Allãh has made it clear that He does not take away any favour axcept when the recepient of that favour shows ingratitude; and He has threatened the ungrateful person very severely: This is because

Allãh does never change a bounty which He has conferred upon a people until they change their own condition; and because Allãh is Hearing, Knowing (8:53); . . . and whoever changes the favour of Allãh after it has come to him, then surely Allãh is severe in requiting (evil) (2:211). And Allãh has set a general parable for its bounties and how it changes when people become ungrateful. He says: And Allãh sets forth a parable: (consider) a town safe and secure to which its means of subsistence come in abundance from every quarter; but it became ungrateful to Allãh's favour, therefore Allãh made it to taste the utmost degree of hunger and fear because of what they wrought (16:112).

The verse beginning from "This day have those who disbelieve", and ending at "Islam as a religion". announces that the religion of the Muslims is completely secured against the disbelievers and is safe from every danger which could come from that side; and no corruption or destruction can infiltrate into it except from the Muslims themselves. That would happen if the Muslims showed ingratitude towards this perfect Divine bounty and rejected this complete religion chosen by Him; then Allãh would take away His favour from them and change it to retribution and affliction and would make them taste the utmost degree of hunger and fear. Unfortunately, the Muslims have done it and Allãh has made them suffer the consequences.

If anyone wants to understand how true is the prophecy of tribulation and trial (which is inferred from the Divine words: fear them not, and fear Me), he should ponder on the condition of the Islamic world today, then he should go back analysing the historical events until he reaches at the roots of these misfortunes and afflictions.

The verses of al-wilãyah (اَلْوِلاَيَة = guardianship, mastership) in the Qur'ãn are fully connected with the threat and warning contained in this verse. Allãh has not cautioned His servants of Himself except when it concerns the wilãyah; and has said in this respect, time and again: . . . and Allãh cautions you of Himself . . . (3:28 & 3:30). To go more deeply in this subject will take us of the scope of this book.

QUR'ÃN: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you and chosen for you Islam as a religion: al-Ikmãl اَلإِكْمَالُ = to perfect) and al-itmãm (اَلإِتْمَامُ = to complete) are near to each other in meaning.

ar-Rãghib has said: "A thing is called perfect when it serves the purpose which it is intended for; and it becomes complete when it reaches a stage where it doesn't need anything extra; a thing is called incomplete when it needs something more."

You can differentiate the meaning of the two words in another way: Effects of the things are of two kinds; some effects spring from it when all its parts and ingredients are in place; if any of its ingredients or conditions is missing, the effect will not take place. We can take the example of the fast; if any of its conditions is violated even for a very small part of the day the fast will be void. Such things are described with the word 'complete". Allãh says: . . . then complete the fast till night . . . (2:187); And the word of your Lord has been completed truly and justly . . . (6:115).

On the other hand, there are the effects which spring from a thing without waiting for completion of all its ingredients. When one part is found, its related effect will appear; if all ingredients are present the desired effect will appear in its entirety. This is described as perfection. Allãh says: . . . but he who cannot find (any offering) should fast for three days during the ḥajj and for seven days when you return; these (make) ten (days) perfect . . . (2:196); . . . and that you should perfect the number . . . (2:185). The effect of some parts of this number are seen as are the effects of the whole number. Arabs say: His affairs are complete and his understanding is perfect; but they do not say: His understanding is complete and his affairs are perfect.

There is a difference between al-ikmãl and at-takmīl (اَلإِكْمَالُ، اَلتَّكْمِيْلُ) as there is between al-itmãm and at-tatmīm (اَلإِتْمَامُ ، اَلتَّتْمِيْمُ). It is the difference between the paradigms of al-if'ãl and at-taf'īl (اَلإِفْعَالُ، اَلتَّفْعِيْلُ). al-If'ãl basically shows instantaneousness of a work while at-taf'īl shows graduality. However, in a wider sense or as a result of literary evolution, the meanings in both paradigms change; sometimes, they become very different from the meaning of the root word, e.g., al-ifrãṭ (اَلإِفْرَاطُ = excess) and at-tafrīṭ (اَلتَّفْرِيْطُ = negligence), etc. Actually, these meanings were attached to such words at some particular occasions and then regular usage made them inseparable and they became like actual meanings.

It appears from the above discourse that the sentence, "This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you", shows that something has been added to the religion, (which is a collection of beliefs, ideologies and laws) today making it perfect; and the Divine bounty and favour (which was something spiritual) was incomplete and without effect until today when it was completed and now the expected effect is going to result from it.

The favour and bounty is the thing which has affinity with nature of the recipient of that bounty. All the things are inter-connected with each other because they are parts of the system of Divine management and in the long run all have affinity with one another; and most, rather all of them are Divine bounties when they are put parallel to each other, as Allāh says: . . . and if you count Allāh's bounties you will not be able to number them . . . (14:34); . . . and made complete to you His favours outwardly and inwardly . . . (31:20).

However, Allāh has described some of these favours naming them as evil, vile, game and play and using similar adjectives which are not paiseworthy; as He says: And let not those who disbelieve think that Our granting them respite is good their souls; We grant them respite only that they may increase in sins; and they shall have a disgraceful chastisement (3:178); And this life of the world is nothing but a sport and a play; and as for the next abode, that most surely is the life . . . (29:64); Let it not deceive you that those who disbelieve go to and fro in the cities (fearlessly). A brief enjoyment! then their abode is hell, and evil is the resting place (3:196-7). There are many other verses like these.

All these verses show that the things which are counted as bounties and Divine favours would really be bounties when they conform with the Divine purpose for which they were given to man. They have been created to serve as the Divine help to man in order that the man cold use them in the way of his real felicity; in other words, when they help the man to be nearer to Allāh through worship and submission to His Mastership. Allāh says: And I have not created the jinn and the human beings except that they should worship Me (51:56).

All the things and faculties which the man uses with the aim of attaining nearness to Allāh and seeking Divine pleasure are the bounties and favours. Otherwise, they will become an affliction and trial. It means that the things in themselves are neutral. They become favour and bounty because they have in themselves the spirit of servitude and with that praiseworthy usage they come under the Divine wilāyah. This wilāyah results in Divine management of the servants' affairs. It follows that the favour in reality is the Divine wilāyah (mastership, guardianship); and a thing will become bounty when it contains something of that wilāyah. Allāh says: Allāh is the guardian (master) of those who believe; He brings them out of the darkness into the light . . . (2:257); That is because Allãh is the Master of those who believe, and because the unbelievers have no master for them (47:11); and He says about His Messenger (s.a.w.a.): But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they make you a Judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then do not find any straitness in their hearts as to what you have decided and submit with total submission (4:65). You may find other similar verses in the Qur'ãn.

Islam is a religionbecause it is a collection of what was sent down from Allãh for guidance of His servants, so that they may worship Him properly; and it is a Divine favour and bounty inasmuch as practically it contains in itself the wilãyah of Allãh, the wilãyah of His Messenger and of those vested with authority (ulu 'l-amr) after him.

The wilãyah of Allãh (i.e., His management of the servants' affairs through the religion) cannot be complete except through the wilãyah of His Messenger; nor will the wilãyah of His Messenger be complete without the wilãyah of those vested with authority after him; and that wilãyah means their management of the religious affairs of the ummah with Divine permission. Allãh says: O you who believe! obey Allãh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you (4:59), we have fully explained this verse before. Again, Allãh says: Only Allãh is your guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay the zakãt while they bow (5:55); and we shall explain the verse, God willing, in its place.

Thus, the verse means as follows: Today, and it is the day when those who disbelieve have despaired of your religion, I have perfected for you the whole religious perceptions (which I had revealed to you before) by making the wilãyah obligatory for you; and I have completed My bounty on you, and it is the wilãyah which means management of the religious affairs with Divine guidance. Until now, you were under the wilãyah of Allãh and His Messenger only; but it could work only upto the time the revelations would be coming down from Allãh; it could not work later when the revelation would be cut off, when the Messenger would not remain among the people to safeguard the Divine religion and defend it. It was essential that somebody should be appointed to carry on this responsibility and be vested with the authority after the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), to act as the overall authority in the affairs of the religion and the ummah.

The wilãyah is a single project; it was incomplete until it was completed with appointment of the one who was vested with the authority after the Prophet.

Now that the religion has became perfect in its legislation and the bounty of wilãyah is completed, I have chosen for you the Islam as religion, which is the religion of monotheism, in which no one is worshipped except Allãh and no one is obeyed (and obedience is a sort of worship) except Allãh and those whose obedience He has made obligatory for you, that is, the Messenger and the waliyy.

The verse makes it clear that the believers are today enjoying the security after they were afraid before, and that Allãh has chosen for them that they should devotedly adhere to Islam, the religion of monotheism. It is compulsory for them that they should worship Allãh without associating anything with Him; they have only to obey Allãh or him whose obedience has been ordered by Allãh. Now, ponder on the Divine words: Allãh has promised to those of you who believe and do good that He will most certainly make them successors in the earth as He made successors those before them, and that He will most certainly establish for them their religion which He has chosen for them, and that He will most certainly, after their fear, give them security in exchange; they shall worship Me, not associating aught with Me; and whoever disbelieves after this, these it is who are the transgressors (24:55). Then place it parallel to the verses under discussion: This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion, so fear them not, and fear Me. This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you and chosen for you Islam as a religion. You will at onece appreciate that this verse is the fulfilment of the promise given in the chapter of "The Light"; the words: they shall worship Me, not associating aught with Me, describe the real purpose of this exercise as may be understood also from the end sentence: and whoever disbelieves after this, these it is who are the transgressors.

The chapter 24, "The Light", was revealed long before the chapter of "The Table" as it contains the story of slander, the verse of flogging, and that of ḥijãb (veil) and other such commandments.

QUR'ĀN: but however is compelled by hunger, not inclining wilfully to sin, then surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful : al-Makhmaṣah (اَلْمَخْمَصَة = hunger); at-tajãnuf (اَلتَّجَانُف = to incline); it denotes inclination of the feet to the outer side; its oposite is at-taḥãnuf

(لِّتَحَانُف) which denotes their inclination to the inner side. The verse, in this context, shows three things:

1. This order is secondary, meant only for emergencies.
2. The permission to take unlawful food is limited to that small amount which removes the pangs of hunger and averts the emergency.
3. The Divine forgiveness and mercy is used in relation to the sins which make one liable to punishment; and likewise, it may be used in connection with the source of those sins, that is, the law contravening which results in sin and brings punishment in its wake.

A DISCOURSE ON SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS

1. Various Views Concerning Eating of Meat:

There is no doubt that man, like all other animals and vegetables, has been provided with alimentary system with which he ingests those material ingredients which he can process to make them a part of his body and thus keep himself alive. So far as the nature is concerned, there is nothing to prevent him from eating whatever he can chew and swallow, the exceptions being the things which bring harm to him or create aversion.

As for harmfulness, the realization comess when he recognizes that the thing which he wants to eat is harmful to his body as, e.g., it is poisonous or things like that; then he restrains himself from eating it; or when he finds that eating it will cause him spiritual harm, like the things which are forbidden in various religions.This self-restraint is ideational.

As for aversion, it emanates from odiousness and dirtiness which repulses man from the thing; a man does not eat his faeces because by nature he thinks it is dirty (although some children and insane persons have been seen eating it). To this natural repulsion is added what results from religious beliefs or various customs prevalent in different societies. For example, the Muslims treat pork as dirty and unclean while the Christians enjoy eating it. In the same way, the Western people eat many animals which the orientals treat as unclean, like crabs, frogs and rats, etc. This type of aversion results from acquired disposition which we call second nature.

It shows that so far as eating of meats is concerned, mankind is divided in numerous categories. The spectrum shows on one side total prohibition and on the other unrestricted indulgence. When he uses some meats he follows the dictates of nature, and when he refrains from some items, it emanates from some ideology, or is a result of his second nature.

The Buddhist system prohibited use of all animals altogether. This is one extreme, and its opposite is the excess which was prevalent among uncivilized people, in Africa and elsewhere, who had no hesitation in eating any meat, even the flesh of man.

The Arabs used to eat the meat of quardrupeds and other animals, even rats and lizards; they ate all types of dead catle which they killed by slaughteringor which died by itself, was strangled or beaten to death; they ate what died as a result of a fall, or by being gored by another animal, or which was killed by beasts of prey. They rediculed the Muslims saying: Why is it that you eat what you kill yourselves and do not eat what has been killed by Allãḥ Many people offer similar objections even today. Some people say: What is the difference between one flesh and the other, when the human body does not get any harm from, especially if it is hygienically prepared, because the digestive system does not differentiate between this and thaṭ

The Arabs also used to eat blood; they filled the intestine with blood, roasted it and offered it to the guests. During famine days, they used to wound their camels with arrows and drank the blood which came gushing out. Even today, eating of blood is common among many non-Muslims communities.

The Chinese Buddhists are more liberal than the ancient Arabs; reportedly, they eat all types of animals including dogs and cats, even the worms, sea-shells and all types of insects.

Islam has charted a middle course, and has allowed the meats which are agreeable to the normal human nature. It has selected in quardrupeds the cattles like sheep, goats, cows and camels (also horse and donkey, although with dislike); among the birds, it disallowed the birds of prey and allowed those other birds which have craw and those which flap their wings more often and do not have talon; in marine animals, it has allowed some categories of fish, details of which may be found in books of sharī'ah.

Even while allowing above-mentioned animals, it has prohibited its blood and that which has died of itself and on which the name of Allãh has not been invoked. The purpose behind these rules is to revitalize the natural canon, inasmuch as the man naturally likes to eat meat. Together with it, Islam respects the correct thinking and normal nature as these too are repulsed from eating those things which may prove harmful to human being or which the human nature thinks odious and unclean.

2. How Allãh Allowed Killing of Animals When the Mercy Rejects iṭ:

It may be asked: The animal has a spirit which is endowed with feelings similar to that which a man has: man hates the torture of slaughtering, the bitter taste of death and is endowed with the natural love of self. These are the feelings which incite a man to flee from every disliked and dangerous situation. This realization of our own feelings demands from us that we should look with respect and mercy on other human beings, because they too feel the same pain as we do, and all souls are equal. The same argument can be advanced for animal species. How can we inflict on animals the sufferings which we ourselves do not accepṭ How can we exchange their sweet life with bitter deatḥ What right do we have to deprive them of the bounty of life which is the best of the bountieṣ Allãh is the most Merciful of all. How can His Mercy allow us to kill an animal for enjoying its meat when both of us are equally His creatureṣ

Reply: This question gives precedence to the feelings over the realities. Legislation follows the real good of humanity and not the emotional feelings. We may expound it as follows: Look minutely at all the things which you find around yourselves; you will see that all of them in their creation and continuity follow the law of continuous change. All things without exception do change to other things; and those other things in their turn do change into these things – directly or indirectly. Nothing comes into being unless another thing loses its existence in the process. Nothing continues living on this earth without something else going out of existence. This material world is the world of change and exchange; or you may say, the world of the eater and the eaten. The earthly compounds eat the earth itself by absorbing its chemicals to themselves changing them to their own images; then after sometime, the earth again eats and destroys them. Again, the vegetable world gets its nourishment from the earth and absorbs the air then later the earth eats it down to its original ingredients, the first elements: and this cycle continues.

How comes the animal world which gets its nourishment from vegetables, water and air. Some animals feed themselves on other animals, like the wild beasts which eat of their preys; and likewise predatory birds eat the pigeons and sparrows. The digestive systems of these carnivorous animals and birds do not accept any other food. The small birds in their turn feed on grain, flies, fleas, insects and mosquitoes, while the mosquitoes feed on blood of man and other animals. Then, finally, the earth devours them all.

Clearly, the system of creation which has overall control on all the creatures, has ordained that man should get nourishment from meats, etc.; then it has guided the various parts of existence towards it. It is the system which has created in human beings the ability to get sustenance from both animals and vegetables. He has in the front of his alimentary system the teeth some of which are made to cut, the others to break, some to tear and others to grind; they are called canines, molars, premolars and incisors; man is not like goat or cow which cannot cut or tear apart, nor is he like beasts of prey which cannot grind or incise.

The faculty of taste with which his mouth is equipped finds the taste of meats pleasant; then other organs of his digestive system likewise find the meats delicious and long for it. All this is a part of creative guidance which proves that the Creator has given him permission to use and eat various meats. How can we separate this creative guidance from lawfulness of the work which this guidance leads to.

Islam is a natural religion. Its only aim is to revive the tracks of nature which the human ignorance has obliterated. It is bound to declare lawful what the creation guides to and the nature decrees. Islamic legislation revives this natural commandment; and in the same way it restores other arrangements which the Creator has ingrained in our nature. We have already mentioned that it confirms the decree of reason that one should abstain from such meats which are harmful physically or spiritually; and it strengthens the inner feelings by prohibiting what the normal human nature dislikes or feels aversion from. These two principles ultimately are based on the Divine management of the creation; and Islam has given credence to them. It has prohibited that which harms the growthof body and has forbidden that which is injurious to the well-being of human society; for example, that which has been slaughtered in the name of other than Allãh or that which has been obtained through gambling and dividingwith arrows and so on; and it has prohibited those repulsive things which the nature abhors.

As for the idea of mercy which prevents one from torturing or killing other living beings, there is no doubt that mercy is a fine gift of Allãh which has been ingrained in the human nature, and in many animals as well, as we have sometimes observed. But the Creator has not given it the status that it should enjoy absolute power over all affairs, or should command unqualified obedience. The creation itself has not given the mercy free rein; otherwise, there would not have been in this world any trace of grief, disease, suffering and various types of tortures and oppressions.

Moreover, human mercy in itself is not like justice, inasmuch as it is not an absolute noble characteristic which admits no restriction. Had it been so, then it would not have been proper to punish an oppressor for his oppression or to penalize a criminal for his crime; nor would we have been allowed to confront a transgression with similar action. If mercy means this, then the earth and all that is on it would perish.

However, Islam has not neglected the demands of mercy altogether, because it is among the creation's gifts. It has ordered us to deal with the animals with mercy. It has forbidden us to torture the animal at the time of slaughter; it doesn't allow to dissect the limbs of the slaughtered animal before it has died, nor is it allowed to skin it while it is alive. The prohibition of strangling an animal or beating it to death comes under this category of rules. Also, it has forbidden to slaughter an animal with another one looking at it. At the time of slaughtering, many rules based on mercy have been laid down, as for example, the animal should be given water before slaughtering, and so on, details of which can be seen in books of jurisprudence.

When all is said and written, the fact remains that Islam is a religion of reason, not of sentiments; it does not give precedence to the dictates of sentiments over the rules which are meant to bring reform in the human society. It accepts only that sentiment which is accepted by the reason; so in the end, that too becomes the dictate of reason.

As for the talk of Divine Mercy and His being the most Merciful of all, do they think that Allãh is a tender-hearted being? Or that His senses are influenced and He feels pity on some things Obviously, these are material and physical characteristics and Allãh is far above such things. The Divine Mercy means that Allãh bestows good on someone who deserves it as much as he deserves it That is why sometimes what we think is punishment turns out to be the Mercy from Him, and vice versa. Consequently, according to the reason, it is not good to neglect or discard a beneficial action by listening to what is suggested by our false mercy. Nor is it allowed to be negligent in legislating the sharī'ah, keeping in view the realities of the creation.

It appears from the above, that Islam follows the dictates of nature when it allows eating of meat, and enforces the the conditions for that, or explains the rules which it has laid down: . . . the nature made by Allāh in which He has made men; there is no altering of Allāh's creation; that is the right religion, but most people do not know (30:30).

3. Why Does Islam Insist on Slaughter?

It is another question branching from the previous one: We accept that eating meats is allowed by the human nature. Then why did not Islam restrict it to that meat which comes into hand after an animal's deaṭh It could have allowed that meat which is obtained when an animal dies by itself. Such a rule would have reconciled the creative order of lawfulness of meat with the demand of Mercy which forbids man to torture an animal by killing or slaughter; there was no need to lay down special rites of slaughtering.

Its reply is clear from what we have said in the preceding question. Mercy in this meaning is not to be necessarily pursued; in fact, following the dictates of such mercy will nullify the norm of realities. However, as explained earlier, Islam has not spared any effort to deal with the animals mercifully, as much as was possible in this respect; it has been done in response to this fine human instinct.

Moreover, if we restrict the lawfulness of meat to the one obtained from a dead body, the only result will be the spread of diseases and physical harm which in itself is against the demands of mercy. Such an order will create a critical situation in general which the reason says must be avoided[35].

[35] Why invoking the Name of Allāh?: The animals have not been created by us; they are the creatures of Allāh. It is His favour and grace that He has allowed us to use their meat. Therefore, it is necessary to invoke His name at the time of slaughtering them, so that we may show our gratitude to Allāh and establish our right for killing and eating them.

Why facing the qiblah?: As for facing the direction of qiblah, its reason is not difficult to understand. It is the same reason for which we are ordered to face towards Mecca during prayers And that reason is the manifestation of the universal unity of the Muslims, all of whom turn towards the Ka`bah for prayers and on certain prescribed occasions like slaughtering. (Your Questions Answered, vol.7, by S.S. Akhtar Rizvi)

TRADITIONS I

‘Ikrimah narrates from Ibn ‘Abbãs that he said, "No verse was revealed (with the words): O you who believe! but ‘Alī is its chief and its head. Allãh has admonished the companions of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) in more than one place, but He has never mentioned ‘Alī except with good (words)." (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī)

The author says: The same ḥadīth upto the words "its head" has been narrated in Tafsīru 'l-burhãn from Muwaffaq ibn Aḥmad from ‘Ikrimah from Ibn ‘Abbãs; al-‘Ayyãshī also has narrated it from ‘Ikrimah; and we have quoted this ḥadīth earlier from ad-Durru 'l-manthūr. Some traditions quote ar-Riḍã (a.s.) as saying: "There is not in the Qur’ãn: O you who believe! except about us." This ḥadīth is based on the flow of Qur’ãn or describes the esoteric meaning of the revelation.

‘Abdullãh ibn Sinãn says, "I asked Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) about the words of Allãh: O you who believe! flfil the covenants. He said, '(It means) agreements'" (ibid.)

The author says: al-Qummī has also narrated it in his at-Tafsīr from him.

ash-Shaykh aṭ-Ṭūsī narrates through his chain from Muḥammad ibn Muslim that he said, "I asked of one the two (i.e., the 5th or the 6th Imãm, a.s.) about the words of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: The Cattle quadrupeds are made lawful for you. The Imãm said, 'The foetus in th wom of its mother when hair or wool grows on its body, then its mother's slaughter is also its slaughter and this is what Allãh has meant (here).'" (at-Tahdhīb)

The author says: This ḥadīth is narrated in al-Kãfī and al-Faqīh from Muḥammad ibn Muslim from one of the two (a.s.); al-‘Ayyãshī in his Tafsīr has narrated this theme from Muḥammad ibn Muslim from one of the two, and from Zurãrah from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.); and al-Qummī has also narrated it in his Tafsīr; and aṭ-Ṭabrisī has narrated it in Majma‘u 'l-bayãn from Abū Ja‘far and Abū ‘Abdillãh (peace be on them).

al-Qummī writes in his Tafsīr under the words of Allãh: O you who believe! do not violate the signs appointed by Allãh . . . : The signs: Iḥrãm, ṭawãf, prayer in the place of Ibrãhīm, running between Ṣafã and Marwã and other rituals are all among the signs appointed by Allãh. Also, it is among the signs that when a man drives his sacrifice for ḥajj and puts some signs on it, as for example, if he wounds the camel's hump or some other part of its skin or puts a garland (of old choes) on its neck in order to make the people know that it was a sacrificial animal so that nobody would meddle with it. This is called ash-sha'ãir (اَلشَّعَائِر = sign,indications) because it indicates to the people its purpose. The words: nor the sacred month, indicate here the month of Dhi 'l-ḥijjah which is one of the sacred months; nor the offerings, points to the animal which is driven by the pilgrim after he wears iḥrãm; nor the symbolic garlands – the garland is made of the shoes in which he has prayed; nor those going to the Sacred House – those who go for pilgrimage of the House. (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī) aṭ-Ṭabrisī says, "Abū Ja'far al-Bãqir (a.s.) said, 'This verse was revealed concerning a man from Banū Rabī'ah who was called al-Ḥuṭam.'" aṭ-Ṭabrisī goes on to say, as-Suddī has said, 'al-Ḥuṭam ibn Hind al-Bakrī came until he reached the Prophet alone, and he had left his group outside Medina; then he asked, "To what do you call (us)?" – The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had already told his companions, "Today will come to you from Banū Rabī'ah (a man) who speaks with the tongue of Satan" – When the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) replied, he said, "Give me some time; probably I wil accept Islam; and there are people who I should consult." Then he went out. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, "Surely he entered with a kãfir face and went out with a treacherous back." Then, al-Ḥuṭam passed by some camels of Medina which were left to pasture, and he took all of them and went away; and he was singing (the following lines):

Tonight Ḥuṭam rolled up with animal drivers,
He is not a herdsman of camles nor a shepherd,
Nor is he a butcher working on a butcher's block,
They all were asleep, but the son of Hind did not sleep,
The night was passing and a young man was enduring it who is straight like an arrow,
With well-developed legs and smooth feet.

Then, next year he came for ḥajj and had put symbolic garlands on the neck of (those) camels. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was thinking of sending some people to him. Then this verse was revealed: nor those going to the Sacred House.'" (Majma'u 'l-bayãn) aṭ-Ṭabrisī further says, "Ibn Zayd has said that it was revealed on the day Mecca was conquered about those polytheists who were coming to the House and saying talbīyyah of `umrah. The Muslims said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! These too are polytheists like these (Meccans). Let us aid them.' Then Allãh revealed this verse."

The author says: aṭ-Ṭabarī has narrated the first story from as-Suddī and ‘Ikrimah and the second one from Ibn Zayd; ad-Durru 'l-manthūr narrates the second story through Ibn Abī Ḥãtim from Zayd ibn Aslam and there it is said that it was on the day of al-Ḥudaybiyyah; but neither story conforms with what is almost unanimously agreed by the exegetes and the narrators that the chapter of "The Table" was revealed in the last pilgrimage. In other words, the Divine orders: . . . the idolators are nothing but unclean, so they shall not approach the Sacred Mosque after this (very) year . . . (9:28); . . . then slay the idolaters wherever you find them . . . (9:5), were already revealed before the Divine words: nor those going to the Sacred House. So, there is no reason why should this last order be taken to forbid confronting the idolworshippers when they go to the Sacred House, [because they had already ceased to visit it].

Probably, something from these two or similar stories was the reason of the traditions narrated from Ibn ‘Abbãs, Mujãhid, Qatãdah and aḍ-Ḍaḥḥãk that the words: nor those going to the Sacred House, are abrogated by the words: then slay the idolators wherever you find them, and the words: the idolators are nothing but unclean, so they shall not approach the Sacred Mosque after this (very) year. al-Qummī also has written about this abrogation in his Tafsīr and it seems that that too is a tradition. But all these traditions should be discarded because the chapter of "The Table" was the last to be revealed and it has been narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) that this chapter is abrogating, not abrogated. Moreover, the Divine words: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . , totally refute the idea that some of its verses would be abrogated. Keeping all this in view, the words: nor those going to the Sacred House, may be taken to be an explanation of the words which follow: and let not the hatred of a people – because they hindered you from the Sacred Mosque – incite you to exceed limits. You should not violate the sanctity of the House they had in the past hindered you from the Sacred House; Nor should you commit transgretion against those who had hindered you from the sacred Mosque before; don't commit any sin like murder against them, nor any lesser transgression and injustice; rather you should cooperate with each other in righteousness and piety.

Aḥmad and ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd have narrated about the verse: and help one another in righteousness and piety; and al-Bukhãrī has narrated in his Tãrīkh – all from Wãbiṣah that he said: "I came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and I had intended that I would not leave any item of righteousness and sin without asking him about it. (The Prophet) said to me: 'O Wãbiṣah! Should I tell you what you have come to ask about or you would ask?' I said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! You tellme.' He said, 'You have come to ask about righteousness and sin.' Then the Prophet joined his three fingers and kept poking them at my chest and he was telling, 'O Wãbiṣah! Ask your heart, ask your heart, righteousness is which the heart gets tranquility and you get peace of mind, and the sin is that which upsets (your) heart and creates uncertainty – even if people give you rullings and rullings.'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Aḥmad, ‘Abd bin Ḥamīd, Ibn Ḥibbãn, aṭ-Ṭabarãnī, al-Ḥãkim (and he has said that it is correct) and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Abū Amãmah (that he said), "A man asked the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) about sin. The Prophet said: 'Whatever makes your soul restless, leave it.' He said: 'Then what is īmãn?' The Prophet said, 'Whoever is grieved for his evil (deed) and is pleased with his good (deed) is a believer.’" (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah, Aḥmad, al-Bukhãrī (in al-Adab), Muslim, at-Tirmidhī, al-Ḥãkim and al-Bayhaqī (in his Shu‘abu 'l-īmãn) have narrated from an-Nawwãs ibn Sam‘ãn that he said, 'The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was asked about righteousness and sin. He said, 'Righteousness is good behaviour and sin is that which keeps your soul restless and you do not like that people should come to know about it.'" (ibid.)

The author says: As you see, these traditions are based on the words of Allãh: And the soul and Him who made it perfect, then He inspired it to understand what is wrong for it and right for it (91:7-8); and they support what we have written earlier about the meaning of sin.

aṭ-Ṭabrisī has written: There is a difference of opinion about it (i.e., the Divine words: nor those going to the Sacred House). It has been said that it is abrogated by the words of Allãh: then slay the idolaters wherever you find them, and this has been written by most of the exegetes; on the other hand, it is said that nothing from this chapter has been abrogated nor from this verse, because it was not lawful to start fighting with the polytheists in the sacred months except when they start it. Then he has said that it is narrated from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.).

aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chain from Abãn ibn Taghlib from Abū Ja'far Muḥammad ibn 'Alī al-Bãqir (blessings of Allãh be on them) that he said: "Dead body, blood and flesh of swine is known: that on which any other name than that of Allãh has been invoked, that is, what has been slaughtered on idols. As for the strangled (animal), the fire-worshippers did not eat slaughtered animals rather they ate dead ones; they used to strangle cow and sheep, and when it died, they ate it; and that beaten to death: they used to tie its legs and beat it until it died and then they ate it; and that killed by a fall: they used to blindfold it and throw it from a roof, when it died, they ate it; and that killed by being smitten with the horn: they made the rams fight each other and when one of them died, they ate it; and that which wild beasts have eaten, except what you slaughter: they used to eat what was killed by wolf, lion and bear; so Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, prohibited; and what is sacrificed on stones set up (for idols): they (the zoroastrians) used to sacrificed animals in their fire-temple; and the Qurayshites used to worship trees and stones and slaughtered animals on them; and that you divide by arrows; that is a transgression:" He said: "They used to take an animal and divide it into ten parts[36], then they gathered and took out the arrows (and they gave it to a man) and there were 10 arrows, seven of which had got shares and three were without any share. Those with shares were: al-fadhdh, at-taw'am, al-musbil, an-nãfis, al-ḥils, ar-raqīb and al-mu'allã, al-fadhdh had one share, at-taw'am two, al-musbil three, an-nãfis four, al-ḥils five, ar-raqīb six and al-mu'allã had seven shares. Those without share were as-safīḥ, al-munīḥ and al-waghad; and the animals price was paid by those who did not get any share; and it was gambling, therefore, Allãh prohibited it." (Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh)

The author says: The meanings given in the tradition in explanation of the strangled animal, that beaten to death and that killed by a fall, aim at explaining the verse through examples (as is clear from the next tradition). Also, the exception of except what you slaughter, attached to and that which wild beasts have eaten, and likewise the words, that is a transgression, which qualifies and that you divide by the arrows, do not mean that this exception or qualification is limited to these single items.

'Ayyūq ibn Qasūṭ narrates from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) concerning these words, that he said, "The strangled animal is that which is strangulated in the neck; that beaten to death is such a sick animal which doesn't feel the pain of slaughter, it does not agitate its limbs nor blood comes out of it; that killed by a fall is that animal which falls down from roof, etc.; that killed by being smitten with the horn is that which is gored by another animal. (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

al-Ḥasan ibn ʻAlī al-Washshāʼ narrates from Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍā (a.s.); he says, "I heard him saying that the animals which fall from high place, those smitten with the horn and those which wild beasts have eaten, if you get chance of slaughtering it, then (you may) eat it." (ibid.)

Muḥammad ibn ʻAbdillāh narrates from one of his companions that he said, "I said to Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), 'May I be made your ransom! Why did Allāh forbid the dead animal, blood and flesh of swine?' He said, Verily when Allāh, the Blessed, the High, prohibited these to His servants and made the other things lawful to them, it was not because Allāh liked these prohibited things for Himself, Blessed and High is He, nor did He dislike other things so allowed His servants to use it. The fact is that He created the creatures and knew what would sustain their bodies and keep them in good health. Therefore, He made it lawful for them as a favour from Himself for their own well-being; and He knew what would be harmful to them, so He forbade it to them and made it unlawful; yet He allowed it for those facing emergencies, and made it lawful to him when his body could not be sustained otherwise; so He ordered him to partake from it to that amount which would avert the emergency, but not any more.' Then the Imām (a.s.) said, 'As for the dead body, nobody goes near it or eats it but his body becomes weak and thin, and his strength is lost and his generation is discontinued; and one who (habitually) eats dead body will not die but unexpectedly. As for blood, it creates burning thirst and hard-heartedness, mercilessness unkindness; one cannot be sure that he would not kill his child or parents; he cannot be trusted about his firends or companions. As for the flesh of swine, verily Allāh had transformed some groups in various forms, resembling swine, monkey, bear and other such animals; then He prohibited (His servants) to eat the animals of similar shapes in order that they should not be polluted by it and should not take the Divine punishment lightly. As for intoxicants, Allāh has made it unlawful because of its effect and disorder.' Then he said, 'Verily the one addicted to liquor is like the idolwoshipper; it creates in him tremor and takes away his radiance; it destroys his sense of honour, and incites him to indulge in unlawful activities like bloodshed and fornication; when he is intoxicated, there is no guarantee that he would not assault sexually the women who are within his prohibited degree [like mother, daughter or sister] without being aware of it. The liquor does not lead the drinker except to every type of evil.'" (ibid.)

TRADITIONS II

Abu 'l-Muayyad Muwaffaq ibn Aḥmad [al-Khwãrazmī] has written in his book Faḍãil ʻAlī; he says, "Informed me the chief of the memorisers Shahrdãr ibn Shīrwayh ibn Shahrdãr ad-Daylamī among what he wrote to me from Hamadãn, informed us Abu 'l-Fatḥ ʻAbdūs ibn ʻAbdillãh ibn ʻAbdūs al-Hamadãnī in writing, narrated to us ʻAbdullãh ibn Isḥãq al-Baghawī, narrated to us al-Ḥusayn ibn ʻAlīl al-Ghanawī, narrated to us Muḥammad ibn ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥmãn az-Zarrã', narrated to us Qays ibn Ḥafṣ, narrated to us ʻAlī ibn al-Ḥusayn, narrated to us Abū Hurayrah from Abū Saʻīd al-Khudrī, 'Verily, the day the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) called the people to Ghadīr Khumm, he ordered so that the thorns under the trees were swept aside, and that was a Thursday, when he called the people to ʻAlī and holding his arm, he lifted it until people were looking at the whiteness of his armpits; then both did not separate from one another until this verse was revealed: This day have I perfected for you your religion and have completed My favour on you and have chosen for you Islam as your religion. Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, "Allãhu Akbar! for perfecting the religion and completing the bounty and for pleasure of the Lord with my Messengership and the wilãyah of ʻAlī." Then he said, "O Allãh! Love him who loves him (ʻAlī) and be enemy of him who has enmity with him (ʻAlī) and help him who helps him (`Alī) and forsake him who forsakes him (ʻAlī)." '

"Ḥassãn ibn Thãbit said, 'Do you allow me, O Messenger of Allãh! to compose some lines of poetry?' He said, 'Say it, Allãh will send it down (to you).' So, Ḥassãn ibn Thãbit said:

On the day of Ghadīr their Prophet was calling them,
At Khumm, and how loud was the Prophet as a caller!
That verily I am Your Mawlã, Yes, and your Waliyy,
So they all said and did not show there any blindness:
Your God is our Mawlã and you are our Waliyy.
And you will not find anyone in the creation disobeying this order.
So he said to him, 'Stand up O ʻAlī! because surely,

I am pleased for you to be the Imām and Leader after me.' " al-Ḥāfiẓ Abū Nu'aym has narrated a similar ḥadīth through his chains from Qays Ibn Rabī' from Abū Hārūn al-'Abdī from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī; and he has added four lines more at the end of the poem:

So whomsoever I am the Master then this is his Master,
Therefore you must be his true helpers and lovers.
Then he prayed (saying): "O Allāh! be friend of his lover and be the enemy of him who has enmity towards 'Alī."

Also, he narrates through his chains from 'Alī ibn 'Āmir from Abu 'l-Ḥajāf from al-A'mash from 'Aḍḍah that he said: "This verse came down to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) about 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib: O Messenger! deliver what has been revealed to you from Your Lord . . . ; and (also) Allāh has said: This day have I perfected for you your religion and have completed My favour on you and have chosen for you Islam as your religion." (ibid.)

Ibrāhīm ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥamawaynī said, informed me ash-Shaykh Tāju 'd-Dīn Abū Ṭālib 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn ibn 'Uthmān ibn 'Abdillāh al-Khāzin; he said, informed us al-Imām Burhānu 'd-Dīn Nāṣir ibn Abi 'l-Makārim al-Maṭrazī through Ijāzah; he said, informed us al-Imām Akhtab Khwārazm Abu 'l-Muayyad Muwaffaq ibn Aḥmad al-Makkī al-Khwārazmī; he said, informed me the Chief of the memorizers in what he wrote to me from Hamadān; informed us ar-Raīs Abu 'l-Fatḥ in writing; narrated to us 'Abdullāh ibn Isḥāq al-Baghawī; informed us al-Ḥasan ibn 'Aqīl al-Ghanawī; informed us Muḥammad ibn 'Abdillāh az-Zarrā'; informed us Qays ibn Ḥafṣ, he said, narrated to me 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn al-'Abdī from Abū Hārūn al-'Abdī from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī (and he narrated like the first tradition). (ibid.)

al-Ḥamawaynī has also narrated from the Chief of the memorizers and Abū Manṣūr Shahrdār ibn Shīrwayh ibn Shahdār ad-Daylamī; he said informed us al-Ḥasan ibn Aḥmad ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ḥaddād al-Muqri' al-Ḥāfiẓ from Aḥmad ibn 'Abdillāh ibn Aḥmad; he said, informed us Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad ibn 'Alī; he said, informed us Muḥammad ibn 'Uthmān ibn Abī Shaybah; he said, informed us Yaḥyā al-Ḥammānī; he said, informed us Qays ibn ar-Rabī' from Abū Hārūn al-'Abdī from Abū Sa'īd al-Kudrī (and narrated like the first tradition) (ibid.) al-Ḥamawaynī has said after this tradition: "This tradition has many paths to Abū Sa'd ibn Mālik al-Khudrī al-Anṣārī."

as-Sayyid ar-Raḍī (r.a.) has narrated from Muḥammad ibn Isḥãq from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) from his father, from his grandfather that he said, "When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) returned from the Last Pilgrimage, he came down at a place called Ḍawjãn; then this verse came down: O Messenger! deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord; and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message, and Allãh will protect you from the people (5:67). When it was revealed that he would be protected from the people, he (ordered to) call: The prayer in congregation! So, the people gathered near him. He said, 'Who has more authority on you than you have yourselveṣ' All of them cried out and said, 'Allãh and His Messenger.' So he held the hand of 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib and said, 'Whomsoever I am the Master, 'Alī is his Master. O Allãh! befriend him who befriends him, and be enemy of him who is his enemy, and help him who helps him, and forsake him who forsakes him; because he is from me and I am from him, and his status with me is like that of Hārūn with Mūsã except that there is no prophet after me.' It was the last obligation which Allãh, the High, imposed on the ummah of Muḥammad. Then Allãh, the High, revealed to His Prophet: This day have I perfected for you your religion and have completed My favour on you and have chosen for you Islam as a religion."

Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said, "So they accepted from the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) all the obligations that Allãh had imposed on them: the prayer, fast, zakãt and ḥajj, and confirmed his truthfulness in all these things."

Ibn Isḥãq said, "I said to Abū Ja'far (a.s.), 'When was thaṭ' He said, 'On 19th[37] Dhi 'l-ḥijjah 10 AH[38] during his return journey from the last pilgrimage and there were between that and [the death of] the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) 100 days[39], and had heard the Messenger of Allãh at Ghadīr Khumm twelve[40].'" (al-Manãqibu 'l-fãkhirah)

Ibnu 'l-Maghãzilī narrates through his chains from Abū Hurayrah that he said, "Whoever will fast on the 18th day of Dhi 'l-ḥijjah, Allãh will write for him the fast of sixty months; and that is the day of Ghadīr Khumm. At that place, the Prophet took (from the Muslims) the bay'ah of 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib and said, 'Whomsoever I am the Master ‘Alī is his Master, O Allāh! befriend him who befriends him, and be enemy of him who is his enemy, and help him who helps him.' Then ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb said to him, 'Congratulations! Congratulations! to you, O son of Abū Ṭćlib! you became my mawlā and mawlā of every believing man and woman.' Then Allāh, the High, sent down the verse: This day have I perfected for you your religion and have completed . . . " (al-Manāqib)

[38] The correct date is 18th Dhi 'l-ḥijjah, not 17th or 19th. (tr.)
[39] This too is not correct. Between Ghadīr day and the death of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) were 70 days (according to the Shī`ah and Sunnī traditions). (tr.)

There are traditions like the first one narrated from Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī in al-Manāqib of Ibn Marduwayh and in Saraqātu 'sh-shi‘r of al-Marzubānī.

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr the two traditions from Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī and Abū Hurayrah, and has said that the chains of narrators of both are weak. And it has been narrated through many chains that end at the companions like ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, Mu‘āwiyah and Sumrah that the verse revealed on the day of ‘Arafah in the Last Pilgrimage and it was a Friday. The reliable among these traditions is that which has been narrated from ‘Umar. (as-Suyūṭī) has narrated it from al-Ḥamīdī, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Aḥmad, al-Bukhārī, Muslim, ar-Tirmidhī, an-Nasā’ī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, Ibn Ḥibbān and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) from Ṭāriq ibn Shahāb from ‘Umar; and has narrated from Ibn Rāhawayh (in his al-Musnad) and ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd from Abu ’l-‘Āliyah from ‘Umar; and also, from Ibn Jarīr, from Qubayṣah ibn Abī Dhuayb from ‘Umar; and also from al-Bazzāz from Ibn ‘Abbās and apparently, he narrates from ‘Umar.

As for the weakness of the chains of narrators of the two traditions, it will not help him at all in proving the weakness of the text of the tradition. We have explained clearly in the foregoing Commentary that the theme of the noble verse does not fit on any hyphothesis except the even of Ghadīr. All other meanings claimed for it are clearly off the mark. Therefore, the two traditions and others of the same meaning conform with the Book of Allāh – contrary to all other traditions – therefore, only these traditions have to be accepted.

Moreover, these traditions which show that the verse was revealed on the subject of al-wilāyah – there are more than twenty traditions from the Sunnī and Shī‘ah chains – are closely related to the traditions describing the reason of revelation of the Divine words: O Messenger! deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord . . . (5:67) – and there are more than fifteen such traditions narrated by both the sects – and all this together is connected with the tradition of Ghadīr: 'Whomsoever I am the Master, ‘Alī is his Master;' and it is a mutawãtir tradition narrated by a huge number of the companions and a great many scholars of both sects have accepted that it is mutawãtir.

And it is agreed upon that this had happened when the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was returning from Mecca to Medina; and this wilãyah (if it is not to be taken as a jest or joke) is an obligatory order like loving the friends of Allãh and keeping aloof from His enemies, which have been explicitly ordered in many verses of the Qur'ãn. Keeping allthis in view, it is not possible to say that this obligatory order of wilãyah was revealed after the revelation of the verse: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . Obviously, this verse must have been revealed after the legislation of al-wilãyah. If there are traditions which show something different from this reality, then they are not to be relied upon.

You have already known what is the position of the tradition which as-Suyūṭī has narrated from 'Umar. However, there is one thing to which attention should be drawn. If we look at the two noble verses: O Messenger! deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord; and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His Message, and Allãh will protect you from the people (as we shall describe its meaning later on), and: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . , together with the traditions written about them by both sects, and the mutawãtir traditions of Ghadīr; and then we study the internal condition of the Islamic Society during the last days of the Prophet of Islam (s.a.w.a.), and deeply ponder on all this phenomenon, we will feel certain that the order of al-wilãyah was already revealed some days before the day of Ghadīr, but the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was hesitating to announce it before the masses, fearing that people would not accept it or would confront the Prophet with evil intentions, which would result in damaging his mission; he was postponing its announcment from today to tomorrow until the the Divine order came: O Prophet! deliver what has been revealed to you . . . , and this did not leave him any room for delaying.

Accordingly, it may be surmised that Allãh had revealed a major part of this chapter including: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . , together with the order of al-wilãyah; and all this happened on the day of 'Arafah; but the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) postponed the announcement of al-wilãyah upto Ghadīr Khumm, although he recited the verse referring to it on the day of 'Arafah. As for the traditions which sho its revelation on the day of Ghadīr, it is not improbable that the idea sprang because the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had recited this verse at the time when he announced the order of al-wilãyah as the verse was revealed for the same purpose.

If we accept this hypothesis, then there would not remain any contradiction between those traditions which say that the verse was revealed about al-wilãyah and those which say that it was revealed on the day of ‘Arafah, as has been narrated from ‘Umar, ‘Alī, Mu‘ãwiyah and Sumrah. There would have been contradiction if one group of the traditions had said that it was revealed on the day of Ghadīr Khumm and the other had said that it was revealed on the day of ‘Arafah.

As for those traditions which take the verse to mean that the religion was perfected by ḥajj, etc., these are merely the narrators' own interpretations. They are supported neither by the Book of Allãh nor by any reliable explanation of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

The hypothesis given above may be inferred from the tradition narrated by al-‘Ayyãshī in his Tafsīr from Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad al-Khuzã‘ī from his father that he said, "I heard Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) saying, 'When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) reached ‘Arafah on Friday, Jibrīl came to him and said, "Verily Allãh sends you salutations and tells you: 'Say to your ummah: "This day I have prefected your religion with wilãyah of ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib and completed on you My favour and chosen for you Islam as a religion; and I will not descend on you people after this. I have brought for you the prayer, zakãt, fast and ḥajj and this is the fifth obligation and I shall not come to you after these four except with that (fifth one).'" """

A part from that, there is another difficulty in the tradition narrated from ‘Umar regarding the revelation of this verse on the day of ‘Arafah. All these traditions together describe that some People of the Book – and some name him as Ka‘b – said to ‘Umar, "Verily there is a verse in the Qur’ãn if like that would have been revealed on us, the Jews, we would have taken the day of its revelation as an ‘īd (feast) and the verse is: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . " ‘Umar said to him, "By Allãh! Surely I know the day and it was the day of ‘Arafah during the Last Pilgrimage."

The wording of the tradition as narrated by Ibn Rãhwayh and ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd from Abu ’l-‘Ãliyah is as follows: He says, "They were near‘`Umar and mentioned this verse. A man from the People of the Book said: 'Had we known on which day this verse was revealed we would have taken it as an ‘īd.' ‘Umar said, 'All praise is for Allãh who has made it ‘īd for us and also the next day; it was revealed on the day of ‘Arafah and the next day is the day of sacrifice; thus He perfected the affairs for us; and we understood that the affairs after this will go on deteriorating.'"

The theme mentioned at the end of this tradition has been narrated in another way. It is written in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Ibn Abī Shaybah and Ibn Jarīr from ʻAntarah that he said, 'When the verse was revealed: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . – and it was the day of the great ḥajj – ʻUmar started weeping; the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said to him, 'Why are you weeping?' He said, 'The thing which has made me weep is that we were (until now) enjoying the increase in our religion. Now that it has become perfect then nothing ever becomes perfect but starts deteriorating.' The Prophet said, 'You are right.'"

There is another tradition resembling a little with the above which is narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Aḥmad from ʻAlqamah ibn ʻAbdillāh al-Muznī who said, "Narrated to me a man who said, 'I was in the gathering room of ʻUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb. ʻUmar said to one of those present, "How did you hear the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) describing Islam?" He said, "I heard the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) saying, 'Verily Islam started [and grew as a camel grows from] a newborn calf, then it grows two teeth[41], then four, then six and then it reaches its peak strength with last set of teeth.' ʻUmar said, "Then there is nothing after completion except deteriorating."'"

As you see, these traditions are intended to show that this verse of "Perfection of Religion" was revealed on the day of ʻArafah for a specific purpose. According to them, it wanted to draw the attention of the people to what they were witnessing of triumph of the religion and its independence at Mecca during ḥajj season.

They want to interprete the perfection of religion and completion of Divine favour as the cleanness of Meccan atmosphere from pollution of polytheism, as all the affairs had come under the Muslims' control; on that day there was no religion there except Islam; and the Muslims had no need to fear their enemies or to remain on guard.

In other words, perfection of religion and completion of the bounty means perfection of what they had been given; they acted upon it without ther being any enemy to mingle with them. According to this interpretation, the religion here does not refer to the sharīʻah which was laid down by Allāh and which contained tenets, ideologies,

[41] "Two teeth" means two in the upper jaw and two in the lower. The same is the case with four and six teeth. (tr.)

beliefs and the religious laws; and likewise, Islam in this verse refers to that Islam which was in their hands and which they followed. We may say that according to these traditions, religion means the form of the religion which could be witnessed in their actions and the same will be the status of Islam. It is this phenomenon which could be subjected to deterioration after reaching its peak; but as for the basic ideologies, faith and the laws laid down by Allãh, they cannot deteriorate after perfection (the idea which is inferred from ‘Umar's words: 'nothing ever becomes perfect but starts deteriorating'). Surely it is the system prevalent in the creation throughout the human history; and the society too is governed by this law; but the religion cannot come under the sway of these social laws. Of course, we are not talking here with those who believe that the religion too is a social phenomenon which is subject to change and evolution like other social formulas.

When you ponder on these matters, you will realize that this interpretation of ‘Umar is not free from shortcomings:

First: What he understood about the meaning of perfection of religion is not applicable to the Divine words: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . , as we have explained earlier.

Second: How is it possible that Allãh should count the religion, in the form with which it appeared to the people, as perfect and could ascribe it to His Ownself as a matter of benevolence, just because the land was free from apparent idolworshippers and the society was apparently made up of the Muslims and cleansed from the polytheist enemies – while the very society contained those who were more harmful then the polytheists and more undermining to the Islamic system. They were the hypocrites who had their own secret societies and had infiltrated the inner circle of Islam. They sabotaged the system, turned the affairs upside down, created doubts in the believers' hearts and surreptitiously put in the religion un-Islamic ideas. They posed a greater threat to Islam; and a great number of Qur’ãnic verses and chapters had warned the Muslims of their machinations; as for example, the chapter of "The Hypocrites", and the warnings given in the chapters of "The Cow", "Women", "The Table", "The Spoils". "Repentence " and "The Confederates" and so on.

I wish I knew where did their gang go? How their fire died ouṭ By which strategy their plots were thwarted? And how their falsity was obliterated? When they were present among the Muslims, how was it possible for Allãh to remind the Muslims of His Benevolence just because the exterior of religion had been perfected and apparent bounties had been completed for them? How could He be pleased by the apparent features of Islam merely because He had banished their idolworshipping enemies from Mecca, while the hypocrites were more inimical towards the Muslims, their danger was greater and it has left bitter results after the prophet. All this may be confirmed from the words of Allãh when He addresses His Prophet about them: They are the enemy, therefore beware of them (63:4).

How could Allãh portray it as His Benevolence to the Muslims and describe as perfect the appearance of religion whose inner reality was thiṣ Or praise His Bounties as complete when they were mixed with afflictionṣ Or announce His pleasure with the shape of an Islam whose reality was suchṇ Allãh, the High, the Great, has said: Nor could I take those who lead (others) astray for aiders (18:51); and He has said about hypocrites – but if you are pleased with them, yet surely Allãh is not pleased with the transgressing people (9:96). (In this verse, the pleasure of Allãh is exclusively related to their hypocricy.)

The verse under discussion is absolutely general and no word has been restricted in any way; it speaks about unconditional perfection, completion and pleasure and unrestricted religion, bounty and Islam.

Objections: The verse, as mentioned earlier, is the fulfilment of the promise given in the chapter of the "Light": Allãh has promised to those of you who believe and do good that He will most certainly make them successors in the earth as He made successors in the earth as He made successors those before them, and that He will most certainly establish for them their religion which He has chosen for them, and that He will most certainly, after their fear, give them security in exchange; they shall worship Me, not associating aught with Me; (24:55).

This verse, as you see, promises them to establish for them their religion which He has chosen for them. Parallel to that, we find in this verse: I have perfected for you your religion, and, I have chosen for you Islam as a religion. Thus, perfection of their chosen religion means establishing it for them, i.e., cleansing it from mingling of the polytheists. As for the hypocrites, their problem was different, not connected with this mingling. It is the connotation to which those traditions point which say that it was revealed on the day of ‘Arafah. That is why it is said that it refers to the fact that the religious rites, and the Muslims who performed it, had been rescued from mingling of the polytheists.

Reply: There is no doubt that: This day I have perfected . . . , points to the fulfilment of the promise given in the verse: Allāh has promised to those of you who believe and do good . . . (24:55); Also, it is accepted that: perfected for your your religion is parallel to the words: most certainly establish their religion which He has chosen for them; but the verse of the chapter of the "Light" begins with the words: Allāh has promised to those of you who believe and do good. Obviously, it was a selected group of the Muslims; appearance of whose deeds fully tallied with their realities, their exterior was one with their inner condition their religious actions were parallel to the religion which was ordained by Allāh. Therefore, establishment of their chosen religion meant perfecting that chosen religion which was in the knowledge, and under the decree, of Allāh, by moulding it in the mould of legislation and gathering all its parts together for them, in order that they should worship Allāh according to that religion, when the unbelievers had despaired of their religion.

That is, as we had said earlier, that perfection of religion means that Allāh perfected it from the point of legislation; now no new obligation was to be revealed after this verse. It does not mean that their actions and particularly their ḥajj was cleansed from the rites and ḥajj of the idolworshippers. In other words, perfection of religion did happen when Allāh raised it to the highest level of development until there was no question of its ever getting deteriorated after completion.

al-Qummī says: "Narrated to me my father from Ṣafwān ibn Yaḥyā from al-'Ulā' from Muḥammad ibn Muslim from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said, 'The last obligatory order which Allāh revealed was al-wilāyah; therefore no obligatory order was revealed; then was revealed: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . at Kurā' al-Ghamīm; and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) established (announced) it at Juḥfah. After that, no obligatory order was revealed.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: This theme has been narrated by aṭ-Ṭabrisī in Majma'u 'l-bayān from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.); and al-'Ayyāshī has narrated it in his Tafsīr from Zurārah from al-Bāqir (a.s.).

ash-Shaykh has narated through his chain from Muḥammad ibn Ja'far ibn Muḥammad from his father Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) from the Commander of the Believers 'Alī (a.s.) that he said, "I heard the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) saying, 'The foundation of Islam is on five characteristics, on the two *shahādah*s and two associates.' He was told, 'As for the two *shahãdah*s, we know them, but what are the two associateṣ' He said, 'The prayer and the zakãt, because one of them will not be accepted without the other; and the fast and the pilgrimage of the House of Allãh upon the one who can afford the journey to it; and he completed it with al-wilãyah; then Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, revealed: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you and have chosen for you Islam as a religion.'" (al-Amãlī)

There is in Rawḍatu 'l-wã'izīn (by al-Fattãl) a tradition from Ibnu 'l-Fãrisī from Abū Ja'far (a.s.). The tradition narrates the story of the journey of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to pilgrimage and then his appointing 'Alī for al-wilãyah at the time of the return journey to Medina and revelation of this verse; that tradition contains the speech of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) on the day of Ghadīr, and it is a very lengthy speech.

The author says: A similar tradition has been narrated by aṭ-Ṭabrisī in al-Iḥtijãj through a well connected chain from al-Ḥaḍramī from Abū Ja'far al-Bãqir (a.s.); also, al-Kulaynī in al-Kãfī and aṣ-Ṣadūq in al-'Uyūn have narrated on revelation of the verse of al-wilãyah, both through their chains from 'Abdu 'l-'Azīz ibn Muslim from ar-Riḍã (a.s.). The same theme has been narrated by ash-Shaykh in his al-Amãlī through his chain from Ibn Abī 'Umayr from al-Mufaḍḍal ibn 'Umar from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) from his grandfather, the Commander of the Believers (a.s.). Also , it has been narrated by aṭ-Ṭabrisī in Majma'u 'l-bayãn through his chain from Abū Hãrūn al-'Abdī from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī; also, by ash-Shaykh in his al-Amãlī through his chain from Isḥãq ibn Ismã'īl an-Naysãbūrī from aṣ-Ṣãdiq from his father from al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī (peace be on them all). We are not quoting those traditions for the sake of brevity. Whoever wants to see them should consult the books referred to. And Allãh is the Guide.

In the Name of Allãh
The All-Compassionate, The All-Merciful

Praise belongs to Allãh, the Lord of all being;
the All-Compassionate, the All-Merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement;
Thee only we serve, and to Thee alone we pray for succor;
Guide us in the straight path;
The path of those whom thou hast blessed,
Not of those against whom Thou art wrathful,
nor of those who are astray.

FOREWORD

1. The late al-'Allãmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabãṭabã'ī (1321/1904 – 1402/1981) – may Allãh have mercy upon him – was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the translation of al-Mīzãn.

2. al-'Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabãṭabã'ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzãn fī tafsīri 'l-Qur'ãn which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the 'Allãmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur'ãn in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzãn because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur'ãn and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustãdh al-'Allãmah as-Sayyid Sa'īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task, because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzãn and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-'Allãmah aṭ-

Ṭabāṭabā'ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and its discussions.

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the tenth volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān. This volume corresponds with the second half of the fifth volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allāh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendices included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of the English translation of al-Mīzān: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

* * * * *

We implore upon Allāh to affect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work, which we have started. May Allāh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: They ask you as to what is made lawful for them. Say: "The good things are made lawful for you: It is a general question which has been answered with a general reply; and it lays down an overall principle for differentiating between lawful and unlawful; that a thing using of which is onsidered good is a good thing. The word, "good", is also used without any condition or restriction and it means that the judge for identification of its goodness should be the normal intellect; whatever normal intellect considers good is good, and every good is lawful. We have explained lawfulness and goodness in general terms putting reliance on normal intellect, because according to the fundamentals of jurisprudence that is how generality is explained.

QUR'ÃN: "and what you have taught the beasts of prey, training them to hunt – you teach them of what Allãh has taught you – so eat of that which they hold for you and mention the name of Allãh over it; . . .": It is said that this sentence is in conjunction with "good things" i.e. and also lawful for you is what you have taught the beasts of prey i.e. the prey of those beasts which you have taught. This explanation supposes that a word, "prey of", is omitted here but understood. But apparently, the sentence is in conjunction independently with the preceding sentence, and the word, "what", is a preposition of condition and the clause: "so eat of that which they hold for you", gives the result of that condition; so there is no need to suppose omission of any word in the sentence.

al-Jawãriḥ (اَلْجَوَارِحُ) is plural of al-jãriḥah (اَلْجَارِحَةُ), which denotes such a bird or beast, which is used for hunting or preying, like hawk, falcon, dog and cheetah. Mukallibīn (مُكَلِّبِيْنَ) is the active participle of the verb at-taklīb (اَلتَّكْلِيبُ = to teach and train dogs for preying; to keep hunting dogs and releasing them for this purpose). The sentence is restricted with the word mukallibīn and this may be a sort of indication that the order is reserved for hunting dog and does not cover other preying beasts.

The words: "of that which they hold for you". The restriction, "for you", clearly shows that the lawfulness is limited to that case where the dog preys for its owner, not for itself. The words: "and mention the name of Allāh over it", complete the conditions of lawfulness: the prey should be taken by the beasts of prey according to the given training and the beast should hold it for the hunter and the name of Allāh should be mentioned over it.

The sentences, in short, indicate that the beasts trained for hunting, i.e. the hunting dogs, when they are properly trained and they catch for you any wild animal (eating of which is lawful when it is slaughtered according to the sharī'ah) and you have mentioned the name of Allāh at the time of releasing the dog, then you may eat from it if the dog kills it before you reach there (that earlier recitation of Divine name will be counted as the proper slaughter). If the dog doesn't kill it, then you will have to slaughter it properly reciting the name of Allāh; but that doesn't come under this rule.

Then the verse ends on the words: and fear Allāh; surely Allāh is swift in reckoning. It clearly shows that one should fear Allāh while hunting wild animals. Hunting should not result in excessive loss of life, nor should it be done merely for game, arrogance, or amusement because Allāh is swift in reckoning and He requits transgression and oppression in this world before the hereafter. Such oppressions and transgressions where people indulge in indiscriminate killings of poor animals inevitably lead one to a very shameful end as we have often seen.

QUR'ĀN: This day have been made lawful for you (all) good things; and the food of those who have been given the Book is lawful for you and your food is lawful for them: Repetition of lawfulness of good things (although it was mentioned in the immediately preceding verse) and beginning of the verse with the adverb, "This day", aims at showing the favour of Allāh on the believers by making lawful for them the food of the People of the Book and their chaste women.

Probably, the clause: "have been made lawful for you (all) good things", has been added to the clause: "and the food of those who have been given the Book is lawful for you . . ." to create reassurance in the hearts of the believers by adding a definite order with an order in which there might be room for some doubt; this addition would remove perplexity and uneasiness. For example, a master says to his servant, 'You are the owner of all that I have gifted to you earlier in addition to this and this extra item.' Mentioning previously gifted things will give the servant full confidence concerning the ownership of the later additions. In a way, the same may be the explanation of the following two verses: For those who do good is good (reward) and more (than this); . . . (10:26). Therein they shall have whatever they will; and with Us there is yet more (50:35).

It looks as though the believers' hearts were very perturbed and they felt doubts concerning the lawfulness of the food of the People of the Book, especially in view of the very strict admonition regarding their friendship – they were strictly forbidden to mix with them and have friendly relations with them. In this background, the order concerning their food was joined with the order of lawfulness of good things without any reservation. Now, they could be sure that the Jews' and the Christians' food is like other lawful good things, and their hearts will be at ease. The same is the explanation of the verse: and the chaste (ones) from among the believing women and the chaste (one) from among those who have been given the Book before you (are lawful for you).

The Divine words: "and the food of those who have been given the Book is lawful for you and your food is lawful for them", have not laid down two separate rules. Obviously, it is one speech with a single connotation. The words: "and your food is lawful for them", have not ordained any order for the People of the Book. Even if we say that disbelievers are obliged to follow the orders of Islamic sharī'ah, yet they do not believe in Allãh and His Messenger or his Prophethood. They do not listen to the Prophet nor do they accept his commandments; and it is not the style of Qur'ãn to address some people or give any order to them when it is clearly known that such a talk will have no effect on them, and that address will avail nothing. [Of course, if such a talk becomes necessary for some reasons, Allãh turns the address from those people to the Prophet or uses some other modes of speech like that. For example, Allãh says: Say, "O People of the Book! Come to a word between us and you . . ." (3:64). Say: "Glory be to my Lord; am I aught but a human messenger?" (17:93); there are other many such verses.]

In short, the clauses are not meant legislating two separate laws: one, allowing the food of the People of the Book to the Muslims, and the other, making the food of the Muslims lawful for the People of the Book. Rather, the whole speech gives one order and that is the lawfulness of food for both groups. There is no restriction in between on either side. It is like the Divine words: . . . then if you find them to be believing women, do not send them back to the unbelievers; neither are these (women) lawful for them, nor are those (men) lawful for them . . . (60:10). In other words, there is no lawfulness on any side.

aṭ-Ṭa'ãm (اَلطَّعَامُ) according to philology refers to all that is eaten and taken as nourishment. But it is said that it is used to wheat and other such grains only. Lisãnu 'l-'Arab says: "When the people of Ḥijãz use the word aṭ-ṭa'ãm without any restriction or association, they mean wheat exclusively." He further says: "al-Khalīl has said, 'In high Arab language aṭ-ṭa'ãm is wheat in particular." The same meaning has been given by Ibnu 'l-Athīr in an-Nihãyah. It is for this reason that in most of aḥãdīth narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l Bayt (a.s.) it has been declared that aṭ-ṭa'ãm in this verse means wheat and other grains, although a few traditions give another meaning; and we shall talk about it under "Traditions".

In any case, this permission does not cover those animals whose meat is forbidden and slaughtering them can make no difference like pig, nor does it cover those lawful animals, which have not been slaughtered properly like the one over which the name of Allãh has not been recited and which has not been slaughtered according to Islamic rules. Allãh has counted the above-mentioned unlawful items in the verses of prohibition (that is, the four verses in the chapters of "The Cow", "The Table, "Cattle" and "The Bee") describing them as uncleanness, transgression, and sin, as we have explained earlier. Far be it from Allãh to allow what He has called uncleanness, transgression, and sin and then to mention it as a favour to the believers.

Moreover, these forbidden things have been enumerated in this very chapter a few lines before this verse. And nobody can claim abrogation in such cases and especially in the chapter of "The Table" about which the traditions say that it is an abrogating chapter, not abrogated.

QUR'ÃN: and the chaste (ones) from among the believing women and the chaste (ones) from among those who have been given the Book before you (are lawful for you): The description of the group using the verb (i.e. among those who have been given the Book), instead of saying, from the Jews and the Christians or even saying, from the People of the Book, points in a way to the reason of the law; because Allãh wants to show His favour and to ease the burden from the believers. The meaning: We have done you a favour by easing the burden by removing the prohibition of marriage between your men and the chaste women of those who have been given the Book before you, because they are nearest to you of all the non-Muslim communities, as they were given the Book and they had believed in One God and the prophets, in contrast to the Idol-worshippers and polytheists who disbelieve in the prophets. Probably, it is for this reason that "those who have been given the Book" is followed by the words "before you"; it clearly indicates a mixing and intermingling.

Be as it may. The verse describes the favour of Allãh and relaxation of rule; such a law cannot be made subject to abrogation. There are two verses which seem to contradict this relaxed law: And do not marry the idolatress until they believe (2:221); and hold not to the ties of marriage of unbelieving women (60:10). But these two verses cannot abrogate the verse under discussion because the first verse is in the chapter of "The Cow" and it was the first detailed chapter which came down in Medina long before the chapter of "The Table"; and the second one is in the chapter of "The Woman Tested" and it was revealed in Medina before the conquest of Mecca, that is, more than two years before the revelation of the chapter of "The Table". Therefore, the earlier revealed verses cannot abrogate a verse revealed later. Moreover, the traditions say that the chapter of "The Table" was the last chapter revealed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); it has abrogated some previous laws but nothing has abrogated this chapter. Apart from that, you have seen in the exegesis of the verse 2:221 that these two verses (of "The Cow" and "The Woman Tested") are not concerned at all with the subject of the marriage with a Christian or a Jewish woman.[1]

If one were to claim that the verse of "The Woman Tested" somehow showed unlawfulness of such a marriage, and if one were to say that the tone of the verse of "The Table", showing Divine favour and relaxation proved that such a marriage was previously forbidden – otherwise there was no place for showing favour and relaxation – then this verse of the chapter of "The Table" will abrogate the verse of the

"The Woman Tested, and not vice versa. We shall further talk under "Traditions" about this second verse.

al-Muḥṣanāt (اَلْمُحْصَنَاتُ) has been translated here as "the chaste ones". Chastity is one of the meanings of al-iḥṣān (اَلإِحْصَانُ). The clause, "and the chaste (ones) from among the believing women and the chaste (ones) from among those who have been given the Book before you", clearly shows that these women are unmarried, and putting together these two groups of the People of the Book and the believers demands that the word al-muḥṣanāt should have the same meaning in both places. It means that al-iḥṣān here cannot be interpreted as Islam, because of inclusion of the women of the People of the Book. Also, the word cannot be interpreted as the free women because the Divine favour would remain incomplete if it were confined to the free women and excluded the slave girls. Thus, we see that no connotation of the word, al-iḥsān, can fit on this verse except chastity.

The verse explicitly shows the lawfulness of the chaste women of the People of the Book for the believers without mentioning permanent marriage or the mut'ah; the only condition is that the believers should give them their dowries and the relationship should be of marriage, not fornicating nor taking them for paramours in secret. It means that the believers are allowed to marry them paying them their dowries and not indulging in illicit relations with them, without mentioning any condition regarding permanency or temporariness of the marriage; and we have described under the Divine words, Then as to such of them with whom you have mut'ah that mut'ah, is a marriage like the permanent one.[2] Its details should be seen in the books of fiqh.

QUR'ĀN: when you have given them their dowries, taking (them) in marriage, not fornicating nor taking them for paramours in secret: It is the same theme that we had seen in the verse. "And lawful for you is (all) besides that, that you seek (them) with your property, taking (them) with decency, not committing fornication" (4:24). This sentence indicates that the verse is speaking about lawfulness of the marriage with chaste women of the People of the Book and does not cover slave girls.

QUR'ĀN: and whoever denies faith, his work indeed is forfeited and in the hereafter he shall be one of the losers*: al-Kufr (اَلْكُفْرُ) actually means to hide, to cover. For covering to take place there must be an object that is covered. An ḥijãb (اَلْحِجَابُ = veil) cannot be an ḥijãb unless there is something to be veiled. al-Kufr may be of Divine favours, of Divine signs or of Allãh and His Messenger and the Last Day.

al-Kufr (= denial, covering) of Imãn demands that there should be in the beginning a firm imãn (اَلْإِيْمَانُ = belief, faith). It is an attribute, which is firmly, rooted in the believer's heart, that is, the correct and true beliefs, which give rise to the good deeds. In this light, denial of faith means not acting on what one knows to be right and truth. For example, if one neglects the pillars of religion like prayer, zakãt, fast and ḥajj although he knows that they are the pillars of religion, or keeps friendship with the polytheists, mingling with them and taking part in their activities, although knowing that only Islam is the truth.

This is the significance of the denial of the faith. However, there is a fine point here al-kufr denotes hiding and the human mind do not accept that an established thing has been covered and hidden unless it is perpetually kept out of sight. Therefore, a man will be accused of denial of the faith only if he continues to neglect the demands of his faith and does not act according to his knowledge and belief. If he goes against the demands of his faith only once or twice without persisting in that behaviour, then the word al-kufr will not be used for him. He will be said to have committed fisq (اَلْفِسْقُ = sin).

It appears from the above that "whoever denies faith" actually means whoever persists in denying faith, although the sentence uses the verb instead of adjective. In other words, whoever does not adhere to what he knows to be truth and does not hold fast to the pillars of religion, he is the disbeliever in the faith and all his good deeds are forfeited as Allãh Says: "his work indeed is forfeited".

This verse fully corresponds with the following verses of the chapter of "The Battlements": . . . and if they see the way of rectitude they do not take it for a way, and if they see the way of error, they take it for a way; this is because they rejected Our signs and were heedless of them. And (as to) those who reject Our signs and the meeting of the hereafter, their deeds are forfeited. Shall they be rewarded except for what they have done? (7:146-7). In this verse, Allãh mentions them as taking the way of error and leaving the way of rectitude after seeing the both, i.e. even after knowing them, then further attributes to them rejection of the signs, and the signs are called signs when it is known what they indicate; finally, it is explained as rejection of the hereafter because if he does not reject the hereafter the knowledge that it was certainly to come should have prevented him from deviating from the truth; as a result, their deeds are forfeited.

Similar is the theme of the Divine words: Say: "Shall We inform you of the greatest losers in (their) deeds? (These are) they whose labour is lost in this world's life and they think that they were acquiring good by their deeds. These are they who disbelieve in the signs of their Lord and His meeting, so their deeds become forfeited, and therefore We will not set up balance for them on the Day of Resurrection . . ." (18:103-5). It can easily be seen how these verses fit the theme of denial of faith as described above.

If we ponder on the above explanations, we will see how the sentence: "and whoever denies faith, his work indeed is forfeited," becomes connected with the preceding sentences. It in fact completes the preceding statements. The idea is to warn the believers of the danger that would face them if they became lax in sincerely following the commands of Allãh. They should not freely mingle with desbelievers. Allãh has allowed them the food and the chaste women of the People of the Book to bring some ease in the believers' lives in order that it should become a means of spreading piety; hopefully it would cause the pure Islamic morality to seep into the non-Muslim society. It would create beneficial knowledge and propagate good deeds.

This is the main purpose of this legislation. It was not meant for the Muslims to tumble down the pitfalls of debauchery and descend into the valleys of lechery and lewdness. They should not be beguiled in their desires nor should they be infatuated with their beauty, lest they gain the upper hand and their culture and their people's culture dominate the Muslim society; then their misconduct will vanquish the Islamic righteousness. This, in its turn, will bring a greater calamity and the believers will become victims of degradation and retrogression. Consequently, this Divine favour will become a devastating tribulation and this relaxation turn into a curse instead of a blessing. That is why Allãh warned the believers – after describing lawfulness of their food and chaste women – that they should not rush headlong into taking advantage of this relaxed rule in such a way that it leads them to the denial of faith and neglect of the pillars of religion; otherwise, it would cause nullification of all their good deeds and in the hereafter all their deeds will be forfeited.

into unknown waters and come up with astonishing explanations which are neither supported by the Qur'ãnic wordings, nor are in keeping with the context.

For example, one has said that the clause: The good things are made lawful for you, refers to baḥīrah, sãibah, waṣīlah and ḥãmī.[3] Another has said that the words: the food of those who have been given the Book is lawful for you, denote that in basic principle the food of the People of the Book is lawful for the believers, Allãh has never forbidden it; and that the animals' meat too is lawful even if it had been slaughtered according to their own custom. A third one said that the verse shows that you may eat with them on one table. Someone wrote that the clause: and the chaste (ones) from among those who have been given the book before you, shows that these chaste women were lawful to the believers from the beginning, they were never forbidden before because the clause: and lawful for you is (all) besides that (4:24), was enough to make them lawful. Another one said that the sentence: "and whoever denies faith his work indeed is forteited", sounds a warning to the believers that they should not reject the order allowing them the food of the People of the Book and their chaste women.

They have written these and other similar meanings some of which are sheer foolhardiness and others are arbitrary; still others are totally against the context and do not look at the adverb "This day" nor at the favour and relaxation. What we have described earlier in the Commentary is enough to show the invalidity of such interpretations. The claim that the clause: and lawful for you is (all) besides that (4:24), shows the lawfulness of marriage with women of the People of the Book, is clearly invalid because the verses 4:23-24 aim at describing the lawfulness and unlawfulness of women because of consanguinity and marriage. They are not concerned with difference of religion.

[3] Baḥīrah was a she-camel exempted from slaughter or carrying of any burdens after she had brought forth five or ten issues. Sãibah was a beast left to pasture without attention or restriction; she was neither ridden on nor milked. Waṣīlah was a goat under some superstition. Ḥãmī was a stallion-camel, left free, not made use of in any way.

Slaughtering them or eating their meat was a taboo in pre-Islamic days, and Islamic abolished their superstitious rituals of the Idol-worshippers. See for detail 5:103. (tr.)

as-Suyūṭī writes under the verse: They ask you as to what is made lawful for them . . . Ibn Jarīr has narrated from ʻIkrimah: "Verily the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), sent Abū Rāfiʻ to kill the dogs. He killed them until he reached al-ʻAwālī. Then ʻĀṣim ibn ʻAdiyy, Saʻd ibn Khaythamah and ʻUwaym ibn Sāʻidah came (to the Prophet) and said, 'What has been made lawful for us, O Messenger of Allāh?' So, this verse was revealed: They ask you as to what is made lawful for them . . . (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Again he says, "Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Muḥammad ibn Kaʻb al-Qaraẓī, 'When the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), ordered killing of the dogs, they said: "O Messenger of Allāh! What has been made lawful for us from this group?" Then the verse was revealed: They ask you as to what is made lawful for them . . .'" (ibid.)

The author says: The two traditions explain each other. The theme is that they had asked what categories of dogs they were allowed to keep and use in various activities like hunting, etc.

But the Divine words: They ask you as to what is made lawful for them. Say: "The good things are made lawful for you, . . ." do not tally with this theme because the question was restricted and the verse is general.

Moreover, these two traditions as well as the next one apparently show that, the clause: and what you have taught the beasts of prey, is in conjunction with: the good things, and that it means: It has been made lawful to you what you have taught. That is why some exegetes have said that the word: prey of, is omitted, but understood in this sentence. But we have already explained that: what you have taught the beasts of prey, is a conditional clause, which is completed by the clause: so eat of that which they hold for you.

According to these traditions, the group about which the question was asked refers to dogs.

Also, he says, "al-Fāriyābī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, aṭ-Ṭabarānī and al-Ḥākim (who has said that the tradition is correct) and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Abū Rāfiʻ that he said, 'Jibrīl came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and asked permission to enter. The Prophet gave him permission but he tarried (in entering). The Prophet took his cloak, came out, and said, "We have already given you permission." (Jibrīl) said, "Yes, but we do not enter a house wherein there is a dog or a picture." They looked around and lo! There was a puppy in one of their houses.'

"Abū Rãfi‘ said, 'Then he (the Prophet) ordered me to kill every dog in Medina, and this I did. People came and said, "O Messenger of Allãh! What is allowed to us from this group, which you have ordered to be killed?" The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was silent. Then Allãh revealed: They ask you as to what is made lawful for them. Say: "The good things are made lawful for you and what you have taught the beasts of prey, training them to hunt . . ." Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.) said, "When a man releases his dog and recites the name of Allãh and it holds the prey for him then he should eat what the dog has not eaten."'" (ibid.)

The author says: What the tradition describes about the coming down of Jibrīl is very strange. Moreover, it does not stand on sound footing because it shows that Jibrīl did not come to the Prophet because there was a puppy in one of their houses. But the story does not tally with the apparent meaning of the verse where both the question and its reply are unrestricted. More probably, the tradition is a forged one.

Also he says, "'Abd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from ‘Ãmir that the said, 'Verily ‘Adiyy ibn Ḥãtim aṭ-Ṭã’ī came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and asked him about the prey of dogs; the Prophet did not know what to say until Allãh revealed to him this verse in the chapter of "The Table": you teach them of what Allãh has taught you.'" (ibid.)

The author says: There are other traditions of the similer meaning and the objections mentioned earlier apply to all of them. Apparently, these and similar traditions are an attempt to fit some events on the verse; but the attempt is inconclusive and defective. What is clear is that they had talked to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) about hunting with dogs and then asked him about a comprehensive principle to distinguish the lawful from the unlawful. So, Allãh mentioned their question in the verse and replied to them by giving a comprehensive principle in this respect. Then the reply was given to their specific question about dogs. This meaning is clear from the verse [and it doest not need any such tradition to make its meaning clear.]

al-Kulaynī has narrated through his chains from Ḥammãd from al-Ḥalabī from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said, "It is written in the book of ʻAlī (a.s.), about the Divine word: what you have taught the beasts of prey, that it refers to dogs." (al-Kāfī)

The author says: al-ʻAyyāshī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr from Samāʻah ibn Mihrān from the same Imām (a.s.).

Also, he has narrated through his chains from Ibn Muskān from al-Ḥalabī that he said, "Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), said, 'My father used to give fatwā and he practised taqiyyah and we were afraid of (giving actual ruling) about the prey of eagles and falcons; but now we are not afraid. Its prey is not lawful except when you get the chance to slaughter it. Because it is written in the book of ʻAlī (a.s.) that Allāh has revealed this sentence: what you have taught the beasts of prey training them to hunt, about the dogs.'"[4] (ibid.)

Also, he narrates through his chains from Abū Bakr al-Ḥaḍramī from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.). He says, "I asked the Imām about the prey of eagles, falcons, cheetahs and dogs. The Imām said, 'Do not eat except what you slaughter except the prey of dogs.' I said, 'If it (dog) kills it.' The Imām said, 'Eat it because Allāh says: what you have taught the beasts of prey, training them to hunt – you teach them of what Allāh has taught you – so eat of that which they hold for you.' Then he said, 'Every beast of prey holds the prey for itself except the trained dog, for it holds it for its owner.' He further said, 'And when you release the dog mention the name of Allāh over it, that is its dhabīḥah.'" (ibid.)

al-ʻAyyāshī narrates from Abū ʻUbaydah from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) about a man who releases a trained dog and mentions the name of Allāh at the time of release. The Imām said, "He shall eat from what the dog has held for him even if he has killed it. And if there was found an untrained dog with it, then don't eat from it." "I asked, 'And (what about) falcons and eagles?' The Imām said, 'If you get chance to slaughter it then eat from it; otherwise don't eat it.' I said, 'So, cheetah is not like dog?' He said, 'No. Nothing is called mukallab except the (kalb) dog.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī).

Abū Baṣīr narrates from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) about the Divine words: what you have taught the beasts of prey, training them to hunt – you teach them of what Allāh has taught you – so eat of that which they hold for you and mention the name of Allãh over it, that he said, "There is no harm in eating what the dog has held when he has not eaten from it; but if the dog has eaten from it before you reach there, then do not eat it." (ibid.)

The author says: The various particular orders mentioned in the traditions like restriction of lawfulness to the prey of dog because of the Divine word: mukallibin and: which they hold for you, and the condition that no untrained dog should join in the hunt, all this is inferred from the verse and we have mentioned them before.

Ḥarīz narrates from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he was asked about a dog of a Magian[5] which a Muslim trains and mentions the name of Allãh on releasing it. The Imãm said, "Yes, it is a trained dog. There is no harm when Allãh's name is mentioned over it." (ibid.)

The author says: The ḥadīth is based on the generality of the word: what you have taught to the beasts of prey. as-Suyūṭī narrates in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Ibn Abī Ḥãtim from Ibn ʻAbbãs that he was asked about a Muslim who takes a trained dog of a Magian or his falcon or eagle which has been trained by its owner and the Muslim releases it and it catches a prey. Ibn ʻAbbãs said, "Don't eat it even if you have invoked the name of Allãh because that animal or bird was taught by the Magian while Allãh says: what you have taught the beasts of prey, training them to hunt – you teach them of what Allãh has taught you." But the weakness of the ḥadīth is obvious because although the speech: you teach them of what Allãh has taught you, is addressed to the believers but what Allãh has taught the Muslims regarding the training of dogs is not different from what He has taught to the people of other religions[6] and this connotation helps the reader understand that it does not restrict the dogs' training to the believers. There is no difference when a dog is trained, whether a Muslim or a non-Muslim trained it, or whether a Muslim or a non-Muslim owned it.

al-ʻAyyãshī narrates from Hishãm ibn Sãlim from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said explaining the Divine words: and the food of those who have been given the Book is lawful for you. It refers to lentils, grains, and similar things of the People of the Book. (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī).

[5] Magus, adherent of Mazdaism. (ed.)

[6] This Divine teaching refers to the creative instinct ingrained in human nature. (tr.)

The author says: ash-Shaykh has narrated it in at-Tahdhīb from the same Imãm and the wording there is, "lentils, chickpeas, etc."

There are traditions from ʻAmmãr ibn Marwãn and Samãʻah from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) explaining what is lawful from the food of the People of the Book. The Imãm said, "Grains." (al-Kãfī; at-Tahdhīb) al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain from Ibn Muskãn from Qutaybah al-Aʻshã that he said, "A man asked Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), and I was present there. He said to the Imãm, 'A Jew or a Christian releases (a dog) on goats or sheep and it attacks it, then it is slaughtered. Should his dhabīḥah (slaughtered animal) be eaten?' Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) said, 'Do not enter its price in your property and don't eat it because it is the (Divine) name (which is important) and no one can be trusted in this matter except a Muslim.' That man said to the Imãm (a.s.), 'Allãh has said: This day have been made lawful for you (all) good things and the food of those who have been given the Book is lawful for you.' Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) said, 'My father used to say that it refers to grains, and similar things.'" (al-Kãfī)

The author says: This tradition has been narrated by ash-Shaykh in at-Tahdhīb and by al-ʻAyyãshī in his at-Tafsīr from Qutaybah al-Aʻshã from the Imãm (a.s.).

As you see, the traditions explain the lawful food of the People of the Book as being confined to grains, and similar items. It is the meaning that is understood from the word: aṭ-ṭaʻãm (اَلطَّعَام = food) when it is used without any contextual restriction as it appears from the traditions and the stories narrated from the early days of Islam. That is why a great majority of our ʻulamã' believes that the lawfulness is confined to the grains, and similar things and the food prepared from them.

Some people (Rashīd Riḍã in Tafsīru 'l-manãr) have forcefully rejected this interpretation, saying that it is against the usage of the Qur'ãn concerning the word: aṭ-ṭaʻãm. He further says, "In the Qur'ãnic language, cereal grain is not the overwhelming meaning of aṭ-ṭaʻãm. Allãh has said in this very chapter: Lawful for you is the game of the sea and its food, a provision for you and for the travellers (5:96); and nobody can claim that the food of the sea means wheat and grain. Also, Allãh says: All food was lawful to the Children of Israel – except that which Israel had forbidden to himself (3:93), and no one has said that the word food here means wheat or grain, because nothing of it was forbidden to the Children of Israel – neither before the revelation of the Torah nor after it. aṭ-Ṭa'ãm basically refers to all that is tasted or eaten. Allãh says narrating the story of the stream that Ṭãlūt had said: whoever then drinks from it he is not of me, and whoever does not taste of it (lam Yaṭ'amhu), he is surely of me (2:249). Also, Allãh says: when you have taken the food (ṭa'imtum), then disperse (33:53)."

COMMENT: Would that I could know what did he understand from the sentence: aṭ-ṭa'ãm when used without any contextual restriction refers to the grain, and similar things. It is amusing that he has tried to refute it with the verbs yaṭ'amhu and ṭa'imtum while the scholars had talked about the noun aṭ-ṭa'ãm and not about the verbs derived from that root. Another of his arguement is based on the genitive construction "food of the sea" and this construction itself is a clear context, which shows that it doesn't refer to cereal grain because wheat or barley does not grow in the sea. Another argument is based on the sentence: All food was lawful to the Children of Israel, and he himself says that wheat or cereal grains were not forbidden in their religion. This context clearly shows that the talk is not about cereal grains. He should have found out from the Qur'ãn the examples where the word: aṭ-ṭa'ãm is used in its generality without contrary context and then he should have spoken; like the Divine words: redemption by feeding a poor man (2:184); the expiation (of it) is the feeding of the poor (5:95); And they give food out of love for Him (76:8); Then let man look to his food (80:24). [In all these verses the noun aṭ-ṭa'ãm has been used free from contextual restrictions and it all refers to the food prepared from cereal grains.]

He further says, "There was no confusion regarding cereal grains whether they were lawful or not. The question arose only about meat when something happens to create doubt about its lawfulness, e.g. if the animal dies a natural death or if it is slaughtered as an offering to the idols or without invoking the name of Allãh. That is why Allãh has said: Say: 'I do not find in that which has been revealed to me anything forbidden for an eater to eat of except that it be what has died of itself or blood poured forth . . .' (6:145); and all this is related to animals. It clearly shows that unlawfulness is restricted to this group only and unlawfulness of other things requires similar clear declaration."

COMMENT: This talk is more amusing than the previous one. He says that cereal grains are not the subject of doubt that it is lawful or not; the doubt occurs about the meat only. We should ask him: Which time is he talking about? Is he looking at these times of ours when people are familiar with Islam and its general regulations since so many centuries or is he talking about the times when the Qur'ān was being revealed and the religion was just a few years old? Does he not know that the people had asked the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) about the subjects, which were clearer than the rules of cereal grains? Allāh has quoted some of their questions. For example: They ask you as to what they should spend (2:215). 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd has narrated from Qatādah that he said, "We have been told that some people had said: 'How can we marry their women and they are on a (different) religion and we are on a (different) religion.' Then Allāh sent down the verse: And whoever denies faith, his work is indeed forfeited . . ." You will find similar questions and objections in the traditions as we have quoted some in the subject of ḥajju 't-tamattu', etc.

When they could raise such objections after the verse was revealed allowing the marriage with chaste women of the People of the Book, then what was there to prevent them, before the verse was revealed, from asking about eating together with the People of the Book or to eat the cereal grains purchased from them or the meals prepared from it like bread or other dishes; or other items prepared from cereal grains when these things were made by the People of the Book, because: they have their own religion and we follow a different religion! Especially so when Allāh had warned the believer in so many verses against establishing friendship and close relation with the People of the Book and inclining towards them.

Rather, we can turn the table against him when he says, 'There is a chance of confusion about meat whether it was lawful or not.' Fine. But how could they ask about it when Allāh had described the general unlawful items of meat in the chapter of "Cattle": Say: "I do not find in that which has been revealed to me anything forbidden for an eater to eat of except that it be what has died of itself, or blood poured forth, or flesh of swine – for that surely is unclean – or that which is a transgression other than (the name of) Allāh having been invoked on it" (8:145); and then in the chapter of "The Bee". Both these chapters are of Meccan period. Then details have been given in the chapter of "The Cow" which was revealed in Medina long before the chapter of "The Table". And even in this chapter, before this verse, forbidden meat has been described. And this preceding verse according to Rashīd Riḍā explicitly shows that the animals slaughtered by the People of the Book are not forbidden. Now, we may ask: How could they entertain any doubt about the lawfulness of the animals slaughtered by the People of the Book when verse after verse of Meccan as well as Medinite period was revealed declaring that it was lawful; and the Muslims were memorising these verses and reciting them and teaching them and putting them into practice?

He has claimed that the verse of the chapter of "Cattle" confines the unlawful things to what has been mentioned therein; accordingly, unlawfulness of animals slaughtered by the People of the Book will require a clear proof. Well, there is no doubt that every rule needs a proof to support it and his claim clearly shows that this exclusive confinement will be valid only when there is no other proof to show that some other things too are forbidden.

Now, if he wants proof from traditions then those who say that the animals slaughtered by the People of the Book are unlawful rely on the traditions, which are narrated in explanation of this verse, and we have quoted some of them earlier.

And if he wants proof from the Qur'ãn, then, first of all it is an unjustifiable arrogance, because tradition is the companion of the Qur'ãn and they are not separate from each other in being authoritative sources of the law. Secondly, we shall ask him what are his views about the animals slaughtered by unbelievers other than the People of the Book like Idol-worshippers and atheists. Will he say it is unlawful because it is a dead body, which has not been slaughtered according to the sharī'ah? In that case, let us look at two slaughtered animals: On one of them the name of Allãh was not invoked at all and it was not slaughtered facing the qiblah; and the other was not slaughtered in the Islamic way. What is the difference between the two? Allãh is not pleased with either, both are unclean in the eyes of the religion, and Allãh has forbidden the unclean things. Allãh Says: (Who) enjoins them good and forbids them unclean things (7:157); and He has said in the preceding verse: They ask you as to what is made lawful for them. Say: "The good things are made lawful for you." This question and answer is a clear proof that lawfulness is confined to the good things and even in this verse, the words: This day have been made lawful for you (all) good things, point to this exclusiveness especially when they describe the favour of Allãh on the believers.

If he says that the animals slaughtered by those unbelievers are unlawful because they invoke on it the names of other than Allãh, like their deities, then there is no difference whether a name of other than Allãh is invoked on it or the name of Allãh is invoked but in a way which has been abrogated and with which Allãh is not pleased.

Rashīd Riḍã further says, "Allãh has very forcefully forbidden the Muslims to follow the idolators of Arab in eating dead animals of all different categories mentioned earlier and sacrificing animals on their idols. It was done in order that the early Muslims should not treat it as an easy matter according to their earlier habit. As for the People of the Book, they were far from eating dead bodies or sacrificing for idols."

He has forgotten that the Christians among the People of the Book eat pork and Allãh has mentioned and forcefully condemned it. In fact, they eat all things the Idol-worshippers eat because atonement of Jesus Christ has made all things lawful for them. In any case, this is an absurd reasoning that should not be used in exegesis of the Book of Allãh or in understanding the laws of His religion.

Finally, he says, "It was the policy of Islam to deal very strictly with polytheists of Arabia in order that everyone in the Arabian Peninsula should feel compelled to enter into the fold of Islam; but it was very lenient to the People of the Book. Then he quotes the rulings of a few companions who believed that the animals sacrificed in synagogues or churches were lawful to eat.

The basic idea lurking behind this speech is, as appears from some traditions, that Allãh had chosen the Arabs over other nations and the Arabs were superior to others. That is why they used to call non-Arabs as al-mawãlī (اَلْمَوَالِي = plural of al-mawlã; clients) but the Qur'ãnic verses apparently do not agree with it. Allãh has said: O you people! Surely We have created you of a male and a female and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other. Surely the most honourable of you with Allãh is the one among you who is most pious . . . (49:13); a lot of aḥãdīth giving this connotation have been narrated from the Imãms of Ahlul 'l-Bayt (a.s.).

Islam while calling people to the right path had not put the Arabs on one side and the non-Arabs on the other. It had put the polytheists – be they Arab or non-Arab – on one side, and they were given no choice except that they should accept Islam; and it had put the People of the Book, Arabs and non-Arabs alike, on the other side and if they did not enter in Islam, they were given an option to come under the protection of Islam by paying jizyah. All that can be seen in this treatment is some leniency shown to them; but it doesn't mean that their slaughtered animals should become lawful to the Muslims when they have killed it according to their own custom and ritual.

As for the practice of fatwã of some companions, it has no authority at all in Islam.

It is clear from the above discussion that this verse does not show that the animals slaughtered by the People of the Book are lawful when killed in un-Islamic way; nor is there any other proof to prove it. If anyone insists on lawfulness of the animals slaughtered by them (because of the generality of the verse), then we have to restrict it to the case when it is known that the animal was slaughtered according to the rules of Islamic sharī'ah, as may be inferred from the words of aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) quoted above from al-Kãfī and at-Tahdhīb: "It is the (Divine) name which is important) and no one can be trusted in this matter except a Muslim." Further details may be seen in the books of fiqh.

al-'Ayyãshī narrates from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) about the Divine words: and the chaste (ones) from among those who have been given the Book before you (are lawful to you), that he said, "It (al-muḥṣanãt) means the chaste ones." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī).

The same book narrates from the same Imãm (a.s.) about the words: and the chaste (one) from among the believing women, that he said, "It means the Muslim women."

al-Qummī narrates from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said, "Verily the marriage is allowed with only those People of the Book who pay jizyah; marriage with others is not lawful." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī).

The author says: It is because without payment of jizyah they will be counted among kãfir ḥarbi.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said, "Verily it is lawful to marry only the simple-hearted women from among them." (al-Kãfī; at-Tahdhīb) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) was asked about a believing man who marries a Christian or a Jewess. The Imãm said, "When he can get a Muslim woman then what will he do with the Jewess or Christian woman?" It was said to him, "He is inclined towards her." He (a.s.) said, "If he does, then he should stop her from drinking liquor and eating flesh of swine, and know that there must be a deficiency in his religion." (Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh).

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said, "There is no harm if a man does mut'ah with a Jewess or a Christian woman while he has got a free (Muslim)

al-Bãqir (a.s.) was asked about a Muslim man, "Can he marry a Magian?" He (a.s.) said, "No; but if he has got a Magian slave girl, then there is no harm if he establishes sexual relations with her; he should practice coitus interruptus and should not seek a child from her." (Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh) al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain from ʻAbdullãh ibn Sinãn from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said inter alia in a ḥadīth, "And I don't like a Muslim man to marry a Jewess or a Christian woman lest his child becomes a Jew or a Christian." (al-Kãfī).

Also, he narrates through his chains from Zurãrah, and al-ʻAyyãshī from Masʻadah ibn Ṣadaqah, that he said, "I asked Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.), about the words of Allãh: and the chaste (ones) from among those who have been given the Book before you." The Imãm (a.s.) said, "It is abrogated by the words: and hold not to the ties of marriage of unbelieving women" (60.10). (al-Kãfī).

The author says: It is a problematic ḥadīth, because the chapter 60 was revealed long before the chapter of "The Table" and abrogating verse cannot come before the abrogated one. Moreover, it is accepted and confirmed in the traditions that the chapter of "The Table" is the abrogator and not the abrogated as we have mentioned repeatedly. Another proof to show that it is not abrogated may be seen in the foregoing tradition that mutʻah with a woman from the People of the Book is allowed and people have acted upon it; and it was described in the verse of mutʻah that mutʻah is a nikãḥ and marriage.

Another tradition says the verse is abrogated by: And do not marry the idolatress until they believe (2:221); and we have already mentioned the objections on this tradition. Details can be seen in the books of fiqh.

al-ʻAyyãshī narrates from Abãn ibn ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥmãn about the words of Allãh: and whoever denies faith his work indeed is forfeited, that he said, "I heard Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), saying, 'The least that throws a man out of Islam is that he has an opinion against the truth and (even after realizing his error) he holds fast to it.' The Imãm (a.s.) then recited the verse: and whoever denies faith, his work indeed is forfeited. Then he (a.s.) said, 'He who denies faith does not accomplish what Allãh has ordered and is not pleased with it.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

Muḥammad ibn Muslim narrates from one of the two (fifth or sixth) Imãm that he (a.s.) said, "It is not implementing (the commandments of Allãh) until he discards the whole lot." (ibid.)

The author says: What we have described earlier is enough to explain the fine points of these traditions.

‘Ubayd ibn Zurãrah said, "I asked Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.), about the words of Allãh: and whoever denies faith, his work indeed is forfeited. He said, 'It is not implementing what he had acknowledged (to do); an example of it is that one neglects the prayer without sickness and without involvement in some work.'" (ibid.)

The author says: Allãh has named prayer as faith in the verse: and Allãh was not going to make your faith to be fruitless (2:143). Probably, that was the reason that the Imãm (a.s.) particularly mentioned it as the example in this tradition.

The Imãm (a.s.) said, "This (denial of faith) refers to him who believes and yet obeys polytheists." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

Abū Ḥamzah (ath-Thumãlī) says, "I asked Abū Ja‘far (a.s.), about the words of Allãh: and whoever denies faith, his work indeed is forfeited, and in the hereafter he shall be one of the losers. He said, 'Its esoteric Qur’ãnic interpretation is: and whoever denies the wilãyah of ‘Alī; and ‘Alī is the faith.'" (Baṣãiru 'd-darajãt)

The author says: It is esoteric or inner meaning, opposite of the manifest one, as we have explained while writing about "The Decisive and The Ambiguous Verses" in the third volume of this book[7] Also, the tradition may be based on the 'Flow of the Qur’ãn'; and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had named ‘Alī (a.s.) as Faith when he had gone out to fight ‘Amr ibn ‘Abd Wadd in the Battle of the Trench, when he (s.a.w.a.) said: "The whole of Faith has gone out to fight the whole Disbelief."

There are other traditions of the same theme.

O you who believe! When you rise up to prayer, wash your faces and your hands as far as the elbows, and wipe a part of your heads and your feet to the ankles; and if you are under obligation to perform a total ablution, then wash (yourselves); and if you are sick or on a journey, or one among you comes from privy, or you have touched the women, and you do not find water, betake yourselves to clean earth and wipe a part of your faces and (part of) your hands therewith; Allãh does not desire to put on you any difficulty, but He wishes to purify you so that He may complete His favour on you, that you may be grateful. (6). And remember the favour of Allãh on you and the covenant with which He bound you firmly, when you said: "We have heard and we obey," and fear Allãh; surely Allãh knows what is in the breasts (7).

The first verse contains rules of all three types of aṭ-ṭahãrah (اَلطَّهَارَةُ = cleanness): wuḍū', wãjib ghusl and tayammum; and the second verse emphasizes or complements this order. There is another verse already mentioned in the chapter of "Women" which deals with these three modes of cleanness: O you who believe! Do not go near prayer when you are intoxicated until you know (well) what you say, nor when you are in a state of major ritual impurity, unless (you are) travelling on the road – until you have washed yourselves; and if you are sick or on a journey or one of you comes from the privy or you have touched the women, and you cannot find water, betake yourselves to clean earth, then wipe a part of your faces and (a part of) your hands. Surely Allãh is Pardoning, Forgiving (4:43).

This verse of the chapter of "The Table" is clearer than that of the chapter of "Women" and covers more aspects of the rule. That is why we had not given a detailed commentary there, until we have reached the verse under discussion here.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! When you rise up to prayer: al-Qiyãm (اَلْقِيَام = to stand up, to rise up), when followed by preposition ilã (الى = to) generally connotes the intention of doing that thing; because when one intends to do a thing one usually moves towards it. Let us suppose a man is sitting and he intends to perform an act, usually he would rise to do it. In other words, rising up for a work is inseparable from its intention. There is a similar example in the words of Allāh: And when you are among them and establish the prayer for them (4:102), that is, you intend to establish the prayer. Conversely, there is a verse which uses the word wish or intention to allude to the actual deed: And if you wish to have (one) wife in place of another and you have given one of them a heap of gold, then take not from it anything (4:20); it means when you divorce a wife and marry another; so the verse uses the word "wish" for the actual deed.

In short, the verse shows that prayer must be preceded by bath and wuḍū'. If it had been unrestricted it would have meant necessity of wuḍū' before every prayer irrespective of the words: and if you are under obligation to preform a total ablution, then wash (yourselves). However, legislative verses are seldom unrestricted in all aspects. Moreover, it is possible to say that the coming words: but He wishes to purify you, explain this obligatoriness of bath, as will be explained later. It is only this much explanation that can be given here for this verse; the exegetes have written at length about it but it is all related to the matter of fiqh and not to tafsīr.

QUR'ĀN: wash your faces and your hands as far as the elbows: al-Ghasl (اَلْغَسْلُ = pouring water on something); it is usually done for cleaning, removal of dirt and filth. al-Wajh (اَلْوَجْهُ = the side of a thing that faces you); but mostly it is used for the front side of man's head, that is, the side which has eyes, nose and mouth in it; when somebody faces you his features become manifest to you; the traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlul 'l-Bayt (a.s.) interprete it as the area from the beginning of the hairline in the forehead upto the tip of the chin length wise and that which is covered by the thumb and middle finger breadthwise. There are some other delineation mentioned by the exegetes and jurisprudents.

al-Aydī (اَلْأَيْدِى = plural of al-yad اَلْيَدُ); it is the organ which is used for folding and unfolding, catching and releazing, attacking someone, etc. It begins from shoulder ending at fingertips. Because most of these activities like catching and releasing are done through that part which begins from elbow down wards, that section is also called hand; and for this very reason the section from wrist to fingertips is also called hand. In this way, the word becomes common between the whole and its' parts.

It is this commonality which makes it necessary to mention some association to point to the intended meaning; and it is for this reason that Allãh has added: "as far as the elbows" to show that the area of the hand to be washed is that which ends at the elbows; also it shows that the whole area upto the finger tips is covered. The traditions also support this meaning. The preposition ilã (to, as far as) indicates the limit of action and it connotes continuation of movement.

This preposition does not show whether or not the elbows are included in the order of washing; the order to wash the elbows is derived from the traditions, not from this preposition.

Someone has said that the preposition ilã in this verse means "together with" as is seen in the verse: and do not devour their property (as an addition) to your own property (4:2). He has also argued on the strength of traditions that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to wash the elbows in wuḍū'. It is really an astonishing insolence in exegesis of the Divine Book. Let us say that the tradition describes an action, but an action may be interpreted in different ways. How can it be used to pinpoint the meaning of a word? Or it may legislate a rule without intending to explain this verse. Moreover, the obligatoriness of washing the elbows could have been inferred from logical reasonings; or may be the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has added to it, because he had the authority to do so (as he had done in the five prayers, as the correct traditions say). As for the verse: and do not devour their property (as an addition) to your own property, the word: al-akl (اَلأَكْلُ = to devour) contains the idea of addition and joining and for this reason it is followed by the preposition: ilã; it is not that ilã gives the meaning of togetherness.

The above discussion makes it clear that the clause: "as far as the elbows", qualifies the words, "your hands". It does not clarify where the washing of hands is to begin and where it is to end. So far as this clause is concerned, the washing could begin from the elbows going to the fingertips (and that is the way man acts while washing his hand apart from wuḍū') or it could begin from fingertips ending at the elbows. But the traditions from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) guide us to follow the former method, instead of the latter.

This removes the objection raised by many people that the clause: "as far as the elbows" proves the obligatoriness of beginning the washing from fingertips ending at the elbows. This claim is based on the assumption that the clause: "as far as the elbows", is related to the order of washing; but, as we have explained, it is connected with the hands. It should be realized that the word "hands", being a common noun, needed an association to make its meaning clear, and once the word "elbows" connects with "hands" it cannot be again connected with the order of washing.

Moreover, the ummah unanimously agrees that the wuḍū' of those who begin washing from the elbows coming to the fingertips is correct (vide Majma'u 'l-bayān). And this unanimity emanates from the fact that the verse gives this meaning and it could only be correct if the clause: "as far as the elbows", is connected with the "hands" and not with the washing.

QUR'ĀN: and wipe a part of your heads and your feet to the ankles: al-Masḥ (اَلْمَسْحُ = to let the hand or any other limb pass over something). They say: 'I wipe the thing'; 'I wiped part of the thing' (bi-shay', بِالشَّیءِ). When this verb is used without preposition it indicates wiping of the whole thing; and when used with the preposition bi (بِـــ) it denotes partial wiping. The Divine words: "and wipe a part of your heads", show that only a part of the head is to be wiped; however it doesn't show which parts are to be wiped. It is known only from the traditions. Our correct traditions say that it is the front part of the head.

The words, wa arjulakum (وَاَرْجُلَكُمْ) has been recited in two ways:

1. With kasrah of لِ (-li-) (wa arjulikum): In this case it is clearly in conjunction with bi-ru'ūsikum (بِرُءُوسِكُمْ), i.e, "and wipe a part of your heads and your feet." Some people say that this kasrah here has no grammatical significance; it just follows the inflection of the preceding word, bi-ru'ūsikum. But it is a mistake because following in inflection is considered a bad grammar as grammarians have said; and the Divine words should not be taken in such a vulgar way.

2. With fatḥah of لَ (-la-) (wa arjulakum). If you read the sentence without any preconceived idea you will see that arjulakum is in conjunction with the grammatical position of bi-ru'ūsikum [which is in dative case and should have been ru'ūsakum but for the preposition bi]. You will understand that the verse shows the obligatoriness of washing the face and hands and wiping the head and feet. You will never think that the word: "and your feet" should be connected to the clause: "wash your faces" in the beginning of the verse, while another order to wipe the parts of the heads has already come in between. A man of good literary taste will not try such gymnastics in a speech of high literary value. How can a speaker of high standards agree to say for example: 'I kissed the face of Zayd and his head and touched his shoulder and hands', when he actually want to say that he had kissed the hands also?

Numerous traditions for wiping the feet have been narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.). As for the traditions of Ahlu 's-Sunnah, they do not purport to explain the wordings of the Qur'ãn; they rather describe the action of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and fatwã of some companions. However they differ among themselves: Some show the obligatoriness of wiping the feet, while the others support their washing.

However, overwhelming majority of the Sunnīs has given preference to the traditions of washing over those of wiping; but one should not entangle with them here because it is a matter of jurisprudence, and the arguments and counter-arguments are more appropriate for a book of fiqh. However, they have tried to fit the verse on a ruling of fiqh which they have accepted and have written various contrived reasons for it; but the verse does not agree with such interpretations unless one is prepared to pull it down from the peak of eloquence to the depth of incoherence.

Some people have said that arjulakum (with fatḥah of -la-) is in conjunction with: "wash your faces"; and if it is recited arjulikum (with kasrah of -li-), then it just follows bi-ru'ūsikum. But we have already explained that such interpretations are not worthy of a speech of high literary standard.

[The author has then quoted some more abstruse grammatical interpretations of the partisans of washing. We have omitted them because they were beyond the grasp of non-Arabic speaking readers. Tr.]

Someone even while reciting with kasrah of -li-) has tried to show obligatoriness of washing of feet. He says that the conjunction is in its place [i.e. "your feet" is in conjunction with "wipe a part of your heads";] yet wiping is a shortened form of washing and therefore wiping of feet means their washing! Then he supports his argument by saying that the verse mentions the limits of the washed organ only i.e. the hands and does not limit the wiped organ i.e. the head; now when it limits the wiped organ by saying: "and your feet to the ankles", we know that it wants them to be washed!

This is the worst type of argument. Wiping is totally different from washing and there is no inseparable connection between them. Apart from that, why should only the feet be washed and the head be left for wiping? Would that I knew what prevents him from interpreting the word masḥ wherever it appears in the Qur'ān or traditions as washing and vice versa. Why should not the traditions of washing taken as to mean wiping and the traditions of wiping as meaning washing? In this way all the proofs will turn topsy-turvy without any clear end. As for his supporting reason he turn was tried in it to impose a meaning on the word through analogy and it is the worst type of analogy.

[Again the author quotes here some contrived reasoning to show that wiping and washing are not two separate actions; and then replies to it. We have omitted it because of its abstruseness. Tr.]

This and similar contrived reasonings which this verse has been made to suffer go against its manifest meaning; their only aim is to justify traditions of washing in a way that they should not appear to be going against the Qur'ān. If we open the door for imposing the theme of a tradition on a verse by twisting the apparent meaning of that verse then nobody could be found guilty of going against the Qur'ān. There is a better way for the believers in the washing of the feet to follow. They should say as some early muḥaddithīn (like Anas and ash-Sha'bī) are reported as saying that Jibrīl had brought wiping and the sunnah is washing. It means abrogation of the Book by the Sunnah and the subject will turn from the tafsīr to the Principles of Jurisprudence: whether or not the Sunnah can abrogate the Book. When an exegete says that a certain tradition is against the Book, he means to say that the connotation of this tradition goes against the apparent meaning of the Book. He shows the conflict of the tradition with the Qur'ān, not that he gives a fatwā for a rule of the sharī'ah.

Now, we come to the words: "to the ankles": al-Ka'b (اَلْكَعْبُ) is the bone protruding on the dorsum of the foot. Some people say that it is the bone protruding at the joint of the leg and foot. In this meaning there are two such bones at the joint of each foot and leg.

QUR'ĀN: and if you are under obligation to perform a total ablution, then wash (yourselves): al-Junub (اَلْجُنُبُ) is an infinitive verb but is generally used in the meaning of active participle; that is why it is used for both genders as well as for singular, dual and plural. When they want to use a word as an infinitive verb, they say al-janābah (اَلْجَنَابَةُ).

This sentence is in conjunction with the clause: wash your faces, as the verse is meant to show the necessary stipulation of cleanliness for prayer. The sentence means: perform a total ablution if you are in al-janãbah. This condition alludes to an unspoken condition in wuḍū'. The verse then will mean: wash your faces and your hands as far as the elbows, and wipe a part of your heads and your feet to the ankles, if you are not junub; and if you are junub, then perform a total ablution. It may be inferred from it that wuḍū' is prescribed if there is no janãbah, but with janãbah the ghusl is enough as the traditions show.

The same law has been explained in the verse of the chapter of "Women": nor when you are in a state of major ritual impurity – unless (you are) travelling on the road – until you have washed yourselves (4:43). The verse under discussion is more elaborate as it names the bath as cleanliness. This cleanliness is other than that which one usually gets from taking bath which it is an effect of that bath; but the cleanliness mentioned in this verse refers to the very act of taking bath (as it removes spiritual uncleanness); while in this context removing physical uncleanness and dirt from the body by using water is called at-tanaẓẓuf (اَلتَّنَظُّف). There is a tradition from Imãm (a.s.): "Whatever water flows on becomes clean." This rule is inferred from this very verse.

QUR'ÃN: and if you are sick or on a journey, or one among you comes from privy, or you have touched the women, and you do not find water, betake yourselves to clean earth*: Now begins the rule which applies to a person who does not have water for cleansing or bath. The four situations which are joined with the particle of conjunction "or" are not opposite to each other in reality; sickness and journey by themselves do not cause al-ḥadath (اَلْحَدَثُ = the things because of which wuḍū' or ghusl becomes necessary); they may demand wuḍū' or ghusl when a small or big ḥadath takes place in that condition. The last two alternatives do not stand face to face with the first two; rather both of the first two alternatives are divided into the last two. That is why someone has said that "or" in the clause: "or one among you comes from privy", is used in the meaning of "and", as we shall describe later. Moreover, the reasons justifying tayammum are not limited to sickness or journey; there are other causes too.

Allãh has mentioned sickness and journey and in these two conditions one is generally unable to get or use water whenever he wishes; and He has mentioned coming from toilet and touching the women – and unavailability of water in these two conditions is a matter of chance. Conversely, it may be said that looking at the physical structure of man, his being sick or on journey is a matter of chance while going to toilet or touching of the women are physical necessities. The first causes small ḥadath, which is removed by wuḍū' and the second brings on big ḥadath which is removed by ghusl. In all the four situations with which man becomes involved sometimes by chance and at other times by nature, he is obliged to do tayammum when he cannot get water.

Unavailability of water metaphorically denotes inability to use water. It means that unavailability of water is a condition for all the four situations including sickness.

The above explanation shows that:

First: The sickness mentioned in this verse is the one, which prevents a man from using water as the condition: "and you do not find water" shows; rather the context of the whole speech gives this connotation.

Second: "Or on a journey" is another alternative in which man is involved by chance and during which sometime water becomes unavailable; it is not restricted by the words: "or one among you comes from privy"; rather it is in conjunction with the words: "wash your faces". So the meaning will be as follows: When you rise up for prayer while you are on a journey and you do not find water then do tayammum. As the sentence: when you rise up to prayer, wash your faces . . . had not required any conditional clause, this order of tayammum also does not need any such condition as both are in conjunction with each other.

Third: The Divine words*:* "or one among you comes from the privy" is another independent situation. Someone has said that "or" has been used here in the meaning of "and"; as Allãh (s.w.t.) has said in another context: And We sent him to a hundred thousand, rather, they exceeded (87:147). But this interpretation is unwarranted. Apart from that, the word "aw" (أَوْ = or, rather) in the verse brought in evidence is not in the meaning of "and"; it is used in its literal meaning as we have translated it with the word "rather". It does not show that the speaker was unsure of their number; it just means that the situation or condition was indefinite. The same interpretation is given to other such expressions whenever they occur in the Qur'ãn. For example: . . . so that you may guard (against evil), (2:21); . . . had they but known this (2:102).

This sentence has the same construction of conjunction as the previous two. The meaning will be: When you rise up to prayer and one of you had come from privy and you do not find water then you should do tayammum.

It may easily be inferred from these wordings that when a man has not broken his aṭ-ṭahãrah (اَلطَّهَارَةُ = here it means wuḍū' or tayam-mum) with small ḥadath then he does not have to repeat his wuḍū' or tayammum; it supports those aḥãdīth which show that a man who has done ṭahãrah is not obliged to repeat it.

The Divine words, "or one among you comes from privy" teach good manner; al-ghãiṭ (اَلْغَائِطُ = a depressed plot or pit); people used to sit in such places to relieve themselves in order to be hidden from public eyes; the Qur'ãn uses the expression "coming from depressed place or privy" and it alludes to relieving oneself. Nowadays, the word al-ghãiṭ is used for human excrements but it is a vulgar usage, which has come up in later centuries. The same is the position of al-'adhrah (اَلْعَذْرَةُ); its literal meaning is threshold of the door. As the people used to empty their lavatory in front of their houses, the word al-'adhrah gradually came to mean faeces, as al-Jawharī has explained in aṣ-ṣiḥãḥ.

Also, the Qur'ãn has not said: "or you come from privy"; because it would have pinpointed the one involved. Nor has it said: "or one of you has come from privy" because this possessive construction too would have shown a sort of specification. Rather, it went further in vagueness and ambiguity and said: "or one among you comes from privy." This was done to teach Muslims polite manner of speaking.

Fourth: "Or you have touched the women". This too, like previous clauses, is an independent condition; and the conjunction and the meaning are like previous phrases. Touching the women is an allusion to sexual intercourse. This too, shows the polite manner of speech, as to how one should keep one's tongue from clearly expressing what the human nature doesn't like to talk freely about.

One might say that, in that case, the preceding expression, "and if you are under obligation to perform a total ablution", would have been more appropriate because it was more decent; but it would have missed the main point of the speech. The present expression shows that it is something, which a man by nature is inclined to do, while the previous phrase lacks this indication.

Someone has said that "touching the women" means exactly what it says and it doesn't indicate sexual intercourse. However, it is a very wrong interpretation because it goes against the context of the verse. Allāh has begun the speech by describing the order concerning small ḥadath and that is wuḍū', and then the order regarding big ḥadath, that is, janābah after which one normally has to take bath. Then the speech turns to these very situations in unusual circumstances, when one doesn't get water; so it describes the substitute of wuḍū', that is, tayammum. Now, the context demands that the substitute of bath too should be mentioned and that is why it has mentioned touching of the women alluding to sexual intercourse. There was no reason why only the substitute of wuḍū' should be mentioned ignoring that of ghusl altogether.

Fifth: The above explanations do not leave room for many objections brought against the verse as may be seen from the following:

i) The mention of sickness or being on a journey is irrelevant, because sickness or journey don't obligate one to do tayammum unless one has undergone a ḥadath or has touched the women; but the small ḥadath and the sexual intercourse would make tayammum necessary even if one is not sick or on journey.

Reply: Small ḥadath and sexual intercourse are not to be joined with sickness and journey; all four are independent situations as was explained earlier.

ii) The second alternative "or on a journey" is irrelevant and the reason is the same as given in the first objection. Sickness is an excuse, which can prevent use of available water; it does not indicate unavailability of water. Therefore, it was necessary to say "and you do not find water"; and in absence of water [one has to do tayammum]; so being sick or on a journey has no relevance here.

Reply: The phrase: "and you do not find water" is an allusion to inability to use water, no matter whether it is because of unavailability of water or otherwise.

iii) It was enough to say: "you do not find water", and all the situations mentioned before it would be covered in this one phrase; so if the phrases: "if you are sick or on a journey or one among you comes from the privy or you have touched the women," were omitted it would have been shorter and clearer.

Reply: If those phrases were omitted, all the fine points mentioned earlier would have been lost.

iv) It would have been better if the phrase were changed to the following: "and if you are unable to use water", because this amended phrase would have covered the sickness plus other excuses.

Reply: The present phrase alludes to that meaning too and it is more eloquent.

QUR'ÃN: betake yourselves to clean earth and wipe a part of your faces and (part of) your hands therewith: at-Tayammum (اَلتَّيَمُّم = to intend*); aṣ-ṣa'īd* (اَلصَّعِيْدُ = face of the earth) aṭ-ṭayyib (اَلطَّيِّبُ), a thing is called ṭayyib when it is in its natural condition. This adjective used for the earth indicates that the earth should be in its natural condition like soil or common stones. It excludes the items, which are separated from earth by burning or through other natural processes like cement, potteries, and minerals. Allãh says: And as for the good land, its vegetation springs forth (abundantly) by the permission of its Lord, and (as for) that which is bad (its herbage) comes forth but scantily (7:58). This adjective has given rise to the conditions mentioned in aḥãdīth for the soil, which may be used in tayammum. Also, it is said that aṭ-ṭayyib means clean; in that case, it indicates the condition of cleanliness for the earth of tayammum.

The phrase: "and wipe a part of your faces and (part of) your hands therewith", shows that one has to wipe those organs in tayammum which one was required to wash in wuḍū'. We may say that tayammum is a shortened alternative of wuḍū' from which the two wipings (of head and feet) have been omitted and the two washings (of face and hands) substituted with the wiping; and water has given way to soil – to remove hardships.

This shows that the two organs of tayammum are the same two which were washed in wuḍū'. As Allãh has used the preposition "bi" (بِ) with the verb of wiping, it indicates that the wiping in tayammum should apply to only some parts of the two organs, that is a part of face and a part of hands. It totally fits on the explanations narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) that the part of face to be wiped in tayammum is the forehead only and the part of hand to be wiped is from wrist downwards.

This explanation shows invalidity of some people's opinion that the hand to be wiped in tayammum covers from armpit to finger tips; or what has been said by others that the whole part of hand washed in wuḍū' should be wiped in tayammum. Clearly, the verb al-masḥ (اَلْمَسْحُ = to wipe) followed by preposition "bi" indicates that only a part of the organ is to be wiped.

"Min" (مِنْ) in "minhu" (مِنْهُ) translated here as "therewith" shows that wiping of face and hands should begin with earth; and aḥãdīth have explained that tayammum should start with hitting the hands on earth and then wiping the face and hands with it.

Someone has said that "min" here indicates apportioning. In other words, there should remain attached to the palms some parts of earth (like dust) which would be used for wiping the face and the hands. According to him, tayammum would not be valid on a smooth stone on which there is no dust, etc.

COMMENT: The meaning that we have given is more in keeping with the wording of the Qur'ãn.

QUR'ÃN: Allãh does not desire to put on you any difficulty but He wishes to purify you: "Min ḥaraj" (مِنْ حَرَجٍ = translated here as any difficulty) literally means any kind of difficulty. It puts emphasis on the negative connotation. There is no commandment in religion, which could create difficulty; that is why the negative is attached to the Divine desire and not to difficulty.

Difficulty can be of two types:

i) A difficulty which results from the nature of the commandment itself; that is, the commandment itself becomes a source of difficulty. Allãh hasn't given any such order. For example, He has not forbidden eating tasty foods with a view of creating a knack for self-denial, because such an order would have created difficulty by its very nature.

ii) A difficulty, which temporarily happens in implementation of an order. For example, if someone cannot stand in prayer because of illness, this rule will be waived for him but the general rule will continue to apply to others.

The phrase: "but He wishes to purify you" after the preceding clause: "Allãh does not desire to put on you any difficulty", shows that Allãh has not laid down any rule with the aim of creating difficulties for human beings. The verse means: Our aim in these laid down rules is to purify you and the main purpose is to complete our favours on you; not that We want to put you in trouble or difficulty. That is why when We found that wuḍū' or ghusl was difficult for you in the absence of water, We changed that order to tayammum which you can easily do; we have not totally waived the order of ṭahãrah because we want to purify you and complete our favours on you, so that you may be grateful.

QUR'ÃN: but He wishes to purify you so that He may complete His favour on you that you may be grateful*: The preceding explanation shows that the main purpose of wuḍū', ghusl and tayammum is to make you purified through these modes of ṭahãrah. This ṭahãrah is not from al-khabath [اَلْخَبَثُ = an uncleanness which doesn't require an-niyyah (اَلنِّيَّةُ = intention) for its removal]; but it is a spiritual purification which one gets through these three modes of ṭahãrah and which is the condition for validity of prayer.

It may be inferred from these words that if a person continues in ṭahãrah and does not get any ḥadath, then he is not required to repeat his ṭahãrah for the next prayer. Although the opening phrase: when you rise up to prayer, is unrestricted, it does not mean that one has to do wuḍū', ghusl or tayammum before every prayer because not every order is obligatory. [In the situation mentioned above, one is only recommended to renew one's ṭahãrah.]

The clause: "so that He may complete His favour on you", the meaning of favour and its completion was explained in the verse 3 of this chapter: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed my favour on you; and the meaning of gratefulness was given in the verse 144 of chapter 3: And Allãh will reward the grateful. Accordingly, the favour in this verse means the religion (not in the sense of its particular beliefs and commandments) but in the meaning of submission to Allãh in all conditions and situations. This entails acceptance of Allãh's authority over His servants in whatever He obligates them to do. That authority will be completed if the sharī'ah covers all religious commandments, small parts of which are the three types of ṭahãrah.

The verse gives two reasons for this order:

i. To purify the believers;
ii. To complete His favour on them.

These two are different from one another. The first reason gives the purpose of legislating the three modes of purification while completion of favour is the purpose of legislating the whole sharī'ah, and the three modes of ṭahãrah are a small part of it. In other words, the two reasons are particular and general. Accordingly, the clauses would mean as follows. We have laid down the three purifications so that you could purify yourselves with them. They are a part of the religion. When the whole sharī'ah will be legislated, Allãh's favour on you will be completed in order that you may be grateful to Allãh, so that He may choose you for Himself. Ponder on it.

QUR'ĀN: And remember the favour of Allāh on you and the covenant with which He bound you firmly, when you said: "We have heard and we obey" . . .*: That was the covenant which was taken from them. They were expected to surrender to Allāh as Allāh reminds them with the words: "when you said: 'We have heard and we obey.'" It is unconditional listening and unconditional obedience; in other words, it is Islam. The favour of Allāh in the clause: "And remember the favour of Allāh on you", points to the graceful gifts which Allāh bestowed on them under protection of Islam. If they compared their condition in the days of ignorance with that after entering into Islam, they would find themselves enjoying peace, well-being, affluence, purity of hearts and purity of deeds; as Allāh says: And remember the favour of Allāh on you when you were enemies, then He united your hearts so by His bounty you became brethren; and you were on the brink of a pit of fire then He delivered you from it (3:103).

Alternatively, the favour may refer to the reality of Islam; Islam is the mother of all favours that nourishes all other favours as we have described earlier. When we say that Divine favour refers to Islam or to Divine authority, we are aiming at pinpointing the examples of favour. We are not trying to find out the meaning of the word; meanings are known from dictionaries and we are not concerned with it here.

Then Allāh reminds them of His Omniscience and that Allāh knows the hidden secrets of the hearts. So, He has ordered them to fear Him: and fear Allāh; surely Allāh knows what is in the breasts.

aṭ-Ṭūsī narrates with his asnād from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: when you rise up to prayer, that he said, "When you rise up from sleep." The narrator (Ibn Bakīr) says, "I said 'Does sleep break wuḍū'?' He (the Imām) said, 'Yes, when it overwhelms hearing and he doesn't hear voices.'" (Tahdhību 'l-aḥkām).

The author says: This meaning is also narrated in other traditions and as-Suyūṭī has narrated it in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Zayd ibn Aslam and an-Naḥḥās. It doesn't go against the explanations given in the Commentary that rising up to prayer means intending to pray, because what we have said explains the meaninng of "rising to" and the tradition explains the meaning of "rising from".

al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain of narrators from Zurãrah that he said, "I said to Abū Ja'far (a.s.), 'From where did you know and say that wiping should be done to a part of head and a part of feet.' He (the Imãm) laughed and said, 'O Zurãrah! The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has said so and the Book has been revealed by Allãh with this order, because Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, says: wash your faces, so we know that the whole face should be washed. Then He says: and your hands as far as the elbows; in this way, the hands up to the elbows have been joined with face (in one order) and we know that they too should be washed up to the elbows. Then He disjointed the speech and said: and wipe a part of your heads; when He used the preposition "bi" (بِ) before "your heads", we understood that wiping should cover only a part of the head. Then He joined the feet with the head (in that order) as had joined the hands with the face, and said: and your feet to the ankles. Now, because He has joined them with the head, we know that wiping should cover only a part of the feet. Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) explained it to the people but they neglected it. Then (Allãh) said: and (if) you do not find water, betake yourselves to clean earth and wipe a part of your faces and (part of) your hands therewith. When wuḍū' was waived in the absence of water, wiping (with earth) was ordered for part of (the organs) which were washed (in wuḍū') because He has said: part of your faces, then has joined with it the hands (that is, parts of it). Then He has said: therewith, that is, in tayammum. It was so ordained because Allãh knew that the wiping with earth would not cover the whole face as the earth adheres to parts of the palms leaving other portions untouched. Then Allãh said: Allãh does not desire to put on you any difficulty; and al-ḥaraj means difficulty.'" (al-Kãfi).

The author says: The clause: and (if) you do not find water, paraphrases the verse making its meaning clearer.

Also al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain of narrators from Zurãrah and Bakīr that both of them asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.) about the wuḍū' of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). He (the Imãm) asked for a wash-bowl with water; he dipped his right hand, scooped a handful of water and pouring it on his face washed the face with it; then he dipped his left hand and scooped a handful of water and pouring it on his right arm washed the arm from the elbow to the palm without returning the hand to the elbow; then he dipped his right palm (in the water) and poured it on his left arm and did as he had done with the right arm; then he wiped his head and feet with wetness of his palms without adding new water to them. Then he said, "One should not insert his fingers under the shoelace." Then (the Imãm) said, "Surely Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, says: When you rise up to prayer, wash your faces and your hands, it is therefore not proper to leave any part of one's face without washing and Allãh has ordered to wash the hands to the elbows, it is therefore not proper for him to leave any part of his hands upto the elbows without washing, because Allãh says: wash your faces and your hands as far as the elbows. Then Allãh has said: and wipe a part of your heads and your feet to the ankles. So, if he wiped a part of his head or a part of his feet between the ankles and toe-tips, his wuḍū' will be completed." The narrators said, "We asked, 'Where are the ankles?' (The Imãm) said, 'Here (pointing to the joint of feet with bone of leg).' We said, 'What is this?' (The Imãm) said, 'This is the bone of leg, and ankle is below it.' Then we asked, 'May Allãh make your affairs good! One handful (of water) is enough for the face and one handful for the arm?' (The Imãm) said, 'Yes, if you use it properly and two handfulls cover the whole wuḍū'.'" (ibid.)

The author says: This tradition is well known; al-'Ayyãshī has narrated it from Bakīr and Zurãrah from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) and has narrated a similar tradition through Abdullãh ibn Sulaymãn from Abū Ja'far (a.s.); also there are other traditions having similar connotation as well as of the preceding tradition in other books.

al-'Ayyãshī has narrated from Zurãrah ibn A'yan; and Abū Ḥanīfah has narrated from Abū Bakīr ibn Ḥazm that they said, "A man did wuḍū' and did masḥ on his socks and entering the mosque performed his prayer. Then came there 'Alī (a.s.) and trampled his neck under foot and said, 'Woe unto you! You are praying without wuḍū'!' He said, ''Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭãb has ordered me (to do wuḍū' like this).' So, 'Alī (a.s.) caught his hand, brought him to 'Umar and said, 'Look what this (man) is narrating from you (and his voice was raised).' 'Umar said, 'Yes. I have ordered him (to do like it). Verily, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had done masḥ (in similar way).' 'Alī (a.s.) said, 'Was it before the revelation of (the chapter of) "The Table" or after it?' He said, 'I don't know.' 'Alī (a.s.) said, 'Then why do you give fatwã when you don't know. The Book (of Allãh) has left socks behind.'" (Tafsīru 'l-burhãn).

The author says: There had appeared a controversy during the reign of 'Umar about masḥ on socks, and it was the judgement of 'Alī

(a.s.) that it was abrogated by the verse of the chapter of "The Table", as appears from the traditions. That is why it has been narrated from some companions like al-Barã', Bilãl and Jarīr ibn 'Abdillãh that they had narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), (permission of) masḥ on socks after revelation of the chapter of "The Table". [In this way they tried to justify 'Umar's fatwã.] But these traditions are not free from confusion. Perhaps they thought that the abrogation of the wiping on socks was not based on the Qurãnic verse. But it is not so, because the verse confirms the wiping on the feet upto the ankles and socks are certainly not parts of the feet. The same is the connotation of the coming tradition.

al-'Ayyãshī narrates from Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-Khurãsãnī (and the ḥadīth is marfū') that he said, "A man came to the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.), and asked him about the masḥ on socks. The Imãm bowed his head for sometime; then he raised the head and said, 'Verily Allãh, the Blessed, the High, has ordered His servants to do ṭahãrah and divided it among the organs; so He gave a share of it to the face and a share of it to the head and a share of it to the feet and a share of it to the hands. Now, if your socks are among these organs you may do masḥ on them.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

Again, he narrates from al-Ḥasan ibn Zayd from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad (a.s.) that he said, "Verily 'Alī opposed the people in the reign of 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭãb regarding the masḥ on socks. They said, 'We had seen the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) doing masḥ on socks.' 'Alī (a.s.) said, 'Was it before the revelation of "The Table" or after it?' They said, 'We don't know.' 'Alī (a.s.), said, 'But I know that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) left wiping on the socks when "The Table" was revealed. And that I do masḥ on a donkey's back is preferable to me than doing masḥ on the socks.' Then he recited this verse: O you who believe! When you rise up to prayer wash your faces and your hands as far as the elbows, and wipe a part of your heads and your feet to the ankles." (ibid.)

as-Suyūṭī writes: Ibn Jarīr and an-Naḥḥãs (in his Nãsikh) have narrated about 'Alī (a.s.) that he was doing (fresh) wuḍū' for each ṣalãt and used to recite: O you who believe! When you rise up to prayer . . . (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: Its explanation has been given earlier.

al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain of narrates from al-Ḥalabī from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said, "I asked him (the Imām) about the words of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: or you have touched the women. He (the Imām) said, 'It means sexual intercourse; but Allāh is concealed and He prefers to cover. Therefore, He did not (clearly) name the act as you do.'" (al-Kāfī) al-ʻAyyāshī narrates from Zurārah that he said, "I asked Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.), about tayammum. He said, 'Verily ʻAmmār ibn Yāsir came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and said, "I was in condition of janābah and I had no water with me." The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) asked. "What did you do? O ʻAmmār!" He said, "I removed my clothes and then I turned round over the earth." (The Prophet) said, "The donkeys too do the same. Allāh has said: and wipe a part of your faces and (part of) your hands therewith." Then (the Prophet) put his hands together on the earth and wiped them. Then, he wiped from his forehead until below the eyebrows; then rubbed on hand with the other on the back of the palm, beginning with the right hand.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

Zurārah narrates from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said, "Allāh laid down washing for the face and the arms, and masḥ, for the head and feet. When man happened to be overcome by journey, sickness or other needs, Allāh removed the washing and changed it to wiping. Then he recited: and if you are sick or on a journey, or one among you comes from privy, or you have touched the women, and you do not find water, betake yourselves to clean earth and wipe a part of your faces and (part of) your hands therewith." (ibid.)

ʻAbdu 'l-Aʻlā Mawlā Āl Sām says, "I said to Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), 'I stumbled and my nail was broken. So I put a bandage on my toe. How should I do wuḍū'?' The Imām (a.s.) said, 'The order for this and similar situations is known from the Book of Allah, the Blessed, the High: and (Allāh) has not laid upon you any hardship in religion, (22:78).'" (ibid.)

The author says: This refers to the verse of the chapter of "The Pilgrimage" which disallows difficulties. The Imām did not refer the clause of the similar meaning in the verse of wuḍū' and went to the last verse of the chapter of "The Pilgrimage". It shows that non-imposition of difficulty has the same meaning in both places. The traditions quoted above contain many fine points which may be understood if one keeps in mind the explanations we have given regarding these verse; that commentary may also be taken as explanation of the traditions.

The connection of the verse with the preceding ones is clear and needs no elaboration. The series of the verses is addressed to the believers, pointing to some important matters, which affect them individually and collectively in both worlds.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Be upright for Allãh, bearers of witness with justice and let not hatred of a people incite you not to act equitably: The verse is similar to the verse 135 of the chapter "Women", O you who believe! Be maintainers of justice bearers of witness for Allãh's sake, though it may be against your own selves or (your) parents or near relatives; if he be rich or poor, Allãh is nearer to them both in compassion; therefore do not follow (your) low desires, lest you deviate; and if you swerve or turn aside, then surely Allãh is aware of what you do.

However, there is a subtle difference between the two verses. The verse of the chapter of "Women" forbids deviation from justice in bearing witness because of some low desires; the person loves the man for whom he bears witness because of some relationship or friendship, etc. and therefore, gives evidence in his favour in order that he might get some undue benefits. Conversely, this verse of the chapter of "The Table" prohibits deviation from justice while bearing witness because of hatred and enmity for the person against whom evidence is tendered; he bears witness against him intending to take some revenge from him and thus tramples on his rights.

This difference of themes has brought difference of stipulations in the clauses of the two verses. The verse in the chapter of "Women" says: Be maintainers of justice, bearers of witness for Allãh's sake; while this verse in the chapter of "The Table" turns the restrictions around and says: "be upright for Allãh, bearers of witness with justice."

The main purpose of this verse is to restrain the believers from going against truth in bearing witness because of some enmity that the witness might be entertaining against the party concerned. Therefore, the evidence is attached to justice, meaning that one should observe justice while giving evidence; the evidence should not contain even an iota of injustice, even if the person concerned is one's enemy. On the other hand, evidence in favour of someone because of love or relationship (even if it goes against the right) is not counted such a deviation from justice although in reality it is not free from injustice and deviation. Therefore, the verse in the chapter of "The Table" enjoins bearing witness with justice and it has been based on the order of being upright for the sake of Allãh; while the order in the chapter of "Women" enjoins giving evidence for the sake of Allãh, that is, without following base desires and it is based on the order of being upright with justice.

The same is the reason why in the verse of "The Table" the order to bear witness with justice leads to the order of acting equitably as Allãh says: act equitably, that is nearer to piety; it calls to justice and counts it as a means of acquiring piety. And in the verse of the chapter "Women", the order has been reversed and the command to bear witness for Allãh is followed by the phrases: do not follow your (low) desires lest you deviate. Thus, Allãh prohibits the believers from following one's low desire and discarding of piety; and counts it as a means of deviating from justice.

Then, both the verses warn them against deviation from piety, using almost similar wordings. The verse of the chapter of "Women" says: and if you swerve or turn aside, then surely Allãh is aware of what you do, i.e., if you don't keep firm hold of piety; and the verse of the chapter of "The Table" says: and fear Allãh, surely Allãh is Aware of what you do.

The meaning of the wording: "be upright for Allãh, bearers of witness with justice . . .", may easily be understood from explanations of previous verses.

QUR'ÃN: act equitably, that is nearer to piety . . .*: The pronoun "that" refers to justice that is understood from the order of acting equitably. The meaning is clear.

QUR'ÃN: Allãh has promised to those who believe and do good deeds: they shall have forgiveness and a mighty reward*: The sentence: "they shall have forgiveness and a might reward", elaborates the divine promise given to those who believe and do good deeds. This verse presents this divine promise more forcefully than does the verse 29 of the chapter of "Victory": Allãh has promised those among them who believe and do good forgiveness and a great reward. It is because the verse under discussion clearly and independently describes the promise while the verse of the chapter of "Victory" mentions it as a part of the sentence. Someone has said that it is more emphatic because it is news after news; but this reasoning is not correct.

QUR'ÃN: And* (as for) those who disbelieve and reject our signs, these are the companions of the flame: ar-Rãghib has said: "al-Jaḥmah (اَلْجَحْمَةُ) means intensely searing fire; and from it is derived the word al-jaḥīm (اَلْجَحِيْمُ = the Hell)". The threat contained in this verse stands opposite to the promise of the preceding verse: they shall have forgiveness and a mighty reward.

In this verse, disbelief is qualified with rejection of the Divine message; the aim is to exclude a disbelief, which is not joined with rejection of the Divine signs and commandments.

When someone knows that the Divine sign is true and does not reject it [yet does not follow it properly] then his case is in the hands of Allãh; if He wishes He would forgive him; otherwise He might give him punishment. The two verses contain good promise for those believers who do good deeds and stern threat to those who disbelieve and reject the Divine signs. Between these two extremes, there are many intermediate stages and stations. Allãh has kept their conditions vague and ambiguous.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Remember Allãh's favour on you when a people had determined to stretch forth their hands towards you . . .*: These wordings may be applied to various incidents and events which had taken place between the infidels and the Muslims; for example, the battles of Badr, Uḥud and Aḥzāb, etc. Apparently, it is a general description and refers to the polytheists' continuous efforts to kill the believers, erase Islam, and annihilate the religion of tawḥīd.

Some exegetes have said that it refers to the polytheists' conspiracy to kill the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) or to plan of some Jews to assassinate him, but the apparent wording does not support this particularization, as may be seen clearly.

QUR'ĀN: and fear Allāh, and on Allāh let the believers rely: This exhortation for piety and reliance on Allāh in fact points to intense warning and total prohibition of neglecting the piety and discarding reliance on Allāh. We say so because this command is immediately followed by the description of making covenant with the Children of Israel and also with those who said: "We are Christians". Both groups had broken the Divine covenant that made them the target of Divine curse, and their hearts were hardened consequently; thus they neglected a portion of their religions. Consequently, Allāh created enmity and hatred among them upto the Day of Resurrection.

The incident has been referred to, only to make the believers aware that the Jews and the Christians have been meted out the punishment because they had forgotten the Divine covenant; they had undertaken that they would surrender themselves to Allāh and had reinforced it with the promise of obeying the God's commands. Accordingly they should have desisted from going against the Divine rules and should have relied on God in their religious affairs. They should have taken what Allāh had chosen for them and left what He did not like them to do. Its only way was to obey their Messengers by believing in them and not following anyone other than Allāh and His Messenger. They should not have listened to those arrogant and insolent persons who called them to submit to their authority, even if they were their religious scholars and monks. There should be no obedience except to Allāh or to him who calls to Allāh's obedience.

But they threw the Divine guidance behind their backs. As a result they were removed far from Divine mercy; they altered the Divine speech from its place and interpreted it in a way that was against the Divine ideas; as a result, they neglected and forgot the important parts of the religion.

It was a part on which all good and happiness depended. When they abandoned it, every happiness, felicity, and good departed from their lives, and what was left of religion in their hands, that too was contaminated and spoiled. Religion is a composite entity of beliefs and rules, every part of which is intertwined with all other parts; if a part is spoiled all other parts are adversely affected, especially if the spoiled part was related to the basics. For example, a person prays but not for the sake of Allãh, spends in charities but not to seek the pleasure of Allãh or fights but not for raising the word of truth. Such people cannot get benefit of what has remained in their hands because it is altered and rotten; and what they had neglected of the religion would not be of any help to them in the hereafter. Nobody can do without religion especially its fundamental principles.

It is seen from the above that the context demands that the believers should be warned against neglecting the piety and discarding the reliance on God. This purpose is served by referring to that event and inviting them to ponder on it.

Also it appears from the above that reliance on God should cover all legislative and creative matters or may be the legislations only; in other words, Allãh has commanded the believer to obey Allãh and His Messenger in religious commandments and accept whatever the Messenger has brought and explained to them; they should entrust the religious affairs and Divine commandments to their Lord; should refrain from thinking that they were independent or that they could manipulate the Divine sharī'ah which the Messenger has brought to them. Also, they should conform to the system of the cause and effect laid down by God in the universe. But they should not ascribe to it any independent authority. They should not give to it any shade of Lordship. They should always remain waiting for what Allãh decides or chooses for them by His own management and will.

QUR'ÃN: And certainly Allãh made a covenant with the Children of Israel and We raised from among them twelve chieftains . . .*: ar-Rãghib has said: an-Naqīb (اَلنَّـقِـيْبُ = translated here as chieftain) denotes the one who investigates or explores the condition of his people; it is derived from an-naqb (اَلنَّـقْبُ = breaching or boring a wall or a hide); plural = an-nuqabã' (اَلنُّـقَبَآءُ).

Allãh narrates to the believers of this ummah what had happened to the Children of Israel. They were given their religious commandments; a covenant was made with them that they would remain steadfast in religion. Chieftains were appointed for them and the sharī'ah was promulgated, and thus the proof of Allãh was completed against them. And what was their response to all that? They broke the covenant and in return, Allãh cursed them and made their hearts stone hard. Allãh says: "And certainly Allãh made a covenant with the Children of Israel." It is mentioned several times in the chapter of "The Cow", and in other place: "and we raised among them twelve chieftains"; apparently, they were the heads of the twelve tribes. They were a sort of rulers over them; their relationship with their tribes was in a way like that of Ulu 'l-Amr vis-à-vis people of this ummah; they had the authority in the worldly and religious affairs although they did not receive any divine revelation nor had they any right to legislate any sharī'ah (because this is reserved for Allãh and His Messenger). "And Allãh said: 'Surely I am with you.'" This is a commitment that Allãh would protect and look after them. It follows that God would help them if they obeyed Him and would abandon them if they disobeyed. That is why this sentence is followed by these two conditions: "if you keep up prayer and pay zakãt and believe in My Messengers and assist them." at-Ta'zīz (اَلتَّعْزِيْرُ = to help respectfully). "My Messengers" refers to those who were to come in future like 'Īsã and Muḥammad, and all those whom Allãh raised between Mūsã and Muḥammad (peace be on them all). "And offer to Allãh a goodly loan", it refers to unobligatory spending in the way of Allãh, not the obligatory zakãt: "'I will most certainly cover your evil deeds, and I will most certainly cause you to enter gardens beneath which rivers flow.'" This is the goodly promise given by God and it is followed by these words: "'but whoever disbe-lieves from among you after that, he indeed shall lose the right way.'"

"But on account of their breaking their covenant"; apparently, it refers to the disbelief mentioned just above about which Allãh has warned that he indeed shall lose the right way.

Fabimã naqḍihim (فَبِمَانَقْضِهِمْ): The particle "mã" here gives emphasis to their breaking the covenant; also it creates a vagueness which gives various connotations in different settings; it may show that a certain thing is too big or too small, etc. The meaning: 'Because of their certain contrary behaviour against the covenant, We cursed them and made their hearts hard.' Curse means keeping isolated from Divine Mercy. Qãsiyah (قَاسِيَةً = hard); it was originally used for hard stones; a hard heart is that which doesn't submit to truth, is not affected by mercy. Allãh says: Has not the time yet come for those who believe that their hearts should be humble for the remembrance of Allãh and what has come down of the truth? And (that) they should not be like those who were given the Book before, but the time became prolonged to them, so their hearts hardened, and most of them are transgressors (57:16).

This hard-heartedness led them to altering the words from their places; this alteration could be by interpreting a Divine speech in a way which Allãh was not pleased with, that is, misinterpreting it and giving it an uncalled for meaning. Also, it could be by deleting some words or adding or altering it; all these are examples of alteration. In this way they lose the sight of clear realities of religion. "And they neglected a portion of what they were reminded of"; that was the portion which contained the fundamentals of religion on which the felicity of both worlds depended; that falicity was replaced by infelicity and hardships. They started believing that God was like His creatures, that the Prophet Mūsã (a.s.) was the final Prophet, that the sharī'ah of the Torah would continue forever, that badã' or abrogation of the sharī'ah was invalid and similar other beliefs.

"and you shall always discover treachery in them"; it may also be translated as 'you shall always find a treacherous group among them.' "excepting a few of them; so pardon them and turn away; surely Allãh loves those who do good (to others)." We have explained several times that exception of a few does not prevent attachment of curse and punishment to the whole group or nation.[8]

QUR'ÃN: And of those who say, "We are Christians," We did take their covenant, but they forgot a portion of what they were admonished with, therefore, We excited among them enmity and hatred to the Day of Resurrection, and Allãh will inform them of what they did: ar-Rãghib has said: "Gharã" (غَرَى) means "became attached"; it is derived from al-gharã' (الْغِرَآء = glue).

Jesus Christ, son of Mary was a Prophet of Mercy; he called people to peace and love and exhorted them to look towards the hereafter keeping aloof from worldly adornments and delights. He strictly forbade them to fight among themselves for the gains of this life.[9]

[8] A strange interpretation was seen in an exegesis that "a few" refers to 'Abdullãh ibn Salãm and his companions. The fact is that 'Abdullãh ibn Salãm had entered into Islam long before revelation of the chapter "The Table", while the exception in this verse points to some Jews who had not entered into Islam yet. (Author's note)

[9] Refer for it to statements of Christ (a.s.) on various occasions as attributed to him in

When they forgot a portion of what they were admonished with, Allāh made their hearts inclined to war and fighting in place of love and peace and exchanged the fraternal feelings which they were taught with enmity and hatred, as He says: "but they forgot a portion of what they were admonished with, therefore, We excited among them enmity and hatred to the Day of Resurrection."

This enmity and hatred became ingrained in their psyche, which has fixed its tentacles among these Christian nations. This mindset of theirs is like the Fire of the hereafter from which they cannot escape no matter how hard they strived. Whenever they will desire to go forth from it, from grief, they shall be turned back into it and taste the chastisement of burning (22:22). This had begun soon after ʻĪsā, son of Maryam (a.s.) was raised up. His disciples and missionaries who roamed from Jerusalem to Rome were entangled in one controversy after another among themselves; and this has kept growing and spreading its tentacles resulting in wars, fightings, raids, banishments and anathemas, until it reached to the great world wars which threatened the earth with destruction and humanity with annihilation. All this shows how a Divine bounty turns into Divine revenge and how the endeavours are wasted; and soon Allāh will show them the result of what they were doing.

O People of the Book! Indeed has come to you Our Messenger making clear to you much of what you concealed of the Book and passing over much; indeed there has come to you a light and a clear Book from Allãh (15); with it Allãh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of peace and brings them out of utter darkness into light by His permission and guides them to a straight path (16). Certainly they disbelieve who say: "Surely, Allãh – He is the Messiah, son of Mary." Say: "Who then could control anything as against Allãh if He wished to destroy the Messiah son of Mary and his mother and all those on the earth together?" And Allãh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is between them; He creates what He pleases and Allãh has power over all things (17). And the Jews and the Christians say: "We are the sons of Allãh and his beloved ones." Say: "Why does He then chastise you for your faults? Nay, you are men from among those whom He has created; He forgives whom He pleases and chastises whom He pleases;" and Allãh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is between them, and to Him is the eventual return (18). O People of the Book! Indeed Our Messenger has come to you explaining to you after a cessation of the Messengers, lest you say: "There came not to us a giver of good news or a warner," so indeed there has come to you a giver of good news and a warner; and Allãh has power over all things (19).

It was described above that Allãh had made a covenant with the People of the Book that they would help respectfully His Messengers and would preserve the Book that was revealed to them but they broke the covenant, which they had made with their Creator. After this preamble, Allãh invites them to believe in His Messenger whom He has now sent and the Book, which has been revealed to him. For this purpose, Allãh has introduced the Messenger and the Book to them and has established proof of truth of his messengership and the Book and finally, He has completed that proof for them.

As for the introduction, it is contained in these sentences: O People the Book! Indeed has come to you Our Messenger making clear to you much of what you concealed of the Book and passing over much; indeed there has come to you a light and a clear Book from Allãh. And then, O People of the Book! Indeed Our Messenger has come to you explaining to you after a cessation of the Messengers . . .

As for establishment of the proof, we see it in the Divine words: making clear to you much of what you concealed of the Book and passing over much. There could be no better proof of the truth of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) who was an unlettered Arab and was revealing to them what they were hiding that could be known only to their own scholars with specialized knowledge. Likewise, the sentence: with it Allãh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of peace . . . gives a convincing proof; the true ideas are the best proof for the truth of Messengeship and veracity of the Book.

As for completing the proof, it is asserted in the last sentence: lest you say: "There came not to us a giver of good news or a warner," so indeed there has come to you a giver of good news and a warner, and Allãh has power over all things.

Also, Allãh has refuted in the passing the belief of a group of them that: "Surely, Allãh – He is the Messiah, son of Mary", and the saying of the Jews and the Christians both: "We are sons of Allãh and his beloved ones."

QUR'ĀN: O People of the Book! Indeed has come to you Our Messenger making clear to you much of what you concealed of the Book and passing over much: We may quote the following verses to see how the Prophet made clear to them what they were hiding: Those who follow the Messenger, the Prophet, the ummī*, whom they find* written down with them in the Tawrāt and the Injīl . . . (7:157). Those whom we have given the Book recognize him as they recognize their sons; . . . (2:146*). Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, and those with him are severe against the unbelievers, compassionate among themselves . . . that is their description in the Tawrāt and their description in the Injīl; like as seed produce that puts forth its sprout* . . . (48:29). Also, as he (s.a.w.a.) disclosed the order of stoning which they had hidden and wanted to use the Prophet to get it changed as the verse 41 of this chapter will show: O Messenger! Let not those grieve you who strive together in hastening to unbelief . . . We find even today the law of stoning clearly mentioned in Deuteronomy, 22:23-24.

As for the Messenger's passing over much of their misbehaviour, suffice it to say that he left undisclosed many things, which they were hiding of their Book. It may be ascertained from the contradictions and errors still found in the Tawrāt and the Injīl. The Tawrāt, for example, contains many things concerning Tawḥīd (Divine Unity) and Prophethood which cannot be ascribed to Allāh: That He has got a body, He enters into a place and things like that; also unacceptable accusations against the Prophet that they indulged in kufr, sins and other misdemeanours. Also, the Tawrāt is totally silent about the resurrection, while no religion can stand on its feet without this important belief. As for the Gospels, they, and especially the Gospel according to St. John are full of idolatrous ideas.

QUR'ĀN: indeed there has come to you a light and a clear Book from Allāh: The construction of the sentence manifestly shows that the coming one depends on Allāh as a speech depends on the speaker and an explanation depends on the explainer. Accordingly, the light would refer to the Qur'ān; and in that case the conjunction: "and a clear Book", would be an explicative apposition; thus, the light and the clear Book both would indicate the Qur'ān. Allāh has called the Qur'ān a light in several places; for example: . . . and follow the light which has been sent down with him . . . (7:157). Therefore believe in Allāh and His Messenger and the Light which We have revealed . . . (64:8). . . . and we have sent to you clear light (4:174).

Alternatively, the light may refer to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). This explanation gets support from the beginning of the verse; also, Allāh has called the Prophet, "Light", in the verse 46 of the chapter 33: . . . and as a light-giving torch.

QUR'ĀN: with it Allāh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of peace: "with it" – the preposition "with" is attached to the pronoun of the instrument that refers to the Book or to the Light. It makes no difference whether the light refers to the Prophet or to the Qur'ān, because the end result is the same. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) is one of the apparent causes of the guidance and the same is the position of the Qur'ān; and the reality of guidance comes from Allāh as He has said: Surely you cannot guide whom you love, but Allāh guides whom He pleases . . . (28:56). And thus did We reveal to you a spirit by Our command. You did not know what the Book was, nor (what) the faith (was), but We made it a light, guiding thereby whom We please of Our servants; and most surely you guide to the right path. The path of Allāh, Whose is whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is in the earth; now surely to Allāh do all affairs eventually come (42:52-53). As you see, these verses ascribe the guidance to the Qur'ān and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and simultaneously, they ascribe it to Allāh; Allāh is the Guide in reality while others are apparent causes who have been brought in this world to revive the guidance.

The guidance of Allāh benefits him who follows His pleasure. In other words, the Divine guidance will affect only those who would follow His pleasure. Guidance in this verse denotes conveyance to the destination; Allāh takes such people to a way or ways of peace or to many such ways, one after another.

Peace is unrestricted; as such, it denotes safety and freedom from all misery and distress that spoil the happiness of life in this world or the hereafter. The Qur'ān has described Islam, faith and piety as success, achievement and security and the peace mentioned here fits perfectly on that. We have described in the first volume of our book while explaining the verse: Guide us to the straight path (1:5), that depending on the conditions of the walkers, Allāh has created many lanes in one highway; all walk on the same route related to Allāh which He has named in His Book, 'the straight path': And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them unto Our ways; and Allāh is most surely with the doers of good (29: 69). And (know) that this is My path, the straight one, therefore follow it, and follow not (other) ways, for they will lead you away from His way . . . (6:153). Allāh has thus shown that He has laid down many lanes but all lead the walkers to the same destination without differentiating between walkers of one lane from those of the others. It is unlike the ungodly ways where each way leads to a different destination.

The verse thus means – and Allāh knows better – that Allāh guides, and through His Book or through His Prophet, He leads those who follow His pleasure to the ways that protect the walkers from infelicity of the life of this world and the next, and keeps them away from all things which contaminate the happiness of life.

The guidance to peace and happiness revolves around following the Divine pleasure; and Allāh has said: . . . and He does not like kufr in His servants; . . . (39:7*). . . . yet surely Allāh is not pleased with the transgressing people* (9:96). Ultimately, it depends on keeping aloof from the way of injustice and avoiding any contact with unjust people. Allāh has excluded them from His guidance and made them despaired of reaching this Divine honour, as He has said: . . . and Allāh does not guide the unjust people (62:5). The verse: "with it Allāh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of peace", runs in a way parallel to the verse 6:82 which says: Those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice, those are they who have the security and they are those who go aright.

QUR'ĀN: and brings them out of utter darkness into light by His permission and guides them to a straight path*: aẓ-Ẓulumāt (اَلظُّلُمَاتُ) is plural of aẓ-ẓulmah (اَلظُّلْمَةُ = darkness). Darkness has been brought in plural while light is singular. It gives an indication that unlike the path of untruth there is no difference or disparity in the path of truth even if it contains various lanes suitable to various spiritual levels.

If bringing out of utter darkness into light is ascribed to someone other than Allāh, like the Prophet or the Book, then the Divine permission means His approval and pleasure; as Allāh says: (This is) a Book which We have revealed to you that you may bring forth men, by their Lord's permission from utter darkness into light . . . (14:1). This verse says that the Prophet was to bring them out from darkness to light, and this action has been qualified with permission of their Lord. The idea is to show that the Prophet was not an independent cause of guidance, because its actual cause is Allāh. Soon after that a verse says: And certainly We sent Mūsā with Our signs saying: "Bring forth your people from utter darkness into light . . ." (14:5). This verse, has not qualified the guidance with Divine permission because the imperative mood has taken care of that.

When this action is attributed to Allāh then 'bringing them out with His permission' means that Allāh takes them out of darkness with His knowledge; al-idhn (الإِذْن = permission) has been used for informa-tion. They say: adhina bihi (اَذِنَ بِهٖ= learnt of him), that is, was informed about him. The following verses give the same meaning: And an announcement (information) from Allãh and His Messenger . . . (9:3). But if they turn back, say: "I have given you warning (information) all alike . . ." (21:109). And proclaim (inform) among men the ḥajj . . . (22:27); there are several other verses like these.

"and guides them to a straight path": The verb, "guides them", has been repeated because another verb: "and brings them out", has come between "with it Allãh guides Him", in this sentence. Also, we have explained in the chapter of "The Opening" that the straight path is a highway, which contains many lanes. Therefore, guidance to that path also should be a comprehensive one which would include all kinds of guidance.

"a straight path" is a common noun, yet it refers to the same straight path which is unique and which Allãh always ascribes to Himself alone (the only exception is in the chapter of "The Opening" where it is not ascribed to Allãh but the context makes it clear). The common noun serves to enhance its status and magnify its honour.

QUR'ÃN: Certainly they disbelieve who say: "Surely, Allãh – He is the Messiah, son of Mary"*: It refers to one of the three sects mentioned in the chapter of "The House of ʻImrãn" who believed that Allãh had become one with Messiah and Messiah is god and man both at the same time. This sentence may fit to the belief of sonship of Messiah as well as the belief of the three persons in one god. Be it as it may, the sentence points to the belief that Messiah had become one with God.

QUR'ÃN: Say: "Who then could control anything as against Allãh if He wished to destroy the Messiah son of Mary and his mother and all those on the earth together?" . . .*: This is a proof to refute their belief because that belief contains contradiction in term. They say that Messiah is God and at the same time he is man as they have introduced him as the son of Mary; now being a man he is subject to all those changes which afflict any other man on this earth; all human beings like all that is in the heavens and the earth and all that is between them, are owned and controlled by Allah; they are subjugated under His Kingdom and authority; He can dispose them as He wishes and decides for or against them as He thinks fit; He has the right and authority to destroy Messiah as He has the right and authority to destroy his mother and all those who are on the earth together without any distinction for Messiah over others. But if he is God how can he be destroyed? To say that Messiah is man rebuts their claim that he is God.

The words: "who then could control anything as against Allāh", are an allusion to show that there is no one at all who could stop Allāh from doing anything He wished; otherwise, it would mean that Allāh had no control on that thing. No cause in the universe has an independent control on its effect; nothing can stop or overwhelm the Divine control on anything; nobody owns anything except Allāh alone who has no partner or colleague; when He makes us owner of a certain thing, His ownership and His authority on it continues as before.

Now, come the words: "'if He wished to destroy the Messiah son of Mary and his mother and all those on the earth together?'" The Messiah is qualified by the phrase "son of Mary" to show that he was a total man, and like other human beings was under the control of the Lord. For this very reason, "his mother" has been added in conjunction because both had the same root and origin. Then, the clause: "and those on the earth together" was added because all are governed by the same law without any difference.

This qualification and conjunction clearly present the proof of ʻĪsā's transience. The Messiah is like any other human being, and like all those on the earth he is subject to all the changes and variations which affect others, because all are similarly transient; if others can be destroyed by Divine order then ʻĪsā too would be affected likewise. There is nothing to save him from it; if he were God he could not be destroyed.

The clause: "And Allāh's is the Kingdom of the Heavens and the earth and what is between them", gives the reason of the preceding statement. The Qur'ān generally refers to the creation with the words: "the Heavens and the earth" but here the phrase: "and what is between them" has been added. The aim is to make the proof clearer; now no one can say that Allāh has not mentioned what is between the heavens and the earth while the speech deals with ʻĪsā who was between the heavens and earth. In this sentence, the predicate "and Allāh's is" has been written before the subject, in this way it confines the Ownership to Allāh, and the proof becomes more emphatic. The meaning will be: How can anyone stop Allāh if He wished to destroy the Messiah and others when the Kingdom and unrestricted authority on the heavens, earth and what is between them is reserved for Allāh and no one shares it with Him. Consequently, nobody can stop the implementation of Allãh's order.

"He creates what He pleases; and Allãh has power over all things": These sentences in their turn explain the reason of the preceding sentence, that is: "and Allãh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is between them." The Kingdom – which is a sort of control and ownership – contains in its essential ingredients comprehensive power and effectual will; and such a Kingdom in the heavens, earth and what is between them is reserved for Allãh. He has power over all things and He creates what He pleases. His creating what He pleases and having power on all things is the proof of His Kingdom; and His Kingdom proves that if He wished to destroy all, there is nobody to stop its implementation. Finally, it proves that no one is His partner in His Divinity.

To prove that His will is implemented and His power is comprehensive, it is enough to say that He is Allãh. Perhaps, for this reason the Divine name, Allãh, has been repeated several times. If He is Allãh then nobody shares Godship with Him.

QUR'ÃN: And the Jews and the Christians say: "We are the sons of Allãh and His beloved ones": Certainly, they did not claim real sonship as the Christians claim for the Messiah (a.s.). Neither the Jews nor the Christian put forward this claim in the literal sense. They called themselves sons of God metaphorically, as a mark of distinction. In their scriptures, a lot of people have been called sons of God, for example, Adam[10], Jacob[11], David[12], Ephraim[13], Jesus,[14] and good-doing believers[15].

What they meant with this claim was that their relationship with Allãh was like that of sons with their father. They thought themselves like the sons of a King who had special status in comparison to the subjects. They were nearer to God and God was not supposed to treat them as His other subjects. In a way, they were exempted from the laws and regulations which were revealed for the general public, because they had very close connection with the King and as such, He would not punish them like His other subjects, nor will He keep them standing like common people on the Day of Resurrection. He would not humiliate them like others. All of this was the result of their relationship with God that was a relation of love and honour.

This sonship created a special relationship with God, which brought them very near to Him. The phrase: "His beloved ones" coming after the conjunction is an explicative apposition; it serves no real purpose. This claim of special relation and belovedness was meant to establish its inseparable attribute, that is, they can never be chastised and punished. They are assured of Divine favour and honour because if Allāh were to punish them, it will go against the distinction and honour that He has reserved for them. The proof of the above interpretation is seen in the rebuttal of their claim where Allāh says: He forgives whom He pleases and chastises whom He pleases. There was no reason to give this reply if they had not meant by their claim: "We are the sons of Allāh and His beloved ones", that they cannot be punished at all even if they did not accept the call of truth. Also, there would be no meaning to the statement: Nay you are men from among those whom He has created. In short, when they said: "'We are the sons of Allāh and His beloved ones'", they wanted to say that they were the chosen people of God and His beloved ones and Allāh was not going to give them punishment even if they did what they did or left what they left, because full security against every unpleasant result or situation was a concomitant of special relationship and love.

QUR'ĀN: Say: "Why does He then chastise you for your faults?": Allāh tells His Prophet to refute their claim by bringing two proofs against them:

(1) By contradicting their claim, pointing to the chastisements that were inflicted on them; and (2) Bringing a proof, which would oppose their claim. The sentence under discussion contains the first proof: "Say: 'Why does He chastise you for your faults?'" If you are right in your claim that you are the sons of Allāh and His beloved ones, that you are safe from Divine punishment and in no way you can be chastised, then you should have been safe from every punishment of this world and the next. If so, then why are you constantly being punished for your sins and faults?

As for the Jews, they always committed major sins; they killed their prophets, they murdered their good people, they broke the Divine covenants which were taken from them, they altered the words from their places, they concealed the Divine communications and rejected them, they committed every type of transgression and contravention. Consequently, they always tasted the bitter results of their misdeeds; some were transformed into animals, others were thrown into disgrace and infelicity, unjust rulers were hoisted over them who killed them, disgraced them, and destroyed their towns and cities. Theirs is but a moribund life, they are neither alive nor dead.

As for the Christians, the sins and crimes that have taken root in their societies and nations are not less than those of the Jews; nor are the various types of chastisement meted out to them different from those of the Jews. Their condition was the same before coming of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), remained the same in his days and continues unchanged after him until now. History has recorded all this, even more than that; and the Qur'ãn also describes it to a certain extent, as may be seen in the chapters of "The Cow", "The House of 'Imrãn", "Women", "The Table" and "The Battlements", etc.

They cannot say that these misfortunes, disasters and calamities that afflict them from time to time are in fact manifestations of Divine love towards them, which they do not emanate from Divine wrath and are not meant as punishment or chastisement. After all, similar misfortunes had come upon good servants of Allãh, even His Prophets and Messengers like Abraham, Ishmael, Jacob, Joseph, Zacharia and John the Baptist and others like them; and you too, O Muslims! Have suffered such reversals of fortune as in the battle of Uḥud and Mūtah, etc. How can you say that when these catastrophes come to us they are Divine punishment but when you are afflicted you count it as Divine favour?

COMMENT: There is no doubt that these physical troubles, worldly disasters and misfortunes afflict the believers and disbelievers alike, and they catch the good-doers and evil-doers in similar way. It is the Divine custom that covers all the servants of Allãh since time immemorial. However, it is called with different names and brings about different effects depending on the goodness or wickedness of the men affected. In other words, we have to see what is the status of the servant vis-à-vis his Master.

There is no doubt that when the good traits are entrenched in a servant's psyche and the human excellence has fully covered his being (like the Prophets and their true followers), then the afflictions and worldly troubles which come to him, serve only to unveil his hidden virtues and merits which benefit not only him but even others. This type of afflictions, although they are disliked by human nature, are parts of spiritual training which Allāh puts His good servants through; you may say that through these misfortunes Allāh opens the way to raise their status and rank.

Then comes one whose felicity or infelicity has not taken root and after affliction with calamities and catastrophes, he did not find the way to felicity and happiness, then these trials and tribulations help in exposing his status of belief or disbelief, merit or demerit. The only name that can be given to such misfortunes is that they are tests and trials coming from Allāh, which open the way for the man to the paradise or the hell.

Lastly come those whose life is a permanent tale of base desires; they are depraved and corrupt and are intent on making others depraved and corrupt; they are submerged in the currents of desire and anger; if they get a chance, they would choose depravity over virtue and arrogance before their Creator instead of submitting to Him; as the Qur'ān narrates the end results of the unjust nations like the people of Noah, 'Ād, Thamūd, Pharaoh, the inhabitants of Midian and the people of Lot. Their bad end was the result of their arrogance against Allāh. The calamities that were poured on them and which annihilated their whole nations have to be counted as Divine punishment, chastisement, and the evil consequences of their deeds. They cannot be explained in any other way.

Allāh has combined these three groups in His noble speech: . . . and We bring these days to men by turns, and that Allāh may know those who believe and take witnesses from among you; and Allāh loves not the unjust. And that Allāh may purge those who believe and eradicate the unbelievers (3:140-1).

The history of the Jews since the time Mūsā was raised amongst them until Allāh raised Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), (more than 2000 years); and likewise, the history of the Christians since the day the Messiah was raised to heaven till the advent of Islam (nearly six centuries, as they say) are full of various types of sins they did and crimes they committed. There was hardly an evil they did not indulge in, they persisted in it and remained stubborn without any shame. In this backdrop, the only name that can be given to the calamities that afflicted them is chastisement, punishment, and retribution.

Of course, the Muslims too have suffered similar afflictions; those misfortunes (in their natural disposition) were such episodes, which the Divine management had brought on the Muslims. Such has been the course of Allāh that has indeed run before: . . . and you shall not find a change in Allãh's course (48:23). We have to look at the position of the affected Muslims to decide about those misfortunes; if they were steadfast on the path of truth then the misfortune was a trial and test given to them by Allãh, and if they had deviated from the straight path, then certainly it was punishment and chastisement. No one has any badge of honour against Allãh, nor can anyone arbitrarily claim any right on Allãh. The Qur'ãn has never said that the Muslims had any special honour before Allãh nor has it called them sons of Allãh and His beloved ones. In fact, Qur'ãn doesn't care about the names and the titles, which people have taken for themselves.

Allãh has addressed them in these words: Do you think that you will enter the Garden while Allãh has not yet known those who strive hard from among you, and (He has not) known the patient . . . And Muḥammad is no more than a Messenger, the messengers have already passed away before him; if then he dies or is killed, will you turn back upon your heels? And whoever turns back upon his heels, he will by no means do harm to Allãh in the least; and Allãh will reward the grateful (3:142-4). (This) shall not be in accordance with your vain desires nor in accordance with the vain desires of the People of the Book; whoever does evil, he shall be requited with it, and besides Allãh he will find for himself neither a guardian nor a helper (4:123).

The phrase: "'Why does He then chastise you for your faults?'", may be taken to refer to the chastisement of the next world. In that case, it would be translated as a future tense and not as a present imperfect tense. The People of the Book accept that they could be punished a little for their faults. The Qur'ãn has quoted the Jews' claim that*: "Fire shall not touch us but for a few days"* (2:80); and although the Christians say that Messiah sacrificed himself to atone his followers' sins, but this claim in itself admits that they commit sins and that the resulting punishment was taken by Messiah upon himself in the form of crucifixion; in addition to that, the Gospels describe some sins like fornication, etc, and the Church in its turn was admitting it practically by issuing certificates of atonement. However, the earlier interpretation is more appropriate.

QUR'ÃN: "Nay, you are men from among those whom He has created; He forgives whom He pleases and chastises whom He pleases;" and Allãh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is between them, and to Him is the eventual return: It is the second argument against their claim. It tells them that if we look into your reality it will show the falsity of your claim that you are the sons of Allāh and His beloved ones; you are merely mortal human beings from among the creatures of Allāh; you have no superiority in this matter over other creatures of God; whoever is in the heavens and earth and what is between them, his only distinction is that he is one of the creatures placed in the heavens and earth and between them. He is a creature of God, and God is the King who rules over him and about him as well as over others and about others as He wishes and anyhow He wishes; and that creature like other things is to return to his Lord who is the King and ruler over him and the others. Accordingly, it is on Allāh's discretion to forgive whom He pleases or give punishment to whom He pleases; any distinction or nobility or other such things cannot stop Allāh from forgiving him or punishing him as He wishes. Nothing can block Allāh's way and no shield can protect anyone from Allāh's will.

The clause: "'Nay, you are men from among those whom He has created'", is one premise of the argument; the second is: "and Allāh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is between them"; and the end phrase: "and to Him is the eventual return", is the third premise. The clause: "He forgives whom He pleases and chastises whom He pleases", gives the result of the argument that refutes their claim that there was no way they could be punished.

QUR'ĀN: O People of the Book! Indeed Our Messenger has come to you explaining to you after a cessation of the Messengers . . .*: ar-Rāghib has said: "al-Futūr (اَلْفُتُوْرُ) is tranquillity after heat, softness after hardness and weakness after strength. Allāh has said: O People of the Book! Indeed Our Messenger has come to you explaining to you after a cessation of the Messengers, i.e. tranquillity and quiet during which no messenger of Allāh came."

This verse is the second speech addressed to the People of the Book; and it completes the preceding speech. The first verse has explained to them that Allāh has sent to them a Messenger who is supported by the manifest Book and he guides by Allāh's permission to every good and happiness. Now, this verse explains that this Divine explanation is meant for completing the proof over them, lest they say: "there came not to us a giver of good news or a warner."

This description makes it clear that the clause related to the verb: "explaining to you"; in this verse is the same, which is mentioned, in the preceding verse. Thus, the full sentence will be: 'explaining to you much of what you concealed of the Book.' You should understand that this religion to which you are invited is exactly the same which you believed in; it confirms what is with you; if there is any difference it is because it makes clear those religious realities which the Divine Books had explained and you had kept them hidden. It means that the speech: "O People of the Book! Indeed Our Messenger has come to you explaining to you", in a way repeats exactly the previous speech and the purpose is to add some more details which were not given before, and which are mentioned in the clause: "lest you say: 'There came not to us a giver of good news or a warner'". Such repetition is allowed because there is a long gap between the two sentences and it is not unusual in literature.

There is another possibility that it is a completely new speech, and the related clauses of the verb: making clear to you are deleted. This deletion may allude to comprehensiveness i.e. He makes clear to you all those things which require clarification. Or it may show eminence and magnificence of the matter, i.e. makes clear to you a very important and great matter which you needed to know. The clause: "after a cessation of the Messengers" alludes to this need. The meaning then will be: makes clear to you all those things you needed to know because a long period has gone by without there being any messenger who could have explained to you. The words: "lest you say: 'There came not to us a giver of good news or a warner'", is connected with the verb: indeed there has come to you, showing the reason of his coming.

The sentence: "and Allãh has power over all things", aims at replying to an unspoken objection. The Jews thought that no sharī'ah was to come after the Torah because abrogation and al-badã' were not possible. Allãh refutes their assumption by saying that such thinking goes against the comprehensiveness and generality of Divine Power. We have described in detail about abrogation while writing on the verse 2:106 in the first volume of our book: Whatever signs We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, We bring one better than it or like it.

THE WAY OF THINKING TO WHICH THE QUR'ÃN GUIDES*

* The author in this essay wants to prove the inevitability and reliability of logical proofs and rational arguments. Although he does not say so clearly, I think his main aim is to refute the Akhbãrīs' views that rational precepts have no place in religion. They say that only the Qur'ãn and the Sunnah are the genuine sources of the

No doubt, man's is a life of reflection that requires perception and discernment; we call it faculty of thought. So the life is built on thought. It follows that the more correct and comprehensive the thought is, the more appropriate and sound the life will be. Whatever system a man follows and whichever path he treads upon, his good life is linked to, and bound with, proper thought; as much share it takes from that thought, that much uprightness it enjoys.

Allãh has repeatedly described it in His Great Book in different ways and various styles: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth? (6:122). Say: "Are those who know and those who do not know alike?" (39:9). Allãh will exalt those of you who believe, and those who are given knowledge, in high degrees (58:11). . . . therefore give good news to My servants, those who listen to the word, then follow the best of it, those are they whom Allãh has guided and those it is who are the men of understanding (39:17-18). There are many such verses, which there is no need to quote here. Nobody has any doubt how Qur'ãn invites people to the correct thinking and exhorts them to proceed on the path of knowledge.

Also the Qur'ãn reminds the readers that what it guides to is a way from among the ways of thinking. Allãh says: Surely this Qur'ãn guides to that which is most upright (17:9); i.e. the religion, custom, or path that is most upright. In any case, it is the path of life and its uprightness depends on the uprightness of the way of thinking, as Allãh has said: indeed, there has come to you a light and a clear Book from Allãh; with it Allãh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of peace and brings them out of utter darkness into light by His permission and guides them to the straight path (5:15-16). The straight path is that clear path which is free from contradiction and conflicts, i.e. neither it goes against the truth which one seeks nor its various sections point to different directions.

Allãh, in His Mighty Book, has not pin-pointed the correct and upright thought to which He calls His servants; He has left it to the common sense of the people, expecting them to use their natural sharī'ah. However, a group of them says that the Qur'ãn should not be explained except according to the traditions narrated from a ma'ṣūm. This practically divests the Qur'ãn of its authority, transferring it to its explanatory traditions. For them all traditions in the four early collections are authentic and must be followed without any testing. (tr.)

reasoning power and the perception engrained in their minds. If you minutely study the Divine Book and meditate upon its verses, you will probably find over three hundred verses which invite people to contemplate, remember or ponder; or they teach the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) an argument to prove a truth or negate a falsity; as for example: Say: "Who then could control anything as against Allãh if He wished to destroy the Messiah son of Mary and his mother . . ." (5:17). Of the same genre are those verses which describe the arguments and proofs used by His prophets and beloved ones like Nūḥ, Ibrãhīm, Mūsã and other great prophets, in addition to Luqmãn (Lokman) and the believer from the family of Fir'awn (Pharaoh) and others, peace of Allãh be on them all. For example: Their Messengers said: "Is there (any) doubt about Allãh, the Maker of the heavens and the earth?" (14:10). And when Luqmãn said to his son while he admonished him: "O my son! Do not associate aught with Allãh; most surely polytheism is a griveous iniquity" (31:13). And a believing man of Fir'awn's people who hid his faith said: "What! Will you slay a man because he says: 'My Lord is Allãh,' and indeed he has brought to you clear arguments from your Lord?" (40:28). Also, He quotes the magicians of Pharaoh as saying: They said: "We do not prefer you to what has come to us of clear arguments and to He Who made us, therefore decide what you are going to decide; you can only decide about this world's life; surely we believe in our Lord . . ." (20:72-73).

Allãh has not ordered His servants even in a single verse of His Book that they should blindly believe in Him, or in things sent by Him; or that they should tread on a path without thinking. He has often hinted to the reasons because of which He has laid down certain regulations and commandments (where a man has no way of knowing their detailed causes) describing some things which could be used as arguments; as He says: . . . surely prayer keeps (one) away from indecency and evil, and certainly the remembrance of Allãh is the greatest . . . (29:45). O you who believe! Fasting has been prescribed for you, as it was prescribed for those before you, so that you may guard yourselves (against evil) (2:183). Allãh does not desire to put on you any difficulty, but He wishes to purify you so that He may complete His favour on you, that you may be grateful (5:6). There are many other verses of similar nature.

This thoughtful perception, i.e. the way of correct thinking which the Qur'ãn exhorts the human beings to use, on which it has based its call to truth, good or benefit or restrains from falsity, evil or harm – it is that perception which we know and recognise with our nature, which doesn't change or alter, and about which no man disputes with others. If there appears some dispute or discord about it then it is like a dispute in self-evident principles; it happens only when one or the both parties do not understand the true meaning of the subject matter because of some miscomprehension.

You may ask what is this path, which we are supposed to know by our nature. There is no doubt that there are some solid realities which independently exist and do not depend on our actions, like the realities of the genesis of the world and its end or mathematical, physical or other such principles. When we want to understand these matters we refer to basic principles, which are self-evident and are not subject to any doubt. Also, we take help from other principles, which are intrinsically attached to those self-evident principles. Then we arrange them in a particular way until we get the desired result. For example we say:

A is B, and every B is C; therefore A is C.

Or, as we say:

If A is B, then C is D; and if C is D, then G is H. Therefore if A is B then G is H.

Or, as we say:

If A is B, then C is D; and if C is D, then G is H. But A is not B. Therefore G is not H.

These patterns of logic and the principle matters described above are self-evident truths and no man of normal wisdom can have any doubt about them. If anybody doubts them, then it indicates some defect in his power of understanding, because of which it has failed to grasp these clear matters, as is generally seen about those who express doubts about self-evident truths.

If we look at the doubts or uncertainties expressed against this logical way of thinking, we will see that when they want to reach at a result in their claims and objectives they too use the same principles laid down in the logic in its form, pattern and material; if we analyse their speech to the elementary premises used in them, they will turn into logical forms and principles. If somebody changes those premises or the forms in a way that according to logical principles would not lead to any result, the whole speech would become devoid of meaning and you will see that they would not like it. This is a clear proof that these people according to their human nature do accept the correctness of these logical principles, they submit to it and use it; they refute it with their tongues but in their inner selves they believe in it.

1) As some mutakallimūn (experts of scholastic theology) have said: "If the logic were a way leading to the truth then there should not have been any discord among the scholars of logic; but we find them differing among themselves in their opinions."

COMMENT: This scholar has used hypothetical syllogism without realizing what he was doing. He doesn't realise that when we say that logic is the instrument that prevents man from falling into error, we mean that use of logic in proper way prevents man from falling into error. Nobody claims that everyone who uses logic uses it correctly. Sword is the instrument for cutting; but it will do its work only if it is used in proper way.

2) Some of them have said: "These principles of logic were developed gradually. How can the recognition of true realities depend on them? How can a man who doesn't know them or doesn't use them arrive at the real truth?"

COMMENT: This argument too like the preceding one is hypothetical syllogism. Moreover it is the worst type of sophistry. He has not understood the meaning of development. Development in this context refers to the detailed discovery of those principles which man is vaguely aware of by his nature; development doesn't mean invention.

3) Some have said: "These principles were propagated among the people in order to close the door of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.), or to divert the people from following the Book and the Sunnah. As such the Muslims must keep aloof from them."

COMMENT: If we analyse this speech it will result in some conjunctive or hypothetical syllogism. If a system is used for improper purpose it doesn't mean that the system in itself is not good and proper; it is like a sword, which is used to kill an innocent person or the religion, which is used for something other than the pleasure of Allãh.

4) Some have said: "The intellectual reasoning often leads to what is clearly against the Book and the Sunnah, as we see in the opinions of many philosophers."

COMMENT: This too is a compound conjunctive syllogism. The mistake of the philosophers does not emanate from the form of syllogism or from a self-evident truth. It occurs because some wrong proposition is mixed with correct ones.

5) Some people have said: "The whole purpose of logic is to differentiate between a form that would lead to a correct conclusion from an unsound form; but as far as the matter is concerned, the logic doesn't have any law which would prevent a man from falling into error about it. There is no assurance against committing mistakes in the matter except referring it to the ma'ṣūmīn (a.s.). Therefore, the only safe way is to return to the ma'ṣūmīn (a.s.)."

COMMENT: The above argument is sophistic. The scholar wants to prove that khabaru 'l-wāḥid (خَبَرُالْوَاحِدْ)[16] or the collection of akhbāru 'l-āḥād (اَخْبَارُ الأَحَاد) combined with the apparent meanings of the Qur'ān is al-ḥujjah (اَلْحُجَّةْ = proof) of sharī'ah. We know that we can hold fast to the ma'ṣūmīn only when me are sure that a ḥadīth has actually been uttered by them and also know what is the meaning of the speech. But such certainty is impossible concerning akhbāru 'l-āḥād because there is no more than a strong conjecture that the words were spoken by the ma'ṣūm (a.s.), and the same is the case with its meaning. And this applies to all those proofs, which are based on strong conjectures. Holding fast to the ma'ṣūmīn (a.s.) admittedly depends on the certainty of matter and the certainty of matter may emanate from their words or from logical premises; and in any case, one has to be sure that the form of the argument is not faulty [and it leads us to logic].

They have said that in view of all these doubts, the rational arguments cannot give us any certainty regarding the subject matter.

COMMENT: First of all, it is just an overbearing obstinacy. Secondly, this speech in itself is a rational argument from which he wants to reach to a definite conclusion and even its form is based on logic.

6) Some have said: "All that is needed by human beings is placed in the Mighty Book and stored in the traditions of the ma'ṣūmīn (a.s.). Therefore, why should we resort to the left overs of the unbelievers and atheists?"

COMMENT: The need of rational and logical arguments is the same, which we observe in this objection itself, because he has composed a logical conjunctive syllogism and has used in it the materials that are admittedly correct. Yet, he has fallen victim of sophistry in two places.

Firstly, he did not realize that these logical principles themselves are a part of what is stored in the Book and the Sunnah and one cannot go to its depth without independent research.

[16] Khabaru 'l-wāḥid (plural: akhbāru 'l-āḥād:): Literally, a tradition narrated by one person; actually the term refers to a tradition, which is not mutawātir, even if many narrators narrated it. (tr.)

Secondly, it is one thing to say that the Book and the Sunnah do not need any addenda or appendix for making their meaning clear and quite another to say that those who hold fast to the Book and the Sunnah also do not need any additional help in reaching at the correct conclusion. What will they say if a medical doctor who makes research about the human body were to claim that he did not need to study any scientific, social, or literary subject, because all are related to human beings. Or, if an ignorant person refused to learn any knowledge claiming that all types of knowledge are found in the human nature. These friends of ours are not different from them.

Thirdly, the Book and the Sunnah themselves invite the people to widely use the correct logical and rational arguments. (Such arguments are the self-evident premises or those depending on the self-evident propositions.) Allãh says: . . . therefore give good news to My servants, those who listen to the word, then follow the best of it; those are they whom Allãh has guided, and those it is who are men of understanding (39:17-18). There are many other such verses and traditions. Of course, the Book and the Sunnah forbid us to follow what clearly goes against them. The Book and the definitely proved Sunnah are the things whose veracity and truth has been clearly proved by reason; and it is impossible that the same reason should prove invalidity of what it has definitely proved to be valid earlier. Admittedly, we have to distinguish true rational premises from the false ones, in order that we may hold fast to the correct premises, in the same way, as we have to distinguish the decisive verses and traditions from the ambiguous ones in order that we may hold fast to the decisive ones. The same is the case of the traditions where we have to distinguish those traditions, which have surely emanated from the ma'ṣūmīn (a.s.) from the forged and fraudulent ones; and how great their number is!

Fourthly, the truth is truth wherever it is found and however it is found. Its truth is not affected by the belief or disbelief of its conveyor nor his piety or sinfulness makes it tainted. To refuse to accept a truth just because of hatred of its conveyor is nothing but the prejudice of ignorance, which has been condemned by Allãh in His Book and through the words of His Messengers (a.s.).

7) Some have said: "The way of precaution in religion which is preferred in the Book and the Sunnah is to restrict oneself to the apparent meanings of the Book and the Sunnah and to keep aloof from using logical and rational principles, because there is a danger of their pushing one into eternal perdition from which one could never get out."

COMMENT: The objecter has in this very statement used the logical and rational principles as it contains exceptive syllogism based on rational premises that are acceptable by reason although they are not based on the Book or the Sunnah. However, the risk he mentions might involve those who don't have ability to understand deep rational propositions. But as for those capable persons who have such discernment, there is no proof from the Book, the Sunnah, or reason to show that they cannot understand the realities of the deep knowledge. We know that man can have no nobility or greatness except with such understanding and the Book, the Sunnah and the reason all prove it.

8) Some people have said: "The way of our noble predecessors was totally different from the way of the philosophy and 'irfãn. They used the Book and the Sunnah and had no need to use the logical and rational principles like the philosophers, or to use the ways of spiritual regimen like the Ṣūfīs. When the Greek philosophy was rendered into Arabic in the days of the caliphs, the Muslim mutakallimūn (scholastic theologians) who themselves were among the followers of the Qur'ãn decided to fit the philosophical ideas on the Qur'ãnic realities. As a result, they were divided into two sects, the Ash'arites and the Mu'tazilites. Then, during the same period appeared another group who were called Ṣūfīs and *'ãrif*s. They claimed that the secrets were open to them and they knew in depth the Qur'ãnic realities. They thought that they had no need to return to the ma'ṣūmīn (a.s.). In this way, they separated from the Shī'ahs who held fast to Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.); things continued like this until about the middle of the thirteenth century of Hijrah (about a 100 years ago). Then these people (the philosophers and the Ṣūfīs) began forgery and deception; they reinterpreted the themes of the Qur'ãn and Ḥadīth to make them conform to the ideas of philosophy and taṣawwuf. They used this method so extensively that the majority of the Shī'ahs were confused."

He has inferred from the above statement that these principles go against the correct way to which the Book and the Sunnah guide the people. Then he has mentioned some objections against the logic. For example, the existence of discord among the logicians themselves, and the fact that one is not always safe from errors inspite of using logical formulae and the fact that we do not find a sufficient number of self-evident truths or free from doubt realities which could serve in leading us to the deep realities. Then he has mentioned many themes of philosophy that according to him go clearly against the principles inferred from the Book and the Sunnah.

This is the gist of his writing, which we have given in brief.

COMMENT: would that I knew which aspect of these lengthy ramblings can be mended and corrected, because the disease has passed the stage of treatment. What he has said about the history of the mutakallimūn and their going against the aimmah of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) – that they wanted to fit the philosophy on the Qur'ãn which supposedly divided them into two sects of Ash'arites and Mu'tazilites; then the appearance of the Ṣūfīs and their presumption that they and their followers had no need of the Book and the Sunnah; that the things continued like that until the thirteenth century of Hijrah when the philosophy or 'irfãn came into being – all these are totally against the known definite history and we shall briefly refer to all of this later on.

Apart from that, he has committed a great blunder by mixing al-kalãm (scholastic theology) and philosophy. The philosophy deals with phenomenal things and matters (which are found in reality) and offers proof for accepted issues and problems through such premises, which are free from doubt. Scholastic theology, on the other hand, deals with matters that may be real and objective or subjective (mentally posited), and it offers proof for issues and problems through such premises, which could be based on reality or on subjective consideration. Obviously, these two fields of knowledge are far removed from one another. How can it be thought that the mutakallimūn would endeavour to make philosophy conform to the Qur'ãn? It is common knowledge that the mutakallimūn from their very beginning until now had remained in conflict and dispute with the philosophers and al-'urafã' (اَلْعُرَفَاءُ = here this word has been used for the Ṣūfīs). Their books and writtings which are in our hands and the reports of their debates and polemical argumentations which have come to us are the best witness to prove it.

Probably, his talk was based on the writings of some orientalists who claim that it was the transference of Greek philosophy to Islam, which caused the appearance of 'ilmu 'l-kalãm (عِلْمُ الْكَلاَم = scholastic theology) among the Muslims. This man did not know the meaning of al-kalãm or philosophy, nor was he aware of the aims and objectives of the two fields of knowledge. He was also unaware of the factors that led to the appearance of scholastic theology in Islam. He just shot his arrows in the dark.

Even more amusing is his assertion where he describes the difference between al-kalãm and philosophy. He says: "The scholastic theology aims at attesting to the topics of genesis and resurrection keeping in view the aspects of religion; while philosophical discussions talk about the same topics without paying any attention to religious dictates." Then he has used this supposed difference to claim that the way of logical and rational principles is totally different from the way of religion, and goes against the path laid down by the sharī'ah. He has confounded the confusion. Every knowledgeable scholar knows that the group which has mentioned this difference between these two disciplines wants to indicate that the syllogisms used in theological discussions are dialectical and composed of uncontestable premises (the well known undisputable ones), because such arguments lead to undisputed realities; as for the philosophical discussions, some of them are composed of argumentative syllogisms which aim to prove what is truth, not what is universally accepted. In the light of the above, how can it be taken to mean that the way of scholastic theology is the way of religion and the way of philosophy goes against religion and that it should be discarded even if it is true?

As for his objections against logic, philosophy and 'irfãn, we have already commented on his objections against logic. What he has written concerning philosophy and 'irfãn, if it is correct quotation and he has correctly understood its meaning that it goes against the clear dictates of the true religion, then nobody doubts that it is invalid and it is among the erroneous ideas of philosophers or those who tread on the path of 'irfãn; but such errors should be put in the account of those people who have expressed those ideas, and should not be used against philosophy or 'irfãn as a discipline; it would be merely the defect and deficiency of the scholars concerned.

It was incumbent on him to ponder on the disputes that have grown between various groups of scholastic theologians – Ash'arites, Mu'tazilites and Shi'ites. These differences have divided the single Islamic ummah into 73 sects, then every sect has branched into various sub-sects, and these subdivisions might be equal in number to the main divisions. He should have thought what was the root cause of these differences. Was it not because of following the path of religion itself? Does any research scholar have a right to present these differences to prove that religion is null and void and its way is incorrect? Can any explanation be given for this phenomenon that could not be applied with equal force to logic and philosophy? Can the logicians and philosophers be accused of an inner deficiency that could not be found in the people of religion?

Similar to the scholastic theology is the case of Islamic jurisprudence. How many sects have developed even within a single sect; how much discords and differences are found among their various fuqahã'? The same is the case of all numerous disciplines and arts as none of them is immune from differences.

All this long talk has led him to declare that all the ways used for argumentation are null and void and the only correct path is that of the Book and the Sunnah that is the path of religion. In short, the only way left to him is that of tadhakkur (اَلتَّذَكُّر = remembrance). It is a theory attributed to Plato; he says that if man frees himself from lustful mentality, acquires piety and spiritual perfection, and then turns to his inner self, he may reach at the truth.

This explanation is offered of the said Platonic theory. Some ancient Greek and other philosophers had adopted it. Some Muslims and some other occidental philosophers accepted this view too. However, every group has affirmed it in a different way.

1. Some assert that human knowledge is but natural; it is there, present with him actually from the first instant of his existence; as such, when we say that a new knowledge has come to Zayd, it in effect means that he has remembered it.
2. Some others say that when man turns to his soul by isolating himself from material distractions, it causes discovery of realities – it does not mean that knowledge is present with him actually; rather it is with him potentially. Actuality of knowledge is found in the inner human soul – it separates from him when he is heedless, connects with him when he remembers. This view is held by the Illuminists and those cognizant with divine knowledge (implying here the Ṣūfīs), and their likes from all religions and creeds.
3. Another group offers the same explanation as the no.2 above, but has added to it the condition of piety and adherence to the sharī'ah in knowledge and practice. It has been asserted by some of our contemporary Muslims and others, as they think that this condition of adherence to the sharī'ah would separate them from the Ṣūfīs and 'urafã' (those cognizant with divine knowledge). But they are oblivious of the fact that the Ṣūfīs and 'urafã' have already put that condition in their explanations, as evidenced by their reliable books, which are commonly available. So, this view is the same as the one held by the Ṣūfīs; yet the one differs from the other in the manner of "following" and the exact identification of its meaning. They believe that "following" should inflexibly concentrate on the apparent meanings of the Qur'ān and the Sunnah. Their method is a mixture of those of the Ṣūfīs and the Akhbārīs.

If this theory of remembrance is not intended to invalidate reference to logic and rational principles, then it may be deemed correct to a certain extent. When man is created in his essence, he has perception of his person and is cognizant of his personal powers and weaknesses; this cognition is naturally present with him, and it turns to acquired knowledge under influence of some of his faculties. Every faculty is bound to remain active within its sphere. It is inferred from the above that man, from the first moment of his existence, has some knowledge – that knowledge, although behind in nature, is concurrent with him in time. Also, nobody can deny that man gets some knowledge when he isolates himself somewhat from material connections.

But if the theory of remembrance is meant to invalidate reference to logic and rational principles, in other words, if it means that turning to oneself by isolating from external distraction frees one from the need of arranging academic premises for arriving at the results, then this view is most absurd, unworthy of slightest consideration. There are many reasons, which negate this view:

First: Deep research in human fields of knowledge and cognition, shows that man's declarative knowledge depends on his knowledge of the ideas of subject and predicate separately; and his ideas are confined to, or abstracted from the knowledge of items perceived by one of the five senses. Analogy and experiments have shown that if a man lacks one of the senses, he remains totally oblivious of all knowledge that depends on that sense – be it ideal or assertive, self-evident or requiring analogical set-up. If the knowledge were actually present with human nature and essence, lack of a sense would not have any adverse effect on that knowledge. If it were said that blindness or deafness obstructed that remembrance, it would contradict the basic theory that remembrance – turning to oneself by discarding material connections – helps in this process by removing the obliviousness.

Second: So far as this remembrance is concerned, only some human beings are blessed with it. As for the general humanity, they achieve their goals of life by combining various premises and deriving the results; they derive in this way thousands and thousands of correct results. This method pervades all fields of knowledge and technical skills. To deny this fact would be haughtiness, and to explain it as a chance would be rashness. To follow this method is but natural for the human beings; and when a species is equipped with a natural and creative apparatus, it is bound to succeed in its endeavours, it is impossible for it to stumble in its actions.

Third: If we analyse the results of this "remembrance" we find that it is made up of well-arranged logical premises – disturb any laid down procedure in its form or substance and you disturb the result. So, they do use the logical principle – without knowing what they were doing. The hypothesis of chance and concurrence cannot be applied here. If they want to prove their theory of remembrance, they should bring an academic form based on it, which should have no connection with logic and its principles.

Now, let us look at the view that remembrance frees man from the need of referring to logical principles. It implies that there are two ways: the way of logic and the way of remembrance by following the sharī'ah; that both of these ways lead to the correct destination, but the way of remembrance is better and preferable, because it is sure to hit the mark by conforming to the ma'ṣūm's views; while there is the risk of falling into error, always or mostly, in the way of logic and intellect.

In any case, the second objection to the previous view applies here too. Only a few persons can comprehend all objectives of the Book and the Sunnah with their mysteries and secrets that have such astonishing wide range. Those precious few persons are those who deeply meditate on religious gnosis with its astonishing inter-connectedness and intertwining roots and branches; some aspects of which are related to belief, others to personal and social activities. Man cannot be asked to perform something beyond his ability and power, neither in creation nor in legislation. People are only required to understand the objectives of religion through normal methods that they use in their lives. That is, arranging the known premises for discovering the unknown. And we know that only some premises of sharī'ah are known which have been established by proofs. It is amusing to note that a proponent of remembrance has used this very argument against logic and philosophy. He says that even if we accept for the sake of argument that it was possible to know the actual realities by using the logic and philosophy, only such stalwarts of philosophy as Aristotle and Avicenna could achieve it; general public could not do it. Therefore, how can the Lawgiver order people to use logical and philosophical principles to discover the realities?

That man did not realize that the tables could be turned on him and the same question asked from him. If he says, that use of remembrance is within reach of everybody according to the degree of his following of the sharī'ah, we shall reply that the use of logic, a little or a lot, is within reach of every body according to his ability of finding the realities – it is not necessary for every one to reach the furthest limit, even if it is beyond his strength.

Secondly, the third objection, mentioned earlier, is applicable here too. These people use the methods of logic in all their arguments they put forward in the name of remembrance. They could not discard those logical methods even when trying to negate the same way of logic and establish the way of remembrance. And this is enough to show its incorrectness.

Thirdly, even those who follow the way of remembrance fall mostly in error. Remembrance, as they claim, was the way used by our good predecessors – and not the way of logic. Yet they were involved in a lot of controversies and differences among themselves, like a number of the companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) who are regarded by the Muslims to be perfect in knowledge and adherence to the Book and the Sunnah; or whose knowledge and probity are agreed upon by the majority; and like many companions of the Imãms of the same calibre, like Abū Ḥamzah, Zurãrah, Abãn, Abū Khãlid, Hishãm ibn al-Ḥakam, Hishãm ibn Sãlim, Mu'minu 'ṭ-Ṭãq, the two Ṣafwãns and others. Their basic differences with each other are well known. Clearly, when two persons differ on a subject, only one will be on the right. The same is the case with ancient jurisprudents and muḥaddithīn like al-Kulaynī, aṣ-Ṣadūq, aṭ-Ṭūsī, al-Mufīd, al-Murtaḍã, and others (may Allãh be pleased with them all). So what is the advantage of remembrance over logical consideration? They must search for some factor other than remembrance to distinguish between right and wrong. The only resort is the logical contemplation.

Fourthly: The gist of their argument is that man by adhering to the sinless personalities saves himself from falling into error. It is because the views of a sinless personality when heard from him properly and when his meaning is perfectly understood are safe from error. This much is accepted by all. Yet the fact is that what is definitely heard or taken from a ma'ṣūm, has nothing to do with remembrance or intellectual consideration at all; rather its syllogism runs as follows: It is the opinion of a ma'ṣūm; and all his opinions are right; therefore it is right. It is a proof that produces difinite result.

On the contrary, what is understood from a tradition narrated by one narrator or other such things which produce only presumption, it has no authority; there is no proof that such solitary traditions have any validity – except in the field of fiqh – unless it is in conformity with the Qur'ãn; nor does presumption lead anywhere when its opposite is proved by academic proofs.

9) Some people have said: "Allãh has spoken to us in the Qur'ãn in the language with which we are familiar, with arrangements of words and phrases known to the speakers of this language. The apparent statements contain order and prohibition, promise and threat, stories and wisdom, sermon and arguments in a good manner. For understanding them, one is not obliged to learn logic, philosophy, and other such legacies of unbelievers, polytheists, and unjust persons. Allah has forbidden us to befriend them, incline towards them, or follow their paths. The proper way for one who believes in Allãh and His Messenger is to adhere to the apparent meanings of religious statements, and stop at what a normal intellect understands from those words, without interpreting or overstepping them. This view is held by al-Ḥashawiyyah (اَلْحَشَوِيَّةُ = those who believe in literal meanings of traditions), al-Mushabbihah (اَلْمُشَبِّهَةُ = those who think that the person of Allah is similar to that of humans), and other traditionalists."

This view is wrong both in form and in substance. As for the form, this argument uses the principles of logic at the same time when it wants to ban its use! Nobody says that the Qur'ãn leads to the use of the logical principles and that it was incumbent on every Muslim to learn logic. Yet its use is unavoidable in daily life. The opponents of logic are not unlike a person who says: The objective of the Qur'ãn is to lead us to the goals of religion, as such we are not obliged to learn the Arabic language which is a legacy of the people of Ignorance! Obviously, this assertion has no legs to stand upon, because language is the way man is naturally obliged to use in conversation, and that is why Allãh has used it in His Book and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in his traditions. Likewise, logic is a mental way, which man is naturally obliged to tread in the sphere of understanding, and Allãh has used it in His Book and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in his traditions.

Coming to the substance of that view, it takes intellectual substance but falls into fallacy by equalizing the apparent meaning with its application. A Muslim is required to understand from the Qur'ãnic words, like knowledge, power, life, hearing, sight, speech, volition and will the meanings that are opposite of ignorance, inability, death, deafness and blindness, etc. But he is not supposed to assert that Allãh has a knowledge like our knowledge, power and life like our power and life, and hearing, sight, volition and will like those of ours; he is not allowed to say so by the Book, the Sunnah or the reason. We have explained this topic to a certain extent under the discussion of the Decisive and Ambiguous verses in the third volume of this book.[17]

10) Some others have said: "The only evidence for the validity of the premises which are proved by rational arguments is the rational premise which says that reason's dictates must be followed. In other words, there is no authority for the reason's dictates except the reason itself. And it is clearly a vicious circle. Therefore, there is no escape in controversial issues except to the opinion of a ma'ṣūm – the Prophet or Imãm – without following [a non-ma'ṣūm]."

But it is a most absurd doubt expressed on this matter. The man wanted to strengthen a structure, but it has led to its demolition. He has invalidated the rational dictate by what he has described as clear vicious circle. Then when he turned to authenticating the sharī'ah's orders he was obliged to argue through rational arguments (which led to a vicious circle), or through sharī'ah's dictate (which led to another vicious circle.) Now, he is disconcerted and confused between two vicious circles. Or he may opt to follow a non-ma'ṣūm, which will be a second confusion.

He has fallen into confusion when trying to understand the meaning of 'Obligatoriness of following the reason's dictate.' If this obligatoriness refers to what stands with prohibition and permission as a copartner, and whose contravention entails condemnation or punishment (like obligatoriness of obeying a good counsellor, and obligatoriness of justice in deciding the cases and other similar things), then it is the dictate of practical intellect, and we have nothing to say against it. And if it means that man is necessarily bound to confirm and accept a result – when arguments are offered for it with academic premises and in correct form with perfect conception of all aspects of related issues, then it is a proposition which man sees by his psychic forces. In this case, why should the intellect be asked for an evidence to prove the authenticity of its proof? Because its authenticity is self-evident; and this case is like other self-evident propositions. Every self-evident clause is its own proof; it needs no outside proof.

11) Some have said: "The ultimate goal of logic is to get at the things' established quiddities, to arrive at the results through firm and established general premises. But academic researches have established today that there is no totality, generality, permanency, or durability – neither in mind nor outside it. The things are governed by the law of general transformation; nothing continues as it is, in an established, permanent, or total condition."

This assertion is totally wrong. The man has used the principles of logic; in form and substance both, [to argue against the same principles] as any contemplating person will understand. Moreover, the objector has offered this objection only to prove that the old [Aristotlian] logic was not correct; yet it is a result, which is general, enduring and established which contains established concepts. Otherwise, it would not serve his purpose. So, the objection invalidates itself.

Perhaps we have gone beyond the self-imposed condition to keep the book as brief as possible. So, let us return to our previous topic.

The noble Qur'ãn guides the intellect to use what it has been created to use, and to precede on what it knows and is familiar with – that is, to arrange the known premises for arriving at the results, which were hitherto unknown. The intellect has a natural disposition for using authentic and indisputable premises in order to arrive at genuine and authentic results – and it is what is called "Proof". Also, the intellect is used in practical matters which lead to felicity and infelicity, good and evil, benefit and harm; showing what should be taken and adopted and what is to be rejected and discarded – these are mentally posited ideas, well-known or accepted premises – and it is what is called "Debate" or "Disputation". Alternatively, it uses in matters of assumed good or evil assumed premises, which guide to presumed good or prevent from presumed evil – and it is called "Admonition". Allãh says: Call to the way of thy Lord with wisdom and goodly exhortation, and have disputation with them in the best manner (16: 125). Clearly, "wisdom" refers to "proof", as may be understood from its positioning vis-à-vis goodly exhortation and disputation.

Question: The way of logical thinking and contemplation is within the ability of believer and unbeliever both, and human beings whether sinner or pious tread on it. In this background, how can you justify the Qur'ãnic statements where Allãh disallows good knowledge and correct remembrance to all who are not pious and do not follow true religion; as is seen in the following verses: . . . and none minds but he who turns (to Him) again and again (40:13). . . . and whoever fears Allãh, He will make for him an outlet (65:2). Therefore turn aside from him who turns his back upon Our reminder and does not desire anything but this world's life. That is the (last) reach of their knowledge; surely your Lord knows best him who goes astray from His path and He knows best him who follows the right direction. (53:29-30). And how will you explain the numerous, nearly-mutawãtir traditions which say that beneficial knowledge cannot be attained except through good deeds?

Reply: There is no doubt that the Book and the Sunnah give importance to piety in respect of knowledge. But it does not mean that they have made piety (or piety coupled with remembrance) an independent way for acquiring knowledge of realities, separate from the natural way of contemplation which man inevitably treads upon. Otherwise, all the arguments and disputations brought in the noble Book against the unbelievers, polytheists, and immoral and sinful persons would become irrelevant – they do not follow the truth and do not know what piety and remembrance was; accordingly, they would be unable to attain the intended goal. Consequently, it would be irrelevant to argue with them. The same applies to the disputations found in the sunnah against various sects and groups that have gone astray.

In fact, piety is considered necessary for bringing the human intelligent soul back to its natural uprightness. It may be explained as follows:

Man, on his body's side, is made up of contrary animalistic and predatory powers, all related to this material body; each of these powers performs its own function without having any coordination with other powers. The desire of food, for instance, encourages man to go on eating and drinking; it feels no restriction or limitation by itself, except if stomach refuses to accept any more food or drink when it is filled up completely, or if the jaws become tired of chewing, or things like that. These are the things we always observe in ourselves

In this situation, if man inclines towards one of his powers, follows its dictates and proceeds to where it instigates him to go, that power exceeds its limits, and subjugates the opposite power to such an extent that it is almost negated. For example, giving free rein to desire of food or sex diverts the man away from all important affairs of life, like earning livelihood, social relations, domestic affairs, upbringing of children and all other individual and social responsibilities which he is obliged to do. The same thing happens when man goes on following other powers of desire and anger. This too we always see in our own lives as well as in others'.

With this excess and shortcoming, humanity is bound to perish. Man is a person who is controlled by these adverse powers; he is supposed to pull all these powers together by activating them in the way of his felicity in the life of this world and the next. Such life has to be based on knowledge and perfection. He has no option but to give every power its due share in a way that it does not obstruct other powers, nor does it become dormant itself.

Man cannot perfect his humanity unless he creates a perfect balance between his various powers in such a manner that every power keeps in the middle of the way prescribed for it. The top characteristic of proper proportion in these powers is called wisdom, bravery, chastity, etc., and collectively they are called justice, probity.

No doubt, man acquires the thoughts (which are present with him now), and expands his human cognizance and knowledge by instigating these perceptive faculties to do their work. I mean, initially man comes into this world without any of these vast informations and knowledge; he is totally empty-handed. Then his internal faculties perceive their requirements and demand from him what they desire. These elementary perceptions are the starting point of man's knowledge. Thereafter he goes on generalising, particularizing, mixing and separating these matters until he completes the process of human thoughts.

A wise person will understand from the above description that if man remains deeply involved in obeying one of his various contradictory powers, and exceeds the limit in giving it what it demands, then his thoughts and perceptions would be deviated from right path; he would blindly make its propositions superior and keep other powers' propositions and thoughts subservient to it; he will remain oblivious to the demands of other faculties and powers.

Experience confirms it. It is this deviation, which we observe in intemperate and extravagant persons who have become slaves of their desires. Also it may be seen in unjust, oppressive tyrants who corrupt the life in human society. The former who are submerged in the abyss of desires and are obsessed by pleasures of drinking, entertainment and sexual enjoyments, are almost incapable of thinking about the obligations of humanity and the important matters for which great people vie with each other. Desire has permeated their sitting and standing, their joining and separating and things like that. The later, that is the oppressive and haughty people, are hard-hearted; incapable of thinking about compassion, kindliness, mercy, or humility even where it is essential. Their lives are mirrors of their evil condition which they display in all its manifestations – their talk and silence, their looking and averting of eyes, their advancing and retreating, all are devoid of kindliness. Both groups are proceeding on a wrong path in seeking the knowledge; all are bent upon the perverted and deviated knowledge and thoughts connected with their twisted psyche. They are unaware of what lies beyond their myopic vision. And what lies there? It is beneficial knowledge and true cognizance. Man cannot attain true cognizance and beneficial knowledge unless his morals are excellent and his human virtues are complete. And this is piety, God-fearing.

It is thus proved that it is the good deeds, which preserve the good characteristics, which in their turn preserve the true cognizance, beneficial knowledge, and correct thoughts. There is no good in knowledge if it is devoid of practice.

Although we have explained this topic in academic and ethical terms (because the context demanded it), Allãh has told all this in one short phrase, where He says: And pursue the right course in your going about . . . (31:19). It is an indication that one should keep on the middle of the path, and remain moderate in life. Also He says: If you fear Allãh, He will grant you a distinction . . . (8:29). . . . and make provision, for surely the best provision is piety (guarding oneself against evil); and fear Me, O people of understanding! (2:197); i.e. being men of understanding, you require piety and God-fearing for activating your understanding. Again Allãh says: And (I swear by) the soul and Him Who made it perfect, then He inspired it to understand what is wrong for it and right for it; He will indeed be successful who purifies it, and he will indeed fail who corrupts it (91:7-10). Also He says: . . . and fear Allãh, that you may be successful (3:130).

On the other hand, He says about the opposite group: But there followed after them an evil generation, who neglected prayer and followed the sensual desires, so they shall soon meet (the result of their) sin; except such as repent and believe and do good . . . (19:59-60).

Allãh states here that following the sensual desire leads to perdition. Also He says: I will turn away from My signs those who are unjustly proud in the earth; and if they see every sign they will not believe in it; and if they see the way of rectitude they do not take it for a way, and if they see the way of error, they take it for a way; this is because they rejected Our signs and were heedless of them. (7:146). Here Allãh reminds that the prisoners of the powers of anger are prevented from following the way of truth and are pulled to the path of error and perdition, then He explains that it all happens because they are heedless of truth. Again He says: And certainly We have created for hell many of the jinn and the men; they have hearts with which they do not understand, and they have eyes with which they do not see, and they have ears with which they do not hear; they are as cattle, nay, they are in worse errors; these are the heedless ones (7:179). In this verse, He states that these heedless ones are oblivious of the true perceptions, which behove human beings. Their hearts, eyes, and ears do not perceive what a blissful man perceives. Their perception does not reach higher than the level of cattles or even worse – and these are the ideas which grazing cattles and preying beasts are familiar with and inclined to.

The foregoing details clearly show that the Qur'ãn has made thought, remembrance and understanding conditional upon piety (God-fearing), and has joined knowledge with practice in order that man may attain to straight thinking and correct knowledge which is free from animalistic imaginations and Satanic insinuations.

Of course, there is a Qur'ãnic reality which cannot be denied; and that is: If man is brought under the influence of divine guardianship and goes near the perimeter of heavenly sanctity, it opens for him a door to the kingdoms of the heavens and the earth, and he sees through it what remains hidden to others – the great signs of Allãh and everlasting lights of His omnipotence. aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) has said, "If the Satans had not hovered around the hearts of the human beings, they would have seen the kingdoms of the heavens and the earth." The Sunnīs have narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: "If there were no multiplicity in your talk and confusion in your hearts, you would have seen what I see, and heard what I hear." Allãh has said: And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them onto Our ways; and Allãh is most surely with the doers of good (29:69). The apparent meaning of the following divine words prove it: And worship thy Lord until there comes to thee that which is certain (15:99), as it shows that certainty springs from worship. Also He says: And thus did We show Ibrāhīm the kingdoms of the heavens and the earth, and so that he might be of those who are sure (6:75), as it ties the virtue of certitude to observation of the kingdom. In other verses He says: Nay! If you had known with a knowledge of certainty, you should most certainly have seen the hell; then you shall most certainly see it with the eye of certainty (102:5-7) Nay! Most surely the record of the righteous shall be in the ʻilliyyīn*. And what will make you know what the* ʻilliyyīn is? It is a written book; those who are drawn near (to Allāh) shall witness it (83:18-21). (A full discussion of this subject will be found in Chapter 5, verses 55 and 105.)

Affirmation of this reality does not go against our earlier stand that the noble Qur'ān supports the way of natural thinking, on which the structure of human life is founded and man has been created. Because this way is other than meditation and contemplation; it is a divine gift, which is reserved for His selected servants; and the good end is for the pious ones.

A HISTORICAL DISCUSSION

In this discussion we shall have an overall view of the history of Islamic thoughts, and the way, which the Muslim ummah adopted – in spite of its sectarian differences. We do not intend to support or oppose any school of thought. Our aim is to present the historical events to the Qur'ān and let the Holy Book confirm or reject them. We are not concerned with boastings of supporters or apologia of opponents, because the place for it is in a religious discussion.

The noble Qur'ān deals with all aspects of human life without being restricted with any condition. It governs man – be he an individual or a group, small or big, male or female, be he of white race or black, an Arab or non-Arab, civilized or primitive, learned or ignorant, present or absent; be he at any time and in any place. The Qur'ān certainly guides him in all his affairs, be it belief, ethics or deeds.

The Qur'ān interlocks with all academic and industrial aspects related to the human life. Ponder on its verses exhorting people to meditate, think, remember and understand, and you will find that the Book intensely urges man to acquire knowledge and discard ignorance in every field, be it concerned with heavens or earth, whether it is vegetable world, animal kingdom or humanity as parts of this world of ours; and even going beyond that to the angels, satans, the tablet and the pen, etc., in order that it may be a means to acquire gnosis of God and whatever is in any way related to the social human life – ethics, laws, reciprocal rights and social norms.

You have seen that the Qur'ãn supports the natural way of thinking, to which the nature inevitably invites; there is no escape from it as the nature demands to proceed in logical way.

The Qur'ãn itself uses all types of logical techniques – proof, argumentation, and sermon. It invites the Muslim ummah to follow its lead and to offer proofs regarding positivistic realities (in practical sphere); and to argue with the help of accepted premises in other spheres as in mentally posited considerations.

The Qur'ãn has offered the Prophetic way of life as its ideal; it has appointed the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) as its model; the Muslims used to observe and remember his ways, and follow his knowledgeable steps as a student follows his teacher in his academic progress.

The Muslims during the Prophet's time (i.e. during his stay at Medina) were new to the Islamic teachings. Their condition was not different from the ancient man in academic and industrial field. When they engaged in academic discussion, it was in a simple and untechnical manner, their only aim being to know divine commandments. In the beginning their attention was fixed on memorizing and recital of Qur'ãn, and memorizing the Prophetic traditions (without writing them) and their transmission. Sometimes they disputed with each other on religious topics; also they entered into arguments with people of some alien faith, especially the Jews and the Christians, because there were some groups of them in Arabia, Ethiopia and Syria. This was the beginning of 'ilmu 'l-kalãm (Scholastic Theology). They also liked narrating poetry; it was a part of Arabian culture, which Islam did not give importance to; the Book does not contain a single word in praise of poetry or poets, nor the sunnah lauds it much.

When the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) departed from this world, we know what happened regarding the caliphate; the resulting discord further increased the disunity. The Qur'ãn was collected during the reign of the first Caliph after the battle of Yamãmah, when a great number of the reciters were martyred there. The condition remained the same during his time – nearly two years – and the reign of the second caliph.

Although Islam's fame had spread and its domain increased, thanks to the great victories the Muslims had achieved in those days, it kept them busy and prevented them from paying any thought to academic matters, nor did they try to enhance their level of knowledge. Or, perhaps with their academic level they did not feel need to any increase or enhancement.

Knowledge and its virtue is not something to be perceived by the five senses, which a nation may know from the other, except when that knowledge is related to craft and industry; then its effect is perceivable and general public recognizes it.

Those continuous and growing victories did reawaken in them the characteristics of the Days of Ignorance – the pride and arrogance – which had subsided as a result of the Prophetic teaching and training. But now the spirit of domineering and oppressing nations was sneaking into, and getting hold of them. Its proof may be seen in the division of the Muslim ummah at that time into Arab and clients; also look at the behaviour of Mu‘ãwiyah, then Syria's governor, towards the Muslims, and how he adopted the imperial Caesarian style, in addition to many other indications recorded by history about Muslim armies. This psychology had its effect on the academic progress, especially the Qur’ãnic teachings.

As for their academic development at that time, their involvement with Qur’ãn was as before; and there appeared its numerous versions attributed to Zayd, Ubayy, Ibn Mas‘ūd, and others.

As for ḥadīth, it spread widely – and what a spreading it was? Its narrations and records increased to such an extent that ‘Umar forbade some companions from narration because he was narrating a lot of it. A number of the People of the Book entered into the fold of Islam, and the Muslim muḥaddithīn took from them a lot of traditions from their books including the stories of their prophets and nations; then they mixed it with what they had preserved from the traditions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Forgery and uncalled for infiltration freely circulated among the aḥãdīth. Today we have got a lot of pieces of traditions, narrated from the companions and their narrators of the early days of Islam, which are clearly rejected by the Qur’ãn.

We may summarize its reason in three factors:

1. The high status which people accorded to the Prophet's companionship and to memorization of his aḥãdīth; the prestige and honour enjoyed by the companions and their disciples who narrated to the people the traditions on those companions' authority. This led the people to take traditions – and that too abundantly – even from converted People of the Book, and to intense rivalry among narrators of ḥadīth for gaining precedence and pride of place.

2. Their intense avidity for remembrance and narration of ḥadīth hindered them from testing the narrative for correctness, and from meditating on it's meaning, especially presenting it to the Qur'ãn for verification. The Book of Allãh is the foundation on which the religion's structure is built; and the root from which the religion's branches sprout. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had enjoined them to do so, as his correct traditions show. For example: "Certainly forgers and liers against me will increase; so when a tradition is brought to you, present it to the Qur'ãn: whatever conforms to it, accepts it, and whatever goes against it, throw it on the wall."

This environment became a fertile ground for circulation of forged traditions in respect of divine attributes, names and actions; about the lapses ascribed to the noble prophets, and slanderous evil deeds attributed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); it took in its fold the myths of genesis and creation, stories of past nations; it even contained the claim that the Qur'ãn had been altered, and numerous such stories which are similar to what is found in the Tawrãt and the Injīl.

At this juncture the Qur'ãn and the Ḥadīth divided advancement and practice between themselves. Seeming advancement became the Qur'ãn's lot, but practice was reserved for ḥadīth; consequently very soon Qur'ãn was abandoned. This habit of neglecting to present the ḥadīth to the Qur'ãn has become a permanent feature of the Muslims' behaviour since those early days uptil now, although they do not admit it in so many words: And the Messenger cried out: "O my Lord! Surely my people have treated this Qur'ãn as a forsaken thing." [25:30]. Exceptions to this malady are rare, countable on fingers.

This negligence is exactly one of the reasons why many ancient national myths and superstitions are still alive in the Muslim nations even after their entering into the fold of Islam. And disease breeds disease.

3. What happened regarding the caliphate after the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) turned the opinions of the general Muslims away from the people of the family of the Prophet? Muslims found themselves divided into three groups. There were some who were devoted to them, remained adhered to them; others turned away from them, not caring about them or the position they had in Qur'ãnic knowledge; there were even those who hated them, felt enmity towards them. All this took place when the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) had enjoined them – in traditions whose authenticity is undoubted and whose meaning is accepted by all – that they should learn from the Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) and should not attempt to teach them because they know the Book of Allāh better than the ummah; he had reminded them that his family members would never make mistake in Qur'ānic exegesis nor would they go astray in its understanding. He had said in the mutawātir ḥadīth of "Two Precious Things": "Surely I am leaving among you two precious things, the Book of Allāh and my descendants, and they shall not separate from each other until they come to me near the reservoir." Some of its narratives add: "Do not teach them, for they are more knowledgeable than you." Also he has said in a nearly-mutawātir ḥadīth: "Whoever interprets Qur'ān according to his opinion, he should prepare his seat in hell." (It has been fully explained in the discussion on "The Decisive and the Ambiguous Verses", in the third[18] volume.)

That was the biggest loss that afflicted the knowledge of the Qur'ān, and the way of thinking to which it calls. If you want any proof of this turning away, look at the paucity of the aḥādīth which have been taken from the Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.). Think about the prestige and status 'ilmu 'l-ḥadīth enjoyed in the reign of the caliphs, and how the people vied with each other in taking ḥadīth; and then count how many aḥādīth have been narrated from 'Alī, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn – and particularly those connected with the Qur'ānic exegesis – and you will see an astonishing phenomenon: As for the companions, they did not narrate from 'Alī (a.s.) anything worthy of attention. As for their disciples if we count what they have narrated from him in the whole of Qur'ān, it will not reach a hundred narratives. As for al-Ḥasan (a.s.), perhaps the number of narratives taken from him would not reach ten; and as for al-Ḥusayn, they have not narrated from him anything worthy of mention. You will understand the true position when you come to know that some people have counted the narrations regarding the Qur'ānic exegesis and the number has reached seventeen thousand aḥādīth from Sunnī chains.[19] The same ratio is found in the tradition of fiqh too.[20]

[19] It has been mentioned by as-Suyūṭī in al-Itqān that he said he has counted the traditions in his tafsīr named Tarjumānu 'l-Qur'ān, and its abridgement known as ad-Durru 'l-manthūr. (Author's Note)

[20] A researcher said that he has been able to find only two narratives from al-Ḥusayn

Was it because they had abandoned Ahlu 'l-Bayt and turned away from their ḥadīth? Or was it because they had abundantly taken ḥadīth from them, and then it was hidden and forgotten during Umayyad period, because Umayyads were hostile to them? I do not know.

However, seclusion of ʻAlī and his non-participation in the gathering of the Qur'ān – in beginning and in end – and the life histories of al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (peace be on them all) supports the first alternative.

The situation regarding his ḥadīth deteriorated to such an extent that some people denied that some of his magnificent sermons in the book, Nahju 'l-balghah were of his saying; while no one casts any doubt about al-khuṭbatu 'l-batrā' of the Ziyād (of illegitimate birth) or Yazīd's poems extolling intoxicants!

The Ahlu 'l-bayt remained under oppression and their ḥadīth forsaken until the time of the Imāms, al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (peace be on them), when there was some intermission because of the ensuing conflict between the Umayyads and ʻAbbāsids. Thus they got a chance to describe the hitherto lost traditions of their ancestors, and renew what had been obliterated of their tracks.

However their traditions as well as those of their forefathers and descendants did not remain safe from infiltration, were not free from forgery, and unauthorised insertion – just like the Prophetic traditions. Those two Imāms had stated it clearly and mentioned by name some forgers, like Mughīrah ibn Saʻīd and Ibn Abi 'l-Khaṭṭāb and others like them. Some Imāms refuted many traditions, which were attributed to them and to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); and commanded their companions and the Shīʻahs to present the narrated traditions to Qur'ān, and to accept what conforms to it and reject what goes against it.

But the people (excepting a few individuals) did not follow this order in practice concerning the aḥādīth of the Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.), and especially in subjects other than fiqh; they followed the same path which the general Muslims had taken in respect of the Prophetic traditions.

The malady spread to such an extent that a group said that the apparent meanings of the Qur'ān had no authority at all[21]; while the books of traditions like Miṣbāḥu 'sh-sharīʻah, Fiqhu 'r-Riḍā and Jāmiʻu 'l-akhbār had authority. They went to such an extent that some of them said that ḥadīth explains the Qur'ān even when the former goes against the clear meaning of the latter. It is not different from some Sunnīs' view that ḥadīth abrogates the Book! Perhaps what is seen in the Muslims' behaviour is what a research scholar has said: "The Sunnīs took the Book and abandoned the Ahlu 'l-Bayt; the result was that they forsook the Book too, because the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), has said: 'Surely they will not separate from each other.' And the Shī'ahs took the Ahlu 'l-Bayt and abandoned the Book; the result was that they forsook the Ahlu 'l-Bayt too, because of the same Prophetic saying: 'Surely they will not separate from each other.' Thus the ummah collectively forsook the Qur'ān and the Ahlu 'l-Bayt (the Book and the Sunnah) altogether."

(a.s.) in traditions related to fiqh. (Author's Note)

The path they had taken regarding ḥadīth was one of the factors that caused severance of relationship between Islamic subjects (like religion and literature) and the Qur'ān. This happened while it is known that all Islamic subjects are like branches and fruits growing from this good tree (Qur'ān) whose root is firmly fixed and whose branches are in heaven, yielding its fruit in every season by the permission of its Lord. You will clearly see it if you look at these subjects: you will find that they have been developed and arranged in a way that they do not need Qur'ān at all. It is possible for a student to learn and complete all Islamic subjects – morphology, grammar, rhetoric, language, ḥadīth, rijāl, critical knowledge of ḥadīth, jurisprudence and its fundamentals; he may become an expert and authority in these branches of knowledge without even reciting the Qur'ān or touching the Book. So what share has actually been given to Qur'ān in Muslims' lives? Its recital is only for earning reward in the next world or using it as amulet for protection of their children from misfortunes and untoward occurances! Learn lesson if you have any understanding.

Now, let us return to our original topic:

You have heard what was the position of Qur'ān and ḥadīth during 'Umar's reign. In the same period there was increase in scholastic debate, as the Islamic victories naturally led to mingling of Muslims with other religions and groups, and there were scholars, rabbis, bishops and patricians in those religions who discussed and debated on religious matters. In this way, scholastic theology got boost although it was not much arranged or recorded – its early books are attributed to later scholars.

It continued during 'Uthman's time, but people turned against the caliph. However, he succeeded in gathering of various collections of Qur'ān and uniting the Muslims on one version.

The same was the condition during ‘Alī's caliphate; but he remained busy in reform of Muslim society, as there were internal conflicts which led to battles one after another. However, he founded Arabic grammar (syntax) and dictated its general broadlines to his companion, Abu 'l-Aswad ad-Dualī, and told him to write down smaller details. He could not do more, but he delivered important sermons and aḥadīth, which contain comprehensive materials of religious knowledge and finest Qur’ãnic mysteries. In addition, his scholastic discussions are recorded in collections of ḥadīth.

This situation of Qur’ãn and ḥadīth continued in Mu‘ãwiyah's reign and after him during the Umayyad and ‘Abbãsid periods' upto nearly beginning of the fourth century of hijrah. It coincided with the end of the time of twelve Shī‘ite Imãms. Nothing important happened in respect of discussions about Qur’ãn and ḥadīth – except what happened during Mu‘ãwīyah's reign as he tried his utmost to destroy the name of the Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) and obliterate their tracks. For this purpose he started forgery of aḥãdīth in an organized way. The religious rule turned into an autocratic despotic government, and the Islamic sunnah gave way to byzantine splendour and authority. Also in this same period ‘Umar ibn ‘Abdi 'l-‘Azīz gave order to put ḥadīth in writing; before that muḥaddithūn used to take, preserve and transmit traditions verbally without recording them on paper.

In this very period, Arabic poetry got wide prevalance in society. It began in Mu‘ãwiyah's time, as he was very keen to spread it, and it continued during Umayyad and ‘Abbãsid periods. Sometimes, they rewarded two lines of poetry, or a fine literary point with hundreds and thousands of dinãr. People dedicated themselves to poetry and its transmission, and to history of Arabia and their battles; they earned through it magnificent wealth. The Umayyads benefited very much from spread of poetry and paid good money for it, because it supported their stand vis-à-vis Hãshimites; the same advantage was taken from it by Abbasids vis-à-vis Fãṭimids. The rulers paid high respects to scholars in order that they could help them against masses, and could make them do what they (rulers) wanted.

Poetry and literature got so much hold on academic circles that you would see many scholars, while engaged in intellectual or academic discussions, offering a poetry or well-known proverb as their proof, and winning the debate. Often they base theoretical purports on linguistic rules – at least they begin with linguistic explanation of the name of the subject and then enter into its main topics. All these things do have deep influence on scholars' thoughts and their academic proceedings.

In those very days scholastic discussions got wide prevalence; many books and booklets were written on this subject. Soon the scholars were divided into two big sects: the Ash'arites and the Mu'tazilites. The seeds of their views were present at the time of the caliphs – nay, of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) himself. Its proof may be found in the recorded arguments of 'Alī (a.s.) regarding compulsion and delegation, qadar and ability, etc. and in the narrated aḥãdīth of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) on these subjects.[22] What happened at this time was clear distinction of the two groups in their opinions. The Mu'tazilites accorded total authority to dictates of reason over apparent aspects of religion, like the beliefs that good and evil may be understood through intellect; that it is wrong to give precedence to something without a reason; that it is repugnant to force someone to do what is beyond his power; that man is totally independent in his actions, and that he has been given all power, etc. The Ash'arites, on the other hand, gave total authority to apparent factors of religion on the dictates of reason, like the rejection of idea that good and evil could be understood through intellect; that it was quite in order to give precedence without a reason; that man is not independent in his actions, rather he is under compulsion; that the speech of Allãh is eternal, and many similar ideas which are found in their books.

Then they wrote and arranged the subject of scholastic theology, coined its terminologies, and added to it some issues with which they faced the philosophers in imaginative topics of general proposition. This happened when the works of Greek philosophy were translated into Arabic and its study spread among the Muslims. Anyhow, it is not correct to say (as some have done) that the scholastic theology began in Islam or divided into I'tizãl and Ash'ariyyah after the transfer of philosophy to Arabia. The existence in the early traditions of their major issues and opinions is sufficient to refute such an idea.

The Mu'tazilites continued to multiply in number and their splendour and might kept on increasing from their advent to the early 'Abbãsid period (early third century of hijrah); then they began their downward slide until the Ayyūbids extinguished their life. Only Allãh knows how many people were massacred at that time and later for the crime of I'tizãl. This left the field clear for the Ash'arites to indulge into scholastic discourses without anybody being there to oppose them; so they entered its arena (while previously their jurisprudents used to brand it a sin!). Now, Ash'ariyyah is the prevalent school among the Sunnīs today.

[22] For example: His (may Allãh bless him and his progeny) saying which is narrated from him: "There is no compulsion, nor delegation; rather it is a position between the two." And his saying: "The Qadariyyah are the Mazdaists of this ummah." (Author's Note)

The Shī'ites had precedence in scholastic discussions. They began speaking in this vein soon after the departure of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Most of their scholars were companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) e.g. Salmãn, Abū Dharr, Miqdãd, 'Ammãr and 'Amr ibn al-Ḥamq and others. Also there were among the tãbi'īn people like Rushayd, Kumayl and Maytham and the descendants of 'Alī (a.s.). Umayyads annihilated them; yet they put down new roots and were reinvigorated in the days of the two Imãms al-Bãqir and aṣ-Ṣãdiq (peace be on them). They took part in discussions and wrote books and booklets. Their efforts continued in spite of the persecution and suppression of the governments. However they were given some breathing space during the Buwayhids' rule.[23] Then again they were strangulated until the advent of the Safavid kingdom[24] in Iran – and this situation continues till today.

The characteristic style of their scholastic discussions was more in conformity with Mu'tazilites than with Ash'arites. The Shī'ite and Mu'tazilite views were almost similar in many aspects, as for example they too believed that good and evil were perceivable through intellect, to give precedence without reason was wrong, and in the questions of qadar and delegation. This similarity made some people to think that the Shī'ites and the Mu'tazilites went on the same way in scholastic matters, like two competing horses. But they have totally missed the point, because the fundamentals which are narrated from the Imams of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) – which are the authority in the Shī'ite sect – have no affinity with the Mu'tazilite taste and style.

In short, the scholastic theology is a noble branch of knowledge, which defends the true religious precepts. But the Muslim scholars went awry in their debates and discussions and they made no distinction between intellectual propositions; they mixed truth with acceptable, as we shall explain it later to some extent.

During the same period, ancients' books were translated into

[23] About 4th century of hijrah. (Author's Note)
[24] Early 10th century of hijrah. (Author's Note)

Arabic; they were related to logic, mathematics, physics, divinity, medicine, and practical ḥikmah. Some were translated in Umayyad reign, and the exercise was completed in the early ‘Abbãsid period. Hundreds of books were rendered into Arabic from the Greek, Latin, Sanskirit, Persian and Suriyac languages. People became engaged in studies of various fields of knowledge, and in a short time they formed independent views and opinions. Of course, the religious scholars were enraged by this "development", especially when they looked at the open attacks against the accepted religious issues launched by atheists, philosophers, Manichaeans and others; they were also infuriated by the Muslim philosophers' disparaging the religion and religionists, and insulting the fundamentals of Islam and landmarks of sharī‘ah. And there is no disease like ignorance!

What inflamed their anger most was the philosophers' habit of basing the issues on the principles derived from Greek astronomy and physics, like the arrangement of Ptolemaic celestial bodies, and their belief that those skies were the fifth nature; they could not be rent or mended; they were eternal as was the astronomical system in person; likewise the elements were eternal in species; all species were eternal and so on. In fact, all these issues were based on principles that were taken for granted and for which philosophy had not established any proof. Yet ignorant persons posing as philosophers were presenting them as if they were proven issues. The atheists and their likes who professed to believe in philosophy added to it other false issues like belief in transmigration of soul, rejection of resurrection, particularly the physical one. They used all these suppositions for ridiculing literal meanings of religion. Sometimes one of them would say: Religion is a collection of blindly followed rituals and responsibilities, which the prophets had brought for training and perfecting the simple and primitive minds; but a philosopher who has attained real knowledge, does not need them or their message, they had firm standing on the path of argumentation.

This behaviour prompted and called the jurisprudents and scholastic scholars to stand against them and refute their views; to annihilate their influence by all possible means, debating with them, cursing and disavowing them, declaring them out of the fold of Islam. In this way, they broke their force, dispersed their gathering, and destroyed their books during Mutawakkil's reign. Then philosophy was on the verge of extinction; until it was revived by the Second Teacher, Abū Naṣr al-Fãrãbī (d. 339 AH) and then ash-Shaykhu 'r-

Raīs Abū ʻAlī al-Ḥusayn ibn ʻAbdillāh ibn Sīnā (d. 428 AH) followed by other stalwarts of philosophy like Abū ʻAlī ibn Miskwayh, Ibn Rushd al-Andulusī and others. Since then, philosophy has remained alive although the number of its students has always been small; it rotates between strength and weakness.

Although philosophy was first brought to Arabia, very few Arabs, like al-Kindī and Ibn Rushd got fame as philosophers. Lately it has settled in Iran.

The Muslim scholars of ʻilmu 'l-kalām opposed philosophy and vehemently refuted it. However, most of them accorded acceptance to Logic as they found it conforming to the natural way of argumentation; so they wrote books and booklet on this discipline.

But, as you have been told earlier, they erred in its use: They applied the rules of real definition and its parts on mentally posited concepts, and used the proof in propositions of subjective consideration – while in fact proof had nothing to do with it, it was the field of argumentative syllogism. You will find them talking on scholastic issues like good and evil, reward and punishment, forfeiture and grace, and they describe its genus, class and limits, they describe its definition. Likewise, they argue regarding issues of uṣūl and al-kalām (in branches of religion) on the basis of inevitability and impossibility; it is an example of using realities in mentally posited issues. On the other hand, they say that: 'This is obligatory for Allāh', or 'This is improper for Allāh'. In this way they make subjective considerations rule over realities – and they think that it is proof! In fact, it is just a poetic analogy.

They went ahead in this respect to such a stage that one of them said: Allāh is so sublime that subjective consideration cannot creep into His command and action, such consideration is mere allusion; therefore whatever He has created or legislated are real factual matters. Another one said: Allāh has all power; it would be beneath His omnipotence to give an order and not to be able to establish a proof for it; therefore proof covers both created things and legislated orders. There are other such absurd sayings that, by my life, are tragedies of knowledge and people of knowledge; and even greater tragedy is for me to feel compelled to record and discuss them in academic works.

In this same period, Ṣūfīsm appeared among the Muslims. Its rudiments were found in the garb of asceticism. Then the Ṣūfīs began openly showing their colours in early ʻAbbāsid period, when people like Abū Yazīd, Junayd, ash-Shiblī and Maʻrūf appeared on the scene.

They believe that the true way for reaching real human perfection and attaining realities of cognition is to enter into an Ṣūfī ṭarīqah (path). This path is a sort of diligence in practice of sharī'ah for attaining to the reality. A greater part of them – among the Shī'ites and Sunnītes both – trace their chain to 'Alī (a.s.).

They claim to perform some supernatural deeds, and their talks contain things that go against clear concepts of religion and dictate of reason (saying that those expressions have correct interpretations which are beyond the understanding of general people!). Consequently, fuqahā' and general Muslims could not tolerate such utterances; they opposed them, avoided them and decreed that they were infidels. Sometimes they were imprisoned, whipped, killed, crucified, chased away, or banished. All this happened because of their moral depravity and their loose talks that they called mysteries of the sharī'ah. But if the things were as they claimed, and the Ṣūfīs' path was the kernel of reality and concepts of religion were merely its shell, then the legislator of the sharī'ah had more right to pay attention to it and make it public – as they are doing. On the other hand, if it is not truth, then what is there after truth except error and falsehood?

The Ṣūfīs, to begin with, expressed their views relating to the path in words only. After finding some place in people's hearts, they started writing books and tracts after the third century of hijrah. Then they went ahead and declared in clear words their opinion about reality and path together; and what they wrote in prose and poetry spread to all corners of the world.

Their number kept increasing, and so did their strength and influence among Muslim masses. They reached the pinnacle of their prestige in the sixth and seventh centuries of hijrah.

Then began their retreat; their status suffered and general public turned away from them.

There were two factors that led to their downfall:

First: When a system, which involves general public, becomes highly popular attracting the masses, insincere people take its advantage seeking to gain worldly riches through it; they disguise themselves, showing that they were deeply rooted in that system and are particularly attached to it. This exploitation makes people dislike, nay, hate the whole system.

Second: A group of their mashāyikh said that the way to know one's self was an innovation, which the Legislator of the sharī'ah had not enacted, yet it was a pleasing way which Allāh is pleased with, as

He was pleased with monasticism which the Christians had innovated. Allãh says: . . . and (as for) monasticism, they innovated it – We did not prescribe it to them – only to seek Allãh's pleasure, but they did not observe it with its due observance . . . (57:27).

The masses agreed whole-heartedly with it. This opened the way to them to create for it rituals and etiquettes hitherto unknown in sharī'ah. They went on innovating fresh procedure that resulted in discarding a procedure of the sharī'ah. Ultimately a time came when the sharī'ah was placed on one side and the ṭarīqah (way) stood on another side. Not surprisingly, it led to indulgence in unlawful things, discarding of obligatory practices of religion – in short, sharī'ah was treated as abrogated, there appeared groups like al-Qalandariyyah, and nothing remained of Ṣūfīsm except beggary and addiction to opium and bhang – which they call 'obliteration of the self'.

What have the Book and the Sunnah to say on this subject? They guide to the verdict of reason. According to them, it is true that behind the external aspect of the sharī'ah there are realities that are its hidden or esoteric meanings. It is also correct to say that man has a way to reach that reality. But that way is to deligently follow and obey the external aspect of the sharī'ah – nothing else. Far be it from us to think that there was any esoteric idea which the external practices did not lead to; it is the external which identifies the hidden or esoteric realities, and leads to them. Far be it from us to suppose that there was a nearer path than the one laid down by the Bringer of religion, but the Prophet did not pay heed to it, or showed negligence towards it or ignored it for some reason. Remember what Allãh says: . . . and We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything (16:89).

To make a long story short, three methods developed for searching and uncovering of realities: the external meaning of religion, the way of intellectual research, and that of purification of soul. A Muslim group adopted each method – and the three groups continue to dispute and quarrel with one another. They are like the angles of a triangle; if one of them becomes bigger, the other two are bound to reduce and vice versa. The methods used in Qur'ãnic exegesis greatly differed from one another resulting from vast differences in exegetes' taste. Usually they imposed their own academic views on the Qur'ãn, instead of letting the Qur'ãn shape their views – with rare exceptions.

You have seen that the Book confirms all that is true in each method and way. It cannot be that there is a true hidden reality, which the external sense does not conform to, or that there is a truth – hidden or apparent – which is opposed by true proof.

That is why some 'ulamã', according to the knowledge they had, and with diverse tastes, tried to bring conformance between apparent senses of religion and 'irfãn, like Ibnu 'l-'Arabī, 'Abdu 'r-Razzãq al-Kãshãnī, Ibn Fahd, the Second Martyr and al-Fayḍ al-Kãshãnī; while others endeavoured to bring agreement between philosophy and 'irfãn, like Abū Naṣr al-Fãrãbī, ash-Shaykh as-Suhrawardī (the illuminist) and ash-Shaykh Ṣãinu 'd-Dīn Maḥammad Turkeh. Still others attempted to bring conformity between apparent senses of religion and philosophy, like al-Qãḍī Sa'īd and others; while a fourth group endeavoured to make all the above disciplines conform with one another, like Ibn Sīnã in his exegesis and books, and Mullã Ṣadrã in his books and tracts in addition to some later scholars.

In spite of that, the deep-rooted difference continues as before; the more attempts are made to uproot, it the deeper go the roots; the more water is thrown on this fire, the higher rise the flames.

You find that no amulet is of any benefit.

Scholars of every discipline accuse experts of other fields of ignorance, atheism, or stupidity, while the masses disavow all of them together.

This is the result of initial error when the ummah did not pay heed in the beginning to the call of the Book for joint meditation: and hold fast to the rope of Allãh and be not divided . . . (3:103)

TRADITIONS

It is reported [by as-Suyūṭī] under the verse: O People of the Book! Indeed has come to you Our Messenger making clear to you much of what you concealed of the Book . . . Ibnu 'ḍ-Ḍarīs, an-Nasã'ī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim and al-Ḥãkim (who said that it was correct) have narrated from Ibn 'Abbãs that he said, "Whoever denies stoning, he denies the Qur'ãn from whence he thinks not. Allãh has said: O People of the Book! Indeed has come to you Our Messenger making clear to you much of what you concealed of the Book. So, stoning was among what they had concealed." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: It points to what we shall write under the verse: O Messenger! Let not those grieve you who strive together . . . (5:41) that how the Jews had concealed the commandment of stoning in the days of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and how he (s.a.w.a.) exposed it.

at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī explains the words of Allãh: after a cessation of the messengers, as 'after discontinuation of the messengers'.

[al-Kulaynī narrates] through his chains from Abū Ḥamzah Thãbit ibn Dīnār ath-Thumālī and Abu 'r-Rabī‘ that he said, "We performed ḥajj with Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) in the year when Hishãm ibn ‘Abdu 'l-Malik too went for ḥajj; and there was with him Nãfi‘ mawlã (client) of ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭãb. He looked at Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) in the rukn of the Ka‘bah and people had gathered around him. Nãfi‘ said, 'O leader of the faithful! Who is it that people are pressing around him?' [Hishãm] said, 'He is the prophet of the people of Kufah; he is Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī.' [Nãfi‘] said, 'I bear witness that I shall certainly go to him and ask him about problems which no one would give me their reply except a Prophet or successor of a Prophet.' [Hishãm] said, 'Then go and ask him; perhaps you would put him to shame.'

"So Nãfi‘ came (near) until he leaned on people; then he was close to Abū Ja‘far (a.s.). Then he said, 'O Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī! I have read the Torah, the Injīl, the Zabūr and the Qur’ãn; and I have understood its lawful and its unlawful; and I have come to ask you about problems which no one would reply except a prophet or a successor of the prophet.'" [The narrator] said, "So Abū Ja‘far raised his head and said, 'Ask whatever you want to.' [Nãfi‘] said, 'Tell me how many years (had passed) between ‘Īsã and Muḥammad?' [Abū Ja‘far] said, 'Should I inform you according to my view or your view?' [Nãfi‘] said, 'Tell me according to both together.' He [Abū Ja‘far] said, 'As according to my view, five-hundred years, and as according to your view, six-hundred years.'" (al-Kãfī)

The author says: Various traditions are narrated concerning the reason of revelation of verses. For example, aṭ-Ṭabarī has narrated from ‘Ikrimah that the Jews had queried the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) about the law of stoning. So he asked who was the most knowledgeable of them; they pointed to Ibn Ṣūriyã. He [the Messenger of Allãh] adjured him by Allãh whether there was the commandment of stoning (the adulterer and adulteress) in their books. He said, "When it increased in our society, we flogged hundred (lashes) and shaved (their) heads." The Prophet sentenced them to be stoned. Then Allãh revealed: O People of the Book! Indeed has come to you Our Messenger making clear to you much of what you concealed . . . and guides them to the straight path [5:15-16].

Also he has narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said, "Ibn Ubayy, Baḥrī ibn ‘Amr and Shās ibn ‘Adiyy came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); he talked with them and they talked with him. He called them to Allāh and warned them of His punishment. So they said, 'What are you frightening us with O Muḥammad! We, by Allāh! Are the sons of Allāh and His beloved ones' – they used the words of the Christians. Then Allāh revealed about them: And the Jews and the Christians say: 'We are the sons of Allāh and his beloved ones.' Say: 'Why does He then chastise you for your sins?' . . . [5:18]"

He has also narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh invited the Jews to Islam; he excited their interest in Islam and frightened them, but they refused to listen. Then Ma‘ādh ibn Jabal, Sa‘d ibn ‘Ubādah and ‘Uqbah ibn Wahb said to them, 'O group of Jews! Fear Allāh, because, by Allāh, you certainly know that he is the Messenger of Allāh; you were telling us about him before his being sent, and describing to us his attributes.' So Rāfi‘ ibn Ḥuraymalah and Wahb ibn Yahūdā said, 'We did not tell it to you; and Allāh has not revealed any book after Mūsā, nor did he send any bringer of good news or any warner after him.' Thereupon, Allāh revealed: O People of the Book! Indeed Our Messenger has come to you explaining to you after a cessation of the messengers . . . [5:19]" as-Suyūṭī has narrated it in ad-Durru 'l-manthur from Ibn ‘Abbās and others; and has narrated other stories too.

These traditions like most of the narratives giving theoretical reasons are, in fact, mere attempts to fit some occurances on a verse, and then claiming that it was revealed for this reason. These are merely theoretical reasons; the verses most probably do have general connotation.

COMMENTARY

The verses are not without connection with the preceding ones: they show how they broke some of the covenants they had made for listening to and obeying Mūsã (a.s.). How they confronted Mūsã with open rejection of his order and how they were inflicted for the sin with the Divine punishment of wandering in wilderness.

QUR'ÃN: And when Mūsã said to his people: "O my people! Remember the favour of Allãh upon you . . ."*: The verses related to Mūsã's life show that this incident – the call of Mūsã to them to enter the holy land – had occurred after their exodus from Egypt; as the phrase: "and made you kings", in this verse too proves it.

The clause: "and gave you what He had not given any other in the worlds", shows that before that time they were favoured with several signs of divine favour, like manna and quails, gushing forth of water from stone and making the clouds to give shade over them.

The phrase: the nation of transgressors, repeated twice, shows that even before this event they were habitually opposing and disobeying the divine messenger, i.e. Mūsã, until transgression became a confirmed trait of their character.

All these aspects prove that this wandering in wilderness had occurred during the last phase of Mūsã (a.s.)'s life among them, and that most of the events described in the Qur'ãn concerning them had taken place before it.

Mūsã's words: "Remember the favour of Allãh upon you", point to the sum total of all the favours Allãh had bestowed on them. He has used it to prepare them for what he was going to command them, i.e. to enter the holy land. He reminded them of the Lord's favours, in order that they might become enthusiastic for receiving more favours and blessings. Allãh had bestowed His bounties upon them by sending Mūsã to them, guiding them to His religion, delivering them from Pharaoh, sending the Torah to them and legislating a sharī'ah. They had got almost everything; now there was only one thing to complete these favours that they should have a holy land where they would live in and rule over it independently.

Mūsã (a.s.), while enumerating the favours, divided them into three categories:

1) "He raised prophets among you": It could refer to the prophets in their direct ancestral line, i.e., Ibrãhīm, Isḥãq, Ya'qūb and those after them, or specifically to those from the Children of Israel, i.e., Yūsuf, the tribes, Mūsã and Hãrūn. Prophethood is another favour.

2) "and made you kings": The word mulūk (مُلُوك = plural of اَلْمَلِكُ = al-malik) is usually translated as "kings". Here it means: free from humiliation of Pharaohs' subjugation, independent of tyrants' oppression. He is truly a king who independently manages the affairs of his own self, his family and his property. The Israelites, at the time of Mūsã (a.s.), followed a social system that was the best of all. It was the system of monotheism which exhorted them to obey Allãh and His messenger, to enforce complete justice in society and non-aggression against other nations; they did not allow anyone of their group to acquire mastery over them; there was no such class distinction among them which could disrupt their social order. There was no one over them except Mūsã (a.s.) – and he was a prophet who did not behave like a king or a tribal chief who gains upper hand unjustly.

Someone has offered another explanation for this phrase: "made you kings"; that Allãh had decreed that there would be kings among them beginning with Ṭãlūt, then Dãwūd and going to their last king. The speech, accordingly, refers to the future and is the news of the unseen, because kingdom did not come to them except sometime after Mūsã. There is no difficulty in this explanation, except that the phrase: "and made you kings", does not agree with it. If this explanation were perfect, Allãh would have said: 'and made among you kings', as He has said: "He raised prophets among you."

Possibly, the "kingdom" could merely indicate concentration of authority in some members; it would then include the custom of sheikhdom. In this light, Mūsã too would be a king, followed by Joshua; before them Yūsuf was king; this would reach to well-known kings, Ṭãlūt, Dãwūd, Sulaymãn and others. But the above-mentioned objection applies to this explanation also.

3) "and gave you what He had not given any other in the worlds": It reminds them of the divine care and blessings that were joined with clear important signs. Those favours guaranteed that their lives would improve and straighten out if they remained firm on their words and adhered to their covenant. Those were the clear signs that surrounded them from all sides during their stay in Egypt, and after they were delivered from Pharaoh and his people. It is a fact that no nation before Mūsã's time was given so many and so continuous signs, miracles, and brilliant proofs. Israelites were the first to be blessed with such favours in their nation's life.

Accordingly, there is no reason to say (as some have done) that "the worlds" means 'worlds of that time'. The verse asserts that no nation throughout the world upto that time was blessed with so many favours as were the Israelites. And it is a fact.

QUR'ÃN: "O my people! Enter the holy land which Allãh has prescribed for you and turn not on your backs, for then you will turn back losers": Mūsã ordered them to enter the holy land; but looking at their past he knew they would not obey him. That is why he emphasized the order by forbidding them to turn on their backs and warning them of the consequences of disobedience, that they would turn losers.

The proof that he was apprehensive of their disobedience because of their past behaviour is found in his description "transgressors" used for them after their refusal to enter. Just one disobedience does not justify the use of this active participle for them; it is generally used when one repeatedly and continuously indulges in that action.

The land is described as holy. Exegetes have explained it as the land free from polytheism because prophets and believers made it their abode. There is nothing in the Qur'ãn to explain this word. Yet there are in it other expressions nearer in meaning. For example: . . . to the remote mosque of which We have blessed the precincts . . . (17:1). And We made the people who were deemed weak to inherit the East and the West of the land, which we had blessed; . . . (7:137). To bless a land means only to place in it a great good; and a part of that great good is establishment of the religion and removal of the impurity of polytheism.

The clause: "Allãh has prescribed for you", apparently means that Allãh had decreed that they would abide therein. The later coming clause: So it shall surely be forbidden to them for forty years, does not contradict it, rather it supports it, because the clause: "Allãh has prescribed for you", is general, it has left vague many details – it does not say for what time and for whom it has been assigned; it is addressed to the ummah without specifying who comes under its circle. It has been said that all the people who had been addressed and were given that order, had expired and perished in the wilderness, and it was their sons and grandsons who entered the holy land under Joshua ben Nun. In any case, the clause: So it shall surely be forbidden to them for forty years, indicates that this assignment was to take place after this period.

This prescription is seen in the verses: And We desired to bestow a favour upon those who were deemed weak in the land, and to make them the Imãms, and to make them the heirs, and to grant them power in the land (28:5-6). Mūsã (a.s.) hoped that his people would get that land provided they sought help from Allãh and were patient, as Allãh says: Mūsã said to his people: "Ask help from Allãh and be patient; surely the land is Allãh's; He causes such of His servants to inherit it as He pleases, and the end is for those who fear (Allãh)." They said: "We have been persecuted before you came to us and since you have come to us." He said: "It may be that your Lord will destroy your enemy and make you rulers in the land, then He will see how you act" (7:128-9).

And it is this promise whose fulfilment is mentioned in these words: And We made the people who were deemed weak to inherit the East and the West of the land which We had blessed; and the good word of your Lord was fulfilled in the Children of Israel because they bore up (sufferings) patiently; . . . (7:137). This verse shows that their domination over the holy land and their settlement there was a divine word; a decided fact and firm decree provided they remained patient in Allãh's obedience, in avoidence of His disobedience and in bitter happenings.

We have widened the circle of patience because the verse is unrestricted, and also because hard events were piling up over them during Mūsã's time in addition to the divine commands and prohibitions. The more they persisted in disobedience, the harder became their assignments, as may be seen in their stories mentioned in the noble Qur'ãn.

This is the apparent Qur'ãnic connotation of prescription of the holy land for them. Yet the verses are vague as to its time and extent. However, the following verses make it clear that this prescription was conditional, not unrestricted, or irrevocable: It may be that your Lord will have mercy on you, and if you again return (to disobedience) We too will return (to punishment). And We have made hell a prison for the unbelievers (17:8); [Mūsã's words in the above-mentioned verse]: "It may be that your Lord will destroy your enemy and make you rulers in the land, then He will see how you act" (7:128-9). And when Mūsã said to his people: "Call to mind Allãh's favour to you when He delivered you from Pharaoh's people . . . And when your Lord made it known: 'If you are grateful, I would certainly give you more; and if you are ungrateful, My chastisement is truly severe'" (14:6-7).

An exegete has said that the words of Mūsã: "Allãh has prescribed for you", refer to the promise Allãh had given to Ibrãhīm (a.s.); then he has quoted from the Old Testament[25] the divine

[25] The Genesis reports that when Ibrãhīm passed into the land of Canaan, the Lord appeared unto him and said: "Unto thy seed will I give this land" (Gen. 12:7); "In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram [Ibrãhīm], saying, 'Unto thy seed have I given this land from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates.'" (Gen. 15:18)

The Deuteronomy gives the following details: "The Lord our God spoke unto us in Horeb, saying, 'Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the sea side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river promises to Ibrãhīm, Isḥãq and Ya‘qūb, that He would give the land to their progeny; and has gone to some length in this topic. But keeping in view the limit we have put for our book, it is not of much concern to us to discuss it, no matter whether those promises were in the original Torah or are the handiwork of manipulators and forgerers. Certainly the Qur’ãn is not explained through the Torah.

QUR’ÃN: They said: "O Mūsã! Surely there is a strong race in it; and we will never enter it until they go out from it, so if they go out from it, then surely we will enter*: ar-Rãghib has said: "The real meaning of al-Jabr (اَلْجَبْرُ) is to restore a thing with some force. It is said: Jabartuhu fa-injabara wa ijtabara (جَبَرْتُهُ فَاِنْجَبَرَ وَاِجْتَبَرَ) 'I mended it, so it became mended and restored.'" He further says: "Sometimes al-jabr is used for restoring and mending [without connotation of force]; for example, the saying of ‘Alī (may Allãh be pleased with him): 'O who sets every broken (thing or heart), O who makes easy every difficult (situation or problem)'; in this sense they call bread Jãbir ibn ḥabbah (جَابِرْ اِبْنْ حَبَّة = 'restorer son of grain'); at other times it is used for force and compulsion only, as [the Prophet] has said: La jabra wa la tafwīḍ (لَاجَبْرَ وَلَا تَفْوِيْضُ = 'There is no compulsion nor delegation')." He goes on to say: "al-Ijbãr (to compel) actually means to make someone to restore another one, but it is commonly used for mere compulsion; the clause: 'I forced him', has the meaning of, 'I compelled him'." He has further explained: "al-Jabbãr (اَلْجَبَّارُ = tyrant, gigantic, insolent) when used for a man implies that having a defect, he tries to make it up by claiming for himself a high position which he does not deserve. It is only used in derogatory sense. Allãh says: . . . and every insolent opposer was disappointed [14:15]. . . . and He has not made me insolent, unblessed [19:32]. '. . . there is a strong race in it' (5:22)." Also he writes: "Keeping in view the idea of overwhelming by towering over one's fellows, they say: a jabbãrah (giant) date tree; a jabbãrah (colossal) she-camel."

It is now clear that "strong race" in this verse refers to the group with power and authority who compel people to obey them.

The sentence: "and we will never enter it until they go out from

Euphrates. Behold, I have set the land before you: go in and possess the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give unto them and to their seed after them.'" (Deut. 1:6-8). (Author's Note) it", makes their entering the land conditional on the exit of the strong race from it; in reality it is rejection of Mūsā's order, although they promised again to enter it if their condition was met: "so if they go out from it, them surely we will enter."

A number of traditions have been narrated describing those Amalekites, how huge were their bodies and how tall their stature, they contain such strange things as no sane person can accept; no archaeological find supports those stories, nor any physical research has found their trace. Obviously those traditions are mere forgeries, inserted in Islamic literature.

QUR'AN: Two men of those who feared, upon both of whom Allāh had bestowed a favour, said: "Enter upon them by the gate, . . . and on Allāh you should rely if you are believers": The context clearly shows that the fear means fear of Allāh; there were people who feared God and avoided disobedience of Allāh and His prophet; and these two men belonged to that group; that is why they said what they said. Moreover, they had a distinction among that group that Allāh had bestowed His favour upon them, it has been earlier mentioned in this book that when "favour" comes in the Qur'ān without any condition, it denotes divine wilāyah (اَلْوِلاَيَةُ = friendship); so, the two men were among the friends of Allāh. This in itself indicates that the above-mentioned fear refers to fear of Allāh, because friends of Allāh are not afraid of anything, they fear only Allāh. He says: Now surely the friends of Allāh – they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve (10:62).

It may possibly be said that bestowal of divine favour is related to fear; that is, Allāh had bestowed His fear upon them. In the phrase: "those who feared", object of the verb, "feared", is omitted because it is understood from the phrase: "upon both of whom Allāh had bestowed a favour", because clearly they were not afraid of the strong race, otherwise they would not have exhorted the Israelites to enter as they said: "'Enter upon them by the gate'".

Some exegetes have given a strange explanation: The phrase: "of those who feared", means: Two men from among those whom the Children of Israel feared and upon both whom Allāh had bestowed a favour by guiding them to Islam. They support it with the recital of Ibn Jubayr, who read, yukhāfūn (يُخَافُونَ in passive case; meaning: they were feared). They say: Two men from the Amalekites had believed in Mūsā (a.s.) and joined the Children of Israel, then they advised them as described in the verse, showing the way to vanquish Amalekites and capture their towns and land.

This explanation is based on some explanatory traditions; but they are solitary narratives, and are not supported by the Qur'ãn, etc.

"Enter upon them by the gate": "Gate" may refer to the first town of that strong race, nearest to the Israelites; reportedly, it was called Ariḥã', such usage is not uncommon. Or it may refer to the gate of the town.

"for when you have entered it you shall surely be victorious": It was their promise to the Israelites for victory over the enemy. They gave such a definite promise, as they had full faith in Mūsã (a.s.) who had said that Allãh had prescribed the holy land for them – because they knew that his statements were true. Or, probably they knew about this victory through the light of divine friendship.

Most of the Shī'ah and Sunnī exegetes have written that the two men were Joshua ben Nun and Caleb ben Yuqina, and that they were among the twelve chiefs of the Israelites.

Then the two men invited them to rely on Allãh: "and on Allãh should you rely if you are believers", because Allãh is sufficient for him who relies on Him; the call was meant to set their minds at rest and give them encouragement.

QUR'ÃN: They said: "O Mūsã! We shall never enter it at all so long as they remain therein; go therefore you and your Lord, then fight you both, surely we will here sit down"*: They repeated their refusal, "We shall never enter it", in order to make Mūsã (a.s.) lose all hope of their compliance, so that he should not go on telling them to enter.

This speech is full of derision, insult and contempt for Mūsã (a.s.) and the divine order and promise that he had conveyed to them. The sentences are set in an amazing way: They totally ignored the advice of the two men who had told them to obey Mūsã (a.s.)'s order, as if they did not deserve any reply; then they told off Mūsã (a.s.) in a few words after they had talked with him in the beginning to some length and given him their reason, etc. Resorting in argumentation to brevity after lengthy talk indicates that the speaker is tired of talking with his opposite party and does not like to hear his voice any more. Then they emphasized the repeated refusal, "We shall never enter it", with the word, "at all"; then their stupidity emboldened them to commit the most improper folly when they told Mūsã (a.s.): "go therefore you and your Lord, then fight you both, surely we will here sit down."

This speech very clearly proves that they thought, like Idol-worshippers, that God had a body like His creatures. And they were like this, for Allāh quotes them as saying: And We made the Children of Israel to pass the sea; then they came upon a people who kept to the worship of their idols. They said: "O Mūsā! Make for us a god as they have (their) gods." He said: "Surely you are a people acting ignorantly" (7:138). To this day they have continued to believe in anthropomorphization and embodiment of God, as their books clearly show.

QUR'ĀN: He said: "My Lord! Surely I have no control (upon any) but my own self and (so does) my brother; therefore make a separation between us and the nation of transgressors": The context shows that the clause: "Surely I have no control (upon any) but my own self and (so does) my brother", is an indirect declaration that he cannot make anyone accept his call except his own self and his brother. Obviously he could himself follow the divine command and call his brother, Hārūn (a.s.), to do so; his brother was, after all, a messenger prophet and was his successor in his life, he could not go against the divine commands. Another meaning: Mūsā (a.s.) had no control except on his own self, and likewise his brother had no control except on himself.

Mūsā (a.s.) did not mean that he had no power at all even in making someone to listen to his invitation to belief. Such an explanation does not agree with the context: Certainly there were the two men who feared and many others who believed in him and had accepted his call. What we should ponder upon is the fact that he had not included even his and his brother's families in the people under his control, while obviously they were not disobedient to him in any way.

This mystery is solved when we look at the context and the situation. Mūsā (a.s.) had called his people to a legitimate responsibility; he put all his efforts in it; but the Israeli society rejected his call in a very ignominious and repulsive manner. This situation demanded that he should say to Allāh: 'O my Lord! I diligently conveyed your message to them, but in this affair I have no control on anyone except my own self, and so does my brother; we have discharged the responsibility put on our shoulders; but these people confronted us with total refusal. Now, we have lost hope concerning them and our path is blocked. Now, we pray to You to open this knot and with Your Lordship, pave the way for them to get your complete favour, that they may inherit the land and be made successors in it. O Lord! Decide and judge between these transgressors and us.'

They had in past disobeyed Mūsã (a.s.) on many occasions: in their demand to see the Lord, in worship of the calf, in entering the door saying ḥiṭṭah, etc. But this time they transgressed all limits; they openly rejected Mūsã (a.s.)'s call in a very rude manner. If Mūsã had left them in their insolence, and remained silent on their flaunting his order, it would have been the end of his prophetic call; his orders and prohibitions would have lost their value and the society would have disintegrated, losing the unity which Mūsã (a.s.) had established with so much trouble.

The above statement shows that:

First: The situation demanded that Mūsã (a.s.) should mention his own condition and that of his brother while complaining to Allãh, because these two were the conveyors of the divine message, and should not refer to other believers' condition (even though they were not insubordinate), because the others had no concern with tablīgh and mission. The context required description of the conveyor of the order, not of those who accepted the call, followed, and obeyed the divine commandment.

Second: The situation also demanded that Mūsã (a.s.) should turn to his Lord with this complaint, which in reality was a call to Allãh to help him in enforcement of His command.

Third: The clause, "and my brother", is in conjunction with "I" in, "Surely I have no control", The meaning thus will be as follows: and my brother too, like me, has no control except on his own self. It is not in conjunction with, "my own self", which would imply that he had no control except on himself and on his brother, because it would not agree with context, although both connotations are correct in themselves. Mūsã and Hãrūn (a.s.) both had control on their own selves in obedience and compliance, and Mūsã (a.s.) had control on Hãrūn (a.s.) that he would obey him (Mūsã), because he was Mūsã (a.s.)'s successor in his life; likewise, both had control on sincere believers that they would listen to, and obey them.

Fourth: The sentence: 'therefore make a separation between us and the nation of transgressors." Mūsã (a.s.) does not invoke God against the Children of Israel that He should enforce on them His final judgement by sending punishment on them, or by separating Mūsã and Hãrūn (a.s.) from them (by removing them from there or by giving death to both brothers); Mūsã (a.s.) was calling them to what Allãh had prescribed for them with completion of favour, and it was through him that Allãh bestowed His blessings on the Israelites by delivering them and making them successors in land – all on his hands, as Allãh says: And We desired to bestow a favour upon those who were deemed weak in the land, and to make them the Imãms, and to make them the heirs (28:5). Also the Israelites were aware of the role of Mūsã in their lives, as Allãh quotes them as saying: They said: "We have been persecuted before you came to us and since you have come to us." He said: "It may be that your Lord will destroy your enemy and make you rulers in the land, then He will see how you act" (7:129).

Another evidence may be found in the divine advice to Mūsã (a.s.): therefore do not grieve for the nation of transgressors (5:26). It shows that Mūsã (a.s.) was afraid of divine punishment overtaking them, and not unexpectedly he would grieve for them when they were encircled in the wilderness.

QUR'ĀN: He said: "So it shall surely be forbidden to them for forty years, they shall wander about in the land, therefore do not grieve for the nation of transgressors.": The pronoun, "it", refer to the holy land. The forbidding implies divine creative decree to that effect; at-tīh (اَلتِّيه = wondering, wilderness); "in the land": "the" here refers to the land where they were at that time; "do not grieve": Mūsã (a.s.) is advised not to be sorry for them. Allãh has confirmed here Mūsã (a.s.)'s description of his people as "transgressors".

Meaning: The holy land, i.e., entering and capturing it is forbidden to them, i.e., We have decreed that they would not be able to enter it for forty years; they will wander in the land all those years – neither will they be 'civilized' and dwell in a town, nor will they be 'bedouines' living a life of desert-dwellers; do not grieve for the nation of transgressors because of this chastisement, because they are transgressors, one should not be sorry for them when they are inflicted with retribution of their deeds.

TRADITIONS

Ibn Abī Ḥãtim has narrated from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: "The Children of Israel, if one of them had a servant, a riding animal and a woman he was written a king." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Abū Dāwūd has narrated in his marāsīl[26] from Zayd ibn Aslam, in explanation of: and made you kings, that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: "A wife, house and servant." (ibid.)

The author says: [as-Suyūṭī] has narrated other traditions too of the same theme. But the verse's context does not agree with this explanation. Although it was possible that the Israelites used to call everyone having a house, woman and servant a king, or write him as king, yet obviously not all of them (even their servants!) fulfilled this condition and had houses, women and servants. Certainly, only some of them were of that status, as is the case in other nations and generations; acquiring house, wives and servants is a worldwide custom and no nation is without houses, wives, and servents. Therefore, it was not something particularly bestowed on the Children of Israel, so that Allāh should count it as a special favour to them that He made them kings – and the verse counts His special favours.

Probably awareness to this defect has led some narrators to say – as is narrated by Qatādah – that the Israelites were first to have servants! But history does not agree with it.

al-Mufīd narrates through his chains through Abū Ḥamzah from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: "When Mūsā arrived with them near the holy land, he told them: 'Enter the holy land which Allāh has prescribed for you and turn not on your backs, for then you will turn back losers.' And Allāh had certainly prescribed it for them. They said: 'Surely there is a strong race in it, and we will never enter it until they go out from it, so if they go out from it, then surely we will enter.' Two men of those who feared, upon both of whom Allāh had bestowed a favour, said: 'Enter upon them by the gate, for when you have entered it you shall surely be victorious, and on Allāh you should rely if you are believers.' They said: 'O Mūsā! We shall never enter it at all so long as they remain therein; go therefore you and your Lord, then fight you both, surely we will here sit down.' He said: 'My Lord! Surely I have no control (upon any) but my own self and (so does) my brother; therefore make a separation between us and the nation of transgressors.' So, when they refused to enter it Allāh made it forbidden to them, and they kept wandering within about four parasang for forty years, wandering in the land; therefore do not grieve for the nation of transgressors."

[26] Marāsīl is the plural of mursal [i.e.] al-Aḥādīthu 'l-Mursalah means the traditions which one relates as on the authority of a tābi'ī (one next in the order of time after the ṣaḥābah) by tracing up the ascription thereof uninterruptedly to him; when the tābi'ī says, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, . . ." without mentioning a ṣaḥābī who heard it from the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). (ed.)

Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) said: "When evening came, their crier called: 'Departure', so they set out with chantings and songs; until came the dawn, and Allāh ordered the land to turn round with them, and in the morning they found themselves in the place which they had started from, then they said (to one another): 'Certainly you lost the way.' They remained in this (punishment) for forty years; and manna and quails were sent down to them; until all of them had died except two persons, Joshua son of Nun and Caleb son of Yuqina as well as the children of the (first generation). They kept wandering within about four parasang. When they wanted to go from there, their clothes and socks dried up upon them." He said: "They had with them a rock; when they came down, Mūsā hit on it with his staff and there gushed out twelve streams from it, one stream for each tribe; and when they departed, the water returned to the rock and it was put on an animal . . . " (al-Amālī, al-Mufīd)

The Author says: There are so many traditions of nearly the same meaning narrated through Shīʻah and Sunnī chains. The words, "Abū ʻAbdillāh said", indicate beginning of another tradition.

Although these traditions give such details about the wandering and other matters that are not expressly supported by the verses, yet they do not contain anything, which might be considered against the Book. Actually the affairs of Israelites in the time of Mūsā (a.s.) were amazing, and their life was surrounded on all sides by supernatural happenings; therefore, there is nothing wrong if their wandering had the features mentioned in the traditions.

Masʻadah ibn Ṣadaqah narrates from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he was asked about the words: enter the holy land which Allāh has prescribed for you; he said. "He wrote it for them, then erased it, then wrote it for their children; so they (the children) entered it; Allāh erases what He pleases, and establishes (likewise), and with Him is the basis of the Book [13:39]." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

The Author says: This theme has been narrated also by Ismāʻīl al-Juʻfī from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), and by Zurārah, Ḥumrān and Muḥammad ibn Muslim from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.). The Imām (a.s.) has looked at the generation which received from Mūsā (a.s.) the order to enter the land with assurance that it was prescribed for them and at the generation which actually entered it; this resulted in al-badã' regarding the generation prescribed for. It does not go against the apparent context of the verse, which shows that those who were prescribed for had entered the land; it was forbidden to them for forty years, then they entered it. In fact, the order was given to the Israeli society collectively; thus the same people entered it for whom it was prescribed, because all were one nation and one society. It was prescribed to that society to enter, then it was forbidden for a time, then they succeeded in entering. In this light, there was no badã', although looking at the particular people there certainly was badã'.

[al-Kulaynī] has narrated through his chains from ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥmãn ibn Yazīd that Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), said: 'The Prophet Dãwūd died on Saturday morning, so the birds overshadowed him with their wings, and Mūsã Kalīmullãh died in wilderness, so a crier announced from the sky: "Mūsã has died, and which soul would not die?"'" (al-Kãfī)

The verses describe the story of the two sons of Adam, and make it clear that envy sometimes drives son of Adam to a stage where he slays his brother unjustly, then he becomes a loser and he regrets when no remorse can do any good. In this sense, the verses are conjoined with preceding ones, which describe how the Children of Israel had an aversion to believing in the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.); their rejection of the true call had no reason except envy and transgression. Thus does envy pushes man to slaughter of his brother, then throws him in a remorse and regret from which he can never be free; so they should take lesson from this story, and should not persist so much in envy and then disbelief.

QUR'ÃN: And relate to them the story of the two sons of Adam with truth . . . "Allãh only accepts from those who are pious: Watlu (وَاتْلُ = translated here as: "And relate") has its root in at-tilãwah (اَلتِلاَوَة = to read, to recite), which in its turn is derived from at-tulūw (اَلتُّلُو = to follow); because a relater describes a news or story in stages one after another; an-nabã' (اَلنَبَاء = news which has some benefit); al-qurbãn (اَلْقُرْبَانُ = offering with which one wants to come nearer to God or someone else), it is an infinitive verb/grund, it has no dual or plural form; at-taqabbul (اَلتَقَبُّلْ = to accept with more care accorded to the accepted thing). The pronoun, "them", (in, "relate to them") refers to the People of the Book, because the speech concerns them.

"Adam" refers to the same person whom Qur'ãn introduces as the progenitor of the mankind. An exegete has said, "It refers to an Israelite who had two sons who quarrelled regarding an offering, and one of them, called Qãbīl (Cain), killed Hãbil (Abel); and that is why Allãh says at the end of the story: For this reason did We prescribe to the Children of Israel . . ." But it is wrong, because:

First: Qur'ãn has nowhere mentioned any other Adam except the one who was the progenitor of mankind. If someone else were the subject of this verse, it was necessary to place here some indication, in order to remove any confusion.

Second: Some details of the story, e.g., sending of a crow, conforms with the condition of the primitive man who possessed simple thoughts and unelaborate perceptions, who gradually went on accumulating informations through experiences which he got from incident to incident. The verse clearly shows that the killer did not even know that a dead body could be covered in the earth. Obviously, this characteristic fits on the son of Adam, the progenitor of mankind, not on a person from the Children of Israel, who were civilized, advanced, and nationally refined in culture; and such matters could not be unknown to them.

Third: This exegete, by saying that "and that is why Allãh says at the end of the story*: For this reason did We prescribe to the Children* of Israel", wants to reply to a question levelled against the verse. That question says: "Why the said prescription was reserved particularly to the Children of Israel, while the moral of the story covers the whole humanity – that whoever kills a person it is as though he killed all men, and whoever kept alive one person it is as though he kept alive all men."

So the said exegete tried to reply that the killer and the killed were not sons of Adam who was progenitor of mankind, and this story was not among the initial events taking place at the dawn of humanity, so that it could provide a lesson to all succeeding generations. Rather this event had concerned two sons of an Israelite, and the story describes an Israeli incident, which had a particularly national character; and that is why its lesson was especially confined to the Children of Israel.

However, this reply does not settle the argument; the question even now remains unanswered. The principle that killing one man is tantamount to killing all men and keeping one person alive is like keeping all men alive, is applicable to all killings taking place in human species; it is not reserved to any particular killing; and innumerable murders had taken place before the era of Israelites and even in Israelites before the one mentioned in this verse. Then why was this principle enunciated from this particular murder? And why was it confined to a particular nation?

Moreover, if the matter were as he says, it was better to say, . . . that whoever "among you" slays a soul, so that it would have been reserved for them, and in that case the same question would arise as to that reservation; and the notion in itself was not sound.

The reply to original question is as follows: The words: whoever slays a soul . . . it is as though he slew all men; and whoever keeps it alive, it is as though he kept alive all men, do not enact a legislative order; they enunciate a deep principle. Therefore, the prescription to the Children of Israel denotes that this principle was explained to them, although its benefit was comprehensive and covered Israelites and non-Israelites both. It is not unlike the admonitions and wisdom the Qur'ãn explains to the ummah of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) although their benefits are not confined to it.

Why does this verse say that this maxim was prescribed to the Israelites? It is because the verses are concerned with admonishing them, reminding them and rebuking them for their envy and jealousy against the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); their intense hatred of the Prophet led them to fanning the fire of mischief, instigating others to fight the Muslims and active participation in many such wars. That is why this speech is followed by the words: and certainly Our messengers came to them with clear proofs, but even after that many of them certainly act extravagantly in the land.

Add to all this fact that the story as mentioned by that exegete has no basis at all – neither in tradition nor in history.

Now, it is clear that "the story of the two sons of Adam" is related to the sons of that Adam who was the Father of mankind. The clause: "with truth" is related either to "the story" or to "relate"; in either case it is a notice or declaration that the story as was prevalent in their society was not free from distortion and omission. Actually the story as presented in the Genesis (ch.4) does not mention the event of the crow and its digging up the earth; also it clearly presents God as having a body – Far exalted be He from such things!

The context of the clause: "when they both offered an offering, but it was accepted from one of them and was not accepted from the other", obviously shows that each of the two had offered an offering to Allãh; but the word, al-qurbãn (اَلْقُرْبَانُ = offering) was used in singular number, because, as mentioned earlier, it being a maṣdar, does not accept dual or plural form.

The clauses: "He said: 'I will most certainly slay you.' He (the other) said: 'Allãh only accepts from those who are pious.'" The first speaker is the killer and the second, the killed one. It shows that they both knew that the offering of one was accepted and of the other rejected. But the verse does not say as to how they came to know it or which evidence led them to that deduction.

However, the Qur'ãn in another place mentions that among the ancient nations, or particularly among the Israelites, customarily the acceptance of an offering was known through its consumption by fire. Allãh says: (Those are they) who said: "Surely Allãh has enjoined us that we should not believe in any messenger until he brings us an offering which the fire consumes." Say: "Indeed, there came to you messengers before me with clear proofs and with that which you said; why then did you kill them if you are truthful?" (3:183).

Offerings are well known among the People of the Book till today.[27] Possibly in this case too the same method was used to indicate the offering's acceptance – especially keeping in view that the story was narrated to the People of the Book who believed in that method. Be it as it may, the killer and his victim both knew that the one's offering was accepted and that of the other rejected.

Obviously, the one who said, "'I will most certainly slay you,'" was that brother whose offering was not accepted; and he thus spoke only because of envy and jealousy, as there was no other reason, nor the victim had committed any crime by his own will and power so that he should be confronted with such talk and threatened to be murdered.

The killer threatened: "'I will most certainly slay you,'" merely because of envy that the victim's offering was accepted and the killer's rejected. The victim replied: "'Allãh only accepts from those who are pious. If you will stretch forth your hand towards me to slay me, I am not one to stretch forth my hand towards you to slay you; surely I fear Allãh, the Lord of the worlds.'" By this reply he made it clear that:

First: He (the victim) had nothing to do with the acceptance or non-acceptance of any offering, nor had he committed any crime. If anyone was to be blamed, it was the killer who did not fear Allãh, and consequently Allãh refused to accept his offering.

Second: If the killer wanted to kill him and stretched his hand toward the victim for that purpose, the victim was not going to stretch his hand towards him with intention of killing him. Why? Because of his piety and fear of Allãh. In this situation, the killer would return (in the next world) with the victim's sin and his own, so that he would be among the inmates of the Fire, and that is the recompense of the unjust.

"Allãh only accepts from those who are pious." It asserts that acceptance is reserved only for the offering of the pious – it excludes that of unpious. Or, perhaps the killer arrogantly or ignorantly was thinking that his own offering would be accepted and that of the victim rejected – thinking that it does not depend on piety; or that Allãh did not know the real position and probably He would be confused as human beings become sometimes; therefore it was established that the killer's offering was not acceptable at all.

This episode contains many important principles: It describes how and when acts of worship and offerings are accepted; admonishes about murder, injustice and envy emphasizing their seriousness;

the bread and wine taken at the Eucharist, which according to their belief, really turns into Christ's flesh and blood. (Author's Note) confirms the system of divine retribution and shows that it is an integral part of the Lordship of the Lord of the worlds, for, Lordship cannot be complete without a well organized system interlinking various parts of the world, which would lead to just evaluation of deeds, and would recompense injustice with painful chastisement; so that the oppressor should desist from oppression, or should receive the retribution which he had arranged for himself, and that is the Fire.

QUR'ĀN: "If you will stretch forth your hand towards me to slay me, I am not one to stretch my hand towards you to slay you; surely I fear Allāh, the Lord of the worlds: The preposition, "l" (ل) in lain (لَئِنْ = if) is for oath; stretching forth the hand alludes to preparing for murder and making its arrangements; the reply to this conditional clause begins with a negative connected to a nominal clause: "not one to stretch my hand" – in original Arabic, it is not a verb but an adjective, the negative is strengthened with 'bi' (بِ) and the whole speech with the earlier mentioned oath. All these devices were used to show that the victim was far-removed from intention of killing his brother; such thought had never come to his mind.

This claim of his innocence is emphasized by the clause: "'surely I fear Allāh, the Lord of the worlds.'" When the pious ones, those who fear Allāh, remember their Lord, Allāh, the Lord of the worlds, Who, they know, recompenses every sin with its prescribed punishment, the fear of Allāh is awakened in them, and it does not allow them to commit any injustice which would throw them into perdition.

Then comes the reality of this sentence: "'If you will stretch forth your hand towards me . . .'", and its true interpretation. In short, the events had reached a point where the victim had only two alternatives before him: Either he should kill his brother or his brother kills him; if he opts for the first alternative then he would become unjust oppressor, would carry sins of both on his shoulders and would enter the Fire; if on the other hand his unjust brother kills him all the above consequences would come to that brother. Obviously, the victim did not opt for the first alternative because in that case his own felicity would be jeopardized; he rather opted for the second alternative – that his unjust brother should suffer infelicity by killing him while he himself attains felicity without being unjust or oppressor. Thus, in the clause: "'Surely I wish that you should bear my sin . . .'", the word, "wish", denotes option in case of there being two alternatives.

This verse gives the interpretation of the clause: "'If you will stretch forth your hand . . .'" in the same way as had happened in the story of Mūsã (a.s.) and his companion when the latter had killed a boy they had met; Mūsã (a.s.) objected saying: "Have you slain an innocent person otherwise than for manslaughter? Certainly you have done a horrible thing" (18:74). His companion later gave him its interpretation in these words: "And as for the boy, his parents were believers and we feared lest he should oppress them by disobedience (to them) and disbelief (in God). So we desired that their Lord might give them in his place one better than him in purity and nearer to having compassion" (18:80-81).

Likewise, in this case, the victim "wished" i.e. he opted for death joined with his felicity even if it resulted in his brother's infelicity as he had wrongly preferred life joined with infelicity which pushed him into the band of oppressors; exactly as the companion of Mūsã (a.s.) preferred the boy's death in felicity (although it would cause grief and sorrow to his parents) over his continued life which would make him oppressor and disbeliever who would go astray and lead his parents into error; and he desired that Allãh would give them in his place another boy better than him in purity and nearer to having compassion.

The son of Adam who was murdered was pious and God fearing and had gnosis of Allãh. His piety is shown in his reply: "'Allãh only accepts from those who are pious.'" It contains the claim of his own piety, and Allãh has quoted it without rebutting it. As for his knowledge and gnosis, it is inferred from his speech, "'surely I fear Allãh, the Lord of the worlds.'" Here he openly claims that he feared God, and Allãh has again quoted him without rebuttal; and Allãh says in another place: . . . verily fear Allãh only those of His servants endued with knowledge . . . (35:28). So when Allãh endorsed his claim that he feared Allãh, it was as though He also confirmed that he was a man of knowledge, as He has also portrayed the Mūsã (a.s.)'s companion as a knowledgeable person and said: . . . and whom We had taught knowledge from Ourselves (18:65). The victim's talk with his unjust brother is enough to show the extent of his knowledge; you will find in it deep sagacity, wisdom and good sermon. He showed with his clean disposition and pure nature that human race was bound to multiply, and their bands would contain individuals of diverse characters, some would be pious, others unjust and transgressors. However, there is one Lord Who is their Owner and the Owner of all the worlds and He manages their affairs. It is an aspect of His perfect management that He likes and loves justice and beneficence, dislikes and hates injustice and transgression. It follows that man must fear God and acquire piety – and this is religion. There are acts of obedience that bring man nearer to God, as there are acts of disobedience and injustice. Obedience is accepted when it springs from piety. Disobedience and injustice are sins the burden of which lies on the shoulders of the sinner. All this makes it clear that there should be another life – the resurrection – where everyone would be recompensed for his deeds, and the recompense of unjust and oppressors is the Fire.

As you see, these are the roots of the religious gnosis, confluence of the knowledge of genesis and resurrection, which this good servant of Allāh explained to his foolish brother who did not even know that a thing could be hidden from people by burying it in the earth – until he learned it from the crow. The victim, however, did not say to his threatening brother: If you want to kill me I'll throw myself before you without defending myself or repulsing your attack; he had only said: "I am not going to kill you." Nor did he say: 'I wish to be killed by you anyhow, so that you will become an oppressor and will go to the Fire.' To cause someone to go astray and fall into disgrace is in itself an injustice and error; and it is the verdict of natural law, not confined to one sharī'ah or the other. He only said: "If you stretch forth your hand towards me to kill me, I shall accept it and opt for it."

Keep in mind this fine point; and then listen to this objection on this event: No doubt the killer went beyond the limit through his oppression and transgression; but the victim too fell short in his duty by not standing up to the killer and by accepting the oppression; instead of boldly facing the adversary and defending himself, he meekly submitted to the killer and said: "'If you will stretch forth your hand towards me to slay me, I am not one to stretch forth my hand towards you to slay you; . . .'"

You will realize that this objection is baseless. He had not said, 'I shall not defend myself and shall let you do whatever you want to do with me;' he had only said, "I do not wish to kill you." The verse does not say that he was killed and knowingly did not defend himself. May be, he was waylaid or ambushed, or was killed while defending or protecting himself.

Someone has looked at this episode in a wrong perspective, saying: The victim intended to give his brother power over himself, so that he would kill him, and thus fall into eternal perdition, while he

(the victim) would get felicity and bliss, as he himself had said: "Surely I wish that you should bear my sin as well as your sin, and so you would be of the inmates of the Fire." As in these days, some ascetics think that they should adhere to their acts of worship and denial of self; if someone oppresses him or does injustice to him, that unjust oppressor would himself bear the burden of his oppression and injustice, and the victim should not stand up to defend his right, rather he should bear it patiently hoping to get its reward from God. But it is nothing but stupidity, because it is helping the sinner in his sin, and it makes both the helper and the helped partners in sin, so it will not make the oppressor to bear the burden of sins of both alone.

However, the explanation we have written above, of the words: "Surely I wish that you should bear my sin as well as your sin, . . ." clarifies this objection.

Some people have replied to the above-mentioned two objections with some absurd answers; there is no benefit in mentioning them.

QUR'ĀN: "Surely I wish that you should bear my sin as well as your own sin, and so you would be of the inmates of the Fire, . . .": Tabūa (تَبُوءَ) translated here as "bear", literally means, stay; i.e. you should stay with my sin. ar-Rāghib has written in his Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān: "al-Bawā' (اَلْبَوَاء) actually means equality of parts in a place, in contrast to an-nabwah (اَلنَبْوَة) i.e. disagreement of parts; they say: a bawwā' (بَوَّاءُ = agreeable) place, when it is not repulsive; also they say: 'I bawwa'tu lahu (بَوَّأْتُ لَهُ = prepared for him) a place . . .' And the Qu'ān says: 'Surely I wish that you should bear with my sin as well as your own sin'; a poet has said:

" 'I rejected her falsity and stayed with her right.'"

Therefore, its explanation with "return" looks at its inseparable connotation.

The clause: "'that you should bear my sin as well as your sin,'" denotes that the sin of unjustly murdered person is transferred to his killer, thus he shall bear two sins while the victim will come to Allāh without any sin in his account. This is the apparent meaning of this clause and traditions support it; also reason justifies it. This topic has been discussed to a certain extent in the second volume of this book.[28]

Objection: This theory compels us to admit that a person may be held responsible for another man's sin; but reason rejects it, and Allāh has said: That no bearer of burden shall bear the burden of another (53:38).

Reply: This matter is not within the purview of theoretical wisdom (so that reason could declare that it was impossible); rather it is within the jurisdiction of practical wisdom that follows the changing pattern of human social order and its exigencies. It is quite in order if the society lays the burden of one person's deed on another person, and considers the latter responsible for it; or if it decides that the deed done by a man was not done by him. For example, someone kills a man and the society had some rights upon the murdered man; now the society is justified in demanding those due rights from the killer. Likewise, if someone rebels against the society and creates disturbance in law, order, and mischief in the land, then the society has the right to consider all his good points as if they did not exist at all. And so on.

In the above-mentioned examples, the society looks at the bad deeds of the oppressed and puts them in the account of the oppressor. At this juncture, that bearer of burden bears the burden of the deeds which are now assigned to him – now it is not someone else's load; it is now transferred to his account because he had committed injustice to his victim, and in lieu of that injustice the victim's bad deeds have come to his door. It is not unlike a business transaction when the seller gives the goods to the buyer and accepts a price in its place; now the new owner of the goods uses it as he likes, and nobody would object to it simply because at one time it had belonged to someone else – because now the previous ownership has ceased. In the same way, the verse: That no bearer of burden shall bear the burden of another, cannot prevent the killer being charged with sins that were committed by the murdered man in his life, because now they have been transferred to the killer's account, and the previous responsibility of the murdered man is no more operative. It does not mean that the verse: That no bearer of burden . . ., has lost its validity or effect because a new reason has caused its transfer to a new doer; it is like the ḥadīth, "A Muslim's property is not lawful to another except with his pleasure"; if the previous owner sells the property, he will lose all rights in it as his rights have been transferred. But no one can say that the above-mentioned ḥadīth has lost its validity or effect.

An exegete has written: The words: my sin as well as your own sin, mean 'the sin of my murder if you did it, and your sins which you had previously committed.' It is narrated from Ibn Mas‘ūd, Ibn ‘Abbãs and others. Another interpretation: 'the sin of my murder and your previous sin because of which your offering was not accepted.' It has been narrated from al-Jubbã’ī and az-Zajjãj. A third explanation: 'the sin of my murder and your sin of slaying the whole mankind.' It has been narrated from others.

But all these interpretations are devoid of support from the wordings of the Qur’ãn, and reason too does not agree with them. Moreover, if any of these interpretations were correct, there was no reason to put both sins side by side – when both were committed by the killer – and then ascribe one to the victim and the other to the killer.

QUR’ÃN: Then his mind facilitated to him the slaying of his brother, so he slew him; then he became one of the losers: ar-Rãghib says in his Mufradãtu 'l-Qur’ãn: "aṭ-Ṭaw‘ (اَلطَّوْعُ) means obedience; its oppo-site is al-kurh (اَلْكُرْهُ = dislike). aṭ-Ṭã‘ah (اَلطَّاعَةُ) is synonymous to aṭ-ṭaw‘, but it is mostly used for obeying an order and displaying a draw-ing. The [Qur’ãnic] clause, fa-ṭawwa‘at lahu nafsuhu, means his mind allowed him and seduced him; ṭawwa‘at [طَوَّعَتْ, used in the verse] is more appropriate here than simple aṭã‘at (أَطَاعَتْ = obeyed); the Qur’ãnic clause is opposite to ta’abbat ‘an kadhã nafsuhu (تَأَبَّتْ عَنْ كَذَا نَفْسُهُ = his mind declined it)."

It does not mean that ṭawwa‘at includes the connotation of obedience and seduction. It actually means that at-taṭwī‘ (اَلتَّطْوِيْعُ = maṣdar of ṭawwa‘at) indicates graduality, while al-iṭã‘ah (اَلإِطَاعَةُ) indicates promptness, and it is the usual difference between the stems of if‘ãl and taf‘īl. Ṭawwa‘at, used in the verse, therefore, implies that he was gradually pushed towards that deed through insinuations and temptations coming successively one after another, until he submitted to it and obeyed. Meaning: His mind submitted to that evil plan and he gradually succumbed to the temptation to kill his brother. The phrase: "slaying of his brother", stands for "the order of slaying of his brother".

Sometimes it is said that ṭawwa‘at here means, 'made attractive'; in that case, slaying of his brother will be its object – that is, his mind made slaying of his brother attractive to him. Another explanation: ṭawwa‘at means 'his mind acceded to him in slaying of his brother'; in this case qatla (قَتْلَ) is given the vowel a in place of i because the preposition, fī (فِى = in) has been omitted.

Someone has inferred from the phrase: fa-aṣbaḥa (فَأَصْبَحَ = became one of the losers) that he had slayed his brother at night [because aṣbaḥa (أَصْبَحَ) literally means entered upon morning]. But this is not correct, because although literally it gives this meaning, but Arabs generally use it in the meaning of "became" without looking at its root or time. Even in the Qur'ān there are several sentences where time factor is not relevant at all. For example: . . . so by His favour you became brethren; . . . (3:103). . . . so that they shall be regretting on account of what they hid in their souls (5:52). Hence there is no way of taking the above phrase in its literal sense.

QUR'ĀN: Then Allāh sent a crow digging up the earth so that he might show him how he should cover the dead body of his brother . . .: al-Baḥth (اَلْبَحْثُ = means searching for something in the earth; then it is said: 'I thoroughly searched' [i.e. made research] about this matter. This meaning is given in Majma'u 'l-bayan. al-Muwārāt (اَلْمُوَارَاة = to hide); from this root come at-tawārī (اَلتَّوَارِى = to hide oneself) and al-warā' (اَلْوَرَاء = behind). as-Saw'ah (اَلسَوْأَة = what makes one annoyed, displeased); al-wayl (اَلْوَيْلُ = woe, perdition), ya waylata (يَاوَيْلَتَا = exclamatory expression used for disaster, perilous situation); al-'ajz (اَلْعَجْزُ = weakness; opposite of power).

The context shows that the killer had spent a considerable time in bewilderment and perplexity; while he was wary lest others come to know of his deed; he could not understand what device to use in order to hide the dead body of his brother; this continued until Allāh sent the crow. If the sending of the crow and his digging the earth had occurred close together with his slaying of his brother, he would not have lamented in these words: "'Woe me! Do I lack the strength that I should be like this crow and cover the dead body of my brother?'"

Also it appears from the context that the crow had buried something in the earth after digging it; clearly it wanted to demonstrate the method of burial, not the way of digging. Mere digging could not teach him how to bury the dead body, because he was so simple minded that he did not understand the purpose of digging; how could he go ahead from digging to burial as the two things are not concomitant. His mind perceived the method of burial when he saw the crow digging the earth and burying something in it.

Among the birds, the crow has a habit of storing for future use a part of what he obtains through preying [or lifting away] by burying it in the earth. Although other birds which feed on grain, etc. sometimes dig the earth, but their purpose is to find out things like grain and worms, not to bury and store.

The pronoun, "he" in "so that he might show him", stands for the crow, as it is the nearest noun. Some people have claimed that it refers to "Allãh"; this too may be correct, but it seems a bit far-fetched; however, meaning is correct in both cases.

The words: "He said: 'Woe me! Do I lack the strength that I should be like this crow'", were uttered by the killer when he realized how easy was the method used by the crow to bury something. He found that he too was able to do as the crow had done and bury the dead body – now he had seen the connection between digging and burial. Then he felt remorse for not thinking about it himself, so that he could understand that digging the earth was the easiest means of hiding the body. So he expressed his regret: "'Woe me! Do I lack the strength that I should be like this crow and cover the dead body of my brother?'" It was a sort of a soliloquy between him and his mind in the style of a question implying negation. It is as though he was questioned – implying negation: 'Did you lack the strength to be like this crow and cover the dead body of your brother?' The reply would be: 'No.' Then he would be asked second question in the same style: 'Then why did you remain oblivious to it? Why did you not resort to this method although it was so obvious, and put yourself in such trouble without any reason for such a long period?' There was no answer to it. And this caused the remorse. Remorse is a psychological emotion, a mental agony that particularly affects a human being when he realizes that he has neglected some means, which have led to loss of a benefit or appearance of a loss. You may say that it is a feeling that affects man when he remembers that he has neglected making use of a possibility.

This is the condition of man, when he commits an injustice or oppression, which he does not want people to know about. Such deeds and behaviour are not acceptable to the society with its well-laid system whose parts are interlinked. The effects of such anti-social deeds are bound to appear before public eyes, even if they remain hidden in the beginning. The unjust criminal wants to compel the society to accept his crime, but it does not accept it at all. It is not unlike a man eating or drinking poison, wishing that his digestive system would digest it, but it does not digest it. And even if that injustice remains hidden in this life, there is a meeting place, which he cannot avoid, and your Lord is on watch. At this juncture man will know that his plans were defective and he did not properly observe what was required of him; then he will feel remorse. Even if he were given a second chance, he would damage some other parts. It would continue like that until Allāh disgraces him before the whole world.

The above discussion makes it clear that the words: "So he became of those who regret", indicate his regret for not hiding and burying the dead body of his brother. Also it may possibly be said that the words show his regret for the slaying itself, and it is not wide of mark.

A TALK ON PERCEPTION & THOUGHT

The verse: Then Allāh sent a crow digging up the earth so that he might show him how he should cover the dead body of his brother. He said: "Woe me! Do I lack the strength that I should be like this crow and cover the dead body of my brother?" So he became of those who regret is a unique one; there is no other like it in the Qur'ān. It portrays man's ability of benefiting from perception; that he acquires knowledge of characteristic properties of various things through perception, and then thinking on it arrives at its aims and objects in life. It is what has been discovered by academic research that human knowledge and cognition emanates from perception (or call it sensitivity), in contrast to those who believe in remembrance and natural knowledge. We may explain it as follows:

Look at a man with all his cognitive pictures – be it ideas or propositions, particular or general, whatever the characteristic of his knowledge and consciousness – you will find that he has got numerous pictures and a great deal of cognition, even if he be the most ignorant, and extremely weak in understanding and thinking; and no one can enumerate the pictures in his mind; in fact only Allāh knows their limit.

Although it is beyond the limit of human computation, it is seen that it goes on growing and increasing so long as the man remains alive in this world. If we retreat and go back in human life, we shall find it decreasing and decreasing until it will become cipher, and man will become like a blank slate without any knowledge. Allāh says: [Allāh] taught man what he knew not (96:5).

The above verse does not mean that Allāh taught him what he did not know; but as for the things he knew, he had no need of divine teaching. Obviously, human knowledge, of whatever type it may be, is needed to guide him to what will make his existence perfect and will benefit him in his life; the goal to which inorganic things proceed by natural laws, the organic ones – including man – proceed and are guided to it in the light of knowledge. Thus knowledge is guidance.

Allãh has ascribed guidance to Himself, as He quotes Mūsã as saying: "Our Lord is He Who gave to everything its creation, then guided." (20:50). Again He says: And Who made (things) according to a measure, then guided (87:3). Also He says, and in a sense it points to guidance through perception and thought: Or, Who guides you in utter darkness of the land and sea, . . . (27:63). In previous volumes, we have discussed to a certain extent meaning of guidance. In short, every knowledge is guidance; and every guidance is from Allãh; therefore, whatever knowledge man has got, has come to him through divine teaching.

Also, the verse, And Allãh has brought you forth from the wombs of your mothers – you did not know anything – and He gave you the hearing and the sight and the hearts . . .(16:78), gives the connotation near to that of the verse: [Allãh] taught man what he knew not.

Contemplation of man's condition and meditation on Qur'ãnic verses show that man's theoretical knowledge, i.e. knowledge of things' characteristics and the resulting intellectual cognition, all emanate from the senses, and Allãh through it teaches him the things' characteristics, as is seen in the divine words: Then Allãh sent a crow digging up the earth so that he might show him how he should cover the dead body . . .

Attribution of sending the crow for showing how the dead body should be covered is exactly the attribution of teaching the way of covering to Him. The crow did not know that it was Allãh Who had sent it; likewise, the son of Adam did not perceive that there was a planner who had arranged the matter for his thinking and learning; and the fact that apparently the crow and its digging had caused him to learn the way of burial, was merely a chance factor like all chance factors which teach man ways of his life in both worlds. However, it is Allãh Who has created mankind and led him to perfection of knowledge for the goal of his life. The laid down system of creation is such as makes man seek perfection through knowledge, with continuous contacts and knocks between him and various parts of creation; and by this process man learns the means of acquiring his aims and objects. It is Allāh Who sends the crow and other mediums to engage in some activity that helps man in his learnings; so He is the real teacher of man.

There are many similar expressions in the Qur'ān. For example: . . . and what you have taught the beasts of prey, training them to hunt – you teach them of what Allāh has taught you . . . (5:4); the verse counts what they have learnt and what they teach as part of what Allāh has taught them, although they have learnt it from other people or found it out by themselves. Again: . . . and fear Allāh; and Allāh teaches you, . . . (2:282); but it was the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) who was teaching them. Also: . . . and the scribe should not refuse to write as Allāh has taught him (2:282); while the scribe had learnt the art of writing from another scribe. However, all these matters are an integral part of creation and management; and the resulting knowledge helps man in arriving at his perfection. Therefore, it is Allāh who has taught him these means of perfection, as a teacher teaches through speech and training, and a scribe teaches others through speech and pen.

This is the way of all activities, which are attributed in this world of cause-and-effect to Allāh. Allāh is their creator, and there is a chain of causes between Him and His creatures, which are apparent causes like instruments and tools, which bring a thing into existence.

You may say that these causes are conditions on which a thing's existence depends – everything is covered from all sides by these causes. Zayd comes into this world; he is son of 'Amr and Hind. Now, 'Amr and Hind should have been born long before Zayd, and they should have united in marriage; only then the said Zayd could be born. Likewise, for seeing through a seeing eye, there should be a seeing eye before the sight.

Some people think that belief in oneness of God (monotheism) demands that one should totally negate chain of causes; only then one can establish God's absolute power and dismiss the idea of any weakness in him. They say that the idea of necessity of intermediary causes is tantamount to saying that Allāh is compelled to use a particular way for creating things and has no free will or power. However, those people have inadvertently contradicted themselves.

In short, it is Allāh Who has taught human beings characteristics of the things which are perceived by their senses; He has taught them through the senses; then made all that is in the earth and the sky subservient to them; He says: And He has made subservient to you whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is in the earth, all, from Himself; . . . (45:13)

This subjugation has a purpose behind it: Man by managing these things reaches his goals and attains to his wishes in life. Allãh has made them connected to his existence so that he may benefit from them. The Creator has bestowed on man the faculty of contemplation in order that he may understand how to manage and use them, how to proceed ahead through them. The following verses points to this reality: Do you not see that Allãh has made subservient to you whatsoever is in the earth and the ships running in the sea by His command? . . . (22:65). . . . and made for you of the ships and the cattle what you ride on (43:12). . . . and upon them [the cattle] and upon the ships you are borne (40:80). There are many verses of similar connotation. Look at their language, how they ascribe making of ships to Allãh, while they are manufactured by man; how they attribute carrying of man to Allãh, while it is done by the ships and the cattle; how they assign the ships' movement to His order, while it takes place because of the flow of the river, winds or steam, etc. All these phenomena have been described as God's subjugating them to man, because his will has some control on ships, cattle and in the earth and sky which pulls them to the desired goal.

In short, Allãh has given man thinking power over the senses, so that he may use it as a means to reach the perfection appointed for him; he is helped by his intellectual cognition covering the creation, in other words, the theoretical knowledge.

Allãh says: . . . and He gave you the hearing and the sight and the hearts that you may give thanks. (16:78)

As for the knowledge related to action, which guides man to what is to be done and what not to be done, it comes to man through divine inspiration [or call it, instinct] without the agency of the senses or theoretical intellect. Allãh says: And [I swear by] the soul and Him Who made it perfect, then He inspired it to understand what is wrong for it and right for it; he will indeed be successful who purifies it, and he will indeed fail who corrupts it (91:7-10). Then set your face upright for religion in natural devotion (to the truth), the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; there is no altering of Allãh's creation; that is the right religion, . . . (30:30). In these verses Allãh ascribes the knowledge of what should be done (i.e. good deed) and what should not be done (i.e. evil deed) to divine inspiration; and it is what is thrown into the heart.

So, whatever knowledge is gained by man is a divine guidance and through divine guidance. However, there is difference among various types of knowledge: (i) As for the characteristics of things found outside human mind, Allāh gives him their knowledge through the five senses; (ii) The general comprehensive intellectual knowledge is given by Allāh and through His subjugation; the senses do not interfere in it, nor can man be able to dispense with it; (iii) The knowledge related to action, which is related to good or evil deed, and decides what is good for it and what is bad; this comes from divine inspiration, thrown into the heart, knocking on the nature's door.

This third type of knowledge, which in fact emanates from divine inspiration, can only succeed in doing its work and complete its effect if the second type is in order and has grown up with health and uprightness; as even intellect can only do its work properly if man is upright and firm in piety and on the natural religion. Allāh says: . . . and none do mind except those having understanding (3:7). . . . and none minds but he who turns (to Allāh) again and again (40:13). And We will turn their hearts and their sights, even as they did not believe in it the first time, . . . (6:110). And who turns away from the religion of Ibrāhīm but he who makes himself a fool, . . . (2:130). That is, none discards the demands of nature except he whose understanding is defective, and therefore he treads on a wrong path.

Reason supports this concomitance between understanding and piety. If man's theoretical power becomes defective, and he does not perceive truth as truth or falsehood as falsehood, then how can he be inspired to adhere to that or avoid this? Look at someone who believes that there is no life after this world's life; obviously he would not be inspired to observe religious piety which is the best provision for the life hereafter.

Likewise, if a man's natural religion is perverted, and he does not acquire the provision of religious piety, then his inner powers which give rise to desire or anger, love or hate, etc. cannot remain moderate; and when these powers' balance is disturbed, the power of theoretical perception cannot discharge its functions properly.

As the Qur'ānic statements aim at spreading the religious cognition and teaching the people useful knowledge, they tread the same path and stick to the above methods which it has prescribed for acquiring knowledge: (i) If the matter concerns particular items which have perceivable characteristics, it clearly appeals to the senses; for example, verses which contain phrases like, "have you not seen", "do they not see", "have you seen","do you not then see?" (ii) If the topic covers rational generality – whether it is related to general physical matters, or is beyond this phenomenal world – then it pays full regard to understanding and reason, although it is beyond the jurisdiction of the senses and outside the circle of matter and materials. For example, most of the verses related to genesis and resurrection, which contain phrases like, "for a people who understand", "for a people who reflect", "for a people who remember, "for a people who understand", etc. (iii) As for practical propositions which touch upon good and evil, profit and loss in deed, or piety and impiety, they rely on divine inspiration and describe the things which make the person remember his inner inspiration; like the verses which contain such phrases as, "it is better for you", "his heart is surely sinful", "in both of them there is a great sin", "and sin and rebellion without justice", "surely Allãh does not guide", etc. You should meditate on them.

Now, it is clear that the Qur'ãn demonstrates the error of materialists – those who rely on sense and experiment alone and reject pure rational propositions in practical matters. We know that the first concern of the Qur'ãn is the topic of monotheism, and it is on foundation of monotheism that it builds all true cognition, which it explains and invites people to. There is no need to remind that monotheism is a topic which is the furthest removed from the senses, has the least connection with matter and is deeply related to the pure rational affair.

The Qur'ãn explains that this true cognition is a part of nature and creation. Allãh says: Then set your face upright for religion in natural devotion (to the truth), the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; there is no altering of Allãh's creation . . . (30:30).

It means that human creation is such an origination as it results in these perceptions and cognition. What does alteration of a creation imply? That alteration itself would be another creation and origination. But if altering of general creation is taken to mean negation of actual function then it is beyond comprehension. Far be it from him to negate his natural knowledge and to tread in life on a totally different path. Those who deviate from natural orders do not negate the dictate of nature; they rather use it in a wrong way. Sometimes an archer misses the target; now the bow and arrow as well as other conditions of shooting are originally made and laid down for hitting the target, but mistake in using throws it into error. If knives, saws, augers, needles, and other such things are fitted wrongly in their machines, they will perform the same functions for which they have been made but in an undesired way. However, it will be impossible for them to deviate from their natural function and do some other work, e.g. a saw cannot do the work of needle by sewing clothes, and so on.

The above matters are clear for him who thinks over general arguments offered by those who oppose rational proofs. For example, they say: 'Pure rational proofs and syllogisms composed of such premises which are not based on perceptions of five senses, often throw one into error. Look, for instance, at irreconcilable disputes in pure rational matters. Therefore, one should not rely on them because they do not reassure mind.'

Also they argue for correctness of the way of senses and experiments in the following manner: Obviously, the senses are the tools through which we acquire the knowledge of the characteristics of various things. When we perceive a thing's effect in the framework of some particular conditions, and observe the same effects repeatedly appearing with the same conditions – without fail and without any discrepancy – then we become sure that the said effect was the characteristic of the said thing and that it was not merely a matter of chance, because chance is not a permanent phenomenon.

Both these arguments have been offered to prove that one should compulsorily depend on perception and experiment, and should discard pure rational methods. But it is amusing to note that all the premises used therein are rational and outside the purview of perception and experiment. These people have used these rational premises for rebutting the use of these very premises. That is what we have earlier said that nature cannot be negated, although man errs in its use.

And more abominable than that is the use of experiment and test in evaluation of legislated rules and enacted laws; a law is made and enforced in public with the aim of testing its effect through statistics, etc.; if good results get the upper hand, the law is confirmed as a permanent one, otherwise it is set aside and replaced by another, and so on. The same is the case of making a law through analogy or discretional liking.[29]

The Qur'ān negates all the above methods and proves that the laid down laws are natural and clear; general piety and impiety are

[29] As for analogy in fiqh and personal liking and what is termed as olefaction of jurisprudential knowledge, they are the signs for "discovery" of law, not for laying it down; and its discussion is related to the uṣūlu 'l-fiqh. (Author's Note) academic and based on inspiration; and their details should be learnt from the side of revelation. Allãh says: And pursue not that of which you have not the knowledge; . . . (17:36); and do not follow the footsteps of the Satan . . . (2:168). It names the laid down sharī'ah as truth: . . . and He sent down with them the book with truth, so that it might judge between people in that in which they had differed; . . . (2:213). . . . and surely conjecture does not avail against the truth at all (53:28). How can conjecture avail when by following it one puts oneself in danger of falling into untruth which is error? Allãh says: . . . and what is there after the truth but error; . . . (10:32) . . . yet surely Allãh does not guide him who leads astray, . . . (16:37). In other words, error cannot be a way to lead man to good and felicity. Whoever wants to reach truth through falsehood, achieve justice through injustice, do a good by means of evil, or acquire piety through impiety, he has certainly lost the way; he craves to get from the creation (which is the foundation of law and sharī'ah) what it can never deliver. Had it ever been possible, this interchange would have happened in characteristics of opposite things, and one side of opposite would have served what the other side was supposed to do.

Likewise, the Qur'ãn negates the path of remembrance (which invalidates the procedure of thinking academics and dismisses the natural logic); and we have earlier discussed this topic in detail.

In the same way, the Qur'ãn forbids people to indulge in contemplation without accompaniment of fear of Allãh. (We have talked briefly on this subject too.) That is why when Qur'ãn teaches the laws of religion; it follows that legislation with description of moral virtues and good characteristics, which in their turn awaken the instinct of piety in man, with which he is able to understand the law. Look for example the following verses: And when you have divorced the women and they have ended their term (of waiting), then do not prevent them from marrying their husbands when they agree among themselves in a lawful manner; with this is admonished whosoever among you believes in Allãh and the last day; this is more profitable and purer for you; and Allãh knows while you do not know (2:232). And fight with them until there is no more mischief (disbelief), and religion be only for Allãh; but if they desist, then there should be no hostility except against the oppressors (2:193). . . . and keep up prayer; surely prayer keeps (one) away from indecency and evil, and certainly the remembrance of Allãh is the greatest, and Allãh knows what you do (29:45).

QUR'ĀN: For this reason did We prescribed to the Children of Israel that whoever slays a soul, unless it be for manslaughter or for mischief in the land, it is as though he slew all men; and whoever keeps it alive, it is as though he kept alive all men; . . .: Majma'u 'l-bayān says: "al-Ajl (اَلأَجْلُ) literally means felony." ar-Rāghib says in Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān: "al-Ajl is that felony (retribution of) which is feared immediately; thus every ajl is a felony, but not every felony is ajl; it is said: 'I did it because of him.'"

Then it was used for describing the cause; it is said: 'I did it for this cause,' i.e., this is the cause of my action. Probably its use for description of cause began in the context of felony and crime, as we say: 'Zayd did evil and for this crime [ajl] I punished him with hitting,' i.e. my hitting Zayd sprang from his crime which was his evil-doing, or from crime of his evil-doing; then it was used for general cause and reason, as for example, I visited you for the reason of my love to you, or because of my love to you.

The context apparently shows that the phrase, "For this reason", refers to the story of the two sons of Adam given in the preceding verses. That is, the occurance of that distressing event was the reason of our prescribing to the Children of Israel this and this. Some people have said that this phrase is a part of the preceding sentence: So he became of those who regret; i.e. this was the cause of his regretting. This in itself is not far-fetched, as we see in the verses 2:219-20: . . . Thus does Allāh make clear to you the signs, that you may ponder (219) about this world and the hereafter. And they ask you concerning the orphans . . . But in that case the words: "We prescribed", would begin a new sentence, and the usual style of the Qur'ān would demand a وَ (wa) for recommencement of another sentence, as we have seen in the above-mentioned verse 2:220.

Why does this phrase refer to the story of the two sons of Adam? It is because the story shows that this human species by nature is entangled in desire and jealousy; thus he hates people for things that are beyond their power [i.e., are gifted by God]. This jealousy for even ordinary things instigates him against divine decrees for negating the purpose of creation; it blinds him so that he kills another human being, even his own brother.

Individual men belong to a single species and have the same essence and reality. Each of them possesses [in miniature] the same humanity that is possessed by all others, and vice versa. Allāh created so many individuals and multiplied the human race in order that this reality should survive, in view of the fact that individuals remain alive only for short periods; by this increase in population, new generations will replace the old, and the worship of Allãh will continue. In this background, destroying an individual by murder is tantamount to doing mischief in creation and negating the divine aim of keeping the humanity alive through increased population and succeeding generations. To this fact the killed son of Adam had pointed while talking to his brother: "I am not one to stretch forth my hand towards you to slay you; surely I fear Allãh, the Lord of the worlds." Thus he indicated that slaying someone without genuine reason was tantamount to waging war against Allãh's Lordship.

As the human nature is such that a trivial cause incites him to commit injustice and oppression, which in the long run, negates the laws given by the Lord and contradicts the purpose of creation of humanity in general; and as the Children of Israel were sunk in jealousy and envy, pride and haughtiness, pursuit of desire and rejection of truth – as the preceding verses have described and their narrated stories show – Allãh explained to them the reality of this heinous oppression and its position in depth, and informed them that in His eyes slaying one man was equal to slaying all people, and conversely keeping one person alive was tantamount to keeping alive all of them.

The phrase: "We prescribed to the Children of Israel", does not indicate any laid down law, yet it is not without emphasis looking at its importance and approach; and it has effect in provoking the divine wrath in this world or the next.

In short, the verse means: As man, by nature, is pushed even by a trivial motive to commit this great oppression [i.e. murder], and peculiar characteristics of the Children of Israel were well-known, We described to them the gravity of manslaughter, in order that they should desist from extravagance, and there came to them Our messengers with clear proofs, but even after that they certainly act extravagantly in the land.

The sentence: "whoever slays a soul, unless it be for manslaughter or for mischief in the land, it is as though he slew all men". Here Allãh has made exception of two categories of killing: (i) In punishment, i.e., for retribution, as He says: . . . retaliation is prescribed for you in the matter of the slain; . . . (2:178). (ii) In punishment of mischief in the land, as He says in the next verse: The punishment of those who wage war against Allãh and His messenger and strive to make mischief in the land is only this, that they should be killed or crucified or their hands and their feet should be cut off on opposite sides . . . (5:33).

The seriousness of killing is elaborated by the phrase: "it is as though he slew all men." We have already explained that each individual man possesses the same reality and quiddity, which is found in all members of the species, this reality lives and dies with him. All human beings, be he an individual or the whole species, one man or a multitude, all are one in this reality. Naturally, murdering one soul should be tantamount to killing the whole species. Conversely, keeping alive one man should be equal to keeping all men alive, as the verse says.

First Objection: This equalization leads to nullification of the main purpose of the verse. The verse aims at showing the seriousness and gravity of slaying a soul and its great sin and dire conesquences. Obviously, the more men one kills the more serious and grave its consequences should be. If one slaying is made equal to slaying all men, then what would be said for a man who kills ten men? One victim's murder becomes equal to murdering all men; and the remaining nine victims are left without anything to compare with.

This objection cannot be removed by saying that: 'Killing ten persons is equal to ten times murdering all men; and killing all of them is equal to murdering all multiplied by the total number of all'; because it means multiplication of punishment number, and the text of the verse does not support it.

Moreover, the total is made of units each of which is equal to the total, which is again made of such units; and this computation is not going to end at any point, and such a total is meaningless, because it has no unit, and there is no total without unit.

Apart from that, Allãh says: . . . and whoever brings an evil deed, he shall not be recompensed but only with the like of it, . . . (6:160).

Second Objection: What is the meaning of saying that killing one person is equal to killing all? If this "all" includes this one person who is killed, it means that the said person is equal to a collection of himself and others taken together. But it is obviously impossible. If "killing all" connotes killing all persons accept this one, it means that whoever killed a man, it is as though he killed all men except this one. Obviously, it is a rotten claim that contradicts the purpose of speech, i.e. elaboration of the extreme seriousness of this oppression. Moreover, the phrase: "it is as though he slew all men", is unconditional and without any exception; so it does not allow this hypothesis.

This objection cannot be cleared by saying that: 'The aim is to show equality as far as punishment is concerned, or in other words, multiplication of punishment or other such matters.' And it is clear.

The reply to both the above objections is this: The divine words: "whoever slays a soul, . . . it is as though he slew all men", are an allusion to the fact that all men have one single reality, that is humanity in which all are united, and one and all are equal in it; whoever attacks the humanity found in one of them, he attacks the humanity found in all of them. For example, there is water divided in numerous glasses; whoever drinks from one glass he drinks the water – and he desires the water because it is water – and what is found in all other glasses is no more than water; thus it is as though he has drunk from all glasses. Therefore, the above-mentioned sentence is an allusion in the form of a simile.

In this way both objections are removed, because those objections have treated it as a simple simile in which the factor of similarity intensifies when the number of a side of simile increases; obviously if in this case one is equalized with all the meaning will be disturbed and objection will arise, as if someone says: One of this group of people is like a lion, and one among them is like all in bravery and valour.

As for the sentence: "and whoever keeps it alive it is as though he kept alive all men", it will be explained in the same way as the preceding sentence was. Keeping alive alludes to what the sane persons would call giving life, like delivering a drowning person and freeing a captive. Allãh in His Book has counted guiding to the truth as giving life, as He says: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, . . . (6:122). Therefore, one who guides a soul to the true faith has raised him to life.

The clause: "and certainly Our messengers came to them with clear proofs", is related to the beginning of the verse, i.e., 'Certainly, Our messengers came to them warning them against murder and other related ways of making mischief in the land.' The next sentence: "but even after that many of them certainly act extravagantly in the land", completes the speech, and its addition gives the intended result of this talk – a clear idea that the Children of Israel were extravagant, persisting in their arrogance and impertinence. We certainly described to them the gravity of murder, and Our messengers came to them with proofs, explaining this and other related topics. They clearly described it to them and warned them of its consequences; even then they did not desist from their haughtiness and insolence. They certainly acted extravagantly in the past, and continue to do so even now.

Extravagance means going beyond the boundary and exceeding this limit in all activities, although it is mostly used in monetary context. Allāh says: And they who when they spend, are neither extravagant nor parsimonious, and (keep) between these the just mean (25:67), as ar-Rāghib has said in his Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān.

TRADITIONS

Hishām ibn Sālim narrates through Ḥabīb as-Sijistānī from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said, "When the two sons of Adam offered (their) offerings, and it was accepted from one of them and was not accepted from the other; [the Imām] said, 'It was accepted from Hābīl and not accepted from Qābīl. Because of it he (Qābīl) was overcome by intense jealousy and he committed outrage against Hābīl. He was lying in wait for him, watching when he would be alone, until he got the better of him, away from Adam; so he attacked and killed him. A part of their story is what Allāh has described in his Book concerning their talk before his killing . . .' " (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: This is one of the best traditions narrated about this story. It is a lengthy tradition in which the Imām (a.s.) describes: the birth of Hibatullāh Shīth after this event, Adam's will for him; and continuation of will among the prophets. We shall write it in some appropriate place.

The tradition clearly shows that Qābīl assassinated Hābīl when Hābīl was unaware of it, and he did not submit himself to the killer's design, as it agrees with reason; and we have elaborated it in the preceding Commentary.

It should be noted that our traditions give the names of the two sons as Hābīl and Qābīl, while the prevalent Bible says: Abel (Hābīl) and Cain (Qābīl). But there is no authenticity in it, because the narration of the Torah ends on one person whose details are unknown, apart from the alterations in the Torah, which are widely known.

al-Qummī narrates from his father, from al-Ḥasan ibn Maḥbūb, from Hishãm ibn Sãlim, from Abū Ḥamzah ath-Thumãlī, from Thuwayr ibn Abī Fãkhitah that he said, "I heard ʻAlī ibn al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), talking to some Qurayshites. He said, 'When the two sons of Adam offered (their) offering, one of them offered the fattest ram which he kept, and the other offered a bunch of ear of grain; so it was accepted from the owner of the ram – and he was Hãbīl – and not accepted from the other one. Thus Qãbīl was angry, and said to Hãbīl, "By Allãh! I will most certainly slay you." Hãbīl said, "Allãh only accepts from those who are pious. If you will stretch forth your hand towards me to slay me, I am not one to stretch forth my hand towards you to slay you; surely I fear Allãh, the Lord of the worlds. Surely I wish that you should bear my sin as well as your own sin, and so you would be of the inmates of the Fire, and this is the recompense of the unjust." Then his mind facilitated to him the slaying of his brother; but he did not know how to kill him until Iblīs came and taught him, saying, "Put his head between two rocks, then crush it." So when he killed him, he did not know what should he do with him. Then came two crows, and they came forward fighting and combating with one another; so one of them killed his companion; then the survivor dug into the land with his claws and buried his companion in it. Qãbīl said, "Woe me! Do I lack the strength that I should be like this crow and cover the dead body of my brother? So he became of those who regret." Then he dug for him a ditch and buried him into it; thus it became a custom to bury the dead bodies.

"'Thereafter Qãbīl returned to his father, and he did not see Hãbīl with him. Adam said to him, "Where have you left my son?" Qãbīl told him, "Had you sent me as his guardian?" Adam said, "Come with me to the place of offering." And [Adam] had a fore boding of what Qãbīl had done. When he arrived at the place of offering, Hãbīl's murder became clear to him. Then Adam cursed the land that accepted Hãbīl's blood [i.e. drank the blood, leaving nothing above]; and Adam ordered that Qãbīl be cursed, and Qãbīl was called from the sky: "You are cursed as you killed your brother." It is for the above reason that the earth does not drink blood.

"'Then Adam returned, weeping for Hãbīl forty days and nights. When he felt grief for him, he complained to Allãh about it. So Allãh revealed to him: "I am going to give you a male child who will be a replacement of Hãbīl." Thus Ḥawwã' gave birth to a son, pure and blessed; when it was the seventh day, Allãh revealed to him: "O Adam! This son is my gift to you; therefore you name him Hibatullãh [i.e. Allãh's gift];

so Adam gave him the name Hibatullāh.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: This is the most moderate of the traditions narrated about this story and the matters connected with it. Even so, it is not free of some confusion in the text; as it shows that Qābīl threatened Hābīl to kill him, and then he did not know how to kill him; it is an unimaginable idea, except if it is taken to mean that he was perplexed which method he should use to kill his brother, so Iblīs (may Allāh curse him!) advised him to crush his head with rock. There are other traditions, narrated through the Shī'ah and Sunnī chains, whose theme is nearer to this tradition.

It should be noted that many diverse traditions have been narrated about this event with astonishing themes, like:

The one that says that Allāh took the ram of Hābīl, and kept it in the Garden for forty autumns, then offered it as Ismā'īl's ransom, so Ibrāhīm slaughtered it:

Or that which says that Hābīl surrendered himself to Qābīl's control and desisted from stretching forth his hand towards his brother;

Or that which says that when Qābīl killed his brother, Allāh bound one of his legs to its thigh from the day of murder to the Day of Resurrection, and turned his face to right side, wherever he turns it turns; on him is a hedge of ice in winter, and a hedge of fire in summer; there are with him seven angels, when one of them goes, another one comes;

Or that which says that he is undergoing punishment in an island in sea; Allāh has hanged him upside down, and he will remain in the same condition upto the Day of Resurrection;

Or that which says that Qābīl son of Adam hangs by his hair in core of the sun; it takes him with it in its circulation – in winter and summer – upto the Day of Resurrection; when that day comes. Allāh will send him into the Fire;

Or that which says that the son of Adam, who killed his brother, was Qābīl who was born in the Garden;

Or that which says that when Adam came to know of the murder of Hābīl, he elegized him in a few lines of Arabic poem;

Or that which says that according to their sharī'ah if someone intended to attack another person, the victim left him free to do whatever he wanted, without resistence.

In addition to other such traditions, most or all of these and other similar traditions are weak; they go against the dictates of reason, and the Book does not support them. Some of them are clearly forged; others are distorted, while many are the result of the narrators' mistake who tried to narrate them in their own words.

Ibn Abī Shaybah narrates from ‘Umar that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, "Does one of you lack the strength, if a man comes to him to slay him, to say like it?" – He said it pointing with one of his hands to the other – "Then he would be like the good one of the two sons of Adam; he would be in the Garden and his killer in the Fire. (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: It is among the traditions describing civil strifes and trials. There are many others like it, and as-Suyūṭī has narrated most of them in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr. For example, the following one which he has quoted through al-Bayhaqī, from Abū Mūsã from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: "Break your swords" – i.e., during civil strife – "and cut your strings, and stay inside the houses, and be in it like the good one of the two sons of Adam."

Another tradition he has quoted through Ibn Jarīr and ‘Abdu 'r-Razzãq from al-Ḥasan that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.), said, 'Verily the two sons of Adam have been offered as an example for this ummah; so adhere to the good one of them.'" There are other narrations like them.

These traditions apparently are not consistent with correct consideration, which is supported by correct traditions, which command people to defend themselves and fight in support of truth. Allãh has said: And if two parties of the believers quarrel, make peace between them; but if one of them acts wrongfully towards the other, fight that which acts wrongly until it returns to Allãh's command (49:9).

Moreover, all of these traditions purport to explain the words of Hãbīl in this story: "If you will stretch forth your hand towards me to slay me, I am not one to stretch forth my hand towards you to slay you", and try to show that Hãbīl gave his brother power over himself enabling him to kill him without any attempt to defend himself. And you have seen that this idea is not in conformity with the Qur’ãnic text.

Apart from that, what makes one suspicious of these traditions is the fact that they have been narrated by people who sat during turmoils that led to ‘Uthmãn's murder, and during ‘Alī's reign they joined Mu‘āwiyah, the Khārijites and Ṭalḥah and az-Zubayr. Therefore, it is necessary to interpret them in a sensible way if possible, failing which they should be discarded.

Ibn ‘Asākir has narrated from ‘Alī (a.s.) that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said, "There is a mountain in Damascus, called Qāsiyūn; son of Adam killed his brother in it." (ibid.)

The author says: There is no objection to this tradition. However, Ibn ‘Asākir has narrated through one chain from Ka‘bu 'l-Aḥbār that he said, "The blood, which is on the mountain of Qāsiyūn, is that of the son of Adam." Also he narrates through another chain from ‘Amr ibn Khabīr ash-Sha‘bānī that he said, "I was with Ka‘bu 'l-Aḥbār on the mountain, Dayru 'l-Murrān; and he saw a flowing chasm in it; so he said, 'Here the son of Adam had killed his brother, and this is the trace of his blood; Allāh has made it a sign for the worlds.'"

These two traditions show that there was there some firm sign, which was claimed to be the blood of Hābīl. In all probability, it looks like so many myths which crafty people have invented, so that people should come there to visit it, bringing with them large votive offerings and precious gifts, not unlike so many palm-prints and foot-prints on stones,[30] and the grave of the grandmother[31] and other such things.

Aḥmad, al-Bukhārī, Muslim, at-Tirmidhī, an-Nasā’ī, Ibn Mājah, Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir have narrated from Ibn Mas‘ūd that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), said, 'No soul will be slain unjustly but a portion of its blood shall be apportioned to the first son of Adam, because he was the first to establish the custom of killing.'" (ibid.)

The author says: This theme has been narrated through other Sunnī and Shī‘ah chain

Ḥumrān said, "I said to Abū Ja‘far (a.s.), 'What is the meaning of the words of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: For this reason did We prescribe to the Children of Israel that whoever slays a soul, unless it be for manslaughter or for mischief in the land, it is as though he slew

[31] In Jeddah (Saudi Arabia) there is a large grave, which public attributes to Ḥawwā’ (Adam's wife); they even claim that this was the reason the town was named Jaddah (grand-mother)! (tr.)

all men?'" He [Ḥumrãn] said, "How can it be as though he slew all men, while he had slain a single soul? He (a.s.) said, 'He will be put in a place in Jahannam (Gehenna) where the punishment of the people of the Fire reaches its utmost limit; if he had killed all men, he would have entered the same place.' I said, 'Then if he killed another (man)?' He said, 'It will be increased for him.'" (al-Kãfī)

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadūq too has narrated a similar tradition in Ma'ãni 'l-akhbãr from Ḥumrãn.

Ḥumran's question, "Then if he killed another (man)?" points to the above-mentioned objection that it makes one murder equal to that murder plus all others. The Imãm (a.s.) has replied that his punishment will be increased for him.

At this juncture someone may think that this reply of the Imãm (a.s.) goes against the equality mentioned in the verse: whoever slays a soul . . . it is as though he slew all men, because increase means that murder of one or many or all is not equal. But this objection is not sustainable, because equality refers to the nature of punishment, i.e. all murderers – whether of one or many or all – will be put in one valley of Jahannam, and to this fact refer the Imãm's words: "if he had killed all men, he would have entered the same place."

The evidence for this explanation is found in a tradition narrated by al-'Ayyãshī in his at-Tafsīr, from the same Ḥumrãn from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) about this verse, that the Imãm (a.s.) said, "There is a place in the Fire where the punishment of all the people of the Fire reaches its utmost limit, so he will be put in it." "I [i.e. Ḥumrãn] said, 'And if he had killed two?' (The Imãm, a.s.), said, 'Don't you see that there is no place in the Fire more severe in punishment than this?' Then he said, '[His punishment] will be increased according to his deed . . .'"

The Imãm (a.s.) has joined negative and positive in his reply; it points to what we have already explained that equality is in the nature of punishment and difference will be in intensity of punishment and the effect it will have on the killer.

Some more evidence may be found in what Ḥannãn ibn Sudayr has narrated from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said about the verse: whoever slays a soul, . . . it is as though he slew all men. "There is a valley in Jahannam, if he slew all men, he will be (put) in it, and if he slew one soul he will be (put) in it." This too is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyãshī.

The author says: It is as though the verse is quoted not verbatum in this ḥadīth.

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from Fuḍayl ibn Yasār that he said, "I asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.), about the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, in His Book: and whoever keeps it alive, it is as though he kept alive all men. He said, '(It is saving) from burning or drowning.' I said, 'He who takes him out from error to guidance?' He said, 'That is its greatest ta'wīl.'" (al-Kāfī)

The author says: ash-Shaykh has narrated it in his al-Amālī, and al-Barqī in his al-Maḥāsin, through Fuḍayl from Abū Ja'far (a.s.); and it has been narrated by Sumā'ah and Ḥumrān from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.).

The statement that saving from error is the greatest ta'wīl of this verse means that it is its finest and most subtle explanation. In early period of Islam the word, ta'wīl, was often used as a synonym of tafsīr.

This explanation of ours is supported by what has been narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from Muḥammad ibn Muslim from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said, "I asked the Imām (a.s.), about the word of Allāh: whoever slays a soul, unless it be for manslaughter or for mischief in the land, it is as though he slew all men. (The Imām) said, 'For him there is a place in the Fire, if he killed all men, his punishment will not increase on it.' He said, 'and whoever keeps it alive, it is as though he kept alive all men. He did not kill him, or saved him from drowning or burning; and the greatest of this all is that he takes him out from error to guidance.'"

The author says: The Imām's saying, "He did not kill him", means: 'He did not take revenge against him (the victim) though he could do so after the killing has been proved.'

al-'Ayyāshī also says in his at-Tafsīr that Abū Baṣīr narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said, "I asked him (the Imām, about the verse): whoever keeps it alive, it is as though he kept alive all men; he (a.s.), said, 'Whoever saves one from the unbelief (kufr) to belief (īmān).'"

The author says: This theme has been mentioned in many traditions narrated through Sunnī chains.

Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said, "Extravagants are those who regard unlawful things as lawful and shed blood." (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

AN ACADEMIC DISCOURSE AND APPLICATION

The Torah says:

1. And Adam knew Eve his wife; and she conceived, and bare Cain, and said, I have gotten a man from the LORD.
2. And she again bare his brother Abel. And Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground.
3. And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the LORD.
4. And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. And the LORD had respect unto Abel and to his offering:
5. But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell.
6. And the LORD said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy cauntenance fallen?
7. If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him.
8. And Cain talked with Abel his brother: and it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him.
9. And the LORD said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? and he said, I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?
10. And he said, What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground.
11. And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand;
12. When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.
13. And Cain said unto the LORD, My punishment is greater than I can bear.
14. Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me.
15. And the LORD said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him seven fold. And the LORD set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.

16. And Cain went out from the presence of the LORD, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden. (Genesis, 4:1-16)

The Qur'ān says about the story of the two sons of Adam:

27. And relate to them the story of the two sons of Adam with truth when they both offered an offering, but it was accepted from one of them and was not accepted from the other. He said: "I will most certainly slay you." (The other) said: "Allāh only accepts from those who are pious.
28. "If you will stretch forth your hand towards me to slay me, I am not one to stretch forth my hand towards you to slay you; surely I fear Allāh the Lord of the worlds.
29. "Surely I wish that you should bear my sin as well as your own sin, and so you would be of the inmates of the Fire, and this is the recompense of the unjust."
30. Then his mind facilitated to him the slaying of his brother, so he slew him; then he became one of the losers.
31. Then Allāh sent a crow digging up the earth so that he might show him how he should cover the dead body of his brother. He said: "Woe me! Do I lack the strength that I should be like this crow and cover the dead body of my brother?" So he became of those who regret. (Qur'ān, 5:27-31)

You should contemplate on this story as described by the Torah and then compare it with the narrative of the Qur'ān; then decide for yourself.

The first thing which hits your eyes in the story of the Torah is that it has turned God the Lord into an earthly creature in the image of man, who lives with the men, issues decrees for and against them as another man may do; he comes near him and talks to him as one man to another; then he hides himself by going away and becoming absent; so he does not see an absent and far away thing or person as he sees a nearby and present person. In short, he is just like a terresterial man in every aspect; the only difference is that his intentions come into force and his orders are carried out. On this basis are built all the teachings of the Tawrāt and the Injīl; far exalted be Allāh from such insinuations!

This Biblical story makes us to understand that man at that time lived face to face with Allāh and his physical presence; then Allāh hid himself from Cain or from Cain and people like him, while the others continued to see him plainly. But irrefutable proofs show that mankind is one species, its individuals have similar faculties and powers, and they live in this world the material lives, while Allāh is totally free of material attributes and conditions; accidents of possibility and attributes of defect cannot touch his subtle position – and this is what the Qur'ãn describes.

As for the Qur'ãn, its story is based on the fact that all men share similar traits and is joined in humanity. Then it goes on to tell the story of the appearance of the crow on the scene, and discloses the fact that man gradually advances to his perfection, and that his step-by-step perfection is based on his sensory perception and contemplation. Then it describes the talk of the two brothers; and quotes Hãbīl's discourse which contains brilliant cognition of human nature, and fundamental religious factors like tawḥīd, prophethood and resurrection; then he explains piety and impiety, justice and injustice – the two basics which govern all divine laws and sharī'ah's rules; finally he elaborates the principle of justice of God concerning acceptance and non-acceptance and the recompense in the next world.

Then the Qur'ãn describes the remorse and regret of the killer and his loss in this world and the next. Lastly, it shows the gravity of the crime of murder that to slay one soul is tantamount to slaying all men; and whoever keeps one soul alive is as though he kept alive all men.

The punishment of those who wage war against Allãh and His Messenger and strive to make mischief in the land is only this, that they should be killed or crucified or their hands and their feet should be cut off on opposite sides or they should be banished from the land; this shall be as a disgrace for them in this world, and in the hereafter they shall have a grievous chastisement (33). Except those who repent before you have them in your power; so know that Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful (34). *O you who believe! COMMENTARY

The verses are not without some connection with the preceding ones. Although the story of the slaying of a son of Adam by his brother and the subsequent prescription to the Children of Israel regarding murder, had not specifically laid down any punishment or sentence, yet the topics have affinity with these verses that describe the punishment of thieves and those who make mischief in the land.

QUR'ĀN: The punishment of those who wage war against Allāh and His Messenger and strive to make mischief in the land is only this: Fasādan (فَسَادًا = mischief) is a maṣdar used in the sentence as a circumstantial clause. Waging war against Allāh: It is impossible to take it in its literal sense; it can only be interpreted metaphorically. But the metaphorical meaning is very wide and it can be applied on disobeying any rule of the sharī'ah and on every injustice and extravagance; yet the verse joins the Messenger with Allāh and it means that the disobedience covers those rulings in which the Messenger had some involvement. This narrows the circle to include only those affairs for which Allāh has given His Messenger certain authority, like fighting the disbelievers under the banner of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and keeping the roads safe from highway robbers, by maintaining the general law and order which the Prophet had established in the land. The clause: "and strive to make mischief in the land", pinpoints the intended meaning, i.e. to make mischief in the land by disturbing the peace and highway robbery; it does not refer to fighting against the Muslims. Moreover, it is known that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had never meted out the above-mentioned punishments of killing, crucifying, cutting their hands and feet on opposite sides or imprisonment to the disbelievers who were vanquished in wars.

Apart from that, the exception contained in the next verse indicates that waging war against Allāh and the Messenger only means this making mischief in the land, because one may repent from waging war, and not from polytheism, etc.

Therefore, waging war and making mischief obviously mean the same thing, i.e. disturbing general law and order. Law and order is upset when fear and anxiety prevail in society; normally this happens when arms are used and lead to killings. That is why the sunnah explains making mischief as drawing sword, etc., as we shall write under "Traditions", God willing.

QUR'ÃN: that they should be killed or crucified or their hands and their feet should be cut off on opposite sides or they should be banished from the land: at-Taqtīl (اَلتَّقْتِيْل), at-taṣlīb (اَلتَّصْلِيبُ) and at-taqṭī' (اَلتَّقْطِيعُ) are on the stem of at-taf'īl from the roots, al-qatl (اَلْقَتْلُ = to kill), aṣ-ṣalb (اَلصَّلْبُ = to crucify) and al-qaṭ' (اَلْقَطْعُ = to cut off), and accord-ingly emphasize or enhance the root meanings. The conjunctive aw (اَوْ = or) indicates alternatives, showing that the two (or more) sides can-not appear together. The question arises whether there is any sequence or choice between the four alternative punishments mentioned here; the conjunctive does not throw light on it, and some other spoken words, or circumstantial factor is needed for deciding it. Thus the verse in this sense is vague. However, traditions have explained it and those narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) shows that the four laid down punishments are applied according to the level of the mischief made. For example, a man draws sword and kills and takes property; another one only kills, a third one only takes property, and a fourth only draws sword – obviously each one's punishment would differ from the others, as will be explained under "Traditions".

The words: "their hands and their feet should be cut off on opposite sides", mean that if the hand is cut on the right side, the foot should be cut on the left; this only shows that cutting the hands and the feet means cutting one hand and one foot (on opposite sides), not both hands and both feet.

As for the words: "or they should be banished from the land", an-nafy (اَلنَّفْى) means banishment; tradition explains it as banishing him from one town to another.

The verse contains other matters concerned with the law; their details should be seen in books of jurisprudence.

QUR'ÃN: this shall be as a disgrace for them in this world, and in the hereafter they shall have a grievous chastisement: al-Khizy (اَلْخِزْى = disgrace); its meaning is clear. It has been argued on the strength of this verse that if the prescribed punishment is meted out to a guilty man, it does not necessarily mean that he will not be punished in the hereafter; and it is true to a certain extent.

QUR'ÃN: Except those who repent before you have them in your power; so know that Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful: However, after one is caught and proof is established against him, the prescribed punishment is not waived. The sentence: "so know that Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful", alludes to the waiver of the said punishment. It is one of the verses where forgiveness is used for affairs other than of the next world.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! Fear Allāh and seek means of nearness to Him and strive hard in His way that you may be successful: ar-Rāghib has written in Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān: "al-Wasīlah (اَلْوَسِيْلَةُ) means attaining something with longing; it is more particular than al-waṣilah (اَلْوَصِيْلَةُ = joining, attaining) as it has added connotation of longing. Allāh says: and seek means of nearness to Him; the reality of this means of nearness to Allāh is to comply with demands of His path with knowledge and worship, and pursuit of virtues of the sharī'ah, and it is like al-qurbah (اَلْقُرْبَةُ = nearness)."

It is a sort of joining together, i.e. a spiritual joining which connects the slave with his master; there is no link that connects man with his Lord except the submissiveness of worship and veneration. Therefore, the means of nearness means ensuring the reality of veneration and turning the face of humility and poverty to His direction – this is then the connecting link that joins the servant to his Lord. As for knowledge and good deed, these are obviously its tools and concomitants, except if knowledge and deed are used to this very condition.

It is clear from the above discourse that in the clause: "and strive hard in His way", the word al-jihād (اَلْجِهَادُ = fighting, striving) has been used in its wider sense which covers both fighting the unbelievers and struggling against one's base desires and anger. There is no reason to restrict it to the fight against unbelievers, especially as the clause is connected to the preceding order to seek means of nearness to Allāh, and you have seen what it means. Moreover, the reason given in the two following verses is more appropriate to that wider connotation.

However, it is possible to restrict this jihād to the fight against unbelievers, keeping in view the Qur'ānic style: The jihād in this verse is qualified with the phrase: "in His way", and this qualification has been used in all the verses which exhort Muslims to fight the enemy; while general striving does not contain this condition, as Allāh says: And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them onto Our ways; and Allāh is most surely with the doers of good (29:69). Accordingly, the order to fight in the way of Allāh after the order to seek means of nearness to Him mentions a particular after the general for showing its importance; and probably the same is the case of the order of seeking means of nearness to Him coming after the order of fearing Allãh.

QUR'ÃN: Surely (as for) those who disbelieve even if they had what is in the earth, all of it, and the like of it with it, that they might ransom themselves with it from the punishment of the Day of Resurrection, it shall not be accepted from them, and they shall have a painful punishment. They would desire to go forth from the Fire, and they shall not go forth from it, and they shall have a lasting punishment: As we have pointed out above, the two verses apparently give the reason of the theme of the preceding verse. The three verses together enjoin people to fear Allãh, seek means of nearness to Him and fight in His way, because these are the important means for warding off the painful lasting punishment from them. That is the only relevant factor, and nothing else can take its place; because if the unbelievers (who had not feared Allãh, and had not saught any means of nearness to Him, nor had they fought in His way) had possession of all that is in the earth – and usually it is the utmost that a man desires – and then they were given again as much, and they wished to ransom themselves with it from the punishment of the Day of Resurrection, it shall not be accepted from them, and they shall have a painful chastisement; naturally they would desire to go out of the Fire but they shall not succeed, because it is a lasting punishment which would never go away from them.

The verses show that:

First: The punishment is the basic aspect which is nearer to man; it is only īmãn and piety which ward off this punishment from him, as the words of Allãh point to it: And there is not one of you but shall come down to it; this is a decided decree of your Lord. Then We shall deliver those who were pious, and We shall leave the unjust therein on their knees (19:71-72). Most surely man is in loss, except those who believe and do good, and enjoin on each other truth, and enjoin on each other patience (103:2-3).

Second: The original human nature, which feels pain from fire in this world, will not become inactive or null and void in the next world; otherwise they would not have felt pain or agony of fire, nor would have they desired to go forth from it.

QUR'ĀN: And (as for) the man who steals and the woman who steals, cut of their hands as a punishment for what they have earned, an exemplary punishment from Allāh; and Allāh is Mighty, Wise. But whoever repents after his iniquity and reforms (himself), then surely Allāh will turn to him (mercifully); surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful: "And" begins the new sentennce, and here it stands for ammā (اَمَّا = as for); that is why the predicate "cut off" has taken fā (فَا = then – not translated in English), as is usual for the clause which comes in reply of ammā; it is said by the exegetes. The word, aydi (اَيْدِ = hands) is plural, which in Arabic is used for at least three items, while here it means only two hands. It is said that such usage is common; some, rather many, organs in human body are double, like eyes, ears, hands, feet and legs; when two persons are involved the total of these organs comes to four, which demands plural, like their eyes, hands and legs, etc. The usage of plural spread to organs of two persons, even if the said organ was not double. For example, they say: 'I covered the backs and stomachs [in plural] of the two with hitting.' Allāh says: If you both turn to Allāh, then indeed your hearts [in plural] are already inclined . . . (66:4). "Hand" is used for the organ attached to shoulder; according to traditions here it refers to the right hand; cutting of hand means severing the whole or part of it with a sharp instrument.

The words: "as a punishment for what they have earned", are apparently a circumstantial clause connected to the cutting, i.e. while the cutting is a punishment from Allāh for what they have earned; an-nakāl (اَلنَّكَالُ = exemplary punishment, meted out so as to make the culprit as well as the others desist from the crime.)

As the cutting of hand is an exemplary punishment, the statement quite appropriately follows it: "But whoever repents after his iniquity and reforms (himself), then surely Allāh will turn to him (mercifully)". The meaning: As the cutting of hand is an exemplary punishment given with the aim of making the culprit desist in future from his crime, so whoever repents after his iniquity and reforms himself and does not think of stealing – and it is this factor by which repentance is established – then surely Allāh will accept his repentance and turn to him with forgiveness and mercy, because He is Forgiving, Merciful. He says: Why should Allāh chastise you if you are grateful and believe? And Allāh is the Appreciator, Knowing (4:147).

There are many other jurisprudential topics connected with this verse; interested readers should consult books of fiqh for them.

QUR'ÃN: Do you not know that Allãh – His is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth; He chastises whom He pleases; and forgives whom He pleases and Allãh has power over all things: It gives the reason why He accepts the repentance of the stealing man and woman when they repent and reform themselves after their iniquity: To Allãh belongs the kingdom of the heavens and the earth, and the King has full authority and power to decide about his kingdom and his subjects as he pleases – be it punishment or mercy. Therefore Allãh has the power and authority to chastise whom He pleases and forgive whom He pleases, according to the underlying reason and wisdom – thus He chastises the stealing man and woman if they do not repent, and forgives them if they repent.

The end clause: "and Allãh has power over all things", explains the reason of the sentence: "His is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth"; Kingdom is an aspect of power while ownership emanates from creation and origination, i.e., divine guardianship.

We may explain it as follows: Allãh is the Creator and Originator of all things; there is nothing whose self and its effects do not belong to Allãh. He is the Giver of what He gives and Withholder of what He withholds; He has power to do with every thing as He pleases – and it is the ownership. Allãh says: Say: "Allãh is the Creator of all things, and He is the One, the Subduer." (13:16). Allãh is He besides Whom there is no god, the Everliving, the Self-subsisting by Whom all subsist; slumber does not overtake Him nor sleep; whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His (2:255). Also He has power to do with all the things whatever He pleases and intends; it is because everything begins from Him, and His decree is enforced and His will effective – and it is the kingdom and rulership on everything. Thus Allãh is the Owner because everything subsists by Him, and is the King because He is Powerful, He is neither powerless nor prevented from enforcing His pleasure and will.

TRADITIONS

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from Abū Ṣāliḥ from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said, "There came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), a group from Banū Ḍubbah, (who were) sick. So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said to them, 'Stay with me; when you will recover, I shall send you in an expedition.' They said, 'Keep us out of Medina.' So he sent them to the Ibili 'ṣ-Ṣadaqah[*], they drank its (camel's) urine and ate from its milk. When they were cured and became strong, they killed three camel-herders. It (the news) reached the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and he sent ‘Alī (a.s.) to them, and lo! They were in a valley wandering, unable to go out of it, near the land of Yemen. He captured them and brought them to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). Then this verse was revealed: The punishment of those who wage war against Allãh and His Messenger and strive to make mischief in the land is only this, that they should be killed or crucified or their hands and their feet should be cut off on opposite sides or they should be banished from the land; . . ." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: ash-Shaykh has narrated it in at-Tahdhīb through his chain from Abū Ṣãliḥ (a.s.) with minor difference; and al-‘Ayyãshī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr from the same Imãm (a.s.) and there is in it at the end the addition: So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) chose to cut off their hands and feet on opposite sides.

This story is narrated in Sunnī collections of aḥãdīth (including aṣ-Ṣiḥãḥu 's-Sittah) with different chains and varying particulars. Some of those traditions say that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) cut their hands and feet on opposite sides and gouged out their eyes; others say that he killed some of them and crucified some others and cut off and gouged out eyes of yet others; others tell us that he gouged out their eyes because they had gouged out the eyes of the camel-herders; still others say that Allãh forbade him to gouge out the eyes, and that the verse was revealed admonishing him for this mutilation; some of them say that he wanted to gouge out their eyes but did not do so; etc.

However, the traditions narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) do not mention the gouging out at all

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from ‘Amr ibn ‘Uthmãn ibn ‘Ubaydullãh al-Madãinī from Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍã (a.s.) that he was asked about the words of Allãh; the Mighty, the Great: The punishment of those who wage war against Allãh and His Messenger and strive to make mischief in the land is only this, that they should be killed or crucified or their hands and their feet should be cut off on opposite sides or they should be banished from the land. "What is it that when he does it he becomes liable to one of the four (punishments)? Then he (the Imãm, a.s.) said, 'When he wages war against Allãh and His Messenger and strives to make mischief in the land and kills someone, he will be killed; and if he kills and takes (other's) property, he will be killed and crucified; and if he takes property without killing, his hand and foot will be cut off on opposite sides; and if he draws out sword, wages war against Allãh and His Messenger and strives to make mischief in the land but does not kill and does not take property, he will be banished from the land.' I said, 'How will he be banished from the land and what is the limit of his banishment?' He said, 'He shall be banished from the town where he had done what he had done to another town, and it will be written to the people of that (another) town that he has been banished, so they should not sit with him, nor should they sell anything to him, establish marriage ties with him, or take food or drink with him; this will be done to him for a year; if he leaves that town for another town, the people of that town will be informed in similar terms, until the year comes to end. I said, 'And if he proceeds to the land of polytheism to enter it?' He said, 'If he proceeds to the land of polytheism to enter it, its people will be fought against.'" (al-Kãfī)

The author says: ash-Shaykh in at-Tahdhīb and al-ʻAyyãshī in his at-Tafsīr have narrated it from Abū Isḥãq al-Madãinī from the same Imãm (a.s.); and nealy-mutawãtir traditions of this meaning have been narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.). Also it has been narrated through various Sunnī chains; and some of their traditions say that it depends on Imãm's discretion, he shall kill if he pleases, and shall crucify if he pleases, and shall cut off hands and feet on opposite sides if he pleases, and shall banish if he pleases. Some Shīʻah traditions too likewise say that the Imãm has the discretion. For example, see the tradition narrated in al-Kãfī from Jamīl ibn Darrãj from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) about this verse: He says: "I said, 'What are they liable to form these prescribed punishments that Allãh has named?' He said, 'It is upto Imãm; he shall cut off if he pleases, and banish if he pleases, and crucify if he pleases, and kill if he pleases.' I said, 'Banishment, up to where?' He (a.s.) said, 'He shall be banished from one town to another;' and said that ʻAlī (a.s.) had banished two men from Kūfah to Baṣrah." Its details may be found in fiqh. However, the verse is not without a certain indication that there is a sequence in these laid down punishments according to the levels of disorder. The alternatives – killing, crucifying, cutting of hand and foot on opposite sides and banishment – are not on the same level, on a par; they greatly differ in intensity and degree, and this in itself is a rational proof of this sequential order.

Also, the verse clearly shows that these are the laid down punishments for waging such war and making mischief in the land; so whoever draws out a sword and strives to make mischief in the land or slays someone, he will have to be killed because he is a fighter against Allãh and His Messenger and a mischief-maker; it does not come under retribution, i.e., he is not being killed because he has slayed a respectable soul; so even if the heirs of the slain person agree to take blood-money, his punishment of killing is not waived. al-ʻAyyãshī has narrated in his at-Tafsīr from Muḥammad ibn Muslim from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) a tradition which says, inter alia, "Abū ʻUbaydah said, 'May Allãh ameliorate you! (What) do you see if the heir of the slain person pardoned him (i.e. the slayer)?' Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said, 'If they pardoned, then it is incumbent on the Imãm to kill him, because he certainly had waged war, killed and stolen.' Then Abū ʻUbaydah said, 'Then if the heirs of the slain wanted to take blood-money from him and let him go free, do they have the right to do so?' He said, 'No. His (punishment) is to be killed.'"

[as-Suyūṭī] narrates from Ibn Abī Shaybah, ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Abi 'd-Dunyã (in Kitãbu 'l-Ashrãf), Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥãtim from ash-Shaʻbī that he said, "Ḥãrithah ibn Badr at-Tamīmī, a resident of Baṣrah, had made mischief in the land and waged war; and he talked with some men from Quraysh to obtain from ʻAlī a promise of security for him, but they refused. Then he came to Saʻīd ibn Qays al-Hamadãnī. So he approached ʻAlī and said, 'O Leader of the Faithful! What is the recompense of those who wage war against Allãh and His Messenger and strive to make mischief in the land?' He said, '(It is) that they should be killed or crucified or their hands and their feet should be cut off on opposite side, or they should be banished from the land.' Then (the Imãm) said, 'Except those who repent before you have them in your power.' Then Saʻīd said, 'Even if it be Ḥãrithah ibn Badr.' Thereafter, Saʻīd said, 'This is Ḥãrithah ibn Badr; he has come repenting; is he then safe?' [The Imãm, a.s.], said, 'Yes.' So [Saʻīd] brough him to ʻAlī, and he did his bayʻah; and the Imãm accepted it from him and wrote for him a warrant of safety." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: Saʻīd spoke the words, 'Even if it be Ḥãrithah

ibn Badr', as an appendix he attached to the verse, with the aim of showing its unrestricted generality which covers everyone who repents after waging war and making mischief. Such additions are found generally in every speech.

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from Sawrah Banī Kulayb that he said, "I said to Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), 'A man comes out of his house, proceeding to mosque or for some other work; another man meets him and going behind him, beats him and takes away his clothes?' (The Imãm) said, 'What do they say about it those who are in your place?' I said, 'They say that it is open immorality; and war mongering happens in the towns of polytheists.' He said, 'Which has more sanctity, the house of Islam or the house of polytheism?' I said, 'The house of Islam.' Then (the Imãm) said, 'Such people are covered by this verse: The punishment of those who wage war against Allãh and His Messenger and strive to make mischief in the land is only this, that they should be killed . . .'" (al-Kãfī)

The author says: What the narrator has pointed out concerning the opinion of the people has been narrated in some Sunnī traditions. For example, aḍ-Ḍaḥḥãk has explained the reason of its revelation in these words: "This verse was revealed about the polytheists, and aṭ-Ṭabarī has written in his at-Tafsīr that ʻAbdu 'l-Malik ibn Marwãn wrote to Anas asking him about this verse. So Anas wrote to him: 'Surely this verse was revealed about those people from the ʻArniyyīn, and they were from Bujaylah.' Anas said, 'Then they apostatized from Islam, killed the camel-herder, took away the camels, and spread terror in the way and committed adultary. So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) asked Jibrīl about the judgement regarding those who wage war. He said, "Whoever steals and spreads terror in the way and thinks unlawful hidden part as lawful, you crucify him."'" There are several other traditions.

The verse, with its generality, supports the tradition of al-Kãfī; and it is known that reason or occasion of revelation does not restrict the apparent meaning of a verse.

al-Qummī has written about the words of Allãh: O you who believe! Fear Allãh and seek means of nearness to Him . . , that (the Imãm) said, "Come near Allãh through the Imãm."

The author says: That is, through obedience to the Imãm. Thus it is based on the flow of the Qur'ãn, and applies the verse to its best import. A similar narrative has come from Ibn Shahrāshūb that he said, "The Leader of the Faithful (a.s.), said about the divine word: and seek means of nearness to Him: 'I am the means of nearness to Him.'" And nearer to it is the narration of Baṣāiru 'd-darajāt, through his chains from Salmān from ʻAlī (a.s.). Also possibly the two narratives may be a sort of interpretation. Ponder on it.

Majmaʻu 'l-bayān quotes a tradition from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said, "Ask from Allāh for me the wasīlah, as it is a rank in the Garden, will not get it except one servant, and I hope that I shall be him."

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] narrates through his chain from Abū Saʻīd al-Khudrī that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), said, 'When you ask from Allāh, ask for me the wasīlah.' We asked the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) about the wasīlah; so he said, 'It is my rank in the Garden . . .'" (It is a long narrative, known as the Ḥadīth of Wasīlah.)

If you meditate on this ḥadīth and as to how the meaning of the verse fits on it, you will find that wasīlah is the position of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in presence of his Lord, with which he gets nearer to Allāh; and joins him there his pure progeny, then the good servants from among his ummah. And it has been narrated in some traditions narrated from them that verily the Messenger of Allāh adheres to his Lord, and we adhere to him and you [the Shīʻahs] adhere to us.

And to this returns what we have written concerning the two narratives of al-Qummī and Ibn Shahrāshūb that possibly they are a sort of interpretation. Probably Allāh will help us to explain this theme in a more appropriate place further on.

Appended to these traditions is the narration of al-ʻAyyāshī from Abū Baṣīr that he said, "I heard Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.), saying, "Enemies of ʻAlī, they shall abide in the Fire; Allāh has said: and they shall not go forth from it."

Tafsīru 'l-burhān writes about the verse: And (as for) the man who steals and the woman who steals cut off their hands, quoting ash-Shaykh who narrates in at-Tahdhīb through his chain from Abū Ibrāhīm (a.s.) that he said, "The hand of the thief will be cut and his thumb and palm left (intact), and his foot will be cut and his heel left (intact) so he shall walk with it."

[ash-Shaykh] also narrates through his chain from Muḥammad ibn Muslim that he said, "I said to Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), 'In (theft of) how much will the thief's hand be cut?' He said, 'In one-fourth of dīnār.'" He (Muḥammad) says, "I told him, 'In two dirhams?' He said, 'In one-fourth of dīnār; whatever the value of dīnār may be.'" He (Muḥammad) says, "Then I said to him, 'What do you think? One who steals less than one-fourth of a dīnār, will the name of thief apply to him? And is he in that condition, a thief before Allāh?' So he said, 'Anyone who steals from a Muslim a thing which he owns and keeps preserved, the name, thief, will apply to him, and he is a thief before Allāh, yet (his hand) shall not be cut off except in one-fourth of a dīnār or more; and if the hand of a thief were to be cut off in less than one-fourth of a dīnār you would have found the people in general amputated.'" (at-Tahdhīb)

The author says: The words of the Imām (a.s.), if the hand of a thief were to be cut off in less than one-fourth of a dīnār . . ., indicate that this law of cutting of hand (with this condition) is a relief from Allāh and His mercy towards His servants. This rule, i.e., restriction of this order to the theft of one-fourth of a dīnār or more, is narrated through some Sunnī chains too; it has been narrated in aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukharī and aṣ-Ṣaḥīh oḥ Muslim through their chains from ʿĀishah that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, "Will not be cut the hand of a thief except in one-fourth of a dīnār and more."

Samāʿah narrates from Abū ʿAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said, "When a thief is caught his middle of palm will be cut off, then if he returned (stole again) his leg will be cut off from middle of foot; then if he returned he will be put in prison; then if he stole in the prison, he will be killed." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʿAyyāshī)

Zurārah narrates from Abū Jaʿfar (a.s.), (that he was asked) about a man who stole and his right hand was cut off, then he (again) stole and his left leg was cut off, and (now) he steals the third time? (The Imām) said, "The Leader of the Faithful (a.s.), used to imprison him for ever, and he used to say, 'I feel ashamed of my Lord that I should leave him without any hand with which he should cleanse himself and without any leg with which he should go for his needs.' (The Imām then) said, 'So when he cut the hand he cut it below the joint of fingers with the palm, and when he cut the leg he cut it below the ankle.' (The Imām) said, 'He did not think it proper to disregard any of the laid down punishments.'" (ibid.)

Zarqān (companion and fast friend of Ibn Abī Duwād) said, "One day Ibn Abī Duwād returned from al-Muʿtaṣim's presence and he was distressed. So I asked him about it. He said, 'Today I wish that I had died twenty years earlier.'" He (Zarqān) said, "I told him, 'Why?' He said, 'Because of what happened from this black, Abū Ja'far Muḥammad ibn 'Alī ibn Mūsā, today in presence of Amīru 'l-mu'minīn al-Mu'taṣim.'" (Zarqan says) "I said, 'And how was it?' He said, 'A thief confessed to stealing and asked the caliph to cleanse him by punishing him according to the sharī'ah. The caliph gathered jurisprudents in his presence and Muḥammad ibn 'Alī (too) was brought there. So (the caliph) asked us about the cutting (of hand), from which place it should be cut off.' He (Ibn Abī Duwād) said, 'I said, "From wrist, because Allāh says regarding tayammum: and wipe your faces and your hands [5:6];" and a group joined me in this (opinion); and some others said, "Rather it must be cut from elbow." He (the caliph) asked, "And what is its proof?" They said, "Because when Allāh said: and your hands upto elbows, regarding the washing (in wuḍū'), it proved that the limit of hand is upto elbow."' (Ibn Abī Duwād) said, 'Then he turned towards Muḥammad ibn 'Alī and said, "What do you say about it, O Abū Ja'far!" He said, "The people have already spoken about it, O Amīru 'l-mu'minīn!" He said, "Leave aside what they have said; what do you have (about it)?" He said, "Excuse me from it, O Amiru 'l-mu'minīn!" He said, "I adjure you by Allāh that you should tell (me) what you know about it." He said, "Now that you have adjured me by Allāh, I say that they have made a mistake in the sunnah; because cutting must compulsorily be at the joint of the fingers, and palm should be left (intact)." (The caliph) said, "And what is its proof?" He said, "The saying of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a. w.a.): sajdah is on seven organs: face and two hands and two knees and two feet; if his hand is cut off from wrist or elbow, he will not have a hand to do sajdah upon; and Allāh, the Blessed, the High, says: And that the places of sajdah are Allāh's, i.e. these seven organs on which sajdah is done: therefore call not upon any one with Allāh [72:18], and what is Allāh's is not cut off."' (Ibn Abī Duwād) said, 'So al-Mu'taṣim liked it (very much) and ordered the thief's hand to be cut off from the fingers' joint, below the palm.' Ibn Abī Duwād said, 'I was extremely shocked and wished that I were dead.'"

Ibn Abī Zarqān said that Ibn Abī Duwād then continued, "After the third day I went to al-Mu'taṣim and said, 'It is incumbent upon me to give sincere advice to Amiru 'l-mu'minīn; and I am going to tell him that because of which, I know, I shall enter the Fire.' He said, 'And what is it?' I said, 'When Amiru 'l-mu'minīn gathers in his presence jurisprudents and scholars of his subjects for a problem in a religious matter, and asks them about its law, and they tell him what they know of the order concerning it; and there are in that gathering his sons, commanders, ministers and secretaries; and people have heard that [question and answers] from behind his door; then he leaves aside the opinions of all of them because of one man's opinion (in whose imãmah a group of this ummah believes, and claims that that man has more right to this position than the caliph), then the caliph gives order according to that man's opinion, instead of the jurisprudents' order?' " (Ibn Abī Duwãd) said, "So his colour changed and he understood what I wanted to tell him; and said, 'May Allãh give you good reward for your sincere advice!' "

He said, "On the fourth day he ordered a certain man from among his minister-secretaries to invite [Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī] to his house. He (the Imãm) refused to accept and said, 'You know that I do not attend your gatherings.' He said, 'I only invite you for a meal, and I love that you should step on my clothes (i.e. carpets) and enter my house, so I should be blessed with your blessing; and so-and-so, son of so-and-so, a minister of the caliph, desires to meet you.' So he went to his place; when he was offered the meal, he felt the pain of poison, and (at once) called for his riding animal. The host asked him to stay; he said, 'My going out of your house is better for you.' So he remained in agony the whole day and night until he died." (ibid.)

The author says: This story has been narrated through other chains too. We have copied the whole narration, in spite of its length (like some preceding repeated traditions) because it contains some deep Qur'ãnic discourses that may help in understanding of the Qur'ãnic verses.

[as-Suyūṭī] narrates from Aḥmad, Ibn Jarīr, and Ibn Abī Ḥãtim from ʻAbdullãh ibn ʻUmar that a woman committed theft in the time of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and her right hand was cut off. So she said, "Do I have repentance? O Messenger of Allãh!" He said, "Yes. Today you are (free) from your sin like the day you were born of your mother." Then Allãh revealed the verse in the chapter of "The Table": But whoever repents after his iniquity and reforms (himself), then surely Allãh will turn to him (mercifully), surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful.

The author says: The tradition is in the style of application and looks at the connection of the verse with the preceding one. Obviously, both verses were revealed together.

COMMENTARY

The verses are interlinked revealed in a single context. Clearly they speak about a group from the People of the Book who had approached the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) regarding some laws of the Torah, hoping that he would give a judgement other than that of the Torah; and thus they would get relief from the strict ruling of their own Book. They told each other: "If you are given this – i.e. what they desired – take it; and if you are not given this – i.e. are given the same law of the Torah – then be cautious." The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) referred them to the ruling of the Torah, so they turned away from him. Also there was a group of hypocrites which had a tendency similar to that of the Jews; they wanted to put the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) into temptation, so that he might judge between them according to their desire, favouring the powerful segments of the society, as they were doing in the days of ignorance; and who is better than Allãh to judge for a people who are sure?

The verses give credence to what has been narrated regarding its reason of revelation. That they were revealed concerning the Jews when two distinguished married persons from among them committed adultery; and their religious scholars desired to change the scriptural law of stoning to flogging. So they sent some people to ask the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) for the ruling about adultery of married persons; they enjoined them to accept it if he sentenced them to flogging, and reject it if he sentenced them to be stoned. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) gave judgement for stoning, so they turned away from him. Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) asked Ibn Ṣūriyã what was the law of the Torah on this matter, and he adjured him by Allãh and His signs not to hide what he knew of the truth; so he confirmed to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) that the law of stoning was there in the Torah . . . This story will come under "Traditions", God willing.

However, the verses independently throw light on their theme; they are not restricted in their connotation to their reason of revelation. This is the case in general with all the verses, which were revealed on particular occasions; the reasons or events of their revelation have no significance except as one, among many, of their applications. It is because the Qur'ãn is a comprehensive and everlasting Book, which is not, confined to a time or space and not restricted to a particular group or event. Allãh says: . . . it is nothing but a reminder for all mankind (12:104). Blessed is He Who sent down the Furqãn to His servant so that he may be a warner to the worlds (25:1). . . . and most surely it is a Mighty Book; falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor from behind it; . . . (41:41-42).

QUR'ÃN: O Messenger! Let not those grieve you who strive together in hastening in unbelief . . .: The verse consoles the Prophet (s.a.w.a.)

and placates him because of what he had to endure at the hands of those who are mentioned here. They were those who were striving together in hastening in disbelief; they went ahead rapidly on this path; their motives of disbelief were reflected in their words and deeds one after another; thus they were unbelievers striving in unbelief. It should be noted that striving in unbelief is not the same as striving to unbelief.

The clause: "from among those who say with their mouths: 'We believe', and their hearts do not believe", describes those who strive together in hastening in unbelief, i.e., from among the hypocrites. It has given the attribute instead of naming the persons concerned, in order to describe the reason of this prohibition. Likewise, the attribute: "who strive together in hastening in unbelief", points to the reason for not grieving. Meaning therefore will be as follows, and Allãh knows better: These people should not grieve you by striving together in hastening in disbelief, because they have entered into Islam with their mouths only, not with their hearts; and they are not the believers; of the same character are the Jews who have approached you and have said what they said.

The context shows that the phrase: "and from among those who are Jews", is in conjunctive with the phrase: "from among those who say with their mouths: . . ."; it is not an independent sentence. Accordingly, the words: "listeners for the sake of a lie, listeners for another people who have not come to you", are predicate of an omitted subject, that is, they are. These sentences describe the condition of the Jews; as for the hypocrites who have been mentioned at the beginning of the verse, obviously, their condition does not fit this description. These Jews are "listeners for the sake of a lie"; they avidly listen to a lie although they know it to be a lie; otherwise they were not liable to be blamed; and they are "listeners for another people who have not come to you"; that is, they accept whatever is reported to them and do whatever they are told. This variation in the import of listening necessitated the repetation of the word, "listeners". The first indicates paying attention to while the second signifies acceptance.

The clause: "they alter the words from their places", i.e., after the words have been put in their proper places; it shows the attribute of "another people"; also with the same phrase is connected the sentence: "saying: 'If you are given this, take it, and if you are not given this, be cautious.'"

It all shows that a group of the Jews were involved in a religious problem; their Book contained clear divine order for it, but their scholars changed it knowingly; then they sent some people to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to seek his judgement on that matter, enjoining them to accept his decision if he decided according to their corrupted order, and be on guard if he decided otherwise.

The sentence: "and as for him whose temptation Allãh desires, you cannot control anything for him with Allãh", is parentetical; it shows that the Jews in this affair are enmeshed in divine temptation and trial; therefore the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) should set his mind at rest that this affair is from Allãh and it has to return to Him, and no one else has any authority on any of it; why should he feel grieved for a matter from which no one except Allãh can remove.

"Those are they for whom Allãh does not desire that He should purify their hearts": Their hearts continue to wallow in their original filth and dirtiness, because they are piling up sin over sin, so Allãh has left them to their error: . . . but and He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors [2:26].

"they shall have disgrace in this world, and they shall have a grievous chastisement in the hereafter": It is a threat that the Jews will be disgraced in this world – and it has already been done – and shall have grievous punishment in the life hereafter.

QUR'ÃN: (They are) listeners of a lie, devourers of what is forbidden: ar-Rãghib says in Mufradãtu 'l-Qur'ãn: "as-Suḥt (اَلسُّحْتُ = rind, bark which is destroyed); Allãh says: fa-yusḥitakum bi-'adhãb ('lest He destroys you by a punishment' [20:61]); it has also been recited as fa-yasḥitakum; it is said: suḥtuh and asuḥtuh; from this root is derived as-suḥt, a forbidden thing which brings shame to the user or doer, as though it destroys his religion and honour; Allãh says: devourers of what is forbidden; and the Prophet (a.s.), has said: 'All flesh that grows from forbidden things, Fire is more entitled to it;' and bribe is named suḥt."

Thus every property obtained unlawfully is suḥt (forbidden). The context shows that in this verse "what is forbidden" refers to bribe. This adjective as used here indicates that those Jewish scholars who had sent that group to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had taken bribe in that matter for altering the divine law; some people's safety was under threat because of that law, so they averted it with bribery; they took bribe and changed the order of Allãh.

It is now clear that the two phrases: "listeners of a lie, devourers of what is forbidden", taken together describe the condition of the whole nation; but taken separately, the words, "listeners of a lie", describe the attribute of preceding: those who are Jews, i.e. those who were sent to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and their companions; and: "devourers of what is forbidden", points to the preceding: another people who have not come to you. In short, the scholars of the Jews devour bribe, and their followers, the general public, listen to their lies.

QUR'ĀN: therefore if they come to you, judge between them or turn aside from them, and if you turn aside from them, they shall not harm you in any way; and if you judge, judge between them with equity; surely Allāh loves those who judge equitably: The verse leaves it to the Prophet's discretion to judge between them – when they come to him for judgement – or to turn aside from them. It is understood that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was not to choose either of the two without an underlying reason and justification. In short, the matter was left to his own outlook. Further elaborating this option, Allāh says that if the Prophet turned aside from them refusing to judge between them, they could not harm him in any way; and if he decided to judge, he was to judge with justice and equity.

Ultimately, it means that Allāh does not like them to be judged except according to His law; the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was to enforce divine law among them, if it was not acceptable to them, he should not involve himself with them because he could not apply any other law anywhere.

QUR'ĀN: And how do they make you a judge and they have the Torah wherein is Allāh's judgement? Yet they turn back after that, and these are not the believers: The verse points to a surprising behaviour of the Jews: They are a nation having their own Book and Sharī'ah; they reject your Prophethood, Book and Sharī'ah; then they are faced with a problem about which their book contains a clear divine order; yet they turn back from the Torah with its divine order, while they are not those who believe in it.

Accordingly, the phrase: "Yet they turn back after that", means: they turn back from the law concerning that event although they do have the Torah, which contains divine commandments. The phrase: "and these are not the believers", means: they do not believe in the Torah and its law; they have abandoned belief in the Book and its law, and turned to disbelief.

It is possible to take the words: "Yet they turn back", as referring to their rejection of the Prophet's judgement; and the phrase: "these are not the believers", as pointing to their disbelief in the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), even though they had come to him and sought his judgement; or it could refer to their disbelief in the Torah and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) together. But the explanation we have given earlier is more in keeping with the context.

The verse confirms to a certain extent the Torah now prevalent among the Jews. It is the book collected by Ezra by the permission of Cyrus, king of Persia, after he conquered Babylon, released the Children of Israel from captivity of Babylon, and allowed them to return to Palestine and rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem. It is the same Torah, which was in their hands during the time of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and it is the same, which they have with them today. The Qur'ãn confirms that this present Torah contains laws of Allãh, and it also says that alterations and changes have corrupted it.

The above discourse proves that the present Torah, prevalent among the Jews today, contains some parts of the original Torah sent down to Mūsã (a.s.), also many of its parts have been changed and corrupted through addition, omission, change of word or context, etc. This is the Qur'ãnic view of the Torah and extensive research leads to the same conclusion.[32]

QUR'ÃN: Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light; with it the prophets who submitted themselves (to Allãh) were judging (matters) for those who were Jews, and (so did) the Divines and the scholars, as they were required to guard (part) of the Book of Allãh, and they were witnesses thereof; therefore fear not the people and fear Me, and barter not My signs for a small price; and whoever did not judge by what Allãh revealed, those are they that are the unbelievers: It gives the reason of what was explained in the preceding verse. This and the following verses describe that Allãh had laid down for these nations, in their successive times, laws, and wrote them in the books revealed to them, in order that they should be guided by them and acquire insight through them, and they should serve as reference points in matters in which they differed; He ordered their prophets and scholars to judge matters by them; they were given the responsibility to guard the books and protect them from corruption and alteration; they were admonished not to accept any price for giving judgement – a price which was bound to be trivial [in comparison to Allāh's pleasure]; they should not fear the people, rather they should fear Allāh.

He emphasized it again and warned them of following their low desires, lest the worldly people seduce them from divinely revealed truth. He has appointed various sets of law for various people in different times, so that He might try them thoroughly; it is because abilities of times differ with changing eras, and two things which differ in strength and weakness cannot be perfected with one factor with one style.

"Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light": There was in it some guidance and some light with which the Israelites were led to some cognizance and laws adequately suitable to their condition, conforming to their capabilities. Allāh has described in His book their general behaviour and the particulars of their national affairs and limits of their understanding. Accordingly they were given a part of guidance and a part of light because they had appeared on the scene in remote past and primitive age with simple understanding; Allāh says: And We wrote for him in the tablets admonition from every thing and clear explanation of all things . . . (7:145).

"with it the prophets who submitted themselves (to Allāh) were judging (matters) for those who were Jews": The prophets followed Islam, i.e. submission to Allāh, which is the religion with Allāh. This nomenclature has been used to show that there is only one religion, and that is to submit to Allāh and not to refrain from worshipping Him. A man who believes in Allāh and submits to Him has no right to reject any of His commandments and laws.

"and (so did) the Divines and the scholars as they were required to guard (part) of the Book of Allāh, and they were witnesses thereof": The Divines, i.e., those scholars whose knowledge and action were exclusively devoted to Allāh (if the word is derived from ar-Rab (اَلرَّبُ = Lord); it may also be taken to mean those scholars who train and raise up people by their knowledge (if it is derived from at-tarbiyah (اَلتَّرْبِيَةُ = to raise up). al-Aḥbār (اَلأَحْبَارُ) are those knowledgeable and expert scholars who judge according to the divine order, and who guard the sharī'ah as contained in the Book of Allāh; and because they were its guardians and preservers, they were called its witnesses; the sacred book was safe from change and alteration because they had memorized it perfectly. The clause: "and they were witnesses thereof", is a sort of result of the phrase: "as they were required to guard (part) of the Book of Allãh". In other words, they were told to guard it, so they were guarding it by being its witnesses.

This meaning of witnessing is supported by the context. Some people have said that it refers to attesting about the Prophet's judgement of stoning that it is found in the Torah; some others have said that it means testifying for the Book that it has come from Allãh. But the context does not support either of these two interpretations in any way.

"therefore fear not the people and fear Me, and barter not My signs for a small price": It branches out from the clause: "Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light; with it the prophets . . ." Meaning: As the Torah was sent down by Us, and it contained the laws with which the prophets, the divines and the scholars judged between you, therefore you should not hide anything of it nor should you make any alteration in it, be it for fear or for greed. As for fear, it may happen, if you fear the people and forget your Lord; but you should fear Allãh only, it will liberate you from people's fear; and as for greed, it may take place if you barter the signs of Allãh for a small price, like worldly riches or glory – all of which is transitory and ephemeral.

There is also another possibility: It could have branched out from the phrase: "as they were required to guard (part) of the Book of Allãh, and they were witnesses thereof"; because the requirement to guard the Book is tantamount to take covenant for guarding it. Thus the meaning will be as follows: We made covenant with them for guarding the Book and made them witnesses for it, that they would not change it, would not be afraid of anyone except Me in making it known and would not barter My signs for small price. Allãh says: And when Allãh made a covenant with those who were given the Book: You shall certainly make it known to men and you shall not hide it; but they cast it behind their backs and took a small price for it; . . . (3:187). Then there came after them an evil posterity who inherited the Book, taking only the frail good of this low life and saying: "It will be forgiven us." And if the like good came to them, they would take it (too). Was not a promise taken from them in the Book that they would not speak anything about Allãh but the truth, and they have read what is in it? And the abode of the hereafter is better for those who guard (against evil). Do you not then understand? And (as for) those who hold fast by the Book and keep up prayer; surely We do not waste the reward of the right-doers (7:169-70).

And this second meaning is more appropriate, keeping in view the forceful emphasis at the end piece of the subsequent verse: and whoever did not judge by what Allãh revealed, those are they that are unjust.

QUR'ÃN: And We prescribed to them in it that life is for life, and eye for eye, and nose for nose, and ear for ear, and tooth for tooth, and (that there is) reprisal in wounds: The context, and especially or the mention of reprisal in wounds proves that the aim here is to describe the law of retribution in various types of felonies, like murder, cutting wounding. The contraposition in "life for life" and subsequent phrases places the avenger against the felon. It means that a life is taken in retaliation for life, an eye in reprisal of eye and so on. ba (بَ = for) is used here for exchange, as you say: "I sold it for so much."

These sentences, then, give the following meaning: A life would be taken in place of a life, an eye would be gouged for an eye, a nose would be cut for a nose, an ear would be severed for an ear, a tooth would be extracted for a tooth and there is reprisal in wounds. In short, all limbs and organs of man shall be avenged with similar limb and organ of the felon.

Probably that is the purpose of the suggestion offered by someone that: "life is for life", actually has an omitted but understood predicate, 'avenged' or 'killed'. Otherwise, there is no need of this supposition; sentences are grammatically complete without that addition.

The verse is not without a certain indication that this law is other than that for which they had come to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and which has been mentioned in preceding verses; because the context has changed with the verse: Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light.

The law described in the verse under discussion is found in the present Torah, as will be quoted in the forthcoming "Traditions", God willing.

QUR'ÃN: but he who foregoes it, it shall be an expiation for him; and whoever did not judge by what Allãh revealed, those are they that are the unjust: If the possessor of the right of retribution, like the heir of the slain, the victim of attack himself or the wounded forgives the felon and remits the retribution, then "it", i.e. this remission shall be an expiation for the sins of the remitter; or it shall be an expiation for the felon in that particular felony.

The meaning therefore is as follows: If the holder of the right of retaliation forgives the culprit, it shall be expiation for him; but if he does not forgive then he must decide according to the law revealed regarding retaliation; and whoever does not judge by what Allãh has revealed, those are the unjust people.

It clearly shows that:

First: The conjunctive: wa (وَ = and) in the clause: "and whoever did not judge", joins it with the clause: "but he who foregoes"; i.e., it does not begin a new sentence. Also, the conjunctive, fa (فَ = translated here as 'but') has the import of branching out, i.e. it makes the details grow from the general order of retaliation. It is not unlike another verse of retaliation, which inter alia says: . . . but if any remission is made to any one by his (aggrieved) brother, then (the demand for the bloodwit) should be made according to the usage, and payment should be made to him in a good manner (2:178).

Second: The clause: ″and whoever did not judge by what Allãh revealed . . .", metaphorically puts the reason in place of its effect. The full construction shall be as follows: and if he does not forego, then he should judge by what Allãh has revealed, because whoever did not judge by what Allãh revealed, those are they that are the unjust.

QUR'ÃN: And We sent after them in their footsteps 'Īsã, son of Maryam, verifying what was before him of the Torah: at-Taqfiyah (اَلتَّقْفِيَةُ = to send something behind another thing); it is derived from al-qafã (اَلْقَفَا= back); al-ãthãr (اَلآثَارُ) is plural of al-athar (أَثَرٌ = track, trace, sign), it is mostly used for footsteps; "after them" i.e. after the prophets.

The sentence: "And We sent after them in their footsteps 'Īsã, son of Maryam", is an extended metaphor, intimating that Allãh made 'Īsã (a.s.) to proceed on the same path on which had gone the preceding prophets; and it is the way of invitation to monotheism and submission to Allãh.

The clause: "verifying what was before him of the Torah", makes the preceding statement clearer; it points to the fact that the call of 'Īsã was the same as the call of Mūsã (peace be on them both), without any difference at all.

QUR'ĀN: and We gave him the Injīl in which was guidance and light, and verifying what was before it of Torah, and a guidance and an admonition for those who are pious: As the verses speak about the sharī'ah of Mūsā, 'Īsā and Muḥammad (may Allāh's blessing be on him and his progeny and on them both), and as they have been revealed concerning their Books, it proves that the Books tally with each other.

It follows that:

First: The Injīl mentioned in this verse – and it means Good News – was a book revealed to 'Īsā (a.s.); it was not merely a "good news" without a book. But Allāh has not given any detail in His Book as to how it was revealed, contrary to what He has done regarding the Torah and the Qur'ān. He says about the Torah:

He said: "O Mūsā! Surely I have chosen you above the people with My messages and with My words, therefore take hold of what I give to you and be of the grateful ones." And We wrote for him in the tablets admonition from everything and clear explanation of all things . . . (7:144-5). . . . he took up the tablets, and in the writing thereof was guidance and mercy for those who fear for the sake of their Lord (7:154).

And He says especially for the Qur'ān:

The Faithful Sprit has descended with it, upon your heart that you may be of the warners, in plain Arabic language (26:193-5). Most surely it is the Word of an honoured messenger, the possessor of strength, having an honourable place with the Lord of the Throne, one (to be) obeyed, and faithful in trust (81:19-21). In honoured books, exalted, purified, in the hands of scribes, noble, virtuous (80:13-16). Although Allāh has not mentioned anything regarding revelation of Injīl and its particulars, yet the verse under discussion mentions its revelation to 'Īsā (a.s.) side by side with the coming down of Torah on Mūsā (a.s.), and revelation of the Qur'ān on Muḥammad (may Allāh's blessings be on him and his progeny) and it proves that Injīl too was a book like the other two.

Second: Allāh says about Injīl: in which was guidance and light, parallel to what He had said about Torah [in 5:44]: Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light; these words point to the cognition and laws contained in the Book. He says at the end of this very verse 5:46 [about Injīl]: and a guidance and an admonition for those who are pious. By putting the two phrases [about Injīl] side by side, it is understood that the guidance mentioned in the former phrase is something separate from the one mentioned in the latter phrase and which has been explained as admonition. The former guidance is related to cognition, which guides in matters of faith and belief, while the latter refers to that cognition which leads one to fear of Allãh and piety in religion.

Now, what is meant by light? It can only mean the laws and sharī'ah; and meditation gives support to this interpretation. The laws of religion are the light, which illuminates the path of life and man proceeds in that light to his destination. Allãh says: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, . . . (6:122).

It is now clear that the guidance, mentioned first in description of the Torah and the Injīl, refers to matters of faith and belief; like Oneness of God and resurrection; and the light in both places denotes sharī'ah and laws; while the guidance mentioned second time as attribute of the Injīl refers to sermon and admonition. And Allãh knows better.

Also, now one may understand the reason of repetition of "guidance" in the verse; it is because the second "guidance" is different from the first one; in the second instance, in the phrase: "a guidance and an admonition", there is an explicative apposition, inasmuch as "admonition" gives the meaning of "guidance". And Allãh knows better.

Third: The phrase: "and verifying what was before it of Torah", as attribute of Injīl, is not a repetition for the sake of emphasis[33], etc.; rather it denotes that Injīl follows the sharī'ah of Torah, because there was nothing in Injīl other than confirmation of Torah's sharī'ah and call to follow it. Of course, there were a few exceptions made by 'Īsã (a.s.), as Allãh quotes him as saying: . . . and that I may allow you part of that which has been forbidden you, . . . (3:50).

Its proof is seen in the next but one verse: And We have revealed to you the Book with the truth, verifying what is before it of the Book and a guardian over it, as will be explained in the "Commentary".

QUR'ÃN: and a guidance and an admonition for those who are pious: This clause has already been explained. It proves that the Injīl revealed to ʻĪsā paid special care to piety, in addition to matters of belief and faith and practical laws which were found in the Torah. Although the Qur'ān does not verify totally the Torah which is in their hands today; and although the four Gospels attributed to Mathew, Marks, Luke and John, are not the same Injīl which Qur'ān says was revealed to ʻĪsā himself, yet they all confirm this matter, as will be explained later, God willing.

[33] In fact, there is no repetition at all. The first clause: And We sent . . . 'Īsã . . ., verifying what was before him, is an attribute of 'Īsã (a.s.), while this second one describes Injīl's position. (tr.)

QUR'ĀN: And the people of the Injīl should have judged by what Allāh revealed in it; and whoever did not judge by what Allāh revealed, those are they that are the transgressors: Allāh had revealed in the Injīl confirmation and verification of the Torah in its laws, except some abrogated rules which were described in the Book revealed to ʻĪsā (a.s.); obviously when Injīl verified the laws of Torah and made lawful some things which had been forbidden in it, then following the Torah in its laws – except those unlawful things which were made lawful by Injīl – was tantamount to obeying the law of Injīl.

Some exegetes have claimed on the strength of this verse that Injīl too contained, like Torah, elaborated laws and sharīʻah; but the explanation given above show the weakness of this claim.

The statement: "and whoever did not judge by what Allāh revealed, those are they that are the transgressors", puts emphasis on the order contained in the preceding sentence: "And the people of the Injīl should have judged . . ." Allāh has repeated this sentence three times with minor difference all for emphasis; twice relating to the Jews and once regarding the Christians; as He has said: and whoever did not judge by what Allāh revealed, those are they that are the unbelievers [5:44]. . . . those are they that are the unjust [5:45]. . . . those are they that are the transgressors [5:47]. In this way, their disbelief, injustice, and transgression have officially been put on record.

What is the reason that the Christians have been called transgressors while the Jews were described as unbelievers and unjust? It is because the Christians changed monotheism to trinity and abandoned the laws of Torah; they were misled by Paul who preached that ʻĪsā had brought an independent religion, separate from that of Mūsā, and that that new religion had abrogated all laws through ʻĪsā's atonement; thus the Christians went out of the fold of monotheism and its sharīʻah through mistaken interpretation; so they transgressed the boundary of the true divine religion. Transgression means exit of a thing from its prescribed place, like exit of the core of date from its cover.

As for the Jews, they had no doubt whatsoever about the religion of Mūsã (a.s.); they had rejected knowingly the laws and beliefs, which they had, full knowledge of; and it was nothing but injustice and disbelief in Allãh's signs.

It should however be noted that the three verses, i.e.: and whoever did not judge by what Allãh revealed, those are they: that are the unbelievers; that are the unjust; that are the transgressors, are unrestricted; they are not confined to any one group, religion or nation, although here they have been applied to the People of the Book.

There is a difference of opinion among exegetes regarding the import of the unbelief of him who does not judge by what Allãh has revealed, e.g., a judge who decides a case contrary to what Allãh has revealed, or a ruler who rules against what Allãh has revealed, or an innovator who invents a system other than that of divine religion. This question comes under the purview of fiqh. The fact is that violation of any rule of the sharī'ah or any other established matter of religion, when one knows that it is an established fact and then rejects it, is disbelief, if one violates it, knowing its factuality but without rejecting it, it is transgression. But of one does not know that it is an established religious matter and then rejects it, it is neither disbelief nor transgression, because it is an excusable incapability (except if there was negligence in investigation of facts and proofs). See books of fiqh for details.

QUR'ÃN: And We have revealed to you the Book with the truth, verifying what is before it of the Book and a guardian over it: Haymanah (هَيْمَنَة) of a thing over another thing entails its authority over it, involving its protection, safety and management. This describes the position of the Qur'ãn, which Allãh says is explanation of everything vis-à-vis the previous divine books. It preserves from those books' contents, the permanent unchangeable fundamentals and abrogates what deserves it from the subsidiary items that are liable to change and alteration, in order to make it conform to man's position, keeping in view his step-by-step development and perfection with passage of time. Allãh says: Surely this Qur'ãn guides to that which is most upright (17:9). Whatever signs We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, We bring one better than it or like it (2:106). Those who follow the Messenger, the Prophet, the Ummī*, whom they find written down with them in the Torah and the Injīl*, (who) enjoins them good and forbids them evil, and makes lawful to them the good things and makes unlawful to them impure things, and removes from them their burden and the shackles which were upon them; so (as for) those who believe in him and honour him and help him, and follow the light which has been sent down with him, these it is that are the successful (7:157).

The phrase: "a guardian over it", is an explanatory conclusion of the preceding, verifying what is before it of the Book; without it the mention of verification could cause a misunderstanding that the Qur'ān confirmed the laws of the Torah and the Injīl and let them continue without any change; but with this phrase in place, the verification only means that the Qur'ān accepts that those laws and cognitive matters had truly come from Allāh and Allāh has full power to manage them as He pleases, He may abrogate them or may complete them with other laws, as He points to it in this very verse: and if Allāh had pleased He would have made you (all) a single people, but that He might try you in what He gave you.

Therefore, the words: "verifying what is before it", mean that the Qur'ān has kept intact that part of the law and knowledge of Injīl which were suitable for this ummah, as such the consequent addition, omission or abrogation was not contrary to this verification – in the same way as 'Īsā (a.s.) and his Injīl had verified the Torah even when they had made lawful some things prohibited by the Torah, as Allāh quotes him as saying: And a verifier of that which is before me of the Torah and that I may allow you part of that which has been forbidden you . . . (3:50).

QUR'ĀN: therefore judge between them by what Allāh has revealed, and do not follow their (low) desires (diverging) from the truth that has come to you: As the sharī'ah, which has been revealed to you and is contained in the Book, is truth, and as it is truth when it tallies with the Books revealed earlier, and is truth when it goes against those Books, because it is a guardian over them, therefore you are inevitably required to judge between the People of the Book (as is apparently supported by the preceding verses), or between the people (as is supported by following verses), by what Allāh has revealed to you; you should not follow their desires or turn away from the truth that has come to you.

The above discourse shows that the pronoun in: "judge between them", may refer to the People of the Book or to the people in general. But the first alternative necessitates taking the phrase as meaning, judge between them if you decide to judge, because Allãh had not obligated him to judge between the People of the Book, but had left it to his discretion whether he wanted to judge or turned aside from them. He says: therefore if they come to you, judge between them or turn aside from them [5:42]. Moreover, Allãh has at the beginning of this set of verses, mentioned the hypocrites together with the Jews. So there is no reason why the pronoun, "them", should be taken to refer to the Jews only when another group was mentioned together with them. Therefore, looking at it in this context, the second alternative seems more appropriate, i.e. judge between the people.

Obviously, the words: "do not follow their desires from the truth", are well connected and they imply divergence from the truth.

QUR'ÃN: for every one of you did We appoint a law and a way: ar-Rãghib says in his Mufradãtu 'l-Qur'ãn: "ash-Shar' (اَلشَرْعُ) is the way of a clear path; it is said: 'I opened for him a path.' ash-Shar' is a maṣdar, then it was used as a noun for open path; it is pronounced ash-shir', ash-shar' and ash-sharī'ah; then it was used for the divine path; Allãh says: a law and a way . . . Some people have said, 'The sharī'ah was given this name to liken it to drinking place.'"

Probably, the case is vice versa, i.e., the drinking place was the original meaning which was then borrowed for the law; because they knew clearly the ways to water holes, etc. which were frequently visited by them. And he has said: "an-Nahj (اَلنَهْجُ) is clear path; nahaja 'l-amr and anhaja both mean the matter became clear; manhaj and minhãj of path mean open road."

MEANING OF SHARĪ'AH AND DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SHARĪ'AH, DĪN AND MILLAH IN QUR'ÃNIC USAGE

Sharī'ah, as you have seen, means path and religion; likewise millah is an adopted path. However, apparently the Qur'ãn uses the word, sharī'ah in a meaning more particular than dīn (religion). For proof, see the verse: Surely the religion with Allãh is Islam . . . (3:19).

And whoever seeks a religion other than Islam, it shall not be accepted from him, and in the hereafter he shall be one of the losers (3:85); when read together with the verse under discussion: for every one of you did We appoint a law and a way, and the verse: Then We have made you follow a course in the affair, therefore follow it . . . (45:18).

Thus, sharī'ah is the way prepared for an ummah or a prophet who was sent with it, as we say, sharī'ah of Nūḥ, sharī'ah of Ibrãhīm, sharī'ah of Mūsã, sharī'ah of 'Īsã and sharī'ah of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.); and religion is the divine course and system which covers all nations; so sharī'ah is liable to abrogation but not religion in its wider sense.

There is one more difference: Religion is attributed to singular or plural whatever their position; but sharī'ah is not attributed to a singular unless it be its Legislator or its principle head who manages it. They say: Muslims' religion, Jews' religion, Muslims' sharī'ah, Jews' sharī'ah; again they say: Allãh's religion, Allãh's sharī'ah, Muḥammad's religion, Muḥammad's sharī'ah; Also they say: Zayd's religion, 'Amr's religion, but they never say: Zayd's sharī'ah or 'Amr's sharī'ah. May be it is so because the term, sharī'ah, carries a hint of incidental happening, an allusion of preparing and paving the path. It is perfectly right to say: the path prepared by Allãh, the way laid down for the prophet or for a certain ummah; but it is not right to say: the way which was laid down for Zayd, because Zayd has no particular connection to it.

In any case, it is inferred from the above that sharī'ah's meaning is more particular than that of religion. As for the verse, 42:13 (He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ, and that which We have revealed to you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrãhīm and Mūsã and 'Īsã . . .), it does not go against it, because it shows that the sharī'ah of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), laid down for his ummah is the sum total of what was enjoined upon Nūḥ, Ibrãhīm, Mūsã and 'Īsã (peace be upon them), added to what was revealed to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). It is either an allusion to the fact that Islam [is a comprehensive religion which] combines the merits of all previous sharī'ah plus the excellence of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.)'s revelation, or it aims at proving that all the laws do have a single reality and essence, even though they were somewhat different among themselves because the people for whom they were sent had different [intellectual and social] standards; as is hinted or proved by the words of verse 13 of chapter 42 coming after the clause quoted above: . . . that establish the religion and be not divided therein.

Religion is one and unalterable, while laws differ [from nation to nation, time to time, and] are liable to abrogation. The relationship of a particular sharī'ah with religion is like that of minor rules of Islam (with their abrogator and abrogated ones) with the basic religion. Allãh has not obligated His servants except to adhere to one religion, i.e. submission to Him; but He has taken them to that destination through different paths, legislating for them various systems according to their various abilities, and these are the laws of Nūḥ, Ibrãhīm, Mūsã, 'Īsã and Muḥammad (may Allãh's blessing be upon him and his progeny and on them); exactly as He sometimes abrogated within one sharī'ah some laws replacing them with others because the abrogated law had lost its benefit and the abrogator one had become more appropriate and beneficial. See for example the replacement of the punishment of life-imprisonment for a fornicatress with flogging and stoning, etc. This is proved by the divine words: and if Allãh had pleased He would have made you (all) a single people, but that He might try you in what He gave you . . .

As for millah, it is as though it points to norms and customs observed by people in their lives; and it probably has a shade of meaning of imlã' (إِمْلاَءُ) and imlãl (إِمْلاَل) i.e., 'dictation'; as such it would be a custom handed down by others; its root meaning is not so clear; therefore more likely it is synonymous to sharī'ah inasmuch as, contrary to religion, milla like sharī'ah denotes a system and way related to a particular group; yet there is difference between the two: sharī'ah is used for the system or way keeping in view the reality that it has been laid down by Allah for people's use; while millah is used for the system as it is handed down practically among the people generation after generation. Probably that is the reason that millah is not ascribed to Allãh in genitive construction, i.e. they never say, millah of Allãh, while they say, religion of Allãh, sharī'ah of Allãh.

However, it is ascribed to a prophet to denote his tradition and habit, or to an ummah because they follow and observe that custom and tradition. Allãh says: . . . the millah of Ibrãhīm, the upright one, and he was not of the polytheists (2:135); and Allãh quotes Yūsuf (a.s.) as saying: . . . surely I have forsaken the millah of a people who do not believe in Allãh, and they are deniers of the hereafter; and I follow the millah of my fathers, Ibrãhīm and Isḥãq and Ya'qūb . . . (12:37-38). And He quotes the unbelievers' threat to their prophets:

. . . We will most certainly drive you forth from our land, or else you shall come back into our millah . . . (14:13).

It is thus seen that dīn (religion) in Qur'ānic usage is more general than sharī'ah and millah; and these two are synonymous, with some difference in their usage.

QUR'ĀN: and if Allāh had pleased He would have made you* (all) a single people, but that He might try you in what He gave you: It gives the reason why there were sent various laws. Making all a single people does not mean making them a single species, because all of them already belong to a single species living in the same way, as Allāh says: And were it not that all people would have been a single nation, We would certainly have assigned to those who disbelieve in the Beneficent God (to make) of silver the roofs of their houses and the stairs by which they ascend (43:33).

Rather it means treating whole mankind as a single people considering them to be on a single level of intellectual capacity and social behaviour, in which case a single set of laws would have been made for all, because of proximity of their ranks. Accordingly, the clause: "if Allāh had pleased He would have made you (all) a single people", has metaphorically put the reason of condition in place of condition; the idea is to make the meaning of the following clause clearer: "but that He might try you in what He gave you", that is, He might test you with the favours He bestowed on you. Naturally, the favours, pointed to in the verse, differed from nation to nation. The differences were not based on their habitations, languages and colours, because Allāh had never sent more than one sharī'ah in one period; rather the differences occurred by passage of time because of man's gradual development intellectually and socially. Divinely prescribed responsibilities and laid down laws are but means of trial with which Allāh tests man in various stages of life. In other words He brings man's potential to fulfilment, be it on the side of felicity or infelicity. You may say that it is done for differentiating the party of Allāh from the party of Satan. These different expressions used above have been taken from the divine Book, and sum total of all is the same. Allāh says keeping in view the aspect of test: . . . and We bring these days to men by turns and that Allāh may know those who believe and take witnesses from among you; and Allāh loves not the unjust; and that Allāh may purge those who believe and eradicate the unbelievers. Do you think that you will enter the Garden while Allāh has not yet known those who strive hard from among you, and (He has not) known the patient! (3:140-2). There are many verses of this theme.

As for the bringing man's potential to fulfilment, Allãh says: So if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy. And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life, and We will raise him, on the Day of Resurrection, blind (20:123-4).

And He says regarding the third aspect (i.e., distinguishing the party of Allãh from that of Satan): And when your Lord said to the angels: "Surely I am going to create a mortal of the essence of black mud fashioned in shape . . ." [Satan] said: "My Lord! Because Thou hast left me to stray, I will certainly make (evil) fair seeming to them on earth, and I will certainly cause them all to deviate, except Thy servants from among them, the freed ones." He said: "This is a straight path with Me: Surely as regards My servants, thou hast no authority over them except those who follow thee of the deviators. And surely Hell is the promised place of them all." (15:28-43). There are many such verses.

In short, Allãh had bestowed on mankind different types of capabilities and potentialities in different times and eras; also the divine laws, whose enforcement among them was essential in order to complete their lives' felicity were sent for man's test which varies according to the variance in examinees' abilities – all these factors together had caused difference in various laws. That is why Allãh has said that this difference of laws has happened because He has wished to test and examine you in what He has bestowed on you of His favours, as He says: for every one of you did We appoint a law and a way, and if Allãh had pleased He would have made you (all) a single people.

The meaning of this verse is then as follows, and Allãh knows better: For each nation from among you We have laid down and legislated a different law and distinct way; if Allãh had pleased He would have made you (creatively) a single nation and legislated for you a single set of law. But He has laid down for you different laws in order to test you in what He has given you of various favours. This difference in favours demanded difference in test (which in their turn) give rise to divine laws and legislations. Naturally there was difference in various laws.

The different nations mentioned here are those of Nūḥ, Ibrãhīm, Mūsã, ‘Īsã and Muḥammad (may Allãh's blessing be upon him and his progeny and on them) as He says describing His favours on this ummah: He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and that which We have revealed to you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and ʻĪsā . . . (42:13).

QUR'ĀN: therefore strive with one another to hasten to virtuous deeds; to Allāh is the return of all of you, then He will let you know that in which you differed*: al-Istibāq (اَلإِسْتِبَاقُ = to vie, to compete) is derived from the root as-sabq (اَلسَبْقُ = to get ahead of some one); al-marjaʻ (اَلْمَرْجَعُ = return) is a maṣdar derived from ar-rujūʻ (اَلرُجُوْعُ = return). The speech has branched out as a concomitant from the preceding: for every one of you did We appoint a law and a way. The meaning: And We have prescribed for you this true sharīʻah which is superior to all previous ones, and it contains your good and welfare, therefore you should vie with each other to hasten to good deeds, i.e., the divinely prescribed laws and responsibilities; you should not entangle yourselves in the differences that are there between you and the others, because all of you are to return to your Lord, and then He will let you know that in which you differed, and will judge between you clearly and decide with justice.

QUR'ĀN: And that you should judge between them by what Allāh has revealed, . . . many of the people are transgressors*: The beginning of the verse: "And that you should judge between them by what Allāh has revealed, and do not follow their low desires", corresponds with the clause in the preceding verse: therefore judge between them by what Allāh has revealed, and do not follow their (low) desires; then the two separate in their ramifications, and one realizes that the repetition has occurred for this purpose. The former verse tells them to judge by what Allāh has revealed and admonishes them not to follow their low desires – because this sharīʻah revealed by Allāh is the one prescribed for the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and his people. Therefore, it is incumbent upon them to vie with one another in virtuous deeds. The latter verse orders them to judge by what Allāh has revealed and not to follow their low desires – explaining that if they turned back from what Allāh has revealed, it would show that Allāh has left them in their error on account of their transgression. Allāh has said: . . . He causes many to err by it and many He leads aright by it; but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26).

It results from the above that this verse elaborates some themes of the preceding verse which needed more explanation: The only reason that people of low desire turn away from following what Allãh has revealed with truth is that they are transgressors; Allãh desires to afflict them on account of some of their sins which have caused their transgression. This affliction apparently means that He leaves them to err. Thus the clause: "And that you should judge between them by what Allãh has revealed", is in conjunction, as has been said, with the word, "Book", in the preceding verse's opening sentence: And We have revealed to you the Book . . . In that case, it is more appropriate to take the al (اَلْ = the) in, "the Book", as connoting a new occurence; the meaning then will be as follows: We have revealed to you the laws which have been prescribed for them, and that you should judge between them by what Allãh has revealed.

"and be cautious of them, lest they seduce you from part of what Allãh has revealed to you": Here Allãh warns His Prophet against their seduction and temptation, although he (s.a.w.a.) was ma'ṣūm and sinless through divine protection. It is because the power of 'iṣmah (sinlessness) does not nullify the free will and choice, nor does it repeal the laws based on that will and choice. Iṣmah is in fact an academic and intellectual aptitude; knowledge and perception do not deprive practical powers and faculties from their middle position between doing and not doing. It is these faculties, which move the limbs and organs of a man and cause his activities.

For example, a sure knowledge that a certain food is poisoned prevents man from taking that food. But the organs used in eating, like hand, mouth, tongue, and teeth may perform their activities in this eating, or they may remain inert although they could possibly become active; so the action is within power, although it has become like impossible to do because of that knowledge.

We have written to some extent on this topic when explaining the verse: . . . and they shall not harm you in any way, and Allãh has revealed to you the Book and the Wisdom, and He has taught you what you did not know, and Allãh's grace on you is very great (4:113).

"But if they turn back, then know that Allãh desires to afflict them on account of some of their faults": As mentioned above, it describes that they were left to err because of their transgression. This clause reverts to the initial theme of this set of verses, where it says: O Messenger! Let not those grieve you who strive together in hastening in unbelief . . . [5:41]. The verse aims at putting the Prophet's mind at rest and cheers him up; it teaches him that which would keep grief and sorrow away from his heart. This is what Allāh has done in most of the places where He has told him not to grieve if the unbelievers turn away from the true Call or disdain to accept, that which would lead them to the path of guidance and success. So Allāh explained to him that they were not going to weaken the kingdom of Allāh, nor were they to overwhelm Him; it is Allāh Who is dominant in His affairs; it is He Who leaves them to err because of their transgression, makes their hearts deviated because of their deviation, and puts uncleanness on them by removing His help from them and luring them into evil. Allāh says: And let not those who disbelieve think that they shall come in first; surely they will not escape (8:59). So, as all matters are in Allāh's hand, and He drives away all types of uncleanness from His clean religion, so nothing can escape from Him if He wants it; therefore there was no cause to grieve, as nothing was lost.

Probably, that is the reason that Allāh has said: "but if they turn back, then know that Allāh desires to afflict them on account of some of their faults"; instead of saying, 'but if they turn back, then Allāh desires . . .' or some other expression to that effect. In its present structure the verse intends to teach the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that their turning back is caused by divine subjugation, as such it should not cause grief to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); he is a Messenger inviting people to the way of his Lord; if anything grieves him it should do so because Allāh's will is predominant in the affairs of religious Call. As nothing can overcome Allāh's will, and it is He Who leads them here and there by His subjugation, helping some and leaving some in their deception, therefore there was no reason to be grieved.

Allāh has explained this reality in other words: Then may be you will kill yourself with grief, sorrowing after them, if they do not believe in this announcement. Surely We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment for it, so that We may try them (as to) which of them is best in deed. And most surely We will make what is on it bare ground without herbage. (18:6-8) Thus Allāh has made it clear that the aim of sending messengers, and their coming with religious warning and good news was not that all people should enter into the fold of true religion, as a man plans and thinks concerning his requirements and needs. The only purpose of this all is to test the people and put them on trial, so that it may be known who is best in deed. Otherwise, this world and all that is in it is going to perish very soon, nothing will remain except a bare ground, free from these disbelievers who turn away from the speech of truth, and cleansed from all their hearts' attachments. So, there is no reason to be sorry, because it is not going to bring any failure in Our endeavours, nullify Our power or cause weariness in Our will.

"and most surely many of the people are transgressors": As mentioned earlier, it gives the reason of the preceding sentence: then know that Allãh desires to afflict them on account of some of their sins.

QUR'ÃN: Is it then the judgement of (the times of) ignorance that they desire? And who is better than Allãh to judge for a people who are sure?: This question branches out from the theme of the preceding verse that describes their turning back from what is in reality the judgement of Allãh that was revealed to them and which, they knew very well, was truth. Also possibly the verse may be taken as the conclusion of the themes of previous verses.

Its meaning: As these laws and rules are the truth revealed by Allãh, and as other than these there is no true sharī'ah, there is nothing besides them except the system of the days of ignorance, emanating from low desires. What do these people, who turn aside from judgement of truth, want after all? There is noting else except the judgement of the Days of Ignorance. Do they then want that judgement, when there is no one better than Allãh to judge for these people who claim to be believers?

So, the sentence: "Is it the judgement of (the time of) ignorance that they desire?" is a reprimand in the form of question; and: "who is better than Allãh to judge?" Is a question with implied negative reply, i.e. no one is better than Allãh to judge, and a judgement is followed because of its good. The clause: "for a people who are sure", is an insinuation to them that if they are truthful in their claim of believing in Allãh, then they are sure of His signs; and those who are sure of His signs deny that any one can be better than Allãh in judgement.

It should be noted that these verses in several places turn from singular or plural first person pronoun to that of third person and vice versa. For example, the clause: surely Allãh loves those who judge equitably, followed by: Surely We sent down Torah, which is followed by: as they were required to guard (part) of the Book of Allãh, after which comes: and fear Me, and so on. Whenever the third person uses the proper Divine Name: Allãh, it reflects on the importance of the subject. Where the first person singular pronoun is used, it shows that all affairs are in the hand of Allãh alone, without any interference from any friend or intercessor. If the verse speaks of any good promise or attraction, it is Allāh who is going to manage it and He is the Most Noble of those who fulfil their promise. If it contains a threat or warning then it is really most troublesome and hardest and no friend or intercessor can avert it from man, because the matter is in Allāh's hand alone. And He [by using singular pronoun] has nullified every intermediate link and rejected every intervening cause. Ponder on it; and some aspects of it have been described earlier.

TRADITIONS

Majmaʿu 'l-bayān narrates under the verse: O Messenger! Let not those grieve you who strive together in hastening in unbelief . . ., from al-Baqir (a.s.) that he said, "A woman of high status in Khaybar committed adultery with a man of high rank from among them – and both had spouses. So they did not like to stone them. They sent (some one) to the Jews of Medina and wrote to them to ask the Prophet about it, hoping that he would allow them some latitude. So a group of them, including Kaʿb ibn al-Ashraf, Kaʿb ibn Usayd, Shuʿbah ibn ʿAmr, Mālik ibn aṣ-Ṣayf and Kināhah ibn Abi 'l-Ḥaqīq, etc., went (to the Prophet, s.a.w.a.) and said, 'O Muḥammad! Tell us about a fornicator and a fornicatress, when they have their spouses, what is the prescribed punishment for them?' He said, 'And will you agree to my judgement in this?' They said, 'Yes.' So Jibrīl came down with (the order of) stoning. (The Prophet) told it to them; they refused to accept it. Jibrīl said, 'Make Ibn Ṣūriyā (arbitrator) between you and them;' and gave his particulars to (the Prophet).

"So the Prophet said, 'Do you know a young man, beardless, white, one-eyed, who lives in Fadak and is called Ibn Ṣūriyā?' They said, 'Yes.' He said, 'What position does he have among you? They said, '(He is) the most knowledgeable Jew (living on the face of the earth) of what Allāh had revealed to Mūsā.' He said, 'Then you send (message) to call him.' They did so, and ʿAbdullāh ibn Ṣūriyā came to them.

"So the Prophet said to him, 'I adjure you by Allāh, that which there is no god but He, and Who sent down Torah to Mūsā, and parted the sea for you, and delivered you and drowned the people of Pharaoh, and made the clouds to give shade over you and sent to you manna and quails, do you find in your Book (the punishment of) stoning for the one who commits adultery while having a spouse?' Ibn Ṣūriyã said, 'Yes. By Him Whom you have reminded me, if it were not for the fear that the Lord of Torah would burn me down if I lied or changed, I would not have confessed to you. However, (now) you tell me how it is in your Book, O Muḥammad!' He said, 'When four witnesses of approved probity testify that he had entered into her as kohl stick enters kohl container, then he becomes liable to stoning.' Ibn Ṣūriyã said, 'Exactly like it had Allãh revealed to Mūsã in Torah.'

Then the Prophet said to him, 'What was the first time you became lax in the judgement of Allãh?' He said, '[It was our custom that] when a man of status committed adultery, we did nothing to him, and when a weak person did so, we enforced the punishment to him; thus fornication increased in our high class society, until a cousin of one of our kings committed adultery and we did not subject him to stoning. Then another man committed the same and the King wanted to stone him. But the man's people told the King, "Never, until you stone that person, i.e., the King's cousin." So we said, "Come together, so that we lay down something below stoning that will be applied to men of high and low status both." Thus we laid down flogging and taḥmīm, that is, the fornicator and fornicatress should each be flogged forty strokes, then their faces be blackened, and they be put on two donkeys their faces being towards the donkey's posterior, and they be made to go round (the town). They prescribed it in place of stoning.'

"The Jews then said to Ibn Ṣūriyã, 'How quickly you told him (everything); you did not deserve what we had said about you, but you were absent, and we did not like to slander your reputation.' He said, 'He adjured me by Torah, otherwise I would not have informed him.'

The Prophet gave his judgement and the two were stoned near the door of his mosque. And he said, 'I am the first to revive your judgement when they had made it dead.' Then Allãh revealed in this connection: O People of the Book! Indeed has come to you Our Messenger making clear to you much of what you concealed of the Book and passing over much. Then Ibn Ṣūriyã stood up and put his hands on the knees of the Messenger of Allãh and said, 'This is the place of the one who seeks protection by Allãh and you, that you should not mention to us the "much" which you have been told to pass over.' So the Prophet did not mention it.

"Then Ibn Ṣūriyã asked him about his sleep. He (the Prophet) said, 'My eyes sleep but my heart does not sleep.' He said, 'You said the truth; now tell me (why) a child resembles his father and has no resemblance with his mother at all, or resembles his mother without having any resemblance to his father.' He said, 'The water of whichever of the parents tops that of the other, his or her resemblance will prevail.' He said, 'You said the truth; now tell me which parts of the child belong to the man and which to the woman?'" (The Imām, a.s.), said, "Then the Messenger of Allāh went into trance for a long time; then he came out of it, with ruddy face and pouring sweat; and he said, 'Flesh, blood, nail and fat belong to the woman, and bone, sinew and veins belong to the man.' He said, 'You said the truth; your affairs are those of a prophet.'

"So Ibn Ṣūriyā accepted Islam at this stage. And he said, 'O Muḥammad! Which of the angels comes to you?' He said, 'Jibrīl. He said, 'Describe his attributes to me; and the Prophet described it.' He said, 'I bear witness that he is in Torah as you have said and that you are truly the Messenger of Allāh.'

"When Ibn Ṣūriyā accepted Islam, the Jews quarrelled with him and abused him.

"When they wanted to leave, Banū Qurayẓah caught the hold of Banu 'n-Naḍīr and said, 'O Muḥammad! (These are) our brothers, Banu 'n-Naḍīr, our father is one, and our religion is one, and our prophet is one. When they slay one of us, (the slain one) is not avenged [i.e. his killer is not killed], rather they give us his blood money seventy wasaq[34] of date; and when we slay one of them, they kill the killer and take from us double the amount, one hundred and forty wasaq of date. If the slain one is a woman, they kill (in her retaliation) one of our men, and (they kill) two of our men in place of their one man, and one of our free men in place of their slave; and our wounds are recompensed at half of their wounds. Therefore, you judge between them and us. So, Allāh revealed the verse about stoning and retaliation.'"

The author says: aṭ-Ṭabrisī has also narrated in Majma'u 'l-bayān, through a group of exegetes, in addition to his narration from al-Bāqir (a.s.). Also, there are traditions in Sunnī *tafsīr*s and collections of aḥādīth, somewhat nearer to the beginning of the above story, narrated through several chains from Abū Hurayrah, Barā' ibn 'Āzib, 'Abdullāh ibn 'Umar, Ibn 'Abbās and others. The traditions are nearer in meaning to each other. The end part of the tradition has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd and Abu 'sh-Shaykh from Qatādah, and from Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Isḥāq, aṭ-Ṭabarānī, Ibn

Abī Shaybah, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and others from Ibn ʻAbbās.

As for the confirmation (in the tradition) by Ibn Ṣūriyã that the order of stoning was found in the Torah, and that it was the meaning of the verse: And how do they make you a judge and they have the Torah . . ., it is also supported by the fact that nearly similar order is found in the Torah which is prevalent among them, as may be seen in the Deuteronomy, ch. 22, vs. 22-24:

22. If a man be found lying with a woman married to an husband, then they shall both of them die, both the man that lay with the woman, and the woman: so shalt thou put away evil from Israel.
23. If a damsel that is a virgin be betrothed unto an husband, and a man find her in the city, and lie with her;
24. Then ye shall bring them both out unto the gate of that city, and ye shall stone them with stones that they die; the damsel, because she cried not, being in the city; and the man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife: so thou shalt put away evil from among you.[35]

As you have seen, this reserves stoning for some eventualities.

As for the report in the tradition that they had also asked the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) about the law of blood money, apart from their question regarding the law of adultery, it has been written earlier that the verses are not without some support to it. As for the order of retaliation of slaying and wounding which the verse says was prescribed in the Torah, this too is found in the present Torah, as may be seen in Exodus, ch. 21, vs. 12-13 & 23-25:

12. He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death.
13. And if a man lie not in wait, but God deliver him into his hand; then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee.

. . . . . .

23. And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life,
24. Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot,
25. Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe.

Further, the Leviticus, ch. 24, vs. 17-20, says:

17. And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death.
18. And he that killeth a beast shall make it good; beast for beast.
19. And if a man causes a blemish in his neighbour; as he hath done,

[35] These quotations as well as all others from the Old and New Testaments throughout various volumes of the English al-Mīzãn have been taken from the Authorized (King James) Version of the Holy Bible. (tr.)

so shall it be done to him;
20. Breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth: as he hath caused a blemish in a man, so shall it be done to him again.

as-Suyūṭī narrates through Aḥmad, Abū Dāwūd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, aṭ-Ṭabarānī, Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh from Ibn ʻAbbās that he said, "Surely Allāh revealed: and whoever did not judge by what Allāh revealed, those are they that are the unbelievers. . . . that are the unjust. . . . that are the transgressors. He revealed it about two groups of the Jews, one of them subdued the other in the Era of Ignorance, until they reconciliated and made peace (on the condition) that if the mighty group slayed someone of the weaker group, his blood money should be fifty wasaq, and if the weaker one slayed a member of the mighty group, his blood money should be a hundred wasaq. This continued until the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) came to Medina. The two groups came down to welcome the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and he had not overpowered them yet. Then the weaker group stood up and said, 'Was there ever such a thing between two tribes? Their religion is one, their lineage is one and their town is one and (yet) blood money of one is half of that of the other? Certainly, we had given it to you only because of the injustice you did to us and in fear of you. But now that Muḥammad has arrived, we shall not give in to you.' War was almost to erupt between them, and then they agreed to make the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) (Arbitrator) between them. Then the mighty group thought it over and said, 'By Allāh! Muḥammad is not going to give you from them the double of what he would give them from you;' and they have truly said that they had not given it to us but because of (our) injustice and coercion to them. So, they engaged in secret intrigue against the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). Allāh informed His Messenger of all their affairs and what they wanted. Then Allāh revealed: O Messenger! Let not those grieve you who strive together . . . and most surely many of the people are transgressors." [5:41-49] Then he said, "By Allāh! It was revealed about them." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: al-Qummī has narrated this story inter alia in a lengthy tradition in his at-Tafsīr; and it says that it was ʻAbdullāh ibn Ubayy who talked on behalf of Banu 'n-Naḍīr – and it was the mighty one – and tried to frighten the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) of them, and that it was he who had said: If you are given this, take it, and if you are not given this, be cautious.

But the first tradition is truer in text, because its meaning is more in conformity with the context of the verses; the first parts of the verses – particularly the first two – do not fit the story of the blood money between Banu 'n-Naḍīr and Banū Qurayẓah, as is not hidden from a person who recognizes the literary styles. It is not unlikely that it is an attempt to apply the story to the Qur'ãn, as is the case with a lot of traditions purporting to describe the reason of revelation of verses. It is as though the narrator found this story applicable to the verse: And We prescribed to them in it that life is for life, . . . and preceding ones; then he found that the verses are connected with one another beginning from: O Messenger! Let not those grieve you who strive together . . . so he took all these verses as revealed in this story, and became oblivious of the story of stoning. And Allãh knows better.

Sulaymãn ibn Khãlid said, "I heard Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), saying, 'When Allãh intends good for a servant, He scratches up a white spot in his heart, and deputes to him an angel who keeps him on right (path); and when He intends evil for a servant, He scratches up a black spot in his heart, and closes the hearing of his heart, and deputes to him a Satan who leads him astray.' Then he recited this verse: Therefore (for) whomsoever Allãh intends that He would guide him aright, He expands his breast for Islam; and (for) whosoever He intends that He should leave him to err, He makes his breast strait and narrow as though he were ascending into the sky . . . [6:125]. Then he said: Surely those against whom the word of your Lord has proved true will not believe [10:95]; and he said: . . . Those are they for whom Allãh does not desire that He should purify their hearts; . . . [5:41]." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from as-Sakūnī that Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) said, "as-Suḥt (forbidden) is the price of dead body, and price of dog, and dowery for fornication, and bribe in judgement and wage of al-kãhin (اَلْكَاهِن = fortuneteller, soothsayer)." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: The tradition describes a number of forbidden and unlawful earnings, without encompassing all such things. There are a lot of unlawful earnings as detailed in traditions. There are many traditions of this theme narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.).

ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd has narrated that ʻAlī ibn Abī Ṭãlib was asked about suḥt, he said, "Bribe." It was said to him, "In judgement?" He said, "That is disbelief." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: "That is disbelief" points to what has come in the verses under discussion in condemnation of suḥt and taking bribe in judgement: and barter not My signs for a small price and whoever did not judge by what Allāh revealed, those are they that are the unbelievers. Many traditions from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) have repeatedly said that: 'As for taking bribe in judgement, it is disbelief in Allāh and His Messenger.' There are numerous traditions in exegesis of suḥt and its prohibition, narrated through Shī'ah and Sunnī chains and recorded in their collections of aḥādīth.

Ibn Abī Ḥātim, an-Naḥḥās (in his an-Nāsikh wa 'l-mansūkh), aṭ-Ṭabarānī, al-Ḥākim (saying that it was correct), Ibn Marduwayh and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunanu 'l-kubrā) have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he said, "Two verses of this chapter – i.e. 'The Table' – were abrogated: the verse of al-qalāid (اَلْقَلاَئِدُ = sacrificial animals with symbolic garlands) and: therefore if they come to you, judge between them or turn aside from them. Thus the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had option, if he wished he would judge between them and if he wished he would turn aside from them and return them to their laws. Then was revealed (the verse): And that you should judge between them by what Allāh has revealed, and do not follow their low desires." (Ibn 'Abbās) said, "So the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was ordered to judge between then according to our Book." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Abū 'Ubayd, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he said about the verse: judge between them or turn aside from them, that it was abrogated by the verse: And that you should judge between them by what Allāh has revealed. (ibid.)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has also narrated it through 'Abdu 'r-Razzāq from 'Ikrimah. However, the theme of the verses does not agree with this claim of abrogation. The clear context of the verses shows them to be interlinked and proves that they were revealed all together. As such there is no sense in saying that some of its verses have abrogated some others. Moreover, the verse: And that you should judge between them by what Allāh has revealed, is not independent in its meaning; it is connected with the preceding verses; therefore there is no reason to treat it as an abrogating one. (However, if abrogation is OK with all these difficulties, then the clause: therefore judge between them by what Allãh has revealed, in the preceding verse, has more right to be treated as abrogating.) Apart from that, you have seen that the pronoun, them, in, judge between them, more manifestly refers to the people in general, rather than the People of the Book or particularly the Jews. Moreover, we have described in the beginning of this chapter that the chapter of "The Table" is abrogating, and not abrogated.

Abū ‘Amr az-Zubayrī narrates from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said, "Surely the things because of which one deserves Imãmah are: Purification, cleanliness from sins and grave offences which make one liable to the hell; then enlightened – and another copy says, (hidden) knowledge of all that the ummah needs, its ḥalãl and ḥarãm, knowledge of its Book, its particular and general, decisive and ambiguous, intricacies of its knowledge and marvels of its interpretation, its abrogating and abrogated."

"I said, 'What is the proof that Imãm cannot be except he who has the knowledge of these things you have mentioned?' He said, 'The word of Allãh regarding those whom He has given permission to rule and made them deserving to it: Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light; with it the prophets who submitted themselves (to Allãh) were judging (matters) for those who were Jews, and (so did) the Divines and the scholars, . . . So these are the Imãms, below the prophets, who raised up the people by their knowledge; and as for al-aḥbãr (اَلأَحْبَارُ), they are the scholars, below the Divines; then Allãh gave information and said: as they were required to guard (part) of the Book of Allãh; and He did not say, they were put under the burden of the Book.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī)

The author says: It is a very fine argument presented by the Imãm (a.s.); it shows a wonderful connotation of the verse, finer than the previously given explanation: It describes that the sequence used in the verse – the prophets, then the Divines, then the scholars – points to their descending ranks in excellence and perfection; thus the Divines are below the prophets and above the scholars, and the scholars are those men of religious erudition who have been entrusted with its knowledge through teaching and learning.

Allãh has described the mode of the Divines' knowledge in these words: as they were required to guard (part) of the Book of Allãh, and they were witnesses thereof. If the idea were to show its similarity to the scholars' knowledge, it would have been said, as they were placed under it, as Allāh says: The similitude of those who were placed under the Torah, then they did not hold it . . . (62:5). It is because al-istiḥfāẓ (اَلإِسْتِحْفَاظ) means to ask someone to guard; it implies obligating him to guard and protect; it is similar to the words of Allāh: That He may question the truthful of their truth, . . . (33:8), i.e. that He may obligate them to display the attribute of truthfulness that is hidden in their souls.

This guarding of the Book and its witnessing cannot be complete without 'iṣmah (عِصْمَةٌ = sinlessness) which Allāh does not grant to non-*ma'ṣūm*s. 'Iṣmah's essentiality is understood from the fact that Allāh has based His permission to them to judge on their guarding of the Book, and has given credence to their witnessing based on the same; and it is impossible to give credence to their witnessing if there were any possibility of their falling into error or committing any mistake – because it is on their testimony that the Book is confirmed.

So, this guarding and witnessing is something quite different from the protection and the testimony, which we are familiar with, in our society. Rather it is of the type of the protection of deeds and witnessing that has been mentioned in the verse: . . . that you may be the witnesses for the people and (that) the Messenger may be a witness for you . . . (2:143). Its explanation was given in the first volume of the Book.[36]

This guarding and witnessing is ascribed to all, although only some of them were going to do it, in the same way as witnessing of deeds has been ascribed to the whole ummah, although only a few shall do it. Such usage is common in the Qur'ān; e.g. Allāh says: And certainly We gave the Book and the Wisdom and the Prophecy to the Children of Israel . . . (45:16). Of course, the scholars too were given the responsibility of guarding and witnessing and covenant was taken to that effect from them too. But it was only a subjective religious affirmation, quite apart from real affirmation that depends on real guarding, free from mistake and error; and divine religion cannot be complete without this as it cannot be without that.

It is now established that there is a position between those of the prophets and the scholars, and it is the position of the Imāms. Allāh has told us about it in His word: And We made of them Imāms to guide by Our command as they were patient, and they were certain of our signs (32:24). It does not go against the verses, which say: And

We gave him Isḥãq, and Ya'qūb, as a further gift, and We made (them) all good ones. And We made them Imãms, to guide (people) by Our command, . . . (21:72-73). It is because joining of prophethood and Imãmate in a group does not prevent separation of the two positions in others. Some details about Imãmate have been given in the first volume under the divine words: And (remember) when his Lord tried Ibrãhīm with certain words, . . . (2:124).[37]

In short, the divines and Imãms, who hold the middle rank between the prophets and the scholars, do have the knowledge of the Book as it should be known, and do bear witness thereof as it should be done.

The verse speaks about the divines and Imãms of the Children of Israel. But the verse shows that it was because Torah was a Book revealed by Allãh which contained guidance and light, i.e., matters of belief and deed required of the ummah; and if that demanded this guarding and witnessing which can only be done by the divines and Imãms, then the same will apply to every Book revealed by Allãh which contained divine gnosis and practical laws. And this proves our intended purpose.

Therefore, the Imãm's words, 'so these are the Imãms below prophets', mean that the Imãms' rank is below that of the prophets, according to the sequence given in the verse; likewise, the scholars are below the Imãms. The words, they bring up the people with their knowledge, make it clear that the Imãm has taken the word, ar-rabbãnī (اَلرَّبَّانى) as being derived from at-tarbiyah (اَلتَّرْبِيَةُ = to bring up) and not from ar-rububiyyah (اَلرُّبُوبِيَّةُ = lordship). The meanings of other clauses are clear from earlier explanation.

Perhaps this meaning was intended by al-Bãqir (a.s.) when he said that the verse: Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light . . . required to guard (part) of the Book of Allãh . . ., was revealed about the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.). Mãlik al-Juhanī narrates that Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said about the above verse, "About us was it revealed." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

Tafsīru 'l-burhãn writes under the verse: and whoever did not judge by what Allãh revealed, those are they that are the unbelievers, that [al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from 'Abdullãh ibn Muskãn that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), said,

'Whoever judged about two dirhams a judgement of injustice, then enforced it by coercion, he shall be from among the people of this verse: and whoeverr did not judge by what Allãh revealed, those are they that are the unbelievers.' I said, 'And how does he coerce in this matter?' He said, 'He will be having whip and prison; so he gives judgement against someone; then if he agreed to his judgement, (well and good); otherwise, he would beat him with his whip and put him in prison.'"

The author says: ash-Shaykh has narrated it in at-Tahdhīb through his chain from Ibn Muskãn, from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); and al-ʻAyyãshī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr from him. The beginning of the ḥadīth is narrated through other chains too from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.).

In this tradition, the judgement is made conditional on coercion. It implies that the judgement should be of such a nature as would produce an affect; it would be a decree, which by its very nature would show some definite result. Otherwise, mere utterance is not called judgement.

Saʻīd ibn Manṣūr, Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Ibn ʻAbbãs that he said: and whoever did not judge by what Allãh revealed, those are they that are the unbelievers, . . . that are the unjust, . . . that are the transgressors, (were revealed) especially about the Jews. (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: The three verses are unrestricted and there is no cause to justify their restriction; place of application does not permit change in word's generality. Apart from that, the third verse is related to the Christians, not the Jews. Moreover, a contrary tradition is narrated from the same Ibn ʻAbbãs.

ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd narrates from Ḥakīm ibn Jubayr that he said, "I asked Saʻīd ibn Jubayr about these verses of 'The Table'; I told (him) that a group thinks that they were revealed to the Children of Israel, and not to us. He said, 'Recite what is before it and what is after it,' so I recited them before him. So he said, 'No; but it was revealed to us.' Then I met Muqassim, mawlã of Ibn ʻAbbãs; and I asked him about these verses in 'The Table'; I told (him) that a group thinks that they were revealed to the Children of Israel, and not to us. He said, 'It was revealed to the Children of Israel and revealed to us, and whatever was revealed to them and to us, it is for them and for us.'

"Then I went to ʻAlī ibn al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), and asked him about these verses in 'The Table'; and I told him that I had asked Saʻīd ibn Jubayr and Muqassim about them. He (the Imãm) said, 'Then what did Muqassim say?' So I informed him of it." (Ḥakīm) said, "The Imãm said, 'He has said truth; but it is an unbelief, not like the unbelief of polytheism; and a transgression, not like the transgression of polytheism; and an injustice, not like the injustice of polytheism.' Then I met Saʻīd ibn Jubayr and informed him of what he (the Imãm) had said. Saʻīd ibn Jubayr said to his son, 'How did you find him?' [He said], 'Indeed I found for him excellence over you and Muqassim." (ibid.)

al-Kulaynī narrates in al-Kafī through his chain from al-Ḥalabī from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.); and al-ʻAyyãshī narrates in his at-Tafsīr from Abū Baṣīr from the same Imãm (a.s.) that he said about the verse: but he who foregoes it, it shall be an expiation for him; "Shall be expiated from his sins as much as he will forego of his wound or other things."

Ibn Marduwayh has narrated from a man from the Helpers that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said regarding the words of Allãh: but he who foregoes it, it shall be an expiation for him. "A man, his tooth is broken, or his hand is cut, or any organ of his body is cut or wounded, and he foregoes it, so (similar) quantity of his faults is reduced from him. If it was one-fourth of blood-money, then one-fourth of his faults, and if it was one-third, then one-third of his faults; and if it was (full) blood-money (all) his faults will fall down from him in similar way." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: A similar tradition has been narrated by ad-Daylamī from Ibn ʻUmar. Probably, what this and the preceding traditions say that the expiation is divided according to the division of foregoing, is inferred from the fact that in the sharīʻah, blood-money, which is divisible, has the same position as retailation; then retaliation and blood-money together are weighed vis-à-vis expiation of sins, and this too is divisible. Therefore part of it would stand opposite to part of that, as the whole stands opposite to the whole.

al-Qummī narrates in his at-Tafsīr, under the verse: for every one of you did We appoint a law and a way, that he (a.s.) said: "For every prophet was a sharī'ah and a way."

Tafsīru 'l-burhān writes under the verse: Is it then the judgement of (the times of) ignorance that they desire?, that [al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad ibn Khālid from his father from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said, "Judges are four (types), three are in the Fire and one is in the Garden; a man judges unjustly and knowingly, so he is in the Fire; and a man judges unjustly and he does not know, so he is in the Fire; and a man judges justly but he does not know, so he is in the Fire; and a man judges justly and he knows, so he is in the Garden."

And he (a.s.) said, "Judgements are (of) two (categories): Judgement of Allāh and judgement of (the Era of) Ignorance; so whoever misses the judgement of Allāh, judges according to the (Era of) Ignorance."

The author says: There are many traditions of these two themes from the Shī'ah and Sunnī chains, recorded under the chapters of judgement and evidence. The verse hints at, rather clearly denotes both meanings. As for the first meaning, it is because judging unjustly – whether he knew it to be unjust, or judged without knowledge and it chanced to be unjust – and likewise judging justly but without knowing it, all this is following the low desire, and Allāh has forbidden it in His words: therefore judge between them by what Allāh has revealed, and do not follow their low disires (diverging) from the truth that has come to you. In this verse, Allāh warned against following low desires and has put it parallel to the judgement by the revealed truth. It is understood from it that permission of judgement is conditional on knowledge of truth; otherwise giving judgement is not allowed because it is merely following the low desires. Moreover, the name, judgement of the Era of Ignorance, is applicable to it, which stands face to face with the judgement of Allāh.

As for the second theme, i.e., the division of judgement between that of Allāh and that of the Era of Ignorance, it is inferred from the apparent meaning of the words of Allāh: Is it then the judgement of (the times of) ignorance that they desire? And who is better than Allāh to judge . . .? See how the two judgements stand opposite each other.

aṭ-Ṭabarī has narrated in his at-Tafsīr from Qatādah, under the verse: Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light; with it the prophets who submitted themselves (to Allāh) were judging (matters) for those who were Jews, and (so did) the Divines and the scholars, that he said, "As for the Divines, they were jurisprudents of the Jews; and as for the aḥbãr, they were their scholars." He (also) said, "And it has been reported to us that the Prophet of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, when this verse was revealed, "We do judge the Jews and the others from people of (other) religions."

The author says: as-Suyūṭī too has narrated it under the same verse through ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd and through Ibn Jarīr from Qatãdah.

This tradition apparently shows that the reported utterance of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) is related to this verse, i.e., the verse is the proof of this statement. But the difficulty is that the said verse proves only that the judgement was based on the Torah and was reserved for the Jews because it contains the word: for these who were Jews; it did not extend to non-Jews, or to judging by other than Torah, contrary to what appears from the tradition. It could be said that the Prophet's word, "We do judge", means that the prophets do so; but it is a ridiculous meaning and has no relevance to the verse.

However, it appears that one of the narrators has erred in quoting the verse, and that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had spoken those words after revelation of the verse: And We have revealed to you the Book with the truth, . . . therefore judge between them by what Allãh has revealed and do not follow their low desires . . . This hypothesis fits on what has earlier been mentioned that apparently the pronoun in, judge between them, refers to the people and not particularly to the Jews. However, the narrator has quoted one verse (5:44) in place of the other (5:48).

O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends; they are friends of each other; and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them; surely Allãh does not guide the unjust people (51). So you will see those in whose hearts is a disease, hastening in them, saying: "We fear lest a calamity should befall us;" but it may be that Allãh will bring the victory or a thing from Himself, so that they shall be regretting on account of what they hid in their souls (52). And those who believe will say: "Are these they who swore by Allãh with the most forcible of their oaths that they were most surely with you? Their deeds shall go for nothing, so they shall become losers." (53). O you who believe! Whoever of you turns back from his religion, then soon Allãh will bring a people that He shall love them and they shall love Him, lowly before the believers, mighty against the unbelievers, they shall strive hard in Allãh's way and shall not fear the censure of any censurer; this is Allãh's grace, He gives it to whom He pleases, and Allãh is Ample-giving, knowing (54).

It is difficult to say anything about these verses' connection with the preceding ones or the ones that follow, like: Only Allãh is your Guardian . . . then surely the party of Allãh are they that shall be triumphant; and then its connection with that which follows: O you who believe! Do not take for guardians . . ., and finally their connection with the verse: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you . . .

But as for the four verses under discussion, they speak about the Jews and the Christians. The Qur'ăn had not talked about them in the Meccan verses, because there was no such need at that time. It however describes their maneuvers in the verses revealed at Medina. Even then, the ones revealed in the early Medinan period are not concerned with the Christians, because Muslims in those days were involved with the Jews. They had to mingle with them, live with them, keep good relations with them, or evert their deceit and neutralize their plot. They were entangled with the Christians in the later half of the Prophet's stay at Medina. Therefore, probably these four verses were revealed in that period; and perhaps the 'victory' alludes to the conquest of Mecca.

But it has been mentioned earlier that more reliably the chapter of "The Table" was revealed in the year of the Last pilgrimage, when Mecca was already conquered. So, does this victory refer to some conquest other than that of Mecca? Or, were these four verses revealed before Meccan conquest, and before the complete chapter was revealed? Again, is the last verse: O you who believe! Whoever of you turns back from his religion, then soon Allãh will bring a people . . ., connected with the three preceding ones? Which was the group whose apostasy was expected? Who were those people whom Allãh promised to bring in place of the apostates? All these unanswered questions have compounded the confusion. The narratives giving the reason of revelation are varied and conflicting; actually they are merely personal opinions of the ancient exegetes, as is the case with most of such traditions. This excessive contradiction perplexes the mind and it fails to understand the verses' meaning. Add to it the intermingling of sectarian prejudice with personal interpretations, as you will see later in the traditions and exegetes' writings – both ancient and modern.

Meditation on these verses proves that the four are interlinked and independent having no relation with the preceding and the following verses; and the fourth one completes the intended theme. However one must be wary, in looking for its meaning, of laxities and carelessness indulged in by exegetes who have based their interpretations on personal views, especially regarding the attributes mentioned in the verses.

In a nutshell, Allãh warns the believers against taking the Jews and the Christians for friends, and threatens them most severely; then points in an apocalyptical way where such friendship was to take them and how it would turn into ruins the magnificent structure of religious character; then Allãh will bring on scene a people who will manage the affairs and restore the religion's structure to its original splendour.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends; they are friends of each other: Majma'u 'l-bayan says: "al-Ittikhãdh (اَلإِتِّخَاذُ) means to rely on a thing in preparation for an affair; it is on the stem of ifti'ãl (اِفْتِعَالُ) from the root, al-akhdh (اَلأَخْذُ = to take); actually it was al-i'tikhãdh (اَلإِئْتِخَاذُ), then " ' (= ء)" was changed to "t (=تَاء)" and that was amalgamated in the other "t". The same has happened with al-itti'ãd (اَلاِتِّعَادُ) from al-wa'd (اَلْوَعْدُ = to promise). al-Akhdh (to take) is used in various ways: You say, 'He took the book (when he placed it in his hand)', 'He took the offering ar-Rãghib says in Mufradãtu 'l-Qur'ãn: "al-Wilã' (اَلْوِلاَءُ) and at-tawãllī (اَلتَّوَلِّى) = two or more things appear together in such a way that nothing extraneous comes between them. As an extended metaphor, it is used for proximity and nearness – in place, in relationship, in religion, in friendship, belief and mutual helping." More will be explained later.

In short, al-wilãyah is a sort of proximity, which removes barriers and partitions between two things, keeping in view the purpose of that proximity. If the proximity is with respect to piety and help, then waliyy (وَلِىّ) is the helper whom nothing can prevent from helping the person who is near him. If it is in respect of harmony and love (which is spiritual attraction) then waliyy is the beloved before whom man cannot keep his own will and gives him whatever he desires; and if it is in respect of relationship, the waliyy is the one who interits him without any hindrance; and if it is with respect of obedience, then the waliyy is the one who controls his affairs in any way he pleases.

Allãh, the Sublime, in His words: "do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends", has not put any condition or speciality on friendship; it is unrestricted [and as such should be prohibiting any kind of nearness]. But the words in the next verse: But you will see those in whose hearts is a disease, hastening towards them, saying: "We fear lest a calamity should befall us", show that wilãyah in this verse is a sort of proximity and joining which is in affinity with the excuse offered by them, "We fear lest a calamity should befall us." As such it points to the turn of fortune, which alternates between the people. Such calamities could befall them through other than the Jews and Christians in which case these hypocrites hoped to get help from these two groups by taking them for awliyã', in the meaning of helpers; in the same way they were afraid of calamities befalling them from these two groups, and hoped to avert it by taking them for awliyã', in the meaning of nearness in love and friendship.

Wilãyah in the meaning of nearness in love and friendship gives both benefits of help and spiritual blending. Therefore, it is the meaning intended in the verse. We shall describe under the last verse, O you who believe! Whoever of you turns back from his religion . . ., that wilãyah here means only friendship, nothing else.

An exegete has forcefully claimed that wilãyah in these verses means wilãyah of helping – two persons or two groups enter into alliance or covenant that when need arises each party would help the other. His argument runs as follows:

"The verses – as their apparent meaning shows – were revealed before the Last Pilgrimage, in the early days of hijrah, when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and the Muslims were not finished with the affairs of the Jews in Medina and around it in Fadak and Khaybar, etc. and beyond them were the Christians. Those Jews and Christians had entered into pacts and covenants of mutual help with various Arab tribes.

"This statement might fit on what has been narrated (in reasons of revelation) that ‘Ubãdah ibn aṣ-Ṣãmit (from Banū ‘Awf ibn al-Khazraj) disavowed Banū Qaynuqã‘ when they fought the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and upto that time there was a wilãyah of covenant between him and them; but ‘Abdullãh ibn Ubayy (the leader of the hypocrites) did not separate from them and hastened towards them, saying: 'We fear lest a calamity should befall us.'

"Or, as has been narrated in the story of Abū Lubãbah that when the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), sent him to Banū Qurayẓah, so that he should make them come out of their fortress and accept the Prophet's judgement, he pointed with his hand to his throat, hinting to them that it meant slaughter.

"Or, as is narrated that some of them used to write the news of Medina to the Christians of Syria, and some were reporting to the Jews of Medina in order to benefit from their wealth, even if it be a loan.

"Or, as is reported that after the killings and defeat in the battle of Uḥud, some of them said that he would attach himself to so-and-so Jew or Christian.

"All these narratives almost unanimously claim that it were the hypocrites who had said: 'We fear lest a calamity should befall us.'

"In short, the verses forbid entering into covenant and wilãyah of mutual help between the Muslims and the Jews and the Christians.

"Some people have emphasized it, claiming that linguistically the words and context of the verse totally oppose taking wilãyah in it in the meaning of wilãyah of love and reliance; it is also opposed by the reason of revelation and the overall condition under which the Muslims and the People of the Book lived in the era of revelation.

"How can the verse be taken to prohibit living and mingling with them even if they were *dhimmī*s or had pact with Muslims? We know that the Jews lived with the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the Muslims in Medina, and the Muslims dealt with them with total equality."

COMMENT: All this shows a laxity and carelessness in finding out the verse's connotation:

What has he said that the verses were revealed before the year of the Last Pilgrimage – and it was the year when the chapter of "The Table" was revealed – presents not much difficulty; but it does not prove that the wilãyah denotes entering into covenant and not wilãyah of love.

As for the narrated reasons of revelation that show that the verses were revealed particularly about the covenant and the wilãyah of mutual help between some Arab tribes and the Jews and the Christians, the following comments apply to them:

First: The said reasons of revelation are mutually contradictory and do not present a single connotation which could be relied upon;

Second: It does not cover the wilãyah of the Christians, even if it covers somehow that of the Jews, because the Arabs did not have any wilãyah of covenant with the Christians.

Third: We agree to the reasons of revelation in what they say; yet you have been told several times that most of those traditions, apart from being weak, are merely attempts to apply historic events on the Qur'ãnic verses which appear to have some relevance to them – although we find no difficulty in it.

However, the idea, that such narrated events particularize or restrict the generality of a Qur'ãnic verse, is not tenable, nor does its apparent meaning support it. If the apparent meanings of the verses were particularized or restricted because of some speciality of reasons of revelation, without taking it from the wordings of the verse, the Qur'ãn would have died with the death of those about whom such verses were revealed, and it could not be used in any argumentation related to any later event or incident; such an idea is not approvable by the Book or the Sunnah nor by reason.

He has also claimed, "Linguistically the words, and context of the verse totally oppose taking wilãyah here in the meaning of wilãyah of love and reliance. It is also opposed by the reason of revelation and the overall condition under which the Muslims and the People of the Book lived in the era of revelation." Ponder on it as much as you like but you cannot deduce any worthwhile meaning from it. When apparent meaning of a verse does not go against application of a theme to it, reason of its revelation and overall prevailing condition of the time become irrelevant. You have known that there is no justification in restricting the verse to its reason of revelation and to the overall condition of the era. Rather, the argument goes totally against it, because a verse in its unrestricted appearance is in itself an authentic proof. You have seen that this verse too is unrestricted (and nothing points to its being restricted); therefore, it is an authentic authority in its unrestricted meaning, i.e., the wilãyah in the meaning of love.

The claim that meanings of single words used in the verse and its context disavow totally taking wilãyah in the meaning of love is really astonishing. Would that I knew what he has meant with this total disavowal, and more than that he has used the 'context' too in this argument!

How can the wording or context of the verse reject this meaning, when the clause: "do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends", is followed by the clause: "they are friends of each other", and doubtlessly wilãyah in this latter clause denotes love, unity and affection, and not wilãyah of covenant and pact. There is no sense in saying: 'Do not make a covenant with the Jews and the Christians; they have covenant with each other.' Whatever unity and relation there was among the Jews, it was the wilãyah of national love. The same was the case with the Christians; there was no pact or covenant made by them, it was only the love and unity based on religion.

Likewise, the words of Allãh, coming after this clause, prove this meaning: and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them. The reason that turns a friend of a group into a member of it, is this: Love unites scattered things, unites different souls; because of love perceptions of the lovers become one, their characters mirror one another; their actions reflect each other's. The two lovers, when love overwhelms them, become as if they are one person, having a single psyche, a single will, doing a single action; one does not go against the other in the passage of life and in social norms.

This is what makes a lover of a group a member of that group and unites him with it. It has been said: Whoever loves a people, he is one of them; also [it is said]: A man is with whom he loves. And Allãh has said forbidding loving the polytheists: O you who believe! Do not take My enemy and your enemy for friends: would you offer them love while they deny what has come to you of the truth, . . . (60:1). The verses go on in the same vein, until it says: . . . and whoever makes friends with them, these are the unjust (60:9). Also He says: You shall not find a people who believe in Allãh and the latter day befriending those who act in opposition to Allãh and His Messenger, even though they were their fathers, or their sons, or their brothers, or their kinsfolk; . . . (58:22). Allãh has also said regarding the love of the unbelievers – and the wording is general which includes the Jews, the Christians and the polytheists – Let not the believers take the unbelievers for friends rather than the believers; and whoever does this, he shall have nothing (to do) with Allãh, except (when) you guard yourselves against (them) for fear from them; and Allãh cautions you of Himself; . . . (3:28). The verse clearly speaks about the wilãyah of love and affection rather than that of covenant and pact. Remember that when the third chapter, "The House of ‘Imrãn", was revealed; the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had already concluded pacts and truce with the Jews and the polytheists.

In short, the wilãyah that makes one people attached to another people is that of love and affection, and not that of covenant and help; and it is quite clear. If the clause: and whoever amongst you takes them as awliyã’, then surely he is one of them, is taken to mean, whoever among you entered into a pact of mutual help after this prohibition, then surely he because of his going against this prohibition would be unjust, and would be joined to those unjust people in injustice, then it would be a vulgar meaning and would need additional conditions to be attached to the speech.

If the Qur’ãn prohibits something which was hitherto lawful, it always points to its being lawful uptil then; it does so to preserve the honour of that order which is now being changed; and to keep the sanctity of the Prophetic tradition and practice. Ponder on these verses: O you who believe! The idolaters are nothing but unclean, so they shall not approach the Sacred Mosque after this year; . . . (9:28). . . . Wherefore now be in contact with them and seek what Allãh has written for you, and eat and drink until the white thread becomes distinct unto you from the black thread (of night) . . . (2:187). It is not allowed to you to take women afterwards, nor that you should change them for other wives, . . . (33:52); and many other such verses.

Now, it is clear that the language of the verse, in meanings of words and in context, does not disallow wilãyah to be taken for love and affection; if there is any rejection, it rejects other meanings.

As for their claim that clause: in whose hearts is a disease, refers to the hypocrites, you will soon see that the context does not support it.

Thus, the clause: "do not take the Jews and the Christians for awliyā'," clearly forbids loving them or having any affection towards them; because such feelings pull the souls and spirits towards each other and it creates mutual moral effects on both sides; and if Muslims are influenced by un-Islamic behaviour, their society will diverge from its religious way (which is based on the felicity of following the truth) to the way of unbelief (which is based on following the low desires and worshipping the Satan); and thus it will go astray from the path of the natural life.

Allāh has used for them their names of Jews and Christians, instead of saying, the People of the Book; because the phrase: "People of the Book", indicates that they are somewhat nearer to the Muslims, which in its turn gives rise to some affection and love which is opposite to what this verse orders that they should not be taken as friends. However, a coming verse mentions them as being given the Book: O you who believe! Do not take for guardians those who take your religion for a mockery and a joke, from among those who were given the Book before you and the unbelievers; . . . (5:57). They were given the Book and yet they take the divine religion for a mockery and a joke. This mockery and joke turns the good point of their being given the Book into utmost condemnation. When the people who were given the Book which invited to the truth and made it clear, began ridiculing the religion of truth and playing with it, they certainly deserved to be shunned and avoided; they should not be taken as friends; the believers must avoid living with them, mingling with them and having any soft feeling towards them.

"they are friends of each other": As explained earlier, wilāyah here means friendship, because their hearts are nearer to each other and their souls have mutual attraction. Consequently, they think in similar way; they join hands in following their low desires, and their haughtiness leads them to reject the truth; they strive together to extinguish the light of Allāh, and help each other in fighting against the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the Muslims. It seems, as all of them are one person of one religion. Although actually they are not of one religion, yet they have joined their forces and have become one power against the Muslims, simply because Islam calls them to truth and opposes what in their eyes is the greatest goal: To follow their low desires and licentiousness in objects of desire and enjoyment of worldly attractions.

It is this factor that has made the Jews and the Christians – in spite of their mutual discord and enmity – into one society; they come near each other and return to one another; the Jews love the Christians and the Christians love the Jews; Jewish groups love each other, and the Christian nations are attracted to one another. That is why the clause: "they are friends of each other", has been left vague [so that it may cover all situations]. This clause explains the reason of the foregoing one: ″do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends." It means as follows: 'Do not take them for friends because, in spite of their internal discord and mutual enmity, they are fully united against you; you will not get any benefit from going near them with love and affection.'

It is possible to infer another meaning from this clause: "they are friends of each other." Do not take them for friends; because with this friendship, you expect the group, which you have befriended to help you against another group, which is not your friends; but your expectation can never materialize, because they are friends of each other, so naturally they will not help you against their own people.

QUR'ÃN: and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them; surely Allãh does not guide the unjust people: at-Tawallī (اَلتَّوَلِّی = To take as friend); min (مِنْ = from, part). The meaning is as follows: Whoever from amongst you takes them for friend; he is a part of them. This is an attachment brought into effect by revelation and it makes some believers members of Jewish and Christian groups. It shows that faith is a reality which has different stages, some blemished, some pure; some adulterated, some clean. This is inferred from Qur'ãnic verses like: *And most of them do not believe in Allãh without associating other*s (with Him) (12:106). This blemish and turbidity is what Allãh describes as the disease of hearts: So you will see those in whose hearts is a disease, hastening in them, . . .

Thus, those who love the Jews and the Christians, Allãh has counted them as belonging to the Jewish and Christian communities, although apparently they were believers. It shows at least that they were proceeding, not on the path of guidance (that is, belief), but on a way used by the said communities, it leads them where they are being led and takes them where they are taken.

That is why Allãh has explained the reason of their adherence to them by the clause: "surely Allãh does not guide the unjust people." The meaning: A man from amongst you who takes them as a friend, then surely he is one of them, and he is proceeding on a path other than yours, because the path of belief is the path of divine guidance; this man who befriends them is unjust like them, and Allāh does not guide the unjust people.

As you see, the verse just shows that the position of the believers who befriend the Jews and the Christians is the same as theirs; but it does not go ahead, i.e. does not describe the effects branching from it. The wording is unrestricted; yet because it describes a fundamental reality (like the clauses: . . . and that you fast is better for you . . . [2:184]; . . . surely prayer keeps [one] away from indecency and evil . . . [29:45], etc.). It is inevitably vague, and if one wants to prove from it a subsidiary law, one should refer to the sunnah; and it is fiqh that looks into such orders.

QUR'ĀN: So you will see those in whose hearts is a disease, hastening in them, . . .*: It sprouts from the preceding statement: surely Allāh does not guide the unjust people. As the divine guidance does not cover them, so they are in error, they do hasten in them and offer an excuse that does not deserve attention. Allāh has said, "hastening in them," instead of 'towards them'; so they are a part of them, occupying their place in error. They hasten in them not because they are afraid of befalling a calamity over them; actually they had no such fear; it was an excuse they had contrived for averting the admonition and blame they expected from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the Muslims. In fact, this hastening emanated from their friendship with, and love of those Jews and Christians.

Every injustice and falsity is bound to vanish and disappear any day; its ignominy becomes exposed before public eyes; and anyone who seeks to attain unlawful objects through wrongful means disguised as truthful, has to be bitterly disappointed; as Allāh has said: surely Allāh does not guide the unjust people. Consequently, it was definitely expected that Allāh would bring a victory or a thing from Himself, then they would be regretting on account of what they were doing, and the believers would clearly see through their falsehood and pretence.

The above talk makes it clear how the clause: "So you will see those in whose hearts is a disease," branches from the preceding: surely Allāh does not guide the unjust people. We have somewhere earlier have written the meaning of the unjust people not getting any guidance in their injustice.

The group mentioned in these verses was hypocrites, because they showed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the believers what was not in their hearts. They claimed that they hastened in the Jews and the Christians, lest a calamity should befall them, while the real cause (which conformed to what was in their hearts) was their love of, and inclination towards Allãh's enemies. This was the aspect of their hypocrisy. But they were not hypocrites, in the meaning of unbelievers pretending to be believers, because the context does not agree with it.

Some exegetes have written that the verses refer to the hypocrites, in the latter meaning, like ‘Abdullãh ibn Ubayy and his companions, as appears from the traditions giving reason of revelations. Those hypocrites participated with the believers in their gatherings and dealt with them in an amicable way; on the other hand they had made with the Jews and the Christians covenants and pacts of mutual help. This double-dealing was done in the hope of getting benefits from both sides, and as a matter of precaution to safeguard their personal interests. In this way, they hoped to triumph either way; they would be safe from calamity on whichever side it befel.

But this interpretation of theirs is not in agreement with the context, because it contains a hope that they shall be regretting because of the victory or a thing from Allãh. The victory may refer to the conquest of Mecca or taking the fortresses of the Jews and the Christians' towns, or so on. But in all these situations there was no reason why they should be regretting, as they had taken the precaution to protect their both flanks, and there is no regret in precaution. Their regret could be in place if they had totally separated from the believers and joined the Jews and the Christians, and then calamity had befallen on their group. Likewise, the forfeiture of their deeds and the loss mentioned in the next verse, (their deeds shall go for nothing, so they shall became losers), have no relevance with their hypocrisy, as the hypocrites practised precaution to safeguard their interests; and if someone does so for fear of some untoward happening, and perchance that happening does not take place, he suffers no loss and won't be called a loser. In fact, precaution is a wise method in practice and does not entail any blame or condemnation.

It could be claimed that they became liable to condemnation because they went against divine prohibition and had no faith in the divine promise of victory. There is nothing wrong in this idea in itself, but the verse's wording does not support it.

QUR'ĀN: but it may be that Allāh will bring the victory or a thing from Himself, so that they shall be regretting on account of what they hid in their souls: 'Asā (عَسَى = may be), in divine speech, like other talks, denotes a hope, an expectation – as we have already explained that the said expectation relates to the listener, or to the situation. But this verse contains a definite association that shows that the expected event must certainly take place. The clause aims at confirming the truth of the preceding one: surely Allāh does not guide the unjust people; as such what it says must happen without fail.

The victory which Allāh has mentioned – and has presented it as an alternative to a thing which is unknown to us – probably supports the view that "the" in "the victory" denotes generic noun, not a particular victory. As such it does not point to the victory of Mecca, which the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was promised in verses like: Most surely He Who has made the Qur'ān binding on you will bring you back to the destination . . . (28:85); . . . you shall most certainly enter the Sacred Mosque, if Allāh pleases . . . (48:27), and others.

Although the word, "victory" when used in the Qur'ān, refers in most of the places to the conquest of Mecca, yet in some places it is not possible to apply it on that usual theme. For example: And they say: "When will this victory take place, if you are truthful?" Say: "On the day of victory the faith of those who (now) disbelieve will not profit them, nor will they be respited." Therefore, turn away from them and wait, surely they too are waiting (32:28-30). Allāh declares here that when this victory gained the faith of those who had hitherto disbelieved will not profit them and that the unbelievers were waiting for it. Obviously, these two attributes do not apply to the Meccan conquest, nor to any other victory which Muslims have achieved upto this time. [For this reason the word, al-fatḥ (اَلْفَتْحُ) is rendered in many Qur'ānic translations as "judgement".]

We can think of only two situations where the faith, repentance, will not be of any profit, as we have described when writing about Repentance.[38] One: With change of this world with the next world when there will remain no free will and power. Two: If a man acquires such characteristics and traits that his heart becomes stone hard, and every hope of repentance and returning to Allāh is lost. Allāh says: . . . On the day when some of the signs of your Lord shall come, its faith shall not profit a soul, which did not believe before, or

earn good through its faith . . . (6:158). And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds, until when death comes to one of them, he says: "Surely, now I repent;" nor (for) those who die while they are unbelievers . . . (4:18)

In any case, if the victory refers to the conquest of Mecca or victory over the Jewish fortresses or Christian towns, so be it; but there is a vagueness in application of the clauses: "they shall be regretting . . ." and the verse: And those who believe will say . . ., on this meaning.

And if the victory denotes victory of Islam over disbelief and clear judgement between the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and his people, then it is a Qur'anic apocalyptic text which points to the happenings which this ummah is to face in future; and it fits what has been stated in the chapter of "Yūnus": And every nation had a messenger; so when their messenger came, the matter was decided between them with justice and they shall not be dealt with unjustly. And they say: "When will this threat come about, if you are truthful?" . . . every nation has a term; when their term comes, they shall not remain behind for an hour, nor can they go before (their time). Say: "Tell me if . . . What! Now (you believe)! And already you wished to have it hastened on." . . . And they ask you: "Is that true?" Say: Aye! By my Lord! It is most surely the truth, and you will not escape." . . . and they will manifest regret when they see the chastisement. . . . (10:47-56).

"so that they shall be regretting on account of what they hid in their souls": One happens to regret when one does what should not have been done or neglects what should not have been neglected; and those people had done some undesirable thing; and Allãh describes in the next verse, that their deeds were forfeited and they had incurred loss. It was because they had hid in their hearts love of the Jews and the Christians, in order to accomplish through it and by hastening in them what those enemies of Islam had wanted, i.e., to extinguish the light of Allãh and acquire the worldly objects of desire – without there being any hindrance from religion. Probably, this was what they hid in their hearts and for this purpose hastened in them; and they soon shall be regretting when their endeavours shall come to naught when Allãh will grant victory to the truth.

QUR'ÃN: And those who believe will say: "Are these they who swore by Allãh with the most forcible of their oaths that they were most surely with you? Their deeds shall go for nothing, so they shall become losers"*: Yaqūlu (يَقُولُ = will say) has also been recited yaqūla (يَقُولَ) in which case it will be in conjunction with: so that they shall be regretting; and then the meaning will be, they shall be regretting while the believers will be saying . . . This recital is preferable because it is more in conformity with the context. Their regretting on account of what they hid in their souls, and the believers' statement all are a rebuke to them because of their love of, and hastening in the Jews and the Christians. The demonstrative pronoun, in "Are these they" points to the Jews and the Christians; while the second person plural pronoun in "with you" addresses those in whose hearts there is a disease; also it may be vice versa; likewise, the pronouns in the clauses: "Their deeds shall go for nothing, so they shall become losers", may point to the Jews and the Christians or to those in whose hearts there is a disease.

However, the context shows that "with you" refers to those in whose hearts there is a disease, and the demonstrative pronoun points to the Jews and the Christians; while the clauses: "Their deeds shall go for nothing . . .", are a reply to an unasked question. The meaning: It may be that Allãh will bring the victory or a thing from Himself, then those who believe will say to those of weak faith when the wrath of Allãh will overtake them, 'Are these Jews and Christians they who swore by Allãh so forcefully, with the most forcible of their oaths that they were most surely with you? So why they are not doing something to benefit you?' Then arose in minds the unspoken question: 'So what was the ultimate result of those who loved these Jews and Christians?' And the reply came: 'Their deeds were forfeited and they became losers.'

A DISCOURSE ON THE MEANING OF DISEASE OF HEART

The phrase: in whose hearts is a disease, clearly says that hearts become diseased; conversely it shows that they also may be healthy, because health and disease are opposite each other; if one is found in a subject, inevitably that subject is capable of accepting its opposite, like blindness and eye-night. Don't you see that a wall is not called sick because it does not accept the attribute of healthiness?

In all places where Allãh ascribes disease to hearts, He describes such conditions and attributes of hearts, which prove that they have gone out of straight nature and deviated from right path. For example: And when the hypocrites and those in whose hearts was a disease began to say: "Allãh and His Messenger did not promise us (victory) but only to deceive" (33:12). When the hypocrites and those in whose hearts was disease said: "Their religion has deceived these (Muslims)" . . . (8:49). So that He may make what the Satan casts a trial for those in whose hearts is disease and those whose hearts are hard; . . . (22:53), apart from other verses.

In short, heart's disease means its involvement with a sort of suspicion and doubt that pollutes the faith in Allãh and removes confidence in His signs; it blends faith with polytheism. That is why such a heart experiences such conditions, and such a man commits such deeds as have affinity with disbelief in Allãh and rejection of his communications.

Conversely, heart's health and freedom from disease means its being steadfast in straight nature and its adherence to the right path; it leads man to sincerity in monetheistic belief and reliance on Allãh, discarding all things to which his low desires are attracted. Allãh says: The day on which neither property will avail, nor sons, except him who comes to Allãh with a heart free (from evil), (26:88-89).

It is evident from above that those in whose hearts is a disease, are other than the hypocrites, as the Qur'ãnic expression in so many places shows: the hypocrites and those in whose hearts is a disease. It is because the hypocrites are those who believed with their tongues and their hearts did not believe, while total disbelief is the death of the heart, not a disease. Allãh says: Is he who was dead then we raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, . . . (6:122). Only those accept who listen; and (as to) the dead Allãh will raise them, . . . (6:36).

Obviously, the heart's disease, in Qur'ãnic expression, means the doubt and suspicion that overwhelms man's perception regarding Allãh and His signs, which makes the heart unable to adhere to a religious belief.

Thus, those in whose hearts is a disease are the people of weak faith who listen to every loud-mouthed person; and like a weather-cock turn with winds; this phrase does not refer to the hypocrites who pretended to believe and kept their disbelief hidden, caring for their worldly interests, is order that they might get benefits from the believers – through their manifested belief – and from the disbelievers through their hidden disbelief.

Of course, sometimes the Qur'ãn calls them hypocrites analytically, because both groups in their inner selves are devoid of faith. It is separate from using the phrase: those in whose hearts is a disease, for those whom are unbelievers pretending to believe. Allāh says: Announce to the hypocrites that they shall have a painful chastisement, those who take the unbelievers for guardians rather than believers. Do they seek honour from them? Then surely all honour is for Allāh. And indeed He has revealed to you in the Book that when you hear Allāh's communications disbelieved in and mocked at, do not sit with them until they enter into some other discourse; surely then you would be like them; surely Allāh will gather together the hypocrites and the unbelievers all in Hell. (4:138-40)

As for the words of Allāh in the chapter of "The Cow": And there are some people who say: "We believe in Allāh and in the last day"; while they are not at all believers . . . There is a disease in their hearts, so Allāh added to their disease . . . . . And when it is said to them: "Believe as the people have believed", they say: "Shall we believe as the fools have believed?" . . . (2:8-13); it goes on describing their double-facedness upto verse 20; and it gives a picture of their hearts' journey from doubt in truth to its denial; and declares that in the beginning they were diseased because they wrongfully claimed to be believers while they were in doubt and had not believed yet; so Allāh added to their disease, until they perished because they disbelieved in truth and mocked it.

Allāh has explained that the heart's disease, like that of the body, sometimes goes on increasing until it becomes deep-rooted and chronic and ends in perdition; it happens when harmful things are taken or done – which in this case is disobedience of Allāh. Allāh says: There is a disease in their hearts, so Allāh added to their disease . . . (2:10). And whenever a chapter is revealed, . . . And as for those in whose hearts is a disease, it adds uncleanness to their uncleanness and they die while they are unbelievers. Do they not see that they are tried once or twice in every year, yet they do not turn (to Allāh) nor do they mind? (9:124-6). Then Allāh comments in a general way: Then evil was the end of those who did evil, because they rejected the signs of Allāh and used to mock them (30:10).

Allāh then says that the cure of this disease is to believe in Him; as He says in a general way: . . . their Lord will guide them by their faith; . . . (10:9). Also He says: To Him do ascend the good words; and the good deed, lifts them up; . . . (35:10). Therefore, if a heart-patient wants to cure his disease, he must repent and return to Allāh; in other words, he must believe in Him and must practise good thought and good deed, as the above-mentioned verse alludes to it: . . . yet they do not turn (to Allãh) nor do they mind (9:126).

Allãh has revealed a comprehensive statement on this subject in the chapter of "Women": O you who believe! Do not take the unbelievers for friends rather than the believers; do you desire that you should give to Allãh a manifest proof against yourselves? Surely the hypocrites are in the lowest stage of the Fire, and you shall not find a helper for them; except those who repent and amend and hold fast to Allãh and are sincere in their religion to Allãh; these are with the believers, and Allãh will grant the believers a mighty reward (4:144-6). It has been explained that it means returning to Allãh with belief, remaining steadfast on it and adhering to to the Book and the Sunnah, and being sincere in all this.

* * * * *

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Whoever of you turns back from his religion, . . .: al-Irtidãd (اَلإِرْتِدَاد) literally means to turn back. In Muslims' terminology, turning back from religion means apostasy, forsaking belief for disbelief, no matter whether that belief was preceded by disbelief or not. If an unbeliever accepts Islam and then apostatizes, he is called murtadd millī; if a born Muslim turns back from Islam, he is called murtadd fiṭrī. This terminology is either laid down by the sharī'ah or by the Muslims themselves.

It may appear at the first glance that the turning back in this verse denotes the terminological meaning in which the Muslims use this word. As such the verse will have no connection with the preceding verses. It would be an independent verse showing that Allãh might dispense with belief of one people replacing it with that of the others. But this likelihood is removed, when one meditates on this and the preceding verses. The verse in fact makes the believers remember that Allãh has power that He should be worshipped in His earth, and He will soon bring there a people who would not turn back from His religion; they would adhere to it to the end. He says: . . . therefore if these disbelieve in it, We have (already) entrusted with it a people who are not disbelievers in it (6:89). . . . and whoever disbelieves, then surely Allãh is Self-sufficient (independent) of the worlds (3:97). . . . If you disbelieved, you and those on earth all together, most surely Allãh is Self-sufficient, Praised (14:8).

Such a sublime position does not demand more than paying attention to the basic theme, i.e., appraising them that Allãh would bring a community of believers who would not turn back from His religion. The other attributes that they shall love Allāh and He shall love them, and that they will be lowly before the believers and mighty against the unbelievers, etc. are additional characteristics that have been described here keeping in view additional requirements of context and condition.

Looking at it from another angle, we realize that the said attributes are not without some connection with the theme of the preceding verses regarding befriending the Jews and the Christians rather than the believers. Taking them as friends rather than the believers, shows a certain inclination of heart towards them, a connection of love and affinity; and how could such a polluted heart contain the love of Allāh – as Allāh says: Allāh has not made for any man two hearts within him; . . . (33:4).

This friendship would lead the believer to become lowly before the disbelievers and mighty against the believers and show haughtiness before them, as Allāh says: . . . Do they seek honour from them? Then surely all honour is for Allāh (4:139).

Another concomitant of this friendship is that they would show laxity in fighting against those disbelievers and would shrink from jihād; they would not have any patience if they were deprived of any comfort in the way of Allāh, nor would they be ready to cut off all social contacts with them. But Allāh says: O you who believe! Do not take My enemy and your enemy for friends: would you offer them love while they deny what has come to you of the truth, . . . If you go forth fighting in My path and seeking My pleasure, would you manifest love to them? . . . (60:1). Further Allāh says: Indeed, there is for you a good example in Ibrāhīm and those with him when they said to their people: "Surely we dissociate from you and from what you worship other than Allāh; we renounce you, and enmity and hatred have appeared between us and you for ever until you believe in Allāh alone"; . . . (60:4).

Likewise, irtidād, in its literal meaning, or by analytical process, is applicable to befriending the disbelievers, as Allāh has said in the preceding verse: and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them. Also He has said [in this context]: . . . and whoever does this, he shall have nothing (to do) with Allāh, . . (3:28); . . . surely then you would be like them; . . . (4:140).

The above discussion shows that the verse has some connection with the preceding ones; and it makes it clear that Allāh's religion does not need such people who are prone to fall into the pit of disobedience and befriend the Jews and the Christians, because hypocrisy has crept into their community, and now it contains a lot of people with diseased hearts. They sell religion for worldly benefits, and covet the falacious honour and transient influence rather than the honour and power, which are reserved for Allãh, His Messenger, and the believers. They do not care for the real felicity, which covers life of this world as well as that of the next.

The verse expounds it by giving information about a future upheaval: If religion suffers from unsteady capricious behaviour of these people of weak faith who prefer love of other than Allãh over that of Allãh, seek honour near enemies of Allãh, show laxity in fighting in His way and fear blames and admonition of His enemies, then certainly soon Allãh will bring a people who shall love Him and He shall love them; who shall be lowly before the believers, mighty before the unbelievers, and who shall fight in the way of Allãh and shall not fear the censure of any censurer.

Although many exegetes were aware that the verse contains information of a future catacalysm, and spent much time on deciding whom the verse should be applied to; yet they did not take trouble to properly explain its wordings. As a result, they failed to correctly interpret the attributes mentioned in it. Consequently, they treated the divine speech just like a human talk which includes many a loop-holes and inaccuracies.

No doubt, the Qur'ãn uses the same words, which the Arabs did, and construction of its sentences is not different from the usual Arab style – in short, its oratorial system is the same as the Arabs of the time of revelation were familiar with. Yet it totally differs from other speeches in one aspect: When we speak, no matter whether we are eloquent or not, we base our talk on the meanings we understand, and our understanding is drawn from the social life which we have created through our human social nature. This nature usually passes a judgement in accordance with analogy. This opens before us the door of inexactitude and inaccuracy. We start saying 'all' in place of 'most', and 'ever-lasting' instead of 'long-lasting'. We take an analogical statement as unconditional truth; we confuse 'rare' with 'non-existent', and 'a little' with 'extinct'. We unreservedly say: This is good, that is bad; this is liked, that is disliked; this is praiseworthy, that is condemnable; this is beneficial, that is harmful; this man is noble, that one is evil, and so on. We give unconditional judgement. But in reality it is correct only in some conditions, with some assumptions, in view of a few people, in comparison to some things only – but not unreservedly. However, we treat a few contrary situations as non-existant, thus showing a laxity in its perception and the judgement. This concerns those items, which actually exist independently. As for those things of which man is oblivious because of his limited perception of related matters, they are even more numerous. Therefore, whatever man speaks about and about which he assumes some knowledge and perception, is all based on inexactitude in some aspects, and ignorance of others. If we could comprehend the reality and then tried to apply that speech on it, we would find that it was merely a joke. Ponder on it.

This is the condition of human speech, which is based on the knowledge acquired by man. As for the divine speech, it must be above such short-comings, because Allãh encompasses all things in His knowledge; and He says about His speech: Most surely it is a decisive word, and it is not a jest (86:13-14).

And it guides us how we should explain the divine words without attaching to it any condition when the said words are unrestricted and are not followed by any joint or separate condition; and this is how we should look at the attributes mentioned therein as they point to the underlying reason of the statement. When Allãh says: He shall love them, then He shall not dislike them in anything and in any manner – otherwise He would have attached an exception. And when He praises them as being lowly before the believers, it implies that they would be lowly before them because of their belief in Allãh, and they would remain lowly in all conditions and in all situations; otherwise it would not be a decisive word.

Of course, there are some attributes ascribed to a large group while in reality it applies to a select band from among them – when both groups are united in a way that justifies such usage. Allãh says: And certainly We gave the Book and the Wisdom and the Prophecy to the Children of Israel, and We gave them of the goodly things, and We made them excel the nations (45:16). . . . He has chosen you and has not laid upon you any hardship in religion; . . . (22:78); You are the best of the nations raised up for the (benefit of) men; you enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong . . . (3:110); . . . that you may be witnesses for the people and the Messenger may be a witness for you . . . (2:143); And the Messenger cried out: "O my Lord! Surely my people have treated this Qur'ãn as a foresaken thing. (25:30), apart from other verses which describe sociological attributes which are found in individuals and society. Such expressions are not based on any laxity; they are attributes ascribed to a part and the whole, to the society as well as to an individual, because of some relevance. For example, we have a handful of earth containing a gem; now we may say, there is earth in our hand; and equally truthfully it may be said that there is a gem in our hand, and the real purpose is to take that gem.

Now, let us return to our original topic:

"O you who believe! Whoever of you turns back from his religion": As explained earlier, turning back from religion here means taking the Jews and the Christians for a friend. The verse, like the preceding one, is addressed to the believers. The main theme is to declare that the true religion does not need such people's belief, which is polluted with love of the enemies of Allãh. Allãh has counted such friendship as disbelief and polytheism, as He has said: and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them. It is because Allãh is the Guardian and Helper of His religion, and as an aspect of His help to His religion, He will certainly bring a people who will renounce the enemies of Allãh, and love His friends and will not love any except Him.

"then soon Allãh will bring a people": Allãh has ascribed the bringing to Himself to confirm the meaning of His help to His religion. The context makes it clear that this religion has got a Helper, besides Whom it does not need any helper – and that is Allãh Himself.

The speech puts the help to religion given by these people vis-à-vis the national help sought by those who love Allãh's enemies. Likewise, the word, "people", and mention of their attributes and related verbs in plural show that the people whose appearance is promised, will be a community not one or two individuals. In other words, it does not say that Allãh will bring in every period a person who will love Allãh and whom Allãh will love, and who will be lowly before believers and mighty before disbelievers, and who will fight in the way of Allãh and will not be afraid of the censure of any censurer.

Bringing of these people is attributed to Allãh. It does not mean that He will create them, because there is no creator except Allãh. He has said: Allãh is the Creator of everything . . . (39:62). Rather this bringing connotes that it is He Who shall arouse them to take the opportunity to help the religion; and shall enhance their honour by loving them and being loved by them; He will help them in being lowly before His friends and mighty against His enemies, and in fighting in His way and ignoring every censurer's comments. Therefore, their help to the religion is Allāh's help to it through them and by means of them. Whether this promise is implemented at once or after sometime is all the same for Allāh, although our mind because of its limitation differentiates between nearness and farness.

"He shall love them and they shall love Him": Love is unrestricted with any attribute or adjective; thus this mutual love is for 'person' only without any condition. They love Allāh; it follows that they give preference to their Lord over anything else, be it wealth, honour, family, or other such things. They do not love anyone among the enemies of Allāh; if they love any one, it is reserved for the friends of Allāh because of the love of Allāh.

As for His love to them, it means that they are free from every injustice, clean of every spiritual uncleanness, be it disbelief or sin. They attain this cleanness through divine protection, or through divine forgiveness resulting from repentance. It is because Allāh does not love any injustice or sin as He says: . . . then surely Allāh does not love the unbelievers (3:32); . . . and Allāh does not love the unjust (3:57); . . . surely He does not love the extravagants (6:141); . . . and Allāh does not love the mischief-makers (5:64); . . . Surely Allāh does not love those who exceed the limits (2:190); . . . surely He does not love the proud (16:23); . . . surely Allāh does not love the treacherous (8:58); apart from other such verses.

These verses condemn all evils. When these evils are removed from man, as Allāh's love to him testifies, he will acquire their opposite virtues. After all man cannot be devoid of both characteristics; he must compulsorily adhere to this side or that.

In short, they are the true believers whose belief is not tainted with injustice, and Allāh has said: Those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice, those are they who shall have the security and they are those who go aright (6:82). So, they are protected from going astray; and Allāh has said: . . . surely Allāh does not guide him who leads astray, . . . (16:37). Thus, they are under divine protection against every straying and are led by divine guidance onto His straight path. They because of their faith – confirmed by Allāh – are guided to following the Messenger and total submission to him, as they have surrendered totally to Allāh. Allāh says: But no! By your Lord! They do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then do not find any straitness in their hearts as to what you have decided and submit with total submission (4:65).

When they shall reach that stage, then the words of Allãh shall be truly applicable to them: Say: "If you love Allãh, then follow me, Allãh will love you . . ." (3:31) It also clearly proves that following the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and being loved by Allãh are concomitants and inseparable; whoever follows the Prophet, Allãh loves him; and Allãh does not love anyone unless he is a follower of His Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

When they shall follow the Messenger, they will acquire every good, which Allãh loves and is pleased with, like piety, justice, magnanimity, patience, reliance on Allãh, repentance, cleanness, and other such virtues. Allãh says: . . . then surely Allãh love the pious (3:76); . . . surely Allãh loves the doers of good (2:195*)*; . . . and Allãh loves the patient (3:146); surely Allãh loves those who fight in His way in ranks as if they were a firm and compact wall (61:4); . . . surely Allãh loves those who trust (in Him) (3:159*)*; . . . surely Allãh loves those who turn much (to Him), and He loves those who purify themselves (2:222), apart from other such verses.

If you search and ponder on the verses which expound the effects of these qualities and their concomitant virtues, you will come upon a great many good characteristics; and you will find that all lead to the conclusion that the people having those virtues are the heirs who shall inherit the earth, and for them will be the good end of the abode, as the verse under discussion (O you who believe! Whoever of you turns back . . .) points to it; and Allãh has stated it in a short but comprehensive sentence: . . . and the (good) end is for piety (20:132). We shall explain the underlying theme of this verse in another relevant place, God willing.

QUR'ÃN: lowly before the believers, mighty against the unbelievers: al-Adhillah and al-a'izzah (اَلأَذِلَّةُ ، اَلأَعِزَّةُ) are plurals of al-dhalīl (اَلذَّلِيْلُ = lowly) and al-'azīz (اَلْعَزِيْزُ = mighty) respectively. It is an allusion that they should be gentle to the believers in respect to Allãh Who is their friend and they are His friend; and should not pay any attention to the false honour which the unbelievers manifest and to which the divine religion does not attach any importance. Allãh has guided His Prophet to this reality when He has said: Do not strain your eyes after what We have given certain classes of them to enjoy, and do not grieve for them, and make yourself gentle to the believers (15:88). Probably, the preposition 'alã (عَلى = on, over) has been used for adhillah (أَذِلَّةُ = lowly) because it contains the meaning of love and compassion or of bending down, as has been claimed.

QUR'ĀN: they shall strive hard in Allāh's way and shall not fear the censure of any censurer; . . .: Fighting in the way of Allāh has been especially singled out from among their numerous virtues because the context demanded it, as Allāh has declared that He will raise them for helping His religion. The phrase: "and shall not fear the censure of any censurer", is apparently a conditional clause related to all preceding sentences and not with the immediately preceding one (they shall fight in Allāh's way), although it is the safest interpretation in such constructions. No doubt, fighting in the way of Allāh is often faced by censurers' censure who warns the believers that if they went for jihād, they would be in danger of losing their wealth, lives, and would have to bear untold hardships and difficulties. But the same is the case of being lowly before the believers and mighty against the unbelievers. After all, the latter have, in their hands, worldly embellishments, desirable luxuries, and necessities of life, which the believers do not have. And if one turns away from those unbelievers, he invites censure of the censurers. Yet the true believers do not fear such things.

The verse contains a prophecy of undesirable unseen events that were to appear in future, and we shall discuss them, God willing, under "A Qur'ānic-Cum-Traditional Discourse and Discussion".

TRADITIONS

as-Suyūṭī writes under the verse: O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends: Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh, al-Bayhaqī (in his ad-Dalāil) and Ibn 'Asākir have narrated from 'Ubādah ibn al-Walīd that 'Ubādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit said, "When Banū Qaynuqā' fought the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), 'Abdullāh ibn Ubayy ibn Salūl held fast to them and stood by them, while 'Ubādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit went to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and renounced their covenant before Allāh and His Messenger, he was from Banū 'Awf ibn al-Khazraj, and he had got a covenant with them just as they had got a covenant with 'Abdullāh ibn Ubayy; so ['Ubādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit] renounced them before the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said, 'I love Allāh and His Messenger and the believers, and renounce before Allāh and His Messenger the covenant of these unbelievers and their friendship.'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The same book says that it was about ʻAbdullãh ibn Ubayy that these verses were revealed: O you who believe! Do not take the Jews . . . . . then surely the party of Allãh are they that shall be triumphant (5:51 & 56).

The same book says: Ibn Abī Shaybah and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from ʻAṭiyyah ibn Saʻd that he said, "ʻUbãdah ibn aṣ-Ṣãmit (from Banu 'l-Ḥãrith ibn al-Khazraj) came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! I have numerous friends among the Jews and I adhere to Allãh and His Messenger getting clear of the friendship of the Jews, and I love Allãh and His Messenger.' Then ʻAbdullãh ibn Ubayy said, 'I am a man who fears lest a calamity should befall me, I shall not renounce the friendship of my guardians.' So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said to ʻAbdullãh ibn Ubayy, 'O Abu 'l-Ḥubãb! Do you think that what you have spoken of the Jews' friendship is for you against ʻUbãdah?' He said, 'Then I'll accept.' So Allãh revealed [the following] verses: O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and . . . . . and Allãh will protect you from the people; . . . [5:51-67]."

Again the same book narrates: Ibn Marduwayh narrates from Ibn ʻAbbãs that he said, "ʻAbdullãh ibn Ubayy ibn Salūl accepted Islam; then he said, 'Surely there is a pact between me and Banū Qurayẓah and Banu 'n-Naḍīr, and I fear calamities;' so he turned back and became an unbeliever. And ʻUbãdah ibn aṣ-Ṣãmit said, 'I renounce the pact of Qurayẓah and an-Naḍīr turning towards Allãh, and I love Allãh and His Messenger.' Then Allãh revealed: O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends; . . . So you will see those in whose hearts is a disease, hastening in them, [i.e. ʻAbdullãh ibn Ubayy] . . . Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay the zakãt while they bow [i.e. ʻUbãdah ibn aṣ-Ṣãmit and the companions of the Messenger of Allãh, s.a.w.a.]. He [Ibn ʻAbbãs] said [reciting the verse]: "And had they believed in Allãh and the Prophet and what was revealed to him, they would not have taken them for friends, but most of them are transgressors [5:81]."

The author says: This story has been narrated through other chains too. However, we have repeatedly explained that such "reasons of revelation" are merely the personal opinions of exegetes who have applied the stories to the verses that seemed somehow relevant. There are other signs in them that point to this fact. How could these stories have caused revelation of these verses, when they mention the Christians with the Jews, and there was no trace of Christians in the events of Banū Qaynuqā‘ nor in the affairs of Banū Qurayẓah or Banu 'n-Naḍīr? The Muslims had no dealing with the Christians in all those happenings. And there is no reason justifying their uncalled for inclusion in divine speech. There are many verses in the Qur'ān describing the Jews' condition in the happenings that had taken place between them and the Muslims. Also where it deals with the hypocrites' meddlings it particularly mentions the Jews and has not said anything about the Christians, as for example in the chapter of "The Mustering" and others. So how can we treat the mention of the Christians in these verses as uncalled-for?

Moreover, the tradition says that not less then 17 verses (5:51-67) were revealed about ‘Ubādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit and ‘Abdullāh ibn Ubayy. However, first of all, these verses are not inter-connected, so that it may be claimed that they were revealed at one go.

Second: There is among them the verse [of wilāyah]: Only Allāh is your Guardian . . . [5:55], and there are mutawātir traditions narrated by the Shī‘ahs and Sunnīs that it was revealed about ‘Alī (a.s.).

Third: There is also the verse [of balligh]: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord . . . [5:67], and it has no connection with the narrated stories.

Apparently, the narrator looked at the story of ‘Ubādah and ‘Abdullāh, and then found that some of the above verses have some relevance to it; so he applied the story to the verses. There can be no other explanation. However, the application was not done properly, as he put seventeen verses in place of three, just because they all speak about the People of the Book.

as-Suyūṭī narrates, through Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, from ‘Ikrimah that [he said], "The verse: O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends; they are friends of each other, was revealed about Banū Qurayẓah; when they committed treachery and broke the pact they had made with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), by writing to Abū Sufyān ibn Ḥarb, calling them and the Quraysh to enter into their fortresses. So the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) sent Abū Lubābah ibn Abdu 'l-Mundhir to them in order that he might urge them to come down from their fortresses. When they agreed to come down, he pointed to his throat – meaning slaughter. At the same time, Ṭalḥah and az-Zubayr were corresponding with the Christians and the Syrians. And I have been told that some companions of the Prophet

(s.a.w.a.) were afraid of being afflicted with poverty and indigence, so they corresponded with the Jews of Banū Qurayẓah and Banu 'n-Naḍīr, giving them news about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), [expecting] to seek from them loan and (other) benefits [afterwards]. So they were forbidden it." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: There is no difficulty in (accepting) this tradition. It explains the wilãyah in the verse as love and affinity, and the preceding discourse supports it. If that was really the reason of revelation, then the verses are unrestricted and will also apply to other similar situations; and if the tradition is merely an application, then the case is clear.

Majma'u 'l-bayãn writes under the verse: O you who believe! Whoever of you turns back from his religion, then soon Allãh will bring a people He shall love them and they shall love Him. And it has been said, 'They are: the Leader of the faithful ʻAlī (a.s.) and his companions, when he fought those who fought against him – the nãkithīn (pledge-breakers), the qãsiṭīn (deviators from the truth), the mãriqīn (heretics).[39] It has been narrated from ʻAmmãr, Ḥudhayfah and Ibn ʻAbbãs; and it is also narrated from Abū Ja'far and Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.).

The author says: [aṭ-Ṭabrisī] has written in Majma'u 'l-bayãn after quoting the above tradition, "This statement is supported by the fact that the Prophet had praised ʻAlī (a.s.), with the very attributes mentioned in the verse. He said about him when he called him to conquer Khaybar (after dismissing previous standard-bearers one after the other when they came back accusing the people of cowardice while the people accused them of the same), 'Surely, tomorrow I will give the standard to a man who loves Allãh and His Messenger, and Allãh and His Messenger love him; repeatedly attacking, never fleeing; he will not return until Allãh gives victory on his hand;' and then he gave the standard to him.

"As for the attributes of being gentle with the believers and hard against the unbelievers, and waging war in the way of Allãh, without being afraid of a censure of any censurer, nobody can deny that ʻAlī (a.s.), fully deserved these virtues. His jihãd against polytheists and unbelievers is well known, and everyone is aware of his strivings in strengthening of Islam and helping the religion, as well as his gentleness before the believers.

"It is also supported by the warning given by the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), to the Quraysh that ‘Alī might fight them after him. It happened when Suhayl ibn ‘Amr came to him with a group; they said: 'O Muhammad! Our slaves have come to you and you return them to us.' Thereupon, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), said, 'You should desist (from such behaviour), O people of Quraysh! Otherwise, Allãh will certainly raise over you a man who will beat you on the interpretation of the Qur’ãn as I had beaten you on its revelation.' Some of his companions said, 'who it is, O Messenger of Allãh? Abū Bakr?' He said, 'No; rather it is the repairer of shoes inside the room.' And ‘Alī (a.s.) was (then) repairing the shoes of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.).

"It has been narrated from ‘Alī (a.s.), that he said on the day of Baṣrah, 'By Allãh! The people of this verse were not fought against till today;' then he recited this verse.

"And Abū Isḥãq ath-Tha‘labī has narrated in his at-Tafsīr through his chain from az-Zuhrī from Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyab from Abū Hurayrah that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Will come to me on the Day of Resurrection a group of my companions, and they will be removed from the ḥawḍ; so I will say, "O my Lord! My companions, my companions"; and it will be said, "Surely you do not know what they did after you, surely they fell back (from religion)."'"

What aṭ-Ṭabrisī has written fits on ‘Alī (a.s.). There is no doubt that he is the best example of the attributes mentioned in the verse; but there is a question about its application on the whole group who were with him in the battles of the Camel and Ṣiffīn, because many of them had changed after that, while the words in the verse: He shall love them and they shall love Him, have come without any exception, and you have known its meaning.

Also ath-Tha‘labī says, "And it has been narrated that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), was asked about this verse, and he tapped his hand on Salmãns shoulder and said, 'He and his people.' Then he said, 'If the religion were fastened to the Milky Way, certainly some people from Persia would have got it.'"

The author says: The comment mentioned above applies here also, except if it is taken to mean that they would be raised from his people.

ath-Tha‘labī goes on to record, "And it has been said that they are the people of Yemen. They are most gentle-hearted, mildest in temper; the faith is Yemenite, and the wisdom is Yemenite. ʻAyãḍ ibn Ghanam al-Ashʻarī said, 'When this verse was revealed, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) pointed to Abū Mūsã al-Ashʻarī and said, "They are his people."'"

The author says: This theme has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, through several chains; and the preceding comment applies here too.

aṭ-Ṭabarī narrates through his chain from Qatãdah that he said, "Allãh revealed this verse and He certainly knew that a group of people would soon apostatize; when Allãh took away His Prophet Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), most of the Arabs turned back from Islam except three mosques: people of Medina, people of Mecca and people of Bahrain. They (i.e. the others) said, 'We shall pray but we shall not pay zakãt, and our wealth shall not be taken by force.' So Abū Bakr talked (with companions) about it, and it was said to him, 'Surely if they had its knowledge they would pay it and increased over it.' But he said, 'No, by Allãh! I will not separate a thing which Allãh has joined; and if they refused (to give) a cord which Allãh and His Messenger have made compulsory, we should fight them for it.' Then Allãh raised a group with Abū Bakr, and he fought on what the Prophet of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had fought on, until he captured, killed and burned into fire many people who had turned back from Islam and had refused zakãt; and he fought them until they agreed to pay zakãt, with humility and inferiority. . . ."

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated it in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr through ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, al-Bayhaqī and Ibn ʻAsãkir from Qatãdah; and also from aḍ-Ḍaḥḥãk and al-Ḥasan.

The wording of the narrative clearly testifies that it is merely an application based on personal opinion. Therefore, the objections against previous narratives would also apply in this case. These battles and fightings contain many happenings and affairs, and among the fighters were people like Khãlid ibn al-Walīd, Mughīrah ibn Shuʻbah, Busr ibn al-Arṭãh, and Sumrah ibn Jundab. History records about them in these battles and in later days such injustice and sins which do not leave any chance to apply to them the verse: He shall love them and they shall love Him . . . You should study history books and then ponder on the verse's meaning, which we have given.

An exegete has indulged in such an exaggeration in this idea that he shows his astonishment on someone's saying: 'The verse is more clearly applicable to the Ash‘arites from Yemen than to those who had fought the apostates.' We append below a gist of his comments:

> "The verse is general and covers all those who helped the religion from among those good Muslims who had got the virtues mentioned in it; right from the believers during the time of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), to those who came after him; and it fits on all the previously mentioned traditions, like the one saying that it is about Salmãn and his people (in spite of its weakness), and the one that it concerns Abū Mūsã Ash‘arī and his people, and the one that it is about Abū Bakr and his companions. However, it does not fit on the tradition which says that the verse is about ‘Alī (a.s.), because the verse contains the word, people, and it is not used for one person, as it is made for a group."

This is the gist of his opinion. It only shows that he has treated the divine speech with its praising phrases, just like poetries in which the praise of the subjects is entirely based on imagination. Whatever the poet can imagine, he applies it to his praised one, without caring whether it was true or false, but Allãh says: and who is truer of word than Allãh? (4:122) Or he has taken it as our usual talk, which is generally based on laxity and carelessness; and whenever somebody objects on any such expression, we offer the excuse of indulgence. But Allãh says: Most surely it is a decisive word, and it is not a jest (86:13-14). You have understood from the preceding explanation that if the verse is taken in its proper meaning with all the attributes that it contains, it will be clear that its application has not appeared yet. Read that part again, think over it, and then decide for yourself.

Even more astonishing is his comment at the end [that it does not fit on ‘Alī because the word people is not used for one person]: Whoever has mentioned ‘Alī, has said, "‘Alī and his companions"; just as others have mentioned: Salmãn and his people, Abū Mūsã and his people, and Abū Bakr and his companions. Likewise, the traditions about ‘Alī (a.s.) – and some have been mentioned earlier – speak about ‘Alī and his companions. No one has said that it was revealed for ‘Alī (a.s.) alone, so that it could be said that the verse's wordings fit on a group, not on an individual.

Of course ath-Tha‘labī has written in his at-Tafsīr that it was revealed about ‘Alī (a.s.). Also it is narrated in Nahju 'l-bayãn (of al-Shaybānī) from al-Bãqir and aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) that it was revealed about ʻAlī (a.s.). But looking at them in conjunction with other traditions, it becomes clear that these too mean ʻAlī and his companions who stood with him to help the religion in the battles of the Camel, Ṣiffīn and the Khawãrij.

Apart from that, there are a lot of traditions narrated through Sunnī chains that the verse: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers . . ., was revealed for ʻAlī (a.s.) although it uses plurals.

Moreover, there is another objection on the traditions of Qatãdah, aḍ-Ḍaḥḥãk and al-Ḥasan: The verse: O you who believe! Whoever of you turns back from his religion, then soon Allãh will bring a people He shall love them and they shall love Him . . ., very clearly shows that there shall be an exchange and that Allãh does not need these people who are present now; no matter whether the verse is addressed to those who were present at the time of its revelation, or to the combined group of those present and those not yet born. The aim is to declare to a group of believers that if they all or some of them turned away from the religion, Allãh shall soon bring in their place a people He shall love them and they shall love Him – and obviously neither He does love apostates nor they do love Him – and who shall have such and such good characteristics and they shall help His religion.

It is clear that the promised group shall be different from the people who were present at the time of revelation. But those who fought against the apostates so soon after the Prophet's death were present at the time of revelation and it is they who were addressed with the clause: O you who believe! . . . Therefore, the promise: soon Allãh will bring a people He shall love them and they shall love Him . . ., cannot be applied to them.

The verse runs on the line of the verse: . . . and if you turn back He will bring in your place another people, then they will not be like you (47:38).

an-Nuʻmānī narrates in his at-Tafsīr, through his chain from Sulaymãn ibn Hãrūn al-ʻIjillī that he said, "I heard Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), saying, 'Surely, the master of this matter has (companions) reserved for him; if all the people went away, Allãh would bring his companions; and it is they about whom Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, has said: . . . therefore if these disbelieve in it, We have already entrusted with it a people who are not disbelievers in it (6:89); and about them He has said: then soon Allãh will bring a people He shall love them and they shall love Him, lowly before the believers, mighty against the unbelievers.

The author says: This connotation has been narrated by al-ʻAyyãshī and al-Qummī in their books of tafsīr.

A QUR'ÃNIC-CUM-TRADITIONAL DISCOURSE AND DISCUSSION

We have repeatedly hinted previously that when Qur'ãn puts too much emphasis on a certain topic, and imperatively asserts and goes to the utmost limit in affirming it, it gives an indication that the causes and factors that were then present would surely join forces to push man to the pitfalls of perdition and make him liable to the wrath of Allãh. Look, for example, at the verses of interest and of the love of the kindred, etc.

This inference springs from the nature of speech. When a wise speaker gives a simple and easy to comply with order, and then goes to the extreme in emphasizing it; or when he addresses a respected personality in a way that such people are not talked to in that manner (for example, a divine scholar, deep-rooted in self-denial and worship is openly admonished not to commit heinous debauchery), it shows that there is some hidden reason behind it, and that there lies ahead a great dangerous situation and an imminent perdition.

The Qur'ãnic talks of this style were certainly followed by such events and happenings that confirmed that allusion, or let us say, prophecy; although those who heard the verse on the day of revelation probably were not aware of the hints and allusions it contained.

Look at how the Qur'ãn ordered people to love the Prophet's kindred, and how it emphasized it until it was counted as the wage of messengership, and then see how the Muslims inflicted calamitous oppressions and massacres on his family-members, to such an extent that if they were ordered to do such things they could not do more.

The Qur'ãn forbade discord and disagreement, and emphasized this prohibition to the utmost degree; and then the ummah was disunited and divided into so many sects that exceeded the disunity of the Jews and the Christians. The Jews had divided into seventyone sects and the Christians into seventytwo, but the Muslim went to seventy-three sects. This was only in matters of belief and theology; as for their divisions in social orders and political systems, etc., nobody can fully compute it.

The Qur'ãn forbids judging by what Allãh has not revealed. It prohibited creating discord between various classes, and clearly told the ummah not to transgress the boundary or to follow their low desires, etc. In spite of all this emphasis there happened what we all are aware of.

This prohibition of taking the unbelievers and the People of the Book as friends did not fare any differently from other forcefully emphasized Qur'ãnic prohibitions. It may rather be said that no other prohibition in the circle of the branches of religion reaches near this forbiddance. Its importance was raised to such a level that Allãh counted the friends of the People of the Book and the unbelievers as being one of them: and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them; He declared that they are not from Allãh: . . . and whoever does this, he shall have nothing (to do) with Allãh, . . . (3:28); He warned them most forcefully, and said time and again: . . . and Allãh cautions you of Himself; . . . (3:30); and we have explained under the verse that it indicates that what they had been warned of, was bound to happen without any change.

If you want more clarification then think over the verses 111 and 113 of chapter 11 (Hūd): Allãh has before that given the stories of the peoples of Nūḥ, Hūd, Ṣāliḥ and others and described the discord of the Jews in their books. Then He says: And your Lord will most surely pay back to all their deeds in full; surely He is aware of what they do. Stand fast then (in the right path) as you are commanded, as also he who has turned (to Allãh) – Note that the address is to the community – and be not inordinate (O men!), surely He sees what you do. Now, ponder on the next verse: And do not incline to those who are unjust, lest the Fire touch you, and you have no guardians besides Allãh, then you shall not be helped.

The verse is unrestricted and, therefore, the fire shall touch them in this world too before the next; and He has threatened them by the clause: and Allãh cautions you of Himself; this touching of the Fire is explained in the verse: . . . This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion, so fear them not, and fear Me. . . . (5:3). It makes it clear that what the believers were afraid of regarding their religion, until this verse was revealed, from the disbelievers, i.e. the polytheists and the People of the Book, now they are safe from it; therefore, they should not fear them about their religion; rather they should fear their Lord. What were they afraid of regarding their religion from the disbelievers? It was because they were aware that the only goal that the disbelievers had before their eyes was to extinguish the light of religion, and to snatch away this precious commodity from their hands by any means available. They were under this apprehension before today; but revelation of the chapter of "The Table" brought a feeling of security to them, and their hearts became tranquil. Even so, they should fear their Lord, lest He takes away their light and deprives them of their religion.

It is known that Allāh does not inflict any misfortune or punishment on any people unless they fully deserve it. He says: This is because Allāh never change a bounty which He has conferred upon a people until they change their own condition; . . . (8:53). Thus, He made it clear that His changing of bounty does not take place unless the people concerned deserve it, which is then followed by change of bounty. Allāh has called religion or religious guardianship a favour or bounty, as He says soon after it: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you and chosen for you Islam as religion.

If this favour is changed it is through their own agency. It is expected that they would go out of divine protection by cutting relation from Him, inclining towards the unjust people and taking the disbelievers and the People of the Book for friends. It is incumbent on them to fear Allāh concerning their selves, – fearing His wrath which nobody can avert; He has threatened them of it in these words: and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them; surely Allāh does not guide the unjust people (5:51). Allāh in these words has declared that He will not guide them to their felicity; and it is this felicity with which guidance is connected. Their felicity in the world means that they would live on religious tradition and general Islamic custom in their society.

When the structure of this system comes down, its manifest bearings are disrupted, like enjoining the good and forbidding the evil, which had preserved its real meaning; general Islamic practices give way to disbelievers' traditions; this un-Islamic behaviour gradually takes firm roots and is permanently established – and this is the situation of Muslims' society in these days.

Ponder on general Islamic behaviour arranged by the Book and the Sunnah, which they try to establish among the Muslims. Then look at this corrupt behaviour burdened over the Muslims' shoulders today. Lastly think over the divine words: then soon Allãh will bring a people He shall love them and they shall love Him, lowly before the believers, mighty against the unbelievers, they shall fight in Allãh's way and shall not fear the censure of any censurer (5:54). Then you will realize that all the evils which have today encompassed our Muslim society, and have taken deep roots – that we had borrowed from the unbelievers and then it has grown and generated – are the opposites of what Allãh has mentioned as the attributes of the people whose appearance He has promised. In other words, all our bad characteristics are encapsuled in the fact that our people today do not love Allãh, nor does He love them, they are lowly before the unbelievers, haughty against the believers; they do not fight in Allãh's way and fear the censure of every censurer.

It was this degeneration that the Qur'ãn had read in those people's faces. You may say that it was a news of the unseen which the knowing God had given the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): That the Islamic society will turn back from the religion; it would not be the terminological apostacy; rather it would be a degradation for which Allãh says: and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them; surely Allãh does not guide the unjust people (5:51); And had they believed in Allãh and the Prophet and what was revealed to him, they would not have taken them for friends, but most of them are transgressors (5:81).

Allãh had promised to help them if they would help Him, and to weaken their enemies if the Muslim themselves did not strengthen and help them. He says: . . . If you help Allãh, He will help you (47:7); . . . and if the People of the Book had believed, it would have been better for them; of them (some) are believers and most of them are transgressors. They shall by no means harm you but with a slight distress; and if they fight you they shall turn (their) backs to you, then they shall not be helped. Abasement is brought down upon them wherever they are found, except under a protection from Allãh and a protection from men, . . . (3:110-12). It is not far-fetched to infer from the words: except under a protection from Allãh and a protection from men, that they could come out of that abasement if they established friendship with people or if Allãh gave them mastery over people.

Then Allãh promised the Muslim society – and we have seen its condition – that He shall bring a people that He shall love them and they shall love Him, lowly before the believers, mighty against the un- believers, they shall fight in Allāh's way and shall not fear the censure of any censurer.

These attributes, which Allāh has ascribed to them, are the very characteristics that the today's Islamic society does not have. If you ponder on them, you may infer the detail of the evils, which the verse alludes, shall soon afflict the Islamic society.

Those evils are enumerated in a lot of traditions giving the news of the upheavals of the last days; they are narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.). Despite their great numbers, on the whole they are not free from the defects of interpolation and alteration; yet among them are traditions whose authenticity is confirmed by subsequent events and happenings. Those traditions are recorded in the books compiled by ancient scholars a thousand years or more before our time. Their authorship is established and people have been quoting from them during all that period.

Moreover, those traditions spoke about such events and happenings that had not taken place at that time, nor had the people in those days ever expected such things to happen. Therefore, we have no option but to admit their authenticity and accept that they have come from the fountain-head of revelation.

For example, al-Qummī has narrated in his at-Tafsīr, from his father, from Sulaymān ibn Muslim al-Khashshāb, from ʻAbdullāh ibn Jarīḥ al-Makkī, from ʻAṭāʼ ibn Abī Riyāḥ, from ʻAbdullāh ibn ʻAbbās that he said: "We performed ḥajj – the Last Pilgrimage – with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and then he took hold of the door of Kaʻbah, thereupon he (stood) facing us said, 'May I inform you of the Signs of the Day of Resurrection?' Salmān al-Fārisī (r.a.), who was the nearest of all there, replied, 'Surely, O Messenger of Allāh!'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Verily, amongst the Sings of the Hour is that people will neglect the prayer (i.e., will not pray at all, or will pray without fulfilling its conditions, or will not pray in the preferred time), and will follow their own desires (desires will supersede the commands of Allāh, they will follow only those rules which will appeal to them, and will leave other rules), and will incline towards their own preferences, and will respect the wealthy people (forgetting the Islamic criterion of honour, i.e., piety), and will sell the religion for worldly benefits (for example, the greed of worldly riches will instigate them to go to such places where, they very well know, it would be difficult to observe religious commands); at that time the heart and soul of the believer will melt (from grief) as salt melts in water, because he will see the unlawful things (and actions) and will not be able to change them.'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! At that time their rulers will be tyrant, the ministers transgressors, the leaders unjust and the trustees embezzlers.'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said: 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! Verily at that time evil will become virtue, and virtue will become evil; embezzlers will be trusted, and trustworthy people will be thought untrustworthy; and the liars will be authenticated, and the truthful one will be considered a liar.'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! At that time, women will be rulers and concubines will be consulted; (it may mean the governments of the women and/or the domination of women over their husbands – so much so that the husbands will not, or cannot, ask them to remain within the limits of the sharī'ah, leaving them free to go wherever they want in whatever clothes they like) and the children will sit upon *minbar*s (pulpits). (It may mean that children will sit upon pulpit of the Prophet even though they cannot appreciate the sanctity of the minbar. Or it may mean that such people will ascend the pulpit who will not deserve such honour. The minbar was created for delivering the commands of Allãh to His servants. Its only purpose was to enjoin good and to forbid evil, and later on the narration of the tragedy of Karbalã' was included in it, because the faḍīlah [superiority] and sufferings of the Ahlu 'l-Bayt [a.s.] are important parts of religion. If someone wants to exhort others to do good, he must sincerely follow the sharī'ah himself; and if he wants to forbid others from doing evil, he, first of all, must abstain from the sins himself. Unfortunately, nowadays anyone who can recite a few poems of Iqbãl or Rumī, and who is unrestrained enough to invent faḍãil and maṣãib of the Ahlu 'l-Bayt [a.s.] on the spur of the moment, is given the titles al-'allãmah, mawlãnã and dhãkir and is offered heavy fee to demonstrate his oratorical power, even if he shaves his beard, even if he knows nothing about Qur'ãn and Ḥadīth, even if he expresses his own opinions against the sayings of the Holy Prophet and the Imãms [peace be on them all], even if he uses the pulpit to mislead the masses); and the lie will be considered as cleverness; and zakat will be (disliked) as fines; and the booty of war will be like personal property (or in present days' context, public property will be squandered as personal property); and man will be tyrant to his parents and generous to his friend; and at that time comets will appear.'

"Salmān (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allāh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allāh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmān! At that time woman will become a partner of her husband in trade; (it means, more probably, that she will help her husband in the shop, acting as sales-girl, accountant and what not); and the rain will be very hot; (its meaning is not clear yet. Does it mean radioactive rain?), and virtuous people will remain very sorrowful; and the poor person will be humiliated; at that time, the markets will come nearer; (it has already happened, thanks to the fantastic developments in the means of communications, like teleprinters, fax and internet. A man sitting in New York buys and sells in Tokyo). Then this will say. "I did not sell anything" and that will say, "I did not get any profit". Thus, you will see none who is not complaining against Allāh.'

"Salmān (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allāh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes; By (Allāh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmān! And then it will happen that their rulers will be such people that if they talked, they would kill them and if they remained silent, they would confiscate their wealth, would put their honour under their feet and would shed their blood – and the people's hearts will fill with fear; then you will not find anyone but that he would be afraid, fearful, awed and in terror.'

"Salmān (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allāh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allāh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmān! Verily at that time some things will be brought from the East, and some things from the West, and my ummah (Muslims) will be dyed in them. [It means that un-Islamic behaviour and character will be imported from the East and the West and Muslims will imitate those things and will be dyed in un-Islamic colour.] Then woe be unto the weaker people of my ummah from them; and woe be unto those (un-Islamic agents) from Allāh. They will not have mercy upon the little ones and will not respect the old ones; and will not pardon anyone who committed a mistake. Their bodies will be of human beings, and their hearts will be of Satans.'

"Salmān (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allāh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allāh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! And at that time males will satisfy their lust with males; and females will satisfy their lust with females; and minor boys will be mounted upon like the women; and the males will liken themselves to females [i.e., will look like females]; and females will look like males. [The clean-shaved faces and long hair on one side, and pants and bell-bottoms on the other are proof of the fulfilment of this forecast], and females will ride the saddles (i.e., horses, cycles, scooters and motor-cycles). So there will be curse of Allãh upon those women of my ummah.'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! Verily, at that time mosques will be decorated (by gold, etc.) as are synagogues and cathedrals; and the (copies of the) Qur'ãn will be beautified (with designs and golden colours, etc.); and the minarets (of the mosques) will be high, and the lines of the people standing in prayers will increase but their hearts will be hating each other and their talks will be different from each other, [i.e., though the external show of religion will be on the increase, the spirit of religion will disappear. Even when they will pray together, the Islamic brotherhood and unity will be absent. They will hate each other; they will not speak with one voice.]'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! At that time males will use golden ornaments. [In many marriages, bridegroom wears golden ring. I wonder why it is thought necessary to start the married life by defying the command of Allãh. Will such wilful affront to religion bring the blessings of Allãh and the Fourteen Ma'ṣūmīn (a.s.), upon the newlyweds?]; and they (the males) will wear silk and (people) will use cheetah-skins.'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! And at that time "interest" will appear (everywhere), and people will deal with (the help of) backbiting and bribe; and the Religion will be suppressed, and the world (worldly affairs) will be raised (in importance).'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! At that time, divorce will increase. And the ḥudūd (punishments of various crimes and sins prescribed in Islam) of Allāh will not be established [i.e., the penal code given by Allāh will not be followed, as is the case nowadays]. But it will not do any harm to Allāh. [It will harm them only; they will suffer.]'

"Salmān (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allāh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allāh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmān! And at that time will appear female singers and musical instruments ["will appear" means "will be openly used"]; and will rule upon them most evil of my ummah (worst people will rule upon the Muslims).'

"Salmān (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allāh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allāh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmān! And at that time the rich of my ummah will go to pilgrimage for recreation, and the middle class for trade [What about foreign exchange, gold, watches and radios?], and the poor to show off. Thus, at that time, there will be people who will learn the Qur'ān for other than Allāh [i.e., for earning worldly benefits] and will treat the Qur'ān as musical instrument [as is happening today in Islamic countries where the Qur'ān is recited on the radios, not to make people follow the religious commands, but just to entertain the listeners].'

"'And there will be people who will study religion for other than Allāh [i.e., for earning prestige or wealth, as is happening today when the main purpose of religious studies in many circles is to become a good orator, so that higher and higher fees may be demanded from the audience] and the number of illegitimate children will increase; and people will sing the Qur'ān, and will fall upon one another in greed of the worldly (riches).'

"Salmān (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allāh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allāh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmān! This will happen when honours will be defiled, and sins will be committed, and the evil people will have authority upon good people, and falsehood will be prevalent, and disputes will appear [talks will be full of obstinacy], and poverty will be wide-spread and people will be proud of their clothes [fine clothes will be the criterion of greatness], and there will be rains at wrong times; and they will like chess and gambling apparatus and musical instruments; and will dislike enjoining the good and forbidding the evil; so much so that the (true) believer will, at that time have less respect than a slave-girl; and the reciters (of the Qur'ān) and those who spend their time in worshipping God will blame each other.

[Mudslinging amongst apparently religious people is not an uncommon sight nowadays.] Those are the people who will be called unclean and filthy in the kingdom of heavens.'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! At that time the rich will not fear (anything) except the poor so much so that a beggar will continue begging between two Fridays and will not find anyone putting anything in his hands.'

"Salmãn (r.a.), said, 'And is this to happen, O Messenger of Allãh?'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Yes, By (Allãh) in Whose hand is my soul, O Salmãn! At that time will talk Ruwaybiḍah.'

"Salman asked, 'And what is Ruwaybiḍah? O Messenger of Allãh, may my father and mother be made your ransom!'

"The Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Such persons will talk about public affairs who had not talked in such matter before. Then in a short time chaos will appear upon earth, and every nation will think that chaos was only in their land [but it will cover the whole world].

"'They will remain in that condition so long as Allãh would wish them to remain; then the earth will throw out the pieces of its heart – gold, silver and other minerals' – (Then the Holy Prophet [s.a.w.a.], pointed towards the pillars, and said) 'like these (in size), but on that day neither gold nor silver will be of any benefit to anyone. And this is the meaning of the words of Allãh: So surely did come its (i.e., qiyãmah's) Signs [47:18].'" (Biḥãru 'l-anwãr, vol.3).

[al-Kulaynī] narrates in ar-Rawḍatu 'l-Kãfī, from Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyã, from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad, from some of his companions. Also ʻAlī ibn Ibrãhīm narrates from his father, from Ibn Abī ʻUmayr; both from Muḥammad ibn Abī Ḥamzah, from Ḥumrãn that he said: "Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), said – when it was mentioned before him about those (in power), and the bad condition of the Shīʻahs near them – 'I (once) went with Abū Jaʻfar al-Manṣūr, and he was in his procession. He was on a horse, and before him and behind him were many horses [i.e. riders]; and I was at his side on a donkey. So he said to me, "O Abū ʻAbdillãh! It were proper if you had been glad at the power Allãh had given us and the honour He had opened to us; and you should not tell people that you and your family have more right for this affair [i.e. caliphate] than we have – thus inciting us against yourself and them."' "He (the Imãm), said, 'So I told him, "Whoever has brought it to you from me is a lier." He said to me, "Do you swear

[by Allāh] for what you have said?"' He (the Imām) said, 'I said, "Surely the people are enchanters, i.e., they desire to turn your heart against me, therefore you should not listen to them, because we have more need of you than you have of us." Then he (al-Manṣūr) said, "Do you remember the day I asked you, 'Is there any kingdom (decreed) for us?' And you said, 'Yes. Long, wide, strong; you will continue in respite in your affair and spaciousness in your world, until you afflict us with a sacred blood in a sacred month in a sacred town?'"' He [the Imām) said, 'So I knew that he has memorized the ḥadīth, and I said, "May be Allāh will suffice you, because I had not said it particularly for you, it was only a ḥadīth which I had narrated, then may be some other person from your family would do it." So he became silent.

"'When I returned to my residence, one of our followers came to me and said, "May I be made your ransom! By Allāh! I saw you in the procession of Abū Ja'far; you rode a donkey and he was on a horse, and he talked to you looking down on you as you were under him. So I thought in my mind: 'He is the Allāh's proof on the creation, and the master of this authority who is followed, while this other one commits oppression, murders the children of the prophets and indulges in bloodshed in the earth which Allāh does not love; and yet he is in his procession and you are on a donkey.' This created such a doubt in my heart that I was afraid about my religion and my life."

"The Imām (a.s.), said, 'I said to him, "Had you seen the angels who were around me, before and behind me, and on my right and left, you would have looked at him and his splendour with disdain." Then (the follower) said, "Now I am satisfied."

"'Then he asked, "Upto how long will they continue to rule? When will release from them come?" I said, "Don't you know that there is a (fixed) term for everything?" He said, "Yes." Then I said, "Will it benefit you to know that when this thing came it would be quicker than the twinkling of an eye? If you were to know what and how was their condition before Allāh, the Mighty the Great, you would most forcefully hate them; and if you and all the inhabitants of the earth were to strive to make them enter into the most serious sin they do, they would not be able to do so. So the Satan should not unsettle you, because honour is only for Allāh, and His Messenger, and the believers, but the hypocrites do not know. Don't you know that whoever waits for our affair (power), and remains patient on what he experiences of harm and fear, he will be tomorrow in our group?

"'"So when you see:

– that truth has died and truthful people have gone;
– that oppression has encompassed towns;
– that the Qur'ãn has become old and such things have been innovated in it, which were not therein, and it is interpreted according to desires;
– that religion has retreated as water goes back in its hole;
– that people of falsity tower over people of truth;
– that evil is manifested, and not forbidden; and evil men are absolved from guilt;
– that sin is wide-spread;
– that men content themselves with men, and women with women;
– that the believer is silent, his words are not accepted;
– that the sinner speaks untruth and his falsity and lie is not rebutted;
– that the younger looks at the elder with disdain;
– that relationships are cut off;
– that the one who is praised for sin, laughs at it and does not refute it;
– that a boy offers what a woman offers;
– that women marry women;
– that praise has increased;
– that man spends wealth in other than Allãh's obedience and he is not forbidden nor his hand caught;
– that an onlooker seeks protection of God from the endeavours of a believer;
– that neighbour troubles his neighbour and nobody stops him;
– that the unbeliever is glad with the condition he sees the believer in, happy on the mischief he sees in the earth;
– that intoxicants are drunk openly and gather on it those who do not fear Allãh, the Mighty the Great;
– that enjoiner of good is humiliated;
– that sinner (committing) what Allãh does not like, is powerful, praised;
– that people of Qur'ãn and ḥadīth are disdained, and so is the one who loves them;
– that the path of good is closed; and the path of evil well-trodden;
– that the House of Allãh is abandoned and order is given to leave it;

– that man says what he does not do;
– that man are desirous of men and women of women;
– that a man lives on the earning of his posterior, and a woman on that of her vulva;
– that women hold gatherings [of amusements] like men;
– that femininity has appeared in the Children of ‘Abbās, they use hair-dye and comb (their hair) as a woman combs [i.e. makes herself up] for her husband;
– that men are given wealth for their genitals, people vie with each other for a man, and jealousy is shown about men;
– that a wealthy person is more honoured than a believer;
– that interest is openly [taken and given], without any shame;
– that women get praised for fornication;
– that woman cajoles her husband to establish sexual relations with men;

– that a faqīh learns jurisprudence for other than religion, seeking the world and leadership;
– that people attach themselves to whoever gains ascendancy;
– that one who seeks his livelihood through lawful means is criticized and put to shame; and one who seeks it through unlawful means is praised and respected;
– that in Mecca and Medina things are done which Allãh does not like [but] no one stops them nor anyone puts obstacles between those evils and their doers;
– that instruments of amusements are openly used in Mecca and Medina;
– that if a man speaks some truth, enjoins good, and forbids evil, someone stands up to admonish him and says: 'It is no concern of yours';
– that people look at each other and follow the people of evil;
– that the path of good and its way is empty, nobody uses it;
– That a dead body is shaken and nobody feels pity for it;
– that every year innovation and evil takesplace more than it was before;
– that people and gatherings do not follow except rich ones;
– that a needy person is paid for being laughed at, and is shown mercy for other than Allãh's sake;
– that nobody is afraid of the heavenly signs;
– that people cohabit together like cattles; nobody forbids a bad thing for fear of people;

– that man spends a lot in other than Allãh's obedience, and refuses a small amount in Allãh's obedience;

– that disobedience of parents is wide-spread and parents are disdained; they (live) with the child in the most wretched condition, and he is glad if they are slandered;

– that women have taken possession of the kingdom and gained ascendancy over everything, nothing is done except what they desire;

– that a son slanders his father and invokes God against his parents and becomes happy on their death;

– that if a day passes for a man in which he did not commit a great sin – debauchery, giving short weight or measure, fornication, or drinking intoxicants – he would remain depressed and melancholy, thinking that that day of his life was a loss;

– that the sulṭãn hoards food-stuff [with intention of increasing the price];

– that the money [Allãh has given to the Prophet's] kindred is distributed in wrong ways, and used in gambling and drinking intoxicants;

– that intoxicants are used for medicine, and are prescribed to patients and cure is sought in them;

– that all people are equally guilty of abandoning enjoinment of good and forbiddance of evil; they do not consider it a part of religion;

– that hypocrites live in clover and the people of truth are in oblivion;

– that ãdhãn is given on wages, and prayer is led on wages;

– that the mosque is full of people who do not fear Allãh, and have gathered there for backbiting and eating the flesh of the people of truth, and describe to one another [various kinds of] intoxicants;

– that an intoxicated person leads the people in prayer without understanding anything;

– that intoxication is not disgraced, and when a man is drunk, he is accorded respect and is feared, he is left without punishment and excuse is found for his intoxication;

– that the one who eats orphans' property is praised for his goodness;

– that the judges judge contrary to what Allãh has ordered;

– that the rulers have trust in embezzlers for greed;

– that the rulers have allotted the inheritance to sinners who are audacious against Allãh; they take [something] from them and leave them to do whatever they like;

In the Name of Allãh
The All-Compassionate, The All-Merciful

Praise belongs to Allãh, the Lord of all Being;
the All-Compassionate, the All-Merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement.
Thee only we serve; and to Thee alone we pray for succour.
Guide us in the straight path,
the path of those whom Thou hast blessed,
not of those against whom Thou art wrathful,
nor of those who are astray.

* * * * *

O' Allãh! Send your blessings to the head of your messengers and the last of your prophets, Muḥammad and his pure and cleansed progeny.
Also send your blessings to all your prophets and envoys.

بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم
الحمد لله رب العالمين الرحمن الرحيم
مالك يوم الدين إياك نعبد وإياك نستعين
اهدنا الصراط المستقيم صراط الذين
أنعمت عليهم غير المغضوب عليهم
ولا الضالين
اللهم صل على
سيد رسلك وخاتم أنبيائك
محمد وآله الطيبين الطاهرين
وصل على جميع الأنبياء والمرسلين

FOREWORD

1. The late al-‘Allãmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabãṭabã’ī (1321/1904 – 1402/1981) – may Allãh have mercy upon him – was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contem-porary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the translation of al-Mīzãn.

2. al-‘Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabãṭabã’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzãn fī tafsīri 'l-Qur’ãn which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allãmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ãn in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzãn because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ãn and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustãdh al-‘Allãmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task, because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzãn and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-‘Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabãṭabã’ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzãn and its discussions.

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the eleventh volume of the English translation of al-Mīzãn. This volume corre-sponds with the first half of the sixth volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allãh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendices included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of the English translation of al-Mīzãn: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

* * * * *

We implore upon Allãh to affect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work, which we have started. May Allãh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay the zakãt while they bow (55). And whoever takes Allãh and His Messenger and those who believe for a Guardian, then surely the party of Allãh are they that shall be triumphant (56).

COMMENTARY

The two verses, as you see, are placed between the verses, which prohibit taking the People of the Book and the unbelievers for a helper or guardian. That is why a group of Sunnī exegetes has tried to join these two with the preceding and following verses in a single context; they have taken the whole group in one connotation, aiming to describe the believers' responsibility regarding people's wilãyah (in the meaning of helping), and prohibition of taking the Jews, the Christians and the unbelievers as a helper. It confines the wilãyah to Allãh, His Messenger, and those believers who establish prayers and pay the zakāt while they are bowing – they indeed are true believers. Thus it excludes the hypocrites and those in whose hearts is a disease; leaving the true believers whose wilāyah is incumbent. The verse gives the same import that is shown by a collection of such verses as: . . . and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers (3:68); The Prophet has a greater claim on the believers than they have on themselves, . . . (33:6); [and about the believers that] . . . these are guardians of each other; . . . (8:72); And (as for) the believing men and the believing women, they are guardians of each other; . . . (9:71). [According to these exegetes] the verse under discussion makes Allāh, His Messenger and the believers awliyā' (أَوْلِيَاء = here meaning 'helpers') of the believers.

However, there remains the difficulty of the circumstantial clause, while they bow, which is attached to the clause, and pay zakāt. They have tried to remove this difficulty by taking the bowing in a metaphorical sense, i.e., they submit themselves to Allāh; or they are financially in a low position, etc. The verse then would mean: The Jews, the Christians and the hypocrites are not your guardian; rather your Guardians are Allāh, His Messenger and those believers who keep up prayers and pay zakāt, and they in all this surrender them-selves to Allāh with total obedience – or, they pay zakāt while they themselves are poor and in straitened condition.

This was the explanation given by them. But if you ponder on, and look minutely at the two verses and the ones surrounding them, and then at the general position of this chapter, you will reach at a conclusion different from what they have said.

The first thing which goes out of window is their claim that all these verses were in a single context, and that their aim was to describe the wilāyah of helping and to differentiate between genuine and false help.

Yet, although it is accepted that the chapter was revealed during the last days of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) in the Last Pilgrim-age; but it is also accepted that all its verses were not revealed to-gether in one go; the chapter contains verses which were doubtlessly revealed before that time, and their meanings clearly show it; also their narrated reasons of revelation support their earlier revelation. If a verse is placed before or after a verse it does not give an indication that their context is one; nor does some affinity between one verse and another show that they were revealed together or in one context.

Moreover, the preceding verses [O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends . . .] forbid the believers to befriend the Jews and the Christians, and put to shame the hypocrites and those in whose hearts is a disease for hastening to them and looking after their interests, without addressing the Jews and the Christians or talking to them. And the following ones [O you who believe! Do not take for guardians those who take your religion for a mockery and a joke, from among those who were given the Book before you and the unbelievers; . . . Say: "O People of the Book! Do you find fault with us (for aught) except that we believe in Allãh . . ., and that most of you are transgressors?"], prohibit taking them for guardians and expose their condition by ordering to talk to them and put them to shame for hypocrisy and transgression. Thus the aims in the two sets of verses are quite different from each other. So, how the context can be the same?

Apart from that you have seen in the commentary of preceding verses [O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends . . .] that the wilãyah in the meaning of help is not suitable in that context, and the particularities of those verses and especially the words, they are friends of each other, and the words, and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them, are not appropriate for such interpretation. Establishing the wilãyah of help and its undertaking between two nations does not make the two into one nation nor does it attach one to the other. Also such prohibi-tion cannot be justified by saying that, they are friends of each other. Such expressions can only be used when the aim is to prohibit wilãyah of love, because love creates psychological and spiritual blending of both parties, and permits each to affect psychological and spiritual management in the other's life affairs; it brings two groups near each other in character and activities in a way that obliterates national characteristics.

Not only that. It is not correct to count the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) as a waliyy (in the meaning of helper) of the believers, while its opposite is correct. This help which is given by Allãh, and the Qur'ãn mentions it in many of its verses, is the help in religion. Accordingly, it is pro-per to say that the religion belongs to Allãh – in the meaning that He has established it and laid down its sharī'ah. Thus the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) or the believers or both together are exhorted to help it, or some helpers are invited to help Allãh regarding the laid down religion, as He says: . . . The disciples said: "We are helper of Allãh" . . . (61:14); . . . if you help Allãh, He will help you . . . (47:7); And when Allãh made a covenant with the prophets: ". . . you must believe in him, and you must aid him." . . . (3:81); apart from other many such verses.

Also, it is proper to say that the religion belongs to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) – in the meaning that it is he who has called to it and con-veyed it to us, for example. Or that the religion belongs to Allãh and His Messenger – in the meaning of legislation and guidance, and so they call people to help it or praise the believers for helping it; as Allãh says: . . . so those who believe in him and honour him and help him, . . . (7:157); . . . seeking grace of Allãh and (His) pleasure, and assisting Allãh and His Messenger . . . (59:8); . . . and those who gave shelter and helped . . . (8:72); and other such verses.

Likewise, it is proper to say that the religion belongs to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the believers – in the meaning that they are obligated to follow its laws and act on it, so it is said that Allãh is their Guardian and Helper; as He says: . . . and surely Allãh will help him who helps Him; . . . (22:40); Most surely We help Our messengers, and those who believe in this world's life and on the day when the witnesses shall stand up (40:51); . . . and helping the believers is ever incumbent on Us. (30:47), apart from other such verses.

However, it is not correct to ascribe the religion to the believers alone, thus making them as principal and putting the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) aside, and then to count the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) as their helper in their affairs; because whatever religious dignity there is, the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) has the lion's share in it. That is why we do not find a single ex-ample in the Qur'ãn where the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has been mentioned as the believer's helper. Far be it from the divine speech to neglect the noble divine decorum in any instance.

This is one of the strongest proofs that wherever the Qur'ãn ascribes wilãyah to the Prophet, it means the wilãyah of Guardianship and authority or that of love and affection, as Allãh says: The Prophet has a greater claim on the believers than they have on themselves, . . . (33:6); Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, . . . (5:55); note that the verse is addressed to the believers, and as you have been told earlier, there is no meaning in counting the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) their waliyy in the meaning of helper.

It is now clear that these two verses are different in the context from the preceding ones, even if we take the wilãyah in the meaning of helping; do not be confused by the clause: the party of Allãh are they that shall be triumphant, because triumph and prevailing points to the connotation of helping as much as it does to that of management and authority, and to that of love and affinity. Triumph of religion – the topmost desire of the people of religion – takes place when the believers attach themselves to Allãh and His Messenger with any possible means. Allãh has clearly announced it to them in His words: Allãh has written down: "I will most certainly prevail, I and My Mess-engers;" . . . (58:21); And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the messengers: most surely they shall be the assisted ones, and most surely Our host alone shall be the victori-ous ones (37:171-3).

On top of all, there are a lot of traditions declaring that these two verses were revealed about ‘Alī (a.s.) when he gave his ring in charity while he was praying. Thus these verses are reserved for him and are not general. God willing, many of those traditions will be quoted under "Traditions".

If such numerous and so many accumulated traditions pointing to the reason of revelation can be ignored while explaining a verse, then obviously not a single verse could be explained with the help of the narrated reasons of revelation in the whole Qur’ãn. Therefore, there is no justification for generalizing the two verses and claiming that they point to the believers' friendship with one another.

However, the exegetes have objected to these traditions – although they should not have done so in view of their overwhelming numbers – as follows:

First: These traditions are against the context of the verses that apparently point to the wilãyah of help, as mentioned above.

Second: They want us to use plural and mean singular; because according to them, the clauses: those who believe and those . . ., refer to ‘Alī, but language does not support it.

Third: According to these traditions, zakãt would mean giving the ring in charity, and it is not called zakãt.

Based on these objections, they say that the verses are general, and restrict the wilãyah to the group mentioned therein. The hyp-ocrites were hastening to the help of the People of the Book and em-phasizing its importance; so Allãh forbade it and said that their only helpers are Allãh, His Messenger and the true believers, rather than the People of the Book and the hypocrites. There would remain only one difficulty: that this explanation did not agree with the apparent meaning of the conditional clause: while they bow. But, it could easily be removed if we took it in its metaphorical meaning, i.e. while they are humble before Allãh; or even when they are themselves in need, in wretched condition.

This was the gist of their objections. But if you meditate on this and other similar verses, you will see that none of these stands on its legs.

As for the verse's position in the context of the ones denoting wilãyah of help: You have seen that those verses do not give the mean-ing of help; and even if we suppose that the previous verses denote that meaning, this verse is not compatible with it.

As for the problem of using plural and meaning singular: You have seen the detailed reply to it under the verse of Mubãhalah (3:61) in volume three of this book.[1] Also, it was explained there that there were two ways of speaking:

1. To use a plural word and mean a singular, a single entity.
2. To describe a general proposition, using a plural word, in order that it may be applied to all suitable candidates, even if at present there be only one person or thing to which it could be applied.

The language rejects the first style; but the second one is very common in use.

Would that I knew what they would say about the verse: O you who believe! Do not take My enemy and your enemy for friends: would you offer them love while they deny what has come to you of the truth, . . . would you manifest love to them? . . . (60:1). It is undoubtedly known that the verse refers to one man, Ḥãṭib ibn Abī Balta'ah, when he corresponded with the Quraysh.

Or about the verse: They say: "If we return to Medina, the mighty will surely drive out the meaner therefrom;" . . . (63:8). It is well known that the speaker one man, was 'Abdullãh ibn Ubayy ibn Salūl.

Or about the verse: They ask you as to what they should spend. . . . (2:215), and the questioner was one man.

Or about the verse: (As for) those who spend their wealth by night and by day, secretly and openly, they shall have their reward . . . (2:274). It is narrated that the spender was 'Alī or Abū Bakr.

There are a lot of such verses in the Qur'ãn.

A very strange phenomenon appears before our eyes when we look at the clause: (they say), "We fear lest a calamity should befall us;" . . . (5:52). The speaker was 'Abdullãh ibn Ubayy, according to the narrated reason of revelation, which the objectors themselves do accept; and it is in between the verses under discussion. [They find no difficulty in applying the plurals to one man in this clause!]

It could be said that in the above-mentioned verses there were many people who agreed with that one person's views, or were pleased with their action; therefore Allãh has used plurals in order that it may cover the doer together with those who agreed with him. However, it would show that using a plural for a single person was justified if there was a good reason for it. The verse under discussion too would come into this category; as it would prove that the religious nobilities – including the said wilãyah – is not confined to one person to the exclusion of the others; rather it only depends on priority in sincerity and deeds.

Moreover, all the narrators of these traditions were the companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and their disciples who were with them in that very era. All of them were pure Arabs whose language was not perverted and whose tongues were not mixed up. If such usage was not allowed in the speech and people were not familiar with such expressions, they would not have accepted these narrations, rather they would have been the first to put forward this objection; but none of them is on record to speak against it on this ground.

As for the saying that charity of a ring is not called zakãt: It should be kept in mind that the use of the word, zakãt, specifically in its terminological meaning took place in the Muslim's expressions after the Qur'ãn laid it down as an obligatory act of religion; but in its literal sense it covers that terminological meaning and other spendings altogether. When it is used without any restriction or joined with keep-ing up prayer, it indicates spending the property for the sake of Allãh. See, for example, what Allãh has mentioned regarding the previous prophets: He says about Ibrãhīm, Isḥãq, and Ya'qūb: . . . and We revealed to them the doing of good and the keeping up of prayer and the giving of zakãt*,* . . . (21:73); and He says about Ismã'īl: And he enjoined on his family prayer and zakãt*, and was one in whom his Lord was well pleased.* (19:55); and He quotes 'Īsã (a.s.) saying in the cradle: . . . and He has enjoined on me prayer and zakãt so long as I live (19:31). And it is known that their sharī'ah did not have the zakãt of wealth as we understand it in Islam.

Likewise, look at the following verses, which were revealed in Mecca in early days of prophethood when the zakãt (as we know it) was not legislated yet:

He indeed shall be successful who pays zakãt*, and remembers the name of his Lord and prays* (87:14-15); [He] who gives away his wealth for zakãt (92:18); Those who do not give zakãt and they are unbelievers in the hereafter. (41:7); And who are givers of zakāt (23:4). Would that I knew what the Muslims understood from the word, zakāt, in these verses!

Even the verse of zakāt itself: Take alms out of their wealth, you would cleanse them and purify them thereby, and pray for them; surely your prayer is a relief to them; . . . (9:103), shows that zakāt is a sort of alms and charity, and it has been named zakāt [lit: purification] only because charity cleanses and purifies in general; and then its was predominantly used for that particular alms.

All of it clearly shows that there is no hindrance in calling gen-eral alms and spending in the way of Allāh as zakāt. Also it is evident that there is no reason for interpreting the word, bowing, in metaphori-cal sense. Similarly, there is no reason to look for far-fetched justifi-cations as to why Allāh used in the beginning of the verse the word: your Guardian, in singular and brought in its predicate: those who believe, in plural. Think over it.

QUR'ĀN: Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe: ar-Rāghib has said in his Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān: "al-Walā' and at-tawālī (اَلْوَلاَء ، اَلتَوَالي) denote that two or more things are so positioned as nothing extraneous comes between them. Metaphorically it is used to indicate proximity in place, or affinity, or friendship, and in help, or in belief. al-Wilāyah (اَلْوِلاَيَة) is help, and/or management of affairs. It has been said that al-walāyah and al-wilāyah (اَلْوَلاَيَة ، اَلْوِلاَيَة) both are one like al-dalālah and al-dilālah (اَلدَلاَلَة ، اَلدِلاَلَة); and it really means management of affairs; and al-waliyy and al-mawlā (اَلْوَلِيّ، اَلْمَوْلى) denote this meaning, and both are used as nomen agentis, i.e. guardian /manager; and as nomen patientis, i.e. one whose affairs are managed. A believer is called waliyy of Allāh, but nowhere is he referred to as mawlā of Allāh; while Allāh is called waliyy of the believers, as well as their mawlā."

Further he says: "They say, tawallī when used without any preposition, gives the meaning of wilāyah, indicating that it is related to the nearest objective; they say, 'I turned my ears/eyes/face to so-and-so'. Allāh says: . . . so We shall surely turn thee to a qiblah which thou shalt be pleased with; turn then thy face towards the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you are, turn your faces towards it; . . . (2:144); but when it is followed by preposition min (مِنْ = from) clearly or implied, it means turning away and leaving the proximity."

Apparently, man perceived the proximity (pointed to by wilāyah) first of all physically in bodies and their places and times; then it was borrowed for immaterial nearness, opposite to the above-mentioned idea. We know that primitive man began his perceptive journey with the material things perceived through the five senses and was involved with them long before thinking about rational proposi-tions and immaterial ideas and their related things.

When wilãyah – a special proximity – is affected in spiritual/ immaterial affairs, it follows that waliyy has a right and an authority over the mawlã which others do not have (except through him). All such managemental aspects that may be delegated to another will automatically be taken over by the waliyy, e.g. the waliyy of a deceased person. The estate, which the deceased used to manage by right of ownership, his heir, has the right to manage it by wilãyah of inheritance. Likewise, the guardian of a minor manages that minor's financial affairs by wilãyah of guardianship; and the helper manages the affairs of the helped one strengthening him in his defence; and Allãh is the Guardian (Waliyy) of His servants and manages their affairs in this world and the hereafter – there is no guardian except Him. So Allãh is the Guardian of the believers, inasmuch as He man-ages the affairs of their religion through guiding, calling, and helping them and so on. And the Prophet is the Guardian of the believers inas-much as he has the authority to decide between them, for them and against them through legislation and judgement. Likewise, the ḥãkim (ruler, judge) is the guardian of the people over whom he rules within his jurisdiction. The same is the case with other examples of wilãyah, like that of emancipation, covenant, protection, neighbourhood and divorce; similarly, the wilãyah of a cousin, of love and of a designated successor, and so on.

Also, His word: they shall turn (their) backs to you [33:15], i.e. they shall turn their backs towards the war and ignore its demands.

And His word: you turned back [5:92], i.e. you turned away from accepting it; you faced its opposite direction by turning away from it.

In short, looking at wilãyah in its different usages, we get the meaning of a sort of proximity that gives its subject some authority of management and possession of planning.

Looking at the context of the verse under discussion: "Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe", we find that the meaning of wilãyah (guardianship) for all the guard-ians is the same, because "Allãh, His Messenger and the believers", have all been ascribed to one word: "your Guardian", and clearly guardianship of each has the same meaning. This is also supported by the clause at the end of the second verse: then surely the party of Allāh are they that shall be triumphant, as it indicates or clearly shows that all the guardians are the party of Allāh, because they are under His Guardianship; thus the guardianship of the Messenger and of those who believe sprout from the root of Allāh's Guardianship.

Allāh has ascribed to Himself the following aspects of wilāyah:

al-Wilāyatu 't-Takwīniyyah (The Authority Over Creation): Through this authority He manages everything and disposes the creatures' affairs as He pleases and in whatever way He pleases. He says: Or have they taken guardians besides Him? But Allāh is the Guardian, . . . (42:9); . . . you have not besides Him any guardian or any intercessor; will you not then mind? (32:4); . . . Thou art my guardian in this world and the hereafter; . . . (12:101); . . . he has no guardian after Him; . . . (42:44). The same is the implication of the verses: . . . and We are nearer to Him than his life-vein. (50:16); . . . and know that Allāh intervenes between man and his heart, . . . (8:24).

Possibly related to it is the wilāyah of help which Allāh ascribes to Himself: That is because Allāh is the Protector of those who believe, and because the unbelievers shall have no protector for them (47:11); . . . then surely Allāh it is Who is his Guardian, . . . (66:4); and the same connotation is seen in the verse: . . . and helping the believers is ever incumbent on Us (30:47).

al-Wilāyatu 't-Tashrī'iyyah (The Authority Over Legislation): Allāh has ascribed to Himself this wilāyah, which concerns the believers' religious affairs: Legislation of the laws, guidance, advice, help and so on. He says: Allāh is the Guardian of those who believe; He brings them out of the darkness into light; . . . (2:257); . . . and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers (3:68); and Allāh is the Guardian of the pious . . . (45:19) The same is the theme of the verse: And it is not for a believing man nor for a believing woman to have any choice in their affairs when Allāh and His Messenger have decided a matter; and whoever disobeys Allāh and His Messenger, he surely strays off a manifest straying (33:36).

This is what Allāh has described related to His wilāyah, and it concerns the authority over creation and authority over legislation. You may also call them the real wilāyah and the wilāyah from a subjective point of view.

Then Allāh has mentioned for His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) the wilāyah which is reserved for him, and it is al-Wilāyatu 't-Tashrī'iyyah: The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has the right and authority to legislate the laws, call people to it, train the ummah accordingly, rule over them and decide in their affairs. Allãh says: The Prophet has a greater claim on the believers than they have on themselves, . . . (33:6). The same is the connotation of the verses: Surely We have revealed the Book to you with the truth that you may judge between people by means of that which Allãh has taught you; . . . (4:105*)*; . . . and most surely you guide to the right path (42:52); . . . a Messenger from among them-selves, who recites to them His communications and purifies them, and teaches them the Book and the Wisdom, . . . (62:2); . . . that you may make clear to men what has been revealed to them, . . . (16:44); . . . obey Allãh and obey the Messenger . . . (4:59); And it is not for a believing man nor for a believing woman to have any choice in their affairs when Allãh and His Messenger have decided a matter; . . . (33:36); And that you should judge between them by what Allãh has revealed, and do not follow their low desires, and be cautious of them, lest they seduce you from part of what Allãh has revealed to you; . . . (5:49). It has been mentioned that Allãh has not ascribed to the Prophet the wilãyah of help for the ummah.

In short, the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has the wilãyah over the ummah, inasmuch as he leads them to Allãh, rules over them, judges and decides in all their affairs. It is incumbent on them to obey him uncon-ditionally. In this way, his wilãyah springs from Allãh's wilãyah, in the meaning of the authority of legislation. In other words, the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has precedence over them as they are bound to obey him, because his obedience is Allãh's obedience. Thus, his wilãyah is the wilãyah of Allãh, as some previously quoted verses prove, for example: . . . obey Allãh and obey the Messenger . . . (4:59); And it is not for a believing man, nor for a believing woman to have any choice in their affairs when Allãh and His Messenger have decided a matter; . . . (33:36), apart from other such verses.

It is this meaning of wilãyah as ascribed to Allãh and His Mess-enger, which is bestowed on the believers in the verse under dis-cussion, when it says: "Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Mess-enger and those who believe." You have seen that the context proves that it is only one wilãyah, and it belongs to Allãh directly and to the Messenger and to those who believe indirectly by permission of Allãh.

Had the wilãyah ascribed to Allãh in this verse, been different from that ascribed to those who believe, it was more appropriate, in order to avoid any confusion, to bring another word of wilãyah before mentioning "those who believe", as Allãh has done in similar situ-ations. For example, He says: Say: "A hearer of good for you (who) believes in Allāh and believes the faithful . . ." (9:61). The word: "believes", has been repeated because its connotations in the two clauses are different. A similar style was used in the verse: . . . obey Allāh and obey the Messenger . . . (4:59), as was explained in volume five of this book.[2]

Moreover, the word: "Your Guardian", is singular and is ascribed to, "those who believe", i.e. plural. According to the exegetes, it is because wilāyah here has a single meaning, and it directly belongs to Allāh and as for the Messenger and the believers, it is indirectly, through Allāh.

It is clear from above that the restriction in "Only" aims at confining the wilāyah to those mentioned in the verse. It removes the possible misunderstanding that it might cover those who are men-tioned and also the others. There is another possibility that this restric-tion negates the wilāyah of all persons other than those mentioned therein.

QUR'ĀN: those who keep up prayers and pay the* zakāt while they bow: It gives further particulars of "those who believe"; "while they bow" is the conditional clause attached to the subject hidden in the verb "pay". ar-Rukū' (اَلرُّكُوع) is a particular position of body which is found in human beings only. An old man with bent back is called ar-rāki' (اَلرَّاكِع = one who bows down.) In the language of sharī'ah it is the name of a special position in worship. Allāh says: . . . (those) who bow down, who prostrate . . . (9:112). Symbolically it represents humil-ity and submission [to Allāh]; but in Islam it is not allowed except in prayer, contrary to prostration.

And because it shows humility and submission, the word is sometimes used to allude to general humbleness, or to poverty and need, because a man in straitened circumstances usually shows humil-ity before others.

QUR'ĀN: And whoever takes Allāh and His Messenger and those who believe for guardian, then surely the party of Allāh are they that shall be triumphant: at-Tawallī (اَلتَّوَلِّي = to take as a friend); "those who believe" points to the preceding: those who believe, together with their attributes: those who keep up prayers and pay the zakāt while they bow; the clause: "then surely the party of Allāh are they that shall be triumphant", is put in the place of the complement for the pre-ceding conditional clause, although it is not the complement. Rather, the speech has put the major premise in place of the conclusion, in order to show the reason of the proposition. In effect it says: Whoever takes Allãh and His Messenger and those who believe for guardian, shall be triumphant, because he belongs to the party of Allãh and the party of Allãh are they that are triumphant. It is an allusion that they are the party of Allãh.

al-ḥizb (اَلْحِزْب), according to ar-Rãghib, is a group having coarseness, ruthlessness, and harshness. Allãh has described His party in another place in the Qur'ãn, with a nearly similar theme and has ascribed success to them. He says: You shall not find a people who believe in Allãh and the latter day befriending those who act in opposition to Allãh and His Messenger, even though they were their fathers, or their sons, or their brothers or their kinsfolk; these are they into whose hearts He has impressed faith, and whom He has strengthened with a spirit from Him: and He will cause them to enter gardens beneath which rivers flow, abiding therein; Allãh is well-pleased with them and they are well-pleased with Him; they are Allãh's party: now surely the party of Allãh are the successful ones (58:22).

al-Falãḥ (اَلْفَلاَح) means victory and acquisition of the object of desire, i.e., triumph. It is this triumph and success, which Allãh has promised to bestow on the believers – this being His best promise to them. He says: succeful indeed are the believers (23:1). Many verses have this theme; and in all of them the promise is without any con-dition; obviously it denotes unrestricted victory and unconditional success. Gaining felicity, adhering to truth, vanquishing infelicity and refuting falsity in this world and the hereafter: In this world through good life which is found in virtuous society made up of the friends of Allãh, in an earth cleansed from the friends of Satan, based on piety; and in the hereafter, in neighbourhood of the Lord of the worlds.

TRADITIONS

[al-Kulaynī] narrates from ʻAlī ibn Ibrãhīm, from his father, from Ibn Abī ʻUmayr from ʻUmar ibn Udhaynah, from Zurãrah, al-Fuḍayl ibn Yasãr, Bakīr ibn Aʻyan, Muḥammad ibn Muslim, Barīd ibn Muʻãwiyah and Abu 'l-Jãrūd, all together from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said, "Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, ordered His Messenger (to have) wilãyah of ʻAlī, and revealed to him: Only Allãh is your Guard-ian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay the zakāt while they bow; and the wilāyah of ulu 'l-amr [was made] incumbent; and they did not know what it was. So Allāh ordered Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) that he should explain the wilāyah to them as he had explained prayer, zakāt, fast and ḥajj.

"When this (order) came to him from Allāh, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), felt uneasy and he was afraid lest they turn away from their religion and call him a liar; so his breast was straitened and he appealed to his Lord, the Mighty, the Great. Then Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, revealed to him: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord; and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message, and Allāh will protect you from the people. So he complied with the order of Allāh, Mighty is His remembrance! He stood up (to announce) the wilāyah of ʻAlī on the day of Ghadīr Khumm; so he called out: The Prayer of Congregation; and (then) ordered the people that those present should convey (this message) to those who were not there."

ʻUmar ibn Udhaynah said, "All (the above-mentioned narrators) except Abu 'l-Jārūd (further) said, 'Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said, "This was another duty, and the wilāyah was the last of the obligations. Then Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, revealed: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you and chosen for you Islam as religion." Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said, "Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says, 'I shall not send to you any duty after this; I have perfected for you all the duties.' "'" (al-Kāfī) al-Burhān and Ghāyatu 'l-marām narrate from aṣ-Ṣadūq through his chain, from Abu 'l-Jārūd, from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said about the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, "A group of the Jews accepted Islam; there were among them ʻAbdullāh ibn Salām, Asad, Thaʻlabah, Ibn Yāmīn and Ibn Ṣūriyā. So they came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and said, 'O Prophet of Allāh! Verily Mūsā had made Yūshaʻ ibn Nūn his waṣiyy (successor); so who is your waṣiyy? O Messenger of Allāh! And who is our Guardian after you?' Then this verse was revealed: Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, who keep up prayers and pay zakāt while they bow.

"The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), said (to the companions): 'Stand you up.' They stood up and came to the mosque, and lo! A beggar was coming out. The (Prophet, s.a.w.a.), said, 'O beggar! Has anyone given you anything?' He said, 'Yes. 'This ring.' (The Prophet) said, 'Who gave it to you?' He said, 'Gave it to me that man who is praying.' He (the Prophet) said, 'In which position had he given it to you?' He said, 'He was bowing.' So the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Allãhu Akbar,' and the people in the mosque said, 'Allãhu Akbar.'

"Then the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), said, '‘Alī is your waliyy (Guardian) after me.' They said, 'We are pleased with Allãh as the Lord, and with Muḥammad as the Prophet, and with ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib as the Guardian.' So Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, revealed: And whoever takes Allãh and His Messenger and those who believe for a guardian, then surely the party of Allãh are they that shall be triumphant."

al-Qummī narrates from his father, from Ṣafwãn, from Abãn ibn ‘Uthmãn from Abū Ḥamzah ath-Thumãlī, from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said, "While the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), was sitting with a group of the Jews including ‘Abdullãh ibn Salãm, this verse was revealed to him. So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) went out to the mosque, and a beggar came before him. Then (the Messenger, s.a.w.a.) said, 'Has anyone given you something?' He said, 'Yes. That one who is praying.' So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) came there and lo! It was ‘Alī (a.s.)." (at-Tafsīr)

ash-Shaykh writes: Narrated to us Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad, i.e. al-Mufīd; he said: narrated to us Abu 'l-Ḥasan ‘Alī ibn Muḥammad al-Kãtib; he said: narrated to us al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī az-Za‘farãnī; he said: narrated to us Abū Isḥãq Ibrãhīm ibn Muḥammad al-Thaqafī; he said: narrated to us Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī; he said: narrated to us al-‘Abbãs ibn ‘Abdillãh al-‘Anbãrī, from ‘Abdu 'r-Raḥmãn ibn al-Aswad al-Kindī al-Yashkurī, from ‘Awn ibn ‘Ubaydillãh, from his father, from his grandfather Abū Rãfi‘, that he said, "I went, one day, to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), while he was asleep and a snake was in, a side of the house; but I did not like to kill it lest I awake the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and I thought that [probably] revelation was being sent to him, so I laid between him and the snake, and said (to myself): 'If there was any evil from it (the snake), it would come to me, not to him.'

"So I was (there) a little while, and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) woke up, and he was reciting: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messen-ger and those who believe . . . until he came to the end of the verse. Then he said, 'Praise be to Allãh Who completed for ‘Alī His favour, and congratulations to him for the grace of Allãh which He has bestowed on him.' Then he said to me, 'What are you doing here?' So I informed him about the snake, he said to me, 'Kill it.' So I killed it. Then he said to me, 'O [Abū] Rãfi‘! What will be your position when a group will fight against ‘Alī and he will be on right and they on wrong? To fight them, is a right of Allãh (on His creatures), Mighty is His name! So whoever could not [fight, he should hate them] by his heart; there is nothing beyond Allãh.' So I said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! Pray to Allãh for me that if I find them He should strengthen me to fight them.' " (Abū Rãfi‘) said, "Then the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), prayed for me; and said, 'Verily, every prophet had a trustee, and verily, my trustee is Abū Rãfi‘.' "

He said, "When people did bay‘ah of ‘Alī after ‘Uthmãn, and Ṭalḥah and az-Zubayr proceeded (against him), I remembered the saying of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). So I sold my house at Medina and a piece of land (I had) at Khaybar; and I came out my sons – and –myself with the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) in order to be martyred in his army. But I could not reach him until he returned from Baṣrah. And I went with him to Ṣiffīn; I fought in his presence in Ṣiffīn and also in Nahrawãn. I remained with him constantly until ‘Alī (a.s.) was martyred. I returned to Medina, and I had neither any house there nor any land. So al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī (a.s.) gave me a land in Yanbū‘, and divided for me a part of the house of the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.); and I lived in it with my dependents." (al-Amãlī) al-‘Ayyashī narrates through his chain from al-Ḥasan ibn Zayd, from his father Zayd ibn al-Ḥasan, from his grand father that he said, "I heard ‘Ammãr ibn Yãsir saying, 'A beggar stood near ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib, while he was bowing in a supererogatory prayer; so he pulled out his ring and gave it to the beggar. Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) came and was informed of it. Then this verse was revealed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow (to the end of the verse). So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) recited it before us, then said, "Anyone whose mawlã (guardian) am I, ‘Alī is his mawlã; O Allãh! Be friend of him who is his friend, and be enemy of him who is his enemy."' " (at-Tafsīr)

Also, al-‘Ayyãshī narrates from al-Mufaḍḍal ibn Ṣãliḥ, from some of his companions, from the Fifth or Sixth Imãm (a.s.) that he said, "When this verse was revealed: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, it proved troublesome to the Prophet

(s.a.w.a.), as he was afraid that the Quraysh would accuse him of lying. So, Allãh revealed: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord (to the end of the verse). So he carried it out on the day of Ghadīr Khumm." (ibid.)

Also, he narrates from Abū Jamīlah, from some of his companions, from either of the two Imãms (a.s.) that he said, "Indeed the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Verily Allãh revealed to me to love four: ‘Alī, Abū Dharr, Salmãn and al-Miqdãd.' " [The narrator says:] "I said, 'Well, with all that multitude of the people, was not there anyone who knew this matter?' (The Imãm) said, 'Certainly; (there were) three.' I said, '[When] these verses were revealed: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, and: Obey Allãh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you: was there no one to ask about whom they were revealed?' He said, 'For that reason (perdition) came to them, they were not asking.' " (ibid.)

aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chain from Abū Sa‘īd al-Warrãq, from his father, from Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad, from his father, from his grandfather, in the ḥadīth of adjuration of ‘Alī (a.s.) against Abū Bakr when Abū Bakr acquired caliphate; and ‘Alī (a.s.) mentioned his excellent virtues to Abū Bakr, and described the clear wordings of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) concerning his appointment; so he said inter alia, "I adjure you by Allãh; is it I who have the wilãyah from Allãh, (joined) with the wilãyah of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), in the verse of the zakãt of the ring, or you?" (Abū Bakr) said, "Nay! It is for you." (Ghãyãtu 'l-marãm) ash-Shaykh narrates through his chain from Abū Dharr, the ḥadīth of adjuration of the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) against ‘Uthmãn, az-Zubayr, ‘Abdu 'r-Raḥmãn ibn ‘Awf and Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqãṣ, on the day of consultation, and his arguments against them with the clear declarations of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) – and everyone of them was confirming what he was saying. And he (a.s.) had said inter alia, "Is there anyone among you – except me – who had paid zakãt while he bowed; and the verse was revealed about him: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow?" They said, "No." (al-Majãlis)

Abu 'l-Ḥasan ath-Thãlith ‘Alī ibn Muḥammad al-Hãdī (a.s.) wrote an epistle to the people of Ahwãz when they had asked him about Compulsion and Delegation. He (a.s.) wrote in it, inter alia:

"The ummah unanimously agrees, without any difference at all, that the Qur'ān is truth, there is no doubt in it, according to the belief of all sects. Therefore, when they unite on it they are on the right, and they are guided aright to confirm what Allāh has revealed, because the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has said, 'My ummah shall not unite on error.' He (s.a.w.a.) has thus told us that what the (whole) ummah agrees upon and some of them are not in discord with others on it, is the truth. This is the (true) connotation of this ḥadīth; not what the ignorant ones say in its interpretation; nor that which the enemies have said: negation of the order of the Book, following the commands of forged traditions and vain narrations, and following the perilous and ruinous desires which go against the clear verdict of the Book and confirmed meanings of clear and brilliant verses. And we pray to Allāh that He should help us for ṣalāt and guide us to good conduct."

Then he (a.s.) said:

"Therefore, when the Book testifies for the truth and actuality of news, then a group of the ummah refutes it and argues against it by one of those forged narrations, they become lost in error because of its rejection and refutation. The most correct ḥadīth is that whose truth is known from the Book. For example, the hadīth of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) which is unanimously agreed upon by all, that he said, 'Indeed I am leaving behind among you two caliphs: the Book of Allāh and my Progeny, as long as you adhere to them both you shall never go astray after me, and they shall never separate from each other until they come to me on the ḥawḍ (reservoir)'. And there is another wording narrated from him in the same meaning, 'Indeed I am leaving among you two precious (or weighty) things: the Book of Allāh and my Progeny (who are) people of my house, and they shall never separate from each other until they come to me on the reservoir, as long as you adhere to them both you shall never go astray.'

"We find evidence of this ḥadīth in clear words in the Book of Allāh, like His word: Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakāt while they bow. Then the traditions of the scholars in this respect unani-mously point to the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) that he gave his ring in alms while he was in rukū'; so Allāh appreciated it from him and revealed the verse about him.

"Then we find that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), distinguished him from his companions by (saying) this word: 'He whose guardian am I, 'Alī is his guardian; O Allāh! Be friend of him who is his friend, and be enemy of him who is his enemy'; and by his word: ''Alī shall repay my debt and fulfil my promise; and he is my successor over you after me'; and by his word when he appointed him as his successor in Medina and he said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! Are you leaving me (to look after) women and children?' So he (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Are you not pleased that you have the same position with me as Hãrūn had with Mūsã, except that there is no prophet after me?'

"Thus we know that the Book testifies verifying these traditions and confirming this evidence; therefore the ummah is bound to acknowl-edge them, because these traditions agree with the Qur'ãn. So when we find them in agreement with the Qur'ãn, and find the Qur'ãn in agree-ment with these traditions, and proving them, then to follow them be-comes a duty which no one will transgress except the people of enmity and mischief." (aṭ-Ṭabrisī, al-Iḥtijãj)

The Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a ḥadīth:

"The hypocrites said to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), 'Is there any duty pending which your Lord intends to impose on us after all that has already been laid down? So you (better) tell (it to us) so our souls may be at rest that now nothing else is pending.' So Allãh revealed in this respect: Say: 'I exhort you only to one thing' (34:46), i.e. the wilãyah. Then Allãh revealed: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow; and there is no difference in the ummah that on that day no one gave zakãt while bowing, except one man . . ." (ibid.)

al-Mufīd narrates from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad ibn 'Īsã, from al-Qãsim ibn Muḥammad al-Jawharī, from al-Ḥasan ibn Abi 'l-'Alã' that he said, "I said to Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.), 'The successors, is their obedience incumbent?' He said, 'Yes. They are those (about whom) Allãh has said: Obey Allãh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you; and they are those (about whom) Allãh has said: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow.'" (al-Ikhtiṣãṣ)

The author says: [al-Kulaynī] has narrated it in al-Kãfī from al-Ḥusayn ibn Abi 'l-'Alã' from the same Imãm (a.s.); and has also narrated another tradition of the same meaning from Aḥmad ibn 'Īsã from the same Imãm (a.s.).

The chain of various narrations of what was revealed about 'Alī (a.s.) ends at all the Imãms (a.s.), because they are the people of one house, and their affair is one.

ath-Thaʻlabī has written in his at-Tafsīr: Informed us Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad ibn al-Qãsim al-Faqīh; he said: narrated to us ʻAbdullãh ibn Aḥmad ash-Shaʻrãnī; he said: informed us Abū ʻAlī Aḥmad ibn ʻAlī ibn Razīn; he said: narrated to us al-Muẓaffar ibn al-Ḥasan al-Anṣãrī; he said: narrated to us as-Sariyy ibn ʻAlī al-Warrãq; he said: narrated to us Yaḥyã ibn ʻAbdi 'l-Ḥamīd al-Jummãnī, from Qays ibn ar-Rabīʻ, from al-Aʻmash, from ʻAbãyah ibn ar-Rabʻī; he said: narrated to us ʻAbdullãh ibn ʻAbbãs (may Allãh be pleased with him), while he was sitting at the rim of Zamzam, saying: "The Mess-enger of Allãh said" – when a man wearing a turban came there. Now, whenever Ibn ʻAbbãs said, "The Messenger of Allãh said," that man also said, "The Messenger of Allãh said."

So, Ibn ʻAbbãs said to him, "I ask you by Allãh! Who are you?" (The narrator) said, "Then he removed the turban from his face and said, 'O people! Whoever knows me, he knows me; and whoever does not know me, then I am Jundab ibn Junãdah al-Badrī Abū Dharr al-Ghifãrī. I heard the Messenger of Allãh by these two [ears], else they should become deaf, and I saw him by these two [eyes], else they should become blind, (while) he was saying, "ʻAlī is the leader of the righteous ones and the killer of the unbelievers; helped is he who helps him and foresaken is he who foresakes him." Indeed I prayed one day the prayer of ẓuhr with the Messenger of Allãh. A beggar asked in the mosque but no one gave him anything. So the beggar raised his hand to the heavens and said, "O Allãh! Be (my) witness that I asked in the mosque of the Messenger of Allãh, but nobody gave me anything"; and ʻAlī was in rukūʻ, so he pointed out to him with his right little finger, and he had a ring in it. So the beggar came forward till he took the ring from his little finger; and all this was in the sight of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). When he finished his prayer, he raised his head towards the heavens and said, "O Allãh! Mūsã had asked You saying: 'O my Lord! Expand my breast for me, and make my affairs easy to me, and loose the knot from my tongue, (that) they may understand my word, and give to me an aider from my family, Hãrūn, my brother, strengthen my back by him, and associate him (with me) in my affair' [20:25-32]. So You revealed for him a speaking Qur'ãn: We will surely strengthen your arm with your brother, and We will give you both a power, so that they shall not reach you; with Our signs; [28:35]. O Allãh! And I am Muḥammad, Your Prophet, and Your chosen one. O Allãh! So expand my breast for me, and make my affairs easy to me, and give to me an aider, ʻAlī; strengthen my back by him."'"

Abū Dharr said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), had not finished his words when Jibrīl came to him from near Allãh, the High, and said, 'O Muḥammad! Recite.' He (s.a.w.a.), said, 'What should I recite?' He said, 'Only Allãh is your Guardiann and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow."

The book al-Jam' Bayna 'ṣ-Ṣiḥãḥi 's-Sittah (by Zarīn, vol.3, tafsīr of the chapter of "The Table") quotes under the verse: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger . . ., from Ṣaḥīḥụ 'n-Nasã'ī, from Ibn Salãm that he said, "I came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), and we said, 'Verily our people became our enemy when we accepted the truth of Allãh and His Messenger, and they swore that they would not talk to us.' Then Allãh revealed: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow.

"Then Bilãl called ãdhãn for ẓuhr prayer, and people stood up praying; some were prostrating and some bowing, some asking Allãh; when a beggar (came there) begging; and 'Alī gave (him) his ring while he was bowing. So the beggar informed the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.). Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) recited before us: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow. And whoever takes Allãh and His Messenger and those who believe for a guardian, then surely the party of Allãh are they that shall be triumphant."

Ibnu 'l-Maghãzilī ash-Shãfi'ī narrates explaining the word of Allãh: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger . . .: Informed us Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad ibn 'Uthmãn; he said: informed us Abū Bakr Aḥmad ibn Ibrãhīm ibn Shãdhãn al-Bazzãz by permission; he said: narrated to us al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī al-'Adawī; he said: narrated to us Salamah ibn Shabīb; he said: narrated to us 'Abdu 'r-Razzãq; he said: informed us Mujãhid from Ibn 'Abbãs that he said about the word of Allãh: Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow, that it was revealed about 'Alī. (al-Manãqib)

Also, he narrates: Informed us Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad ibn Ṭãwãn; he said: informed us Abū Aḥmad 'Umar ibn 'Abdillãh ibn Shawdhab; he said: narrated to us Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-'Askarī ad-Daqqãq; he said: narrated to us Muḥammad ibn 'Uthmãn; he said: narrated to us Ibrãhīm ibn Muḥammad ibn Maymūn; he said: narrated to us 'Alī ibn 'Ãbis; he said: Abū Maryam and I called on 'Abdullãh ibn 'Aṭã'. Abū Maryam said

(to him): "Narrate to ʻAlī the ḥadīth which you had narrated to me from Abū Jaʻfar." He said, "I was sitting near Abū Jaʻfar, when passed by him the son of ʻAbdullāh ibn Salām. I said, 'May Allāh make me your ransom! Is he the son of him who had knowledge of the Book?' He said, 'No. Rather it is your companion, ʻAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib about whom were revealed verses of the Book of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: and he who has knowledge of the Book [13:43]; Is he then who has with him clear proof from his Lord, and a witness from Him recites it [11:17]; Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe.'" [5:55]. (ibid.)

al-Khaṭīb al-Khwārazmī has narrated the correspondence be-tween Muʻāwiyah and ʻAmr ibn al-ʻĀṣ, in which the latter writes inter alia: "You certainly know, O Muʻāwiyah! What (Allāh) has revealed in His Book, of the verses, which are recited regarding [ʻAlī's] excellent virtues, which no one shares with him. For example, the word of Allāh, the High: They fulfil vows [76:7]; Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakāt while they bow [5:55]; Is he then who has with him clear proof from his Lord, and a witness from Him recites it [11:17]; and Allāh, the High, has said: . . . men who are true to the covenant which they made with Allāh [33:23]; and Allāh, the High, has said to His Messenger: Say: 'I do not ask of you any recompense for it except the love of (my*) near relatives'* [42:23]."

al-Khaṭīb narrates through his chain, from Abū Ṣāliḥ, from Ibn ʻAbbās, that he said, "ʻAbdullāh ibn Salām came with some of his people who had believed in the Prophet (s.a.w.a), and they said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! Our houses are far away, indeed; and we do not have any place for assembly or discussion except this place (of yours); and when our people saw that we had believed in Allāh and His Mess-enger and had accepted his veracity, they abandoned us and swore to themselves that they would not sit with us, nor enter into marriage-tie with us or talk with us; and it has proved very hard for us.' So the Prophet (s.a.w.) said to them: 'Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakāt while they bow.'

"Then the Prophet (s.a.w.), went out to the mosque and some people were standing (in prayer) and others bowing. (The Prophet) saw a beggar; and he said to him, 'Has anyone given you anything?' He said, 'Yes; a golden ring.' The Prophet (s.a.w.) said to him, 'Who has given it to you?' He said, 'That one standing (in prayer)' – and he pointed with his hand to ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib. Then the Prophet (s.a.w.) said, 'In which position he gave (it) to you?' He said, 'He gave to me while he was in rukū‘.' Then the Prophet (s.a.w.) said: 'Allãhu Akbar', and then recited: And whoever takes Allãh and His Messenger and those who believe for a guardian, then surely the party of Allãh are they that shall be triumphant."

Then Ḥassãn ibn Thãbit composed and recited (the following poem):

O Abu 'l-Ḥasan! May my soul be your ransom, and my life-blood!
As well as every slow and fast in (the way of) guidance!
Will my praise and of (your) lovers go in vain?
But praise for Allãh's sake is never lost.
So it is you, who gave while bowing,
The souls of the people are your ransom! O the best bowing one!
Your blessed ring; O the best Master,
And the best buyer and the best seller!
So Allãh revealed about you, the best wilãyah,
And made it clear in decisive sharī‘ah. (ibid.)

al-Ḥamawaynī [al-Ḥamū’ī] narrates through his chain from Abū Hadbah Ibrãhīm ibn Hadbah that he said, "Informed us Anas ibn Mãlik that a beggar came into the Mosque and he was saying, 'Who will lend to the Rich, the Trustworthy (Allãh)?' And ‘Alī was bowing, indicating by his hand to the beggar to take off the ring from his hand. (Anas) said, 'Then the Prophet (s.a.w.) said, "O ‘Umar! It became incumbent." (‘Umar) said, "May my father and mother be your ransom! O Messen-ger of Allãh! What became incumbent?" He (s.a.w.) said, "The Garden became incumbent for him. By Allãh! He (the beggar) did not take it off from his hand, but he removed him from every sin and every fault."'" al-Ḥamawaynī narrates through his chain from Zayd ibn ‘Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn, from his father, from his grandfather that he said, "I heard ‘Ammar ibn Yãsir – may Allãh be pleased with him – saying, 'A beggar stood near ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib, and he was in rukū‘ of a super-erogatory prayer; so he removed his ring and gave it to the beggar. Then he came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) and informed him of it. Then this verse was revealed to the Prophet (s.a.w.): Only Allãh is your Guardian and His Messenger and those who believe, those who keep up prayers and pay zakãt while they bow. So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) recited it; then said, "Anyone whose mawlã am I, ‘Alī is his mawlã."'" al-Ḥãfiẓ Abū Nu‘aym narrates from Abu 'z-Zubayr, from Jãbir

(may Allāh be pleased with him) that he said, "'Abdullāh ibn Salām came [to the Prophet] with a group, complaining that people have avoided them since they have entered into Islam. So the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.) said, 'Find for me a beggar.' We entered the Mosque and a beggar came near him. (The Prophet) said to him, 'Has anyone given you anything?' He said, 'Yes, I passed by a man who was bowing, so he gave me his ring.' (The Prophet) said, 'Come along and show me.'" (Jābir said) "So we proceeded and lo! 'Alī was in standing position, so (the beggar) said, 'This.' Then was revealed: Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger . . ."

Also, al-Ḥāfiẓ Abū Nu'aym narrates from 'Awf ibn 'Ubayd ibn Abū Rāfi', from his father, from his grandfather that he said, "I went to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.) while he was asleep, and a snake was in a side of the house; but I did not like to kill it lest I awake the Prophet. So I lay between him and the snake, so that if there was any- thing (i.e. snake-bite) it would be in me, not him. Then (the Prophet) woke up and he was reciting this verse: Only Allāh is your Guardian and His Messenger. He said, 'All praise is for Allāh!' Then he came to my side and said, 'Why do you lie here?' I said, 'Because of the pres-ence of this snake.' He said, 'Go to it and kill it.' So I killed it.

"Then he took my hand and said, 'O Abū Rāfi'! There shall soon be after me some people who would fight 'Alī; to fight them will be a right of Allāh; so whoever could not fight them by his hand, he should do so by his tongue, and whoever could not do so, then by his heart; there is nothing beyond that.'"

The author says: The traditions showing that the two verses were revealed concerning the alms of the ring are very numerous. We have quoted some of them here from al-Baḥrānī's book, Ghāyatu 'l-marām; and it has been ascertained that they are found in the books al-Baḥrānī has copied from. We have quoted only as much as was necessary to show various versions of the story.

Many companions have narrated this event, like Abū Dharr, Ibn 'Abbās, Anas ibn Mālik, 'Ammār, Jābir, Salamah ibn Kuhayl, Abū Rāfi', 'Amr ibn al-'Āṣ and 'Alī and al-Ḥusayn; and likewise as-Sajjād, al-Bāqir, aṣ-Ṣādiq, al-Hādī and other Imāms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt.

Also, Aimmatu 't-Tafsīr (those who explain the verses with the help of traditions) unanimously agree on this tradition, without any objection, like Aḥmad, an-Nasā'ī, aṭ-Ṭabarī, aṭ-Ṭabarānī, 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd and many other ḥuffāẓ (memorizers) and *imām*s (masters) of ḥadīth. The scholars of 'ilmu 'l-kalãm (Islamic Theology) have accepted the tradition. The jurisprudents have used it as their proof in the question of a great many actions during prayer, and in the discussion whether supererogatory alms is called zakãt.

And the outstanding luminaries of language and literature from among the exegetes, like az-Zamakhsharī in al-Kashshãf and Abū Ḥayyãn in his at-Tafsīr have not disputed regarding the application of this verse on this tradition; nor has any narrator showed any reluctance in it – and they were the people of this language.

Therefore, no attention should be paid to someone's claim that the tradition of the revelation of this verse in connection with the story of the ring is forged and fabricated. Some of them, like Shaykhu 'l-Islam Ibn Taymiyyah, have transgressed the limit and claimed ijmã', unanimity, that this tradition was forged. It is really an astonishing claim. You have, however, seen in the preceding commentary, what is the truth and reality of this matter.

COMMENTARY

The verses forbid taking those who make mockery of Allãh and His communications as friends from among the People of the Book and unbelievers, and enumerate some of their evil characteristics in-cluding their breaking the covenants of Allãh and so on – the matters related to the theme of this chapter, i.e. exhorting people to keep their promises and covenants and showing the demerit of going against promises, etc.

All the verses seem to be revealed in one context, although possibly some of them could have particular reason of revelation.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Do not take for friends . . . who were given the Book before you and . . .*: ar-Rãghib has said: "al-Huz' (اَلْهُزْوُ) = secret jest, sometimes it is used for something like a jest." Then he says explaining la'ib: "They used the verb, la'ib (لَعِب), when the doer does not have a correct purpose for his action."

A thing is taken as a mockery and a jest when it is handled in an unserious way to show that it does not deserve any attention. Similarly, a thing is taken as a plaything and a joke when it is not intended for a correct reasonable purpose, is rather taken for some unrealistic themes. Thus, they take the religion for a mockery and a joke in order to show that it only serves some false motives – incorrect and unserious. Had they taken it to be truly a religion or believed that its Legislator and the Caller to it as well as the Believers in it were truly serious and paid them the respect due to them, they would not have placed them in this place. So, they take the religion as a mockery and a jest to show that the religion does not have any reality or any established position; it is merely a toy to be played with and jested about.

It appears from the above that:

First: Those, whose friendship is forbidden, are described as "those who take your religion for a mockery and a joke"; this description points to the reason of this prohibition. As described earlier, friendship entails spiritual mingling and management of personal and sociological affairs. Obviously, a waliyy (friend) will not treat as a joke or a mockery those things, which his friend respects and pays honour to, and con-siders it more distinguished and honourable than everything, even his own self. It is therefore necessary not to take such a person as a friend and not to let him interfere in one's spiritual and physical affairs.

Second: The verse is very appropriately addressed to: "you who believe," as it stands parallel to: "those who take your religion for a mockery and a joke"; also there is the fine point of the genetic con-struction: "your religion", [as it emphasizes their strong connection with the religion of Islam, and puts them on guard against the enemies' manipulation].

Third: The clause: "and fear Allãh if you are believers," puts a sort of emphasis to the preceding wordings: "Do not take for friends those who take your religion for a mockery and a joke," by repeating it in a more inclusive and comprehensive wording. Obviously, a believer who adheres to the cord of true faith cannot be pleased if the matters he believes in were to be taken as a mockery or joke. Therefore, these people, if they are truly associated with belief and are attached to the religion, are bound to fear Allāh regarding those inimical persons and not to take them as friends.

Another possibility: The clause: "and fear Allāh if you are believers", may point to the verses which were revealed a little earlier, e.g. and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them. The meaning then will be as follows: Be afraid of Allāh in taking them for a friend if you are not one of them. But the first meaning is more manifest.

QUR'ĀN: And when you call to prayer they take it as a mockery and a joke; . . .*: It confirms the preceding statement that the unbelievers take the religion of those who believe for a mockery and a joke. The call for prayer refers to the adhān, which was laid down in Islam before the legislation of the daily five prayers. It is said that adhān has not been mentioned in the noble Qur'ān except in this place.[3]

"they take it": The pronoun "it" refers to the prayer, or to the verbal noun, the call, understood from the verb: "when you call to prayer". A pronoun referring to a verbal noun may be brought in either gender.

The end clause: "this is because they are a people who do not understand", puts their misdeed in its true perspective. It says that they take the prayer or the adhān for a mockery and a joke because they are a people devoid of understanding. As such, they cannot appreciate the underlying spiritual realities behind the pillars and acts of religious worship – the reality of servitude, the benefits of attaining nearness to Allāh and convergence of life's happiness in this world and the hereafter.

QUR'ĀN: Say: "O People of the Book! Do you find fault with us (for aught) except that we believe in Allāh and . . ."*: ar-Rāghib has said in his al-Mufradāt: "an-Naqam and an-naqim (اَلنَّقِم ، اَلنَّقَم) mean to deny, to vengeance through tongue or punishment; Allāh says: and they did not find fault except because Allāh and His Messenger enriched them out of His grace [9:74]; and they did not take vengeance on them for aught except that they believed in Allāh . . . [85:8]; do you dind fault with us . . . [5:59]" an-Naqimah (اَلنَّقِمَة) is punishment, Allāh says: Therefore We inflicted retribution on them and drowned them in the sea [7:136].

Thus, the verse under discussion means: Do you deny or dislike from us anything except that we believe in Allāh and in His revelation

[3] This is a strange claim. See ch.62, vr.9: O you who believe! When the call is made for prayer on Friday, then hasten to the remembrance of Allāh . . . (tr.)

while you are transgressors. It is as people say: Do you disavow me for anything except that I am a chaste person and you are profligate? Do you find any fault with me except that I am wealthy and you are poor? This verse speaks in the same vein. Do you find any fault with us except that we are believers and most of you are transgressors?

Some people have said that the end clause gives the reason of their hostility; in other words, it means: You do not deny or dislike anything from us except because you are transgressors.

"that we believe in Allãh and in what has been revealed to us and what was revealed before": It means, what has been revealed to us and to you. But the former revelation was not ascribed to them as an allusion against them – As they did not fulfil the covenant they had made with Allãh and did not follow the commandments given in their books, so it was as though their books were not sent to them nor were they qualified to receive them.

The meaning: We do not differentiate between one revealed Book and the other; as such we do not make any difference between the messengers of Allãh. It is an adverse allusion to the People of the Book that they make difference between one messenger and another and say: We believe in some and disbelieve in others. Also they used to say: "Avow belief in that which has been revealed to those who believe (in) the first part of the day, and disbelieve (at) the end of it, . . . [3:72]. Allãh says: Surely those who disbelieve in Allãh and His messengers and desire to differentiate between Allãh and His messen-gers, and say: "We believe in some and disbelieve in others"; and desire to take a way between (this and) that. These it is that are truly unbelievers, and We have prepared for the unbelievers a disgraceful chastisement (4:150-1).

QUR'ÃN: Say: "Shall I inform you of (him who is) worse than this in retribution near Allãh? (It is he) whom Allãh has cursed and . . .": The exegetes have said that in this verse Allãh tells His Messenger (s.a.w.a.) to address those who indulged in mockery of religion in a just manner bringing himself down to their level, in order to complete his proof against them. He should tell them that if they hated the believers because they believed in Allãh and in what He has revealed to His messengers, then they should hate their own selves too, because they are worse in place and more erring from the straight path, be-cause they are afflicted by divine curse and were changed into apes and swine and indulged in the worship of Satan. If they do not hate their own selves in spite of all these demerits and evils, which invite hatred, they have no reason to hate those who are less liable to any evil or demerit. They are the believers keeping firm on their belief – this is in case we accept that their belief in Allāh and His Books is an evil; but we know that it can never be an evil. Accordingly, al-mathubah (اَلْمَثُوبَة = lit. reward) here means recompense; probably it has been borrowed for end-result and inseparable attribute, as may be inferred from the phrase: "near Allāh", which qualifies the clause: "worse than this in retribution"; because what is near Allāh is perma-nent, enduring and unchangeable; and Allāh has adjudged and ordered it. He says: . . . and what is with Allāh is enduring; . . . (16:96); . . . there is no repeller of His decree . . . (13:41). This recompense or ret-ribution is therefore an enduring one because it is near Allāh or with Allāh.

There is a sort of reversal in this speech. Normally, the sentence should have been framed as follows: Being cursed and transmuted and worshipping the Satan is worse and more erring than believing in Allāh and His Books. But here it says: He whom Allāh has cursed and changed into apes and swine is worse in place and more erring. It puts the described person in place of the description or attribute; and this style is common in the Qur'ān, as Allāh says: . . . but righteousness is the one who believes in Allāh and . . . [2:177]

In short, the verse declares that if our belief in Allāh and His revealed Books was an evil in your opinion, then I inform you of what is more evil than that, and which you should truly hate, and it is the characteristics, which is found in yourselves.

It has been said by some that the demonstrative pronoun: "this", in the phrase: "worse than this", points to the entire community of the believers that is mentioned in the clause: "find fault with us". Accordingly the speech will be straight forward, without any reversal; and the meaning will be as follows: Shall I inform you of his who is worse than the believers, so that you should find fault with him? It is you yourselves who were afflicted with divine curse and transmutation and worshipped the Satan.

Someone else has said that, the pronoun: "this", in the phrase: "worse than this", points to the verbal noun, to find fault, to hate, which is hidden in the verb: "do you find fault with us". The meaning: Should I inform you of what is worse than this fault-finding and hate of yours in retribution? Well, it is what you have been afflicted with, i.e. the divine curse, transmutation, and so on.

QUR'ÃN: And when they come to you, they say: "We believe;" and indeed they come in with disbelief and indeed they go forth with it; and Allãh knows best what they concealed: Here Allãh exposes their hidden hypocrisy, and that they keep in their hearts what Allãh is not pleased with – when they meet the believers. So He says: When they come to you they claim that they have believed while actually they come to you with disbelief and they go forth with the same disbelief. Their entry and exit both take place in the same one condition i.e. disbelief without any change; they merely pretend to believe while Allãh knows what they concealed of treachery and perfidy.

Accordingly the clause: and indeed they come in with disbelief and indeed they go forth with it, means: Their condition in disbelief has not changed at all; the nominative pronoun: hum (هُمْ = they) has been added for emphasis, to show that disbelief has firmly taken root in their hearts.

It has been said that the said clause indicates that they take turns from one condition of disbelief to another.

QUR'ÃN: And you will see many of them striving with one another to hasten in sin and exceeding the limits . . . Certainly evil is that which they work: Apparently, the word: "sin", indicates their rashly plunging into the religious verses revealed to the believers, and speaking regarding religion's cognition what would cause disbelief and transgression, as is shown by the clause: "their speaking of what is sinful", in the following verse.

Accordingly, the three items, i.e. sin, transgression, and eating of what is unlawfully acquired, encompass samples of their trans-gression in words and deeds. They indulge in verbal misdeeds (and it is the sin in words) and misdeeds in actions – and it can be either against other believers (and it is transgression against them) or against their own selves, e.g. their eating what is unlawfully acquired, like interest, bribe, and things like that. Then Allãh has condemned all these activities and said: "Certainly evil is that which they work." Then He has strongly rebuked their doctors of law and scholars of religion for their keeping silent and not prohibiting them from com-mitting these grave sins and misdeeds, although they are aware that these are very grave sins. So He says: "Why do not the learned men and the doctors of law prohibit them from their speaking of what is sinful and their eating of what is unlawfully acquired? Certainly evil is that which they work."

The former verse speaks of "sin and exceeding the limits, and their eating of what is unlawfully acquired", while the latter speaks only of "speaking of what is sinful and their eating of what is unlawfully acquired". The omission of exceeding the limits in this verse indicates that sin and exceeding the limits are one and the same – sin is exceed-ing the divine limits verbally, which stands parallel to exceeding those limits in action, an example of which is seen in eating unlawful things.

Accordingly, the clause: "striving with one another to hasten in sin and exceeding the limits, and their eating of what is unlawfully acquired", aims at exposing their one fault of words (and it is sin and exceeding the limits) and another one of deeds, and it is their eating of what is unlawfully acquired.

al-Musãra'ah (اَلْمُسَارَعَة) puts emphasis on as-sur'ah (اَلسُرْعَة = hastening); it is opposite of al-buṭ' (اَلْبُطْىء = tardiness). The difference between as-sur'ah and al-'ajalah (اَلْعَجَلَة = hurring), as inferred from usage of these words is this: as-sur'ah is more relevant to the actions of body, while al-'ajalah is more concerned with activities of heart. It is not unlike the difference between al-khuḍū' (اَلْخُضُوع = to bow, to defer) and al-khushū' (اَلْخُشُوع = to submit, to be humble); and between al-khawf (اَلْخَوف = fear) and al-khashyah (اَلْخَشْيَة = dread, apprehen-sion). ar-Rãghib has said in his al-Mufradãt: "as-Sur'ah is opposite of al-buṭ'; it is used in description of bodies and actions; it is said: saru'a (he hastened); its nomen agentis is sarī' (سَرِيْع = hastener); and [they say]: asra'a and musri' in the same meanings."

It has been said that al-musãra'ah and al-'ajalah are synony-mous; but al-musãra'ah is mostly used for good works; the use of this word here – although the context is of bad deeds, and al-'ajalah would have been more appropriate – is aimed at showing that they indulge in it as if they were doing a good work. But this seems far-fetched.

QUR'ÃN: And the Jews say: "The hand of Allãh is tied up!" Their hands shall be shackled and they shall be cursed for what they say. Nay, both His hands are spread out, He expands as He pleases: The Jews did not agree that the laws of religion could be abrogated, and, for this reason, they did not accept that Tawrãt could be abrogated; rather they rebuked the Muslims for abrogation of some of their laws. Similarly, they did not accept the doctrine of al-badã' (اَلْبَدَاء) in matters of creation, as is seen from various Qur'ãnic verses. We have elabor-ated this topic in the first volume of this book, under the verse: What-ever signs We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, We bring one better than it or like it, . . . (2:106). Some light has been thrown on it in other places too.

The verse: "And the Jews say: 'The hand of Allãh is tied up!' " might be referring to their above-mentioned views; however, the following clause in their rebuttal: "Nay both His hands are spread out, He expends as He pleases", does not leave room for such interpretation. It rather shows that they had uttered these sinful words particularly with reference to sustenance:

Either they had said it especially about the believers, because generally they were afflicted with poverty and their condition was straitened. So, they talked in this way as a mockery against Allãh, alluding that He does not have power to give riches to His believing servants nor can He rescue them from need and humiliation. But this opinion is not worthy of consideration, because the verse is in the chapter of "The Table", which was revealed [in the last years of the Prophet's life] when the Muslims enjoyed abundance of livelihood and lived a pleasant and luxurious life.

Or, they said it because of the famine and draught, which had made their lives miserable, disturbed their economic system, and lowered their standard of living, as appears from some of the traditions that explain the reason of revelation. But this explanation too does not agree with the context of the verses, because evidently the verses expose their various characteristics like their enmity and treachery against the Muslims whom they hated to the extreme. These verses do not allude to the sinful talks they had uttered regarding their own selves.

Or, they said it when they heard the Qur'ãnic verses, e.g.: Who is it that will lend to Allãh a goodly loan (73:20). So they said: "The hand of Allãh is tied up! He is not able to obtain the necessary funds to spend in His requirements for propagating His religion and reviving His mission." They had said it as a mockery and a jest against Allãh, as appears from some other traditions relating to the cause of revelation.

This explanation appears nearer to reality.

In any case, this ascription – that the hand of Allãh was tied up and He was over-powered in His plans, when some adverse situation had developed – does not go against their religious teachings nor is it alien to the descriptions and comments found in the present Tawrãt. According to Tawrãt, there were many things which Allãh was unable to do and which prevented Him from enforcing His will time and again, as strong persons hinder weaker ones in their activities. You may look at the stories of the prophets, like Adam and others as they appear in Tawrãt.

So, many aspects of their belief allow them to ascribe to Allāh what is totally against the sanctity of His status, although in the present context they had uttered these words as a jest and mockery – we know that every action of a man emanates from some aspects of belief which he holds and which encourages him to do it.

"Their hands shall be shackled and they shall be cursed for what they say": It is an invocation of evil against them, of the same type which they had ascribed to Allāh, and which went so clearly against His sanctity and sacredness – their declaration that Allāh's hand was tied up and He has no power to do what he pleases. Accordingly, the clause: "and they shall be cursed for what they say", is in explanatory conjunction with the clause: "Their hands shall be shackled", inas-much as their hands being shackled displays the divine curse on them, because Allāh's speech is His action, and He curses someone only through penalizing him with punishment either in this world or the next. Thus, this curse means a punishment equal to shackling of their hands or more total and comprehensive.

Someone has opined that: "Their hands shall be shackled", is [not a curse, but] a statement showing that they have already been inflicted with chastisement because of their arrogance against Allāh in saying: "The hand of Allāh is tied up!" But the former interpretation is more understandable.

"Nay, both His hands are spread out, He expends as He pleases": It is the rebuttal of their claim: "The hand of Allāh is tied up!"

The sentence: "both His hands are spread out", is an allusion to His all-encompassing firmly rooted power; and such usage is very common.

Allāh has said: "both His hands" (although the Jews had used singular in their talk, "The hand of Allāh is tied up!") in order to show His complete and perfect power; as is the case in the verse: He said: "O Iblīs! What prevented thee that thou shouldst do obeisance to him whom I created with My two hands? Art thou proud or art thou of the exalted ones?" (38:75), as it indicates or rather clearly shows the use of perfect power in Adam's creation; or as they say: 'You do not have two hands on her, to emphasize absence of every power and every favour.'

The dictionaries often give various meanings for 'hand' other than the body organ, like power, strength, favour, ownership and so on. However, the fact remains that word was originally coined for the said organ, and it is used in other meanings as allusion, because all other meanings have some affinity with various aspects of the hand, e.g.

magnanimity and spending is related to it in its management and raising up or putting down.

Therefore, when the Book or Sunnah ascribes hand to Allãh, its connotation changes with the context. For example, in the clauses: "both His hands are spread out [5:64]"; and: whom I created with My two hands (38:75), "hands" means power and its perfection; and in the clauses: . . . in Thine hand is the good . . . (3:26); Therefore glory be to Him in Whose hand is the Kingdom of everything . . . (36:83); Blessed is He in Whose hand is the Kingdom, . . . (67:1) and other such verses, "hand" means kingdom and authority; likewise, in the verse: . . . Be not forward in the presence of Allãh and His Messenger . . . (49:1) the phrase means 'in the presence of' as translated above.

"He expends as He pleases": It elaborates the clause: "both His hands are spread out".

QUR'ÃN: and what has been revealed to you from your Lord will certainly make many of them increase in inordinacy and in unbelief: The context shows that this and the sentences coming after it aim at elaborating the foregoing clauses, "And the Jews say: 'The hand of Allãh is tied up!' Their hands shall be shackled and they shall be cursed for what they say."

The sentence under discussion indicates that their arrogance against Allãh and their utterances like: "The hand of Allãh is tied up!" are not something unexpected from them, because they have been steeped in transgression and disbelief from their earliest days; and it has emanated from their oppression and envy. When a man with such characteristics sees that Allãh has given someone else excellence over him and bestows on that person inesteemable favours, his inordinacy and disbelief is bound to increase.

The Jews believed that they were lords, and the most developed nation of the world; they called themselves People of the Book, were proud of their doctors of law and scholars, and of their knowledge and wisdom; they called all other nations gentiles. Now, they saw that a Divine Book was revealed to a people who uptil then submitted to the Jewish knowledge and Book – as was the case between them and the Arabs in the Days of Ignorance. Then they looked in that Book and found it truly a Book revealed by Allãh as a Guardian over all Divine Books of yore. They realized that it contained clear truth, sublime teaching, and complete guidance. They felt that this Book would sub-due them and put them to shame in the very field that was the source of their pride, that is, the knowledge, and the Book. Naturally, they became alarmed and outraged, and their transgression and disbelief increased.

Their increase in transgression and disbelief has been ascribed to the Qur'ān inasmuch as no sooner had their unjust and envious souls seen the revelation of the Qur'ān and realized the true knowledge and manifest Call contained in it, than they rose up in transgression and disbelief.

Moreover, Allāh has often attributed in His Book guiding and causing to go astray to Himself. For example: All do We aid – these as well as those – out of the bounty of your Lord, and the bounty of your Lord is not confined (17:20); And We reveal of the Qur'ān that which is a healing and a mercy to the believers, and it adds only to the perdition of the unjust (17:82). Causing someone to go astray – or some-thing similar to it – is considered blameworthy, if it is done initially, without any cause. But if it done as a retribution of moral depravity or sins committed by the one gone astray, then there is nothing wrong in such causing to go astray; because the man's depravity has brought down the divine wrath on him as a recompense of his wrong-doings. As Allāh says: . . . but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26); . . . but when they turned aside, Allāh made their hearts turn aside . . . (61:5).

Ultimately, the statement that the Qur'ān increases in their inordinacy and disbelief, means that they are deprived of divine help, and Allāh does not bring them out of their inordinacy and disbelief to submission to His will and acceptance of the true Call. This topic was explained in the first volume of this book under the verse: but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26).

Let us return to our original discussion. The verse: "and what has been revealed to you from your Lord will certainly make many of them increase in ordinacy and in unbelief;" aims at removing any astonishment as to how could those people who called themselves the People of the Book and claimed to be the sons and beloveds of Allāh, could dare to utter this contemptuous and insulting sentence that the hand of Allāh was tied up.

They are most certainly steeped in inordinacy and disbelief, a trace of which is seen in this statement; and it is bound to be followed by signs after hideous signs; and this is what is inferred from the verb having the prefix of the la (ل) of oath and sufix of the nun (ن) of emphasis.

The verse mentions inordincy before disbelief, keeping in view the natural sequence, because disbelief is among the vestiges and results of inordinacy.

QUR'ÃN: and We have put enmity and hatred among them till the Day of Resurrection: The pronoun "them" refers to the Jews, as is evident from the position of the sentence within the talk relating particularly to the Jews, although it had initially covered the People of the Book in general. Accordingly, the enmity and hatred points to the discord and difference that is found in their various sects and schools of thought. Allãh has pointed to it in various places in His Book; for example: And certainly We gave the Book and the Wisdom and the Prophecy to the Children of Israel, and We gave them of the goodly things, and We made them excel the nations. And We gave them clear arguments in the affair, but they did not differ until after knowledge had come to them, revolting among themselves; surely your Lord will judge between them on the Day of Resurrection concerning that wherein they differed (45:16-17), apart from other similar verses.

It seems that enmity points to the hate that is accompanied by transgression in action, and hatred indicates aversion of the heart, even if it does not show in action. The combination of the two in the verse indicates a hate that causes injustice against another party and the one, which does not reach that stage.

The clause: "till the Day of Resurrection", obviously shows that their ummah will continue upto the end of the world.

QUR'ÃN: whenever they kindle a fire for war Allãh puts it out: To kindle a fire is to inflame it, and to put it out is to extinguish it. The meaning is clear. There is another possibility that the clause: "whenever they kindle a fire", explains the preceding clause: "and We put enmity and hatred . . ." Thus the meaning will be as follows: Whenever they kindled a fire of war against the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the believers, Allãh puts it out by reviving their internal discords and differences.

The context points to the divine decree that their endeavours in kindling the fire of war against the divine religion and against the Muslims (because of their belief in Allãh and His signs) are bound to fail. However, it does not cover those wars, which the Jews might wage against the Muslims, not for religious motive, but because of politics, or because of ideas of racial or national superiority.

QUR'ÃN: and they strive to make mischief in the land; and Allãh does not love the mischief-makers*: as-Sa'y (اَلسَعْی = translated here as strive) literally means moving quickly, running; fasādan (فُسَادًا) shows the motive of action, i.e., to make mischief. However, Allāh does not love the mischief-makers; and He will not leave them free to achieve what they want, so their endeavours to make mischief in the land are bound to fail. And Allāh knows better.

All of this explains how their hands are tied up and how they are cursed because of their demeaning utterances; they shall never succeed in achieving what they aimed at by waging war after war against the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the Muslims, and for which they were continuously trying to make mischief in the land.

QUR'ĀN: And if the People of the Book had believed and guarded* (against evil) We would certainly have covered their evil deeds and We would certainly have made them enter gardens of bliss: The talk again returns to the condition of People of the Book in general as was the case in beginning; and it ends on description of the favours they have missed in this world and the next – the gardens of bliss there and the happy life here.

The taqwā (اَلتَقْوٰی) mentioned after belief means abstaining from the forbidden things and guarding against the sins which bring down divine wrath and chastisement of fire in their wake. Such sins are ascribing a partner to Allāh and all those major sins, which Allāh has threatened with fire. Accordingly, the evil deeds mentioned here which Allāh has promised to cover would mean minor misdeeds; and it fits the theme of the verse: If you avoid great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins and cause you to enter an honourable place of entering (4:31).

QUR'ĀN: And if they had kept up the Tawrāt and the Injīl and that which was revealed to them from their Lord, they would certainly have eaten from above them and from beneath their feet*: The Tawrāt and the Injīl mentioned here refer to the two Divine Books which the Qur'ān says were revealed to Mūsā and 'Īsā (peace be on them), rather than the Old and the New Testaments which these people have got in their hands and which have reportedly been extensively manipulated and altered by succeeding generations.

Apparently, the clause: "that which was revealed to them from their Lord", refers to all scriptures attributed to various prophets, which these people have got, like the Psalms of David which the Qur'ãn calls Zabūr, and other such Books.

The opinion that this clause refers to the Qur'ãn is not sustain-able, because the Qur'ãn with its sharī'ah has abrogated the laws of the Tawrãt and the Injīl, and therefore there is no reason to count it with them and to express the desire that they should have kept those Books up together with the Qur'ãn which had abrogated them. May be some one would say that to follow the Qur'ãn is to follow also the Tawrãt and the Injīl; for when one acts on the abrogating rules in Islam, one acts on the sharī'ah of Islam in its totality – which includes the abro-gating and the abrogated rules together, because the divine religion is one, and its parts are not in conflict with one another; utmost that can be said is that some laws are temporary, are valid upto a fixed time without any contradiction. But this view is not correct, because Allãh describes this act as "keeping up" that is firmly preserving something on its roots. Such expression is not suitable for abrogated laws per se; so the Tawrãt and the Injīl could correctly be kept up at the time when they were not abrogated by any other sharī'ah; and the Injīl did not abrogate the sharī'ah of the Tawrãt except in some minor aspects.

Moreover, the clause: "that which was revealed to them from their Lord", refers to the Books, which were revealed to the Jews and the Christians, and we have never seen the Qur'ãn to be described as being revealed to them.

Obviously, this clause refers to the scriptures, which were revealed after the Tawrãt and the Injīl, including various kinds of revelations sent to the prophets of the Israelites, like the Psalms of David, etc. To keep those Books up means diligently obeying the divine laws contained in those Books, and believing the gnosis of genesis and return which Allãh had described therein. It is a far cry from manipulating those truths through alteration, concealment, and abandonment. If they had properly kept up the Books they would certainly have eaten from above them and from beneath their feet.

The eating mentioned in this clause alludes to a life of ease and comfort, whether it is through eating or using some other luxuries. The use of "eating" for general management and unrestricted enjoyment is common in the language.

"from above them" indicates from the heaven, and "from beneath their feet" means from the earth. The sentence alludes that they would enjoy the blessings of the heaven and the earth, and would be encompassed by those blessings. It is the same theme which is given in the verse: And if the people of the towns had believed and guarded (against evil), We would certainly have opened up for them blessings from the heaven and the earth; but they rejected, so We overtook them for what they had earned (7:96).

The verse proves that the belief and good deeds of the human species have an effect on the good of the creative system inasmuch as it has a connection with this species. So if this species behaved properly the whole system of the world would remain good, because it would fulfil what is necessary for a happy life of man – by repelling the mis-fortune and abundance of blessings.

Many other Qur'ãnic verses prove it in clear words: Corruption has appeared in the land and the sea on account of what the hands of men have wrought, that He may make them taste a part of that which they have done, so that they may return. Say: "Travel in the land, then see how was the end of those before; most of them were polytheists (30:41-42); And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought . . . (42:30), apart from other such verses. We have mentioned in the second volume[4] of our book some matters relevant to the effects of human deeds.

QUR'ÃN: there is a party of them keeping to the moderate course, and* (as for) most of them, evil is that which they do: al-Iqtiṣãd (ٱلإِقْتِصَاد) is to adhere to al-qaṣd (ٱلْقَصْد = the middle course); thus the moderate group is the one which keeps to the middle course in religious affairs and submits to the commandments of Allãh.

The talk is a fresh start to describe that all that has been attributed to them – their exceeding the limits imposed by Allãh, their disbelief in divine signs, their affliction by divine wrath and the curse on their bands – portrays the condition of their majority; and that is why all these evils have been ascribed to them; however, there is among them a moderate group which is above these demerits. This is an example of the justice the divine speech contains, as it does not ignore anyone's right, and shows appreciation of reviving the affairs of truth however little it may be.

This reality has been alluded to in many preceding verses, but not so clearly; for example, the divine words: . . . and that most of you are transgressors [5:59]; And you will see many of them striving with one another to hasten in sin and exceeding the limit . . . [5:62]; . . . and what has been revealed to you from your Lord will certainly make many of them increase in inordinacy and in unbelief [5:64].

TRADITIONS

al-Qummī writes under the verse: And when they come to you they say: "We believe;" . . . "It was revealed about ʻAbdullãh ibn Ubayy, when he pretended to accept Islam, while they had come in with disbelief. (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: The context clearly shows that these verses were revealed about the People of the Book, not about the hypocrites, except if this verse is claimed to be revealed alone.

The same book says about the words: and indeed they go forth with it, i.e. they went forth with disbelief, without faith. (ibid.)

al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain from Abū Baṣīr, from ʻUmar ibn Riyãḥ, from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said, "I told him, 'I have been informed that you say that whoever divorced in contravention to sunnah you do not consider his divorce (to be) anything.' Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said, 'It is not I that say so; but Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, says it. Why by Allãh! Were we to give you legal opinion with injustice, we would have been worse than you. Verily, Allãh says: Why do not the learned men and the doctors of law prohibit them from their speaking of what is sinful and their eating of what is unlawfully acquired? (al-Kãfī) al-ʻAyyãshī narrates from Abū Baṣīr that he said, "I said to Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), 'Verily, ʻUmar ibn Riyãḥ thinks that you have said, "There is no divorce except with proof [i.e. with two just witnesses]."'" Abū Baṣīr said that (the Imãm, a.s.) said, "It is not I that have said so, but Allãh, the Blessed, the Sublime, says it. Why, by Allãh! Were we to give you legal opinion with injustice, we would have been worse than you. Verily, Allãh says: Why do not the learned men and the doctors of law . . . (at-Tafsīr) ash-Shaykh narrates through his chain from Ibn Abī ʻUmayr, from Hishãm ibn Sãlim, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) regarding the words of Allãh, the High: And the Jews say: "The hand of Allãh is tied up." "He said that they used to say, 'He has concluded all affairs.'" (al-Majãlis)

The author says: al-ʻAyyãshī has narrated this connotation in his

at-Tafsīr from Ya‘qūb ibn Shu‘ayb and Ḥammād from the same Imām (a.s.).

al-Qummī narrates [from the same Imām, a.s.] that he said, "They used to say, 'Allāh has concluded all affairs; He does not bring forth other than that which He had ordained in the first ordination.' Therefore, Allāh rebutted them and said: Nay, both His hands are spread out, He expends as He pleases, i.e. He brings (something) forward and puts (another) back, and He increases and decreases; to Him belong al-badā' and volition." (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated this theme in his Ma‘ānī 'l-akhbār, through his chain, from Isḥāq ibn ‘Ammār, from the one who heard it, from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.).

al-‘Ayyāshī narrates from Hishām al-Mashriqī from Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Khurāsānī (a.s.), [i.e. ar-Riḍā, a.s.], that he said, "Indeed Allāh is as He has described Himself, the One, on Whom all depend, the Light." Then he said, "Rather, both His hands are spread out." [Hishām says,] "I said to him, 'Well, does He have two hands like this?' – and I pointed with my hand to his hand. He said, 'If He were like this, He would have been a created thing.'" (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated it in al-‘Uyūn, through his chain from al-Mashriqī from the Imām (a.s.).

aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chain from Muḥammad ibn Muslim that he said, "I asked Ja‘far (a.s.), and said, '(What is the ex-planation of) His word, the Mighty, the Great: O Iblīs! What prevented thee that thou shouldst do obeisance to him whom I created with My two hands? [38:75].' (The Imām, a.s.), said, 'Hand in the language of Arabs is (used) for power and favour; He has said: And remember Our servant Dāwūd, the powerful [38:17], [lit: owner of hands]; and the heaven, We created it by hands, (i.e. by power) and verily We are expanding [51:47]; and He has said: and He strengthened them with a spirit from Himself [58:22];' (the Imām said) 'i.e. He gave them strength; and it is said, "I owe that man a bright hand," i.e. a boon and grace.'" (Ma‘ānī 'l-akhbār) al-Qummī writes in his at-Tafsīr about the word of Allāh: And if they had kept up the Tawrāt and the Injīl – i.e. the Jews and the Christians – they would certainly have eaten from above them and from beneath their feet – from above them (alludes to) rain, and from beneath

al-‘Ayyāshī narrates under the divine word: there is a party of them keeping to the moderate course, from Abu 'ṣ-Ṣahbā’ al-Kubrā that he said, "I heard ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib [who] invited Ra’su 'l-Jālūt and the Bishop of the Christians and said, 'I am going to ask you of a matter – and I know it better than you do – so do not conceal (it).' Then he called the Bishop of the Christians and said, 'I adjure you by Allāh, Who sent down Injīl to ‘Īsā, and put blessings on his foot, and (because of which, ‘Īsā) healed the blind and the lepers, and removed the pain of the eye, and made for you birds out of clay and he informed you of what you ate and what you stored.' (The bishop) said, 'I would tell truth (even) for less than that.'

"So ‘Alī (a.s.), said, 'Into how many (sects) were the Israelites divided after ‘Īsā?' He said, 'No, by Allāh! Not even a single sect.' Then ‘Alī (a.s.) said, 'You have told untruth. By Allāh, that there is no god except Him! Indeed they had divided into seventy-two sects; all of them are in the Fire except one sect. Verily, Allāh says: there is a part of them keeping to the moderate course, and (as for) most of them, evil is that which they do; it is that which shall be saved.'" (at-Tafsīr)

The same book narrates from Zayd ibn Aslam, from Anas ibn Mālik, that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), used to say, 'The ummah of Mūsā divided into seventy-one sects, seventy of them were in the Fire and one in the Garden; and the ummah of ‘Īsā into seventy-two sects, seventy-one of them is in the Fire and one is in the Garden; and my ummah will rise over the two sects together with one group in the Garden, and seventy-two (of their sects) (will go) to the Fire.' They (the companions) said, 'Who are they? O Messenger of Allāh!' He said, 'The groups, the groups.'" (ibid.)

Ya‘qūb ibn Yazīd said, "Whenever ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.), narrated this ḥadīth from the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), he used to recite the (verse of the) Qur’ān: And if the People of the Book had believed and guarded (against evil) We would certainly have covered their evil deeds . . . evil is that which they do; and he also recited, and from among those We created, there is a group who guide with truth and they do justice with it – i.e. the ummah of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.)."

COMMENTARY

The meaning of the verse in itself is clear. It contains an order in the form of threat to the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) to convey the mess-age, and promises to protect him from the people.

If we ponder on the verse looking at the position it has been placed in, and look at the verses preceding and following it, you will see them exposing the condition of the People of the Book and admon-ishing and condemning them for their various transgressions, their crossing the limit and indulging in things prohibited by Allãh and their rejection of divine communications. For example, the preceding verse says: And if they had kept up the Tawrãt and the Injīl and that which was revealed to them from their Lord, they would certainly have eaten from above them and from beneath their feet; . . .; and the following one says: Say: "O People of the Book! You have no ground to stand upon until you keep up the Tawrãt and the Injīl and that which is revealed to you from your Lord;" . . .

Then ponder on the verse itself and see how its clauses are inter-linked together. Now, you will be astonished, [and realize that this verse is not connected with the preceding or following verses].

Had this verse been connected to the preceding and following verses which deal with the People of the Book, it would have meant that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was ordered – in extremely harsh words – to deliver what Allãh had revealed regarding the People of the Book; and the context would show that: what has been revealed to you from your Lord refers to what he was told to convey in the immediately follow-ing verse: Say: "O People of the Book! You have no ground to stand upon until you keep up the Tawrãt and the Injīl and that which is revealed to you from your Lord;" . . .

But the context of the verse itself rejects this interpretation. The clause: and Allãh will protect you from the people, shows that the revealed order which the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) is urged to convey is a very important one; the delivery of which would put the life of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in peril or would cause the divine religion to fail in its aim. But the Jews or the Christians did not have such a power during the days of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) as to put his life in danger to such an extent as to justify holding back or delaying its conveyance, until Allãh gives him a promise to protect him from the people if he conveys the revealed order. Even in the early days of the Prophet's hijrah to Medina the People of the Book were not in a position to put his life in danger, although the Jews were fiercely opposed to him and their active opposition ultimately led to the battle of Khaybar, etc.

Moreover, this verse does not contain any tough order or any vehement word. The Prophet had delivered before that the verses, which were harder, sharper and much bitter than it for the Jews. Also, before that he was told to convey to the unbelievers of the Quraysh and the polytheists of Arabia what was more distasteful than it, e.g. the message of tawḥīd and the rebuttal of idol-worship. Besides, those people were more ruthless, more violent and more given to bloodshed than the Jews and other People of the Book. Hence, Allãh did not use any threatening word when ordering him to convey His message, nor did He find it necessary to give him assurance of His protection.

Apart from that, the verses describing the condition of the People of the Book constitute the major part of the chapter, "The Table". Therefore, this verse was certainly revealed in it; and at the time this chapter was revealed, the Jews' power was already broken, their fire had died down, and they were engulfed by the divine curse and wrath. Whenever they kindled a fire for war, Allãh put it out. In this back-ground, there was no reason for the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) to fear them regarding the divine religion. They had already entered through peace treaties in the domain of Islam and they, as well as the Christians, had agreed to pay jizyah. How could Allãh talk, in this environment, about the Messenger's fear and worry in delivering the divine message to them; while he had conveyed to them messages which were much harder, and stood before them in surroundings which were more frightful and more weired.

Thus, there is no room for any doubt that this verse is totally separate in its context from that of the preceding and following verses; and has no connection with them. In short, it is a single verse, which was revealed alone.

The verse speaks about an order which was sent to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) – the entire religion or some parts of it – and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was afraid of the people in delivering that message and kept postponing it waiting for a suitable time. If there were no fear and no delaying there was no reason why he should be addressed in such a threatening way: and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message. Compare it with the verses revealed in early period of the Call none of which has any shade of threat. For example: Read in the name of thy Lord Who created . . . (to the end of ch.96); O you who are enwrapped, arise and warn (74:1-2); . . . therefore, follow the right way to Him and ask His forgiveness; and woe to the polytheists (41:6), apart from other such verses.

No doubt, the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was afraid of the people, but he was not afraid of sacrificing his life in the cause of Allãh, because his whole life and character is a rebuttal of such thinking. Moreover, Allãh Himself testifies about His Messengers that they did not fear the adversaries. For example: There is no harm in the Prophet doing that which Allãh has ordained for him; such has been the course of Allãh with respect to those who have gone before; and the command of Allãh is a decree that is made absolute. Those who deliver the message of Allãh and fear Him, and do not fear any one but Allãh; and Allãh is suff-icient to take account (33:38-39). Also, Allãh has said concerning such situations:

. . . so do not fear them, and fear Me if you are believers (3:175). And He has praised a group of believers that they were not afraid of the people although the people had tried to frighten them: Those to whom the people said: "Surely men have gathered against you, therefore fear them"; but this (only) increased their faith, and they said: "Allãh is sufficient for us and most excellent Protector is (He)." So they returned with favour from Allãh and (His) grace; no evil touched them and they followed the pleasure of Allãh; and Allãh is the Lord of mighty grace (3:173-4).

Also, it is not possible to say that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was afraid for his life because if he were killed the divine mission was bound to perish, and for this reason he was delaying its conveyance waiting for a suitable time. But this hypothesis is patently false, be-cause Allãh says: You have no concern in the affair . . . (3:128); and if they had killed the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) Allãh had power to revive His mission through any means He pleased and any cause He wished.

Of course, it is possible to infer from the clause: and Allãh will protect you from the people, that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was afraid of the people concerning the delivery that they would accuse him [of having selfish motive], which would irreparably damage the whole fabric of conveyance. He had permission from Allãh to use his discre-tion in such matters, and it had no connection with any fear regarding his own self.

The above description makes it clear that the verse was not revealed in the early days of prophethood, as some exegetes have thought; as in that case there would be no sense in the clause: and Allãh will protect you from the people; because such an interpretation would imply that Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was delaying the delivery of the divine message because he was afraid that they would kill him and it would cost him his life, or would nullify the effects of tablīgh. But such a hypothesis is not tenable.

Again, let us see what is the connotation of the phrase: what has been revealed to you from your Lord. Does it mean the whole religion? If so, then the clauses: and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message, would mean: O Messenger! Deliver the religion, and if you do not deliver the religion, then you did not deliver the religion!

Someone has said: The verse means: If you do not deliver the message, then you will be liable to blame for dereliction of duty and negligence of what Allãh had most emphatically commanded you to do and it is in the same vein as the well known Arab poet, Abu 'n-Najm, has said:

I'm Abu 'n-Najm, and my poem is my poem.

But this explanation is wrong; such rhetorical expressions are used regarding the general and the particular, or the unrestricted and the restricted, and such expressions allude that the both are one and the same; as Abu 'n-Najm says that my poem is my poem, i.e., no one should think that my talent has now dulled, or vicissitudes of time have adversely affected my genius and robbed me of the gift of poetry; be-cause the poem which I compose today has the same brilliance which my poems had in the past.

However, this explanation cannot be applied to the divine speech: and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message. Because if it is believed that the verse was revealed in early days of prophet-hood, then the message – the religion in its totality or the basic religion – was a single unit, not changeable or alterable. Then how can it be said that if you did not deliver this message then you did not deliver that message of the basic messages; admittedly in the beginning it was the basic message that was a collection of religious cognition.

It is now clear that the verse could not have been revealed in the early period of prophethood, nor can the phrase: what has been revealed to you from your Lord, point to the basic religion or totality of religion – either in the early days or at any later period; because all such interpretations would render the clause: and if you do it not then you have not delivered His message, devoid of meaning and irrelevant.

We should reiterate here that:

If message were to refer to the basic or total religion, then the words: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord, could not have been revealed except in the early days of prophet-hood, as is clear;

And the problem would remain as before, that the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) was afraid of the people in delivering the divine message.

Apparently, the matter which was revealed to the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) and this verse put emphasis on its delivery was not the religion in its totality, or basic religion – whatever meaning is understood from it. Therefore, we have to admit that it was a part of religion. The mean-ing in this case will be as follows: O Messenger! Deliver the particular command revealed to you from your Lord, and if you do it not, then you have not delivered Allãh's message at all. According to this inter-pretation, "His message" means all the things that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had brought as part of religion. Otherwise, the previ-ous trouble – that the speech would be devoid of meaning – would continue. Let us put it in this way: If "His message" means this par-ticular order, it would means: 'Deliver this order, and if you did it not, you did not deliver this message!' It is clearly absurd.

The verse therefore means: 'O Messenger! Deliver this particu-lar command, and if you do it not, then you have not delivered the basic message or the message in its totality.' This meaning is correct and understandable and then the speech will be in the style of the poem of Abu 'n-Najm:

I'm Abu 'n-Najm, and my poem is poem.

Why was this order so important that if it was not conveyed then the message was not conveyed at all? It was because religion's knowledge and commands are inter-linked, inter-twined with one another on all sides; if one coil is unravelled, the whole material is destructed – especially in the sphere of delivery – because each item is connected with all others. This supposition has no defect in itself, yet the clauses coming after it: and Allãh will protect you from the people; surely Allãh will not guide the unbelieving people, do not fit on it. These clauses clearly show that some unbelieving people had decided to oppose this revealed command, or, seeing their tendency, they were expected to oppose it to the extreme. They would use every strategem to nullify this divine mission and neutralize it, so that it could not bring about any effect or benefit. Therefore, Allãh promised His Messenger that He would protect him from them, nullify their artifice and leave them wandering in their own viles.

This meaning does not fit on any revealed order whatsoever; because the religious cognition and orders in Islam are not all of them of the same importance, some are the pillars of religion, others are like the invocation on sighting the crescent, there is prohibition of adultery and that of looking at a stranger woman. The fear that the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) had and for which Allãh promised him His protection, cannot be related to every such order; obviously it had emanated from some es-pecial commandment.

The fact, that if this commandment was not conveyed, then no other order was conveyed, shows its utmost importance, and makes it crystal clear that this particular order occupies such a central position in the whole structure that if it was left unannounced, it would amount to leaving all other orders unannounced, because its relation to other items is like that of soul with body; if it is disconnected, there would remain only a dead body, devoid of feeling, movement [and percep-tion, etc.].

The verse thus proves that Allãh had sent to his Messenger (s.a.w.a.) an order which was to complete the religion, and by which the religion would firmly settle in its proper pedestal. As such there was a danger that the people would oppose it and strive hard to over-turn it against the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) aiming at demolishing the structure of religion he had built and disintegrating all its parts. The Prophet (s.a. w.a.), having intuitive knowledge of the people's nature, understood their tendency and was afraid that they would contrive to neutralize all his endeavours. Accordingly, he kept postponing its delivery from time to time, waiting for a suitable circumstances and peaceful atmosphere, in order that his mission might be successful and his endeavours fruit-ful. But Allãh ordered him to make haste in conveying that message, showing to him its importance, and promising to protect him from the people. In this way, He assured him that He would not let their plans succeed, nor would they be able to overturn his Mission's affairs.

Overturning the Prophetic Mission and negating his efforts after the spread of Islam was not possible for the polytheists and idol-worshippers of Arabia or outside. In other words, it is not possible to suppose that the verse was revealed in Mecca before hijrah, and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was afraid that the people would slander and accuse him of lying in his affairs, as Allãh quotes their calumnies in the Qur'ãn: "One taught (by others), a madman" (44:14); "A poet, we wait for him the evil accidents of time" (52:30); "A magician or a mad man" (51:52); "You follow only a man deprived of reason" (17:47); "This is not but enchantment, narrated" (74:24); "The stories of the ancients – he has got them written – so these are read out to him morning and evening" (25:5); "Only a mortal teaches him . . ." (16: 103); "Go and steadily adhere to your gods; this is most surely a thing sought after" (38:6); and other such things which they used to say about him (s.a.w.a.). However, such talks could not shake the founda-tion of religion. They only show – if they show anything – the confu-sion and perturbation in their ideas and their crookedness. Moreover, such slanders were not reserved for the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), so that he would be disturbed because of them or afraid of their appearance; in fact all the messengers and prophets were equally made targets of such afflictions and misfortunes; they all had to face such unpalatable situations from their people, as Allãh has described in the stories of Nūḥ and the succeeding prophets who are mentioned in the Qur'ãn.

If there was something like that – and there must have been – it could be imagined after the hijrah when the religion was firmly established in the Islamic society. The Muslims were then a mixed lot: There were good believers, and there were the hypocrites who were powerful and could not be under-rated. Lastly there were those whose hearts were diseased whom the Mighty Book calls "the listeners". These people dealt with the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) – although they believed in him really or apparently – like the kings are dealt with; and the divine religion in their eyes was not different from man-made national laws. All this may be seen in various sets of Qur'ãnic verses; and some of them have already been explained in previous valumes of this book.[5]

In this background, it could possibly happen that delivery of some orders which could apparently give some advantage to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), could generate a misconception in those people's minds that he is a king in the guise of prophethood, and his sharī'ah is the worldly law disguised as religion; as we find its evidence in some people's talk on various occasions.[6]

If this or similar doubt had entered into their hearts, it would have generated such corruption and perversion in religion which no power on earth could rectify or anyone could remove. Obviously, this revealed order which the Prophet had to deliver was of such a nature that people could think of it to be especially benefitting the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and that it was particularly reserved to him without any Muslim having any part in it, like the story of Zayd, and plurality of marriages and the one-fifth of the war booty, etc.

However, the especial rules, if not affecting general Muslims, were not expected to create doubts in minds. For examples, permission of marriage with a woman divorced by an adopted son was not particu-larly reserved to him. Likewise, if marrying more than four wives were based on his own desire without permission of Allãh, there was nothing to prevent him from allowing it to all Muslims. His life-long conduct of giving preference to Muslims over his own self in division of wealth, etc. which came into his hands leaves no room for any doubt in such affairs.

All the above elaboration makes it clear that the verse speaks about a revealed order that could create a misunderstanding that it con-tains a sort of personal benefit and interest for the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and gives

[5] For example, the verses giving the story of Uḥud in ch.3; and verses 105-6 of ch.4. (Author's Note)

[6] As Abū Sufyãn is reported to speak in the presence of 'Uthmãn when he got the caliphate. (Author's Note) him a privilege which the others too would have desired; and its delivery and enforcement would deprive them of its enjoy-ment. That is why the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was afraid of its delivery. But Allãh ordered him to convey it and put utmost emphasis on this delivery, and promised to protect him from the people, telling him that his adver-saries will not succeed in their machination, even if they tried.

This supports the traditions, narrated by both sects, that the verse was revealed about the guardianship of ʻAlī (a.s.); that Allãh had sent direction to convey this commandment, but the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was afraid that the people would accuse him regarding his cousin; that was why he kept postponing its delivery until this verse was sent down; and he delivered it at Ghadīr Khumm, and announced: "He whose mawlã (Guardian) am I, this ʻAlī is his mawlã."

The essentiality of the Guardianship of the affairs of the ummah for religion is clear without any doubt. Islam is a religion so compre-hensive and all-encompassing that it has laid down for the whole mankind in all regions and for all times all fundamental gnosis, ethical principles and practical rules which cover all human movement and stillness, separately and collectively, contrary to other general legal systems. How can it be imagined that such a comprehensive system does not need a guardian who should protect and preserve it properly. Or, can it be said that of all the human societies, only the Muslim ummah and Islamic society is so self-sufficient that it does not need any ruler to manage its affairs and look after its interests. What excuse can be offered to a research scholar who looks at the social system established by the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and finds that whenever he went out of Medina, he invariably always put a man in his place to manage the society. He had appointed ʻAlī in his place in Medina at the time of going forth to Tabūk; ʻAlī said: "O Messenger of Allãh! Are you leaving me among the women and children?" The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said: "Well, are you not pleased that you should be to me as Hãrūn was to Mūsã, except that there is no prophet after me?"

And the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to appoint governors in all towns, which were in the hands of the Muslims, e.g., Mecca, Ṭãif and Yemen, etc. Likewise, he appointed people at the head of expeditions and battalians, which he used to send around. And what difference is there between his lifetime and after his death? Rather the essentiality of such appointment is more emphatic for the time after his departure from this world; and the need of such a ruler at that time is more and more pressing.

QUR'ÃN: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord: The order is addressed to the Messenger, as it is the most appropriate attribute to the conveying the divine order, which was revealed. It is a sort of proof that the delivery mentioned in the verse is obligatory and compulsory; because the only function of a messenger is to convey the message he is entrusted with. In other words, the office of messengership obligates him to deliver the message.

The verse does not elaborate what was revealed to him from his Lord. It alludes to it just as a thing revealed to him. This vagueness points to the greatness of that message, and shows that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had no hand in it, nor did he have any authority in his own affairs. It would be another proof that he (s.a.w.a.) had no power or discretion to keep the order secret and postpone its convey-ance from this time to that. It also provided him with an excuse that he had been obligated to deliver this order; and showed that he was perfectly justified in fearing the people in this respect; but at the same time indicated that this important order had to be announced by him, in his own words, through his own tongue.

QUR'ÃN: and if you do it not, then you have not delivered his message: Some reciters have read, "his messages" in plural. In any case, it means the totality of the messages that was sent by Allãh to His Messenger (s.a.w.a.). We have explained above that this clause shows the utmost importance of the order alluded to; and that it enjoyed such a dignity and position that if it was not conveyed then it would be as if no message was ever delivered by him.

The speech is constructed as a threat; and in reality it connotes the importance of the order – if this one order was not conveyed to the people and its implications were not preserved, it would be as though no other part of religion was ever conveyed.

It is a conditional sentence, to show the importance of the conditional clause; that its subordinate clause depends totally on the principle one for its existence.

This conditional sentence is not like such sentences found in our speech. We use conditional sentences because we do not know whether the principle clause would lake place, bringing about with it the subor-dinate clause. But far be it from the position of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that the Qur'ãn should imply that it was not sure whether the Prophet would convey or not the revealed message. And Allāh says: Allāh best knows where He places His message (6:124).

In short, this sentence apparently contains a threat, but in fact it makes it known to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and other people the utmost importance of the order and that the Messenger had no power to delay its delivery.

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh will protect you from the people; surely Allāh will not guide the unbelieving people: ar-Rāghib has said: "al-'Aṣm (اَلْعَصْم) means to take hold; and al-i'tiṣām (اَلإِعْتِصَام) is to adhere. al-'Iṣām (اَلْعِصَام) is strap, that which is used for binding; the prophets enjoy 'iṣmah (عِصْمَة) – i.e. Allāh protects them, first through the pure nature which is reserved for them; then through the physical and psy-chological virtues which He has bestowed upon them. Then through helping them and keeping their feet firm [on righteousness]; then by sending tranquillity upon them and protecting their hearts, and finally through tawfīq (تَوْفِيْق = divine help); Allāh says: "and Allāh will protect you from the people". And al-'iṣmah is like bracelet, and al-mi'ṣam (اَلْمِعْصَم) is wrist, the part of hand where it is worn; the wrist's whiteness is called 'iṣmah, likening it to bracelet, as the whiteness of foot is called taḥjīl (تَحْجِيْل = wearing anklet); in the same vein they say, a'ṣam (أَعْصَم white-footed) crow [i.e. rare]."

The author says: The explanation given above of the prophets' 'iṣmah is good, there is no objection to it; but those meanings cannot be applied to the verse under discussion: and Allāh will protect you from the people; if we were to apply it, it may be applied to the verse: . . . and they shall not harm you in any way, and Allāh has revealed to you the Book and the Wisdom, and He has taught you what you did not know, and Allāh's grace on you is very great (4:113). As for the clause: and Allāh will protect you from the people, the verb, ya'ṣim, in it apparently denotes protection and safety from the people's evil which they aimed at the noble person of the Prophet, or his religious objec-tives or at the success of his Call and the triumph of his endeavours – in short, any connotation appropriate to his sacred office.

However, looking at the usage of this word, we find that it actually means holding fast and clutching. Therefore, its use in the meaning of protection is based on allusion, because protection necessi-tates holding it fast.

Protection from the people is unrestricted and general. It does not say from which type of machination of the people the Prophet shall be protected. Does it point to their transgression and endeavours to harm him in body, like murder, poisoning, or assassination? Or through speech, like abusing and slandering? Or through some other devices, like disrupting his affairs one way or another through treach-ery, deception and double-dealing? In short this non-identification of things protected against, implies a sort of generalization; yet the con-text confines it to their evil that could have disrupted and destroyed what he had built and raised of the structure of religion.

"The people" refers to all human beings, without looking at any especiality, be it natural and in field of creation, like masculinity and femininity, or otherwise, like knowledge, virtues, and richness, etc. That is why it is seldom used for other than a group; and for this very reason, it often points to virtuous human beings if the virtue spoken of has some relation with humanity, as Allãh says: And when it is said to them: "Believe as the people have believed" [2:13], i.e. those in whom meaning of humanity is found, and it is by which truth is perceived and distinguished from falsity.

Also, sometimes it denotes a sort of vileness and downfall in circumstances. This happens when the subject of talk is a thing in which some such human virtues are contemplated which are extraneous to the basic theme of the species, as Allãh says: . . . but most people do not know (30:30). Or, as you may say: Don't put trust in the people's pro-mises; or, don't seek help from their masses. In the above clauses, you want to express the idea that trust or appeal to help should be placed in virtuous people who have natural disposition to fulfil their under-takings and to remain firm on their stand; that you should not trust such people who are merely called humans, without any praise or blame being attached to them; [especially] when the main theme does not indicate any merit or demerit other than the basic meaning of humanity, as Allãh says: O you people! Surely We have created you of a male and a female and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allãh is the one who is most pious; . . . (49:13).

Probably, the word: "the people", in the clause: "and Allãh will protect you from the people", points to the multitude of people which encompasses believers and hypocrites and those whose hearts are dis-eased; all of them are mixed together without any distinction. There-fore, if there is a cause to fear them, all of them combinedly will be feared.

Probably the clause: "surely Allāh will not guide the unbe-lieving people," points to it. This clause explains the reason of the preceding one: "and Allāh will protect you from the people"; it has been described earlier that the verse was revealed after hijrah when the Islam had gained upper hand in Arabia, and most of the people had apparently entered into the fold of Islam, although there were among them the hypocrites and those whose hearts were diseased. Therefore, the phrase: "unbelieving people" denotes those who were mingled with the general public, who were not called "unbelievers" yet the charac-teristics of disbelief had taken root in their hearts. And through this clause, Allāh has given assurance that He will nullify their machina-tions and protect His Messenger from their evil.

Also, it seems clear that in this clause, disbelief, means disbelieving in one of the commandments of Allāh, i.e. the order to which the phrase: what has been revealed to you from your Lord, points; it is the same style that has been used in the verse of Ḥājj: . . . and who-ever disbelieves, then surely Allāh is Self-sufficient (independent) of the worlds (3:97).

In any case, the context of the verse does not allow taking "disbelief" in the meaning of rejection of the two testimonies. Such views can only be considered if we take: what has been revealed to you from your Lord, as referring to the sum total of all the revealed messages, but you have seen that this interpretation has no leg to stand upon.

The statement that Allāh will not guide the disbelievers, means that He will not guide them in their treachery and machinations, and will prevent usual causes to submit to them when they proceed to their objectives of evil and mischief. It is like the verses: . . . surely Allāh does not guide the transgressing people (63:6); . . . and Allāh does not guide aright the unjust people (2:258). Detailed discussion on this subject may be seen in volume two of this book.[7]

It is certainly not correct to say that the non-guidance here means not guiding them to correct faith, because it goes against the basic concept of Divine Call. How can Allāh tell His Messenger: You call them to Allāh, or, invite them to obey the divine command, but I will not guide them to it, except for the purpose of completing the proof against them!

Moreover, we see with our own eyes that Allāh guides a lot of unbelievers to faith, and continues to do so every day; and He Himself has said: . . . and Allãh guides whom He pleases to the straight path (2:213).

Now, it is crystal clear that not guiding the unbelievers means that Allãh does not let them achieve their goal of negating the word of truth and extinguishing the light of the revealed commandments. The unbelievers as well as the unjust people and the transgressors, under the influence of their sinister minds and erroneous views, want to change the custom of Allãh, which encompasses the whole creation. They intend to divert the proceedings of true causes (which are free from stigma of disobeying the Lord of the universe) towards their own false goals and wicked destinations. But their formal powers can never debilitate Almighty Lord. Let them ponder on this question. Who has put these powers in their body? The only answer is: Allãh. [How can these powers overpower their Creator?]

They might occasionally succeed in their endeavours and obtain for a short time what they want, but soon all this is turned upside down and their trickery turns against themselves: . . . and the evil plan does not beset any save the authors of it . . . [35:43]; . . . thus does Allãh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it remains in the earth; thus does Allãh set forth parables [13:17].

Accordingly, the clause: "surely Allãh will not guide the unbelieving people", elaborates the preceding one: "and Allãh will protect you from the people", putting some limitation on its generality. The protection then means that Allãh will protect him (s.a.w.a.) so that the people do not inflict any harm on him before he achieves his objectives of delivering this order and announcing it to the ummah. For example, He will not let them kill him before he conveys the message; they would not be able to rise against him or overturn his affairs, or accuse him of such matters which would make the believers go out of his religion, or affect such devices which would destroy and annihilate this sharī'ah. Nay, Allãh will certainly make the word of truth victorious, and estab-lish the religion as He pleases, wherever He pleases and whenever He pleases. Allãh says: If He pleases, He can make you pass away, O people! And bring others; and Allãh has the power to do this (4:133).

However, the verse: "and Allãh will protect you from the people", cannot be taken to imply a general and all-encompassing protection from all and every trouble and harm; because such a view is rebutted by the Qur'ãn, the ḥadīth and accepted history. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had to suffer from his people – be they believers, unbelievers or hypocrites – such misfortunes, tribulations and multifarious afflictions and griev-ances which nobody could ever bear – except the noble Prophet (s.a. w.a.); and he has said – in a famous ḥadīth: "No prophet was ever harmed like I have been."

TRADITIONS

al-ʻAyyāshī narrates from Abū Ṣāliḥ, from Ibn ʻAbbās and Jābir ibn ʻAbdillāh, that they said, "Allāh, the High, ordered His Prophet Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), to set up ʻAlī (as a) standard among the people, in order to inform them of his wilāyah (guardianship); so the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), was afraid lest they say, 'He has brought his cousin to us,' and speak against him in this matter. Then Allāh revealed to him the verse: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord; and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message; and Allāh will protect you from the people. So, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), raised up his wilāyah on the day of Ghadīr Khumm." (at-Tafsīr)

Also, he narrates from Ḥanān ibn Sadīr, from his father, from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said, "When Jibrīl brought, in the days of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), in the Last Pilgrimage, (the order of) announcement of the matter of ʻAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.): O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord (to the end of the verse); so the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) delayed (it) for three days until he reached Juḥfah, yet he did not take ʻAlī's hand, for fear of the people. Then when he came down at Juḥfah on the day of Ghadīr at a place called Mahyaʻah, he (ordered to announce): The congregational prayer. The people gathered together. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.), then said, 'Who has more authority on you than you have yourselves?' They loudly said, 'Allāh and His Messenger.' Then he asked them the second time and they said, 'Allāh and His Messenger.' Then he again asked the third time and they said, 'Allāh and His Messenger.'

"Then he caught the hand of ʻAlī (a.s.) and said, 'Whoever whose Master I am, ʻAlī is his Master; O Allāh! Love him who loves ʻAlī, and be the enemy of the enemy of ʻAlī; help him who helps ʻAlī, and forsake him who forsakes ʻAlī; for indeed he is from me and I am from him; and he has the same position in relation to me as Hārūn had to Mūsā except that there is no prophet after me.'" (ibid.)

Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord; and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message; and Allãh will protect you from the people; surely Allãh will not guide the unbelieving people, [The Imãm said], 'Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) caught the hand of ‘Alī (a.s.) and said, "O people! Surely there was not any prophet, among the prophets who were before me, but he lived his life then (Allãh) called him (back) and he accepted (the call); and the time is near that I'll be called and I'll accept it; and I shall be asked and you shall be asked; so what are you going to say?" They said, "We shall bear witness that you had certainly delivered (the message) and acted in good faith and fulfilled what was incumbent upon you, so may Allãh recompense you the best of the recompense He had given to the Messengers." (The Prophet) said, "O Allãh! Be witness (of it)."

"'Then he (s.a.w.a.), said, "O group of the Muslims! He who is present should convey it to those who are absent. Whoever believes in me and gives credence to my truth, I enjoin on him the wilãyah of ‘Alī. Well certainly ‘Alī's wilãyah is my wilãyah, being a covenant which my Lord made with me; and He has ordered me to convey it to you." Then he said, "Did you hear?" – saying it three times – so some one said, "Indeed we have heard, O Messenger of Allãh!"'" (ibid.)

[aṣ-Ṣaffãr] narrates through his chain from al-Fuḍayl ibn Yasãr, from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said about the words of Allãh: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord; and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message, that "It is wilãyah." (Baṣãiru 'd-darajãt)

The author says: al-Kulaynī has narrated about the revelation of this verse in relation to wilãyah with the story of Ghadīr in al-Kãfī, through his chain, from Abu 'l-Jārūd, from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) in a lengthy ḥadīth. Also, this meaning has been narrated by aṣ-Ṣadūq, in Ma‘ãni 'l-akhbãr, through his chain, from Muḥammad ibn al-Fayḍ ibn al-Mukhtãr, from his father, from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) in a lengthy ḥadīth. Also, al-‘Ayyãshī has narrated from Abu 'l-Jārūd in a lengthy narration; and from ‘Amr ibn Yazīd from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) in abbreviated form.

ath-Tha‘labī writes in his at-Tafsīr: "Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad said explaining the word of Allãh: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord, (that it was revealed) about the excellence of ‘Alī; so when it was revealed, the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) caught the hand of ‘Alī and said, 'Whoever whose Master am I, ‘Alī is his Master.'"

The same writer narrates through his chain from al-Kalbī, from Abū Ṣāliḥ, from Ibn ʻAbbās that he said about this verse, "It was revealed about ʻAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib; Allāh ordered the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he should convey (the order) about him; so he caught the hand of ʻAlī and said, 'Whoever whose Master am I, ʻAlī is his Master; O Allāh! Love him who loves ʻAlī, and be enemy of the enemy of ʻAlī.'"

[al-Baḥrānī] narrates from Ibrāhīm ath-Thaqafī through his chain, from al-Khudrī and Buraydah al-Aslamī and Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī that it was revealed on the day of Ghadīr about ʻAlī. (at-Tafsīr) ath-Thaʻlabī writes about its meaning that Abū Jaʻfar Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī said, "It means, deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord about ʻAlī."

Tafsīru 'l-Manār quotes the following from at-Tafsīr of ath-Thaʻlabī:

"Verily this word of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), regarding the love of ʻAlī spread about and reached all towns; it was conveyed to al-Ḥārith ibn an-Nuʻmān al-Fihrī; so he came to the Prophet (s.a.w.), on his camel, and (the Prophet) was in al-Abṭaḥ; he came down and tied his camel, and said to the Prophet (s.a.w.) – and he was in a gathering of his companions – 'O Muḥammad! You ordered us on behalf of Allāh that we should bear witness that there is no god except Allāh and that you are the Messenger of Allāh; and we accepted (it) from you.' (Then he likewise mentioned all the pillars of Islam.) 'Yet you were not pleased with all this until you caught the upper arm of your cousin and gave him preference over us saying: "Whoever whose Master am I, ʻAlī is his Master;" so is this from you or from Allāh?' He (s.a.w.) said, 'By Allāh, except Whom there is no god! It is the order of Allāh.' Thereupon al-Ḥārith turned back towards his riding camel, and he was saying: 'O Allāh! If this is the truth from Thee, then rain upon us stones from heaven or inflict on us a painful punishment.' So he had not yet reached his camel when Allāh struck him with a stone, it fell on his head and came out from his rear; and Allāh revealed: One demanding (person) demanded the chastisement which must befall the unbelievers – there is none to avert it [70:1-2]."

The author says: The author of al-Manār after quoting this ḥadīth has commented as follows:-

"This tradition is forged; and this sūrah of al-Maʻārij (ch.70) is of Meccan period; and the saying of some unbelievers of the Quraysh ("O Allāh! If this is the truth from Thee, . . .") which Allāh has quoted [in 8:32] was a reminder of what they had said before hijrah. That reminder is in the sūrah of al-Anfãl (ch.8) which was revealed after the battle of Badr, years before the revelation of "The Table"; while this tradition apparently shows that al-Ḥãrith ibn an-Nu‘mãn was a Muslim and then he apostatized, but he is not known as a companion. al-Abṭaḥ is in Mecca, and the Prophet (s.a.w.) did not return from Ghadīr Khumm to Mecca, as he had come down at Ghadīr when he was returning to Medina after the Last Pilgrimage."

You may clearly see how arbitrarily he has pontificated. [Let us look at it, sentence by sentence]:

al-Manãr: "This tradition is forged; and this chapter of al-Ma‘ãrij is of Meccan period."

COMMENT: This claim relies on some traditions narrated from Ibn ‘Abbãs and Ibn az-Zubayr that the chapter of al-Ma‘ãrij was revealed at Mecca. Would that I knew why those traditions should be given preference over this tradition, because both of them are khabaru 'l-wãḥid (solitary tradition).

Let us accept that this chapter is of Meccan period, as the theme of most of its verses support it. Yet what is the proof that all its verses were revealed at Mecca? May be the chapter was Meccan but these two verses were non-Meccan. For example, this chapter "The Table" is of Medina period which was revealed during the last days of the Mess-enger of Allãh (may Allãh bless him and his progeny!), and in this Medinan chapter, the verse under discussion (O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord . . .) has been placed, which, many exegetes insist, was revealed at Mecca in the early days of the Mission. Thus, if a Meccan verse (O Messenger! Deliver . . .) can be placed in a Madinan chapter, "The Table", why cannot a Madinan verse (One demanding (person) demanded . . .) be put in a Meccan chapter, al-Ma‘ãrij?

al-Manar: And the saying of some unbelievers of the Quraysh . . .:

COMMENT: It is not less than the preceding sentence in arbitrariness. Even if we accept that the chapter of al-Anfãl was revealed several years before the chapter of "The Table" is there any reason to say that at the time of compilation some later revealed verses could not be placed in it. For example, the verses of usury and the verse: And fear the day in which you shall be returned to Allãh; . . . (2:281), (which according to them were the last verses revealed to the Prophet, s.a.w.a.), were placed in the chapter of "The Cow" (which was revealed in the early days of hijrah several years before those verses).

al-Manār: The quotation of the saying of some unbelievers of the Quraysh (O Allāh! If this is the truth from Thee, . . .) was a reminder of what they had said before hijrah:

COMMENT: It is another arbitrary statement for which there is no proof at all – if we do not say that the context proves the opposite. Those who understand the style of literature cannot entertain any doubt that the words: O Allāh! If this is the truth from Thee, then rain upon us stones from heaven or inflict on us a painful punishment, were not uttered by an idolater polytheist. This verse contains a demonstra-tive pronoun strengthened with a detached pronoun, then the word "the truth" which has been turned into a proper noun by addition of al (اَلْ = the), and the clause: from Thee, all these factors show that, far from being the talk of an idolator who mocks the truth and takes it as a joke, it is the speech of the one who believes in Allāh's Lordship and knows that the truthful affairs are decided by Him, and the laws are sent by Him. But he is not sure about a matter, which is attributed to Allāh, and a claimant says that it is the Truth – to the exclusion of all other things – nevertheless he finds himself unable to accept it. At this stage he curses himself invoking Allāh's wrath on himself, as is done by someone who is wearied and tired of life.

al-Manār: This tradition apparently shows that al-Ḥārith ibn an-Nu‘mān was a Muslim and then he apostatized; but he is not known as a companion:

COMMENT: Again the same arbitrary attitude! Can anyone claim that the Muslims had recorded the names of all those who had seen the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and believed in him? Or of those who believed and then went out of Islam? And if they need any proof, then this tradition may be treated as the proof of this man's companionship.

al-Manār: al-Abṭaḥ is in Mecca, and the Prophet (s.a.w.) did not return from Ghadīr Khumm to Mecca.

COMMENT: It shows that he has taken the word, al-Abṭaḥ, as the name of a particular place in Mecca, instead of taking it in its general [or literal] meaning, as the word is used for any sandy place. But there is no proof to support his interpretation; rather the proof goes against it – and it is the narrative given in this tradition and other places.

There is a verse:

I was saved and al-Murādī (Ibn Muljam) had made his sword wet, from (the blood of) the son of Abū Ṭālib, the Chief of al-Abāṭiḥ.

It may be inferred from it that Mecca and its adjacent areas were called al-Abāṭiḥ.

It is written in Marāṣidu 'l-iṭṭilā': "Abṭaḥ = every riverbed containing smaller pebbles is called abṭaḥ. Ibn Durayd has said, 'al-Abṭaḥ and al-Baṭḥā' = soft ground spread out.' Abū Zayd has said, 'al-Abṭaḥ = sign of a riverbed, be it narrow or wide. al-Abṭaḥ is correlated to Mecca as well as to Minā because it is equidistant from both, and possibly it is nearer to Minā and it is al-Muḥaṣṣab, and it is Khīf Banī Kinānah; and it has also been said that it is Dhū Ṭuwā, but it is separate from it.'"

Apart from that, this very tradition has been narrated by other than ath-Tha'labī, and there is no mention of al-Abṭaḥ in it – this tradition is coming below from Majma'u 'l-bayān through the Sunnī chains and other books.

However, the tradition is a solitary one; it is neither mutawātir nor is it verified and confirmed by definite associations; and you have known from our previous discourses that we do not rely on solitary traditions in other than the rules of practical fiqh. It is in accordance with the general system of the intelligent persons on which man has based his life. Anyhow, the following discussion merely aims at show-ing the untenability of the proofs he has offered for the putetic forgery of this tradition.

[aṭ-Ṭabrisī] writes: Informed us as-Sayyid Abu 'l-Ḥamd; he said: narrated to us al-Ḥākim Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Ḥaskānī; he said: informed us Abū 'Abdillāh ash-Shīrāzī; he said: informed us Abū Bakr al-Jurjānī; he said: informed us Abū Aḥmad al-Baṣrī; he said: narrated to us Muḥammad ibn Sahl; he said: narrated to us Zayd ibn Ismā'īl Mawlā of al-Anṣār; he said: narrated to us Muḥammad ibn Ayyūb al-Wāsiṭī; he said: narrated to us Sufyān ibn 'Uyaynah, from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad aṣ-Ṣādiq, from his fathers, that he said, "When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), installed 'Alī on the day of Ghadīr Khumm (and) said, 'Whoever whose Master am I, this 'Alī is his Master,' and it reached (various) towns, so an-Nu'mān ibn al-Ḥārith al-Fihrī came to the Prophet and said, 'You ordered us from Allāh that we should bear witness that there is no god except Allāh and that you are the Messenger of Allāh; and you ordered us to fight (in the way of Allāh) and to perform ḥajj, and to fast, and to pray, and to pay zakāt; so we accepted it (all); yet you were not pleased until you have installed this youth, and you said, "Whoever whose Master am I, 'Alī is his Master." Now, is this thing from you or is it an order from Allāh, the High?' So (the Prophet) said, 'Certainly, by Allāh other than Whom there is no god! Indeed it is from Allāh.'

"Then an-Nu‘mān ibn al-Ḥārith turned away, and he was saying: 'O Allāh! If this is the truth from Thee, then rain upon us stones from heaven [. . .].' So Allāh struck a stone on his head and killed him. Then Allāh revealed: One demanding (person) demanded the chastisement which must befall. (Majma‘u 'l-bayān)

al-Ḥāfiẓ Abū Nu‘aym narrates a ḥadīth which he has ascribed to ‘Alī ibn ‘Āmir, from Abu 'l-Ḥajjāf, from al-A‘mash, from ‘Aṭiyyah that he said, "This verse was revealed to the Messenger of Allāh (may Allāh bless him and his progeny and send peace on them), about ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib*: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord*; and Allāh has said: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you and chosen for you Islam as religion." (Nuzūlu 'l-Qur’ān) al-Mālikī has said, "al-Imām Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Wāḥidī has narrated in his book, Asbābu 'n-nuzūl, ascribing it through his chain to Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī (may Allāh be pleased with him), that he said, 'This verse: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord, was revealed on the day of Ghadīr Khumm about ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib.'" (al-Fuṣūlu 'l-muhimmah)

The author says: And it has been narrated in Fatḥu 'l-Qadīr, from Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Ibn Marduwayh and Ibn ‘Asākir, from Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī; and likewise in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr.

ash-Shaykh Muḥyi 'd-Dīn an-Nawawī has explained the word Khumm as follows: "It is the name of a field, three miles from al-Juḥfah; in it is a well-known Ghadīr (غَدِيْر = pond) which is ascribed to this field."

Ibn Marduwayh has narrated from Ibn Mas‘ūd that he said, "We used to recite during the time of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.): O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord that ‘Alī is the Master of the believers, and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message; and Allāh will protect you from the people." (Fatḥu 'l-qadīr)

The author says: This is a small portion of the traditions, which show that, the verse: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord . . ., was revealed about ‘Alī on the day of Ghadīr Khumm. As for the ḥadīth of Ghadīr, (i.e. the Prophet's declaration:

'Whoever whose Master am I, ‘Alī is his Master'), it is a mutawãtir ḥadīth which has been narrated in Shī‘ah and Sunnī sources through more than a hundred chains.

It has been narrated from a great multitude of the companions, among them being al-Barã’ ibn ‘Ãzib, Zayd ibn Arqam, Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī, ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib, Salmãn al-Fãrisī, Abū Dharr al-Ghifãrī, ‘Ammãr ibn Yãsir, Buraydah, Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqāṣ, ‘Abdullãh ibn ‘Abbãs, Abū Hurayrah, Jãbir ibn ‘Abdillãh, Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī, Anas ibn Mãlik, ‘Imrãn ibn al-Ḥuṣayn, Ibn Abī Awfã, Su‘dãnah and the wife of Zayd ibn Arqam.

The Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) are all agreed on it; and ‘Alī (a.s.) had adjured the people by Allãh at the public square [of Kūfah] about this ḥadīth, and a group of the companions who were present there stood up and testified that they had heard the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) saying it on the day of Ghadīr.

Many of these traditions show that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.) said in his speech, inter alia: "O people! Don't you know that certainly I have more authority over the believers than they have themselves?" They said, "Certainly." He said, "Whoever whose Master am I, ‘Alī is his Master." These wordings are seen in many traditions narrated by Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal in his Musnad, and by others. The Sunnīs and the Shī‘ahs both have compiled many books especially to enumerate the chains of the tradition and to discuss and comment on its text; and they have done full justice to it which has not left any room for further elaboration.[8] al-Ḥamawaynī narrates through his chain from Abū Hurayrah that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), said, 'The night when I was taken to the seventh heaven, I heard a voice from under the Throne: "Verily ‘Alī is the sign of guidance and beloved of him who believes in Me; convey (it) to ‘Alī." When the Prophet (s.a.w.) descended from the heaven, he was made to forget it. Then Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, revealed (to him): O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord; and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message; and Allãh will protect you from the people; surely Allãh will not guide the unbelieving people.'" (Farãidu 's-simṭayn)

Ibn Abī Ḥãtim has narrated from Jãbir ibn ‘Abdillãh that he said,

[8] For a concise yet comprehensive review of the ḥadīth of Ghadīr, see my book, Imãmate, published by WOFIS, Tehran, 1985/1405, pp.62-81. (tr.)

"When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), fought Banū Anmãr, he came down at Dhãtu 'r-Raqī‘ in the higher part of the date orchard. So while he was sitting on the top of a well, dangling his feet (in it), al-Wãrith of Banu 'n-Najjãr, said, 'Indeed I'll certainly kill Muḥammad.' His companions said, 'How will you kill him?' He said, 'I'll tell him: "Give me your sword"; and when he will give me it I'll kill him with it.' So he came to him and said, 'O Muḥammad! Give me your sword, so that I may smell it.' So he gave it to him. But his hand trembled un-til the sword fell down from his hand. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) said, 'Allãh intervened between you and what you had intended.' Then Allãh revealed: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord . . ." (Fatḥu 'l-qadīr).

The author says: After the above, ash-Shawkãnī has written in Fatḥu 'l-qadīr: "Ibn Ḥibbãn has narrated it in his aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ. Also Ibn Marduwayh has narrated from Abū Hurayrah nearly the same story without giving the man's name; and Ibn Jarīr has narrated likewise from Muḥammad ibn Ka‘b al-Qaraẓī; and the story of Ghawrath ibn al-Ḥãrith is written in aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, and it is famous and well-known." However, the problem here is to fit the story on the theme of this verse – and it will never fit on it.

It is narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr and Fatḥu 'l-qadīr, etc. from Ibn Marduwayh and aḍ-Ḍiyã’ in al-Mukhtãrah, from Ibn ‘Abbãs that he said, "Verily the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), was asked, 'Which of the verses sent down from the heaven was the hardest for you?' He said, 'I was in Minã during the ḥajj period; and gathered there – in those days – the polytheists of Arabia and other people. Then Jibrīl brought to me and said: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you . . .' (The Prophet) said, 'Then I stood near the mountain-pass and called out, "O people! Who will help me in delivering the message of my Lord, and he shall enter the Garden? O people! Say: 'There is no god except Allãh and I am Allãh's Messenger to you', (and) you will be successful and will prosper, and you shall get the Garden."'

"(The Prophet) said, 'Then there was not any man, woman or child, but they were hurling earth and stone (at me) and spitting on my face and saying, "The Liar, the Ṣãbian." Then someone appeared before me and said, "O Muḥammad! If you are the Messenger, then the time has come for you to curse them, as Nūḥ had invoked against his people to annihilate them." But the Prophet (s.a.w.) said, "O Allãh! Guide my people, because they do not know."'

"Then his uncle, ‘Abbãs, came and rescued him from them and removed them from him."

The author says: The complete verse does not fit on this story, as you have known its details. However, if it is taken to mean that only a part of the verse (O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord) was revealed on that occasion it could be tenable. But the tradition apparently rejects this view. And the same is the position of the following traditions:

It is written in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr and Fatḥu 'l-qadīr. ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim and Abu 'sh-Shaykh have narrated from Mujãhid that he said, "When the verse: Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord, was revealed, (the Prophet) said, 'O my Lord! I'm but one, how should I do it? The people will combine together again me.' Then it was revealed: and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message."

The same two books narrate from al-Ḥasan, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), said, 'Verily Allãh sent me with His message, and I felt uneasy about it, and I knew that the people would accuse me of lying. Then (Allãh) promised me that I must deliver (it) or He would punish me; so He revealed: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord.'"

The author says: These two traditions, in addition to being maqṭū‘ and mursal, have the same defect as the preceding one – that they do not fit the theme of the verse. Similar is the condition of some traditions saying that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to keep guards for himself; but when this verse was revealed he let them disperse and said, "Verily my Lord has promised to protect me."

Tafsīru 'l-manãr says: It has been narrated by those exegetes who base their exegesis on tradition, as well as by at-Tirmidhī, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, al-Ḥãkim, Abū Nu‘aym, al-Bayhaqī and aṭ-Ṭabarãnī from several companions that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to keep guards in Mecca before revelation of this verse; when it was revealed, he dis-carded them; and Abū Ṭãlib was the first person to manage his guarding; and ‘Abbãs too used to guard him.

Also, it is written therein: Among the traditions on this subject, it is narrated from Jãbir and Ibn ‘Abbãs that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to keep guards, and his uncle, Abū Ṭālib, used to send with him everyday some men from Banū Hāshim (for protection), until this verse was revealed; then he said, "O Uncle! Verily Allāh has given me protection. (Now), I have no need of anyone to be sent (with me)."

The author says: These two traditions, as you see, show that the verse was revealed in the middle of the Prophet's stay at Mecca. They imply that he (s.a.w.a.) conveyed for sometime his message, but then he felt unable to bear the people's offensives and their denials of his veracity, until he feared that they would kill him. So he abandoned the delivery of the Message and the Divine Call. Then he was ordered again to engage in the Call, and Allāh threatened him if he neglected it, and also promised to protect him, then he began the noble work the second time. But the Prophet's dignity and sanctity totally rejects such an idea.

Also, ad-Durru 'l-manthūr and Fatḥu 'l-qadīr have reported: ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, at-Tirmidhī, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, al-Ḥākim and Ibn Marduwayh as well as Abū Nuʻaym and al-Bayhaqī (both in ad-Dalāil) have narrated from ʻĀishah that she said, "The Messenger of Allāh used to keep guards until the verse: and Allāh will protect you from the people, was revealed. So he stuck his head out of the cupola and said, 'O people! Go away (now) because Allāh has (promised to) protect me.'"

The author says: As you see, the tradition apparently shows that the verse was revealed at Medina.

aṭ-Ṭabarī narrates in his at-Tafsīr from Ibn ʻAbbās in explana-tion of: and if you do it not, then you have not delivered His message, that it means: "If you hide a verse out of what has been revealed to you, then you have not delivered His message."

The author says: If this refers to a particular verse – a particu-lar order – that was revealed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), then it may be treated as correct. But if it means a threat concerning any unspecified verse or order, then you have seen earlier that the verse does not fit such interpretation.

Say: "O People of the Book! You have no ground to stand upon until you keep up the Tawrāt and the Injīl and that which is revealed to you from your Lord"; and surely that which has been revealed to you from your Lord shall make many of them increase in inordinacy and unbelief; grieve not therefore for the unbelieving people (68). Surely those who believe and those who are Jews and the Sabaeans and the Christians whoever believes in Allāh and the Last Day and does good – they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve (69). Certainly We made a covenant with the Children of Israel and We sent to them mess-engers; whenever there came to them a messenger with what their souls did not desire, some (of them) did they call liars and some they used to slay (70). And they thought that there would be no affliction, so they became blind and deaf; then Allāh turned to them mercifully, but (again) many of them became blind and deaf; and Allāh is well seeing what they do (71). Certainly they disbelieve who say: "Surely Allāh, He is the Messiah, son of Mary"; and the Messiah said: "O Children of Israel! Worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord. Surely whoever associates (others) with Allāh, then Allāh has forbidden to him the garden, and his abode is the Fire; and there shall be no helpers for the unjust" (72). Certainly they disbelieve who say: "Surely Allāh is the third of the three"; and there is no god but the one God, and if they desist not from what they say, a painful chastisement shall befall those among them who disbelieve (73). Will they not then turn to Allāh and ask His forgiveness? And Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful (74). The Messiah, son of Mary is but a messenger; messengers before him have indeed passed away; and his mother was a truthful woman; they both used to eat food. See how We make the signs clear to them, then behold, how they are turned away (75). Say: "Do you worship besides Allāh that which does not control for you any harm or any profit? And Allāh – He is the Hearing, the knowing." (76). Say: "O People of the Book! Be not unduly immoderate in your religion, and do not follow the low desires of people who went astray before and led many astray and went astray from the right path" (77). Those who disbelieved from among the Children of Israel were cursed by the tongue of Dāwūd and ʿĪsā, son of Maryam; this was because they disobeyed and used to exceed the limit (78). They used not to forbid each other the hateful things (which) they did; certainly evil was that which they did (79). You will see many of them befriending those who disbelieve; certainly evil is that which their souls have sent before for them, that Allãh became displeased with them and in chastisement shall they abide (80). And had they believed in Allãh and the Prophet and what was revealed to him, they would not have taken them for friends, but most of them are trans-gressors (81). Certainly you will find the most violent of people in enmity for those who believe (to be) the Jews and those who are polytheists, and you will certainly find the nearest in friend-ship to those who believe (to be) those who say: "We are Christians"; this is because there are priests and monks among them and because they do not behave proudly (82). And when they hear what has been revealed to the Messenger, you will see their eyes over-flowing with tears on account of the truth that they recognize; they say: "Our Lord! We believe, so write us down with the witnesses (of truth) (83). And what (reason) have we that we should not believe in Allãh and in the truth that has come to us, while we earnestly desire that our Lord should cause us to enter with the good people?" (84). Therefore Allãh rewarded them on account of what they said, with gardens in which rivers flow to abide in them; and this is the reward of those who do good (85). And (as for) those who disbelieve and reject Our signs, these are the companions of the flame (86).

The verses in themselves are inter-linked and appear to be in the same context. But they are not connected with the verse: And if they had kept up the Tawrãt and the Injīl . . . (5:66) even if we do not look at the verse: O Messenger! Deliver what has been revealed to you from your Lord; (5:67). As for the connection of the verse 5:67, you have known its details.

It is more likely that these verses run on the same track which is used by the preceding verses from the beginning of the chapter upto this point. Look at the theme of the verse 5:12 (And certainly Allãh made a covenant with the Children of Israel . . .) upto the end of the verses under discussion, and you will see that, except for a few inter-vening verses like those of wilãyah and tablīgh, etc.; all deal with the affairs of the People of the Book; and the same is the topic of the following verses upto the end of the chapter.

QUR'ÃN: Say: O People of the Book! You have no ground to stand upon until you keep up the Tawrãt and the Injīl . . .*: It is a common experience of human beings that when they want to perform a labori-ous and hard work that requires the use of utmost strength, they let their bodies or organs rely on some firmly fixed things. For example, if a man wants to pull a heavy thing, or to push, or remove it, or to carry it or make it stand, he firmly puts his feet on earth and then begins the work he has to do. He knows that if his feet are not firmly held by some strong surface, he will not be able to do his work.

If we apply the same principle in immaterial affairs, e.g., man's spiritual activities, or psychological affairs, it would indicate that per-formance of great activities and prodigious deeds depends on a spiri-tual base, strong psychological foundation; i.e. such actions depend on patience, firmness, high ambition and strong will-power. Likewise, man can succeed in his dealings with Allãh only through true piety and desistence from forbidden things.

All this shows that the clause: "you have no ground to stand upon" [lit. you are not on anything], alludes to the fact that they do not rely on a thing which would keep their feet firmly in place, in order that they could keep up the Tawrãt and the Injīl and what has been revealed to them from their Lord. It signals that Allãh's religion and His commands are a heavy burden which man cannot easily pick up or bear on his shoulders without depending on a firm foundation and surface; he cannot keep the religion up merely by his desire. Allãh has pointed to this heavy burden in relation to the noble Qur'ãn: Surely We will send down to you a weighty word. (73:5); Had We sent down this Qur'ãn on a mountain, you would certainly have seen it falling down, splitting asunder because of the fear of Allãh, and We set forth these parables to men that they may reflect. (59:21); Surely We offered the trust to the heavens and the earth and the mountains, but they refused to bear it, and were afraid thereof; and man undertook it, verily he was unjust ignorant (33:72).

And He says in relation to the Tawrãt, addressing Mūsã: . . . so take hold of it with firmness and enjoin your people to take hold of what is best thereof; . . . (7:145).

And says addressing the Children of Israel: . . . Take hold of what We have given you with firmness . . . (2:63).

And He says addressing Yaḥyã: O Yaḥyã! Take hold of the Book with strength. (19:12)

The verse in short says that you do not have anything to rely upon in your desire to keep up the religion of Allãh, which He has revealed to you in His Books. You could get that support if you practise piety, return to Him repeatedly through repentance time and again, hold fast to His cord, and rely on His pillar. But your attitude is contrary to it; you haughtily turn away from His worship and transgress His limits.

The same meaning appears from the verse: He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ, and that which We have revealed to you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrãhīm and Mūsã and ʻĪsã, (42:13). It makes it clear that the sum total of religion is what is mentioned in these words. Then it is followed by the admoni-tion: that keep up the religion and be not divided therein. It puts em-phasis on unity and warns them of division and disunity. Then the verse says: hard to the polytheists is that which you call them to. It is because they do not like to see you united; it is hard for them to see you firm in obedience to religious commands. Then Allãh further says: Allãh chooses for Himself whom He pleases, and guides to Himself him who turns (to Him) frequently. It declares that keeping up the religion is not feasible without guidance from Allãh. Only such a person is capable of doing it who repents to Allãh, holds to His cord fast without breaking it, and returns to Him again and again. Then Allãh says: And they did not become divided until after the knowledge had come to them, out of rivalry among themselves (42:14). It shows that the only reason of their division and disunity and of their not keeping up to religion is their rivalry and envy and their transgressing the via media laid down for them.

Allãh likewise mentions this factor in similar verses: Then set your face upright for religion in natural devotion (to truth), the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; there is no altering of Allãh's creation; that is the right religion, but most people do not know – turning to Him, and be careful of (your duty to) Him, and keep up prayer and be not of the polytheists, of those who divided their religion and became sects; every party rejoicing in what they had with them (30:30-32). This too clearly says that the means of keeping up the natural religion is to return to Allãh and keeping the cord intact which attaches him to the divine presence, and not letting that cord be cut or severed at all.

He had pointed to this reality in the verses preceding these verses under discussion, where He had mentioned that Allāh had cursed the Jews and was displeased with them because of their transgressing His limits; consequently He put enmity and hatred among them. Also, He has mentioned this theme particularly about the Christians in another context as He said in this verse: . . . therefore We excited among them enmity and hatred to the Day of Resurrection; . . . (5:14).

Allāh had warned the Muslims of similar painful affliction that was to fall down on the People of the Book – the Jews and the Chris-tians. He informed them that they shall never be able to keep up the Tawrāt and the Injīl and what was revealed to them from their Lord. History testifies that what the Qur'ān had foretold, has actually taken place. They are divided into untold denominations and their mutual enmity and hatred goes on unabated. So, Allāh warned the Muslim ummah lest they follow in their track and their relation with Allāh be severed and they do not return to Allāh, as He said in the verse: Then set your face upright for religion in natural devotion . . . [30:30], among many other verses in the same chapter 30.

We have elaborated on various verses of this theme in previous volumes of this book, and, God willing, some other verses will be explained in coming volumes.

As for the divine word: "and surely that which has been revealed to you from your Lord shall make many of them increase in inordinacy and disbelief;" its explanation has already been given before. The clause: "grieve not therefore for the unbelieving people", aims at giving consolation to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in the form of prohibition.

QUR'ĀN: Surely those who believe and those who are Jews and the Sabaeans and the Christians . . .*: Apparently, the word aṣ-ṣābiūn (اَلصَّابِئُون) in nominative case, is in conjunction with "those who believe". A group of grammarians says that the subject of inna (إِنَّ = Surely) [in this instance: those who believe] cannot be placed in conjunction with another word of nominative case before its predicate is mentioned. But this verse disproves their view.

The verse aims at explaining that so far as the ultimate happi-ness is concerned, nomenclatures and titles have no effect on it. A group is called believers, another is named Jews, a third is labelled Sabaeans, and a fourth is branded Christians. But none of the titles will be of any benefit before Allãh; the only quality needed is the belief in Allãh, the Last Day and good deeds.

In the first volume of this book, detailed discussion of this topic has been given[9] under the verse 62 of chapter 2.

QUR'ÃN: Certainly We made a covenant with the Children of Israel and We sent to them messengers; whenever there came to them a messenger with what their souls did not desire, some (of them) did they call liars and some they used to slay: This and the following verses describe the condition of the People of the Book, as a proof of what has been said in the preceding verse: O People of the Book! You have no ground to stand upon until you keep up the Tawrãt . . . It is because the crimes and sins committed by them (as mentioned in the verse under discussion) have cut asunder any connection that they might have had with their Lord; consequently they are not in a posi-tion to keep up the Books of Allãh or to rely on them.

Another possibility: The verses may be connected with the preceding one (Surely those who believe and those who are Jews and the Sabaeans and the Christians . . .). Accordingly, it would confirm that the names and titles would not avail anyone at all in the matter of actual bliss and happiness; had it been of any benefit it would have prevented them from slaying the prophets and calling them liars, and would have protected them from perils of mischief and hazards of sins.

Also, possibly these verses may be taken as an elaboration of the verse: Surely those who believe and those who are Jews and the Sabaeans and the Christians . . ., which in its turn could be an elaboration of the verse: O People of the Book! You have no ground to stand upon . . . The meaning is clear.

The clauses: "some (of them) did they call liars and some they used to slay." Obviously, the words "some" in both clauses are the objects of the verbs coming after them. These objects have been put before their verbs to show their importance. The sentences in normal sequence will be as follows: they did call some of them liars and used to slay some others. The whole phrase completes the preceding clause: "whenever there came to them a messenger . . ." The meaning is as follows: Whenever there came to them a messenger with what their hearts did not like or desire, they stood against him haughtily and rejected his call; they dealt with the messengers, sent to them, in two ways: some of them they called liars and some others they used to kill.

[aṭ-Ṭabrisī] writes in Majma'u 'l-bayān: "If it is asked: 'Why did Allāh put a future tense in conjunction with a past tense, [as the clauses should literally be translated as follows], some of them did they call liars and some they will slay?' Then the reply is as follows: 'This style was used to show that it is their confirmed habit; it actually means: They called them liars and killed them and will call others liars and kill them. Apart from that, yaqtulūn (يَقْتُلُوْنْ = they will slay) comes at the end of the verse and therefore it was necessary to make it rhyme to other such endings.'"

QUR'ĀN: And they thought that there would be no affliction, so they became blind and deaf*: It completes the topic of the preceding verse. al-Ḥusbān (اَلْحُسْبَان = reckoning, thinking); al-fitnah (اَلْفِتْنَة = an ordeal that beguiles a man, or evil and tribulation in general); al-'amā (اَلْعَمَى = blindness; here it indicates not seeing the truth, not differentiating between good and evil). aṣ-Ṣamam (اَلصَمَم = deafness; here it means not listening to admonition, indifference to good advice). This blind-ness and deafness have been caused by their delusion that there would be no affliction; and apparently that delusion had emanated from their vanity and conceit that they had a special status before Allāh because they were from the seed of Israel, and they were sons and beloveds of Allāh. Therefore, no evil would fall to them no matter what they did and what they indulged in.

The meaning of the verse then is as follows – and Allāh knows better: They, because of their vanity that they enjoyed the prestige of Jewishness, thought that they would not be afflicted by any evil, and would not be put on trial no matter what they did; this thought and delusion blinded their eyes – so they cannot see the truth – and deafened their ears – so they cannot listen to their Prophets' call which would have benefited them.

This interpretation favours what we have said earlier that these verses are a sort of proof of the verse: Surely those who believe and those who are Jews . . . It shows in short that names and titles are not to avail anyone anything. Look at these Jews who thought that they had a special prestige because they were Jews; yet this delusion did not do them any good, rather it made them blind and deaf and led them to perils of destruction and tribulation when they called the Prophets of Allāh liars and murdered them.

QUR'ÃN: then Allãh turned to them mercifully, but (again) many of them became blind and deaf; and Allãh is well seeing what they do: [As explained in Eng. vol.8, at-tawbah means to return. When a servant of Allãh repents from his sin, he returns to Allãh seeking forgiveness, and] when Allãh accepts that repentance, He returns to the servant with mercy. It shows that Allãh had removed them away from His mercy and care, and therefore they got involved in that delusion which resulted in their blindness and deafness. But Allãh turned to them second time accepting their repentance, and they were freed from that delusion and their eyes and ears were cured of that blindness and deafness respect-ively. Then they recognized themselves, knew that they were servants of Allãh and they had no prestige or status except through piety. So they saw the truth, and listened to divine admonition delivered by the tongues of the Prophets. Thus, they realized that mere names and titles would never bring any benefit to anyone.

Again many of them became blind and deaf.

Allãh has ascribed blindness and deafness first to the whole group and then to many of them. It is based on justice in speech.

First: It shows that the ascription of blindness and deafness to the whole group uses the style of attaching the majority's attribute to the whole, because in reality only majority, and not the whole group, has this attribute.

Second: It however indicates that the said blindness and deafness had covered the whole group in the beginning.

Third: It shows that Allãh's turning to them with mercy was not in vein, and had not passed away without benefit, without any effect. Rather some of them were saved through repentance, and that is why that minority had remained immune from the blindness and deafness that had affected the majority second time.

Allãh ends the verse on the clause: "and Allãh is well seeing what they do"; it proves that nothing can make Allãh oblivious of realities. When persons, other than Allãh, bestow an honour to a group, it puts a veil on their eyes, which prevents them from seeing any defect or drawback in that group. But Allãh is not like that; He is the All-Seeing; He sees all aspects and facets; an outward appearance does not hide other iner layers from Him.

QUR'ĀN: Certainly they disbelieve who say: "Surely Allāh, He is the Messiah, son of Mary": It further explains that the Christians did not get any benefit from calling themselves Christians and tracing their origin to the Christ; as in spite of these factors, they were counted as disbelievers, because they ascribed partners to Allāh and did not believe in Him in true sense, when they said: Surely Allāh is the Christ, son of Mary.

The Christians have differed among themselves in explaining as to how the Christ comprises the essence of divinity. Some say that the Person of the Christ (i.e. the knowledge) had branched out from the Person of the Lord (i.e. the life); and this is the meaning of one of them being the Father, and the other being the Son. Some others say that the Lord was transformed and changed into the Christ. A third group says that the Lord became incarnate in the Christ. We have described this topic in detail while writing about ʻĪsā, son of Maryam, in the chapter of "The House of ʻImrān", in the third volume of our book.[10]

However, each of the three views fits this clause: "Certainly they disbelieve who say: 'Surely Allāh, He is the Messiah, son of Mary.'" Obviously therefore, all the Christians are included in this verdict of disbelief, because all believe in his divinity and have exceeded the limits. In short, this verse does not speak about those only who believe in incarnation.

The description of the Messiah as the son of Mary proves – or at least indicates – how and why they became disbelievers; it was because they believed in divinity of a man, son of a woman, both of whom were created from dust. How can dust become the Lord of Lords?

QUR'ĀN: and the Messiah said: "O Children of Israel! Worship Allāh, my Lord, and your Lord. Surely whoever associates (others) with Allāh, then Allāh has forbidden to him the garden, and his abode is the Fire; and there shall be no helpers for the unjust": This argument proves their disbelief and rebuts their view through the Messiah's own words. When he said: "Worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord," he clearly showed that he himself is a created servant like them and in the same way he needs a Lord Who would look after all his affairs and manage them. Then he said: "Surely whoever associ-ates (others) with Allāh, then Allāh has forbidden to him the garden"; thus he declared that whoever ascribes a partner to Allāh, he becomes a polytheist and the garden is forbidden to

Allãh quotes the Christ as saying: "then Allãh has forbidden to him the garden, and his abode is the Fire; and there shall be no helpers for the unjust." This quotation refutes what they say about atonement. They believe that the Christ atoned the Christians' sins by offering his own self as redemption and that is why he was crucified. The beliefs of atonement and crucifixion have assured them that all their sins are forgiven in advance. They are not obliged to follow the divine law, since they would go directly to the garden, and the fire will not touch them at all. (We have described all these things under the chapter of "The House of ‘Imrãn", in the above mentioned volume of our book.)

What the verse quotes ‘Īsã (a.s.) as saying may be seen in dif-ferent chapters of the Gospels, e.g. the order to believe in One God[11], refutation of polytheistic worship[12], and the declaration that the unjust people would abide in the Fire[13].

QUR’ÃN: Certainly they disbelieve who say: "Surely Allãh is the third of the three": That is, He is one of the three Persons: the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost; and He corresponds with each of the three. It intrinsically results from their saying that the Father is god, the Son is god and the Holy Ghost is god; and He is three and He is one. They try to give the example of the sentence: Verily Zayd son of ‘Amr is man. Now, there are three things in this statement: Zayd, son of ‘Amr and man, and at the same time there is only one person to whom all three attributes are applied. But they are oblivious of the fact that if this plurality were real (not based on a subjective approach), then the persons too should have been plural; and when the said person is in reality one, then the plurality would be based on the subjective ap-proach, and would never be real. It is beyond human understanding to imagine that Zayd combines in himself the real singularity and the real plurality at the same time.

And probably that is the reason why some Christian missionaries say that the trinity in which they believe, is an idea, which has come to them from the early fathers of the Church, and that it is a claim that cannot be proved through rational arguments or logic. They do not realize that it is incumbent on men to demand proof for any claim they hear, no matter whether it has reached them from their elders or from the coming generations.

QUR'ĀN: and there is no god but one God: It is a rebuttal of their saying that Allāh is the third of the three. It portrays that the Sublime Person of Allāh cannot accept or admit any plurality by any means. He is One in His Person; even when His noble adjectives are attrib-uted to Him, or His good names are ascribed to Him; it does not add anything to His One Person. Also when an adjective is added to an-other adjective, it does not create any numerousness or plurality in His Person. He is One Person and is not divisible at all – neither in reality nor in imagination or in reason. Allāh is not such as may be divided into such and such parts or ingredients; nor anything can be ascribed to Him that He could become two or more. How can it be? Because it is Allāh Who has made that thing which one wants to attach to Him in reality, imagination, or supposition.

Allāh, the High, is One in His Person. But it is not the numeri-cal oneness that the created things have and which gives rise to plu-rality and multitude. Nor is He subject to numerousness in His Person or name or adjective. How can it be? Because this numerical oneness, and the plurality which results from this unity, both are the effects of His making and His innovation. How then can He accept the attrib-utes, which He Himself has created?

The sentence: "and there is no god but one God", affirms the oneness of God with an emphasis and intensity not possible in other expressions: The sentence begins with negation followed by excep-tion, which in itself is sufficient for emphasis; then the preposition min (مِنْ = from) is added to the particle of negation which further empha-sizes all-inclusiveness of the statement. And lastly the clause: "one God", is used as common noun which denotes species of oneness; if it were used as proper noun, i.e. except the one God, it would not have expressed the intended essence of unity.

The meaning then is as follows: There does not exist in the genes of god any species except one God Whose Oneness does not accept any plurality at all – neither in person nor in attributes, neither in reality nor in supposition. If Allāh had said: There is no god but the One God, it would not have refuted the Christians' claim that "Allāh is the third of the three", because they do not deny His Unity; yet they say that He is one being which has three Persons, He is One although He is three in reality.

The Christians' supposition can be rebutted only when we prove the unity from which no plurality can be formed; and it is this unity which the Qur'ãn asserts in the sentence: "and there is no god but One God".

It is a very fine theme to which the divine Book eludes concern-ing the reality of unity; and we shall further discuss it thoroughly in a special Qur'ãnic Discussion, then in a Rational one followed by a Traditional one.

QUR'ÃN: and if they desist not from what they say, a painful chastise-ment shall befall those among them who disbelieve: Apparently, the verse threatens them with a painful chastisement of the hereafter.

It is a fact that the theory of Trinity (as contained in the sen-tence, Allãh is the third of the three) is beyond the understanding of general public. Most of the Christians receive it as a religious creed accepting its verbal formula without understanding, or hoping ever to understand, its meaning; and it is beyond the capacity of unimpaired reason to comprehend it properly. The mind places it side by side with other impossible suppositions, like a man who is no-man, a number that is neither one nor more, neither odd nor even. That is why the general Christian public accepts it without looking at its meaning. As for their expressions – God the Father, God the son – they take it as a matter of protocol. Such people, in fact, are not trinitarians; they merely utter the words and cling to it without thinking. But the position of their elite class is quite different. It is they whom Allãh says are responsible for creating discord in religion because of their internal rivalry. He says: . . . that keep up the religion and be not divided therein; . . . And they did not become divided until after the knowledge had come to them out of rivalry among themselves; . . . (42:13-14)

Accordingly, the real disbelief (which does not emanate from being deemed weak), which entails rejection of the belief in Unity of God and denial of divine communications, applies to some – not all – of them. And Allãh has addressed the threat of ever-lasting fire to only those who disbelieve and deny the divine communications, as He says: And (as to) those who disbelieve in, and deny Our signs, they are the inmates of the Fire, in it they shall abide (2:39). There are many such verses, and we have explained this topic fully under the verse 98 of the chapter 4.

Probably, that is why the verse under discussion threatens only a particular group, and not all, of the disbelievers.

Or it may be an indication that there were some Christians who did not believe in Trinity, and accepted Jesus Christ only as a servant of Allāh and His Messenger, as the history records about the Ethiopian Christians, for example.

The meaning: If the Christians do not desist from what they say [it ascribes the belief of some people to the whole community], then those among them who disbelieve [i.e., believe in Trinity] shall be afflicted with a painful chastisement.

Some exegetes have opined: The clause: "a painful chastisement shall befall those among them who disbelieve", uses the noun in place of pronoun; it wants to say "shall befall them", but has used "shall befall those among them", in order to show that such thought is disbelief, and that this disbelief has invited the threatened punishment.

COMMENT: There would have been no difficulty in agreeing with this opinion if the verse itself had not begun with the words: Certainly they disbelieve who say . . .

No less far-fetched is another opinion that the phrase: "those among them who disbelieve", actually means, those who disbelieve and they are these; it is a claim without proof.

QUR'ĀN: Will they not then turn to Allāh and ask His forgiveness? And Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful: It exhorts them to repent and seek Allāh's forgiveness and reminds them of His pardon and mercy. Alternatively, the question may stand for admonition, or for denial, i.e. they do not turn to Allāh nor do they seek His forgiveness.

QUR'ĀN: The Messiah, son of Mary is but a messenger; messengers before him have indeed passed away; and his mother was a truthful woman; they both used to eat food: It is a rebuttal of their claim that "Surely Allāh is the third of the three", or of this together with earlier mentioned claim that: "Surely Allāh, He is the Messiah, son of Mary". These claims are based on the belief that Messiah has got in him the essence of divinity. The verse under discussion proves that Messiah is not different from other messengers of Allāh, who had appeared before him and whom Allāh had given death. All of them, including Messiah, were human beings, mortals, who were sent by Allāh for guidance of mankind, and none of them was a Lord apart from Allāh. Likewise his mother, Maryam, was a truthful woman who attested to the truth of the divine signs – and she too was a mortal human being. Both Messiah and his mother used to eat food; and eating food with all that it entails, is words, based on the foundation of 'need.' 'Need' is the first sign of transience, and the 'needy' is something made and transient. In other Messiah was a transient, born of a transient; he was a servant and messenger of Allãh, born from his mother; both mother and son worshipped Allãh, and proceeded in their lives on the path of need and dependence – in short they were not Lords.

The Gospels accept the above reports. They clearly say that Maryam was a young lady who believed in, and worshipped, Allãh. They declare that Jesus was born of her, as a human from another human. They further assert that Allãh sent Jesus to the mankind not unlike all other messengers. Also, they make it clear that Jesus and his mother used to eat food. These are the phenomena, which the Gospels explicitly declare, and they prove that he was a servant and a messen-ger of Allãh.

Possibly the verse may be aiming at refuting the idea of divinity of Jesus and his mother both; because the verse: And when Allãh will say: "O ʻĪsã son of Maryam! Did you say to men, 'Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allãh?'" (5:116), clearly shows that there were some people at that time who believed in the divinity of Maryam too side by side with that of Jesus.

Or, the expression, taking Maryam for god, may have been used in the same meaning as in the verse [9:31], which says: They have taken their doctors of law and their monks for lords besides Allãh. It actually points to their total submission to their scholars in a manner, which reason and sharīʻah do not approve.

Be it as it may. The verse accordingly altogether refutes their belief that Jesus and his mother were lords, declaring that Jesus was only a messenger like other messengers, his mother was a truthful woman, both used to consume food; and all these facts speak against their divinity.

The clause: "the messengers before him have indeed passed away", reinforces the proof of his humanity, by pointing out that he is subject to life and death like other preceding messengers.

QUR'ÃN: See how We make the signs clear to them, then behold, how they are turned away: The verse is addressed to the Prophet (s.a. w.a.), and draws his attention to a strange phenomenon. See how Allãh offers the clearest explanation of the clearest proof that negates the Christians' claim of the Christ's divinity, and then see how they refuse to understand these proofs. How long will they turn a blind eye to this reality? How long will their intellect remain oblivious to the falsity of their claim?

QUR'ĀN: Say: "Do you worship besides Allāh that which does not control for you any harm, or any profit? And Allāh, He is the Hearing, the Knowing."*: Submission to the idea of Lordship was wide-spread among the mankind since the earliest days, and especially among the general public – that public worshipped idols, hoping that through that worship, the Lord would ward off evil from them and bring them benefits, as the historical researches of ancient eras have shown. So far as the worship of Allāh – because He is Allāh – was concerned, it was not found beyond a small circle of some chosen servants like the prophets and the divine scholars among their nations.

It is in this background that Allāh orders His Messenger (s.a.w.a.) to talk to them exactly as a simple man is talked to, who follows the dictates of his simple primitive nature regarding the divine worship. It is the same manner in which He had addressed the idol-worshippers. He reminds them that what had led the man to the divine worship was his awareness that Allāh holds the reins of good and evil, profit and harm in His hand; and man hopes to avoid harms and obtain benefits through the worship of Allāh.

And clearly nothing besides Allāh owns or controls any benefit or harm, because everything is owned by Allāh and has no power whatsoever of its own. Therefore, how can any such thing be selected for worship and joined with Allāh, the Lord, for submission? Allāh is the Owner of him and the others, and it was necessary that He (Allāh) should be worshipped exclusively, without extending this homage to others. It is only Allāh who hears and answers; He hears the call of the servant and answers it; it is He who is fully aware of the needs of His servants, and neither ignores it nor is confused in it contrary to what others do – because others own only that which Allāh gives into their possession, and can do only that which Allāh empowers them to do.

The above discourse has made it clear that:

First: The proof contained in this verse is quite separate from the one contained in the preceding verse [The Messiah, . . . is but a messenger, . . . and his mother was a truthful women; they both used to eat food], although both depend on a common premise, i.e. the Messiah and his mother both were transients and needy. The preceding verse, quoted in square brackets above, argues that they both were mortals, needy and obedient servants of Allāh, and anyone with such attributes cannot be a Lord or worthy of being worshipped. And the verse under discussion argues that the Messiah is a transient and needy person who himself is owned by Allãh, and has no control on any benefit or harm. And a person in this situation cannot be accepted as a Lord or worthy of worship.

Second: The argument is based on what a simple man expects from his acts of worship, because his only aim in accepting someone as his Lord, and in worshipping Him is to ward off possible harms and acquire possible gains. But the power to control harm and benefit belongs exclusively to Allãh. So why should anyone worship other than Allãh? It is essential that such submission and worship [i.e. to other than Allãh] be totally rejected.

Third: In the clause: "that which does not control for you any harm or any profit", the relative pronoun mã (مَا = that which) has been used, which is reserved for other than rational beings, even though the Messiah was a rational person. It is because the same proof is used against those who worship insensate things, like idol-worshippers; and the Messiah's rationality has no effect on the perfection of this proof – it is applicable against all "worshipped" things other than Allãh.

Moreover, the creatures (all things besides Allãh) even if they do have perception and understanding, do not possess that perception and understanding by their own power, nor do they own other aspects of their 'being'. Allãh says: Surely those whom you call on besides Allãh are in a state of subjugation, like yourselves; therefore call on them, then let them answer you if you are truthful. Have they feet with which they walk, or have they hands with which they strike, or have they eyes with which they see, or have they ears with which they hear? Say: "Call your associates, then make a struggle (to prevail) against me and give me no respite." (7:194-5)

In the clause: "any harm or any profit", harm precedes profit; this too follows the same pattern to which the simple primitive nature invites, as described above. Man by nature thinks that whatever bless-ings and benefits he has got are owned by him, are his to remain; he does not imagine that these benefits might be lost, and does not antici-pate the sorrow or pain that would follow that loss. But as for the harm which he presently experiences, and the benefits and blessings which are lost and he presently feels the pain of that loss, the nature alerts him to take refuge in a Lord Who would ward off that loss and harm, and would restore the lost blessings; as Allãh says: And when afflic-tion touches a man, he calls on Us, whether lying on his side or sitting or standing; but when We remove his affliction from him, he passes on as though he had never called on Us on account of an affliction that touched him; . . . (10:12). And if We make him taste mercy from Us after distress that has touched him, he would most certainly say: "This is of me . . ." (41:50). And when We show favour to man, he turns aside and withdraws himself; and when evil touches him, he makes lengthy supplications (41:51).

It all proves that a touch of affliction induces a man to submit to the Lord and worship him, rather more than gaining a profit does. That is why in the clause: "that which does not control for you any harm or any profit", 'harm' precedes 'profit'. The same reason applies to other similar expressions, like: And they have taken besides Him gods, who do not create anything while they are themselves created, and they control not for themselves any harm or profit, and they control not death, nor life, nor raising (the dead) to life (25:3).

Fourth: The complete verse: "Say: 'Do you worship besides Allãh . . . the Knowing'", proves that worship is exclusively reserved for Allãh, and none else should be joined with Him in it. This short verse actually contains two proofs: One, Submission to a God and worship-ping Him is resorted to for averting harm and acquiring benefit; as such, it is necessary that the worshipped God should control the harm and benefit. Therefore, it is not correct to worship one who has no control on anything. Two, only Allãh is the Hearing, Who answers the call of the distressed, and knows the true nature of his need; none other than Allãh has this attribute. Therefore, it is necessary to wor-ship Him exclusively, without joining others to Him.

QUR'ĀN: Say: "O People of the Book! Be not unduly immoderate in your religion*: Another call to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), ordering him to invite the People of the Book to abandon immoderation in their religion. The People of the Book, and especially the Christians, are entangled in it. al-Ghãlī (اَلْغَالِي = one who transgresses the limit, on the side of excess); its opposite is al-qãlī (اَلْقَالِي = one who does not reach the required goal). The divine religion, as explained by His revealed Books, orders the people to believe in one God Who has no partner, and forbids believing in any partner to Him. The People of the Book, the Jews, and the Christians in general, were afflicted with this desease, although the condition of the Christians was more ignominious and abominable. Allãh says: And the Jews say: "Ezra is the son of Allãh"; and the Christians say: "The Messiah is the son of Allãh"; these are the words of their mouths; they imitate the sayings of those who disbelieved before; may Allãh destroy them; how they are turned away! They have taken their doctors of law and their monks for lords besides Allãh, and (also) the Messiah son of Mary; and they were not enjoined but that they should worship one God only, there is no god but He; far from His glory be what they set up (with Him), (9:30-31).

Although the belief, that Ezra is the son of God, is apparently not found today in the Jewish community, but the verse testifies that such as belief was prevalent at the time of the Qur'ãnic revelation.

Apparently, son of God was an honorific title which they used for Ezra, in view of the valuable services he rendered and the good he did to them: He brought them back to Jerusalem after the Babylonian captivity; and rewrote the Torah after it was lost in the devastative attack of Nebuchanazzar. The Jews treated the sonship of God as an honorific title, in the same way as the Christians nowadays treat "fatherhood", as they call the Popes, bishops and priest Fathers – the word Pope itself means father. Allãh says: And the Jews and the Christians say: "We are the sons of Allãh and his beloved ones" (5:18). Further, the verse 9:31 quoted earlier (They have taken their doctors of law and their monks for lords besides Allãh, and (also) the Messiah son of Mary) indicates it, as it mentions only the Messiah, but not Ezra. It means that Ezra is included in the expression: their doctors of law and their monks. In other words they called Ezra the son of God in the same sense as they name their scholars and monks as sons of God. However, they chose to mention his name in particular because he had done much good to them, as described above.

In short, they had placed some of their prophets, scholars and monks on the throne of lordship, and submitted to them in a manner that is reserved exclusively for Allãh. It was their inordinacy in religion that Allãh forbids them here through his Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

The phrase: "unduly immoderate in your religion", if literally translated would be written as, immoderate without truth in your religion. In fact, immoderation is always without truth, it can never be with truth. Yet, here the Qur'ãn qualifies it with the word, unduly or with-out truth, in order to put emphasis on the prohibition of immoderation; and also to remind the hearer of a concomitant item with its principal – after all, he had forgotten or nearly forgotten this indespensibility when he indulged in inordinacy.

The reason does not reject the idea of using the word, father, for God, provided its meaning is purified of all material and physical defects and stigmas – if it is taken in the meaning of "One who has control on creation and upbringing." The same applies to the word, son, when used for God in its non-physical sense. But the sharī'ah strictly forbids use of these words for Allāh, because we are obliged to use only those names for Him, which He has approved. We cannot use self-invented names or titles for Him, because it would lead to corrup-tion and scandals. We have only to look at the Jews and the Christians – and especially the latter – to realize how much depravity they were afflicted with through the Church 'fathers' in all those long centuries. The things are not much better even today!

QUR'ĀN: and do not follow the low desires of people who went astray before and led many astray and went astray from the right path": Apparently the context shows that the people who went astray before and whose low desires were not to be followed, were the leaders whose opinions and orders were obeyed. They themselves went astray by holding fast to their views and opinions, and led many astray as others followed them. Thus, their going astray from the right path was the sum total of their going astray and leading astray – it was a compound error.

Also, the context shows that the people whose low desires were not to be followed were the idol-worshippers. The verse is addressed to the whole community of the People of the Book and not only to those who were contemporaries of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). So, it cannot be said that their later generations are here admonished not to follow their forefathers.

This interpretation is supported, rather it is proved, by the words of Allāh: And the Jews say: "Ezra is the son of Allāh"; and the Chris-tians say: "The Messiah is the son of Allāh"; these are the words of their months; they imitate the saying of those who disbelieved before (9:30).

This is then the historical fact as analysed by the Qur'ān. It indicates that the belief in divine fatherhood and sonship has infiltrated into People of the Book from the idol-worshippers who had passed before them. We have described in the third volume of this book (in chapter 3, story of Jesus, a.s.[14]) that this belief was prevalent among the Hindus and the Buddhists of India and China, as well as in ancient Egypt and other places. Then, gradually, it was brought into Christian community, clothed in religious dress by its religious leaders. The name remained monotheistic and the meaning became idolatrous.

QUR'ĀN: Those who disbelieved from among the Children of Israel

were cursed by the tongue of Dãwūd and 'Īsã son of Maryam; this was because they disobeyed and used to exceed the limit. They used not to forbid each other the hateful things (which) they did; certain-ly evil was that which they did: It reveals that their prophets cursed the disbelievers from among them. It adversely alludes to the Jews who were cursed by their own prophets, and it was because they exceeded the limit, and continued in this transgression generation after gener-ation. The words: "They used not to forbid . . . evil was that which they did", explain that transgression.

QUR'ÃN: You will see many of them befriending those who disbe-lieve; certainly evil is that which their souls have sent before for them, that Allãh became displeased with them and in chastisement shall they abide: It is a perceivable proof that they had exceeded the limit. If they had any respect for their religion, they would have adhered to it and not exceeded its limit. As a concomitant of that, it was necess-ary for them to befriend those who believe in one God, and avoid those who disbelieve. If a nation respects somethings and considers them sacred, and another group has animosity towards those things, this group would be an enemy of the nation. Now, if that nation befriends this group, it would mean that that nation had abandoned that thing which it hitherto considered sacred. And a friend of enemy is enemy. Then Allãh condemns them in these words: "certainly evil is that which their souls have sent before for them." It points to their befriending the disbelievers as because of their low desires. Consequently, its recom-pense was, "that Allãh became displeased with them and in chastise-ment shall they abide." The verse has put the recompense in place of action. It is as though their souls had sent for them the recompense by sending ahead the action.

QUR'ÃN: And had they believed in Allãh and the Prophet and what was revealed to him, they would not have taken them for friends, but most of them are transgressors: If these People of the Book had believed in Allãh and the Prophet Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and what was revealed to him; or if they had believed in their own prophet, e.g. Mūsã and what was revealed to him, i.e., the Torah, they would not have taken those disbelievers for friends, because Islam cuts asunder all worldly ties; but most of them are transgressors, recalcitrants from belief.

Some people have suggested another explanation: They have taken the pronouns in "they believed" and "them [for friends]", as refer-ring to "those who disbelieve" [in the preceding verse]. Accordingly, the meaning will be as follows: If those disbelievers, whom the People of the Book have taken for friends, had believed in Allāh, the Prophet Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and the Qur'ān, these People of the Book would not have taken them for friends. They have only befriended them because they disbelieve in the Prophet and the Qur'ān.

COMMENT: There is no difficulty in accepting this interpretation, but the end phrase: "but most of them are transgressors", does not agree with it.

QUR'ĀN: Certainly you will find the most violent of people in enmity for those who believe (to be) the Jews and those who are polytheists, and you will certainly find the nearest in friendship to those who believe (to be) those who say: "We are Christians": Allāh has described in the preceding verses the depravities found in the People of the Book in general, and some which apply to only a particular group among them, e.g., the saying of the Jews that the hand of Allāh is tied up; and the saying of the Christians that surely Allāh, He is the Messiah son of Mary. Now, He describes their attitude vis-à-vis the believers and Islam; and adds to it the attitude of the polytheists, in order to present a complete picture of the non-Muslim communities' mental disposition towards Islam, and how near or far they are from accepting it. Its sum-total is that the Christians are the nearest of all those groups in friendship to the Muslims and readier to listen to the call of the truth.

They have been counted as the nearest in friendship to the believers, because a group of them did believe in the Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.) as the next verse shows: And when they hear what has been revealed to the Messenger you will see their eyes overflowing with tears on account of the truth that they recognize; they say: "Our Lord! We believe, so write us down with the witnesses (of truth)." [5:83].

However, if acceptance of faith by a group can justify its ascription to the whole community, then the Jews and the polytheists too must be joined with the Christians in this matter, because a Jewish group led by ʻAbdullāh ibn Salām had entered into Islam, and so had a lot of the polytheists of Arabia – in fact, the latter formed the majority of the Muslims at that time. In this background, singling the Christians out for the praise contained in the above verse – to the exclusion of the Jews and polytheists – points to their sincere acceptance of the call of Islam, even when they had other options than entering into Islam: they could have opted to continue on their religion and pay jizyah, or to fight against Islam.

The case of the polytheists was totally different, because they had no alternative to acceptance of Islam [or to fight]. In this situation, the fact that the majority of Muslims had come from that group does not prove that they had entered into Islam sincerely. This is quite apart from the sufferings they inflicted upon the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the tortures they wreaked on Muslims.

Coming to the Jews, although they had the same alternatives as the Christians, and they could remain on their religion with payment of jizyah, yet they continued in their haughtiness, became harder in their bigotry, and turned to double dealing and deception. They broke their covenants, eagerly waited calamities to befall the Muslims and dealt to them bitterest deal.

The attitude the Christians had towards the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the Muslims, and their attraction to Islam; and also the enmity of the Jews and polytheists toward the divine religion and their sustained arrogance and bigotry, have continued exactly in the same manner even after the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Innumerable were the Christians who answered the call to Islam during the past centuries, while the number of the Jews and the polytheists was so insignificant. These unchanged characteristics in both groups confirm what the Mighty Book had indicated.

The verse: "Certainly you will find the most violent . . .", lays down a general all-inclusive principle, although it is addressed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) alone. It is the style used in many preceding verses: You will see many of them befriending those who disbelieve . . . (5:80); And you will see many of them striving with one another . . . (5:62). All these verses use the second person singular pronoun; but their connotation is general.

QUR'ÃN: this is because there are priests and monks among them and because they do not behave proudly: al-Qissīs (اَلْقِسِّيس = priest, clergyman); ar-ruhbãn (اَلرُّهْبَانُ) is plural of ar-rãhib (اَلرَّاهِبُ = monk), sometimes it is used as singular. ar-Rãghib has said: "ar-rahbah (اَلرَّهْبَة) and ar-ruhb (اَلرُّهْبُ) mean to fear with cautiousness . . . at-tarahhub (اَلتَّرَهُّب = devoutness); ar-ruhbãniyyah (اَلرُهْبَانِيَّة = excessive devotion based on extreme fear [of God]; monasticism). Allãh says: and (as for) monasticism, they innovated it [57:27]. ar-Ruhbãn is used both as a singular and a plural; those who take it as singular, make its plural ruhãbīn (رُهَابِيْن)."

Allãh has given three reasons for the Christians being the near-est in friendship to the believers, and of their geniality and cordiality towards the Muslims; these reasons are their exclusive attributes, which are not found in the Jews and the polytheists: (i) There are priests among them, (ii) and monks and ascetics, and (iii) they are not proud. These three are the keys to prepare them for felicity.

The felicity of religious life depends on good deeds, which emanate from knowledge. You may say that that felicity is achieved when one believes in the Truth and acts accordingly. He, first of all, needs knowledge in order to perceive the right of religion and it is the religion of truth. However, mere perception of truth is not enough to prepare him to act according to its dictates unless and until man removes from his soul the opposite factors, i.e. the arrogance which prevents him from submitting to truth, the bigotry, prejudice, and other such things. When man is armed with beneficial knowledge, and becomes ready to deal justly vis-à-vis the truth by discarding haughtiness and arrogance, then he is ready to submit to the truth by acting according to its demands – provided the environment is not incompatible to it, because compatibility of environment with action has great effect on that action. The activities, which are performed, by the society, where children grow up in that atmosphere; their sub-conscience forms a habit to go on doing it and it continues generation after generation. The conscious mind is not given a chance to think over it, to ponder or meditate as to how to get rid of that habit – even if he understands that the habit is harmful and against his felicity. The same is the case of good deeds and activities if they become deep-rooted in the society – it is extremely difficult to neglect them. That is why it is said that habit is second nature. Also it is because of this factor that when one intends to do something, which one does not like, it seems very diffi-cult to accomplish, but with each repetation its difficulty is decreased.

When a man, therefore, makes sure that a certain deed is correct and good, and removes from his soul the tendency of obstinacy and stubbornness by negating haughtiness, then it will be fully helpful to him if he sees another person doing that deed, as it would prove to him that the said deed is not beyond his own power.

This shows that the society will be ready to accept a truth if there are in it knowledgeable persons who know it and teach it, and there are people who act upon that truth, so that general public ascertains that the deed is not impossible and is really good, and finally the general public is accustomed to submit to the truth and not to be too proud to accept it when it appears before their eyes.

It is because of these factors that Allãh has said about Christians that they are nearer to accept the call of the true religion because they have their religious scholars and monks who do not behave proudly. Their scholars continue to teach them cognizance of truth and realities of religion – verbally. Their ascetics remind them the greatness of their Lord and the importance of their felicity in this world and the next – practically. And they do not have pride and haughtiness, which would prevent them from accepting the truth.

As for the Jews, they had their own scholars, no doubt; but they behaved proudly, and their arrogance and stubbornness did not let them be prepared for accepting the truth.

And as for the polytheists, they did not have any religious scholar or ascetics, and on top of that, they did behave arrogantly.

QUR'ÃN: And when they hear what has been revealed to the Messenger, you will see their eyes overflowing with tears on account of the truth that they recognize; they say: "Our Lord! We believe, so write us down with the witnesses (of truth): Eyes overflowing with tears i.e. shedding plentiful tears; min (مِنْ) in mina 'd-dam' (مِنَ الدَّمْعِ = with tears) denotes beginning; and in mimmã 'arafū (مِمَّا عَرَفُو = that they recognize) shows emergence; and in mina 'l-ḥaqq (مِنَ الْحَقِّ = of the truth) gives explanation.

QUR'ÃN: "And what (reason) have we that we should not believe in Allãh and in the truth that has come to us, while we earnestly desire that our Lord should cause us to enter with the good people?": The word, "cause us to enter", implies the meaning, put us/place us; that is why it is followed by the preposition ma' (مَعَ with).

The meaning: that our Lord should place us with the good people and include us among them.

The words and the deeds which Allãh has attributed to them prove what He has said about them that they are nearest in friendship to the believers, and ascertain that they possess beneficial knowledge and good deed and they surrender to the truth because there are among them priests and monks and they do not behave proudly.

QUR'ĀN: Therefore Allāh rewarded them on account of what they said, with gardens in which rivers flow to abide in them; and this is the reward of those who do good. And (as for) those who disbelieve and reject Our signs, these are the companions of the flame: al-Ithābah (اَلإِثَابَة = to reward). The first verse here describes, their reward, and the second one recompense of those who oppose them. Thus, all groups are dealt with.

TRADITIONS

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] narrates through his chain from ar-Riḍā (a.s.) from his forefathers from ʻAlī (a.s.) that the clause: they both used to eat food, means: "They both evacuated the bowels." (Maʻānī 'l-akhbār)

The author says: al-ʻAyyāshī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr.

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from Abū ʻUbaydah al-Ḥadhdhā' from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said about the word of Allāh: Those who disbelieved from among the Children of Israel were cursed by the tongue of Dāwūd and ʻĪsā, "Swines are [those who were cursed] by the tongue of Dāwūd, and monkeys by the tongue of ʻĪsā son of Maryam." (al-Kāfī)

The author says: Also, al-Qummī and al-ʻAyyāshī have nar-rated it from the same Imām (a.s.). The Sunnī traditions from Mujāhid and Qatādah, etc. narrate that monkeys were cursed by the tongue of Dāwūd and swines by the tongue of ʻĪsā son of Maryam; and some Shīʻah traditions agree with it, as will be seen later.

Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said: "As for Dāwūd, he cursed the people of Eilat, when they transgressed on their Sabbath day, and their trans-gression had occurred in his days. So he said, 'O Allāh! Dress them with curse like robe and like belt on waist.' So Allāh transformed them into monkeys. And as for ʻĪsā, he cursed those to whom the food was sent down and then they disbelieved." Then Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.), said, "They befriended tyrant kings and made their [i.e. kings'] desires fair seeming to them in order to get (a share) from their world." (Majmaʻu 'l-bayān)

The author says: The Qur'ān supports this report that the people of the Sabbath were transformed into monkeys. Allāh says: And certainly you have known those among you who exceeded the limits of the Sabbath, so We said to them: "Be apes, despised and hated" (2:65). And ask them about the town which stood by the sea; when they exceeded the limits of the Sabbath, when their fish came to them on the day of their Sabbath, appearing on the surface of the water, and on the day on which they did not keep the Sabbath they did not come to them; . . . And when a party of them said: "Why do you admonish a people whom Allãh would destroy or whom He would chastise with a severe chastisement?" They said: "To be free from blame before your Lord, and that haply they may guard (against evil)" . . . Therefore when they revoltingly persisted in what they had been forbidden, We said to them: "Be apes, despised and hated" (7:163-6).

ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, aṭ-Ṭabarãnī, and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Ibn Masʻūd that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), said, 'Verily whenever the Children of Israel committed a sin, their scholars forbade them (to do it) in rebuke, and then they sat with them and ate and drank with them as if they had not committed any sin yesterday. So when Allãh saw this conduct of theirs, He let discord to appear among them, and cursed them by the tongue of a prophet.' Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'By Allãh! You will most certainly enjoin the right and forbid the wrong; and you most certainly bend them to turn to truth; otherwise, Allãh will most certainly let discord appear among you, and will most certainly curse you as He had cursed them.'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd has narrated from Maʻãdh ibn Jabal that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Accept gift as long as it is gift; and if it is a bribe to divert you from your religion, then do not take it. But you shall never leave it – need and fear shall not let you avoid it. Surely the children of Gog have arrived. And certainly the handmill of Islam will soon start going round, so wherever the Qur'ãn revolves, you should revolve with it. It is about to happen that the worldly power and the Qur'ãn shall fight each other and separate. Surely soon you will get kings who will judge you according to one standard and judge themselves with another standard; if you would obey them they would lead you astray, and if you would disobey them they would kill you.'

"They (companions) said, 'How should we [behave] if we found that (era)?' He said, 'You should be like the companions of ʻĪsã. They were sawed with handsaws and hoisted on wood (i.e. crucified). Death in obedience (of Allãh) is better than life in disobedience. Surely the first defect that appeared in the Children of Israel was that they used to enjoin the good and forbid the evil, rebuking (the evil-doer), and then when one of them met the fellow whom he used to rebuke, he ate and drank with him as though he had not rebuked him for anything. So Allãh cursed them by the tongue of Dãwūd, and it was because they disobeyed and used to exceed the limit. (I swear) by Him in Whose hand my soul is! You should certainly enjoin what is good and forbid what is evil; otherwise Allãh will most certainly impose your evil ones as rulers over you, then your good ones will call (on Allãh) and their call will not be answered. (I swear) by Him in Whose hand my soul is! You should most certainly enjoin what is good and forbid what is evil, and you will most certainly take the hand of the unjust and twist it over him; otherwise Allãh will cause discord to appear among you.'" (ibid.)

Ibn Rãhwayh, al-Bukhãrī (in al-Waḥdãniyyãt), Ibnu 's-Sakan, Ibn Mandah, al-Bãwardī (in Ma'rifatu 's-ṣaḥãbah), aṭ-Ṭabarãnī, Abū Nu'aym, and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Ibn Abzī, from his father that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), delivered a sermon; he offered thanks to Allãh and praised Him; then he mentioned some groups of the Muslims and lauded them in good terms; there-after he said, 'What has happened to some people that they do not teach their neighbours and do not impart to them the knowledge of religion? Why they do not enjoin them (to do good) and do not forbid them (the evil)? And why is it that some people do not learn from their neighbours, and do not acquire religious knowledge and do not become knowledge-able? (I swear) by Him in Whose hand my soul is! They should most certainly teach their neighbours, or they should most certainly acquire religious knowledge, or they should most certainly become knowledge-able; otherwise I shall most certainly hasten to their chastisement in this world.'

"Thereafter he came down and entered his house. The compan-ions of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) said, 'Whom does he mean by this talk?' They said, 'We do not know whom does he mean by this talk except the tribe of Ash'arites. (They are) religious scholars, knowl-edgeable and they have neighbours, uncouth, ignorant.'

"Then a group of Ash'arites came together and visited the Prophet (s.a.w.). They said, 'You mentioned some groups of Muslims in good (terms) and mentioned us in bad (terms); so what should we do?' The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) said, 'You should most certainly teach your neighbours, and most certainly give them religious knowledge, and most certainly enjoin them and forbid them; otherwise I shall most certainly hasten to your chastisement in this world.' They said, 'O Mess-enger of Allãh! Give us one year's time; as in that one year we shall teach them and they shall learn.' So he gave them time of one year. Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) recited: Those who disbelieved from among the Children of Israel were cursed by the tongue of Dãwūd and ʻĪsã son of Maryam; this was because they disobeyed and used to exceed the limit. They used not to forbid each other the hateful things (which) they did; certainly evil was that which they did. (ibid.)

Muḥammad ibn al-Haytham at-Tamīmī narrates from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said about the word of Allãh, They used not to forbid each other the hateful things (which) they did; certainly evil was that which they did: "Well, they did not enter their places nor did they sit in their sessions; but when they met them, they showed glad-ness on seeing them and showed friendliness towards them." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

Marwãn narrates through some of his companions, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he described the Christians and their enmity (towards Muslims); then he mentioned the word of Allãh: that is because there are priests and monks among them and because they do not behave proudly, (and) said, "Those were the people who were between ʻĪsã and Muḥammad, (who) were awaiting coming of Muḥammad (s.a. w.a.)." (ibid.)

The author says: Apparently the verse is general and not restricted to a certain period. Probably, the tradition means that the praise is applied to them only as long as they did not change, exactly as the praise of the Muslims too is conditional to their not changing.

ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Saʻīd ibn Jubayr that he said explaining the word of Allãh: that is because there are priests and monks among them . . . "It refers to the messengers of Negus whom he sent with (news of) his Islam and that of his people; they were seventy persons whom he selected from among his nation, good ones. So good is in religious knowledge and age." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Another version says: He sent to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) thirty men from among his good companions. They came to him, and he recited before them the chapter of Yã-Sīn; so they wept when they heard the Qur'ãn and recognized that it was truth. Therefore, Allãh revealed about them: that is because there are priests and monks among them . . . Also it was revealed about them: (As to) those whom We gave the Book before it, they are believers in it. And when it is recited to them they say:

"We believe in it; surely it is the truth from our Lord; surely we were submitters before it." These shall be granted their reward twice . . . [28:52-54]. (ibid.)

Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Ibn ʻAbbās that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.), while in Mecca, was afraid of polytheists regarding his companions. So he sent Jaʻfar ibn Abī Ṭālib, Ibn Masʻūd and ʻUthmān ibn Maẓʻūn with a party of his companions to Negus, the king of Ethiopea. When the news reached the polytheists, they sent ʻAmr ibn al-ʻĀṣ with a group of theirs. It is said that they arrived at Negus' (court) before the com-panions of the Prophet (s.a.w.), and said, 'Indeed, has appeared among us a man who has declared as foolish the wisdom and aspirations of Quraysh; he thinks he is a prophet. He has sent a party to you in order to sabotage your nation against you; therefore, we liked to come to you and give you his report.'

"(Negus) said, 'If they came to me, I'll look into what they say.' When the companions of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.) arrived (there), they came to the gate of Negus and said [to the door-keeper], 'Take permission for the friends of Allāh.' (Negus) said, 'Give permission to them; welcome to the friends of Allāh.' When they came to him, they greeted him with salām. The group of the polytheists said, 'Do you not see, O King! That we have told you the truth, and they have not greeted you with the formula you are (usually) addressed with.' (The King) said to them (the Muslims): 'What has prevented you from greeting me with my (usual) greeting?' They said, 'We have greeted you with the greeting of the people of Garden, and the greeting of the angels.'

"Then he said to them, 'What does your companion say about ʻĪsā and his mother?' They said, 'He says, "A servant of Allāh and His Messenger; a word from Allāh and a spirit from Him which He sent to Maryam"; and he says about Maryam that she was a virgin, pure and untouched.' The King took up a (small) piece of wood from the earth and said, 'ʻĪsā and his mother were not more than what your com-panion says even to the extent of this wood.' The polytheist did not like his words and their faces underwent a change.

"Then (Negus) said, 'Would you recite something from what has been revealed to you?' They said, 'Yes.' He said, 'Then recite (it).' They began to recite. And there were around the King, priests, monks, and all other Christians. A group of the priests and monks [was so over-whelmed that] whenever they recited a verse, their (the Christians') eyes overflowed with tears because of what they recognized of the truth. Allāh says: this is because there are priests and monks among them and because they do not behave proudly. And when they hear what has been revealed to the Messenger, you will see their eyes over-flowing with tears on account of the truth that they recognize. (ibid.)

The author says: al-Qummī has narrated in his at-Tafsīr this event in a lengthy tradition, and it says at the end: [The envoys sent by Negus] returned to him and gave him the information about the Mess-enger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and recited to him what the Prophet had recited to them. So, Negus wept and the priests wept, then he became Muslim but did not disclose his Islam to the Ethiopeans, because he was afraid of them regarding his life. So he came out of Ethiopea proceeding to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); when he crossed the sea, he expired[15]. . . .

MEANING OF TAWḤĪD IN THE QUR'ÃN

A deep thinker on matters of general cognizance certainly recognizes that the subject of tawḥīd (monotheism, oneness of God) is the deepest of all problems. It is the most difficult to imagine and con-ceive, and most entangled to unravel, because it is highly above the general topics which human understanding grasps, and much beyond the common propositions which minds are familiar with.

Such a complicated subject is bound to be perceived in diverse ways by different minds, because of multiplicity of thinking which mankind is created with, as every individual has a separate body-construction, and this leads to diversity of the senses in their actions. This in its turn affects thought and understanding ranging from sharp intelligence to idiocy, from steadfastness to deviation. All this is generally accepted and no one has any doubt about it. The Qur'ãn has affirmed this difference and diversity in various places. Allãh says: Say: "Are those who know and those who do not know alike? Only those pos-sessed of understanding shall bear in mind (39:9). Therefore turn aside from him who turns his back upon Our reminder and does not desire anything but this world's life. That is the (last) reach of their knowl-edge; (53:29-30). . . . but what is the matter with these people that well-nigh they do not understand what is told (them)? (4:78). . . . See how we make the signs clear to them, then behold, how they are turned away (5:75).

[15] The story of Negus' journeying towards Mecca and dying on the way is not supported by history. (tr.)

A clear example of this difference in understanding is their difference in cognizance of the meaning of oneness of God. Although the human nature through its secret inspiration has united all men together in believing that there is a Creator, yet there is a great difference and vast chasm between one mind and the other in grasping its meaning.

Some people's intellect led them to idol-worship. He carves idols and statues from wood and stone, even from [flour,] cheese and clay made with urine of goats and sheep. Then he declares these to be part-ners and colleagues of God. He worships God exactly as he worships these idols, and asks God for his needs as he asks them, and shows devotion to Him as he does to them. It did not take him long to give precedence to those idols over God; he came closer to them and left Him; put all his needs in their hands and discarded Him.

Utmost that such a man can understand about the existence of God is what he does about his idols, which were made by himself or by another man like himself. That is why they ascribed to God the attribute of oneness in the same way as they did to each of their idols, and it was the oneness in number; one is a number from which other numbers are made. Allãh says: And they wonder that there has come to them a Warner from among themselves, and the disbelievers say: "This is an enchanter, a lier." What! Makes he the gods a single God? A strange thing is this, to be sure! (38:4-5)

These people looked at the Qur'ãnic call to monotheism as a call to numerical oneness, as opposed to numerical multitude. Allãh says: And your God is one God! There is no god but He; . . . (2:163); He is the Living, there is no god but He, therefore call on Him, being sincere to Him in obedience (40:65); apart from many verses which call man to discard numerous gods and turn his face exclusively to the One God. Also, He says: . . . and our God and your God is One . . . (29:46); in addition to other verses which call men not to be divided by worship-ping different gods, as every nation, group and tribe used to worship a god which exclusively belonged to it, and discarded others' gods.

Qur'ãn's sublime teachings negate numerical unity concerning God; a thing, which is numerically one, must inevitably be distinguished from another similar one through confinement of limit and dimension. For example, there is water in a reservoir; if we put it in various pots, then the water in each pot would be a unit, separate from other units found in other pots. Likewise, Zayd is one man because he does not have the particulars found in other men. If there were no such distinc-tion, their humanity would not be called one or more numerically.

Limitedness of existence compels the numerical one to be one. When this unity is curtailed in some aspects, the numerical multitude is formed; for example, when some units gather together to form a group.

Allãh is the Subduer, not subdued; the Victor whom nothing can subjugate, as the Qur'ãnic teachings make clear. As such, numerical unity or numerousness vis-à-vis God is unimaginable. Allãh says: . . . and He is the One, the Subduer (13:16). . . . are sundry lords better or Allãh the One the Subduer? You do not worship besides Him but names, which you have named, you and your fathers; . . . (12: 39-40). . . . and there is no god but Allãh, the One, the Subduer (38:65); If Allãh had intended to take a son to Himself, He would surely choose those He pleases from what He has created. Glory be to Him! He is Allãh, the One, the Subduer. (39:4)

These verses, in their contexts, negate every unity which stands face to face with opposite numerousness: No matter whether it is numerical unity, like a single member of a species, which if joined with another member would become two. (This individual member is subdued by the limit imposed on it by the second member, who is distinguished from it.) Or, if it is unity in species genes or any other general conception, parallel to numerousness of the same type. For example, when man as a species, is looked at side by side with other species, e.g. horse, cow, sheep, etc., is subdued by the limit imposed on it by the other species.

However, we know that nothing can subdue Allãh in any aspect, be it His person, His attributes, or His actions. He is the Subduer, above all things; nothing can impose any limit on Him. He is Existent without any taint of non-existence; He is the Truth that no nullity can touch Him; the Living that death cannot come near Him; the Knowing that ignorance cannot creep to Him; the Powerful that weakness can-not overcome Him; the Owner and the King that nothing can possess Him, and the Mighty Who is far above meakness – and so on. He has the essence of perfection. If you want to understand more this Qur'ãnic reality, then imagine one thing finite, and another infinite. You will find that the infinite encompasses the finite in a way that the finite does not push the infinite away from its perfection; rather, the infinite dominates the finite and is present in every aspect of the finite's perfection; the infinite stands independently, and is the witness over the finite and encompasses it. Keeping this scenario in view, look at the connotation of these verses: Is it not sufficient as regards your Lord that He is a witness over all things? Now surely they are in doubt as to the meeting of their Lord; now surely

He encompasses all things (41:53-54).

This is what is proved by all those verses that describe divine attributes and which clearly or apparently shows all-inclusiveness. For examples: Allāh – there is no god but He; . . . (20:8); . . . and they shall know that Allāh is the evident Truth (24:25); He is the Living, there is no god but He . . . (40:65); . . . and He is the Knowing, the Powerful (30:54); . . . that the power is wholly Allāh's . . . (2:165); . . . to Him belongs the kingdom, and to Him is due (all) praise . . . (64:1); . . . surely might is wholly Allāh's . . . (10:65); The truth is from your Lord, . . . (2:147); . . . you are the ones who stand in need of Allāh, and Allāh is He Who is the Self-sufficient, the Praised one (35:15), in addition to other many similar verses.

As you see, these verses loudly declare that every imaginable perfection originally belongs to Allāh; others do not have any perfec-tion unless and until He gives it to them; even then He does not lose any perfection by giving it to the others, contrary to what happens to us when we give something into others' possession – that we lose our hold on it and our possession of it is negated.

In this backdrop, when we imagine a perfect thing vis-à-vis Allāh, with a view to make it His second and His partner, we will find that all its perfection actually belongs to Allāh and comes from Him; He is the Truth, Who owns everything; and whatever is besides Him is worthless and owns nothing for itself. Allāh says: . . . and they control not for themselves any harm or benefit, and they control not death, nor life, nor raising (the dead) to life. (25:3)

It is this connotation that negates numerical unity in respect of Allāh. Had He been numerically one, He would have been confined to His own person and unable to encompass other beings; and then it would have been possible in reason to suppose His second like Him – no matter whether that second could exist in reality or was impossible to exist. Then the reason could attribute numerousness to Him looking at His person, even if such multitude was impossible in actuality. But it is not so.

He is One, i.e. His existence cannot be limited with any limit; otherwise it would have been possible to imagine His second beyond that limit. This is the connotation of the chapter of "The Unity": Say: "He, Allāh, is Unique. Allāh is He on Whom all depend. He begets not, nor is He begotten. And none is like unto Him." The word aḥad denotes uniqueness. It does not mean one, so that we may start counting, two, three, and so on. This attribute removes the possibility of numbering. In a negative sentence it is translated as "no one" or "nobody". They say: 'No one came to me.' It negates coming of one, two or more. Allãh says: And if one of the idolators seek protection from you, grant him protection . . . (9:6). The 'one' here encompasses one, two and group; no number is out of its circle. Also He says: . . . or one of you come from the privy . . . (5:6). Here too 'one' covers all numbers endlessly.

The word One or Unique in the first verse [of the chapter of "The Unity"] is used in a positive sentence. There is no negation, nor is it qualified with any adjective or genetive construction; and it con-notes that in His essence Allãh is such as no like unto Him can even be imagined – be it one or more. Therefore, regardless of its condition in actuality, it is impossible even to imagine it properly.

Allãh has gone ahead, mentioning the attribute of aṣ-ṣamad (اَلصَّمَدُ): It means something solid, not hollow. [That is why it is translated as the One on Whom all depend and Who does not depend on anything.]

Then it says: "He begets not", followed by, "nor is He begotten", and finally comes: And none is like unto Him.

The last three attributes negate such factors that impose some limits and isolation.

This is the reason why the attributes imagined or invented by the creatures in respect of Allãh cannot be applied to Him properly. Allãh says: Glory be to Allãh (for freedom) from what they describe; except the servants of Allãh, freed (from sins) (37:159-60); . . . they do not comprehend Him in knowledge (20:110). The fact is that the attributes of perfection that we use for Allãh are limited attributes, and far be it from His glory to be subject to limitation and restriction. This was the idea which the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) expressed in his famous words: "I do not count Your praise, You are as You have praised Yourself."

This meaning of unity removes the idea of the Christian trinity. They are Unitarians and at the same time are Trinitarians. But the unity they believe in is the numerical unity, which does not negate numerousness from other sides. They say: There are three persons (the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost) (or say: the self, the knowledge, the life), yet they are one, like: A living learned man; he is one, yet he is three because there is man, life, and knowledge.

But the Qur'ãnic teaching rebuts this idea, because it affirms such a unity, which leaves no room for a supposition of any type of multitude, numerousness, or distinction either in His person or His attributes.

Whatever attribute is supposed for Him is exactly the other attribute, because there is no limit or boundary here. Allãh's person is exactly His attribute; and each attribute supposed for Him is His other attribute. May He be exalted above what they associate with Him and Glory be to Him from what they ascribe to Him.

This is the reason that the verses that describe Him as the Sub-duer first ascribe to Him the attribute of Oneness and then mentions His subdueing. It shows that His unity does not leave any room to anyone even to imagine His second who could be similar to Him in any way, not to speak of that second's actual existence. Allãh says: . . . are sundry lords better or Allãh the One, the Subduer? You do not worship besides Him but names which you have named, you and your fathers; . . . (12:39-40). In this speech, Yūsuf (a.s.) ascribes to Allãh the unity, which has subdued every imaginary partner, and this sub-dueing does leave nothing to any other supposed god except name. Also He says: . . . Or have they set up with Allãh associates who have created creation like His, so that what is created became confused to them? Say: "Allãh is the Creator of all things, and He is the One, the Subduer" (13:16); . . . To whom belongs the Kingdom this day? To Allãh, the One, the Subduer (40:16). It is because His unrestricted kingdom does not leave any other supposed owner without turning him and his possession into His hand as His possession. Also He says: . . . and there is no god but Allãh, the One, the Subduer (38:65); If Allãh had intended to take a son to Himself, He would surely have chosen those He pleases from what He has created. Glory be to Him: He is Allãh, the One, the Subduer (39:4). Thus, you see that in all these verses, His Oneness precedes His attribute of subdueing.

TRADITIONS

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] narrates through his chain of narrators, from al-Miqdãm ibn Shurayḥ ibn Hãnī, from his father that he said, "Verily a Bedouin stood up on the day of the Camel to the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) and said, 'O Leader of the Faithful! Do you say that Allãh is one?'" (The narrator) said that the people bore down on him and said, "O Bedouin! Do you not see how disturbed the Leader of the Faithful is at present?" The Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) said, "Leave him, because what this Bedouin wants is exactly what we want from these people [our adversaries]."

Then he said, "O Bedouin! The statement that, Allãh is One is of four kinds [i.e., it can be interpreted in four ways]: Two sides (meanings) of them are not applicable to Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, and two sides are affirmed about Him. As for the two meaning which are not allowed to attach to Him: [One:] It is the word of a speaker, 'one', when he intends it as a number; so this is not allowed [in respect of Allãh], because that which has no 'second' does not enter into the fold of numbers [i.e. cannot be counted]. Don't you see that He has declared them disbelievers who said that He was the third of the three? [Two:] It is the word of a speaker [for someone] that he is one of the people; he means a species from genes; so it is not allowed because it likens Him [to others], and our Lord is far greater and more sublime than it.

"And as for the two meanings which are affirmed about Him: [One:] It is the word of a speaker: He is One, there is nothing like unto Him; such is our Lord. [Two:] It is the word of a speaker: He is of one meaning, i.e. He cannot be divided in existence, or in reason, or in imagination. Such is our Lord, the Mighty, the Great." (at-Tawḥīd; al-Khiṣãl)

The author says: He has also narrated it in Ma'ãni 'l-akhbãr, through another chain, from Abu 'l-Miqdãm ibn Shurayḥ ibn Hãnī, from his father from the Imãm (a.s.).

['Alī, a.s. said:] "The foremost in religion is the knowledge of Him, the perfection of knowing Him is to testify Him, the perfection of testifying Him is to believe in His Oneness, the perfection of be-lieving in His Oneness is to adhere to Him purely, and the perfection of adhering to Him purely is to deny Him attributes, because every attribute testifies that it is different from that to which it is attributed and everything to which something is attributed testifies that it is different from the attribute.

"Thus whoever attaches attributes to Allãh joins Him (to another thing) and who joins Him (to another thing) regards Him two; and who regards Him two reconizes parts for Him; and who recognizes parts for Him is ignorant of Him; and who is ignorant of Him pointed at Him; and who pointed at Him admitted limitations for Him; and who admitted limitations for Him numbered Him . . ."[16]

The author says: It is a most amazing expression. The gist of the first paragraph is that cognition of Allãh in its perfection ultimately leads to denying Him attributes. And the gist of the second paragraph (beginning with, "Thus whoever attaches attributes to Allāh . . .") is that affirmation of attributes entails affirmation of numerical unity that in its turn depends on putting limitations on Him, which is not allowed for Allāh. The two premises lead to the conclusion that perfection of Allāh's cognition entails denying numerical unity/oneness for Him, and seeking some other meaning for divine unity. And that is the theme of the Imām (a.s.) in this sermon.

As for the question of denying Him attributes, the Imām (a.s.) has explained it in his word: The foremost in religion is the knowl-edge of Him. Apparently, one, who does not know Allāh in any way, is yet to enter into the fold of religion. That knowledge is sometimes accompanied by deeds and at other times is devoid of deeds. Obvious-ly, if one had a knowledge, which was somewhat, related to deed and action that knowledge would settle in the psyche only when it was acted upon. Otherwise, the knowledge would go on losing its power if contrary actions were performed, until it would become futile, null and void. The Imām (a.s.) has explained the same principle some-where else in the same book: Knowledge is joined with action, he who knows acts; knowledge calls action loudly, if it answers the call, (well and good); otherwise knowledge too departs.

The knowledge and cognition becomes complete when the knower holds truly to "the known", and manifests it in his interior and exterior, in his heart and limbs, by submitting to it in spirit and flesh. And it is the faith, which spreads to his inner and outer self. This reality is expressed in a nutshell in the sentence: the perfection of knowing Him is to testify Him.

Although this submission, which is called testifying Him, may take place with ascribing a partner to the Lord, as we see idol-worshippers submitting to Allāh together with their other gods, yet obviously submission to a thing cannot be complete without turning away from other things. Thus submission to one of the gods means to turn away from other gods and in a way behaving arrogantly towards them. By the same standard, testifying to Allāh and submission to Him cannot be complete without turning away from submission to the partners ascribed to Him and from the call to multitude of gods. This takes us to the sentence: the perfection of testifying Him is to believe in His Oneness.

Now, the belief in unity of God has different grades one over another; and it is not perfected until the One God is given His due right of exclusive divinity. It is not enough just to call Him One God, but every factor having any part in existence and perfection must be attributed to Him, e.g., creation, giving sustenance, raising to life, causing to die, and bestowal and withholding. Submission and worship must be reserved to Him, without showing humility to other than Him in any way; one should not hope except for His mercy, should not fear except His wrath, should not covet except what is with Him, and should not adhere except to His door. In other words, one must devote oneself solely to Him in knowledge and practice. This factor is described by ‘Alī (a.s.) in these words: the perfection of believing in His Oneness is to adhere to Him purely.

When man settles on throne of sincerity, and divine solicitude attaches him to the near friends of Allãh, then appear before his in-sight the signs manifesting his inability to properly acquire His cog-nition or to ascribe to Him the attributes worthy of His Greatness and Majesty. He sees that whatever attributes he uses for Allãh are merely the ideas, which he has perceived by looking at, created things and the happening that he has observed in transient creatures. These are limited and restricted forms, each repelling the others; they cannot be mixed and mingled. Look for example at the meanings of existence, knowledge, power, life, sustenance, might, and affluence.

The limited meanings repel each other because clearly each meaning is devoid of the other meaning; for example, meaning of knowledge is devoid of that of power. When we imagine knowledge our attention is diverted from power, and we do not see the meaning of power in that of knowledge; and when we imagine the meaning of knowledge (which is one of the attributes) we are diverted from the meaning of His person, to Whom these attributes are attached.

Thus, these meanings, perceptions, and knowledge fall short of the ability to be applied properly to Allãh, or to express exactly His splendour. A sincere servant, who intends to describe his Lord, inevitably feels the need to confess his shortcomings, which are not redeemable, his weakness that cannot be restored. Then he looks again to himself and negates what he had affirmed; and wanders in bewilder-ment from which he can't come out. This is the connotation of the words of ‘Alī (a.s.): "and the perfection of His purity is to deny Him attributes, because every attribute testifies that it is different from that to which it is attributed, and everything to which it is attributed testifies that it is different from the attribute."

This explanation given by us of the first paragraph is supported by the beginning of the sermon where the Imãm (a.s.) says: ". . . Whom the height of intellect cannot appreciate, and the divings of under-standing cannot reach; He for Whose description no limit is laid down, no eulogy exists, no time is ordained and no duration is fixed", as is clear to an intelligent contemplator.

The next paragraph: "Thus whoever attaches attributes to Allãh joins Him (to another thing) . . ." This section analyses the implication of attaching attributes to Allãh and in this way arrives at the aim that Allãh is not subject to limitation or counting; while the first paragraph had reached through analysis of cognition to the denial of attributes.

"Thus whoever attaches attributes to Allãh joins Him (to an-other thing)" because attribute and that to which it is attributed are two separate things; and whoever attaches them together, joins them; and whoever joins them recognizes them as two; and whoever recognizes Allãh and His attributes as two, recognizes parts for Him, and who-ever recognizes parts for Him is ignorant of Him, because in his imagin-ation he points to Him; and whoever points to Him admits limitations for Him – because pointing shows that the one who is pointed at is separate from the one who points; and it creates a distance between the two, as the pointing begins from one and ends at the other; and whoever puts limitation on Him, numbers Him. In other words, he believes in Him as a numerical one, because counting is concomitant with division and isolation: Far be it from His glory.

ʿAlī (a.s.) says in another sermon:

"Praise be to Allãh for whom one condition does not precede another so that He may be the First before being the Last or He may be Manifest before being the Hidden. Everyone called one (alone) except Him is by virtue of being small (in number); and everyone enjoying honour other than Him is humble. Every powerful person other than Him is weak. Every master (owner) other than Him is slave (owned). Every knower other than Him is seeker of knowledge. Every powerful other than Him is sometimes imbued with power and some-times with disability. Every listener other than Him is deaf to faint voices while loud voices make him deaf and distant voices also get away from him. Every onlooker other than Him is blind to hidden colours and delicate bodies. Every manifest thing other than Him is hidden, but every hidden thing other than Him is incapable of becoming manifest."[17]

The author says: It is based on the principle that Allãh is not limited and all other things are limited. When these and similar attrib-utes and ideas are subjected to limitation, they have some relationship with other things; and limitation causes them to be isolated from those other things, and be turned into opposite meaning.

Manifestation, when it is taken as limited, will be limited to a certain thing or a certain direction, and not to another thing or direction. Rather this manifest thing will turn into a hidden one when looked at in relation to that another thing or direction. When honour is subjected to limitation, will become null and void beyond that limit – will become humility. Power, when confined to a limit, will turn into disability beyond that limit. Manifestation is concealment beyond its location, and concealment is manifestation outside its context.

When ownership is restricted then the one who restricts shall be guardian and supervisor over this owner – in this way, both the owner and the thing he owns will be under ownership of someone else. Knowledge, when it is limited, does not belong to the knower, because a thing does not restrict itself – it has come to him by bestowal of someone else and his teaching. And so on.

The proof that the Imãm (a.s.) has based his talk on the meaning of limit, may be seen in the sentences: "Every listener other than Him is deaf to faint voices" [to the end of the paragraph,] as all of it shows that all the created things are subject to limitation; and all is in the same context.

The sentence: "Everyone called one (alone) except Him is by virtue of being small (in number)," is the reason why we have quoted the whole paragraph. Manifestly it is based on the meaning of limit. The numerical oneness branches out from the limitedness of what is called one; and it entails division and multiplication. The more this division increases, the smaller and weaker that 'one' becomes – in comparison to the resulting multitude. Obviously, every numerical 'one' is small in comparison to the resulting multitude – even if in imagination only.

As for the 'one' which has no limit nor end, we cannot imagine any numerousness in it, because it does not accept any limit or distinc-tion, and its being encompasses all its essence. As nothing of its essence is left out, there is nothing to add to it or to subtract from it – so it cannot increase nor decrease; what we imagine as that one's second, is exactly the same 'one'.

ʻAlī (a.s.) has also said:

"All praise be to Allāh Who gives proof of His existence through His creation, of His being eternal through the newness of His creation, and through their mutual similarities proves that nothing is similar to Him. Senses cannot touch Him, because of the difference between the Maker and the made, the Limiter, the limited, the Sustainer, and the sustained.

"He is One but not by being the first in counting; is Creator but not through movement or labour; is Hearer but not by means of any physical organ; is Looker but not by a stretching of eyelids; is Witness but not by nearness; is Distant but not by measurement of distance; is Manifest but not by seeing and is Hidden but not through a rarefied (body).

"He is Distinct from things because of their subjugation to Him and their turning to Him.

"He who describes Him puts limits on Him, he who puts limits on Him counts Him, and he who counts Him rejects His eternity."[18]

The author says: The beginning of this sermon indicates that all attributes and ideas found in transient creation, are limited affairs; they cannot take place until and unless there is a Limiter to fix their limits, a Maker to make them and a Sustainer to sustain them, and that Limiter, Maker and Sustainer is Allāh. Obviously, limit is of His making, and as such it has come into being when He has made it; so it cannot cover its Maker. Far sublime is His Glory from these limits.

As such, whatever attributes are ascribed to Him are not subject to any limit – although our words are incapable of describing this idea properly. Allāh, therefore, is One but not in the sense of number, because number and count leads to limitation. In the same way should be interpreted the further descriptions of His creation, His hearing, His seeing, His presence and so on.

It sprouts from it that His being distant from His creation does not mean separation and isolation. Far High is He from attachment and separation, incarnation and isolation. Rather it means that He subdues the creation and controls it, while the creatures are subjugated to Him and return to Him.

[18] Nahju 'l-balaghah, Sermon 152. Azal (ازل) means eternity (without beginning), while abad (ابد) denote eternity (without end). Unfortunately, there are no words in English to express this difference in meaning, and one is constrained to use 'eternity' in both places. However, in the above sentence it denotes eternity without beginning. (tr.)

The clauses: "He who describes Him puts limits on Him, and he who puts limits on Him counts Him, and he who counts Him rejects His eternity", prove that affirmation of numerical unity entails rejection of His eternity. Eternity in its essence means that Allãh is not finite in His person and attributes, nor is He limited in any way. When we think of Him with regard to His being unprecedented by any former thing, it is His eternity without beginning; and when we regard Him as being not followed by any later thing, it is His eternity without end; and when one is regarded eternal on both sides, it is perpetuity.

Some scholars think that Allãh's eternity without beginning means that He precedes the created things, which He has created, and there had passed untold time before it when there was no news of any creation or its trace. [In other words, His precedence is seen within the framework of time.] But it is a most repulsive mistake. What is time? It is but the amount of the movement of moving things. How can such a thing join Allãh in His eternity?

"All praise be to Allãh, Creator of the people, Who has spread the earth, has made streams to flow and vegetation to grow on high lands. His primality has no beginning, nor has His eternity any end. He is the First and from ever, and the everlasting without limit. Foreheads bow before Him and lips declare His Oneness. He determined the limits of things at the time of His creating them, keeping Himself away from any likeness.

"Imagination cannot surmise Him with limits and movements, limbs or senses. It cannot be said about Him: When? and no time duration can be attributed to Him by saying: till. He is Manifest, but it cannot be said: from what. He is Hidden but it cannot be said: in what. He is not a body that can die, nor is He veiled so as to be enclosed within. He is not near to things by way of touch, nor is He remote from them by way of separation.

"The gazing of people's eyes is not hidden from Him, nor the repetition of words, nor the glimpse of hillocks, nor the tread of a foot-step in the dark night or in the deep gloom, where the shining moon casts its light and the effulgent sun comes in its wake, through its setting and appearing again and again with the rotation of time and periods, by the approach of the advancing night or the passing away of the running day.

"He precedes every extremity and limit, and every counting and number. He is far above what those whose regard is limited attribute to Him, such as the qualities of measure, having extremities, living in houses, and dwelling in abodes, because limits are meant for creation and are attributable only to other than Allãh.

"He did not create things from eternal matter, nor after ever-existing examples. But He created whatever He created and then He fixed limits thereto, and He shaped whatever He shaped and gave the best shape thereto."[19]

Again he (a.s.) says:

"He who assigns to Him (different) conditions does not believe in His oneness, nor does he who likens Him (to something) grasp His reality, He who illustrates Him does not signify Him. He who points at Him and imagines Him does not mean Him. Everything that is known through itself has been created, and everything that exists by virtue of other tings is the effect (of a cause). He works, but not with the help of instruments. He fixes measures, but not with the activity of thinking. He is rich, but not by acquisition.

"Times do not keep company with Him, and implements do not help Him. His being precedes times. His existence precedes non-existence, and His eternity precedes beginning. By His creating the sense it is known that He has no senses. By His creating contrariness in various matters it is known that He has no contrary; and by His creating simi-larity between things it is known that there is nothing similar to Him. He has made light the contrary of darkness, brightness that of gloom, dryness that of moisture, and heat that of cold. He produces affection among inimical things, fuses together diverse things, brings near remote things, and separates things, which are joined together.

"He is not confined by limits, nor counted by numbers. Material parts can surround things of their own kind, and organs can point out things similar to themselves. The word, 'since', disproves their eternity; the word, qad (قَدْ) [that denotes nearness of time of occurrence], disproves their being from ever; and the word lawlã (لَوْلا = if it were not) keeps them remote from perfection.

"Through them the Creator manifests Himself to the intelligence; and through them He is guarded from the sight of the eyes. Stillness and motion do not occur in Him: How can that thing occur in Him, which He Himself has made to occur? And how can a thing revert to Him, which He first created? And how can a thing appear in Him, which He first brought to appearance? Had it not been so, His Self would have become subject to diversity, His Being would have become divisible (into parts), and His reality would have been prevented from being deemed Eternal. If there was a front to Him, there would have been a rear also for Him, and He would have needed completion when shortage befell Him. In that case signs of the created would appear in Him, and He would become a sign (leading to other objects) instead of signs leading to Him."[20]

The Author says: The first parts aim at showing that Allãh cannot admit limitation. We have briefly explained it earlier.

"He is not confined by limits, nor counted by numbers": It gives the sum total of the preceding paragraphs.

"Material parts can surround things of their own kind, and organs can point out things similar to themselves": It further elaborates immedi-ately preceding result. The preceding clauses showed that the limits encompassing the created things are the handiwork of the Creator, and have occurred after Him as an action occurs after its doer. Obviously, such a thing cannot encompass the doer. But these clauses under discussion look at the same aspect from another angle. Quantification and limitation, which are affected by these organs and material parts, take place within the framework of the given species. For example, gram is a unit of weight, and it is used in weighing loads, not colours or sounds; time which is amount of motion is used for gauging move-ments; a man's social prestige and weight is measured by comparing him to that of another. In short, each of these limits gives its object a frame of its own kind. Now, every transient attribute, whatever it may be, is based on a measure and limit, and adheres to a term and end; this being the case, how can its limited meaning be applied to Allãh Who is eternal, without beginning and without end, remaining for ever?

This is what the Imãm (a.s.) means, and that is why it is fol-lowed by the clauses: "The word, 'since', disproves their eternity; the word, qad (that denotes nearness of time of occurance), disproves their being from ever; and the word, lawlã (= if it were not) keeps them remote from perfection." The words, since and qad, both indicate new occurrence in time; obviously their objects cannot be described as being eternal or without beginning. Likewise, the word, lawlã, points to shortcoming and defect, which has kept it far from perfection.

"Through them the Creator manifests Himself to the intelligence; and through them He is guarded from the sight of the eyes": 'Through them' i.e. through these things. Meaning: The things are the signs of Allāh, the Creator; and signs show only that whose signs they are. They are like mirrors that show only His power and knowledge; through them He has shown Himself to intelligence; and also through them He prevents the eyes to see Him. The only way to see Him is through these signs – and these are limited and can cover only those things, which are limited like them. How can they encompass the Lord who encompasses everything?

For the same reason, eyes cannot see Him. Eyes are delicately made organs, which have their own limitations and can comprehend only those things, which are similarly limited. And far be it from the Glory of the Lord to be subject of limitation!

"Stillness and motion do not occur in Him . . .": It reiterates the forgoing theme in a different way. These actions and occurrences, which are ultimately a combination of stillness and motion, are not applicable to Him; they do not return to Him, nor do they occur in Him. They are merely the effects of His influence on a thing. And man cannot influ-ence himself, except through a sort of analysis that would divide his person somehow, like a man hitting his hand on his head, or a physician treating himself through his medicine, etc. This looks Ok because of variation of aspects or imaginary separation of limbs. Otherwise it would have been impossible. For example, eye does not see itself, and fire does not burn itself; similarly no active agent shows its action except in other than itself, (save where compounding or analysis is entailed). This is the connotation of the Imām's words: "Had it not been so, His Self would have become subject to diversity, His Being would have become divisible (into parts), and His reality would have been prevented from being deemed Eternal."

"In that case signs of the created would appear in Him, and He would become a sign (leading to other objects) instead of signs leading to Him": If He were subject to limits and dimension, He would be afflicted with shortage and defect, in need of somethings to remove that shortfall. But defect and shortage are signs of 'made' objects, and are proofs of transience; and in that case He would carry in Himself signs of being created; Glorified and High be He from such aspects! Such an idea would place Him side by side with other made things, which through their defects, limitations and transience, point to an Eternal Being Who is free from all defects and limitations – and He is Allāh, Whom hands of limitation and dimension cannot reach.

The Imām (a.s.) has shown here that only a transient and made thing leads to its Eternal Maker. In other contexts, the same Imãm as well as all other Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) have asserted that Allãh is known by Himself while other things are known through Him; that He is the Guide to His Own Self as well as to His created things. Apparently, these two stands seem contrary to each other. But it is not so, because this knowledge is different from that, and this guidance is dissimilar to that. I hope that Allãh will help me to explain it fully in a related discourse in some later study – God Willing!

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] narrates through his chain from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said, "While the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) was delivering a sermon on the pulpit of Kūfah, a man named Dhiʻlib stood up – and he had a fluent tongue, eloquent speech and a brave heart – and said, 'O Leader of the Faithful! Have you seen your Lord?' He said, 'Woe unto thee, O Dhiʻlib! I am not the one to worship Whom I have not seen.' (Dhiʻlib) said, 'O Leader of the Faithful! How did you see Him?' He said, 'O Dhiʻlib! Eyes have not seen Him through the eye-sight; but hearts perceive Him through the realities of belief. Woe unto thee, O Dhiʻlib! Verily my Lord is the most kind,[21] and He is not described in terms of kindness; the most exalted, but is not described in terms of exaltedness; the greatest, but not described in terms of greatness; the most grand, but not described in terms of thickness. He is before every thing, it is not said that anything is before Him; He is after everything, it is not said that for Him there is an after. He wished (creation of) thing but not through endeavour; He is successful, not through treachery. He is in the things, but not intermingled with them, or separate from them. He is Manifest but not in physical sense, is Evident but not through sight-ing with eyes. He is separate but not because of distance, is near but not by proximity. He is delicate, but not through embodiment, existing, not after non-existence. He is the Doer, but not under compulsion, the Ordainer, but not with movement, the Preceptor, not with any worry; He is the Hearer, not with an organ, the Seer, not with a body part. Places do not encompass Him, and times do not accompany Him and attributes do not limit Him. His Being preceded times, and His exist-ence (preceded) non-existence, and His eternity (preceded) the begin-ning. By His creating the senses it was known that He has no senses, and by His making the substances it was recognized that He has no substance; and by His creating the contraries in various matters it is known that He has no contrary, and by the similarity between things it is known that there is nothing similar to Him. He has made light contrary of darkness, dryness that of moisture, and cold that of heat. He produces affinity between inimical things (and) separates things, which are joined together. (These things) by their separation lead to their separator, and by their joining point to their joiner; and this is the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: And of every thing We have created pairs that you may be mindful [51:49]. In this way He separated them between before and after, in order that it may be known that for Him there is no before or after; they prove through their natures that their Creator has no nature; their being bound by time makes it known that He Who thus binds them is not bound by time. He veils some of them from others, that it may be understood that there is no veil between Him and His creation – except the creation itself. He was the Sustainer when there was no sustained, the God when there was no worshipper, the Knower when there was no known, and the Hearer when there was nothing to be heard. (Then he recited saying:)

"'And my Master was always well-known by praise,
And my Master was always described for magnaminity;
And He was when there was no light to illuminate,
Nor was darkness keeping to horizons;
So our Master is unlike the whole creation,
And unlike all that could be imagined by minds.'"[22]

The author says: As you see, the speech of the Imām (a.s.) explains the theme of the uniqueness of Allāh's person in all its manifestations; and that His Person is neither finite nor limited. No self-stands opposite His Self, otherwise it would have threatened Him through limitation and subdued Him through determination. He encompasses everything, and controls every affair. No attribute is ascribed to Him, which is separate from His person; otherwise it would negate His eternity and go against His limitlessness.

His attribute of perfection is not bound with any limit, which would push away other thing or be pushed away by it. For example, our knowledge is other than our power because both are separate from each other in meaning as well as in external existence; but so far as Allāh's person is concerned, the two attributes are not separate from one another; this attribute is exactly that, and is not distinguishable from His many other attributes; His one name denotes all His beauty-ful names.

Going one step further, we find another meaning – finer and deeper than above: These meanings and ideas are like weights and measures for intelligence. The intelligence uses them to weigh and measure external existence, the actual being. As such these meanings and ideas are subject to limits, and boundaries. They cannot be devoid of this aspect, even if we join them together and even if they were to support one another; they cannot weigh or measure except the things, which are subject to limits and boundaries like them. Now, if we sup-pose something unlimited, and then try to guage it with these limited weights and measures, we cannot get except a limited thing and it will not be the One Who is above limits and boundaries; and the more we try to get Him in this way, the higher and remoter He will go.

Let us look at the meaning of knowledge: It is a meaning we have taken from an attribute which is limited in existence and which we deem as perfection for the knower. This theme is bounded in such a way that it cannot accommodate power and life, for example. Sometimes we may use this word for Allãh and try to overcome its limitedness by adding to it some phrases, e.g. "knowledge unlike other knowledge"; now it would release it from some limitations, yet it cannot go beyond its basic meaning and will not cover other attributes of perfection. (Every meaning has a limit that it cannot go beyond.) Just adding one theme to another does not lead to negation of the particular theme, as it is clear.

This leaves man bewildered when he tries to describe Allãh according to his own wisdom and understanding. It is this theme that is inferred from his clause, "and attributes do not limit Him", and from another clause in the first sermon quoted earlier, "and the perfection of adhering to Him purely is to deny Him attributes", and again in the same sermon [not quoted here]: "He for Whose description no limit has been laid down, and no eulogy exists". Here you see that he (a.s.) asserts attribute at the same time when he negates it or negates its limit; and it is understood that its assertion cannot be free from limit; thus negating its limit is tantamount to rejecting it after admitting it. It means that asserting for Him an attribute of perfection does not negate other attributes. In this way His attributes combine with one another and then become one with His Self and there is no limit; then it does not negate what is beyond these attribute (that which we do not under-stand that we may narrate, nor do we perceive that could be attached to Him). Understand it.

Had it not been that meanings fall down when they reach near His Majesty and Greatness (in the sense described above), it would have been possible for the reason to encompass Him with all the general and vague ideas which surround Him, like His description that He is a person not like persons, He has knowledge unlike knowledges, power not like others' power, and life different from all types of life. This manner of discription does not leave anything without counting and encompassing it in general. The question is: Is it possible for any- thing to encompass Him? Or is it that one cannot comprehend Him in detail, but there is no difficulty in encompassing Him in a general way? But Allãh has said: . . . while they do not comprehend Him in knowledge (20:110); . . . now surely He encompasses all things, (41:54). So, nothing encompasses Allãh from any direction in any manner of encompassing; and His Glorified Self does not accept any detail or generality, so that there could be one verdict for His detail and another for His generality. Understand it.

ʻAlī (a.s.) says in another sermon:

"His proof is His signs, and His existence is His affirmation; and His cognition is His Oneness, and His Oneness is to distinguish Him from His creation; and the verdict of distinction is the separation of attribute, not separation of isolation. Verily He is the Sustainer (and) Creator, not sustained (or) created; anything imagined, He is opposite to it. [Thereafter he, a.s. said]: He is not a god who is recognized by his self; He guides the proof to lead to Him, and leads the cognition to Himself."[23]

The author says: Meditation on foregoing statement makes it clear that this sermon aims at showing that the divine unity is an one-ness unrelated to number. See how clearly he (a.s.) says that His cognition is His oneness; in other words, affirmation of His existence is exactly the affirmation of His oneness. Had this oneness been of number, it would have been separate from His Self, and the Self, per se, would not have sufficed for oneness except through an external factor separate from affirmation of the Self.

It is an amazing logic and a most profound description of the divine unity; if we were to go into its proper explanation, it would require a deep and extensive discourse beyond the scope of this book. A finest point included therein is his clause: "His existence is His affirmation"; the Imãm (a.s.) means that His proof is His actual existence, i.e. mind does not grasp Him and reason does not encompass Him.

[23] aṭ-Ṭabrisī, al-Iḥtijãj. (Author's Note)

"anything imagined, He is opposite to it": The Imãm (a.s.) does not mean that He is opposite the imagined form, because everything found outside imagination shares this quality. The actual meaning is that Allãh is opposite to what the mind imagines about Him, whatever it may be; as such imagined form cannot encompass Him. However, you should not forget that He is much beyond even this imagination, i.e. the imagination that He is opposite to every imagination.

"He is not a god who is recognized by his self": Allãh's Majesty is so great that cognition cannot reach Him and He subdues all under-standing and perception. Everyone whom we recognize by his own self, his self is other than ours and his cognition is likewise separate from ours, and that is how our cognition is attached to him. But Allãh encompasses and supervises our cognition and us. There is no safety-hold to which our cognition or we might cling to avoid His all-encom-passing power and to adhere to it in isolation.

The Imãm (a.s.) has explained this stage in his words: "He guides the proof to lead to Him, and leads the cognition to Himself." It means that Allãh is the Guide Who leads the proof to guide to Him, and leads the cognition to have a sort of relation to Him; it is because He encom-passes everything and has power and authority over everything. That being the case, how can anything find a way to His Self or encompass Him, while Allãh encompasses it and controls its guidance to Himself?

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] narrates from ʻUmar ibn ʻAlī from ʻAlī (a.s.) that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has said, 'The Unity (of God), its exterior is in its interior, and its interior is in its exterior; its exterior is attributed (which) is not seen and its interior is existant (which) is not hidden. He is saught in every place while no place is devoid of Him even for one moment; (He is) present, without any limit, absent (but) not lost.'" (Maʻãni 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: This speech too aims at describing Allãh's numberless oneness; it is based on the fact that Allãh is not limited by any limit. This limitlessness shows that His unity's exterior is not separ-ate from its interior, and vice versa. It is because exterior and interior become separated and isolated from one another when there is a limit and boundary between them, but when that boundary is removed, both mingle together and become one.

Likewise, the attributed exterior is encompassed and the extant interior is hidden and veiled when they are fettered with a limit, and cannot trespass that boundary. Likewise, a thing present is limited and its presence is perceived by those who are near it, while the absent is unperceived and lost because of its limitedness. Otherwise, the present with all its being would not have gathered near those who are in its proximity, and the absent would not have been hidden from those who are far away. And it is clear.

A HISTORICAL DISCOURSE

The belief that there is a Creator for the universe, and that He is One, is among the earliest ideas prevalent among the thinkers of this species, to which it is guided by its natural instincts. If we ponder deeply on even the idol worship, which is based on polytheism, we shall find that it is founded on the Oneness of the Creator, and the idols are taken merely as interceders near Him (We do not worship them save that they may make us nearer to Allãh [39:3]), although with passage of time it deviated from its original path, and finally they treated those idols as independent dieties besides Allãh.

The human nature, which calls to the Unity of God, was inviting human beings to the One God Who is not bound with any limit in His Greatness and Majesty, neither in Person nor in attribute (as we have explained earlier with the help of the Mighty-Book); yet man in his life is intimately familiar with units in numbers; and the people of relig-ion were entangled with idol-worshippers and dualists, etc. to refute plurality of gods, on the other hand. Both these factors stamped the idea of oneness of number on the minds, so much so that the above-mentioned natural dictate was almost forgotten.

That was the reason that the ancient philosophers of Egypt, Greece, Alexanderia, as well as those who came after them, affirm divine unity in terms of oneness in number; even such a genius as Avicenna has clearly affirmed it in his Kitãbu 'sh-Shifã'. And the same path was trodden by later ones upto about the year 1000 of hijrah.

As for the scholars of scholastic theology, their arguments too for the Unity do not prove other than the oneness in number, although they have based their lalk on the Qur'ãnic general declarations. So, this is what is understood from the scholars' writings on this subject.

In fact, what the Qur'ãn has explained concerning the meaning of the divine unity was the first and the foremost step for teaching this reality of cognition. Unfortunately, the Companions, their disciples, and their pupils who dealt with the Qur'ãnic explanation and who pursued the knowledge of the Book, left this noble topic in abeyance. Look into the collections of traditions, and the book of exegesis narrated on their authority; you will not find in all that multitude any trace of this reality – neither with an explanatory description nor in a logical manner.

We did not find in all our searching anything which could un-cover its veil, except what has come into the speeches of the Imãm 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib (a.s.) exclusively. It is his speech that has opened its door and raised its curtain, showing the straightest path and the clearest way of proofs. Thereafter we come straight to the Muslim philosophers who appeared after the year one thousand of hijrah, and they have clearly said that they have learned it from the Imãm (a.s.)'s speeches.

That is the reason that we had no alternative to quoting only from his pure speeches in the preceding section of Traditions, because nowhere else can we find description of this topic and its explanation with logical arguments – May Allãh's peace be on him.

Also because of the same reason, we have not included an independent philosophical discussion of this subject. The fact is that the proofs presented in their books are composed of the same premises, which have been explained in the Imãm's speeches; and all are based on the theme of the oneness of His Person.[24]

[24] If one looks with critical eyes and meditates deeply, one cannot fail to be astonished by the blunder committed by some scholars who have claimed that these Sermons of 'Alī (a.s.), which are included in Nahju 'l-balãghah, are spurious and not genuine; some have said that they were forged by ash-Sharīf ar-Raḍī (may Allãh have mercy on him!). Comments on some aspects of this mistake have been given somewhere earlier.

Would that I knew, how could forgery and unauthorized insertion cover such a complicated and fine academic subject which had for long centuries remained beyond the grasp of scholars even when the Imãm (a.s.) had opened its door and raised its curtain – until the developing intellect had trodden on this path for one thousand years; and which had remained beyond the understanding of the Companions and their disciples.

The claim of these proponents of forgery loudly speaks that they had thought that the Qur'ãnic realities and the high academic principles were only some banal and vulgar ideas, and they are only distinguished by literary language and erudite expression. (Author's Note)

COMMENTARY

These three verses together with the following ones [upto the verse 108] give details of various commandments related to branches of religion. This whole group is inserted between the verses describing the story of the Messiah (a.s.) and the Christians. These verses consist of various groups laying down diverse orders, each being independent and complete in its theme. As such, it is difficult to decide whether a given group was revealed separately or had accompanied other verses, because context supports neither alternative. As for the traditions showing reasons of revelation, important ones shall be quoted under Traditions.

The above comment is applicable to these three verses too, because the third one is independent in its theme, and the first one too is independent; although they are not devoid of a sort of affinity, because one type of vain oath may be related to forbidding oneself the good things which have been made lawful by Allãh. Perhaps this was the reason why some exegetes have narrated that all verses were revealed about vain oaths.

This applies to the first verse vis-à-vis the third. As for the second, it in a way completes the first verse, as evidenced by some factors in it; that is, the command to: fear Allãh in Whom you believe, and the conjunction: and at its beginning, as well as the order to "eat of the lawful things," forbidding which has been prohibited in the first one. In this way the two verses are harmonized, give the same order and have the same context.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allãh has made lawful for you: ar-Rãghib says in al-Mufradãt: "al-Ḥarãm (اَلْحَرَام) denotes the forbidden thing, be it by divine subjugation or forcible obstruction; whether this prohibition is by reason or sharī'ah or by one whose orders are followed."

Again he says: "al-Ḥill (اَلْحِلّ) basically means to untie a knot; the verse: and loose the knot from my tongue [20:27], is used in this meaning; and ḥalaltu (حَلَلْتُ) means: 'I descended'; this is based on the fact that one unties one's luggage on dismounting, then it was used for dismounting and disembarkation in general, and in this sense they say: 'He disembarked'; someone made him disembark, i.e., hosted him. Allāh says: or it will alight close by their abodes [13:31]; and made their people to alight into the abode of perdition [14:28]. When time to repay a loan comes, they say, the loan has arrived; al-ḥillah (اَلْحِلَّة) is used for the people who alight; the same is the meaning of ḥayy ḥallāl (حَيّ حَلاَّل); al-maḥillah (اَلْمَحِلَّة) is the place of disembarking; ḥalla ḥillan (حَلّ حِلاً) means it is lawful – this metaphorical expression is derived from 'untying the knot'. Allāh says: And eat of the lawful and good (things) that Allāh has given you; also He says: This is lawful and this is unlawful [16:116]."

Apparently the contraposition between ḥill (lawfulness) and ḥurmah (unlawfulness), and opposition between ḥill (area beyond a sanctuary) and ḥaram (sanctuary) or iḥrām (the robe worn when entering ḥaram) is based on imaginary tying of knot when forbidding something, i.e. unlawfulness; then it (ḥurmah) is put opposite of ḥill (which is metaphorically used for lawfulness). The two words, ḥill, and ḥurmah were generally used for lawfulness and unlawfulness, respectively, even before Islam; it is not that sharī'ah or its followers have coined them.

The verse: "O you who believe! Do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allāh has made lawful for you . . ." prohibits to the believers forbidding themselves what Allāh has made lawful for them. This forbidding what has been made lawful by Allāh can be done either by laying down a legislation contrary to divine legislation, or by forbidding others or abstention, i.e. one leaves out a lawful thing by abstaining from it or prohibiting it to oneself or others. All this behaviour is tantamount to forbidding what Allāh has made lawful, and it is equal to fighting Allāh in His Power; this trangression against Him is contrary to the belief in Allāh and in His communication. That is why the verse begins with the phrase: "O you who believe!" it implies that you are believers in Allāh and have submitted to His commandments; therefore you should not forbid to yourself what Allāh has made law-ful. This explanation is further supported by the end clause of the next verse: and fear Allāh in Whom you believe.

"the good things which Allāh has made lawful for you": The addition of the word, "good", – although the sentence would be com-plete even without it – aims at completing the cause of prohibition: If the believers forbid themselves the things which Allãh has made lawful for them, then it is not only that they commit transgression against Allãh in His authority and defy the demands of their belief in, and submission to, Allãh, but also go against the law of nature, which takes these law-ful things as good without reservation. Allãh has pointed to it where He says about His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the sharī'ah which he has brought: Those who follow the Messenger Prophet, the ummī*, whom they find written down with them in the Tawrãt and the Injīl,* (who) enjoins them good and forbids them evil, and makes lawful to them the good things and makes unlawful to them impure things, and removes from them their burden and the shackles which were upon them; so (as for) those who believe in him and honour him and help him, and follow the light which has been sent down with him, these it is that are the successful (7:157).

The above description supports the following:

First: Forbidding the good things that Allãh has made lawful means abstaining, and making others desist, from lawful things.

Second: Lawful, as opposite of unlawful, includes the permissible and the commendable, even the obligatory things.

Third: Addition of "the good things" to that "which Allãh has made lawful for you" aims at further elaboration of the same idea.

Fourth: Exceeding the limits (in "do not exceed the limits") means transgression against Allãh in His legislative authority; or over-step-ping the limits laid down by Allãh by revolting against His obedience, refusing to submit to Him, and forbidding what He has made lawful. As Allãh says, inter alia, describing the laws of divorce: These are the limits of Allãh, so do not exceed them, and whoever exceeds the limits of Allãh then these it is that are the unjust (2:229). Likewise He says at the end of the verses of inheritance: These are Allãh's limits; and whoever obeys Allãh and His Messenger, He will cause him to enter gardens beneath which rivers flow, to abide in them; and this is the great achievement. And whoever disobeys Allãh and His Messenger and transgresses His limits, He will cause him to enter Fire to abide in it, and he shall have an abasing chastisement (4:13-14).

As you see, the verses count uprightness and adherence to the sharī'ah in obedience to Allãh and His Messenger as praiseworthy; and stepping out of obedience and submission to Him, and trans-gression and exceeding the limits of Allãh as condemnable act that makes one liable to chastisement.

In short, the verse prohibits one from forbidding oneself what Allāh has made lawful, by keeping away from it and avoiding it, because it goes contrary to the belief in Allāh and His signs. Also it opposes the fact of their being lawful and good, and of their being free of impurity; otherwise, why should one abstain from them? It is nothing but exceeding the limits, and Allāh does not love those who exceed the limits.

QUR'ĀN: and do not exceed the limits; surely Allāh does not love those who exceed the limits: You have seen and the context appar-ently shows that exceeding the limits connotes the self-imposed abstain-ing of the preceding sentence. As such the prohibition: "do not exceed the limits," aims at emphasizing the one in: do not forbid (yourselves).

Some people have said: Exceeding the limits means over-step-ping the line of moderation regarding the lawful things, by throwing oneself down to enjoying them without restraint, contrary to discard-ing them abstemiously. So, the verse would mean: Do not forbid your-selves the good and tasteful things that Allāh has made lawful for you. Do not intentionally avoid enjoying them abstemiously believing that it would bring you nearer to Allāh. And do not exceed the limits by transgressing the line of moderation, going to extravagance and excess which would be harmful for your bodies or souls.

Or, exceeding the limits may mean overstepping the good and lawful things, indulging in bad and unlawful things. Then the connota-tion will be as follows: Do not avoid lawful thing and do not use un-lawful things. In other words, do not forbid yourselves what Allāh has made lawful for you and do not indulge in what Allāh has forbidden you.

Although these two meanings are correct in themselves and the Qur'ān clearly supports both themes, but neither fits the verse under discussion as its context and that of the following verse shows. Obvi-ously, not every correct theme can be applied to every word without looking at its context and position.

QUR'ĀN: And eat of the lawful and good (things) that Allāh has given you, and fear Allāh in Whom you believe: The conjunction, "And", joins the imperative: "eat", with the prohibition: do not forbid. As such, this verse apparently repeats and emphasizes the connotation of the preceding one. This is further supported by its opening phrase, "the lawful and good (things)" which stands parallel to the phrase in the preceding verse: the good things which Allãh has made lawful for you, and the preceding verse's clause: O you who believe! as explained earlier.

Accordingly, the word: 'eat', coming after the prohibition: do not forbid, implies permission. Allowing one to eat in particular after the overall prohibition of forbidding is merely a verbal particulariza-tion, and the word: 'eat', implies unrestricted use of good bounties bestowed by Allãh. Also, the word may mean only partaking of food or all aspects of usufruct and disposal. It has been repeatedly described that use of the word, eating, for general management and disposal is very common and widespread in literature.

Alternatively, the word 'eat' could have possibly been used here in its literal sense. Thus the two verses were revealed when some believers had forbidden themselves the good and tastey food, and the verses were sent down to stop them from it. The first verse is compre-hensive and includes eating as well as other modes of management, and it covers things which are lawful to eat and lawful to use otherwise.

The clause: "that Allãh has given you", is object of the verb: 'eat'; and the words: "the lawful and good (things)", are its circum-stantial phrases – in this way, both verses do conform to each other.

Some others have said that, the words: "the lawful and good (things)", are the object of the verb: 'eat'; and the clause: "that Allãh has given you", is attached to that verb; alternatively this clause might be a circumstatial phrase connected with the words: "the lawful and good (things)", and has preceded the connecting clause (the lawful . . .) because it is a common noun; as a second alternative, the words: "the lawful and good (things)", might be adjectives to an omitted verbal noun, sustenance: And eat of the lawful and good sustenance . . . There may also be some other interpretations.

Some people believe that sustenance includes lawful and unlaw-ful both, and have argued for it by the adjective: "lawful", attached to it here.

Reply: The "lawful and good" is not a circumspectional condition for keeping out unlawful and bad sustenance; it is rather an explanatory condition and has the same connotation as the word explained – in this case, sustenance. The reason why it has been added here is that its being lawful and good does not leave any excuse for anyone for avoiding and keeping aloof from it, as explained earlier. We have elaborated the mean-ing of sustenance under the verse 27 of the chapter of "The House of ‘Imrãn", in the third volume of this book.[25]

QUR'ĀN: Allāh does not call you to account for what is vain in your oath, but He calls you to account for the making of deliberate oaths: al-Laghw (اَللَّغْو = inconsequential action); al-aymān (اَلأَيْمَان) is plural of al-yamīn (اَلْيَمِيْن = vow, oath). ar-Rāghib says in al-Mufradāt: "al-Yamīn in context of oath is an allusion to the [right] hand, keeping in view what the parties of treaty or agreement do [that they shake their right hands at the conclusion of the agreement]. Allāh says: Or have you received from Us an agreement confirmed by an oath extending to the Day of Resurrection . . . [68:39]; And they swear by Allāh with the strongest of their oaths, . . . [6:109]; Allāh does not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths, . . . [5:89]". at-Ta'qīd (اَلتَّعْقِيْد) puts emphasis on al-'aqd (اَلْعَقْدُ = to tie); it is also recited without intensified pronunciation; "in your oath" is related to "does not call you to account", or to "what is vain", and this is nearer.

The clause, "what is vain in your oath", has been placed face to face with, "the making of deliberate oaths"; it shows that the vain oath is the one regarding which the maker of oath is not serious, his heart is not in it, he merely uses the formula of oath by force of habit, as they generally say – and particularly in trade dealings – 'No, by Allāh!' 'Certainly by Allāh!' It is a far cry from serious deliberation when one declares on oath that: 'By Allāh! I'll most certainly do it', or 'By Allāh! I'll most certainly not do it'.

This is what appears from the verse. But the sharī'ah also counts it as vain oaths if someone says: "By Allāh! I'll do this unlaw-ful deed"; or, "By Allāh! I'll not do that obligatory deed"; it is because the Supreme Legislator has counted it as vain oath when it is used for something that has no preference in sharī'ah. This rule is added to the above Qur'ānic one by the sunnah; and it is not necessary that the Qur'ān should speak about everything that is affirmed by the sunnah particularly.

As for the clause: "but He calls you to account for the making of deliberate oaths," it includes only that oath which is endorsed by the sharī'ah, as it says at the end: And guard your oaths. Inevitably it refers to such oaths, and obviously the order to guard your oaths can-not point to that oath which Allāh has declared vain. In short, a vain oath is that one which is not taken with deliberation; and the one made seriously is endorsed by sharī'ah.

QUR'ÃN: so its expiation is the feeding of ten poor men . . . or the freeing of a neck*: al-Kufr (اَلْكُفْر = to cover, to hide); al-kaffãrah (اَلْكَفَّارَة = an action which somehow hides or covers the evil of disobedience). Allãh says: . . . We will expiate from you your (small) sins . . . [4:31]. ar-Rãghib says: "al-Kaffãrah is that which covers the sin; and from it is the kaffãrah (expiation) of oath."

The words: "so its expiation", have branched out from the description of oath, keeping in view some omitted but understood words; for example: Then if you break your oath, so its expiation . . . It is because the word: "expiation", points to a disobedience which demands expiation; and that disobedience cannot be the oath itself, otherwise the end section of the verse would not have said: guard your oaths, be-cause there is no sense in guarding an act of disobedience. Obviously, expiation is related to the breaking of oath, not the oath itself.

It also shows that the calling to account mentioned in the sentence: but He calls you to account for the making of deliberate oaths, is related to the breaking of, not the making of the oath. This calling to accounts is related to oaths because it points to its breaking. The word, its expiation, branches from its breaking because the sentence, He calls you to account for the making of deliberate oaths, points to it. Similar explanation applies to the sentence: this is the expiation of your oaths when you swear, i.e. when you swear and break it.

The clauses: "the feeding of ten poor men out of the average (food) you feed your families with, or their clothing, or the freeing of a neck", mention three items of expiation, any one of which may be chosen by the person concerned – because of the conjunction, 'or'; i.e. all three are not to be joined together.

The clause: but whoever cannot find (means) then fasting for three days, prove that the above three items are matters of choice, without looking at their sequence. Otherwise, the clause: but whoever cannot find . . ., would be meaningless, as in case of sequential expi-ation, it should have been, "or fasting for three days".

The verse contains many legislative details, for which reference should be made to Jurisprudence.

QUR'ÃN: this is the expiation of your oaths when you swear; . . .*: As mentioned earlier, it means: when you swear and break it.

The demonstrative pronouns, dhālika (ذٰلِكَ = this is) and kadhālika (كَذٰلِكَ = thus) are of second person singular, while the pro-nouns that follow them in: "your oaths", and, clear to you, are second person plural. In a way, the speech turns from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to the believers. Probably, it is because the divine elaboration reaches the people through the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), as Allāh has said: . . . and We have revealed to you the Reminder that you may make clear to men what has been revealed to them, and that haply they may reflect (16:44).

QUR'ĀN: Thus does Allāh make clear to you His signs, that you may be grateful: He makes clear to you, through His Prophet, His commandments, so that you may express your gratitude to Him by learning those commandments and acting on them.

TRADITIONS

al-Qummī narrates under the verse: O you who believe! Do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allāh has made lawful for you. Narrated to me my father, from Ibn Abī ʻUmayr, from some of his men, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), that he said, "This verse was revealed about the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.), Bilāl and ʻUthmān ibn Maẓʻūn. As for the Leader of the faithful (a.s.), he had sworn that he would never sleep at night; and as for Bilāl, he had sworn that he would never eat during day-time [i.e. would always keep fast]; and as for ʻUthmān ibn Maẓʻūn, he had sworn that he would never indulge in sexual relation.

"Then ʻUthmān's wife came to ʻĀishah – and she was a beauti-ful woman. ʻĀishah said to her, 'Why do I see you without make-up?' She said, 'For whom should I make myself up? By Allāh! My husband has not come near me since a long time, because he has become a monastic, wears course clothes, and has become an ascetic.'

"When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), entered (the house) ʻĀishah informed him of it. So, he came out, and call was given for congregational prayer. People assembled and (the Prophet, s.a.w.a.) ascended the pulpit. He thanked Allāh and praised Him; then said, 'What has happened to (some) people that they have forbidden them-selves good things? Well, surely I sleep at night, and establish sexual relation and eat during day-time; so whoever dislikes my sunnah, he is not from me.'

"Then people stood up and said, 'But O Messenger of Allãh! We have sworn to it. Then Allãh revealed to him: Allãh does not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths, but He calls you to account for the making of deliberate oaths; so its expiation is . . . this is the expiation of your oaths when you swear." (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: It is not clear how the sentences: Allãh does not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths, but He calls you to account for the making of deliberate oaths, could refer to their oaths; and some explanation of it has been given earlier. aṭ-Ṭabrisī has narrated the story in Majma'u 'l-bayãn from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) and that narrative does not have the last paragraph; so meditate over it.

Imãm al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī (peace be on both) said to Mu'ãwiyah and his companions inter alia, in a ḥadīth:

"I adjure you by Allãh, do you know that 'Alī was the first among the companions of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), to forbid the desires to himself; then Allãh revealed: O you who believe! Do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allãh has made lawful for you. (al-Iḥtijãj) [aṭ-Ṭabrisī] writes under the above-mentioned verse: The exegetes have said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), sat one day and reminded the people and described the resurrection. The people were over-whelmed and cried; and ten companions gathered in the house of 'Uthmãn ibn Maẓ'ūn al-Jumaḥī, and they were: 'Alī, Abū Bakr, 'Abdullãh ibn Mas'ūd, Abū Dharr al-Ghifãrī, Sãlim mawlã Abū Ḥudhayfah, 'Abdullãh ibn 'Umar, al-Miqdãd ibn al-Aswad al-Kindī, Salmãn al-Fãrisī and Mu'qil ibn Muqrin. They agreed among them-selves that they would fast in the day and stand (for worship) in the night, would not sleep on bedding; would not partake of meat or fat, nor would go near women or perfume. (They decided) to wear coarse fabrics, discard the world and roam into the earth; some of them even intended to cut off their genitals.

"This news reached the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). He went to the house of 'Uthmãn (ibn Maẓ'ūn) but did not find him there. So he said to his wife – her name was Ḥawlã' and she was a perfume vendor – 'Is it true what I have been informed about your husband and his companions?' She did not like to tell lie to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) nor did she like to speak against her husband; so she said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! If 'Uthmãn has told you so then he has told you the truth.' So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) returned. When 'Uthmãn entered (his house) she informed him about it. So, he and his companions came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said to them, 'Have not I been informed that you have agreed on such and such?' They said, 'Certainly, O Messenger of Allāh! And we did not intend except good.' The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, "I have not been ordered this. Then he said, 'Surely your souls have rights on you; so keep fast and eat, stand (at nights) and sleep. Certainly, I stand (at nights) and sleep, and keep fast and eat, and I partake of meat and fat, and I go to women; and whoever dislikes my sunnah, is not from me.'

"Then he gathered the people and spoke to them; and said, 'What has happened to some people that they have forbidden them-selves women, food and perfume, as well as sleep and desirable things of the world? Well, certainly I have not ordered you to become monks, because it is not in my religion to abstain from meat or women, nor (to live in) hermitages; and surely the wandering of my ummah is fast, and their monasticism is jihād. Worship Allāh and do not associate anything with Him; perform ḥajj and 'umrah, establish prayer, pay zakāt and keep fast of Ramaḍān; and remain straight, it will remain right for you. Those who were before you fell in perdition only because of zealotry. They put heavy burdens on themselves, so Allāh intensified their load. So, these are their remnants in hermitages and monastries. Then Allāh revealed this verse.'" (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The author says: It appears by referring to the traditions that this narrative is a synopsis of traditions on this topic; there are a lot of such traditions, and aṭ-Ṭabrisī has written it here after combining them together and abridging them into one tradition.

As for those numerous narrations, none of them mentions names of those companions together. The most comprehensive of them says, 'Uthmān ibn Maẓ'ūn and his companions; some others say, a group of the companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); still others say, some people among the companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.)[26]. Likewise, the differ-ent sentences of the Prophet's talk and his detailed sermon are found scattered in various traditions. In the same way, the narratives do not say clearly that each of those companions had intended to avoid all those good things. Rather some traditions clearly show that various companions had wanted to leave out various things. al-Bukhārī and Muslim narrate from 'Āishah that some companions had asked the wives of the Prophet

[26] aṭ-Ṭabrisī has named nine of them in this composite narration. Obviously, he has gleaned these names from various traditions. (tr.)

(s.a.w.) about his life in secret. Then some of them said: "I'll not eat meat"; some said: "I'll not go to women"; and some others said: "I'll not sleep in bedding." This news reached the Prophet (s.a.w.), so he said, "What is the matter with the people, that some of them say this and this? But as for me, I keep fast and eat, sleep and stand (in prayer), and eat meat and go to the women; so whoever dislikes my sunnah is not from me."

Probably, when aṭ-Ṭabrisī says that "they agreed among themselves that they would fast . . .", he does not mean that each of them had intended to do all those things; he only means that those people among themselves had decided to do one or the other of those things.

Although the traditions vary in their themes and there are weak, mursal and reliable ones among them, yet meditation on all of them creates a certainty that a group of the companions had decided to adopt that type of abstinence and asceticism, and ‘Alī (a.s.) and ‘Uthmān ibn Maẓ‘ūn were among them, and that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had said to them, "Whoever dislikes my sunnah is not from me." And Allāh knows better. You should refer to the books of exegesis which explain the Qur’ān with the help of traditions, like at-Tafsīr of aṭ-Ṭabarī, ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, Fatḥu 'l-qadīr and so on.

It has been narrated by at-Tirmidhī (who said that it was good), Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Ibn ‘Udayy (in al-Kāmil), aṭ-Ṭabarānī and Ibn Marduwayh, from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said, "A man came to the Prophet (s.a.w.) and said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! Whenever I eat meat I become roused and overcome by sexual desire; and I have forbidden meat to myself.' Then the verse was revealed: O you who believe! Do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allāh has made lawful for you." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from Zayd ibn Aslam that he said, "Verily ‘Abdullāh ibn Rawāḥah had a guest from among his relatives; and he (‘Abdullāh) was near the Prophet (s.a.w.). Then he returned to his family and found that they had not given food to their guest, waiting for him (to return). So he said to his wife, 'You detained my guest because of me, this (food) is unlawful to me.' So his wife said, 'It is unlawful to me'; the guest said, 'It is unlawful to me. When (‘Abdullāh) saw this, he put his hand (in food) and said, 'Eat you in the name of Allāh.' Then he went to the Prophet (s.a.w.) and informed him. The Prophet (s.a.w.) said, 'You did right.' Then Allāh revealed: O you who believe! Do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allāh has made lawful for you. (ibid.)

The author says: Possibly, the two reasons mentioned in the last two traditions are the narrators' attempts to fit an event on the verse, and this is very common in the reasons of revelation. Also, possibly there may be several reasons for a single verse.

ʻAbdullāh ibn Sinān said, "I asked him [the Imām] about a man who said that his wife would be divorced, or his slaves would be free, if he drank any unlawful or lawful (drink). (The Imām) said, 'As for the unlawful he should not go near it, whether he swore the oath or did not swear; and as for the lawful he should not leave it, because he has no right to forbid what Allāh has made lawful, because Allāh says: O you who believe! Do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allāh has made lawful for you; therefore, there is nothing on him regarding his oath concerning lawful things.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

The author says: al-ʻAyyāshī has narrated in his at-Tafsīr a similar ḥadīth from ʻAbdullāh ibn Sinān; and another similar one from Muḥammad ibn Muslim with one difference at the end where it says, "no serious thought on it."

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Ibn ʻAbbās that he said, "When the verse: O you who believe! Do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allāh has made lawful for you, was revealed regarding those who had forbidden women and meat to themselves, they said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! What should we do with the oaths which we have made?' Then Allāh revealed: Allāh does not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This tradition resembles the end part of the first tradition, which we have quoted in the beginning. The trouble is that it does not fit the apparent meaning of the verse, because making oath for avoiding an obligatory or permissible action is not devoid of deliberate serious thought; the verse has put: what is vain in your oaths, opposite the clause: making of deliberate oaths; it shows that a vain oath is that which is devoid of deliberation and thinking. This apparent meaning agrees with the ḥadīth which explains vain oath as someone's saying, 'No, by Allãh', and 'Certainly, by Allãh' without any serious thought on it. As for that oath which is nullified by the sharī'ah, it is, or was, made with deliberate seriousness. Therefore it is impera-tive to ascribe its nullification to the sunnah, not the Book.

Moreover, the context of the verse is the strongest proof that it aims independently at describing the expiation of breaking of oath, and orders to preserve its sanctity; and it is not just an aside, as that explanation would make it.

COMMENTARY

The verses are in conformity with each other in context; prob-ably they all were revealed together or at short intervals. The last verse aims at removing a possible misunderstanding, as we shall describe. All this deals with the topic of intoxicants, although one adds to it the games of chance; and the other, games of chance and sacrificing to set up stones and dividing by arrows.

It has been mentioned earlier in volume two of the book under the verse[27]: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance. Say: "In both of them there is a great sin and (some) profit for men; and their sin is greater than their profit." (2:219); and in volume four[28] under the verse: O you who believe! Do not go near prayer when you are intoxicated until you know (well) what you say, . . . (4:43), that these two verses together with the verse: Say: "My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed, and sin . . . (7:33), and the verses under dis-cussion, i.e.: O you who believe! Intoxicants and games of chance and (sacrificing to) stones set up and (dividing by) arrows are only an abomination of the Satan's handiwork; shun it therefore that you may be successful. The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst by means of intoxicants and games of chance, and to keep you off from the remembrance of Allãh and from prayer. Will you then desist? If these verses are studied together, their diverse context shows that the Legislator had adopted a course of gradual pro-gression in prohibition of intoxicants.

By gradual progression we do not mean that He had gone step by step; that it began with aversion and loathing, then displeasure, and finally ended at clear prohibition; giving an example of abrogation. Nor do we say that it had progressed from vague description to clear declaration, or from secret allusion to clear statement because of the religious policy in enforcement of the laws of sharī'ah. Such ideas are untenable because the verse 7:33 had clearly prohibited 'sin', and it was in a Meccan chapter; then came the verse that in them there is a great sin (2:219), and it is in the chapter of "The Cow" which was the first detailed chapter revealed at Medina. When these two verses are studied in conjunction, they clearly show the prohibition of intoxicants without leaving any room for any excuse or re-interpretation.

The gradual progression mentioned above, in fact, means that the Qur'ān first forbade the intoxicants in a general context, and it was when it described it as a sin. Then it went ahead by prohibiting it in particular in the form of advice and admonition; this method was used in the verses: Say: "In both of them there is a great sin and some profit for men; and their sin is greater than their profit"; and, do not go near prayer when you are intoxicated until you know (well) what you say (if this verse had spoken about intoxication of liquor, and not of sleep). Finally, there came the prohibition of intoxicants in particular conjoined with the most emphatic intensity which is seen in the verses under discussion: O you who believe! Intoxicants and games of chance and (sacrificing to) stones set up and (dividing by) arrows are only an abomination of the Satan's handiwork; shun it therefore that you may be successful. The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst by means of intoxicants and games of chance, and to keep you off from the remembrance of Allāh and from prayer. Will you then desist?

These verses were the last to be revealed concerning the intoxicants. We may easily see as to how many devices of emphasis have been used in them: They begin with innamā (إِنَّمَا = but only); then name it "an abomination" and ascribe it to the Satan's handiwork; then give an unambiguous order to shun it and give the hope that by shun-ning it "you may be successful"; then it elaborates the evil conse-quences of taking intoxicants, and asks them whether they would desist.[29] This is followed by the order of obeying Allāh and His Messenger and warning them to be cautious, implying that Allāh and His Messenger have no need of them if they disobey their laws. The last verse of this piece (There is no blame on those who . . .) also hints to this connotation, as we shall explain later.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Intoxicants and games of chance and* (sacrificing to) stones set up and* (dividing by) arrows are only an abomination of the Satan's handiwork; shun it therefore that you may be successful*: The meanings of intoxicant, games of chance, sacri-ficing to set up stones and dividing by arrows have been explained in the beginning of this chapter. al-Khamr (اَلْخَمْرُ) is every intoxicating fermented liquid, which covers the reason. al-Maysir (اَلْمَيْسِرُ) is gamb-ling of any type. al-Anṣãb (اَلأَنْصَابُ) means the idols or stones which were set up for slaughtering the sacrificial animals upon, and which were held in esteem and considered a source of blessings. al-Azlãm (اَلأَزْلاَمُ) were the arrows used for division of a camel's shares; often this name was given to the arrows used for omen before beginning an important work like journey, etc. But this word has been used in the chapter's beginning for the former meaning (because it is included among the things unlawful to eat); therefore, it has the same meaning in this verse too.

Objection: Games of chance in its general meaning includes the former meaning of al-azlãm, i.e. division by arrows; and there is no reason to mention a particular after the general without any apparent cause. Therefore, the only alternative would be to interprete al-azlãm as the arrows of oracle, which was common feature in the Era of Ignorance. A poet had said:

If the tribe of Judhaymah have killed their (own) chiefs,
So their women hit with arrows.

Reportedly, the method of oracle-seeking through arrows was like this: They used to take three slim arrow-like pieces of wood; on one was written, 'Do'; on another was written, 'Don't do'; and the third was left blank; all three were put in a small bag, and all were similar (in size, etc.). When a man wanted to begin any important work, like a journey, etc., he took out one arrow; if it was the one with 'Do', he determined to do it; if the arrow was the one with 'Don't do', the idea was abandoned; if the blank arrow came out, the process was repeated – until one of the written arrows came out. This method was called istiqsãm (to seek a share), i.e. what is in his fate like sustenance or some other good things. The verse proves its unlawfulness because it contains the claim of the knowledge of future. The same is the position of similar other things like istikhãrah by rosary and so on.

Reply: You have seen that the clause: [Forbidden to you is] . . . that you divide by the arrows, which has come at the beginning of the chapter [verse 3], manifestly speaks about prohibition of dividing the meat of an animal by using the arrows, which was a sort of gambling, because it is included among the unlawful food; and it supports the view that in this verse too 'arrows' has the same connotation.

However, if we admit that this verse has no connection with the verse 3, then the word 'arrows' will be having more than one meaning, and it will need an association for pinpointing its intended meaning; in sort, its interpretation will depend on traditions. And there are numer-ous traditions narrated from the Imãms of Ahlul 'l-Bayt (a.s.) which allow seeking divine guidance through rosary, etc. when one feels really perplexed. [It is generally called istikhãrah, i.e to seek good. (tr.)]

What is istikhãrah? When man intends to embark on an import-ant work, it is possible for him to know of its appropriateness, by using the power of thought which Allãh has given him, or by seeking the advice of those who have the ability to distinguish between right and wrong. However, if these two methods fail to make him recognize the correct way, and he is still bewildered, then he should choose his course of action after paying some attention to his Lord, and seeking His help.

When man chooses what he chooses through this type of seeking good, or istikhãrah, he cannot be accused of claiming to know the unseen; nor does he meddle with the divine affairs, which are ex-clusively reserved with Allãh. It does not involve allowing someone other than Allãh to join with Him in management of affairs, nor it entails any other religious problem. Because the only function of istikhãrah is to decide positively or negatively about a course of action without making it obligatory or unlawful or giving it any other shade of religious responsibility. Also, it does not claim to unveil the good or the evil that is hidden behind the curtains of the unseen. It only shows what is better for the man concerned whether he should or should not do that work; in this way he comes out of bewilderment and hesitation [with a firm resolve.]

As for what follows that action or non-action, it may turn out to be good and it may equally result in evil – in the same way as it hap-pens when a man opts for a course of action by his own thinking or by someone's advice. Thus, istikhãrah, like one's own thinking or well-wishers' advice, is merely a way to remove hesitation or confusion while taking a practical step; and the result of acting upon it is not different from that of an action done by one's own meditation or by someone's

Of course, someone may think looking at the traditions about seeking good omens from the Qur'ãn, etc., that it entails a sort of a claim of the knowledge of the unseen; because often the soul expects from it good or bad result, or benefit or harm. But it has been narrated in correct ḥadīth, through the chains of both sects that the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) saught good omen by good things and ordered it, and forbade (to believe in) ill omen and ordered to pass over it and rely on Allãh.

Therefore, there is nothing to prevent seeking omen from the Qur'ãn, etc.; if the result of that omen seeking is good, it is OK. Otherwise, he should proceed ahead in that affair relying on Allãh, the High. Its ultimate effect is to creat satisfaction in mind about the affairs and actions, which he believes, would bring happiness and benefit to him. We shall write on this topic in detail in a place devoted to it particularly.

Now, it is clear that some exegetes are totally wrong when they have taken the 'arrows' as referring to their practice of oracle seeking; and then arriving at the conclusion that istikhãrah was unlawful.

As for the clause: an abomination of the satan's handiwork: ar-rijs (اَلرِّجْسُ = abomination) is dirty thing as ar-Rãghib has said in his al-Mufradãt; so ar-rajãsah (اَلرَّجَاسَة) like an-najãsah (اَلنَّجَاسَة) and al-qadhãrah (اَلْقَذَارَة) is that factor because of which one keeps away and refrains from a thing as the nature distastes it.

The items enumerated in the verse – intoxicants, games of chance, sacrificing to set up stones and dividing by arrows – are described as abominations because they have such a characteristic which the human nature is repulsed with and does not like to go near it. And that characteristic is its being devoid of all such things that contain human happiness – the happiness which sometimes appears in its pure form, which is probably alluded to in the divine words: they ask you about intoxicants and games of chance. Say: "In both of them there is a great sin and (some) profit for men; and their sin is greater than their profit" (2:219). Note how sin is given dominance over profit without exception.

Probably, that is the reason why these abominations have been ascribed to the Satan's handiwork alone without joining him to others. Then He says in the next verse: The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst by means of intoxicants and games of chance, and to keep you off from remembrance of Allãh and from prayer.

It is because Allãh has clearly described the Satan as the enemy of man who never wants any good to reach to man. He says: . . . surely the Satan is an open enemy to man (12:5). Against him it is written down that whoever takes him for a friend, he shall lead him astray . . . (22:4); . . . and they do not call on anything but a rebellious Satan; Allāh has cursed him; . . . (4:117-8) In these verses Allāh has confirmed His curse on the Satan and has removed him away from every good.

Also, He has mentioned that the Satan's contact with man and the extent of his action about him is only through seduction, temptation and enticement by putting ideas in his mind; as Allāh quotes him as saying: He said: "My Lord! Because thou hast left me to stray, I will certainly make (evil) fair seeming to them on earth, and I will certainly cause them all to deviate, except Thy servants from among them, the freed ones." He said: "This is a straight path with Me: Surely as regards My servants, thou hast no authority over them except those who follow thee of the deviators." (15:39-42). It should be noted that the Satan had threatened only to cause them to deviate, and Allāh negated the Satan's authority except on his followers from among the deviators. Again, Allāh quotes him as speaking to the children of Adam on the Day of Resurrection: . . . and I had no authority over you, except that I called you and you answered my call, . . . (14:22). And Allāh describes the Satan's call in these words: O children of Adam! Let not the Satan cause you to fall into affliction as he got your parents out from the garden, . . . he surely sees you, he as well as his host, from whence you cannot see them; . . . (7:27). It means that his call is not like men calling someone being face to face with each other; but the Satan calls men while he sees them but not vice versa.

This topic has been clarified in the chapter 114, where it says: From the evil of the whisperings of the slinking Satan, who whispers into the hearts of men, from among the jinn and the men (vrs.4-6). Thus, Allāh makes it clear that the Satan's dealings with man are based on his creating ideas in man's heart, and in this way he calls him to error.

All this shows that when intoxicants and other items are called abominations of the Satan's handiwork, it is because these items are ultimately based on the Satan's action which is exclusively related to him; and his modus operandi is creating ideas in man's heart – the Satanic whispering that calls him to error. That is why it is called abomination or uncleanness; Allāh has called error as uncleanness, as He says: . . . and (for) whomsoever He intends that He should leave him to err, He makes his breast strait and narrow as though he were ascending into the sky; thus does Allāh lay uncleanness on those who do not believe (6:126).

What is the connotation of intoxicants and other items being an abomination of the Satan's handiwork? The next verse clarifies it: The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst by means of intoxicants and games of chance, and to keep you off from the remembrance of Allãh and from prayer. That is, the Satan's motive in calling you to intoxicants and games of chance is nothing except evil; thus it is an abomination of his handiwork.

Objection: The sum total of the above explanation is that the intoxicants and other items mentioned therein are abominations only because making it, drinking it [or using it] ultimately returns to the satanic temptation. But several traditions prove that it was the Satan himself who appeared before man and made liquor for the first time and taught him how to make it.

Reply: Yes. Although these traditions are merely solitary and as such it is not incumbent on us to accept them; yet there are many and diver-sified traditions, narrated under different chapters, which show that the Satan took shape and appeared before many prophets and friends of Allãh and even before some other men. Also, there are reports about the angels appearing before them. There are still other nar-rations showing that the world and the deeds take [human or other] shapes; and so on. The divine Book too supports this view to some extent, as Allãh says: . . . then We sent to her Our spirit, and so he appeared to her as a well-made man (19:17). We shall fully discuss this topic, God willing, in the exegesis of the chapter 15, under the verse: Glory be to Him Who made His servant to go on a night . . . (vr.1), or in some other appropriate place.

It should be understood that if a report or story appears in one or more traditions, it does not have the authority to change the appar-ent connotation of a Qur'ãnic verse, especially when it is supported by other verses. The verses clearly show that the Satan has no more authority on man than creating ideas in his mind. Even if he appeared in physical form before a man and made something or taught him to make it, the net result was no more than seduction and temptation in his mind or imparting some information and knowledge. You should wait for the coming elaborate discussion.

"Shun it therefore that you may be successful": It lays down the prohibition in unambiguous words, after describing its evil effects; this style has more impact on the souls. Then is expressed the hope of being successful if they would shun it. This gives intense emphasis to the prohibition, as it asserts that there would be no hope of success for those who would not refrain from these abominations.

QUR'ĀN: The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst . . . Will you then desist?*: ar-Rāghib has said in his al-Mufradāt: "al-'Adw (اَلْعَدْو) connotes overstepping, transgression and disharmony; sometimes it is related to heart, then it is called enmity and feud; at other times it is ascribed to walking, then it is called running; yet at other occasions it refers to lack of justice in dealings, then it means transgression and overstepping; Allāh says: . . . lest exceeding the limits they should abuse Allāh out of ignorance. . . . [6:108]; at times it refers to parts of habitation, and then it is said, al-'adwā' (اَلْعَدْوَاء), they say: a place having 'adwā', i.e. whose parts are not in harmony with each other; from 'enmity' is derived 'aduww (عَدُوّ) so they say, enemy man, enemy nation; Allāh says: . . . some of you being the enemies of others; . . . [2:36]. Its plural comes as 'idayy (عِدًى) and a'dā' (اَعْدَاء); Allāh says: And on the day that the enemies of Allāh shall be brought together . . ." [41:19].

al-Bughḍ (اَلْبُغْضُ) and al-baghḍā' (اَلْبَغْضَاءُ) are the opposites of love (اَلْحُبُّ); aṣ-ṣadd (اَلصَدُّ = to turn away); al-intihā' (اَلإِنْتِهَاءُ) is to obey a prohibition; also it is opposite of beginning (اَلإِبْتِدَاءُ).

As mentioned earlier, this verse aims at explaining the clause: the Satan's handiwork, or an abomination of the Satan's handiwork. It is the reality of these items being: the Satan's handiwork, or an abom-ination of the Satan's handiwork, that the only goal and purpose he wants to achieve from the intoxicants and the games of chance (which are abominations of his handiwork only) is to create enmity and hatred amongst you by making you transgress your limits and hate one another, as well as to divert your attention from the remembrance of Allāh and from prayer, keeping you engaged in the intoxicants, games of chance, sacrifing to set up stones and dividing by arrows.

Only the intoxicants and the games of chance are singled out as causing enimity and hatred, because the two effects are their more appar-ent results. Look at liquor and intoxicants: Its use agitates nervous system in such a way that it covers and dominates the reason and brings up bigotry. If it incites anger, it lets the intoxicated person commit any felony, however serious and ugly it might be, which even beasts of pray do not do. If incites desire and lust, it makes to seem fair in his eyes all types of ugliness and debauchery, be it in his self, property or honour, in what he believes to be sacred and sanctified in religion or society, etc. He will commit theft and embezzlement, will not keep a secret, nor maintain the limit of a prohibited thing; in short he will indulge in affairs, which are destructive to humanity. Available data show that intoxicants have the lion's share in various types of felonies and debaucheries in that society where drinking liquor is prevalent.

As for the games of chance, i.e. gambling, it squanders in a short time all the endeavours a man had exercised for a long period in acquirement of wealth, property and status. Gambling throws the wealth away, and often it destroys honour, life, and prestige. If a gam-bler wins and gets wealth, it encourages him to abandon moderate way of life and indulge extravagantly in debauchery; he becomes indiffer-ent towards earning his livelihood through lawful means. And if he loses, the loss of wealth and bitterness of defeat, leads to enemy and hatred towards the winner, and leaves irritation and grief in its wake.

Although these evil results do not manifest themselves so clearly to the simple minds in infrequent and rare cases for the first or second time, but the rare leads to dominant, the little pulls to numerous, and once becomes many times; and it does not take long for this evil to prevail in the society, and seep through all strata of the community; it thus turns into a barbaric free for all where unruly passions dominate and destructive desires rule.

All this shows that the exclusive particle innamã (إِنَّمَا = only, but) in the verse: "The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst by means of intoxicants and games of chance, and to keep you off from the remembrance of Allãh and from prayer", covers all the items enumerated earlier on the whole, yet prevention from the remembrance of Allãh and from prayer is inflicted by all, and the enmity and hatred are especial effects of the intoxicants and games of chance by nature.

Although prayer is a kind of the remembrance of Allãh, yet Allãh has mentioned it separately in the clause: "and to keep you off from the remembrance of Allãh and from prayer"; it shows how much importance the prayer has in the eyes of sharī'ah, because it is the perfect entity of the remembrance. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has said in a correct ḥadīth: 'The prayer is the pillar of religion'; and the Qur'ãn in numerous verses shows its unparalleled significance, which no one can entertain any doubt about. For example: Successful indeed are the believers, who are humble in their prayers (23:1-2); And (as for) those who hold fast by the Book and keep up prayer, surely We do not waste the reward of the right-doers

(7:170); Surely man is created of a hasty temperament; being greatly grieved when evil afflicts him, and niggardly when good befalls him, except those who pray (70:19-22); Recite that which has been revealed to you of the Book and keep up prayer; surely prayer keeps (one) away from indecency and evil, and certainly the remembrance of Allãh is the greatest . . . (29:45); . . . then hasten to the remembrance of Allãh . . . (62:9), [it refers to prayer]; . . . and keep up prayer for My remembrance (20:14); and there are many other such verses.

Allãh, in this verse under discussion, has given precedence to His remembrance over prayer, because the remembrance is the only objective of the Divine Mission; it is the spirit of life in the body of servitude, and the basis of happiness in this world and the next. It may be seen in the words of Allãh to Adam the first day He laid down the sharī'ah for him: He said: "Get down you two therefrom, all (of you), one of you (is) enemy to another. So if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy. And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life, and We shall raise him, on the Day of Resurrection, blind." (20:123-4); And on the day when He shall gather them, and whatever they worshipped besides Allãh, He shall say: "Was it you who led astray these my servants, or did they themselves go astray from the path?" They shall say: "Glory be to Thee! It was not beseeming for us that we should take any guardians besides Thee, but Thou didst make them and their fathers to enjoy until they forsook the remembrance, and they were a people in perdition." (25:17-18); Therefore turn aside from him who turns his back upon Our remem-brance and does not desire anything but this world's life. That is the (last) reach of their knowledge; . . . (53:29-30).

Remembrance in the Qur'ãnic verses only connotes that which stands opposite to oblivion of the side of Lordship which brings in its wake oblivion of the side of servitude; and the servitude, the humble adoration, is that religious behaviour which is the only path to bring good fortune and happiness to the soul. Allãh says: And be not like those who forgot Allãh, so He made them forget their own souls . . . (59:19).

As for the end clause: "Will you then desist?" it is a reproving question, which indicates that the Muslims had somehow failed to desist from the prohibitions that had preceded this one. The verse: "The Satan only desires . . ." is a sort of explanation that explains the verse: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance. Say: "In both of them there is a great sin and some profit for men; and their sin is greater than their profit." (2:219). That is, their profit which is sup-posed to accompany the great sin is not of a type that could be separ-ated at sometime from the sin or the greater sin; unlike the lie which contains sin and profit, and occasionally its profit may be separated from its sin, e.g., a lie spoken for removing misunderstanding between two persons.

It is because of the exclusive particle: "only", in the verse: "The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst by means of intoxicants and games of chance, and to keep you off from the remembrance of Allãh and from prayer", which comes after the words: only an abomination of the Satan's handiwork. It means that it is nothing other than an abomination of the Satan's handiwork, and the Satan's only aim is to create enmity and hatred among you through the intoxicants and the games of chance, and to prevent you from the remem-brance of Allãh and from the prayer. In this framework, no situation can arise where these items' profit could be separated from their sin. In no circustances they could ever be supposed to be lawful. Understand it.

QUR'ÃN: And obey Allãh and the Messenger and be cautious; . . . on Our Messenger: The verse emphasizes the preceding command to abstain from these abominations. It does so by first ordering obedi-ence to Allãh, and He has the authority to lay down a law; then by ordering obedience to the Messenger, and he has the authority of implementation; and lastly by giving warning in clear words.

Then comes further emphasis in the words: "but if you turn back, then know that only a clear deliverance (of the message) is (incumbent) on Our Messenger." This emphasis contains a serious warning, particularly as it begins with the word: "then know"; it has an allusion that if you turn back and indulge in these sins, probably you think that you are showing arrogance to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) by going against his prohibition and that in this way you have defeated him; but you do not understand – or you have forgotten – that he is Our Messenger to you; he has no authority except a clear delivery of the message which is revealed to him and which he is ordered to deliver; actually you are only disputing with Allãh in His Lordship.

It has been described in the beginning that these verses contain numerous modes of emphasizing the prohibition of these items. Look how it begins with the words: O you who believe! Then comes the exclusive particle, innamã (only), then its description as an abomin-ation, then its ascription to the Satan's handiwork, then the clear order to shun it; then the hope of success resulting from that shunning. Then comes the description of their general evil – enmity and hatred, averting from remembrance of Allāh and from prayer. Then the rebuke at their indifference to desisting followed by the command to obey Allāh and the Messenger, and the final warning in case of turning away after the clear deliverance.

QUR'ĀN: There is no blame on those who believe and do good for what they have eaten, when they fear Allāh and believe and do good, then they fear Allāh and believe, then they fear Allāh and do good, and Allāh loves those who do good*: aṭ-Ṭa'm (اَلطَّعْمُ) and aṭ-ṭa'ām (اَلطَعَامُ) means to eat; it is used for taking food, not drink; the Madinans use it for wheat only; sometimes it is used in the meaning of taste, and then it is used for drinking too, as it is for eating. Allāh says: . . . whoever then drinks from it, he is not of me, and whoever does not taste of it, he is surely of me, . . . (2:249). And it has come in a ḥadīth of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said about the water of Zamzam: "Verily it is (ṭa'ām ṭu'min – طَعَامُ طُعْمٍ) a satisfier of the stomach (of man, like as is food), and a remady for a disease."

The context of the verse makes it certain that it is connected with the preceding verses. As such it aims at answering an unspoken question: What will be the position of those believers who were indulged in drinking liquor before the revelation of (its) prohibition, or before the revelation of these verses? It is because the words: "for what they have eaten" are general, it is not restricted by anything that could restrict it. The verse aims at removing blame from this general food, and this removal of blame has been qualified with the clauses: "when they fear Allāh and believe, then they fear Allāh and do good." This condition in which fear of Allāh or piety has been mentioned three times makes it certain that it means intense piety, as the piety should be.

Now, let us see what would be the implication of the disavowal of blame from pious believers for whatever they eat (lawful nourish-ment): If it implies assertion of blame for the opposite group, i.e. affirmation of general prohibition to non-pious persons from all be-lievers and unbelievers, it is rebuttable by verses such as: Say: "Who has prohibited the embellishment of Allāh which He has brought forth for His servants and the good provisions?" Say: "These are for the believers in the life of this world, purely (theirs) on the Resurrection Day; . . ." (7:32).

Moreover, it is known from the taste of this religion that it does not stop anyone from savouring the lawful good things which human nature is bound to use in the life.

Alternatively, if the verse is not meant to show its prohibition to the opposite group, then it would imply that that food is lawful for those who believe and do good provided that they fear Allãh, then fear Allãh, and then fear Allãh. But it is known that its lawfulness is not restricted to the believers who do good, rather it is common to be-lievers and unbelievers altogether; and even if we suppose that it is restricted to them, no one says that the permission depends on such a hard condition. [As both these alternatives are untenable, the suppo-sition, that the verse removes blame from pious believers for whatever lawful food they eat, has no leg to stand upon.]

There are many such interpretations, based on the view that: "for what they have eaten" refers to lawful food in a general way; but none is free from either of the two objections mentioned above. It is because the meaning given by them revolves around the following proposition: There is no blame on those who believe and do good, when they avoid unlawful things, for eating lawful things. And this meaning cannot be free from either objection, as is clearly understood.

Some have said: There is an omission in verse; the complete verse is as follows: There is no blame on those who believe and do good for what they have eaten and for other things when they abstain from unlawful things.

COMMENT: It supposes an omission without any proof to support it; apart from that, the original objection still stands.

Someone else has said: The belief and good deed altogether is not a real condition; the main idea is to show the obligatoriness of avoiding unlawful things, and belief and good deed have been joined to it to show its compulsoriness.

COMMENT: The verse manifestly shows that it aims at removal of blame for what they have eaten, and it is not dependent on belief, good deed, or avoidance of unlawful things – as we have explained earlier. How far is this supposed meaning from the apparent meaning of the verse!

A third one has said: So far as a believer is concerned, it is all right to say that there is no blame on him; but an unbeliever deserves punishment, so he cannot be declared blameless.

COMMENT: There is no reason why the verse should be restricted to the believers. In fact, it is not unlike the verse: Say: "Who has pro-hibited the embellishment of Allāh which He has brought forth for His servants and the good provision?" . . . (7:32); and the verse: Say: "I do not find in that which has been revealed to me anything forbidden for an eater to eat of except that it be what has died of itself, or blood poured forth, or flesh of swine . . ." (6:145), inasmuch as it lays down a general principle without addressing it to believer or unbeliever. Or it is like the verse: O you people! Surely We have created you of a male and a female and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allāh is the one among you who is most pious. (49:13), as it is addressed to the people, which include believers and unbelievers both.

Another one has said: The unbeliever has closed for himself the path of knowing unlawfulness and lawfulness; that is why the verse speaks particularly about the believers.

COMMENT: The objections mentioned earlier apply to this interpretation also; moreover, it does not remove the difficulty arising out of the words: when they fear Allāh . . .

Thus, it is appropriate to say that the verse is connected with the preceding ones, and it looks at the condition of those Muslims who had indulged in drinking liquor, or in using it or eating from winnings of gambling or from what had been sacrificed to idols. It appears as if they had asked, after the clear prohibition was revealed to them, regarding him who had used liquor or indulged in other unlawful things mentioned above, before the revelation of prohibition – from among those Muslims who had passed away, or those who were present at that time and had willingly surrendered to the divine law.

Now, this verse answers their question, saying that there was no blame on those Muslims provided they were among those who believed and did good deeds, if they were proceeding on the path of piety with belief in Allāh and good deeds, then believing in every law revealed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), then doing good in acting according to the revealed commandment.

It appears from the above discourse that the relative clause: "what they have eaten", refers to intoxicants [and 'eaten' stands for drunk]; or it includes all the above mentioned items – intoxicants, gamb-ling, and animals sacrificed to stones or divided by arrows – while the eating points to their various uses. The meaning: There is no blame on those who believe and do good for what they have tasted – before the revelation of prohibition – of intoxicants; or of intoxicants and the other unlawful items described in the verse.

The clauses: "when they fear Allãh and believe and do good deeds, then they fear Allãh and believes, then they fear Allãh and do good." Apparently, the clause: "when they fear Allãh and believe and do good deeds," repeats the same theme that has been described in the preceding clause: "There is no blame on those who believe and do good deeds"; it shows that these characteristics of belief and good deeds have a hand in nullification of blame. The same style is seen in the verse: . . . with this is admonished whosoever among you believes in Allãh and the last day . . . (2:232). Such expressions are widely used in the language.

The clause: then they fear Allãh and believe: It takes into account "belief after the first mentioned belief." It can only mean a detailed belief in every law brought by the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) from his Lord, without rejection or denial; inevitably it implies submission to the Messenger in all that he orders and forbids. Allãh says: O you who believe! Fear Allãh and believe in His Messenger: . . . (57:28); And We did not send any messenger but that he should be obeyed by Allãh's permission; . . . But no! By your Lord! They do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then do not find any straitness in their hearts as to what you have decided and submit with total submission (4:64-65). There are numerous verses of this theme.

The clause: "then they fear Allãh and do good." Apparently, it adds doing good to the belief after belief, with an aim to show its im-portance. al-Iḥsãn (اَلإِحْسَانُ) means performance of an act because of its goodness – without false intentions. Allãh says: Surely (as for) those who believe and do good, We do not waste the reward of him who does a good work (18:30). Also, He says: (As for) those who responded to the call of Allãh and the Messenger (even) after the wound had afflicted them, those among them who do good and fear (Allãh) shall have a great reward (3:172). That is, their response emanates from their seeking near-ness to Allãh and their total submission to Him, and not for any other motive. al-Iḥsãn (doing good) is also used as transitive verb, i.e., to do with someone what he thinks good; as Allãh says: . . . and (you shall do) good to (your) parents, . . . (2:83); . . . and do good (to others) as Allãh has done good to you, . . . (28:77).

According to the context the first of the two meanings is more appropriate for the clause under discussion, i.e. to do a work because of its goodness. The religious piety is not given its full due with merely believing in Allãh and affirming truth of His religion, unless one believes in detail in each and every laid down law of the sharī'ah; because rejection of even one of those laws is rejection of the religion itself. And even the detailed belief in each and every law does not give piety its full due unless he acts according to the law in good manner, proceeding according to the demands of the law by implementing it or abstaining from it; and that proceeding must be based on total obedi-ence, not on a hypocritical intention. Therefore, it is incumbent on him who is equipped with provision of piety to believe in Allãh and do good deeds, and to believe in His Messenger in all that he has brought with him, proceeding in all this on the path of obedience and good-doing.

The verse has repeated piety (fear of Allãh) three times and has qualified all the three stages with it. It emphatically points to the fact that all three stages must be connected to real piety without any shade of any other irreligious motive. It has been mentioned somewhere in the preceding discourses that piety is not a special religious position; it is rather a spiritual condition that co-exists with all spiritual positions. In other words, each spiritual station has a particular piety, which is reserved to it.

In short, the foregoing discourse shows that the verse means as follows: There is no blame on those who believe and do good deeds for what they had tasted and used of the intoxicants and the other un-lawful items, provided they adhere to piety in all their conditions, hold fast to the belief in Allãh and His Messenger, and do good deeds by performing all obligatory things and refraining from all unlawful things prohibited to them. However, if they had indulged in any abomination of the Satan's handiwork, before the revelation of the prohibiting verse, before it had reached them, or before they understood its connotation, it will do them no harm.

It is like the words of Allãh in the matter of the change of qiblah, in reply to their query regarding the prayers which they had prayed facing other than the Ka'bah: . . . and Allãh was not going to make your faith to be fruitless; . . . (2:143).

Its context is another witness that the verse: "There is no blame on those who believe and do good deeds, . . ." is connected with the preceding verses, and that it was revealed with those verses (whose language testifies that they were the last to be revealed on the subject of intoxicants); and that some Muslims had not discarded the habit of drinking liquor between the period when the first verses were revealed till the revelation of these verses.

Then the question arose, after these verses were revealed, about the condition of those who had indulged in it: Some had used it before the prohibition; others had done so before learning the law, and some without any excuse. Allãh replied them specifying for each group its order as related to its particular condition. He who drank it while he believed and did good deed – and it could be only those believers who did so before the revelation of prohibition or because they did not know of its unlawfulness – there was no blame on him; and as for others, the law concerning them is different.

The exegetes have written lengthy discussions on this verse. Some are concerned with explanation of: "what they have eaten," and we have given a short detail of it.

Others have expressed their opinions about the end portion of the verse, where it repeats piety and fear of Allãh three times, and repeats belief and then good deeds and ends at doing good. [Their opinions may be summerized as follows]:

The clause: "when they fear Allãh and believe and do good deeds", means: When they avoid unlawful things and remain steadfast on belief and good deeds; then the clause: "then they fear Allãh and believe", means: Then they avoid what has been forbidden them like intoxicants, and believe in its prohibition; and the clause: "then they fear Allãh and do good", means: Then they remain steadfast and con-tinue to firmly shun the disobedience, and remain engaged in good deeds.

This repetition looks at three situations as man uses belief and piety between himself and his soul, between himself and the people, and between himself and Allãh; accordingly doing good means doing good to others.

The repetition looks at three stages: The beginning, the middle, and the end, i.e. the piety as it should be.

The repetition is in consideration of what is feared of. One should leave the forbidden things for fear of chastisement; should avoid doubtful things as a precaution against falling into unlawful things, and should abstain from some permissible things for pre-venting the soul from meanness and keeping it clean from blemish.

The first piety is avoidance of drinking liquor, and the first belief is the belief in Allãh; the second piety is the continuation of the first piety, and the second belief is the continuation of the first one; and the third piety is performance of obligatory deeds, and doing good is performance of supererogatory deeds.

The first piety is avoidance of sins known through reason, and the first belief is believing in Allāh and in evil of theses sins; the second piety is avoidance of sins known through sharī'ah, and the second belief is believing in obligatoriness of avoiding these sins; and the third piety concerns especially with rights of the people and with the injustice and iniquity vis-à-vis other persons; and doing good refers to doing good to others.

The first condition [i.e. when they fear Allāh . . .] is reserved for the past; the second, for its continuation, and the third one is reserved particularly to the people's rights.

There are many similar opinions. But there is no proof either in the wording of the verse or somewhere else that could justify appli-cation of the verse on any of their interpretations; and it becomes manifest when one contemplates on its context and refers to what we have explained earlier.

TRADITIONS

Hishām ibn Sālim narrates from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) that he heard him saying, "While Ḥamzah ibn 'Abdi 'l-Muṭṭalib and (some of) his companions were (drinking) a liquor named as-sukarkah[30]." He said, "Then they talked about ash-sharīf[31], and Ḥamzah said, 'How can we find it?' They said, 'There is this she-camel of your nephew, 'Alī.' So he went forth to it and slaughtered it; then took its liver and hump and brought it to them." He said, "When 'Alī (a.s.), came and saw his she-camel, he was smitten by it. They said to him, 'Your uncle Ḥamzah has done it.'" He said, "So he went to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and com-plained to him of it."

He said, "Then the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) came with him. Ḥamzah was told, 'Here is the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) at the door.'" He said, "So Ḥamzah came out and he was enraged. When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) saw (the sign of) anger in his face, he returned." He said, "Then Ḥamzah said to him, 'If the son of Abū Ṭālib wanted to lead you by a halter he could do it.' Then Ḥamzah entered his house and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) came back."

He said, "It was before (the battle of) Uḥud." He said, "Then Allāh revealed the prohibition of liquor. So, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.)

[30] Liquor made from a variety of sorghum or millet. (tr.)
[31] Its meaning in this context is not clear. (tr.)

ordered their (liquor) pots to be turned over." He said, "Then the call went out to the people to proceed to Uḥud. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) went forth, and the people went forth, and Ḥamzah went forth. He stood in the side of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.)." He said, "When they stood in line, he attacked the people (i.e. unbelievers) until he was swallowed up among them; then he returned to his place. The people (i.e. the believers) said to him: 'Allãh! Allãh! O Uncle of the Messenger of Allãh! That you should go (i.e. die) and there be some-thing against you in the heart of the Messenger of Allãh.'" He said, "Then he attacked again until he disappeared amongst the people; then he returned to his place. They (again) said to him: 'Allãh! Allãh! O Uncle of the Messenger of Allãh! That you should go and there be something against you in the heart of the Messenger of Allãh.'

"So he proceeded towards the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). When he saw him (coming towards him), he proceeded to his direction, embraced him, and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) kissed his forhead, then said, 'Launch attack on the people.' Then Ḥamzah was martyred, and the Messenger of Allãh gave him a shroud of tamrah." Then Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) explained it saying, "Like this suryãnī. When his face was covered his feet were opened, and when his feet were covered his face was opened." He said, "So he covered his face with it and put idhkhir[32] on his feet."

He said, "The people fled away and ʻAlī (a.s.) remained. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said to him, 'What did you do?' He said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! I adhered to (this) place.' He said, 'This was expected of you.'" He said, "And the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), said, 'Fulfil, O my Lord! Your promise to me, because, if you wished (so), You would not be worshipped.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī) az-Zamakhsharī has written: Three verses were revealed on the subject of intoxicants: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance, . . . [2:219]. Some Muslims then left it and some continued to drink; until a man drank it, began his prayer, and talked nonsense. Then was revealed: O you who believe! Do not go near prayer when you are intoxicated until you know (well) what you say, . . . [4:43]. Still some Muslims continued drinking it; until ʻUmar drank it; then he took a jaw-bone of a camel and bashed with it the skull of ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥmãn ibn ʻAwf, and then sat lamenting those (unbelievers) who were killed in the battle of Badr, reciting the poem of al-Aswad ibn Yaghfūr:

[32] A well-known wide-leafed aromatic grass; it was used in thatching roofs, and was burned in place of firewood. (tr.)

How many spears (i.e. braves) and noble drinkers are (thrown)
In the well – the well of Badr?[33]
How many nobles and feeders of humps are (there)
In the well – the well of Badr?
Does Ibn Abī Kabshah[34] threaten us that we shall be made alive again?
And how can (happen) the life of ghosts and skulls?
Is he helpless in averting death from me?
And will raise me (again) when my bones become rotten?
Well, who will convey my message to the Beneficent (God)
That I am abandoning the month of fast;
So tell Allãh to stop my drink from me,
And tell Allãh to stop my food from me.

This (news) reached the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and he came out enraged, dragging his cloak along; he raised something that was in his hand to strike him (‘Umar). So he (‘Umar) said, "I seek refuge in Allãh from the wrath of Allãh and the wrath of His Messenger." Then Allãh, the Glorified, the Sublime, sent down (the verse): The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred . . . Will you then desist? So ‘Umar said, "We desist." (Rabī‘u 'l-abrãr)

Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh, and an-Naḥḥãs (in his an-Nãsikh) have narrated from Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqãṣ that he said, "Regarding me was revealed the prohibition of intoxicants. A man from the Helpers prepared a feast, and he invited us. People came to him, ate, and drank until they became intoxicated with liquor – and it was before the intoxicants were pro-hibited. So they began boasting. The Helpers said, 'The Helpers are superior;' and the Quraysh said, 'The Quraysh are superior.' Then a man came down with a jaw-bone of a camel and hit at my nose tearing it – and Sa‘d's nose was torn." He said, "Then I came to the Prophet (s.a.w.) and mentioned it to him. So this verse was revealed: O you who believe! Intoxicants and games of chance . . . (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: The traditions about the stories, which resulted in prohibition of intoxicants, are numerous, through the Sunnī chains, with great discrepancies among them. As for those traditions which mention some companions who had been drinking, we have no con-cern to go into them analysing and sifting, because our purpose is to explain the Qur'ãnic verse. However, these narratives support what we have written in the Commentary that these verses imply, nay, rather clearly say, that a group of Muslims had not left drinking liquor since the verse, 2:219 was revealed until these verses of chapter five came down.

[33] The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had thrown after the battle of Badr the bodies of the seventy unbelievers who were killed therein. (tr.)

Of course, some traditions say that ʻAlī (a.s.) and ʻUthmãn ibn Maẓʻūn had forbidden intoxicants to themselves before the verse of prohibition was revealed; and it has been mentioned in al-Milal wa 'n-Niḥal, that a few Arabs in the Era of Ignorance had forbidden intoxicants to themselves, and Allãh helped some of them to find Islam and enter into its fold. Among them were ʻÃmir ibn aẓ-Ẓarīb al-ʻUdwãnī and Qays ibn ʻÃmir at-Tamīmī (who attained Islam). Also, among them were Ṣafwãn ibn Umayyah ibn Muḥrith al-Kinãnī, ʻAfīf ibn Maʻdī Karb al-Kindī, al-Uslūm al-Yãmī (who forbad to himself both intoxi-cants and fornication). These few individuals were those on whose tongue the word of truth had appeared. Otherwise, generally the Arabs of that era like all other people of the world (except the Jews) were habituated to drink freely, until Allãh forbade it in His Book.

It appears from the verses of the mighty Book that intoxicants were forbidden in Mecca before the hijrah, as is shown by the verse: Say: "My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed, and sin and rebellion without justice . . ." (7:33). It is a Meccan verse; and when it is joined to the divine words: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance. Say: "In both of them there is a great sin and (some) profit for men, and their sin is greater than their profit." . . . (2:219); which is Medinite verse revealed in early days of hijrah, there does not remain room for any doubt that at that time its prohibition was clear to the Muslims. And if we meditate on the context of the verses of the chap-ter 5, "The Table", and especially on the implications of the words: Will you then desist? And the verse: There is no blame on those who believe and do good deeds for what they have eaten, when they fear Allãh and believe . . . it will be clear that the indulgence of a group among them in drinking liquor between the revelation of chapter 2 and 5, was a residue of the previous bad habit. It was like some people's continuing to sinfully cohabit in the nights of Ramaḍãn until Allãh revealed: It is made lawful to you on the night of fast to go in unto your wives; they are an apparel to you and you are an apparel for them; Allãh knew that you were acting unfaithfully to yourselves, so He has turned to you (mercifully) and forgave you. . . . (2:187).

However, it is clear that these traditions invite two observations:

One: They differ among themselves concerning the date of the prohibition of intoxicants. The first narrative says that it was shortly before the battle of Uḥud [i.e. the 3rd year of hijrah], while other reports say that it was after the battle of the Allies[35] [i.e. the 5th year of hijrah]. But it is not a big problem, because possibly the latter may be referring to the revelation of the verses of the chapter "The Table" in the 5th year of A.H. – although the wording of some of the tradi-tions do not fully agree with it.

Two: They say that intoxicants were not prohibited before the revelation of the verse of "The Table", or that its prohibition was not clear before it for people and particularly for the companions. But the verse 33 of chapter 7, "The Battlements", clearly forbids sin, and the verse 219 of the chapter 2, "The Cow", clearly declares it to be a great sin; and these two declarations cannot be interpreted away.

Rather it looks far-fetched to think that prohibition of sin was revealed at Mecca before hijrah, in the verse which included a general summary of forbidden things, i.e.: Say: "My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed, and sin and rebellion without justice, and that you associ-ate with Allãh that for which He has not sent down any authority, and that you say against Allãh what you do not know." (7:33), and then a long time would pass after it and neither the believers would ask its meaning from their Prophet, nor polytheists would seek from him its explanation, while their biggest concern was to refute the Book of Allãh and object against it in any way they could imagine.

Rather the history shows that the Prophet's prohibition of the intoxicants like his forbidding polytheism and fornication was widely known to the polytheists. For the proof, look at the report given by Ibn Hishãm in his as-Sīrah; quoting Khallãd ibn Qurrah and other learned elders of the tribe of Bakr ibn Wãil that, A‘shã ibn Qays went forth towards the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) intending to accept Islam. He said a Qaṣīdah in praise of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), [which began with these lines]:-

Did not your eyes remain sore at night?
And did you not spend the night awake like one bitten by snake?

[35] It has been narrated by aṭ-Ṭabarī in his at-Tafsīr, and by as-Suyūṭī in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, quoting aṭ-Ṭabarī and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir from Qatãdah. (Author's Note)

When he reached Mecca – or was near it – some polytheists of Quraysh intercepted him and asked him his news. He told him that he had come intending to see the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) in order to enter into Islam. (The Qurayshite) said to him, "O Abū Baṣīr! He for-bids fornication." A‘shã said, "By God! Certainly, it is a thing that I have no desire of." The Qurayshite said, "O Abū Baṣīr! And he forbids intoxicants." A‘shã said, "As for this, certainly there are some consola-tions about it in (my) soul; but I am going back and shall quench my thirst with it this year, then I'll come to him and accept Islam." So he returned, and died the same year and did not come back to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.).

Thus, no weight remains at all for the above-mentioned tradi-tions. We can only say that the narrators had inferred them by their independent thinking on the verses, while they had forgotten the verse 7:33. The exegetes have offered strange interpretations with an aim to justify these traditions.[36]

However, after all this lengthy discourse, the net result remains that the Book of Allãh had clearly announced prohibition of intoxi-cants in Islam before hijrah; and the only purpose of these verses of the chapter 5, "The Table", was to put intense pressure on the people because they had not shown any seriousness in submitting to this divine prohibition and enforcing this law.

Hishãm narrates through a trustworthy person from Abū ‘Abdil-lãh (a.s.) that he was asked, "Is it true what has been narrated from you that intoxicants, set up stones and dividing arrows are men?" He said, "Allãh was not to address His creatures in a language that they did not understand." (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī)

‘Abdullãh ibn Sinãn narrates from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said, Qudãmah ibn Maẓ‘ūn was brough before ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭãb; and he had drunk liquor and proof was established against him. (‘Umar) asked ‘Alī (about it) and he ordered him to be flogged eighty stripes. Qudãmah said, "O Leader of the Faithful! There is no penalty for me; I am of the people of this verse: There is no blame on those who be-lieve and do good deeds for what they have eaten (upto the end of the verse)." ‘Alī (a.s.) said to him, "You tell a lie; you are not from among the people of this verse. What its people had eaten, it was lawful for them; and they do

[36] One of them has said that the companions were interpreting the verse 2:219, Say: "In both of them there is a great sin . . .", that it means pure sin. And this was in spite of the verse 7:33, which had clearly forbidden sin before it. (Author's Note)

not eat or drink except what is lawful for them." (ibid.)

The author says: This meaning has also been narrated from Abu 'r-Rabī‘ from the same Imām (a.s.). Also, ash-Shaykh has narrated it in at-Tahdhīb through his chain from Ibn Sinān from the same Imām (a.s.); and this meaning is narrated through the Sunnī chains too. The Imām's words, "What its people had eaten, it was lawful for them; and they do not eat or drink except what is lawful for them," agrees with what we have explained in the foregoing Commentary; so refer to it.

aṭ-Ṭabarī narrates from ash-Sha‘bī that he said, "Four verses were revealed about the intoxicants: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance . . . [2:219], so they left it; then was revealed: . . . you obtain from them intoxication and goodly provision . . . [16:67], so they drank it; then the two verses of "The Table" were revealed: intoxicants and games of chances and . . . Will you then desist? [5:90-91]. (at-Tafsīr, aṭ-Ṭabarī)

The author says: It appears from it that the verse 16:67 abro-gated the verse 2:219, and this in its turn was abrogated by 5:90-91; this in itself is sufficient to show this claim's invalidity.

[al-Kulaynī and ash-Shaykh] have narrated through their chains from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said, "Allāh did never raise any prophet but it was in Allāh's knowledge that when He would perfect his relig-ion it would include prohibition of intoxicants; and intoxicants were always unlawful, but they are only carried away from [one] trait to [another] trait; and if it were imposed on them all together, it would have cut them off short of religion." (The narrator) said, "Abū Ja‘far (a.s.), said, 'There is no one more kind than Allāh, the Sublime; and it is from His kindness (the Blessed, the Sublime) that He transfers them from (one) trait to (another) trait; and if He had imposed on them all together, they would have perished.'" (al-Kāfī; at-Tahdhīb)

(al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from ‘Amr ibn Shimr from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said, "When Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, revealed to His Messenger (s.a.w.a.), intoxicants and games of chance and (sacrificing to) stones set up and (dividing by) arrows are only an abomination of the Satan's handiwork; shun it therefore, it was said to him, 'What is games of chance? O Messenger of Allāh!' He said: 'Anything you make a bet with, even cubes and walnut.' It was said, 'Then what is stones set up?' He said, 'What they sacrifice to their deities.' It was said, 'Then what is arrows?' He said, 'Their arrows which they used for division [of meat].'" (al-Kãfī)

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from ‘Atã’ ibn Yasãr from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said," The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'Every intoxicant is unlawful, and every intoxicant is liquor.'" (ibid.)

The author says: This tradition is narrated also through Sunnī chains, from ‘Abdullãh ibn ‘Umar from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and its wording is as follows, "Every intoxicant is liquor and every liquor is unlawful." al-Bayhaqī and others have narrated it too. There are numerous traditions narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) which are nearly mutawãtir that every intoxicant is unlawful, and that whatever is used for betting on, is game of chance.

Abu 'ṣ-Ṣabãḥ narrates that he asked Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) about nabīdh and intoxicants, "Do they have the same position? (The Imãm, a.s.), said, 'No. Surely nabīdh is not of the rank of intoxicants. Certainly, Allãh has prohibited intoxicants a little of it and more of it, as He has prohibited dead body, blood and flesh of swine; and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has prohibited the intoxicant from among the drinks, and what the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has prohibited, Allãh has prohibited it.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī)

[al-Kulaynī and ash-Shaykh] have narrated through their chains from Mūsã ibn Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said, "Verily, Allãh has not prohi-bited the liquor because of its name; but He has prohibited it because of its effect. Therefore, anything, which has the effect of liquor, is liquor." (In another version, the last sentence is, 'Therefore, anything which does the action of liquor is liquor.') (al-Kãfī; at-Tahdhīb)

The author says: The tradition in condemnation of intoxicants and gambling that has come through the Sunnī and Shī‘ah chains are beyond the limit of enumeration; whoever wants to study them should consult the Collections of Traditions.

COMMENTARY

The verses describe the law regarding the game of land and sea when a man is in the state of sanctity, wearing the robes of pilgrims.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Allãh will certainly try you in respect of some game which your hands and your lances can reach*: al-Balã' (اَلْبَلَاءُ = test, trial); layabluwannakum (لَيَبْلُوَنَّكُم = will certainly try you); la (لا) is for oath, which together with the doubling of n (ن) connotes emphasis and intensity. The word: "some game", indicates insignificance, in order that it would help the audience to comply with the coming prohibition. The clause: "which your hands and your lances can reach", includes in its ambit game which can be caught easily by hand, like young birds, cubs of wild animals and eggs; or with difficulty like big games that usually cannot be hunted except with arms.

This verse apparently aims at paving the way for the severe law which follows in the next one; and that is the reason that this clause is followed by the words: that Allãh might know who fears Him in secret; as it indicates that the ensuing law would be prohibitive; then comes the concluding statement: but whoever exceeds the limit after this he shall have a painful punishment.

QUR'ĀN: that Allãh might know who fears Him in secret; . . .: It is not unlikely that the divine words: "Allãh will certainly try you . . . that Allãh might know", allude to the fact that He will certainly fore-ordain it in order to distinguish those of you who fear Allãh in secret from those who do not fear Him. Obviously, Allãh is not afflicted by ignorance, which should be removed by knowledge! A full explanation of the meaning of test has been given under the verse: Do you think that you will enter the garden . . . (3:142), in the fourth volume of this book[37]; and also another meaning of knowledge was given earlier. As for the clause: "who fears Him in secret", the adverb: "in secret", is related to: "fears"; fearing in secret indicates that man fears his Lord and is cautious of the next world's punishment and its sufferings which the Lord has warned him of; all those aspects are unseen for man, and he does not perceive any part of it with his five senses. Allãh says: You can only warn him who follows the reminder and fears the Beneficent God in secret; . . . (36:11); And the garden shall be brought near to those who guard (against evil), not far off: This is what you were promised, for every one who turns frequently (to Allãh), keeps (his limits); who fears the Beneficent God in secret and comes with a patient heart (50:31-33); Those who fear their Lord in secret and they are fearful of the hour (21:49).

The clause: "but whoever exceeds the limit after this", means:

Whoever exceeds the limit which Allãh fixes for him after the said test and trial, shall have a painful chastisement.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Do not kill game while you are in the pilgrim garb, . . . may taste the unwholesome result of his deed: al-ḥurum (اَلْحُرُم = in the pilgrim garb. It is a ṣifah mushabbahah (صِفَة مُشَبَّهَة = adjective which resembles a verb). [aṭ-Ṭabrisī] writes: "Ḥarãm and muḥrim both have the same meaning; likewise the opposite ḥalãl and muḥill have the same meaning; aḥrama 'r-rajul (اَحْرَمَ الرَّجُلُ = 'The man entered into sacred month.'), also it means: 'He entered into the Sanctuary.' Also, aḥrama (اَحْرَمَ) means: 'He entered into ḥajj (by saying talbiyah تَلْبِيَة).' al-Ḥarm (اَلْحَرْم) means the pilgrim garb; this is the mean-ing of the ḥadīth, 'I was applying perfume to the Prophet for his iḥrãm.' The basic meaning of the root-word (ḥ-r-m) is to protect, to prohibit; the women are called ḥaram (حَرَم) because they are protected; and al-maḥrūm (اَلْمَحْرُوم) is the one who is deprived of sustenance."

He has also said: "al-Mithl, al-mathal (اَلْمِثْلُ ، اَلْمَثَلُ) as well as ash-shibh and ash-shabah (اَلشِبْهُ ، اَشَبَهُ) have all one meaning [i.e. like, likeness.]"

He says: "an-Na'am (اَلنَّعَم) denotes camel, cow, sheep and goat; if there is camel alone, it is called na'am; but if there are cow and sheep or goat alone, they are not called na'am. This has been men-tioned by az-Zajjãj."

Again he says: "al-Farrã' has said: 'al-'Adl (اَلْعَدْلُ) is a thing which is equal to another thing not from the same species. al-'Idl (اَلْعِدْلُ) is like; you say: 'I have 'idl of your slave or goat,' when you have a slave like his slave or goat like his goat; but if you mean his/its value from another species, you will say, ''adl.' The Baṣrite gram-marians say that al-'adl and al-idl both mean 'like', no matter it is of the same species or not."

Also, he has said: "al-Wabãl (اَلْوَبَال = translated here as 'the un-wholesome result') means burden of a thing in hateful situation; accord-ingly they say: Ta'ãm wabīl (طَعَامُ وَبِيْلُ) and mã' wabīl (مَاءُ وَبِيْلُ) when the food and water are heavy, not nourishing; thus Allãh says: . . . so We laid on him a violent hold [73:16]; i.e. heavy and hard; and for this reason, the board of washerman is called wabīl."

The words: "Do not kill game while you are in the pilgrim garb," forbid the killing of game. But it is partially elaborated by the next verse: Lawful to you is the game of the sea – this explains the kind of game; and the nature of killing is elaborated by the next sentence: "and whoever among you shall kill it intentionally . . ." The word: 'intentionally' is the circumstantial clause related to: "whoever among you shall kill it." Apparently, intentional killing is opposite of unin-tentional one, i.e. killing without intention, e.g. one shoots arrow to a certain target, and it missing the target hits a game. The verse makes it clear that he must pay the compensation if he did have the intention of killing the game, no matter whether he remembered that he was in the pilgrim garb, or had forgotten it or was oblivious to it.

The sentence: "the compensation (of it) is the like of what he killed, from the cattle, as two just persons among you shall judge, as an offering to be brought to the Ka'bah." Its meaning is clear: He has to offer a compensation, which should be like the game he has killed; it should be from a kind of cattle which is like the killed game; that similar cattle will be decided by two just religious persons among you; that offering should be brought to the Ka'bah and slaughtered in the sanctuary in Mecca or Minã, as explained by the Prophetic sunnah.

Grammatically the word: 'compensation' is a subject whose predicate is omitted [although this aspect is lost in English translation. tr.]. The clauses: "the like of what he killed, from the cattle," and, "two just persons . . . shall judge", are descriptions of the compensa-tion; the clauses: "an offering," and "to be brought to the Ka'bah," are the noun and its adjective, respectively, while the "offering" is the circumstantial clause related to "the compensation", as described above. The verse has been analysed in some other ways too.

The clauses: "or the expiation (of it) is the feeding of the poor or the equivalent of it in fasting", lay down two other alternatives for the expiation of killing a game. The particle, 'or', does not show more than alternativeness, and its elaboration comes from the sunnah; however, the verse, first names the feeding of the poor as its expiation, and then mention its equivalent fasting, and it is not without some indication of sequence between these alternatives.

The clause: "that he may taste the unwholesome result of his deed": The letter, l (ل = that) indicates the objective; this and the preceding sentences to which it is attached, show that it is a kind of retribution.

QUR'ÃN: Allãh has pardoned what is gone by; and whoever returns (to it), Allãh will inflict retribution on him; and Allãh is Mighty, Lord of Retribution: Pardon is bestowed to what is gone by. It shows that "what is gone by" refers to those game killings, which had occurred before the verse was revealed giving this law. Obviously, if pardon was to apply to the game killed when it was being revealed or after its revelation, it would contradict the law. This sentence was revealed to remove the possible misunderstanding that the law of compensation was retroactively applicable to the incidents preceding the time of revelation.

The verse proves that pardon may be applied to such deeds too which are not sins, provided those deeds contain evil, which by their nature would be liable to attract legislative prohibition. The clauses: "and whoever returns (to it), Allãh will inflict retribution on him; and Allãh is Mighty, Lord of Retribution." Apparently, returning to it means repeating the sin, and the clause: "Allãh will inflict retribution on him," speaks about future recurrence, not to a present order. It shows that the returning means repeating the deed that had attracted compensation, and the divine retribution refers to something other than the imposed compensation.

In this backdrop, the verse, together with the preceding and the following ones, deals with various aspects of the law of killing the game. Allãh has pardoned those who had done so before revelation of the law; but he who would kill a game after law was promulgated, would have to offer in compensation cattle like of what he had killed – this is for the first offence. However, if he repeats the sin, Allãh will inflict retribution on him, and there is no compensation on him. This is seen in most of the traditions of the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) which deal with the explanation of this verse.

Had not this explanation been given in traditions, we would have to say that the retribution, mentioned in the clause: "Allãh will inflict retribution", covered general laws including expiation; and the returning connoted killing a game again; it would then mean: Whoever indulged in killing a game as they were doing before promulgation of this law – i.e. whoever would kill a game – Allãh would inflict retribution on him – i.e. would make him liable to pay the compensation/expiation. But, as you see, this meaning is far from the wording of the verse.

QUR'ÃN: Lawful to you is the game of the sea . . . and fear Allãh, to Whom you shall be gathered: All these verses aim at describing the law of hunting [intentionally, while the hunter is in iḥrãm] on land or in sea. It proves that what is made lawful in this verse is hunting the game of the sea, not [only] its eating; in this context, the word, ṭa'ãmuhu [طَعَامُهُ = which can be translated as, its food, or its eating] gives here the meaning of food, and not of eating; and it means that you are allowed to eat from the game of the sea. In short, the verse says that you are allowed to hunt the game of the sea, and also to eat from what you have hunted.

The seafood covers what is hunted from it, like good meat of the game, as well as what is thrown up by sea like a dead animal, etc. However, the traditions of the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) explain it as good meat of game, salted or otherwise.

The words: "a provision for you and for the travellers," is a circumstantial clause related to "the game of sea and its food." It contains a shade of bestowal of gracious boon.

The verse is addressed to the believers who are in condition of iḥrãm; therefore the clause: "a provision for you and for the travelers", may be translated as, a provision for those in the condition of iḥrãm and for others.

It should be noted that there are numerous topics of jurispru-dence contained in these verses, which are written in detail in the books of fiqh; and whoever wants to know more should refer to those books.

QUR'ĀN: Allãh has made the Ka'bah, the Sacred House, a sanctuary for the people, and the sacred month and the offerings and the (ani-mals with the) garlands; . . .: The talk begins with the Ka'bah, which is followed by its explicative apposition the Sacred House; then month is described with the attribute, the sacred, which is followed by the offerings and the animals with garlands, which in their turn are related to the sanctity of the House. All this shows that the essential prerequi-site of this verse's topic is Sanctity.

Qiyãm (اَلْقِيَام = that with which something stands). ar-Rãghib has said: "al-Qiyãm and al-qawãm (اَلْقوَام) is the name of that with which a thing stands, i.e. remains firm; like al-'imãd (اَلْعِمَاد = pillar) and as-sinãd (اَلسِنَاد= prop) which are used for that with which a thing remains upright; as Allãh says: And do not give away your property which Allãh has made for you a (means of) support to the weak of understanding, . . . [4:5], i.e. He has made it for you a means to keep you upright; and He says: Allãh has made the Ka'bah, the Sacred House, a support for the people, i.e. it provides their means of support in this life and in the hereafter;[38] al-Aṣamm has said: '(It means), firmly standing which will not be abrogated. It has an alternative version, qayyiman (قَيِّمًا), with the same meaning.'"

The verse basically means that Allãh has made the Ka'bah a sacred house and laid down its sanctity. Also, He has made some months sacred, and joined them together in some respects, like the ḥajj which is done in the sacred month of Dhi 'l-Ḥijjah. He has also ordained something connected to it, which share in this sanctity like sacrificial animals [marked as such by cutting off a piece of their ears, or putting garlands on their necks]. All this has been prescribed as a means of support for the people's blissful social life.

So, He has prescribed the Sacred House as the qiblah, towards which the people face in their prayers, keep to it the faces of their dead bodies and slaughtered animals, and maintain its respect in their shameful conditions [i.e. they do not face it while evacuating the bowels]. In this way their community is united and their ties are strengthened; their religion is revived and maintained; they come to it for ḥajj from different lands and furthest regions, and therein witness advantages for themselves and proceed on the path of servitude. The people throughout the world get guidance by the Ka'bah's name, by its remembrance and by looking at it. They seek divine nearness through it and by fixing their attention to it. Allãh has described its excellence in another way which is not far from above, as He says: Most surely the first house appointed for men is the one at Bakkah, blessed and a guidance for the nations (3:96). And you have seen a discourse in volume three of this book, under this verse, which illuminates this subject.[39]

Similar is the case of the sacred month, inasmuch as it is a sanctuary for men. Allãh has forbidden fighting in it, and has therein given them safety and security in their lives, honour and properties so that they get a chance to mend what had gone bad in the affairs of their lives. The position of sacred month within all months is like a station where a wayfarer – weary and tired – gets an opportunity to rest and restore himself. In short, the sacred house and the sacred month with the sacrificial animals connected with them are a means of support for the people, encompassing various aspects of their lives here and in the hereafter. If a deep-thinking meditater reflects comprehensively on the particulars of the benefits which the people acquire from the Ka'bah and the sacred month – the benefits that are ever-flowing or firmly fixed – he will get enormous blessings and will be highly amazed: He will see that because of the sacred house and sacred month, blood relationships are strengthened, friendships are fortified, wealth is gladly spent on needy and poor; markets flourish, mutual love between near relatives blossoms, and strangers recognize each other; hearts come nearer, souls become purified and powers are revitalized; the com-munity gets support from one another, religion is revived, and standards of truth and banners of monotheism are raised high.

It seems this fact is mentioned here after the verses forbidding the game in order to remove any misgiving that these laws were of little or no benefit at all. What is the benefit of forbidding hunting in a certain place or time? What is the advantage of bringing sacrificial animals to a fixed area? And so on. Were not these laws merely vestiges of the superstitious rites of the ignorant and barbaric nations?

This doubt was removed here by saying that the dignity of the sacred house and the sacred month and related rules are based on an academic reality and serious basis, i.e., they are the means of support for their lives.

This explanation shows how the verse: "this is that you may know that Allãh knows whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth, and that Allãh is the Knower of all things", is connected with the preceding verses. The demonstrative pronoun: "this" may point to the law described in the preceding verses (the underlying reason of whose legislation is explained in the sentence: "Allãh has made the Ka‘bah . . ."). In this case the meaning will be as follows: Verily Allãh has made the sacred house and the sacred month sanctuaries for the people and has laid down relevant laws, in order that by preserving their sanctity, obeying the laws enacted about them, the people may proceed to the realization that Allãh knows what is in the heavens and the earth, and is fully cognizant of what is beneficial for them; that is why He has laid down for you these laws with full knowledge. There is no superstition involved in these laws that could have emanated from delusive imagination.

Alternatively, that pronoun (this) may be pointing to the explanation of the law which is elaborated in the sentence: "Allãh has made the Ka‘bah . . ." In this case, the meaning will be as follows: We have explained to you this reality (i.e., making the sacred house and the sacred month and their related affairs as sanctuaries for the people) in order that you may understand that Allãh fully knows what is in the heavens and in the earth and the related laws which are beneficial to their affairs.

Therefore, you should not think that these laid down laws were useless and ineffectual, or were based on superstition.

QUR'ÃN: Know that Allãh is severe in requiting (evil) and that Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful. Nothing is (incumbent) on the Messenger but to deliver (the message), and Allãh knows what you reveal and what you hide: It re-enforces the preceding declarations and firmly establishes the ground of the above-mentioned laws; it threatens disobedient persons and offers (good) promise to obedient ones. The both clauses have a shade of threatening; that is why Allãh has described Himself first as being severe in punishment and then has mentioned His forgiveness and mercy. Also, it is for this reason that the talk has ended with the sentences: "Nothing is (incumbent) on the Messenger . . . and what you hide."

TRADITIONS

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chains from Ḥammãd ibn ʻĪsã and Ibn Abī ʻUmayr, from Muʻãwiyah ibn ʻAmmãr, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said in explanation of the words of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: Allãh will certainly try you in respect of some game which your hands and your lances can reach. "Wild animals were crowded for the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), in the ʻumrah of Ḥudaybiyyah until their hands and their lances could reach them." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: Also, al-ʻAyyãshī has narrated it as a mursal tradition from Muʻãwiyah ibn ʻAmmãr; and this theme has been narrated by al-Kulaynī and ash-Shaykh (in al-Kãfī and at-Tahdhīb, respectively) through their chains to al-Ḥalabī from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.). al-ʻAyyãshī has also narrated it from Samãʻah from the same Imãm, as a mursal one; and similarly al-Qummī has narrated it as a mursal; this is also narrated from Muqãtil ibn Ḥayyãn as quoted below.

[as-Suyūṭī says:] Ibn Abī Ḥãtim has narrated from Muqãtil ibn Ḥayyãn that he said: "This verse was revealed in the ʻumrah of Ḥudaybiyyah; wild animals, birds and games used to come to them in their stations like of which they had never seen in the past; so Allãh forbade them to kill it while they were in the condition of iḥrãm; so that He might know who fears Him in secret." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: These two traditions do not go against what we have written in the Commentary that the verse's meaning is general.

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chains from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad, about the words of Allāh, the Blessed, the Sublime: which your hands and your lances can reach; he said, "What the hands can reach are eggs and nestlings, and what the lances can reach refers to what cannot be caught by hands." (al-Kāfī)

[al-Ayyāshī] narrates, through his chains in his at-Tafsīr, from Ḥarīz, from Abū ʿAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said, "If a muḥrim (مُحْرِم = one in the condition of iḥrām) kills a pigeon, then in it [its expiation] is a goat; if he kills a bird chick, then in it is a camel; and if he sets foot on an egg and breaks it, then on him is one dirham, all these (expiations) shall be given in ṣadaqah at Mecca and Minā; and this is (the meaning of) the word of Allāh in His Book: Allāh will certainly try you in respect of some game which your hands will reach – eggs and chicks – and your lances – big mothers."

The author says: ash-Shaykh has narrated it in at-Tahdhīb, from Ḥarīz from the same Imām (a.s.), giving only its last section.

ash-Shaykh narrates through his chains from Ibn Abī ʿUmayr, from Ḥammād, from al-Ḥalabī, from Abū ʿAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said, "When a muḥrim kills a game, then its compensation is (incumbent) on him, and the (killed) game will be given to a poor as ṣadaqah; then if he repeats and kills another game, there is no compensation on him, and Allāh will inflict retribution on him, and (that) retribution (will be) in the next world." (at-Tahdhīb)

[ash-Shaykh] narrates from al-Kulaynī, from Ibn Abī ʿUmayr, from some of his companions, from Abū ʿAbdillāh (a.s.), that he said: "If a muḥrim kills a game by mistake, then compensation is incumbent on him; then if he kills it again intentionally, then he is from those on whom Allāh will inflict retribution, and he is not liable to pay expiation." (ibid.)

[ash-Shaykh] narrates from Ibn Abī ʿUmayr, from Muʿāwiyah ibn ʿAmmār, that he said, "I said to Abū ʿAbdillāh (a.s.), 'A muḥrim has killed a game?' He said, 'He has to give its expiation.' I said, 'Then if he repeats?' He said, 'He has to give expiation whenever he repeats.'" (ibid.)

The author says: As you see, the traditions differ one from another; and ash-Shaykh has reconciled them by saying that they mean: 'If a muḥrim intentionally kills a game it is incumbent on him to give expiation; and if he intentionally repeats then there is no expiation on him and he is among those on whom Allãh will inflict retribution; and as for him who kills forgetfully, he has to give expiation when-ever he repeats.'

[ash-Shaykh] narrates through his chains from Zurãrah from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) about the words of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: as two just persons among you shall judge. "So the just is the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and the Imãm after him, who shall judge, and he is just. So, when you have known what Allãh has ordered from the Messenger of Allãh and the Imãm, then it is sufficient for you and you should not ask (others) about it." (ibid.)

The author says: There are several traditions of this meaning; one of which says, "I recited near Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.), 'dhawã 'adlin minkum' (two just persons among you); he said, 'dhū 'adlin minkum' (just person among you); it is among the mistakes of the scribes. And it returns to variations of recital, as is apparent."

[al-Kulaynī] narrates from az-Zuhrī from 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), that he said, "Fast in compensation of game is obligatory; Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, has said: and whoever among you shall kill it intentionally, the compensation (of it) is the like of what he killed, from the cattle, as two just persons among you shall judge, as an offering to be brought to the Ka'bah or the expiation (of it) is the feeding of the poor or the equivalent of it in fasting. Well, do you know how will the equivalent of it in fasting be? O Zuhrī!" (Zuhrī) says, "I said, 'I do not know.' He said, 'The (price of) the game will be assessed; then that price will be broken up on wheat (i.e., it will be seen how much wheat may be bought with that price); then the wheat will be measured in ṣã' (صَاع = equivalent of 3 kg.), and he will fast one day for each half a ṣã'.'" (al-Kãfī)

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chains from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad from one of his men, from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said, "Whoever is obligated to offer a sacrifice in his iḥrãm, he is free to slaughter it wherever he wishes, except the compensation of game, because Allãh says: an offering brought to the Ka'bah." (ibid.)

al-'Ayyãshī narrates from Ḥarīz, from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said about the words: Lawful to you is the game of the sea and its food, a provision for you and for the travelers. "Its salty one, which they eat." (And he said:) "Distinguish between the two: Every bird that lives in thickets, lays egg in land and brings up its chick on land is a game of land; and whatever bird lives in land, and lays egg in sea and bring up its chick (there) is among the game of the sea." (at-Tafsīr)

[al-ʻAyyāshī narrates] from Zayd ash-Shaḥḥām that he said, "I asked Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), about the word of Allāh: Lawful to you is the game of the sea and its food, a provision for you and for the travel-lers; he said, 'It is salty fish; also whatever you take from it as supply, even if it is not salty, it is provision.'" (ibid.)

The author says: There are numerous traditions of this mean-ing narrated through Shīʻah chains from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.).

[as-Suyūṭī quotes] Ibn Abī Shaybah from Muʻāwiyah ibn Qurrah and Aḥmad, from a man of the Helpers, "Verily a camel of a man trode a nest of an ostrich and broke its eggs. So the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.) said, '(Incumbent) on you is fast of one day in lieu of every egg, or feeding of poor.'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: He has also narrated this theme from Ibn Abī Shaybah, from ʻAbdullāh ibn Dhakwān, from the Prophet (s.a.w.); and has also narrated it from Abu 'z-Zinād, from ʻĀishah from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated through the chain of Abu 'l-Muhzim, from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said, "In the eggs of ostrich it is (incumbent to pay) its price." (ibid.)

Also, he quotes Ḥātim from Abū Jaʻfar Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī [a.s.]: A man asked ʻAlī about sacrificial animal, from what it is (i.e. from which species it should be). He said, "From the eight pairs." Then it seemed as if the man had some doubts; so ʻAlī said, "Do you read Qur'ān?" It seemed as if the man said, "Yes." (ʻAlī) said, "Then have you heard Allāh saying: O you who believe! Fulfil the covenants. The cattle quadrupeds are made lawful for you . . . [5:1]." He said, "Yes." (ʻAlī) said, "Have you heard Him saying: . . . and mention the name of Allāh during stated days over what He has given them of the cattle quadrupeds . . . [22:28]; And of the cattle (He created) beasts of burden and those which are fit for slaughter only; . . . [6:142]?" He said, "Yes." (ʻAlī) said, "And have you heard Him saying: . . . two of sheep and two of goats . . . [6:143]? And two of camels and two of cows . . . [6:144]?" He said, "Yes." (ʻAlī) said, "And have you heard Him saying: O you who believe! Do not kill game while you are in the pilgrim garb . . . as an offering to be brought to the Kaʻbah?" The man said, "Yes." Then (ʻAlī) said, "If I killed a deer, then what is (incumbent) on me?" He said, "A goat." ‘Alī said, "An offering to be brought to the Ka‘bah?" The man said, "Yes." Then ‘Alī said, "Allāh has named it: to be brought to the Ka’bah, as you hear." (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Ḥātim narrates from ‘Aṭā’ al-Khurāsānī that ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭab, ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān, ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, Ibn ‘Abbās, Zayd ibn Thābit and Mu‘āwiyah had judged that if a muḥrim kills a game for which an offering is given in compensation, the price of that offer-ing should be assessed and poor persons fed from it. (ibid).

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Abū Hurayrah that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.), said, 'Lawful to you is the game of the sea and its food, a provision for you.' He said, 'Whatever dead animals it throws (on the shore), it is its food.'" (ibid.)

The author says: Similar themes have been narrated from some companions too; but what is narrated from the chains of Ahlu 'l-Bayt contradicts it, as described earlier.

[al-‘Ayyāshī] narrates from Abān ibn Taghlib that he said, "I said to Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.), '(What is the meaning of:) Allāh has made the Ka‘bah, the Sacred House, a sanctuary for the people?' He said, 'Livelihood.'" (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: The explanation of this tradition has been given earlier.

COMMENTARY

The verse seems as if it is independent and complete in itself, because its connection with the preceding and the following verses is not clear. Therefore, one should not needlessly strive to seek its con-nection with foregoing verses. It only explains a universal parable Allãh has used to describe a characteristic which distinguishes the True Religion from other prevalent religions and customs: That consideration and respect belongs to the Truth even if the people adhering to it are few and its band scattered; that one should rely on good and bliss even if majority has turned away from it and powerful people have forgotten it. It is because Truth does not rely in its intrinsic values except on sound reason; and far be it from the sound reason to lead to other than the good of human society – the good which supports man in the affairs of life and means of pleasant livelihood, no matter whether it agrees with majority's desires or not (and often it goes against majority's wishes!). So it is this system prevalent in creation, and it is the basis of correct views and opinions; it does never follow their desires, and if the Truth were to follow their desires, the heavens and the earth would perish.

QUR'ÃN: Say: "The bad and the good are not equal, though the abundance of the bad may enchant you;": Apparently, unequality of the bad and the good means that the good is better than the bad. It is a very clear idea; therefore the speech must be an allusion to some deeper factor: The good by it very nature enjoys a higher status than the bad; now if we suppose the opposite, that because of some acci-dental development, the bad becomes better than the good, it would mean that the bad had gradually risen and ascended the stairs until it reached a step where it became level with the good in rank and status, before surpassing it and gaining ascendancy over it. So, when equality between them is negated, it more clearly and forcefully would negate the idea of the bad being better than the good.

It also makes it clear why "the bad" has been placed in this verse before "the good." It is because the speech aims at showing that abundance of the bad does not make it better than the good; and it could only happen if the bad rose from the abyss of vileness and meanness to the height of nobility and glory until it became level with the good in its position and then ascended higher. If the speaker were to say: 'The good and the bad are not equal,' then the motive would be to show that the good cannot be more vile and mean than the bad, and in that case it should have mentioned smallness of the good in place of abundance of the bad. Understand it.

Goodness and badness are two real attributes for real things found outside imagination, like good/bad food, good/bad land. Allãh says: And as for good land, its vegetation springs forth (abundantly) by the permission of its Lord, and (as for) that which is bad (its herb-age) comes forth but scantily; . . . (7:58); . . . and the good provisions? (7:32). If at any time, goodness and badness are used for any type of subjective approach or situation, like good/bad judgement or good/bad behaviour, then it is based on a sort of consideration.

However, in this speech, the clauses: so fear Allãh, O men of understanding, that you may be successful, have branched out from, "The bad and the good are not equal . . .;" and fear of Allãh or piety results from action or inaction, while its goodness and badness ema-nate from metaphorical consideration; and the sentence: "The bad and the good are not equal," is taken as a well-accepted principle; all these factors together offer the strongest proof that goodness and badness here connote the real things outside imagination – only then the proof will be successful. If on the other hand, it were to describe good and bad and behaviour, the meaning would not be so clear, because every community believes that its system is the good one and what goes against its wishes and opposes its desires is bad.

Therefore, the speech is based on another meaning which Allãh has described in various places in His Book; that is, the religion is based on nature and creation, and what the religion invites to is the life that is good, and what it forbids is the bad; that Allãh has not made lawful except the good things, and has not forbidden except the bad things. Allãh says: Then set your face upright for religion in natural devotion (to truth); the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; there is no altering of Allãh's creation; that is the right relig-ion, . . . (30:30); . . . and makes lawful to them the good things and makes unlawful to them impure things, . . . (7:157); Say: "Who has prohibited the embellishment of Allãh which He has brought forth for His servants and the good provisions?" . . . (7:32)

It comes out from above that the sentence: "The bad and the good are not equal, though the abundance of the bad may enchant you," is a parable to show that religious laws, which are based on the things' good or bad inherent attributes, do affect the human bliss and misery; that they do not vary because of smallness or abundance; the good is good even it is in small quantity, and the bad is bad even it is in abundance.

Thus it is incumbent on every man of understanding to distin-guish the bad from the good, and to decide that the good is better than the bad. He must realize that man is obligated to exert himself to make his life blissful, and to opt for the good against the bad; he must fear Allãh, his Lord, and proceed on His path. He should not be deceived when he sees the multitude of the people addicted to heinous deeds and perilous characteristics and conditions; base desires should not turn him away from following the truth, and fear or favour should not influence him in anyway. Probably then he will succeed in attaining the human bliss.

QUR'ĀN: so fear Allãh, O men of understanding, that you may be successful*: It branches out from the preceding parable. The meaning:

Piety and fear of Allãh are connected with divine sharī'ah, which in its turn is based on creative good and bad for looking after the interest of the man's bliss and success; and no man of reason can entertain any doubt about it. Therefore, O men of understanding! It is incumbent on you to fear Allãh by acting on His sharī'ah, in order that you may be successful.

O you who believe! Do not put questions about things which if declared to you may trouble you, and if you question about them while the Qur'ãn is being revealed, they shall be declared to you; Allãh has pardoned of this, and Allãh is Forgiving, Forbearing (101). A people before you indeed asked such questions, and then became disbelievers in them (102).

COMMENTARY

The two verses clearly have no connection with the preceding ones, and their meaning does not require any relation with any previ-ous talk for clarification of any of their part. Therefore, there is no need for the over-exertion and the mental gymnastic which many exegetes have indulged into to discover the verses' connection with the theme preceding ones, or with the beginning of the chapter, or with its; so it is better to ignore it altogether.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Do not put questions about things which if declared to you may trouble you . . . and Allãh is Forgiving, Forbearing: al-Ibdã' (اَلإِبْدَاءُ = to declare, to disclose); sã'ahu (سَاءَهُ) is opposite of sarrahu (سَرَّهُ = it pleased him).

The verse forbids the believers to put questions about such things, which may pain and displease them if disclosed. It has left it vague who was the person asked from. But the sentence: "if you ques-tion about them while the Qur'ãn is being revealed", as well as the next verse: A people before you indeed asked such questions, then became disbelievers on account of them, clearly show that it is the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) who is intended here – that the believers should not put such questions to him which would result in such and such. However, the underlying reason of this prohibition conveys the idea that it covers also other situations; that it forbids man to enquire about, and search, the things Allãh has lelf vague and put a veil on them which cannot be removed by normal means and usual ways. Obvious-ly, there is a strong chance of misery and perdition if one were to acquire somehow the knowledge of such realities as, for example, the date when he would die, the cause of his death, the life-span of his near and dear ones, the fall of his kingdom and honour; probably the very knowledge might cause his perdition or misery.

The system of life has been streamlined by Allãh and imple-mented by Him in the world. He has disclosed some things and put veil on the others. He has not made open what He has but for an under-lying reason; and has not hidden what He has but for an underlying reason. Therefore, to cause hiding of what is apparent or to disclose what is hidden would disrupt the system, which covers the universe. It is not unlike the human life based on the body-system which is made up of various powers, organs and limbs – if one of it is removed from, or added to it, a major function of life would be lost, and may be at times the life itself – or its meaning – will be ruined.

The second factor, which the verse has left vague, is the nature of the things about which they are forbidden to ask. It only describes them as being such that they may pain or trouble you if they are dis-closed. There is no doubt that the words: "which if declared to you may trouble you," are the attribute of the preceding word: "things." It is a conditional sentence that shows that if the condition takes place, its concomitant is bound to take place. As those things were of such a nature that if disclosed they would certainly trouble them; therefore, putting questions about them and seeking to unearth their hidden affairs was tantamount to asking to be troubled and pained.

Objection: A sane person does not seek that which would give him pain or put him in trouble. Therefore, it would have been better if the prohibition was rephrased, for example: do not put question about things that contain factors which if disclosed to you may trouble you. Or, do not put questions about things which you are not sure would not trouble you if disclosed to you.

Someone has replied to it in a really strange way. He has said: "It is established in the Arabic grammar that the particle, in (إِنْ = if) describes a condition which is not certain to take place, to appear; and the concomitant follows the condition in coming into existence or not coming; as Qur'ãn has used in, and not idhã (إِذَا = if, when) [which gives a shade of certainty], it proves that mere possibility of its dis-closure being troublesome, is sufficient to forbid putting questions about it."

COMMENT: He has clearly erred in this reply. Would that I knew which rule of the Arabic grammar has said that a condition followed by in was not sure to take place; and that consequently its concomitant too was not certain to come into being. What does it mean when we say: 'If (in) you come to me I'll bestow honour upon you?' Doesn't it mean that if you came you'll certainly be bestowed honour upon? Therefore, his view that, mere possibility of its disclosure being trouble-some is sufficient to forbid putting questions about it, could hold water only if the verse had forbidden asking about things which could possibly trouble them if disclosed. But as you already know the fact is different; it forbids putting question about things, which were definitely going to trouble them if disclosed. So the objection remains unanswered.

Another Reply: Similar in weakness is another view, based on some traditions, that the: "things which if declared to you may trouble you", points to those unseen things which some people appear eager to know, like dates of deaths, final result of many affairs, flow of the good and the bad, and avidity to unearth the hidden destiny, which by nature is not free from what gives pain to man; for example, when a man asks how many years have remained in his life, how will he die, what will be his end result, who was his father and so on; and such ques-tions were usually asked in the Era of Ignorance. Therefore, the verse forbids them to put questions about such things; because usually such disclosures may expose informations which may afflict man with pain and grief; for example, that his death is nearer, or that his end is disas-trous, or that his real father is someone other than the one he is affili-ated to. These are the things which usually throw man in trouble and sorrow; and there was a possibility that if questions about them were put to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), he would answer them with what would not please the questioner, and arrogance and pride might push him to refute the words of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and become a disbeliever, as the next verse points to it: A people before you indeed asked such questions, and then became disbelievers on account of them.

COMMENT: Although this interpretation seems perfect at the first glance, yet it does not agree with the divine words: and if you question about them while the Qur'ãn is being revealed, they shall be declared to you – whether we say that this verse permits such questions at the time of the revelation of Qur'ãn, or that it emphatically forbids it at that time by pointing to the fact that at other times the replier, i.e. the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has the option of not replying to such questions, keeping in view the well-being of the questioners; but such things are in fact unveiled before his eyes, their reality is known to him from the beginning; therefore you should not ask about them while the Qur'ãn is being revealed.

As for its disagreement with the first meaning, it is because the questions about such things, by their nature, entail scandals; therefore, there is no sense in saying that such questioning is allowed while the Qur'ãn is being revealed, as the scandal will remain even then.

As for its being unfit with the second meaning, it is accepted that the time of the revelation of Qur'ãn was the time of disclosure and unveiling for those things which needed to be disclosed and unveiled; yet this especially was reserved to realities of cognition and the laws of do's and don'ts, and related affairs. However, fixing the age of Zayd, disclosing how 'Amr will die, identifying who was that man's father and things like that have no connection at all with the Qur'ãnic descriptions. In this backdrop, there appears no reason why the pro-hibition of putting questions about such things should be followed by the clause: "and if you question about them while the Qur'ãn is being revealed, they shall be declared to you."

Therefore, the more appropriate reply is the one inferred from some other persons' talk that: The next verse: A people before you indeed asked such questions, and then became disbelievers on account of them, as well as the clause: "and if you question about them while the Qur'ãn is being revealed, they shall be declared to you," show that the things questioned about were connected with the laid down laws; the verses discourage and forbid the believers to seek minute details regarding those laws, because too much interrogation and too deep delving in questions would certainly lead to harder details and put the questioners in greater troubles, as Allāh has described in the story of the cow of the Israelites. The more they indulged in enquiry, asking for more and more particulars of the cow which they were told to slaughter the more Allāh went on tightening the conditions and narrowing their choices.

The clause: "Allāh has pardoned of this," is apparently an independent sentence, put here to explain the reason of the prohibition: "do not put question about things which if declared to you may trouble you."

Some exegetes have said: The clause: "Allāh has pardoned of this", is the attribute of "things"; and the speech has to be re-arranged as follows: do not put questions about things, which Allāh has par-doned, which if declared to you may trouble you.

COMMENT: This interpretation is not correct; the verb: 'afā (عَفَا = pardoned) has taken the preposition: 'an (عَنْ), and it is the best proof that the things pardoned are those which are related to sharī'ah and laws; had they been from among the creative affairs, it was almost certain to be described as, Allāh has pardoned this.

In any case, the reasoning in terms of pardoning, indicates that the word: "things", refers to the particulars of the laws and sharī'ah, and the conditions pertaining to them; and makes it clear that if the Qur'ān is silent about them, it is not because Allāh was unmindful of them or had neglected them; it is but a concession from Allāh to His servant which He has bestowed on them to make their lives easier; as He says [at the end of the verse]: "And Allāh is Forgiving, Forbearing." When they put questions asking for an order's particulars, they make themselves liable to more hardship, to further tightening – and it is bound to afflict them with pain and grief as in this way they reject the divine pardon which was offered to them to make life easy to them, and to affirm the divine attributes of forgiveness and forbearance.

The theme of the verse may be expressed in our words as follows: 'O you who believe! Do not ask the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) about the things regarding which the sharī'ah is silent, Allāh has pardoned them and has not spoken about them in order to make your life easy and free from burden; because they are such that if you ask about them while the Qur'ān is being revealed, they shall be declared to you, and they will put you in trouble and pain if they are disclosed to you.'

The above discourse has made it clear that:

The divine words: "and if you question about them while the Qur'ãn is being revealed, they shall be declared to you", are the ending part of the prohibition, as has been explained; they are not intended to erase the prohibition of questioning at the time when the Qur'ãn is being revealed, as some people have thought.

The clause: "Allãh has pardoned of it," is an independent sentence, put here to give the reason of the prohibition of the questioning; it thus gives the benefit of adjective, although grammatically it is not an adjective.

The speech ends with the clause: "and Allãh is Forgiving, Forbearing," although the speech contains prohibition which does not agree with the attributes of forgiveness and forbearance. Therefore these two attributes are related to the pardon mentioned in the clause: "Allãh has pardoned of it," and not to the prohibition contained in the verse.

QUR'ÃN: A people before you indeed asked such questions, and they became disbelievers on account of them: It is said that sa'alahu (سَأَلَهُ) and sa'ala 'anhu (سَأَلَ عَنْهُ) have the same meaning: He asked about him; thumma (ثُمَّ = then) indicates delay in terms of speaking, not in terms of time; bihã (بِهَا = in them) is connected with, disbelievers, as the verse apparently shows; it is intended to forbid putting questions concerning the conditions of laws and orders which were left vague at the time of legislation. Thus, the disbelief here indicates disbelief in the laws as it entails diffidence of soul and straitness of hearts against their acceptance.

There is also a possibility that bi (بِ) in it may be used to show the cause; then the meaning will be: on account of it; but this is a far-fetched idea.

Although the verse has not named the people who had turned disbelievers, yet there are some episodes mentioned in the Qur'ãn to which the verse may be applied, like that of the table (among the Christians' stories) and several others related to the ummah of Mūsã and others.

TRADITIONS

[as-Suyūṭī] quotes Ibn Jarīr, Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh who have narrated from Abū Hurayrah that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.), delivered a sermon before us, and said, 'O people! Allāh has prescribed ḥajj for you.' ‘Ukāshah ibn Muḥṣin stood up and said, 'Every year? O Messenger of Allāh!' (The Prophet) said, 'As for it, if I had said, "Yes," it would have become obligatory; and if it had become obligatory and then you were to leave it, you would have gone astray. Remain silent before me when I am silent before you, as those who were before you had perished only because of their questionings and their discord against their prophets.' Then Allāh revealed: O you who believe! Do not put questions about things which if declared to you may trouble you . . " (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This story has been narrated by several narrators from Abū Hurayrah and Abū Amāmah, etc.; and it has been narrated in Majma‘u 'l-bayān and other Shī‘ite books. It fits on the explanation that we have written earlier.

[as-Suyūṭī] quotes Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim who have nar-rated from as-Suddī about the word of Allāh: O you who believe! Do not put questions about things which if declared to you . . ., that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.), became angry one day, and stood up to address the people; and he said, 'Ask me, for you will not ask me about anything but I shall inform you about it.' So there stood up a Qurayshite man from Banū Sahm, ‘Abdullāh ibn Ḥadhāqah by name – and people used to vilify him – and said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! Who is my father?' He said, 'Your father is so-and-so (and he asserted his relationship to his father).' ‘Umar betook himself to him, kissed his foot and said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! We are pleased with Allāh as the Lord, and with you as the Prophet, and with the Qur’ān as the leader; so pardon us, may Allāh pardon you!' So he continued beseeching him until his anger subsided. It was on that day that he said, 'The child belongs to the bed and for the adulterer is the stone.' And it was (then) revealed to him: And people before you indeed asked such questions, [and then became disbelievers on account of them]." (ibid.)

The author says: This tradition is narrated through several chains with variations in their wordings. However you have seen earlier that it does not fit on the verse.

[as-Suyūṭī] quotes Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhhir and al-Ḥākim (who said that it is correct), who narrated from Tha‘labah al-Khashnī that he said, "Then the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.), said, 'Verily Allāh has laid down (some) limits, so do not transgress them; and has prescribed for you (some) obligations, so do not neglect them; and has made (some) things unlawful, so do not commit them; and has left (some) things, not because of forgetfulness, but as a mercy from Himself for you, so accept them and do not delve in them.'" (ibid.)

ʿAlī (a.s.) said, "Verily Allãh has enjoined upon you some duties, so do not neglect them; and laid down for you some limits, so do not transgress them; and has forbidden you some things, so do not commit them; and has passed over some things, and has not left them because of forgetfulness, so do not force yourself concerning them." (Majmaʿu 'l-bayãn; Tafsīr aṣ-Ṣãfī)

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chains from Abu 'l-Jārūd that he said, "Abū Jaʿfar (a.s.), said, 'When I tell you anything, you should ask me for its authority from the Book of Allãh.' Thereafter he said in one of his talks, 'Verily the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had forbid-den idle lalk, squandering of wealth and excessive questioning.' It was said to him, 'O Son of the Messenger of Allãh! Where is it from the Book of Allãh?' He said, 'Verily Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, says: There is no good in most of their secret talks except (in his) who enjoins charity or goodness or reconciliation between people [4:114]; and He has said: And do not give away your property which Allãh has made for you a (means of) support to the weak of understanding [4:5]; and He has said: do not put questions about things which if declared to you may trouble you.'" [5:101] (al-Kãfī)

[al-ʿAyyãshī] narrates from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad that he said: "I wrote to Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍã (a.s.), [he wrote its reply] at the end of which he wrote: 'Have not you [people] been forbidden to ask too many questions? Yet you refuse to desist! Beware of it, for those who were before you had perished only because of abundance of their questions. So Allãh, the Blessed, the Sublime, said: O you who believe! Do not put questions about things which if declared to you may trouble you, . . . A people before you indeed asked such questions, and then became disbelievers in them.'" (at-Tafsīr)

QUR'ÃN: Allãh has not ordained (the making) of) a baḥīrah or a sãibah or a waṣīlah or a ḥãmi . . .: These were some cattle-groups the people of the Era of Ignorance had made for them some rules which were based on respect and accorded them a sort of freedom, Allãh in this verse rebuts the idea that He had might have made any of it. [The literal meaning: Allãh has not made]. This negated making is related to those cattles attributes, not their beings; because their beings, their selves, are Allãh's creatures, without any doubt. Likewise, their attributes, so far as they are attributes, are created by Allãh. What may be positively or negatively ascribed to Allãh, are the self-same attri-butes inasmuch as they were thought to be the source of the rules, which those Arabs claimed for them. Thus, the negation of making of baḥīrah and its group means that Allãh had not ordained those rules or laws which were ascribed to them and were well-known among Arabs.

The exegetes differ about the meanings of the names of these four kinds of cattle, resulting in difference about details of their related laws – as you will soon see – yet it is accepted by all that those laws accorded them some sort of freedom, respect and care for their well-being; and that three groups were of camels, i.e. baḥīrah, sãibah and ḥãmi, and one, waṣīlah, was of goat.

al-Baḥīrah: Majma'u 'l-bayãn says: It was a she-camel which gave birth five times, the last one being a male calf; they used to cleave its ear a wide tear; they refrained from riding or slaughtering it; it was not driven away from any water or pasture, and even if a tired traveller found it, he would not ride it. (Reported from az-Zajjãj.)

Also, it is said that when a she-camel had given birth five times, they looked at the fifth issue; if it was a male, they slaughtered it and men and women all partook of it; but if it was a female, they cleaved its ear and it was called al-baḥīrah: its fur was not shorn; if it was slaughtered, the name of Allãh was not mentioned on it; nor was it used for loading or riding; women were forbidden to taste even a drop of its milk or to get any benefit from it – its milk and benefits were reserved for men until it died; when it died, men and women joined in eating it. (Reported from Ibn 'Abbãs.)

And it is said that al-baḥīrah was the daughter of as-sãibah. (Reported from Muḥammad ibn Isḥãq.)

as-Sãibah: Majma'u 'l-bayãn says: It was what they used to let go free; a man made a vow that if he returned from his journey, or if he recovered from illness, or so on, then his she-camel would be sãibah; then it would be treated like al-baḥīrah, in that it would not be used in any way, nor would it be kept back from any water or pasture. (Reported from az-Zajjāj; and also it is the saying of ‘Alqamah.)

Also, it is said that it is was a she-camel that was freed for idols. Usually, a man freed whatever he wished from among his property; then he brought it to custodians, i.e. servants of their dieties, and they fed way-farers of its milk and so on. (Reported from Ibn ‘Abbās and Ibn Mas‘ūd.)

Also, it is said that when a she-camel gave birth to ten females consequently, without any male calf coming in between, it was made free; they did not ride it, nor did they shear its fur, and except for a guest, no one could drink its milk; if after that she again bore a female, its ear was torn and it was left to roam with its mother; and it was that was called al-baḥīrah. (Reported from Muḥammad ibn Isḥāq.)

al-Waṣīlah: Majma‘u 'l-bayān says: It was taken out from goats. When a goat gave birth to a female kid, it belonged to them, and if it bore a male, it was slaughtered to their dieties; but if it gave birth to a male and a female together, they said: It has joined its brother; and then the male kid was not slaughtered for their dieties. (Reported from az-Zajjāj.)

Also, it has been said that when a goat gave birth seven times, then if the seventh was a male kid, they slaughtered it for their dieties, and its meat was exclusively reserved for men; and if it was a female kid, it was allowed to live and joined the herd. But if the seventh preg-nancy brought forth a male and a female kids, they said: The sister has joined its brother, as it is unlawful to us; so both became unlawful, and their benefit and milk was reserved for men to the exclusion of women. (Reported from Ibn Mas‘ūd and Muqātil)

Also, it is said that al-waṣīlah was a goat which brought forth ten female kids in five pregnancies, without there being any male among them. Then they said she has joined. Then whatever was born to her after that, was reserved for men, the women being excluded from it. (Reported from Muḥammad ibn Isḥāq.)

al-Ḥāmī: Majma‘u 'l-bayān says: It is a male camel. When a male camel had sired ten pregnancies, they used to say: Its back is pro-tected. Nothing was loaded on it, nor was it prevented from water or pasture. (Reported from Ibn ‘Abbās and Ibn Mas‘ūd, and also from Abū ‘Ubaydah and az-Zajjāj.)

Also, it is said that when a male camel's child's child was im-pregnated, they said: Its back has become protected; so it was not ridden. (Reported from al-Farrā’.)

Although there is all this difference in meanings of these names, there is a strong probability that it portrays the variation in different tribes' usage and customs, because such superstitions were wide spread among ancient barbaric nations.

Be it as it may. The verse aims at refuting the rules they had fabricated for these four types of the cattle, wrongly ascribing them to Allãh. Look at the divine words: "Allãh has not ordained (the making of) a baḥīrah or a sãibah or a waṣīlah or a ḥãmi"; followed immediately by the clause: "but those who disbelieve fabricate a lie against Allãh."

This latter clause appears to answer a supposed question: When Allãh denied ordaining baḥīrah and other types of cattle, it was as if somebody had asked: 'Then what is the position of the claims made by disbelievers?' And the answer came: those who disbelieve fabricate a lie against Allãh. Then it was further explained, adding the clause: "and most of them do not understand." It means that their positions differ in this fabrication; most of them fabricate against Allãh what they do and they do not understand; while the remaining small group do under-stand the Truth, knowing well that what they ascribe to Allãh is mere fabrication. These are the leaders whose words are listened to and who manage the affairs of the masses; and they are the obstinate and stubborn ones.

QUR'ÃN: And when it is said to them: "Come to what Allãh has revealed and to the Messenger," they say: "That on which we found our fathers is sufficient for us." What! Even though their fathers knew nothing and did not follow the right way: It describes their attitude when they were invited to come to what Allãh had revealed and to the Messenger whose responsibility was to convey the mess-age. That call invited them to Truth, devoid of fabrication, and knowl-edge clear of ignorance. The preceding verse gathers fabrication and lack of understanding together on their side; obviously nothing remains for the opposite side – the side of Allãh – except truth and knowledge.

But they did not discard it except because of blind imitation, as they said: That on which we found our fathers is sufficient for us.

at-Taqlīd (اَلتَّقْلِيْدُ = imitation, following) is not always wrong; sometimes it might be correct with some conditions – and that is when an ignorant person follows a knowledgeable one. This 'following' is the factor on which the progress of human society is based in all those affairs of life in which man is unable to acquire necessary knowledge. However, if an ignorant man follows another ignorant one in his ignor-ance, then it is highly condemnable in the eyes of the understanding people. Likewise, it is also objectionable if a learned man follows another learned one, going against his own deductions discarding it for another man's findings.

That is why Allāh has refuted their claim and said: "What! Even though their fathers knew nothing and did not follow the right way." It indicates that reason – if there is reason – does not allow a man to refer to him who has no knowledge, nor does he follow the right way. This is the way of life, and it does not permit to follow a path which is not free of dangers, and whose condition is not known – neither independently nor by following an expert.

Probably, the addition of: "and did not follow the right way", after the clause: "knew nothing", aims at completing the qualifications of speech, in its true sense; although reference by an ignorant person to another ignorant one is condemnable, but it is so only when the followed one is like the follower in ignorance without there being any distinction between the two. But if the followed one, even if ignorant, proceeds on the way guided by a knowledgeable expert, then he follows the right way, and then there is no blame if somebody follows him on the way; because ultimately it turns out to be an imitation of a person who knows the details of the path.

It is now clear from above that the clause: "even though their fathers knew nothing", was not enough by itself to complete the proof against them, because there would have remained a possibility that their ignorant fathers might have been following learned guides, in which case there was no blame on them. Therefore, that possibility was removed by adding the clause: "and did not follow the right way", so there was no justification in imitating such people.

The preceding verse: Allāh has not ordained (the making of) a baḥīrah . . ., had shown that those people either had no understanding, (and they were the majority) or were stubborn and arrogant [and they were the misleading leaders]; and it had made it clear that such people did not deserved to be addressed by Allāh, or to be presented with divine arguments. That is the reason that this verse does not argue with them directly; it seems to address another group and avoids talking to them face to face; and therefore it says: "What! Even though their fathers knew nothing and did not follow the right way."

There has been given in the first volume[40] of this adoption of other people's concepts and rulings, which you may refer for details.

The verse also makes it clear that referring to the Book of Allãh and to His Messenger, i.e., to the sunnah is not a blameworthy imita-tion and following.

TRADITIONS

It is narrated in Tafsīru 'l-Burhãn from aṣ-Ṣadūq, through his chains, from Muḥammad ibn Muslim, from Abū Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said about the word of Allãh, the Might, the Great: Allãh has not ordained (the making of) a baḥīrah or a sãibah or a waṣīlah or a ḥãmi. "The people of (the Era of) Ignorance used to say, when a she-camel brought forth two calfs in one pregnancy, 'it has joined'; then they did not allow its slaughter or partaking of its meat; and when it bore ten (calves), they declared it to be sãibah; then they did not allow riding it or eating its meat; and ḥãmī was the male camel, they did not allow it [i.e. riding or eating it]. So, Allãh revealed that He had not ordained prohibition of any of these things."

[al-Baḥrãnī says:] Then Ibn Bãbawayh says: "It has been nar-rated that al-baḥīrah was a she-camel, when it gave birth five times, then if the fifth calf was a male, they slaughtered it (the calf) and men and women partook of it; and if the fifth was a female they tore its ear, and its meat and milk was unlawful to women, but if it died then it became lawful to women. as-Sãibah was a camel, which was freed by nadhr (vow); a man vowed that if Allãh gave him recovery from ill- ness or conveyed him to his home, he would do so.

"And al-waṣīlah was a goat. If a goat gave birth in seven preg-nancies, and the seventh kid was a male, it was slaughtered, and men and women ate from it, but if it was a female, it was joined to the herd; and if there were two kids, a male and a female, they said: 'It has joined its brother;' then it was not slaughtered, and its meat was unlawful for women, except that it died (of itself), the eating it was lawful for men and women.

"And al-ḥãm was a stallion, when a child of its child was (ready to be) ridden, they said: 'Its back is indeed protected.'" Then he (al-Baḥrãnī said: "Also, it is narrated that ḥãmi is a camel which brought forth ten pregnancies; so they said: 'Its back is indeed protected;' so it was not ridden, nor was it prevented from any pasture or water."

The author says: There are other traditions from the Shī'ite and Sunnite chains, regarding the meanings of these names: baḥīrah, sãibah, waṣīlah and ḥãmi, some other have been quoted above from Majma'u 'l-bayãn.

What is certain about their meanings, is that these groups of cattle enjoyed some freedom in the Era of Ignorance, and there were related laws, for example, it was not allowed to ride them or eat their meat, and they were never prevented from any pasture or water; also, that waṣīlah was from goats and the other three from camels.

Ibn 'Abbãs has narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: "Verily 'Amr ibn Luḥī ibn Qam'ah ibn Khandaf became king of Mecca. He was the first who changed the religion of Ismã'īl and obtained idols and put up graven images[41] and invented baḥīrah, sãibah, waṣīlah and ḥãmi." (The Messenger of Allãh, s.a.w.a. said:) "And indeed I saw him in the Fire, the smell of his guts troubles the people of the Fire." Also, it is narrated that [the Holy Prophet said, "I saw him] dragging his guts in the Fire."

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated this chains from Ibn 'Abbãs and others.

as-Suyūṭī quotes 'Abdu 'r-Razzãq, Ibn Abī Shaybah, 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibn Jarīr who narrated from Zayd ibn Aslam that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), said 'Verily I know the first man who invented sãibah and fixed idols, and the first man who changed the religion of Ibrãhīm.' They said, 'Who was he, O Messenger of Allãh!' He said, 'Amr ibn Luḥī, of Banū Ka'b; I had indeed seen him dragging his guts in the Fire.' [Then he said:] 'And I know who put marks on dedicated animals.' They said, 'Who was he, O Messenger of Allãh?' He said, 'A man from Banū Mudlij; he had two she-camels, and he tore up their ears and forbade (to himself) their milk and backs; and he said, "These two are for Allãh." Thereafter, he felt the need of them, so he drank their milk and rode (on) their backs.' He (the Prophet) said, 'And indeed I saw him in the Fire, and the two (camels) were shattering him with their mouths and trampling him down with their hooves.'" (ad-Durr 'l-manthūr)

[as-Suyūṭī] quotes Aḥmad, ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, al-Ḥakīm at-Tirmidhī (in Nawãdiru 'l-uṣūl), Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim and al-Bayhaqī (in al-Asmã' wa 'ṣ-ṣifãt) who narrated from Abu 'l-Aḥwaṣ, from his father, that he said, "I came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) wearing shabby garments. So he said to me, 'Do you have some wealth?' I said, 'Yes.' He said, 'What type of wealth?' I said, 'From every kind, camels, goats, horses and slaves.' He said, 'When Allãh has bestowed on you, it should be seen on you.' Then he said, 'Do your camels give birth to (calves with) unimpaired ears?' I said, 'Yes; and does camel give birth except like this.' He said, 'Then perhaps you take a razor and cut off the ears of a group of them and then you say: "It is a baḥīrah," and split the ears of (another) group of them, and then you say: "It is separated?"' I said, 'Yes.' (The Prophet) said, 'Don't do it; whatever Allãh has given you is lawful to you.' Then he said, 'Allãh has not ordained (the making of) a baḥīrah or a sãibah or a waṣīlah or a ḥãmi.'" (ibid.)

COMMENTARY

The verse enjoins the believers to take care of themselves and adhere to the path of their guidance; they should not be worried because a group of people has gone astray; everyone is to return to Allãh, and He is to judge everyone according to his deeds.

The speech contains very deep meanings.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! Take care of your souls; he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way; . . .: 'Alaykum anfusakum (عَلَيْكُمْ أَنْفُسَكُمْ = translated here, take care of your souls): 'Alaykum is a verbal noun, and means, adhere; your soul is its objective; literally it means, adhere to your souls.

It is known that going astray and being on the right way – the opposites – take place when one proceeds on a way. If one adheres to the middle of the road, he reaches to the end of the road, and it is the destination that he had intended to arrive at in his life's journey. On the other hand, if he was not serious in his proceeding and deviated from the right path, then he goes astray and misses the intended goal. The verse supposes that man has got a path to tread on and a destination to arrive at; sometimes he adheres to the way and is guided aright; at other times he deviates from it and is led astray. However, there is no other destination that a man aims at except the blissful life and good end. Yet the verse declares that to Allãh is the return to Whom all have to return – those who are guided aright as well as those who go astray.

The reward that a man wants to get in his natural proceeding is only with Allãh; the guided ones achieve it and the misled ones are deprived of it. It inevitably means that all the paths used by the people of guidance and all the ways trodden upon by the people of misguid-ance finally end at Allãh, and with Him is the intended destination, although those paths and ways vary in conveying the man to desire and success or beating him with failure and loss; and likewise regarding nearness and distance; as Allãh says: O man! Surely thou art striving to thy Lord, a hard striving, so that thou art to meet Him (84:6); . . . now surely the party of Allãh are the successful ones (58:22); Didn't you see those who changed Allãh's favour for ungratefulness and made their people to alight into the abode of perdition (14:28); . . . then verily I am very near; I answer the prayer of suppliant when he calls on Me, so they should answer My call and believe in Me that they may walk in the right way (2:186); . . . and (as for) those who do not believe, there is a heaviness in their ears and it is obscure to them; these shall be called to from a far-off place (41:44).

Allãh has made it clear in these verses that all men are unavoid-ably proceeding to Him; the road for some of them is short and it leads to guidance and success, while that for the others is long and it does not end at bliss and happiness, but takes the walker to destruction and perdition.

In short, the verse supposes for the believers and the disbelievers two paths, both of which end at Allãh; and it directs the believers to look after their own interests and to turn away from the others, i.e., from the people of misguidance. They should not weary themselves thinking about those people; because their account is on their Lord, not on the believers; these believers will not be asked about them, so why should they involve themselves with them. Thus the verse is near in meaning to another verse:

Say to those who believe (that) they for-give those who do not hope the days of Allāh that He may reward a people for what they earn (45:14). And similar is the connotation of the verse: This is a people that have passed away; they shall have what they earned and you shall have what you earn, and you shall not be called upon to answer for what they did (2:134).

Therefore, a believer must remain occupied only in that which concerns his soul by proceeding on the path of guidance; he should not be shaken by what he sees of misguidance of the people and perva-sion of sins among them; he should not waste his time with involve-ment in their affairs. Truth is truth even if abandoned, and falsehood is falsehood even if taken up, as Allāh says: Say: "The bad and the good are not equal, though the abundance of the bad may enchant you; so fear Allāh, O men of understanding, that you may be successful." (5:100); And not alike are the good and the evil. . . . (41:34).

In the light of the above discourse, the words of Allāh: "he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way," are a sort of illusion which aims at forbidding the believers to be influenced by mis-guidance of those who are misled, as it may encourage them to leave the way of guidance, and to think that the present world does not sup-port religion and does not allow them to be involved in spiritual affairs, as these things are remnants of the ancient simple customs whose time has passed away. Allāh says: And they say: "If we follow the guidance with you, we shall be carried off from our country." . . . (28:57).

It forbids them also to fear the others' misguidance and neglect their own guidance; in this way they would remain engaged in the others' affairs and would forget their own selves; thus they would become like the others. Actually, what is incumbent on a believer is only to call towards his Lord, enjoin the good, and forbid the evil. In short he is to arrange the normal causes, and then he should leave the affairs of the effects in the hands of Allāh, because to Him belong all the affairs. He has not been told to put himself in perdition in trying to rescue others from peril; and he shall not be called upon to account for what others had done; he is not an overseer to check others' activities. Thus the verse is similar in meaning to what the Qur'ān says in other places: Then may be you will kill yourself with grief, sorrowing over them, if they do not believe in this announcement. Surely We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment for it, so that We may try them (as to) which of them is best in deed. And most surely We will make what is on it bare ground without herbage (18:6-8). And even if there were a Qur'ãn with which the mountains were made to pass away, or the earth were travelled over with it, or the dead were made to speak thereby; nay! The commandment is wholly Allãh's. Have not yet those who believe known that if Allãh had willed He would certainly guide all the people?. . . (13:31)

This explanation shows that this verse is not in conflict with those of calling the people, and those telling the believers to enjoin good and forbid evil; because it only forbids the believers to remain involved in the people's misguidance, forgetting their own guidance to the right way. In other words, they should not put their own souls in perdition while endeavouring to rescue others from peril.

Moreover, calling the others to Allãh, and enjoining good and forbidding evil are a part of a believer's involvement with the affairs of his own self, and of his advancing on the path of his Lord. How can this verse be considered as going against the verses of the Call or those of enjoining good and forbidding evil, or taken to be abrogating them, while Allãh has counted these factors as the designation of this relig-ion and a foundation upon which it has been built; as Allãh says: Say: "This is my way: I invite (you) to Allãh; with clear sight (are) I and he who follows me; . . ." (12:108); You are the best nation raised up for (the benefit of) men; you enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong . . . (3:110).

What is incumbent on a believer is this: that he should invite to Allãh with clear sight, and should enjoin the good and forbid the evil, aiming only at discharging a duty imposed upon him by Allãh. He is not expected to kill himself in grief [if they do not listen] or to exert himself beyond the limit trying to influence the misguided people, as this is not his duty.

The verse proposes that there is one path for the believers that leads them aright, and another one for the disbelievers that misleads them to error. Then it orders the believers to adhere to their souls (as it says, 'alaykum anfusakum, which literally means, adhere to your souls). All this shows that the soul of the believer itself is the path which he should tread on and adhere to; exhorting one to a path conforms with exhortation to adhere to it, to never leave it; it does not connote adher-ence to the walker of the way; as we clearly see in verses like this: And (know) that this is my path, the right one, therefore follow it; and follow not (other) ways, for they will lead you away from His way; . . . (6:153).

Now, when Allãh wishes to exhort the believers to vigilantly proceed on the path of their guidance, He orders them to adhere to their souls. It makes it clear that the path, which they have to walk on and adhere to, is their own souls. That is, the soul of the believer is his path on which he proceeds to his Lord; it is the path of his guidance, and it leads him to his ever-lasting bliss.

In this way, this verse throws brilliant light on the aim and goal to which other verses point somewhat vaguely, like the words of Allãh: O you who believe! Fear Allãh, and let every soul consider what it has sent on for the morrow, and fear Allãh; surely Allãh is Aware of what you do. And be not like those who forgot Allãh, so He made them for-get their own souls; these it is that are the transgressors. Not alike are the inmates of the Fire and the dwellers of the garden; the dwellers of the garden are they that are the achievers (59:18-20).

These verses enjoin on every soul to consider what it has sent on ahead, and to vigilantly guard its good deeds, as it is its provision for tomorrow – and the best provision is piety and fear of Allãh. The soul has a today and a tomorrow, and it is proceeding ahead as it has to go a long way, and its destination is Allãh, and with Him is the best reward, and that is the garden. Therefore, every soul should continu-ously remember its Lord without forgetting Him for a single moment; because Allãh is the destination, and forgetting the destination would make one forget the path; because whoever forgets his Lord forgets his soul; such a person would not gather any provision for his tomor-row and for his future journey, which he could use to preserve his life; and it would mean perdition. This is the meaning of what both sects have narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: "Whoever knew his soul knew his Lord."

It is the meaning that is supported by total meditation and cor-rect consideration. Man, in the journey of his life – no matter to which end it would stretch out – has really no concern at all except the good of his soul and happiness of his life, even when he sometimes is engaged in what looks like benefiting the others. Allãh says: If you do good, you do good for your own souls, and if you do evil, it is for them (only) . . . (17:7).

There is only this man who changes from one condition to an-other, and develops from one stage to the other: foetus, child, youth, middle aged, and old; then continues his life in barzakh, then on the Day of Resurrection, then to the Garden or the Fire. It is this distance the man completes from his first existence until he reaches his Lord. Allãh says: And that to your Lord is the end goal (53:42).

And this man does not go ahead in this journey except with some activities of mind (i.e., beliefs, etc.) and some actions of limbs – be they good or evil. Whatever he produces today will be his provi-sion tomorrow. Thus, the soul is the path of man to his Lord, and Allãh is the final destination of his journey.

This is a path man has to tread upon compulsorily, as the words of Allãh indicate: O man! Surely thou art striving to thy Lord, a hard striving, so that thou art to meet Him (84:6). This path has to be trod-den by each man, be he a believer or disbeliever, alert and cautious or oblivious and careless. The verse, when it exhorts to adhere to this path does not intend to push to it those who do not use it.

The verse's only purpose is to make the believers aware of this reality when they had become oblivious of it. Although this reality, like all other creative realities, is firmly established and is not affected by our knowledge or ignorance, yet man's attention to it does have manifest effect on his activities. And it is the actions that provide to the human soul an upbringing that is proper for its nature. When the actions are appropriate with reality and agree with purpose of creation, then the soul, which is brought up with their help, will be blissful in its endeavours; its projects will not fail and its dealings will not end in loss. We have explained it in many places in this book, which leaves no room for any doubt.

However, it may be elaborated in this background, as follows: Man, like other creatures of Allãh, is placed under divine training and rearing, His attention encompasses all his affairs. And Allãh has said: . . . there is no living creature but He holds it by its forelock; surely my Lord is on the straight path (11:56). This creative rearing, accord-ing to the training Allãh gives to other things, proceeds together to Him; and He has said: . . . now surely to Allãh do all affairs eventually come (42:53). This rearing does not change in any affair, and does not differ even a little between one thing and the other, because the path is straight, and the affair is the same and constant. Allãh has also said: . . . you see no incongruity in the creation of the Beneficent God; . . . (67:3).

The end goal of man, and the destination of his affairs where his final result (his felicity and infelicity; his success and failure) is estab-lished is based by Allãh's prescription on his character and his soul's aspects, which in their turn are based on deeds which are divided into good and evil, and piety and corruption. Allãh says: And (by) the soul and Him Who made it perfect, then He inspired it to understand what is wrong for it and right for it; he will indeed be successful who purifies it, and he will indeed fail who corrupts it (91:7-10).

As you see, these verses put the perfected soul at one end, i.e. at the start of his journey, its success, or failure at the other end, and it is the end of the journey. Then they base the two ends of success and failure on the soul's purification and its corruption, i.e. the good and evil deeds, which the verses say, are inspired to man by Allãh.

The verses in all this elaboration do not pass over the condition of soul. They look at soul as a perfected creation of Allãh; it is to which are ascribed the piety and impiety; it is, that is, purified and corrupted; and it is in which the man becomes successful and fails. As you understand, it follows the course dictated by creation.

Keep in view this creative reality: Man in journey of his life proceeds on the path of his soul; he cannot step away from it, even for one step, nor can he leave it, even for a single moment. The condition of the one who is ever alert to it and remembers its demands without being oblivious to it at all, cannot be like the position of the one who forgets it and is oblivious of the inescapable reality, as Allãh has said: . . . Say: "Are those who know and those who do not know alike?" Only those possessed of understanding shall bear in mind (39:9); So if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy. And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life, and We will raise him on the Day of Resurrection, blind. He shall say: "My Lord! Why hast Thou raised me blind, and I was a seeing one indeed?" He will say: "Even so: Our signs came to you, but you forgot them; even thus shall you be forsaken this day." (20:123-6).

When a man becomes aware of this reality and turns his atten-tion to his actual position vis-à-vis his Lord, and compares himself to all the parts of the universe, he finds his soul cut off from others (while previously he saw it in another light) and hidden behind a curtain; no one can encompass or influence it except its Lord Who manages its affairs, and pushes it from behind and pulls it forward by His power and His guidance. He finds that it is alone with its Lord, and besides Him it has no guardian or master. Then the man under-stands the implication of the divine words: "to Allãh is your return, of all (of you), so He will inform you of what you did," coming after the words: "take care of your souls; he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way;" and also he knows the meaning of the verse: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth?. . . (6:122).

At this point the soul's perception and discernment will change; and it will emigrate from the position of polytheism to the station of servitude and place of monotheism. He will be changing polytheism with monotheism, imaginary with real, distance with proximity, satanic arrogance with divine humility, imaginary self-sufficiency with devo-tional dependence – if divine care takes its hand and leads it ahead.

Regrettably, we are not in a position to perfectly understand these ideas, because we are clinging to the earth and are involved in it, and it stops us from diving to the depth of these realities, which are disclosed by the religion and to which the Divine Book points; but we are very much entangled with unnecessary scums of this transitory life, which the divine speech speaks of only as a play and idle sport, as He says: And this world's life is naught but a play and an idle sport; . . . (6:32); That is the (last) reach of their knowledge; . . . (53:30).

Even so, the correct consideration, deep investigation and ad-equate meditation leads us to general confirmation of its broader out-lines, although we fall short of encircling its details. And Allãh is the Guide.

Well, probably we have gone beyond the limits of brevity; therefore we should return to the beginning of this talk:-

The verse may be taken as addressing the community per se. That is the clause: O you who believe! may be addressed to the believers' society as a group. In this case, the clause: "take care of your souls," will mean that the believers should reform their Islamic society by acquiring the attribute of being guided aright by divine guidance. They should preserve their religious cognition, virtuous deeds, and general Islamic symbols, as Allãh says: And hold fast by the cord of Allãh all together and be not divided . . . (3:103). It was described in its exegesis that this holding fast collectively means adherence to the Book and Sunnah.

Accordingly, the clause: "he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way," will mean that the erronous non-Islamic societies cannot hurt them in any way. Therefore, the Muslims are not obligated to exert most strenuously for speading Islam among the non-Muslim nations. They should limit themselves within normal limits, as explained earlier.

Or, it may mean that they should not let the guidance they have got slip out of their hands by looking at the misguided societies as to how they are engrossed in base desires and how they enjoy the forbid-den fruits of life; because all of them are to return to Allãh and He will inform them of what they had done. Accordingly, the verse has the same implication as the following ones: Let it not deceive you that those who disbelieve go to and fro in the cities (fearlessly). A brief enjoyment! Then their abode is hell, and evil is the resting-place (3:196-7); And do not stretch your eyes after that with which We have provided different classes of them, (of) the splendour of this world's life, . . . (20:131).

There may also be another meaning for the clause: "he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way." The negative may refer to the harm emanating from the persons of those who err, and not to any of their particular characteristics or actions; thus the meaning will be unrestricted. Accordingly, the verse negates the idea that the disbelievers could hurt the Islamic society by forcefully changing it to a non-Islamic society. In this case, the verse will be similar in impli-cation to the following verses: . . . This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion, so fear them not, and fear Me. . . . (5:3); They shall by no means harm you but with a slight distress; and if they fight you they shall turn (their) backs to you, . . . (3:111).

A group of ancient exegetes have said that the verse gives the believers permission to abandon the Call to religion and avoid enjoin-ing the good and forbidding the evil. According to them the verse speaks exclusively about a time or situation when the conditions are not found for the said Call, and the enjoining and forbidding – i.e. when the believer has no security against harm. They have narrated in this respect traditions, which shall be quoted under the ensuing "Traditions".

This interpretation means that the clause: "he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way," is an illusion to removal of responsibility, i.e., you are not responsible for it. Otherwise, no one can have any doubt about the damage that the religious society suffers from spreading of misguidance, disbelief, and debauchery.

However, this meaning seems far-fetched, which does not agree with the context: If this verse is taken as particularizing the generality of the incumbency of the Call to religion and enjoining the good and forbidding the evil, then its language is not that of particularization; and if it is taken as an abrogator, then the verses of the Call and en-joining and forbidding confute abrogation. This topic has some addenda, which you will later see.

TRADITIONS

al-Ãmidī narrates from ʻAlī (a.s.) that he said, "He who knew his soul knew his Lord." (al-Ghurar wa 'd-durar)

The author says: Both sects have also narrated it form the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); and it is a well-known ḥadīth. Some scholars have said that it uses the style of attaching an impossible to an impossible; and that it means that it is impossible for man to know his soul because it is impossible for him to comprehend Allãh. But this view has been refuted: First, because of another Prophetic tradition: The more one of you knows his soul, the more he knows his Lord; and Second, because the ḥadīth gives a meaning of contradistinction to the verse: And be not like those who forgot Allãh, so He made them forget their own souls [59:19].

ʻAlī (a.s.) has also said, "Astute is he who knows his soul and purifies his deeds." (ibid.)

The author says: In previous explanation it was described how purification is interconnected with gnosis of soul.

He (a.s.) has also said, "Gnosis through the soul is the more beneficial of the two gnosis." (ibid.)

The author says: Apparently, the two gnosis refers to the gnosis through the signs of the soul and the one through the signs of the universe. Allãh says: We will soon show them Our signs in the uni-verse and in their own souls, until it will become quite clear to them that it is the truth. Is it not sufficient as regards your Lord that He is a witness over all things? (41:53). And in the earth there are signs for those who are sure, and in your own souls (too); will you not then see? (51:20-21).

How is the progress of soul more beneficial than the progress of universe? It is because the gnosis of the soul is usually not separate from the reform in its characteristics and activities, unlike the gnosis of the universe; gnosis of the signs is beneficial only because the signs per se lead to the gnosis of Allãh, and of His names and attributes. For example, Allãh is Living, death does not touch Him; Powerful, help-lessness does not vitiate Him; All-knowing, ignorance does not mix with Him; He is the Creator of all things, Owner of everything; He is the Lord who takes care of everything by what it has earned; He created the creatures not because He had any need of them, but in order that He should bestow His favours on them as they deserve; then He will gather them for the day of gathering, there is no doubt in it: so that He may reward those who do evil according to what they did, and He may reward those who do good with goodness [53:31].

This and similar verses describe such true realities which, if man were to receive and master them, would represent before him the reality of his life; he would understand that it is an eternal life having ever-lasting bliss or never-ending misery; that it is not this temporary fantasy, this distracting passtime. This academic stand leads man to realize that he does have responsibilities and duties vis-à-vis his Lord and vis-à-vis his fellow human beings in this world as well as in the hereafter. No one is devoid of this thought, not even a bedouine, in a sort of a life after death – whatever details they may attach to it – and they strive to practise good deeds in order to make that life happy and blissful. This factor is very clear to all.

The life which man adopts for himself, presents before his eyes the necessities and requirements which that life demands. Thus he is guided to the deeds, which normally guarantee the fulfilment of those needs. So he acts keeping his actions in conformity with those require-ments. And it is what we call custom or religion.

In short, looking at the signs in the souls and in the universe, and arriving through them at the knowledge and gnosis of Allãh, leads man to adhere to the true religion and the divine sharī'ah, inasmuch as the said gnosis represents the eternal human life, and it shows this life's connection with Oneness of God, Resurrection and Prophethood.

This guidance to belief and piety is shared by both ways, i.e. the way of looking at the universe and that of looking at the souls. Both of these methods are useful; however that of looking at the signs of the soul is more beneficial. It is because in this process man has every chance to discover his own soul and its powers as well as its spiritual and physical instruments; he will also perceive if its affairs are in a moderate position or are inclined to this or that extreme; which virtu-ous or evil traits it has acquired, and which good or bad situations it has adhered to.

When man is involved in investigation of these affairs and be-comes sure of the security or danger, the felicity or infelicity which are attached to them, he is bound to diagnose his malady and know its treatment from close proximity. Then he can easily be engaged in mending the defective parts and preserving the good ones. It is unlike to looking at the signs in the universe: Although that too calls to the reform of the soul and its purification from inferior and depraved characteristics (and to adorning it with spiritual virtues), but that call comes from a far away place, and it is clear.

The tradition has another deeper meaning which is derived from the results of real researches in psychology, and it is this: Observation of the signs of the universe and the gnosis acquired through it are aca-demic observation based on process of reasoning and acquired knowl-edge. They are unlike to the observation of the soul, its powers and stages of its existence, and to the gnosis manifested from it, because it is a witnessing observation and automatic (unacquired) knowledge. A reasoned proposition depends for its existence on arrangement of anal-ogous deductions and logical proofs; it continues as long as the man is attentive to its premises, is not oblivious to them, nor has his attention diverted from them. That is why the knowledge disappears as soon as attention is diverted from its proof; and then doubts raise their heads and controversies start.

It is contrary to the gnosis the soul has of its own entity, its own powers and the stages of its existence, because this knowledge is manifest. When man becomes engaged in looking at the signs of his own soul, and witnesses its poverty to its Lord and its neediness in all stages of its existence, he sees an amazing reality. He finds his soul attached to the divine grandeur and majesty, connected in its exist-ence, life, knowledge, power, hearing, sight, will, love and all its attributes and activities, to the infinite splendour and brilliance, beauty and perfection of the [divine] existence, life, knowledge, power and other perfections.

He will then see manifestly what we have described earlier that the human soul has no concern except with itself, and never goes out of itself. Its only occupation is the compulsive progress in its own path; and that it is separated from everything it ever thought that it was joined to and mixed with – except its Lord who encompasses its inner and outer self as well as all things besides it. The soul now finds that it is always in private audience with its Lord, even if it happens to be surrounded by a multitude of the people.

At this stage, it turns away from everything and fixes its atten-tion to its Lord; it forgets everything and remembers only its Lord; now no curtain hides Him from it, nor does any screen conceal Him from it; it is the height of gnosis ordained for man.

This knowledge deserves to be called knowledge of Allãh by Allãh. As for the knowledge acquired through reasoning process, which results from observation of the signs of the universe – be it through analogy, conjecture or some other ways – it is the knowledge of an image in mind through an image in mind. Far be it from Allāh to be encompassed by a mind, or that His Person could be equated to an image fabricated by any of His creatures: . . . and they do not compre-hend Him in knowledge [20:110].

Biḥāru 'l-anwār quotes from al-Irshād and al-Iḥtijāj, from ash-Sha'bī that the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a talk: "Verily Allāh is too great to be hidden from anything, or for anything to be hidden from Him."

Mūsā ibn Ja'far (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a talk: "There is no curtain between Him and His creation except the creation (itself); He is hidden without any covering curtain; and is concealed without any hiding veil; there is no god except He, the Great, the Sublime." (at-Tawḥīd)

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] narrates from 'Abdu 'l-A'lā from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) inter alia in a ḥadīth, that he said, "And whoever thinks that he knows Allāh through a curtain, or form, or image, is an idolator; because curtain, form and image are other than Him, and He is only One, professed to be One; how can be he a monotheist who thinks that he declares Him to be One through one other than Him? Only he knows Allāh who knows Him through Allāh; so whoever does not know Him through Him, he [in fact] does not know Him, he only knows someone other than Him . . ." (ibid.). The traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.) on this topic are very numerous; probably Allāh will give us tawfīq to quote and explain them, God willing, in the tafsīr of chapter seven, "The Battlements".

It has indeed come out from the above that observation in the signs of the souls is the most precious and valuable; and only that leads to the real gnosis. Therefore, when 'Alī (a.s.) counted the gnosis through the soul as the more beneficial of the two gnosis, and not as the only appointed way of gnosis, he (a.s.) knew that the general public was incapable of attaining to that gnosis. The Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) are agreed, and the custom of the Prophet and his Ahlu 'l-Bayt has established, that the belief of the one who believes in Allāh through observation of His creation, is fully accepted; and it is the outlook that is prevalant among the believers; so the ways are beneficial, although the benefit in the way of the soul is more complete and comprehensive.

'Alī (a.s.) said, "The gnostic is he who knows his soul and liberates it and purifies it from all that removes it far." (ad-Durar wa 'l-ghurar)

The author says: That is, liberates the soul from captivity of desire and slavery of lust.

[The author has quoted here many sayings of the same Imãm (a.s.) from the same book, which are enumerated below. (tr.)]:-

– The biggest ignorance is a man's oblivion to affairs of his soul.

– The biggest wisdom is man's knowledge of his soul.

– The most knowledgeable of people regarding his soul is the one who fear his Lord most.

The author says: It is because he is the most knowledgeable of all about his Lord, and Allãh has said: . . . verily fear Allãh only those of His servants who are possessed of knowledge; . . . [35:28].

– The best understanding is man's knowledge of his soul; so whoever knows his soul is possessed of understanding, and whoever is ignorant of it, has gone astray.

– I am surprised about the man who searches for his lost item, while he has lost his own soul and does not search for it.

– I am surprised about the man who is ignorant of his soul, how does he know his Lord.

– The end goal of knowledge is that man should know his soul.

The author says: It has been explained earlier, why it is the end goal of knowledge, because it is the knowledge in reality.

– How can he know another person who is ignorant of his own soul?

– Enough is for man in knowledge that he should know his soul, and enough is for him in ignorance that he should not know his soul.

– Whoever knew his soul, became free.

The author says: That is, became free from worldly entanglement; or became free from people being secluded from them; or became free from everything through sincere devotion to Allãh.

– Whoever knows his soul fights it, and whoever does not know it leaves it unfettered.

– Whoever knows his soul, his affair (rank) becomes great.

– Whoever knows his soul, shall be more knowledgeable about others; and whoever is ignorant of his soul, shall be more ignorant of others.

– Whoever knows his soul, he has indeed reached the end goal of all gnosis and knowledge.

– Whoever does not know his soul, goes far away from the path of deliverance, and wanders at random in error and ignorance.

– Knowledge of soul is the most beneficial of all knowledge.

– He attained the great success who achieved the knowledge of the soul.

– Don't be ignorant of your soul, because he, who is ignorant of his soul, is ignorant of everything.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said inter alia in a ḥadīth: "Whoever thinks that he knows Allāh through mind's imagination, is a polytheist; and who-ever thinks that he knows Allāh by name, not meaning, has indeed agreed to calumny, because the name is of a later appearance; and whoever thinks that he worships the name and the meaning, has indeed made a partner for Allāh; and whoever thinks that he worships through attribute, not through perception, refers to an absentee; and whoever thinks that he joins the characterized [entity] to the attribute, has belittled the great one; and they esteem not Allāh with the estima-tion due to Him [6:91]."

He was asked: "Then how is the path of monotheism?" He said, "The door of search is possible, and the pursuit of the way out exists; verily the knowledge of a present person comes before his attributes, and knowledge of the attributes of an absent one comes before his person."

It was said (to him): "And how can the knowledge of a present person come before his attributes?" He said, "You know him, and know (about) his knowledge, and you know your own self through him and do not know your self through your self; and you know that whatever is found in him is for him and through him. As they said to Yūsuf: 'Are you indeed Yūsuf?' He said: 'I am Yūsuf and this is my brother.' [12:90]. So, they knew him through him, and did not know him through someone else, nor did they assert his identity by them-selves through imagination . . ." (Tuḥafu 'l-'uqūl)

The author says: We have described under the second[42] ḥadīth of this section ('Gnosis through the soul is the more beneficial of the two gnosis') that when man becomes engaged with signs of his soul and leaves all other things for it, he becomes exclusively connected to Allāh and forgets everything; it brings in its wake the gnosis of his Lord, a direct knowledge without intervention of any intermediary, without causation by any cause. It is because when one adheres exclus-ively to Allāh, then every curtain is raised; and at this juncture man looks at the arena of Divine Greatness and Majesty which makes him so dazzled and perplexed that he forgets his own self, his own soul. This gnosis, this knowledge truly deserves to be called the Knowledge of Allãh through Allãh.

And then the reality of his soul will be clear to him that it is totally dependent on Allãh, and completely owned by Him in such a way that it is not independent of Him in any affair. And this is the im-plication of the Imãm's words, "and you know your own self through him and do not know your self through your self; and you know that whatever is found in him is for him and through him."

al-Mas‘ūdī has narrated a similar theme in Ithbãtu 'l-waṣiyyah from the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) that he said inter alia in a sermon:

"So, glory be to Thee! Thou hast filled everything and hast separ-ated from everything; so Thou art such that nothing misses Thee; and Thou art the doer of whatever Thou wishest; Blessed art Thou, O He that every comprehender is of His creation, and every limited is from His make. . . .

"Glory be to Thee! Which eye can stand opposite the splendour of Thy light, or can rise to the light of Thy power's reflection, or which understanding can comprehend (even) what is below it? Except the eyes from which curtains have been removed and the blinding covers have been torn away; thus their spirits have soared high on the wing-tips of the spirits; they talked with Thee in whisper under Thy pillars, and entered in middle of the lights of Thy splendour; they looked from the steps of dust to Thy Majesty; so the people of (heavenly) Kingdom have named them visitors, and the people of (worldly) power have called them settlers." (Ithbãtu 'l-waṣiyyah)

[al-Majlisī] has quoted from Irshãdu 'l-qulūb of ad-Daylamī (and has written after that two chains of narration for this ḥadīth) which inter alia says:

"So whoever acts according to My pleasure, I attach to him three characteristics: I introduce to him a thankfulness which is not mixed by ignorance, and a remembrance which is not mingled by forget-fulness, and a love that he does not prefer love of the creatures to My love.

"So when he loves Me, I love him, and I open the eye of his heart towards My greatness; and do not keep hidden from him My special creation; I talk to him in secret in darkness of night and light of day, until his talk with the creatures and his social intercourse with them are discontinued; I make him hear My talk and that of My angels; and I let him know the secret which I have kept hidden from My creatures; I dress him in modesty until all the creation feels shy of him; he walks on the earth while [his sins are] forgiven to him; I make his heart attentive and seeing; I do not hide from him anything of the Garden and the Fire; and let him know what fright and hardship will afflict the people in resurrection, and how I'll take account of wealthy and poor, ignorant and knowledgeable. I shall make him sleep in his grave and send to him Munkar and Nakīr in order that they should question him; he will not see (feel) the sorrow of death, darkness of grave and laḥad[43] and terror of the observing place; then I shall set up for him his balance, and spread his book of accounts, then I'll put his book in his right hand, which he shall read spread about; then I shall not ap-point any interpreter between Me and him. So these are the attributes of the lovers.

"O Aḥmad! Keep your concern, and make your tongue one tongue, and keep your body alive which is never inattentive; whoever is heed-less of Me, I don't care in which valley he perishes."

[The author says:] Although the last three traditions are not related to this topic of uprightness and rectitude, we have quoted them here to let the scholars with critical insight see for themselves, as we have described earlier, that true gnosis of Allãh is not fully acquired through thoughtful knowledge. These traditions mention many items of divine gifts, which can never be attained through rational process.

These are upright and correct traditions, correctness of which is witnessed by the Divine Book, as we shall fully explain, God willing, in exegesis of the seventh chapter, "The Battlements".

al-Qummī narrates in his at-Tafsīr, under the verse: O you who believe! Take care of your souls; (he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way), that the Imãm (a.s.) said, "Keep your souls good, and do not pursue the people's shortcomings, nor should you remind them [of their defects]; because their misguidance will not harm you when you are good."

The author says: The tradition supports what we have explained earlier that the verse aims at forbidding too much involvement in society's reform, more than is usual for such call and for enjoining good and forbidding evil; but it does not allow negligence of that call and enjoining and forbidding.

[43] Laḥad (لَحَد): Charnel vault with a niche for the corpse in the lateral wall. (tr.)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "This verse was revealed concerning taqiyyah (dissimulation)." (Nahju 'l-bayãn)

The author says: The tradition explains that the verse speaks particularly for the situation when one is afraid of the people of misguidance in calling to the truth, enjoining good and forbidding evil, because in sharī'ah this duty is conditional on there being no danger in it. But we have earlier explained that the apparent meaning of the verse does not support it.

Of course, as-Suyūṭī has quoted in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr words of a group of ancient exegetes giving the same meaning, like Ibn Mas'ūd, Ibn 'Umar, Ubayy ibn Ka'b, Ibn 'Abbãs and Makḥūl, but the traditions narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) on this topic do not support it.

The said tradition is the one narrated by at-Tirmidhī (and he has said that it is correct), Ibn Mãjah, Ibn Jarīr, al-Baghawī (in his Mu'jam), Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, aṭ-Ṭabarãnī, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh, al-Ḥãkim (and he has said that it is correct), and al-Bayhaqī (in Shu'abu 'l-'īmãn) from Abū 'Umayyah ash-Sha'bãnī that he said, "I came to Abū Tha'labah al-Khashanī and said to him, 'How do you make (i.e. interpret) this verse?' He said, 'Which verse?' I said, 'The word of Allãh: O you who believe! Take care of your souls; he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way.' He said, 'Indeed, by Allãh! You have asked a man who fully knows it. I had asked the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.) about it. He had said, "Rather you should enjoin each other the good and forbid each other the evil; [continue in this way] until when you see that niggardliness is obeyed, base desire is followed, worldly [attraction] is preferred, and every opinion-holder admires his opinion, then you should take care of your own soul especially, and leave alone the affairs of the general people; because there are ahead of you the days of patience, the one patient in those days will be like the one holding live coal in hand; the one doing (good) deeds in those days shall have the reward of fifty men doing (good) deeds like yours."'"

The author says: The same is the theme of what Ibn Marduwayh has narrated from Ma'ãdh ibn Jabal from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). The tradition shows that enjoining the good and forbidding the evil were not eliminated by this verse.

[as-Suyūṭī] narrates from Aḥmad, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, aṭ-Ṭabarãnī and Ibn Marduwayh, from Abū 'Ãmir al-Ash'arī, that there was some-thing among them, and he was restrained from (coming to) the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.); then he came to him; (The Prophet) said, "What had kept you away?" He said, "O Messenger of Allāh! I read this verse: O you who believe! Take care of your souls; he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way." (Abū ʿĀmir) says, "Then the Prophet (s.a.w.) said, 'Where have you gone? It only means: He who errs from among the disbelievers cannot hurt you when you are on the right way.'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: As you see, the tradition reserves the order of the verse particularly to the permission of abandoning the call of disbelievers to the truth; and diverts it from the permission of discarding enjoining the good and forbidding the evil in matters of sharīʿah. Moreover, the verses which show obligatoriness of the call to truth, and its related verses regarding jihād and so on make it crystal clear that the verse under discussion does not go against the verses of en-joining the good and forbidding the evil.

[as-Suyūṭī] narrates from Ibn Marduwayh, from Abū Saʿīd al-Khudrī that he said, "I mentioned before the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.) the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: O you who believe! Take care of your souls; he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way. The Prophet of Allāh (s.a.w.) said, 'Its interpretation has not come yet; its interpretation will not come until ʿĪsā son of Maryam (a.s.) comes down.'" (ibid.)

The author says: The same comment, as the above are appli-cable here too.

[as-Suyūṭī] narrates from Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim from Ḥudhayfah about the verse: Take care of your souls; he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way, that he said: "When you have enjoined the good and forbidden the evil."

The author says: It is a moderate interpretation that in the end returns to what we have explained; and Saʿīd ibn al-Musayyab also has narrated like it.

AN ACADEMIC DISCOURSE

Composed of historical indications and other psychological discussions, etc.; in various sections:

1. Man, even the primitive one, has always been saying, 'I' and 'my soul'; he uses these words to point to a reality of creation; and inevi-tably he comprehends what he says and knows what he intends. However, his attention is fully focused on mobilization of the basic elements of his physical life, and he remains engaged in bodily works for fulfilling his material needs. This factor prevents him from think-ing deeply on the affairs of this soul to which he refers with the words, 'I' and 'my soul'; and sometimes he imagines that it refers to the body and nothing else.

And sometimes he finds that the distinction between a living person and a dead is apparently the breathing which continues as long as a man is alive; and when it is discontinued, or the breathing system is blocked, he turns dead, he loses all his perceptions, his existence is nullified and his personality is negated. For this reason, he comes to believe that the soul is the breath, which is a wind or a special type of wind; that is why he calls it spirit; and believes that man is a sum total of spirit and body.

Alternatively, he sees that the bodily perception and movement depend on the blood which is retained in the body, circulates in its limbs and flows in his veins and arteries; also he realizes that the life is related to this red liquid and that man dies when blood is completely taken out his body. Keeping these factors in view, he decides that the soul is the blood; so he calls the blood soul, and divides it into a blood, which comes out with a gush and that which does not come out with a gush.

Also, he looks at the changes taking place in semen, when it is swallowed by womb and goes on developing from one stage to the next until it becomes a man. This observation makes him believe that the human soul is the basic ingredients, which are gathered in the semen; and these ingredients continue in the human body throughout his life. May be someone would think that these parts are safe from change and nullity; and humanity continues with continuity of these ingredients, and nullity and change does not affect it. However, if the human soul were the ingredients mentioned above – whether we said that they should combine in a particular form or did not say it – it would entail a lot of impossibilities, described in its place.

These and similar views do not refute what man, per se, comprehends from his words, 'I' and 'my soul'; and makes no mistake in it at all. It is not unimaginable that we may correctly comprehend a reality from among the creative ones as a general principle; but we fall into error when we study its quiddity in detail. There are many academic subjects, like exterior or interior perceived objects which we clearly comprehend – not withstanding the sophists and agnostics – and the scholars go on disputing about them generations after generations.

Likewise, the general public, beyond the circle of research scholars, observes in their souls what the specialists do without any difference, and even then are ignorant of its details, unable to explain the particulars of its existence.

In short, there is no doubt that man at all stages of his existence is aware of a thing, not outside himself, to which he points with the words 'I' and 'my soul'. When he acquires penetrating sight and deep understanding, he finds that it is totally different from what he perceives of physical affairs, which are subject to change and division and are related to time and space. Also, he finds it totally different from this material body which with its limbs and ingredients is governed by the matter's laws; he may sometimes forget one of his limbs or become oblivious of his body altogether, but he never forgets his soul, nor does he become oblivious of it. Don't be misled by such expressions which you may occasionally use, as: 'I forgot myself;' 'I became oblivi-ous of my soul,' or 'I was distracted from my soul;' because they are metaphorical expressions throwing light on different psychological considerations. Don't you see that even now you ascribe this forget-fulness, obliviousness and distraction to your soul, and you say that your perceiving soul had perceived an item?

Also, put aside what some people think that an unconscious person becomes oblivious of his person and soul. Because what he realizes after returning to consciousness is that he does not remember perceiving his soul at the time of unconsciousness, not that he remem-ber that he did not perceive it – and there is a great difference between the two. Also, some people do remember what they had experienced during their unconsciousness like the dream, which we remember after getting up from sleep.

In any case, there is no doubt that man, per se, is never devoid of this psychological perception which represents before his eyes the reality of his soul to which he refers as 'I'. If he becomes a little fam-iliar with what he observes about his soul and turns aside from his bodily functions and material desires, he will certainly come to the conclusion that his soul is something different from the root of matter and materials, as he finds that the particulars of his soul and its effects are quite different from the particulars of material things and their effects.

However, its involvement with daily engagements, and concentrating the attention to desires of material life and fulfilling the physical needs lead him to neglect this aspect and to agree with those simple primitive ideas, stopping at general observation.

2. Although a normal man is deeply involved in affairs of food, clothes and abode and in marital relations, which prevent him from contemplating the reality of his soul and researching various aspects of his person; but various happenings which overwhelm him during his life, are often not devoid of factors which turn away his attention from other than himself and concentrate it to his soul – for example, intense fear which makes him forget everything and turn to his soul as if he were holding it fast lest it perishes and disappears; or like happiness or grief which attracts the soul to what it is pleased with; or like intense love which causes him to cling to his beloved or his remembrance, so much so that he has no care except that of his beloved; or like a high emerg-ency in which man is cut off from everything and turns to himself; and many similar factors.

These various factors and diverse causes, sometimes, place a man (or men) in a position where such things appear before him, which are not conceived by manifest senses or empty thoughts. For example, a man who is locked in a dark desolate place is over-whelmed by fear and often sees dreary things or hears terrible voices that threaten him to utmost degree. It is this phenomenon that they sometimes attribute to ghoul, jinn, or an invisible caller, and so on.

Sometimes he is so overwhelmed by intense love, or sharp grief and sorrow that they block his manifest senses and concentrate his perception on what he loves or what he grieves for, and he sees during sleep or in a condition between sleep and wakefulness various past events or future happenings, or such hidden phenomena which other people's senses do not perceive.

Often, when will power is strengthened with certainty, intense belief, and decisive surity, then he accomplishes such feats which a normal man cannot do, nor can usual causes lead to them.

These minor happenings, which are rare in comparison to generally common events, take place because of various factors indicated earlier. However, there is no need to offer proofs to establish that they do take place, because each of us remembers such incidents, which he, or others known to him, has experienced. As for the real cause that brings it into being, this is not the place to look into it.

What we should be aware of is this: All these affairs depend for their occurance on a sort of diversion of the soul from involvement with outside affairs – and particularly physical enjoyments – and its inclination to its own self. That is why the foundation of all psycho-logycal regime with all its innumerable divergences and differences – is contradiction of the soul in general; and it is only because devotion of soul to the obedience of its desires diverts it from being engaged with itself, and leads it to its extraneous desires. Thus its attention is divided and it adheres to those base desires and forgets its own self.

3. There is no room for doubt that the factors leading to the psychological effects happen to some people temporarily and for short periods, and in the same way happen to some others permanently or for a longer period. Often we find ascetic people abstaining from worldly enjoyments and material objects of desire; their attention is concentrated on training the soul and remaining engaged in proceed-ing on the path of the inner self.

Also, it should not be imagined that this psychological avocation is a newly invented phenomenon of this time of ours. Reports and observation prove that it was prevalent in the society from ancient times. Go back to the earliest days of humanity and you will see this phenomenon present in their midst.

4. Research about various nations, meditation on their customs and traditions and analysis of their beliefs and actions make us aware that engagement in cognition of the soul – with its various ways – for attaining to its wonderful effects, was prevalent among them; rather it was a well-coveted prize for which they spent best of the times and highest prices since ancient eras. For proof, look at the primitive nations in various parts of the Earth, like Africa, etc. and you will find among them even today the remnants of the myths of witchcraft and oracular prophecies, and they firmly believe in their reality and their truth.

Deep consideration of what has been reported to us of old religions and sects, like Hinduism, Buddhism, Sabiism, Manichaeism, Zoroastrianism, Judaism, Christianity and Islam, indicates that their main concern is cognition of the soul and attainment to its effects. This is deeply ingrained in them, although they may differ in its description, teaching and training.

Although Hinduism – and it is the ancient religion of India – differs from the religions of the Book in monotheism and affairs of prophethood, yet it calls to purification of the soul and cleanliness of the inner self, and especially for the Brahmins themselves.

It has been quoted from al-Bīrūnī (from his book, Mã lil Hind min maqūlah) that he said: "A Barahim's life, after completing seven years, is divided into four stages:

"At the beginning of the first stage, i.e. in his eighth year, the Brahmins gather around him to make him aware and teach him his responsibilities and to enjoin him to hold fast to them and follow them all his life."

He says: "When he enters the first stage upto 25 to 48 years of his age, it is incumbent upon him to abstain from the world; he should make the earth his foothold and proceed to the study of Veda and its explanation, the scholastic theology and jurisprudence, from a teacher whom he should serve day and night, he should take bath three times a day and offer sacrifices to the fire in the morning and the evening, and should prostrate before his teacher after offering the sacrifice; he should fast on alternate day and should abstain from eating meat alto-gether; he should stay in the house of the teacher, coming out of it only once at noon or evening for begging; whatever he gets from begging, he would put before his teacher in order that he may take what he likes from it, allowing him to use whatever is left, and he eats from it; and he should carry firewood to the fire because fire has a high honour in their eyes, and the lights are in proximity with each other.

"The same was the situation in other nations, as they considered a sacrifice accepted if fire came down to it; and the worship of idols, stars, cow, donkeys or images did not turn them away from fire-worship."

He (al-Bīrūnī) said: "As for the second stage, it was from 25 years to 50 or 70 years of his age. At that time the teacher allows him to marry; so he marries and seeks offspring." Then he describes how he lives with his family and the people, how he earns his livelihood, and how he behaves in the society."

Then he said: "As for the third stage, it is from 50 to 70 or 90 years of his life. In this stage, he practices self-denial and asceticism, discards all worldly adornments, entrusts his wife to his children (if she does not accompany him into wilderness); he lives outside civili-zation as he did in the first stage; he does not stay under a roof and does not wear except that which covers his shame from bast of a tree; he does not sleep except on earth without bedding, he takes only fruit and vegetable for his food; he lets his hair grow without putting oil in it."

Then he continued: "As for the fourth stage it continues to the end of his life. He wears red robe, keeps in hand a walking stick, and concentrates on thinking and making his heart free of friendships and enmities; he discards desire, greed and anger, and always remains alone.

"If he intends to go to a place where he would get some spiritual reward, he does not stay in any wayside village longer than a day, nor in a wayside town more than five days; if someone gives him anything he does not keep from it for tomorrow. He has no choice but to persevere in the conditions of the path that leads to deliverance and conveys to a state from which there is no return to the world. Then he describes the general laws which a Brahmin is obligated to follow throughout his life."

As for other sects of the Hindus, like the Yogis who exercise breath control and imaginations, and the spiritualists and the philosophers, etc., each of these groups do have systems of very tough practical regimes, none of which is free from seclusion and solitude and forbidding enjoyable desires to the self.

As for the Buddhists, their religion is based on cleansing of the soul and opposition to its desires; they forbid soul's desires to it in order to attain the real cognition. This was the path trodden by Buddha himself in his life. It is reported that he was a prince or a son of a noble man; he rejected adornments of life and discarded the throne for a desolate jungle in the peak of his youth. He left the company of the people and denied to himself privileges of life. He proceeded to train his soul and to think over the secrets of creation, until the true cogni-tion was thrown into his heart, when he was thirty-six years old. Then he went forth to the people and called them to train their souls and attain cognition. He remained in this mission for about forty-four years, as the history books say.

As for the Sabians, i.e. the people of spirituality and its idols: Although they do not believe in prophethood, yet they do have various ways for reaching the perfect cognition of soul, which do not differ much from the ways of the Hindus and the Buddhists. Their views according to the book, al-Milal wa 'n- niḥal are as follows:

"It is incumbent on us to cleanse our souls from the filth of physical desires, and to clear our characteristics from the relations of our desire and anger, in order there happens an affinity between us and the spiritual powers, so that we may ask our requirements from them, present our conditions before them and direct our attention in all our affairs towards them; then they would intercede on our behalf before our and their Creator and our and their Sustainer; this purifica-tion is not attained but through our earning and endeavours when we wean our souls from base desires seeking help from the spiritual world. This help is sought with entreaty, supplication and invocation, keeping up prayer, paying zakāt, fasting, offering sacrifices, burning incenses and enchanting spells;

thus our souls acquire ability without any medium."

Although all these groups differ somewhat among themselves in general beliefs related to creation, they however agree that it is incumbent to train the soul for attaining the perfect cognition and happiness of [next] life.

As for the Manichaeans (from the dualists), their religion is known to be based on the belief that the soul is from the sublime illuminated world, which has descended to this material darkened net which is called 'body'; its bliss and perfection depends on the release from this dark house to the sphere of the light, either by choice through psychological regimes, or by compulsion through natural death.

As for the People of the Book, i.e.; the Jews, the Christians and the Zoroastrians, their holy books, i.e. the Old Testament, the New Testament and the Zend-Avesta, are full of the Call to redemption and restoration of the soul and opposition to its desires.

The two Testaments always speak about denial of this world and involvement in cleansing the inner self, and there have been appearing among them large groups of monks and ascetics generation after generation, and especially among the Christians, as monasticism is a well-adopted system of theirs.

The noble Qur'ãn has mentioned their monasticism in two places: . . . this is because there are priests and monks among them and because they do not behave proudly. (5:82); . . . and (as for) monasticism, they innovated it – We did not prescribe it to them – only to seek Allãh's pleasure, but they did not observe it with its due observance; . . . (57:27). Also, it has mentioned devout worshippers from among the Jews, as it says: They are not all alike; of the People of the Book there is an up-right party; they recite Allãh's communi-cations in the night time and they prostrate (to Him). They believe in Allãh and the Last Day, and they enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong, and they strive with one another in hastening to good deeds, and those are among the good (3:113-4).

As for various other groups from among the people who observe tough regimes and psychological exercises, like those who indulge in witchcraft and natural magic, use talismans, strive to subdue the spirits and jinn, and delve in cryptic letters and stars, etc; also those who [claim to] call the spirits and subdue the souls, all of them have their particular psychological regimes which produce a sort of control over affairs of souls.[44]

In short, what is understood from all the above is this. The ultimate goal of all the people of religions is to purify the soul by rejecting its desires and with engagement in cleansing it from filthy characteristics and undesirable conditions.

5. Probably, you might say that what has been proved from the customs of the people of religions and sects and from their traditions is voluntary renunciation of the world, and it is quite different from the issue of cognition of soul or engagement in its affairs which is the main topic.

In more clear words, what the religions and sects (which call men to servitude towards God in one way or the other) exhort the man, is to abstain from worldly enjoyments by doing good deeds, leaving aside base desires, sins and evil characteristics, in order that he should prepare himself for the best rewards, either in the next world as is clearly indicated by the prophetic religions like Judaism Christianity and Islam, or in this world as maintained by idol-worship-pers and believers in transmigration of souls, etc.

Thus, a man who devoutly worships according to the direction given by religion, follows what he is called to, a sort of self-denial, without ever thinking that there was an immaterial soul, and that that soul may attain to a sort of cognizance which guarantees its happiness and perfection of existence.

Likewise, the people who follow the tough regimes of various ways and systems, indulge in very tough [mental and psychological] exercises, indulge in them only for attaining the promised status and acquiring the result of their activities, like effectiveness of the will for example; and they remain oblivious of the affairs of the said soul from the start to the finish of the said exercise.

Moreover, among these people there are those who believe that soul is merely a material and physical item like blood, or steam mingled with blood, or original ingredients of man's body. There are also those who think that soul is a fine body similar to this physical one, which resides inside it and it is the carrier of life. In this back-ground how can it be said that all people intend with it attainment of cognizance of soul?

[44] See for it the books: as-Sirru 'l-maktūm (by ar-Rãzī), adh-Dhakhīratu 'l-Iskanda-riyyah and al-Kawãkibu 's-sab'ah (by al-Ḥakīm Ṭamṭam al-Hindī), the Risãlah of as-Sakkãkī on Taskhīr; also see ad-Durru 'l-maktūm (by Ibn 'Arabī), and other books on spiritualism and iḥḍãr lately published and others. (Author's Note)

However, you should remember what has been stated earlier that man (in all these stations where he indulges in activities which prevent the soul from being engaged in external affairs and various material enjoyments and turn its attention to its own self in order to attain to such characteristics and effects which are not reached through material causes and physical normal factors) desires nothing except to be separated from external causes and factors and to become indepen-dent by himself, so that he may get the particular results to which material and normal factors cannot reach.

Therefore, a devoutly religious person, who lives an ascetic life, believes that it is incumbent on man to choose for himself his real bliss and happiness, and that it is the good life of the next world (according to those who believe in resurrection) or the good worldly life which gathers all good for him and repluses every evil from him (according to those who do not believe in the next world like idol-worshippers and believers in transmigration of soul). Then he finds that wallowing in animalistic enjoyments does not gain for him his happiness, nor does it take him forward to his end-goal. Thus, he has no alternative but to discard his desires and abandon his journey to his soul's crazes. He should be attracted to a cause or causes above the normal material ones, by going near it and joining it; this proximity and joining is achieved by submitting to him and surrendering to his orders. This is a spiritual and psychological affair that can be pre-served through body's commissions and omissions – and these are the acts of religious worship like prayer, ḥajj, and so on.

The actions, regimes and various exercises prescribed by relig-ion, ultimately return to a sort of involvement with affairs of the soul. Man sees by his nature that he neither takes nor leaves anything but for his own benefit. We have stated earlier that man is never oblivious – not for a single moment of his existence – of observing his soul and seeing his person, and that he never commits mistake in this percep-tion at all; if there ever occurs a mistake it does in its interpretation based on rational thinking and academic research. It is now clear from this discourse that religions and denominations, in spite of the differ-ences in their customs and ways, do not intend except being involved with affairs of the soul in general, no matter whether they were aware of this fact or not.

Likewise, a man from among those who indulge in various re-gimes and spiritual exercises – even if they do not follow any religion nor they believe in reality of soul – do not aim through the said exer-cises except obtaining the promised result. And that promised result is not connected with commissions and omissions which he does, in a physical connection, as it appears between the physical causes and their effects; it is rather an immaterial connection emanating from [human] will, which is related to the exerciser's perception and will which are preserved by the sort of activity done by it, it extends from the soul of the exerciser to the promised result. Thus the reality of the said exercise is that it strengthens the soul and completes it in its perception and will for the said result. In other words, it is the effect of the exercise that the soul acquires the condition where it knows that the desired result is within its power. Thus when correct exercise is done and completed, the soul acquires the power that if it wishes to get the result unconditionally, or wishes it with certain conditions (as for example when a child is made to see a spirit in a mirror), that result will certainly appear.

To this aspect points the traditions narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that the people said to him that some disciples of ʻĪsã (a.s.) walked on water. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said, "If he had stronger conviction he would have walked on air." As you see, this tradition indi-cates that the whole affair depends on the conviction and certitude about Allãh, when all creative causes are effaced and stripped of inde-pendent effectiveness. The greater the reliance of man on the absolute divine power, the greater the submission of worldly things to his will. Understand it.

The most comprehensive saying on this affair is the word of aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.): "The body does not feel weak from doing what the inten-tion is strong about." Also the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has said: "The actions are only according to intentions."

It is now clear that the religious effects of rites and worships as well as those [spiritual and psychological] exercises and regimes are related with human soul only through its inner affairs. When one is engaged in any aspect of its, one is engaged in affairs of the soul.

A man deceives himself if he thinks that the relationship of cause-and-effect exists between the bodies of these good deeds and the goals of the next world; or between them and the strange worldly goals which are not affected by physical causes, like manipulating the souls' perceptions and their various kinds of will, setting things in motion without a mover; acquiring knowledge of hidden ideas of the others, or of things to appear in future; establishing connections with the spiritual world and spirits, etc.; or thinks that action engenders an effect without there being a real link between them, or merely by divine will without there being any particular reason.

6. Be careful, lest you fall in error of deducing from above discussions that religion is but the cognition and Ṣūfīsm, i.e. cognition of the soul, as some materialist scholars have wrongly inferred, and have divided ways of life prevalent among the people into two branches: materialism and cognition i.e. religion.

It is because what religion teaches is that there is a real happi-ness for man, which he cannot get except by surrendering to super-natural and refusal to concentrate on material enjoyments. And the preceding discourses have shown that religions, whichever they might be – right or wrong – use the reform of soul and its cleansing in an appropriate way, for training the people and leading them to the happi-ness which it promises them and calls them to. And where is this from the idea that cognizance of the soul is religion?

Religion calls man to the worship of Allãh directly or through interceders and partners, because therein is found the human bliss and happiness and the good life which is the only goal of the man; and the man does not acquire it, and shall never acquire it, except through a pure soul which is cleansed of material connections and animalistic unbridled enjoyments. Thus the need arises to include reform of the soul and its cleansing among the parts of its call, in order that the one with that characteristics becomes ready to be covered with good and blessings; and does not become like someone who takes a thing with one hand and throws it away with the other. Thus religion is one thing and cognizance of the soul is quite another, although religion is insep-arable from cognizance to a certain extent.

This same discourse also makes it clear that the systems of exercises and regimens used for diverse and unusal goals too are separate from cognizance of the soul, although some are connected somehow with some others.

Of course, we may come to the conclusion that the cognizance of the soul – whatever the path taken to reach it – is a thing taken from religion. Also, independent research shows that the religions – with all their diversities and differences, have sprouted from one deep-rooted religion to which the human nature invites, and it is the religion of monotheism.

Thus, when we refer to our simple nature, leaving aside the prejudices which come to us by heredity or are transmitted from environment, we will know with certainty, without a shade of doubt, that the universe, with its unity in plurality, and interconnectedness of its parts in diversity, ends at the one cause above all causes, and it is the Truth to which one must submit and manage the life according to its teach-ing and management – and it is the Religion based on monotheism.

Deep consideration of all religions and customs makes us aware that all of them contain somewhat this living spirit [i.e. monotheism], even idolatry and dualism; what discord there is, it is in fitting the religious system on this fundamentalism, and by hitting the target and missing it. For example, there are those who say: 'He is indeed nearer to us than our life-vein, and He is with us wherever we might be, we do not have beside Him any guardian or intercessor; therefore it is incumbent on us to worship Him alone without ascribing any partner to Him.' Also there are those who say: 'Man's earthly lowliness and baseness of his nature does not leave any way to him to establish any connection with the divine courtyard; what a distance there is between dust and the Lord of lords? Therefore, we have no alternative but to seek proximity with some of His honoured servants, who are freed of the curtain of matter, are pure and cleansed from the dirt of nature, and they are the spirituality of the stars, or lords of species, or nearer humans, and we do not worship them except that they may make us nearer to Allãh. However, because they are beyond our perceptions, far above our sides, it is necessary that we should represent them bodily in stones and idols, so that the matter of nearness in worship may be completed.' The same is the case with all other religions and traditions; and we do not find in their books except that which shows in reality its direction towards divine monotheism.

It is well known that the customs prevalent among the people, no matter how many branches there may be in it and how much serious diversities may appear in it, are all inclined towards unity, when we retreat backwards to its earliest times, and it ultimately ends at the natural and simple human religion, and it is monotheism. Thus the religion of monotheism is the father of all religions, and these in their turn are its sons – good or evil.

Again, the natural religion looks into the cognizance of the soul only to use it to arrive at the human blessings to which it invites, and it is the cognizance of God which is its ultimate goal. In other words, religion invites to the cognizance of the soul as the way, not the desti-nation. In fact, religious taste is not pleased with involvement in any-thing except in the way of servitude; verily the religion with Allãh is the Islam, and He is not pleased with unbelief in His servants; there-fore how can He be pleased with cognizance of the soul if it acquires the status of independent wantedness.

It is seen from this that the cognizance ultimately ends at the natural religion, because it is not in itself an independent matter to which the human nature might be calling, until its branches and sprouts end at the one root, which is natural cognizance.

This fact may possibly be understood through another way: Although humanity proceeds by nature to civilization and grouping for blissfulness of the life, and reports and research have proved that some people or communities called their groups to the ways of nationalism, or laid down civil systems and enforced them among them, like the tribal customs, monarchical traditions, democratic systems and so on; but neither any report nor any research has claimed that during all the long human history anyone other than the people of religion had called to the cognizance of the soul and reform of its ethics.

Yes, it is possible that some adherents to those irreligious ways, like people of witchcraft and spiritualists, etc, might have awakened to this type of the cognizance of the soul through a path other than relig-ion, yet they would not reach it through the nature, because nature has nothing to do or say in this matter, as you have seen; rather it would have been through accidental observation of some unusual psycholog-ical effects; then his soul yearns to attain to a psychological position with which he can perform wonderous deeds and rare manipulations in the world which souls consider strange; this yearning pushes him to hunt for it and proceed to it stage by stage until the desired goal is achieved.

7. We are often told about many of our good people of religion that they had got, through their religious regimes, super-natural miracles and extraordinary events that were especially bestowed on them. For example, they could see somethings or affairs which were not seen by the others, or they could observe some people or episodes which were not perceived by other persons, or their prayers were answered, some hopelessly sick persons were cured, men were rescued from dangers and perils in other than usual way. Such things sometimes happen even on the hands of a person who is not virtuous, if his intention is true and his soul detached [from worldly involvements]. These people see what they see but they are oblivious of its immediate cause, and they ascribe it directly to Allãh without seeing any intermediary. Although ascription of the affairs and things to Allãh is true and one has no alternative but to accept it, yet negation of intermediary cause cannot be coveted.

Sometimes a spiritualist brings forth someone's spirit in a mirror or water and so on, by manipulating a child's soul – as is generally known – and he himself, like the others, observes that the child sees [that spirit] with his physical eyes, and that there is a curtain between the said spirit and the eyes of the others, and if that curtain was lifted off, the others too would be able like the child to see it.

Sometimes they find the procured spirit telling lies in its information, and it seems very strange, because the spiritual world is the one of purity and clarity; there is no way for lie, falsity and untruth to reach it.

Sometimes they bring forth a living person's spirit and make it describe his secrets and inner thoughts, and that person is awake and engaged in his daily activities without realizing that his spirit has been procured and is disclosing what he is not pleased with its disclosure.

Sometimes a person is put under hypnotic trance, and is directed to perform a deed and he in the same condition agrees to it. Then on waking up, he performs the same deed with all the conditions told to him; yet he is not aware of what was taught to him, nor does he know that he had agreed to it.

Some spiritualists, after seeing some spiritual apparitions similar to human form or like an animal's, thought that these forms are parts of the material world and receptacles of ever-changing nature. It especially applies to those who do not believe that any immaterial thing exists; so much so that some of them had tried to invent some artificial apparatus to catch the spirits. All this relied on a hypothesis which they had about the soul: that it has a material starting point, or is a characteristic of a material starting point, which acts with perception and will. However, they have not solved the question of life and perception even today.

Similar to it is the hypothesis of those who believe that spirit is a fine body, similar to the physical body in its forms and appearance. It is because they found that man sees himself in dream in the same form, which he sees of himself while awake. Sometimes the people exercising spiritual regimes see their own forms outside their bodies – and it looks totally similar to their bodies' form; so they said that spirit is a fine body which remains incarnated in the physical body as long as man remains alive; when it leaves the body it is death.

But they have failed to realize that this perceived form is found in the man's senses, like his form, which he perceives of his body, and like the forms of all extraneous things, which are separate from his body. Also, occasionally this separate form appears to some people of exercised regime as more than one, or in a form other than his own form; and sometimes he sees his soul exactly as soul of some another person. Now, if they do not say about the said form that it is the form of the spirit, they also should not say for a form, which is seen by people of exercised regime that it is the form of the spirit.

The fact is that these people did get a part of the cognizance of the soul, but they lost the cognizance of the soul's true nature as it is, so they erred in explanation of what they had got and went astray in directing its affair. However, the truth, to which the proof and experi-ment lead, is that the soul's true perceived nature which is referred to by the word, 'I', is a thing which is quite separate in its essence from these material things, as explained earlier; and its various perceptions and senses – feelings, thought or understanding – inasmuch as they are perceived are settled in their own world and receptacle, other than the physical characteristics which appear in the organs of feeling and perception of the body, because they are material commissions and omissions and have no life or perception in themselves. So these affairs which are especially seen by good people and those who undergo spiri-tual exercises and regimes, are not beyond the grasp of their souls; the only question is: How did this cognizance settle in the soul and where in the soul is its place? And the soul has a sublime sign for all happen-ings and affairs which are somewhat connected to them. So all these strange affairs, which are compliant to the people of exercise and regime, are nourished by their will and intention; and intention emanates from perception. Thus, the human perception has some intervention in all events connected to, and all affairs touching him.

8. Thus, it is proper to divide into two, the people who are gen-erally involved in cognizance of soul: One, those who are engaged in it by acquiring some unusual effects of soul, which are beyond the circle of material cause-and-effect like the people indulging in magic and talisman, or those who subdue the spirituality of stars, jinn or men's spirits, or those who recite invocations or incantations.

Two, those who are engaged in cognizance of the soul by turning away from extraneous things and being attracted towards it for deeply thinking over it and observing its essence and conditions, like the Ṣūfīs in their various categories and paths.

Ṣūfīsm is not something invented by the Muslims on their own. It is found even in those nations which had appeared before them, like the Christians and even the Hindus and Buddhists; there are in those religions even today those who proceed on this path; it is rather an hereditary way they have inherited from their ancestors.

However, it is not as the usual imitation as people inherit vari-ous types of civilization, one from the other, a later generation follow-ing in the footstep of an earlier one, as is believed by some researchers in religions and sects. You have seen in previous discourses that the natural religion leads to asceticism, and asceticism guides to the cog-nizance of the soul. When religion is settled in a nation and is firmly rooted in their hearts, it adapts and prepares them for inevitable growth in them of the way of cognizance of the soul; and then follow it some of those people who are fully affected by its factors. Thus, if religious life continues for sometime in a nation, this way [of Ṣūfīsm] is bound to appear among them, whether correct or incorrect, even if they remain totally cut-off from other religious nations and groups. An affair of this type should not be counted as a hereditary custom, which is passed on from generation to generation.

9. Now, we should further divide the second category of the people (i.e. those who are engaged in cognizance of the soul) into two groups:

One group proceeds on this way for the soul's own sake, so they are given some of its knowledge, but they fail to get its comprehensive cognizance. It is because their only aim was to know the soul; so they remain oblivious of its Maker, and He is Allāh, Great is His name, Who is the True Cause, Who takes the soul by its forelock in its existence and effects of existence. How can a man fully know a thing when he is oblivious of the knowledge of the causes of its existence? Especially the cause, which is the Cause of every cause? Is he but like someone who claims to have the knowledge of a bed while he is ignorant of the carpenter and his visit, does know nothing of his saw or the purpose of its making, and likewise other causes of the bed's existence.

This type of the soul's cognizance deserves to be called sooth-saying, as it entails acquirement of a little information regarding the soul and its effects.

The other group goes ahead on the path of the soul's cognizance in order that it would lead to the cognizance of the Lord. This way of theirs is the one which religion is somehow pleased with. The man be-comes engaged in the cognition of his soul because it is one of the signs of his Lord, and the nearest sign. The soul becomes the path trodden, and Allāh is the destination towards which he proceeds: and that to your Lord is the end goal [53:42].

These are the different groups, having various beliefs. We do not have much information about the non-Muslims' views and of the paths they tread. As for the Muslims, they have got numerous paths, basic among them are counted to twenty five chains, and each of them is branched out to other smaller chains; all of them (except one) reach in the end to ʻAlī (a.s.). There are some people who are not connected to any of these chains; they call themselves al-Uwaysiyyah (linking themselves to Uways al-Qaranī). Also, there are others who do not have any name nor do they demonstrate with any slogan.

They have their own books and tracts in which they have described their chains and paths, the laws and ethics, which apply to them and have been narrated from their people. In these books they have recorded their narrated revelations, and elaborated their proofs and purposes based on them. Anyone wanting to understand it should consult them. This is not the place for detailed discussion of those paths and ways and confirmation of what is correct and critique of what is incorrect. Also, a discussion was given in the fifth volume of this book, which is not without benefit in this respect. This is in short what we had intended to write here concerning the discussion of the cognizance of the soul.

You should know that cognizance of the soul has a practical purpose, and its full knowledge cannot be attained except through the way of practical, not theoretical, proceeding. As for the knowledge of the soul written by the ancients it is totally useless; and the practical psychology invented by the later scholars is merely a branch of the ethics according to the ancients' categorization. And Allãh is the Guide.

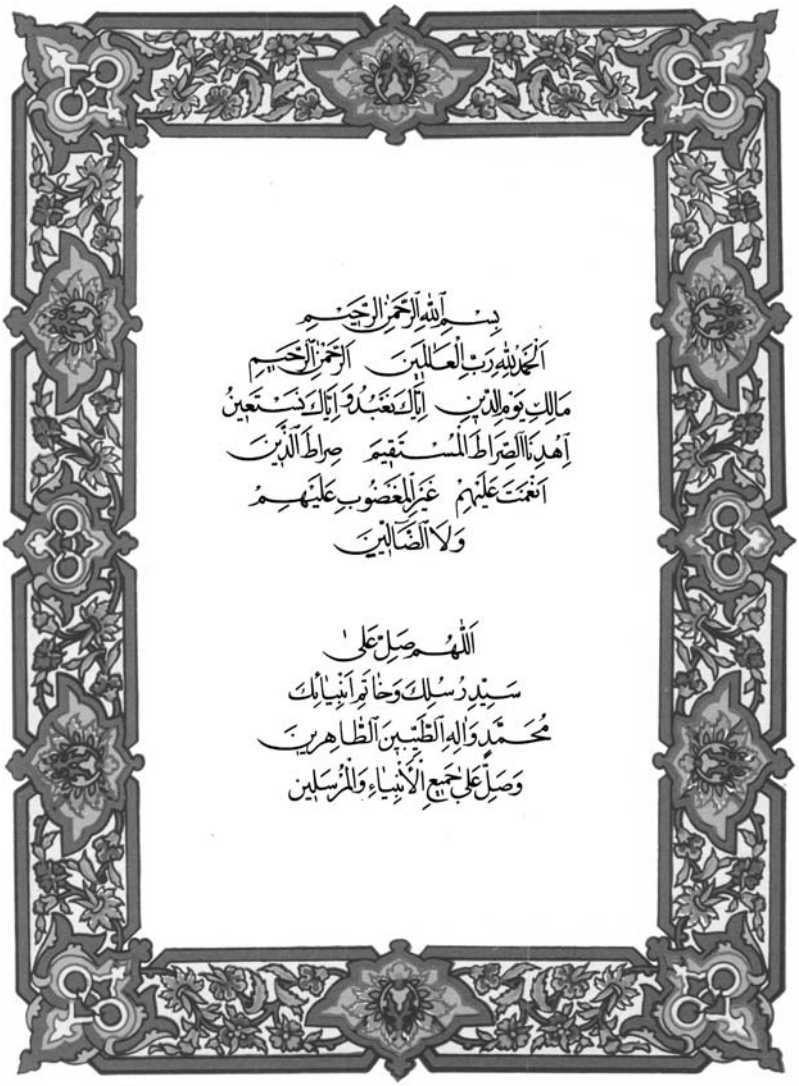
This is a clear statement for men, and a guidance and an admonition for the pious ones .



(Qur'ãn , 3:138)

In the Name of Allãh
The All-Compassionate, The All-Merciful

Praise belongs to Allãh, the Lord of all Being;
the All-Compassionate, the All-Merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement.
Thee only we serve; and to Thee alone we pray for succour.
Guide us in the straight path,
the path of those whom Thou hast blessed,
not of those against whom Thou art wrathful,
nor of those who are astray.

FOREWORD

1. The late al-‘Allãmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī (1321/1904 – 1402/1981) – may Allãh have mercy upon him – was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contem-porary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the translation of al-Mīzãn.

2. al-‘Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzãn fī tafsīri 'l-Qur’ãn which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allãmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ãn in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzãn because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ãn and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to the late great scholar al-‘Allãmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī (may Allãh cover him with His mercy) to undertake this task, because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzãn and his literary capability in expression and translation. So, we relied on him for this work and considered him responsible for the English translation as al-‘Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and its discussions.

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the twelfth volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān. This volume corre-sponds with the second half of the sixth volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allãh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendices included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of the English translation of al-Mīzān: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

* * * * *

We implore upon Allãh to affect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work, which we have started. May Allãh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

COMMENTARY

The first three verses deal with affairs of testimony, and the last one is not without some connection with it in meaning.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! Call to witness between you . . . ". . . for then most surely we should be of the unjust": The gist of the two verses is as follows: If a Muslim is on journey and wants to make a will, he must call to witness, at the time of will, two just witnesses from among the Muslims; if he does not find them, then he should call two witnesses from among the People of the Book. If the near rela-tives of the deceased feel some doubt about the will, the two witnesses shall be detained after the prayer, they shall swear by Allāh for their truth in witnessing, and the discord will be removed. Then if it be-comes known that the two witnesses have lied in testimony, then two other witnesses shall stand up in the place, and testify against them swearing in the name of Allāh.

This is apparently the connotation of the two verses. The phrases: "'O you who believe'", addresses the believers and the law is reserved to them. "Call to witness between you when death draws nigh to one of you, at the time of making the will, two just persons from among you": It means, witness between you is witness of two just persons from among you; there is an omitted but understood muḍãf (first construct of a genitive), i.e. two just persons from among you. It means that the required number of witnesses is two; thus the maṣdar here gives meaning of active participle, as they say, a just man, two just men.

The phrase: "when death draws nigh to one of you," is an allu-sion for drawing near to you the cause for making will, because people naturally do not get involved in such things unless there appears some-thing which indicates death's nearness; usually it means serious illness which brings man nearer to death.

The clause: "at the time of making the will," is an adverbial phrase of time, related to "witness", i.e. witness at the time of making the will. The maṣdar, al-'adl (اَلْعَدْلُ) means probity, and the context shows that it means probity and rectitude in religious affairs. This, in its turn, ascertains the "from among you" and "from among others than you" means from among the Muslims and the non-Muslims respectively, and not near relatives and clan; Allãh has mentioned "two" parallel to "two others", then has described the former as "just persons" and "from among you", while the latter has only been described as "from among others than you" without the qualification of justice. The qualification of probity or otherwise in religious affairs differs in the Muslim and the non-Muslim; there is no reason why probity in religious affairs should be necessary if the witnesses were from among the relatives or clan of the principal, but unnecessary if the witness were a non-relative.

Accordingly, the phrase: "or two others from among others than you," presents an alternative with sequence. The meaning: If there are Muslims two of them shall be made witnesses; but if there is none other than non-Muslims then two of them will be called to witness; all this is understood from the associations.

This very association makes it understood that the clause: "if you are travelling in the land and the calamity of death befalls you," is a restriction related to the words: "or two others from among others than you"; a Muslim usually lives in a Muslim society, and normally in a Muslim environment there does not arise a need to call two non-Muslims to act as witnesses; contrary to the condition of travelling when such chances or emergencies may occur and the need may arise to approach non-Muslims for witnessing, etc.

The same association, i.e. affinity between the subject and the order, joined with the taste perceived from the divine speech, proves that the word, non-Muslims, here exclusively points to the People of the Book, because the divine speech does not bestow any nobility to the polytheists.

The clause: "they shall both swear by Allāh," i.e. the two witnesses shall swear; the clause: "then if you doubt," i.e. if you are in doubt about what the executor of the will describes concerning the will, or about the property governed by the will, or about its condition; what they shall swear to, is explained in the next sentence: "We will not take for it a price though there be a relative . . .," i.e. We will not accept any big or small price for testifying for the claim of the execu-tor of the will, even if he be a relative of ours. Selling the testimony for a price indicates that the witness turns aside from the truth in his testimony for a worldly goal, like wealth, prestige or feeling of relation-ship; thus he offers his testimony in exchange of a worldly price, and it is a small price indeed.

An exegetes has said that the pronoun, it, [in the phrase: We will not take for it] refers to the oath, i.e. We will not take for our oath a price; but it would entail swearing twice by Allāh, and the verse does not give any such hint.

The clause: "and we will not hide the testimony of Allāh", i.e. by testifying against the reality and truth; "for then certainly we should be among the sinners," i.e. carriers of sin. This sentence is in conjunction with, "We will not take for it a price, . . ." as an explicative apposition.

In the possessive case: "the testimony of Allāh", ‘the testimony’ is related to "Allāh", because Allāh testifies for the reality as the two witnesses do it; therefore it is the testimony of Allāh as it is the testimony of the two witnesses; and Allāh has more right to possession; thus it is His testimony by right and primarily, and the testimony of the two witnesses follows it secondarily. Allāh has said: . . . and Allāh is sufficient as a witness. (4:79); . . . and they cannot comprehend any-thing out of His knowledge except what He pleases; . . . (2:255).

Alternatively, it may be because witnessing it a right of Allāh imposed on His servants and it is incumbent on them to offer it with truth without alteration, without hiding it. It is as we say, religion of Allāh, thus we ascribe the religion to Allāh although it is the servants who are covered by it. Allāh says: . . . and give upright testimony for Allāh. . . .

(65:2); . . . and do not conceal testimony, . . . (2:283).

The clause: "Then if it becomes known . . ."; al-'uthūr (اَلْعُثُور) followed by preposition 'alã (عَلَى) means to get something, to find something. This verse elaborates the law if it becomes known that the two witnesses have lied and testified wrongly.

The clause: "that they both have been guilty of a sin": Istiḥqãq (إِسْتِحْقاق = to be entitled; to deserve); al-ithm (الإِثْم = sin); to be entitled to a sin means to commit a sin or crime; it is said: The man deserved a sin, i.e. he committed a sin; Zayd deserved a sin against Bakr, i.e. Zayd committed a crime against Bakr. That is why in the coming sentence it has taken the preposition 'alã (عَلَى), as it says: two others shall stand up in their place "from among those who have a claim against them," i.e. those against whom the two witnesses have sinned by giving false testimony and perfidy. The basic meaning of istaḥaqqa 'r-rajul (إِسْتَحَقَّ الرَجُل) is as follows: The man demanded that the sin or its punishment be established and confirmed against him. Accordingly it is here an extended metaphor in which demand is used for describing the thing demanded, and path is mentioned in place of destination. The word, sin, in the clause: "that they both have been guilty of a sin," is inferred from the preceding clause: "for then certainly we should be among the sinners."

The words: two others shall stand up in their place, i.e. if it is found that the two witnesses have committed perjury and perfidy, then two other witnesses shall stand in their place for swearing that the first two have committed perjury and perfidy.

The clause: "from among those who have a claim against them," denotes situation, i.e., while these two new witnesses against whom the first two had committed perfidy, and who are nearest in kin to the deceased according to the will, as ar-Rãzī has stated in his tafsīr. In short, it denotes that if it was known that the two witnesses have com-mitted perjury and perfidy against the near relatives of the deceased, then two other witnesses shall stand up in their place from among those against whom the first two have committed that perjury, before their guilt was known.

This interpretation is based on the recital of 'Ãṣim from Ḥafṣ who has recited ustuḥiqqa (أُسْتُحِقَّ) in passive voice; then the apparent context would make, "the first two" the subject and its predicate would be, "two others shall stand up in their place". The meaning: If it becomes known that the two witnesses have committed perjury and perfidy against the near relatives of the deceased, then two near rela-tives of the deceased shall stand up in their place against whom the perfidy was committed.

In the recital of ʻĀṣim through Abū Bakr, Ḥamzah, Khalaf and Yaʻqūb, al-awlayān (اَلأَوْلَيَان) is recited al-awwalīn (الأَوَّلِيْن= the first ones, opposite to the last ones), and apparently it means the nearest of kin who have first claim [on the deceased's estate]; it is adjective or appositional substantive standing for "those who".

The exegetes have written much numerous modes and aspects so far as the construction of various parts of the verse is concerned; so much so that if some aspects are multiplied by the others in order to infer the full meaning of the verse, it would result in hundreds of aspects. az-Zajjāj has reportedly said that it is the most complicated verse of the Divine Book so far as its construction is concerned.

What we have written in its explanation is manifestly clear from the context, without any aberration or arbitrariness; we have avoided thoroughly looking at all the possibilities, which they have mentioned, because it would only increase the vagueness of the word, leaving a scholar bewildered.[1]

From the clause: "two others shall stand up in their place", sprouts the clause: "so they two should swear by Allāh;" it means the two other witnesses, nearest in kin to the deceased; they should swear by Allāh that certainly our testimony (which unmasks the falsity and perfidy of the first two witnesses) is truer than that of the first two concerning the aspects of the will; and we have not exceeded the limit against them by testifying contrary to what they had testified, other-wise, most surely we should be among the unjust people.

QUR'ĀN: This is more proper in order that they should give testi-mony truly or fear that other oaths be given after their oaths; . . .: The verse describes the underlying reason of the preceding rule. It says that this law, with the sequence prescribed by Allāh, is the safest way of arriving at the truth in this place, and is the nearest method of ensuring that the first two witnesses would not commit injustice in their testimony, as they would be afraid that, otherwise their testimony would be refuted and rejected.

Man is entangled in his desire; the desire invites him to enjoy whatever he can, and grasp to whatever he longs for, provided there is nothing to divert him from it; it makes no difference whether he has any right to that desired item or not, whether it is based on justice or injustice even by nullifying someone else's right. The man desists from that transgression and exceeding the limit either because of some ex-terior thing which prevents him from it through punishment or chastise-ment, or because of some inner prohibition from his own soul; and the strongest psychological prohibitive factor is the belief in Allãh to Whom the servants have to return and Who takes reckoning of the deeds, decides with justice and awards full recompense.

[1] If anybody wants to know those details, he should refer to the Tafsīr Rūḥu 'l-maʻānī, vol.7 (by al-Ālūsī), Majmaʻu 'l-bayān (by aṭ-Ṭabrisī), Mafātīḥu 'l-ghayb (by ar-Rāzī) and other detailed books. (Author's note)

If, as is supposed at this juncture, the reality about the deceased's will is unknown and the only way to find it is through the testimony of the two witnesses whom the deceased had appointed, then the strong-est way of keeping their testimony nearer to truth is to compel them to swear by Allãh, and to make the nearest of kin of the deceased swear by Allãh if it transpires that the first two witnesses have committed perjury and perfidy. Thus, these two methods, i.e. their oaths in the beginning and then returning the oath to the nearest of kin, are the most effective ways to keep the first two witnesses on truth, as they would be afraid to be ignominiously exposed and their oaths refuted. These two are the strongest factors to prevent them from deviation from truth.

Then Allãh ended the speech with the admonition and warning: and fear Allãh, and hear; and Allãh does not guide the transgressing people.

QUR'ÃN: On the day when Allãh will assemble the messenger, then say: "What answer were you given?" They shall say: "We have no knowledge, surely thou art the great Knower of the unseen things.": The verse is not averse to be connected with the previous subject; al-though the end part of the preceding verse: "and fear Allãh, and hear . . .," is general, yet the context denotes that it contains prohibition of deviation, committing injustice in witnessing or disdaining the oath by the name of Allãh. Thus it is appropriate to describe what is to take place between Allãh and His messengers, who shall be witnesses over their nations, and what an excellent witnesses they are! Allãh shall ask them what answer they were given by their people, and although they knew very well what their people had done, and they were appointed by Allãh to be their witnesses, yet they will reply by saying: "'We have no knowledge, surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things.'"

The matters being like this and with Allãh being the Knower of everything, it is appropriate for the witnesses to be afraid of divine majesty, and not to deviate from the truth which Allāh has given them the knowledge of; they should not conceal the testimony of Allāh, otherwise they would be one of the sinners, unjust and tyrants.

The divine words: "On the day when Allāh will assemble . . .," is an adverb of time, related to the preceding clauses: "and fear Allāh . . ." The verse speaks of assembling of the messengers (instead of saying, when Allāh will say to the messengers), as it has more affinity with gathering of the witnesses for testimony, as shown by the words: the two witnesses you should detain after the prayer; . . . they shall both swear by Allāh.

As for the messengers' negating the knowledge from them-selves, when they shall say: "'We have no knowledge, surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things.'" They restrict the knowledge of all unseen things exclusively to Allāh, and it proves that the negated is not the knowledge per se, because the clause: "surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things", apparently aims at explaining the reason of negation; and it is understood that confinement of the knowl-edge of all unseen things does not entail removal of all knowledge from other than Allāh, especially so when it is a knowledge of testimony; and what will be asked, i.e. how the people answered their messengers, is related to the testimony not to the unseen.

Their reply: "'We have no knowledge'", does not negate knowl-edge in general; it negates the truly inside knowledge which is not without some relationship with the unseen. It is known that the knowl-edge discloses to the knower the reality as much as it is related to a certain affair concerning its causes and concomitants; and the reality is inter-connected with all parts present externally, whether they precede the reality in external existence or are found simultaneously; knowledge of any external affair, in true sense, does not occur except by compre-hending all parts of its existence and acquiring comprehension of its Maker – far be it from His majesty that anything could ever compre-hend Him, and it is an affair beyond the human power. Thus, man has not been given knowledge in this universe – the universe thinking on whose vast dimension leaves him flabbergasted, looking at the magni-tude of its stars and galaxies makes him scared, if he observes its minute items his reason is bewildered, and if he wants to walk between these two extremes he becomes giddy – except a little that is needed by him in the journey of his life, just as a walker in utterly dark night carries a small candle which gives him only enough light to see where to put his next step.

What the human knowledge is connected to, adheres with its being, and attaches with its reality to its fringes and then to the fringes of the fringes and so on. All of it is unperceived by human percep-tions. Knowledge, in its true meaning, cannot be attached to anything except when it is connected to all its unseen factors of existence, and this is not possible for any limited creature, be it human or something else, except Allãh, the One, the Subduer, with Him are the keys of the unseen, none but He knows them. Allãh says: . . . and Allãh knows, while you do not know (2:216). The verse shows that man's nature is ignorance, and he is not given knowledge except to a limited measured quantity. Allãh says: There is not a thing but its treasures are with Us, and We do not send it down but according to known measures (15:21). The same is the connotation of the ma'ṣūm's reply when he was asked, "Why Allãh is concealed from His creatures?" He said: "Because surely He has built their structure on ignorance." Allãh has also said: . . . and they cannot comprehend anything out of His knowledge except that which He pleases; . . . (2:255). It shows that knowledge, all of it, belongs to Allãh and man comprehends out of it only what Allãh wills. Also He says: . . . and you have not been given the knowledge but a little (17:85). This proves that there is a multitude of knowledge, but man has not been given except a little.

So, the reality is this: knowledge, the real one, is not found except with Allãh. When the Day of Resurrection comes, the things will appear in their true forms and shapes, as the related verses show. Thus, there would not be on that day any place except for the true speech, as Allãh says: . . . they shall not speak except he whom the Beneficent Lord gives leave, and he will speak the truth. That is the certain day, . . . (78:38-39). That is why when the messengers shall be asked, "What answer were you given?" the true reply will be to repudi-ate from themselves all knowledge as it will be a part of the unseen, and to affirm it to their Load, by saying: "We have no knowledge, surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things."

This reply of theirs, emanates from their humility before His Grandeur and Majesty; it is a confession of their personal neediness and essential nullity vis-à-vis their True Master; keeping the manner of His audience and displaying the truth of the matter. However, it is not a final answer shutting the door to further replies, because:

First: Because Allãh has made them witnesses for their peoples, as He says in this Book: How will it be, then, when We bring from every people a witness, and We bring you as a witness over those (witnesses)? (4:41); . . . and the book (of deeds) shall be set up, and the prophets and the witnesses shall be summoned . . . (39:69). And there is no meaning of making them witnesses except that they should be witnesses over their peoples – as the witnessing should be on that day. Inevitably they will testify on that day as Allãh has ordained it. Thus, their reply, "We have no knowledge," is based on the manner of worshipful homage vis-à-vis the True King in whose hand is command and kingdom on that day. It also explains the reality of the affair, i.e. Allãh possesses knowledge by Himself, and others possess it only as much as He makes them have it; and there is no wrong if, after this reply, they disclose what knowledge they had of the conditions of their peoples. This supports what we have previously written in the first volume of this book, under the verse: And thus we have made you a justly balanced group so that you may be witnesses over mankind, and so that the Messenger may be a witness over you, . . . (2:143), where we have explained that this knowledge and witnessing are not of the type of knowledge and witnessing as we understand them; rather they are of the knowledge which is particularly reserved to Allãh and which is bestowed to a group of His honoured servants

Second: Because Allãh has confirmed that a group of his nearer servants will possess knowledge on the Day of Resurrection. He says: And those who have been given knowledge and faith will say: Verily you have tarried according to the decree of Allãh till the Day of Resurrection, . . ." (30:56); . . . and on the heights shall be men who know them all by their marks (7:46); And those whom they invoke beside Him do not own any power of intercession, save he who bears witness to the truth, and they know the truth (43:86); and ʻĪsã son of Maryam is included in this verse, and he was a messenger; therefore he is among those who bear witness to the truth and they know the truth; And the Messenger shall say: "O my Lord! Verily my people took this Qur'ãn as a thing abandoned." (25:30). The Messenger refers to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and his speech quoted in this verse is exactly the reply to the question contained in the verse under dis-cussion, i.e., the divine words: "What answer were you given?" Now, it is clear that the words of the Messengers: "We have no knowledge, . . ." is not the final answer, as described above.

Third: Because the Qur'ãn mentions that the questioning will cover both the Messengers and those to whom they were sent. Allãh says: Then surely We shall question those to whom (Our messengers) were sent, and certainly We will also question the messengers (7:6). Also, He mentions many replies given by the people to whom the messen-gers were sent of many questions asked of them; and replying entails knowledge and questioning confirms it. Also, Allãh says: Certainly, you were heedless of this (day), now We have removed from you your veil, so your sight is sharp today (50:22); And could you but see when the guilty will stand before their Lord, heads hung low, (and say): "O our Lord! We have seen and we have heard; now send us back; we will do good; verily now we are convinced." (32:12). There are many verses of similar theme. Now, when the peoples – and especially the guilty among them – were having knowledge on that day, how could it be imagined that the honoured messengers would be lacking that knowledge. Thus the end result is the same as we have said.

A TALK ON THE MEANING OF TESTIMONY

The society in which we live, and the interaction that takes place between our active powers in general aspects of this worldly life, pushes us willy-nilly to various kinds of discords and disputes. What one of us exclusively enjoys, often another one wants to share it with him, or even acquire it solely for himself, displacing the original owner. This made man realize that jurisprudential judgements and decrees were essential for settling such disputes.

The first requirement for judging a case is that the events and occurances should be preserved exactly as they took place and recorded in a way that no change or alteration sneaks in them, in order that the judge may decide accordingly. No body can doubt its importance.

This can be ensured only through making someone look at the event: He observes the episode and takes upon himself to convey the report truly when need arises, or records it in some other way, like writing or using other instruments which serve the same purpose [like audio or video cassettes, etc.].

There are some important differences between witnessing and other means of preservation and recording: First, The means of preser-vation and recording, other than witnessing, are not available generally; its most common and well known method is writing, but even today it has not covered the whole mankind, let alone the ancient times; contrary to the witnessing. Second, Rendering testimony, i.e., description with tongue by a witness through his undertaking to convey the fact truly and based on his memory, is less likely to be affected by any defectiveness and more secured against various afflictions in comparison to writing and other means of recording.

That is why we see that no nation shuns giving credence to testimony – it is true in all nations, despite their excessive discord in sociological customs, tribal and religious dispositions and progress or regress in culture and barbarism – in short every group gives some credence to testimonies.

Consideration is given in this respect to someone who is counted as a member of the nation and part of the group. That is why no import-ance is given to the evidence of a child below the age of discretion or to that of an insane who does not know what he speaks. The same is the reason why some barbarous nations did not recognize women's evidence, as they did not accept women as part of the society; and most of the social norms in ancient nations were based on the same thinking, like Rome, Greece and other regions.

Now, Islam is the natural religion, and as such recognizes testimony, and accepts this alone as the definite proof, while all other means of substantiation and corroboration have no value unless and until they create "Knowledge". Allãh says: . . . and establish the evidence for Allãh; . . . (65:2); . . . and do not conceal evidence, and whoever conceals it, then surely his heart is sinful; . . . (2:283); And those who stand firm in their testimonies (70:33).

Islam has fixed the number of two for witnesses regarding all affairs except fornication [where the required number is four] so that each supports the other. Allãh says: . . . then call to witness two wit-nesses from among your men, and if there are not two men, then one man and two women from among those whom you choose to be wit-nesses, so that should one of the two forgets the (second) of the two may remind the other; and the witnesses should not refuse when they are summoned; and be not averse to writing it (whether it be) small or large, with the time of its falling due. This (procedure) is more equi-table in the sight of Allãh, and assures greater accuracy in testimony, and the nearest (way) to not entertaining any doubts (afterwards); . . . (2:282). It shows that what the verse explains and lays down in respect of the laws of witnessing, including the addition of one witness to the other to make them two, is more in conformity with justice, rendering of testimony and removal of doubt.

When Islam looks at the individual members of the society – who are the bricks to build the society – it counts woman among them, and bestows on her the right, like the men, to render the witness. At the same time, it has decided that the society created by it should be founded on understanding, rather than emotions. Woman is an emo-tional human being; and therefore it has given her half the right and weight of man; thus two women's testimonies equal to that of a man, as the above-quoted verse points to: so that should one of the two forgets, the (second) of the two may remind the other. In the fourth volume of this, we have written on the right of woman in Islam, which will be useful here. Witnessing has many detailed laws, which are elaborated in the books of jurisprudence, which is beyond the limit of this discussion here.

A TALK ON JUSTICE

A research scholar in Islamic Laws often comes across the word Justice; and he often finds different definitions and diverse explanations of this word, depending on diversity of the scholars and their ways.

But what is appropriate at this juncture of the Qur'ãnic discourse – in analysis of its meaning and the way of its application to the nature on which Islam is based – is that we should adopt another way of explanation. So we say:

al-'Adãlah (اَلْعَدَالَة) is moderation and middle position between two modes of high and low, and two sides of exaggeration and short-fall. It has a real value and great weight in human societies. The via media, the moderate position, is the substantial ingredient or the core around which the social structure is built. A noble man of high rank who would be dressed in high social virtues, and represent the utmost wish of society, is not born every day; such a person appears on the scene only rarely and it is known that society is not made up of a rare person even if he be looked up as a cardinal organ wherever he be found.

On the other side is a vile and despicable person who does not uphold social rights, and who does not fulfil the average aspirations of the society. He does not have any caller inviting him to observe the general social principles on which depends the life of society; nor does he have any deterrent which would prevent him from committing social sins which destroy the society and nullify the essential mutual attraction between its ingredients; in short, no trust can be had for his being a part of the body of society, nor can one rely on his good influ-ence and proper advice.

[We find, after leaving these two high and low ranks aside, that] the rule is exercised by the medium rank of the society on whom depends the society's structure, and who fulfil its aims and aspirations; and it is through them that its good effects take place – its ingredients and organs have not come together except for achieving this goal and enjoying it.

A member of the society cannot entertain any doubt about it when he looks at it even once.

It is self-evident to him that he, in his social life, greatly depends on some individual members of the society on whose social deportment he relies – they are covered with moderation in affairs, are cautious against being indifferent to breaking the laws or violation of prevalent customs and manners in various fields like jurisprudence, judgement and testimonies, etc.

This imperative or nearly imperative quality demanded by nature is what Islam looks for in a witness. Allāh says: . . . and call to witness two just men from among you, and establish the evidence as before Allāh. Thus is admonished he who believes in Allāh and the last day; . . . (65:2); . . . when death draws nigh to one of you, at the time of making the will, two just persons from among you, . . (5:106). Both these verses are addressed to those who believe. Therefore, the condi-tion that the witnesses should be two just men from among them implies that they should have a moderate and medium position vis-à-vis their religious society; but as for its position vis-à-vis national or political society, Islam does not care for such non-religious relation-ships. Apparently, if the witnesses are on a medium position vis-à-vis the religious society, they must be from among those whose religiosity is relied upon and who do not indulge in major sins, which adversely affect the religion. Allāh says: If you avoid the major sins, which you are forbidden, We will remit from you your (minor) sins and We will make you enter an honourable entering (4:31). We have described the meaning of major sins under this verse in the fourth volume of this book.

This meaning is evident in the divine words: Those who accuse chaste women (and) then do not bring four witnesses, scourge them with eighty stripes, and do not accept their testimony for ever and they are the transgressors. Save those who afterwards repent and make amends. So Allãh is Oft-forgiving, Merciful (24:4-5).

Similar to the previous verse which lays down the condition of justice and probity, is the divine word: . . . from among those whom you are pleased with to be witnesses, . . . (2:282), because the pleasure mentioned here means pleasure of a religious society; and it is known that a religious society, per se, will not be pleased with anyone unless he behaves in a manner that makes him trustworthy in religious affairs.

It is what we call in fiqh the faculty of 'adãlah. It is other than what is called 'adãlah in Ethics. The 'adãlah of fiqh is the psycho-logical aspect which in common point of view prevents one from committing major sins; and the 'adãlah of Ethics is the deep-rooted trait of character in reality.

What we have inferred from the meaning of 'adãlah is what is understood from the madhhab of the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (peace be upon them) as is reported through their chains:

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] narrates in Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh, through his chains from Ibn Abī Ya'fūr, that he said: "I said to Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.), 'By what is known the 'adãlah of a man among the Muslims, so that his testimony is accepted for and against them?' He said:

"'(It is) that they recognize him with covering and abstinance, and control of stomach, and genitals, and hand, and tongue; and he is known to avoid major sins for whom Allãh has threatened the Fire, as drinking liquor, fornication, interest, disobedience of parents, fleeing from jihãd and so on.

"'And it is known from the fact that he conceals all his defects, in order that the Muslims are forbidden to search for his slips and defects, and are obliged to pronounce his integrity, and declare his 'adãlah among the people; and he is considered regular in the five prayers when he deligently prays and preserves their times with attending the Muslims' congregational prayers, and does not remain behind from their congregation in their prayer place except because of some (genuine) cause.

"'When he is like that, inseparable from his prayer-place at the advent of the five prayers; when he is asked about in his tribe and quarter, they would say: "We did not see from him except good", (he is) regular in his prayers, waiting for their times in his prayer place, then surely it would make his testimony valid, and (establish) his 'adãlah among the Muslims. And it is because prayer is a curtain and expiation of sins. And it is not possible to testify about a man that he prays if he does not come to his prayer place and does not regularly attend the Muslims' congregation.

"'Congregation and gathering for prayer has been prescribed only for this purpose that he who prays may be distinguished from him who does not pray; and he who preserves the times of prayer from him who neglects it. And if it were not so, no one could testify for the goodness of the other, because he who does not pray has no goodness among the Muslims. Verily the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had intended to burn a group in their houses because they avoided attending the Muslims' congregations; and there were among them people who used to pray in their homes, but it was not accepted from them. Therefore, how can evidence or probity of someone be accepted among the Muslims about whom decision of Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, and of His Messenger was taken to burn (him) with fire inside his house? And he (s.a.w.a.) used to say: "There is no prayer for him who does not pray in the mosque with the Muslims except because of some reason (illness)."'" (Man lã yaḥḍuruh 'l-faqīh)

The author says: ash-Shaykh has narrated it in at-Tahdhīb with some addition, which we have left out. Covering and abstinance both mean avoidance, as [Jawharī] has said in aṣ-Ṣiḥãḥ. As you see, the tradition makes basic 'adãlah a thing which is well-known among the Muslims; and shows that the effect resulting from it and which proves this psychological characteristic is avoidance of the things prohibited by Allãh, and abstention from forbidden desires; and it is recognized through avoidance of major sins; then proof of all this is seen in (his) good appearance among the Muslims, as the Imãm (a.s.) has described it in detail.

ʻAbdullãh ibn al-Mughīrah narrates from Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍã (a.s.) that he said: "He who was born on fiṭrah (i.e., of Muslim parent) and is known with goodness in himself, his evidence is allowed." (ibid.)

Sumãʻah has narrated through Abū Baṣīr from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "There is nothing wrong with evidence of an old (or weak) person when he is righteous and chaste." (ibid.)

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from ʻAlī ibn Mahziyãr from Abū ʻAlī ibn Rãshid that he said: "I said to Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.): 'Verily, your followers are of different types; so should I pray with them all?' He said: 'Don't pray except behind him of whose religion you are confident.'"

(al-Kãfī)

The author says: The tradition clearly indicates what we have explained above. There are other topics in it, which are beyond our theme here.

A TALK ON OATH

What do you mean when you say: 'By my life, it is so'; or 'By my life, the thing is as I have said?' It means that you somehow attach that statement in its truthfulness to your life – which has a great position and dignity in your eyes – in such a way that they become inseparable in existence and non-existence; if you were wrong in your statement, you would nullify the dignity of your life and its honour in your eyes, and thus would fall down from the level of humanity which demands respect for life's affairs.

When you say, 'I adjure you by Allãh to do (or, not to do) this thing', it means that you have attached your order or prohibition to the dignity and honour which Allãh has in the believers' eyes; in this way if anyone goes against that order or prohibition it would be an insult to the divine position and would negate the sanctity of the belief in Allãh.

Likewise, when you say, 'By Allãh! I'll do such and such', you affect a special connection between your intention to do it and the dignity and honour which Allãh has in your eyes according to your belief in Him, so much so that if you cancel your intention it would entail a negation of the divine dignity in your eyes. Its purpose is to create a deterrent against cancellation of that plan. Thus, oath creates a special connection between a statement and another thing which has a dignity and honour in such a way that if the former is nullified, the latter too would be negated; and because the latter has such a dignity and honour that the person concerned would not be pleased by its loss of dignity or by an insult to it, therefore he is truthful in what he says and is obeyed in what he orders or forbids, or is bound to implement what he plans. So the oath results in intensified emphasis.

In some languages, there is found another kind of connection vis-à-vis oath; it connects the statement with something which has no value or importance at all in the eyes of the speaker; it is done to show the contempt or desdain of the information given or received – it is a sort of abuse and it is very rare in Arabic language.

Swearing and oath, as we know, is a prevalent custom on people's tongue, which is inherited generation after generation; and it is not particular to one language beside others. It proves that it is not something related to a language; rather man is led to it by his social life on occasions when he realizes the need to seek refuge in it and get its benefit.

Oath was always prevalent among the nations; they relied on it on various unprecise occasions, which occurred in their societies for various purposes, e.g. removal of blame, lifting a slander, making one-self happy, or supporting information. This continued at random until civil laws took it in their hands and gave it a legal stand on some occa-sions, like swearing in of Presidents and Executives when they assume great responsibilities and are appointed to great and high posts, etc.

Islam gave oath full consideration when it was sworn in the name of Allãh in particular. It is not but because of the high regard that it accords to the Majesty of God, as it aims to protect the divine grandure from unbecoming attachments. That is why it has laid down special expiation for breaking the oath and dislikes frequent swearing in the name of Allãh. He say: Allãh does not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths, but He calls you to account for the making of delib-erate oaths; so its expiation (for breaking an oath) is the feeding of ten poor men out of the average (food) you feed your families with, or their clothing, or the freeing a neck; . . . (5:89). And make not Allãh in your oaths a hindrance against that you may do good and . . . (2:224).

Islam has recognized oath in those cases of litigation where there is no proof. Allãh says: . . . so they two should swear by Allãh: "Certainly our testimony is truer than the testimony of those two, and we have not exceeded the limit, . . ." (5:107). And the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) has said: "The proof is on the claimant, and oath is on him who denies."

The essence of recognition of oath is that only the oath is a suf-ficient proof in cases where no other proof exists. The religious society is founded on individuals' belief in Allãh, and a believer is a part of this composite whole; he is the fountain-head from which spring forth the customs which are followed and laws which are enforced; in short, all signs which appear in the community and which rise from their relig-ious condition. It is not unlike a secular society that is based on peoples' belief in their national objects, and from which the social laws and cus-toms as well as the manners and culture are born which are found in it.

This being the case, as it is OK to rely in all social affairs, and in general concomitants of life, on individuals' oaths in various ways, then it should also be OK to rely on their oaths in cases where no other reliable proof exists – and it is the oath in cases where no proof is offered; the denier would attach his denial of the claimant's claim with his belief in such a way that if falsity of his claim becomes apparent, no reliance can be put on his belief in Allãh.

As he ties his belief and faith with that oath, he pawns his faith putting it under the control of the pawn-broker, and its return to the borrower depends on his true promise and repayment of the loan within the agreed period; otherwise the pawned property goes and he remains empty-handed.

Likewise, the one who swears is considered as if he has pawned his faith in exchange of what he has sworn for until its falsity is found out; when its falsity appears, he becomes empty-handed from faith, falls down from the height of reliability, is deprived of enjoying the fruit of belief; in other words, in the religious society he loses all social bene-fits; he is banished from the well-knit society; neither the sky puts him under its shadow nor the earth accepts his burden.

This discourse is supported by what used to happen at the time of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), when people openly showed their hatred for those who stayed behind from religious assemblies like congregational prayer, jihãd and so on; as it was the time when religion had total domination and authority over desires.

But what is the situation nowadays? Religion has lost its hold; base desires have seeped into hearts; we are living in a society com-posed of religious objectives (whose structure is weakened and people have turned away from it) and modern civilization's objectives. It is submerged in material enjoyments whose foundation is strong and general public eagerly proceeds towards it. Then there appeared severe quarrel and dispute between religious factors and modern civilization, in which constantly the latter is winning and the former retreating. The religious system that was supposed to dominate the society lost it coherence, and chaos and confusion appeared in spiritual affairs. In this condition, neither oath nor anything stronger can be of any bene-fit; there remains nothing to protect the people's rights. People have lost confidence not in the religious safeguards found in society, but even in modern laws.

However, the divine rules and sharī'ah cannot be abrogated merely by the people's turning away from it or by their being tired of it. Verily the religion with Allãh is Islam, He is not pleased with disbelief for his servant, and if Truth had followed their desires the heavens and the earth would have perished. Certainly, Islam is a relig-ion which deals with all conditions of human life, it explains them and describes their laws – the laws that consist of parts which are in con-formity with each other, are interlinked and mutually complementary; they are alive with spirit of monotheism. If one part ails the whole becomes sick; if some portions become rotten, it adversely affects the whole – just like a human body.

If a limb of body starts ailing or becomes decayed, it is essential to preserve the healthy parts and treat the ailing one; it is not correct in reason to leave the ailing limb as it is and also neglect the healthy parts.

Islam is the True Religion, of easy laws and forgiving nature; its sharī'ah has various vast degrees; its responsibilities are assessed according to what one has the ability to do. Its rope is stretched from secured social condition (where its laws and rules comprehensively cover all situations without exception) to individual conditions of emergency (when prayer is allowed by sign); but coming down from a high step to a lower one is conditional to emergency that removes responsibility and allows respite and extension. Allãh says: He who disbelieves in Allãh after he has believed – except he who has been forced (to do so), while his heart remains firm in faith – and opens (his) breast for dis-belief, will suffer the wrath of Allãh. For them there shall be a great torment . . . Then, verily your Lord – to those who migrated after being persecuted, then they strived hard and endured patiently – verily, your Lord, after that, is Oft-Forgiving, Most Merciful (16:106, 110).

As for those who base their lives on materialistic enjoyment, then try to justify the rejection of its opposite religious factors by say-ing that it does not agree with prevalent customs of the present world, they merely follow the materialistic logic, and not the religious one.

There is a discourse related to this chapter that emanates from some people's claim that swearing by other than Allãh's name is a sort of polytheism, ascribing a partner to Allãh. It is necessary to ask this speaker what he means by polytheism, which he claims in this context.

Does he mean that: Swearing by other than Allãh (aggrandize-ment of the one sworn by and showing greatness to his affairs, as the meaning of oath is based on it) contains a sort of humbleness and wor-ship to him, and it is polytheism? But not every aggrandizement is polytheism. It can be polytheistic only when grandeur of independent Lordship is ascribed to someone other than Allãh, with the idea that he is self-sufficient and does not require anyone's help.

Allãh has sworn [in His Book] by a lot of His creations, like the sky, the earth, the sun, the moon, the disappearing orbiting stars, and the star when it goes down; He has sworn by the mountain, the river, the fig, the olive, and the horse. Also, He has taken oath by night and day, by morning, by evening glow, by afternoon and forenoon; by the Day of Resurrection and the soul; He has sworn by the Book and the Great Qur'ãn, by the life of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the angels, and many such things in numerous verses – while no oath can be valid without some aggrandizement.

So, what is there to prevent us from proceeding on the way Allãh has used in His speech? Why should not we show greatness of some things, which Allãh has bestowed on them, and stop at that? If such expressions were polytheistic, the divine speech should have avoided it in the first place!

Also, Allãh has shown the greatness of many things in His Book, like the Qur'ãn, the Throne, and the manners of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). He has said: . . . and the mighty Qur'ãn (15:87); . . . And He is the Lord of the Mighty Throne (9:129); . . . and surely you are on a mighty morality (68:4). He has prescribed for His prophets and messengers and for the believers rights on Himself, and has shown their greatness and dignity, as He has said: And certainly Our word has already gone forth about Our servants, the messengers, that verily they shall be helped (37:171-172); . . . and it was incumbent on Us to help the believers (30:47). Why should not we show their grandeur and follow the divine way in swearing in general? What is there to stop us from adjuring Him by something He Himself has sworn by? Or by one of the rights He has prescribed for His friends on Himself?

Of course, the jurisprudential oath that has legal effects in the fields of oath or judgement is not valid by name of other than Allãh, as is explained in fiqh, but we are not talking about that.

If the objector means to say that general aggrandizement, in any way, is not allowed for anyone other than Allãh – even if it is done through what Allãh has shown its grandeur with – then it is a claim for which there is no proof at all; rather definite proof is found against it.

Sometimes it is said that swearing by the right of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and Allãh's friends, seeking nearness to them and hoping for their intercession in any way, is a worship and bestowal of an unseen authority on them. The same comments as above apply to this claim too: What do they mean by this "unseen authority"? Does it denote the independent authority, which is reserved for Allãh? If so, then no Muslim (who believes in the Book of Allãh) assigns it to other than Allãh. And if it denotes non-material authority in general (even if it is by permission of Allãh), then where is the proof that it is impossible for some chosen servants of Allãh, like His friends, to have such auth-ority by divine permission? The noble Qur'ãn has clearly mentioned many unseen authorities, as Allãh says: . . . until, when death comes to one of you, Our messengers (angels) cause him him to die, . . . (6:61); Say: "The angel of death will cause you to die . . ." (32:11); By those (angels) who drag forth violently, and those who undo (the bonds) gently, and those who glide along (swiftly); and those who go ahead with foremost speed, and those who manage the affairs (79:1-5); Say: "Whoever is the enemy of Jibrīl, verily it is he who has brought it to your heart by Allãh's command . . ." (2:97); and there are numerous verses of this theme.

And He says about Iblīs and his hosts: for he and his tribe watch you from a position where you cannot see them. Verily We have made the Satans to be the guardians of those who do not believe (7:27). Likewise, innumerable verses have been revealed about the prophets' and others' intercession in the next world, and their miraculous signs in this world.

Would that I knew what is the difference between material effects, which these people assert in these subjects without any aversion, and non-material effects, which they call unseen authority. If assertion of effect to other than Allãh were forbidden, then there should not be any difference between a material and a non-material effect, and if it is allowed by permission of Allãh, then all are equal in this respect.

TRADITIONS

'Alī ibn Ibrãhīm narrates through his people a marfū' ḥadīth: He says: "Tamīm ad-Dãrī, Ibn Bandī and Ibn Abī Mãriyah went forth on a journey. Tamīm ad-Dãrī was a Muslim and the other two were Christians. Tamīm ad-Dãrī had a box, which contained his merchan-dise togetherwith a pot with golden design and a necklace; he had taken to sell it in an Arabian market.

"Then Tamīm ad-Dãrī became very sick. With the approach of death he gave all that he had to Ibn Bandī and Ibn Abī Mãriyah, ordering them to convey it to his heirs. When they returned to Medina, they took out from the merchandise the pot and the necklace, handing over the rest to his heirs. The heirs found the two items missing. So, the family of Tamīm said to the two, 'Was our man sick for a long time in which he spent a lot of money?' They said, 'No. He was not sick but for a few days.' (The family) said, 'Then was he robbed of something in this journey?' They said, 'No.' (The family) said, 'Then did he do some trade in which he suffered a loss?' They said, 'No.' Then, the family said, 'But (here) we find missing the best things which he had, 'A pot with golden design ornamented with gems and a necklace.' They said, 'Whatever he gave to us we have given to you.'

"The family brought the two to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) asked them to take oath; they swore and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) let them go free. There-after, that pot and necklace appeared with them, so the heirs of Tamīm came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! Indeed, has appeared with Ibn Bandī and Ibn Abī Mãriyah what we had claimed against them.' So, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) waited for an order from Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, about it.

"Then Allãh, the Blessed, the Sublime, revealed: O you who believe! Call to witness between you when death draws nigh to one of you, at the time of making the will, two just persons from among you, or two others from among others than you, if you are travelling in the land – Thus, Allah, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, allowed witnessing of the People of the Book in will only when one is on journey and does not find Muslims; then He said: – and the calamity of death befalls you; the two witnesses you should detain after the prayer; then if you doubt (them), they shall both swear by Allãh (saying): 'We will not take for it a price, though there be a relative, and we will not hide the testimony of Allãh, for then certainly we should be among the sinners.' – This is the first witnessing, which the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had administered. – Then if it becomes known that they both have been guilty of a sin, – i.e. they have perjured themselves; – two others shall stand up in their place (i.e. from among the heirs of the deceased; – from among those who have a claim against them, – i.e. against the first two; – the two nearest in kin; so they two should swear by Allãh: – i.e. they should swear in the name of Allãh, that they [the two] have more right to this claim than them, and that they have perjured themselves in swearing by Allãh; – 'Certainly our testimony is truer than the testimony of those two, and we have not exceeded the limit, for then most surely we should be of the unjust.'

"So, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) ordered the heirs of Tamīm ad-Dārī to swear by Allāh as he directed them; they did swear and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) took the necklace and the pot from Ibn Bandī and Ibn Abī Māriyah, and returned them to the heirs of Tamīm ad-Dārī. – This is more proper in order that they should give testimony truly or fear that other oaths be given after their oaths." (al-Kāfī)

The author says: al-Qummī has likewise narrated it in his at-Tafsīr; but there is in it after the clause: the two witnesses you should detain after the prayer, the word, "i.e. the afternoon prayer."

The word of the Imām (a.s.): "who have a claim against them, against the first two": Apparently, it is in dual form, and if means the first two witnesses; it explains the Qur'ānic word, "the first two." We have stated in the preceding commentary that it is the clearest of all probable meanings, according to this recital.

at-Tirmidhī (who has said that it was a weak tradition), Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, an-Naḥḥās (in his Nāsikh), Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh and Abū Nu'aym (in al-Ma'rifah) have narrated, through the chain of Abu 'n-Naḍr (and he is al-Kalbī), from Bādhān (mawlā of Umm Hānī), from Ibn 'Abbās, from Tamīm ad-Dārī, that he said about this verse: "The people became clear of the two, except me and 'Udayy ibn Badā'; and they were Christians frequenting to Syria before Islam. So, they came to Syria for their trade, and there came to them for trade mawlā of Banū Sahm, Badīl ibn Abī Maryam by name. He had a silver bowl, and it was his main merchandise. Then he became sick, and he appointed them as his executor of the will and enjoined them to convey what he had left to his family."

Tamīm said, "When he died, we took that bowl and sold it at a thousand dirham; then 'Udayy ibn Badā' and I divided it among ourselves. When we came to his family, we gave to them what was with us; but they missed the bowl and they asked us about it; we said: 'He did not leave anything else nor did he give to us any other thing.'"

Tamīm said, "Thereafter, when I accepted Islam after arrival of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) at Medina, I felt guilty about it; so I came to his family, gave them the information and paid to them five hundred dirham, and told them that a similar amount was with my companion. So, they brought him to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); he asked them for proof which they did not find; then he ordered them to adjure him by what is held sacred by his co-religionists, and he took oath. Then Allāh revealed: O you who believe! Call to witness between you . . . or fear that other oaths be given after their oaths. Then ‘Amr ibn al-‘Ãṣī and another man stood up and swore (to it); so five hundred dirhams were extracted from ‘Udayy ibn Badã’." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: Apart from its weakness, the tradition does not conform fully to the verse, and this non-conformity is clear. as-Suyūṭī has narrated from Ibn ‘Abbãs and ‘Ikrimah what is near the preceding tradition of al-Qummī.

al-Fãriyãbī, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Abū ‘Ubayd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Abū 'sh-Shaykh have narrated from ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib that he recited mina 'l-ladhī staḥaqqa (with vowel a after t), [as is the common recitation.]

Ibn Marduwayh and al-Ḥãkim (who has said it is correct) have narrated from ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) recited: al-ladhīna staḥaqqa ‘alayhimu 'l-awlayãn (with a after t). (ibid.)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Ibn ‘Abbãs that he said: "This verse is abrogated." (ibid.)

The author says: There is no proof of abrogation as claimed here.

Muḥammad ibn Ismã‘īl has narrated from al-Faḍl ibn Shãdhãn, and ‘Alī ibn Ibrãhīm has narrated from his father, from Ibn Abī ‘Umayr, from Hishãm ibn al-Ḥakam, from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said about the word of Allãh: or two others from among others than you: If the man is in a town where there is no Muslim, the witness of a non-Muslim is allowed in will. (al-Kãfī)

The author says: The tradition's meaning is inferred from the verse.

[al-Kulaynī] narrates through his chain from Yaḥyã ibn Muḥam-mad that he said, "I asked Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.), about the word of Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty: O you who believe! Call to wit-ness between you when death draws nigh to one of you, at the time of making the will, two just persons from among you, or two others from among others than you. He said, 'The two from among you means two Muslims; and those from among others than you, means (from) the People of the Book; and if they did not get from the People of the Book, then from the Magians, because the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had followed about the Magians the system of the People of the Book regarding jizyah.

"'And it is (like this:) When a man dies in a place away from home and does not find two Muslims, he will call to witnness two men from among the People of the Book; they will be detained after the afternoon prayer, and they both shall swear by Allāh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, (saying:) "We will not take for it a price, though there be a relative, and we will not hide the testimony of Allāh, for then certainly we should be among the sinners."' The (Imām) said: 'And it is when the heir of the deceased feels doubt about their [the two's] testimony, then it becomes known that they both have testified falsely, he has no right to refute their testimony until he brings two other witnesses; so they shall stand up in the place of the first two witnesses, so they two should swear by Allāh: "Certainly our testimony is truer than the testimony of those two, and we have not exceeded the limit, for then most surely we should be of the unjust." If he did so, the testimony of the first two would be set aside and that of these two would be allowed [i.e. accepted]. Allāh says: This is more proper in order that they should give testimony truly or fear that other oaths be given after their oaths.'" (ibid.)

The author says: As you see, the tradition fits the earlier given explanation of the verse. There are other traditions of the same mean-ing in al-Kāfī and at-Tafsīr of al-ʻAyyāshī narrated from Abū ʻAbdillāh and Abu 'l-Ḥasan (peace be upon both.)

And in some traditions, the Divine Words: or two others from among others than you, have been interpreted as, 'the unbelievers'; and it is more general than 'the People of the Book', as is narrated in al-Kāfī from Abu 'ṣ-Ṣabāḥ al-Kinānī, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), and in at-Tafsīr of al-ʻAyyāshī from Abū Usāmah from the same Imām (a.s.) about this verse: [I asked him:] "What (means): or two others from among others than you?" He said, "They are two unbelievers." "I said, '(What means:) two just persons from among you?' He said 'They are two Muslims.'"

Although the preceding tradition which confines it to the People of the Book is not capable of putting any restriction on this generality, according to the rules of generality and restriction because both are in positive case, yet the first tradition's context may explain the general-ity of the second one in a way that conforms with restriction.

aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated through his chain to Abū Zayd ʻAyyāsh ibn Yazīd ibn al-Ḥasan from his father, Yazīd ibn al-Ḥasan that he said: "Narrated to me Mūsā ibn Jaʻfar (peace be upon both), he said, 'aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.), said about the words of Allāh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty: On the day when Allāh will assemble the messengers, then say:

"What answer were you given?" They shall say: "We have no knowledge, . . ."' He said, 'aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.), said, "They shall say, 'We have no knowledge through other than Thee.'"' He also said, 'aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.), said, "The Qur'ãn, all of it, is rebuke, and its interior is approximation."'" (Tafsīru 'l-Burhãn)

The author of al-Burhãn says: "Ibn Bãbawayh has said, 'The Imãm (a.s.) means that behind the verses of rebuke and threat there are verses of mercy and forgiveness.'"

The author says: What he has quoted from aṣ-Ṣadūq (may Allãh have mercy upon him) regarding the meaning of the Imãm's saying: 'The Qur'ãn, all of it, is rebuke, and its interior is approxima-tion,' does not fit on it: Neither in view of the beginning of the tradi-tion, because the interpretation of the messengers' word, 'We have no knowledge,' as, 'We have no knowledge through other than Thee', has no relation with the Qur'ãn containing two types of verses, those of promise and those of threat; nor in view of the context of the sentence itself, i.e. 'The Qur'ãn, all of it, is rebuke, and its interior is approxi-mation;' because this speech apparently means that the whole Qur'ãn is rebuke and the whole of it is approximation, and the matter differs from the point of view of interior and exterior; it does not mean that the Qur'ãn is divided into two categories, one is of the verses of rebuke, and another besides it is the verses of approximation.

Pondering on the Imãm (a.s.)'s talk, we come to understand that 'rebuke', inasmuch as it stands parallel to 'approximation' means its concomitant, i.e., to remove far as opposed to bring near; the Qur'ãn, all of it, is cognizance and reality; its exterior separates realities from one another and categorizes its parts, and its interior brings them nearer to each other, perfects them and unifies them. In short, it means that the Qur'ãn, in its exterior shows various realities of cognizance, which are separate one from the other, yet in spite of its multitudin-ousness and separateness of its components, in its interior its ingradi-ents are quite near to each other, and its various meanings are inter-connected, until it is unified and becomes one single reality, pervading the whole body like spirit – and it is nothing but the reality of oneness, monotheism. Allãh says: A Book whose verses are firmly arranged then separated, from the All-Wise, All-Aware (11:1).

At this juncture, it becomes clear how it fits on what the Imãm (a.s.) has said at the beginning of the tradition that the messengers' reply, 'We have no knowledge,' means: 'We have no knowledge through other than Thee.' It is because man, or any knower we suppose, knows whatever he knows, he knows it through Allãh; Allãh is known through Himself, and all other things are known through Him. In other words, when knowledge connects with anything, it connects first of all with Allãh, as deserves His sublime status and majesty, and then it connects through Him with that thing; because with Him is the knowledge of everything, He gives out of it to whomsoever He wishes from among His servants, as much as He wishes. Allãh says: . . . while they cannot comprehend anything out of His knowledge except that which He wills; His throne extends over the heavens and the earth . . . (2:255). We have quoted earlier the narration of ʻAbdu 'l-Aʻlã mawlã Ãl Sãm from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) and some other traditions in this regard.

Accordingly, the messengers' reply: 'We have no knowledge, surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things,' would mean in the light of the Imãm's explanation, as follows: We have no knowledge of anything leaving Thee aside; we know whatever we know because of our knowledge about Thee; it is because all the knowledge belongs to Thee; and as such Thou knowest it better than us; after all, whatever we know comes out of Thine knowledge and Thou hast given us a part of it by Thine will and Thine sustenance.

Accordingly, another meaning is understood of the words: 'surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things'; and it is more sublime than the previously given explanation: Everything in this creation has an existence separate from the others' being. As such it is 'unseen' vis-à-vis the others, because its existence is limited and foreordained, it does not comprehend except what Allãh wills it to comprehend; and Allãh comprehends everything, and knows every unseen; thus nothing knows anything except through Allãh, Sublime and Glorified is He from every short-coming.

Now, we understand that division of the things into unseen and seen, actually means their division into an unseen which Allãh wills that we should comprehend it and an unseen which He has kept hidden from us. Probably, this meaning is supported by the apparent meaning of the divine words: He is the Knower of the unseen, and He does not reveal His unseen (secrets) to any one except to the messenger whom He chooses (72:26-27), as is implied by relating the 'unseen' to the pronoun. You should deeply ponder on this matter.

Yazīd al-Kanãsī narrates from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.), that he said about the verse: On the day when Allãh will assemble the messengers . . . " He will say, 'What answer were you given about your awṣiyã' (successors) whom you left behind in your ummah?' They will say: 'We have no knowledge of what they (the ummah) did after us.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

The author says: al-Qummī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr, from Muḥammad ibn Muslim from the same Imãm (a.s.).

[al-Kulaynī] has narrated in al-Kãfī a tradition of similar theme, from Yazīd, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), and it is based on the principle of the flow of meaning, or gives its interior explanation.

COMMENTARY

These two and the subsequent verses (which narrate the story of the coming down of the Table and those which describe what Allãh shall ask ʻĪsã, son of Maryam [a.s.] regarding the people's taking them as two gods besides Allãh, and the reply which he will offer), all are related with the theme of the Chapter with which it had begun: It began with the call to fulfil the covenant and give thanks for favours, and cautioning against breaking the contract and being ungrateful to divine bounties. In this way, the end of the chapter fully returns to its beginning, and unity of intended theme are preserved.

QUR'ÃN: When Allãh shall say: "O ʻĪsã, son of Maryam! . . . and when you raised the dead by My leave: The verse counts many of the clear signs which had appeared on his hand, but it is counted in a way that shows Allãh's grace on him and his mother together. These favours are mentioned in almost similar words in the chapter of "The House of ʻImrãn", where Allãh narrates the angels' talk with Maryam when they came to give her the good news of ʻĪsã's birth. Allãh says: When the angels said: "O Maryam! Surely Allãh gives you good tidings of a Word from Him whose name is the Masīḥ, ʻĪsã son of Maryam, . . . And he shall speak to the people when in the cradle and when of mature age, . . . And He will teach him the Book and the Wisdom, and the Tawrãt and the Injīl. And (make him) a messenger to the Children of Israel: 'That I have come to you with a sign from your Lord, that I create for you out of clay the likeness of a bird; then I breathe into it, and it becomes a bird by Allãh's leave; and I heal the blind and the leper, and bring to life the dead, by Allāh's leave . . . (3:45-49).

Meditation on the context of the verses makes it clear why the signs which apparently were exclusively connected with the Christ, have been counted as bounties bestowed on him and on his mother together, as the verses of the third chapter indicate; because good tiding is given concerning a bounty, and here the case is the same. Whatever signs and bounties were connected with Jesus, e.g. being born without a father, being strengthened by the Holy Ghost, creating flying birds, healing the blind and the leper and raising the dead to life by Allāh's permission, were miraculous signs of Maryam to the same degree as they were related to ʻĪsā (peace be upon both). They both together were bestowed the divine favours, as Allāh says: "remember My favour on you and your mother".

Also, the same is indicated by the divine words: . . . and We made her and her son a sign for all peoples (21:91), as He has counted both of them together as one sign, not two.

The words: "when I strengthened you with the Holy Spirit (so that) you spoke to the people", apparently show that the strengthening with the Holy Spirit was the cause that enabled him to talk to the people. That is why the clause: "you spoke to the people", is attached to the preceding sentence without any intervening conjunction; it indi-cates that the strengthening and the speaking together constitute one action, made up of a cause and its effect. Allāh on occasions has only mentioned one of the two – either cause or its effect as is seen in the preceding verses: . . . you spoke to the people in the cradle, and when grown up . . . (5:110); . . . and We gave to ʻĪsā, son of Maryam, clear evidence, and aided him with the Holy Spirit. . . . (2:253)

Apart from that, if the strengthening with the Holy Spirit is taken to mean sending revelation through the Spirit, it was not reserved for ʻĪsā, son of Maryam (a.s.) and all the messengers shared it with him; moreover, the verse's context rejects this meaning.

The words: "and when I taught you the Book and the Wisdom and the Tawrāt and the Injīl". It may be inferred from it that ʻĪsā (a.s.) received this knowledge at one go, through a single divine command, without any graduality. Also, it may be understood from the facts that all actions have been combine together and are governed by only one adverb of time, 'when'.

The clauses: "and when you made out of clay the figure of a bird by My leave, . . . and you healed those born blind and the lepers by My leave;" The context, because the word 'when' is not repeated, shows that creating of the bird and healing of the blind and the lepers had happened at the same time; and mention of creation of bird contains the proviso: "by My leave", as the matter of creation is very important because it entails bestowal of life; that is why the Qur'ãn has paid special attention to this clause and mentions its being done by divine leave, although the divine leave is also mentioned at the end of the sentence. But the divine Book did not like keeping the hearers in suspense even for a few moments, lest they think for a few seconds that some one besides Allãh can independently bestow life. And Allãh knows better.

The words: "and when you raised the dead by My leave". Raising the dead alludes to making them alive. It clearly indicates that this miracle that had appeared on his hand, had involved those dead bodies, which were buried in graves, and he (a.s.) has put life into them and brought them out of the graves to this worldly life. The sentence shows that this miracle had taken place many times. Other themes connected with this verse were explained under the verses of the third chapter, and may be referred to if necessary.

QUR'ÃN: and when I held back the children of Israel from you . . . 'This is nothing but clear sorcery': It shows that the Israelites wanted to harm him, but Allãh held them back from it. It tallies with what Allãh has mentioned in the chapter of "The House of 'Imrãn", in his stories: And they planned and Allãh (also) planned, and Allãh is the best of planners (3:54)

QUR'ÃN: And (recall) when I revealed to the disciples: 'Believe in Me and . . . that we are Muslims'": It agrees with the third chapter's verse 52: And when 'Īsã perceived their disbelief, he said:"Who will be my helpers unto Allãh?" The disciples said: "We will be Allãh's helpers: We believe in Allãh; and bear witness that we are Muslims."

It is clear from the above that the belief of the disciples, mentioned in this verse (And when I revealed to the disciples: "Believe in Me and My messenger", they said: "We believe . . .") is other than their first belief in 'Īsã (a.s.); because the above verse 3:52 apparently shows that it had happened in later days of his Call, while the disciples [who answered it] were the foremost and the first in believing in him and had remained adhered to him.

Moreover, the verse 3:52 (. . . he said: "Who will be my helpers unto Allãh?" The disciples said: "We will be Allãh's helpers: We believe in Allãh; and bear witness that we are submitting ones."), apparently shows that this Call was given to obtain their commitment for helping the divine religion, not for initial belief in Allãh. That is why the verse ends on the words: "and bear witness that we are Muslims." The word, "Muslims", here indicates that they were ready to submit to the divine order by establishing Allãh's Call and enduring the affliction in His cause. Obviously, this stage comes after the basic belief in Allãh.

Now, it is clear that this verse relates the story of taking the covenant from the disciples.

There are some other themes related to this verse, which were given in the chapter of "The House of ‘Imrãn".

TRADITIONS

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] narrates through his chain from Abū Ya‘qūb al-Baghdãdī that he said, "Ibn as-Sikkīt said to Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍã (a.s.), 'Why did Allãh send Mūsã ibn ‘Imrãn with his shining hand, staff and magical implements, and ‘Īsã with medical implements, and Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), with speech and sermons?'

"Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) said, 'Verily, when Allãh, the Sublime, sent Mūsã (a.s.) magic was prevalent among the people of his time; so Mūsã (a.s.) brought to them from Allãh, the Sublime, what they did not have and was beyond their power to (bring) its like; with it he nullified their witchcraft and established through it the proof against them. And verily Allãh, the Sublime, sent ‘Īsã at a time when chronic deseases had spread and the people were in (dire) need of medicine; so he brought to them from Allãh, the Sublime, like of which they did not have, and with which he gave life to the dead and healed the blind and the lepers by Allãh's permission and established through it the proof against them. And verily Allãh, the Sublime, sent Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) at a time when lectures, talks and poetry were prevalent among the people of his time; so he brought to them the Book of Allãh, sermons and wisdom with which he nullified their talk and established through it the proof against them.'

"Ibnu 's-Sikkīt said, 'I have not ever seen as you (are) today. Now, who is today the proof against the creatures?' He said, '(It is) reason, with it is recognized he who speaks the truth about Allãh and it confirms him, and the lier against Allãh, and it refutes him.' Ibnu 's-Sikkīt said, 'This is, by Allãh, the reply.'" (Ma‘ãni 'l-akhbãr)

Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyã narrates from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad, from al-Ḥasan ibn Maḥbūb, from Abū Jamīlah, from Abãn ibn Taghlib and others, from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.), that he was asked, "Had ‘Īsã ibn Maryam raised anyone after his death (so that) he ate, got sustenance for a time and begot?" He said, "Yes. Verily, he had a friend, his brother in Allãh, the Blessed, the Sublime; and ‘Īsã (a.s.) used to pass by him and be his guest; and verily ‘Īsã lost contact with him for sometime, then came to him to greet him; so his mother came out and he (‘Īsã) asked her about him; she said, 'He is dead, O Messenger of Allãh!' So he said, 'Do you like to see him?' She said, 'Yes.' And he said, 'Tomor-row I shall come to you so that I raise him to life by the permission of Allãh, the Sublime.'

"When the morning came, he came to her and said, 'Come with me to his grave.' They both proceeded until they reached his grave. So, ‘Īsã (a.s.) stood there, then prayed to Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty. Then the grave opened wide and her son came out alive. When his mother saw him and he saw her, they both wept. ‘Īsã (a.s.) had mercy on them, and told him (the son), 'Do you like to remain with your mother in the world?' He said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! (Will it be) with eating, sustenance and a [fixed] period? Or without eating, sustenance and a period?' ‘Īsã (a.s.) said to him, 'With eating, susten-ance and a period; you will live twenty years, will marry and beget.' He said, 'Then, yes.'"

(The Imãm) said, "So ‘Īsã (a.s.), gave him to his mother; and he lived for twenty years and begot off-spring." (al-Kãfī)

Muḥammad ibn Yūsuf aṣ-Ṣan‘ãnī narrates from his father that he said, "I asked Abū Ja‘far (a.s.), about (the verse): And when I revealed to the disciples. He said, 'They were inspired.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī)

The author says: The word, revelation, has been used in the meaning of inspiration, in many places in the Qur’ãn. For example: And We revealed to the mother of Mūsã: "Suckle him . . . (28:7); And your Lord revealed to the bee, saying: "Make hives in mountains . . . (16:68); that your Lord revealed to her (i.e. the Earth), (99:5).

When the disciples said: "O ʻĪsã son of Maryam! Is your Lord able to send down to us food from heaven?" He said: "Fear Allãh if you are believers." (112). They said: "We desire that we should eat of it and that our hearts should be at rest, and that we may know that you have indeed spoken the truth to us and that we may be of the witnesses to it." (113). ʻĪsã the son of Maryam said: "O Allãh, our Lord! Send down to us food from heaven which should be to us an ever-recurring happiness, to the first of us and to the last of us, and a sign from Thee, and grant us sustenance, and Thou art the best of providers." (114). Allãh said: "Surely I will send it down to you, but whoever shall dis-believe afterwards from among you, surely I will chastise him with a chastisement with which I will not chastise any one among the nations." (115).

COMMENTARY

The verses describe the story of coming down of the table on Christ (a.s.) and his companions. Although they do not say clearly that Allãh sent it down to them, yet the last verse contains the uncondi-tional divine promise of sending it down to them; and He has men-tioned His attribute that He does not break His promise.

Some people's opinion, that they saught pardon from ʻĪsã (a.s.) when they heard the threat of unprecedented chastisement for those who would disbelieve after coming of the table, is an opinion without any proof from the Book or trustworthy ḥadīth.

This view has been narrated from a group of the exegetes, among them being al-Mujãhid and al-Ḥasan; and their or others' views are no proof at all. Even if their views were supposed to be traditions, they would be of incomplete chains of narrators, and such items are not fit as proof because of their weakness. Moreover, they are opposed by other traditions, which show that the table was sent down. Even if they were correct they would be only 'solitary' traditions, which are not relied upon except in matters of jurisprudence.

Sometimes proof is offered of not coming down of the table by the fact that the Christians do not know about it and their holy books do not mention it; had it been sent down to them there were many reasons to describe it in their books and to keep it alive in their society as they have preserved the memory of the Last Super – the Euchrist.

However, a man who knows the history of Christianity – as how it spread and how the gospels appeared on the scene – would not care about such utterances; because neither their books were written and preserved with tawãtur since the time of ʻĪsã (a.s.), nor the present Christianity reaches upto him, so that it might be useful in what they have received generation after generation, or in that which they do not know from what is attributed to the Christ's Call.

Of course, in some Gospels there is the story of his feeding his disciples and some other people with a little bread and fish. But that story does not agree with the Qur'ānic statement in any of its particulars.

The Gospel According to St. John, chapter 6 says:

1. After these thing Jesus went over the sea of Galilee, which is the sea of Tiberias.
2. And a great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased.
3. And Jesus went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples.
4. And the passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh.
5. When Jesus then lifted up his eyes, and saw a great company come unto him, he saith unto Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?
6. And this he said to prove him: for he himself knew what he would do.
7. Philip answered him, Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little.
8. One of his disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto him.
9. There is a lad here, which hath five barley loaves, and two small fishes: but what are they among so many?
10. And Jesus said, Make the men sit down. Now there was much grass in the place. So the men sat down, in number about five thousand.
11. And Jesus took the loaves; and when he had given thanks, he distributed to the disciples, and the disciples to them that were set down; and likewise of the fishes as much as they would.
12. When they were filled, he said unto his disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.
13. Therefore they gathered them together, and filled twelve buskets with the fragments of the five barley loaves, which remained over and above unto them that had eaten.
14. Then those men, when they had seen the miracle that Jesus did, said, This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world.
15. When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come and take him by force, to make him a king, he departed again into a moun-tain himself alone. (John, 6:1-15)

Moreover, if we ponder on this story as given in the Divine Book, Qur'ān, we find in it other aspects that require contemplation. The initial question in the beginning of the story totally lacks the manners, which must be maintained vis-à-vis Allāh. And it ends at the threat which Allāh has threatened those who shall disbelieve afterwards that He would chastise them with a chastisement with which He would not chastise anyone among the nations. Its like is not found in any sign given by Allãh to His prophets, nor in any that were suggested by their people, like the suggestions of the nations of Nūḥ, Hūd, Ṣāliḥ, Shu‘ayb, Mūsã and Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.).

Was it because the disciples, who had asked it, had shown lack of manners in their questioning, because they had used words, which show their doubt about the divine power? However, we find in the demands of the preceding nations insults to the majesty of their Lord, and mock-ery against their prophets, as well as what we see in the Qur’ãn of the stories of the arrogance of the people of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and of the Jews who lived at that time, is more impertinent and more dis-gusting than it.

Or was it because they, being believers before this question and coming down of the table, became disbelievers after its coming down and observation of clear signs, and therefore invited such severe threat-ening. However, although disbelief after seeing clear signs is a great haughtiness and over-stepping the limits, but it was not confined to them, as such examples are found in every nation and they were not threatened in such a harsh manner – not even those who apostasized after being placed nearer to the divine proximity, like the one whom Allãh mentions in these words: And recite to them the narrative of him to whom We gave Our signs, but he withdrew himself from them, so the Satan overtook him, so he became of those who go astray (7:175).

What may be said at this juncture is that this story, which began with a question, is distinguished with a theme that is unique among all miracles of the prophets, which they had brought because of their people's suggestion, or some other necessary requirements.

The miraculous signs narrated by the Divine Book were of vari-ous types: There were the miracles which Allãh gave to the prophets when He sent them to the peoples, in order that it should serve as the proof to support their claims of prophethood or messengership, as Mūsã (a.s.) was given the bright hand and staff; and ‘Īsã (a.s.) was enabled to raise the dead to life, create the bird and heal the blind and the lepers; and Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) was given the Qur’ãn. These signs were given, as they were needed for the Call to the true belief and for completing the proof against the disbelievers, so that he who would perish might perish by clear proof, and he who would live might live by clear proof; . . . [8:42].

There were the miracles brought by the prophets and the messengers as a result of the disbelievers' suggestions, like the she-camel of Ṣãliḥ; in the same category come the dreadful happenings and tormenting chastisements which appeared in the course of the prophetic Calls, like the signs of Mūsã (a.s.) against the people of Pharash (locust, lice, forgs, etc. totalling seven signs), flood of Nūḥ, earthquake of Thamūd, storm of ‘Ãd and similar things. These too were the signs connected to the disbelieving enemies.

There were the signs shown by Allãh to the believers for fulfil-ling their needs, like gushing forth of streams from rocks, coming down of manna and quails for the Israelites in the wilderness, raising of the mountain over their heads and opening up the river to save them from Pharaoh and his deeds. These were the signs, which appeared either to frighten the sinners and the arrogants or to show the dignity of the believers in order that the word of the Beneficent Lord is completed about them – without any suggestion put by them.

Of the same category are the promises given by Allãh in His Book to the believers for manifesting the honour of His Messenger (s.a.w.a.), e.g. the promise of the conquest of Mecca, and of victory of the Romans in a few years, etc.

These are the categories of the signs narrated in the Qur’ãn and described in divine teachings. But as for suggesting a sign after coming down of a sign, it is a fantasy which the divine teaching counts as nonsense that should not be paid attention to: For example, the proposal of the People of the Book that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) should bring for them a book from the heavens, while the Qur’ãn was present before their eyes. Allãh says: The People of the Book ask you to bring down to them a book from heaven; so indeed they had demanded of Mūsã a greater thing than that, for they said: "Show us Allãh manifestly"; . . . But Allãh bears witness by what He has revealed to you that He has revealed it with His knowledge; and the angels bear witness (also); and sufficient is Allãh for a witness (4:153; 166).

Likewise, the polytheists had asked the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he should bring down the angels or should show Allãh to them. Allãh says: And those who do not hope for Our meeting say: "Why not have angels been sent down upon us, or (why) do we not see our Lord?" Now certainly they are too proud of themselves and have revolted in great revolt (25:21). Also, He says: And they say: "What is the matter with this Messenger that he eats food and goes about in the markets? Why has not an angel been sent down to him, so that he should have been a warner with him? Or (why is not) a treasure sent down to him, or he is made to have a garden from which he should eat?" And the unjust say: "You do not follow any but a man enchanted." See what likeness do they apply to you, so they have gone astray; therefore they shall not be able to find a way (25:7-9). There are many verses of the same theme.

It is only because the purpose of coming down of a sign or verse is manifestation of truth and completion of proof; when it came down then indeed the truth became manifest and the proof was com-plete. Now, there is no sense in asking for coming down of a sign as it has already happened and the purpose achieved, and therefore such asking would only mean mockery of divine signs, play with the Lord's majesty and wavering in acceptance of reality; and it is the greatest arrogance and haughtiness.

Such behaviour, if shown by believers, would entail cruder offence and greater sin. Why should a believer ask for coming down of a heavenly sign while he is already a believer, and especially so if he is one of those who have seen the divine signs and believed after that observation? Would it not be similar to the suggestions, which the people of pleasure, surrounded with luxury, in gatherings of entertain-ments and assemblies of amusements, offer to the magicians and prac-titioners of legerdemain, in order that they should show to them the most astonishing jugglery and the most wonderous activity that they can perform?

What appears from the words: When the disciples said: "O ʻĪsã son of Maryam! Is your Lord able to send down to us food from heaven?" that they had asked the Christ (a.s.) to show them a sign which would be reserved for them; they were his disciples, attached to him; and they had seen those clear signs and manifest miracles; because he (a.s.) was not sent to his people except with miraculous signs, as is seen from the divine words: "And a messenger to the Children of Israel: 'That I have come to you with a sign from your Lord, that I create for you out of clay the likeness of a bird; then I breathe into it and it becomes a bird with Allãh's leave; and I heal the blind and the leper, and bring to life the dead, by Allãh's leave . . .'" (3:49).

And how can it be imagined about him who believed in Christ (a.s.) that he would not have seen any sign from him, while he (a.s.) in his own existence was a sign: Allãh created him without a father, and strengthened him with the Holy Ghost, and he talked with the people in the cradle as well as in matured age; and he continued to be hon-oured by one sign after another until Allāh raised him to Himself and ended his affairs with a wonderful sign.

When they asked to be shown a sign which they had chosen for themselves – even after seeing all those numerous sign – it was tanta-mount to suggesting a sign after a sign; thus they committed a great offence, and that is why ʻĪsā (a.s.) admonished them, saying: "Fear Allāh if you are believers."

And it was because of the same reason that they reinterpreted their suggestion and explained it again in such a way as to tone down the vehemence of their speech and blunt its edge; so they said: "We desire that we should eat of it and that our hearts should be at rest, and that we may know that you have indeed spoken the truth to us and that we may be of the witnesses to it." Thus they added to eating from it other reasons to explain their suggestion. They wanted to show that this suggestion was not like amusement with wonderous activities or playing with divine signs; rather there are some benefits intended, like perfection of their knowledge and removal of wrong ideas from their hearts and their being the witnesses to it.

Yet they did not omit mentioning the intention of eating from it, and that was the main offence. If they had said: 'We desire that we should eat of it so that our hearts should be at rest,' there would not have been any blame on them; but they said: "... eat of it and that our hearts should be at rest," The former sentence cuts at the roots of all fantasy and foolhardiness, but not the latter (i.e. present construction).

When they insisted, ʻĪsā (a.s.) agreed to their demand and asked his Lord to honour them in this way; and it was the only sign sent down to them on their suggestion in an apparently unimperative matter, and that is the believers' partaking of it. That is why he (a.s.) presented it in a manner suitable to be addressed to the Divine Majesty, so he said: "O Allāh, our Lord! Send down to us food from heaven which should be an ever-recurring happiness, to the first of us and to the last of us." Thus he dressed it in the robe of festivity; feast for a people is the day in which they get a gift or an item of pride, which is exclusively re-served, to them from among the people, and the coming down of the table has this particular attribute.

When ʻĪsā (a.s.) asked of his Lord what he asked – and far be it from him to ask for anything except what he hoped that it would be accepted, and that his Lord would not disgrace him by rejecting it; and far be it from his Lord to turn him away without accepting his invoca-tion – his Lord accepted his prayer, but with one proviso, that whoever among his people would disbelieve afterwards, Allãh would chastise him with a chastisement that would be exclusively reserved to them, as the sign that would be given to them would be exclusively reserved to them; that is why He said: "Surely I will send it down to you, but whoever shall disbelieve afterwards from among you, surely I will chastise him with a chastisement with which I will not chastise any one among the nations." Ponder on it.

QUR'ÃN: When the disciples said: "O 'Īsã son of Maryam! Is your Lord able to send down to us food from heaven?": 'When' is an adverb, related to an implied verb, Remember, or some similar word.

Someone has said that it is related to the words in the preceding verse, they said: "We believe in Allãh; and bear witness that we are submitting ones." It means: The disciples said: 'We believe and bear witness that we submit,' at the time when they said to 'Īsã: "'Is your Lord able to send down to us food from heaven?'" It shows that they were not truthful in their claim, nor were they serious in asking 'Īsã (a.s.), to bear witness that they were submitters.

COMMENT: This interpretation goes against the context. How could their belief be impure, when Allãh Himself had revealed to them to believe in Him and His Messenger? And when Allãh counts it as His favour to 'Īsã (a.s.). Apart from that, if this verse was joined to the preceding one, it should have brought pronoun and not said: "When the disciples said."

al-Mãidah (اَلْمَائِدَة = plate when it contains food). ar-Rãghib has said: "al-Mãidah is the plate that contains food; and both [plate and food] are separately called mãidah; and it is said: 'Mãdanī yumīdunī', i.e. 'He fed me.'"

The wording of their question, i.e., "Is your Lord able to send down to us food from heaven?" according to its apparent meaning that comes to the mind, is such that the reason thinks it difficult that it could have been uttered by the disciples, who were companions of the Christ, and his confidants who adhered to him, were illuminated by the light of his knowledge and cognizance, and followed in his footsteps; and belief and faith – even in its lowest rank, makes man aware that Allãh has power over everything, He cannot be overcome and no disability reaches Him. So, how was it possible for them to ask their messenger whether his Lord was able to send down to them food from heaven?

That is why al-Kasā'ī, one of the seven reciters, has recited this verse as: hal tastaṭī'u (second person singular) rabbaka (as an object); i.e. 'Are you able [to ask] your Lord?' Thus, implying the verb, which we have put in the brackets.

The exegetes have given different interpretations of this question, while most of them agree that it means other than what comes to the mind – that they entertained doubt about the power of Allāh – because they were far above such absurd ignorance.

The best possible interpretation is to say that ability in this verse is an allusion to demand of the underlying reason and occurance of permission; in the same way as possibility, power and ability are used metaphorically in this very meaning. For example, it is said: 'The King cannot listen to every needy person;' it means that the King's under-lying reason prevents him from it; otherwise, listening to is within his ability. Or as it is said: 'A rich man cannot give to everyone who asks,' i.e. the reason of protecting the wealth does not demand it. Or as it is said: 'A knowledgeable person cannot disseminate all that he knows,' i.e. stops him from it the welfare of religion, or welfare of the people, or the system that is prevalent among them. Or as one says to his com-panion: 'Can you come with me to visit Mr. X?' The question implies: 'Does it agree with your welfare and wisdom?' It does not imply his ability to go there. Think over it.

There are some other explanations given by the exegetes: -

One: The disciples had asked this question in order to acquire tranquillity through the belief resulting from observation; it was not because they were having any doubt regarding Allāh's power. In a way, it is the same mode as Allāh quotes in the story of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) that he said: "My Lord! Show me how Thou givest life to the dead." He said: "What! And do you not believe?" He said: "Yes, but that my heart may be at ease." . . . (2:260).

COMMENT: Although there is nothing wrong in asking for a sign for increase in belief and tranquillity of heart, but there is no reason to take their question in this meaning; and their sinlessness is not proved, like Ibrāhīm (a.s.) so that it could be an independent proof for inter-preting their talk in a way free from rancour. Rather the proof is against it, because they had not said: 'We desire that we should eat of it in order that our hearts should be at ease' (as Ibrāhīm [a.s.] had said, 'Yes, but that my heart may be at ease'). Rather they had said, 'We desire that we should eat of it and that our hearts may be at ease;' thus they had counted the eating, per se, a purpose.

Moreover, this interpretation takes it for granted that their hearts were clean of any shade of doubt regarding the divine power. And the ugliness of the apparent meaning of their talk remains in its place.

Apart from that, it had been explained under the verse 2:260: And when Ibrãhīm said: "My Lord! Show me how Thou givest life to the dead." . . ., that he (a.s.) did not want to see the dead getting life after death. (The interpretation under Comment is based on this idea.) Because that would have meant asking for a sign after clear observa-tion, as he (a.s.) was at that time talking with his Lord "face to face." What he had asked for was to see 'how' the dead would be raised – in the afore-mentioned meaning.

Two: They actually wanted to ask about the action, not about Allãh's power to do so; they expressed the idea metaphorically through its concomitant.

COMMENT: There is no proof for this explanation. Even if we accept it, it would negate the idea that they were ignorant of all-encompass-ing divine power; but the unsuitability of their talk to manners of ser-vitude still remains in place.

Three: There is in this speech an implied word, which is omitted. The complete sentence is as follows: 'Are you able to ask your Lord to send down to us food from heaven?' This meaning is supported by the recital: 'Are you able (to ask) your Lord,' i.e. 'Are you able to ask Him without there being anyone to dissuade you from it.'

COMMENT: This supposed omission and implication cannot turn the word: 'Is your Lord able to . . .' into, 'Are you able to ask your Lord;' because the verbs differ in the two recitals – in the verse it is third per-son singular, while in the implied one it is second person singular; and omission or implication does not change the third person to the second person at all.

However, if such change-over be necessary, then it would be said as follows: It ascribes the action of ‘Īsã (a.s.) to his Lord, because his action is in reality Allãh's action, or because everything attributed to him belongs to Allãh. But to begin with this explanation is wrong be-cause only those actions of prophets and messengers are attributed to Allãh which do not bring any defect or short-coming to His majesty, e.g. guidance, knowledge and things like that. On the other hand, when it comes to the concomitants of their humility and humanity, like lack of power and neediness or eating and drinking, etc., their attribu-tion to Him cannot be justified at all. Apart from that, the difficulty of the apparent meaning of the words remains in its place.

Four: al-Istiṭā'ah (ability) is used here in the meaning of al-iṭā'ah (obedience); and the question means: 'Will your Lord obey you and accept your prayer if you asked Him for it.'

COMMENT: It is like jumping out from the frying pan into the fire. Obviously, the question whether Allāh would obey His messenger is more hideous and repulsive than the query about His capability.

Someone has supported this explanation as follows: al-Istiṭā'ah (اَلإِسْتِطاعَة) and al-iṭā'ah (اَلإِطاعَة) both are derived from the root ṭ-w-' (طوع = obedience) which is opposite of kurh (كُرْه = dislike); thus obeying an order means doing it with pleasure and free will; the paradigm of al-istif'āl (اَلإِسْتِفْعَال) from this stem is like that of this paradigm from the stem (jawb). In other words, as istijābah (اِسْتِجَابَة) gives the mean-ing of ijābah (اِجَابَة = to accept prayer), likewise istiṭā'ah indicates iṭā'ah; thus istaṭā'ahu (اِسْتَطاعَهُ) means aṭā'ahu (أَطاعَهُ = 'he obeyed him'). And 's' and 't' in both verbal nouns denote their most well known theme, and that is 'to want something'; however it is related to an implied verb which is indicated by the described verb that emanates from the omitted one; 'he is capable of doing this thing' means as follows: 'He wanted it and intended that this thing should obey him, and so it obeyed him and followed his order'; likewise he answered Zayd means: 'Zayd asked for something and wanted it to accept his call, so it answered it'.

He further says: With this fine explanation we may understand the correctness of those exegetes' opinion who have said that "Is your Lord able" here means "Will your Lord obey", i.e. Will He do this work by His own free will and pleasure, without any compulsion? In short, it means that: Will your Lord be pleased to send down to us food from heaven, when we ask Him, or when you ask it from Him on our behalf?

COMMENT:

First: All that he has done is to correlate istaṭā'a with istajābah, and give to the former the later's meaning. But using analogy in langu-age is not allowed.

Second: That both istiṭā'ah and iṭā'ah are derived from ṭaw' which is opposite of kurh (dislike), does not necessarily mean that the stem's meaning will be preserved in all conjugational changes; because there are many basic words which have left their original meaning as a result of the changes in conjugation, for example: dharaba (he hit) and adhraba (he went on strike); qabila (he accepted), aqbala (he came forward), qabbala

(he kissed), qãbala (he encountered) istaqbala (he welcomed).

When the grammarians look at the basic stem of the verb while seeing its conjugational changes, their only aim is to find out how much of the basic meaning is sustained in all these changes; or does that meaning give way to another new one; they do not think that the original meaning should be preserved, even with all those changes. Understand it.

A word indicates the meaning that is understood from it by the live and prevalent usage, not by the literal connotation of its root-word. The word: istiṭã'ah has been used in more than forty places in the Divine Book, and everywhere it gives the meaning of ability. And the word: aṭã'ah is used in nearly seventy places, and everywhere it gives the meaning of obedience. Also, wherever the word: ṭaw' has been used it denotes 'opposite of dislike'. Now, how can the word: istiṭã'a be taken to mean iṭã'a, and this in its turn be taken to mean ṭaw'? And how can it be then claimed that ability here means pleasure or liking?

As for ajãba and istajãba, both have been used in the Qur'ãn in the same meaning; and istajãbah has been used several times more than ajãbah – the former is found in about thirty places while the latter is not seen in more than ten. How can aṭã'a and istaṭã'a can be analogized with it?

As for the both words having the same meaning, it only means that two aspects of theses words fit on one place: Ajãba means that the answer went over from the answerable to the questioner, and istajãba means that the one who is answerable asked for the reply from himself and passed it on to the questioner.

It is now clear that what that exegete has explained istajãbah with, is not correct; he has said: "Istajãba means that he asked for something and wanted it to give him the reply and it replied." But the paradigm of istif'ãl indicates demand of fa'ala, and not demand of af'ala. And it is clear.

Third: The context does not agree with this interpretation. If we accept that their question, "Is your Lord able to send down to us food from heaven?" only meant: 'Will your Lord be pleased that we ask Him (or you ask Him) to send down to us food from heaven?' and that their only aim from this question or from this coming down was that their faith be strengthened and their hearts be at ease, then why 'Īsã (a.s.) should admonish them and say: "Fear Allãh if you are believers?" And why should Allãh threaten him who would disbelieve afterwards from among them with a chastisement with which He would not chas-tise any one in the worlds? While the fact remains that they had not spoken except truth and had not put except a proper request; and Allāh Himself has said: . . . and ask Allāh of His grace; . . . (4:32)

QUR'ĀN: He said: "Fear Allāh if you are believers."*: ʻĪsā (a.s.) admonished them because apparently they had questioned the ability of his (a.s.)'s Lord to send down food from heaven; this speech creates doubt in any case. However, in view of the interpretation given by us, that the actual reason of this censure which ended with the severe threatening, was that they had asked for a sign when there was no need of it, and suggested what was tantamount to playing with divine signs; add to it their ugly style of the question which apparently showed that their hearts had not firmly believed in the power of Allāh; in this back-drop, the reason of ʻĪsā (a.s.)'s admonition becomes more manifest.

QUR'ĀN: They said: "We desire that we should eat of it and that our hearts should be at rest, and that we may know that you have indeed spoken the truth to us and that we may be of the witnesses to it."*: It appears from the context that they offered this excuse in order to save themselves from his censure. This talk apparently is related to their demand for a sign by sending down the food; it does not refer to any imagined doubt that they would have entertained regarding Allāh's unrestricted power. This is another evidence that they were so admonished because they had asked for a sign when it was not needed at all.

As for their words: "We desire that we should eat of it . . . we may be of the witnesses to it." The disciples have given four reasons for demanding this particular sign: -

First: Eating of it: They wanted to point out that they had not intended playing with the signs of Allāh; they wanted to eat of it, and it was a reasonable objective. We have said earlier that this explana-tion of the disciples was tantamount to their acceptance that they deserved the admonition by ʻĪsā (a.s.) and the severe threatening by Allāh to him who would disbelieve in the sign of the food.

Someone has said that they had mentioned eating in order to show their utmost need of food and that they could not find anything to satisfy their hunger.

Yet others have said that they meant to say: that we should be blessed by eating it.

However, you are aware that neither of the above reasons can be inferred from merely the word, eating. Had they intended either of the two reasons, which would really remove the censure, it was necess-ary for them to mention it clearly. As they did not mention any such thing in spite of its necessity in this context, obviously they had used eating in its general sense, inasmuch as it was a reasonable purpose, and it was one part of their objective in suggesting the coming down of the food.

Second: Tranquillity of hearts, that their hearts should be at rest, by the removal of notions, which were inconsistent with sincerity and presence.

Third: To know that ʻĪsã (a.s.) had indeed spoken the truth in conveying the divine message to them. Knowledge here means that certainty which comes into the heart when devilish notions and insinuations are removed from it.

Or, as someone has said, the knowledge that he (a.s.) had spoken to them the truth in what he (a.s.) had promised them as the fruits of faith, like acceptance of invocations.

However, this interpretation looks unlikely because the disciples had not asked for coming down of the food except through ʻĪsã (a.s.)'s invocation, i.e. as a miracle from him (a.s.), and they had already seen numerous signs and miracles on his (a.s.)'s hand; because he (a.s.) was always accompanied by great divine signs; he was not sent to his community, nor had he (a.s.) put a call to them except with the signs of his Lord; so they were always seeing the fruits of his faith in the form of the acceptance of his invocation – if the fruit means acceptance of his (a.s.)'s invocation. But if the fruit is taken to mean acceptance of their own invocation, then [it would be against the context, because] they had not demanded coming down of the sign through their own invoca-tion, and it did not come down but by ʻĪsã (a.s.)'s invocation.

Fourth: That they might be of the witnesses thereof, wherever witnessing would be needed, like giving witness before the disbelievers and on the Day of Resurrection before Allãh. So, witnessing here is unrestricted. Also, possibly it may refer only to the witnessing before Allãh, as appears in their talk quoted by Allãh, inter alia: "Our Lord! We believe in what Thou hast revealed and we follow the Messenger, so write us down with those who bear witness." (3:53)

In short, while pleading in their defence, they added some beautiful and likeable factors to their other objective, i.e. partaking from heavenly food. They did so in order to remove the ugliness from their demanding a sign after already seeing sufficient signs; then ʻĪsã (a.s.)

agreed to their demand after their persistence.

QUR'ĀN: 'Īsā the son of Maryam said: "O Allāh, our Lord! Send down to us food from heaven which should be to us an ever-recur-ring happiness, to the first of us and to the last of us, and a sign from Thee, and grant us sustenance, and Thou art the best of providers.": He (a.s.) joined his own self with them in asking for the food; and began by calling to his Lord with a comprehensive word: "O Allāh, our Lord!" They had said: "Is your Lord able . . .", but he changed it so that the address would agree with the prayer.

This prayer is unique amongst all the prayers and invocations of the prophets (peace be upon them), quoted in the Qur'ān. While all others begin with the word: 'My Lord' or 'Our Lord'; this alone begins with: "O Allāh, our Lord!" It is only because of the delicacy of the situation and the fright of appraisal. On the other hand, similar open-ing addresses are found in the various types of praises quoted in the Qur'ān: Say: "Praise be to Allāh . . ." (27:59); Say: "O Allāh, Master of Kingdom! . . ." (3:26); Say: "O Allāh! Originator of the heavens and the earth, . . ." (39:46).

Then he (a.s.) mentioned a heading for this sent down food, which would serve as a reason for his and his companions' request that it be sent down, and it is that it should be to them an ever-recurring happiness, to him and his people. The disciples had not mentioned in their demand that they wanted it to be an exclusive festival to them. But he (a.s.) asked for it in a general style and moulded it into a good mould, in order that it would not be thought as a demand for a sign while there already were so many great divine signs before their eyes and within their observation. In this way, it would become a demand likeable by Allāh, and not in clash with His majesty and greatness; because a festival by its very nature unites the word, revives the com-munity, enlivens the celebrants and is announced whenever the grandeur of religion returns.

That is why he said: "an ever-recurring happiness, to the first of us and to the last of us," i.e. the first group of our nation and the other ones who would join them later – as the context shows. Because 'īd (عِيْدُ = festival) is derived from 'awd (عَوْدُ = return); so it would be 'īd only if it returns time and again, in descendants after ancestors without any limit.

This festival exclusively belonged to the ummah of 'Īsā (a.s.), and as explained earlier, this type of sign too was reserved for them.

"and a sign from Thee": First he puts up the question of 'īd, and it was a good and beautiful thing free from all blemish; then he fol-lowed it by its being a sign from Allãh. It was an extra benefit added to the main objective; it was not intended to be the only objective. Had it been the only purpose, i.e. its being a sign asking for, it would have led to an unwanted result; because all good advantages which could be intended from it, were easily obtainable through the signs which the disciples and others were seeing from him (a.s.) every day.

"and grant us sustenance, and Thou art the best of providers": It is another benefit which he counted as resulting from that invocation of ʻīd, although it is not the intended purpose. The disciples had asked for it as the main intended purpose in itself, as they had said: "We desire that we should eat of it . . ." Thus, they had mentioned it as the thing intended for itself, and mentioned it before other items. But ʻĪsã (a.s.) counted it as unintended for itself and put it at the end; also, he changed the word, eating, with that of sustenance, and added after it the phrase: "'and Thou art the best of providers.'"

What they had treated as the main purpose, has been relegated by ʻĪsã (a.s.) as a resulting benefit, only. Its proof may be seen in the fact that he (a.s.) first prayed for himself and his whole ummah the granting of ʻīd, which he had added to their suggestion. In this way, its becoming a sign of Allãh and a sustenance, became two attributes which were reserved to some of them excluding the others, like a resulting benefit which is not all-encompassing.

When you will look at his (a.s.)'s fine and brilliant good man-ners vis-à-vis his Lord, you will be astonished. See how he (a.s.) took the wording of their demand, then added to it, omitted from it, altered the sequence and changed and preserved, until their original talk which was totally unfit to be presented before Allãh, turned into a beautiful speech containing the good manners of servitude. Just meditate on the proviso of his (a.s.)'s speech, you will be amazed.

QUR'ÃN: Allãh said: "Surely I will send it down to you, but whoever shall disbelieve afterwards from among you, surely I will chastise him with a chastisement with which I will not chastise any one among the nations."*: The people of Medina and Syria as well as ʻÃṣim have recited it, munazziluhã (مُنَزِّلُهَا) with intensified pronunciation, and the others have recited munziluha (مُنْزِلُهَا) without intensification – as has been described in Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn. And the latter is more appro-priate, because inzãl (إِنْزَال) – from which munziluhã (مُنْزِلُهَ) is derived – denotes being sent down all at once, and the food was sent down in this very manner. As for tanzīl (تَنْزِيْل) – from which munazziluhã is derived – it is generally used for gradual coming down, as described earlier repeatedly.

The phrase: "Surely I will send it down to you" is an unambigu-ous promise to send the food down, especially when we see its struc-ture: the original phrase literally means: I am its sender down, i.e. it uses the paradigm of nomen agentis, and not of a verb; and it inevi-tably means that the food was indeed sent down to them.

Some exegetes have said that it was not sent down, as is quoted in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr and Majma'u 'l-bayãn, from al-Ḥasan and Mujãhid that they said: "It did not come down; because when they heard of the condition they abandoned their request and said: 'We do not want it nor do we need it'; so it did not come down."

But the fact is that the verse clearly shows that it was sent down, as it contains clear promise of its coming down, and far be it from Allãh that He should magnanimously give a clear promise when He knew that they would give up their demand so it would not be sent down; the promise given in the verse is quite clear, and the condition men-tioned in it says that those who would disbelieve after its coming down would be given unparallelled chastisement. In other words, the verse contains unconditional promise of sending the food down, and then it attaches the chastisement to disbelief. It does not say that it would be sent down provided they accepted the chastisement for disbelief, so that the promise would be cancelled if they did not accept the said condition, and then the food would not be sent if they gave up their demand. Understand it.

In any case, the divine promise to send the food conjoined with severe threat of disbelievers' chastisement was not a rejection of ʻĪsã (a.s.)'s prayer, rather it apparently accepts his invocation. However, as this acceptance of the prayer, in this context, would have apparently shown that that sign would be an unrestricted mercy which would be enjoyed by the first of them and the last of them, Allãh restricted it with the attached proviso. In short, it shows that this festival, which is exclusively reserved to them, would not benefit all of them, it would be beneficial only to the believers among them who would continue in their belief, but as for the disbelievers they would be harmed by it, extreme harm.

Thus, these two verses in their style are like the verses 2:124 and 7:155-6. All these verses contain a general and unrestricted prayer and a restricted acceptance. [Those verses are as follows.]

And (remember) when his Lord tried Ibrãhīm with certain words, and he fulfilled them. He said: "Surely I am going to make you an Imãm for men." He (Ibrãhīm) said: "And of my offspring?" He said: "My covenant shall not include the unjust." (2:124).

". . . Thou art our Guardian, therefore forgive us and have mercy on us, and Thou art the best of the forgivers. And ordain for us good in this world and in the hereafter, for surely we proceed to Thee." He said: "(As for) My chastisement, I will afflict with it whom I please, and My mercy encompasses all things; so I will ordain it for those who fear Allãh and pay the zakãt*, and those who believe in Our signs."* (7:155-6).

You have understood from the above that the actual reason for this threatened chastisement (which would be restricted to them) is that they had demanded a sign of a type that would be reserved to them and no other nation would share in it with them. So, when that demand was granted they were threatened on disbelieving in it a chastisement that no one else would share with them, just like the distinction granted to them.

It is apparent from it that al-ʻãlamīn (اَلْعَالَمِيْنَ = worlds, nations) refers to all nations, not only those who were present at that time, because it is related to those whom they distinguished among the people; and it covers all nations, not only those who were in the days of ʻĪsã (a.s.) from among the nations of the earth.

Also, it is clear that although the sentence: "surely I will chastise him with a chastisement with which I will not chastise any one among the nations", is a very tough threat of a miserable punishment, yet the talk does not say that the chastisement would be above all punish-ments and retributions in hardship and agony; it rather says that the punishment would be unique which they alone would be afflicted with among the nations.

TRADITIONS

Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) explained the phrase: "Is your Lord able" in these words, "Are you able to pray to your Lord?" (Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn)

The author says: This meaning has been narrated through Sunnī chains from some companions and their followers, like ʻÃishah and Saʻīd ibn Jubayr. It returns to the meaning which we have shown earlier, because the querry about ʻĪsã (a.s.)'s power can only be correct if it refers to his ability from the view of reason and welfare, not about his actual power.

ʻĪsā al-ʻAlawī narrates from his father from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said, "The table (of food) that was sent to the Children of Israel was suspended by golden chains; there were nine fish and nine loaves of bread on it." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

The author says: In another version there is nine anwān (أَنْوَان = plural of nūn نُون) in place of aḥwatah (أَحْوَتَـه = plural of ḥūt حُوت); both have the same meaning, fish.

ʻAmmār ibn Yāsir narrates from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said, "The table came (with) bread and meat. It was because they had asked ʻĪsā (a.s.) for an inexhaustible food which they would eat. He (The Prophet) said, 'It was said to them, "Surely it will stay with you as long as you do not act treacherously, do not hide it and do not lift from it; but if you did so you will be punished."' He (The Prophet) said, 'But the day did not come to its end until they hid it, lifted from it and acted treacherously.'" (Majmaʻu 'l-bayān)

The author says: [as-Suyūṭī] has narrated it in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from at-Tirmidhī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Ibnu 'l-Anbārī, Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh, from ʻAmmār ibn Yāsir from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and there is at its end the phrase: "so they were transformed into apes and swine."

Also, he writes in the same ad-Durru 'l-manthūr: Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated a similar tradition in another way from ʻAmmār ibn Yāsir as a mawqūf tradition. at-Tirmidhī has said that the waqf is more correct.

What this report says that they had asked for an inexhaustible food which they would eat, does not fully agree with the verse, as appears from their words quoted herein, and that we may be of the witnesses to it, because a food that is never exhausted does not need any witness to testify for it – except if it means testifying before Allāh on the Day of Resurrection.

Also, the report of their transformation into apes and swines, as what is apparent from the context, is the punishment with which they were threatened. But here it leaves open another door of argument. Because the divine words: "surely I will chastise him with a chastise-ment with which I will not chastise any one among the nations", appar-ently show that they would be meted out with an exclusive punishment, not shared by any others; while the Qur'ãn clearly mentions that other people too were transformed into apes. Allãh says: "Be apes, despised and hated." (2:65). And it is narrated in this connection through some chains of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.), that they were transformed into swines.

al-Fuḍayl ibn Yasãr narrates from Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) that he heard him saying, "Swines were from the people of 'Īsã, they had asked for coming down of the table and then did not believe, so Allãh transformed them into swines." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

'Abdu 'ṣ-Ṣamad ibn Bandãr said, "I heard Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) saying, 'Swines were a community of bleachers, they denied the table, so they were transformed into swines.'" (ibid.)

The author says: It is narrated in al-Kãfī from Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyã, from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad, from Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ash'arī from Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍã (a.s.) that he said, "Elephant is transformed, it was a fornicating king; wolf is transformed, it was a cuckold Bedouin; rabbit is transformed, it was a woman who was dis-loyal to her husband and did not take bath after her menstruation; bat is transformed, it used to steal dates of the people; apes and swines are groups of the Children of Israel who had exceeded the limits of the Sabbath; eel and lizard were a group of the Children of Israel who did not believe when the table was sent down to 'Īsã son of Maryam, so they became disoriented, one group fell in the sea and another in the land; mouse is a debaucherer; scorpion was a slanderer; and bear, lizard and wasp were meat-sellers who defrauded in measure."

This tradition does not go against the preceding two traditions, because it is possible that some of them were changed into swines, while some others were changed into eel and lizard. However, it is not free from another difficulty, as it mentions that the people of the Sabbath were changed into apes and swines, while this verse as well as a similar one in the chapter seven, mention, only their transform-ation into apes, and their context rejects their transformation into any other shape.

COMMENTARY

It is a sort of a dialogue between Allãh and His messenger ‘Īsã son of Maryam, about what the Christians say regarding ‘Īsã (a.s.). It appears that the purpose of these verses is to affirm what he (a.s.) had confessed and described about himself in his life of this world: That he had no right to claim for himself what was not 'his' anyhow; that he indeed was in the sight of Allãh, which does not sleep, nor does it turn aside; that he had never crossed the limits laid down by Allãh. He had not said except that which Allãh had enjoined him to say, and he had remained engaged in the task, which Allãh had given him – it was the subject of 'witnessing'. And Allãh has affirmed his truthfulness in what he said regarding the right of Lordship and servitude.

In this way, the verses fit the aim and objective for which this chapter was revealed; that is the description of the right laid down by Allãh over His servants, that they should fulfil the covenant they have made, and should not break it; it is not proper for them to wander around as they want, and to graze pleasantly wherever they wish. Because they have not been given such right by their Lord, nor do they have such power on their own. Allãh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is in them; and He has power over all things. And on this note the chapter comes to its end.

QUR’ÃN: And when Allãh will say: "O ‘Īsã son of Maryam! Did you say to the people: 'Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allãh'?": "When" is an adverb of time related to an omitted but implied verb which is understood from the context – and it indicates the Day of Resurrection; as Allãh describes: Allãh will say: "This is the day when their truth shall benefit the truthful ones;" and ‘Īsã himself shall say: "and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them, but when Thou didst cause me to die, Thou wert the watcher over them".

The verse mentions Maryam with the attribute of motherhood; it says: "Take me and my mother for two gods", instead of saying: 'Take me and Maryam for two gods'. It points to their most important proof for ʻĪsã's divinity, i.e. his being born of her without a father; thus the sonship and motherhood are the basic ingredients in this matter; therefore mentioning him and his mother was more effective than the mention of ʻĪsã and Maryam.

"Dūn" (دُوْنْ = low, inadequate) is used ultimately in the sense of 'besides'. ar-Rãghib says: "Dūn is used to indicate one who is unable to do something; someone has said that it is the reversed form of dunuw (دُنُو = proximity) adwan (أَدْوَنْ) means danīy (دَنِی = near); Allãh says: Do not take for intimate friends from among others than your own people; . . . [3:118], i.e. he who does not attain your position in religosity; or, in kinship; the word of Allãh: . . . and forgives what is besides that . . . [4:48], i.e. lesser than that; or apart from that; and the two meanings are concomitant. And the divine words: 'Did you say to the people: "Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allãh"?', i.e. other than Allãh."

The phrase: "besides Allãh", has been used in the Qur'ãn mostly in the sense of partnership, and not for independent divinity. When it condemns taking one, two or more gods besides Allãh, it means taking someone other than Allãh a partner of Allãh in divinity – it does not mean taking someone else for a god and denying the divinity of Allãh: Surely it would be a foolish talk without any sense, because the one taken as god would be the true God and other than Him would be ne-gated. Thus, it would turn into a verbal dispute about some attributes. For example, if someone says that God is the Christ, and negated God for Christ, it would mean that he affirms the existence of God but attaches to Him human characteristics of the Christ. Or, if he said that the idols or lords of the idols are gods and negated the existence of Allãh, then he admits that there is a god for the universe; thus he af-firms the existence of Allãh, but has ascribed to Him the attributes of plurality and multitude; thus he makes partner for Allãh. Or says as the Christians say that Allãh is the third of the three, i.e., one who is three and three who is one.

Likewise, whoever says that the beginning of the world is time or nature and denies that there is a god for it, he indeed affirms that there is a Maker for the world and he is Allãh, but he has ascribed to Him the attributes of defect and transience.

And whoever denies any beginning for this wonderful system and rejects any causality and effectiveness, in spite of the clear decision of his nature, he indeed affirms that there is a world firmly fixed which is not subject of denial or non-existence at all; in other words, the world has an essential existence. Now, the protector of its existence and permanence is either the world itself – which cannot be, because its parts are subject to change and cessation – or another one – and He is Allãh who has His attributes of perfection.

It is thus clear that Allãh does not admit negation in any way, except in apparent wording that is devoid of any understandable meaning.

The basic factor in all this is that man proves the existence of Allãh because of the general need felt in the world for the One who should furnish his existence's requirements and manage the affairs of his system, and then he would affirm the particulars of his existence. Whatever he would affirm for fulfilling this need, he is Allãh. Then if he affirms another god or more gods than one, it will be seen that either he has erred in specification of His attributes and apostatized in His names, or has affirmed for Him a partner or several partners. But to deny His being and affirm someone other than Him, would be a senseless exercise.

Now, it becomes clear that the phrase, two gods besides Allãh, means two partners of Allãh beside Himself. Even if it is accepted that the phrase does not indicate partnership in any way, we shall say that its meaning does not go beyond believing in two gods who in quiddity are other than Allãh; but it is silent about its being joined with denial of Allãh's divinity or its affirmation; no word of the verse speaks about it, it is understood from outside. The Christians do not deny His divinity although they take the Christ and his mother as two gods besides Allãh.

Some people have found it hard to explain the verse because the Christians do not believe in the divinity of the virgin Maryam; and they have mentioned several points for explaining it.

But it should be kept in mind that the verse mentions their taking her as a goddess, and not that they believe in her as a goddess. Taking someone as a god is quite different from believing in his divinity – except as a concomitant. Taking someone as a god is applicable to submitting to him with humility. Allãh says: Have you then con-sidered him who takes his base desire for his god? (45:23). And this theme is narrated from the ancients of Christians, and observed in their descendants.

al-Ãlūsī has written in Rūḥu 'l-ma'ãnī: Verily Abū Ja'far al-Imãmī has narrated from some Christians that in the past there was a sect called Maryamiyyah; they believed about Maryam that she was a goddess.

[Rashīd Riḍā] has said in Tafsīru 'l-Manār: As for their taking the Christ as a god, it has already been mentioned in several places in explanation of this chapter; and as for his mother, her worship was agreed upon in the Eastern and the Western Churches after Constantine; then the Protestant denomination (which appeared many centuries after the advent of Islam) rejected her worship.[2]

This worship offered to Maryam, mother of Christ, by Christians, is of various modes: There is a ṣalāt which contains prayer, praise, call for help and intercession; there is also a fast ascribed to her and named after her; and all this is joined with humility to her remembrance, and to her pictures and images, combined with the belief of her authority emanating from the unseen world. That authority, according to their belief, enables her to bring benefit and harm in this world and the next, either by herself or through her son. They have clearly declared that it is incumbent to worship her. However, we know not of any of their sects which would use the word, goddess, for her; of course they name her, 'Mother of god'; and some sects make it clear that it is used in its real, not metaphorical, sense.

The Qur'ān says here that they had taken 'Īsā and his mother for two gods, and the taking is other than naming; taking them for gods occurs when they worship them, and this certainly happens in their case. Allāh has said in another verse that they say: Surely Allāh, He is the Masīḥ son of Maryam; . . . (5:72). But that is something else. And the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has explained the divine words: They have taken their doctors of law and their monks for Lords besides Allāh, . . . [9:31], that they followed them in what they allowed or forbade, not that they called them Lords.

The first clear declaration that I saw about the Christians really worshipping Maryam, was in the book, as-Sawā'ī, from among the books of the Greek Orthodox, and I had seen this book in a monastry called Dayru 't-Talmīd, when I was first admitted in the educational Institute; and the Catholic declare openly and take pride of it.

al-Jazwīt had decorated in Beirut their magazine, al-Mashriq (no.9, year 7) with Maryam's picture and coloured designs, it was done as a souvenir to celebrate the Golden Jubilee at the end of fifty years since the

[2] The belief that the Christ was a messenger and not a god is now spreading among American Christians these days – and it is 1958 C.E. The scholar H.G. Wells has written in his Short History: This worship renderred by general Christians to the Christ and his mother does not agree with the teachings of the Christ, because he had forbidden, as quoted in the Gospel according to St. Mark, the worship of any one other than the One Allāh. (Vide pp.526 & 539 of the said book.) (Author's note) announcement of the Pope Pius IX that the virgin Maryam had become pregnant without pollution of sin; and in that very issue they confirmed that the Eastern as well as the Western Churches wor-shipped Maryam.

Of the same theme is the word of father Luis Shaykhū, in an article of his regarding the Eastern Churches: "Verily the worship by Armenian Church of the chaste virgin, the Mother of Allãh, is certainly a well-known affair." He also writes: "The Coptic Church is distinguished by its worship of the Blessed Virgin, the Mother of Allãh."

Then he quotes a part of an essay by father Inistas al-Karamli published in the Catholic magazine al-Mashriq (no.14, year 5) of Beirut. He writes under the heading, "Antiquity of the Virgin's worship", after mentioning the wording of Genesis, regarding the enmity of the serpent with the woman and her offspring, and interpreting the woman as the Virgin: "Don't you see that you do not find in this text anything clearly pointing to the Virgin until there came that great prophet, Elia the living, and he brought forth the worship of the Virgin from the cornor of symbolism and ambiguity to the world of clarity and explanation."

Then he interprets this clarity and explanation by what is written in the Kings III (according to the Catholic arrangement) that when Elia was with his servant at the summit of Karaml, he ordered him seven times to look towards the sea. After the seventh observation, the ser-vant informed him that he saw a cloud about the size of a man's palm rising from the sea.

The essay-writer says: "From that rising (the first rising of the cloud[3]) I say: 'Is it anything except the picture of Maryam, according to what the exegetes have established, rather it is the picture of the foe-tus without the original sin'." Then he says: "This is the origin of the Virgin's worship in the esteemed orient; and it goes back to the tenth century B.C.; and the excellence in this matter goes to this great pro-phet Elia." Again he says: "That is why the ancesters of the Karmalites were the first to believe in the Lord Jesus after the apostles and the deciples, and they were the first to establish a place of worship for the Virgin after her being taken away to the heaven with soul and body."[4]

QUR'ÃN: He will say: "Glory be to Thee, it did not befit me that I

[3] It points to the cloud which the servant had seen rising from the sea. (Author's note)

[4] We have copied it at length, because a meditating scholar may find in it the type of their 'logic' with which they affirm her woship, and he will also see some of their recklessness in religion. (Author's note)

should say what I had no right to* (say); . . . Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things: This and the next verse contain reply of ʻĪsã son of Maryam (a.s.) of the question he was asked; and he (a.s.) has adopted in it an amazing manner and etiquette:

He began by glorifying God, when he (a.s.) suddenly and unexpectedly was confronted with what was not proper to be ascribed to that Great and Sublime Being – i.e. the people taking them two gods besides Allãh, as His partners. It is a good manner of servitude that the servant should glorify his Lord whenever he hears what is not proper to be ascribed to God or what does not enter into mind in this con-nection. It is this factor that Allãh has trained His servants in the Qur'ãn: And they say: "The Beneficent God has taken to Himself a son." Glory be to Him. . . . (21:26); And they ascribe daughters to Allãh, glory be to Him; . . . (16:57).

Then he turned to refute what was implied in the question that it could be ascribed to him. That he would have told the people to take him and his mother for two gods besides Allãh. He did not only reject it in itself, but refuted its cause to put emphasis on deanthropomorphism. Had he said: 'I did not say (or do) it', it would have implied that although such an action or talk was possible but he did not do it; but when he refuted its cause and said: 'It did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say)', it refuted the basis of such talk; this refutation of such a right also more intensely refutes what depends on it. Let us suppose that a master says to his servant: 'Why did you do what I had not told you to do?' Now, if the servant says: 'I did not do it', it would refute what was expected to happen; but if he said, 'I am rather unable to do it', it would refute it by refuting its cause; it would be rejection of its basic possibility, let alone its actual occurance.

"it did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say)": If the verb, mã yakūn (مَا يَكُونُ = it does not happen) is a defective verb, then its subject is "that I should say", and the predicate is "what I had no right to (say)", and "L" (لِی) denotes possession. The meaning then will be: 'I do not possess what I was not given pos-session of, and it does not befit me to speak without any right.' On the other hand, if this verb is 'complete', then the word, 'me', is related to it, and the phrase: "that I should say . . .", is its subject; and then the meaning will be: 'It does not occur to me to speak without any right.' And the former is nearer interpretation. In any case, it negates the action by negating its cause.

"if I had said it, Thou wouldst indeed have known it": It is second rejection of the question asked – not on its own but through rejection of its concomitant; because if such words were uttered, Allãh would certainly know it, because He it is from whom nothing is hid-den, neither in the earth nor in the heavens, and He watches every soul as to what it earns, and He encompasses everything.

This speech of ‘Īsã (a.s.), to begin with, presents the talk with its proof, and does not offer mere claim; and then indicates that in all his talks and actions he always kept regard of Allãh's knowledge, not caring whether other creatures of Him knew it or not, as he had no-thing to do with them.

In other words, asking questions is in order in a matter in which there is a possibility of being ignorant; so it is intended for removal of ignorance and imparting of knowledge – either for the asker himself, if he is ignorant of the reality, or to some other person, if the asker is knowledgeable but he intends that others too should become aware of the reality. It is this latter reason to which the type of the question found in the divine speech is attributed. ‘Īsã (a.s.)'s reply at this junc-ture: "if I had said it, Thou wouldst indeed have known it", turns the affair to His knowledge and indicates that he does not refer anything of his words and deeds except to the divine knowledge.

Then he said: "Thou knowest what is in my mind, and I do not know what is in Thy mind": This indicates the purity of the divine knowledge from mixing with ignorance. Although the sentence, in it-self, denotes praise; but praise is not intended here, because it is not the place of prise; rather it is the place of getting rid of the attributions that were ascribed to Him.

His words: "Thou knowest what is in my mind," elaborates the comprehensiveness of the knowledge mentioned in the phrase: "if I had said it, Thou wouldst have known it." It shows that Allãh's knowl-edge of our deeds – and He is the King, the Truth on that day – is not like the knowledge of our kings about the condition of their subjects; as they receive reports from various parts of their kingdom, and con-sequently they know things in part and remain ignorant of other parts. Allãh is the Knower of subtilities, Aware of all things, including the soul of ‘Īsã son of Maryam in particular.

Even then, he could not fully elaborate the attributes of His knowledge. Allãh knows everything, not as one of us knows about someone else, and someone else knows about one of us. He knows what He knows by encompassing the object; while nothing encompasses Him, and they cannot comprehend anything of His knowledge. Thus He, the Sublime, is God, without any limit, and everyone beside Him is limited, determined, which cannot transcend the boundary of his limited soul. That is why he (a.s.) added to it another sentence: "Thou knowest what is in my mind, and I do not know what is in Thy mind."

As for his words: "surely Thou art the great Knower of the un-seen things," it gives the reason of his words: "Thou knowest what is in my mind . . ." It removes the possible misunderstanding that the matter of knowledge in the sentence: "Thou knowest what is in my mind, and I do not know what is in Thy mind," is confined to what is between him and his Lord, and does not encompass all things. So, by saying: "surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things," he made it clear that the complete knowledge of all unseen things is reserved for Allãh. Whatever knowledge is held by anything and is unseen by other things, it is indeed known by Allãh and He encompasses it.

It follows that nothing is aware of the unseen thing of Allãh or of other than Allãh's – which Allãh knows – because everything is created and limited and does not transcend its own phases. Thus, Allãh is the great Knower of all unseen things, and nothing besides Him knows any of the unseen things, neither whole nor in part.

Moreover, if any of the unseen things of Allãh was encompassed by a thing; now if Allãh encompasses it, then that encompassing thing would not be encompassing in reality, but it would be encompassed by Allãh: Allãh in His pleasure has given it the power to encompass some of the things owned by Him, without this latter thing going out of His possession, as Allãh says: . . . and they cannot comprehend any thing out of His knowledge except what He pleases; . . . (2:255)

If Allãh were not to comprehend what He comprehends, He would become subject to a limit, and thus would become a created thing; far exalted is He from such things!

QUR'ÃN: "I did not say to them aught save what Thou didst enjoin me with: 'That worship Allãh, my Lord and your Lord': After first refuting the talk in question by rejecting its cause, he now refutes it by explaining his responsibility which he had not transgressed. So, he said: "I did not say to them aught save what Thou didst enjoin me with . . ." He used restricted mode of speech through negative followed by positive, in order to give reply to the question asked, by rebutting it, i.e. the speech: 'Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allãh.' Then he elaborated what he was enjoined with by Allãh: "'That worship Allãh'"; than described Allãh saying: "'my Lord and your Lord'." It was done so that there should not remain any shade of misunder-standing and it should be clearly known that he is a servant and a mess-enger who calls to Allãh, his Lord and the Lord of all the people, alone who has no partner.

In such a clear style ‘Īsã son of Maryam (a.s.) used to call the people to monotheism, as the Qur’ãn quotes him as saying in other places too: Surely Allãh is my Lord and your Lord, therefore worship Him; this is the right path. (43:64); And surely Allãh is my Lord and your Lord, therefore worship Him; this is the right path. (19:36).

QUR’ÃN: "and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them, but when Thou didst cause me to die, Thou wert the watcher over them, and Thou art witness of all things: Now, he (a.s.) mentioned the second responsibility entrusted to him by Allãh, and that was to be a witness of his people's deeds, as Allãh says: . . . and on the Day of Resurrection he (‘Īsã) shall be a witness over them. (4:159).

He (a.s.) declares: 'I had only two responsibilities towards them, to convey the message to them and to be a witness of their deeds; as for the messengership, I performed it in clearest possible terms; and as for the witnessing, I did not transgress the task You had enjoined me with; so I am free from the blame that I might have told them to take me and my mother for two gods besides Allãh.'

"but when Thou didst cause me to die, Thou wert the watcher over them, and Thou art witness of all things": ar-Raqūb and ar-riqãbah (اَلرَّقُوب ، اَلرقابَة = protection, preservation); in this context, it denotes preservation of deeds. The word, witness, has been changed to 'watcher', to avoid repetition because the next phrase contains this word: "and Thou art witness of all things," and there was no reason why this word especially should be used second time.

The clause: "Thou wert the watcher over them," denotes restriction. It follows that Allãh was the witness as long as ‘Īsã (a.s.) was the witness, and He continued to be witness after him. So his (a.s.)'s witnessing was a mediation in witnessing, not an independent witnessing; it is like all other divine arrangements by which He has given some servants agency of some functions, while He is the real manager of everything, like sustenance, giving life and death, preservation, call and guidance, etc. There are numerous noble verses showing this aspect, which need not be quoted here.

That is why ‘Īsã (a.s.), after saying: "but when Thou didst cause me to die, Thou wert the watcher over them," added the next clause: "and Thou art witness of all things." This style was used to denote that his being a witness over his people's deeds, which he continued to per-form as long as he was among them, was a small part of the general, comprehensive witnessing, i.e. the witnessing of Allāh over a thing; because Allāh is the witness over the individual things and their activities, including the deeds of His servants together with the deeds of the people of ʻĪsā (a.s.) as long as he was among them and after his death, and He is the witness together with other witnesses and the witness without other witnesses.

It is clear from the above that the restriction is true concerning Allāh even when other witnesses offer their testimonies, because ʻĪsā (a.s.) has restricted the testimony after his death to Allāh, although Allāh had His other witnesses after ʻĪsā (a.s.)'s death among His servants and messengers, and he (a.s.) was well aware of it.

And its proof may be seen in the good news he (a.s.) gave of the advent of the Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.), as quoted in the Qur'ān: And when ʻĪsā son of Maryam said: "O Children of Israel! Surely I am the messenger of Allāh to you, verifying that which is before me of the Tawrāt, and giving the good news of a messenger who will come after me, his name being Aḥmad;" . . . (61:6); and the Qur'ān has clearly mentioned the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) being a witness, as Allāh says: . . . and bring you as a witness over these? (4:41).

Moreover, Allāh has quoted him (a.s.) as describing this restriction: "but when Thou didst cause me to die, Thou wert the watcher over them," and has not refuted it. So, Allāh is the witness, and no one else, in spite of there being witnesses. It means that the reality of witnessing belongs to Allāh, in the same way as every perfection and goodness belongs to Allāh; whatever perfection, goodness or beauty He gives to others, it emanates from His bestowal of possession, without this bestowal making Him divested of possession or causing negation of His ownership. You should meditate on various aspects what we have said.

It is clear from ʻĪsā (a.s.)'s condition described in these two verses, that he is innocent of what had been said about him, and that he has no responsibility at all regarding their deeds. That is why he (a.s.) has ended his speech on the words: "If Thou shouldst chastise them . . . surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise."

QUR'ĀN: "If Thou shouldst chastise them, then surely they are Thy servants; and if Thou shouldst forgive them, then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise."*: When it became clear, through his proofs, that he had no responsibility towards the people except conveyance of the message and delivery of the testimony, and that he did not do except that and did not cross the limit to what he had no right to, and thus he was not liable to what they uttered of the words of disbelief, then it is obvious that he has nothing to do with the divine judgement concerning them and their Lord. That is why he has started this new topic without any conjunctive or any indication that it branches from the preceding speech.

Thus, the verse is almost capable of being put in place of foregoing explanation. Its meaning: 'I am not responsible for the ugly polytheism in which they fell down, and I did not interfere in any of their affairs, so that I should take part with them in the judgement between Thee and them in whatever Thou pleasest, and in Thy decree about them as Thou wishest. They alone should face whatever Thou doest about them. If Thou shouldst chastise them, as Thou hast decided about those who ascribe a partner to Thee, by sending them into the Fire, then surely they are Thy servants, and in Thy hand alone is the manage-ment of their affairs, and Thou hast the right to be angry with them, because Thou art the Master in reality, and to the master belong his servants' affairs. And if Thou shouldst forgive them, by erasing the trace of this great injustice, then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise, to Thee belongs the right of power and wisdom, and a mighty one (the one who owns the seriousness and power, not found in others), especially if he is wise (who does not take any step except when it is proper) has the authority to forgive the great injustice; obviously when power and wisdom are joined together in anyone, do not allow any other power to stand against him, nor any obscurity in whatever he decides.'

The foregoing explanation makes it clear that: -

First: the word of ‘Īsã (a.s.): "then surely they are Thy servants," has the force of saying: 'then surely Thou art their true Master', as we see in the Qur’ãnic style that it brings the names of Allãh after describing His actions, as is seen in the end of this verse.

Second: The clause: "then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise," is not meant for restriction; the detached personal pronoun of second person singular, and addition of al (ال) to the predicate are brought for emphasis. The meaning then will be as follows: 'Surely Thy Power and Wisdom cannot be doubted about, and nobody has any right to object if Thou wert to forgive them.

Third: The backdrop of this speech, where ʻĪsā son of Maryam (a.s.) was talking with his Lord, let us say, face to face, was the situ-ation where the divine Majesty was manifest, the Majesty that nothing can stand to it; and it demanded that it should be faced with utmost humility of servitude, and the servant must avoid interference in any affair with invocation or question. That is why he (a.s.) said: "and if Thou shouldst forgive them, then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise." Mark that he did not say: 'Thou art the Forgiving, the Merciful.' It was because the radiance of the overpowering sign of the divine Majesty and authority, which subdues everything, does not leave any way for the servant except to seek refuge in Him with all the humility of his servitude, and misery of total slavery; and to act affably in this situation is a great sin.

As for the words of Ibrāhīm addressed to his Lord: then whoever follows me, he is surely of me, and whoever disobeys me, Thou surely art Forgiving, Merciful; it is an invocation; and a servant has full right to incite the divine mercy in any way possible.

QUR'ĀN: Allāh will say: "This is the day when their truth shall benefit the truthful ones: This is the confirmation of the truth of ʻĪsā son of Maryam (a.s.) in an illusive way; Allāh has not declared his name, but it is known from the context.

This truth of the truthful ones refers to their truth in this world; because Allāh says after this sentence: they shall have gardens beneath which rivers flow to abide in them forever. Obviously, it elaborates the reward of their truth near Allāh – it is the benefit of the truth which will return to them; while the next world's deeds and conditions – including the truth of the people of the next world – will not bring any benefit as reward. In other words, no reward is given on the deeds and conditions of the next world, as it is given on this world's deeds and conditions, because there is no taklīf (تَكْلِيْف = religious responsibility) in the next world, and reward is a branch of the taklīf. Obviously, the next world is a house of reckoning, reward and punishment, in the same way as this world is a house of action and responsibility. Allāh says: . . . on the day when the reckoning shall come to pass! (14:41); . . . today you shall be rewarded for what you did. (45:28); . . . This life of the world is only a (passing) enjoyment, and surely the here-after is the abode to settle. (40:39).

What ʻĪsā (a.s.) spoke about his condition in this world, con-tains of words and deeds, and Allāh has confirmed his truthfulness; thus the truth mentioned in this verse contains truth in deeds as it includes truth in words. Therefore, those who were truthful in this world in their words and deeds, shall benefit from their truthfulness on the Day of Resurrections, they shall have the promised gardens, and they shall be pleased [with Allãh] and pleasing [to Him], and they shall achieve the great success.

Apart from that, truth in words necessitates truth in deeds – i.e. clarity and purity of deeds from stigma of hypocrisy – and leads it to goodness. It is reported that a Bedouine asked the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) for an advice; so he admonished him not to tell a lie. Thereafter, the man narrated that adherence to what he was advised to, prevented him from all sins; because whenever a sin tempted him, he remembered that if he did it and then was asked about it, he would be obliged to confess its commission and inform the people about it; so he did not do it because of that fear.

QUR'ÃN: "they shall have gardens beneath which rivers flow to abide in them forever; Allãh is well pleased with them and they are well pleased with Allãh; this is the mighty achievement.": Allãh shall be well pleased with them because of the truth which they had sent before them, and they shall be well pleased with Allãh because of the reward which He will bestow on them.

The verse has attached the pleasure with their selves, and not with their deeds, unlike the divine words: . . . and whose words He is pleased with. (20:109); . . . and if you are grateful, He shall be pleased with it in you; . . . (39:7). There is a difference between these two pleasures: Your pleasure with a thing means that you do not push it away with dislike; it is possible for your enemy to bring up an action which you like, although you are angry with him; and for a friend whom you love to do a deed which you do not like.

Thus, the words: "Allãh is well pleased with them", denote that Allãh likes their selves; and it is known that this pleasure cannot take place unless there appears the purpose for which Allãh has created them; and He has said: And I have not created the jinn and the men except that they should worship Me (51:56). So, this servitude and worship is the divine object for which man has been created. Allãh shall be pleased with a servant's soul only when he shall become an exemplary worshipper. In other words, when his soul will be the soul of a servant of Allãh Who is the Lord of everything; he does not see his own soul, nor anything else; but he is only a slave of Allāh who is submissive to His Lordship, who does not turn except to Him and does not return but to Him, as He says about Ayyūb: . . . most excel-lent the servant! Surely he was frequent in returning (to Allāh), (38: 44); and this is their being pleased with Him.

This is one of the stations of servitude. Its concomitant is the purity of the soul from disbelief (in all its ranks) and from trans-gression, as Allāh says: . . . and He does not like ungratefulness in His servants; . . . (39:7); . . . yet surely Allāh is not pleased with the trans-gressing people (9:96).

It is one of the signs of this position that when servitude takes hold of a servant's soul and he sees that all that he perceives with his external eyes and internal insight is owned by Allāh and is submissive to His order, then he will be pleased with Allāh, because he will realize that whatever has Allāh given him, has given it from His Grace, so it is His generosity and bounty, and whatever He has stopped from him, He has done it for some reason.

Moreover, Allāh says about them when they shall be in the Garden: They shall have in them what they please. (16:31; 25:16). And it is known that when man gets all that he wishes, and then naturally he will be pleased. This is the utmost human bliss and felicity in his servitude, and that is why the talk ends on the clause: "this is the mighty achievement."

QUR'ĀN: Allāh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is in them; and He has power over all things: al-Milk (اَلْمِلْك = ownership) is a special authority on individual things, and its effect is permeation of the owner's will in the things he has the power to manage; and al-mulk (اَلْمُلْك = kingdom) is the special authority over the system prevalent among the things, and its effect is permeation of the owner's will in the things he has the power to manage; in simple words, al-milk (ownership) relates to an individual and al-mulk (king-dom) to a group.

Inasmuch as the kingdom, in its actions, is restricted with, or formed by, the power, therefore when the power is complete and un-restricted, the kingdom shall be all-comprehensive, not restricted with one thing besides the other, nor confined to one condition, beside the other. To draw attention to this fine point, the sentence: "Allāh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is in them;" is fol-lowed by the clause: "and He has power over all things."

The chapter ends on this verse, which denotes His all-encom-passing Kingdom. Its correlation is clear: The chapter's objective is to exhort the servants and attract them to fulfil the covenants and agreements which have been taken from them by their Lord, and He is the absolute ruler. Thus, their only title is that they are absolutely owned servants; they have no power in whatever He orders them or forbids them except to hear and obey; nor about whatever agreement and covenant He takes from them except to fulfil it without breaking it.

TRADITIONS

Tha'labah ibn Maymūn narrates through some of our compan-ions from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said about the words of Allãh, the Blessed, the Sublime, to 'Īsã: "Did you say to the people: 'Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allãh'?" "He had not said it, but will soon say so; surely when Allãh knows that a thing is to happen [in future], He speaks about it as a done thing." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: The same book narrates a similar tradition from Sulaymãn ibn Khãlid from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.). Its gist is that information of the future has been given in past tense because it is known to take place certainly; and such usage is common in the language.

Jãbir al-Ju'fī has narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) in explanation of the sentences: Thou knowest what is in my mind, I do not know what is in Thy mind, surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things, that he said, "Surely the great name of Allãh is seventy three letters; and the Lord, the Blessed, the Sublime, has kept hidden one of the letters; that is why nobody knows what is in His mind, to Whom belong Might and Majesty. Adam was given seventy two letters, so, the prophets inherited it from one another, until it reached 'Īsã (a.s.); that is the (meaning of) the word of 'Īsã: 'Thou knowest what is in my mind', i.e. seventy two letters of the great name; he means to say: 'Thou hast taught them to me, so Thou (certainly) knowest them; and I do not know what is in Thy mind'; he wants to say: 'because Thou hast hidden that letter, so nobody knows what is in Thy mind'." (ibid.)

The author says: We shall extensively explain about the good names of Allãh and His great name, under the verse: And Allãh's are the best names, therefore call on Him thereby; . . . (7:180). There it will become clear that the great name or the big name is not made up of alphabets; in such places name actually means the named one, i.e. the person of Allāh looked at with one of His attributes or one of the aspects; accordingly the name in words would be the name of the name, as will be explained later.

Acordingly, the Imām (a.s.)'s words, that the Great Name is made up of seventy-three letters, and similar expressions which have come in numerous traditions of this topic, that the Great Name is made up of so many letters, and that they are scattered in such and such chap-ter, or such and such verse, all these are talks based on symbolism, they are parables to make the people understand what is feasible to under-stand of the realities; for not every reality can be explained clearly without allusion.

It will explain the meaning of the ḥadīth to a certain extent if we say: There is no doubt that Allāh's good names are the mediums for manifestation of the universe in its species and appearance of its innumerable occurances. Also, we have no doubt that Allāh created His creatures, because He is the Creator, Magnanimous, and Originator, for example; not because He is the Avenger and Hard-hitter. He gives sustenance to whom He sustains, because He is the Sustainer and Bestower, for instance, not because He is the Holder and Forbidding. He bestows life to the living, because He is the Living and Life giving, not because He is death giving, and returning. The Qur'ānic verses are the most truthful witnesses of this reality, because we see the realities elaborated in a verse, are justified at the end with the divine name appropriate for that theme. Often the verse ends with one such name, and sometimes it ends with two names, which together illuminate its topic.

It appear from the above that if one of us is given the knowl-edge of the names, and if he knew the connections between those names and the things and understood what the divine names, individ-ually and combined, demanded, he would know the system of the uni-verse, with all the general laws which govern it and which are applied to its individual parts one after another.

The noble Qur'ān, as is understood from its apparent meanings, has described many general laws regarding the genesis and the return, and what Allāh has arranged concerning the felicity and infelicity; and then it has told the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): . . . and We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything, . . . (16:89).

However, all of them are general laws, which are necessary. But they are necessary not in themselves, not by demand of their own selves; but through that necessariliness and inevitability which Allāh has bestowed on it. Now that this intellectual and definite authority comes from Allãh's side, and by His order and will, it is clear that Allãh's action cannot compel Him at all in this regard, nor would it overpower Him in His person; He, Glorified be He, is the Subduer and Predominant; how can a thing subdue Him which returns to Him from every direction, and depends on Him in its substance and effect. Understand it.

It is therefore impossible that the intellect (which decides whatever it does by Allãh's bestowal on it) or the realities (whose laws and effects do exist by His will) would have any authority over Him or demand something from Him, by the same decision and demand that Allãh Himself keeps them active and subdues them. In other words, whatever demand or decision is found in the things emanates from the transfers of ownership which Allãh has given to it; thus He, the High, is the absolute owner, and He cannot be owned in any way.

If Allãh were to give good reward to a sinner, or to punish a good-doer, or did any type of deed, which He wished, there was no harm in it, and there was nothing to prevent it – neither the reason nor any extraneous matter. But Allãh has promised us and threatened us, the felicity and infelicity, and good reward and tough recompense; and He has informed us that He does not break His promise; and He has informed us about some things by the way of revelation or through our intellect, and He has mentioned that He does not speak except truth. Thus our souls became tranquil with Him, and our hearts were at ease towards Him – without any doubt finding a way to it. Allãh says: . . . surely Allãh fails not in (His) promise. (3:9; 13:31); . . . and the truth do I speak. (38:84).

What Allãh has explained it is the demand of His names, as we have known by His teaching. But beyond that is the fact that He, the Sublime, is the absolute owner, He has the right and power to do what He wishes and decide what He wants. Allãh says: He is not questioned concerning what He does and they shall be questioned. (21:23). This meaning itself is one of His names which is of unknown essence; none of His creatures has any way of knowing it. It is because whatever we know of His names is what one or other of the concepts shows, and then we identify by its relationship its effects in existence. As for those effects that there is no way of identifying them, they inviolably are the effects of a name that there is no way to know its meaning. You may say that it is a name that cannot be hunted down by a concept; rather, it somehow is pointed to by the attribute of His absolute ownership.

Thus it is clear that there are some of His names to which no creature has got a way – and it is the name, which He has kept hidden. So understand it.

A TALK ON THE MEANING OF GOOD MANNERS

We shall talk here in various chapters on the good manners, which Allāh has taught His prophets and messengers, peace be on them all.

1. al-Adab (the manners): is the good form on which the lawful action should take place, either in religion or near intellectuals in their society, like the manner of prayer, the etiquette of visiting the friends; or you may say, gracefulness of intellect.

It does not appear except in lawful things, not forbidden ones. There is no manner in injustice, treachery and falsehood; nor is there any manner in ignominious and ugly deeds. Also, it does not take place except in voluntary actions, which may be performed in more than one way, so that some would agree with manners, beside the others. For example, there is the manner of eating in Islam that one begins it in the name of Allāh and ends on the thanks for Allāh and that one should eat less than one's fill. Or there is the manner of sitting in ṣalāt that one sits on one side of one's thigh, keeping the palms on thighs above the knees, and looking at the lap.

As the manners are the good form of voluntary actions and good deeds, and according to its original meaning, it denotes agreement with the aim of life. Although there is no dispute among the societies in this basic theme, yet when it comes to indentification of its substance, there appears a lot of discord, among various communities, nations, religions and denominations. It appears even in very small societies like a family, in identification of good and evil, and in manners of deeds.

Often a community observes some manners, which the others do not know about; sometimes an action is considered good by a community while another group thinks it evil. For example, greeting on meeting someone: In Islam it is by saying: as-Salāmu ʻalaykum, i.e. blessed, peace and pure safety be to you from Allāh; and in some nations it is by taking off the caps, in others it is by raising the hand in front of the head, in some others it is done by prostration, or bowing down or bending with bowed head; as there are among the westerners the manners of meeting with women which Islam condemns and con-siders disgusting, and so on.

However, all these differences have cropped up at the stage of identification of manners; as for the basic meaning of the manners, it is unanimously agreed by all sane persons – that it is the good form in which the actions should take place. Also, there is no difference in that it is a good thing.

2. As the goodness and beauty are among the ingredients of the good manners, as described above, and this differs from society to society according to their particular objectives, this inevitably has given rise to differences in man's sociological manners. The manner in every society is like a mirror, which reflects that general society's ethical character-istics – which have been arranged in them by their lives' objectives; and have been concentrated in their souls by their social factors and other natural or chancy agents.

Manners are not ethics, because ethics is the deeply ingrained psychological trait, which are adopted by the souls, while manners are various good forms, which affect the actions, which are done by man because of various psychological attributes – and there is a vast difference between the two.

Thus, manners sprout from the ethics, and ethics is among the demands of society in particular according to its especial objective. The objective, which man desires in his life, identifies his manners in his actions, and draws for him a line which he does not cross, when he performs an action in his life and acquires nearness from his destination.

3. As the manner follows, in its particulars, the desired destination of the life, therefore, the divine manners, which Allah, the Glorified, teaches His prophets and messengers (peace be upon them), and trains them on, is the good form of religious actions which are in harmony with the religion's aims and objectives – and it is the servitude with differences in the true religions, according to abundance or shortage of its substance and depending on its ranks in perfection and sublimity.

As the Islam deals with all the life-affairs of the human beings, in such a way that nothing of it, big or little, great or small, goes out of its fold, therefore it has encompassed the life with manners, and laid down for every deed a good form which is in harmony with its objective.

However, it has no general objective except the belief in one God in both stages of faith and action together. It means that man should believe that there is a God, from Whom is the genesis of every-thing and to Whom everything is to return; for Him are the good names and sublime parables. Then this monotheism runs throughout the life and lives in the actions, it manifests in itself the servitude of man and all that he has to Allāh, Great is His name! In this way the monotheism permeats in its esoterics and exoterics, and the pure servitude is mani-fested from his words, deeds and all aspects of his existence, a mani-festation where there is no veil over it, nor any cover to hide it.

In short, the divine manner – or prophetic manner – is the form of monotheism in action.

4. The reason shows and definite experience supports that the practi-cal knowledge – i.e. the knowledge that is acquired in order to act upon it – does not fully succeed and does not bring about its good effects if it is not put before a learner in practical way. It is because unless the general academic principles are applied to its individual cases, human soul finds it difficult to accept it and to believe in its correctness, because our soul throughout our life remains engaged with perceivable components, and it feels tired, as its second nature, from observation of intellectual general principles, which are beyond our senses. A man who affirms the goodness of bravery, per se, then he faces a dreadful situation in which the hearts tremble; now a dispute starts between his intellect (which affirms the goodness of bravery) and his feeling which pulls him towards caution against facing physical destruction and loss of fine material life; thus the soul remains oscil-lating between this and that, and cannot decide which of the two op-posing sides to support, and strength is found in the side of the feeling because it accompanies senses.

Thus, it is incumbent during teaching that the student is taught intellectual realities accompanied by practice, so that he gets training through action and is drilled on it, and it would erase the opposing ideas which might be hidden in cornors of his soul, and affirmation of what he learns would be firmly rooted in mind, because occurance is the best evidence of possibility.

That is why we see that an action whose real occurance is not experienced by the soul, it becomes difficult for the soul to submit to it. So, when it occurs for the first time it seems as it has turned from impossibility to possibility, and it appears to be a great affair, and creates agitation and perturbation in the mind. Then if it happens more than two or three times, it becomes easier and its severity is broken, joining the fold of usual things, which become unimportant. Surely the good is a habit as the evil is a habit.

Consideration of this style in religious teachings, and especially in Islamic religious education, is among the clearest affairs. The Law-giver of religion, in teaching the believers, has not adopted to teach intellectual generalities and over-all legislations; rather he has started with deeds and then has gone to words and verbal explanations; when a believer completes learning religious cognition and its laws, he does so and he is equipped with good deeds and furnished with piety.

Likewise, it is incumbent that the teacher and trainer must be acting on his knowledge, because knowledge has no effect if it is not joined by practice; the action shows the way exactly as the words show the way. If the action opposes the words, then it shows that there is an opposite form in the soul that opposes the words; thus it proves that the said word is a trick and a sort of deception, which the speaker uses for cheating the people and preying on them.

That is why we see that the hearts of the people do not incline, and their souls do not lean, towards a sermon and admonition when they find that the preacher or the advisor does not follow his own admonition or advice; and does not have patience and steadfastness in its path. Often they say: If his words were true, he would have acted on them. However they seem confused in drawing this result. The result in the above case is as follows: These words are not true in the eyes of the speaker, because if he believed them to be true he would have acted on them. But it does not give the result that the words are not true at all – as they sometimes draw it.

It is one of the conditions of good bringing up that the teacher and trainer himself should have the attributes which he wants the trainee to acquire; because it is impossible in practice that a coward would train a couragous and brave person, or that a well-balanced scholar should come up from the school of prejudice and stubbornness.

Allãh says: Is He then Who guides to the truth more worthy to be followed, or he who himself does not go aright unless he is guided? What then is the matter with you; how do you judge. (10:35); What! Do you enjoin men to be good and forget your own selves . . . (2:44)? And He quotes Shuʿayb telling his people: . . . and I do not desire that in opposition to you I should betake myself to that which I forbid you; I desire nothing but reform so far as I am able, . . . (11:88); and there are many similar verses.

Because of all these factors it was incumbent that the teacher and trainer must have full faith in the substance of his teaching and training.

Apart from that, even a man who has no faith in what he says, even a hypocrite who covers himself with good deeds, and pretends to have pure unalloyed faith, does not train on his hand except a one who represents him in his unclean soul; even if it is possible to create separation between tongue and heart by speaking what the soul is not pleased with and the inner idea does not agree with; yet speaking is a sort of action, and action is an effect of the soul, and how can an action go against the nature of its doer?

Thus the speech, apart from its denoting the meaning for which it is made, carries the nature of the speaker's soul, like belief or dis-belief and so on. Its maker, and its conveyer to the simple soul of the student does not differentiate the aspect of its goodness – i.e. the aspect of its laid down meaning – from the aspect of its ugliness – and it is all other aspects – except the one who has the insight of the reality. Allãh says to His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) regarding the hypocrites: . . . and most certainly you may recognize them by the intent of (their) speech; . . . (47:30) So, the training which brings good effect in its wake is that one in which the teacher and trainer has faith in what he presents before his students, accompanied by good deeds that agree with his knowledge, but as for the one who does not believe in what he says, or who does not act according to his knowledge, no good can be expected from such a person.

There are many and innumerable examples for this reality in the conduct of us, the orientals and especially the Islamists, in teaching and training in our official and unofficial institutes, that no effort seems to succeed, and no planning to be of any benefit.

5. To this chapter returns what we see in the divine speech that it contains pieces of divine manners which are reflected in actions of the prophets and the messengers (peace be on them) which are connected with Allãh, Glorified be He – including various facets of their wor-ship, invocations and urgings, also those which are related to the people in their dealings and addresses; it is because bringing in the examples in education are a sort of practical teaching with evidence in practice.

Allãh says, after narrating the story of Ibrãhīm with his people, regarding the Oneness of God: And this was Our argument that We gave to Ibrãhīm against his people; We exalt in dignity whom We please; surely your Lord is Wise, Knowing. And We gave to him Isḥãq and Ya'qūb; each did We guide, and Nūḥ did We guide before, and of his descendants, Dãwūd and Sulaymãn and Ayyūb and Yūsuf and Hãrūn; and thus do We reward those who do good (to others). And Zakariyyã and Yaḥyã and 'Īsã and Ilyãs; every one was of the good; and Ismã'īl and al-Yasa' and Yūnus and Lūṭ; and every one We made to excel the worlds: And from among their fathers and their descendants and their brethren, and We chose them and guided them into the right way. This is Allãh's guidance, He guides thereby whom He pleases of His ser-vants; and if they had set up others (with Him), certainly what they did would have become forfeited for them. These are they to whom We gave the Book and the Wisdom and the Prophecy; therefore if these disbelieve in it We have already entrusted with it a people who are not disbelievers in it. These are they whom Allãh guided; therefore follow their guidance. . . . (6:84-91)

Allãh mentions here His noble prophets (peace be on them) comprehensively, and then says that He exalted them with divine guidance; and it was the guidance to monotheism only; its proof is found in the clause: and if they had set up others (with Him), certainly what they did would have become forfeited for them; mark that He in this place contrasts His bounty of guidance which He had bestowed on them with polytheism only; thus He had guided them to the monotheism only.

However, the order of monotheism flowed into their actions, gaining ground in it. Its proof is seen in the clause: certainly what they did would have been forfieted for them; if polytheism were not flowing in the actions, infiltrating in them, it would not have caused their for-feiture. The same would apply to its opposite, the monotheism.

What is the meaning of flowing of monotheism in actions? It means that the actions' forms represent monotheism, and reflect them as a mirror reflects the image of the looker in. It is such that if mono-theism were supposed to be imagined, it would be exactly those actions; and if those actions were abstracted into pure beliefs, it would be exactly those.

This meaning has many examples in psychological attributes. For example, you find that the actions of a proud person exemplify the pride and haughtiness that are hidden in his soul. Likewise, all move-ments and stillness of a wretched poor man expose what is hidden in his inner self of humiliation and submissiveness, and so on.

Thereafter, Allãh taught good manners to His Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and commanded him to follow the guidance of the prophets who had preceded him; he was not supposed to follow [their persons, but their guidance]. One follows someone else in action; and not in belief, because belief is outside one's option, per se, i.e. he should choose their good actions, which were based on monotheism, and performed by them through practical divine training.

We mean by this practical training what is pointed out by the divine words: And We made them Imãms who guided (people) by Our command, and We revealed to them the doing of good and the keeping up of prayer and the giving of the zakãt*, and Us* (alone) did they wor-ship. (21:73). The genetive construction using the *maṣdar*s as the first constructs in: doing of good, Keeping up of prayer and giving of the zakãt, denotes that they refer to the actual good they did, prayers they kept up and the zakãt they gave, and not only to performing the supposed deeds. Thus this revelation, which was sent to them when they were engaged in this performance, was the revelation to show the right way and to teach the manners; it was not the revelation of prophecy and legislation. Had it meant the revelation of prophecy, the sentence would have been as follows: 'And We revealed to them that you should do good deeds, keep up prayer and give the zakãt' – as we see in the verse: Then We revealed to you: Follow the faith of Ibrãhīm, . . . (16:123); And We revealed to Mūsã and his brother, saying: "Take for your people houses to abide in Egypt and make you houses places of worship and keep up prayer . . ." (10:87), and many similar verses. The revelation to show the right way means that Allãh bestows on one of His servants a holy spirit which supports and strengthens him in good deeds and in remaining cautious against evil; in the same way as the human spirit supports us in thinking about good and evil, and the ani-malistic spirit in choosing what we desire through wilful attraction and repulsion. A detailed talk on this topic will be given later on, God willing.

In short, the clause: therefore follow their guidance, is a general divine ethical teaching to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) with the manner of monotheism, which is spread over the prophets' actions and free from polytheism.

Allãh has likewise mentioned several of His prophets (peace be on them) in the chapter of "Mary", and then said: These are they on whom Allãh bestowed favours, from among the prophets of the seed of Adam, and of those whom We carried with Nūḥ, and of the seed of Ibrãhīm and Isrã'īl, and of those whom We guided and chose; when the signs of the Beneficent God were recited to them, they fell down making obeisence and weeping. But there came after them an evil generation, who neglected prayers and followed the sensual desires, so they will meet perdition, except such as repent and believe and do good, these shall enter the garden, and they shall not be dealt with unjustly in any way. (19:58-60).

In this way, Allãh mentioned their general manners in their life, that they live with submission to Allãh in activities and humility towards Him in heart; their prostration and recital of Allãh's sign is the example of submission, and their weeping which emanates from soft-ness of heart and humbleness of soul is the sign of humility; and both together allude to the domination of the attribute of servitude over their souls, inasmuch as whenever they are reminded of a sign of Allãh, its effect appears on their exterior as well as it dominates their inner self. Thus they are on their divine manner, and it is the mark of the servitude when they are alone with their Lord and its mark when they mix with the people. They live on the divine manner with their Lord and with the people.

The proof that it means general manners may be found in the next verse: But there came after them an evil generation, who neglected prayers and followed the sensual desires. Prayer is paying attention to Allãh and its neglecting shows their condition with their Lord, and following the sensual desires points to their condition with the people. As these people stand parallel to the preceding group, it indicates that the prophets' general manner is that they turn to their Lord with the mark of servitude and deal with the people with the mark of servitude. It means that the structure of their lives is founded on the foundation that they do have a Lord who owns them and manages their affairs, from Him is their genesis and to Him is their return. So this is the basis of all their conditions and actions.

The exception mentioned of those who repented among them is another divine manner. It begins with Adam (a.s.), the first of the prophets, as He says: . . . and Adam disobeyed his Lord, so his life be-came evil (to him). Then his Lord chose him, so He turned to him and guided (him). (20:121-2). God willing, some talk on it will follow.

Allãh says: There is no harm in the Prophet doing that which Allãh has ordained for him; such has been the course of Allãh with respect to those who have gone before; and the command of Allãh is a decree that is made absolute: Those who deliver the messages of Allãh and fear Him, and do not fear any one but Allãh; and Allãh is suffi-cient to take account. (33:38-39).

It is a general manner which Allãh trained His prophets on (peace be upon them), and His continuously running course about them: That they should not be distressed by the life destined for them and should not be affected in any affair; they are on the nature, and the nature does not guide except to what Allāh has equipped it to acquire, which agrees to it; it does not affect to dominate what Allāh has not made it easy for it to rise to it. Allāh quotes His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) as saying: "... nor am I of those who affect:" (38:86); Allāh does not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability; ... (2:286); ... Allāh does not lay on any soul a burden except to the extent to which He has granted it; ... (65:7). As affectation is going beyond nature, it is a kind of following the sensuous desires, and the prophets are protected from it.

Allāh says – and this too is training for comprehensive manner: O Messengers! Eat of the good things and do good; surely I know what you do. And surely this religion is one religion and I am your Lord, therefore fear Me (23:51-52). Allāh taught and trained them to eat of the good things. In other words, they should use the good things from the provisions of life, and should not cross the boundary to the repulsive things towards which the healthy nature feels aversion. They should do the good deeds – those which are good for man to perform, to which the nature is inclined according to the powers with which Allāh has equipped him, and through them his life continues to an appointed time and destination. Or they should do the deeds, which may be presented at the divine presence. Both these meanings are nearer to each other. So this is the manner relating to an individual.

Then Allāh has joined it to group manner. He mentioned that the people were but a single nation – those who were sent and those to whom they were sent; they do not have except the one Lord, so they should join together in piety; in this way they should cut off the roots of grouping and divisiveness. When these two types of manners, i.e., of individual and of group, join together, they constitute a human society, protected from discord, which worships one Lord; its individ-uals carry on divine manner, and they refrain from evil deeds and bad actions; thus they are firmly settled on the pedestal of felicity.

This is what is gathered from another verse: He has laid down for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and that which We have revealed to you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and ʿĪsā, that keep up the religion and be not divided therein; ... (42:13).

And Allāh has differentiated between the two types of manners in another place and has said: And We did not send before you any messenger but We revealed to him that there is no god but Me, there-fore worship Me (21:25). In this way, he taught them His monotheism and trained them to base His worship on it. This was their manner vis-à-vis the Lord. Also, He has said: And they say: "What is the matter with this Messenger that he eats food and goes about in the markets; why has not an angel been sent down to him, so that he should have been a warner with him? Or (why is not) a treasure sent down to him, or he is made to have a garden from which he should eat?. . . (25:7-8). Then Allãh replies to it: And We have not sent before you any messen-gers but they most surely ate food and went about in the markets (25: 20). Thus, Allãh described that it is the conduct of all prophets – and it is their divine manner – to mix with the people, and avoid seclusion, reservation and discrimination between people; because all behaviour is repulsed by the nature. This was their manner with the people.

6. ÃDAM: An example of prophetic manners as they turn their faces to their Lord and pray to Him, is the prayer of Ãdam (a.s.) and his wife quoted by Allãh: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to ourselves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers." (7:23). This they said after they had eaten from the tree which Allãh had forbidden them not to go near; of course, this prohi-bition was of advisory nature, not an order of a master to his servants; and their disobedience was not of a legislative command, they only went against an advice which was given to them in order to preserve the good-ness of their condition; to maintain the felicity of their lives in the garden, safe from every type of infelicity and trouble. Allãh had told them while cautioning them against following the Iblīs: . . . therefore let him not drive you both from the garden so that you should be un-happy: Surely it is (ordained) for you that you shall not be hungry therein nor bare of clothing; and that you shall not be thirsty therein nor shall you feel the heat of the sun (20:117-9).

However, when they fell in the tribulation, and were over-whelmed by misfortune and the happiness of life departed from them, they were not occupied with themselves like someone who is des-paired and hopeless, nor did pessimism cut off the rope that tied them to their Lord. Rather, they at once saught refuge with Allãh Who owned all their affairs, and in Whose hand was every good that they hoped for themselves. So, they adhered to the attribute of His Divinity and Lordship – which contains all with which evil is repulsed and good attracted; the Lordship is the noble attribute, which joins the servant with Allãh, the Glorified.

Then they both mentioned the evil which was threatening them with appearance of its signs, and it was the loss in life – It was as though they had bought the taste of eating for obedience to divine advice, and it became clear to them that their happiness was indeed about to fall down – and they described that they needed what would avert that evil from them. So they said: "... and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers." That is: loss in life is threatening us and towers over us, and nothing can avert it except Your forgiving the sin committed by us, and then Your covering us with Your mercy and it is the happiness and felicity; because man, rather every being who is made, perceives by its created nature that the tings which are found in the station of existence and on the path of abiding are bound to seek perfection by removal of any defect or shortcoming attached to it, and the cause to complete that defect is Allãh alone, so it is of the habit of divinity.

And for this reason, it was enough to only describe their condition, and to display the need and poverty that had afflicted the servant; and there was no need to ask for its remedy in words; rather, describ-ing only their need was a most eloquent imploration and most fluent proposition.

And that is why Ãdam (a.s.) and his wife did not say clearly what they wanted; they did not say, 'so forgive us and have mercy on us'. As they had placed themselves in station of abasement and wretchedness because of the disobedience they had done, and now they felt that they had neither face nor any prestige, as a result of which their only course was the total and pure submission to whatever order was issued from the arena of divine power. Therefore, they stopped from all pleading and request – they just said that He was their Lord. In this way they pointed to what they hoped for and [before that, they] confessed to their injustice.

In this backdrop, the words: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to ourselves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers." mean as follows: 'We did wrong by being unjust to ourselves; thus we were on the brink of the loss which was threatening our general felicity and bliss of life; now abasement and wretchedness have covered us from all sides and we are in intense need of erasing the brand of injustice so that we may be overwhelmed by divine mercy; and this has not left us with any face and dignity with which we could ask You; so here we are submitting to Your decision, O Mighty

King! In Your hand are the command and the judgement; [our only salvation lies in the fact] that You are our Lord and we are under Your lordship, we hope from You what a ward hopes from his Guardian.'

NŪḤ: Another example of their manners is what Allãh quotes Nūḥ (a.s.) concerning his prayer for his son: And it moved on with them amid waves like mountains; and Nūḥ called out to his son, and he was aloof: "O my son! Embark with us and be not with the unbelievers." He said: "I will betake myself for refuge to a mountain that shall pro-tect me from the water." . . . And Nūḥ cried out to his Lord and said: "My Lord! Surely my son is of my family, and Thy promise is surely true, and Thou art the justest of the judges." He said: "O Nūḥ! Surely he is not of your family; surely he is (the doer of) other than good deeds, therefore ask not of Me that of which you have no knowledge; surely I admonish you lest you may be of the ignorant." He said: "My Lord! I seek refuge in Thee from asking Thee that of which I have no knowledge; and if Thou shouldst not forgive me and have mercy on me, I should be of the losers." (11:42-47)

Doubtlessly, it appears from the above talk of Nūḥ (a.s.) that he wanted to pray for his son to be saved; but meditation of the verses of the story removes the curtain from the reality in another way:

On one side, Allãh ordered him to embark on the ark with his family and the believers, saying: . . . "Carry in it two of every thing, a pair, and your own family – except those against whom the word has already gone forth, and those who believe." . . . (11:40). Thus, Allãh promised him to save his family and excepted those against whom the word had already gone forth; and his wife was a disbeliever, as Allãh mentions in the verse 66:10. Allãh sets forth an example of those who disbelieve the wife of Nūḥ and the wife of Lūṭ. But as for his son, there was not any manifestation that he did not believe in the Call of Nūḥ; and the report given by Allãh, of his behaviour with his father when he was aloof, shows only his disobedience to his father, rather than clear disbelief. Therefore, it was possible to think about him that he would be of the saved ones, because he was one of his sons and ap-parently was not a disbeliever; so he would be included in the divine promise of safety.

On the other side, Allãh had revealed to Nūḥ (a.s.) his decreed order about the people, as He says: And it was revealed to Nūḥ: That none of your people will believe except those who have already be-lieved, therefore do not grieve at what they do; and make the ark before Our eyes and (according to) Our revelation, and do not speak to Me in respect of those who are unjust; surely they shall be drowned (11:36-37). Does the clause: those who are unjust refer to those who disbe-lieved in his Call? Does it include every type of injustice? Or is it vague and ambiguous and needs explanation from the Speaker?

It appears that these were the factors, which put Nūḥ (a.s.) in doubt about his son. Otherwise, he was not among those who would be oblivious of the position of his Lord; and he was one of the five Ulu 'l-'Azm messengers who are chiefs of the prophets; he was not the one to forget the divine revelation: "do not speak to Me in respect of those who are unjust; surely they shall be drowned"; nor was he to be pleased with the safety of his son even if he was a disbeliever while he (a.s.) had said clearly in his prayer against his people: . . . "My Lord! Leave not upon the land any dweller from among the unbelievers" (71:26). If he were to agree to it for his son, he would have agreed to it for his wife too.

That is why he did not dare to beseech Allāh in clear terms; rather he put it forth like an enquiry, because he did not encompass all the factors that were there around his son. Therefore, he began by calling Allāh with name of Lord, as it is the prayer-key of the needy beseecher. Then he said: "surely my son is of my family". He wanted to say that it decides in favour of the safety of my son: "and Thou art the justest of the judges"; there is no mistake in Thy command and no ambiguity in Thy order; so I do not know what is to be the end result of his affair.

Thus, Nūḥ (a.s.) spoke with parental sentiment, as the word "cried out" indicates; yet he only mentioned the divine promise and did not add anything to it nor did he put forth any request.

Then the divine protection caught him up and cut short his speech. And Allāh explained to him the true meaning of "your own family" in the promise, that it referred to only the doers of good from among his family, and this son was not good-doer, and Allāh had earlier admon-ished him saying: and do not speak to Me in respect of those who are unjust; surely they shall be drowned. Nūḥ (a.s.) had taken the apparent meaning of "family" and thought that the exception was of his unbe-liever wife only. Allāh then stopped him from asking that of which he had no knowledge, i.e., the request of his son's safety – as it appeared that he was about to ask for it.

Now, he refrained from asking because of that divine interven-tion, and started a new talk that appears in the form of repentance but actually it is thank giving for bestowing on him this manner, which is certainly a favour. So he said: "My Lord! I seek refuge in Thee from asking Thee that of which I have no knowledge." Thus he saught refuge in his Lord from what he was on verge of speaking, i.e., the prayer for safety of his son when he did not know the reality of his condition.

The proof that till then he had not prayed any such thing, may be found in his words: "I seek refuge in Thee from asking". It should be noted that he had not said: I seek refuge in Thee from the question of what I had no knowledge of; as the maṣdar used as the first member of a genitive construction proves that the deed has already been done.

"ask not of Me that of which you have no knowledge": Had he already asked for it, the prayer should have been rebutted by clear rejection, or by such admonition as: "Do not do like it again"; as we find similar modes in the Divine Book; for example: . . . he said: "My Lord! Show me (Thyself), so that I may look upon Thee." He said: "You can never see Me, . . ." (7:143). When you received it with your tongues and spoke with your mouths what you had no knowledge of, . . . Allãh admonishes you that you should not return to the like of it ever again . . . (24:15-17).

Another prayer of Nūḥ (a.s.) was the one quoted by Allãh in these words: "My Lord! Forgive me and my parents and he who enters my house believing, and the believing men and the believing women; and do not increase the unjust in aught but destruction." (71:28). Allãh quotes this prayer of his after many verses describing his com-plaint in which he explains to his Lord his endeavours in calling his people day and night for nearly a thousand years of his life, what he endured of their hardships and what he suffered of the tribulations in the cause of Allãh; he spent himself to the utmost limit and sacrificed himself in the way of their guidance, but his call to them did not cause them except fleeing, and his admonitions to them did not increase in them except arrogance.

He continued spreading among them his admonition and good sermons, and making them hear the truth and the reality; in the mean time, he was complaining to his Lord of their enmity and persistence with which they confronted him, and of their deception and trickery with which they opposed him. This continued until his feelings of sorrow were excited and the divine rage overwhelmed him, and he prayed against them, saying: "My Lord! Leave not upon the land any dweller from among the unbelievers; for surely if Thou leave them they will lead astray Thy servants, and will not beget any but immoral, ungrateful." (71:26-27)

What he says about their leading astray the servants of Allãh if He left them in the land, is what he had said in the preceding verse: And indeed they have led astray many. They had already led astray many believers; so he was afraid that they would mislead the remaining ones. The words: and will not beget any but immoral, ungrateful, declare that their loins and wombs have lost the ability to beget any believer. He described this news of the unseen through prophetic fore-sight and divine revelation.

When he cursed the disbelievers because of the divine rage which he felt, and he was the noble prophet, the first to bring a book and a sharī'ah, and he had stood up to rescue the world from inundation of idolatry, but did not respond to him from the human society save a few – about eighty persons, according to traditions – thus it was a manner of this situation that he should not forget those who believed in his Lord and should pray for them of good upto the Day of Resurrection.

So he said: "My Lord! Forgive me": He began with his own self, because the talk was of seeking forgiveness for those who tread on His path, so he is in the forefront of them and is their Leader. "and my parents": This is the proof that they were believers. "and him who enters my house believing": They were those of his contemporaries who had believed in him. "and the believing men and the believing women": It refers to all believers, the people of monotheism, because all of them were his people, and were obliged to him upto the Day of Resurrection; he was the first who raised the call of religion in the world with the book and the sharī'ah, and kept the standard of mono-theism aloft among the people. That is why Allãh has greeted him with his best greeting when He says: Peace be upon Nūḥ among the nations (37:79). So peace and greetings be on him, the noble prophet, whenever believed in Allãh any believer or performed any good deed for Him, and whenever any name was mentioned for Allãh, honoured be His name! and whenever there was any trace of good and felicity among the people; because all this is from the blessings of his call and the appendant of his rising. May Allãh bless him and all the prophets and messengers together!

IBRĀHĪM: Another example was shown by Ibrāhīm (a.s.) as quoted by Allãh describing his argumentation with his community: He said: "Have you then considered what you have been worshipping, you and your ancient sires? Surely they are enemies to me, but not (so) the Lord of the worlds, Who created me, then He has shown me the way, and He Who gives me to eat and gives me to drink, and when I am sick, then He restores me to health, and He Who will cause me to die, then give me life, and Who, I hope, will forgive me my mistakes on the Day of Judgement. My Lord! Grant me wisdom, and join me with the good, and ordain for me a goodly mention among posterity, and make me of the heirs of the garden of bliss, and forgive my father, for surely he is of those who have gone astray, and disgrace me not on the day when they are raised." (26:75-87)

It was an invocation, which he (a.s.) began by praying for him-self and for his father because of a promise that he had given him. It was in the beginning of his mission when he had not lost the hope that his father would become a believer; but when it became clear that he was an enemy of Allãh, he washed his hand of him.

He began this prayer with praising his Lord beautifully, as the manner of servitude demands. This is the first detailed praise that Allãh has quoted from him (a.s.). What has been quoted before is not of this kind, like his words: "O my people! Surely I am clear of what you set up (with Allãh). Surely I have turned myself, being upright, wholly to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth, . . . (6:79-80). " . . . I will pray to my Lord to forgive you; surely He is ever Affectionate to me." (19:47).

Ibrãhīm (a.s.) has used best manner in Allãh's praise, in that he has put forward a comprehensive praise, which describes his Lord's care and attention to him from beginning of his creation until he shall return to Him; and has set himself in the station of total neediness and poverty; and has not mentioned for his Lord except absolute Self-sufficiency and pure magnanimity. He has represented himself as an abased servant, who has no power over anything, and the divine power turns him over from one condition to another; creation, then giving food and drink, then restoration of health, then causing to die, then giving life, then leading to the recompense of the Day of Judgement; while he has nothing except simple obedience and hoping for forgiveness of mistakes.

And look at the manner, which he has maintained in the above speech. He ascribes sickness to himself in the sentence: "and when I am sick, then He restores me to health"; he did so because its ascrip-tion to Allãh in this place – and it is the place of praise – would not be free from incongruity. Although sickness is an event, a happening, and as such it is not devoid of its ascription to Allãh; but the talk here is not about its happening (so that it would be ascribed to Allãh), but it aims at declaring that restoration to health after sickness is from His mercy and care. That is why he (a.s.) attributed sickness to himself and restoration of health to his Lord, claiming that nothing proceeds from Him except what is beautiful.

Then he used the same fine manner in the prayer, which he began with the name: Lord! and he confined his request to the real and abiding blessings, without looking at the adornments of this transient world; and selected from within that field what was the biggest and greatest. So, he asked for wisdom [regulation] and it is sharī'ah, and for being joined with the good people, then asked that Allãh should ordain for him a goodly mention among posterity. It means that Allãh should send and raise after him time after time some prophets or messengers who will hold up his call and propagate his sharī'ah. Actually, it is a request that Allãh should distinguish him with a sharī'ah that would abide upto the Day of Resurrection; thereafter he asked for inheritance of the paradise, forgiveness for his father and not to disgrace him on the Day of Resurrection.

Allãh positively answered all his requests, as His speech shows, except his prayer for his father [about which the divine speech is silent]. But far be it from the Lord of the worlds to mention a prayer of one of His honoured servants which would have gone in vain and remained unanswered. Allãh says: . . . the faith of your father Ibrãhīm; . . . (22: 78); And he made it a word to continue in his posterity . . . (43:28); . . . and most certainly We chose him in this world, and in the hereafter, he is most surely among the righteous. (2:130); and He greeted him with a comprehensive greeting: Peace be on Ibrãhīm. (37:109).

Study of history after Ibrãhīm (a.s.) confirms all that the glorious Qur'ãn has mentioned of his commendable acts and praised him for them. He (a.s.) was the noble prephet who stood alone with the religion of monotheism to revive the natural religion and rose for demolition of the pillars of idolatry and breaking of the idols; and this was at a time when the signs of monotheism were obliterated, and the passage of time had effaced the sketches of prophethood; the world had forgotten the names of Nūḥ and other honoured prophets. So, he made the natural religion stand up, and spread the religion of monotheism among the people. The monotheistic religion uptil now – and about four thousand years have gone by since his time – is enduring in his progeny. What the world knows of the religion of monotheism is the religion of the Jews and their prophet is Mūsã, and the religion of the Christians and their prophet is 'Īsã, and they both were from the progeny of Isrã'īl Ya'qūb, son of Isḥãq, son of Ibrãhīm (peace be upon them); and the religion of Islam which was brought by Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and he was from the progeny of Ismã'īl son of Ibrãhīm (peace be upon both).

And among his prayer mentioned by Allãh is his speech: "My Lord! Grant me of the doers of good deeds." (37:100). He asks Allãh for a good offspring; in this affair he adheres to his Lord, and regular-izes his request (which is in a way of this world's benefit) by attaching to it the attribute of good-doing, in order that it turns towards Allãh and His pleasure.

Also, among his beseechings was what he prayed when he arrived at the land of Mecca and had settled Ismã'īl and his mother therein. Allãh says: And when Ibrãhīm said: "My Lord! Make it a secure town and provide its people with fruits, such of them as believe in Allãh and the Last Day." He said: "And whoever disbelieves, I will grant him enjoyment for a short while, then I will drive him to the chastisement of the Fire; and it is an evil destination." (2:126).

He asks his Lord to make the land of Mecca – and at that time it was a desolate tract, a valley without any agriculture – a sanctuary for himself, in order to preserve through it the religion, and it may be a sort of earthly and bodily connection between the people and their Lord, to which they would proceed for worshipping their Lord, and turn towards it in their rituals; and would maintain its sanctity among themselves. So it would be an enduring sign of Allãh on the earth, whoever remem-bers it will remember Allãh, whoever proceeds to it, will proceed to Him; with it direction will be pinpointed, and the word united.

The proof that he (a.s.) intends with "security", a legislative security (which is the meaning of making it a secure town), and not the physical peace and safety from the battles, wars and many other events which disturb the peace and order, and destroy the people's well-being, may be found in the divine words: . . . What! Have We not settled them in a safe, sacred territory to which fruits of every kind are drawn? . . . (28:57). In this verse, Allãh shows His great favour to them that He has made the sacred territory a place of safety for them; it is a place which Allãh has attached to Himself; and it is described as a safe place because the people pay respect to it, not because of any creative factor which would protect it from disturbance and murder. The verse was revealed and before that Mecca had witnessed annihilative wars be-tween the Quraysh and the Jurhum; and likewise it had seen innu-merable murders, tyranny and depravity. The same is the connotation of the divine word: Do they not see that We have made a sacred territory secure, while men are carried off by force from around them? . . . (29:67). That is, these people are not carried off from this sacred territory as the people respect it because of the sanctity We gave to it.

In short, his (a.s.) aim was that there should be for Allāh a sanctuary in the land, which his offspring were to settle in; and this could not be achieved except by building a town which the people would pro-ceed to from every direction; so it would be a religious gathering place where they would arrive for settlement, refuge and pilgrimage upto the Day of Resurrection. That is why he prayed that Allāh should make it a secure town; and it was without any greenery, so he prayed that Allāh should give them sustenance from the fruits, in order that it should become inhabited by its residents and they should not go away from it.

Then, when he felt that his prayer for such honour includes believers and unbelievers both, he attached to it the proviso of belief in Allāh and the hereafter, and said: "... such of them as believe in Allāh and the Last Day." As for that: how will it be possible in a town inhabited by believers and unbelievers together, and they are at vari-ance; or if it is inhabited by unbelievers only; or how will they be sustained with fruits while the land is plain and uncultivated, such questions did not occur to his mind.

In fact, it was a good manner of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) in his position of a beseecher. It would be a waste of word for a beseecher to teach his Lord as to how his request be fulfilled; or, what is the way to comply with his request; while He is the Lord, All-Knowing, Wise, All-Powerful; His command, when He intends anything, is only to say to it, 'Be', so it is.

However, Allāh wanted to fulfil his need according to the usual system of normal causality, and in this there is no differentiation between a believer and an unbeliever. Therefore, Allāh completed his prayer by adding a restriction in His speech: "And whoever disbe-lieves, I will grant him enjoyment for a short while, then I will drive him to the chastisement of the Fire; and it is an evil destination."

This prayer which led to the legislation of the divine sanctuary; also the construction of the holy Ka'bah, which was the first house appointed for men, the one at Bakkah, blessed and a guidance for the nations, was one of the fruits of his holy sublime endeavour, with which he has put all the Muslims under his obligation upto the Day of Resurrection.

Another of his invocations was the one he prayed in the later part of his life and which Allāh describes in the following words: And when Ibrāhīm said: "My Lord! Make this city secure, and save me and my sons from worshipping idols: My Lord! Surely they have led many people astray; then whoever follows me, he is surely of me, and who-ever disobeys me, Thou surely art Forgiving, Merciful: O our Lord! Surely I have settled a part of my offspring in a valley devoid of agri-culture, near Thy Sacred House, our Lord! That they may keep up prayer; therefore make the hearts of some people yearn towards them and provide them with fruits; haply they may be grateful: O our Lord! Surely Thou knowest what we hide and what we make public, and nothing in the earth nor anything in heaven is hidden from Allãh; Praise be to Allãh, Who has given me in old age Ismã'īl and Isḥãq; most surely my Lord is the Hearer of prayer; My Lord! Make me keep up prayer and from my offspring (too), O our Lord! Grant me forgive-ness and my parents and the believers on the day when the reckoning shall come to pass!" (14:35-41).

This he had prayed in his later days when the town of Mecca was already built. See for proof, his words: "Praise be to Allãh, Who has given me in old age Ismã'īl and Isḥãq"; and the word: "make this city secure". (Note that he did not say as before: "make it a secure town" – 2:126)

His decency is noticed by his adhering to the Divinity through-out his prayers. Whenever he asks for something as reserved to his own self, he says: "My Lord!" and whenever he mentions a thing which he shares with others, he says: "Our Lord!"

Another etiquette is reflected in these prayers, in that whenever he asks for something which could be used for lawful as well as un-lawful purpose, he clearly mentions his correct and lawful purpose; this gives rise to the divine mercy, as is very clear. When he said: "save me and my sons . . .", he followed it by saying: "Surely they have led many people astray"; and when he said: "O our Lord! Surely I have settled a part of my offspring . . .," he said: "our Lord! That they may keep up prayer"; and when he prayed: ". . . make the hearts of some people yearn towards them and provide them with fruits; he ended it with the hope: haply they may be grateful."

Also, it was an example of his manner that he mentioned, at the end of every need, an appropriate good name of Allãh, like: the Forgiving, the Merciful, the Hearer of prayer; and repeated the name: 'Lord', whenever he mentioned any of his needs, because the Lordship is the rope which links the servant and the Lord, and it is the key of the door of every prayer.

His manner is also seen in his speech: "and whoever disobeys me, Thou surely art Forgiving, Merciful", inasmuch as he did not curse them with any untoward thing; rather he mentioned when speaking about them two of the divine names which are the means of conveying happiness to every man, i.e. Forgiving, Merciful, in his desire for rescuing his people and spreading the magnanimity of his Lord.

IBRÃHĪM & ISMÃ'ĪL: Another example is found in what Allãh has quoted from him and his son Ismã'īl – and they had jointly said it: And when Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl raised the foundations of the House: "Our Lord! Accept from us; surely Thou art the Hearing, the Knowing; Our Lord! And make us both submissive to Thee and (raise) from our offspring a nation submitting to Thee, and show us our ways of devotion and turn to us (mercifully), surely Thou art the Oft-returning (to mercy), the Merciful. Our Lord! And raise up in them a Messenger from among them who shall recite to them Thy signs and teach them the Book and the Wisdom, and purify them; surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise." (2:127-129)

It was their prayer when they were building the Ka'bah, and this too, like the preceding prayers, contains beautiful manners.

Similar manners are seen in Ismã'īl (a.s.)'s talk during the story of the slaughter, which Allãh describes as follows: So We gave him the good news of a boy, possessing forbearance. And when he attained to working with him, he said: "O my son! Surely I see in dream that I am sacrificing you; consider then what you see." He said: "O my father! Do what you are commanded; if Allãh please, you will find me of the patient ones." (37:101-102)

At the beginning of this talk, shows Ismã'īl (a.s.)'s manner with his father, but later parts show his attitude between him and his Lord. Moreover, showing respect to a messenger like Ibrãhīm, 'The Friend of Allãh" (a.s.), is showing respect to Allãh Himself, the Sublime.

In short, when his father told him of what he had seen in the dream (and it was a divine command as is proved by Ismã'īl's words: "do what your are commanded"), he ordered him to consider what was his opinion. This was his (a.s.)'s manner with his son. Ismã'īl said to him: "O my father! Do what you are commanded; if Allãh please, you will find me of the patient ones." He did not say that it was his opinion, in order to show his humility vis-à-vis his father, as though he has no opinion of his own in presence of his father's. That is why he began the talk addressing him with the attribute of fatherhood; he did not say. Do it if you want it; he did so to please his father; and he said during it that it was a divine command given to Ibrãhīm, and it is un-imaginable for the one like him to hesitate or think twice about such a command without complying with it.

Also, his words: "if Allãh please, you will find me of the patient ones." is another endeavour to please his father. All this shows his good manners with his father.

And with his Lord he showed his manners, when he did not present his opinion or decision in a definite way; rather he attached it to the pleasure of Allãh; it is because definitely expressing a view without attaching it to the pleasure of Allãh indicates a claim of inde-pendent causality, and far removed from it is the arena of prophet-hood. And Allãh has condemned a group who decided an affair with-out attaching it to the pleasure of Allãh, as He has said in the story of the owners of the garden: Surely We tried them as We had tried the owners of the garden, when they swore that they would certainly cut off the produce in the morning, and they did not say, God willing (68: 17-18). Also, Allãh had taught His prophet (s.a.w.a.) in His Book to say: 'God willing', with an amazing allusion, when He said: And do not say of anything: 'Surely I will do it tomorrow,' unless Allãh pleases; . . . (18:23-24)

YA'QŪB: Another example of this manner is seen in the narrative given by Allãh of Ya'qūb's expression when his sons had returned from Egypt leaving there Benjamin and Yahuda. Allãh says: And he turned away from them, and said: "O my sorrow for Yūsuf!" And his eyes became white on account of grief, and he was a represser (of grief). They said: "By Allãh! You will not cease to remember Yūsuf until you are a prey to constant disease or (until) you are of those who perish." He said: "I only complain of my grief and sorrow to Allãh, and I know from Allãh what you do not know." (12:84-86)

He says to his sons that my constant remembering of Yūsuf means that I complain my wretched condition to Allãh; and I have not despaired of the mercy of my Lord that He will return him to me un-expectedly; he said it because it is a manner of the prophets vis-à-vis their Lord that they turn to Him in all their conditions, and direct all their movements and their stillness into His way, for Allãh has clearly said that He has guided them to it on a straight path. He says: These are they whom Allãh guided, . . . (6:90); and He says especially about Ya'qūb: And We gave to him (Ibrãhīm) Isḥãq and Ya'qūb; each did we guide, . . . (6:84). Then He has said that following desire is going astray from the way of Allāh: . . . and do not follow desire, lest it should lead you astray from the way of Allāh; . . . (38:26).

Thus, the prophets – who are rightly guided by the guidance of Allāh – do not follow desire at all. Their psychological feelings and inner inclinations – desire or anger, love or hate, happiness or sorrow for what is related to appearances of life, such as wealth, sons, marri-age, food, dress, abode and so on – all this occurs in the way of Allāh; they do not intend from these except Allāh, Great is His Majesty! There are two ways, which are trodden, a way in which truth is followed, and another in which desire is followed. Or you may say: The way of Allāh's remembrance, and the way of forgetting Him.

As the prophets (peace be upon them) were guided to Allāh and did not follow desire, they constantly remembrered Allāh, they did not intend with movement or stillness other than Allāh, the High; nor did they knock for any need of their life any door of any cause other than His door. We mean to say that when they attached themselves to a cause, it did not make them forget their Lord, nor were they oblivious of the fact that all affairs are in His hand. It does not mean that they absolutely rebut the cause in such a way that it loses its existence in mind also, because this cannot be done. Nor is it that they look at the things and remove from them their attribute of causality, because it would cause going against the human nature. Rather it means that man does not see any independence in anything other than Allāh, and puts everything in its place where Allāh has placed it.

When the condition of the prophets was as we have described above that they totally adhere to Him, then this divine manner enabled them to watch the position of their Lord and properly attach them-selves to His divinity; thus they aim at nothing except Allāh, and do not leave anything except for pleasure of Allāh; they do not adhere with any cause without adhering with their Lord before it and with it and after it; so He is their destination in all conditions.

Ya‘qūb (a.s.)'s speech: "I only complain of my grief and sorrow to Allāh", aims at explaining that 'my constantly remembring Yūsuf and my sorrow for him is not like you people that when one of you is inflicted by a misfortune and loses one of the favours of Allāh, he begins talking about it before someone who owns neither benefit nor harm, all this because of his ignorance; rather I address my complaint to Allāh because of the grief I feel for disappearance of Yūsuf; and it is not a request from me for something which is not to be, for I know from Allãh what you do not know.'

YŪSUF: Another example is that which Allãh quotes Yūsuf, The Truth-ful, as saying when the wife of ʻAzīz threatened him with imprison-ment if he did not do what she was telling him to do: He said: "My Lord! The prison is dearer to me than that to which they invite me; and if Thou turn not away their device from me, I will yearn towards them and become (one) of the ignorant." (12:33).

He (a.s.) describes to his Lord that he now has only two alter-natives in facing these women, prison or accepting what they were asking him to do; and he because of his knowledge which Allãh has honoured him with – and it is mentioned in the divine words: And when he had attained maturity, We gave him wisdom and knowledge; . . . (12:22) – chooses prison in preference to accepting their demand; but the causes are pressing in favour of their desire and are threatening him to ignore the position of his Lord and nullify the knowledge he has got from Allãh; and there is no decision in all this except for Allãh; as he said to his fellow-prisoner: ". . . judgement is only Allãh's; . . ." (12:40). That is why he (a.s.) maintained good manners and did not mention any need of himself, because that is a sort of judgement. He rather alluded to the threat of ignorance by nullification of the favour of knowledge with which his Lord had honoured him. He (a.s.), also mentioned that his safety from the danger of ignorance and repulsion of their devices depended on its averting by Allãh; thus he surrendered the whole affair to Allãh and became silent.

Then his Lord accepted his [unspoken] prayer, and removed their device from him – and it was either sensual passion or prison, and Allãh protected him from both. It is understood from it that their device refers to the desire and the prison together. As for his word: "My Lord! The prison is dearer to me than that to which they invite me;" it shows his inclination in case the matter remained suspended between the two; it is an allusion to his hate and hatred of indecency; it was not a prayer for imprisonment, as [Imãm Ḥusayn, a.s.] had said:

Death is better than boarding a disgrace,
And disgrace is better than entering the Fire.

It was not as some people think that Yūsuf (a.s.) had prayed for imprisonment, so it was decided accordingly. The proof of what we have said is found in the following divine words: Then it occurred to them after they had seen the signs that they should imprison him till a time (12:35). This verse clearly says that his imprisonment happened because of an opinion which occurred to them afterwards, and Allāh had already averted from him their device i.e., their temptation to themselves and the threat of imprisonment.

One more example of Yūsuf (a.s.)'s manner is seen in his praise of, and prayer from, Allāh, as He says: Then when they came in to Yūsuf, he took his parents to lodge with him and said: "Enter safe into Egypt, if Allāh please." And he raised his parents upon the throne and they fell down in prostration before him, and he said: "O my father! This is the interpretation of my vision of old; my Lord has indeed made it to be true; and He was indeed kind to me when He brought me forth from the prison and brought you from the desert after that the Satan had sown dissensions between me and my brothers, surely my Lord is benignant to whom He pleases; surely He is the Knowing, the Wise. My Lord! Thou hast given me of the kingdom and taught me of the interpretation of sayings: Originator of the heavens and the earth! Thou art my guardian in this world and the hereafter, make me die a Muslim and join me with the good." (12:99-101).

A scholar should contemplate on the prophetic manner appearing from these verses. Just imagine the kingdom and absolute authority which Yūsuf was enjoying and how eagerly his parents yearned to visit him, and how much humility his brothers felt towards him, and all of the parties fully remembered his life history since they had lost him till they found him while he was the overlord of Egypt, settled on the throne of power and authority.

And then see that he never opened his month for a talk but there was a part of it, or the full talk, reserved for his Lord, except the open-ing clause when he told them to: "Enter safe into Egypt, if Allāh please." So he asked them to enter and declared their safety, but at once attached it to the pleasure of Allāh, lest somebody think that he was independent in this judgement, besides Allāh; while it was he who had earlier said: "judgement is only Allāh's".

Then he began praising his Lord for all that had passed on him since he had separated from them until he was gathered together with them. He started with the story of his vision and realization of its inter-pretation; and he affirmed in it the truthfulness of his father, not in his interpretation only, but even in what he had mentioned in the end of his talk regarding Allāh's knowledge and wisdom, penetrating deeply in the praise of his Lord, as his father had told him [in the beginning]. And thus will your Lord choose you and teach you the interpretation of sayings and . . . surely your Lord is Knowing, Wise. (12:6), and Yūsuf now tells his father: "O my father! This is the interpretation of my vision of old; . . . surely my Lord is benignant to whom He pleases; surely He is the Knowing, the Wise." (12:100)

Then he pointed briefly to what had passed over him between his vision and appearance of its interpretation, and ascribed it to his Lord describing it as good – and it was beneficence from Allãh. It was a very fine manner that he indicated to all that he suffered from his brothers from the time they threw him in the pit till they sold him for a very low price of a few dirhams and accused him of theft, in a short sentence: the Satan had sown dissensions between me and my brothers [12:100]. And he continued mentioning the bounties of his Lord and praising Him, saying: "My Lord! My Lord!" until he was over-whelmed by the love and overcome by the divine attraction, and he became totally occupied with his Lord and left them as if he did not recognize them; and said: "My Lord! Thou has given me of the king-dom and taught me of the interpretation of sayings." In this way, he praised his Lord for His bounties, which were with him, i.e., kingdom and knowledge of the interpretation of sayings. Then his noble self moved from the remembrance of the bounties to the fact that his Lord who bestowed on him what He bestowed did it all because He is the Originator of the heavens and the earth who has brought forth all things from total non-existence to existence, without their being any novelty for anything on its own with which it could possess any harm or benefit, felicity or infelicity or any ability to manage any affair of itself in this world or in the hereafter.

And because He is the Originator of everything, He is the Guardian of everything. That is why he (a.s.) said after the clause: "Originator of the heavens and the earth!" that he is a humble servant, he does not own management of his self in the world or in the here-after; rather he is under the guardianship and control of Allãh, Who chooses for him of the good what He pleases and places him in any position He wishes. So he said: "Thou art my guardian in this world and the hereafter," at this juncture he mentioned what he needed from his Lord, i.e., he should go from this world to the hereafter while he is in the state of submission to his Lord to the extent that Allãh had bestowed it on his fathers, Ibrãhīm, Ismã'īl, Isḥãq and Ya'qūb. Allãh says: . . . and most certainly We chose him in this world, and in the hereafter he is most surely among the righteous. When his Lord said to him: "Submit (yourself)," he said: "I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds." And the same did Ibrãhīm enjoin on his sons and so (did) Ya'qūb. "O my sons! Surely Allãh has chosen for you (this) faith, therefore die not unless you are Muslims." (2:130-2).

To this refers Yūsuf (a.s.) in his prayer: . . . make me die a Muslim and join me with the good (12:101). He prays for death on Islam and then to be joined with good servants. It was the same, which his great-grandfather Ibrãhīm (a.s.) had asked for when he said: "My Lord! Grant me wisdom, and join me with the good." (26:83). So, it was positively answered as seen in the previously mentioned verses. And on this note Allãh has ended his story; and most surely to your Lord is the destination [53:42]. This is an extremely delicate grace of the Qur'ãnic contexts.

MŪSÃ: Among the prophetic manners is what Allãh describes about His prophet Mūsã (a.s.) during his early days in Egypt, when he struck a Coptic and killed him. He said: "My Lord! Surely I have done harm to myself, so do forgive me." So He forgave him; surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. (28:16).

Another example is his prayer when he fled from Egypt, reached Madyan and watered the sheep of the daughters of Shu'ayb and retired to the shade: Then he said: "My Lord! Surely I stand in need of what-ever good Thou mayest send down to me." (28:24).

Mūsã (a.s.) in both his prayers has observed the manner, after taking refuge with Allãh and adherence to His divinity, in that he, in the first prayer, clearly mentioned what he needed, because it was con-cerned with forgiveness, and Allãh loves to be asked for forgiveness, as He has said: . . . and ask the forgiveness of Allãh; surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful. (2:199); and it was the factor to which Nūḥ and the prophets coming after him had been calling the people. But he did not pinpoint his need in the second prayer by which, as the context apparently shows, he wanted to fulfil his needs of life like food, accom-modation, for example; he showed his neediness and then was silent; after all what respect has got this world in the eyes of Allãh?

You should know that Mūsã's words: "My Lord! Surely I have done injustice to myself, so do Thou forgive me", runs in confessing to have committed injustice and asking for forgiveness, parallel to the prayer of Adam and his wife, when they said: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to ourselves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers." (7:23). The injustice here means injustice against his own self, because he had done a deed that was against the welfare of his life, in the same way as it was in case of Adam and his wife.

Certainly, Mūsã (a.s.) did what he did before Allãh had sent him with His sharī'ah which forbade slaying a man; moreover, he had slain only an unbeliever whose life was not respectable; and there is no proof that such a killing was forbidden before his sharī'ah. And the same was the situation regarding the disobedience of Adam and his wife; they had indeed done harm to their own selves by eating from the tree, before Allãh had laid down any sharī'ah for human beings – Allãh had established sharī'ah – whatever it might be – after they had come down from the garden to the earth.

Mere prohibition of going near the tree does not prove that it was an authoritative order whose disobedience entails sin (in terms of fiqh); rather there are associations to show that the prohibition was of advisory nature, as appears from the verses of the chapter "Ṭã Hã", and we have explained in the explanation of the story of Adam's garden, in the first volume of the book.

As for Mūsã (a.s.), the Divine Book clearly says that he was a purified servant; and that Iblīs cannot seduce the purified servants of Allãh, the High; and it is evidently known that sin cannot occur with-out misleading of Iblīs. Allãh says: And mention Mūsã in the Book; surely he was one purified, and he was a messenger, a prophet. (19:51); He said: "Then by Thy might I will surely seduce them all, except Thy servants from among them, the purified ones." (38:82-83).

It appears from the above that the forgiveness, for which he had prayed, like the prayer of Adam and his wife, does not mean wiping off the chastisement which Allãh writes for the sinners – as is the case with disobedience of authoritative commands; rather it means erasure of evil consequences which come in the wake of doing harm to one-self in the course of life. In fact, Mūsã (a.s.) was afraid lest his affair be known to them and they recognize what they would consider as his sin. So, he asked his Lord that He should cover for him and forgive him; and "forgiveness" in the Qur'ãnic language is more general than wiping off the chastisement, it is rather wiping off the evil conse-quences whatever they might be. And there is no doubt that the authority of this all is in the hand of Allãh.

In a way, similar to it is the earlier-mentioned prayer of Nūḥ (a.s.):

". . . and if Thou shouldst not forgive me and have mercy on me, I should be of the losers." (11:47), i.e. if Thou didst not teach me Thy manners, and didst not protect me by Thy protection and safety, and didst not have mercy on me in this way, I should be of the losers. Understand it.

Another example is Mūsã (a.s.)'s prayer when revelation was sent to him for the first time and he was given the message to convey to his people as Allãh has quoted: He said: "O my Lord! Expand my breast for me; and make my affair easy for me; and loose the knot from my tongue; (that) they may understand my word; and give to me an aider from my family; Hãrūn, my brother; strengthen my back by him; and associate him (with me) in my affair; so that we should glorify Thee much; and remember Thee oft; surely, Thou art seeing us." (20:25-35).

He seriously thinks over the religious mission of which he has been given responsibility, and says to his Lord – as is inferred from the words with help of the context – "that surely Thou art seeing my and my brother's condition; that we, since our early life, love Thy glorification; tonight Thou hast burdened me with the load of messen-gership, and I feel that I am hot-tempered and that there is knot in my tongue – the factors which Thou knowest better; and I fear that they would accuse me of falsehood if I called them to Thee and conveyed Thy message to them; then I shall be angry and my tongue will not work; therefore expand my breast for me and make my affairs easy for me." This is the removal of harm which Allãh mentions in His speech: There is no harm in the Prophet doing that which Allãh has ordained for him; (such has been) the course of Allãh with respect of those who have gone before; . . . (33:38); "and loose the knot from my tongue (that) they may understand my word; and my brother Hãrūn's tongue is more eloquent than mine, and he is from my family, so associate him with me in this affair and make him my helper, so that we should glorify Thee much, as we loved to do so, and should remember Thee often before the gatherings of the people helping each other." This is the gist of what he (a.s.) asked his Lord for, from among the equip-ments of the mission and conveying. The manner which he has used here is that he clearly mentioned the aim and objective of his askings, lest it might be thought that he was asking all this for his own self; so he said: "so that we should glorify Thee much, and remember Thee oft." And he offered in proof of his claim's truth, the knowledge of Allãh Himself, by throwing their selves before Him and submitting themselves to Him; so he said: "surely, Thou art seeing us." And when the needy beseecher throws himself in his need before the wealthy and magnanimous beseeched one, it becomes the mightiest factor in inciting the feeling of mercy, because it displays the need more clearly than its verbal description could do – after all, it is not impossible for the tongue to tell lie.

Another example is when Mūsã (a.s.) prayed against Pharaoh and his chiefs, as he said: And Mūsã said: "Our Lord! Surely Thou hast given to Pharaoh and his chiefs finery and riches in this world's life, to this end, our Lord, that they lead (people) astray from Thy way: Our Lord! Destroy their riches and harden their hearts so that they believe not until they see the painful punishment." He said: "The prayer of you both has indeed been accepted, therefore continue in the right way and do not follow the path of those who do not know." (10:88-89).

The prayer was jointly of Mūsã and Hãrūn; that is why it began with the word: "Our Lord!" and it is proved by the next verse, He said: "The prayer of you both has indeed been accepted." They first cursed their riches that it should be destroyed; then they invoked Allãh against them that He should harden their hearts so that they would not believe until they saw the painful chastisement, in order that their faith would not be accepted, as Allãh says: On the day when some of the signs of your Lord shall come, its faith shall not profit a soul which did not believe before, or earn good through its faith. . . . (6:158).

That is, take revenge from them by forbidding the faith to them through suddenly inflicting punishment on them as they had deprived Thy servants of it by leading them astray. This was the hardest possible curse, which could be inflicted on anyone, because it is the curse for ever-lasting infelicity, and nothing is more evil than that for a man.

Curse, or prayer for evil, is different from prayer for good, because the divine mercy is ahead of His wrath; Allãh had revealed to Mūsã (a.s.): "(As for) My chastisement, I will afflict with it whom I please, and My mercy encompasses all things; . . ." (7:156). Thus, the all-encompassiveness of the divine mercy dislikes inflicting harm or loss to any of His servants even if he is unjust. Its proof is seen in the divine bounties on them, in His covering them with His magnanimity; and in His ordering His servants for forbearance, and in His patience on their ignorance and stupidity – except in establishing an important right or in emergency in inequity when they are fully aware that a necessary underlying reason, like that of religion or people of religion demands it.

Apart from that, the more delicate and subtle the aspects of good and bliss; the more adhering it would be to the souls, by the nature on which Allāh has created people – contrary to the aspects of evil and infelicity; because man by his nature flees from knowing it, and tries not to pay attention to its root, let alone its particulars. This factor causes difference in manner between the two types of prayers, i.e. of good and of evil.

Thus, it is among the manners of prayer for evil that affairs leading to that prayer should be mentioned obliquely, and particularly about the ugly and detestable matters, contrary to the prayer for the good, because clearly mentioning such prayer factors is desirable. Mūsā (a.s.) has kept it in mind when he said: "that they lead (people) astray from Thy way," and did not give the details of the oppressions being inflicted by the people of Pharaoh.

Among its manners is augmentation of entreaty and supplication; and he (a.s.) did so by saying: "Our Lord!" and repeating it several times in such a short prayer.

Another manner is that a man should not pray for evil about someone except when he knows that it is in the interest of truth for religion or its people – without basing it on imagination or accusation. And Mūsā (a.s.) had full knowledge of it, and Allāh has said about Pharaoh: And truly We showed him Our signs, all of them, but he rejected and refused. (20:56). Probably, it is for this reason that Allāh ordered Mūsā and his brother when He informed them of the acceptance of their prayer: "therefore continue in the right way and do not follow the path of those who do not know." [10:89]. And Allāh knows better.

Another prayer of Mūsā was the one quoted by Allāh in the following verses: And Mūsā chose out of his people seventy men for Our appointment; so when the earthquake overtook them, he said: "My Lord! If Thou hadst pleased, Thou hadst destroyed them before and myself (too); wilt Thou destroy us for what the fools among us have done? It is not but Thy trial, Thou makest err with it whom Thou pleasest and guidest whom Thou pleasest; Thou art our Guardian, therefore forgive us and have mercy on us, and Thou art the best of the forgivers. And ordain for us good in this world's life and in the hereafter, for surely we turn to Thee." (7:155-6).

The actual prayer begins with the words: "therefore forgive us"; however it was an extremely hard situation, as they were inflicted by divine wrath and violant attack which nothing can stand against; and asking for forgiveness and mercy from an angry master whose master-ship has been debased and insulted, is not like asking for it from a master who is in normal condition. That is why Mūsā (a.s.) offered before that what would calm down the flare up of the divine wrath, in order that he could then proceed to the asking for forgiveness and mercy.

Thus he said: "My Lord! If Thou hadst pleased, Thou hadst destroyed them before and myself (too)." He wants to say, as the con-text shows: 'My Lord! Surely my soul and their souls all together are in Thy hand, and submissive to Thy pleasure; if Thou hast pleased, Thou wouldst have destroyed them and myself too before today, as Thou hast destroyed them and kept me alive today. Now, what shall I say to my people when I shall go back to them and they would accuse me of murdering all of them, and Thou knowest the condition of my people better than I do; this would nullify my mission and all my endeavours would be forfeited.'

Then he (a.s.) counted the destruction of the seventy as the destruction of himself and his people; and mentioned that those were the fools of his community and no importance should be attached to their deeds. Thus, he incited his Lord's mercy, as it was not His custom to destroy a community because of the deeds of some fools among them. It was but an example of the general test and trial which is always prevalent in human beings, and are led astray by it many, and are guided aright by it many, and Thou hast not dealt with them except by forgiveness and covering.

As in Thy hand is the authority of my soul and our souls, Thou canst destroy us whenever Thou pleasest; and this event is not some-thing unique in the way of Thy general trial which results in going astray of one group and being guided aright of another, and all this does not end except at Thy pleasure; therefore Thou art our Guardian, by thine order and pleasure stands management of our affairs, and we have nothing to do with it; so judge Thou about us with forgiveness and mercy; among Thy attributes is that Thou art the best of forgivers; ordain for us in this world a life secure from punishment, and it is the one that is liked by him who is overwhelmed by the divine wrath, and in the life hereafter the good by forgiveness and the garden.

This was the style used by him (a.s.) in his prayer, when had taken up his people the eathquake and covered them the misfortune. See how did he use the beautiful homage of servitude, and sought, through it, his Lord's mercy. He continued beseeching the mercy and calming down with his praises the out-burst of divine wrath until he got the response which he had not mentioned in words, at all, and it was their renaissance after the destruction, and the revelation came to him as Allãh says: He said: "(As for) My chastisement, I will afflict with it whom I please, and My mercy encompasses all things; so I will ordain it for those who guard (against evil) and pay the zakāt*, and those who believe in Our signs."* (7:156). Now, what do you think about Him after He said to Mūsā (a.s.) in answer to his prayer: and My mercy encompasses all things?

Allāh mentions that He had clearly forgiven them and accepted the prayer of Mūsā (a.s.) by returning them to life when they had been destroyed; and bringing them back to this world, as He says: And when you said: "O Mūsā! We will not believe in you until we see Allāh manifestly," so the punishment overtook you while you looked on. Then We raised you up after your death that you may give thanks (2:55-56). The report in the chapter of "Women" [4:153] is nearer to it.

Mūsā (a.s.) had maintained manners in his talk when he said: "Thou makest err with it whom Thou pleasest"; he did not mention that it occurred because of evil choice of those who went astray, in order to show verbally God's deanthropomorphism – as he did so in heart; thus it will be like the divine words: He causes many to err by it and many He leads aright by it; but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26). He used this style because the place prevented him from paying attention except to the fact of Allāh being the absolute Guardian to Whom only ends every management.

And in all this talk he did not mention the main issue which was in his heart, i.e., the prayer that Allāh should give them back their lives after destroying them, because the situation with all its fright and danger prevented him from elaboration; he merely pointed to it briefly by saying: "My Lord! If Thou hadst pleased, Thou hadst destroyed them before and myself (too) . . ."

Also, among his invocations is that which he prayed when he returned to his people from the meeting point and found that they had begun calf-worship after him; and Allāh had informed him of that misdeed, as He says: And he threw down the tablets and seized his brother by the head, dragging him towards him. He said: "Son of my mother! Surely the people reckoned me weak and had well-nigh slain me, therefore make not the enemies to rejoice over me and count me not among the unjust people." (7:150). Then Mūsā (a.s.) became soft towards him and prayed for him and for himself, so they should be distinguished from the unjust people. He said: "My Lord! Forgive me and my brother, cause us to enter into Thy mercy, and Thou art the most Merciful of the merciful ones." (7:151).

Why did he want to be distinguished from the other people, and that Allãh should enter both of them in His mercy? It was only because he knew that the divine wrath was surely to overtake them because of their injustice, as Allãh describes it after the above verse: (As for) those who took the calf (for a god), surely wrath from their Lord and disgrace in this world's life shall overtake them, . . . (7:52). The preced-ing explanation will show the way of good manners in his talk.

Another of his (a.s.)'s prayers – and it is in effect a curse against his people who had said when he ordered them to enter the holy land: They said: "O Mūsã! We shall never enter it at all so long as they remain therein; go therefore you and your Lord then fight you both, surely we will here sit down." (5:24); – is that which Allãh narrates in his words: He said: "My Lord! Surely I have no control (upon any) but my own self and my brother; therefore make a separation between us and the nation of transgressors." (5:25).

He (a.s.) used fine manners when he alluded to his intention of stopping to tell them and to convey to them the commands of their Lord again – after they rejected his first command in such an ugly and rude way – by his saying: "My Lord! Surely I have no control (upon any) but my own self and my brother;" i.e.: 'no one obeys my orders except I and my brother; these people have rebutted my order in such a way that now there is no hope about them; so now I desist from telling them Thy commands and guiding them to what contains their community's welfare.'

The verb translated here: "I have no control", actually means, 'I do not possess'. But the context shows that here it means 'possession of obedience'. Had it meant creative possession, he (a.s.) would not have attributed it to himself without making it clear that real pos-session belongs to Allãh only, and whatever he owns is only that which Allãh has given into his possession; and when he explained to his Lord his desistance and despair of their positive response to his call, he left the judgement in Allãh's hand and said: "therefore make a separation between us and the nation of transgressors."

SHUʿAYB: Of the same style is the curse, which Shuʿayb (a.s.) did against his people, when he said: "Our Lord! Decide between us and our people with truth; and Thou art the best of deciders." (7:89).

Thus, he asks for fulfilment of the divine promise after he lost all hope of his call being effective among them; and requests Him to decide between him and them with truth, as Allãh has said: And every nation had a messenger; so when their messenger came, the matter was decided between them with justice and they shall not be dealt with unjustly (10:47).

He used the pronoun: us, because he joined the believers to himself; and the unbelievers had threatened him and the believers all together when they had said: "We will most certainly turn you out, O Shu'ayb! And (also) those who believe with you, from our town, or you shall come back to our faith." . . . (7:88). So, he joined them to himself and abandoned his people in their misdeeds, and proceeded with the believers to his Lord, and said: "Our Lord! Decide between us . . ."

He adhered in his prayer to the noble divine name: "the best of the deciders," because, as mentioned earlier adherence to the attribute, which agrees with the text of the prayer, is an intense support tanta-mount to adjuration. It is contrary to the talk of Mūsã (a.s.) quoted earlier: "My Lord! Surely I have no control (upon any) but my own self and my brother; therefore make a separation between us and the nation of transgressors;" because, as we had explained, his (a.s.)'s words were not really a prayer; rather they were an allusion that he would desist from his call and return all the matters to God. So there was no reason for adjuration, contrary to the talk of Shu'ayb.

DÃWŪD & SULAYMÃN: Another example is what Allãh has quoted of the praise of Dãwūd and Sulaymãn (peace be upon them). Allãh says: And certainly We gave knowledge to Dãwūd and Sulaymãn, and they both said: "Praise be to Allãh, Who has made us to excel many of His believing servants." (27:15)

The aspects of manner in their praise and thank, and their attribution of their knowledge to Allãh, are clear. They did not say like what is quoted from some others, as Qãrūn said to his people when they admonished him not to show arrogance in the land because of his wealth: He says: "I have been given this only on account of the knowl-edge I have." . . . (28:78); or as Allãh describes about some others: Then when their messengers came to them with clear proofs, they exulted in what they had with them of knowledge, and there beset them that which they used to mock (40:83).

There is no harm in the two prophets' praising Allãh for making them excel many of the believers, because it manifests a particular blessing and describes a fact; it is not something like showing arro-gance against the servants of Allãh, which would invite condemnation. Allãh has mentioned that a group of believers had asked for excellence and has praised them for their sublime nature and high ambitions, as He says: And they who say: "O our Lord! . . . and make us leaders for those who are pious." (25:74).

SULAYMÃN: Another example is what has been reported from Sulaymãn in the story of the ant, as He says: Until when they came to the valley of the ants, an ant said: "O ants! Enter your abodes, (so that) Sulaymãn and his hosts may not crush you while they do not know." So he smiled, wondering at her word, and said: "My Lord! Grant me that I should be grateful for Thy favour which Thou hast bestowed on me and on my parents, and that I should do good such as Thou art pleased with, and make me enter, by Thy mercy, into Thy servants, the good ones." (27:18-19).

The ant by its talk reminded him of his great kingdom which was strengthened by subduing the wind as it flew by his order, and the jinns made for him what he wanted, and the knowledge of the birds' speech, etc. But this kingdom did not come to his (a.s.)'s mind as the brightest wish to which man arrives, as it happens in us; it did not make him forget his servitude and his poverty. It rather came to his mind as a favour that his Lord had bestowed on him. So, he remembered his Lord and His blessings, which He had bestowed especially on him and on his parents. And this remembrance from a servant like him, and in such a condition, was the most excellent of manners vis-à-vis his Lord.

He remembered favours of his Lord; although a multitude of favours and blessings were bestowed upon him, yet what he was thinking about at that time and place was the great kingdom and the over-powering authority; and that is why he mentioned good deed and asked his Lord to grant him that he should do good deed; because good deed and good character are desirable from him who sits on the throne of kingdom.

In view of all the above factors, he first asked his Lord to grant him that he should be grateful for His favour; then that he should do good; and he was not content to ask merely for good deed, but added the proviso: "as thou art pleased with"; it was because he was a servant who was not concerned with other than his Lord, and he wanted to do good deed only to please his Lord; then he completed the prayer of tawfīq for goodness of deed by the prayer for goodness of self, so he said: "and make me enter, by Thy mercy, into Thy servants, the good ones."

YŪNUS: Another example is in what Allāh has reported from Yūnus (a.s.). He had prayed in these words when he was in the stomach of the fish that had swallowed him. Allāh says: And Yūnus, when he went away in wrath, so he thought that We would not straiten him, so he called out among afflictions: "There is no god but Thou, glory be to Thee; surely I am of those who make themselves to suffer loss." (21:87).

Yūnus (a.s.) had asked his Lord, as the Qur'ān narrates, to send chastisement on his people, and Allāh had accepted it; then he informed his people of that. When the divine chastisement reached almost over them, they repented to their Lord, and it was averted from them. When Yūnus saw it, he left his people and went away wandering, until he boarded a boat, and a fish blocked its way. They decided to throw to it one of them, so that it might swallow him and leaves the others alone; for this purpose they cast lot, and Yūnus's name came out. He was thrown into the river and the fish swallowed him. He was constantly glorifying his Lord in its belly until Allāh ordered it to throw him up on the bank of the river. However, it was only a divine disciplining, through which He disciplines His prophets as required by their various situations. Allāh says: But had it not been that he was of those who glorify (Us), he would certainly have tarried in its belly to the Day when they will be raised (37:143-4). His turning away from his people and wandering along present the picture of a servant who was not pleased with a certain action of his master, so becoming angry he fled away and left his service and neglected his own responsibilities. Obviously, Allāh did not like this behaviour and disciplined him. He put him in an incapacious prison in which he could not move even about a finger, in utter darkness, and in that darkness he cried out: "There is no god but Thou, glory be to Thee, surely I am of those who make themselves to suffer loss." (21:87).

All of this had one aim only: To make him realize, contrary to what his condition showed, that Allāh has the power to catch and hold him wherever He wishes, and to do with him whatever He pleases, there is no escape from Him except to Him. That is why he learned in that condition in the belly of the fish to acknowledge that only Allāh is worthy of worship, there is no other like Him and nothing can escape from His servitude; so he said: "There is no god but Thou". It should be noted that he did not call Allāh by attribute of Lordship; and it is the only prayer from among the prophets' prayers, which has not begun with the name, 'Lord'.

Then he mentioned what had passed on him that he left his people when Allãh did not destroy them even after sending the punish-ment to them, and he affirmed injustice for himself and glorified Allãh from all that had any shade of injustice and defect, and said: ". . . glory be to Thee, surely I am of those who make themselves to suffer loss."

But he did not mention his [actual] need – i.e. reinstatement to his previous position of servitude – counting himself as undeserving to have any right of asking for any favour, because of intense shame and remorse. The proof that he had in mind an unspoken of request is found in the divine word coming after it: So We responded to him and delivered him from the grief, . . . (21:88)

And the proof that his request consisted of his reinstatement to his previous position, is found in the verses: Then We cast him on to the vacant surface of the earth while he was sick; and We caused to grow up for him a gourd-plant; and We sent him to a hundred thou-sand, rather they exceeded; and they believed, so We gave them pro-vision till a time (37:145-8).

Another example is found in the story of Ayyūb (a.s.) when he said after he became chronically ill and lost all his properties and sons: And Ayyūb, when he cried to his Lord, (saying): "Harm has afflicted me, and Thou art the most Merciful of the merciful." (21:83).

The aspects of good manners are evident here as explained in earlier cases. Ayyūb (a.s.) did not clearly mention his need as was seen in the prayers of Adam, Nūḥ, Mūsã, and Yūnus (peace be upon them), thinking himself unworthy of attention and considering his affairs too trivial to be mentioned. The prophets' prayers, as described earlier and as will be seen afterwards, had never mentioned the requirements clearly, when they were related to worldly affairs, although they did not want any such thing because of any base desires.

From another angle: His mentioning the reason which led him to beseech, like affliction of harm, and describing the attribute found in Him Who is asked from, which incites the beseecher to ask, like His being most Merciful of the merciful, and remaining silent about the actual need, present the most eloquent allusion that it was not necess-ary to mention the need, because it would suggest that the above factors were not sufficient to induce the mercy of the most Merciful of the merciful, rather there was need to describe it in so many words!

Another example is of Zakariyyã (a.s.) as Allãh says: A mention of the mercy of your Lord to His servant, Zakariyyã, when he called upon his Lord in a low voice. He said: "My Lord! Surely my bones are weakened and my head has flared with hoariness, and, my Lord! I have never been unsuccessful in my prayer to Thee; and surely I fear my relatives after me, and my wife is barren, therefore grant me from Thyself an heir, who should inherit me and inherit from the progeny of Ya'qūb, and make him, my Lord! One in whom Thou art well-pleased." (19:2-6).

What prompted him to offer this prayer and encouraged him to ask His Lord for a son was what he had observed Maryam, daughter of 'Imrān, in her abstinence and worship, and how Allāh had honoured her with the manners of servitude and distinguished her with sustenance directly from Himself, as Allāh describes in the chapter of "The House of 'Imrān": . . . and gave her into the charge of Zakariyyā; whenever Zakariyyā entered the sanctuary to (see) her, he found with her food. He said: "O Maryam! Whence comes this to you?" She said: "It is from Allāh." Surely Allāh gives sustenance to whom He pleases, with-out measure. There did Zakariyyā pray to his Lord; he said: "My Lord! Grant me from Thee good offspring; surely Thou art the Hearer of the prayer." (3:37-38)

At that juncture, he was overwhelmed by intense longing for a good and pious offspring who would inherit him and worship his Lord in a way that would please Him, in the same way as Maryam inherited 'Imrān and exerted herself to the utmost in worshipping her Lord, and thus got honour from Him. At the same time, he looked at himself that old age had taken his hold and his strength had gone down, and like-wise his wife was old and weak, and to top all this, she was barren even in her child-bearing age; so he was afflicted with grief of depri-vation of a good and pleasing child which only Allāh could know. Yet he could not control himself and was overwhelmed by divinely zeal and reliance on his Lord; he turned to his Lord and described his con-dition in a way that would incite the divine mercy and affection on his situation that he had remained uninterruptedly adhered to the door of servitude and beseechment since his early age until now that his bones had weakened and his head had flared with hoariness; and he had never been unsuccessful in his prayers; and has found the Lord the Hearer of the prayer; therefore He should hear his prayer and grant him a pleasing heir.

The proof of what we have said that he had asked what he had done, under the influence of intense emotion and sorrow, is seen in his response when Allāh revealed to him that his prayer was granted: He said: "O my Lord! How shall I have a son, and my wife is barren, and I myself have reached indeed the extreme degree of old age?" He said: "So shall it be; your Lord says: 'It is easy to me, and indeed I created you before, when you were nothing.'" (19:8-9). It clearly shows that when he heard about granting of his prayer, he recovered from his condition, and began wondering because of the strangeness of the prayer and its acceptance, until he asked his Lord about it in the form of a farfetched proposition and asked for a sign for himself which he was given.

In any case, the manner which he (a.s.) has used in his prayer, was that to which he was led by the feeling and sorrow which had over-powered him. That is why he preceded his prayer by describing his extreme condition in the way of his Lord, for he had spent his life in treading on the way of repentance and beseeching, until he stood at a situation in which every merciful onlooker's heart would melt for him, then he prayed for a son and supported it with the reason that He is the Hearer of the prayer.

This is the meaning of what he said as preamble of his prayer; it was not that he was trying to put his Lord under his obligation by show-ing his extended servitude – far be it from the status of prophethood. Therefore, the meaning of his prayer: "My Lord! Grant me from Thee good offspring; surely Thou art the Hearer of prayer." [3:38], is as follows: 'Surely I ask Thee what I have asked, not because there is any importance of my extended servitude and lengthy prayers to Thee; or because it has put Thee under any obligation to me; rather, I asked Thee because Thou art the Hearer of the prayer of Thy servants, and Thou acceptest the call of Thy destitute beseechers; and the fear of my relatives after me has compelled me to put this request before Thee and has strongly exhorted me to ask for a good offspring.'

It has been described earlier that as part of the good manner used in his prayer, he said after this fear of the relatives: ". . . and make him, my Lord! One in whom Thou art well-pleased." [19:6]. Pleasant-ness, although by nature it denotes being pleasing to its subject, and being unrestricted it contains pleasure of Allãh and pleasure of Zakariyyã, and pleasure of Yaḥyã; but his words: good offspring [3:37], show that it denotes his being good and pleasing to Zakariyyã, because an off-spring is good to its progenitor, not to others.

Another example of the good manners is seen from the Christ when he asked for the table, as Allãh quotes him: 'Īsã the son of Maryam said: "O Allãh, our Lord! Send down to us food from heaven which should be to us an ever-recurring happiness, to the first of us and to the last of us, and a sign from Thee, and grant us sustenance, and Thou art the best of providers." (5:114).

The story described in the Divine Book about the question of the disciples to ʻĪsā (a.s.) for sending down food from heaven, shows by its context that it was one of the hardest requests for ʻĪsā (a.s.); because their quoted wordings: "Is your Lord able to send down to us food from heaven?" [5:112], first, put under question the power of Allāh, and it does not agree with the manner of servitude; even if they intended to ask about the underlying reason, not the power itself, the ugliness of the wording remains in its place.

Second, it contained suggestion of a new sign, although his (a.s.)'s signs were covering them from all sides – his noble personality was a sign in itself; his speaking in the cradle was another sign, and so were his reviving dead body, his creating a bird, his restoring the blind and lepers to health, his giving information of the unseen, as well as his knowledge of the Tawrāt, the Injīl, the Book and the Wisdom were divine signs, which did not leave any room for any doubt and suspi-cion to anyone. In this background, their choosing a sign for themselves and asking for it was manifestly tantamount to playing with divine signs. That was why he admonished them by saying: "Fear Allāh if you are believers." [5:112]. But they insisted on it and explained their sugges-tion in these words: "We desire that we should eat of it and that our hearts should be at rest, and that we may know that you have indeed spoken the truth to us and that we may be of the witnesses to it." [5:113]. So, they compelled him to ask for it, which he finally did.

ʻĪsā (a.s.) mended by his divinely-gifted manner the demand which they had put forth, and rephrased it in a way that it could be addressed to the arena of divine power and greatness. Firstly, he gave it the title of ʻīd which would be reserved for him and his people, because it would be a sign proposed by them and would be unique among the prophets' signs, as all their signs were sent down for com-pleting the proof against them or because the ummah needed them, and this sign had neither attribute. Secondly, he summarized what the disciples had elaborated regarding the benefits of its coming down, that their hearts should be at ease, and they might know that he had indeed spoken the truth to them and they might be among the wit-nesses to it; all this was included in a single phrase, and a sign from Thee. Then, thirdly, he mentioned what they had said about eating of it; he described it at the end, although they had mentioned it before all other purposes, and he put another garb on it which was more appro-priate for the divine audience and said, and grant us means of subsis-tence, then added to it: "and Thou art the best of providers", in order that it would support the suggestion, on one hand, and be a praise for the Sublime Authority on the other hand.

He began his prayer by calling on Allãh with the phrase: "O Allãh, our Lord!" Thus, he added on what is generally found in the prophets' prayers, as they used to say: "My Lord" or "Our Lord"; he did so because the situation was very tough, as explained earlier.

Another example of this manner will be seen in his (a.s.)'s direct talk with his Lord which is quoted in the Qur'ãn: And when Allãh will say: "O ʿĪsã son of Maryam! Did you say to the people: 'Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allãh'?" He will say: "Glory be to Thee, it did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say); if I had said it, Thou wouldst indeed have known it; Thou knowest what is in my mind, and I do not know what is in Thy mind, surely Thou art the great Knower of unseen things. I did not say to them aught save what Thou didst enjoin me with: 'That worship Allãh, my Lord and your Lord', and I was a witness of them as long as I was among them, but when Thou didst cause me to die, Thou wert the watcher over them, and Thou art witness of all things. If Thou shouldst chastise them, then surely they are Thy servants; and if Thou shouldst forgive them, then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise." (5:116-8)

He (a.s.) observed the manner in his speech, first by beginning his speech with declaring His purity from what does not fit with the glory of His arena, following the style of His speech, as He says: And they say: "The Beneficent God has taken to Himself a son. Glory be to Him." (21:26)

Second, he took his own self too humble to be imagined that he would say such a thing for himself, so that it would need rebuttal. That is why he did not say in this speech from the beginning to the end, "I did not say it" or "I did not do it." He only refuted it time and again by way of allusion and under cover; and said: "It did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say)." Thus he negated it through negation of its cause; i.e. 'I did not have any such right so that I could utter such an untoward word.' Then he said: "If I had said it, Thou wouldst indeed have known it; . . ." So, he refuted it through refutation of its concomitant, i.e. 'if I had said it, Thou must surely hadst known it, because Thy knowledge encompasses me and all unseen things.'

Then he will say: "I did not say to them aught save what Thou didst enjoin me with: 'That worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord.'" He refuted it by bringing forth its opposite, and restricting it with "not" and "save". He says: 'I had told them something, but it was the same which Thou hadst enjoined me to say,' i.e., 'worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord;' then how was it possible that I should say to them, 'Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allāh.'

Then he will say: "and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them, but when Thou didst cause me to die, Thou wert the watcher over them". It is further refutation of the above-mentioned idea; in a way it further completes the above speech: "I did not say to them aught save what Thou didst enjoin me with." Its meaning is as follows: 'I did not say to them anything that is attributed to me; what I had told them was only by your order, and it was: "Worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord;" no other commandment was ever sent to me, and I had no relation with them except witnessing of and watching over them, so long as I was among them; and when Thou didst cause me to die, my connection with them was cut off and Thou wert the watcher over them by Thy everlasting and general witnessing, before Thou didst cause me to die and after that, over them and over every other thing.'

Now, that the talk will reach thus stage, he (a.s.) will decide to repudiate this idea from himself through another reason which would complement the above-mentioned cause, and which would absolutely deny the idea. So, he will say: "If Thou shouldst chastise them, then surely they are Thy servants; and if Thou shouldst forgive them, then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise." He will want to say in this con-text as follows: 'If they had gone astray as Thou hast said, then I am cut off from them and they are cut off from me. Now Thou art to deal with Thy servants alone; if Thou shouldst chastise them, they are Thy servants; and the Master, the Lord, has the authority to chastise his servants if they disobey him and associate others with him, and they deserve to be punished; and if Thou shouldst forgive them, there is no reproof against Thee, because Thou art the Mighty, unsubdued, the Wise, who does not do any unwise and vain deed, and who always does what is more suitable.'

What we have explained, shows fine aspects of the manners of servitude in his (a.s.)'s speech. Also, ponder on the fact that whenever he uttered a sentence, he mixed it with the finest praise, in the most eloquent description and in the truest tongue.

Another example of the divine manner is seen in the words of His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) which has been quoted by Allah, and He has joined the believers of his ummah in it: The Messenger believes in what has been revealed to him from his Lord, and (so do) the believers; they all believe in Allãh and His angels and His books and His messen-gers: "We make no difference between any of His messengers;" and they say: "We hear and obey; our Lord! Thy forgiveness (do we crave), and to Thee is the eventual course." Allãh does not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability; for it is (the benefit of) what it has earned, and upon it is (the evil of) what it has wrought: "Our Lord! Do not punish us if we forget or make a mistake; Our Lord! Do not lay on us a burden as Thou didst lay on those before us; Our Lord! Do not impose upon us that which we have no strength to bear; and pardon us and grant us protection and have mercy on us; Thou art our Patron, so help us against the unbelieving people." (2:285-6).

As you see, the divine words describe the Prophet's belief in the noble Qur'ãn in all that it contains of fundamental beliefs and divine commandments; then it joins with him (s.a.w.a.) the believers among his ummah, not only those who were present near him (s.a.w.a.), but also those were to come later, as is manifest from the context.

It then follows that what the verses contain of acknowledge-ment, praise of prayer, related to some of them would be the narration of the tongue of their condition although possibly their tongues; or the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) himself could have said it directly talking with his Lord on his own behalf and on behalf of the believers, because they by their faith were the branches of the tree of his blessed soul.

The two verses contain a sort of comparison and equilibrium between the People of the Book and the believers of this ummah in the manner of their acceptance of what was revealed to them in the Book of Allãh; or, in other words, with respect to their courteousness of ser-vitude vis-à-vis the Book sent to them. Apparently, Allãh has praised these believers in these two verses and has eased their burden exactly in those aspects in which He has admonished the People of the Book and put them to shame in the verses of the chapter "The Cow". He has indeed criticised them because they differentiated between the angels of Allãh, as they hated Gabriel and loved the others; and between the revealed Divine Books, as they disbelieved in the Qur'ãn and believed in previous ones; and between the messengers of Allãh, as they be-lieved in Mūsã (or in Mūsã and 'Īsã) and disbelieved in Muḥammad (may Allãh's blessings and peace be on him and them), and between His commands, as they believed in some commands of the Book of Allãh and disbelieved in some others; but the believers of this ummah: believe in Allãh, and His angels, and His Books, and His messengers: "We make no difference between any of His messengers".

They indeed observed proper manners vis-à-vis their Lord by submitting to the cognizence sent to them by Allãh. Then they showed the manners by positively responding to the divine commandments, when they said: "We hear and obey"; unlike the Jews who had said: "We hear and we disobey." After that they showed proper manner when they counted their own selves, the slaves possessed by their Lord, who do not own anything, and they do not try to put Allãh under their obligation because of their faith and obedience; so they said: "Thy forgiveness (do we crave)"; they were not like the Jews who had said: "He soon will forgive us"; and said: "Surely Allãh is needy and we are self sufficient"; and said: "The Fire will not touch us except for counted days", and other similar erroneous utterances.

Then Allãh said: Allãh does not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability, for it is (the benefit of) what it has earned, and upon it is (the evil of) what it has wrought. It is because the divinely laid responsibility, by its disposition, follows the nature on which He has created the people; and it is known that the nature, being a sort of creation, does not invite except to what it has been equipped with; and certainly in it is found the felicity of life.

However, if the topic would be of importance which would demand more attention to itself, or if the servant who was ordered went out of the fold of nature, beyond the appearance of servitude, then it would be Ok as a secondary natural command for the master of the one having authority in his hand to give him an order beyond the usual extent of its ability; for example, he may tell him to observe precaution on mere doubt, or to avoid forgetfulness and mistake when utmost attention is given to the topic, e.g. indispensability of precaution in con-nection with blood, genital and property in Islamic; or to increase the inconvenience and tighten the screw the more one increases in dispu-tation and insists in questioning, as Allãh has given us many such an information concerning the Children of Israel.

In any case, the Qur'ãnic phrase: Allãh does not impose upon any soul . . ., is either continuation of the speech of the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) and the believers: If so, then they must have said it as a preamble to their prayer: "Our Lord! Do not punish us if we forget or make a mistake;" in order that it may serve as His praise, to remove a possible misunderstanding that Allãh might impose a burden in the excess of one's ability, and might lay down a disconcerting order – such ideas would be removed by asserting that Allãh does not impose a respon-sibility upon a soul except to the extent of its ability; and what they have asked by saying: "Our Lord! Do not punish us if we forget or make a mistake;" refers to divine commands in their secondary aspects, resulting from the order or from the side of the servants because of their enmity, not from the side of Allãh, the High.

Or, it is the divine speech, inserted between two phrases of their prayer, which are reported here, i.e., "Thy forgiveness (do we crave)," and: "Our Lord! Do not punish us if we forget . . .," in order to give the above-mentioned connotation, in addition to teaching and training them under divine guidance; this too will be a sort of their speech, because they are the believers in what Allãh has sent down, and this too is from Him. In any case, this is what their speech relies on and their prayer depends upon.

Then Allãh mentions the remainder of their prayer; or you may say, the other group of their problems: "Our Lord! Do not punish us . . .", "Our Lord! Do not lay on us a burden as Thou didst lay on those before us"; "Our Lord! Do not impose upon us that which we have not the strength to bear; and pardon us", it is as though they want pardon for what they might have committed in forgetfulness or by mistake and all such reasons; "and grant us protection and have mercy on us" for all our sins and mistakes. Forgiveness here does not entail repetition al-though they had earlier said: "Thy forgiveness (do we crave)", because it quotes their speech in order to compare their condition and their man-ner with their Lord with the People of the Book in their dealing with their Lord and regarding their Book that was sent to them; moreover, the context of prayer does not reject repetition unlike other situations.

It is not necessary to explain how this prayer contains the man-ner of servitude, by adhering to the attribute of Lordship time and again, and confessing to one's being possessed and under guardianship of the owner, standing at the station of humbleness and wretchedness of servi-tude vis-à-vis the Mighty Lord.

The noble Qur'ãn contains divine trainings and sublime teach-ings to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) by various types of praise he uses for his Lord, or the beseechings he offers before Him. For example: Say: "O Allãh, Master of the kingdom! Thou givest the kingdom to whomsoever Thou pleasest, . . ." (3:26); Say: "O Allāh! Originator of the heavens and the earth, Knower of the unseen and the seen! Thou judgest be-tween Thy servants . . ." (39:46); Say: "Praise be to Allāh and peace on His servants whom He has chosen: . . ." (27:59); Say: "Surely my prayer and my sacrifice and my life and my death are (all) for Allāh, . . ." (6:162); ". . . and say: "O my Lord! Increase me in knowledge" (20:114); And say: "O my Lord! I seek refuge in Thee from the evil sug-gestions of the Satans, and I seek refuge in Thee! O my Lord! From their presence." (23:97-98), in addition to numerous such verses.

All these collectively contain the fine manners, which Allāh trained His messenger (s.a.w.a.) with, and he in his turn exhorted his ummah to observe it.

7. Now, we should see how they preserved the manners towards their Lord while they talked with their people: This too is a vast chapter and it is attached to the manners of praising Allāh, the glorified. From an-other angle, it is a sort of practical tablīgh, which is not less, or rather is more, effective than the verbal tablīgh.

There are many such examples in the Qur'ān. Allāh quotes a talk between Nūḥ and his ummah: They said: "O Nūḥ! Indeed you have disputed with us and lengthened dispute with us, therefore bring to us what you threaten us with, if you are of the truthful ones." He said: "Allāh only will bring it to you if He please, and you will not make (Him) incapable. And if I intend to give you good advice, my advice will not profit you if Allāh intended that He should leave you to go astray; He is your Lord, and to Him shall you be returned." (11:32-34). He (a.s.) refuted from himself what they were attributing to him, in order to show his inability in this way; he attributes it to his Lord, and shows finest manner by adding the phrase: "if He please", and then saying: "and you will not make (Him) incapable", i.e. will not make Allāh incapable. That is why he had used the word: Allāh, instead of saying, 'My Lord', because Allāh is He to Whom is the end goal of every beauty and grandeur. Also, he did not consider this much refuta-tion and affirmation enough until he supported it by saying that his advice would not profit them if Allāh did not intend them to get its benefit. Thus he completed the refutation of power from himself and its affirmation for his Lord, and showed its reason by saying: "He is your Lord, and to Him you will be returned."

This is a dialogue steeped in beautiful manners vis-à-vis Allāh; Nūḥ (a.s.) used this speech to address the transgressors of his ummah, disputing with them. And he was the first prophet who opened the door of argumentation in calling to the monotheism, and stood up against the idol-worship, as the noble Qur'ãn describes.

This is the greatest of the doors which lets the researcher's eyes free to look at the prophets' manners; one sees in them the finest of their characteristics which are steeped in good manner and perfection. It is because all their talks and deeds, movements and stillness, are based on contemplation and servitudal presence, although, in form, it looks like the deed of him who is absent from his Lord, and his Lord is absent from him. Allãh says: . . . and those who are with Him are not proud to worship Him, nor do they grow weary. They glorify (Him) by night and day; they are never languid (21:19-20).

Allãh has quoted in His Book many dialogues of Hūd, Ṣāliḥ, Ibrãhīm, Mūsã, Shu'ayb, Yūsuf, Sulaymãn, 'Īsã and Muḥammad, etc. (peace be upon them), in different conditions of theirs, like hardship and ease, war and peace, disclosure and secrecy, good omens and warn-ing and so on.

Contemplate on the divine speech: So Mūsã returned to his people wrathful, sorrowing. Said he: "O my people! Did not your Lord promise you a goodly promise: did then the time seem long to you, or did you wish that displeasure from your Lord should be due to you, so that you broke (your) promise to me?" (20:86). He mentions Mūsã when he returned to his people while he was filled with wrath and rage, but it did not turn him away from observation of manner while mentioning his Lord.

Also, look at the divine words: And she in whose house he was sought to make himself yield (to her), and she made fast the doors and said: "Come forward." He said: "I seek Allãh's refuge, surely my Lord made good my abode: Surely the unjust do not prosper." (12:23).

And the divine words: They said: "By Allãh! Now has Allãh certainly chosen you over us, and we were certainly sinners." He said: "(There shall be) no reproof against you this day; Allãh may forgive you, and He is the most Merciful of the merciful." (12:91-92). He men-tions Yūsuf in privacy wherein the woman of 'Azīz tried to make Yūsuf yield to her; it was a situation where man forgets all understanding; yet it did not turn him away from piety, and did not distract him from observation of manners when mentioning his Lord and with others.

Also, the divine words: . . . Then when he saw it settled beside him, he said: This is of the grace of my Lord that He may try me whether I am grateful or ungrateful; and whoever is grateful, he is grate-ful only for his own soul, and whoever is ungrateful, then surely my Lord is Self-sufficient, Honoured (27:40). So, this is Sulaymān (a.s.), and he was given of the great kingdom, effective order and amazing power, that he ordered to bring the throne of the queen of Sheba from Sheba to Palestine, and it was brought down in less than a twinkling of an eye, yet he was not taken over by pride and pompousness and did not forget his Lord, and at once offered praise to his Lord in the presence of his courtiers with best praise.

Compare it with the story of Nimrod with Ibrāhīm (a.s.), as Allāh says: Have you not considered him who disputed with Ibrāhīm about his Lord, because Allāh had given him the kingdom? When Ibrāhīm said: "My Lord is He Who gives life and causes to die," he said: "I give life and cause death." . . . (2:258). He said it when he ordered two prisoners to be brought before and ordered one of them to be killed and the other to be freed.

Or, it may be compared with what Pharaoh said, as Allāh has quoted him: "O my people! Is not the kingdom of Egypt mine? And these rivers flow beneath me; do you not then see? Nay! I am better than this fellow who is contemptible, and who can hardly speak dis-tinctly: But why have not bracelets of gold been put upon him, or why have there not come with him angels as companions?" (43:51-53)

He shows his pride in the kingdom of Egypt and its rivers and a quantity of gold which was in his possession and that of his nobles; and it did not take him long to announce: 'I am your sublime lord,' and this was the same fellow who was being humiliated by Mūsā (a.s.)'s signs day after day, like flood, locust, lice and frogs, etc.

Other examples of manner: Allāh says: . . . when they were both in the cave, when he was saying to his companion: "Grieve not, surely Allāh is with us." . . . (9:40); And when the Prophet secretly communi-cated a piece of information to one of his wives . . . so when he informed her of it, she said: "Who informed you this?" He said: "The Knowing, the One Aware, informed me." (66:3). So, the hard situation, terror and anxiety on the day of fear did not upset him to forget his Lord who was with him, and his noble self was not affected by the threatening situ-ation; and likewise the information which he secretly communicated to one of his wives, all this contains the good manners in referring to his Lord.

These are a few examples, and in the same style we find the finest manner and noble characteristics, which appear in their stories in the noble Qur'ān. We have already gone beyond our self-imposed limit in this topic, otherwise we would have narrated their stories at length and described them fully.

8. Prophets' manners with the people in their dealings and talks: Samples of this manner are found in their arguments with the unbe-lievers which are quoted in the Qur'ãn, and in their talks with the be-lievers; also some aspects of their life histories which are narrated.

As for the manners in talk, you will not find them in their talks with those arrogant and ignorant people ever using any word that would annoy them or any abusing, insulting or debasing remark; while their adversaries went to the extreme in abusing and taunting them and in attacking and mocking them, but they never replied to them except with best of the words and most sincere admonition; they turned away from them in peace, and when the ignorant ones talked to them they said: "Peace!"

Allãh says: But the chiefs of those who disbelieved from among his [Nūḥ's] people said: "We do not consider you but a human being like ourselves, and we do not see any have followed you but those who are meanest of us at first thought and we do not see in you any excel-lence over us; nay, we deem you liars." He said: "O my people! Tell me if I have with me clear proof from my Lord, and He has granted me mercy from Himself and it has been made obscure to you; shall we constrain you to (accept) it while you are averse from it?" (11:27-28).

Also, He quotes the tribe of ʿÃd, the people of Hūd, as saying: "We do not say aught but that some of our gods have smitten you with evil." He said: "Surely I call Allãh to witness, and do you bear witness too, that I am clear of what you associate (with Allãh), besides Him, . . ." (11:54-55).

They meant that some of their gods had smitten Hūd with evil, i.e., madness or idiocy, etc.

Also, Allãh quotes Ãzar as saying: "Do you dislike my gods, O Ibrãhīm? If you do not desist I will certainly revile you [or, stone you to death] and leave me for a time." He said: "Peace be on you, I will pray to my Lord to forgive you; surely He is ever Affectionate to me." (19:46-47)

Also, He quotes the people of Shuʿayb (a.s.) as saying: The chiefs of those who disbelieved from among his people said: "Most surely we see you in folly, and most surely we think you to be of the liars." He said: "O my people! There is no folly in me, but I am a messenger of the Lord of the worlds; I deliver to you the message of my Lord and I am a faithful adviser to you." (7:66-68).

Also, Allāh says: Pharaoh said: "And what is the Lord of the worlds?" He said: "The Lord of the heavens and the earth and what is between them, if you understand." . . . Said he: "Most surely your Messenger who is sent to you is mad." He said: "The Lord of the east and the west and what is between them, if you understand." (26:23-28)

Also, He says quoting the people of Maryam: They said: "O Maryam! Surely you have done a strange thing. O sister of Hārūn! Your father was not a bad man, nor was your mother an unchaste woman." But she pointed to him. They said: "How should we speak to one who is a child in the cradle?" He said: "Surely I am a servant of Allāh; He has given me the Book and made me a prophet. . . ." (19:27-30)

And Allāh has said consoling His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) when they accused him of soothsaying, madness and of being a poet: Therefore, continue to remind, for by the grace of your Lord, you are not a soothsayer, or a madman. Or do they say: "A poet, we wait for him the evil accidents of time." Say: "Wait, for surely I too with you am of those who wait." (52:29-31)

Also, He says: And the unjust say: "You do not follow any but a man bewitched." See what likeness do they apply to you, so they have gone astray; therefore they shall not be able to find a way. (25:8-9)

Add to it many other types of abuse, accusation and insult which have been quoted in the Qur'ān; yet it has not been narrated from the prophets (a.s.) that they ever faced them with rudeness or obscenity; they rather replied to them with correct speech and good and gentle logic, in obedience to the divine instruction which had taught them good speech and beautiful manners. Allāh says addressing Mūsā and Hārūn: Go both of you to Pharaoh; surely he has become inordinate. Then speak to him a gentle word, haply he may mind or fear (20:43-44). And He said addressing His Prophet (s.a.w.a.): And if you turn away from them to seek mercy from your Lord, which you hope for, speak to them a gentle word (17:28).

It was an aspect of their manner in talks and discussions that they took themselves to be equal in position to general people; thus they talked with every stratum of society according to the level of its under-standing. It becomes manifest if you ponder on their talks with the people with all their differences beginning from Nūḥ onwards. Both sects have narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: "Surely, we the group of the prophets have been ordered to talk with the people to the degree of their understanding."

It must be known that the sending of prophets was only based on the foundation of guidance and its explanation and support. So, it was incumbent on them to equip themselves with truth in their mission, be devoid of falsity, and remain on guard against traps of error what-ever they might be, whether it agreed with the people's pleasure or went against their liking, whether it resulted in their willingness or unwilling-ness. Allãh has ordained very strict prohibition and extreme caution in this matter for His prophets, the falsity cannot be followed in words or deeds even for helping the truth, for the falsity is falsity no matter it falls in the path of truth or not; and the call to truth does not combine with sanction of falsity even in the path of truth; a truth which is led to by falsehood and which results from untruth is not a total truth.

That is why Allãh has said: . . . nor could I take those who lead (others) astray for aiders. (18:51); And had it not been that We had already made you firm, you would certainly have been near to incline to them a little; in that case We would certainly have made you to taste a double (punishment) in this life and a double (punishment) after death, then you would not have found any helper against Us (17:74-75). For there is no indulgence, no close association, and no adulation in truth, and no respect for falsity.

And that is why Allãh equipped the people of His mission and guardians of His religion, i.e. the prophets (peace be upon them), with what would pave for them the path for following and helping the truth. Allãh says: There is no harm in the Prophet doing that which Allãh has ordained for him: such has been the course of Allãh with respect to those who have gone before; and the command of Allãh is a decree that is made absolute: Those who deliver the messages of Allãh and fear Him, and do not fear any one but Allãh; and Allãh is sufficient to take account (33:38-39). Allãh says that the prophets do not feel any difficulty in doing what Allãh has ordained for them; they fear only Him, and do not fear any one other than Him; there is no snag in their declaring the truth, come what may.

Then He promised them help in what they stood up to do for Him. He says: And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the messengers: Most surely they shall be the assisted ones, and most surely Our host alone shall be the victorious ones. (38:171-3). Most surely We help Our messengers, . . . (40:51).

That is why we find in their narrated stories that they do not care for anything in declaration of truth and the word of vericity, even if the people did not like it and found its taste bitter. Allāh quotes Nūḥ addressing his people: . . . but I consider you a people who are ignor-ant (11:29). And Hūd said: . . . you are nothing but forgers (of lies), (11:50). Also, he told them: Indeed uncleanness and wrath from your Lord have lighted upon you; what! Do you dispute with me about names, which you and your fathers have given? Allāh has not sent any authority for them; . . . (7:71). And He quotes Lūṭ as saying: . . . nay, you are an extravagant people (7:81). Also, He quotes word of Ibrāhīm addressed to his people: "Fie on you and on what you worship besides Allāh; what! Do you not then understand?" (21:67); again He quotes Mūsā as he replied to Pharaoh's claim: "Most surely I deem you, O Mūsā! To be a man bewitched." He said: "Truly you know that none but the Lord of the heavens and the earth has sent down these as clear proofs, and most surely I believe you, O Pharaoh! To be given over to perdition." (17:101-2), i.e., prevented from believing in truth, turned out, steeped in perdition. There are many other such examples.

All of this shows observation of manners about truth and its following; and there is no desired thing more honourable than this, nor is there any sought after item more noble and more valuable. Yet some-times it contains what goes against the prevalent manners among the people because their lives are based on following the side of desires and proceeding to the life's pleasure, by indulging the people of false-hood, and submitting to those who create disturbance in society and exceed the limit in practical policy.

In short, manner, as earlier explained, appears in palatable words and good deeds. Thus it differs with changed ways of life in societies, and the opinions and beliefs, which are settled in it and shape it. As for the divine mission, upon which the religious society depends, it only follows the truth in belief and action. The truth does not mix with falsity or depend on or get supported by it. So, there is no escape from declaring and following it. The manner that springs from it is that one should proceed on the best path of truth and dress in it with the finest robe, like opting for soft words when one has the option of speaking softly or harshly, and to choose hastening in doing good when both hastening and delaying are permissible.

It is this aspect which Allāh has ordered in His Book: And We ordained for him [Mūsā] in the tablets admonition of every kind and clear explanation of all things: so take hold of them with firmness and enjoin your people to take hold of what is best thereof; . . . (7:145). Then He gave good news to His servants who adhered to it: . . . there-fore give good news to My servants, those who listen to the word, then follow the best of it; those are they whom Allãh has guided, and those it is who are the men of understanding (39:17-18). So there is no man-ner found in falsity, nor any manner in a mixture of truth and false-hood; whatever is out of the fold of pure truth is error which the Guardian of truth is not pleased with, and He has said: . . . and what is there after the truth but error; . . . (10:32)

It is this factor that led the prophets of truth to clear declaration and true language, even if on occasions it was against the demands of sycophancy and false manners that are prevalent in non-religious societies.

It was a part of their manners in their dealings and characteris-tics with the people that they accorded respect to the weak and to the powerful in equal degree; if there was increase and augmentation, it was for the people of knowledge and piety. For, when they built on the foundation of servitude and upbringing of human soul, it resulted in equality of judgement between rich and poor, big and small, man and woman, master and slave, ruler and ruled, leader and follower, king and subject. At this juncture, the distinction of attributes becomes ineffectual, exclusive possession of social distinctions by powerful people is negated; and division of gain and loss, deprivation and enjoy-ment, felicity and infelicity between the attributes of wealth and poverty, and power and weakness, becomes inoperative; the system is nullified in which the powerful and wealthy are placed at the topmost stratum, enjoy the most tender life, are given in every endeavour the easiest and most comfortable and in every responsibility the lightest; rather all people are treated equally. Allãh says: O you men! Surely We have created you of a male and a female, and made you tribes and families that you may know each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allãh is the one among you most pious; . . . (49:13). In this way, the arrogance of the powerful because of their power, and pride of the rich because of their wealth, turns into humility for the truth, and hastening to forgiveness and mercy, racing to the good deeds, endeavouring in the way of Allãh for the purpose of Allãh's pleasure.

Thus, they accorded respect to the poor just as they did to the wealthy, and observed good manners with the weak as they did with the rich. Rather the weaker section was reserved for more magnanimity, mercy and graciousness. Allãh says teaching His Prophet (s.a.w.a.): And withhold yourself with those who call on their Lord morning and evening desiring His good will, and let not your eyes pass from them, desiring the beauties of this world's life; and do not follow him whose heart We have made unmindful to Our remembrance, and he follows his low desires and his case is one in which due bounds are exceeded. (18:28); And do not drive away those who call upon their Lord in the morning and the evening, they desire only His favour; neither are you answerable for any reckoning of theirs, nor are they answerable for any reckoning of yours, so that you should drive them away and thus be of the unjust. (6:52); Do not strain your eyes after what We have given certain classes of them to enjoy, and do not grieve for them, and make yourself gentle to the believers; and say: "Surely I am the plain warner." (15:88-89).

This fine manner is seen in the dialogue between Nūḥ and his people as Allāh narrates: But the chiefs of those who disbelieved from among his people said: "We do not consider you but a man like ourselves, and we do not see any have followed you but those who are the meanest of us at first thought, and we do not see in you any excellence over us; nay, we deem you liars." He said: "O my people! Tell me if I have with me clear proof from my Lord, and He has granted me mercy from Himself and it has been made obscure to you; shall we constrain you to (accept) it while you are averse from it? And O my people! I ask you not for wealth in return for it; my reward is only with Allāh and I am not going to drive away those who believe; surely they shall meet their Lord, but I consider you a people who are ignorant [because of your disdaining the poor and weak servants of Allāh]: And O my people! Who will help me against Allāh if I drive them away? Will you not then mind? And I do not say to you that I have the treasures of Allāh; and I do not know the unseen, nor do I say that I am an angel [i.e. I do not claim for myself any distinction against you except that I have been sent as a messenger to you]: nor do I say about those whom your eyes hold in mean estimation (that) Allāh will never grant them (any) good – Allāh knows best what is in their souls [of the good and felicity expected from them]: – for then most surely I should be of the unjust." (11:27-31).

A similar negation of distinction is seen in the words Shuʿayb addressed to his people, as Allāh narrates: ". . . and I do not desire that in opposition to you I should betake myself to that which I forbid you: I desire nothing but reform so far as I am able to, and with none but Allāh is the direction of my affair to a right course; on Him do I rely and to Him do I turn." (11:88). And Allāh says introducing His Mess-enger to the people: Certainly a Messenger has come to you from among yourselves, grievous to him is your falling into distress, excessively sol-icitous respecting you, to the believers (he is) compassionate, merciful. (9:128); And there are some of them who hurt the Prophet and say: "He is an ear;" say: "A hearer of good for you (who) believes in Allãh and believes in the faithful and a mercy for those of you who believe;" . . . (9:61); And most surely you conform (yourself) to sublime morality (68:4). Also, He says and it gathers all preceding attributes: And We have not sent you but as a mercy to the worlds (21:107).

Although apparently these verses describe his good characteris-tics, and not his manners which are something beyond that; yet a sort of manners, as described earlier, is inferred from a sort of characteris-tics; moreover, manner itself is a branch of characteristics.

OTHER TRADITIONS

Most of the Qur'ãnic verses, from which the Prophet (s.a.w.a.)'s noble characteristics and beautiful manners inferred are revealed in the forms of imperative and prohibitive orders. Therefore, we thought it advisable to write here some traditions about his (s.a.w.a.)'s custom-ary usage, which contain collections of his characteristics which point to his beautiful divine manners; and they are also supported by the noble Qur'ãnic verses.

1. Ma'ãni 'l-Akhbãr: (aṣ-Ṣadūq) narrates through his chain, from Abū Hãlã at-Tamīmī, from al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī (peace be upon both); and through another chain from ar-Riḍã (a.s.), through his forefathers, from 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn from al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī (peace be upon all of them); also through a third chain, from a man from the progeny of Abū Hãlã, from al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī (peace be upon both), that he said:

"I asked my maternal uncle Hind ibn Abī Hãlã, who was a describer of (the attributes of) the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); and I was desirous that he should describe to me something of it in order that I should hold fast to it. So he said:

"'The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was magnificent and hon-oured, his face radiated like the full moon on moonlit night; taller than al-marbū' (of medium height), and shorter than al-mushadhdhab (tall and excellent); (he had) big skull and long, straight hair; if his hair was parted it separated in the middle, otherwise his hair did not reach beyond his earlobes; of bright colour, wide forehead; his eyebrows were thin and long, lengthy from one end to the other without joining in the middle; between them was a vein; he had a light over-whelming him, if one did not ponder over him, would deem him having high nasal wind pipe, of thick beard, soft checks and wide mouth; had white teeth not tightly joined; had a thin line of hair from middle of the chest to the stomach; it seemed as his neck was like that of a deer in clarity of silver; of medium stature, plump and holding himself properly; his stomach and chest were in one level; his shoulders were wide; his bone-joints were thick; his chest was broad; when he disrobed, his body was brilliant; a thin line of hair joined his neck to the navel-pit; apart from that, his breasts and belly were without hair; there was hair on his arms, shoulders and upper chest; his wrists were long, his palms wide; his palms and soles were thick; his sides flowed, his joints were soft; hol-lows of his soles were deep, the feet were wide, water did not adhere to them; he proceeded ahead well-balanced, and walked in humbleness, fast-paced, when he walked it seemed as if he was going down a slope; when he turned (towards someone), turned with his whole body; kept his eyes down, he looked to the earth much longer than he looked at the heaven; most of his look was observation; he hastened to say salām to whomever he met.'"

He said: "Then I said to him, 'Describe to me (the way of) his speaking.' He said, 'He (s.a.w.a.), was constantly in grief, always contemplating, he never spoke unnecessarily; he began his talk and ended it very eloquently; he spoke short sentences, pithy and expressive, in which there was neither any superfluous word nor any shortcoming; mild-tempered, neither vain nor insulting; exalted a bounty (gifted to him) however small it might be; he never criticized any of it; however, he never derogated nor praised any taste. When he stood for the truth nobody recognized him; nothing could stand against his anger until he obtained its right for it. When he pointed, he did so with his whole palm, and when he was astonished he turned [the palm]; when he talked he joined it and touched his right palm with inside of his left thumb. When he was angry he turned away and cast down his eyes; mostly his laugh was a smile; when he laughed his teeth appeared like hail-stone.'" aṣ-Ṣadūq says: Upto here was the narration of al-Qãsim ibn al-Manī‘ from Ismã‘īl ibn Muḥammad ibn Isḥãq ibn Ja‘far ibn Muḥam-mad; and the rest is the narrative of ‘Abdu 'r-Raḥmãn upto the end.

"al-Ḥasan (a.s.), said, 'I did not mention the [above tradition] for a while to al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), then I narrated it to him, but I found that he already knew it. So, I asked him about it and found that he had asked his father (a.s.) about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) – his entry and exit, his sitting and his features – not leaving anything out.'

"al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), said, 'I did ask my father (a.s.), about the entrance of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). He said, "His entrance in itself was allowed to him; so when he went to his house, he divided his entry in three parts: one part for Allãh, one for his family and one for himself; then he divided his own part between himself and the people and dealt with general public through his especial people and did not keep away anything from them.

"'"And it was part of his (s.a.w.a.)'s characteristics in the part of the ummah to give preference to the people of excellence in his man-ners, and apportion it on them according to their superiority in relig-ion; so among them was one with one need, another with two needs, and a third with many needs; so he remained engaged with them and kept them busy in that which was good for them, and constantly asked about the ummah and informed them of that which should be done; and he used to say: 'The one who is present must convey [the mess-age] to him who is absent;' [and he admonished]: 'Convey to me the need of him who is unable to convey it (to me); because anyone who conveys to an authority the need of him who is unable to convey it himself, Allãh will make his feet firm on the Day of Resurrection.' Nothing else was mentioned in his presence, and he did not accept from anyone any other thing; people came to him in groups and did not go out except after tasting (food), and went away as guides (to the other)."

"'And I asked him about the going out of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) how did he do it? He said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to preserve his tongue except from that which concerned him; he kept them united, and not to alienate them; he honoured the noble man of every community and made him their governor; he remained on watch about the people and kept guards against them, without turning his face away from anyone or showing any change in his manners; he checked conditions of his companions, and asked the people about the people. He praised the good, strengthened it, showed the ugliness of the evil, and weakened it; he was moderate in his affairs, not contra-dictory. He was never oblivious lest they become oblivious and incline (to one side); was never short from truth and never allowed it; those who were close to him were best of the people; the one having excel-lence near him was the one who was most sincere to the Muslims, and the one having greatest rank near him was the one who was best of all in beneficence and assistance."'

"He (a.s.), said, 'Then I asked him about his (s.a.w.a.)'s sitting. He said, "He never sat down or stood up except with remembrance (of Allãh); he did not reserve any seat for himself; when he reached a group, he sat down where he had arrived, and he ordered (others) to do the same. He gave each of the group his due share (of attention); and no co-participant in the gathering thought that any other person was more honoured than him (in the Prophet's eyes). Whoever sat with him, (the Prophet), patiently remained with him until he took his leave. Whoever asked him for a need, did not return except either with that thing or with sweet words. His good manners overwhelmed the people until he was (like) a father to them; and all of them were equal in his eyes in their rights. His gathering was one of forbearance, modesty, truth and trust, voices were not raised therein, nor were people's honours disgraced there. If one of them committed a mistake, it was (gracefully) amended so that no one repeated it; they dealt with each other with justice, joining together with piety, humble with each other; they respected the elder and had mercy on the younger; they gave preference to a needy person over themselves and provided safety to a stranger."'

"Then I said, 'How was his dealing with those who sat with him?' He (a.s.) said, 'He (s.a.w.a.) had always a smiling face; he was of agree-able manner and gentle hearted; he was neither rude nor rash, neither loud voiced nor obscene; neither exposer of defects nor eulogist, he ignored what he did not desire, so neither they despaired of him nor those who had hoped of him were disappointed. He freed himself from three (things): dispute, increase and what did not concern him; and freed the people from three (things): He never condemned anyone or put him to shame; never did he look for any one's slips or defects; he did not speak except about what he hoped (divine) reward; when he talked his companions bowed their heads in silence, as though there were birds on their heads; so when he became silent, they spoke; they did not dispute near him in a talk, whoever spoke they listened to him until he finished; their talk near him was one after another; he laughed at what they laughed at, and wondered at what they wondered at. He remained patient when a stranger was rude in his talk and demands until his companions fulfilled his requirements, and used to say: "When you see a needy person seeking his needs, fulfil it." He did not accept praise except for a favour he had done to him. He did not interrupt anyone's talk until he exceeded the limit, then he stopped it by forbidding it or standing up.'

He said: "Then I asked him about the silence of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) so he (a.s.) said, 'His (s.a.w.a.)'s silence was based on four (factors): forbearance, caution, estimation and meditation; as for the estimation, it was in equally looking at the people and listening to them; and as for his meditation, it was on what would abide and what would perish. Forbearance and patience were united in him; there-fore nothing would enrage or agitate him. His caution had gathered in four things: his holding fast to good in order to follow it, his abstaining from evil in order to desist from it, his deep thinking regarding the welfare of his ummah, and standing up for what is gathered for him of the good of this world and the next.'"

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadūq has also narrated it in Makãrimu 'l-akhlãq, copying it from the book of Muḥammad ibn Isḥãq ibn Ibrãhīm aṭ-Ṭãliqãnī who has narrated it through his trusted narrators from al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (peace be upon both). al-Majlisī has said in Biḥãru 'l-anwãr: "This is a famous tradition and the Sunnīs have nar-rated it in most of their books."

And numerous traditions on this theme or on some of its parts have been narrated from the Companions.

[Note: From here about two pages of Arabic book contain meanings and explanations of the difficult words and phrases of this tradition. We are omitting it here, because our English version has incorporated them fully. tr.]

2. Iḥyãu 'l-'Ulūm writes: He (s.a.w.a.) was the most eloquent in speech and the sweetest . . . He spoke comprehensive sentences, there was neither any superfluous word in them nor any shortcoming; it was as though his words followed one another; he paused between his speech in order that the hearer could memorize and preserve it; he was loud-voiced with most beautiful melody. (al-Ghazãlī)

3. at-Tahdhīb: (aṣ-Ṣadūq) narrates through his chain from Isḥãq ibn Ja'far, from his brother Mūsã, through his forefathers from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said: "I heard the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), saying, 'I have been sent with noble ethics and the best manners.'"

4. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), was more modest than a virgin girl in her private room; and when he disliked a thing, we knew it from his face." (aṭ-Ṭabrisī)

5. al-Kãfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chains, from Muḥammad ibn Muslim that he said: "I heard Abū Ja'far (a.s.) saying that an angel came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said, 'Surely Allāh has given you option to choose that you become a servant, Messenger (and) humble or a messenger angel.' (Abū Ja'far) said, 'So the Prophet looked at Gabriel (who) pointed with his hand that be a humble (Messenger); so he said, "(I shall be) a servant, Messenger (and) humble." The mess-enger (angel) said, "With (condition that) it would not decrease any-thing that you have got with your Lord." (He said), "And with it are the keys of the treasures of the earth."'"

6. Nahju 'l-Balāghah: 'Alī (a.s.) said: "So you follow your pure cheerful Prophet . . . He gnawed at the world and did not lend any glance at it. He was most suffering of all in side and most empty of stomach. The world was offered to him but he refused to accept it. He knew that Allāh disliked a thing, so he disliked it, and He degraded a thing, so he degraded it. If we did not have except our love to what Allāh disliked, and our honouring what Allāh degraded, it was enough for discord with Allāh and deviation from Allāh's command.

"And the Messenger of Allāh used to eat sitting on the earth, and sat like a slave; he mended his shoes by his hand, rode an unsad-dled donkey, and allowed someone to ride behind him. (Sometimes) there would be a curtain on his door with pictures on it, so he would say, 'O so-and-so! (Addressing a wife of his): Remove it from me, because whenever I look at it, I am reminded of this world and its adornments.' Thus he turned away from the world by his heart, and let its remembrance die from his soul; he liked that its adornment be wiped away from his eyes, lest he takes some equipment from it. He did not believe that it was something to abide, and did not expect to remain therein; so he turned it out of his soul, and dispatched it from his heart and removed it from his sight. In this way, whoever hates a thing, he hates to look at it and does not like it to be mentioned before him."

7. al-Iḥtijāj: Mūsā ibn Ja'far has narrated from his father, from his forefathers, from al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī, from his father, 'Alī (peace be upon them), inter alia, in a lengthy ḥadīth: "He (s.a.w.a.) used to weep for fear of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, until his place of prayer became wet – without any sin . . ." (aṭ-Ṭabrisī)

8. al-Manāqib: "He (s.a.w.a.) used to weep until he fainted. Some-body told him, 'Has not Allāh forgiven you your past faults and those to follow?' He said, 'Well, should I not be a grateful servant?' And exactly like that were the faintings of 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, his successor in his positions." (Ibn Shahrãshūb)

The author says: That question was based on the idea that the purpose of divine worship is safety from chastisement; and it has been said in traditions that it is the worship of slaves; and his (s.a.w.a.)'s reply is based on the idea that the reason is to show one's gratitude to Allãh, it is the worship of noble people, and it is another of the types of worship. It has been narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (a.s.): "Surely among the worship is the one that is done for fear of punish-ment, and it is the worship of slaves; and there is the one that is done for desire of reward, and it is the worship of traders; and among them is the one that is done to show one's gratitude to Allãh." (Some traditions say: 'for love of Allãh'; some others say: 'because He deserves it'.)

We have discussed the meaning of these traditions in detail in vol.4 of the book under the "Commentary" of the verse: . . . and Allãh will reward the grateful. (3:144)[5]. We have explained there that grate-fulness to Allãh in His worship means being sincere to Him, and that the grateful are the purified ones who are described in such wordings of Allãh as: Glory be to Allãh (for freedom) from what they describe, but not so the servants of Allãh, the purified ones (37:159-60).

9. al-Irshãd, ad-Daylamī: "Surely during the prayer of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) the wheezing sound of fear was heard from him because of fear of Allãh; and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) too was like that."

10. Tafsīr of Abu 'l-Futūḥ: It is narrated from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī that he said, "When the verse: . . . remember Allãh, remembering fre-quently [33:41] was revealed, the Messenger of Allãh became engaged in the remembrance of Allãh until the unbelievers said that he had become insane."

11. al-Kãfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Zayd ash-Shaḥḥãm from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to repent to Allãh every day seventy times." "I [Zayd] said, 'Was he saying: "I seek pardon of Allãh and return (repent) to Him?"' He said, 'No; but he used to say, "I return to Allãh."' I said, '(How is it that) the Messennger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to repent and did not return (to that fault) and we repent and then return?' He said, 'Allãh's help is saught.'"

12. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: (aṭ-Ṭabrisī) narrates from 'Alī (a.s.) copying from Kitãbu 'n-Nubuwwah that he (a.s.) used to say when he described the attributes of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.): "He was the most generous of hand, the bravest of the chest, the most truthful in speech, the most fulfilling of obligations, of the mildest nature, from the noblest family; whoever saw him all of a sudden, was afraid of him, and who-ever mingled with him knowing him, loved him; I did not see like him (s.a.w.a.) neither before him nor after him."

13. al-Kãfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from ‘Umar ibn ‘Alī from his father (a.s.) that he said: "It was (the style) of the swear-ing of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) that he said, 'No, and I seek pardon of Allãh'."

14. Iḥyãu 'l-‘Ulūm: "When he (s.a.w.) was very upset, he touched his noble beard frequently."

15. Ibid: "And he (s.a.w.) was the most generous of all people; dīnãr or dirham did not remain with him; if something was left with him and he did not find one to give it to him and the night came, he did not go to his house until he found someone who needed it. He did not take from what Allãh had given to him except the food sufficient for the year from easily available dates and barley; and he put all of it in the way of Allãh.

"He was not asked for a thing except he gave it out; then he returned to the nourishment of the year – so much so that he often was empty-handed before the expiry of the year if nothing new came to him." He said, "And he enforced the truth even if it resulted in a harm to himself or his companions." He said, "And he used to proceed alone between his enemies without a guard." He said, "Nothing from world-ly affairs ever intimidated him."

He said: "He sat with poor, took food with needy; he used to respect the people of excellence in their ethics, and was on intimate terms with the people of dignity by doing good to them. He did good to his relatives, without giving them preference over one who was superior to them; he was not harsh to anyone, he accepted the apology from one who offered it."

He said: "He had some slaves and slave girls but did not rise over them in meals or dress. He never passed a time without some work for Allãh or for something, which was necessary for his welfare. He used to go forth to the orchards of his companions. He never looked down any poor with disdain because of his poverty or chronic illness. He was not awed by any king because of his kingdom; he called this and that towards Allãh in equal way."

16. Ibid: "And he (s.a.w.) was furthest from anger and nearest in pleasantness; he was most gracious of all people towards the people, the best of all for all people, and the most beneficial of all for the people."

17. Ibid: "When he (s.a.w.) was happy and pleased, he was the best of the people in pleasantness; when he admonished, he admonished seriously, and when he was angry – and he was never angry except for Allãh – nothing could stand against his anger. And he was like that in all his affairs; and when any affair occured to him, he entrusted that to Allãh, freed himself from power and strength, and invoked the guidance."

The author says: Reliance on Allãh, entrusting the affairs to Him, freeing oneself from power and strength and invocation of guid-ance from Him, all of it returns one to another, and all of it sprouts from one root, and it is this: All affairs are based on the Divine Will which is the conqueror, unconquered, and His power which is the sub-duer, unlimited. The Book and the Sunnah with one voice call to it. Allãh says: . . . and on Allãh should the reliant rely. (14:12); . . . and I entrust my affair to Allãh, . . . (40:44); . . . and whoever trusts in Allãh, He is sufficient for him; . . . (65:3); . . . surely His is the creation and the command; . . . (7:54); And that to your Lord is the goal, (53:42) apart from other such verses. As for the traditions they are beyond counting.

Acquiring these ethics and learning these manners is based on the fact that they apply the human activities on the proper realities, which establish them on the natural religion. It is because in reality all affairs return to Allãh, as He says: . . . now surely to Allãh do all affairs eventually come (42:53). It has a magnificent benefit: When man relies and depends on Allãh – and he recognizes His unlimited power and subduer Will – this factor strengthens man's will and builds the pillars of his determination; as such he is not affected by any hindrance which appears in the way, nor is he constrained by any difficulty or tiredness that faces him; his firm intention is not shaken by any seduction or Satanic whispering which may appear in his inner self in the form of imaginary significances.

SOME OF HIS CUSTOMS AND MANNERS IN HIS SOCIAL RELATIONS

18. Irshãdu 'l-Qulūb, ad-Daylamī: "The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to patch his clothes, mend his shoes and milk his goat; he ate with slaves, sat on the earth and rode a donkey and allowed someone to sit behind him; he was not ashamed to carry his provisions from market to his family; he shook hands with rich and poor, and did not remove his hand from any one's hand until it was the opposite party who removed it; he greeted anyone who came before him, be he rich or poor, senior or junior; he never degraded what he was invited to even if it was date of inferior quality.

"And he (s.a.w.a.) was light of provision, noble of nature, of beautiful social relation and cheerful face; smiling without laughter, sorrowful without scowling; humble without humiliation, magnani-mous without extravagance, soft-hearted, merciful to every Muslim; he never filled his stomach so that it would result in belching, and did not extend his hand to anything because of covetousness."

19. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: It is narrated about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he looked into mirror, let his hair grow long and combed it; some-times he looked into water and managed his hair in this way. He used to adorn himself for his companions more than he did for his family. And he (s.a.w.a.) said: "Surely Allāh likes from His servant when he goes out for his brethren that he should prepare and beautify himself for them."

20. 'Ilalu 'sh-Sharāi', 'Uyūn Akhbāri 'r-Riḍā, and al-Majālis: aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chain, from ar-Riḍā (a.s.) from his forefathers that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, '(There are) five (things) that I shall not leave them till I die: To eat (sitting) on the earth with slaves, my riding with someone, milking my goat by my hand, wearing wool(len dress), and greeting the children in order that it may be a custom after me.'"

21. Man lā Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: It is narrated from ʻAlī (a.s.) that he said to a man from Banū Saʻd: "Should not I tell you about Fāṭimah and myself? . . . So came to us the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) early in the morning, and we were under our blanket; and he said: 'Peace be on you!' But we remained silent and felt shy because of our position.

"Then he (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Peace be on you!' And we remained silent. Then he (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Peace be on you!' So we feared that if we did not respond (this time) he would go back. (And it was his custom that he would say salām three times, and if he was given per-mission, well and good; otherwise he would go away.) So we said: 'And on you be salām, O Messenger of Allāh! Come in.' so he entered . . ."

22. al-Kāfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Ribʻī ibn ʻAbdillāh, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to greet (say salām to) the women and they gave him the reply of the salām, and the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) used to greet the women; and he disliked to greet the young ones from among them, and used to say: 'I fear that her voice would give me pleasure and thus I would become liable to more (responsibility) than the reward I seek.'"

The author says: And aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated it as a mursal tradition; and so has done Sibṭ aṭ-Ṭabrisī in al-Mishkāt copying from Kitābu 'l-Maḥāsin.

23. Ibid: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from ʻAbdu 'l-ʻAẓīm ibn ʻAbdīllāh al-Ḥasanī, as a marfūʻ tradition. He said: "The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to sit in one of the three styles: al-Qurfuṣā', i.e. he raised his legs and encircled them with his hands, holding fast to the arms with the hands; and he rested on his knees; and he doubled one leg, putting the other over it; and he was never seen cross-legged."

24. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq, copying from Kitābu 'n-Nubuwwah: It is narrated from ʻAlī (a.s.) that he said: "When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), shook hand with someone, he did not remove his hand from that one's hand until it was the other man who pulled his hand away; and no one talked with him about some need of his or for some other purpose and the Prophet went away, until that man himself was the one who went away; and no one cut his talk until that man became silent; and he was never seen extending his leg before a companion.

"And he was never given an option between two courses of action but he opted for the harder one; and he did not avenge himself for any injustice, until someone disgraced a sanctuary of Allāh, then he shall be angry for Allāh; he never took meal reclining (on pillow) until he departed from this world; and he was never asked for a thing and he replied in negative; no petitioner ever asked for his need, but he (s.a.w.a.) accepted it or (alternatively) talked to him in easy lan-guage; he was lightest of all in prayer, shortest of them in lecture and least of all in useless talk. When he came he was known by the good scent; when he ate with the people, he was the first to begin and last to stop his hand; when he ate, he ate from the side that was near him; however if it was dates, his hand roamed all over it; when he drank he divided it in three breaths; he used to sip the water, not flooding it. His right hand was for his food and drink, for his taking and giving, he did not take but by his right hand and did not give but by his right hand; and his left hand was for other functions of his body; he liked to begin with the right side in all his affairs – in wearing dress, shoes, and dismounting.

"When he called, he called three times, when he spoke, he spoke once, and when he sought permission, he did so thrice. His speech was in sections; whoever heard him clearly, understood him; when he spoke, it seemed as if a light went forth from between his teeth. When you saw him you would say (his teeth were) separated, but they were not.

"His observation was glancing with his eyes; he did not tell anyone anything, which he disliked; when he walked it was as though he was going down a slope. He used to say: 'Surely the best of you is the best of you in ethics (manners);' he never condemned any taste nor did he praise it; and never did the speakers dispute before him. The one describing him used to say: 'I did not see with my eye anyone like him, neither before him nor after him (s.a.w.a.)."

25. al-Kāfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain, from Jamīl ibn Darrāj, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) divided his glance between his companions, he looked to this and to that equally." (Also he said:) "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) never spread his legs between his companions; if someone shook his hand, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) did not remove his own hand from that man's hand until it was he who removed his hand; so when they became aware of it, the man on shaking his hand (soon) moved his hand and removed it from the Prophet's hand."

26. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: "When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said a thing, he smiled in his speech."

27. Ibid: Yūnus ash-Shaybānī said: "Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) said to me, 'How is your joking (and jesting) with each other?' I said, 'Very little.' He said, 'Why don't you do it?' Because joking (and jesting) is a part of good manners; and surely you introduce through it joy to your brother; and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to jest with a man intending to make him happy.'"

28. Ibid: Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Kūfī narrates in Kitābu 'l-Akhlāq from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said: "There is no believer but there is jesting in him; and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to joke, yet he never spoke other than the truth."

29. al-Kāfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Muʻammar ibn Khallād that he said: "I asked Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) and said: 'May I be made your ransom! A man (mingles) with the people and talk among them continues, they joke and laugh?' He said, 'There is no harm (in it) as long as there is no.' (So I thought that he meant 'obscenity'.)

"Then (the Imām) said, 'Surely, a Bedouin used to come to (the Messenger of Allāh) and bring to him (some) gift; then he used to say:

"Give us the price of our gift." So the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to laugh. And when he was distressed, he used say: "What happened to the Bedouin, would that he came to us."'"

30. Ibid: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Ṭalḥah ibn Zayd, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.) used to sit mostly facing qiblah."

31. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: "The people used to bring a small child to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), so that he should pray for blessings to him; so he used to keep him in his lap in order to honour his family members; and sometimes the child urinated on him, and if someone who saw it shouted at the child, he (s.a.w.a.) would say: 'Don't disturb the child until he finishes urinating;' thereafter, he would complete pray-ing for him or naming him, thus heightening the joy of his family, and they never felt that he was disturbed because of their child's urine; then when they had gone back, he would wash his clothes afterwards."

32. Ibid: It is narrated that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) never allowed anyone to walk on foot with him when he himself was riding until he made him sit with him; if the man refused, then he told him: "Proceed before me and meet me at the place you intend."

33. Ibid: Abu 'l-Qãsim al-Kūfī writes in Kitãbu 'l-Akhlãq: "It has come in traditions that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) never took his revenge from anyone; rather he used to forgive and pardon."

34. Ibid: "If a man from among his brethren remained absent for three days, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to enquire about him; if he was out of town, he prayed for him; if he was present therein, he visited him; and if he was sick, he went to see him."

35. Ibid: Anas said: "I served the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) for nine years. I have no knowledge that he ever said to me: 'Did you do such and such (thing)?' Nor did he ever criticize me for anything."

36. Iḥyãu 'l-ʻUlūm: Anas said: "By Him Who sent him with truth! He never said to me about a thing, which he disliked: 'Why did you do it?' And his women never blamed me but he said: 'Leave him alone, it was only by a Book and destiny.'"

37. Ibid: It is narrated from Anas that no one from his companions or others called him but he said: "Labbayk."

38. Ibid: Anas said: "He (s.a.w.) used to call his companions with their agnomen, in order to honour them and to win their affection; and he gave agnomen to the one who did not have any, so he was called by that agnomen. He also allotted agnomen to the ladies who had children and even those who had not borne yet; and he also gave agnomen to the children thus softening their hearts."

39. Ibid: "He (s.a.w.) made a visitor sit on the cushion on which he sat; if the visitor refused to do so, he (s.a.w.) adjured him until he accepted."

40. al-Kāfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from ʻAjlān that he said: "I was with Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.); a beggar came, so he (a.s.) went to a container of dates, and taking out a handful gave it to him; then came another, so he stood up and gave him a handful; then came a third one, he asked and the Imām stood up and taking a handful gave it to him. Thereafter came another man, and the Imām (a.s.), said, 'Allāh is our Sustainer and yours.'

"Then he said, 'Surely nobody asked anything of this world from the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) but he gave it to him. A woman said to her son, "Go to him (the Prophet) and ask from him; if he says: 'We do not have anything', then say: 'Give me your shirt'." So, the Prophet took his shirt and threw it to him. (Another version: "gave it".) There-upon, Allāh taught him moderation and said: And do not make your hand to be shackled to your neck nor stretch it forth to the utmost (limit) of its stretching forth, lest you should (afterwards) sit down blamed, stripped off [17:29].'"

41. Ibid: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Jābir, from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to eat gift and did not eat ṣadaqah.

42. Ibid: It is narrated from Mūsā ibn ʻImrān ibn Bazīʻ that he said: "I said to ar-Riḍā (a.s.), 'May I be made your ransom! The people narrate that when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) went forth by a way, he used to return by another way. Was it so?' He said, 'Yes; I do it most of the times; so you too do it.' Then he said to me, 'Well, it expands more sustenance for you."

43. al-Iqbāl: Narrates from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), used to come out after sunrise." (Ibn Tāwūs)

44. al-Kāfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from ʻAbdullāh ibn al-Mughīrah, from his narrator that he said: "When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) entered a house, he sat in the nearest place to him on entering."

The author says: Sibṭ aṭ-Ṭabrisī has narrated it in al-Mishkāt, copying from al-Maḥāsin and other books.

45. And among his (s.a.w.a.)'s customs and manners regarding cleanliness and adornments is what has been said in al-Makārim that when the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) washed his head and beard, he did so with [leaves of] lotus tree.

46. al-Ja'fariyyãt: It is narrated through his chain from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad, from his forefathers from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to comb his hair and often he combed it with water, and used to say, 'Sufficient is water as perfume for a believer.'"

47. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: (aṣ-Ṣadūq) says: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'Surely the Majūs cut off their beards and increased their mustaches; and surely we trim the mustaches and let the beards grow.'"

48. al-Kãfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Abū 'Abdil-lãh (a.s.) that he said: "From among the sunnah is to clip the nails."

49. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: It is narrated that to bury hair, nail and blood is from sunnah.

50. Ibid: (aṣ-Ṣadūq) narrates through his chain from Muḥammad ibn Muslim that he asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.) about hair-dye. He said: 'The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to use hair-dye, and this is his hair with us.'"

51. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to coat (medicine); the coater overlayed (his upper part) until when he reached below waistband, he did it himself."

52. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: "'Alī (a.s.) said, 'Plucking out the armpit removes bad smell, and it is cleansing and sunnah ordered by the Agreeable (a.s.).'"

53. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: "He (s.a.w.a.) had a kohl-container, which he used every night; and his kohl was antimony."

54. al-Kãfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Abū Usãmah, from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "From among the customs of the messengers is the toothbrush."

55. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: (aṣ-Ṣadūq) narrates through his chain from 'Alī (a.s.) in the ḥadīth of four hundred, that he said: "And tooth-brush is pleasure of Allãh, and sunnah of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and cleansing of mouth."

The author says: There are very many traditions from both sects' ways about his (s.a.w.a.)'s, cleansing the teeth with toothbrush.

56. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Four (things) are from among the ethics of the prophets: To use scents, to cleanse [pubic hair] with razor, to shave the body with depilatory agent and going to women very often."

57. al-Kāfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from ʻAbdullāh ibn Sinān, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had a holding (handle); when he performed the ritual ablution, he caught it with his wet hand; so when he came out they knew that it was the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.)."

58. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: "Never was a scent presented to him but he used it, and he used to say, 'Its air is agreeable and its load light;' and if he did not use that scent, he put his finger in it, then licked it."

59. Ibid: "He (s.a.w.a.) used to burn incense with qamarī sticks."

60. Dhakhīratu 'l-Maʻād: "Any (type of) musk was the most agree-able scent to him (s.a.w.a.)."

61. al-Kāfī: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Isḥāq aṭ-Ṭawīl al-ʻAṭṭār, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messen-ger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to spend on scent more than he spent on food."

62. Ibid: (al-Kulaynī) narrates through his chain from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "The Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) said, '(Applying) scent to mustache is among the prophets' ethics and is honour to the two writer angels.'"

63. Ibid: Through his chains from as-Sakan al-Khazzāz that he said: "I heard Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) as saying, 'It is the right on every pubes-cent person on every Friday to trim his mustache and nails, and rub a little scent; and when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) did not have any scent on a Friday, he called for a veil of one of his wives, then wetting it with water put it on his face."

64. Man lā Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: (aṣ-Ṣadūq) narrates through his chain from Isḥāq ibn ʻAmmār, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was brought a scent on the day of ʻĪdu 'l-Fiṭr, he began with his women."

65. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: "And he used various types of oil," (he said), "and he generally used the oil of violet and used to say: 'It is the best of oils.'"

66. Among his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners in travelling were what are nar-rated in Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh, through his chain from ʻAbdullāh ibn Sinān, from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to travel on Thursday."

The author says: There are many aḥādīth of this meaning.

67. Amānu 'l-Akhṭār and Miṣbāḥu 'z-Zāir: The author of ʻAwārifu 'l-Maʻārif has written: "Surely when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) travelled, he took with him five things: Mirror, kohl-container, winnowing fork, and toothbrush." (He said: "Another tradition says:) 'and scissors'."

The author says: It has also been narrated in Makãrimu 'l-akhlãq and al-Ja'fariyyãt.

68. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: It is narrated from Ibn 'Abbãs that he said: "When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) walked, he did so in a man-ner which showed that he was neither weak nor tired."

69. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: Narrates through his chain from Mu'ãwiyah ibn 'Ammãr, from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "When during journey, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) proceeded down a slope, he said: 'Lã ilãha illa 'llãh'; and when he ascended, he said: 'Allãhu Akbar'."

70. Lubbu 'l-Lubãb, (by ar-Rãwandī): It is narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), that he did not depart from a station but prayed therein two *rak'ah*s; and said: "So that it will testify for me of prayer."

71. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: He says: "When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) bid farewell to the believers, he used to say: 'May Allãh give you sustenance of piety, and direct you to every good, and fulfil every need of yours, and keep safe your religion and your world for you, and bring you back safely to those who are successful.'"

The author says: There are different traditions about his (s.a. w.a.)'s prayer at the time of bidding farewell, yet despite their differences, all contain the prayer of safety and success.

72. al-Ja'fariyyãt: It narrates through his chain from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad, from his forefathers, from 'Alī (a.s.) that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to say to the one arriving from Mecca: "May Allãh accept your rituals, and forgive your sin, and replenish your expenses to you."

73. Among his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners regarding dresses and what per-tains to them, is what is written in Iḥyãu 'l-'ulūm: "He (s.a.w.a.) used to wear the dress that was available, be it loin-cloth or cloak, shirt or jubbah, etc. He liked green dresses, yet most of his dresses were white, and he used to say: 'Dress it to your living and shroud in it your dead.'

"He used to wear stuffed qabã' (outer-garment) for war and at other times; he had a qabã' of silk brocade, when he wore it, its green colour contrasted beautifully with his white colour; all his dresses were turned up above the ankles, and the loin-cloak reached above it upto middle of the leg; his shirt was buttoned up, and sometime he opened the buttons in prayer.

"He had a wrapper dyed in saffron; sometimes he prayed with the people wearing that alone; at other times he wore only the cloak without adding any other thing; he had a felt cloak which he wore and said: 'I am but a slave, I wear like slaves.' He had two dresses reserved for Fridays, separate from his dresses of the other days. Sometimes he wore one cloak alone, and tied its two corners between his shoulders; often he prayed in it with the people in funeral prayer; sometimes he prayed in his house in the one cloak wrapping it around keeping its sides crossed; and it could be the cloak which he had used during sexual intercourse; he often prayed at night in the cloak only and put on part of the dress that adjoined his fringe, and left the other portion on one of his wives and prayed.

"And he had a black cloak, then he gave it (to someone); so Umm Salamah said to him, 'May my father and mother be made your ransom! What happened to that black cloak?' He said, 'I put it on (someone).' So she said, 'I had never seen anything more beautiful than your whiteness on its blackness.' Anas said, 'And often I saw him praying with us the ẓuhr prayer, wearing a cloak, tying its two sides; and he used to wear ring, and sometimes he came out having tied a thread on his ring for remembering something; and he used to seal the letters with it and said, "Seal on the letter is better than insinuation."'

"And he used to wear a skull-cap under his turban, or without turban; and often he removed his skull-cap from his head and used it as a cover before him and prayed towards it. Sometimes he did not have a turban, so he tied head-band on his head and forehead; and he had a turban named saḥãb (cloud), then he gifted it to ʻAlī. Sometimes ʻAlī appeared in it, then he (s.a.w.) used to say: 'ʻAlī is coming to you in the cloud.'

"And when he put on a dress, he began from its right side, and said: 'All praise is due to Allãh Who clothed me with what I cover my shame, and beautify myself among the people;' and when he un-dressed, he removed it from his left side; When he wore a new dress, he gave the old one to a needy person and then said: 'There is no Muslim who covers a Muslim with his worn out dress – not doing it except for Allãh – but he will be in Allãh's security, guaranty and good as long as it would cover him, dead or alive.'

"And he had a ground-spread of leather stuffed with palm-frond, its length was two arms or so, and breadth one and a half arms or so; and he had a cloak spread for him, wherever he moved, it was folded twice under him; and he slept on mat, there was nothing else under him.

"And it was among his manners to give name to his riding animals, arms and provisions. The name of his standard was 'uqãb (eagle), and his sword, which he took with him in wars, was named Dhu 'l-Fiqãr; he had a third sword called al-Mukhdhim, and yet anothers, called ar-Rasūb and al-Qaḍīb; the grip of his sword was gilded with silver. He wore a leather-belt which had three silver rings; his bow was named al-Katūm, and the quiver al-Kãfūr; his she-camel's name was al-'Aḍbã', his mule was al-Duldul, his donkey was Ya'fūr; and his milking goat, whose milk he drank was called 'Aynah.

"He had a cleansing pot of clay, which he used for performing ritual ablution and drinking. People used to send their small children (who had reached the age of understanding) to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.), and they were not prevented from approaching him; so if they found in that pot some water, they drank from it and wiped it on their faces and bodies, seeking blessings with it."

74. al-Ja'fariyyãt: It is narrated from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad, from his forefathers from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.) wore quilted caps . . . He had a sheild called Dhãtu 'l-Fuḍūl, it had three silver links, one in front and two at the back . . ."

75. al-'Awãlī: It is narrated that he (s.a.w.a.) had a black turban, in which he used to pray.

The author says: It is narrated that his (s.a.w.a.)'s turban had three, or five, coils.

76. al-Khiṣãl: Narrates through his chain from 'Alī in the ḥadīth of four hundred that he said: "Wear cotton dresses, because it is the dress of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and he did not wear hair or wool except during sickness."

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadūq has also narrated it as a mursal ḥadīth; aṣ-Ṣafwãnī has narrated it in Kitãbu 't-Ta'rīf; it clarifies the meaning of what was earlier said about his (s.a.w.a.)'s wearing wool, and that there is no contradiction.

77. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: Narrates through his chain from Ismã'īl ibn Muslim, from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) from his father (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had a short spear with a crutch at its end; he leaned on it, and took it out on the two 'īd days and (fixing it before him) he prayed towards it."

The author says: It has also been narrated in al-Ja'fariyyãt.

78. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from Hishãm ibn Sãlim from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "The ring of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was from silver."

79. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Abū Khadījah that he said: "He (the Imām) said, 'The stone of the ring is round.' Then he said, 'Like this was the ring of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.).'"

80. al-Khiṣāl: Narrates through his chain from ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥīm ibn Abi 'l-Bilād, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had two rings (seals), on one of them was written: Lā ilāha illa 'llāh, Muḥammadun Rasūlu 'llāh; and on the other (was): Ṣadaqa 'llāh."

81. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Ḥusayn ibn Khālid, from Abu 'l-Ḥasan II (a.s.) inter alia in a ḥadīth: "Surely the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) and the Leader of the Faithful, al-Ḥasan, al-Ḥusayn and the Imāms (peace be upon them) wore the rings in the right hand."

82. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: It is narrated from aṣ-Ṣādiq from ʻAlī (peace be upon both) that he said: "The Prophets used to wear shirt before trouser."

The author says: It is also narrated in al-Jaʻfariyyāt; there are other traditions on the above themes.

83. Among his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners regarding his residence and its related things are what is written in Kitābu 't-Taḥṣīn (by Ibn Fahd) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), left this world and never put a brick over a brick."

84. Lubbu 'l-Lubāb: "He (a.s.), said, 'Mosques are the sitting places of the prophets.'"

85. al-Kāfī: Narrates through his chain from as-Sakūnī, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "When the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) came out from the house in the summer, he did so on a Thursday; and when he wanted to enter because of cold in the winter, he entered on a Friday."

The author says: It has also been narrated in al-Khiṣāl as a mursal one.

86. al-ʻUdadu 'l-Qawiyyah (by ash-Shaykh ʻAlī ibn al-Ḥasan ibn al-Muṭahhar, brother of al-ʻAllāmah, may Allāh have mercy on both): Narrates from Khadījah, may Allāh be pleased with her, that she said: "When the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) entered the house, he used to call for a receptacle, and cleansed for prayer, then he stood up and prayed two short *rakʻah*s; then he came to his bed."

87. al-Kāfī: Narrates through his chain from ʻAbbād ibn Ṣuhayb, that he said: "I heard Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) as saying, 'The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) never hatched any plan against an enemy.'"

88. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: "The bedding of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was a cloak, and his pillow was of leather stuffed with palmfronds; one night it was folded double, when morning came, he said: 'This bedding prevented me last night from prayer;' so he ordered that it should be kept unfolded; and he had a bedding of leather stuffed with palm-fronds. Also, he had a cloak which was spread for him wherever he went and it was folded double."

89. Ibid: Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said: "Never did the Messenger of Allãh wake up from sleep but prostrated in sajdah of Allãh."

90. Among his (s.a.w.a.) manners regarding matrimony and children was what is narrated in the tract of al-Muḥkam wa 'l-mutashãbih of al-Murtaḍã, through his chain upto at-Tafsīr of an-Nu'mānī, from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said: "A group of the Companions had forbidden to themselves women, eating during the day and sleeping at night. Umm Salamah gave this news to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), so he went out to his Companions and said, 'Do you feel aversion from women? But surely I go to the women, and eat during the day and sleep at night; so whoever dislikes my sunnah is not from me . . .'"

The author says: This meaning is narrated in the books of both sects through many ways.

91. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from Isḥãq ibn 'Ammãr, from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "Among the ethics of the Prophets is the love of women."

92. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Bakãr ibn Kardam and sev-eral (others), from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'The delight of my eyes is made in prayer and my enjoyment in women.'"

The author says: Nearer to it is what has been narrated through other ways.

93. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: "When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.) wanted to marry a woman he used to send to her someone who looked at her. . . ."

94. at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī: It is narrated from al-Ḥusayn, son of the daughter of Ilyãs, that he said: "I heard Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍã (a.s.) saying, 'Surely Allãh has made the night time for rest, and He has made the women means for rest; and it is a part of sunnah to perform marriage at night and give food (to people).'"

95. al-Khiṣãl: Narrates through his chain from 'Alī (a.s.), inter alia, in the ḥadīth of four hundred, that he said: "Shave the heads of your children on the seventh day, and give, equal in weight to their hair, silver as ṣadaqah to a Muslim; and likewise had done the Messenger of Allãh

(s.a.w.a.) with al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn and all his children."

96. Among his manners regarding food and drink and related to the table, is what has been narrated in al-Kãfī, through his chain from Hishãm ibn Sãlim and another one, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "There was nothing more liked by the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), than that he should remain hungry (and) afraid regarding Allãh."

97. al-Iḥtijãj: Narrates through his chain from Mūsã ibn Jaʻfar, from his forefathers, from al-Ḥusayn ibn ʻAlī (peace be upon them), inter alia, in a lengthy ḥadīth, concerning the questions of a Syrian Jew from the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.): ". . . The Jew said to him, 'They believe about ʻĪsã that he was ascetic.' ʻAlī (a.s.) said to him, 'He was like that, and Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) was the most ascetic of all prophets; he had thirteen wives, apart from the slave-girls who were under his pos-session; and yet no table-cloth was raised for him that had a food on it; and he never ate wheat bread, nor did he eat his full three nights consequently from barley bread.' . . ."

98. al-Amãlī, aṣ-Ṣadūq: Narrates from al-ʻĪṣ ibn al-Qãsim that he said: "I said to aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.), 'A ḥadīth is narrated from your father that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) never ate his full from wheat bread." Is it correct?' He said, 'No, the Messenger of Allãh never ate wheat bread, and never ate his full from barley bread.'"

99. ad-Daʻawãt (by ar-Rãwandī): He said, "It is narrated that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) never ate (while) reclining except once, then he sat down (straight) and said, 'O Allãh! I am your servant and your Messenger.'"

The author says: This meaning has been narrated by al-Kulaynī, ash-Shaykh (through many chains), aṣ-Ṣadūq, al-Barqī and al-Ḥusayn ibn Saʻīd (in Kitãbu 'z-Zuhd).

100. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from Zayd ash-Shaḥḥãm, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) never ate reclining since Allãh raised him (as Prophet) until he expired; he used to eat like a slave and sit like a slave." "I said, 'Why?' He said, 'In humility to Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty.'"

101. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Abū Khadījah who said: "Bashīr ad-Dahhãn asked Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) and I was present (there), 'Did the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to eat reclining upon his right or left side?' He (a.s.) said, 'The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) never used to eat reclining upon his right or left side, but he used to sit like a slave.' I said, 'For what [he did so]?' He (a.s.) said, 'In humility to Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty.'"

102. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Jãbir, from Abū Ja'far (a.s.), that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to eat like a slave and sit like a slave; and he used to eat on the ground and sleep on the ground."

103. Iḥyãu 'l-'Ulūm: "When he (s.a.w.) sat for eating, he gathered his knees and legs as one does in prayer, except that a knee was over the other and a foot was over the other; and he used to say, 'I am but a slave, I eat as a slave eats and sit as a slave sits.'"

104. Kitãbu 't-Ta'rīf (by aṣ-Ṣafwãnī): Narrates from 'Alī (a.s.): "When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) sat on a table, he sat like a slave and he reclined upon his left thigh."

105. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: It is narrated from Ibn 'Abbãs that he said: "The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to sit on the earth, tether the goat and accept the invitation of a slave."

106. al-Maḥãsin: Through his chain from Ḥammãd ibn 'Uthmãn, from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to lick his fingers when he ate."

107. al-Iḥtijãj: Copying from the book, Mawãlīdu 'ṣ-Ṣãdiqīn that he said: "The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to eat all types of food; and he ate what Allãh had made lawful for him with his family and servants when they ate; and with whoever invited him from among the Muslims for eating; and on whatever they partook of [i.e. table or plate] and when-ever they ate, except when a guest came to them, then he ate with his guest. . . . And the most agreeable food to him was that which was (taken) with a lot of dependents."

108. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from Ibnu l-Qadãḥ from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) took any meal with the people, he was the first to put his hand (in the food) and the last to remove it, in order that the people should eat (their full)."

109. Ibid: Narrates through his chain to Muḥammad ibn Muslim, from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: "The Leader of the Faithful (peace be upon him) has said, 'The prophets' evening meal is after 'ishã' prayer; therefore you should not leave (neglect) evening meal, because surely leaving the evening meal ruins the body.'"

110. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from 'Anbasah ibn Najãd, from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "No food, in which contained dates, was presented to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) but he began with dates."

111. al-Kãfī and Ṣaḥīfatu 'r-Riḍã (a.s.): Narrate through their chains from his forefathers (peace be upon them) that he said: "When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) ate dates, he put the stone on the back of his palm, and than threw it away."

112. al-Iqbāl (Ibn Ṭāwūs): Copying from the second part of Tārīkh an-Nāysābūrī (in the biography of al-Ḥasan ibn Bashar), through his chain, that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to thank Allāh between every two morsels."

113. al-Kāfī: Narrates through his chain, from Wahb ibn ʻAbd Rabbih, that he said: "I saw Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) using tooth-pick. I looked at him; so he said, 'Surely the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used tooth-pick; and it makes mouth pleasant.'"

114. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: It is narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that when he drank, began and said tasmiyah[6]. . . and he sipped the water slowly without swallowing the lot; and he used to say, "Liver ailment is from swallowing."

115. al-Jaʻfariyyāt: Narrates from Jaʻfar ibn Muḥammad, from his fore-fathers, from ʻAlī (a.s.) that he said: "I checked the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) several times and (found that) when he drank he breathed three times, with every breath he recited: Bismi 'llāh . . . to begin with, and: al-ḥamdu li 'llāh at the end; so I asked him about it, and he said, 'O ʻAlī! (It is) to thank Allāh with: al-ḥamdu li 'llāh, and tasmiyah is for (pro-tection from) sickness.'"

116. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: "He (s.a.w.a.) did not breathe into the pot when he drank; and if he wanted to breathe, he kept the pot away from his mouth until he breathed."

117. Iḥyāu 'l-ʻUlūm: "And when he (s.a.w.a.) ate meat, he did not lower his head to it; he used to raise it to his mouth properly then tore it to pieces." Then he said, "And when he ate meat especially, he washed both his hands thoroughly then wiped his face with the water left over-hand."

118. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: It is narrated about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he used to eat various kinds of food.

The author says: Thereafter aṭ-Ṭabrisī has described several types of food which he (s.a.w.a.) used to eat, like, bread, meat (of vari-ous types), melon, water-melon, sugar, grapes, pomegranate, date, milk, harīsah[7], ghee, vinegar, wild chicory and cabbage. It is narrated that he liked dates; also that he loved honey; another narration says that the most loved fruit for him was pomegranate.

---

[6] To say: Bismi 'llāhi 'r-Raḥmāni 'r-Raḥīm.

[7] A sweet pastry made of flour, melted butter and suger. (tr.)

119. al-Amãlī, aṭ-Ṭūsī: Narrates through his chain, from Abū Usãmah, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "The [staple] food of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was barley when he found it, and his sweet-meat was dates, and his firewood was palm-leaves."

120. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: It is narrated about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he did not eat hot (food) until it became cold, and he used to say: "Surely Allãh has not fed us fire, certainly hot food does not have barakah."

And when he ate, he said: "Bismi 'llãh . . ."; and he used to eat with three fingers, and from the side that was close to him, and he did not take from that (side) which was adjacent to another person. When food was brought before him, he began before the others, and then they began. He used to eat with three fingers – the thumb, the one adjacent to it and the middle finger, and sometimes took help from the fourth. He used to eat with his entire palm, and he never ate with two fingers. And he used to say: "Eating with two fingers is the Satan's eating." And one day his companions brought fãlūdhaj and he ate (it) with them, and then said, "From what is it made?" They said, "We mix ghee and honey and it comes to this as you see." He said, "It is a good food."

And he used to eat bread made of unsieved barley floor; and he never ate wheat bread, nor did he eat his full with barley bread; and he never ate on a table-cloth until he died. And, he used to eat water-melon and grapes; and he ate dates and fed its stone to the goat; and he never ate garlic, onion, leek or the honey which had maghãfīr; and maghãfīr is a residue of the tree that remains in the bee's stomach, and it throws it into the honey; so its smell remains in the mouth.

And he never criticized any food – if he liked it, he ate it; and if he disliked it, he left it, but did not make it unlawful to others; and he used to lick out the bowl and said, "The last part of the plate is the greatest food in barakah." When he finished, he used to lick his three fingers (with which he ate) one by one; and he used to wash his hand from the food until it became clean; and he never took food alone.

The author says: The expression, the thumb, the one adjacent to it and the middle finger, shows the beautiful manner of the narrator, because he did not say, the thumb and the sabbãbah . . .[8] avoiding to call a finger of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) reviler or rebuker.

What is narrated here that he (s.a.w.a.) ate from the fãlūdhaj, goes against what has been narrated in al-Maḥãsin, with its chain, from Yaʻqūb

[8] Sabbãbah = Index finger. Literally it means, the (finger) used in reviling, rebuking. It was not a good manner to call a finger of the Prophet the reviler/ rebuker. (tr.)

ibn Shu'ayb, from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "While the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) was in ar-Raḥbah with a group of his com-panions, a dish of fālūdhaj was presented to him as gift. He said to his companions, 'Extend your hands;' so they extended their hands and he too extended his, then he withdrew it and said, 'I (just) remembered that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had never eaten it, so I did not like to eat it.'"

121. Makārimu 'l-Akhlāq: He said: "The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to drink from the bowls of glass, which were brought from Syria; and he drank from bowls, which were made from wood, hides and earthen ware."

The author says: Near to its earlier part is narrated in al-Kāfī and al-Maḥāsin, and there is in it: «and he liked to drink from Syrian bowl, and he used to say: "It is the cleanest of your vessels."»

122. Ibid: It is narrated about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he used to drink from his palm (and water was poured in it), and he used to say: "There is no vessel cleaner than hand."

123. al-Kāfī: Narrates through his chain from 'Abdullāh ibn Sinān that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to slaughter two rams on the day of al-Aḍḥā, one for himself and the other on behalf of those who did not have means from his ummah."

124. And among his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners regarding toilet is what is written in Sharḥu 'n-Nafliyyah (of the Second Martyr) about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he was never seen [engaged in] urinating or relieving bowel.

125. al-Ja'fariyyāt: Narrates through his chain from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad, from his forefathers, from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said: "Verily, when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) wanted to discard mucous he covered his head, then buried that, and when he wanted to spit, he did like that, and when he wanted to relieve bowel, he covered his head."

The author says: Constructing the toilet appeared in Arabia after Islam; before that they used to go forth to open spaces, as is inferred from some traditions.

126. al-Kāfī: Narrates through his chain from al-Ḥusayn ibn Khālid, from Abu 'l-Ḥasan II, that he said: "I said to him, 'A ḥadīth has been narrated to us that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to do istinjā'[9] and his ring was in his finger, and so was done by the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.); and the engraving on the seal of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was: "Muḥammad the Messenger of Allāh".' The Imām (a.s.) said, 'They speak truth.' I said, 'So we too should do (like that)?' He said, 'Surely they wore the ring (seal) in the right hand and you wear it in the left.' . . ."

The author says: Near to it is narrated in al-Ja'fariyyãt, and in al-Makãrim copying from Kitãbu 'l-Libãs (of al-'Ayyãshī) from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.).

127. And among his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners at the time of calamities and trials and regarding dead bodies and related matters are what are nar-rated in al-Makãrim: "Whenever the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) saw a pimple in his body, he saught refuge with Allãh and showed humility and fervently prayed to Him. They used to say to him: 'O Messenger of Allãh! There is no problem in it;' and he used to say: 'Surely, when Allãh wants to magnify a small thing, it becomes great, and when He wants to reduce a great thing, it becomes small.'"

128. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from Jãbir, from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: "The sunnah is to carry the bier on its four sides; and whatever carrying is done in addition to it, is voluntary."

129. Qurbu 'l-Asnãd: It is narrated from al-Ḥusayn ibn Ṭurayf, from al-Ḥusayn ibn 'Alwãn from Ja'far, from his father, that al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī (peace be upon both) was sitting and there were some of his com-panions with him; then a funeral procession passed from there; some of the people stood up and al-Ḥasan (a.s.) did not stand. When they went away, some people said to him, "Why did you not stand up? May Allãh preserve your health! Because the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to stand up for a bier when they passed with it." So, al-Ḥasan (a.s.) said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had stood up only once; it happened that a Jew's bier was proceeding and the place was con-fined, so the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) stood up and he did not like that that bier should rise above his head."

130. ad-Da'awãt, al-Quṭb: He said that when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) followed a bier, he was overcome by grief, did much talking to him-self, and did not talk much.

131. al-Ja'fariyyãt: Narrates through his chain from Ja'far ibn Muḥam-mad, from his forefathers from 'Alī (peace be upon them) that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to scatter three handfuls of earth on a grave.

132. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from Zurãrah, from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to do especially with someone dying from among the Hãshimites a thing which he did not do with any of the (other) Muslims; when he prayed (funeral) prayer of the Hãshimite and his grave was sprinkled with water, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) put his palm on the grave until (the marks of) his fingers could be seen on the wet earth; so if a stranger or a traveller from the people of Medina arrived and saw a new grave with marks of the palm of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) he would ask, 'Who has died from the progeny of Muḥammad?'"

133. Musakkinu 'l-Fuād (of the Second Martyr): Narrates from ʻAlī (a.s.) that when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) condoled, he said: "May Allāh give you (its) reward and have mercy on you"; and when he congratulated, he said: "May Allāh bless you and send His bless-ings to you."

134. And among his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners concerning wuḍū' and bath is what is narrated in Ãyãtu 'l-aḥkām (of al-Quṭb) from Sulaymān ibn Buraydah, from his father, that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to perform wuḍū' for each prayer; when it was the year of victory he prayed his prayers with one wuḍū', ʻUmar said, "O Messenger of Allāh! You have done something, which you had not done (before)." He said, "Intentionally have I done it."

135. al-Kāfī: Narrates through his chain from Zurārah, that he said: "Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said, 'Should not I relate to you the wuḍū' of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.)?' We said, 'Certainly.' So, he called for a basin with some water and put it in front of him; then he uncovered his arms; then he dipped his right palm in it and said, 'Like this (will be done) when the palm is clean'; he then scooped up a handful of water and put it on his forehead, and said, 'In the name of Allāh'; and let it fall down to the sides of his beard, then he passed his hand once on his face and forehead; then he dipped his left palm and scooped up a hand-ful and put it on his right arm, then passed his hand on his forearm until the water flowed to his fingertips; then he dipped his right palm and scooped up a handful and put it on his left arm, and passed his hand on his (left) forearm until the water flowed to his fingertips; then he wiped the front part of his head and backs of his feet with the wetness of his left hand and the residue of the wetness of the right hand."

He said: "And Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said, 'Surely Allāh is odd and likes odd (number); sufficient then for you in wuḍū' is three dippings: one for the face and two for the two forearms, and you will wipe the forepart of your head with the wetness of your right hand, and with the residue of that wetness the back of your right foot, and will wipe with the wetness of your left hand the back of your left foot.'"

Zurārah said: "Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said, 'A man had asked the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) about the wuḍu' of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.) so he demonstrated to him like this.'"

The author says: This theme is narrated from Zurãrah, Bukayr and others through numerous ways; have narrated it al-Kulaynī, aṣ-Ṣadūq, ash-Shaykh, al-'Ayyãshī, al-Mufīd, al-Karãjikī and others; and traditions of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (peace be upon them) for this matter are mustafiḍah, nearly mutawãtir.

136. al-Amãlī (by Mufīdu 'd-Dīn aṭ-Ṭūsī): Narrates through his chain from Abū Hurayrah that when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) performed wuḍū', he began with his right side.

137. at-Tahdhīb: Narrates through his chains from Abū Baṣīr that he said, "I asked Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) about wuḍū'. He said, 'The Messen-ger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to perform wuḍū' with a mudd[10] of water, and take bath with a ṣã'[11]'"

The author says: A similar tradition is narrated through another way from Abū Ja'far (a.s.).

138. al-'Uyūn: Narrates through his chains from ar-Riḍã (a.s.), from his forefathers (peace be upon them), inter alia in a lengthy ḥadīth: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'Surely, we Ahlu 'l-Bayt, ṣadaqah is not allowed to us, and we have been ordered to perform wuḍū' pro-perly, and we do not make an ass jump on a she-ass.'"

139. at-Tahdhīb: Narrates through his chains from 'Abdullãh ibn Sinãn, from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "Gargling and rinsing the nose is among what the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has made sunnah."

140. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Mu'ãwiyah ibn 'Ammãr that he said: "I heard Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) saying, 'The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to do ghusl (bath) with one ṣã' (of water); and if one of his women was with him, he did ghusl with a ṣã' and a mudd.'"

The author says: al-Kulaynī has narrated this meaning in al-Kãfī, through his chain from Muḥammad ibn Muslim from the Imãm (a.s.), and there it elaborates that both did ghusl from one vessel; and likewise is narrated by ash-Shaykh through another chain.

141. al-Ja'fariyyãt: Narrates through his chain from Ja'far ibn Muḥam-mad from his father (peace be upon both) that he said: "al-Ḥasan ibn Muḥammad asked Jãbir ibn 'Abdillãh about the bath of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), Jãbir said, 'The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), used to scoop water [with his hand] on his head three times.' al-Ḥasan ibn

[10] Mudd: A measure of varying quantity in various countries, in fiqh it denotes 3/4 kg.
[11] Ṣã': Nearly 3 kg.

Muḥammad said, 'I have a lot of hair (on my head), as you see.' Jābir said, 'O noble man! Do not say so, because the hair of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was thicker and more fragrant.'"

142. al-Hidāyah (by aṣ-Ṣadūq): "aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said, 'The ghusl of Friday is sunnah wājibah for men and women in journey and in presence . . .' And aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said, 'Ghusl of Friday is purity and atonement of sins from Friday to Friday.' He (also) said, 'The reason of (laying down of) Friday bath was this: That the Helpers (Anṣār) used to work for their camels and properties; when Friday came, they came (direct) to the mosque and the people got annoyed with smell of their armpits. So, Allāh ordered the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to take bath, and thus the sunnah was established.'"

The author says: Concerning his (s.a.w.a.)'s customs regarding ghusl, traditions have been narrated for the ghusl of the day of Fiṭr and similar baths in all the *'īd*s and numerous other baths; probably some of them will be mentioned later on, God willing.

143. And among his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners and *sunnah*s concerning prayer and related matters is what is narrated in al-Kāfī, through his chain from al-Fuḍayl ibn Yasār, ʻAbdu 'l-Malik and Bukayr, that they said: "We heard Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) saying, 'The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to perform supererogatory prayers double of the obligatory, and keep supererogatory fast double of the obligatory.'"

The author says: ash-Shaykh too has narrated it.

144. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Ḥanān that he said: "ʻAmr ibn Ḥurayth asked Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), and I was sitting there, he said, 'May I be made your ransom! Please tell me about the prayer of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.).' He said, 'The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to pray eight *rakʻah*s of noon, and four of the first (i.e. ẓuhr), and eight after it and four of 'aṣr, and three of maghrib and four after maghrib, and 'ishā' the last four, and eight tahajjud and three (shafaʻ and) witr, and two *rakʻah*s (nāfilah) of fajr and dawn prayer two *rakʻah*s.'

"I said, 'May I be made your ransom! If I have strength to pray more than that, will Allāh punish me for excess of prayer?' He said, 'No; but He will punish you for leaving the sunnah.'"

The author says: This tradition shows that the two *rakʻah*s in sitting position prayed after 'ishā' prayer are not part of fifty (*rakʻah*s), but with them the number, fifty-one, is completed, counting them as equal to one rakʻah in standing position. Rather it was laid down as a substitute of the witr, in case the death came before he could stand up for witr; as al-Kulaynī (may Allāh have mercy on him), has narrated in al-Kāfī, through his chain, from Abū Baṣīr from Abū ʿAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "Whoever believes in Allāh and the Last Day, should not sleep (at night) without (praying) witr." "I said, 'You mean the two *rakʿah*s after the ʿishā'?' He said, 'Yes; they are counted as one rakʿah; whoever prayed them, then something happened to him (i.e. he died), he would die on witr; and if death did not happen to him, he would pray witr in the last period of the night.'

"I said, 'Did the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) prayed these two *rakʿah*s?' He said, 'No.' I said, 'Why?' He said, 'Because the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to receive revelation, and he knew whether he would die in that night or not, while others do not know it. That was why he did not pray them, and ordered (the people) to pray them.' . . ."

Probably the statement that he did not pray them, means that he did not pray them regularly, rather on some nights he prayed and on others he left them, as is inferred from some other traditions. In this way, it would not go against what has been narrated that he used to pray them.

145. at-Tahdhīb: Narrates through his chain from Zurārah that he said: "I heard Abū Jaʿfar (a.s.) saying, 'The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was not praying in day time until the noon; when the shadow reached (towards the east) about half a finger, he prayed eight *rakʿah*s; then when the shadow reached an arm's length, he prayed ẓuhr; then after ẓuhr he prayed two *rakʿah*s, and he used to pray two *rakʿah*s before the time of ʿaṣr; when the shadow extended to two arm-lengths, he prayed ʿaṣr; and he prayed maghrib after sunset; when the reddish colour (in the sky) vanished the time of ʿishā' came; the last time of maghrib is the end of the reddish colour; when the reddish colour vanished the time of ʿishā' came, and the end of the ʿishā' time is one third of the night.

"'And he did not pray after ʿishā' until midnight, thereafter he prayed thirteen rakʿahs including the witr and two *rakʿah*s of nāfilah of fajr; then at dawn-break he prayed the morning prayer.'"

The author says: This tradition does not describe fully the nāfilah of ʿaṣr; and it is known from other traditions.

146. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Muʿāwiyah ibn Wahb that he said: "I heard Abū ʿAbdillāh (a.s.) saying, and he was describing the prayer of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); he said, 'The cleansing (water) was brought to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and covered (and put) near his head, and his teeth-cleansing small stick was put under his bed; then he slept as long as Allāh wished; when he awoke, he sat up, then turned his eyes in the sky, then recited some verses from [ch. of] "The House of ʿImrān": Most surely in the creation of the heavens and the earth and the alternation of the night and the day there are signs for men who understand [3:190]. Then he cleansed his teeth and performed cleansing, then proceeded to the mosque and prayed four *rak'ah*s, equal to his recitation was his rukū', and equal to his rukū' was his sajdah; he remained in rukū' until it was said: "When will he raise his head?" and he remained in sajdah until it was said: "When will he raise his head?"

"'Then he returned to his bed and slept as long as Allāh wished; then he woke up, and sat up; then he recited the verses from "The House of 'Imrān", and turned his eyes in the sky, then cleansing the teeth, he performed (ritual) ablution, then proceeded to the mosque and prayed four *rak'ah*s like he did before.

"'Then he returned to his bed and slept as long as Allāh wished; then he woke up and sat up; then he recited verses from "The House of 'Imrān", and turned his eyes in the sky; then cleansing his teeth, he performed (ritual) ablution, then proceeded to the mosque and prayed two *rak'ah*s, then went forth for prayer.'"

The author says: This meaning has also been narrated in al-Kāfī from two chains.

147. It is narrated that he (s.a.w.a.) used to make the nāfilah of the dawn prayer short, he used to pray it in the beginning of the fajr and then proceeded to the (wajib) prayer.

148. al-Maḥāsin: Narrates through his chain from 'Umar ibn Yazīd, from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "Whoever, while praying witr, said in it seventy times: 'I seek parden of Allāh, my Lord, and repent to Him', and keeps doing it diligently, until he completes a year, Allāh writes him among those who seek pardon in early dawn.

"And the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to seek Allāh's pardon in the witr seventy times, and used to say seven times: 'This is the stand of him who seeks Your refuge from the Fire.' . . ."

149. Man lā Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: "The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to say in the qunūt of witr: 'O Allāh! Guide me among those whom You guided, and give me remission among those whom You remitted, and take care of me among those You cared for, and give me barakah in what You have given me, and protect me from the evil of what You have decreed; surely You do decide and no one decides against You; Glory be to Thee, O Lord of the House! I seek Your pardon and return to You, and I believe in You and rely on You; and there is no strength or power except with You. O Merciful!'"

150. at-Tahdhīb: Narrates through his chain from Abū Khadījah from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "When the month of Ramaḍān came, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to increase in prayer, and I too increase; therefore, you too should increase."

The author says: The Imām (a.s.) means by this increase, the thousand *rakʻah*s of tarāwīḥ, the nāfilah of the month of Ramaḍān, which the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to pray in addition to the fifty *rakʻah*s of daily nawāfil; many traditions have been narrated as to how to pray it and how to divide it on the Ramaḍān nights; and it has come through the chains of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (peace be upon them) that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to pray it without congregation, and prohibited praying it with congregation. He used to say: "There is no congrega-tion in nāfilah."

And there are other especial prayers reserved for the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), narrated in the books of invocations; we have not copied them here because they are beyond our purpose here. Likewise, there are many prophetic *sunnah*s about prayers, invocations and awrād[12], whoever wants to know about them should look in the relevant books.

151. al-Kāfī: Narrates through his chain from Yazīd ibn Khalīfah that he said: "I said to Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), 'Surely ʻUmar ibn Ḥanẓalah has brought to us from you the time [of prayer].' He said, 'Then he will not tell lie about us.' . . . And I said, 'He said that the time of maghrib (prayer) is when the disc [of the sun] disappears; but when the Messen-ger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was on a journey, he delayed the maghrib and combined maghrib with ʻishā'.' He said, 'He said right.'"

152. at-Tahdhīb: Narrates through his chain from Ṭalḥah ibn Zayd from Jaʻfar from his father (peace be upon them) that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), in rainy nights, used to shorten the maghrib and hasten the ʻishā', praying both together, and used to say: "He who does not have mercy will not be dealt with mercy."

153. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from Ibn Abī ʻUmayr, from Ḥammād, from al-Ḥalabī, from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was on a journey, or had an urgent work, he used to combine ẓuhr with ʻaṣr and maghrib with ʻishā', . . ." This meaning is narrated by al-Kulaynī, ash-Shaykh, Ibnu 'sh-Shaykh and the First Martyr, may Allāh have mercy on them.

154. Man lā Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: Narrates through his chain from Muʻāwiyah ibn Wahb from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "The [12] Short invocations, (pl. of wird).

muadhdhin used to come to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) during hot season (calling him) for the prayer of ẓuhr, so the Messenger of Allāh (s.a. w.a.) used to tell him: "Abrid, abrid."

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadūq interpreted the last two words as, "make haste, make haste", taking it from "al-barīd" [post]; but apparently it indicates delay, so that intense heat might go away, as points to it what is narrated in the Book of al-'Ulā', from Muḥammad ibn Muslim that he said, "Passed from near me Abū Ja'far (a.s.) in the mosque of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and I was praying. Then he met me after that and said, 'Take care not to pray wājib at that time; do you perform it in the intense heat?' I said, 'I was praying nāfilah.'"

155. Iḥyāu 'l-'Ulūm: He said: "Never sat anyone near him when he was praying, but he shortened his prayer and turned to him and said, 'Do you need something?' Then after accomplishing his work, he returned to his prayer."

156. Kitāb Zuhdu 'n-Nabī (by Ja'far ibn Aḥmad al-Qummī): He said: "Whenever the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) stood up for prayer, his face turned ashen, and there was whizzing sound coming from his chest or belly because of the (Divine) fear."

The author says: This meaning has also been narrated by Ibn al-Faḥd and others.

157. Ibid: He said: "And another tradition says that when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) stood in prayer (it looked) as if he was a flung away cloth."

158. Biḥāru 'l-Anwār: He said: "'Āishah said, 'The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) talked with us and we talked with him, but when the (time of) prayer came then it was as if he did not know us nor we did know him.'"

159. al-Majālis (by Mufīdu 'd-Dīn aṭ-Ṭūsī): Narrates through his chain to 'Alī (a.s.) that he wrote to Muḥammad ibn Abī Bakr, when he made him the governor of Egypt: ". . . Then look at your rukū' and sujūd, because surely the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was most perfect of the people in prayer, and shortest of them in its activities."

160. al-Ja'fariyyāt: Narrates through his chain from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad, from his forefathers from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said: "When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) yawned during the prayer, he stopped it with his right hand."

The author says: A similar tradition is narrated in ad-Da'āim.

161. 'Ilalu 'sh-Sharāi': Narrates through his chain from Hishām ibn al-Ḥakam from Abu 'l-Ḥasan Mūsā (a.s.), inter alia, in a ḥadīth that he said: "I said to him, 'For what reason it is said in the rukū': Subḥāna rabbiya 'l- ʻaẓīmi wa bi-ḥamdih, and it is said in sajdah: Subḥãna rabbiya 'l-aʻlã wa bi-ḥamdih?' He said, 'O Hishãm! Surely when the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was taken up in miʻrãj, and he per-formed prayer, and remembered what he had seen of the grandeur of Allãh, his limbs trembled and he sat down on his knees and he began saying: Subḥãna rabbiya 'l-ʻaẓīmi wa bi-ḥamdih; then when he stood up from the rukūʻ and looked at a place still higher, he fell down on his face, saying: Subḥãna rabbiya 'l-aʻlã wa bi-ḥamdih; when he said it seven times, that fear went away; therefore this began as a sunnah.'"

162. Tanbīhu 'l-Khawãṭir: (of ash-Shaykh Warrãm ibn Abī Firãs) from an-Nuʻmãn that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to level our lines, as if he equalizes the arrow-shafts, until he saw that we were heedless of it. Then one day he came out and stood up until he was about to say takbīr, and he saw a man whose chest was shown ahead, so he said, 'Servants of Allãh! You should level your lines or your faces will be turned aside.'"

163. Ibid: It is narrated from Ibn Masʻūd that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to touch our shoulders in prayer and say, 'Be straight and be not uneven, otherwise your hearts will differ from one another.' . . ."

164. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: Narrates through his chain from Dãwūd ibn al-Ḥaṣīn, from Abu 'l-ʻAbbãs, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) remained in seclusion (iʻtikãf) in the first ten days of the month of Ramaḍãn, then remained in seclusion in the middle (second) ten days of Ramḍãn, thereafter he continued to remain in seclusion in the last ten days."

165. Ibid: He said: "Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) said, 'The (battle of) Badr was in the month of Ramaḍãn, and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) did not remain in seclusion; so when the next year came, he remained in seclu-sion for twenty days: ten days for that (current) year and ten as repay-ment of what he had missed [of the last year].'"

The author says: al-Kulaynī has narrated this and the preced-ing tradition in al-Kãfī.

166. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from al-Ḥalabī, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "When the last ten days came [i.e. of the month of Ramaḍãn), the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to remain in iʻtikãf (seclusion) in the mosque, and a cupola of hair was erected for him, and he tucked up his apron, and his bed was rolled up." (Someone added): "and was detached from the women." (The Imãm) said, "As for detachment from the women, No."

The author says: This theme is narrated in many traditions; the negation of detachment from the women – as they have explained and what the traditions say – means permission of mixing with and living with them, not cohabitation.

167. And among his manners and *sunnah*s regarding fast, is what is narrated in Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh, through his chain from Muḥam-mad ibn Marwãn that he said: "I heard Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) saying, 'The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to fast until it was said, "He would not break the fast", and used to break the fast until it was said: "He would not fast"; then he fasted one day and broke the fast the next day; then he fasted on Mondays and Thursdays. Then he returned from it to the fast of three days in a month: Thursday at the beginning of the month, Wednesday in the middle of the month, and Thursday at the end of the month; and he (s.a.w.a.) used to say: "That is the fast of the life-time."

"'And my father (a.s.) used to say: "No one is more hated by Allãh than the man who, when it is said to him that the Messenger of Allãh used to do such and such, says: 'Allãh will not punish me for my striving in prayer and fast'; it is as if he thinks that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had left out some good work being unable to do it."'"

168. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from Muḥammad ibn Muslim, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), in the beginning of his prophethood, used to fast [continuously] until it was said: "He will not leave fasting"; and left fasting until it was said: "He will not fast (again)"; then he left this and began fasting one day and breaking the fast the next day (and it is the fast of Dãwūd); then he left it and fasted three bright days; then he left it and divided them – one day in every ten days – two Thursdays with a Wednesday in the middle, and he (s.a.w.a.) expired and he followed the same.

The author says: There are numerous nearly mutawãtir tradi-tions of this theme.

169. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from ʻAnbasah al-ʻÃbid that he said: "The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) kept up fast on Shaʻbãn, Ramaḍãn and of three days in every month.

170. an-Nawãdir (of Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad ibn ʻĪsã): Narrates from ʻAlī ibn Nuʻmãn, from Zarʻah, from Sumãʻah, that he said: "I asked Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) about the fast of Shaʻbãn, whether the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) did fast it. He said, 'Yes, and he did not fast its whole month.' I said, 'How many days he broke the fast?' He said, 'He broke it.'

So I repeated (the question) and he repeated it three times, without adding to the word, 'he broke it'. The next year I asked him the same question, and he replied to me in the same way. . . ."

171. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: It is narrated from Anas that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had a drink with which he broke the fast, and another drink for the suḥūr;[13] and often both were the same, and often it was milk, and sometime the drink was a bread liquified. . . ."

172. al-Kãfī: Narrates through his chain from Ibnu 'l-Qaddãḥ, from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), that he said: "The first thing with which the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) broke his fast in the season of fresh ripe dates with those fresh dates, and in the season of dried dates with dried dates."

173. Ibid: Narrates through his chain from as-Sakūnī, from Jaʻfar, from his father (peace be upon both), that he said: "When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) fasted and did not get anything sweet, he broke his fast with water; and it is written in some traditions that sometimes he broke his fast with dried grapes."

174. al-Muqniʻah: It is narrated from the progeny of Muḥammad (peace be upon them) that they said: "It is mustaḥab to take something before the dawn, even a sip of water. And it is narrated that the best of it is date and a mush made of wheat or barley, because the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) used to take it."

The author says: And it is among his continued *sunnah*s. One of the things reserved to him was the fast of wiṣãl, i.e. fasting con-tinuously for more than one day without any intervening iftãr. And he expressly prohibited it to his ummah and said: "Surely you are not strong enough to do it and surely for me there is near my Lord what feeds me and gives drink to me."

175. Makãrimu 'l-Akhlãq: It is narrated about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he used to eat harīsah most of the times and used it for suḥūr too.

176. Man lã Yaḥḍuruhu 'l-Faqīh: He said: "When the month of Rama-ḍãn came, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) freed every prisoner, and gave to every begger."

177. Daʻãimu 'l-Islãm: ʻAlī (a.s.) said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.) used to roll up his bed and became very active during the last ten days of Ramaḍãn; and he used to keep his family awake in the twenty-third night, and sprinkled water on the faces of the sleepy ones in the night; and Fãṭimah (peace be upon her) did not let anyone to sleep from her family in that night, and prepared them for it by reducing their meal during the day; and she used to say: 'Deprived is he who is deprived of its [i.e. this night's] good.'"

[13] Suḥūr: The last meal before dawn (in fasting). (tr.)

178. al-Muqni': It is sunnah that the man should break his fast in al-Aḍḥã after the ('īd) prayer, and in al-Fiṭr before the prayer.

179. And among his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners regarding recitation of the Qur'ãn and invocation are what is narrated in al-Majãlis (of ash-Shaykh) through his chain from Abu 'd-Dunyã, from the Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) that he said, "Nothing prevented the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) from recitation of the Qur'ãn except janãbah [major ritual impurity]."

180. Majma'u 'l-Bayãn: It is narrated from Umm Salamah that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to disconnect his recitation verse to verse.

181. Tafsīr (of Abu 'l-Futūḥ): "He (s.a.w.a.) used not to sleep until he recited al-musabbiḥãt, and he used to say: 'There is, in these chapters, a verse that is better than a thousand verses.' They said, 'And what is al-musabbiḥãt?' He said, 'Chapters of "Iron", "The Mustering", "The Ranks", "Congregation" and "Mutual Fraud"'".

The author says: This meaning has been narrated in Majma'u 'l-bayãn, from al-'Irbãṣ ibn Sãriyah.

182. Duraru 'l-La'ãlī (of Ibn Abī Jamhūr): Narrates from Jãbir that he said: "The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used not to sleep until he recited Tabãraka and Alif-Lãm-Mmīm at-Tanzīl."[14]

183. Majma'u 'l-Bayãn: "'Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib (a.s.) has narrated that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) loved this chapter: Sabbiḥ isma rabbika 'l-A'lã[15]; and the first to say: Subḥãna Rabbiya 'l-A'lã, was Mīkã'īl."

The author says: The first part of this ḥadīth is narrated in Biḥãru 'l-anwãr from ad-Durru 'l-manthūr. There are other traditions about what he (s.a.w.a.) used to say at the time of reciting the Qur'ãn, or reciting (various) chapters, or especial verses. Whoever wants to know it should refer to the relevant books.

There are lectures and statements issued by him (s.a.w.a.) in which he awakens the awareness of, and prompts, the people to hold fast to the Qur'ãn and meditate on it, to be led by its guidance and be illuminated by its light. And he (s.a.w.a.) had more right than anyone else to reach, for the perfection he called the people to, and the first and quickest to reach to every good; and, according to the well-known narration, he had said:

[15] ch.87 (tr.)

"Turned my hair white the chapter of 'Hūd'."[16] And it has been narrated[17] from Ibn Mas'ūd that he said: "Ordered me the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) that I should recite for him some parts of the Qur'ãn; so I recited for him the chapter of Yūnus; until when I reached the divine words: and they shall be brought back to Allãh, their true Master [10:30], I saw him and tear was trembling in his noble eyes."

These are some small bits[18] from his (s.a.w.a.)'s manners and *sunnah*s; there are nearly mutawãtir traditions, which have been repeatedly narrated in a lot of books of both sects, and Divine Speech supports it and does not refute any of it; and Allãh is the Guide.

SLAVERY AND ENSLAVEMENT

The Divine Words: If Thou shouldst chastise them, then surely they are Thy slaves [5:118] explain the meaning of slavery and servitude. Although there are many verses in the Qur'ãn that have this theme, but this verse contains the rational argumentation which shows that if there were a slave it would conform with reason that his master had the right to punish him as he wished, because he was his master and owner.

The reason does not accept the permission of giving punishment, and does not allow the management that would be very hard, except after establishing that the master is allowed to have all managerial dis-posals. So, the master has the right to deal with his slave anyhow he wishes and with whatever he wishes; the reason has made exception of only those disposals which it disapproves because they are disgust-ing and ignoble, not because the slave is slave.

As its concomitant, the slave is bound to obey his master in all that he is told to do, and to follow him in his wishes. He has no auth-ority to engage in any activity if his master does not approve of it. It is somehow pointed at by the Divine Words: Nay! They are honoured servants; they do not precede Him in speech and (only) according to His command do they act (21:26-27). See also the verse: Allãh sets forth a parable – (consider) a slave, the property of another, (who) has no power over

[16] He (s.a.w.a.) points to the Divine Words in it: Continue then in the right way as you are commanded, . . . [11:112] (Author's note)

[17] The tradition is narrated by its meaning. (Author's note) anything, and one whom We have granted from Ourselves a goodly sustenance so he spends from it secretly and openly; are the two alike? (16:75).

A full discussion of various aspects of what the noble Qur'ān sees on the question of servitude and slavery depends on the following chapters:

1. Consideration of Servitude to Allāh (s.w.t.):

There are numerous verses in the noble Qur'ān which count the people slaves of Allāh (s.w.t.), and builds on it the root of the religious call: The people are slaves and Allāh is their true Master. Rather it crosses this limit and takes all those who are in the heavens and the earth stamped with the brand of servitude; like the reality which is called angel in their multitude, and another reality which the Qur'ān has named jinn. The Sublime, to Whom belong Might and Majesty says: There is no one in the heavens and the earth but will come to the Beneficent God as a slave (20:93).

There is no doubt that the consideration of the servitude to Allāh (s.w.t.) is an aspect arrived at through analysis. First, we analyse the meaning of servitude to its basic components, then we decide that its reality is established after removal of its extra characteristics, which attach themselves to the basic meaning in the rational creatures. There are some people one of whom is called slave. Why? Because his person is owned by another, an ownership which allows that another person (who is his owner and master) to manage him in any way he wishes and with whatever he desires, and removes from the slave the inde-pendence of will altogether.

Meditation in this meaning leads one to decide that a human being – and if you wish, you may extend it and say, everyone who has cognizance and will – is slave of Allāh in the true meaning of servi-tude. The fact is that Allāh is the Owner of all that is called "thing" in the real meaning of ownership. Nothing owns – neither by itself nor through something else – any harm or benefit, nor death, life or resur-rection; and nothing becomes independent in existence by its person, attribute or action except what Allāh has made it its owner – an owner-ship which does not negate Allāh's ownership, nor does it transfer the ownership from Him to someone else; rather He is the Owner of what He has made them the owner of, and has power over what He has given them the power on, and He has power over everything, and He encompasses everything.

This real authority and actual ownership is what makes it obligatory to them to obey what Allãh wants from them by His legislative will, and the religious laws and regulations which He lays down, through which their affairs are mended and their bliss and happiness in both worlds is achieved.

In short, Allãh, the Sublime, is their owner in the creative ownership, which makes them His slaves, submissive to His decree, no matter whether they knew Him or not, obeyed His commands or disobeyed. He is, also, their owner in the legislative ownership, which obligates them to listen and obey, and commands them to observe piety and worship.

This ownership and mastership in its effect is distinguished from the ownership and mastership which is prevalent among the people – and likewise its opposite, the servitude – as follows: As Allãh is the creative Owner unrestrictedly, and there is no owner other than Him, it is not permissible, in the stage of legislative servitude, to take any other master, nor to worship any other. Allãh says: And your Lord has commanded that you shall not worship (any) but Him (17:23). It is contrary to the mastership prevalent among the people, because here he who overcomes others through any means of domination enjoys ownership.

Also, as among His slaves who are owned by Him, there is nothing which is not owned by Him, and they are not divided in their existence between owned and not owned, and as they are in their per-sons and attributes as well as in their conditions and deeds, creatively owned by Him, which is followed by legislative ownership. So, this ownership decrees that the servitude will be everlasting and will cover all that returns to them in any way. They have no latitude to worship Allãh partially, for example, that they worship Him with tongue, but not with hand. Also, they are not allowed to reserve some parts of their worship to Allãh and the other parts to someone else. It is con-trary to the mastership prevalent among the people, in which the master has no rational authority to do whatever he wishes. Ponder on it.

It is this theme which leads to the unrestrictedness of the like of Divine Words: . . . you have not besides Him any guardian or any intercessor; . . . (32:4). And He is Allãh, there is no god but He! All praise is due to Him in this (life) and the hereafter, and His is the judgement, . . . (28:70). Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth declares the glory of Allãh; to Him belongs the kingdom, and to Him is due (all) praise, and He has power over all things (64:1).

In any case, the servitude considered in regards to Allãh is an analytical meaning inferred from the servitude, which rational people see in their societies, so it has a basis in human society. Now, Let us see what is its basis:

2. Enslaving Human Beings and Its Causes:

Enslavement and holding people in bondage was prevalent in human society upto about seventy years before today.[19] And probably it is still found in some primitive tribes in Asia and Africa. Keeping slave-boys and slave-maids was an established system among ancient nations for which no historical beginning can be fixed. It had its special system and rules and regulations, which were commonly followed, in all nations, and some special rules were found in different nations.

Its basic meaning: A human individual, in presence of some special conditions, becomes merchandise, owned like other owned items of trade, e.g. animals, vegetables, and stones, etc. When the per-son is owned, he is deprived of all options; someone else owns his actions and his effects that manages them as he wishes.

This was their custom concerning enslavement. However it was not based on an at random will, nor was it unrestricted or unbased on any condition. It was not possible for someone to enslave whomsoever one wished, nor could he own whomsoever he wished through trade or gift and so on. In short, the basic meaning was not based on any reck-lessness or foolhardiness, although contained within the laws related to it there could have been numerous foolish items, according to varying opinions and customs of the nations.

Enslavement was based on a sort of victory and domination, for example, victory in war, which gives the victor power to do with his vanquished enemy whatever he wishes e.g., killing, imprisoning and so on; and the domination of presidency which makes a tyrant president do whatever he wants in his jurisdiction; and the mutual relationship of procreation and breeding which puts the mastership of the affairs of a weakling infant in the hands of his strong father who could do with him whatever he thought fit, even selling him, gifting him, exchanging him or lending him and so on.

We have repeatedly mentioned earlier that the ownership in the human society is based on the power ingrained in human nature to utilize and take benefit from everything it is possible to utilize in any way. And man, by nature, employs other things; he employs, for con-tinuing his life, everything he has in power, and gets benefit from his existence's beneficial things, beginning from his basic matter, then elements, then various components of solid matters, then animal king-dom until another human being who is his like in humanity.

However, as he found that he is in dire need of society and social cooperation, he felt himself obliged to accept partnership with all indi-viduals of his species in utilization of the benefits, which are obtained from the things through their joint activities. In this way, he and all individuals of the human species together will form a society, in which every part will be reserved for one or more deeds, and the whole society will benefit from the whole benefits. You may say it in other words that the results of those activities will be divided among them, and every one of them will enjoy those benefits according to his status in social order. That is why we see that as much as a social individual gets strength and power, he negates natural sociology and begins em-ploying people, dominating and enslaving them, and decides about their persons, honour and properties in whatever way he wishes.

Consequently, if you ponder freely on their system of enslaving people, you will find that they do not consider owning a man if he is a member of their society; rather an owned man is considered outside of society, like a fighting enemy whose only aim is to destroy the tilth and offspring; and man erases his name and trace as he is out of his enemy's society, and he has a right to destroy him through annihilation and to enslave him as he wishes, because there is no sanctity attached to him; or like a father vis-à-vis his minor children and his other depend-ents as he believes that being his dependents in the society they cannot be his equal, of the same status or similar, and he has the right to do whatever he likes with them, not excluding killing or selling, etc.

Possibly, the owner has some special characteristics because of which he believes that he is above the society, he is above the others in importance, and he does not share with them a benefit; rather he has the final say and definite decision; and has the right to enjoy the best of what he chooses, and to manage their persons even through owner-ship and enslavement.

It is now clear that the basic root on which man has built the custom of enslavement is the right of special domain and uncondi-tional ownership which man believes he has, and that he does not ex-clude from it anyone except his partners in human society, those who are equal to him in social weight, and with whom he secures himself in the citadel of cooperation and mutual help. As for others, he does not see any hindrance in owning or enslaving them.

The main candidates for this enslavement are three groups: (i) A fighting enemy, (ii) weak children and women vis-à-vis their fathers and guardians, respectively, (iii) a vanquished demeaned person vis-à-vis the victor and dominant person.

3. Origin of Enslavement in History:

Although it is not known when the system of slavery began in the society, yet most probably slaves were taken in the beginning as a result of war and domination, and then their children and women were included in it. That is why we find in the history of strong warrior nations stories and tales as well as the laws and regulations related to enslave-ment through imprisonment, and which is not found in other nations.

Slavery was prevalent in ancient civilized nations, like India, Greece, Rome and Iran, and among religious communities like the Jews and the Christians, as is seen in the Tawrāt and the Injīl. This was the case until the advent of Islam. Islam affirmed the basic idea but restricted its circle and ameliorated its laws; finally came the Brussels Convention some seventy[20] years ago, which resolved to abolish the slavery.

Ferdinand Total says in his Dictionary of Eminent Persons of East and West:

> Slavery was widespread among the ancients and slave was taken from war-prisoners and captives and from defeated tribes. Slavery had a system well known among the Jews, the Greeks, the Romans and the Arabs in the days of ignorance and in Islam.
>
> The system of slavery was abolished gradually: In India (1843), in French colonies (1848), in the U.S.A. after the Civil War (1865), and in Barazil (1888) until the Brussels Convention resolved to abolish enslavement; but it is still found in some tribes in Africa and Asia.
>
> The basis of the abolition of slavery is equality of human beings in rights and responsibilities.

4. Islamic View About It:

Islam divided the slavery according to its causes: It has been explained earlier that its main causes were three: War, domination and guardianship like parentage, etc; and it abolished two of them alto-gether, i.e., domination and guardianship.

[20] In 1890. (tr.)

According to Islam all people are equally honourable, be they king or subject, ruler or ruled, commander or soldier, master or servant; it abolished all distinctions and life characteristics, and established equal-ity amongst individuals in the respect which it accorded to their persons, honour and properties; and gave weight to their perceptions and wills – and it means full authority within the circle of respected rights – and to their actions and what they acquired, and it is their authority and control on their properties and benefit of their existence in activities. A master of affairs in Islam has authority over the people only in imple-mentation of penal code and other laws and regarding the general wel-fare, which returns to the religious society. But as to what his heart desires and what he likes for his individual life, he is just like any other person, he has no special privilege among them, and his order is not implemented in what he desires, be it great or small. This abolishes the slavery based on domination, as a negative with absence of the subject.

It also regulated the guardianship of fathers over their sons; they do have the rights of nursing and protection, and they are duty bound to bringing them up and educating them, and looking after their properties as long as they are prevented from managing it because of their minor-ity; and when they reach the age of maturity, then they are equal to their fathers in social religious rights; they are independent in their lives, and they have the option for what they do like for their own selves.

Of course, it has emphasized the enjoinment of doing good to their parents and consideration of the rights of upbringing. Allãh says: And We have enjoined man in respect of his parents – his mother bears him with fainting upon fainting and his weaning takes two years – saying: "Be grateful to Me and to both your parents; to Me is the eventual coming. And if they contend with you that you should asso-ciate with Me what you have no knowledge of, do not obey them, and keep company with them in this world kindly, and follow the way of him who turns to Me, . . ." (31:14-15); And your Lord has commanded that you shall not worship (any) but Him, and goodness to your par-ents. If either or both of them reach old age with you, say not to them "Ugh" nor chide them, and speak to them a generous word. And make yourself submissively gentle to them with compassion, and say: "O my Lord! Have mercy on them, as they brought me up (when I was) little." (17:23-24).

And the Islamic sharī'ah has counted disobedience of parents among major sins that lead to perdition.

As for the women, it gave them a position in society and accorded them a social weight from which the healthy reason cannot deviate a single step. In this way they became one half of the human society while hitherto they were deprived of it; they were given independent authority in matters of matrimony and property when uptil now they had no such power, or were not independent.

They participated with men in many affairs, while some affairs were exclusively reserved to them and some others were reserved to men. All this was decided considering their being's sustenance and their physiological composition; then she was given latitude in some matters while men were put under hard pressure, like providing sustenance of the family, participating in battlefields, and so on.

We have talked on this subject in detail at the end of the chapter of "The Cow" in the second[21] volume of the book and in the begin-ning of the chapter of "Women" in the fourth[22] volume; and it was made clear there that the women enjoy in Islam more leniency vis-à-vis the men which cannot be found in any sociological system, ancient or modern.

Allãh says: . . . for men is the benefit of what they earn and for women is the benefit of what they earn; . . . (4:32); . . . there is no blame on you for what they do for themselves in a proper manner; . . . (2:234); . . . and they have rights similar to those against them in a just manner; . . . (2:228); "That I will not waste the work of a worker among you, whether male or female, the one of you being from the other; . . ." (3:195). Then He has declared for the whole species joined together: . . . for it is (the benefit of) what it has earned, and upon it is (the evil of) what it has wrought; . . . (2:286); . . . and no soul earns (evil) but against itself, and no bearer of burden shall bear the burden of another; . . . (6:165). Of the same import are many other unrestricted verses which treat an individual man a complete and perfect part of the society and gives him an independence with which he becomes separate from any other person in the result of his actions, be it good or evil, beneficial or harmful, without making exception of big or small, male or female.

Then He equalized them all in honour and dignity, and then He abolished all honour and dignity except the religious dignity, which is acquired by piety and deeds. Allãh says: . . . and to Allãh belongs the honour and to His Messenger and to the believers, . . . (63:8); O you people! Surely We have created you of a male and a female, and made you tribes and clans that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allãh is the one among you most pious; (49:13).

However, Islam affirmed the third cause of enslavement, i.e. war. It means that an unbeliever who fights Allãh, His Messenger, and the believers will be arrested and enslaved. But in case the believers fight amongst themselves there is no imprisonment nor enslaving; rather that party which has crossed the limit will be fought against until it submits to the rule of Allãh. Allãh says: And if two parties of the believers fight, make peace between them; but if one of them acts wrongfully towards the other, fight that which acts wrongfully until it returns to Allãh's command; then if it returns, make peace between them with justice and act equitably; surely Allãh loves those who act equitably. The believers are but brethren, therefore make peace between your brethren and . . . (49:9-10).

It is because a fighting enemy whose only aim is to annihilate humanity and destroy tilth and offspring, the human nature does not entertain least doubt that he should not be treated as a part of the human society who should be allowed to enjoy the fruits of life and the societal rights; and that it is incumbent to remove him even by annihilation, if necessary. On this runs the system of human beings since they came on this earth uptil this day, and it will continue in the same manner.

Islam has laid the foundation of the society – the religious society – on the basis of monotheism and the government of Islamic religion; it has kept away a man who spurns monotheism and religious govern-ment, from being a part of human society, except as a dhimmi or under agreement. He who is outside the religion and its government or agree-ment is outside the human society. Islam deals with him as a non-human, whom a human being may deprive from any blessing which man enjoys in his life; it pushes him to the fringe, thus cleansing the earth from the impurity of his arrogance and corruption. In short, he is deprived of any respect in his person, his action and the results of any of his endeavours; therefore, the Islamic army may arrest him and enslave him when he is vanquished.

5. What is the Way of Enslaving in Islam?

The Muslims prepare to deal with neighbouring unbelievers. They complete the proof against them and invite them to the word of truth with wisdom, admonition and argumentation in a beautiful manner. If the unbelievers respond to it positively, then they become brethren in religion, sharing in all what is for or against the Muslims. But if they reject it, and they are from the People of the Book, and accept to pay jizyah, then they are left alone to enjoy their dhimmah. Or, if they entered into agreement, no matter they were the People of the Book or not, their agreement would be honoured and fulfilled. But if there was nothing of the above, then they are given ultimatum and fought.

In such encounter, whoever among them raises a sword and enters the battle, will be killed; but will not be killed from them the weakened men, women and children; they will not be attacked at night or ambushed; water will not be cut off from them, they will not be tortured nor their organs cut off; they shall be fought against until there is no fitnah and religion becomes of Allāh; then if they desisted then there is no hostility except against the unjust.

When the Muslims vanquished them and the fighting came to its end, then whatever the Muslims brought under their control – be it their persons or properties – will become their property. The history of the wars of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and his expeditions con-tains bright shining pages, that is full of his comportment brimming over with beautiful justice, full of chivalry and generosity, magna-nimity and kindness.

6. What is the Behaviour of Islam Concerning Slave-Men and Women?

When one gets enslaved, he becomes his master's property; bene-fits of his work are for another person [i.e. his master] and his expenses are on his master.

Islam has enjoined that the master should treat his slave as he treats his family members, and he is one of the family [members]; he/ she equally shares with them in requirements of life and its needs. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to eat with his slaves and servants and sit with them; he did not give preference to himself over them in food, cloth, etc.

Islam also laid down that the slaves should not be burdened with hard labour; they should not be tortured, abused or oppressed. They were allowed to marry among themselves with permission of their masters, also free men could marry slave girls; they could give evi-dence like free people and could be their partners in work during slavery and after that.

Islam showed so much compassion towards them that they par-ticipated with free men in all public affairs. We find many slaves who were given governorship and military command, etc., as the history of the early days of Islam shows; among the very respected companions of the Prophet, there were some slaves or freed slaves, like Salmãn, Bilãl and others.

The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) emancipated his slave-girl Ṣafiyyah, daughter of Ḥuyayy ibn Akhṭab and married her; and he married Juwayriyyah daughter of Ḥãrith after the battle of Banu 'l-Muṣṭaliq, and she was among the captives, and they were two hundred houses with their women and children, and this marriage became the cause of the emancipation of all the captives; and this story, in short, was written in the fourth volume of this book.[23]

It is evident from the behaviour of Islam that it gives preced-ence to a pious slave over a dissolute free man; and it allows a slave to own property and enjoy general privileges of life with permission of his master. This is in short what Islam has done for them.

Then it puts utmost emphasis on recommendation to emancipate them, and called in attractive way to remove them from the environ-ment of slavery to the open field of freedom; and in this way their number was continuously decreasing and their group was turning free for the sake of Allãh. Not only that: It made emancipation of slave a part of atonements, like atonement of murder, atonement of missing a fast, etc. Then it allowed them to make condition with their masters, or enter into agreement of kitãbah[24] and tadbīr.[25] All this meticulous-ness of giving them freedom and joining them with healthy human society, in a definite way, was rendered with the aim of removing from them all manners of humiliation.

7. Gist of the Above Discussions:

The above discussion leads us to three results.

First: Islam spared no effort to abolish the causes of enslavement, to reduce the number of and to weaken, those causes, until it stopped at the one cause which was inevitable by nature's decision, that is, allowing the enslavement of every person who fights against the relig-ion, who opposes the human society and does not submit to the truth in any [23] See Eng. transl., vol.7, pp.296-300.

[24] Kitãbah: An agreement between a slave and his master that the slave will become free after payment of a stipulated amount. (tr.)

[25] Tadbīr: When a master declares that his slave will become free after the master's death. (tr.)

possible way.

Second: Islam used all possible means to accord respect to slaves – male and female – and in bringing their life affairs nearer to the life of the members of the free society, until they became like one of them – even if not one of them; and there did not remain on them except a thin curtain, that is, whatever they earn in excess of what is needed for their necessities of an average life, belongs to their masters, not to them. You may also say: There is no difference between a free man and a slave in Islam except permission of the master about the slave.

Third: Islam used every effective device to join the group of slaves to the society of free men: in some cases by exhortations, and in others by compulsion, like atonements, and through permission and enforce-ment, like tadbīr and kitãbah.

8. Progress of Enslavement in History:

Scholars have said[26] that enslavement appeared, when it appeared, through capture and imprisonment. Before that, when tribes overcame in their wars and battles and captured some enemies, they killed all of them. Then they thought that it was better to leave them alive and keep them under their ownership like other war booties. It was done not for benefitting from their work, but as a good deed towards them, and for preservation of mankind and for respect of moral laws which gradual-ly had appeared among them on the path of civilization.

This system appeared among the tribes only after they had left getting their sustenance through hunting; because upto that point they did not enjoy enough affluence which could allow them to spend on slave boys and girls; until they changed to the life of settlement and emigration, and then they could do so.

With the spread of slavery among tribes and nations – by which-ever way it was – man's social life was transformed, as first some system and decipline appeared in the societies, and second, there appeared division of labour.

Slavery, when it was prevalent in the world, was not of one manner throughout; it was not found in some regions altogether, like Australia, Central Asia, Siberia, North America, Skimos and some regions in Africa in north of Nile and south of Rambis.

[26] It has been taken from: 1. Encyclopaedea of Religion and Ethics, by John Hisinik [?] British ed., 2. Short History, by H.G. Wells, British ed., 3. Spirit of the Laws, by Monisque, Tehran ed. (Author's note)

Conversely, it was wide spread in Arabia, primitive Africa, Europe and South America. Also, it was prevalent among the Jews; the Torah calls the slaves to obey the masters; and the same was the case with Christianity; St. Paul in his epistle to Philemon writes that Onesimus was a defector slave whom Paul caused to return to his master, Philemon.

The Jews were most gentle with their slaves; its evidence may be seen in the fact that we have not found any towering building built by them, unlike the pyramids of Egypt and historical Assyrian build-ings, which were built by back breaking labour of slaves; the Romans and the Greeks were the harshest nations to slaves.

The idea of emancipation of slaves spread in the Eastern Rome after Constantine, until slavery was abolished there in the 13th century C.E.; but it continued in Eastern Rome in another form, that is, they sold and bought farms together with the farm workers – Farming was among slaves' activity – but forced labour was abolished among them.

Slavery was widely prevalent in most of the European countries upto 1772 C.E. Shortly before that an agreement was made between England and Spain that the English would fetch to them every year four thousand eight hundred African slaves upto thirty years in ex-change of a huge amount that they would pay.

Public opinion was raised among them against slavery and en-slavement in 1761 C.E. The earliest group, which rose against it, was the religious sect, the Quakers. This continued until a law was passed that whoever entered the British isle would become free.

However, it appeared after deep investigation in 1788 C.E. that England dealt every year in two hundred thousand slaves; and those slaves who were taken from Africa to America alone were one hundred thousand.

This continued until keeping of slaves was abolished in Britain in 1833; and the government paid slave-trading companies twenty million pounds as price of the slave boys and girls who were thus emancipated. At this time 770,380 persons became free.

Slavery was abolished in America in 1862, after tough struggles by American people. The northern and the southern states of the U.S.A. had different views on slavery. The northern states kept slave boys and girls for 'adornment', for status purpose only; not so the southern states – their main occupation was farming and agriculture, and they were in dire need of a great number of working hands; they kept the slaves for getting the benefits of their labour. That was the reason they felt restrained from accepting the general emancipation.

Slavery continued to be abolished in one kingdom after the other until the Brussels Convention of 1890 C.E. decided to abolish it completely, and the governments enforced it and it was abolished in the whole world, and in this manner millions of people were emancipated. (End of their statement, abridged)

If you look minutely you will see that this long struggle and this argumentation, then the laws of emancipation that were laid down and enforced, all of this was related to the slavery through guardianship or domination, as may be witnessed from the fact that most or all of the slaves were brought from around Africa where such slavery was practised. As for the enslavement through captivity in war (which Islam had confirmed), it was never discussed about.

9. A Glance on Their Structure:

This natural independence, which we call God-gifted independence of man, (and we do not know what is the reason of depriving all other animal species of this freedom while they too are similar to man in psychological cognizance and motivating will; except that we say that it is man himself who snatches it away in order to benefit from them), does not branch out from any root except on this: that man is equiped with inner cognizance which differentiates between what he enjoys and what gives it pain, and then with a will which incites it to pull towards him what gives him enjoyment and to push away what gives it pain; thus he has the ability to choose for himself what he pleases.

Human cognizance is not restricted – that it attaches to one thing and does not attach with another in that a weak and humble man does not know what a strong and powerful man does; nor is the human will limited with a circle which prevents it from attaching to some of what it likes, or compels it to be attached with what someone else's will is attached, in order to proceed in a way that some other person benefits from it and he forgets himself. A weak and vanquished man wants for himself things similar to all that strong and victorious man wants; and there is no physical connection between the will of a weak and that of a strong person which could compel the will of the weak not to be attached with what the will of the strong one is attached; or which might make the will of the weak dissolve in that of the strong man, so that the two together would become one will acting for the benefit of the strong one; or the weak's will would follow the strong's will in a way that it loses its freedom.

In such a case, as is necessary for the laws of life to be based on the foundation of physical body, it was incumbent for man to live independent in his person and in his deeds; and from this breast has suckled the abolition of slavery.

But we should think over this God-gifted freedom to man: Whether it is prevalent in the human society in general since it began and remained in human body.

Human species – according to our knowledge – since its beginning lives in sociological condition; and it cannot do otherwise, accord-ing to its system of being, and it is impossible for a society to continue as a society even for a short period without a common system shared by all its members, no matter whether it is a national and just system, or is based on tyranny, fool-hardiness or whatsoever; this system, what-ever it is, limits the individual's freedom.

Moreover, man cannot live without some interference in the matter that ensures his continuity. This is not possible except if he attaches to himself the thing in which he interferes – the attachment which we call ownership – which is more general than the terminology of right and ownership – whatever this man wears, that one cannot wear it; what-ever this individual eates, buys or engages in, another individual can-not hold it under his control. It is nothing but putting a limit to the non-interfering person in generality of his will, a restriction to his freedom.

The humanity has always been subject to discord and dispute since it has come on the earth. Not a single day passes over these per-sons who are spread over the earth, except that the sun rises over them with their discords and sets over them with their disputes. These con-troversies push them to the loss of lives, despoiling of honour and plundering of properties. Had the man believed in unrestricted free-dom for himself – i.e. for humanity – there would not have been any trace of these discords.

Also, the system of censure and punishment was always preva-lent in various types of societies, civilized or barbaric. What is the implication of this censure? It only means that the society takes away from the guilty person somes blessings, which the creation had given him, and deprives him of some of the freedom. Now, if the society or the one who has some authority in society did not own the life of a guilty person who is punished for murder, it could not take it away from him; and if a sinner, indicted for his sin and punished for it by various kinds of chastisement and offence, like amputation, stroke and imprisonment, etc., did not know that the society owned the judge-ment and its implimentation, which affects his life affairs and deprives him of ease and comfort, and takes away his financial authority, he would not have submitted to it. How can a tyrant transgressor be admonished not to indulge in tyranny and transgression; how can he be prevented from aggression against a person or his honour or pro-perty without depriving him of some of his freedom?

In short, what no reasonable man can have a doubt about is the fact that if the human freedom unrestrictedly remains in human society, even for a single moment, it would create disturbance in the social system at that moment. So, this get together, which also is natural for man and without which it cannot live, puts restriction on the natural freedom which is gifted to man by his natural will and cognizance. Thus, no human society can live except with some restriction to its freedom, in the same way as it cannot live with negation of freedom altogether. And the human society has always been preserving between these two boundaries this freedom which the western propaganda makes us think that it is they who have laid down its name after they had invented its meaning, and have protected it without restriction.

So, it is this natural sociology, which restricts that natural free-dom, and demarcates it as all physical and non-physical powers demar-cate one another. Thus, a power stops from working in consideration of some other power with which it works; like the sight, which is the basis of seeing power, goes on doing its work until the eye becomes tired, or the thinking faculty becomes wearied, and then the sight stops its work in consideration of its colleague's work; likewise the perception of taste enjoys devouring tasty meal and chewing it and swallowing it, until the jaws' muscles become tired and restrain the power of taste, thus it stops from its desired food.

So, the natural sociological demands are not completed for man except when he abandons some of his freedom in action and forgoes his enjoyment.

10. What is the Amount of Limitation?

As for the amount by which this freedom, gifted by the natural get together, is limited, and by which its natural releasing is restricted, it differs with difference of human societies looking at the multitude of the laws which are prevalent in the society, and their smallness because, the restricter of freedom, after the basic get together, is the law which prevails among the people; the more the laws increase and looked minutely at their actions, the more deprivation from freedom will take place; and vice versa.

But what no sociological get together can avoid in whatever society we look at, and what is incumbent, which no social man can ignore it, is the preservation of the society's existence, because man cannot live without it, and protection of the systems, that are found therein, from any defect and breakdown. That is why you will not find any human society but there is in it a defence system which averts dangers from people and their offspring, and protects them from annihilation; and there is a guardian and overseer, who oversees their affairs, and protects from breakdown the prevalent customs and the established precedents which are respected among them, by spreading the social peace and punishing the tyrant aggressor. And the history, as we know, supports it.

This being the case, the first right laid down for the society in the natural sharī'ah is that it should take away the freedom from the enemy of the society in the basic get together. You may say in other words: That the society should own the person and action of its enemy, who intends to annihilate its life and destroy his tilth and offspring, and do away with the freedom of his will in any way he wishes – right through killing downwards, deprive the enemy of custom and law of freedom of action, and own from him what he loses through retribu-tion of person or property, etc.

How can a man – even an individual – believe in the freedom of an enemy who does not respect his society, (so that he might treat him as a brother and join and mingle with him) nor does he desist from destruction of his society (so that he might leave him alone)? How can the natural consideration of society be joined with leaving this enemy free to do whatever he likes? Is it anything but clearly joining two mutually contradictory things? It is only idiocy or insanity.

The above discourse clearly shows that: -

First: To base one's ideal on generalization of human freedom is contrary to the clear natural truth laid down for man, which is among the first natural rights that are laid down.

Second: The right of enslavement recognized by Islam fully conforms to natural sharī'ah: That the enemies of the true religion who fight the Islamic society should be enslaved. They should be deprived of the freedom of action and be taken inside the religious society and made to live as slaves, so that they should be trained with good train-ing, and proceed gradually to emancipation; in this way they will join the free society with safety and benefit. Also, the master of the affairs has the option to purchase them and emancipate them altogether if he sees in it the good of the religious society, or to use in this respect some other way which does not lead to abrogation of divine commands.

11. The End Result of the Abolition:

The big powers enforced the Brussels Convention, strictly banned slave trade, and the slave girls and boys were emancipated. Now, they are not lined up in slave-traders' shops, nor are they pulled ahead like sheep and goats; consequently keeping of eunuchs too was abolished. Today it is impossible to find slaves or eunuchs – even in small num-ber, except what sometimes is reported about primitive nations.

However, will this much – i.e. removal of the name of enslave-ment from tongues, and absence of those called slaves from our sights – convince a critical scholar on this topic? Will not he ask whether it is a verbal problem in which it is enough to ban the use of the name and to call the slave a free man, even if he is deprived of the benefits of his work, and is bound to follow his master's will. Or, if the prob-lem is related to its meaning, in which consideration is to be given to its meaning according to its reality and external effects.

Now, look at the Second World War, has not passed more than a few decades since its end; the victor nations imposed on the defeated enemy unconditional surrender, then they settled in their countries, took millions of their property and ruled over them and their children; not only that, they transferred millions of their captives to their (victors') country and they used them in whatever work they wished and in any way they desired. And the situation continues uptil now.

Would that I knew does enslavement mean something, which is not found here, even if its name is not used in it? Does enslavement mean anything except deprivation of freedom, control of (the slave's) will and work, and enforcement by the powerful dominating party of its command on the weak and humiliated party in whatever way it wished, be it justice or injustice?

By God, is it not astonishing that the Islam's judgement in the best possible way is called enslavement, and their order is not called so, while Islam uses the easiest and lightest aspect and they use the hardest and harshest one? We have experienced their love and friend-ship when they entered our country under the banner of love, help and protection. What would be the condition of those whom they domi-nated over by enmity and chicanery?

It is now clear that the Convention of abolition (of slavery) was nothing but a political ploy. In reality it took what it rejected.

As for enslavement as a result of war and fighting, Islam en-forced it and they too enforced it in practice, although they avoided uttering its name. As for enslavement based on sale by fathers of their sons, which they banned, Islam banned it long ago. And enslavement through domination and command, Islam had banned it too 1400 years before; but these people unanimously banned it, yet we have to see whether this ban too stopped at the words like other aspects or really reached to its meaning and was supported in practice?

You may find answer to this question by looking at the history of European colonialism in Asia, Africa and America. Look at the calamities they brought there, the blood they shed, the honour they despoiled, the properties they plundered, and arbitrary decisions they took – and not by one, one hundred and one thousand.

You do not have to go far for this observation – if it be far – it is enough to think over the reports of what the people of Algeria are suffering since many years at the hand of France, how the lives are destroyed, towns wrecked and people overburdened under pressure. Also, see what the Arab countries had to bear from the English, and what the blacks and Red-Indians are suffering in America. Again look at Eastern Europe vis-à-vis the Socialist Republics. What we are suf-fering at the hands of these and those; all this in its words is sincerity and compassion, but in its meaning is enslavement.

It is clear from the above that when they came to the stage of practice, they took what Islam has legislated, i.e., abolition of freedom when its natural cause is found, and that is war and fighting with the one who wants demolition of society and annihilation of humanity. It is a lawful decision based on a factual basis, which never changes. That basis is that humanity for its continuation needs removal of what op-poses it in existence and continuity. Then comes another reasonable sociological basis which does not change and branches out from its real root, i.e. it is incumbent to protect the human society from anni-hilation and demolition.

This is what they aimed at in their action; they took it in reality and rejected it in words. However, they did not stop at the lawful type, and crossed the boundary into unlawful one. That is, they adopted en-slavement through domination and control. Thus they continue to enslave thousands, nay, millions, before the talk of abolition and after it. They still sell and purchase, give in gift and lend; but they do not name it enslavement, they call it colonialism or acquisition, protection or guardianship, consideration or help; or similar other words whose only pur-pose is to put a veil on the meaning of enslavement; and whenever a veil becomes worn out or torn, it is discarded and another is put in its place.

Now, nothing remains from what had been abolished by the Brussels Convention – which is continuously announced to the world and its people, and of which the civilized nations are so proud – those who are the pioneers of the developed civilization and in whose hand is the banner of human freedom – except the enslavement through the sale of sons and daughters and castration. And there is not any import-ant benefit, which returns to the slaves; more over this much, is more of a personal aspect than a sociological problem. As such, its abolition is merely a verbal argument, which serves as propaganda matter in their hands, like their all other arguments, which do not go beyond words, and do not affect any meaning.

Of course, there remains here another debatable issue and it is as follows. Islam begins in its war booties, from slave or other pro-perties (other than the land conquered by force) with individuals from its society, and divides those booties amongst them; then it ends at the government, as was done in early days of Islam, and they reserve the right of their use for the government. But it is another topic apart from the original topic of enslavement; probably we shall be helped by Allãh to fully discuss it later, God willing, under the verses of zakãt and khums; and the help is saught from Allãh.

After all this, we return to the words of the author of Mu'jamu 'l-a'lãm copied earlier: "The basis of abolition of slavery is equality of men in rights and duties." What is the meaning of: 'equality of men in rights and duties'?

Does it mean that they equally have rights whose consideration is necessary, even if those right are different and not equal, like the difference between the president and the subordinate, the ruler and the ruled, the commander and the subaltern, a law abiding citizen and the law-breaker, the just and the unjust, because they differ in their sociological weight?

If yes, then it is correct. But it does not mean that there is equal-ity between a beneficial part of the society and the one who is unable to attach to the society and has no honour; he is rather like a lethal poison wherever it reaches destroys the life; it is the clear natural order that there should be difference between the two, and full freedom should be accorded to the former while the latter should be deprived of it; an enemy has no right on his enemy in his enmity, the wolf has no right over his victim, nor the lion over his prey.

Or, does it mean that because humanity is shared by all human individuals, and any individual, whoever he may be, has power to rise above in civilization, and receive happiness as others have done; so it is a right of humanity on the developing society that it should give freedom to every human being and to train and bring him up until it joins the good society?

This too is right. But sometimes training demands that the trainer should take away from the trainee the freedom of will and action for sometime until he is fully trained, and acquires expertize and the use of his will; then he will truly enjoy the bliss of his freedom; just as a sick person is treated and given unpalatable medicines for his cure; and as a child is trained in a manner which he dislikes. Exactly in the same way Islam takes away the freedom of will and action from the unbelieving people who fight against Islam; it brings them inside the religious society, trains them and gradually brings them in the arena of freedom. The preceeding statement shows that it is a sociological progress; we should look at it and its result and effect in a general and comprehensive manner; it is not an individual's matter, which may be seen individually and partially. Again, it is astonishing that they too affect an action which is followed in Islam, although they differ from it in name and the good intention, as explained earlier.

Or, does it mean that it is the right of the human freedom that it should be applied to all men, and every man should be left free to implement his unrestricted will?

But, it is clear without any doubt that it is not acceptable, nor is it feasible to do in its generality, especially about a fighting enemy – and it is the only aspect, which Islam considers for taking away the general freedom.

Apart from that, if it was true then there should be no difference between one or two and a group: Then why do they accord legal free-dom to one (even in suicide) and two (in duel), yet they do not accept the right for a poor group from the humans that they should remain aloof in caves or such shelters and remain concerned with their own selves, eating the sustenance of their Lord and proceeding on the paths of their lives.

Now, remains one thing: Some one may say: Why did not Islam allow the slaves to own property, so that he could use it on necessities of his life without being a burden on his master? And why did it not put a limit on slavery by Islam, in order that the slave would become automatically free if he accepted Islam? This would remove from him the stigma of depravity, which stained him and his offspring, upto the Day of Resurrection.

But it should be realized that the order for establishment of slavery and depravity from owning a property, appears and is enforced, according to the Islamic sharī'ah, at the first moment of his capture; and the natural order against them, the fighting enemies, allowing their depravity of freedom aims at negating their plans and taking away their power of fighting (with which they could destroy the good religious society); and there is no strength or power except through ownership; so when they would not own any work or its result, they would not get power for disputation or fighting. Of course, Islam has allowed them ownership in general by their masters' bestowing owner-ship on them; and it is an ownership under an ownership, and it does not carry the risk of the slaves' independent manipulation.

As for the suggestion that slaves should have become automatically free if they accepted Islam, it is a proposal that would negate the religious policy regarding the defence of Islamic territory, establish-ment of religious society on its feet, and religiously training these fighting groups (who have come under Muslims' control). Otherwise, they would have pretended to enter into Islam soon at coming under its authority, and just on being enslaved; in this way they would have preserved their power and armaments and then returned to their previous behaviour.

We may go looking back at the custom prevalent among nations and groups from today to the earliest era in human history that we can get any information about. We shall see that when two nations or tribes fought and one of them vanquished and subjugated the other, then it considered it as its lawful right to go on killing the enemies until they totally submitted to its rule unconditionally.

This submission did not mean that the defeated party should put its arms on the earth, and then they would be left free to do, as they liked. Nay, they must accept the control of the victorious group, and must totally submit to what they decide about them and how they manage their persons and properties.

It would be foolish to restrict this control with a condition which would destroy the effect of this open submission; and which would negate its order, pave the way for the enemy to return to his planning and deception and give him a chance to hope to return to the original point. How can the victorious group tolerate this, while it had sacri-ficed the souls and properties for the independence of the blessed society? Will it be anything except injustice to its own self and insult to the most precious item, which it has, and wastage of the blood, properties and endeavours?

No one can raise objection against the victors (who sacrificed their lives and properties to overcome their enemies and thus reduced them to slavery) and say: Well, their men had fought and killed and perverted, so they were arrested and deprived of their freedom; but what is the fault of the children who were born after it, who had not taken arms, drawn a sword, or entered into battlefield? But it is be-cause they are their fathers' sacrifice.

After all this, it should not be forgotten that the Islamic government has the right to seek ways to emancipate the slaves through purchase or freeing, etc. when it finds that it is in the interest of Islamic society. And Allãh knows better.

A TALK ON PUNISHMENT AND FORGIVENESS

1. What is the Meaning of Requital?

No society is devoid of sociological responsibilities, which its members are required to respect. The only aim of the society is to maintain conformance between the members' activities, bring them nearer to one another and join one side of it to the other, in order that it all unites and combines and with its effects and results fulfils the members' needs to the extent everyone is entitled to according to his deeds and endeavours.

These responsibilities, inasmuch as they are related to voluntary affairs, a man may undertake them or leave them; and this in itself would not happen without some negation of the man's freedom of his will and action; it is not impossible for him to stay away from it wholly or partially because man by his nature inclines to freedom without restriction.

Attention to this defect in the laws, and this weakness in its structure, called the sociological man forth to complete this defect and strengthen its weakness by another means: That he should join its dis-obedience or neglect with some things which an adult and sane man dislikes. This exhorts him to obey the imposed law lest he is faced by consequences, which he dislikes and is hurt with.

This is the requital of the evil; and it is the right of the society or of the ruler against the disobedient ones. Parallel to it run the aspects of obedience. It is possible to keep for the obedient one something which he prefers and like as a recompense of his fulfilment of respon-sibilities, in order that it would induce him to perform an incumbent, or likeable deed; and it, in its turn, is the right of the obedient and submissive member of the society or the ruler; and it is the requital of the good deeds. Often the recompense of the evil is called punishment, and that of good is named reward.

On this very mode, the laws of Islamic sharī'ah are laid down. Allãh says: For those who do good is good (reward) . . . (10:26); And (as for) those who have earned evil, the punishment of an evil is the like of it, . . . (10:27); And the recompense of evil is punishment like it, . . . (42:40).

Punishment and reward run to a broad spectrum, beginning from dislike and like, censure and praise, reaching to the ultimate point of good and evil. They are related to various factors: especial-ities of the deeds and the doers, the controller of affairs, and the extent of the benefit or harm that would accrue to the society. Probably, all this may be summarized in this way that the more consideration is given to an affair, the greater the punishment or reward for disobedi-ence or obedience, respectively.

Between a deed and its recompense, a sort of similarity and resemblence is kept in mind, even if approximately. And the speech of Allãh runs on the same pattern. Allãh says: . . . that He may reward those who do evil according to what they do, and (that) He may reward those who do good with goodness (53:31). Even more clear are the divine words quoting the scriptures of Ibrãhīm and Mūsã (peace be upon both): And that man shall have nothing but what he strives for; and that his striving shall soon be seen; then shall he be rewarded for it with the fullest reward (53:39-41). And it is even more manifest in the laws of retribution. Allãh says: . . . retaliation is prescribed for you in the matter of the slain: the free for the free, and the slave for the slave, and the female for the female; . . . (2:178); The sacred month for the sacred month and all sacred things are (under the law of) retaliation; so whoever then acts aggressively against you, inflict injury on him according to the injury he has inflicted on you, and fear Allãh . . . (2:194).

Consequently, it means that the punishment or reward returns to the doer's person with something similar to what he has done. For example, when he disobeys a sociological law, and enjoys himself with what inflicts harm to the society, then he will be deprived of equal amount of the enjoyments in his self, or body, or property, or prestige, etc. which somehow returns to him.

This is to which we pointed under discussion of the meaning of enslavement, that the society or the ruler owns from the culprit his person or some of his personal affairs, which is equal to the crime he has committed, or the defects of the harms, which he has inflicted on the society. Thus, he is punished, i.e., the society, or the ruler, manipu-lates in relation to this ownership – i.e. the right – in the life of the culprit or in some affair of his life, and takes away his freedom to that extent.

If he killed a person – when that person had not killed anyone nor had he done any mischief in the land – in the Islamic society, the ruler would own the person of the culprit because he had brought to the society loss of a respectful life; and its penalty, i.e., killing, ma-nipulates his life in exchange of the ownership he enjoyed. If he stole what amounts to a quarter dīnãr from a secure place, he had brought harm to the society by tearing away a general peace and security's curtain laid down by the hand of sharī'ah and protected by the hand of trust. Its penalty is amputation[27] of the hand. What is the reality of this penalty? It means that the ruler has owned from the thief, in exchange of his felony, an affair of his life, which includes his hand and does in it what he decides by taking away his freedom and its means from this aspect. You may judge by analogy various punishments in different *sharī'ah*s and customs.

It is clear from above that the sociological crime and disobedi-ence attract to themselves a sort of slavery and enslavement, for this reason a slave is the clearest example of punishment. Allãh says: If Thou shouldst chastise them, then surely they are Thy slaves; . . . (5:118).

This theme has different expositions in different customs and *sharī'ah*s. Allãh mentions in the story of Yūsuf when he had put the drinking cup in the bag of his brother so that he could take him to him-self: They said: "But what shall be the requital of this, if you are liars?" i.e., in your denial of the theft of the king's drinking cup: They said: "The

requital of this is the person in whose bag it is found; thus do we punish the wrongdoers," i.e., we punish the thief by enslaving him: So he began with their sacks before the sack of his brother, then he brought it out from his brother's sack. Thus did We plan for the sake of Yūsuf . . . They said: "O Chief! He has a father, a very old man, there-fore retain one of us in his stead; surely we see you to be of the doers of good." This was the exchange and a sort of ransom: He said: "Allāh protect us that we should seize other than him with whom we found our property, for then most surely we would be unjust." (12:74-79)

Often the killer was taken as a prisoner enslaved; sometimes he offered in ransom one of his women like his daughter or sister, etc. Ransoming through giving in marriage was prevalant upto these days among the tribes and clans in our areas, because they treat marriage as a sort of enslavement for women.

2. Is An Obedient Person Counted as Slave of the Obeyed?

Based on this idea, sometimes an obedient one is counted as a slave of the obeyed one; because by this obedience his will follows the will of the obeyed one, thus he is his slave deprived of the freedom of will. Allāh says: Did I not charge you, O children of Adam! That you should not serve the Satan? Surely he is your open enemy, and that you should serve Me; . . . (36:60-61). Have you then considered him who takes his low desire for his god, . . .? (45:23).

So, the society or ruler owns the guilty one who is punished. Conversely, the obedient one who is rewarded owns from the society or the ruler the reward that is equal to his obedience, because the society or the ruler has decreased through this responsibility some of the God-gifted freedom of the obedient one.

What we have explained just now, is the secret of what is generally accepted that fulfilling the promise is incumbent, but not that of the threat. It is because the theme of promise in the arena of master-ship and slavery is the reward for obedience, while the theme of threat is punishment for disobedience. The reward, inasmuch as it is the right of the obedient on the ruler and is his responsibility, its fulfilment is incumbent on him, so that he may discharge his responsibility; contrary to the punishment, because it is the right of the ruler over the guilty person, and it is not necessary that man must manage his property and get the benefit of his right – it is left to his option. This topic needs further elaboration.

3. Forgiveness and Pardon:

We have reached in the preceding discussion to the conclusion that it is OK to leave the punishment of disobedience, contrary to the reward of obedience. It is a natural dictate to a certain extent, and is based on the fact that meting out the punishment is the right of the ruler over the disobedient one, and it is not always necessary that one should use his right without fail.

However, as it is not always necessary to use one's right of punishment, likewise, it is not allowed to neglect this right altogether. Otherwise the natural decision of establishing the right would become null and void; there will be no sense in establishing a thing, which will have no effect at any time. Moreover, negating the right of punish-ment altogether would demolish the laws, which are made to protect the structure of society; if they are demolished the society would be demolished without doubt.

The decision – allowability of pardoning a sin – is established to a certain extent; but it is an unclear proposition. If there is a reason supporting the pardon, pardoning will be allowed; otherwise retribu-tion is compulsory to maintain the respect of the law, which would protect the society and man's bliss. To this reality point the words of ʻĪsã (a.s.): . . . and if Thou shouldst forgive them, then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise (5:118).

There are found in the noble Qur'ãn two general causes of par-don which the divine wisdom endorses:

One: Repentance of the servant to Allãh, the Glorified – whether it is a return from disbelief to belief, or from disobedience to obedience, as was explained under "Repentance" in the volume four of the book.[28] Allãh says: Say: "O My servants! Who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allãh; surely Allãh forgives the faults altogether; surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. And return to your Lord time after time and submit to Him before there comes to you the punishment, then you shall not be helped. [This indicates the repentance from disbelief, to which applies the threat of punishment where no helper or intercessor can avail.] And follow the best that has been revealed to you from your Lord before there comes to you the punishment all of a sudden while you do not even perceive" (39:53-55).

[28] al-Mīzãn (Eng.), vol.8, pp.64-74. (tr.)

[This indicates the repentance from disobedience to obedi-ence, and here the benefit of intercession is not negated.]

Allāh also says: Repentance with Allāh is only for those who do evil in ignorance, then turn (to Allāh) soon, so these it is to whom Allāh turns (mercifully), and Allāh is ever-Knowing, Wise. And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds, until when death comes to one of them, he says: "Surely now I repent"; nor (for) those who die while they are unbelievers. These are they for whom We have prepared a painful chastisement. (4:17-18)

Two: Intercession on the Day of Resurrection. Allāh says: And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for inter-cession, but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (him) (43:86). There are many such verses, which deal with the topic of intercession; and we have fully discussed this topic in the volume one of the book.[29] There are found in the noble Qur'ān different occasions wherein forgiveness is mentioned without giving its cause, although by meditation, one may understand the general reason, which has been kept in sight, and it is the well-being of the religion. For example, see the divine words: . . . and He has certainly pardoned you, and Allāh is Gracious to the believers (3:152); Are you afraid to give in charity before your secret conversation? So when you did not do it and Allāh has turned to you (mercifully), then keep up prayer and pay the zakāt and obey Allāh and His Messenger; . . . (58:13). Certainly, Allāh has turned (mercifully) to the Prophet and the immigrants and the helpers who followed him in the hour of straitness after the hearts of a part of them were about to deviate, then He turned to them (mercifully); surely to them He is Compassionate, Merciful (9:117). And they thought that there would be no affliction, so they became blind and deaf, then Allāh turned to them (mercifully), then many of them became blind and deaf; . . . (5:71). (As for) those who put away their wives by likening their backs to the backs of their mothers, they are not their mothers; their mothers are no others than those who gave them birth; and most surely they utter a hateful word and a falsehood; and most surely Allāh is Par-doning, Forgiving. (58:2). O you who believe! Do not kill game while you are in the robe of iḥrām*, . . . Allāh has pardoned what is gone by; and whoever returns* (to it) Allāh will inflict retribution on him; and Allāh is Mighty, Lord of Retribution (5:95).

These are various occasions of the divine pardoning, and we have explained the particular especiality of each of them under each verse in the book, which may be consulted.

Of a totally different genre is the word of Allãh: Allãh pardon you! Why did you give them leave . . .? (9:43). It is a du'ã', like our saying: 'May Allãh pardon you! Why did you do this and this?' Similar is the case of the verses 74:18-19, although in an opposite way: Surely he reflected and guessed, but may he be cursed how he plotted. Also of a different genre are the words: Surely We have given to you a clear victory, that Allãh may forgive you your past faults and those to follow . . . (48:1-2). It is understood from the fact that the forgiveness is taken to result from the conquest of Mecca, which Allãh had bestowed on His Prophet, but there is no relationship between the forgiveness of fault (i.e. sin) and the conquest. It will be fully explained, God willing, under the exegesis of that verse.

4. Forgiveness has Grades:

Forgiveness and pardon relates to sin; and sin generally attracts a sort of retribution and punishment. As you have seen, retribution has a very wide spectrum and covers various ranks; consequently pardon too has various ranks and grades. This difference does not appear in the sin itself, i.e. in the evil consequence that follows the deed (because no one can deny such difference), and the requital, whether it is punish-ment or reward, is weighed in that scale.

We cannot avoid here the discussion about the sin and its vari-ous grades, and the meditation into what the natural reason leads to. Although the discussion is Qur'ãnic and its aim is to arrive at what the Divine Book leads to concerning these realities, yet as the Sublime God has declared in His speech, He speaks to us according to our under-standing and the natural balance with which the things are weighed in the stages of theory and practice; and we have pointed to this fact in various topics of this book; and Allah has taken the support of human understanding and thought in various places, and has strengthened with it the aims of His speech; as He has variously said: 'then do not you understand', 'then do not you contemplate', and so on.

It is inferred from correct consideration that the first factor with which human society is attached and which it respects is the practical laws and esteemed customs by which the society preserves – through its implementation – the objects of humanity, and leads it to its felicity in life; then it lays down the laws by which the one who goes against it is punished, and the obedient one is rewarded.

At this stage the name, sin, is not used except for going back on the text of the practical laws, and inevitably it stands parallel to a number of sociological rules; and this meaning is settled in our – the Muslims' – minds, and so is the import of similar words like evil, fault, wrong, misdeed, error, outrage, transgression and so on.

Not only this practical laws, when they are acted upon, guarded and preserved, pull the society to suitable characteristics and attributes conforming with the societal aims which are the ultimate destination of human togetherness. It is these characteristics that the society calls human nobilities and exhorts to it. Opposite to them are evil traits.

Although these factors differ one from another based on the difference in societies' customs and objects, yet the principle that they are the products of sociological laws cannot be ignored or refuted.

Although these good characteristics are spiritual attributes, and there is no guarantee to enforce it practically in the societies, and they are non-voluntary because they are traits; yet because their appearance follows repetition of enforcement of laid down rules in the society, or repeated neglect of those rules, the putting in practice those laws ensure their enforcement; and they are counted voluntary inasmuch as their preliminaries are voluntary, i.e. repeated actions. Among its occasions may include rational commands related to noble characteristics like bravery, chastity and justice; and likewise prevents the evil traits like cowardice, rashness, degeneration, covetousness and injustice; in the same manner may be imagined for them rational punishment and reward like praise and censure.

In short, in this way takes place a stage of the sin above the preceding one, and it is the stage of negligence of creational laws and related rational commandments.

These rational commands are not counted as command except because of mutual attachment between them and the wãjib actions, which lead to them. So, there is a judge, which establishes its incum-bency and orders it, and that is the human intellect. Parallel to it the naming of rational prohibition as prohibition. And this is our way in all occasions of mutual attachment. So, whenever we enforce one side of the mutual attachments we at once order to enforce the other part and declare it as incumbent. And we consider neglecting it as dis-obedience to that rational command, and a sin that entails some sort of retribution.

This also makes clear another matter: As these virtues contain incumbent factors which one has to attach himself to – and likewise the evil traits contain forbidden items – and also cover recommended factors which serve as adornments and beauties in characterstics – and they are good manners with which are attached recommended rational commands. Yet when we look at it vis-à-vis ourselves, the attached manners (which are recommended in themselves) will inevitably be-come recommended rationally, following that inter-relation. For example, the environment of a Bedouin to life (who lives a bedouistic life) is removed from the average standard of the civilized life; so he is not held responsible except for the elementary laws of society and general customs which his understanding power may grasp; sometimes he commits reprehensible deeds or utters ugly words, but a civilized man ignores it putting its blame on his misapprehension and his living far away from civil environment – where repeated observation of customs and manners is the best teacher for its residents.

Again an average civilian is not held responsible for those things for which people of exceptional qualities are deemed responsible – the people of fine understanding and lofty manners. When an average man does not observe fine maaners and neglects attractive words and deeds, the only excuse offered on his behalf is that it is the limit of his under-standing; he does not understand the concomitants of manner more than he performs, because of his environment.

And what he does (which he should not) is what the unique people are held responsible for. Often they are blamed for an under-tone in speech, or a slight delay in movement, or missing an impercep-tible moment in stillness, or turning or closing the eyes and so on – all this is counted as a fault or sin from them. But it is not a sin in the meaning of going against legislative articles, be it related to religion or to worldly affairs. It is well known that the good deeds of righteous people are the sins for the near ones.

The more the path becomes intricate and the position delicate, the more hidden sins become apparent which hitherto were unnoticed and the man had not perceived them, nor any ruler or controller was deemed responsible for them.

This, according to deep consideration, leads us to the commands, which develop in the framework of love and hate. An eye of hate – particularly in the condition of rage – sees all good deeds as condemnable sins. Conversely, a lover, when he wanders in love and is submerged in affection, deems slightest inattention towards his beloved a great sin, even if he performs all actions by limbs with all its pillars. It is only because he evaluates his deeds in the way of love according to his mind's attention and attraction of his heart towards his beloved. If it is discontinued because of heart's inattention then he has turned away from his beloved, cut himself from his remembrance, and thus negated the purity of his heart.

Until a time comes that he counts as crime and disobedience even engagement with necessities of life like eating, drinking, etc. He realizes that although the said action is a necessity which man is com-pelled to do, yet each one of these compulsory actions in its root is voluntary; and engagement in it is engagement with other than the beloved and turning away from him by one's own will – and it is a sin. That is why we see that one who is overwhelmed with love and affec-tion, and likewise a grieving and depressed person and others like these neglect food and drink, etc.

On this style should be explained what has been narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): Surely desire covers my heart, so I seek pardon from Allãh every day seventy Aims. And the same may be taken to mean in a way the divine words: . . . and ask pardon for your fault and celebrate the praise of your Lord in the evening and the morning (40:55). Then celebrate the praise of your Lord, and ask His forgiveness; surely He is oft-returning (to mercy), (110:3).

The same will be the bearing of what Allãh has quoted from various noble prophets; like the words of Nūḥ (a.s.): "My Lord! For-give me and my parents and him who enters my house believing, . . ." (71:28); and the words of Ibrãhīm: "O our Lord! Forgive me and my parents and the believers on the day when the reckoning shall come to pass!" (14:41); and the words of Mūsã for himself and his brother: "My Lord! Forgive me and my brother and cause us to enter into Thy mercy, . . ." (7:151); and what has been quoted from the Prophet (s.a. w.a.): "We hear and obey; our Lord! Thy forgiveness (do we crave), and to Thee is the eventual course." (2:285).

So, the prophets (peace be upon them!), inasmuch as they were ma'ṣūmīn (infallibles), could not have committed any disobedience, nor could they perpetrate any sin in the meaning of contradicting any article of religion which they were sent to invite to, and which they were engaged in conveying by words and deeds; as their obedience was obligated from Allãh, and there was no sense in obligating the obedience of one who was not assured of abstaining from disobedi-ence, Sublime is Allãh from it.

The same will be the bearing of the confession of injustice and so on, as quoted from some of them (peace be upon them), like the words of Dha 'n-Nūn: "There is no god but Thou, glory be to Thee; surely I was of the unjust ones!" (21:87); because as it is possible that they should count some lawful deeds done by them as sin for them-selves and should ask forgiveness from Allãh, likewise it is possible to count it as their injustice, because every sin is injustice.

It had been said earlier that there might be another explanation: That injustice might indicate injustice against one's soul, as was seen in the words of Adam and his wife: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to ourselves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers." (7:23).

Beware! You should not think that when we say for a verse: It has this or that bearing, we admit that it is against its apparent meaning and then we strive to invent a meaning which could be applied to it; in other words, the Qur'ãnic verses should be reinterpreted with the aim of protecting the sectarian views. A free discussion was given in the volume two of this book[30] on the subject of the prophets' sinlessness, without relying on strange and extraneous premises.

We have explained there that the apparent speech is not restricted in its identification on common understanding confined to the sentence concerned; rather it also seeks help from associations of context and wordings, joined to it and separate from it, like a verse which throws light on another verse. These associations have definite effects on ap-parent meanings, especially in the divine speech, one part of which interpretes another, some portions of which testify for and affirm the other portions.

Inattention to this point has given rise among many exegetes and theologians to the idea of reinterpretation, in the meaning of turning the speech away from its apparent import, and striving to do so in the verses, which go against their particular belief. You see, they cut up the Qur'ãn into fragments, and then hold each piece to mean what a vulgar plebian understands from the talk of another vulgar person like himself. Thus, when they hear Allãh (s.w.t.) saying [about Yūnus, a.s.]: . . . so he thought that We would not straiten him, . . . [21:87], they take it to mean that, God forbid, he (a.s.) thought or believed that Allãh was unable to catch him; in spite of the fact that the next verse: . . . and thus do We deliver the believers [21:88]; counts him among the believers, and he who enntertains slightest doubt about Allāh's power is devoid of faith and belief, let alone the one who gives more weight to Allāh's [supposed] feebleness or believes Him to have no power.

And when they hear Him saying: . . . that Allāh may forgive you your past faults and those to follow . . . [48:2], they think that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had committed a sin and Allāh forgave it, just as one of us commits sin by going against a divine order or prohibition given by masterly authority, from which springs a law of fiqh.

They were not led by meditation even to the extent of looking at the preceding verse: Surely We have given you a clear victory [48:1]; otherwise it would have been clear to them that if this fault and the related forgiveness were like the sins committed by us, and the subsequent forgiveness, there was no reason to attach the forgiveness to the conquest of Mecca (as an objective is attached to its controller). Also, there was no reason to join with conjunction what follows, i.e. the words: . . . and complete His favour to you and keep you on a right way, and that Allāh might help you with a mighty help. [48:2-3]

Likewise, when they hear all those verses which, according to their view, contain the "slips" of the prophets, like those in the stories of Adam, Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm, Lūṭ, Yaʿqūb, Yūsuf, Dāwūd, Sulaymān, Ayyūb and Muḥammad (blessings of Allāh be upon him and his progeny and these prophets), they hasten to attack their esteemed status, and they do not refrain from speaking ill-manneredly about them, although they themselves deserve those insulting remarks; what defect surpasses ill manners?

Their wrong thinking and rotten outlook misled them until they exchanged their Lord, the Lord of the universe, with the Lord, which is, portrayed in the corrupted Old and New Testaments. They think that the Lord is an unseen power who has a solid body, and who turns around the mill of existence, as an arrogant person manages his king-dom, who has no aim except to satiate his desire and anger. First, they were ignorant of the status of their Lord, and then they forgot the position of the prophets effacing their noble and spiritual high grades, and actual sublime positions. This made those purified sacrosanct souls resemble the rotten contemptible souls whose only share in human nobility is its name; it destroys soul of this,[31] deceives honour of that, and looks coveteously at property of that other. And with all their ignorance, they are not ready to accept that a person who manages any of their worldly affairs, or the one who is given responsibility to look after their home and family, should be afflicted by such scandals. Then how do they agree to ascribe such disgraceful things to Allãh, the Glorified? And He is the Knowing, the Wise, Who sent His mess-engers to His servants, so that they should not have any proof after their advent. Would that I knew, what proof would be established against an unbeliever or a transgressor if it were possible for a mess-enger to disbelieve or transgress or invite to polytheism and idolatory, then he washes his hand of it and ascribes it to the Satan.

[31] Refer to what they have narrated about Dāwūd, Sulaymān, Ibrāhīm, Lūṭ and others, peace be upon them. (Author's note)

And when they are reminded of the divine protection enjoyed by divine prophets (peace be upon them) and shown their God-gifted positions and spiritual status, they count it as polytheism, and inordination regarding the servants of Allãh, and start repeating the verse: Say: "I am but a mortal like you!"

They, to a certain extent, are right in refuting it; because what they think about the Lord, and what attributes they ascribe to Him, is much lower than what they mention of the positions of the prophets (peace be upon them) and much below their status and honour. It is all an example of the afflictions, which Islam and Muslims had to suffer because of what the People of the Book, and especially the Jews, have inserted, in Muslim traditions. Thus they turned the hand mill of Islam around an strange pivot, and they believed about the Glorified God (like Whom there is nothing) that He is like an arrogant man who thinks that he is totally free, he is not asked about his actions while the others have to answer about their activities. According to them, when effects follow their causes, when results appear after premises, and when the existing particulars (in the form or substance) demand appearance of their effects, it all happens at random, without any real connection. And when Allãh ended the prophethood on Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and revealed the Qur'ãn to him, then He reserved Mūsã for talking and ʻĪsã for support through the Spirit, it all was not because of any par-ticular especiallity in their noble souls, but just because He wanted to bestow on them this and that. And when Mūsã hit his staff on a rock and there appeared water streams in it, it was exactly as one of us hits his staff on a rock, but the difference is that Allãh made that to flow and does not make this to do so. And when ʻĪsã said to the dead bodies: "Stand up by the permission of Allãh", it was just as if we might an-nounce in graveyard: "Stand up by the permission of Allãh", but Allãh gave them new life and does not give life to these. And so on.

It is not but an analogy of the creative system with the legislative system; but the latter has no natural structure except that people make it, give it a terminological name and preserve it, so it does not go be-yond the area of society and does not cross the world of the societal man.

If they had used a little intelligence and meditated on the verses dealing with the affairs of fault and forgiveness (in its terminological meaning, i.e. going against the master's command and prohibition) they would have realized that there is a forgiveness that is above the well-known forgiveness.

Thus, Allãh, the Glorified, repeatedly says in His speech that there are some of His servants whom He calls 'sincere' ones [or 'purified' ones] who are protected from sin (in its usual meaning). So they do not have any sin in their account, and consequently they do not need for-giveness related to that sin. He has clearly said about several of His prophets, like Ibrãhīm, Isḥãq, Ya'qūb, Yūsuf and Mūsã that they were purified, sincere. For example, He says about Ibrãhīm, Isḥãq and Ya'qūb: Surely We purified them by a pure quality, the keeping in mind of the (final) abode (38:46); and about Yūsuf: . . . surely he was one of Our sincere servants. (12:24); and about Mūsã: . . . surely he was one purified, . . . (19:51). And Allãh has quoted their asking for forgive-ness, as the words of Ibrãhīm: "Our Lord! Forgive me and my parents . . ." (14:41); and the words of Mūsã: "My Lord! Forgive me and my brother and cause us to enter into Thy mercy, . . ." (7:151). If forgive-ness were not ascribeable except to sin (in the common meaning), this invocation would not be understandable.

Of course, one may say: They (peace be upon them) count themselves as sinners in humility before Allãh, although they had not sinned. But such a man should realize that they (peace be upon them) were not wrong in this view of theirs and there was no recklessness in their talk, because forgiveness covers them in a correct meaning and this is a serious matter.

Moreover, see that Ibrãhīm (a.s.) offers his du'ã' for forgive-ness for all the believers: "O our Lord! Forgive me and my parents and the believers on the day when the reckoning shall come to pass!" [14:41], which includes the sincere ones. Likewise, Nūḥ (a.s.) prays: "My Lord! Forgive me and my parents and him who enters my house believing, . . ." [71:28], and it by its generality includes the sincere ones. And there is no meaning in asking forgiveness for him who has not committed any sin, which would need forgiveness.

All this makes us realize that some sins with which forgiveness is attached are other than the sin (in its common meaning), and also some forgiveness is other than the forgiveness of common meaning. Allãh has quoted Ibrãhīm as saying: "And Who, I hope, will forgive me my mistakes on the Day of Judgement." (26:82). Probably, that is the reason that we find in the divine speech that when Allãh mentions mercy or the mercy of the next world which is the Garden, He men-tions forgiveness before it. Like the Divine Words: And say: "O my Lord! Forgive and have mercy, . . ." (23:118); ". . . and forgive us and have mercy on us; . . ." (2:286); and He quotes Adam and his wife: ". . . and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, . . ." (7:23); and quotes Nūḥ: ". . . and if Thou shouldst not forgive me and have mercy on me, . . ." (11:47).

The above statement proves that sin has different grades one above another and likewise forgiveness has grades parallel to the sin; each grade of forgiveness is attached to its parallel grade of the sin. Also, it is clear that it is not necessary that every sin and fault should be attached to a masterly command or prohibition, which average, man's mind would recognize; nor that every forgiveness should be attached to this type of sin.

Thus, the preceding discussion makes it clear that sin and for-giveness have four grades:

First: The sin related to masterly command and prohibition, i.e. going against a rule of sharī'ah whether connected with its root or branch. You may also say: 'going against a legal article, whether relig-ious or non-religious'. And forgiveness is attached to it, which stands parallel to it in rank.

Second: The sin, which is related to a creative rational command, and the forgiveness attached to it.

Third: The sin related to a mannered command (done by the one whose way of life is way of mannerism), and the forgiveness attached to it. Probably the above-mentioned two grades are not counted by com-mon understanding among the sins and the forgiveness; an average man might treat that as a metaphorical use. But it has no relation with meta-phor at all, because you have seen that real effects take place on them.

Fourth: The sin, which is pointed at by the taste of love, and the forgiveness attached to it. And the opposite is the case with hate in all grades. Average men do not count it as a grade of love; but they have erred in it; not intentionally, but because their rationality does not reach to the level of its understanding, and they do not clearly grasp its meaning.

Some one might say: It is merely the lovers' delusion or poetic imagination, which is not based on any rational reality. But they do not realize that these imaginations, although they are delusions and notions in the path of sociological life, they exactly turn into realities – and what realities – in the path of servitude, emanating from the divine love which melts the heart and distracts the reason; and it does not leave any perception to the man to perceive any other than his Lord, nor any will to wish except what He wishes.

At this stage, he realizes that even a slight attention to his self or to his desires is a great sin and a thick curtain, which cannot be raised except by the divine forgiveness. Allāh has counted sin as a curtain for the heart, which prevents man from total attention to his Lord, as He has said: Nay! Rather, what they used to do has become like rust upon their hearts. Nay! Most surely they shall on that day be debarred from their Lord (83:14-15).

This is what is understood by the serious discussion in which one does not play with the realities. Possibly, there may appear, to the friends of Allāh who in their servitude proceed on the way of His love, fine points of sin and subtle aspects of forgiveness, which cannot be reached through general discussions.

5. Does Censure or Forgiveness Necessarily Mean a Preceding Sin?

If one observes the practice of society's same persons, he finds that their censure or punishment is based on voluntary responsibilities; and one of the conditions of its correctness is rationality; and there are other conditions about whose identity, quiddity and limits various so-cieties differ among themselves, and we are not concerned here with their details.

Our concern here is only with the understanding that differenti-ates between beauty and ugliness, beneficial and harmful, good and evil, according to the average condition of the people in their society. The people, with their sociological outlook, think that there is an active starting point in man which has this quality; although academic dis-cussion sometimes makes it clear that it is not one of the natural powers consigned in man, like imagination and memory; rather it is but a trait which is acquired through conformance of several powers in action, like justice.

The societies, with all their differences, think that responsibility depends on this factor, which is called understanding; and reward and punishment branch out from it, as the responsibility springs from it; so a sane person is rewarded for his obedience and punished for his crime.

However, others who lack this understanding, for example, a child, a mad person, an idiot and other weakened people, they do not deserve any reward or punishment – in their true sense – on what they do of obedience or disobedience. Yet sometimes they are awarded rewards for their acts of obedience to awaken their longing, or are held responsible and given disciplinary punishment vis-à-vis their dis-obedience. And it is commonly found in all societies, including the Muslim society.

Actually the above group, seen in the background of the felicity and infelicity, which are earned through obedience and obedience of the laid down responsibilities in this worldly life, are neither felicitous nor infelicitous, because no responsibility has been loaded on them; thus they have no reward (so they should be called felicitous) nor any punishment (so they should be called infelicitous), although some-times they are exhorted by good reward or disciplined by evil result.

As for the life of the next world, which the divine religion affirms and then divides the people into two groups (without their being any third): felicitous and infelicitious, or rewarded and punished. What the Qur'ãn describes about it is a vague statement whose details are not explained, because there is no rational way of identifying their detailed condition after leaving this world. Allãh says: And others are made to await Allãh's command, whether He chastise them or whether He turn to them (mercifully); and Allãh is Knowing, Wise (9:106). Also, He says: Surely (as for) those whom the angels cause to die while they are unjust to their souls, they shall say: "In what state were you?" They shall say: "We were weak in the earth." They shall say: "Was not Allãh's earth spacious, so that you should have emigrated therein?" So these it is whose abode is hell, and it is an evil resort; except the weak ones from among the men and the women and the children who have not in their power the means nor can they find a way (to escape); so these, it may be, Allãh will pardon them, and Allãh is Pardoning, Forgiving (4:97-99).

These verses – as you see – contain the news of pardoning them and returning to them (mercifully) and there is no forgiveness where there is no sin, and it talks about their punishment, and there is no punishment on him who is not given any responsibility. However, you have known that sin, and likewise forgiveness as well as reward and punishment, have many grades: some of them are related to violation of masterly or rational responsibility; while others are related to rotten psychological forms and filth of heart which prevent man from his Lord. And these people, although they are apart from attachment of responsibility (which depends on reason), yet they are not protected from dirts of the souls and curtains of the hearts, which need enjoying the bliss of divine nearness and presence in the arena of sanctity in order to remove that dirt, and for forgiving it, covering it and pardoning it.

Probably, this is the meaning of what has been narrated in some traditions: "Surely Allāh will gather them, then He will create a fire and order them to enter it; so whoever enters it enters the Garden, and whoever refuses to enter it, enters the Fire." We shall speak about these traditions in the exegesis of the chapter of "Repentance", God willing; and some details were given in the chapter of "Women".

Of the use of pardon and forgiveness on occasions other than sin in the divine speech is what has repeatedly come on the occasion of abolishing an order, as Allāh says: . . . but whoever is compelled by hunger, not inclining wilfully to sin, then surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful (5:3). A similar verse is in the chapter six, "Cattle". Also, Allāh says while abolishing wuḍū' when water is not available: and if you are sick, or on a journey: . . . betake yourselves to pure earth, then wipe your faces and your hands; surely Allāh is Pardoning, Forgiving (4:43). Also, He says in connection with the mischief makers in the earth: Except those who repent before you have them in your power; so know that Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful (5:34). Likewise, He says relating to the abolition of the order of jihād from excused persons: . . . there is no way (to blame) against the doers of good; and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful (9:91). There are many other such verses.

And Allāh says regarding travails and afflictions falling the people: And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults) (42:30).

It is now clear that the attribute of pardoning and forgiving belong to Him, the Sublime, like the attributes of mercy and guidance, which are related to the affairs of creation and legislation both. Thus, Allāh, the Sublime, pardons sins and disobediences and erases them from the scroll of deeds; and He pardons the order, which reason demands its enforcement and erases it by not legislating it. And He pardons travails and afflictions, whose causes are existent; and erases them so that they do not afflict the man.

6. Relationship Between Action and Recompense:

We have understood from the preceding discussion that the orders and prohibitions, i.e. the rules and laws prevalent among the sane persons give rise to fine beautiful effects on its implementation – which is called reward; and evil effects on its disobedience – which is called punishment. And that it is like a device which they use for its implementation; so their arrangement to make good recompense for obedience, is only for encouragement to the implementer, and the evil recompense on disobedience is only to put the defaulter in fear and make him cautious against transgression.

It appears from it that the relationship between deed and recompense is a relationship made and laid down by the society or the ruler; called them to it their pressing need to the action, in order that they get its benefit and fulfil with it their need. That is why you see them that when they do not have its need and their requirement of it is fulfilled, they become careless in fulfilling the promised or threatened reward or punishment.

And that is the reason that you see that the recompense differs in magnitude and paucity, and emolument changes in power and feeble-ness, depending on the difference of need to that action. The more the need to it the more the wages, and the less the need the less the wages. Thus, the instructor and the instructed, and the commander and the commanded are like the seller and the buyer both of them give some-thing and take something.

The wage and reward is like the price; and punishment is like the fine imposed on the one who ruins something and is held respon-sible for its price, which he has to pay.

In short, it is a matter laid down and considered like all sociological titles, orders and weights, on which the handmill of human society revolves like chiefship and subordination; order and prohibition; obedience and disobedience; obligatoriness and prohibition; possession and property; and sale and purchase, etc. The realities are the existing things found outside imagination, and the conditions covering them, whose situation does not change with richness and poverty, honour and humiliation, praise and condemnation like the earth and that which grows from it, and death and life, health and illness, hunger and satiation, thirst and its quenching.

This is how the sociological sane people behave. Allãh treats us in His speech as one of us treats others. He has moulded our bliss, to which He guides us through His religion, in the mould of sociological customs. Thus He ordered and prohibited, exhorted and cautioned, gave good news and warned, promised reward and threatened punish-ment; in this way we went on receiving religion in the easiest manner with which we receive the sociological laws and customs. Allāh says: . . . and were it not for Allāh's grace upon you and His mercy, not one of you would have ever been pure, . . . (24:21).

And Allāh has not neglected the matter of educating the soul, which are ready to comprehend the realities. Accordingly, He has pointed in several verses of His Book that, beyond these religious cognizance, which the apparent meanings of the Book and the Sunnah contain, there is a factor, which is greater, and a secret that is more precious and valuable. He says: And this life of the world is nothing but a sport and a play; and as for the next abode, that most surely is the life, . . . (29:64).

Thus He has counted the life of the world a play, which has no basis except imagination, and whose only function is to prevent man from what is important for him, and it is the next abode and eternal felicity of man which is the reality of life. If the life of the world is exactly what we call life other than the life affairs which are attached to it of property, status, kingdom, honour, nobility and so on, then its being sport and play with what we see of the realities further necessi-tates the life affairs to be sport and play. And if it means the life of the world with all its attachment, then the matter is clearer.

So, these sociological customs and the objects which are saught with them as honour, status, property, etc.; then those factors and aims and objects (which are contained in religious education) to which Allāh has guided us through nature, then through messengership, all these things are like a toy which a reasonable guardian, who brings up a child, puts before the small child (who does not know his good from his evil), then keeps playing it with him, in order to exercise his body and refresh his mind, so that he may prepare the child for practical pur-poses to make him succeed in it. Thus, the sporting event is for the child a beautiful play, which leads him to action, and for the guardian it is a serious work full of wisdom, which has nothing to do with play.

Allāh says: And We did not create the heavens and the earth and what is between them in sport. We did not create them both but with the truth, but most of them do not know (44:38-39).

Then Allāh explains how this formal upbringing leads to its spiritual aims, in a general similituate which He has given to the people: He sends down water from the cloud, then water-courses flow (with water) according to their measure, and the torrent bears along the swelling foam, and from what they melt in the fire for the sake of making ornaments or apparatus arises a scum like it; thus does Allãh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it tarries in the earth; . . . (13:17).

The divine speech makes it clear that there is a real relationship between deed and recompense beyond the laid down and considered relationship which the social people see between them; and the divine teaching proceeds on the same line.

7. The Deed takes Relationship to the Soul:

Then Allãh explained that deed takes this relationship to the soul from the side of the psychological form, which it acquires through action and the condition, that it leads to. Allãh says: . . . but He will call you to account for what your hearts have earned, . . . (2:225); . . . and whether you manifest what is in your minds or hide it, Allãh will call you to account according to it, . . . (2:284). And there are other verses of the same meaning.

It becomes clear from it that all the effects which emanate from deeds, whether reward or punishment, they in reality emanate from what the souls earn by the way of deeds; and that the actions have no function except mediation.

Then Allãh made it clear that what will face them of the recom-pense of the deeds, it will be the deeds themselves as a matter of reality; it is not as man puts a deed in his society then follows it with recom-pense; rather the deed is preserved near Allãh with preservation of the acting soul, then Allãh will manifest it (deed) before it (soul) on the day when hidden things will be made manifest. Allãh says: On the day that every soul shall find present what it has done of good and what it has done of evil; it shall wish that between it and that (evil) there were a long duration of time; (3:30). Also He says: Do not urge excuses today; you shall be rewarded only according to what you did (66:7). The verses are clear and many other verses join them in this meaning.

The best of the verses in indication is the word of Allãh: Certainly you were heedless of it, but now We have removed from you your veil, so your sight today is sharp (50:22). This points to the station of present recompense, and it counts him heedless of it in the world (because of the association of the word "today"; and heedlessness does not happen except of a present thing). Then He mentions removal of the veil from him; and veil necessarily demands something to be covered. It means that what he faces and sees of the recompense on the Day of Resur-rection was present in the world but it was not manifested.

These verses explain other verses, which are clear about recompense and manifestation of deed and recompense, because the verses of recompense look at the stage of the laid down sociological relation-ship, while these verses look at the stage of the real relationship, as we have explained. We had touched in short this topic under the exegesis of the divine words: Allãh has set a seal on their hearts . . . (2:7), in the first volume of this book and whoever wants may refer to it. And Allãh is the Guide.

(Finish; and thanks are due to Allãh!)

FOREWORD

1. The late al-ʻAllãmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabã'ī (1321/1904 – 1402/1981) – may Allãh have mercy upon him – was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the translation of al-Mīzãn.

2. al-ʻAllãmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabã'ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzãn fī tafsīri 'l-Qur'ãn which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ʻAllãmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur'ãn in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzãn because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur'ãn and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to the late great scholar al-ʻAllãmah as-Sayyid Saʻīd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī (may Allãh cover him with His mercy) to undertake this task, because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzãn and his literary capability in expression and translation. So, we relied on him for this work and considered him responsible for the English translation as al-ʻAllãmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabã'ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzãn and its discussions.

4. Most regretfully, the esteemed translator al-ʻAllãmah as-Sayyid Saʻīd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī passed away on the morning of 20th June 2002 when he was busy with the translation of volume thirteen of al-Mīzãn (may Allãh have mercy on him). It has come in a ḥadīth: "When a religious scholar dies a void is created in Islam that nothing can ever fill it." The demise of al-ʻAllãmah ar-Raḍawī was indeed a great loss for the Shīʻah world. It became very difficult for this Organization to find a deserving translator capable to finish the English translation of the 13th volume of al-Mīzãn.

Finally, a decade after the death of the esteemed translator, his son, the venerated ʻAllãmah, as-Sayyid Muḥammad ar-Raḍawī, may Allãh bless him, came forward to complete the remainder of this volume with the proposal and persuation of this Organization. The late ʻAllãmah had completed the first draft of the translation of just over one-third of the 13th volume, from the beginning of chapter six of the Holy Qur'ãn till verse 41. Then his son worked on finalizing the first draft of the late scholar, editing the text and completing the missing parts, and then he continued the translation of the rest volume for which we thank Allãh that he had completed it.

We pray for the continued success of as-Sayyid Muḥammad ar-Raḍawī, who, in spite of his busy religious activities in Canada and elsewhere, has completed this volume, and we hope that he will continue the journey that his late father had started.

5. We have now undertaken the publication of the 13th volume of the English translation of al-Mīzãn. This English volume corresponds with the first half of the 7th volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allãh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendices included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of the English translation of al-Mīzãn: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

* * *

We implore upon Allãh to affect our work purely for His pleasure and to help us to complete this work, which we have started. May Allãh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

In the Name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful

All praise is due to Allãh, Who created the heavens and the earth and made the darkness and the light; yet those who disbelieve set up equals with their Lord (1). He it is Who created you from clay, then He decreed a term; and there is a term named with Him; still you doubt (2). And He is Allãh in the heavens and in the earth; He knows your secret and your open, and He knows what you earn (3).

COMMENTARY

The purpose of this chapter is to elaborate on the Unity of the Almighty Allãh in its general meaning: that the human being has a Lord Who is the Lord of the whole universe; every thing originates from Him and to Him returns every thing; He sent the messengers as bearers of good tidings, and warners [of chastisement], and through them He guides His servants to His true religion. And that is why the majority of its verses came in form of arguments against the polytheists about monotheism, prophethood and resurrection. Of course, it also contains brief description of religious (shar'ī) obligations and prohibitions of the faith.

Its context – as inferred by meditation – is one and synchronized, with no indication in it of any division which could have shown that it was revealed in piecemeal form. This proves that this chapter was revealed all together; and that it is a Meccan chapter as it appears from its context in which most of the talk, rather the whole talk, is addressed to the polytheists [of Mecca].The exegetes [of the Qur'ãn] and the narrators [of ḥadīth] agree that this chapter was revealed at Mecca, except for six verses which some of them say were of Medina period, and they are: And they do not assign to Allãh the attributes due to Him… [6:91-93] and, Say: "Come I will recite what your Lord has forbidden to you…" [6:151-3].

Some have said that the entire chapter is of Meccan period except for two verses 6:151-2. Others have said that it is wholly of Meccan period except two verses which were revealed at Medina about a Jew, who had said: Allãh has not revealed any thing to a mortal… (6:91). Someone said that the whole chapter is of Meccan period except one verse which was revealed at Medina, and that is: And even if We had sent down to them the angels… (6:111).

There is, however, no contextual proof for any of the above views as we have explained earlier that this chapter has a single theme and its verses are all well-connected; and we shall further elaborate upon it according to our ability. It has been narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt ('a.s.) as well as [some companions like] Ubay, 'Ikrimah and Qatãdah that it was revealed all together at Mecca.

QUR'ÃN [6:1]: All praise is due to Allãh, Who created the heavens and the earth and made the darkness and the light: The chapter begins with Allãh's praise and it is like an introduction to the main theme of explaining the meaning of monotheism – the praise contains the gist of the chapter and from it stems the detailed arguments; it further shows astonishment [regarding the polytheists] and blames them for setting up equals with their Lord and doubting His Unity. This all serves as an introduction to what follows of general admonition and threat.

In these three verses of praise, Allãh points to the true knowledge on which the religious call rests – which is like the substance of the sharī'ah – and it is divided into three systems: i.) The universal system of existence (in the first verse); ii.) The system of man as far as his existence is concerned (in the second verse); and iii.) The system of human behaviour (in the third verse).

The sum total of the three verses taken together is to praise the Sublime God for having created the macrocosm in which the man lives; and for having created the microcosm (i.e., the existence of man himself who is limited in the sense that he begins with the clay and ends with the decreed term); and for having knowledge of man's inner [thoughts] as well as his spoken words, and whatever he earns [by his deeds].

The third verse: And He is Allãh in the heavens and in the earth, aims at elaborating the theme of the preceding two verses, and paves the way to explain that He knows man's inner [thoughts] and spoken words, and whatever the soul earns.

The phrase: "…Who created the heavens and the earth and made the darkness and the light", points to the universal system of creation on the basis of which things, with their multitude and numerousness, are managed. Our world with its firm operating system is confined to the earth which is encompassed by the firmament with its spaciousness, then He manages it through light and darkness; and on these two revolves the hand mill of this manifest world in its evolvement and perfection. Here always one thing is born from another thing, one thing changes into another thing, one thing appears while the other disappears, a new thing is made and the old one decays; and with conjunction of all these multifarious movements comes into being the universal great movement which bears the load of the things and proceeds with it to its destination.

The term: al-ja'l (اَلْجَعْل = to make) in: made the darkness and the light means: al-khalq = to create. However, al-khalq (اَلْخَلْق) is derived from khalaq ath-thawb (sewing the dress) in which composition of an item from various components is part of its meaning, as opposed to the term al-ja'l = to make [something without using components]. Perhaps for this reason "to create" has been reserved for the heavens and the earth since they consist of a multitude of components as opposed to the darkness and the light, and hence the use of "to make" for them. And Allãh knows better.

[Keeping the English idiom in mind, we have translated aẓ-ẓulumãt (اَلظُّلُمَات) as 'darkness' in singular even though the word: aẓ-ẓulumãt itself is plural.] The Qur'ãn has used the term aẓ-ẓulumãt in plural form while it has used the term an-nūr (اَلنُّور = the light) as singular. Perhaps it is so because darkness appears only in comparison to light, as it is the absence of light in a thing that should be illuminated.

As such it has varying degrees depending on the changing grades of proximity and distance from the light. Not so the light, because it is an existential phenomenon and does not appear in comparison to the darkness which is non-existence. Even if one imagines its multiplication in relation to the darkness, in reality, it does not augment or multiply.

QUR'ĀN: yet those who disbelieve set up equals with their Lord: It expresses astonishment mingled with blame. Surely Allāh, the Glorified, by the creation of the heavens and the earth, and by making of the darkness and the light, is solitary in divinity and alone in god-ship, nothing is like Him, nor is anything His partner. It is really strange that the disbelievers in spite of their confession that creation and management belong to Allāh in the real sense of ownership, and not to the idols that they have taken as gods, they have set up equals with Him from their idols and images which they think are equal to their Lord; thus they think that they are His equals; so they have to be blamed for it.

The above statement makes clear the reason of using thumma (ثُمَّ = then, yet) which indicates delay. It is as though the speaker, when he described that Allāh is alone in creation and invention, and is solitary in divinity and god-ship, then stated the claim of the polytheists that these stones and wood used for carving idols were equals to the Lord of the universe. So, astonishment overwhelmed him for a moment and prevented him from speaking, then he again proceeded in his talk and pointed to the cause of his momentary silence – that astonishment had stopped him from continuing in his speech, so He said: "Yet those who disbelieve set up equals with their Lord."

QUR'ĀN [6:2]: He it is Who created you from clay, then He decreed a term: After describing the creation of the macrocosm in the previous verse, this verse points to the creation of the human microcosm. It explains that Allāh created the man and manages his affairs by decreeing a term for his physical abode in this world; and, therefore, his existence is limited between the clay and between the decreed terms which accompany death as Allāh says: Every soul must taste of death, then to Us you shall be brought back (29:57). (Human species indeed begun from the clay but continued through marriage and sexual intercourse as Allah says: and He began the creation of man from dust. Then He made his progeny of an extract, of water held in light estimation [32:7-8].)

Possibly the 'term' may be taken to mean the return to Almighty Allãh through resurrection since it looks like the Qur'ãn mostly counts the life of purgatory (barzakh) as part of the worldly life, as is inferred from the apparent meaning of the verse: He will say: "How many years did you tarry in the earth?" They will say: "We tarried a day or part of a day, but ask those who keep account." He will say: "You did tarry but a little – had you but known (it)," (23:112-4). Also, He says: And at the time when the Hour shall come, the guilty shall swear (that) they did not tarry but an hour; thus are they ever turned away. And those who are given knowledge and faith will say: "Certainly you tarried according to the ordinance of Allãh, till the Day of Resurrection, so this is the Day of Resurrection, but you did not know,(30:55-56).

The meaning of 'term' has been kept vague by using it as a common noun in the phrase: then He decreed a term; it indicates that it is unknown to man, and there is no way to know it through normal way.

QUR'ÃN: and the named term is with Him: To name a term means to specify it. Indeed it is an established custom to mention the term in agreements and loans and so on. It means the agreed upon time or the end of the time; and it is [the same meaning of] the named term. Allãh says: when you deal with each other in contracting a debt for a fixed time, then write it down, (2:282); it means the end of the agreed upon time. Likewise, Allãh says: Whoever hopes to meet Allãh, the term appointed by Allãh will then most surely come (29:5). Also, He says in the story of Mūsã and Shu'ayb: He said: "I desire to marry one of these two daughters of mine to you on condition that you should serve me for eight years; but if you complete ten, it will be of your own free will…" He said: "This shall be (an agreement) between me and you; whichever of the two terms I fulfil, there shall be no wrong-doing to me…" (28:27-28). Here 'term' means the completion of the agreed upon term.

Apparently the expression 'Ajal (اَجَل) = term' [by itself] in the sense of the end of an agreed upon time (sprouting from the word in the meaning of the completion of the term) is a common usage [of that term]: i.e., they often said, 'the settled term', then they deleted the qualifying word and only mentioned 'term' in the sense of 'the settled term'. In his al-Mufradãt, ar-Rãghib says: "The term fixed for man's life is called al-ajal; they say: 'his ajal came near', i.e. his death was near; its real sense is completion of the term."

In any case, it appears from the Divine Speech that "the term" and "the named term" mean the end of the life's span, not the whole life term, as is indicated by the Divine Word: ...the term appointed by Allãh will then most surely come;... [29:5].

It is clear from the above that there are two terms: "the vague term", and "the named term" that is with Allãh. The latter never changes because of the phrase, with Him, and Allãh has said: ...and what is with Allãh is enduring... (16:96); and it is the same determined term which does never change as Almighty Allãh says: [Say:] "... when their term comes, they shall not then remain behind for an hour, nor can they go before (their time);" (10:49).

The relationship of the named term to the unnamed term is that of unconditional and determined to the conditional and undetermined. The latter may possibly fail to materialize (if its conditions are unfulfilled), contrary to the unconditional and determined which can never fail to occur.

Meditating on the preceding verses together with the verse: ...for every term there is a book; Allãh erases and establishes what He pleases, and with Him is the basis of the Book (13:38-39), shows that the named term is that which is written in: the basis of the Book; and the unnamed term is written in what we call "the tablet of erasure and affirmation." It shall be explained later that: the basis of the Book may be applied to the events which are established, i.e., the events that depend on the perfect causes which do not fail to produce their effects, and "the tablet of erasure and affirmation" is applicable to the events that depend on incomplete causes which we often describe as "requirements" which may be overcome by some snags, preventing them from bringing about their effects.

The perfect and imperfect causes may be likened to the sun's degrees of illumination. We know that this night will certainly end after a few hours and that the sun will rise, and the face of the earth will brighten up. Yet it is possible that the sunrise will be simultaneously veiled by cloud or lunar eclipse or some other snag will appear to prevent the illumination; however if the sun shines over the earth and there is no hindrance between the two then the face of the earth is bound to illuminate.

Now, the illuminating effect of the sun is like "the tablet of erasure and affirmation" while it's rising on its time (with absence of any barrier between it and the earth) is like: the basis of the Book which is known as the Preserved Tablet.[1]

The special composition of the human body with the limited requirements of its limbs, demands that man should live his normal lifespan which is variably fixed at a hundred or a hundred-and-twenty years. For instance, this is what is written in the tablet of erasure and affirmation, yet, all the components of the universe are connected to and also influence the human existence; and sometimes the causes and the barriers that we cannot compute, interact with one another in a way that we do not comprehend, leading to the arrival of his death before the end of his natural lifespan; and this is what is called sudden death.

This makes it easy to imagine the need, according to the divine order, of both the 'named' as well as the 'unnamed' terms; and that the ambiguity of the unnamed term does not go contrary to the fixed point of the named term; and that the unnamed and named terms sometimes correspond, and sometimes are at variance, and that which takes place is the named term.

This is what is inferred from meditation on the verse: then He decreed a term; and there is a term named with Him.

* * *

The exegetes have written strange explanations for the two terms mentioned in the verse. For example:

- First term refers to the period between creation and death, and the second one to the period between death and resurrection. This has been mentioned by several ancient exegetes, and perhaps it is narrated from Ibn ʿAbbãs.
- First term is the term of the people of the world until they die, and the second is the term of the next world which has no end. This opinion is ascribed to Mujãhid, Jubbã'ī and others.
- First term is the time of those who have passed away, and the second is the time of those who have remained or will come later. This is attributed to Abū Muslim.
- First term refers to the sleep and the second refers to the death.
- Both terms refer to the same thing; and the noble verse should be read as: then He decreed a term and this is the named term with Him.

[1] Editor's Note: For further elaboration on: Lawḥu 'l-Maḥw wa 'l-Ithbãt = 'The Tablet of Erasure and Affirmation', and: Lawḥu 'l-Maḥfūẓ = 'The Preserved Tablet', in English, see the translator's book Justice of God, chap.4.

But I do not think that the paucity of time and brevity of life allow us to engage in discussing the validity or otherwise of these views.

QUR'ÃN: still you doubt: al-Miryah (اَلْمِريَة = doubt). In these two verses, the pronoun turns from third person to the second person. The first verse mentions creation and its management in the general sense, and it concludes that the disbelievers should not have set up equals with Allãh; for this purpose it was appropriate to mention them in the third person. The next verse, however, deals with the creation and management specifically in case of man, and so it was proper for the speaker – the astonished and the censurer – to confront them in second person, and censure them by defying them directly. It is as though He says: You were oblivious of the creation and purpose of the heavens and the earth, and making of the darkness and the light, therefore We excused you for it since it was a general matter and it was possible to be oblivious of what it demands; but what is your excuse in doubting about Him Who created you, decreed a term for you and with Whom is the named term?

QUR'ÃN [6:3]: And He is Allãh in the heavens and in the earth: The preceding two verses describe creation and management of the universe in general and of the man specifically. Hence it is enough to realize that Allãh is the God alone who has no partner in His creation and management. But these disbelievers have affirmed other gods and different intercessors for various aspects of management; for example, god of life, god of sustenance, god of terra firma, god of sea and so on. Likewise, for various species, nations and different groups like god of skies, god of this nation and god of that group. So, He negated all this by His Word: "He is Allãh in the heavens and in the earth."

So, this verse is similar to the Divine Word: And He it is Who is God in the heavens and God in the earth; and He is the Wise, the Knowing (43:84). It proves that His divinity overwhelms the heavens and the earth without any difference or limitation. This sentence elaborates what has been said earlier and also it paves the way for what is to follow below.

QUR'ÃN: He knows your secret and your open and He knows what you earn: Secret and open are two opposites and they are the adjectives for our actions; their 'secret' is what they did secretly, and their 'open' means what they did openly without concealing it.

"What they earn" refers to the psychological dimension of what a man earns through his secret and open activities, be they good or evil. As you know, the secret and open which are mentioned here are two formal attributes of the external actions; and what they earn is a psychological and inner condition which is found with souls; so they are different in aspects of their appearance as well as substance. Probably the difference of the things known has caused the repetition of the word 'knowing' in these two phrases.

This verse paves the way for the theme of messengership and resurrection that is to come soon. As Allãh knows whatever man does secretly or openly, and as He knows what he earns for his soul be it good or bad, and as He brings up and manages the man's affairs, it was for Him to send a messenger with a religion which He would legislate for guidance of the people contrary to what the idolaters say that there was no need of prophethood, as Allãh says: Surely on Us is to show the way (92:12).

Likewise, as Allãh knows all the actions and their consequences in the soul of the man, it was for Him to take their accounts on the day that will not spare any one among them, as Allãh says: Or shall We treat those who believe and do good like the mischief makers in the earth? Or shall We make those who are pious like the wicked? (38:28).

TRADITIONS

1. al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain from al-Ḥasan ibn ʻAlī ibn Abī Ḥamzah who said that Abū ʻAbdillãh aṣ-Ṣãdiq, peace be upon him, said: "Surely the chapter of "al-Anʻãm" was revealed all together, escorted by seventy thousand angels until it was revealed to Muḥammad (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.); so glorify it and respect it, because therein is the Name of Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, in seventy places[2]; and if the people knew what (reward) was there in reciting it, they would not leave it." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: al-ʻAyyãshī has narrated it as a mursal ḥadīth from the same Imãm (ʻa.s.).

2. al-Qummī narrated through his father from al-Ḥusayn ibn Khãlid from ar-Riḍã (ʻa.s.) who said: "'al-Anʻãm' was revealed all together, escorted by seventy thousand angels, they had soft humming

[2] It is an approximation. To be exact, the name has come in eighty-seven places. (tr.)

sound of at-tasbīḥ, at-tahlīl and at-takbīr;[3] so whoever recites it, they shall seek pardon for him till the Day of Resurrection." (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: It has also been narrated in Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn, from al-Ḥusayn ibn Khãlid from the Imãm (ʻa.s.); but the phrase: 'shall seek pardon for him' is changed to: 'shall recite tasbīḥ for him'.

3. Abū Baṣīr said: "I heard Abū ʻAbdillãh (ʻa.s.) saying: 'Surely the chapter of "al-Anʻãm" (ch.6) was revealed all together, escorted by seventy thousand angels when it was revealed to the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.); so glorify it and revere it, because in it there is the Name of Allãh, to Whom belong Might, and Majesty, in seventy places; and if people knew the merit in its recital they would not leave it.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī,)

4. aṭ-Ṭabrisī says that Ubayy ibn Kaʻb narrates a ḥadīth from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) who said: "[The chapter of] 'al-Anʻãm' was revealed to me all together, seventy thousand angels were escorting it; they had soft humming sound of tasbīḥ and taḥmīd; so whoever recites it, those seventy thousand angels will pray for him for one day and night for each verse of 'al-Anʻãm'." (Jawãmiʻu 'j-jãmiʻ)

The author says: It has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) through various chains of narrators. [as-Suyūṭī]

5. al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain from Ibn Maḥbūb, from Abū Jaʻfar al-Aḥwal, from Salãm ibn al-Mustanīr, from Abū Jaʻfar (ʻa.s.) that he said: "Surely Allãh created the Garden before creating the Fire, and created obedience before creating disobedience, and created mercy before wrath, and created good before evil, and created the earth before the sky, and created life before death, and created the sun before the moon, and created the light before the darkness." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: That the light was created before darkness is clear in meaning, inasmuch as the darkness is a non-existent entity [and exists only] in relation to the light. [In other words, darkness is nothing but absence of light itself.]

As for ascribing the process of creation to obedience and disobedience, it does not necessary negate free will; because negation of free will would mean negation of obedience and disobedience themselves, and then there would be no correct reason of ascribing them to creation. Rather it means that Allãh owns obedience and disobedience as He owns all those things which come under His ownership. How is it possible that a thing falls within His ownership and then be beyond His encompassment and authority, and isolated from His will and permission?

[3] at-Tasbīḥ, at-tahlīl and at-takbīr refer to phrases used to sing the praise of Allãh by reciting subhãn Allãh, lã ilãha illa Allãh, Allãhu akbar. (tr.)

Moreover, there is no proof that 'creation' is confined to original invention and manufacturing in the sense that God directly invents all things whose creation is ascribed to Him; so that when it is said that Allãh has created justice or murder, it means that the will power of man is negated and He becomes directly responsible for justice or murder by removing any intermediate factor in between. [No, there is no proof for such a notion.] Understand it; and a detailed discussion on this subject was given in the first volume of this book.[4]

By a similar explanation, the meaning of ascribing creation to good and evil, whether in universal matters or in human actions, will also be clear.

As for obedience being created before disobedience and good being created before evil, this too may be explained the way creation of light before darkness has been explained, because the relation between them is that of negation and potentiality, and the negative depends in its happening on the potentiality. The creation of life before death also becomes clear in the same way. It also proves that the mercy was created before the wrath, because mercy is related to obedience and good, and wrath is related to disobedience and evil, and obedience and good happen before disobedience and evil.

As for the creation of the earth before the skies, the following verses prove it: [Say] "...Who created the earth in two days..." Then He directed Himself to the heaven and it is a vapour, so He said to it and to the earth: "Come both willingly or unwillingly." They both said: "We come willingly." So He ordained them seven heavens in two days... (41:9-12).

As for the creation of the sun being prior to that of the moon, that can be easily inferred from the verses: (I swear) by the sun and its heat, and the moon when it follows it (91:1-2). The modern natural sciences lean towards the view that the earth was split from the sun, and the moon was split from the earth.

6. al-ʻAyyãshī narrates from Jaʻfar ibn Aḥmad, from al-ʻAmrakī ibn ʻAlī, from al-ʻUbaydī, from Yūnus ibn ʻAbdi 'r-Raḥmãn, from ʻAlī ibn Jaʻfar that Abū Ibrahim (ʻa.s.) said: "Every prayer has two times, and the time of the Friday is the midday." Then he recited the verse: All praise is due to Allãh, Who created the heavens and the earth and made the darkness and the light; yet those who disbelieve set up equals with their Lord. (He said): "They consider the darkness and the light, and the injustice and the justice to be equal to one another respectively." (at-Tafsīr)

[4] See al-Mīzãn. (Eng. transl.), vol.1, p.131-5. (tr.)

The author says: This is another meaning of the verse; and it is based on making the phrase, with their Lord, related to the word, disbelieve, instead of, set up equals.

7. al-Kulaynī narrates from Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyã from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad from Ibn Faḍḍãl from Ibn Bakīr from Zurãrah from Ḥumrãn from Abū Ja'far ('a.s.). Ḥumrãn said: "I asked about the Word of Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty: then He decreed a term; and there is a named term with Him." He ['a.s.] said: "They both are two terms: the determined term and the deferred term." (al-Kãfī)

8. al-'Ayyãshī narrates from Ḥumrãn, he said: "I asked Abū 'Abdillãh ('a.s.) about the Word of Allãh: then He decreed a term; and there is a named term with Him. He ['a.s.] said: "They both are two terms: the deferred term (in which) Allãh does what He pleases and the determined term." (at-Tafsīr)

9. al-'Ayyãshī narrates from Mas'adah ibn Ṣadaqah, from Abū 'Abdillãh ('a.s.) about His Word: then He decreed a term; and there is a named term with Him. He ['a.s.] said: "The unnamed term is the deferred term, He advances it whenever He pleases; and the named term is the one which comes down from what He wishes from the Night of Destiny to the similar night (next year)." Then he ['a.s.] said: "So this is the Word of Allãh: When their term comes, they shall not then remain behind for an hour, nor can they go before (their time)." (ibid.)

10. al-'Ayyãshī narrates from Ḥumrãn who narrates from Abū 'Abdillãh ('a.s.). Ḥumrãn said: "I asked him about the Word of Allãh: a term; and there is a named term with Him." He ['a.s.] said: "The named (term) is what has been mentioned to the angel of death in that night [i.e. the Night of Destiny]; and it is that (about which) Allãh has said: so when their term comes, they shall not then remain behind for an hour, nor can they go before (their time); and it is that which is mentioned to the angel of death in the Night of Destiny; and the other [term], He has (His) will in it, if He wishes He advances it, and if He wishes He defers it." (ibid.)

The author says: Other traditions narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt ('a.s.) convey the same meaning; and what they explain of the meaning of named and unnamed terms is the same which has been inferred earlier from the noble verses.

11. There is in at-Tafsīr that ʻAlī ibn Ibrãhīm said: "My father narrated to me from an-Naḍr ibn Suwayd from al-Ḥalabī from ʻAbdullãh ibn Muskãn that Abū ʻAbdillãh ('a.s.) said: 'The decreed term is the determined one which Allãh has decreed and fixed, and the named one is the one in which is al-badã', He advances what He wishes and defers what He wishes; and there is no advancing nor deferring in the fixed one.'" (al-ʻAyyãshī)

The author says: One of the narrators has made a mistake, and has reversed the meaning by explaining the named and unnamed terms with the meaning of the other; moreover, the tradition does not aim to explain the verse; therefore [with this explanation] there is not much difficulty in accepting it.

12. al-ʻAyyãshī narrates from al-Ḥuṣayn from Abū ʻAbdillãh ('a.s.) about His Word: He decreed a term; and there is a named term with Him. He said that Abū ʻAbdillãh ('a.s.) said: "The first term is that which He conveys to the angels, messengers and prophets, and the named term is that which Allãh has kept hidden from the creatures." (ibid.)

The author says: The meaning of the tradition is apparently against that of the preceding traditions. However, it is possible to infer from his ['a.s.] word: He conveyed it, that Allãh has given them the basis from which unnamed terms can be discovered; but when it comes to the named term, He has not given preponderance to any one over His knowledge in the sense that He might have conveyed to him a light with which every named term is discovered whenever he wants it. Of course, if the Sublime describes it to the angel of death or to His prophets and messengers when He wishes; so that is like the unseen whose knowledge is reserved for the Sublime, yet He reveals some of it to whom He chooses from the messengers when He so wishes.

13. It is narrated from Ibn Bãbawayh through his chain, from Muthannã al-Ḥannãṭ from Abū Jaʻfar (I think it refers to Muḥammad ibn an-Nuʻmãn) that he said: "I asked Abū ʻAbdillãh ('a.s.) about the Word of Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty: And He is Allãh in the heavens and in the earth. He ['a.s.] said: "Likewise He is in every place." I said: "By Himself?" He said: "Woe unto you! Surely the places are measures; so when you say: In a place by Himself, it will be necessary for you to say in the measures and other than that. But He is different from His creation, He comprehends what He has created, in knowledge and power, comprehension and authority; His knowledge of what is in the earth is not less than His knowledge on what is in the heavens. Nothing is far from Him, and the things are equal for Him in knowledge and power, in authority, possession and will." (Tafsīru 'l-burhãn)

COMMENTARY

This passage points to the disbelievers' rejection of the truth with which the Messenger was sent, and shows their continued refutation of truth and mockery of the divine signs; then it admonishes them and warns them [of its consequences]; finally it responds to some of their imprudent talks in which they have rejected the clear truth.

QUR'ĀN [6:4]: And there does not come to them any sign of the signs of their Lord but they turn aside from it: It points to the characteristic of arrogance which is deeply rooted in their souls, and has produced in them the aversion for the signs which lead to the truth. Thus, they do not look at any sign and are indiscriminately heedless of all. This is because they have rejected the ultimate goal, i.e. the truth, as Allãh says: So they have indeed rejected the truth when it came to them… [6:5]

QUR'ĀN [6:5]: therefore the truth of what they mocked at will come to them: This is a warning and threat [to those who reject the signs of Allãh] because what they mock at is the truth; and the truth refuses until to appear one day and emerge from the realm of news to the realm of reality. Allãh says: ...and Allãh blots out the falsehood and confirms the truth with His words… (42:24). They desire to put out the light of Allãh with their mouths, but Allãh will perfect His light, though the unbelievers may be averse. He it is Who sent His Messenger with the guidance and the true religion, that He may make it overcome the religions, all of them, though the polytheists may be averse, (61:8-9). Also, He said in a parable: ...thus does Allãh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it tarries in the earth… (13:17).

It is known that when the truth will appear the believer and the unbeliever will not be equal in its handling, nor the one who was humble to it and the one who mocked at it. Allãh says: And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the messengers, most surely they shall be the assisted ones, and most surely Our host alone shall be the victorious ones. Therefore turn away from them till a time, and (then) see them, so they too shall see. What! Would they then hasten on Our chastisement? But when it shall descend in their court, evil shall then be the morning of the warned ones (37:171-7).

QUR'ÃN [6:6]: Do they not consider how many a generation We have destroyed before them…and raised up after them another generation: ar-Rãghib says: "al-Qarn (اَلقَرْن = translated here as 'generation') means a people who are together in the same era, and its plural is قُرُوْن qurūn." Also, he said: "Allãh said: 'And We sent the clouds pouring rain on them in abundance' [6:6]. ...He will send on you clouds pouring down abundance of rain… [11:52]. [The term 'midrãra = abundance of rain'] comes from اَلدَّرُّ ad-darr and اَلدِّرَّه ad-dirrah which literally means milk; and it is symbolically used for rain just as the names of the camel and its qualities are used in metaphorical meanings. So, it is said: 'Li 'llãhi durrahu – lit: 'his achievement is due to Allãh'; your udder flowed copiously;' from it is borrowed the usage: dark pass."

The Divine Word: "whom We had established in the earth as We have not established you": Here the talk turns from third person to the second; apparently its reason is avoidance of confusion regarding the reference point of the pronoun. Had there been no change in the phrase: "as We have not established you", the context would have given the idea that the pronoun refers to those mentioned as 'whom' in "whom We had established in the earth"; otherwise the real context in the opening of the chapter is of the third person. We have explained earlier the change which is found in the phrase: He it is Who created you from clay [6:2].

The Divine Word: "then We destroyed them on account of their faults", prove that evil deeds and sins have some bearing on afflictions and general calamities. There are many verses conveying this meaning as there are verses which prove that good deeds and obedience have an impact on bestowal of bliss and showering of blessings.

QUR'ĀN [6:7]: And if We had sent to you a writing on a paper, then they had touched it with their hands, certainly those who disbelieve would have said: "This is nothing but clear enchantment."**:

It shows that the arrogance of the polytheists has reached a stage where nothing would help them to come to the right path; even if We sent to them a message written on a paper which they could touch with their hands and perceive it with their sight and hearing, and their sensory perceptions supported one another yet they would only say that it is nothing but a clear enchantment. Therefore one should not care about their senseless talk: ...and we will not believe in your ascending until you bring down to us a book which we may read, (17:93).

'Writing' is used as a common noun in the phrase: "a writing on a paper," because this writing or book has been revealed in a piecemeal and gradual manner, and it is qualified with "on a paper" in order that it may be nearer to what they had demanded; also then it would be further from their thought that the verses revealed to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) are his own composition written by him, and not something that was revealed upon him through the Faithful Spirit, as Allāh says: The Faithful Spirit has descended with it upon your heart that you may be of the warners in plain Arabic language, (26:193-5).

QUR'ĀN [6:8]: And they say: "Why has not an angel been sent down to him?" And had We sent down an angel, the matter would have certainly been decided and then they would not have been respited: Their talk: "Why has not an angel been sent down to him?" is an incitement to show his inability. The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) had informed them that the verses which he recited to them were brought to him by a noble angel who comes down from Allāh; as Allāh says: Most surely it is the word of an honoured messenger, the possessor of strength, having an honourable place with the Lord of the Throne, one (to be) obeyed, and faithful in trust, (81:19-21). There are many similar verses.

* * *

Their demand for an angel to be sent to them could be for one of the two reasons as Allãh describes in His speech:

One: That the Holy Prophet should bring to them the chastisement which he had threatened them with; as Allãh says: But if they turn aside, then say: "I have warned you of a scourge like the scourge of ʻÃd and Thamūd." (41:13). Also, He says: Say: "It is a message of importance …Naught is revealed to me save that I am a plain warner; (38:67-70).

And since the coming of the angel would mean changing the realm of the unseen into the realm of the seen, then there would be no escape if they had not yet believed – and they would never believe because of their disposition towards arrogance – but to judge them justly and that would necessitate their death as He said: And had We sent down an angel, the matter would have certainly been decided and then they would not have been respited.

Moreover, the humans who are tied to the material world and are settled in the earthly abode are unable to see the angels if they were to be sent down to them and to mingle with them, because their environment is different from that of the angels. So, if humans were to verge into the angels' environment, it will not be possible except by them transferring from the low physical level to the metaphysical level, and that simply means death. As Allãh says: And those who do not hope for Our meeting, say: "Why have not angels been sent down upon us, or (why) do we not see our Lord?" Now certainly they are too proud of themselves and have revolted in great revolt. On the day when they shall see the angels, there shall be no joy on that day for the guilty, and they shall say: "It is a forbidden thing totally prohibited." (25:21-22). This refers to the day of death or even later aspects, as is seen in the next Divine Word: The dwellers of the garden shall on that day be in a better abiding-place and a better resting-place (25:24).

The Almighty Allãh says after it (and the context apparently shows that it is the last day): And on the day when the heaven shall burst asunder with the clouds, and the angels shall be sent down a sending. The Kingdom on that day shall rightly belong to the Beneficent God, and a hard day shall it be for the unbelievers (25:25-26). Perhaps they meant the same when they said: …or bring Allãh and the angels face to face (with us); (17:92).

In short, the words: And had We sent down an angel, the matter would have certainly been decided…, is the reply to their demand that an angel should be sent down to punish them. As such, there should be added to it what Allāh has promised this ummah that punishment would be deferred from them, as the verses of the Chapter Yūnus point to it: And every nation had a messenger; so when their messenger came, the matter was decided between them with justice and they shall not be dealt with unjustly. And they say: "When will this threat come about, if you are truthful?" Say: "I do not control for myself any harm, or any benefit except what Allāh pleases; every nation has a term…" And they ask you: "Is that true?" Say: "Yea! By my Lord! It is most certainly the truth, and you will not escape." (10:47-53). There are many verses of this meaning; we shall thoroughly describe them in another chapter, Allāh willing. And Allāh says: And Allāh was not going to chastise them, while you were among them, nor is Allāh going to chastise them while yet they ask for forgiveness; (8:33).

The verse, in short, indicates that they are demanding descent of an angel but We shall not respond to it because if an angel came down the matter will be decided and they will not be given a respite. Allāh, however, has willed to give them some respite to a certain time, so that they should plunge in what they are doing until they meet this day of theirs and Allāh will certainly give them in full what they are asking for, then Allāh will decide between them.

The verse may possibly be interpreted in another way: They ask for descending of an angel in order that it should be a sign, not that he should bring chastisement. Then the reply would mean: Even if an angel came down to them, they will not believe because of the arrogance and hatred of truth which are deeply rooted in them, and then it will be decided between them and they will not be given respite – and this is not what they want.

Two: That an angel should be sent down to them in order to carry out all the burdens of the mission of inviting them to Allāh instead of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.); or he should be accompanied by a messenger like him confirming his call and to be a witness for his truth, as is seen in their talk as quoted by Allāh: And they say: "What is the matter with this messenger that he eats food and goes about in the marts; why has not an angel been sent down to him, so that he should have been a warner with him?" (25:7). They meant that the person who has been sent as a messenger by Allāh, it is beneath his dignity that he should be like the people in their habits, e.g., eating of food, and going to and fro in markets to earn his livelihood; rather it is necessary that he should have a heavenly life and angelic living which is devoid of hardships and discomforts of material life. Thus he should either have visible sign of his call or an angel should come down to him from the heaven to become a warner with him. In this way, there would be no doubt in truthfulness of his call and reality of his mission.

It is this idea which is replied to in the next verse: And if We had made him an angel, We would certainly have made him a man…

QUR'ÃN [6:9]: And if We had made him an angel, We would certainly have made him a man, and We would certainly have made confused to them what they make confused: al-Labs (اَلْلَبْسُ) = to hide with a cover what must be kept hidden because of its ugliness or because it needs hiding; al-lubs (اَلْلُبْسُ) = covering of the truth; and it seems that the meaning is metaphorical, and the root is the same.

ar-Rãghib says in his al-Mufradãt: "He wore the cloth, i.e., he hid himself with it, and dressed someone else… The root meaning of al-lubs is to hide a thing, and it is used in various meanings: it is said, 'I confused his affair on him.' (Allãh) says: "We would certainly have made confused to them what they make confused." Also, He said: And do not confuse the truth with the falsehood, [2:42]. Why do you confound the truth with the falsehood…? [3:70]. Those who believe and do not mix up their faith with iniquity… [6:82]; and it is said: 'There is confusion in this matter, i.e. dubiousness.'"

"…what they make confused": its object is deleted; probably it denotes generality; its full meaning will be as follows: That which the disbelievers confuse themselves about; it may mean, confusion of someone over his own self, and confusion of the one over another person.

As for their confusing others, then it is like the corrupt scholars who mingle the truth with the falsehood because of the ignorance of their followers; and like corrupt leaders who mingle the truth with the falsehood because of the weakness of their followers just as Pharaoh had said to his people (as Allãh quotes him): "O my people! Is not the kingdom of Egypt mine? And these rivers flow beneath me; do you not then see? Nay! I am better than this fellow, who is contemptible, and who can hardly speak distinctly: But why have not bracelets of gold been put upon him, or why have not come with him angels as companions?" So he incited his people to levity and they obeyed him… (43:51-54).

Also, he said: "I do not show you aught but that which I see (myself), and I do not make you follow any but the right way." (40:29).

And as for their confusing their own selves, it was by their imagination that the truth was falsehood and falsehood was truth. Then they continued on their falsehood, for, although man by nature distinguishes truth from falsity – the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; and his soul is inspired to what is right and what is wrong – yet he prefers the side of base desire, and supports the spirit of desire and anger in his soul; This creates in his soul the trend of arrogance against truth and superiority over reality; thus his soul is attracted to it. It is dazzled of its misdeed, and it does not leave him free to turn towards truth and to heed its call; at this juncture he embellishes his misdeed and knowingly confuses truth with falsehood. As Allãh says: Have you then considered him who takes his low desire for his god, and Allãh has made him err having knowledge and has set a seal upon his ear and his heart and put a covering upon his eye, (45:23). Also, He has said: Say: "Shall We inform you of the greatest losers in (their) deeds? (These are) they whose labour is lost in this world's life and they think that they are well-versed in skill of the work of hands." (18:103-4).

This explains how man goes astray in an issue even though he knows it; and, therefore, it cannot be said that man's confusing the truth with falsehood means that he proceeds to a necessary harm [rather he thinks it is good for him] – since that won't be [rationally] unacceptable.

Moreover, if we deeply look at our own condition and do justice with it, we shall find in ourselves many bad habits of whose evil we are sure, yet we do not leave them just because they have become deep-rooted in us. This is nothing except becoming astray with knowledge and confusing the truth with falsity in the soul; taking delight in imaginary pleasures and infatuation with it forgetting the firmness on truth and practicing it; may Allãh help us to seek His pleasures.

In any case, the Divine Word: "And if We had made him an angel, We would certainly have made him a man…" answers their demand that an angel should be sent down to them as a warner, so that they may believe in him.

In short, it means that this place is the abode of choice; man does not acquire his real blessing and happiness except through proceeding on the path of choice and earning for or against himself what benefits him or harms him; and proceeding on either path (which he selects for himself) is affirmed by Allãh.

Allãh says: Surely We have shown him the way: he may be thankful or unthankful (76:3). So, it is guidance and showing of the way, so that man may choose what he chooses for himself, either going onto the right path or deviating from it, without being compelled to take this or that path. In fact, he sows for himself and then reaps what he had sowed. Allãh says: And that man shall have nothing but what he strives for; and that his striving shall soon be seen; then shall he be rewarded for it with the fullest reward, (53:39-41). So, man does not get except what he strives for; if it is good Allãh shows it to him, and if it is evil, He affirms it to him. He says: Whoever desires the gain of the hereafter, We will give him more of that again; and whoever desires the gain of this world, We give him of it, and in the hereafter he has no portion, (42:20).

In short, this Divine Call would not be meaningful except when it is based on human choice without compulsion and coercion. There is no escape therefore from the fact that the messenger who was to bring the divine message must be one of the people who speaks their language; so that they would choose for themselves happiness by obedience, and misfortune by disobedience, without putting any compulsion on them to accept the call through a heavenly sign which would force them to it – although He has power to do so, as He says: Perhaps you will kill yourself with grief because they do not believe. If We please, We should send down upon them a sign from the heavens so that their necks should stoop to it, (26:3-4).

So, if Allãh was to send down to them an angel messenger, it was rationally incumbent to make him a man like them, in order that the righteous should profit from their good deeds, and the evildoers should lose, since they would confuse truth with falsehood for themselves and for their followers just as they are confused with a human messenger; and Allãh will affirm it and confuse for them what they have confused. Allãh says: …but when they turned aside, Allãh made their hearts turn aside… (61:5).

So, by sending down an angel messenger there would be no [added] benefit or effect more than that which was to accrue by sending down a human messenger, and so that would be futile. Thus the saying of the unbelievers: Why has not an angel been sent down to him? is a demand for a useless thing from which no special or new effect would result based on their expectation. This is the meaning of the Divine Word: "And if We had made him an angel, We would certainly have made him a man, and We would certainly have made confused to them what they make confused."

The above explanation makes it clear that:

First: The issue of making the messenger an angel and making him a man depends on intellectual necessity of preserving the human will and choice in divine religious call, because if the angel was to be sent down in his heavenly form and the unseen was changed to the seen, it would have meant compulsion which is not appropriate with the call of choice.

Second: The verse only talks about the angel becoming a man; it does not elaborate whether it would happen by changing his essence of angelhood to that of humanness – which, various scholars say, is impossible – or by the angel's only taking on a human form, as the Spirit appeared before Maryam as a full-grown human being, or as they appeared to Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) and Lūṭ ('a.s.) in the form of human guests.

Most of the verses speaking about the angels support the second alternative; yet the Divine Word: And if We please, We could make among you angels to be successors in the land (43:60), somewhat points to the first alternative. This topic has further details which should be looked for in another place.

Third: The Divine Word: "and We would certainly have made confused to them what they make confused", is of the genre of the words, but when they turned aside, Allãh made their hearts turn aside (61:5). So, this divine misguidance for them took place after they preferred misguidance for themselves; it cannot be the initial misguidance which is not appropriate for God's holy divinity.

Fourth: "what they make confused" is of general sense; it covers their act of confusion for their own selves and also their act of confusion for others.

Fifth: The verse offers argument against them that even if an angel was sent down to them with the message, it would not help them in removing their bewilderment. It is because Allãh would make that angel a man similar to the human messenger, and they will confuse themselves and indulge in doubt. The fact is that they are making this demand only to get rid of the human messenger (in the form of a man) for changing their doubt into certainty [that he was not a true messenger]; and when the angel will inevitably appear in the same form, they would not benefit from it at all.

Sixth: Allãh has said: "We would certainly have made him a man," and did not say, 'have made him a human,' (a term that includes man and woman both): it is said that this expression shows that a messenger cannot be but a man; it is also indicates that this "making" would be by the angel taking on the human form, not that his essence would change into that of a man, as has been said.

Most of the exegetes have explained the verse in this way: The human being who demanded that an angel be send down did not have power to look at the angel in his true form because they are fully bound by the material world. Therefore, if an angel was sent down to them, he would have appeared to them as a fully developed human being. Consequently, the same confusion and doubt would have occurred to them as it appeared in case of the human messenger, and they would have not benefited from it at all.

This explanation does not answer the objection, even if we were to admit that an ordinary human being does not see the angels in their true forms, by relying on such verses as: On the day when they shall see the angels, there shall be no joy on that day for the guilty… (25:22).

And we say that because if it were impossible for a human being to see the angel in his original form, then the condition of various individuals would not have differed in being possible or impossible; whereas it has been narrated in the Sunnī and the Shīʿī traditions that the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) had seen Gabriel in his original form twice, and Allãh has power to enable all human beings (as He had enabled His Holy Prophet) so that all people could see the angels and believe in them. Thus, there is no problem in it from rational point of view, except the problem of compulsion; so this is the difficulty which should be resolved through this verse, as described earlier.

Likewise, seeing the angels in human shape is not concomitant with possibility of doubt and confusion. Allãh tells us about Ibrãhīm and Lūṭ (ʿa.s.) that they saw the angels in human forms, and then they recognized them and had no doubt about them. Likewise, He informed about Maryam that she looked at the Spirit, and then knew him and had no doubt about him, nor was his affair confused to her. So, why it is not possible that all people should enjoy similar condition like the above-mentioned friends of Allãh so that they could see the angels in human shape, then recognize them and be certain of them? But there remains a difficulty: Making the souls of all people similar to the souls of Ibrãhīm, Lūṭ and Maryam makes it necessary to erase their natural tenets and to change their souls into purified and holy souls, and this leads us to the problem of compulsion; so compulsion is the problem that makes the question of test and trial redundant; that's the problem which should be removed with the help of this verse, as described earlier.

QUR'ÃN [6:10-11]: And certainly messengers before you were mocked at, but that which they mocked at encompassed the scoffers among them. Say: "Travel in the land, then see what was the end of the rejecters." al-Ḥayq (اَلْحَيْق = staying, descending). ar-Rãghib says in al-Mufradãt: "It is said that its root is ḥaqq (حَقّ), then it was changed as in zalla (زَلَّ) and zãla; and [the phrase] fa-azallahuma 'sh-shayṭãn (فَأَزَلَّهُمَاٱلشَّيْطَانُ), is recited, fa-azãlahuma (فَأَزَالَهُمَا); and similarly, dhammahu and dhãmahu."

Their act of mocking the messengers was actually aimed at mocking the divine punishment which the messengers were warning them that it would come down and encompass them, and so the exact punishment that they had mocked at came down upon them. The first verse aims at pleasing the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) and warning the polytheists; and the second verse is an admonition and advice.

These verses argue against the polytheists regarding Unity of God (at-tawḥīd) and Resurrection (al-ma'ād); the first two verses contain proof of resurrection, and the remaining five discuss the issue of at-tawḥīd based on two types of arguments as will be explained shortly.

QUR'ĀN [6:12]: Say: "To whom belongs what is in the heavens and the earth?" Say: "To Allāh…: Thus begins the proof of resurrection. It says in short that certainly Allāh is the Owner of all that is in the heavens and in the earth; He has the authority to manage it in any way He wishes and wills. He is characterised with the attribute of mercy, and it means fulfilling the need of every needy and conveying every thing to what it deserves and bestowing it on him; and many of His servants including human beings are qualified for an eternal life, and deserve to get happiness in it; so He, according to His ownership and mercy, will soon manage their affairs by resurrecting them and bestowing on them what they truly deserve.

So, His Word, the Sublime: "To whom belongs what is in the heavens and the earth?" contains one premise of the proof; and the phrase: He has ordained mercy on Himself, contains another premise, and the phrase: And to Him belongs whatever dwells in the night and day, is the third premise forming a part of the proof.

And His Word, the Sublime: "Say: 'To whom belongs what is in the heavens and the earth?'…", direct the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) to ask them about him who owns the heavens and the earth, and who manages them as he wishes and no one can oppose him; and that is none but Allãh without doubt, because all others, even the idols and the lords of idols (whom polytheists call [for help]) are like all other creatures, their creation and affairs [by hand of their builders eventually] end at Allãh, and so He is the Owner of all that is in the heavens and the earth.

And since the subject of the question was clearly known to the questioner and the questioned both, and the opponents acknowledge that reality, so there was no need for a reply or verbal confession from the opposite party. Therefore, Allãh directed the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) to mention the reply which constitutes the completion of the proof without waiting for their reply.

Putting forth a question to the opponent and then also answering it are among the subtle styles which are used in argumentations. A benefactor admonishes the ungrateful beneficiary by asking: "Who fed you, gave you water and clothed you?" And then he himself answers: "It was I who did all this and was gracious to you, and yet you repay me with ingratitude?"

In short, this question and answer has affirmed that Allãh is the absolute owner; He may manage the creatures in any way He wishes: by giving them life and sustenance, giving death and resurrecting; nothing can prevent Him from it, like the complexity of task, death, absence or disturbance, etc. With this, one premise of the proof is completed. And then another premise is attached to it: He has ordained mercy on Himself.

QUR'ÃN: "He has ordained mercy on Himself…": al-Kitãbah (اَلْكِتَابَةُ = literally writing); here it means affirmation and a firm decree.

Since mercy – i.e. bestowal of blessing on one who deserves it, and conveying a thing to its due blessing and happiness – is among the Divine Attributes of action, it is appropriate to ascribe it to His affirmation. The meaning will be as follows: He has affirmed for Himself the mercy, bestowal of blessings and sending down the good to one who deserves it. There are other divine verses wherein writing has been described as an action of affirming: Allãh has written down: I will most certainly prevail, I and My messengers (58:21). And by the Lord of the heavens and the earth! It is most surely the truth… (51:23).

And as for the divine attributes of person, like life, knowledge and power, their attribution to affirmation is not correct at all [since those attributes were never separate from His person]; and therefore it is not said: He has affirmed for himself life, knowledge and power.

The necessary consequence of His affirming mercy upon Himself – as explained earlier – is that He should complete His blessings on them by gathering them on the Day of Resurrection in order that He should recompense them for their words and deeds, and so that the believers should succeed and the others should suffer loss.

That is why He has added at the end – as the conclusion of the proof – "most certainly He will gather you on the Day of Resurrection – there is no doubt about it". Look how He has emphasized the theme by using lãm (ل) of oath and nūn (ن) of emphasis [in la-yajma'anna, most certainly He will gather"], and the ending phrase: "there is no doubt about it". Then He pointed out that the profit on that day was reserved for the believers and the loss for the non-believers; and so He said: "(As for) those who have lost their souls, they will not believe".

The proof offered in this verse for resurrection is quite separate from the two proofs offered in the following verses: And We did not create the heaven and the earth and what is between them in vain; that is the opinion of those who disbelieve; then woe to those who disbelieve on account of the fire. Shall we treat those who believe and do good like the mischief-makers in the earth? Or shall We make those who are pious like the wicked? (38:27-28). These two verses present proofs of resurrection from the angle that the divine actions are not in vain; on the contrary, they have some purpose behind them; and from the angle that considering the believer and the unbeliever, and the pious and the impious as equals would be an injustice not worthy of the divine status. And since these two groups are not distinguishable in this world, there is need of another life in which the two sides are made distinct from one another through blessings and unhappiness. This line of argument is other than the one used in the present verse which leads to the conclusion through the path of mercy.

QUR'ÃN [6:13]: And to Him belongs whatever dwells in the night and the day; and He is the Hearing, the Knowing: Dwelling in the night and the day denotes being in the condition of this natural world whose affairs are managed in the night and the day; and its system is run by coverage of light reflected from the brilliant sun, and the light's transmutation through proximity and distance, power and weakness, presence and absence and direction, etc.

So, the night and the day are the general environment in which main elements and their by-products are brought up based on a system in which every part and each entity is led to its final destination determined for it, and completes it in spirit and body.

As the living space, in general and in particular, has full effect on the life of the living being, for example a human being, who lives in a land, moves around in search of sustenance, and obtains his sustenance from what grows from it like grains and fruits, and what is raised in it like the animals, and drinks from its water, breathes its air, and he influences the conditions of its regions and is affected by them, and all parts of his body grow according to its measures – similarly, the night and the day have full impact in creation of what is created in them.

Man, among the things living in the night and the day, has been shaped by the divine will from compounding the elementary and composite parts in a particular shape whose existence is distinguished, in its creation as well as its survival, by a life based on a thoughtful cognizance and a will. These two factors prepare for him his inner emotional powers which compel him to attract the beneficial things and avert the harmful ones; and invite him to create a society in which are fashioned the details [of phenomenon] that we see – mutual understanding through languages, following of traditions, laws and habits in social and business dealings, and respecting general opinions and beliefs regarding good and evil, justice and injustice, obedience and disobedience, reward and punishment, and recompense and pardon.

As Allãh, Glory be to Him, is the Creator of the night, the day and all that lives in them, and He is alone in their invention, therefore He owns whatever lives in the night and the day; and He is the true owner of all the night and day, and their inhabitants, including whatever follows their existence, e.g., various events, actions and words. He also owns the system that flows in the whole universe with its wonderful spaciousness. So, He very well hears our words, voices and signs; and very well knows our actions and deeds whether they are good or bad, just or unjust, helpful to others or hurtful, and whatever the soul earns of the happiness and misfortune.

How can He be ignorant of it when everything has appeared in His domain of ownership and by His permission? The existences of such types of issues like good and evil, justice and injustice, and obedience and disobedience; and also the languages that indicate the intended meanings – all these are matters of knowledge that cannot take place except on basis of knowledge. It is for this reason that none of our actions can be called good or bad, obedience or disobedience except when we are aware of those deeds and understand their meanings. In the same way, a combined voice is not called 'speech' unless we know it and relate to its meaning.

Thus, how is it possible that a human being as a created being possesses knowledge of his own person while his ultimate owner (i.e., Allãh) to be ignorant and unaware of it? (Ponder on it thoughtfully).

It is Allãh, Glory be Him, Who invented this universe, with its wonderful spaciousness, in its simple and elemental ingredients which are compounded with a system that astonishes the intellect. Then, He created us and made us inhabit the night and day, then He increased us and established among us the system of human society; then He guided us to invention of languages, and consideration of customs; and He is always with us and with all the causes, step by step, and proceeds with us, minute by minute; and controls the events which we cannot count, one after another.

When a man utters a speech, Allãh put its meaning in his heart by inspiration, made the word flow on his tongue through His specification; conveyed his voice to the listener's ears by making him hear it, and it went with its meaning to his intellect through His preservation, and the meaning was understood by his cogitation through His education. Then He raised the thinker to agree with what the speaker has conveyed to him or to prevent him from it by creating a will to do it or an aversion to repulse him from it. And He, in all these stages which cannot be counted by fingers, is the leader, the motivator, the guide, the guard and the watcher. So, how can a man avoid believing that He, the Sublime, is the Hearing and the Knowing: Nowhere is there a secret counsel between three persons but He is the fourth of them nor (between) five but He is the sixth of them, nor less than that nor more but He is with them wherever they are; then He will inform of what they did on the Day of Resurrection; surely Allãh is Cognizant of all things [58:7].

Likewise, [Allãh is fully aware] when one of us does an action, whether good or bad; [He is cognizant of every stage of our creation:] a man is born from a father and a mother, they give birth to him under the watch of free choice and will; and he has reached them after treading on a distant path and unmeasured span of time, through the loins of active factors and the wombs of passive factors, until he ends in a situation that Allãh knows better; and the Glorified Allãh, in whose grasp is the earth and in whose hand is the heavens, was transferring him by His will from one lap to another until the person reached this world, the place of free will. Then He remained with him in one station after another by divine permission, until he came up to the real world and took his place in the abode of the day and night; after that he continues to flow in the chain [of cause and effect] that impact various parts of the universe like one of the flowing causes while all along, the Glorified Allãh, was a witness on him and encompassed him. So, how is it possible that He, the Glorified, should be oblivious of a thing of this type? Will He not know Who has created? And He is the Knower of subtleties, the Aware (67:14).

It is clear from the above that the phrase: "and He is the Hearing, the Knowing", is like the result of the phrase: "And to Him belongs whatever dwells in the night and the day".

Although the Hearing and the Knowing are counted among the personal attributes of the Sublime which are not separate from His Sublime person and which do not depend on anything else, yet there is a type of knowledge (as well as the hearing and the seeing) that is an attribute of action separate from the person. It is an attribute whose existence depends on the occurrence of a related issue other than His person, like creation, sustenance, giving life and death, all of which depend on the existence of a created, sustained, living and dead being.

Everything, in their essence and reality, are owned and encompassed by God. So, if they are sounds, they are heard by Him and made to hear by Him; if they are lights and colours, they are seen by Him and made to be seen by Him, and everything, whatever it may be, is known by Him and made to be known by Him. This type of knowledge is among His attributes of action, which take place when the action is done by Allãh, not before it. The fact that this attribute took place after it was not there, does not mean that any change appears in His divine person, because it does not go beyond the station of action, and does not enter the station of person. So, when the verse draws result of knowledge from ownership it intends establishment of practical knowledge. (So think over it.)

The verse, i.e.: "And to Him belongs whatever dwells in the night and the day; and He is the Hearing, the Knowing", is like one of the premise of the proof which is explained in the preceding verse; because although the proof of the resurrection was completed by the words: "Say: 'To whom belongs what is in the heavens and the earth?' Say: 'To Allãh; He has ordained mercy on Himself…'," yet the initial simple glance at it might be oblivious of the fact that Allãh's ownership of the things is concomitant to His knowledge of it and to His hearing of what is heard of it like sounds and speech.

That is why Allãh highlights it by repeating the ownership of the heavens and the earth, and links the hearing and knowledge to it. So, He said: "And to Him belongs whatever dwells in the night and the day" – it is synonymous with the words: "Say 'To whom belongs what is in the heavens and the earth?' Say: 'To Allãh'." So this verse is like a premise which completes the proof given in the preceding verse.

This verse – even though we have not been able to do full justice to its explanation, and it can never be done – is among the finest Qur'ãnic verses in meaning, the most delicate in demonstration and argumentation, and the most eloquent in speech.

QUR'ÃN [6:14]: Say: "Shall I take a guardian besides Allãh, the Originator of the heavens and the earth, and He feeds (others) and is not (Himself) fed.": Now begins the argument for His Unity and that He has no partner.

By studying the history of idolatry and how the idols and false deities were adopted, one can gather that people submitted to it and bowed before the idols for one of the two reasons: Either they found themselves in need of a multitude of factors for preserving their lives, like partaking of food, clothes, dwellings, spouses, children, clan and so on; the most important being the food which according to simple view man needs it more than any other thing. Also, they thought that each kind of these needs is attached to a specific cause that arranges to magnanimously fulfil that particular need, like the cause which produces rain which helps the earth in growing pasture and greenery for their cattle and produces good grain for themselves; and there is the cause which manages the affairs of mountains and valleys; or the one which produces love and affection; or the factor which controls affairs of sea and the ships that traverse it. So, they realized that they don't possess sufficient power to gain control over that need or other necessities and they were forced to humble themselves to the cause relevant to their need and took it as a god and started worshipping it.

Or, alternatively, they found the defenceless man target of the arrows of accidents, surrounded by great and general evils and calamities which he cannot stop, like flood, earthquake, deluge, famine and epidemic; and besieged by other small tests and trials, like illness, pains, stumbling, wretchedness and barrenness; enemy, envier and opponent, etc. Then they fabricated for them dominating causes that inflict calamities upon men in order to break their back and pollute their good life. They believed that such factors were sublime creatures like gods of each species, the spirits of the stars, and celestial bodies. Thus, they took them as gods, fearing their wrath and anger, and worshipped them in order to keep them on their side with their worship and to please them by humbling themselves to them in order to free themselves from calamities and misfortunes, and to be safe from their evil and harms that would have descended on them.

The verse, i.e.: "Say: 'Shall I take a guardian besides Allãh…'" and the following verses, argue against the polytheists by reversing their two proofs against themselves; that is, it accepts the basic argument and considers it as correct, but it clarifies that its inevitable conclusion is that they should worship the Glorified Allãh alone, and it negates every supposed partner.

So, His Word, the Sublime: "Say: 'Shall I take a guardian besides Allãh, the Originator of the heavens and the earth, and He feeds (others) and is not (Himself) fed;'" point to the proof from the first basis [of idolatry], and it is the way of hope, that He should be worshipped because He is the Benefactor, and thus His worship will be the gratitude for His blessings and also bring forth more blessings.

He, Glory be to Him ordered His Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) to explain to them in the style of questioning that the Glorified Allãh alone is the guardian of all blessings that man and others enjoy, since He is the Sustainer Who does not need anyone to sustain Him, He feeds and is not fed. Its proof is that it is He Who has originated the heavens and the earth, and brought them forth from the darkness of non-existence to the light of existence; and bestowed on them the bounty of reality and existence. Thereafter, He poured over them the bounties which no one can count except Him – all this to continue its existence; among them is the feeding of man and the others. All these bounties are prepared to preserve the existence of man and others, and the causes that lead these bounties to their due places, this entire end at His origination and invention of the things and the causes and their effects are all among His makings.

So to Him, the Glorified, returns sustenance whose most important manifestation for man is feeding; so it is incumbent on all to worship Allãh alone, because He is the One who feeds us without any need of anybody feeding Him.

The above description makes it clear that:

First: The expression of worship and divinity by using the word: 'walīy = guardian' in the verse: "Shall I take a guardian beside Allãh", is only because of the proof based on God's bounty of providing food.

Second: Its connection with the phrase: "the Originator of the heavens and the earth", aims at explaining the reason why provision of food is confined to the Almighty as was elaborated earlier. Perhaps that may be inferred from the allusion of the word: and [He] is not fed, since it eludes to the fact that all those who are taken for gods, like 'Īsã and others[5] are in need of food, etc.

It is possible to infer from this phrase in the proof that it points to yet another way of establishing His Unity which is better than the two ways [mentioned above]. It means, in short, that Allãh is the Originator of the universe and everything eventually leads to His creation; hence it is incumbent to surrender and submit to Him.

Why is this way of argument better? Although the first two ways lead to the result of monotheism inasmuch as He deserves worship; yet there remains one thing: the two paths lead to the incumbency of His worship either on basis of need of the bounties or on basis of fear of the punishment. So, the actual purpose is either seeking of the blessing or protecting from the wrath – not the Almighty's own person. But this path leads to the incumbency of Allãh's worship because He is Allãh, the Sublime.

Third: Although there are a multitude of Divine blessings, yet from all those Allãh has especially mentioned the provision of food because feeding is simply the most obvious need of living creatures including the man.

Then, the Sublime ordered, after the completion of the argument of His Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.), to mention to them what would support this intellectual proof: That Allãh has ordered him, through revelation, to proceed in believing in Allãh on the path which is led by the intellect, and it is monotheism; and has clearly forbidden him to cross on to the path that leads to the polytheists. So, He said: Say: "I am commanded to be the first who submits himself," and then He said: "and you should not be of the polytheists;" [6:14].

Now, two things remain here:

One: That His Word: the first who submits himself, if it means the first who submitted from amongst you, then the meaning is clear since he (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) had submitted before his ummah; and if it means "the

[5] The Hindus regularly offer milk and food to the idols in the temples; they bath them with water and milk, and offer flowers and garlands at their feet. (tr.)

first" to submit without any condition, then this priority will be in rank, not in time.[6]

Two: Since the result of the proof was servitude, and that is a sort of submission and humility, it was better to use the word, Islam, in this place, instead of īmãn, because Islam points to the purpose of worship, i.e., submission.

QUR'ÃN [6:15]: Say: "Surely I fear, if I disobey my Lord, the chastisement of a grievous day." This is the second of the two paths which the polytheists had adopted for believing in gods: worshiping the gods protects them from their wrath and from descending of their chastisement.

Thus, Allãh has taken in this argument the most fearful aspect of what one must fear of the kinds of punishment, and that is the punishment of the Hour of resurrection which is the heaviest in the heavens and the earth. This is similar to what He had taken in the first argument regarding the greatest need of man and that is, by first glance of the bounties, the provision of food.

The phrase: "if I disobey my Lord", has been used instead of, "if I ascribed anyone with my Lord", it points to the phrase in the preceding verse: and you should not be of the polytheists, which forbids the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) from polytheism. The verse thus says: It is rationally incumbent upon me to worship Allãh alone so that I may be safe from what I fear of the punishment of the grievous day. It is not only based on the guidance given to me from my Lord's revelation; this is the conclusion to which reason has guided me.

In this way, this verse runs parallel to the preceding one, inasmuch as both establish rational proof first and then support it by the divine revelation. So, understand it. This is among the finest abbreviations of the noble Qur'ãn as it explained this comprehensive meaning merely by using the word 'disobey' in place of 'Ascribed anyone'.

QUR'ÃN [6:16]: He from whom it is averted on that day, Allãh indeed has shown mercy to him; and this is a manifest achievement: The meaning is clear. The verse completes the proof given in the preceding verse. At the simple glance, that verse apparently shows that the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) established the argument regarding

[6] If we look at the Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.)'s spiritual creation, then he was the first not only in the rank but in the time too. He himself has said: "The first thing that Allãh created was my light." See 'Abdu 'l-Ḥaqq Dehlawi, Madãriju 'n-nubuwwah, p.3; as-Sīrah al-Ḥalabiyyah, vol.1, p.159. (tr.)

incumbency of monotheism upon himself by saying that Allāh has forbidden polytheism to him, so it is incumbent on him to believe in Allāh's Unity in order to be safe from the next world's chastisement.

It will appear to a negligent unmindful person that the argument may be turned against the Holy Prophet [ṣ.a.'a.w.a.] by saying that the prohibition was confined to you, as you claim, so the fear and incumbency of monotheism also should be reserved for you. Therefore, the argument does not mean that the belief of monotheism and rejection of any partner was incumbent on anybody other than yourself, and it will be a proof against you, not against anyone else.

So, the Divine Word: "He from whom it is averted on that day, Allāh indeed has shown mercy to him"; show that the Divine chastisement covers and encompasses all; there is no escape from it except through His mercy. Therefore, it is incumbent on every person to fear the chastisement of that day for himself as the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) fears it for himself; so the proof is general and is established against all the people, and not confined to him only.

QUR'ĀN [6:17]: And if Allāh touch you with affliction, there is none to take it off but He; and if He visit you with good, then He has power over all things: The two proofs described in the preceding verses were taken as example of what man hopes for (and that was provision of food) and as example of what he fears (and that is the punishment of the Day of Resurrection). Therefore, the explanation was completed with two examples; and the two verses, however, did not mention other kinds of harms and benefits that Allāh sends down to His servants. All these are from Allāh, glorified is His name.

The verse clearly describes that there are harms other than the punishment of the Day of Resurrection that Allāh afflicts upon man, and it is necessary for him to approach Allāh for its removal. Likewise there are blessings that Allāh bestows upon man, and there is no one to avert His grace or a snag to prevent His bestowal as He has power over every thing; and the hope of blessings makes it incumbent upon man to take Him as God, deserving of worship.

It is possible to imagine that since Allāh touches man with harm or good, therefore He deserves to be worshipped (and the opponent does not deny it[7]); yet it does not prove that divinity and being worshipped

[7] Although the elites among the idolaters allowed His worship but relying on the fact that He is of unlimited existence, they believed that devotional worship is irrelevant to Him. The general public among them, however, often worshipped Him in line is reserved for the Almighty. Because what the idolaters have taken as gods are intermediary causes and powerful intercessors that can affect the world positively or negatively, and that makes it incumbent upon man to seek proximity to them out of fear of their evil or in hope of their good.

This argument is rejected on the basis that Allãh, Glory be to Him is Omnipotent over His servants ("then He has power over all things"); none of them is above or equal to Him. They themselves as well as their actions and effects are under His domination. They do not do any good or bad action except by His [creative] permission and will. They are not at all independent in any affair, nor do they possess for themselves any harm, benefit or anything else. Whatever good or bad effect rises from the horizon of their persons ends at His command, will and permission, and is attributed to Him as it may be appropriate to attribute based on His glory and power.

The two verses together complete one meaning: that whatever good or bad touches the man is from Allãh according to what can be appropriately attributed to His divine person; so the glorified Allãh is alone in divinity, alone as deserving to be worshipped, there is no god other than Him, and none is to be worshipped except Him.

Allãh has expressed the affliction of harm and good with the word, 'touching', as an indication of insignificance in His speech: "if He touches you" and "and if He visit [i.e., touches] you". It shows that whatever harm or good afflicts man is an easy task from His unlimited power against which nothing can stand; a limited creature cannot master it or bear it.

Probably the words that speak about visiting with good, "then He has power over all things", serve to show what we had mentioned earlier that there is no one to avert His grace so that it proves that Almighty Allãh has power over every supposed good, just as He has power over every supposed harm; and it manifests the reason of His Word: "there is none to take it off but He"; because if anyone else were to take off the affliction which Allãh inflicts upon a person, then it would push aside Allãh's power over it; and likewise, "He has power over all things" demands that nothing should be capable of averting the good that He bestows upon a person.

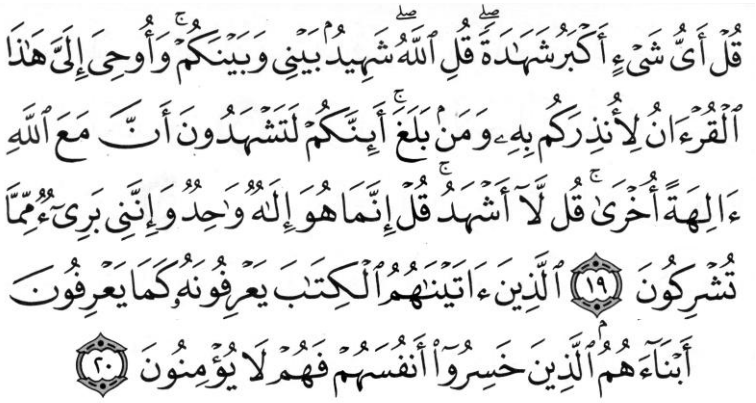
with other gods, as is shown by the Meccan polytheists' talbiyah in pre-Islamic ḥajj: Labbayk lã sharīka laka illa sharikan huwa laka, tamlikuhu wa mã malak, i.e., Here I come [O my Lord], there is no partner to You, except a partner whom You dominate and whatever he owns. (Author's note)

The verse specifically links the touching of harm or good to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.). It is similar to the confinement seen in the verse: Say: "Surely I fear, if I disobey my Lord, the chastisement of a grievous day;" while the verse: And He is the Supreme, above His servant, is of the general nature like that found in the words, He from whom it is averted on that day, Allãh indeed has shown mercy to him.

QUR'ÃN [18]: And He is the Supreme, above His servants; and He is the Wise, the Aware: al-Qahr (اَلْقَهْرُ) is a sort of domination; it means that a thing overcomes another thing and compels it to follow an effect of the dominant thing (which goes against the effect of the dominated thing in nature or so on); for example, water overcomes fire and forces it to extinguishment, and fire overcomes water and turns it into steam or makes it dry. Since Allãh has manifested the creative causes to serve as intermediaries in appearance of the events – so that they may exercise their impact on their effects; and these causes, whatever they may be, are compelled to obey what Allãh wants in them and with them – its correct to say that these causes are dominated by Allãh, and so Allãh is the Supreme Dominator over them.

al-Qãhir is among the names which may be used for Allãh as well as for others; yet there is a difference between His domination and that of others. Other things dominate one another while they co-exist on an equal level of being and existence; for example, fire dominates wood by burning and inflaming it, both are physical beings with different demands of nature from one another, but the fire is more powerful in imposing its effect on the wood and so it overcomes the wood by stamping its effect on it.

However, Allãh, Glory be to Him is dominant not like the domination of fire over wood; rather His dominance is thoroughly overwhelming and comprehensive. In the sense that when we ascribe burning and inflaming a body, e.g., firewood, to Allãh, then He, the Glorified, dominates it through the limited existence which He has bestowed upon it. He dominates it through the characteristics and conditions which He has given it and put in it with His power. He dominates it through the fire which He kindles to burn and inflame it; and He owns all that is found in the fire of its essence and effect. He dominates it by disconnecting the gift of resistance from the firewood, and putting the burning and inflaming in its place so that there is no resistance, no defiance, no rebellion or any such thing vis-à-vis His will and intention, because it comes from a sublime horizon.



So, He, the Sublime, is Omnipotent over His servants while He is above them, and not like domination of one thing over the other that are equals. The noble Qur'ãn has confirmed this discussion by giving its result when it mentioned "al-Qãhir" as one of His names in two places in this chapter: this verse and the verse 61.

Thus, it has qualified this name in both places by the phrase: above His servants. The word, al-qahr, is mostly used where the dominated being is a rational being, contrary to the term al-ghalabah; and that is why ar-Rãghib has explained it as degradation/demeaning; and degradation in rational ones is more apparent; but this does not prevent its application to non-rational beings in usage or with special consideration.

The Glorified Allãh, Who is Omnipotent over His servants, touches them with harm and good, and degrades them for His obedience; He is Supreme above His servants in whatever they do and whatever effect they leave behind, because He is the Owner of what He has given in their ownership, and has power on whatever power that He has given them over others.

Since in the two verses under discussion He has ascribed the touching with harm and good to Himself, and sometimes they are ascribed to other than Him, He distinguished His own stand from that of others by the following phrase at the end of the verse: and He is the Wise, the Aware. 'He is the Wise' who does not do whatever He does haphazardly and ignorantly; and 'He is the Aware' who makes no mistakes nor does He err like others.

COMMENTARY

This is an argument on monotheism based on the path of revelation. Although Unity of Allãh and rejection of a partner from Him can be proved rationally in several ways, there is nothing to prevent its establishment from the way of clear revelation in which there is no doubt. The aim is to achieve certainty that Allãh is One God; there is no partner with Him; and if this objective can be achieved through revelation that there is no doubt in it being a divine revelation, like the Qur'ãn which relies on challenges, and then there is nothing to prevent in relying on this method.

QUR'ÃN [6:19]: Say: "What thing is the greatest in testimony?" Say: "Allãh is witness between me and you…*: Allãh orders His Prophet to ask them about the greatest thing in testimony.

Testimony means bearing the news with a kind of clarity like eye-witnessing, etc. and conveying such news by informing and announcing. This bearing and conveying of news – especially the bearing – greatly differs according to the perception of the bearers and according to the manifestation of the news borne by the bearer and according to the strength and weakness of the bearer in conveying the news.

So, a bearer of testimony afflicted by negligence, forgetfulness or absent-mindedness cannot be like the one who properly remembers what his ears hear and his eyes see; similarly, a vigilant person cannot be like a drunk, nor is a learned specialist in his field like an unaware layman.

With this difference in levels of the bearing and conveying of news, there is no doubt that the Glorified Allãh is greatest of all in testimony because it is He who has created every small and great thing, and to Him returns every amr[8] and khalq[9]. He encompasses everything and is with everything, even [an entity as small as] an atom's weight in the heavens and the earth does not escape from His knowledge, nor anything smaller than that nor bigger; neither does He go astray nor does He forget.

Since this matter was clear and there was no doubt about it, there was no need to bring forth its reply in words by saying: "Say: 'Allãh is the greatest in testimony,'" as Allãh has said: Say: "To whom belongs what is in the heavens and the earth?" Say: "To Allãh…" (6:12); or by saying: "They will surely say: 'Allãh', as He has said: Say:"Whose is the earth, and whoever is therein, if you know?" They will say: "Allãh's." (23:84-85).

Moreover, the Divine Word: "Say: 'Allãh is witness between me and you,'" lead to that reality and takes the place of a reply. It is not unlikely that the word 'witness' be a predicate to a deleted subject, i.e. the pronoun, 'He', pointing to Allãh; and in that case, the whole sentence will be: "Say: 'Allãh is witness between me and you;'" it will thus contain the reply of the question and the beginning of a new sentence.

[8] Amr: To create without matter. (tr.)
[9] Khalq: To create with matter. (tr.)

Bear in mind that the sentence: "Say: 'Allāh is witness between me and you,'" containing the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.)'s statement about Allāh's testimony, is in itself a testimony, as it begins with the word, 'Say' since Allāh's order to him, to inform them of Allāh's testimony for his prophethood, is not separate from this witnessing [of prophethood]. Therefore, there is no need to hold to various types of witnessing that is found in the Noble Qur'ān for his prophethood and for the coming of the Qur'ān from Him as seen in: ...and Allāh knows that you are most surely His messenger (63:1). But Allāh bears witness by what He has revealed to you that He has revealed it with His knowledge... (4:166); and there are other verses that prove the point explicitly or implicitly by using the term 'testimony' or other words.

Qualifying His testimony with the phrase: "between me and you," shows that Allāh comes in the middle of the two opposite parties: the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) and his people. The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) was not separate from them and was not distinguished from them except in the claim of prophethood and messengership, and the claim of revelation of the Qur'ān; but descending of the Qur'ān through revelation is mentioned in the next sentence: and this Qur'ān has been revealed to me. So, Allāh's testimony between the Holy Prophet and his people is actually His testimony for prophethood. This is also supported by His Word in the next verse: Those whom We have given the Book recognize him as they recognize their sons, as will be explained, if Allāh will.

QUR'ĀN: "and this Qur'ān has been revealed to me that I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches: It is connected to the previous order, Say: and is in conjunction with: Allāh is witness between me and you.

Presenting the process of 'warning' as the aim of revealing the Noble Qur'ān is based on the path of fear in the prophetic call and it is more effective in minds of the general public. On the other hand, the path of hope and promise of reward (which is one of the two paths in the prophetic call, and the mighty Book has used it to some extent) does not raise in one the compulsion to seek it, it merely creates longing and desire; contrary to the path of fear in which averting the possible harm is rationally incumbent.

Moreover, Islam calls to the religion of nature which is endowed and placed in people's nature, but they are concealed from it because of their involvement in polytheism and sins which bring upon them misfortune and Divine wrath. In such a situation, it was nearer to reason and prudence to begin their call with warning; and probably it's for all this that the character of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) has been confined [in this verse] to one of a warner, as we see in the Qur'ãnic words: You are naught but a warner (35:23). …and I am only a plain warner (29:50).

This concerns the common people, but as for the particular servants of Allãh, who worship Him out of love for Him, not out of fear of the Fire or greed for a garden, since they perceive the call with fear and hope from a different angle. They perceive the Fire as a symbol of distance [from God] and His wrath, so they are afraid of it for that reason; and they perceive the garden as the arena of proximity and pleasure [of God], and therefore they aspire to it.

Apparently, the sentence: "and this Qur'ãn has been revealed to me that with it I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches", seems that it is addressed to the polytheists of Mecca or to the Quraysh and to the Arabs in general. But the contrast between the second person pronoun 'you' and 'whomsoever it reaches' – and this phrase refers to him whom the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) did not call face to face during his lifetime or after it – shows that the call was addressed to all those whom the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) called, no matter whether the call preceded the revelation of the verse, happened simultaneously with it or followed it.

So, His Word: "and this Qur'ãn has been revealed to me that with it I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches", show that the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) was sent with the Qur'ãn generally to all those who heard it from him or [who will hear it] from someone else till the Day of Resurrection. You may also say: The verse shows that the Noble Qur'ãn is a proof from Allãh and His Book which speaks with truth to the people of this world from the time of its revelation till the Day of Resurrection.

The verse uses the phrase: "with it I may warn you", and does not say, 'with its recital I may warn you; because the Qur'ãn is a proof against him who hears its words, knows its meaning and is guided to its purposes; or interpreted for him its words and made its content reach his ear. It is not necessary that a written message, to a community, to be in their language, but to raise its proof against them and make them comprehend the object of the message. The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) had indeed invited the people of Egypt, Ethiopia, Byzantines and Iran by his letters while their languages were not of the Qur'ãn; and among those who believed in the Holy Prophet in his lifetime and whose belief was accepted were Salmān of Persia, Bilāl of Ethiopia, Ṣuhayb of Byzantine and several Jews whose language was Hebrew – these are the facts in which there is no doubt.

QUR'ĀN: "Do you really bear witness that there are other gods with Allāh?" Say: "I do not bear witness." Say: "He is only one God, and surely I am clear of that which you set up (with Him)."

When Allāh mentioned His testimony [for the Holy Prophet], and it is the greatest testimony for his messengership, and he was not sent except for inviting them to the religion of monotheism. Once Allāh has testified that He has no partner in His divinity, then no one has the right to bear witness that there are other gods besides Him. Now, He orders His Prophet to ask them a question like someone who is surprised and shocked: Do they bear witness for multiple gods? This emphasis is seen by the usage of an and lām; as if the soul does not accept that they would testify to it after hearing the testimony of Allāh, the Sublime.

Then He ordered the Holy Prophet to oppose them in the testimony and to negate from himself the testimony given by them. So the verse says: "Say: 'I do not bear witness.'" – i.e. as you have testified. Then it says: "Say: 'He is only One God, and surely I am clear of that which you set up (with Him);'" and this is bearing witness for His oneness, and disassociating from partners that they set up besides Him.

QUR'ĀN [6:20]: Those whom We have given the Book recognize him as they recognize their sons; (as for) those who have lost their souls, they will not believe:

It gives information of what Allāh has testified in the Books which were sent to the People of the Book, and what their scholars knew from the Books of the prophets in their possession – the books that contained good news after good news of the Holy Prophet of Islam (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) and his attributes in which there was no doubt at all.

Once the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.)'s attributes were brought to their attention; they recognized him exactly as they knew their own sons. Allāh says: Those who follow the Messenger, the Prophet, the Ummī, whom they find, written down with them in the Torah and in the Gospel… (7:157); Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, and those who are with him are hard against the unbelievers, compassionate among themselves; you will see them bowing down, prostrating themselves, seeking grace from Allāh and pleasure; their marks are in their faces because of the effect of prostration; that is their description in the Torah and their description in the Gospel (48:29). Is it not a sign to them that the learned men of the Israelites know it? (26:197).

Since some of their scholars used to hide what was with them (in their books) about his (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.)'s good news and his attributes, they disdained to believe in him. So, Allãh, the Sublime, clarified their loss in their affairs by saying: "(As for) those who have lost their souls, they will not believe".

Some discussion in the explanation of a similar verse in the sūrah of "al-Baqarah" (2:146) has passed earlier; and we have explained there the reason of change from second person pronoun to the third person, and, God willing, full explanation of that will be given in the sūrah of "al-Aʿrãf" (7:156).

TRADITIONS

##1. Ibn Bãbawayh narrates through his chain from Muḥammad ibn ʿĪsã ibn ʿUbayd who said: "Abu 'l-Ḥasan (ʿa.s.) said to me: 'What would you say if it is said to you: "Inform me about Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, whether He is a thing or not a thing."'" He said: "I said: 'Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, has identified Himself as a thing, when He says: Say: "What thing is the greatest in testimony?" Say: "Allãh is witness between me and you." And I say: 'Surely He is a thing not like (other) things; because rejection of His being a thing entails His rejection and nullity.' He [ʿa.s.] said to me: 'You spoke the truth, and well done.'" (Tafsīru 'l-burhãn)

2. ar-Riḍã, peace be upon him, said: "In tawḥīd people are of three faiths: Negation, anthropomorphism, and affirmation without anthropomorphism. As for the faith in negation, is not acceptable; and the faith in anthropomorphism is not acceptable because nothing resembles Allãh, the Blessed, the Sublime; and the correct faith is the third one: affirmation without anthropomorphism. (ibid.)

The author says: The view of negation means repudiation of the meanings of the attributes from Him, as the Muʿtazilites believe; and it means to reduce the positive attributes to the negation of their opposite, for example, the meaning of 'the Powerful' is that He is 'not powerless,' the meaning of 'the Knowing' is that He is 'not ignorant.' This is not valid unless it can be traced to the third view as explained by the Imãm (ʿa.s.).

The view of anthropomorphism means comparing Allãh to something else – and there is nothing like Him – i.e. affirming for Him an attribute in its limited sense which is found within us and which is distinguished from other attributes. So, His power becomes like our power, His knowledge becomes like our knowledge, and so on. But if He had attributes like ours, then He would be in need like us, and consequently He would not be the Essential/Eternal Being – He is well above this.

The view of affirmation without anthropomorphism means that to affirm for Allãh the basic meaning of an attribute, and to remove from Him the characteristics of the attribute which are found in the created beings; in other words, to affirm the attribute and to reject its limitation.

3. Abu 'l-Jārūd narrates from Abū Ja'far ('a.s.) that he said about the Divine Word: Say: "What thing is the greatest in testimony?" Say: "Allãh is witness between me and you.": That was [revealed] because the Meccan polytheists had said: 'O Muḥammad! Didn't Allãh find any messenger to send other than you? We do not see anyone who would confirm what you say.' (This was in the beginning of his call to them when they were at Mecca.) They (also) said: 'And we have indeed asked the Jews and the Christians about you, and they believe that there is no mention of you [in the books] with them; so bring to us someone who would bear witness that you are indeed the messenger of Allãh.' The Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) said: 'Allãh is witness between me and you.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

4. Bakīr narrates from Muḥammad who narrates from Abū Ja'far, peace be upon him, about the Word of Allãh: that with it I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches, that he said: "'Alī, peace be upon him, is among those whom it has reached." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: Apparently, whomsoever it reaches is in conjunction with the second person pronoun, you. It has been narrated in some traditions that whomsoever it reaches means the Imãm; and then whomsoever reaches is a conjunction of the omitted subject: I may warn you. But the first meaning is clearer.

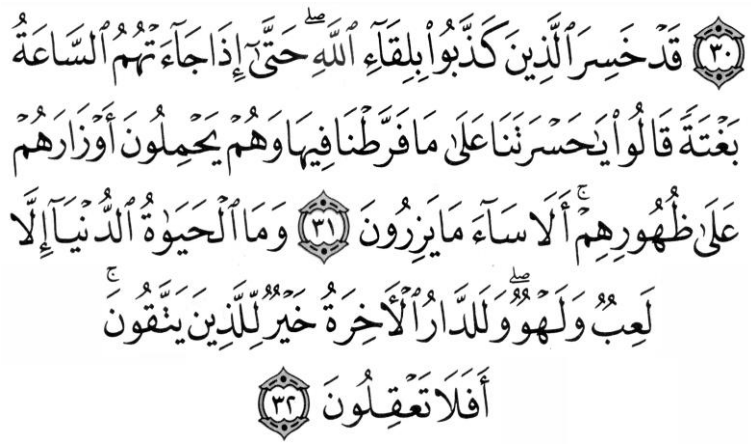
5. Ibn Bãbawayh narrates from Yaḥyã ibn 'Imrãn al-Ḥalabī from his father from Abū 'Abdillãh, peace be upon him, that he was asked about the Word of Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty: "...and this Qur'ãn has been revealed to me that with it I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches." He ['a.s.] said: "In every language." (Tafsīru 'l-burhãn)

The author says: We have seen how this may be inferred from this verse.



6. Abu 'sh-Shaykh has narrated from Ubayy ibn Kaʿb that he said: "Some captives were brought before the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.), so he said to them: 'Were you invited to Islam?' They said: 'No.' So, he set them free and then he recited: "…and this Qur'ãn has been revealed to me that with it I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches." Then he (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) said: 'Set them free until they reach their place of safety because they were not invited (to Islam).'" (Tafsīru 'l-manãr)

7. Verily ʿUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭãb said to ʿAbdullãh ibn Salãm: "Do you recognize Muḥammad in your books?" He said: "Yes, by Allãh! We recognize him with the attributes by which Allãh has described him to us when we see him among you just as one of us recognizes his own son when he sees him with the other children."

As for what Ibn Salãm swears by, is that: "Certainly, I have greater knowledge of this Muḥammad than my knowledge of my son." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

COMMENTARY

The verses turn to the original style, and that is addressing a present audience; so it addresses the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) and describes to him the injustices of polytheists in pure fundamental beliefs, and that is monotheism, belief in propethood and resurrection. This is reflected in the Divine Word: And who is more unjust than he who forges a lie against Allāh …; And of them is he who hearkens to you… And they say: "There is nothing but our life of this world …"

Then these verses describe that in this was the greatest injustice from them, and a way of putting themselves to perdition and loss. Also, it became clear how these acts of injustice reflect on them and they will be fully recompensed on the Day of Resurrection; so they shall forge a lie against their souls by denying what they had said in this world, and they will desire to return to this world in order to do good deeds, and they will show their regret for what they had neglected vis-à-vis Allāh.

QUR'ĀN [6:21]: And who is more unjust than he who forges a lie against Allāh or (he who) gives the lie to His communications…:

Injustice is one of the most ignominious sins; rather meticulous analysis shows that all sins are horrible and condemnable to the extent of the injustice found in them – and it means deviation and diversion from the middle course, and that is justice.

The way injustice is considered great or small based on the characteristics of the perpetrator of injustice, similarly, its greatness or smallness depends on the victim on whom injustice was done or its intended target. Whenever his status becomes greater and his rank becomes higher, the injustice becomes greater and mightier. There is no one more honourable and more respectable than Allãh, Glory be to Him, or His signs which lead to Him; therefore, there is no one more unjust than he who is unjust to this sacred arena or to what is related to it in any way. In reality, of course, he is not being unjust but to his own soul.

Allãh, Glory be Him, has indeed confirmed this rational theory by His Word: "And who is more unjust than he who forges a lie against Allãh or (he who) gives the lie to His communications".

As for forging a lie against Allãh, the Sublime: that happens when one asserts a partner to Him, while He has no partner; or claims prophethood falsely, or ascribes an order to Him falsely and wrongly. As for the denial of His communications: that happens when one denies a true prophet in his call which is based on the divine signs, or rejects the true religion; and rejecting the creator is a part of it.

The verse applies to the polytheists, that is, the idol worshippers to whom this argument is addressed, inasmuch as they established for Allãh, Glory be to Him, partners, claiming that they were intercessors, with whom began the affairs in the world, and on them revolves the management of the universe independently; on the other hand, they denied the divine signs which prove prophethood and resurrection.

* * *

Sometimes some [scholars] join to this mix the people who believe in the intercession of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.), the Purified Ones from his progeny, or Spiritual Masters from his ummah. They think that to seek their intercession in any need of this world or the next is polytheism which comes under this and other similar verses.

It seems that they are oblivious of the fact that Allãh, the Sublime has confirmed intercession when it is joined with permission, in His Speech, without qualifying it with this world or the next. He has said – and Powerful is the Speaker: Who is he that can intercede with Him but by His permission? (2:255).

Moreover, He has said: And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (him), (43:86). So, He confirmed intercession as a right of the scholars who are witnesses of the truth; and prophets are certainly among them, including our Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.). Allãh, Glory be to Him, has confirmed him as a witness in His Word: ...and bring you as a witness against these? (4:41); and He has clearly described his knowledge: and We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly every thing… (16:89). The Faithful Spirit has descended with it upon your heart (26:193-4). Can it be imagined that the Book which clearly explains every thing will be sent to a heart which has no knowledge of it? Or, Allãh has sent him as a witness and he is not a witness with truth? Allãh, the Sublime, has further said: …that you may be the bearers of witness to the people… (2:143) … and take witnesses from among you… (3:140). And (as for) these examples, We set them forth for men, and none understand them but the learned; (29:43). So, He has confirmed that there are in this ummah witnesses who are knowledgeable, and He does not confirm except the truth.

Allãh, the Sublime, also said about His (Prophet's) Household, peace be on them: Allãh only desires to keep away the uncleanness from you, O people of the House! And to purify you a (thorough) purifying (33:33). So, He made it clear that they are purified by divine purification; then He said: Most surely it is an honoured Qur'ãn, in a Book that is protected; none shall touch it save the purified ones (56:77-79). He counts them the scholars of the Qur'ãn (which is a clarification for everything), and the purified ones are the certified group in this ummah for witnessing with truth to which no vain talks and falsity find its way. We have fully described the subject of intercession in the first volume of this book, so refer to it.[10]

QUR'ÃN: surely the unjust will not be successful: al-Falãḥ (اَلفَلَاح = success), al-fawz (اَلفَوْز = success), an-najãḥ (اَلنَّجَاح = success), aẕ-ẕafar (اَلظَّفَر = victory), and as-sa'ãdah (اَلسَّعَادَة = bliss, felicity) are all similar in meaning. That is why ar-Rãghib has explained al-falãḥ as achievement of desire, which is nearly synonymous with as-sa'ãdah.

He said in al-Mufradãt: "al-falaḥ (اَلفَلَح) means to cleave; it is said: 'Iron is cleft with iron,' and that is why al-fallãḥ is used in meaning of a farmer [who tills the land]. al-Falãḥ is victory and achievement of desire and it is of two kinds – of this world and of the next:

i.) The achievement of this world is attainment of the blessings with which the life of the world becomes good, and they are: abiding, affluence and honour; and that were what the poet meant when he said:

Achieve what you want, as sometimes it is achieved with weakness while the wise man is at times deceived.

[10] See al-Mīzãn (Eng. transl.), vol.1, p.226-5. (tr.)

ii.) And the success of the next world and that involves four things: abiding without perdition, affluence without need, honour without humiliation and knowledge without ignorance."

So, it can be said that al-falāḥ is felicity and happiness; it is described in this way because therein is victory and attainment of desire by cleaving the snags which obstruct the way to the goal.

And this is a comprehensive meaning which is applicable to cases where it is used; like the Divine Word: Successful indeed are the believers (23:1); He will indeed be successful who purifies it (91:9); surely the unbelievers shall not be successful (23:117). There are other such verses.

The words "surely the unjust will not be successful" – and injustice is taken here as an attribute – mean that the unjust ones will not get their desire that they wished to attain by clinging to whatever they hold on to because injustice does not lead the unjust to the victory and happiness which he wants to attain through his injustice.

This is so because happiness cannot be happiness unless it is desired and wanted in reality and in external existence. Thus, the thing that desires this goal and happiness in its existence will be equipped with causes and instruments which agree with this required happiness. For instance, there is a man, his required happiness demands that he should abide by replacing in his body what is dissolved in his body. Then he is equipped with the intricate nourishment system which agrees with it, including the related limbs and causes; then there is in external materials that which agrees with his body's composition, and he takes it through the causes and instruments provided for; then he refines it and changes its shape to what resembles the dissolved parts of his body, then attaches it to his body, and thus the body becomes complete after its incompleteness. This is a general order which covers all external species which we perceive through our perceptions and which we explore, without any difference and without fail.

On this runs the system of the universe in its progress. For every intended destination and desired happiness there is a special path; no one proceeds to it except by that path. If attempt is made to reach it through a path other than the one with which the system agrees, it would cause suspension of the cause and negation of the path. This suspension and negation cause decomposition of all the causes and relationships that are related to it. For instance, let us say, there is a man who has found a way to continue his existence through a way other than taking food, swallowing and digesting. This will lead to the suspension of his nutritional power, and in its turn would create deviation in all his powers of growth and reproduction.

The divine providence demands in these species which live with perception and will that they should live by conforming their actions to the knowledge they have acquired in external world. So, if it deviates from external world it would face what would negate its action; and if this was done repeatedly, the personality would perish, like a man who wants to take food, and mistakenly takes poison as food, or clay as bread and so on.

Man has general beliefs and opinions born of the external universal system, which he treats as the basis and makes his action, conform with them, like the beliefs related to the genesis and resurrection as well as the practical laws which he treats as the standards for his actions like worship and trade deals.

These are the natural paths to the human felicities; there is no path to them other than these. If man proceeded on it he would get his desire and achieve his felicity; but if he deviated to some other path – and that is injustice – it would not lead him to his desire, and even if it led to it, it would not be lasting; because all paths and ways are related to it. So, they would fight against it, and oppose it with their full power and ability. Also, the parts of the external world, which are the cause of the genesis of these opinions and orders, would not conform to it in practice; and would continue on this condition until the affair is changed, his felicity is destroyed and his life becomes loathsome.

Often an unjust man in his greed uses his power with sin to acquire his desire and felicity through unlawful means. Thus, he opposes correct belief relating to the monotheism; or disputes legal rights of the others and transgresses the limit to unjustly usurp the people's property; or to disgrace their honour by violently tearing their curtains; or to meddle with their lives without any right; or to disregard the sanctities of divine worship like prayer, fast, ḥajj, etc.; or to commit sins related to them, like falsehood, wrong accusation, cheating and so on.

He commits the above-mentioned sins, and sometimes gets what he intended to, i.e. happiness with achieving his goal as he had wanted, but he is oblivious of his great loss in this world and the next.

As for the worldly loss, the path he has trodden on is the path of turmoil, confusion and chaotic system; had it been the right path it would have been used in general, and if it had been used in general, then the system would have been destroyed; and with destruction of the system, the life of human society would have been nullified. Any system, which guarantees the continuity of the human species, whatever it may be, would dispute with him about what he has acquired through his illegal activities; and it would continue in this dispute until it nullifies for him the demand of his action and result of his disgraced endeavours, be it immediate or deferred; and certainly his injustice will not continue.

And as for the next world, it is because his injustice is written in the book of his deeds, and it is engraved in the tablet of his soul through the marks he brings over it; then he is requited for it and lives in its style; and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it, Allãh will call you to account for it [2:284].

Allãh says: Do you then believe in a part of the Book and disbelieve in the other? What then is the reward of such among you as do this but disgrace in the life of this world, and on the Day of Resurrection they shall be sent back to the most grievous chastisement, and Allãh is not at all heedless of what you do (2:85). Those before them rejected (prophets), therefore there came to them the chastisement from whence they perceived not. So Allãh made them taste the disgrace in this world's life, and certainly the punishment of the hereafter is greater; did they but know! (39:25-26). And among men there is he who disputes about Allãh without knowledge and without guidance and without an illuminating book, turning away haughtily that he may lead (others) astray from the way of Allãh; for him is disgrace in this world, and on the Day of Resurrection We will make him taste the punishment of burning. This is due to what your two hands have sent before, and because Allãh is not in the least unjust to the servants (22:8-10). There are numerous verses in this meaning.

The verses – as you see – cover the injustices affecting the society and the individual; so they confirm the topic described above; and the most comprehensive of all is the verse under discussion, "surely the unjust will not be successful."

QUR'ÃN [6:22-23]: And on the day when we shall gather them all together, then shall We say to those who associated others* (with Allãh): "Where are your associates whom you asserted?" Then their excuse would be nothing but that they would say: "By Allãh, our Lord, we were not polytheists."

The adverb, "the day", is related to a deleted verb, and its full form is: And remember the day… The word: "all together", asserts that the divine knowledge and power do not miss any one among them; so

Allāh encompasses all of them with knowledge and power, He certainly will enumerate and gather them all together, and will not leave any one out.

This sentence aims at explaining the preceding phrase: surely the unjust will not be successful. It is as though when it was said, surely the unjust will not be successful; it was asked: How would it be? The reply was given: Because Allāh will soon gather them together and will ask them about their associates, then they will be lost to them and will not find them; so they will deny their polytheism and will swear falsely by Allāh. If these unjust people would have been successful in ascribing partners to Allāh, their associates would not have been lost and they would not have told lies against themselves. They would have rather found them with the claimed partnership and intercession, and enjoyed their intercession.

The words, "Then their excuse": It is said that the word, al-fitnah (اَلفِتْنَة = translated here as excuse) means reply, i.e., their reply was only that they swore falsely by Allāh that they were not polytheists. Another explanation: It means the end result of their involvement with idols would be nothing but that they would say… Also, it is said that the word, al-fitnah, means excuse. And each interpretation has a justification.

QUR'ĀN [6:24]: See how they lie against their own souls, and that which they forged has passed away from them: It points to the important feature of their story on the Day of Resurrection. It means that they will soon reject themselves and will not find what they had forged [in this world]; if they were successful in their injustice and succeeded in their desire, their end would not lead to its loss and to this lying against their own selves.

As for them rejecting themselves: It is because when they would swear by Allāh that they were not polytheists, they would deny what they had claimed in this world that Allāh had partners; they were insisting on it and had turned away from every clear proof and manifest sign, all because of their injustice and arrogance. So, this would be their lie against their own selves.

And as for the passing away of that which they had forged, it is because that will be the day when it will be manifestly clear that the rule, the kingdom and the power all belong to Allāh, and nothing belongs to any one else except the vileness of servitude, and the inherent readiness without any independence. Allāh says: and O that those who are unjust could see, when they see the chastisement, that the power is wholly Allãh's and that Allãh is severe in chastisement (2:165). To whom belongs the kingdom this day? To Allãh, the One, the Subduer (of all), (40:16). The day on which no soul shall control anything for (another) soul; and the command on that day shall be entirely Allãh's (82:19).

At this time they will see with their eyes that the divinity is reserved for Allãh Who is alone and has no partner; and their idols and associates will be exposed before them, that they own neither any harm nor any benefit for themselves or for others. Then they will realise that all the attributes of divinity and intercession etc, which they had ascribed to them, belong to Allãh only. They had fallen in confusion and had imagined it for others, and what they had forged had passed away from them.

Now, if they would ask them for help, they would be replied in a way that would cut every hope off. Allãh says: And when those who associate (others with Allãh) shall see their associate-gods, they shall say: "Our Lord! These are our associate-gods on whom we called besides Thee." But they will give them back the reply: "Most surely you are liars." And they shall tender submission to Allãh on that day; and what they used to forge shall deport from them (16:86-87). This is Allãh, your Lord, His is the Kingdom; and those whom you call upon besides Him do not control a straw. If you call on them they shall not hear your call, and even if they could hear they shall not answer you; and on the Resurrection Day they will deny your associating them (with Allãh), (35:13-14). And on the day when We will gather them all together, then We will say to those who associated others (with Allãh): "Keep where you are, you and your associates." Then We shall separate them widely one from another and their associates will say: "It was not us that you worshipped. Therefore Allãh is sufficient as a witness between us and you that we were quite unaware of your worshipping (us)." There shall every soul become acquainted with what it sent before, and they shall be brought back to Allãh, their true Patron, and what they devised shall escape from them (10:28-30).

It appears from meditation on these verses that the departure of what they had forged means exposure of the reality of their associates who do not have the attributes of association and intercession; and their realization that what had appeared to them of these things in the world was nothing but an optical allusion, a mirage. Allãh says: And (as for) those who disbelieve, their deeds are like the mirage in a desert, which the thirsty man deems to be water; until when he comes to it he finds it to be naught, and there he finds Allãh, so He pays back to him his reckoning in full (24:39).

Question: The verses dealing with the description of the Day of Resurrection – as given above – show that on that day the realities will appear and come out of the hiding and confusion which are inseparable attributes of this worldly life; as Allãh says: The day when they shall come forth; nothing concerning them remains hidden to Allãh (40:16). So, what benefit can they get from their lie? And how will they tell lie when they see with their eyes opposite of what they spoke of lie? Allãh says: On the day that every soul shall find present what it has done of good and what it has done of evil (3:30).

Answer: The information that they will tell lie and swear falsely on the Resurrection of Day, has come in the Divine Speech time and again. See for example the verse: On the day that Allãh will raise them up all, then they will swear to Him as they swear to you… (58:18). That lie of theirs and their swearing on it will not be with the aim of achieving wrong purposes or to hide the truth, as it is done with lie in this world; and the next world is the place of recompense, not that of action and earning. However, as they had become habituated to come out of dangerous and perilous situations, and to gain benefits with false swearing and forged information, all this for deceiving and diverting [from the truth], the trait of lie has become deeply-rooted into their souls [or into their psyche]. And when the trait is deeply rooted in the soul, the soul is compelled to response to its calls. For instance, look at a ribald obscene person, when the trait of abuse settles in his soul, he is unable to refrain from it, even if he so decides. Likewise, an arrogant person cannot bring himself to show humility to others – even if on a dangerous occasion he shows humility it is only in appearance, but in his heart he is as he was, he will not change, will not show remorse.

This is the secret of their speaking lie on the Resurrection Day, because it is the day when hidden things will be made manifest; and the heart bonded with lie, there is nothing in it except lie; so it will become then manifest, as Allãh has said: …and they shall not hide any word from Allãh (4:42).

Similar to it is the dispute found among the people of the world, and it will appear exactly among them on the Resurrection Day, and Allãh has mentioned it in several places in His Speech; and more beautiful is the expression: That most surely is the truth: the contend- ing one with another of the inmates of the Fire (38:64). This is about the inhabitants of the Fire. As for the inhabitants of Paradise and forgiveness, there will appear what was in their souls here of the purity and safety. Allãh says: They shall not hear therein vain or sinful discourse, except the word peace, peace (56:25-26). Understand it.

QUR'ÃN [6:25]: And of them is he who hearkens to you, and We have cast veils over their hearts lest they understand it and a heaviness into their ears; and even if they see every sign they will not believe in it; so much so that when they come to you they only dispute with you; those who disbelieve say: "This is naught but the stories of the ancients."**:

al-Akinnah (اَلْأَكِنَّة = pl. kinn كِنّ) means the cover in which a thing is hidden; al-waqr (اَلوَقر) means heaviness in ear; al-asãṭīr (اَلْأَسَاطِير = pl. usṭūrah أُسْطُورَة) means lie and falsehood as is narrated from al-Mubarrad; its basis is as-saṭr (اَلسَطْر) which means a line of writing, a line of trees or men, and it is mostly used for false stories that has been collected, organized and arranged [in a systemic style].

The apparent context demands that the statement [of disbelievers] should have been: "They say: 'This is naught but the stories of the ancients;'" however, the verse says, those who disbelieve say: ... Probably this style was used to point to the reason of this statement, i.e. disbelief.

QUR'ÃN [6:26]: And they prohibit (others) from it and go far away from it, and they only bring destruction upon their own souls while they do not perceive. "Prohibit others" i.e. from following it; an-na'y (اَلنَّأي = to be far away). The restriction in, "and they only bring destruction upon their own souls", is that of reversal in the sense that they thought by prohibiting others from it and going far away from it, they would destroy the Holy Prophet and frustrate his divine mission, but Allãh willed to complete His light; so they shall be destroyed in a way that they do not perceive.

QUR'ÃN [6:27-28]: And could you see when they are made to stand before the Fire, then they shall say: "Would that we were sent back, and we would not reject the communications of our Lord and we would be of the believers." Nay, what they concealed before shall become manifest to them; and if they were sent back, they would certainly go back to that which they are forbidden, and most surely they are liars**:

This describes what will be the result of their denial and of their insistence on disbelief and discarding the divine communications.

The words: "Would that we were sent back, and we would not reject the communications of our Lord …" – with the final consonants of نُكَذِّبَ, nukadhdhiba (we would not reject) and نَكُوْنَ, nakūna (we would be) pronounced with a – show their desire to return to the world and to be enrolled in the list of the believers, so that they may be rescued from the punishment of Fire on the Day of Resurrection. This speech of theirs is similar to their denying polytheism and their falsely swearing by Allãh for it; it would be manifestation of their psychic traits on the Day of Resurrection. It is because they were habituated to express their desire of those things which they had no way to attain it, from the good and benefits which they had missed, especially when that missing was caused by their wrong option and their defective actions. Also, it is similar to what will soon come regarding their regret about their negligence of the Hour.

Expression of desire is correct in impossible matters as it is allowed in difficult possible things. For instance, the desire that the past could come back, etc. The poet says:

Would that, and if 'would that' was of any benefit, would that youth were sold, I would have bought it.

As for the words: "Nay, what they concealed before shall become manifest to them", apparently the point of reference of all the pronouns – they, concealed, them – is the same, i.e. the polytheists who were discussed earlier; 'before' refers to this world. So, the meaning would be: When these polytheists will be made to stand before the fire, what they were concealing in this world shall become manifest to them; and its manifestation will make them to desire to be sent back to the world, to believe in Allãh's communications and to enter into the fold of the believers.

[So, what did appear to them?] Nothing except the Fire before which they stood on the Day of Resurrection; they had hidden it in this world by disbelieving, hiding the truth and concealing it after its manifestation, as the following Divine Word point to it: Certainly you were heedless of it, but now We have removed from you your veil, so your sight today is sharp (50:22).

As for the truth itself which they rejected in the world in spite of its manifestation to them, it was manifest to them from before; and the context rejects the idea that merely the manifestation of the truth to them (regardless of the appearance of the fire and the terror of the Day of Resurrection) would cause them to express this desire.

And some similar verses about this situation point towards it. For instance: And when it is said: "Surely the promise of Allãh is true and as for the Hour, there is no doubt about it," you said: "We do not know what the Hour is; we do not think (that it will come to pass) save a passing thought, and we are not at all sure." And the evil (consequences) of what they did shall become manifest to them and that which they mocked shall encompass them (45:32-33). And had those who are unjust all that is in the earth and the like of it with it, they would certainly offer it as ransom (to be saved) from the evil of the punishment on the Day of Resurrection; and what they never thought of shall become plain to them from Allãh. And the evil (consequences) of what they wrought shall become plain to them, and the very thing they mocked at shall beset them (39:47-48).

The exegetes have explained the verse: "Nay, what they concealed before…" in various ways; and the author of al-Manãr has described nine such explanations. He says:

"There are many views about it:

"First: It is their evil deeds and ugly abominations which appeared to them in their scrolls of deeds, and their limbs and organs testified for it.

"Second: It is their deeds which they used to forge and thought that they contain their felicity; however, Allãh will make them null and void.

"Third: It is their disbelief and their rejection which they had hidden in the next world before they were made to stand by the fire; as Allãh has quoted them as saying: Then their excuse would be nothing but that they would say: "By Allãh, our Lord, we were not polytheists."

"Forth: It is the truth or the belief which they were hiding and concealing by showing the disbelief and denial in enmity of the Messenger and because of arrogance. This is applicable to the most extreme of those who disbelieved from amongst the arrogant enemies about some of whom Allãh has said: And they denied them unjustly and proudly while their souls had been convinced of them [27:14].

"Fifth: It is the truth which the leaders were hiding from their followers – the truth brought by the Messengers finally was manifest to the followers who imitated them; and of this was what some people of the Book concealed of our Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.)'s messengership, and his attributes and his good news given by their prophets.

"Sixth: It is what the hypocrites were hiding in this world – they concealed disbelief and showed faith and Islam.

"Seventh: It means the resurrection and the recompense, and included in it is the punishment of the fire; and their concealing it means rejecting it; and this is the basic meaning of the root, k, f, r.

"Eighth: The speech contains an omitted construct state, i.e. appeared to them the evil consequence of what they used to hide of disbelief and sins, and descended to them its punishment. So, they showed their discomfort and vexation, and wished to get free from it by returning to the world in order that they would leave what lack of faith and denial of divine communications have led them to; just as a man whom an incurable disease has put in agony wishes for death so that it would free him from agony, not that it is desirable in itself."

"We do not prefer any of these opinions; rather the opinion preferable in our views is the last one and that is: Ninth. On that day, all those disbelievers and their ilk will find manifest what they used to hide in the world – that which was repugnant in his eyes or in the eyes of those from whom he was hiding it."[11]

Then [the author of al-Manãr] has expanded the talk in details to include the leaders of disbelievers and their followers as well as the hypocrites and profligates, from among those who indulge in abomination and hide it from the people, or neglect the obligatory duties and put forward false excuses and hide the reality.

By looking at the precepts we have put forward and meditating on them, you will clearly see the defects of all these opinions, so we shall not discuss them needlessly.

The Divine Word: "and if they were sent back, they would certainly go back to that which they are forbidden", is a reminder that they would do what was settled in their souls of the contemptible traits in this life. What would incite them to desire to return to this world, and to believe in the communications of Allãh and to enter into the fold of the believers? It would be the appearance of the truth which they had neglected including all that it entails of the chastisement on the Day of Resurrection; and it is what is demanded by the next world which entails the clear appearance of the unseen reality. And if they were to return to this world, they would be governed by the rules of this life, and the curtains of unseen would be let down on them. They would return to their free will, accompanied by the desire of the soul, whispering of the Satan, natural disposition of the humans, and the arrogance and the oppression; thus they would return to their original polytheism and enmity of truth. It will be so because what had urged them to the opposition of truth and the denial of the divine communications when they were in the world, is now as it was then, if we suppose that they are returned to this world after being raised up; so the same rule will apply without any difference.

[11] See al-Manãr, vol.7, p.353. (ed.)

And His Word: "and most surely they are liars," i.e. in their wish that: "Would that we were sent back, and we would not reject the communications of our Lord and we would be of the believers." Although expression of a wish is not an information which could be classified as true or false, but when they said, "would that we were sent back and we would not reject…", it was as though they said, 'Allãh return us to the world and if He returned us we would not reject' – mark that they did not say, we return and we will not reject – their talk contained a request and a promise: request to be returned and promise of belief and good deeds, as He has clearly mentioned it in His Word: And could you but see when the guilty shall hang down their heads before their Lord: "Our Lord! We have seen and we have heard, therefore send us back, we will do good; surely (now) we are certain (32:12)." and they shall cry therein for succour: "O our Lord! Take us out; we will do good deeds other than those which we used to do (35:37)."

In short, their word: "Would that we were sent back, and we would not reject…", is tantamount to saying: 'O our Lord! Return us to the world, we will not reject Your communications, and we will be of the believers.' From this angle, it is subject to truth and falsehood, and so it is okay to count them as liars.

Also, probably they have been called liars in relation to their wish, i.e., their hope and wish proved false, as it did not take place in reality, as they say; your hope proved false, for a man who wishes what is not attained.

Some people have said that it means their falsity in all that they speak about themselves that they would find the reality and believe in truth – but it is as you see [not worthy of consideration].

QUR'ÃN [6:29-30]: And they say: "There is nothing but our life of this world, and we shall not be raised." And could you see when they are made to stand before their Lord. He will say: "Is not this the truth?" They will say: "Yea, by our Lord!" He will say: "Taste then the chastisement because you disbelieved."

These verses describe their open denial of resurrection and what it entails of offering the testimony on Day of Resurrection and their acknowledgement of what they were rejecting. The idolaters used to deny resurrection, as Allãh has quoted them several times in His speech; and their belief in intercession of the partners was related to the worldly affairs only – that they brought benefits to them and averted harmful and perilous things from them.

So, His Word: "And they say: 'There is nothing but our life of this world…'," quote their denial, that there is no life except our life of this world, there is no life after that, and we will not be raised after death. And the words: "And could you see when they are made to stand before their Lord," is like its reply. It explains to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.), the result of their words: "There is nothing but our life of this world, and we shall not be raised," in the style of wish (as is clear from: "And could you see…"). They will certainly verify what they were denying, and acknowledge what they were rejecting by saying: "and we shall not be raised." This is to happen when they shall be made to stand before their Lord, and they shall clearly see the meeting, about which they were told in the world, i.e., they were to be raised after death. So, they acknowledge it after they had denied it in the world.

It appears from above that Allãh has explained the 'raising up' in the verse: "and could you see when they are made to stand before their Lord," with 'meeting of Allãh'; and it is supported by the expression in the next verse: They are losers indeed who reject the meeting of Allãh, until when the Hour comes upon them all of a sudden…, where He has changed the gathering, raising up and resurrection mentioned earlier with meeting and then mentioned the Hour, i.e., the Hour of meeting.

Also, His Word: "Is not this the truth?" i.e. 'Is not the raising up, (which you rejected in the world, and it is meeting of Allãh) the truth?' "They will say: 'Yea, by our Lord!' He will say: 'Taste then the chastisement because you disbelieved'," and hid it.

QUR'ĀN [6:31]: They are losers indeed who reject the meeting of Allãh; until when the Hour comes upon them all of a sudden they shall say: "O our grief for our neglecting it!" And they shall bear their burdens on their backs; now surely evil is that which they bear:

The author of al-Majma‘ says: "Everything which comes suddenly is baghtah (بَغْتَ); it is said: The affair came suddenly, comes suddenly, coming suddenly." ar-Rãghib said in al-Mufradãt: "al-Ḥasr (اَلحَسْر) means removing the cloth from what it covers; it is said: 'I removed (cloth) from arm,'; al-ḥãsir (اَلحَاسِر) means the one who does not wear coat of mail, nor helmet; al-miḥsarah (اَلمِحْسَرَة) means a broom; ...al-ḥãsir means fatigued (because his powers are exposed) ...al-ḥasrah (اَلحَسْرَة) means grief on what is lost, remorse on it; it is as though the ignorance was removed from him which had led him to commit that mistake; or weakened his powers by excessive grief; or he was too fatigued to make up his deficiency."

And he said: "al-Wazar (اَلوَزَر) means place of refuge in a mountain; Allãh says: By no means! There shall be no place of refuge! With your Lord alone shall on that day be the place of rest [75:11-12]. And al-wizr (اَلوِزْر) means heavy load, likening it to the load of mountain; and it is used to denote sin just as it is also described as ath-thiql (اَلثِّقْل) means heavy load; Allãh has said: That they may bear their burdens entirely... (16:25); and also He has said: And most certainly they shall carry their own burdens, and other burdens with their own burdens (29:13)."

The verse shows another consequence of their denial of being raised up, and it is that the Hour will take them all of a sudden. So, they shall cry out with grief on their negligence of it, and their loads will appear before them and sins which they will carry on their backs; and it will be the most difficult and most perilous condition of man. Well, how evil is what they shall be bearing and carrying – a heavy load or a sin, or the consequences of the sin.

The verse: "They are losers indeed who reject the meeting of Allãh;" is as the result emanating from the Divine Word: And they say: "There is nothing but our life of the world, and we shall not be raised." And could you see when they are made to stand before their Lord. He will say: "Is not this the truth?" They will say: "Yea, by our Lord!" He will say: "Taste then the chastisement because you disbelieved." It is because they exchanged comfort of the next world and happiness of the meeting of Allãh with denial of resurrection and the resulting painful chastisement, and clearly it was a losing deal.

QUR'ÃN [6:32]: And this world's life is naught but a play and an idle sport; and certainly the abode of the Hereafter is better for those who are pious; do you not then understand?:

This is the conclusion of the discussion. Allāh describes in it the condition of the two lives of this world and the next, and compares between them. This world's life is a play and idle sport and nothing else, because it revolves around a chain of reflective beliefs and imaginative aims, as a play revolves around them – so it is a play. Hence it deflects man's attention from the important life of the next world which is the real and enduring life – so it is an idle sport. Since the next world's life is real and enduring, it is good, and none shall get it except the pious ones – so it is better for them.

TRADITIONS

1. Hishām ibn Sālim narrates from Abū ʿAbdillāh [aṣ-Ṣādiq] (ʿa.s.) that he said: "Surely Allāh will go on forgiving on the Day of Resurrection to such an extent which will not come into any one's mind, until the polytheists will say: 'By Allāh, our Lord! We were not polytheists.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʿAyyāshī)

[The author of] Majmaʿu 'l-bayān writes about the verse: Then their 'fitnah' would be nothing…, that it means: their 'excuse'. He writes that this has been narrated from Abū ʿAbdillāh (ʿa.s.).

[On Faith (īmān) of Abū Ṭālib (ʿa.s.)]

2. al-Qummī writes about the Divine Word: And they prohibit (others) from it and go far away from it, that 'they prohibit' refers to the Hāshimites who helped the Messenger of Allāh (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) and prevented the Quraysh (from harming him), and who went far away from him and did not believe in him. (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: This tradition is near to what has been narrated from ʿAṭāʾ and Muqātil that it refers to Abū Ṭālib, the uncle of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) as he used to hold back the Quraysh from the Holy Prophet, and to keep himself away from the Holy Prophet while he did not believe in him.

But the context does not agree with it since apparently the pronoun [from it] in the verse refers to the Qurʾān, not to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.). Moreover, the traditions quoted through the Ahlu 'l-Bayt (ʿa.s.) about Abū Ṭālib's faith (īmān) are too numerous.

3. It is quoted in al-Majmaʿ: "The consensus (ijmāʿ) of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (ʿa.s.) for īmān (faith) of Abū Ṭālib is a fact, and their consensus is sufficient proof (ḥujjah) because they are one of the two weighty things the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) ordered to hold fast to them in his words: 'So long as you shall hold fast to them you will never go astray.'"(aṭ-Ṭabrisī)

This is also proven from what [ʻAbdullãh] Ibn ʻUmar has narrated that Abū Bakr brought his father, on the day of the conquest (of Mecca), to the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.), so he (the Holy Prophet) said: "Why didn't you leave the old man so that I should have come to him?" – and he was blind. Abū Bakr said: "I wished that Allãh, the Sublime, should give him reward. I swear by Him who has sent you with truth that certainly I was happier with Abū Ṭãlib's Islam than with my father's Islam, as I sought with it delight of your eyes [i.e. your pleasure]." The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) said: "You are right."

Also, aṭ-Ṭabarī narrates through his chain that when the chiefs of the Quraysh saw how Abū Ṭãlib defended the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.), they came to him in a group and said: "We have brought to you the hero of Quraysh in beauty, magnanimity and gallantry, ʻAmmãrah ibn al-Walīd; we will give him to you and you give us your nephew who has divided our community and made a fool of our understanding so that we may kill him." Abū Ṭãlib said: "You have not been just to me. You are giving me your son so that I should feed him, and I give you my son so that you should kill him; rather every one of you should bring his son so that I should kill him." And he said:

"We defended the Messenger, the Messenger of the King [God], with bright [swords] which radiate like lightening.
I defend and protect the Messenger of the King, protection of a guardian who is affectionate to him."

And his sayings and poems declaring his Islam are numerous and well-known beyond enumeration. Among that is his saying:

Didn't you know that we have found Muḥammad,
a prophet like Mūsã, it is written in earlier books?
Is not our father Hãshim who was courageous, and enjoined his sons to fight and wage war?

And his saying in a qaṣīdah:

And they said to Aḥmad, you are a man, of contrary language (and) weak cause.
Well, certainly Aḥmad has brought to them, truth, and has not brought to them a lie.

And his statement regarding the matter of the 'document'[12] and it is among the miracles of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.):

Certainly there was a lesson in the affair of the document, when a man who was not there will be told he will be astonished.
Allãh erased from it their disbelief and refractoriness and what enmity they had shown against the speaking truth.
And the son of ʿAbdullãh became confirmed among us, at the wrath of our people, he is blameless.

And his saying in a qaṣīdah to his brother, Ḥamzah, exhorting him to follow the Holy Prophet and to be patient in his obedience:

Be steadfast, O Abū Yaʿlã, in the faith of Aḥmad; show forth your faith; may you be strengthened in your resolve!
It made me glad when you said that you are a man of faith!
Be then a true supporter of the Messenger of Allãh in Allãh's cause.

And his saying in a qaṣīdah:

I shall be steadfast in the help of the Prophet, Muḥammad,
I shall fight in his defence with spear and the troops.

Also, his saying urging Negus to support the Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.):

Know, O King of Abyssinia, that Muḥammad is a prophet like Mūsã and Masīḥ son of Maryam.
He brought guidance similar to what they brought,
and all (of them) by order of Allãh guide and protect.
Concerning him, you recite it in your own scriptures,
a true account it is, not a fantastic tale.
So do not set up equals with Allãh and accept Islam, for the way of truth is not obscured in darkness.

"And his saying in his will, when death had reached him:

I enjoin to help the Prophet whose presence is good.
My son ʿAlī, and elder of the group ʿAbbãs;
and Ḥamzah the lion who defends his reality;

---

[12] Editor's Note: As the final strategy, the Quraysh put imposed a socio-economic boycott against the clans of Hãshim and Muṭṭalib. The document of boycott was written and hung in the Kaʿbah. Abū Ṭãlib took the two clans to the mountain trail known as Shiʿb Abū Ṭãlib and spent three years. This happened in the 7th year of the Prophetic mission. Only twice a year, in months of Rajab and Dhu 'l-ḥijjah (when violence was a taboo), did they dare to come out from the Shiʿb. Then one day, the Prophet of Islam said to Abū Ṭãlib, "I have been informed by Allãh that the agreement of the Quryash has been eaten up by insects, and no writing has been left except the name of Allãh." Abū Ṭãlib believed in his nephew and came to the Quraysh and challenged them to check the document. When they looked into it, they found the words of the Holy Prophet to be true. This is how the socio-economic boycott came to its end.

and Ja'far, that they should repulse the people from him.
May my mother, and what she gave birth to, be made your ransom in helping Aḥmad as shields against the people.

And similar to these poems are what is found in his well-known *qaṣīdah*s, and enjoinments and lectures quoting which will make the book too lengthy.

And the main proofs of those who say that Abū Ṭãlib had not accepted Islam are some traditions narrated through the Sunnī chains. On the opposite side are the consensus (ijmã') of Ahlu 'l-Bayt ('a.s.) and some traditions narrated through the Sunnī chains and his poems narrated from him. And every person may choose what he likes.

4. Khãlid has narrated from Abū 'Abdillãh ('a.s.) that he said: and if they were sent back, they would certainly go back to that which they are forbidden, surely they are cursed in origin. (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

5. 'Uthmãn ibn 'Īsã narrates from some of his companions from the (same) Imãm ('a.s.) that he said: "Surely Allãh said to water: 'Be sweet and delicious, I shall create from you My garden and people of My obedience;' and He said to (another) water: 'Be salty and bitter, I shall create from you My fire and people of My disobedience.' Then He made both waters flow on the earth, then He took a handful in His hand and it was the right hand, then He created them a creation like tiny particles, then He made them witnesses on their own selves: 'Am I not your Lord, and is not My obedience incumbent upon you?' They said: 'Certainly.' Then He said to the fire: 'Be fire', and lo! It became flaming fire; and He said to them: 'Fall down in it'; so some rushed to it, some delayed in rushing to it and some did not leave their place, but then when they felt its heat, they returned, and none of them entered it.

Then He [again] took a handful [the earth] in His hand, and created them a creation like tiny particles like those, then made them witnesses on their own selves as He had done with those others; then He said to them: Fall down into this fire; some of them delayed, some others ran fast and some passed on like twinkling of an eye; so they all fell in it. Then He said: Come out of it safe, so they came out and nothing had afflicted them.

"Then the others said: 'O our Lord! Forgive us; we shall do as they have done.' He said: 'I forgive you.' So some of them ran fast and others did not leave their places, as they had done the first time. So this is the Word of Allãh: and if they were sent back, they would certainly go back to that which they are forbidden, and most surely they are liars." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʿAyyãshī)

The author says: This and the preceding narration are among the traditions of the tiny particles.[13] Its full discussion will come in Sūratu 'l-Aʿrãf (The Elevated Places), under the verse: And when your Lord brought forth from the children of Adam, from their backs, their descendants, and made them bear witness against their own souls: "Am I not your Lord?" They said: "Yes! We bear witness." [7:172]

The gist of it is that as the system of reward and punishment in the next world has full connection with the life before it, i.e., with the life of this world from the perspective of obedience and disobedience, in the same way the obedience and disobedience of this world has full connection with another earlier life, relatively speaking, and that is the world of tiny particles.

So, the Imãm's word in the tradition, "So this is the word of Allãh: And if they were sent back, they would certainly go back..." means that if they were sent back from the courtyard of the gathering place to the world, they would certainly go back to what they had been forbidden, and most surely they are liars right from the world of tiny particles because they spoke lie before Allãh in that world. This is exactly what the Imãm (ʿa.s.)'s word in the first tradition means: and if they were sent back, they would certainly go back to that which they are forbidden, surely they are cursed in origin, i.e., in the world of tiny particles, because they spoke lie in it.

Accordingly, these two traditions contain a fourth way of the verse's explanation, other than the three explanations given earlier.

6. Aʿmash narrates from Abū Ṣãliḥ, from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) that he said about the Divine Word: O our grief for our neglecting it... The people of the Fire will see their places in the garden, then they will say: "O our grief for our neglecting it." (Majmaʿu 'l-bayãn)

* * * * *

[13] Editor's note: ʿĀlamu 'dh-dharr, translated here as 'the tiny particles', refers to the primordial form of existence which was purely spiritual.

COMMENTARY

These verses intend to console the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) against the offensive accusations of the polytheists regarding his mission, and to placate his soul with the promise of definite victory, and to explain that the religious call is based on human free will: whoever wants, he would believe and whoever wants, he would disbelieve; because definite divine power and will do not interfere in it to compel them to accept it; and if Allãh had pleased, He would certainly have gathered them all on guidance.

QUR'ĀN [6:33]: We know indeed that what they say certainly grieves you, but surely they do not call you a liar; but the unjust deny the communications of Allãh: Qad (قَدْ), in its past tense, denotes determination; and, in future tense, denotes diminution, and sometimes it denotes determination also, and this is the meaning intended in this verse. Ḥazana and aḥzana (حَزَنَ ، أَحْزَنَ) both have same meaning: to grieve; and it has been recited in both ways.

His Word: lã yukadhdhibūnaka (لَا يُكَذِّبُونَكَ = 'they do not call you a liar'), with a doubling sign, is also recited with it as lã yukdhibūnaka (لَا يُكْذِبُونَكَ); apparently fa (فَ) in "فَإِنَّهُمْ = but surely they…" is for separating it from the previous sentence. Apparently, the meaning is: 'We know indeed that their talk certainly grieves you, but it should not grieve you, because their denial does not return to you since you do not invite except towards Us, and you have no role in it except to convey the message; rather they are being unjust to Our verses and reject them.'

The content of those four verses gives the meaning of the divine words: And whoever disbelieves let not his disbelief grieve you; to Us is their return, then will We inform them of what they did; surely Allãh is the Knower of what is in the breasts (31:23). Therefore let not their speech grieve you; surely We know what they do in secret and what they do openly (36:76); and other such verses which were revealed for the consolation of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.). This explanation is based on the recital of the term with (nunnation) the doubling sign.

But based on the recital without the doubling sign, it would mean: Don't be grieved because they don't defeat you by proving your lie in what you call them to, and they don't refute your proof with a counter proof. They, in fact, are being unjust to the divine communication by rejecting it, and to Allãh is their return.

Also, His Word: "but the unjust deny the communications of Allãh". The apparent style of speech demanded that it were said: 'but they…' [instead of 'but the unjust…']. Yet the use of the noun in place of pronoun aims at showing that their denial emanates from their injustice, not from ignorance or other shortcomings; it is only based on transgression, rebellion and haughtiness, and Allãh will soon raise them, then they will return to Him [and He will deal with them accordingly]. It is for this reason that the style has changed from first person to the third, and it says, 'the communications of Allãh', instead of 'Our communications', in order to show that this behaviour of theirs is in opposition of the position of divinity, and it is a position that nothing can stand to it.

* * *

The verse has been explained in other ways too:

One: The majority have said that it means: They do not call you a liar as a belief in their hearts; rather they display that denial by their mouths out of obstinacy only.

Two: They do not call you a liar, rather they call Me a liar, because denying you actually return to Me, and you are not an exclusive target for it. This explanation is other than what we have described earlier, although it is near to it. These two interpretations are based on the recital with doubling sign.

Three: They did not find you a liar. [It's like] the Arabs' saying: We fought them and we did not find them cowards.

The true interpretation is what was said earlier.

QUR'ÃN [6:34]: And certainly messengers before you were rejected, but certainly they were patient on being rejected and persecuted until Our help came to them; and there is none to change the words of Allãh, and there has come to you some information about the messengers**:

It guides the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) to the way of the past prophets, and it is the way of exercising patience in the cause of Allãh; and Allãh, the Sublime, has said: These are they whom Allãh guided, therefore follow their guidance (6:90).

And His Word: "until Our help came to them", describe the good result of their patience, and point to the Divine promise of the help. Also, in His Saying: "and there is none to change the Word of Allãh", emphasize the promise mentioned in the preceding speech and solidify

it. It also points to what has been described in 58:21: Allãh has written down: "I will most certainly prevail, I and My messengers;" and in 37: 171-2: And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the messengers: Most surely they shall be the assisted ones.

The phrase: "none to change" in "and there is none to change the Word of Allãh" negates any supposed element of change whether it be from Allãh's side (in the sense that His will changes about a decision by erasing it after having willed it or cancels it after confirming it) or from someone else's side (in the sense that the other overcomes Him and subdues Him to do contrary to what He had wished so that He were to change what He had confirmed and to alter it in one way or another).

It appears from it that these words about which Allãh has said that they are unchangeable things beyond 'the tablet of eraser and affirmation'.[14] So, the word of Allãh, the speech of Allãh and the promise of Allãh in the Qur'ãnic usage mean the definite conclusion which does not accept any change. Allãh says: He said: "The truth then is and the truth do I speak..." (38:84). ...and Allãh speaks the truth; (33:4). Now surely Allãh's promise is true (10:55). Allãh will not fail in (His promise), (39:20). A detailed discussion about the meaning of "Word of Allãh" and similar phrases was given under the verse: ...among them are they to whom Allãh spoke... (2:253).

The words at the end of the verse, "and certainly there has come to you some information about the messengers", affirm and offer the witness for the words, "And certainly messengers before you were rejected." It is possible to infer from it that this chapter was revealed after some Meccan chapters which narrate the stories of the prophets, like the chapters: "ash-Shu'arã'", "Maryam", etc. And definitely these chapters were revealed after the chapters like: "al-'Alaq" and "al-Muddaththir". Therefore, this chapter, "al-An'ãm", falls in the third stratum of the chapters revealed at Mecca before hijrah. And Allãh knows better.

QUR'ÃN [6:35]: And if their turning away is hard on you, then if you can seek an opening (to go down) into the earth or a ladder (to ascend up) to heaven so that you should bring them a sign…:

ar-Rãghib said: "an-Nafaq (اَلنَّفَق = the penetrating path; the tunnel in the earth); Allãh says: 'then if you can seek an opening (to go down) into the earth'; and from it comes the expression 'jerboa's tunnel (nãfiqã'),' and 'the jerboa dug the tunnel.' And from it is the term an-nifãq, and it means entering the religion from one door and going out of it from another door; and accordingly (He) has drawn attention to it with His Word: surely the hypocrites are the transgressors [9:67], i.e. out of the religion; and Allãh has made the hypocrites worse than the disbelievers, when He said: Surely the hypocrites are in the lowest stage of the Fire [4:145]; and nayfaq (the two string holes) of trousers is well-known."

[14] Editor's Note: The table of eraser and affirmation (lawḥu 'l-maḥwi wa 'l-ithbãt) refers to the partial knowledge that Allãh exposes to His angels and selected humans who assume the consequences which are not definitive, and hence the use of terms 'erase' and 'Affirm'. Of course, Allãh knows the final outcome of all issues.

And He said: "as-Sullam (اَلسُّلَّم = ladder) that which is used to ascend high places and it gives hope of safety; then it was made the name of everything which is used to ascend to a high thing like a cause; Allãh says: Or have they the means by which they listen? [52:38]; "…or a ladder (to ascend up) to heaven," [6:35]; and a poet says: "Even if he got the means to ascend to heaven with a ladder".

The reply of the conditional clause in the verse is deleted because it is understood; the implied sentence (as has been said) would be: If you can obtain this and that, then do it.

The 'sign' in the phrase: "so that you should bring them a sign", means a sign that would compel them to believe. The statement: "And if their turning away is hard on you…", is addressed to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) through the way of the Qur'ãn, which is the best divine sign that proves the truthfulness of his mission, and whose miraculous dimension is nearer to their understanding since they [the Arabs] were eloquent and wise. The verse thus means that their turning away should not grieve you and you should not take it hard, because this world is place of free will. Also, the invitation to the truth and its acceptance are based on the path of free will; and that you cannot obtain a sign which would compel them to believe. It is so because Allãh does not want from them a faith except through free will; that is why He has not created a sign which would compel the people to believe and obey. If Allãh had so wished, all the people would have entered into the true faith; and so all these disbelievers would have joined the group which believes in you. So, you should not be worried or concerned at their turning away, lest you be among those who are ignorant of the divine cognition.

Someone has suggested that: "you should bring them a sign" means a sign better than the one We have sent you with, i.e. the Qur'ãn. But it does not agree with the context, and especially the words: and if Allāh had pleased He would certainly have gathered them all on guidance [6:35], as it clearly points to compulsion.

It appears from this that the pleasure here means that Allāh would will for them to be guided to faith in a way that they would be forced to accept it, and this would negate their free will. This is what the apparent context of the noble verse demands.

But Allāh, the Blessed, in other similar verses in His Book has not based negation of His will on necessity of compulsion. As He says: And if We had pleased we would certainly have given to every soul its guidance, but the word (which had gone forth) from Me was just: "I will certainly fill hell with jinn and men together." (32:13). He points with it to His similar statement: He said: "The truth then is and the truth do I speak: That I will most certainly fill hell with you and with those among them who fallow you, all;" (38:84-85). Thus, the Almighty has clarified that the negation of His will about guiding them all is actually based on His will which He decreed when the Satan swore against Him that he will misguide all of them except those of His servants who are purified ones.

And the firm decision has been ascribed in another place to their going astray. Allāh says in the story of Adam and the Satan: He said: "My Lord! Because Thou hast made me stray from the right way, I will certainly make (evil) fair-seeming to them on earth, and I will cause them all to deviate, except Thy servants among them, the devoted ones." He said: "This is a right way with Me. Surely as regards My servants, you have no authority over them except those who follow you of the deviators. And surely hell is the promised place of them all;" (15:39-43). And Satan too does ascribe it to them as Allāh has quoted his talk to them on the Day of Resurrection: And the Satan shall say after the affair is decided: "Surely Allāh promised you the promise of truth, and I gave you promise then failed to keep them to you, and I had no authority over you, except that I called you and you obeyed me, therefore do not blame me but blame yourselves: I cannot be your aider (now) nor can you be my aiders; surely I disbelieved in your associating me (with Allāh) before;" (14:22).

The verses show that sins, including polytheism, lead to man's deviation, and the deviation in its turn ends at the man himself. It is not against what appears from other verses that the man has no will except when Allāh pleases for him to have a will, as He says: Surely this is a reminder, so whoever pleases takes to his Lord a way. And you do not please except that Allāh please (76:29-30). It is naught but a reminder for the worlds, for him among you who pleases to go straight. And you do not please except that Allãh please, the Lord of the worlds (81:27-29).

So, although the will of the man depends on the will of Allãh, the Blessed, in its materialization, yet Allãh, the Blessed, does not affirm any will for the man, except when he becomes ready for it through the goodness of his inner self and is exposed to the divine mercy. Allãh says: "...and guides to Himself those who turn;" (13:27), i.e. to Him. And as for a transgressor, whose heart is deviated, who clings to the earth and is inclined to deviation, Allãh does not wish his guidance nor does He engulf him with His mercy, as He says: He causes many to err by it and many He leads aright by it, but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26). ...but when they turned aside, Allãh made their hearts turn aside... (61:5). And if We had pleased, We would certainly have exalted him thereby; but he clung to the earth and followed his low desire (7:176).

In short, the religious call does not proceed except on the way of free choice; and divine communications do not descend except with consideration of free choice; and Allãh does not guide towards Himself except him who is exposed to His mercy and is ready for His guidance through the path of free will.

With this explanation another difficult problem is solved: We agree that if Allãh were to send a sign which would force them to believe and compel them to accept the religious call, it would be contrary to the basis of the free will on which the structure of religious call stands. However, why it is not possible for Allãh that He should wish belief for all the people, in the same way as He wishes the belief of those who have accepted the faith, so that a sign should come down to lead them to the guidance and cover them in faith, without negating with it their free will and their independence in action.

By looking at the issue per se, although it is possible but it is contrary to the general system in the world of cause and effect, and the system of ability and munificence. Guidance is extended to him, who fears Allãh and purifies his soul, and: he will indeed be successful who purifies it [91:9]; and misguidance is not inflicted upon anyone except on him who turns away from the remembrance of his Lord and corrupts the soul: and he indeed will fail who corrupts it [ibid:10]. Infliction of misguidance means that man is prevented from guidance. Allãh says: Whoever desires this present life, We hasten to him therein what We please for whomsoever We desire, then We assign to him the hell; he shall enter it despised, driven away. And whoever desires the hereafter and strives for it as he aught to strive and he is a believer; (as for) these, their striving shall surely be accepted. All do We aid – these as well as those – out of the bounty of your Lord, and the bounty of your Lord is not confined (17:18-20). So, Allāh aids every soul from His bounty according to what he deserves; if he wants good he is given, and if he wants evil he is given, i.e. he is prevented from good. If Allāh were to wish for every man, be he good or bad, that he should wish good and dedicate himself to faith and piety through free choice, it would have negated the general system and destroyed the issue of the cause and effect.

It is supported by the next verse, i.e., the Word of the Sublime: Only those accept who listen…, which will be explained as follows:

QUR'ĀN [6:36]: Only those accept who listen; and (as to) the dead, Allāh will raise them, then to Him they shall be returned: The verse elaborates what was described in the preceding one: And if their turning away is hard on you, then if you can seek an opening… therefore be not of the ignorant: In short, you have no ability to dissuade them from this turning away, nor can you get for them a sign which would lead them to the faith. So, this verse explains that they are like the dead, they have no perception nor do they hear, so they cannot perceive the meaning of the religious call nor can they hear the invitation of the caller, i.e. the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.).

This huge multitude of the people which we see is of two kinds: One group is alive and they hear, and only those respond positively who do hear. The other group is of the dead ones who do not hear although they appear in the form of the alive ones. These will hear the speech only when Allāh will raise them [in the Hereafter]; and He will certainly raise them and then they will hear what they could not hear in this world, as Allāh describes their condition: And could you but see when the guilty shall hang down their heads before their Lord: "Our Lord! We have seen and we have heard, therefore send us back, we will do good; surely (now) we are certain;" (32:12).

This talk is put forward as an allusion: 'Those who listen' refers to the believers and 'the dead' means those who turn away from accepting the call, be they polytheists or others. In the Divine Speech, believers have been portrayed as enjoying life and hearing, and disbelievers have been described as afflicted with death and deafness, as Allāh says: Is he who was dead, then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth? (6:122). Surely you do not make the dead to hear, and you do not make the deaf to hear the call when they go back retreating. Nor can you be a guide to the blind out of their error; you cannot make to hear (any one) except those who believe in Our communications, so they submit (27:80-81). There are many such verses in the Qur'ãn.

In some previous discourses another meaning for these attributes has been repeatedly given, which the majority of the exegetes have explained as allusion and simile, and that they may be interpreted in their real meaning. So, refer to it.

The verse proves that Allãh will certainly make the unbelievers and the polytheists understand the truth and make them hear His call also in the Hereafter as He made the believers understand and hear His call in this world. So, the man be he a believer or an unbeliever cannot escape from understanding the truth, sooner or later.

TRADITIONS

1. Abu 'l-Jãrūd narrates from Abū Ja'far ('a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) earnestly liked that al-Ḥãrith ibn 'Ãmir ibn Nawfal ibn 'Abd Manãf to accept Islam. He invited him and tried hard to make him a Muslim. But Nawfal was overcome by wretchedness. The Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) felt very much bad about it and so Allãh sent the revelation: And if their turning away is hard on you, then if you can seek an opening into the earth; means a tunnel. (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: This tradition is weak and suffers from missing links in the chain of narration. Moreover, it does not agree with the apparent meaning of a multitude of traditions which show that this chapter was revealed all together. Although it may be interpreted in this way that the above-mentioned cause had appeared before the chapter was revealed, and then this verse pointed to the established cause by the way of application.

And they say: "Why has not a sign been sent down to him from his Lord?" Say: "Surely Allãh is able to send down a sign," but most of them do not know (37). And there is no animal that walks upon the earth or a bird that flies with its two wings but (they are) genera like yourselves; We have not neglected anything in the Book, then to their Lord shall they be gathered (38). And they who reject Our communications are deaf and dumb, in utter darkness; whom Allãh pleases He causes to err, and whom He pleases He puts on the right way (39). Say: "Tell me if the chastisement of Allãh should overtake you or the hour should come upon you, will you call (on others) besides Allãh, if you are truthful? (40). Nay, Him you call upon, so He clears away that for which you pray if He pleases and you forget what you set up (with Him);" (41). And certainly We sent (messengers) to nations before you, then We seized them with distress and affliction in order that they might humble themselves (42). Yet why did they not, when Our punishment came to them, humble themselves? But their hearts hardened and the Satan made what they did fair-seeming to them (43). But when they neglected that with which they had been admonished, We opened for them the doors of all things, until when they rejoiced in what they were given We seized them suddenly; then lo! They were in utter despair (44). So the roots of the people who were unjust were cut off; and all praise is due to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds; (45). Say: "Have you considered that if Allãh takes away your hearing and your sight and sets a seal on your hearts, who is the god besides Allãh that can bring it to you?" See how We repeat the communications, yet they turn away (46). Say: "Have you considered if the chastisement of Allãh should overtake you suddenly or openly, will any be destroyed but the unjust people? (47). And We send not messengers but as announcers of good news and givers of warning; then whoever believes and acts aright, they shall have no fear, nor shall they grieve (48). And (as for) those who reject Our communications, chastisement shall afflict them because they transgressed; (49). Say: "I do not say to you, I have with me the treasures of Allãh, nor do I know the unseen, nor do I say to you that I am an angel; I do not follow aught save that which is revealed to me." Say: "Are the blind and the seeing one alike? Do you not then reflect?" (50). And warn with it those who fear that they shall be gathered to their Lord – there is no guardian for them, nor any intercessor besides Him – that they may guard (against evil), (51). And do not drive away those who call their Lord in the morning and the evening, they desire only His favour; neither are you answerable for any reckoning of theirs, nor are they answerable for any reckoning of yours, so that you should drive them away and thus be of the unjust (52). And thus do we try some of them by others so that they say: "Are these they upon whom Allãh has conferred benefit from among us?" Does not Allãh best know the grateful? (53). And when those who believe in Our communications come to you, say: "Peace be on you, your Lord has ordained mercy on Himself, (so) that if any one of you does evil in ignorance, then turns after that and acts aright, then He is Forgiving, Merciful;" (54). And thus do We make distinct the communications and so that the way of the guilty may become clear (55).

COMMENTARY

The verses offer multifarious arguments against polytheists regarding monotheism and the sign of prophethood.

QUR'ĀN [6:37]: And they say: "Why has not a sign been sent down to him from his Lord?" Say: "Surely Allāh is able to send down a sign, but most of them do not know."

It describes how they prodded for a sign to be sent down with the purpose of showing the inability of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.). When they uttered these words there already was before them the best of signs, i.e., the noble Qur'ān which used to come down to them chapter by chapter and verse after verse and was recited before them from time to time. Thus, it was understood that the sign which they demanded was a sign other than the Qur'ān, and that they did not count it as a satisfactory sign with which their souls would be pleased because of their foolishness and frenzy.

The bias for their deities prompted them to cut themselves off from Almighty Allāh as though He were not their Lord; so they said: "Why has not a sign been sent down to him from his Lord?" They did not say, from our Lord, or, from Allāh or some words like that, so that they may belittle the Holy Prophet's cause and highlight his inability. They meant to say: If what he claims and to what he calls to be truth, then let his Lord, to Whom he calls, stand for him and help him, by sending down on him a sign which would prove the truthfulness of his claim.

Such a demand emanates from them because of their ignorance of two things:

One: The idolaters believed that their deities were independent in those affairs of the world which were ascribed to them even though they claimed that they enjoyed the position of intercession. Thus, the god of war or peace had authority on the affair they managed without being disturbed by another factor. Likewise, there were god of land, god of sea, god of love, god of hate and so on; so nothing remained for Allāh to manage because He has divided all affairs between His helpers, although they were His intercessors and He is the Lord of lords; so Allāh is unable to negate the affair of their deities by sending down a sign which would lead to negation of their divinity.

This assumption of theirs and support for it in their heart was prompted by what they had heard from the Jews of Ḥijāz that the hand of Allāh was fettered, in no way can He alter the existing system, nor can He disturb the common norm of the world of the causes [and effects].

Two: The signs sent down from Allāh, Glory be to Him, if they are among the things which Allāh particularly reserved to one of His messengers (without the people demanding them), then they are the proofs which prove the truthfulness of the messenger's claim (without their being any immediate danger to the people who have been invited [if they don't accept it]); like the staff and the bright hand for Moses, and raising the dead to life, healing the blind and leper and creating the bird for ʻĪsã, and the Noble Qur'ãn for Muḥammad (may Allãh's blessings be on him and his progeny and on the Prophets).

But if the sign was sent on demand of the people, then it is the established system of Allãh to pass judgement about them upon its coming down – if they believed, well and good, but if they persisted in their rejection, chastisement was sent on them and they were given no respite, as was the case with the signs of Nūḥ, Hūd and Ṣãliḥ and others; and there are numerous verses in the Qur'ãn which prove it, as Allãh says: And they say: "Why has not an angel been sent down to him?" And had We sent down an angel, the matter would have certainly been decided and then they would not have been respited (6:8). And nothing could have hindered Us that We should send signs except that the ancients rejected them; and We gave to Thamūd the she-camel – a manifest sign – but on her account they did injustice… (17:59).

And the noble verse, i.e.: And they say: "Why has not a sign been sent down to him from his Lord?" Say: "Surely Allãh is able to send down a sign, but most of them do not know", points to both aspects together.

So, He described that certainly Allãh is able to send down any sign He wished. How was it possible to suppose that the one having the name of Allãh would not have comprehensive power? The name used in the question, "Rabb = Lord" has been changed in this reply to "Allãh" in order that it may indicate the proof of the decision; unrestricted divinity combines all perfection without there being any limit or condition to limit or fetter it; so it has unrestricted power. It was their ignorance of the divine position which exhorted them to demand a sign with intention of showing disability of the Holy Prophet.

Moreover, they did not know that the coming down of a sign that they had demanded was not in favour of their well-being, and their venture to demand it exposed them to the destruction of the whole group and to being completely rooted out. The proof that this meaning was somewhat intended in this speech is found in the Divine Word at the end of these argumentations, Say: "If that which you desire to hasten were with me, the matter would have certainly been decided between you and me; and Allãh best knows the unjust;" (6:58).

The Divine Speech [6:37] contains the words: nazzala (نَـزَّلَ) and yunazzilu (يُـنَـزِّلُ) with intensified pronunciation; it shows that they had demanded a gradual sign, or several signs which would be sent down one after the other; as is seen in other places in the Divine Book where their demand is quoted. For example: And they say: "We will by no means believe in you until you cause a fountain to gush forth from the earth for us, or you should have a garden of palms and grapes…or you should ascend into heaven, and we will not believe in your ascending until you bring down to us a book which we may read;" (17:90-93). And those who do not hope for Our meeting, say: "Why have not angels been sent down upon us, or (why) do we not see our Lord?" (25:21). And those who disbelieve say: "Why has not the Qur'ãn been revealed to him all at once?" (25:32).

Ibn Kathīr is reported to have recited the above-mentioned two verbs without intensified pronunciation.

QUR'ÃN [6:38]: And there is no animal that walks upon the earth or a bird that flies with its two wings but (they are) genera like yourselves; We have not neglected anything in the Book, then to their Lord shall they be gathered:

ad-Dãbbah (اَلدَّابَّة) is every animal which creeps or moves on the earth; it is mostly used for the horse; ad-dabb (الدَّب) and ad-dabīb (الدَّبِيْب) mean soft crawling.

aṭ-Ṭã'ir (اَلطَّائِر) is that which glides in the air with its two wings; its plural is aṭ-ṭayr (اَلطَّيْر) like ar-rãkib (الرَّاكِب) and ar-rakb (اَلرَّكْب). al-ummah (اَلأُمَّـة) is a group of people whom a single purpose unites, like a single religion, one culture, one time or one place; its basic meaning is to intend; they say amma, yaummu (أَمَّ ، يَـؤُمُّ) when he intends something; al-ḥashr (اَلحَشْر) = to gather the people by force for battle, evacuation or other such social matters.

Apparently, description of the bird with the phrase that flies with its two wings stands parallel to the phrase: "that walks upon the earth", describing the animal. In short it means: And there is no earth-bound or aerial animal... Apart from that, this elaborates description and negates suspicion of metaphorical use since 'flying' is mostly used for fast movement, in the same way as 'crawling' is used for light movement; and so it was possible to imagine that flying indicated fast movement as it was put side by side with crawling; this idea was removed by the clause, "that flies with its two wings."

A TALK ON ANIMAL SOCIETIES

The verse is addressed to the people; and it says that animals, be they earth-bound or aerial, are genera like men. It does not mean that they are groups having a multitude of numbers, because ummah is not used for merely great numbers, rather it is used to describe a multitude that is joined by a single comprehensive goal, be it involuntary or voluntary, which its individuals seek to achieve. Nor does ummah here mean that animals of different species are each joined together in a special type of life, sustenance and cohabitation: in procreation, shelter and all affairs of life, because although this amount of commonality is correct to declare that their society resembles that of man, but, the words at the end of the verse, then to their Lord shall they be gathered, show that the resemblance does not mean merely similarity in food, cohabitation and shelter; rather there is another aspect of similarity which makes them similar to man and that is: al-ḥashr, their being gathered to Allãh. And being gathered to Allãh is naught but a type of conscious life, which pushes the man to his felicity and infelicity; it is possible for a man to get in this world delicious food, agreeable marriage tie and flourishing habitation and yet he is not happy in his life because he is afflicted with injustice and iniquity. Or, on the other hand, he is overwhelmed by hardships, distress and afflictions and yet he is happy in his life, delighted with the perfection of humanity and light of servitude.

Rather, the conscious human life, or you may say, the human nature, and what supports it from the prophetic call, has established for man a custom combined of belief and action; if he adopts and follows it and the society agreed with him on it, then he would be happy in both lives: here as well as the Hereafter; and if he adopts it alone, he will be happy with it in the Hereafter or in the world and the Hereafter together. But if he did not act on it and failed to take it wholly or partially then it will result in his wretchedness in this world and the Hereafter.

This system laid down for man is combined in two words: to push for goodness and obedience and to restrain from evil and disobedience; or you may say: to call towards justice and steadfastness, and to forbid injustice and deviation from truth. It is so because man, by his sound nature, likes certain things such as justice for his self or for others, and dislikes certain things such as injustice to himself or to others; then the divine religion supports it and further elaborates its details for him.

This is the gist of what has become clear to us in many preceding discussions, and many Qur'ãnic verses affirm and support it. Like the divine words: And [I swear by] the soul and Him Who made it perfect, then He inspired it to understand what is wrong for it and right for it: He will indeed be successful who purifies it, and he will indeed fail who corrupts it (91-7-10). Mankind was but one people; so Allãh sent the prophets as bearers of good tidings and as warners, and He sent down with them the book with the truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed. And none differed about it but the very people who were given it, after clear signs had come to them, revolting among themselves; whereupon Allãh guided, by His will, those who believed to the truth about which they differed. And Allãh guides whom He pleases to the right path (2:213).

In depth consideration of the behaviour of those dumb animals that interact with man in many affairs of life, and pondering on conditions of a species among them in the progress of its life and living, prove to us that they do have, like man, individual and collective beliefs and opinions on which they base their movements and stillness in endeavouring to continue, similar to a series of beliefs and opinions on which man bases his fluctuations in stages of this world's life.

Thus, an individual among us desires food, marriage, child or other such things, or dislikes injustice, poverty or such other things. So, it appears to him that it is incumbent on him to search for food, or to eat it, or to store it; likewise, to marry, procreate and similar things. Also, he understands that it is forbidden and unlawful to him to tolerate injustice or endure the affliction of poverty, etc. So, he moves or remains still according to the ways these opinions prepare for him.

Likewise, an individual animal, as we observe him, in search of the necessities of its life resorts to systematic movements through which it manoeuvres to fulfil its needs about food, cohabitation and shelter, which leaves no room for doubt that it perceives its needs and understands how it would be fulfilled. Thus, it has opinions and beliefs with which it rises to catch beneficial items and repulse harmful things. Often we find in it various kinds of tricks and devices to get its prey and to be secure from enemy, using individual or collective ways which man has not understood except after spending centuries and eons of his species' life.

The scholars who have researched about animals, have found in many of their species like ant, bee and termite, wonderful traces of civilization and sociology, fine points of manufacturing and subtle aspects of norms and policies which are generally not found except among civilized and developed human groups.

Verily, the noble Qur'ãn has exhorted man to understand the animal world and to ponder on their creation and actions in general, as Allãh says: And in your creation and in what He spreads abroad of animals there are signs for a people that are sure (45:4). It has invited us to minutely observe the affairs of many among them, like the cattle, the bird, the bee and the ant.

These opinions and beliefs on which we find the animals basing their activities, in spite of their differences in the life affairs and goals, are not devoid of the inciting and repelling forces; at the same time they do not lack in appreciation of something and disapproval of some others; nor are they free from the sense of justice or injustice.

This is supported by what we see of the difference among the individuals of any species of animals in its behaviour. How clear difference is found in one horse and another, in one ram and another and in one cock and another, one is hot-tempered while the other is tame and of mild disposition.

It is likewise supported by other minor aspects like love and hate, magnanimity and mercy or hard-heartedness and transgression, etc. which we find between individuals of a species. Indeed we have found its parallels among human individuals, and we have seen it affecting the belief in the goodness and evilness of actions, and justice and injustice in deeds. It also affects man's life in the next world and is the basis of his being gathered and reckoning of his deeds as well as their recompense in form of reward or chastisement in the next life.

Now that our discussion has reached this stage, it might appear to us that the animals too are subject to gathering (al-ḥashr) like that of the human beings. Allãh counts application of justice and injustice, and piety and debauchery on man's deeds as the basis of the gathering and proves it with it, as Allãh says: Shall We treat those who believe and do good like the mischief-makers in the earth? Or shall We make those who are pious like the wicked? (38:28). Rather He counts negation of gathering in what He has created of the heaven, the earth and what is between them, negation of His deed and its turning into play or recklessness, as is seen in the preceding verse: And We did not create the heaven and the earth and what is between them in vain;

that is the opinion of those who disbelieve; then woe to those who disbelieve on account of the Fire (ibid.:27).

Will an animal – other than man – be gathered to Allāh like a man will be? If yes, then is its gathering similar to that of man, that there will be weighing and reckoning of its deeds, after which he will enjoy blessings of the Garden or suffer in the Fire, according to how it discharged its responsibility in the world? Does the establishment of the worldly responsibilities depend on the raising of the messengers and sending down of the law? Is the messenger who is sent to the animal from its own species or from men?

These are the questions coming to the mind at this juncture.

As for the first question: (Is there gathering for an animal other than man?), the end phrase in this verse, then to their Lord shall they be gathered, adequately answers it; and nearer to it is the verse: And when the wild animals are gathered (81:5).

In fact, there are very numerous verses which show that the heavens and the earth will be brought back, as will be the sun, the moon and the stars, also the jinn, stones, idols and all those who were worshipped as partners of Allāh. Add to it the gold and the silver, as they will be heated in the Fire of the hell and will be used to brand the foreheads and sides of those who neglect paying zakāt. There are many verses of this theme, which need not be quoted here; as for the traditions of this theme, they are beyond counting.

As for the second question (Will the animals' gathering be similar to that of man? Will their deeds be brought forth and reckoned, resulting in the blessings or punishment?)

Reply: [The reckoning of deeds and judgement] is the concomitant of the gathering. It means that the individuals will be brought together and driven by force. As for the likes of the heaven and the earth and similar things like the sun, the moon, the stone, etc., the word, gathering (al-ḥashr), has not been used for them. For instance: On the day when the earth shall be changed into a different earth, and the heavens (as well), and they shall come forth before Allāh, the One, the Supreme (14:48). …and the whole earth shall be in His grip on the Day of Resurrection and the heavens rolled up in His right hand… (39:67). And the sun and the moon are brought together (75:9). Surely you and what you worship besides Allāh are the firewood of hell; to it you shall come. Had these been gods, they would not have come to it… (21:98-99)

Moreover, the reason given in the Divine Speech for gathering of the people is to deliver final judgement between them regarding the truth in which they had differed. Allãh says: Surely your Lord will judge between them on the Day of Resurrection concerning that wherein they differ; (32:25). "…then to Me shall be your return, so I will decide between you concerning that in which you differed… (3:55). There are many such verses.

All of this is based on rewarding the good-doer and taking revenge from the unjust for his injustice, as Allãh says: Surely We will give punishment to the guilty (32:22). Therefore do not think Allãh failing in His promise to His messengers; surely Allãh is Mighty, the Lord of Retribution. On the day when the earth shall be changed into a different earth, and the heavens (as well), and they shall come forth before Allãh, the One, the Supreme (14:47-48). These two attributes, i.e., good-doing and injustice are present in the animals' activities to some extent.

This is [also] supported by the apparent meaning of the divine words: And were Allãh to punish men for what they earn, He would not leave on the back of it any creature, but He respites them till an appointed term… (35:45). It evidently means that if injustice of the people caused divine censure it would be because it is injustice; and injustice is widespread among all that is called creature – man and all animals; thus it would mean that Allãh would destroy every creature on the earth – although some have said that 'creature' in this verse particularly means man.

The fact that censure and revenge will cover all animals on the Day of Resurrection, does not mean that animals will be equal to man in perception and will, or that dumb animal will rise up to the rank of man in its psychology and spirituality. Such supposition is rejected evidently, and the effects appearing in animals and man refute it.

And that is because mere commonalty in censure and revenge, or reckoning and recompense between man and animal does not prove that they are equal in all aspects, as it does not prove in even closer commonly between individual men themselves that reckoning of their deeds should be done in the same way as far as its diligence and questioning is concerned: [it cannot be that] a wise man and an idiot or a person of sound mind and a weakened one should be on the same level.

This is in spite the fact that Allãh has described about some animals such fine understanding and sensitive intelligence which is not very far from the level of a man of average knowledge and understanding. Look for example at the ant of Sulaymãn which is quoted as saying: Until when they came to the valley of the ants, an ant said: "O ants! Enter your houses (that) Sulaymãn and his hosts may not crush you while they do not know (27:18), and what He has quoted of the talk of hoopoe to him explaining his absence: "I comprehend that which you do not comprehend and I have brought to you a sure information from Sheba. Surely I found a woman ruling over them, and she has been given abundance and she has a mighty throne. I found her and her people prostrating to the sun instead of Allãh, and the Satan has made their deeds fair seeming to them, and thus turned them from the way, so they do not go aright (27:22-24)..." (to the end of the story). When an intelligent scholar meditates on these verses which demonstrate the understanding and perception from those animals and weighs its importance, he would certainly know that that amount of understanding and awareness depends on a lot of cognition and multifarious perceptions related to simple as well as complicated ideas.

This may be supported by conclusions that the zoologists have reached at based on their extensive studies, including raising different kinds of animals, and they observed their amazing conditions which cannot normally appear except from a being which enjoys sublime will, deep understanding and sharp perception.

Coming to the third and fourth questions: Do animals receive their commandments in the world through a messenger who is sent to them and a revelation which is sent upon him? And is this messenger sent to a species of animals exactly an individual of that species? The fact is that the animal world until now is unknown to us and a curtain is let down before our eyes. Therefore, there is no benefit in getting into such discussions, and there is no outcome except conjecture and guesswork. The Divine Speech apparently does not undertake to explain any aspect of it; and there is nothing in the traditions narrated from the Holy Prophet and the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt, blessing and peace of Allãh be upon them, which could be relied upon regarding this subject.

So, the conclusion is that the animal societies, like the human society, contain the element of divine religion that is nourished from its nature in the same way as the religion gets nourishment from the human nature and prepares it to be gathered towards Allãh, as the natural religion prepares the man for gathering and recompense even though the observation of the animal's condition, compared to that of the man's (and it is supported by the Qur'ãnic verses which describe subjugation of the things to man, and his superiority over animals in general), shows that animals have not been given details of human cognition nor are they subjected to duties of intricate burdens placed upon the man.

* * *

Now, we return to the text of the verse regarding the Sublime's Word: And there is no animal that walks upon the earth nor a bird that flies with its two wings but (they are) genera like yourselves, prove that the animal societies which are found in every species of animals, are indeed based on perceptible common goals to which every species of animals proceed, in spite of their difference in perception and will, just like the man.

This is not confined to the physical goals such as nutrition, growth and procreation which are limited to this world's life, but its jurisdiction continues to the affairs after death and prepares it for another life which is connected to felicity and infelicity nourished from perception and will.

Objection: An objection may be raised here that people generally believe that other than man all kinds of animals are deprived of the gift of free choice and that is why an animal's actions are counted, like that of vegetables, natural and involuntary, since it is observed in its conditions that it cannot resist from doing an action which contains its desired benefit (like cat when it sees a rat or a lion when it sees its prey), and from fleeing when it sees an enemy that it fears (like a rat when it sees a cat and a deer when it sees a lion). Thus there is no meaning of voluntary felicity and infelicity in an animal, other than human beings.

Reply: However, meditation on the meaning of free choice and on psychological conditions the man goes through in doing his voluntary actions removes this objection. The perception and will through which man's voluntary actions are done have been actually bestowed upon man, for example, because he is a conscious species and manages the external elements for utilizing them in continuation of his existence by distinguishing what harms it from what benefits it. That is why the divine grace has equipped it with perception and will; so he distinguishes through his conscious perception between what harms it from what benefits it. When a benefit is established, he wills and does it; so whatever is from the issues that are of clear benefit (and in establishing that it is beneficial, he does not need more than its existence and knowledge about it), he wills to do it at once and manages it without hesitation, as is the case mostly with inborn potentials like the act of breathing.

But those issues whose benefit are not obvious, either because they are marked with defective causes or surrounded by some external or dogmatic snags, then mere knowledge of its existence is not enough for willing to do it since there is no surety of benefiting from it. Pursuing such things depends on contemplation on them, for example, on what their defects, snags are and on meditation so that it may be known whether it is beneficial or harmful. If meditation shows that it is beneficial, the will related to it takes shape and it is done, in the same way as if it were of clear benefit which does not require any meditation.

Let us say, a hungry man finds a food with which he can satisfy his hunger: he may be doubtful about it, whether it is a good food, right for nourishment, or it is bad, putrid, poisoned or containing harmful ingredients? Also, whether it is his own property and [if it is his property], is there a problem in using it (e.g., it has been kept for a future emergency or he may be fasting, etc), or is it someone else's property which he cannot use? Then he will stop from hastening towards it, and will continue contemplating until he becomes sure of one alternative. So, if he decided that it is allowed, it will be counted as beneficial; he will not wait for anything, if he wills he will use and manage it. Also, if he had no doubt about it, and he knew from the beginning that the food was good and right for nourishment, he will proceed to it without contemplation or meditation; the knowledge of its existence will not be separate from the will of using it at all.

In short, the topic of free choice means that when man cannot decide between some things whether they are beneficial or harmful, he distinguishes it through contemplation and meditation, and chooses one of the alternatives. On the other hand, if he is able to distinguish them from the beginning, then he wills it and does it without delay and does not require any contemplation. So, man chooses what he thinks is beneficial to him either with contemplation or without it; and no contemplation is required except for removal of snags in making the decision.

If you look minutely at the condition of the humans who have free will in their actions, you will find a major difference among them on the basis of their choice, i.e., in their spiritual states and psychological conditions such as bravery and cowardice, continence and greed, briskness and laziness, and dignity and brazenness; also in strength of discernment and its weakness, and correctness of thought and its incorrectness. Many are the times a greedy person finds himself under compulsion and deprived of free will in places where he desires whole-hearted involvement in it, while a righteous moral person would not care about. Perhaps a coward would think a slight harm he receives in a great task or fight to be a sufficient excuse for himself to negate his free choice, while a brave self-respecting man does not think of death or any bodily discomfort anything beyond strength, and he will not give any importance to a great calamity in the way of his causes. Sometimes an idiot chooses an alternative based on a simple groundless imagination while a wise man would think of such option as a sport and play. Likewise, actions of indiscriminating children are product of free choice accompanied by some meditation but a sane adult would not care for it even a little. Often in our normal conversations we consider some of our actions based on compulsion or coercion when it is accompanied with some social justifications which, in fact, are not based on reality, for example, a cigarette smoker justifies it as addiction, a sleepy man brings excuse of laziness, and a thief or an embezzler offer excuse of poverty.

It is this obvious difference in elements and causes of free choice and the vast latitude in the level of voluntary actions that has led the religion and all other social customs to define the voluntary action as what the average members of human society consider to be voluntary; and they have based on it the validity of applying the command and the prohibition, the punishment and the reward, and the right of utilization, etc.; and they excuse one who lacks the average ability and understanding through which an average man does voluntary action.

So, this average which is counted as voluntary and negates voluntarism of other actions beyond it, is so according to religious or social decision in which welfare of religion or society is preserved, although from the perspective of nature the boundary of voluntariness is greater than that.

Contemplation on the above discourse makes us sure that the animal, other than man, is not totally deprived of the gift of free choice, although it is weaker than what we find in average humans. And this is based on what we observe in many animals, especially the domesticated ones, the effects of hesitation in some situations which are coupled with some impediments; likewise when they desist from action because of rebuke, threat or training. All this proves that there is in their 'souls' (nafs) the ability to decide to do or not to do an action; and that is the basis of free choice in reality, although contemplation is very weak in them and does not reach the level of what we find in an average human.

And since it is correct that the animal, other than humans, is not totally devoid of free choice even if a weak one, then it will be okay if Almighty Allãh makes the average level of free choice among them as the basis of duties relevant to them that we do not comprehend; or He may deal with them based on the gift of free choice in a different way which we do not understand except that this gift is found in them in a way that it would justify to reward them in case of obedience and to censure and punish them in case of disobedience as Allãh knows it better.

Thus, His, the Sublime's Word: ...We have not neglected anything in the Book..., is a parenthetical clause. Obviously, the item which is the object of neglect is the Book; and the word, anything, refers to the exaggeration with which negligence occurs. The verse means: There is no such thing whose consideration was required, the fulfilment of whose right was obligatory and the description of whose attributes was necessary in the Book but that it has been done without any negligence. And so the Book is perfect and complete.

Now, if 'the Book' refers to the Preserved Tablet – which Allãh has described in several places in His speech as a book which contains the past, the future and the present – then the meaning will be as follows: these generic systems (similar to the humanity's system) are systems upon which divine grace is incumbent; [and it is this grace which makes it incumbent upon Him] to create animals' species so that their creation may not go in vain nor its existence be aimless; and so that these species would not be deprived of the gift of perfection according to their ability of acceptance.

So, the verse, based on this meaning, indicates in particular what the following verses show in general: ...and the bounty of your Lord is not confined (17:20). ...there is no living creature but He holds it by its forelock... (11:56).

But if 'the Book' means the Noble Qur'ãn – and Allãh has named it the book in various places in His speech – the meaning will be as follows: As the Noble Qur'ãn is a book of guidance which guides to the straight path (on the basis of describing the realities of cognizance which had to be explained when leading to the clear truth and pure reality), nothing has been neglected in it in description of all issues on whose knowledge the people's success and happiness depend in their world and the next world, as Allãh says: …and We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything… (16:89).

In order to understand the reality of the Hereafter, it is incumbent upon the people to clearly know the connection between the gathering (to be raised on the Day of Resurrection as a group) and the shaping of nations in this world that they find among themselves and among all animal species. Moreover, many other benefits spring from it, like perspicacity of Allãh's monotheism and His delicate power and His care related to the affairs of the creatures, and the general system prevalent in the universe. Its most important benefit is the cognizance that the existing things hold fast to its chain from defect to perfection; and some links in that chain contain the circles of animals (including man) and below it with different gradual ranks beginning from the lowest grade in vegetable world to the ranks proximate to man and finally the man.

Verily, Allãh, Glory be to Him, has very forcefully invited the people to understand the animals and to look in the signs consigned in their existence; and has counted it as a way of reaching to the best scientific results that are inseparable with the human happiness, and that is certainty of Allãh, the Blessed, as He says: And in your (own) creation and in what He spreads abroad of animals there are signs for a people that are sure; (45:4). There are very many verses in the noble Qur’ãn that exhort on looking into the affairs of animals.

Possibly the verse may point to both meanings: The word "the Book" [in 16:89] may mean book in general; and the meaning will be: Surely Allãh, the Blessed, does not neglect any thing in what He writes: Neither in the Book of creation, as He decides and decrees for every species what it deserves to get of the perfection of existence, like the animals species, for each of which He has prepared the blessings of social groupings, as He has done for man, because He found it capable of it; so He did not neglect anything in its affairs. Nor in His Book which is His speech revealed to the people, because He describes in it in cognizance of which is the good of the people and happiness of their present world and the next, and He does not neglect anything in it; as a result He has not neglected anything in the affairs of the animals' genera. Allãh has described in this verse the reality of what He has gifted to them kind of an existential happiness, which has made them conscious genera which proceeds with its existence to Allãh, gathered towards Him, like the man.

Also, His, the Sublime's Saying: ...then to their Lord shall they be gathered. This verse describes that all of the animals shall be gathered and the life gifted to them is a kind of life which would follow the gathering to Allãh, just as the human life is like that. That is also the reason why He has used the pronouns which are used for those having perception and intelligence; and so He said: then to their Lord shall they be gathered; it indicates that the actual basis [of gathering], i.e., the matter on which pleasure and displeasure, and reward and punishment revolve, is found in them also.

In this verse the pronouns have changed from the third person to the first person plural then again to the third person relating to Allãh. Meditation on it shows that the basic context is of the third person; and the context changed to the first person plural (We have not neglected anything in the Book) because it is a parenthetical clause particularly addressed to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.); and when He finished that statement, the talk returned to the original context.

* * *

A very strange explanation has been given by someone who has tried to prove transmigration of souls from this verse. He claims that the soul of man, when it separates from his body at death, is attached to the body of an animal that is appropriate to it in contemptible characteristics which was deep rooted in his psyche, for example, the soul of a crafty person attaches to a fox's body; and the soul of a mischief-monger spiteful person attaches to the body of a wolf; and the soul of the one who hunts follies of the people and their shameful secrets, attaches to the body of a swine; and the soul of a greedy gluttonous man attaches to a cow's body, and so on; and in this way it goes on changing from one body to another, and being punished in this manner, if it was a wretched one having ugly characteristics. And if it was a blessed soul, it would attach after death to a blessed body that enjoys the bounties of blessings, from better human individuals. According to him the meaning of the verse would be: There are no animals out of these animals but are human nations like you who have changed after death to the forms of animals.

But the explanations given earlier make it clear that the verse is far removed from this interpretation. Besides this, the last clause, then to their Lord shall they be gathered, does not agree with this meaning. Moreover, such utterances are so evidently invalid that there is no benefit in analysing them or discussing about their correctness or incorrectness.

* * *

Similarly, strange is what someone else has said about this verse: That the gathering of animals means their death, so there is no question of they being raised after that; or it may mean combined death and rising up.

But, as for the first meaning, it is negated by the apparent meaning of "to their Lord", because there is no sense in death "to Allãh"; and as for the second meaning, it leads to commitment of what is not necessary, because there is no basis of adding death to raising up in the meaning, nor is there anything in the verse that demands it.

QUR'ÃN [6:39]: And they who reject Our communications are deaf and dumb, in utter darkness; whom Allãh pleases He causes to err, and whom He pleases He puts on the right way**:

The Almighty wants to say that those who reject His communications are deprived of the bounties of hearing, sight and speech, since they are in utter darkness in which eyes do not work, and because of their deafness, they are unable to hear the true word and to respond to it. Also, because of their dumbness, they cannot speak a true word or testify for monotheism and prophethood, and since they are overwhelmed by darkness, they cannot see the way of truth to take it as a path.

As regards His Word, the Sublime: "whom Allãh pleases He causes to err, and whom He pleases He puts on the right way", prove that this deafness, dumbness and falling into utter darkness is the punishment meted out to them as a recompense for their rejecting the communications of Allãh; for Allãh has made the causing of err (attributed to Him) as a sort of a recompense as seen in His Word: but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26).

So, their rejection of the divine communications is not the result of their being deaf, dumb, in utter darkness; rather the opposite is true. Accordingly, 'causing them to err', as used in this place, means making them deaf, dumb, in utter darkness; and 'those whom Allãh pleases them to err', points to those who had rejected His communications.

Conversely, it appears that putting someone on the right way means that Allãh gives him hearing with which he hears, then he responds positively to the Caller to Allãh with his tongue and observes the truth with his sight; and that this is the recompense of him who does not reject the divine communications. So, whomsoever Allãh pleases He causes him to err, and He does not wish to cause anyone to err except he who deserves it; and whomsoever He pleases He puts on the right way, and He does not wish that except for one who exposes himself to His mercy.

We have already discussed the actual meaning of their attributes that Allah has mentioned: deafness, dumbness, blindness and similar adjectives. The verse, however, indicates another fine point which is inferred from joining and separating in the Divine Speech: "deaf and dumb, in utter darkness". Note that 'deafness' (which is one of their attributes) has been mentioned first followed by 'dumbness' (which is the second adjective) with a conjunction 'And' in between them; then it mentions their being 'in utter darkness' (that is the third adjective) without conjunction. In short, it has conjoined some attributes and separated some others; and He has written in a similar verse the meaning separately, i.e. His speech about the hypocrites: Deaf, dumb, blind (2:18); and in another similar verse with conjunction, as He says about disbelievers: Allãh has set a seal upon their hearts and upon their hearing and there is a covering over their eyes… (2:7).

Probably, the fine point indicated in the clause, "deaf and dumb, in utter darkness", is that the deaf ones are other than the dumb ones; the deaf are the ignorant followers who go along with their leaders and that does not leave them with an ear with which they would hear the call of truth; and dumb are the leaders who very well know the correctness of the call to monotheism and negation of polytheism, but they, because of their enmity and transgression, are dumb – their tongues do not move to acknowledge the word of truth or to testify for it. Both groups together are partners in the fact that they both fall in the darkness in which the truth is not seen, nor can a third person show them anything by pointing [out the truth] because they happen to be in utter darkness where pointing [out the truth] is useless.

This idea is supported by the fact that the speech contained in the verses covers both groups as pointed by the Divine Word in the preceding verses: And they prohibit (others) from it and go far away from it… (6:26); and likewise: but most of them do not know (6:37). This concerns the verse under discussion.

As for the verse of the hypocrites, deaf, dumb, blind, the idea is to show that all these attributes are gathered in them at the same time because they are cut off from the mercy of Allãh from all sides. And as for the verse of disbelievers: Allãh has set a seal upon their hearts and upon their hearing and there is a covering over their eyes, the idea behind it is to show that setting a seal upon hearing is separate from setting a seal upon their hearts; as Allãh has quoted them in His Book: And they say: "Our hearts are under coverings from that to which you call us, and there is a heaviness in our ears, and a veil hangs between us and you… (41:5). Sometimes the verse is interpreted in different ways.

QUR'ÃN [6:40-41]: Say: "Tell me if the chastisement of Allãh should overtake you or the hour should come upon you, will you call (on others) besides Allãh, if you are truthful? Nay! Him you call upon, so He clears away that for which you pray if He pleases and you forget what you set up (with Him)."

The word, ara'aytakum (أَرَءَيْتَكُم = tell me), with hamzah of question, and the form of singular masculine past tense from ar-ru'yah (اَلرُّؤيَة = to see), followed by second person plural pronoun – is taken by the people of literature in the meaning of: "Tell me". ar-Rãghib says in al-Mufradãt: "Ara'ayta (أَرَأَيْتَ) runs like, tell me; kãf is added to it and ta is left unchanged in dual, plural and in feminine forms; changes occur on kãf, not ta; Allãh says: 'Tell me, is this he whom…' (17:62); Say: 'Tell me if the chastisement of Allãh…' (6:40)."

This verse in a way renews the argumentation against polytheists, and establishes a proof of invalidity of their polytheism. The argument supposes a premise of a punishment coming from Allãh or coming of the Hour to them, and then it supposes that they will call one who would remove that punishment from them – as has been endowed in the nature of humans, when faced with the hardship, to seek help from one who has power to relieve him of it. Then, [O Prophet!] You should ask them: Who is the one whom you would call upon and whom you would approach with your plea, if you are truthful? Would you call besides Allãh your idols and images whom you have given the names of deities yourselves or would you call Him? Far be it that you would call other than Allãh while you observe that they are governed by creative orders like yourselves, and your calling them would not benefit you at all.

But rather you would forget those partners whom you have named deities; because when calamities surround a man and tremors shake him, then he forgets everything except his own self. However, there is in his soul a hope that the calamity will be removed from him, and the one whom he hopes to remove it is his Lord; so you forget your partners and call upon Him Who will remove it (besides them) and He is Allāh, Great is His name. So, it is Allāh Who removes what you pray for its removal, if He wishes to remove it, and He is not bound to accept the prayer nor is He compelled, rather He has power over everything in all situations.

Now, when Allāh, Glory be to Him, is the powerful Lord Whom man never forgets, even when he forgets everything except his own self, and he is compelled to approach Him, by his natural urge whenever he faces back-breaking hardship, forgetting other partners whom they call gods, then He alone is the Lord of the people, and not the idols.

So, the verse's meaning is as follows: Say: O Muḥammad! Tell me, i.e., inform me if the chastisement of Allāh should overtake you or the Hour should come upon you, in case of coming of the divine chastisement (and the disbelievers do not deny it), and in case of coming of the Hour (and it does not matter if they deny it because it will come), will you then call (on others) besides Allah for its removal – and Allāh has quoted in His speech their plea for removal of chastisement in this world and on the Day of Resurrection all together because it is part of human nature, if you are truthful? And deal with justice. Nay, Him i.e. Allāh and not other than Him of your idols, you call upon, so He clears away that for which you pray, of the chastisement, if He pleases to clear it as He did for the people of Yūnus; and He is not compelled or bound to accept the prayer because of His personal power, and you forget what you set up (with Him), from among idols and images; apart from what is ingrained in the human nature that when tragedies overwhelm him he remains focused with his own self forgetting everything, and he does not think except of his own self because there is not enough space to be involved in what does not benefit him. Thus, his involvement, in this situation, in praying to Allāh and forgetting the idols is clearest proof that He, the Sublime, is the God, there is none to be worshipped other than Him, and there is none to be adored except Him.

It is clear from the above discourse that:

First: Coming of chastisement or of the Hour, and likewise the prayer to remove it are suppositions in the proof of the verse. The idea is to describe that He Who is then called upon is Allāh alone, and not the idols. The prayer itself during hardship and afflictions, and the fact that man by nature approaches Him, Who clears the difficulties when hope of all other helps is cut off, is another proof separate from this one. The aim of this proof mentioned in this verse is monotheism, and that of the other proof is to prove that there is a Maker, without looking at His Unity, although both ideas are concomitants.

Second: The clause, "so he clears away that for which you pray", is qualified with "if He pleases", intends to show the absolute power: The Almighty Allãh has the power to clear away all hardships even the Hour in which there is no doubt. So, although His definite decision for any affair makes it certain to appear, yet it does not nullify His power to leave it; He has unfettered power to do what He has decided upon and what He has not decided; and similar to issue of the Hour, in this respect, is every unpardoned punishment and every definite affair. If He pleases He shall bring it about, and if He does not please He shall not bring it, although He always is pleased with what He has definitely decided and has firmly promised, and Allãh does not break His promise. So understand it.

Thus, He, the Sublime, has power not to respond to the prayer of any one who prays; even though He has mentioned Himself that He is the Responder. He says: And when My servants ask you concerning Me, then verily I am near, I answer the prayer of the suppliant when he calls on Me, (2:186); and He has given definite promise to respond to His suppliant, and has said: Call upon Me, I will answer you… (40:60). It is so because the promise of responding does not deprive Him of the power of not responding, although He always answers the prayer of every one who prays to Him with real prayer; and His custom flows on it – a straight path, in which there is no going back.

From all this appears the incorrectness of the objection raised about this verse that its theme goes against the declarations of the Book and sunnah – the Hour is bound to happen and it will definitely happen, and there is no turning back to the punishment of extermination; as Allãh says: …and the call of the unbelievers is only in error, (40:50).

The basis of its incorrectness is that the verse does not show more than the fact that Allãh does whatever He wishes and He has power over every thing. But whether He actually does wish everything and actually does do everything, the verse does not prove it at all; and there is no doubt that His final decision to bring about the Hour, or to mete to a nation the punishment of termination, does not nullify His power to do its opposite. So, He has power to go against it if He wishes so, although He does not go against the promise and does not break what He wills.

As for the Divine Word: and the call of the unbelievers is only in error, it refers to their prayer in the Hell for removal of its punishment, and easing it from them.[15] It is obvious that such a prayer, with the firm ruling and final judgement, loses its reality since asking that Allãh may not resurrect people or He may not punish the inhabitants of Hell is like asking Him not to be the Almighty God for one of the demands of divinity is that people return back to Him according to their deeds. Such prayers only have the appearance of prayer but are devoid of its true meaning.

If the prayer materializes in its real form in the sense that the person pleas truly and sincerely addressing the prayer to Allãh, such a prayer is indeed not rejected as is obvious from His statement: ...I answer the prayer of the supplicant when he calls on Me... [2:186]; and a prayer in such a form does not leave an unbeliever as an unbeliever, at the least when he does such a prayer, as the Almighty has said: So when they ride in the ships, they call upon Allãh, being sincerely obedient to Him, but when He brings them safe to the land, lo! They associate others (with Him), (29:65).

And so His statement that: ...and the call of the unbelievers is only in error, [40:50], refers to their plea while they were unbelievers; and it is known that the characteristic of disbelief will not separate from them in the abode of recompense [i.e., in the Hereafter] even though it is possible that it may separate from them in the abode of action [i.e., in this world] by repentance and belief.

So, the unbelievers' prayer to relieve them of the chastisement on the Day of Resurrection or in the Hell is like their lie against Allãh on the Day of Resurrection when they say: By Allãh, our Lord, we were not polytheists, [6:23]. No lie will be of any use on that day but since they were used to it in the world and its vice had taken roots in their characters, its effect will manifest on the day when the hidden secrets will come out. Similarly, their food, drink and mutual arguments in the Hell [are manifestations of their character]; they will have no escape from any of it as the Almighty has said: [They] shall be made to drink from a boiling spring. They shall have no food but of thorns, which will neither fatten nor avail against hunger, (88:5-7). Then shall you, O you who err and call it a lie! Most surely eat of a tree of zaqqūm and fill (your) bellies with it; then drink over it of boiling water; and drink as drinks the thirsty camel, (56:51-55). That most surely is the truth: the contending one with another of the Inmates of the Fire, (38:64). These are all examples of the manifestation of their inner character [in the Hereafter].

[15] Editor's Note: The respected translator, al-'Allãmah as-Sayyid Sa'īd al-Akhtar ar-Raḍawī, stopped his pen here on the morning of 20th June 2002, and soon after that he suffered a massive stroke and breathed his last on that Thursday night. May Almighty Allãh elevate his status and bless his soul. Amin!

The previous verse supports what we have said above that the unbelievers' prayer was not based on reality. [This is also confirmed by] the Almighty's statement: And those who are in the Fire shall say to the keepers of Hell: "Call upon your Lord that He may lighten to us one day of the punishment." They shall say: "Did not your messengers come to you with clear arguments?" They shall say: "Yea." They shall say: "Then call." And the call of the unbelievers is only in error, (40:49-50). Indeed, their plea to the wardens of the Hell to ask Allãh on their behalf to lessen the chastisement is an indication that they had no hope in acceptance of their prayer for themselves; and a prayer without any hope of acceptance is not a true prayer and invocation since a prayer cannot be linked to something that is not going to happen at all.

Third: The real meaning of forgetfulness in His statement: "and you forget what you set up (with Him)" is seen in the human condition when he is engulfed with difficulties and mishaps since he focuses on himself and forgets everything else except the Glorified Allãh.

And so there is no need to pay heed to what some [commentators] have said that the meaning of "and you forget what you set up (with Him)", means they turn away from the idols like one who has forgotten them. [There is no need to heed to this interpretation] even though it is plausible since it is a common figurative usage of the term 'forgetfulness' and the Qur'ãn has used 'forgetfulness' in the meaning of turning away from something and not being overtly attentive to it just as He has said: And today, it will be announced: We shall forget you just as you forgot the meeting of this day of yours… (45:34), and other similar verses.

QUR'ÃN [6:42]: And certainly We sent (messengers) to nations before you, then We seized them with distress and affliction in order that they might humble themselves:

"al-ba'sã'" (اَلْبَأسَاءُ), "al-ba's (اَلْبَأسُ)" and "al-bu's (اَلْبُؤس)" means distress and misery; however, al-bu's is mostly used for war and the like, while al-ba's and al-ba'sã' is used for other situations like poverty, drought, famine, etc. "aḍ-Ḍurr (اَلْضُرُّ)" and "aḍ-ḍarrã' (اَلْضَرَّاءُ)" refer to a negative psychological condition such as sadness and ignorance or a negative physical condition such as sickness and loss of limb or some other negative condition such as loss of prestige or wealth. Probably the purpose of combining al-ba'sã' and aḍ-ḍarr' as to prove the materialization of difficulties in the real world like drought, flood and earthquake, and its resulting negative consequences for men such as fear, poverty and shabby condition. And "aḍ-ḍarã'ah (اَلضَرَاعَة)" means depravity and "at-taḍarru' (التَّضَرُّعْ)" means self-abasement and it refers to humility expressed towards Almighty Allãh so that He may relieve them of what has befallen upon them from the afflictions of difficulty and calamity.

In this verse and four verses that follow it, Almighty Allãh describes to His Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) the norm that He uses in dealing with the nations that came before him among whom the messengers came with clear signs. He used to send them, the messengers who would remind them of Allãh's unity and [guide them to] humility and sincerity in returning towards Him; then He would afflict them with a variety of difficulties and misfortune, and seize them with distress and misery only to the extent that it would not force them to implore and not compel them to pray humbly and appease; hopefully they may pray to Him with their own right choice and their hearts may become soft so that they may turn away from satanic temptations and reliance on material causes. But they did not turn in humility towards Him, rather indulgence in worldly matters turned their hearts hard, and the Satan made their evil deeds seem fair to them and made them forget the remembrance of Allãh.

When they forgot the remembrance of Allãh, Glory be to Him, He opened for them the doors of all things and bestowed upon them variety of blessings until they were pleased with what they had of the blessings, and became proud and considered themselves to be entirely self-reliant without Allãh. Thus, Allãh seized them all of a sudden and in a way that they were not aware of it, when they were hopeless of salvation, witnessing the decline of what was with them of the means. So the roots of the people who were unjust were cut off; and all praise is due to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds, [6:45].

This [Divine] norm [of dealing with nations] is known as al-istidrãj (letting the evil doers feel secure with themselves and gradually leading them closer to severe punishment) and disguise which Allãh has summarized in His Word: And (as to) those who reject Our Communications, We draw them near (to destruction) by degrees from whence they know not; and I grant them respite; surely My scheme is effective, (7:182-3).

By contemplating on the explanation of the above-mentioned verse and reflecting on its context, it becomes clear that the verse does not contradict the other verses that say that the human being is naturally disposed to belief in One God based on the demands of his nature and instinct of accepting and heeding to God at the time when he loses hope in the causes of nature as He has said: And when a wave like mountains covers them, they call upon Allãh, being sincere to Him in obedience, but when He brings them safe to the land, some of them follow the middle course; and none denies Our signs but every perfidious, ungrateful one, (31:32).

This is so because the words "al-ba'sã'" and "aḍ-ḍarrã'" in the verse under discussion refers to distress and affliction only to the extent of being distracted from all causes of nature and forget all normal causes; and the proof for this interpretation is His Word: "in order that they might humble themselves", the term "might" is a word of hope, and there can be no hope in case of force and coercion. Similarly, the Word: and the Satan made what they did fair-seeming to them [6:43], prove the same since its apparent meaning is that they were deceived by their evil deeds and sought relief from the distress and affliction through their own actions that they had done and managed by their hands to seek control over the obstacles of life and whatever stands against their way of life. So, they were occupied with the natural causes which kept them away from showing humility towards Allãh and relying upon Him; just as He said: Then when their messengers came to them with clear arguments, they exulted in what they had with them of knowledge, and there beset them that which they used to mock. But when they saw Our punishment, they said: "We believe in Allãh alone and we deny what used to associate with Him." (40:83-84). So, the first verse [of these two verses], as you see, talks about them in the same way as the verse which is under discussion: it talks about abstaining from expressing humility [towards Allãh] and being deceived by their evil deeds. And the second verse talks about the same subject that was discussed in other verses about monotheism in state of distress.

This disproves what one commentator has said that the verse says that the past nations were averse to monotheism and avoided humility [to Allãh] even in hardships that compels [one to turn to seek in distress]. He says: "The Almighty Allãh has sworn to His Messenger (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) that He has indeed sent messengers before him to nations before his community, and that they were more stronger than his community in polytheism and more severe in insisting on injustice while his community used to plea to Allãh alone at times of severe hardship and used to forget the masters and partners [of Allãh] that they had adopted. As for the previous nations, the afflictions did not soften their hearts and did not reform the corruption that Satan had brought about in their nature."

The implication of this interpretation is that monotheism is not a natural phenomenon which manifests when overwhelming whims disappear and natural causes evaporate or it could even negate the basis of nature [for monotheism] all together. Whereas the Almighty has indeed said: Then set your face upright for religion in natural devotion (to truth) the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men… (30:30). So, He has thereby explained that the religion of monotheism is based on nature; and that the nature does not accept any change by a changing element. This is supported by other verses which affirm that when a human being loses hope in material causes, he indeed focuses his attention to his Lord by praying to Him with sincerity in faith. Moreover, acknowledging the One God at time of distress and after disillusion [from all material causes] is a fact found within us as a natural instinct and there is no difference in this matter between the past and present man in anyway.

QUR'ĀN [6:43]: Yet why did they not, when Our punishment came to them, humble themselves? But their hearts hardened and the Satan made what they did fair-seeming to them**:

"Yet why did they not," is used for exclusivity or for negation; in any case, its context conveys the meaning of negation by the virtue of His Word: "But their hearts hardened". Hardening of the heart is opposite of its becoming soft, and it means that the person is no more influenced by witnessing a scene or listening to a statement that normally impacts upon a human.

The meaning of the verse is that they neither humbled themselves when punishment came upon them nor turned to their Lord to express humility; instead their hearts refused to be influenced by it, and they were engaged with their satanic deeds which prevented them from remembering Allãh; they focused on the natural causes that they considered sufficient for improving their situation.

QUR'ĀN [6:44]: But when they neglected that with which they had been admonished, We opened for them the doors of all things, until when they rejoiced in what they were given We seized them suddenly; then lo! They were in utter despair*:

"We opened for them the doors of all things," means giving them all blessings from the worldly riches for which people compete in order to enjoy the preferred life such as wealth, children, physical health, comfort, abundance, security, prestige and power – all this is given in abundance without any restrain or prohibition. This is unlike the situation when a person is given from the treasure of goods with a measure and a limit, then its door is open and he is just given accordingly and therefore it is closed. But when the intent is to give without any restrain, then its door is opened and is not closed at all. The sentence, as seen by its context, conveys the meaning of giving them variety of blessings without any measure.

This is the meaning even though the concept of "opening the door" would be naturally more appropriate for good deeds and blessings whereas evil deeds and misfortunes are entitled to deprival and so "closing of the door" would be more appropriate in that case as can be alluded from His Word: Whatever Allãh grants to men of (His) mercy, there is none to withhold it, and what He withholds there is none to send it forth after that… (35:2).

[The verse under discussion ends with the sentence: ″then lo! They were in utter despair."] And the term "mublisūn:مُبْلِسُون (= those were in utter despair)" is from "ablasa, iblãsan:أَبْلَسَ إبْلاَساً)". ar-Rãghib said: "al-Iblãs means the sadness that manifests out of extreme hopelessness... Since the one in utter despair often adopts silence and forgets what is in his mind, it is said: 'So-and-so was in utter despair [ablasa],' when he is silent and his argument has been exhausted." Based on this, the appropriate meaning of His Word: "then lo! They were in utter despair," would be as follows: 'then lo! They were quite, having exhausted the argument.'

The meaning of the verse would be that when they forgot what they were reminded of or turned away from it, We gave to them every kind of blessing to allure them until when the blessings were completed for them and they became happy with what was given to them, We seized them all of a sudden and smothered their souls – and they didn't have any argument in their support – since they deserved it.

QUR'ÃN [6:45]: So the roots of the people who were unjust were cut off; and all praise is due to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds*: ["Dãbiru 'l-qawm: دَابِرُ الْقَوْم" (= the roots of the people) is from "dubru 'sh-shay:

دُبْرالشَئ" (the back of something).] The "dubr/dubur: دُبْر/دُبُر" of something is opposite of its "qubl/qubul:قُبْل/قُبُل" and both are the rear and front parts of a thing and therefore they are also used to describe the two private organs. Sometimes their usage is expanded and applied to describe the first part or the last part of a thing, separate from its main body. This in turn has brought forth relevant verbs from these two words such as aqbal: أَقْبَل (to move forward) and adbara: أَدْبَرَ (to move backward), qabbala: قَبَّلَ (to kiss) and dabbara: دَبَّرَ (to manage), taqabbala: تَقَبَّلَ (to accept) and tadabbara: تَدَبَّرَ (to reflect), and istaqbala: اِسْتَقْبَلَ (to receive or welcome) and istadbara: اِسْتَدْبَرَ (to turn one's back).

And from this derivation comes the term "dãbir:دَآبِر" (the end, the root) in the meaning of what happens at the end of a thing and follows it; for example, it is said amsu 'd-dãbir: أَمْسُ الدَّابِر (tomorrow that follows), 'ãm qãbil: عَام قَابِل (the year that comes). The word "dãbir" in this meaning is used for what is left behind like "dãbiru 'l-insãn: دَآبِرُ الإِنسَان" referring to one's descendants and other legacies. So, the Almighty's Word: "So the roots of the people who were unjust were cut off," means that total destruction covered them in a way that no trace, whatsoever, of them was left or that they were all destroyed and no one was spared as He has said: Do you then see of them one remaining? (69:8).

Verbalizing the noun (i.e., the roots of the people…were cut off) in place of the pronoun (i.e., they were cut off) was done to highlight the basis of the judgement and that was injustice which ruined them all and cut of their roots. This also paves the way for Allãh's following statement: "and all praise is due to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds!"

The description in this verse of their characteristic of injustice and the Almighty's praise for His Lordship proves that the blame and the calamity of what came upon them in form of devastating punishment stems from themselves since they were the people who committed injustice, and that nothing can be attributable to the Almighty except the good praise since He did not do anything in handling their affair except based on the demands of profound wisdom. Nothing led them to the path of their eventual end except what they themselves liked by their wrong choice, and it was proven that disgrace and evil is for the unbelievers, and truly all praise is due to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds.

QUR'ÃN [6:46]: Say: "Have you considered that if Allãh takes away your hearing and your sight and sets a seal on your hearts, who is the god besides Allãh that can bring it to you?" See how We repeat the communications, yet they turn away*:

Taking away the hearing and the sight means taking away the power of the ears and the eyes, making someone deaf and blind. Setting a seal on the hearts means closing its 'door' in such a way that nothing from outside can enter so that one can reflect upon its affair and distinguish the obligatory deeds from non-obligatory ones or the good and beneficial ones from the evil and harmful ones – in spite of retaining its original characteristic and that is the ability of understanding; otherwise, he will become a lunatic and insane.

Since these polytheists were not giving ear to the true words about Allãh, Glory be to Him, and were not seeing His signs that prove that He is One Who has no partner, hence their hearts become such that nothing from the imports of ears and eyes could enter them so that they may distinguish truth from the falsehood. This is an argument to invalidate the belief of the polytheists regarding Allãh, the Sublime and His Unity.

This argument can be summarized as follows: the belief in partners of Allãh carries within itself its falsity. The belief in partners of God is based on believing in them as intercessors in the sense that they intercede and mediate [between humans and God] to procure benefits and avert harms. If the partners are just intercessors based on this supposition, then Allãh [being the Supreme God] has the ability to do whatever He wants in His Kingdom without anyone preventing or opposing Him. So, if Allãh takes away the power of your hearing and sight, and seals your hearts, He can do that, and no one from the partners ascribed to Him can oppose Him since they are intercessors and intermediaries only, not opponents [of God]. So, if Allãh does so and deprives you of what He takes away from you, then no one can give that back to you because the partners [believed by you] are intercessors and intermediaries only, not the source of creation and invention.

If those partners cannot give you any benefit or avert any harm, then what does it mean to ascribe divinity to them? After all, God is none but One Who can create, destroy and do whatever He likes in the universe. Human nature is compelled to acknowledge that this world has a God by searching for the origin of the occurrences of the good and the evil that it witnesses in the existing world. If something neither harms nor benefits, alongside the occurrences [of the world], then calling it 'God' is nothing but a nonsensical statement.

It does not behove a man with sound mind and discerning ability to accept an image of stone or a wood or a metal (carved by human hands based on his own ideas) as the creator of the world or having ability to create and destroy. Neither can he accept the notion that a god of a species (i.e., an idol) is the God worthy of being worshipped who originated the world without a prior model while he himself is a servant of God nurtured by Him.

This argument can also be presented in a different way: the concept of divinity cannot be applied to a partner of God who is merely an intercessor and an intermediary since being original in creation and invention [which is an essential quality of God] demands freedom in whatever He wants to do and deserves expression of humility from the created and sustained beings. Now, if the supposed intermediary of God has freedom in whatever he wants to do, and then he will be the origin and beginning point of creation and not an intermediary and intercessor. But if he has no freedom in whatever he wants to, then he is just an instrument and a tool, and not an originator and God – this also applies to the material phenomenon wherever they are found since they are nothing more than a tool and an instrument such as eating fulfils the appetite, drinking quenches the thirst, parents bring forth a child, pen creates the images of writing, walking covers the distance, etc.

"See how We repeat the communications, yet they turn away": at-Taṣrīf (اَلتَّصْرِيف) Repeating' means changing them [in different forms] in order to explain them [more easily]; and 'aṣ-ṣudūf (اَلصُدُوف) turn away' means ignoring or discarding. The term ṣadafa, yaṣdafu, ṣadufan, are used when a person turns away from something.

QUR'ÃN [6:47]: Say: "Have you considered if the chastisement of Allãh should overtake you suddenly or openly, will any be destroyed but the unjust people?"

al-Jahrah (اَلْجَهْرَة = openly) means a full exposure [of something] that leaves no room for doubt and therefore it has been used here as a contrast to al-baghtah (اَلْبَغْتَة = suddenly) which means coming of something suddenly in a way that it does not appear upon whom it ascends except after it has come and engulfed him, leaving him no chance of escape.

This verse is a general argument stating that the unjust people are in danger of Allãh's chastisement, a chastisement that will neither miss them nor mistake its intended target; then it clarifies that they are classified as 'unjust' because they deviated from the Islamic call and rejected the communications of Allãh, the Sublime. This is so because chastisement actually means conveying the guilty to what harms and destroys him as a recompense of his crime, and there is no crime without injustice. So, if a chastisement comes to them from Allãh, Glory be to Him, it will not destroy anyone but the unjust. This is the meaning of this verse, and the next two verses specify that unbelievers are the unjust ones.

QUR'ÃN [6:48-49]: And We send not messengers but as announcers of good news and givers of warning; then whoever believes and acts aright, they shall have no fear, nor shall they grieve. And (as for) those who reject Our communications, chastisement shall afflict them because they transgressed**:

These verses state that the unbelievers are the unjust ones and that when Allãh's chastisement comes to them, it harms them only because of their injustice. And that is why Allãh changes the thread of the conversation by addressing the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) directly so that he will be the one who informs them about the chastisement and so that it would be more decisive in cutting off the excuse. The first person pronoun has been used to emphasize that this statement comes from the divine arena of glory and greatness.

The summary of this section is that the Almighty has commanded His Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) to present the argument to the unbelievers that if Allãh's chastisement comes to them, it will not destroy anyone but the unjust ones among them. Then He says to His Messenger: We are giving you the argument about coming chastisement; We are informing you that Our plan to send the Messengers is for the purpose of giving good tidings and warning: so whoever believes and does good, there will be no [chastisement] upon him but one, whoever rejects Our verses, he will be touched by Our chastisement because of his deviation and straying away from the path of submission. Therefore, they should reflect about themselves to see among which of the two groups they belong to.

In previous discourses, we have fully explained the meaning of belief (īmãn), doing good (iṣlãḥ), and deviation and sins (fisq), and also the meaning of negating fear and sadness from the believers.

QUR'ÃN [6:50]: Say: "I do not say to you, I have with me the treasures of Allãh, nor do I know the unseen, nor do I say to you that I am an angel; I do not follow aught save that which is revealed to me." Say: "Are the blind and the seeing one alike? Do you not then reflect?"

Perhaps the meaning of "the treasures of Allāh" is ["the treasures of mercy"] as He has mentioned: Say: "If you control the treasures of the mercy of my Lord, then you would withhold (them) from fear of spending…" (17:100). The impact of the "treasures of mercy" has been disclosed in His Word: Whatever Allāh grants to men of (His) mercy, there is none to withhold it… (35:2). So, the mercy of Allāh exists in abundance in the sense that it emanates from Him upon things bestowing them their existence and the effects of their existence. Thus, He, the Sublime, has clarified this by His Word: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it, 'Be,' and it is, (36:82). The source of this abundant mercy is His Word: "Be" which emanates from the divine arena of glory and greatness. This is also reflected by what He has said in another verse: And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure, (15:21).

So, the meaning of "the treasures of Allāh" is the station from which He bestows from it whatever He wishes without anything diminishing [in the treasures] by bestowing of neither existence nor anything making Him incapable by weakness or greatness [of task]. This is reserved for Allāh, Glory be to Him; whereas anyone else, whatever and whoever he may be, is limited and whatever is with him is fixed so that when he gives something from it, it will diminish to that extent; and a person with such limitations cannot make a poor free from need or fulfil the request of a petitioner or answer the plea of a supplicant.

As His Word: "nor do I know the unseen" [uttered by the Holy Prophet] refers to the knowledge of the unseen which is independent of Divine revelation. Whereas his knowledge [of the unseen] based on revelation is confirmed in the following sentence in this same verse: "I do not follow aught save that which is revealed to me." So, He has clarified in various place that some of the revelation sent to the messengers consist of the knowledge of the unseen as seen in the following verses: The Knower of the unseen! So He does not reveal His secrets to any, except to him whom He chooses of an apostle… (72:26-27); and His Word in the story of Yūsuf: This is of the tidings of the unseen (which) We reveal to you, and you were not with them when they resolved upon their affair, and they were devising plans, (12:102); and His Word in the story of Maryam: This is of the tidings of the unseen which We reveal to you; and you were not with them when they cast their pens (to decide) which of them should have Maryam in his charge, and you were not with them when they contended one with another, (3:44); and His Word after the story of Nūḥ: These are of the tidings of the unseen which We reveal to you, you did not know them – (neither) you nor your people – before this… (11:49).

So, the purpose of denying the knowledge of the unseen refers to denial of the state in which he is naturally equipped in his existence with an ability that does not conceal for him things that humans cannot normally know from the secret matters whatever it may be.

As for His Word: "nor do I say to you that I am an angel" intend to deny the angelic nature [of the Holy Prophet] since the angels are devoid of the needs of physical life such as food, drink, marriage and its attachments. This has been mentioned in other places also such as: Say: "I am only a mortal like you; it is revealed to me…" (18:110). The sentence under discussion here consisting of denial of the angelic nature [of the Holy Prophet] without proving his humanity is in response to the unbelievers' bewilderment about the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) in their saying like: "What sort of Apostle is this that he eats food and goes about in the marts…?" (25:7).

It appears that this verse (that contains denial after denial) is a response to what the unbelievers were suggesting to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) in demanding miraculous signs and objecting to his activities which were similar to those of normal humans as can be seen in their statement quoted by the Almighty: And they say:" What sort of Apostle is this that he eats food and goes about in the marts; why has not an angel been sent down to him, so that he should have been a warner with him?" Or, (Why is not) a treasure be thrown down to him, or he should have a garden from which he may eat?" (25:7-8). Similarly: And they say: "We will by no means believe in you until you cause a spring to gush forth from the earth for us. Or you should have a garden of palms and grapes in the midst of which you should cause rivers to flow forth, gushing out. Or you should cause the heaven to come down upon us in pieces as you think, or bring Allãh and the angels face to face (with us). Or you should have a house of gold, or you should ascend into heaven, and we will never believe in your ascending until you bring down to us a book which we may read." Say: "Glory be to my Lord; am I aught but a human messenger?" (17:90-93); …Still they will shake their heads at you and say: "When will it be?" (17:51); They ask you about the hour, when will be it taking place? (7:187).

So, the meaning of this verse: "Say: 'I do not say to you…'" is that in my call to you and in conveying the message to you, I have not claimed anything more than what I am – a mortal human being – so why are you blaming me and forcing me to accept your suggestions? I didn't claim that I have the divine treasures so that you may demand of me to bring forth rivers or create gardens or a house made of ornaments! I didn't claim that I know the unseen so that I may answer to you everything that is hidden under the veils of unseen such as the time of the Hour! I didn't claim that I am an angel so that you may defame me and reject my statements by my eating food and walking in the market to buy things!

The Sublime's Word: "'I do not follow aught save that which is revealed to me,'" clarifies the truth of the Holy Prophet's claim after rejecting what they had expected from his claim of messengership of Allãh to them. So, the claim that "I am the Messenger of Allãh to you" does not mean that 'I have with me the treasures of Allãh, nor do I know the unseen, nor do I say to you that I am an angel; rather the reality is that Allãh reveals unto me whatever He wants to reveal.'

This statement is not presented in form of a claim; rather it says: 'I do not follow aught save that which is revealed to me' in order to prove that he is commanded to convey what is revealed unto him; in other words, conveying the revelation means following it. It is as if when he said: 'I do not say this or that,' it was asked: 'If this is the case and you are a human like us and weak like one of us without any superiority over us, then what do you want from us?' And so he responds: 'I do not follow aught save that which is revealed to me: to give you good tidings [if you follow] and warn you [of chastisement if you disobey], and to call you to the religion of monotheism.'

The proof of this explanation is in the next sentence of the verse: Say: "Are the blind and the seeing one alike? Do you not then reflect?" The context of this sentence explains to us the following: 'Even though I am same as you in humanity and dependency, that does not prevent me from calling you to follow me since my Lord has blessed me with the insight by means of what He reveals to me and not to you; and so you and me are like the blind and the seeing who are not alike in this matter even if they are same in humanity.' Reflection in this difference between the two guides a person to the conclusion that the blind must follow the seeing and the ignorant must follow the learned.

QUR'ÃN [6:51]: And warn with it those who fear that they shall be gathered to their Lord – there is no guardian for them, nor any intercessor besides Him – that they may guard (against evil):

The pronoun "with it" in "warn with it those" refers to the Qur'ãn as seen in the previous sentence: "I do not follow aught save that which is revealed to me." And the statement: "there is no guardian for them, nor any intercessor besides Him" indicates their circumstances which are the outcome of their fear or they being gathered on the Day of Resurrection.

"Fear" here refers to its common meaning and not to knowledge or realization since there is no such indication in the context. And the command to especially warn those who fear that they will be gathered to their Lord on the judgement day does not negate the general warning covering them and others as indicated in an earlier verse: "... and this Qur'ãn has been revealed to me that I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches..." (6:19). Since 'the fear of being gathered to their Lord' helps their souls in accepting [the message] and brings their minds closer to the call, the command of warning has been specified for them; and they have been described in this way in order to emphasize the call for them and to urge the Holy Prophet that he should not neglect their issue and not consider them like others, instead he should pay more attention in the call to them because their position [based on the fear] is closer to the truth and there is hope in their belief. So, this verse, along with other verses related to the general warning, conveys the following meaning: Warn the people in general and especially those who fear of being gathered to their Lord.

And His Word: "there is no guardian for them, nor any intercessor besides Him" is total negation of the power of other than Allãh as well as the authority of intercession. However, the general import of this verse is qualified by other verses such as: ...who is he that can intercede with Him but by His Permission? (2:255); ...and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves... (21:28); And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession but he who bears witness of the truth and they know, (43:86).

This specific verse, however, has not been qualified because it addresses the idolaters who believed in the power of the idols and their intercession, and they didn't believe that their power was dependent upon the permission or approval of Allãh. Whereas the belief in the power and the intercession based on Allãh's permission, depends on its knowledge and that knowledge depends on revelation and prophet-hood, but they did not believe in prophethood. On the contrary, the power and the intercession that they ascribed to their idols was believed by them to be part of their essential nature which did not depend on Allãh's permission; as if they were powerful in their existence which had the inherit ability to do whatever they wished regarding the weak ones without any permission from Allãh, Glory be to Him! In other words, creation of powerful beings inherently carries the 'Authorization' to exercise power over those who are under them.

In short, the verse says: "there is no guardian for them, nor any intercessor besides Him," and does not include 'except by His permission' because the idolaters indeed believed that the idols were absolute guardians and intercessors – so the unconditional rejection of any guardian and intercessor besides Allãh stands parallel to their belief of affirming [guardianship and intercession] for them. As for adding the exception to this general statement, although it is conceptually valid (as it has occurred in various places in His Speech), it is not appropriate in this place.

So, it is clear from the above discussion that the verse, in its unconditional form, commands [the Holy Prophet] to warn everyone who has the fear in his heart of being gathered to Lord when they are reminded of Allãh's verses, no matter whether he is from those who believe in being gathered (like the believers from among the People of the Book) or from those who don't believe in it (like the idolaters and others) who doubt its occurrence but its fear engulfs their souls with its possibility – for the fear of something whose occurrence is possible can indeed materialize even if one is not sure about it.

There is a difference in opinion among the commentators about this verse: One says that the verse was revealed regarding the believers in being gathered and those are the ones addressed in the following verse: And do not drive away those who call their Lord in the morning and the evening… Another says that it was revealed regarding a group of polytheists' idolaters who believed in being resurrected after death. This is so even though there is no proof that any of the Meccans or Arab polytheists of the era of revelation held this view and in spite of the fact that verses of this chapter address the polytheists of Quraysh or Arab! Yet another commentator says that it is addressed to everyone who believes in being gathered in the hereafter no matter whether he is a Muslim or from the People of the Book, and that the command of warning is related to the believers in specific (even though the obligation of warning is for all people) because the argument is more compelling upon them since they confess to the resurrection.

This verse, however, has only described them in context of the fear of being gathered; and the fear of a thing does not depend on absolute knowledge of its occurrence or on belief in its occurrence, rather it depends on doubt (i.e., the probability of equal proportions with varying degrees of preference) just like fear that is based on knowledge. This is obvious.

So, the verse, indeed, urges the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) to warn anyone in whom he finds the signs of fear, from whatever group he may be, because the foundation of the religious call is based on being gathered to the Lord and being held accountable for the bad and good deeds, and be recompensed accordingly. And the minimum impact of the religious call would be on a person who considers the gathering [of judgement day] a possibility and so fears it; and the higher the possibility of its occurrence, the higher would be the level of fear and stronger the impact [of accepting] the call – until he acquires conviction about it and totally negates it opposite, and thereafter emerges the total acceptance.

QUR'ÃN [6:52]: And do not drive away those who call their Lord in the morning and the evening, they desire only His favour; neither are you answerable for any reckoning of theirs, nor are they answerable for any reckoning of yours, so that you should drive them away and thus be of the unjust*:

The context of this verse is that the polytheists from the Holy Prophet's tribe proposed to him that he should push away the [socially] weak believers and so, Allãh, Glory be to Him, forbade him from it in this verse. This is supported by the next verse: And thus do We try some of them by others…

This proposal of theirs is similar to what was proposed by the aristocrats of the past nations to their prophets that they should push away from themselves the weak and poor believers out of arrogance and haughtiness. While describing the people of Nūḥ and his arguments, Allãh, the Sublime, narrates the proposal of his people similar to the verses under discussion: And the chiefs of those who disbelieved from among his people said: "We do not consider you but a mortal like ourselves and we do not see any have followed you but those who are the meanest of us at first thought and we do not see in you any excellence over us; nay, we deem you liars." He said: "O my people!

Tell me if I have with me clear proof from my Lord, and He has granted me mercy from Himself and it has been made obscure to you; shall we constrain you to (accept) it while you are averse from it… I am not going to drive away those who believe; surely they shall meet their Lord… and I do not say to you that I have treasures of Allãh; and I do not know the unseen, nor do I say that I am an angel; nor do I say about those whom your eyes hold in mean estimation (that) Allãh will never grant them (any) good – Allãh knows best what is in their souls – for then most surely I should be of the unjust." (11:27-31).

Comparing these verses with the verse under discussion shows that those who call their Lord in the morning and the evening and desire His favour are the believers; and their call in the morning and the evening – and that is their ritual prayer or their general plea to their Lord – has been mentioned as a proof of their unadulterated link to their Lord, and as a way of explaining the statement in the next verse: Does not Allãh best know the grateful?

The word 'wajh (pl. wujūh)' in "they desire only His wajh" means Allãh's face. [It has been translated here as "His favour".] ar-Rãghib in his Mufradãt says: "The wajh in reality is a bodily part as He says: And wash your faces (wujūh) and hands, [5:6]. And the fire shall cover their faces, [13:50]. And since the wajh is the first part that faces you and the most noble part of the visible body, it is used to describe the front, the most noble and the first part of everything; and therefore it is said: 'wajh of so-and-so' and 'wajh of the day' [in the meaning of beginning of the day].

"Sometimes it is used to indicate the person himself as it can be seen in the Divine Word: [Everyone on it must perish] but the face of your Lord (the Master of glory and honour) will endure forever [55:26-27]. It is said that 'the face' means His Person; it is also said that it means paying attention to Allãh through good deeds.

"He has said: Wherever you turn there shall be Allãh's face [2:115]; Everything will perish except His face [28:88]; they desire only Allãh's face [30:38]; Verily we feed you for Allãh's face [76:9]. It is said that in all these cases, the wajh is superfluous [and it means His Person] and so the verse means everything will perish except Him, and similarly in other examples. It has been narrated that this meaning was mentioned to Abū ʿAbdillãh ibn ar-Riḍã who responded by saying: 'Glorified be Allãh! They have uttered a gruesome statement. Wajh actually means the one who is approached in that direction and so the verse means: everything from the deeds of the people will perish [i.e., be null and void] except what was done for the sake of Allãh; and this is the meaning of other verses also.' And so the meaning of 'they desire only His wajh' is that they desire only Allãh's pleasure or favour."

I say that the transformation in usage of 'wajh' from its literal meaning of a bodily part to a wider meaning of whatever one faces of a thing is no doubt a common transformation of words in their meanings. However, a serious consideration in this does not allow the word 'wajh' to be used in the meaning of 'person'. So, a thing, whatever it may be, indeed faces something else with what is apparent of its qualities and names, and it's the attributes and names that are perceived by an individual [and not the person itself which is an inner reality]. We come to know something through one of its attributes or its names, and then through them we reach to its person without actually perceiving its person directly.

Indeed, we gain knowledge of things first through the means of senses which perceive only the visible qualities (of shapes, lines and forms, etc.) and not their actual essence. From the result of this perception of the senses, we are lead [through the intellect] to the realization of the actual essences which are foundation of the non-essential attributes and related qualities which depend on the essences that protect them. So, when we say, "The person of Zayd," it means the person to whom the visible qualities and attributes of Zayd are referred to in the way we relate our qualities and attributes to ourselves. So, knowing the actual persons is an intellectual perception which always takes place through a kind of deduction by analogy and process of linkage.

If knowing the essential person or essence through a complete intellectual perception is not possible except by help of its attributes and effects using deduction by analogy, then the issue of [knowing] Allãh, Glory be to Him – whose essence has no limit nor is His existence finite – is most clearly and obviously beyond our full comprehension. Perception of a thing does not occur except if it has a limit and so there can be no hope in comprehensive knowledge of the Almighty as He has said: And the faces shall be humbled before the Living, the Self-subsistent God… (20:111); and He knows what is before them and what is behind them, while they do not comprehend Him in knowledge, (ibid:110).

So, the wajh of a thing is what is faced by others; and its direction, i.e., the point of reference, is also the wajh just like the face is to human when faced by others. With this consideration, the good deeds become wajh of Allãh just as the evil deeds become wajh of the Satan. This meaning of wajh can be applied in verses like: ...who seek Allãh's pleasure... [30:38]; "We feed you only for the sake of Allãh..." [76:9], etc. Similarly, the attributes through which Allãh, Glory be to Him, 'faces' the creatures [are His wajh] like mercy, creation, sustenance, guidance and other similar ones from the attributes of action as well as some of the attributes of His Person through which we know Him – to the extent that we can know Him – like life, knowledge and power. All these are the Almighty's wajh by which He 'faces' His creation and through which they turn to Him as can be seen in an implied or explicit form in the verse: But the face of your Lord (the master of glory and honour) will endure forever, (55:27). From the looks of it, the word: the master of glory and honour is an attribute of 'face' and not 'your Lord.' Reflect and ponder on this.

Since it is correct to say that 'the direction of Almighty Allãh' is His wajh, then it is generally correct to say that whatever is linked to the Almighty in the way of proximity – like His names, attributes and religion; and like the good deeds – as well as whoever is found in the precinct of His proximity – like the prophets, angels, martyrs and all the forgiven believers – are all the Almighty's wajh.

This clarifies, firstly, the meaning of His Word, Glory be to Him: ...and what is with Allãh is enduring... (16:96); and those who are with Him are not too proud to serve Him... (21:19); those who are with your Lord are not too proud to serve Him and they glorify Him... (7:206); and His Word about one who was killed in Allãh's way: ...nay, they are alive (and) are provided sustenance from their Lord. (3:169); And there is not a thing but with Us are its treasures... (15:21). Along with the first verse in this paragraph, these verses prove that all these entities are everlasting by the Almighty's ever-lasting nature; destruction and perdition cannot touch them. He also says: ...everything is perishable but His wajh... (28:88). This verse proves that those issues are the wajh of Allãh, Glory be to Him; in other words, all those issues happen to be in the direction of the Almighty, they are comfortably established by His side and in His direction.

Secondly, the point of reference for mans intention towards His Lord is His wajh as He says: ...seeking the grace and pleasure from their Lord... (5:2); ...to seek mercy from your Lord... (17:28); ...and seek means of nearness to Him... (5:35) – these are all wajh of Allãh because the attributes of His Action such as mercy, pleasure, grace and etc. are from His wajh. Similarly, the 'way' of the Almighty is from His wajh as mentioned earlier: ...except to seek Allãh's pleasure ... (2:272).

Also, His Word: "neither are you answerable for any reckoning of theirs, nor are they answerable for any reckoning of yours." al-Ḥisãb (اَلْحِسَاب = reckoning) means using the numbers to add or subtract, etc. Since examining the deeds and evaluating them to fulfil the recompense or to get result and etc. cannot normally be done without using numbers to add or subtract, this is known as reckoning of the deeds.

If the reckoning of the deeds is to fulfil the recompense, and the recompense is indeed from Allãh, Glory be to Him, so the reckoning is upon Allãh, the Sublime, i.e., in His jurisdiction and ability as He has said: Their account is only with my Lord... (26:113); Then surely upon Us is the taking of their account (88:26); and then He reverses the focus by saying that: ...surely Allãh takes account of all things (4:86), to prove that His, the Sublime's power and control over everything.

Based on this, the statement that 'the Prophet is neither answerable for their reckoning nor are they answerable for his reckoning' means: it is not upon him to take account of their deeds in order to recompense them so that he may drive them away from himself if he is not pleased with their behaviour and dislikes their company. On the other hand, it is not upon them to take account of his deeds so that he may drive them away out of fear of scrutiny by them or their punishment or their dislike of him out of arrogance and haughtiness. Consequently, the two sentences: "neither are you answerable…" and "nor are they answerable…" are independent statements.

It could also be said that the verse: "neither are you answerable for any reckoning of theirs…" means that he will not carry the burden of their reckoned deeds that may be overbearing for him; and this is based on the thought that a deed becomes a burden on its doer or on one who becomes responsible for it. So, it would mean that nothing of the weight of their deeds is upon you. Consequently, the statement "nor are they answerable for any reckoning of yours" – it is superfluous since the statement is complete without it – is actually just to complete the other side of the equation and emphasize the implication of the speech.

It can also be said that both sentences "neither are you answerable for any reckoning of theirs" and "nor are they answerable for any reckoning of yours" indicate the lack of any connection between the Holy Prophet and them as far as the reckoning of deeds is concerned.

It is also said that the reckoning in this verse refers to the reckoning of the sustenance and not the deeds, and so the meaning will be: you are not answerable for reckoning of their sustenance; it is Allãh who sustains them and upon Him is the reckoning of their sustenance. And the statement "nor are they answerable for any reckoning of yours" [is superfluous and] has just come to emphasize the implication of the speech as mentioned earlier.

Although it is possible to explain the last two interpretations, but the preferred view is the first one mentioned earlier.

Also, His word: "so that you should drive them away and thus be of the unjust." Being included in the group of the unjust people is dependent upon driving them away that is, driving away those who call their Lord.

The sequence of the speech, in its normal form, demands that the sentence: "and thus be of the unjust" should have followed the first sentence: "And do not drive away those who call their Lord in the morning and the evening, they desire only His favour." But since the speech became prolonged because of interjection of sentences between the first and the last, the phrase: 'drive away' was repeated again as a predicate for the sentence: "and thus be of the unjust" in order to establish the connection and remove any ambiguity. So, no objection can be raised that the speech: "and thus be of the unjust" is predicated upon itself (i.e., 'And do not drive away those who call their Lord so that you should drive them away') since repeating the phrase 'drive away' again has been done to link the statement: "and thus be of the unjust" to the first sentence as you already know.

QUR'ÃN [6:53]: And thus do We try some of them by others so that they say: "Are these they upon whom Allãh has conferred benefit from among us?" Does not Allãh best know the grateful?

[Fatannã = 'We try' is from] al-fitnah (اَلفِتْنَة) which means test and trial. The context proves that the question: "Are these they upon whom Allãh has conferred benefit from among us?" is for mocking and ridiculing since it is known that the polytheists used to deride only those whom they regarded as contemptible and underrated their status in society; and this was done only because of their poverty, humbleness and low esteem in eyes of the aristocracy of Mecca.

So, Allãh, Glory be to Him, informs His Messenger that this variance and difference [between the people] was actually a divine test by which the people are tested so that the ungrateful ones can be distinguished from the grateful ones. So, the ungrateful and arrogant people say about the poor believers: "Are these they upon whom Allãh has conferred benefit from among us?" Verily the social norms of the people are based on the standards of nobility and baseness that they have established themselves; similarly, a deed is evaluated according to the social standing of its doer. Therefore, the norm adopted by the poor, the humble and the slave is underrated by the rich and the powerful; and so a deed accomplished by a poor or a speech uttered by a slave or a prisoner is not worth of any attention by those who own wealth and power.

So, the act of embracing the faith by the poor, the labourers, and the slaves [on the one hand], and the Prophet's consideration for them and association with them [on the other hand] by itself became kind of a proof, in the eyes of the arrogant and tyrant class of the society, of the insignificance of the faith and that it is unworthy of any attention by the notable and powerful ones.

His Word: "Does not Allãh best know the grateful?" is a response to the polytheists' ridicule based on what they considered to be unlikely: "Are these they upon whom Allãh has conferred benefit from among us?" It means that the believers were grateful to Allãh and not the polytheists, and therefore He preferred the former for His favour [of Islam] and kept the latter back. The Almighty has implied that verily Allãh best knows those who are grateful for His favour; and it is obvious that the Benefactor indeed favours and blesses one who is thankful for His blessing. And Allãh has named confirmation of His Unity and negation of a partner from Him as gratefulness while describing the statement of Yūsuf ('a.s.): ...it beseems us not that we should associate aught with Allãh; this is by Allãh's grace upon us and on mankind, but most people do not give thanks, (12:38).

The verse clarifies that the polytheists, out of their ignorance, based honour and power on being advanced in the vanities of this world – wealth, children and status – while these have no value in Allãh's eyes and no honour. The reality [of honour] revolves around the quality of gratefulness and true benefit, and that is the Divine Authority.

QUR'ÃN [6:54]: And when those who believe in Our communications come to you, say: "Peace be on you, your Lord has ordained mercy on Himself, (so) that if any one of you does evil in ignorance, then turns after that and acts aright, then He is Forgiving, Merciful."**:

The meaning of "as-salām = peace" has already been explained earlier. The meaning of "kataba = writing" mercy on Himself is that He has ordained mercy upon Himself in the sense that it is impossible to separate the description of mercy from His actions. "Aṣlaḥa = acts aright" is from al-iṣlāḥ which means to be covered with goodness; grammatically it is an intransitive verb even if in reality it may be transitive. Its meaning is reforming the self or amending the deed.

Its connection to the previous verse is clear. Here Allāh, Glory be to Him commands His Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) – after forbidding him from driving the believers away from himself – to be kind to them, to greet them, and to give good tidings of Allāh's forgiveness and mercy to those among them who had repented a sincere repentance for a sin, so that their souls may be delighted and the inconsistency of their heart beats may calm down.

The verse clarifies the followings:

Firstly, the verse – and it is from the verses of repentance – is related to repentance from sins and misdeeds, and not from unbelief and polytheism. This is based on His Word: "if any one of you does evil," i.e., from those who believe in Allāh's verses.

Secondly, the ignorance in "if any one of you does evil in ignorance" means the opposite of disbelief and obstinacy which are done on purpose and not out of ignorance. Verily one who calls his Lord in the morning and the evening, seeking His favour, and is believer in Allāh's verses does not disobey the Sublime out of arrogance and pride, rather out of ignorance which overcomes him as a result of following his desire or anger.

Thirdly, linking "turns [in repentance]" with "acts aright" is to prove that 'turning in repentance' can only happen with 'Acting aright' since the reality of returning to Allāh and seeking refuge in His proximity, with its pure status, does not combine with filth of sins from which the repenting person cleanses himself. Repentance is not just saying: 'I return [in repentance] to Allāh,' which does not move from the tongue to the heart as High be He Exalted has said: ...and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it, Allāh will call you to account for it... (2:284).

Fourthly, Allāh's attributes of actions like All-Forgiving and All-Merciful can be rightly tied to a time. Even though Allāh, Glory be to Him has ordained mercy upon Himself but He does not manifest it nor implements its impact except when a servant of His commits a sin out of ignorance and then after repents and acts aright.

A relevant discussion on this theme has already passed under the commentary of: Repentance with Allãh is only for those who do evil in ignorance, then turn (to Allãh) soon, so these it is to whom Allãh turns (mercifully), and Allãh is All-knowing, Wise. And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds, until when death comes to one of them, he says, "Surely, now I repent"; nor (for) those who die while they are unbelievers… (4:17-18) in volume four of this book.[16]

QUR'ÃN [6:55]: And thus do We make distinct the communications and so that the way of the guilty may become clear: By looking at the context: "We make distinct the communications" means explaining the Divine Knowledge, and purifying it from ambiguity and fusion.

And the "la = so that" in "so that the way of the guilty may become clear" indicates the purpose; and it is connected to an implied statement which has not been written out of deference and greatness of its meaning – and this is common in the Allãh's speech such as: …and We bring these days to men by turns, and that Allãh may know those who believe… (3:140), and: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and so that he might be of those who are sure, (6:76).

So, the meaning of the verse is that: This is how We explain and clarify the various sections of the Divine Knowledge, and remove whatever ambiguity has come upon it for important objectives; and one of those objectives is to identify the path of the guilty ones so that those who believe in Our verses may avoid it. Based on this: "the way of the guilty" means the path that the guilty ones traverse upon – against the verses that talk about Allãh's Unity and its related true knowledge – and it is the path of disbelief, obstinacy, turning away from divine verses, and ungratefulness.

It has been said that the meaning of "the way of the guilty" means the path that has been adapted regarding the guilty ones; that is, Allãh's attitude towards them of cursing them in this world, and implementing an evil reckoning and painful chastisement upon them in the hereafter.

However, the first meaning is more preferable by looking at the context of the verses of this chapter.

TRADITIONS

1. al-Kulaynī, based on the unconnected chain of narration, quotes al-Imãm ar-Riḍã (ʻa.s.) who said: "Verily, Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, did not make our Holy Prophet die until He had completed for him the religion. He sent down upon him the Qur'ãn in which is clarification for everything, in it He clarified what is permissible as well as forbidden, and the penal code as well as the rules, and all that is required for the people. Allãh, the Glorified, said: We have not neglected anything in the Book." (al-Kãfī)

2. ʻAlī ibn Ibrãhīm al-Qummī narrates from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad who narrated from Jaʻfar ibn Muḥammad who narrates from Kathīr ibn ʻAyyãsh who narrates from Abu 'l-Jārūd from Abū Jaʻfar [al-Bãqir] (ʻa.s.) about the verse: And they who reject Our communications are deaf and dumb, he (ʻa.s.) said: "Deaf from the guidance; dumb who cannot speak anything good; in utter darkness means in the darkness of unbelief; whom Allãh pleases He causes to err, and whom He pleases He puts on the right way – this is the rejection of the Qadariyyah of this ummah whom Allãh will raise on the Day of Resurrection with the Sabaens, the Christians and the Magians, and thereupon they will say: 'Our Lord, we were not polytheists,' Allãh shall say: See how they lied against their own souls, and that which they forged did pass away from them."

The he [ʻa.s.] further said: "The Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.aʻa.w.a.) said: 'Verily, every ummah has [a group like] Magians; and the Magians of this ummah are those who say: "There is no Divine Decree (al-qadr);" and they assume that the will and power is related to them and for them.'" (at-Tafsīr)

While quoting this ḥadīth, the author of al-Burhãn says: "In another copy of the tafsīr of ʻAlī ibn Ibrãhīm, this ḥadīth says: 'He [i.e., the Holy Prophet] said: "Verily, every ummah has [a group like] Magians; and the Magians of this ummah are those who say: 'There is no Divine Decree;' and they assume that the will and power is neither for them nor against them." And in a third copy, it says that: 'They said: "There is no Divine Decree;" and they assume that the will and power is neither towards them nor for them.'" (Tafsīru 'l-burhãn)

The author says: The issue of Divine Decree is from the issues that was discussed during the early era [of Islam]; a group rejected al-qadr – which means the Will of Allãh, Glory be to Him, has a partial connection to the actions of humans – and they proved independent will and power for humans in their actions and that they are the independent creators of their actions. They have been named as al-Qadariyyah, the theologians who discuss the Divine Decree (al-qadr). Both sects, [the Shī'ahs and the Sunnīs] have narrated from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) that he said: "The Qadariyyah are the Magians of this ummah." The application of the term "Magians" on them is obvious since they believe that the human actions has a creator, i.e., the human being, and there is a creator for all other things, i.e., Allãh, Glory be to Him; and this is the belief of the Dualists, (the Magians,) in two gods: the creator of the good and the creator of the evil.

There are other narrations from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) and the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt ('a.s.) which explain the narration as above, and prove that there is Divine Decree and Allãh's Will has an impact in the actions of His servants as the Qur'ãn has proved.

The Mu'tazilah theological sect – and they deny the Divine Decree – has interpreted the narration by saying that the Qadariyyah relate the good and the evil all to a non-human creator. Some discussion on this subject has already occurred and its full discussion, God willing, will come in the future.

It is clear from what we have discussed that reconciling between the view that there is no Divine Decree [in human actions] and the view that humans don't have any will or power [of their own] in reconciling mutually incompatible views since the former proves total independence of humans in their actions while the latter negates their will and power.

So, what exists in the two versions of the narration as a reconciliation of the view (that there is no Divine Decree) and the view (that humans have no will and power) is indeed the result of distortion done by a scribe for whom the meaning was confusing and so he retained the words "no Divine Decree" but changed the rest of the narration.

3. as-Suyūṭī has quoted from Aḥmad, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, aṭ-Ṭabrãnī in al-Kabīr, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh, and al-Bayhaqī in ash-Shu'ab from 'Uqbah ibn 'Ãmir from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) who said: "If you see Allãh giving [material blessings] to a servant in this world while he is still engrossed in his sins, that he loves, then that is indeed istidrãj (luring someone into destruction)." Then the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) recited the verse: But when they neglected that which they had been admonished, We opened for them the doors of all things, until when they rejoiced in what they were given We seized them suddenly; then lo! They were in utter despair [6:44] and the verse after it. (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

4. as-Suyūṭī has quoted from Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh from ʻIbãdah ibn aṣ-Ṣãmit who said that the Allãh's Messenger (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) said: "Verily when Allãh, the Blessed, the Sublime, intends continuation and growth of a community, He blesses them with abstinence and thrift; and when He intends a community to perish, He opens for them or opens upon them the door of deceit until when they rejoiced in what they were given We seized them suddenly; then lo! They were in utter despair. So the roots of the people who were unjust were cut off; and all praise is due to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

5. as-Suyūṭī has quoted Ibnu 'l-Mundhir from Jaʻfar who said: "Allãh revealed to Dãwūd: 'Fear me in all situations; and you should be most worried when blessings accumulate on you so that I shouldn't throw you down at that moment, then I will not look at you.'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: His Word: "I shouldn't throw you down" is a negative form intending to warn; and His Word: "and then I will not look at you" is connected to the earlier negative verb.

6. In the commentary of the verse: Say: "Have you considered if the chastisement of Allãh should overtake you…" ʻAlī ibn Ibrãhīm al-Qummī says: "This was revealed when the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) immigrated to Medina and his companions were afflicted with hardship, illness and sickness. So, they complained about it to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) and Allãh then revealed: Say [to them, 'O Muḥammad!] Have you considered if the chastisement of Allãh should overtake you suddenly or openly, will any be destroyed but the unjust people?' It means that you will not be afflicted with anything but hardship and loss in this world whereas the painful punishment in which is perdition shall be inflicted only on the unjust people." (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: This narration, besides its weakness [in chain of narrators], contradicts what has been copiously described that this sūrah of "al-Anʻãm" was revealed in Mecca all together and the content of the verse [under discussion] does not fit with the story [narrated above], and the context provided for its interpretation seems far from the style of the Qur'ãn.

7. aṭ-Ṭabrisī under the verse: And warn with it those who fear that they shall be gathered to their Lord – there is no guardian for them, nor any intercessor besides Him – that they may guard (against evil), says that aṣ-Ṣãdiq (ʻa.s.) said: "Warn through the Qur'ãn those who fear meeting their Lord [on the Day of Judgement] so that you may entice them for what is with Him; for verily the Qur'ãn is an intercessor whose intercession will be accepted for them." (Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn)

The author says: The ḥadīth apparently is linking the pronoun in "دُوْنِهٖ = besides Him" to the Qur'ãn [and so it would be "...besides it"], and that is a correct meaning even though the Qur'ãn has not been described as "a guardian" in the Qur'ãn itself just as it has been named as "an Imãm".

8. as-Suyūṭī quotes from Aḥmad, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, aṭ-Ṭabarãnī, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh, and Abū Nuʻaym in al-Ḥilyah from ʻAbdullãh ibn Masʻūd who said: "Some prominent Qurayshī individuals passed by the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) while Ṣuhayb, ʻAmmãr, Bilãl, Khabbãb, and other poor Muslims like them were with him. So, they said: 'O Muḥammad, are you satisfied with these people from your community? Are these they upon whom Allãh has conferred benefit from among us? Are we supposed to be followers of these people? Drive them away from yourself, and once you have driven them away, we may follow you.' So, Allãh revealed about them: And warn with it those who fear that they shall be gathered to their Lord…" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: aṭ-Ṭabrisī has also narrated this in Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn from ath-Thaʻlabī through his chain of narrators from ʻAbdullãh ibn Masʻūd in a shorter form.

9. as-Suyūṭī quotes from Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir from ʻIkrimah who said that ʻUtba ibn Rabīʻah, Shaybah ibn Rabīʻah, Qarẓah ibn ʻAbd ʻAmr ibn Nawfal, al-Ḥãrith ibn ʻÃmir ibn Nawfal and Mutʻim ibn ʻUdayy ibn al-Khiyãr ibn Nawfal from among the nobles of the unbelievers from [descendants of] ʻAbd Manãf went to Abū Ṭãlib and said: "If your nephew drives away from us those low ones – and they indeed are our slaves and servants – that will create a great [respect] for him in our hearts, make us more amenable to him, and bring us closer to accept him and follow him."

Abū Ṭãlib mentioned that to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.). ʻUmar [ibn al-Khaṭṭãb who was in that gathering] said: "I wish you, O Allãh's Messenger, would do that, so that we can see whether they really intend to do what they are saying, and what way do they go." So, Allãh revealed: And warn with it those who fear that they shall be gathered to their Lord – to His Word – Does not Allãh best know the grateful?

ʻIkrimah continues: "And those [slaves who had accepted Islam] were Bilãl, ʻAmmãr ibn Yãsir, Sãlim (slave of Abū Ḥudhayfah) and Subḥ (slave of Usayd); and from among the ḥulafã'[17] were Ibn Masʻūd, al-Miqdãd ibn ʻAmr, Wãqid ibn ʻAbdullãh al-Ḥanẓalī, ʻAmr ibn ʻAbd ʻUmar, Dhu 'sh-Shimãlayn, Murthid ibn Abī Murthid and others like them.

"The verse: And thus do We try some of them by others was about the Qurayshī leaders of the unbelief, the slaves and those allied to the Quraysh. When this verse was revealed, 'Umar came forward and apologized for his earlier statement; and so Allãh revealed and when those who believe in Our communications come to you…" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

10. as-Suyūṭī quotes from Abū Shaybah, Ibn Mãjah, Abū Yaʻlã, Abū Nuʻaym in al-Ḥilyah; and Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh, al-Bayhaqī in ad-Dalã'il from Khabbãb who said:

"al-Aqra' ibn Ḥãbis at-Tamīmī and ʻUyaynah ibn Ḥaṣīn al-Fazãrī found the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) with Bilãl, Ṣuhayb, ʻAmmãr, and Khabbãb among the people who were socially weak believers. When they saw them around him, they derided them. Then they came to the Holy Prophet alone and said: 'We want you to appoint a [distinct] place for us with you so that the Arab may know our superiority since delegations of the Arab will soon come to you and we will be embarrassed if they see us sitting with those low status people. So, when we come to you, remove them from your gathering, and once we have left, you may sit with them if you wish.' He said, 'Okay.' They said, 'Then write for us a document binding you to it.' He asked for a paper and called ʻAlī to write the document while we were sitting in one corner.

"That is when Jibrīl came down with this verse: And do not drive away those who call their Lord in the morning and the evening – to His Word – say: 'Peace be on you, your Lord has ordained mercy on Himself…' The Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) threw away the paper from his hand and he called us; so we came to him while he was saying: 'Peace be on you, your Lord has ordained mercy on Himself.' So, we used to sit with him, and whenever he wanted to stand up to go, he would stand up and leave us. Then Allãh revealed: And with- hold yourself with those who call on their Lord morning and evening desiring His goodwill…" Khabbãb continues: "So, the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) would sit with us thereafter and when the time came for him to get up, we would leave him so that he may go." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: aṭ-Ṭabrisī has narrated this in Majmaʿu 'l-bayãn from Salmãn [al-Fãrisī] and Khabbãb; and there are other narrations similar to the last three narrations. However, by looking back at the numerous narrations at the beginning of this sūrah which prove that this sūrah was revealed all together and also by contemplating on the context of the verses, there is no doubt that these narrations are surely like what we have termed as 'Application' [of verses to events] in the sense that the companions found the content of some verses applicable to some events which took place during the Holy Prophet's time and so considered those events as occasions of revelation of the verse; and not in the sense that the verse was revealed all by itself because of that event in order to clarify matters about it. It is applied to the event in the sense that the doubts about that event were removed in light of that verse just as doubts in other similar circumstances were also clarified in its light as we see in the three narrations about the revelation of the verse: And do not drive away those who call their Lord. The purpose of the verse is same but the stories are different even though they are similar: it seems that the elite of Mecca came to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) and proposed time and again that he push the socially weak Muslims away from himself and that at each time some of the socially weak Muslims were present. The content of the verse has affinity with these or some of the suggestions of the Meccans.

This is how the companions used to describe the reasons for revelation of the verses in form of stories or events that had occurred during the Holy Prophet's time which have kind of a relevance to the contents of the holy verses without the verse actually having any connection to the particular story or event that was narrated. Then with the spread of the trend of quoting aḥãdīth based on meaning [rather than verbatim] and wide circulation of this trend created a delusion that the verses were revealed for those specific events to the extent of becoming the exclusive reasons [for their revelation].

So, there is no reliance on such kinds of aḥãdīth narrated on the occasion of revelation, especially in the examples of this sūrah which is among those revealed all together. The most that these aḥãdīth can do is to show a kind of connection of [the theme of] the verses to the events which occurred during the time of the Holy Prophet in particular with the spread of fabrication and interpolation in these narrations as well as their weakness, and leniency of the early scholars in accepting and quoting them.

11. as-Suyūṭī in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr quotes from az-Zubayr ibn Bakãr in Akhbãru 'l-Madīnah from ʻUmar ibn ʻAbudillãh Ibnu 'l-Muhãjir that the verse [6:52] was revealed when some people proposed to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) to drive away the weak ones from Aṣḥãbu 'ṣ-Ṣuffah[18] from himself, similar to the story [mentioned earlier]. This narration is considered weak based on the fact that the sūrah was revealed all together and that also in Mecca before the immigration.

12. al-ʻAyyãshī quotes from Abū ʻAmr az-Zubayrī from Abū ʻAbdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] (ʻa.s.) who said: "Allãh showers mercy upon someone who repented to Allãh before death. Verily repentance purifies the abomination of the sin and prevents from misery of perdition. Allãh has made the mercy a duty upon Himself for His righteous servants as He has said: '...your Lord has ordained mercy on Himself, (so) that if any one of you does evil in ignorance, then turns after that and acts aright, then He is Forgiving, Merciful.' " (at-Tafsīr)

13. as-Sayyid Hãshim al-Baḥrãnī, in al-Burhãn, quotes from ʻAbdullãh ibn al-ʻAbbãs that the verse: And when those who believe in Our communications come to you ... was revealed about ʻAlī, Ḥamzah and Zayd [ibn Ḥãrithah]. (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: There are many narrations which say that the verses previous to it were revealed about the enemies of the Ahlu 'l-Bayt (ʻa.s.). Apparently, all these narrations are based on flow and application [of a verse on its best examples] or based on the esoteric meaning since the revelation of the sūrah in Mecca all together prevents one from considering these narrations as the occasions of revelation (asbãbu 'n-nuzūl); and, therefore, we refrained from quoting them. And Allãh knows the best.

COMMENTARY

These verses are the closing arguments against the polytheists in favour of monotheism and other related themes of prophethood and resurrection; and they form a single well-connected narrative.

QUR'ÃN [6:56]: Say: "I am forbidden to serve those whom you call upon besides Allah." Say: "I do not follow your low desires, for then indeed I should have gone astray and I should not be of those who go aright."

It is a command to the Holy Prophet that he should inform the polytheists about the prohibition that has come upon him regarding worshipping their gods. It is an implied way of conveying the prohibition about worshipping them.

The next sentence: "Say: 'I do not follow your low desires,'" explains the basis of prohibition since worshipping the idols would be following the low desires, and he has been forbidden from doing so. Then the verse: "'for then indeed I should have gone astray and I should not be of those who go aright,'" indicates the reason for not following the low desires: doing so would be misguidance and separation from the group of rightly-guided ones, those who are known by the quality of accepting Allãh's guidance and are recognized by it. Following the low desires negates the continuity of guidance in the person's soul and prevents the light of monotheism from illuminating his heart, an illumination that is constant and beneficial.

These words form a summary of a complete and rationalized statement for prohibition or avoidance of worshipping their idols. It means that worshipping them would be following the low desires, and following low desires is misguidance and separation from the ranks of those guided aright by Divine guidance.

QUR'ĀN [6:57]: Say: "Surely I have manifest proof from my Lord and you call it a lie; I have not with me that which you would hasten; the judgment is only Allāh's; He relates the truth and He is the best of separators (between truth and falsehood)."* al-Bayyinah (اَلْبَيِّنَة) means 'the manifest proof' and it is from al-bayān (اَلْبَيَان) which means 'clarity'. The original meaning of this word is separation of a thing from another in such a way that they do not join or mix. From al-bayān is derived al-bayn, al-bawn, al-baynūnah, etc. al-Bayyinah (the manifest proof) is known as bayyinah because the truth is separated from the falsehood; and so it becomes clear and it becomes easy to identify it without any difficulty and effort.

The pronoun 'it' in "and you call it a lie" refers to the Qur'ān; and the apparent context demands that the lie be related to the manifest proof that is with the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.), and this is supported by next sentence: "I have not with me that which you would hasten…" By considering this latter sentence, the meaning of the verse is as follows: One of the manifest proofs by which Allāh has supported my messengership is the Qur'ān that you have rejected; and what you are demanding from me and asking to hasten one of the signs [i.e., the punishment] is not in my control nor is its decision delegated to me. Consequently, there is no point of agreement between us since I have been given [the Qur'ān as a sign] that you do not want and you demand that what I have not been given.

It is clear from the above that the pronoun in "and you call it a lie" refers to the manifest proof which is contained in the Qur'ān. And verily the statement: "I have not with me that which you would hasten …" means implicitly denying any control over what they would like to hasten. What a human mostly controls (especially in case of giving and bestowing) are things that are with him or at least stored with him and under his control, and then he gives out from it whatever he wishes. Therefore, the meaning of "I have not with me" is denial of control and power in the style of denying the consequence by denying the cause.

His statement "the judgment is only Allāh's…" explains the reason for denial and that is why it has occurred in negative form. [Its literal translation would be: "the judgement is not but of Allãh".] Moreover, the exceptional clause ['only'] denotes the exclusivity of the matter to prove that the negation is universal in the sense that no one but the Almighty Allãh has the judgment and it depends on Him only.

A TALK ON THE MEANING OF JUDGEMENT AND THAT IT BELONGS TO ALLÃH ONLY

al-Ḥukm (اَلْحُكْم) denotes kind of formation by which various elements [of an entity] are smoothly joined, and its gaps and cracks filled so that it does not break up into sections and does not scatter into parts in a way that its impact is weakened and its perimeters are diminished. That basic meaning connects its various derivatives such as al-iḥkãm (to solidify s.t.), at-taḥkīm (to strengthen s.t.), al-ḥikmah (wisdom), al-ḥukūmah (governance), etc.

Man has realized the materialization of this meaning in civic duties and rights that exist in society; so when the rulers and leaders command an issue, they are actually imposing the duty upon the subordinates and tying it to them in a knot that cannot be undone, a binding from which they cannot free themselves. Similarly between the owner of a property and the property itself, and between someone who has a right in a matter and the matter itself there is a kind of connection that prevents others from interfering between the person and his property or his right, and consequently prevents their encroach-ment. So, when a person disputes with the owner of a property about its ownership by claiming it for himself or with a person who has a right by denying his right, he has actually sought to loosen the con-nection and weaken the link between the two. And when the arbiter or the judge to whom the case was presented gives the property or the right to one of two claimants, he makes a judgement (ḥukm), in other words he actually creates a firm link after its weakness and a strong connection after its feebleness. When the judge says, "The ownership of the property is for so-and-so or the right is of so-and-so," this becomes the judgement that ends the basis of dispute and disagreement; and no one can interfere between the owner and the property or between the person and his right. In short, the ruler in his command and the judge in his judgement create the connection between the two sides and remove any weakness and barrier in between – and this is known as al-ḥukm.

This is how the people came to perceive the meaning of al-ḥukm in conventional man-made issues; then they realized that its meaning could also be applied to issues pertaining to the actual creation when related to the fate and Divine Decree. For example, the seed will develop in the earth and then flourishes as a trunk and branches with leaves and fruits; or, for example, the sperm-drop changes into a body with life and feelings, etc. This all happens because of Allãh's ḥukm and decree. This is what we derive from the meaning of al-ḥukm: establishing [a link or a right] of one thing to another or establishing a co-relation of one thing with something else.

The concept of monotheism (tawḥīd), which is the foundation of the teachings of the Noble Qur'ãn, proves that the actual impact in the universe emanates solely from Almighty Allãh who has no partner. Of course, the Qur'ãn relates this relationship of the Divine to the process of creation of the universe in different ways depending on the variety of situations, and not in one single style: you will notice that sometimes He links issue of creation to Himself and at other times He links it to other things differently. [This is not only in the matter of creation,] similarly, when it comes to other attributes like knowledge, power, life, will, sustenance, and beauty, the Qur'ãn sometimes relates these qualities to the Divine exclusively and sometimes to others.

Since the actual impact emanates from Allãh, the Divine ḥukm – which is kind of an impact and creation of the Almighty – is also the same, whether it pertains to the actual world of creation or to conventional realm of laws. The Qur'ãn confirms this meaning [of ḥukm] in the following verses: ...the judgement is only Allãh's... (6:57; 12:67); ...now surely His is the judgement... (6:62); ...All praise is due to Him in this (life) and the hereafter, and His is the judgement... (28:70); ...And Allãh pronounces a judgement – there is no repeller of His decree... (13:41). If anyone else than Almighty Allãh had a ḥukm, it was necessary for him to demonstrate it and contradict the Divine Will. He also says: ...so judgement belongs to Allãh, the High, the Great; (40:12). These verses, specifically or generally, prove the creative will (al-ḥukmu 't-takwīnī) exclusively for the Almighty. [This was about the realm of existence and creation.]

When it comes to the legislative will (al-ḥukmu 't-tashrī'ī) and its exclusively for the Almighty, it can be proven by the following verse: ...judgement is only Allãh's; He has commanded that you shall not worship aught but Him; this is the right religion... (12:40). The earlier verses also apparently prove that the ḥukm, will, is exclusively for the Almighty and no one is part of it. However, Allãh sometimes relates the ḥukm, especially the legislative will, to others in His words such as: ...as two just persons among you shall judge... (5:95); and in His statement to Dãwūd ('a.s.): "O Dãwūd! Surely We have made you a vicegerent in the land; so judge between men with justice..." (38:26); and in His statement to the Holy (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.): And that you should judge between them by what Allãh has revealed... (5:49); ...therefore judge between by what Allãh has revealed... (5:48); ...with it the prophets... judged... (5:44), and other similar verses. Placing these verses alongside the first group of verses shows that the ḥukm, will, originally and primarily belongs to Almighty Allãh; and that others are not independent in this matter and if any will exists for them, it is by His permission and on a secondary basis. Therefore, Allãh considers Himself as the best and the most excellent of judges since originally, independently and primarily judgement belongs to Him. He said: Is not Allãh the best of the Judges? (95:8) and …and He is the best of the Judges; (7:87).

As you can observe from the above, the verses that link the ḥukm to other than Allãh (of course, with His permission and consent) are confined to the conventional matters; but when it comes to the command of creation, as far as I can recall, there is no such attribution to other than Him. Nonetheless, the attribution of the meanings of the general qualities and actions of God to other than Him (with His will and consent) – such as knowledge, power, life, creation, sustenance, giving-life, will, etc. – can be seen in many verses which we don't need to quote here.[19]

This difference in attribution perhaps was in deference to the sanctity of Almighty Allãh by portraying His qualities with independence that cannot be attributed to the secondary causes. Divine will and decree in matters of actual creation is such; and its examples can be seen in the terms like al-Badī' (اَلْبَدِيْع = the originator) and al-Fãṭir (اَلْفَاطِر = the creator), and other words that follow their pattern in portraying kind of an exclusivity in their meanings; and their attribution to other than Allãh is avoided out of deference to the sanctity of Divinity.

[19] For example, where qualities and actions of Allãh have been attributed, with His will, to others, the reader may refer to the following verses: 32:11 (act of giving death is attributed to the angel); 3:49 (act of creation and knowledge of the unseen is attributed to Prophet 'Īsã); 2:255 (a general statement about access to the knowledge of the unseen with Allãh's permission); 2:260 (act of creation attributed to Prophet Ibrãhīm, 'A.s.). (tr.)

Let us return to where we were about the commentary of the verse: "…the judgment is only Allãh's…" The meaning of al-ḥukm (command, judgement) here is the Divine Decree in the matters of creation. This sentence explains the negative statement that has occurred before it: "I have not with me that which you would hasten". And so the meaning within its proper context is that creative command belongs to Allãh only and it is not for me to judge between you and I – that is what you are seeking to be hastened by asking of me to bring upon a sign (i.e., the punishment).

Based on this, the sentence: "I have not with me that which you would hasten" has been used as an indirect expression; it is as if by asking him to bring a sign other than the Qur'ãn, they were asking him to judge between them and himself. Perhaps this is the purpose behind repeating the relative pronoun [mã = that which] and the relative clause [tasta'jilūna = you desire to hasten] in the following verse: Say: "If that which you desire to hasten were with me…" The apparent context demanded that it should have been said, "If that was with me…"

The meaning of the verse: "that which you desire to hasten" refers to the first verse and entails that the judgement be finalized between them and him, as is the Divine Tradition. This has been repeated in the second verse. It is also possible to reverse the indirect expression and so the meaning of "that which you desire to hasten" would be the final judgement as an obvious meaning in the first verse and in the second verse it would be as an indirect expression.

Also, His Word: "…He separates the truth and He is the best of separators (between truth and falsehood)." [This term yaquṣṣu (يَـقُصُّ = relate) has been recited differently by the reciters.] 'Ãṣim, Nãfi' and Ibn Kathīr from the seven [famous reciters] have recited it as it occurs now with qãf and ṣãd without a dot, and it means to cut off a things and to separate it from something else as it has occurred in: And he said to his sister, "separate him;" (28:11). However, the rest of reciters have recited it with qãf and ḍãd (i.e., ṣãd with a dot) from the root qaḍã' [and so it is recited yaqaḍḍu] and the yã' [in the end of that word] has been omitted as it has happened in: consummate wisdom – but warnings do not (تُـغْنِ) avail; (54:5). Both recitations have merits but as far as the meaning is concerned, both are the same: to relate the truth and to separate it from the falsehood is a sure result of judgement and decree on basis of the truth. Nonetheless, the words: "He is the best of separators" is more appropriate with the term yaquṣṣu in the meaning of separating.

Some of the commentators of the Qur'ãn have taken the word yaquṣṣu in the meaning of relating something or in the meaning of following the footsteps. However, the context does not support these meanings.

As for the first meaning [of these two interpretations]: although Almighty Allãh has narrated in His Book many stories of the prophets and their nations but there is no such narration in the context of the present passages, and so there is no basis to take the word as His narration.

As for the second meaning: it would mean that it is Allãh's tradition to follow the truth and its implications in managing His Kingdom and organizing the affairs of His creation. Although Allãh does not decide but on basis of the truth; and does not judge but on basis of the truth, nonetheless the decorum of the Noble Qur'ãn wouldn't accept the style of describing the act of following to the Almighty. Among other things, Allãh has said: The truth is from your Lord. (3:60); and did not say: "The truth is with Allãh" since there is an indication of weakness and dependency in the term 'with'.

A TALK ON THE MEANING OF THE REALITY OF ALLÃH'S ACTION AND JUDGEMENT

The action and judgement of the Almighty Allãh is the actual truth, not just according to the truth or conforming to it. The following is its discussion:

An entity can only be true if it actually exists in the real world and not just be a figment of one's imagination or creation of a mind. For example, the human being is one of the true existing entities as well as the earth on which he resides, also the vegetation and animals upon which he feeds.

A report or news can only be true if it is according to the proven reality, independent of our perception.

A decree or judgement can only be true if it is according to the norm that prevails in the world. When a ruler gives a command or a judge passes a verdict, that command or verdict will be 'the absolute truth' if it is according to the general good based on the prevailing norm in the world; and it would be 'the relative truth' if it is according to the relative good based on the norm of the world in a partial manner without considering the overall global system.

So, when someone commands us to maintain justice or refrain from injustice that command is considered a truth. How? The system of the world [devised by the Almighty] leads things to their fortune and good end; and it has decreed upon the humans to live as social beings and it demands upon all segments of the society to harmonize their various sections and not to disrupt or destroy one another so that it can attain the portion of its success in this world. The general good of a society is the basis of this success in this life, and the command to maintain justice and refrain from injustice is in accordance with that objective. So, both these commands are the truth. Whereas the command to inflict injustice or withhold justice is not in accordance with that success and so they are the falsehood.

at-Tawḥīd (monotheism) is the truth since it leads the human being to success in his true life whereas ash-shirk (polytheism) is falsehood since it leads to a devastating suffering and perpetual chastisement.

Similarly, a judgement between the two litigants will only be the truth if it is in accordance with the legal opinion that takes into account the general good of all people or of a particular group or a specific community. And the real good or welfare, as you already know, is based on the prevailing norm in the world whether it be absolute or relative.

Thus, it becomes clear that the truth, whatever it may be, is based on the real world and the system that governs it and the norm prevailing within it. Moreover, there is no doubt that the world and the existence – with all its system, norms and intricacies – is the act of the Almighty: it starts from Him; it is sustained by Him, and eventually returns to Him. So, the truth (whatever it may be) and the general good (however it may be) follow His action and trail His direction, and they exist only by being attributed to Him; and it is not that God follows the truth in His action or follows its direction. The Almighty is the True by Himself, and whatever is other than Him is true because of Him.

We, the humans in our free actions, whenever we wish to supplement the deficiencies in our existence and fulfill the needs of our lives – our actions that are sometimes in accordance with our desired success and sometimes are in divergence to it – we are forced in this process to take into consideration the side of general good that we deem to be good; in other words, in which lies the good of our situation and success of our endeavour. This leads us to obey the prevailing laws and general rules, to consider the laws and social norms worthy of being fulfilled and followed since it entails the good of humanity and contains the desired success.

This leads us to believe that good (al-maṣlaḥa) and evil (al-mafsadah) exist in the real sense, independent of the realms of mind and outside it, and separate from the domains of knowledge and sight; and they show their effect in the external world, positively and negatively. So, when our actions or laws are in accordance with the real good, per se, it will result in good and attain success; but when they oppose the real good and follow the real existing evil, it will result in every harm and evil. [This leads us to believe that] this kind of existence [of good and evil] is a real existence that cannot be destroyed or changed; and that the good and evil, in the real sense, as well as the qualities related to them (that compel people to act or to refrain) such as good action and evil action, and the laws derived from them (like the obligation of doing or refraining from something) – all these have real existence that refuse to disappear or change; and they govern us and push us to do certain things and refrain from some other. [We are also led to believe that] the intellect is able to perceive these realities just as it perceives other existing entities.

When some [theologians] realized that the Divine rules and laws were not different in purpose from the [manmade] rules and laws found in human societies, and that Allãh's actions also do not differ from our actions in that perspective, they concluded that the Divine laws and actions are like our actions – that is, they are based on real good and are characterized by goodness; in conclusion, they believed that the real good influences the Almighty's actions and governs His laws, more so because He knows the reality of issues and is aware of His servants' good.

This is entirely the result of leaning to one extreme of spectrum. From what we have discussed above, you know that laws and regulations are relative entities and not real: natural desires and needs of social life have compelled us to consider them and legislate them; they do not exist outside the realm of the society and they don't have any [intrinsic] value; they are only realities that exist in the realm of consideration and legislation that are used by humans to distinguish the actions that are beneficial from those that are harmful, the good from the evil, and the fortunate from the hardship.

The biases of the two theological groups during the early days of Islam led them to surprising extreme spectrums in this topic. The mufawwiḍah,[20] on the one hand, believed that the benefit and harm or the goodness and evil were actual realities, eternal and everlasting, never changing or altering; and that these realities govern Allãh's commands and prohibitions, and have impact on His actions, both in the realm of creation as well as legislation, thus forbidding certain things and allowing some other. In conclusion, they removed the Almighty from His authority and negated His absolute power.

The mujabbirah,[21] on the other hand, denied all this, and insisted that the characteristic of 'good' in anything comes to exist only when Allãh commands it and the characteristic of 'evil' in anything comes to exist only when Allãh forbids it; and there is no reason or purpose in creation or legislation; and that the human being is not responsible in any way for his actions and has no power on them. This is in contrast to the view of the first group who believed that actions are purely creation of humans and that Allãh, Glory be to Him has no power at all over their actions. These two views, as you can see, are on two extremes; neither of the two is correct.

The truth is that all these are relative, conventional issues but they have a real basis: that the human (and other social animals like him) who seeks eternity and success in life, is imperfect and in need. He seeks to remove the imperfections and to fulfill the needs through social activities that emanate from consciousness and determination. This forces him to characterize his actions (and matters related to his actions in seeking to reach the success and avoid the pain) with external qualities such as good, evil, obligatory, prohibition, permissible, ownership, right, etc. He then applies on them the spectrum of cause and effect [that is observed in and derived from the real world], and as a result lays down general and specific laws. He also believes that these laws have kind of a reality like the actual entities and he does this so that he can achieve his social life.

This is how we come to believe that justice is good just as the rose is good and beautiful or that injustice is evil just as the dead body is abhorrent [as a food item]; and that the property belongs to us just as our own limbs belong to us; and that the certain act is obligatory as the effect of a perfect cause would be obligatory, etc. That is why you will see variance in the views among nations when the goal of life changes: some will consider an act acceptable while other will consider it reprehensible, some will abrogate laws that others legislate; some are oblivious of something that others value or they appreciate it while others shun it; sometimes in a same nation you will see that a prevailing tradition is abandoned, then readopted, and then shunned again based on where the pendulum of its social compass turns. This is observed in case of variance in the purposes in societies. But when it comes to the general goals in which no two persons differ (such as the need for a society, or positive value of justice or negative value of injustice, etc.), then there is no need for characterizing them as good, evil, obligatory, prohibited, etc., since there is no difference of opinion in them. All this is about the human dimension.

[20] The mufawwiḍah refers to those who believed in 'delegation of absolute power to the humans' and this view was represented by the Mu‘tazilah school of theology. (tr.)

[21] The mujabbirah refers to those who believed in compulsion of Divine Will in human actions and this view was represented, among others, by the Ashã‘irah school of theology. (tr.)

When the Almighty Allãh moulded His religion in the mould of general social norms, He considered (while describing the true teachings moulded in the social norms) what we take into consideration in our lives: He wants us to reflect about His teachings and whatever realities that we receive from Him just as we reflect about the norms of life. He has considered Himself as the Lord who is worshipped and has considered us as the servants who are nurtured. Also, He has reminded us that He has a religion that consists of fundamental beliefs and practical laws which entails rewards and punishments, and that in obeying Him lies our benefit, our eventual good and success of our endeavours based on the path that we follow in our social views. So there are true beliefs that we must believe in and be committed to, and there are duties and religious laws (in rituals, commercial and social matters) that we must adhere to and consider – all human societies are based on this reality.

This allows us to seek religious knowledge (beliefs or laws) just as we seek social knowledge (concepts or rules), and to base the religious knowledge on intellectual views and practical wisdom just as we base the social knowledge on them. So, [we come to believe that] Almighty Allãh does not choose for His servants the duties and obligations but that there is goodness in them that improves their state in this world and the hereafter, He does not command anything but what is good and beautiful, and He does not forbid anything but that which is evil and disgusting in which is corruption of the faith or the world; and He does not do anything but that the reason also approves it; and He does not avoid anything expect that the reason wants us to avoid.

However, Allãh has also reminded us of two things:

Firstly, the reality in its essence is greater than this and ever mightier [i.e. beyond the comprehension of our intellect]. Verily all this knowledge has been derived from social views and these in reality do not extend beyond social norms and do not reach the heights of heavens [like the Qur'ãn] as He says: Surely We have made it an Arabic Qur'ãn so that you may understand. And surely it is in the original of the Book with Us, truly elevated, full of wisdom; (43:3-4). And He also said in the parable that He made: He sends down water from the cloud, then the valleys flow (with water) according to their measure, and the torrent bears along the swelling foam, and from what they melt in the fire for the sake of (making) ornaments or apparatus arises a scum like it; thus does Allãh compare truth and falsehood... (13:17). The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) said: "Verily, we the assembly of the prophets, have been commanded to speak with the people according to the level of their intelligence." And the like what has come in the Book [of Allãh] and aḥãdīth.

This does not mean that we should deny the concept of good and benefit, for example, in relation to the acts of the Almighty by proving its opposite that would end in believing in evilness in His actions or consider them purposeless like a child's actions – exalted is He from such thoughts. Similarly, denying a physical eye for intelligence does not mean attributing blindness to it or denying its ability to perceive, rather it means to separate it from deficiency.

Secondly, although the dimensions of good and advantages of benefits are used as justification for Divine actions and His commandments, and also used to explain the duties of servitude just as they are used to justify our rational rules and actions – nonetheless there is a difference between the two spheres. The dimensions of good and advantages of benefits lead our intentions and are influential in our choices; therefore, as rational beings, whenever we see an act of good quality with a benefit, without any impediment, we are compelled to do the action; and when we see a law with that quality, we don't hesitate in legislating it in our society.

These dimensions of good and welfare are nothing but meanings that we have derived from the system of the creation in the real world that is independent of our minds and separated from us; and therefore we decided to choose the good and beneficial actions so that we do not deviate from our path and so that we base our actions on the system prevailing in the universe and be on the path of reality. So, these dimensions of good are concepts derived from the real world and our actions branching out from them are result of that and affected by them. This is same for our actions as well as the commandments legislated by us. [This is the human dimension of things.]

The action of the Almighty, on the other hand, is the actual world and the real existence from which we derive the dimensions of good and welfare, and they are based on it since we have derived them from it. So, how can Allãh's action be considered as having branched out from them and be affected by them? Similarly, His legislated commandments generate the reality and not that they follow the reality. Understand and ponder [the difference between the two spheres].

[Conclusion:] It is now clear that the dimensions of good and welfare, even though they exists in Allãh's actions and commandments as well as in our actions and laws (since we are intelligent beings), they are different: in relation to our actions and laws, those dimensions lead and affect them – or you may say, they are the compelling causes and reasons for them; but in relation to Allãh's actions and commandments, they are intrinsic and inseparable – or you may say, they have beneficial consequences. Since we are rational beings, we do whatever we do and we legislate whatever we legislate in order to seek goodness and success, and to acquire what we do not possess yet. However, the Almighty Allãh does whatever He does and commands whatever He commands because He is God. Even though the result of His action is same as the result of our action as far as goodness and welfare is concerned, we are accountable for our actions which are tied to their compelling causes and purposes; but He is not accountable [to anyone] for His actions and they are not tied to compelling causes for acquiring what He might not already possess, rather its goodness and purposes are already integral part of the actions. He is not questioned about what He does while they [the people] will be questioned. Think and ponder on this.

This can be seen in the Almighty's statement: He cannot be questioned concerning what He does and they shall be questioned. (21:23); ...All praise is due to Him in this (life) and the hereafter, and His is the judgement... (28:70); ...And Allãh does what He pleases, (14:27); ...And Allãh pronounces a judgement – there is no repeller of His decree... (13:41)

If the action of the Almighty were similar to our rational actions then His judgement would have a repeller unless it is supported by a praise-worthy benefit, and consequently He will not be able to do whatever He pleases, rather He will be compelled by that benefit.

[The fact that benefits are linked to the actions but they don't compel the Almighty in what He pleases to do, as it can also be seen in the following verses:] Say: "Surely Allāh does not enjoin indecency ..." (7:28); O you who believe! Answer (the call of) Allāh and His Apostle when he calls you to that which gives you life... (8:24); and other similar verses that justify the Divine Commandments as dimensions of goodness and benefit.

QUR'ĀN [6:58]: Say: "If that which you desire to hasten were with me, the matter would have certainly been decided between you and me; and Allāh best knows the unjust."

It means that if I was capable of doing what you want from me – and if the sign [i.e., punishment] comes down to a messenger, it shall be a decisive judgement between him and his people – the matter will be finally decided between me and you, and one of the two groups will be saved while the other will be punished and destroyed; and it will punish or destroy only you because you are the unjust, and the Divine punishment seizes only the unjust ones for their injustice. The Almighty is above the level of those who get confused in the judgement and who are unable to distinguish the unjust from the innocent, and thus end up punishing me instead.

The words: "and Allāh best knows the unjust" is kind of an indication and justification [for the decisive judgement]; in other words, it is surely you who will be punished because you are indeed the unjust ones and the Divine chastisement does not pass from the unjust to the others. This sentence reaffirms the message of a previous verse: Say: "Have you considered if the chastisement of Allāh should overtake you suddenly or openly, will any be destroyed but the unjust people?" (6:47)

QUR'ĀN [6:59]: And with Him are the keys of the unseen – none knows them but He; and He knows what is in the land and the sea; and there falls not a leaf but He knows it, nor a grain in the darkness of the earth, nor any thing green nor dry but (it is all) in a clear book**:

In explaining the connection of this verse to the previous one, some commentators say that since the previous verse ended with the words: and Allāh best knows the unjust, the Almighty Allāh added the statement that the treasures of the unseen or the keys of those treasures are with Him, none knows them but He and He knows every sublime and subtle matter.

This explanation does not clarify the exclusivity seen in the verse: "none knows them but He." It is better to link this verse with the theme of both previous verses (from Say: "Surely I have manifest proof from my Lord… to …and Allãh best knows the unjust."), since they together state that the sign and its inevitable outcome that they were asking from the Holy Prophet is, indeed, in full control of Allãh and no one else has any say in it; and that He knows the judgement and He is not confused in judging and punishing the unjust people since He is Aware of them; and that He exclusively knows the unseen, He knows the sublime as well as the subtle issues, and neither does He miss something nor forget. He further elaborates this by His Word: "And with Him are the keys of the unseen," thereby He clarifies His exclusive control on the knowledge of the unseen and that His knowledge encompasses everything. Then He completes His statement by the next three verses.

In this way, the context of the verses become like some other similar verses such as those in the story of Prophet Hūd and his people: They said: "Have you come to us to turn us away from our gods; then bring us what you threaten us with, if you are of the truthful ones." He said: "The knowledge is only with Allãh, and I deliver to you the message with which I am sent…" (46:22-23).

"And with Him are the keys of the unseen." al-Mafãtiḥ (اَلْمَفَاتِحُ = the keys) is plural of maftaḥ (مَفْتَح) in the meaning of a treasure; it could also be plural of miftaḥ (مِفْتَح) in the meaning of a key. This latter rendering is supported by the non-canonical recitation: "وَعِنْدَهُ مَفَاتِيْحُ الْغَيْبِ" [wa ‘indahu mafãtīḥu 'l-ghayb = 'And with Him are the keys of the unseen']. The conclusions of both meanings are the same: whosoever has the keys of the treasures is aware of what is in them and has power to use them as he pleases just as the one who has the treasures themselves. However, other similar verses in the Qur’ãn support the first meaning since the Almighty has repeatedly talked about His treasures and the treasures of His mercy (and that is in seven instances) and in none of those cases has the word "مَفَاتِيْحُ = keys" occurred: Or have they the treasures of your Lord with them? (52:37); Say: "I do not say to you, 'I have with me the treasures of Allãh…'" (6:50); And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it… (15:21); And Allãh's are the treasures of the heavens and the earth… (63:7); Or is it that they have the treasures of the mercy of your Lord…? (38:9). Therefore, the most appropriate meaning of "mafãtīḥ" is the treasures of the unseen.

In any case, the verse: "And with Him are the keys of the unseen" intends to state the exclusivity of the knowledge of the unseen to the Almighty either by saying that the treasures of the unseen are not known to anyone but Allãh or by saying that the keys of the unseen are not known by other than Allãh. So, no one else has access to those treasures since he does not have knowledge of their keys by which he can open them and use what is therein.

Although the beginning of the verse talks about the exclusivity of the knowledge of the unseen to Almighty, its latter part is not restricted to the knowledge of the unseen; rather it mentions that His knowledge encompasses everything no matter whether it is unseen or seen – after all not everything 'wet or dry' can be classified as unseen. This is clear enough. So, the verse in general clarifies the encompassing nature of Almighty's knowledge covering every unseen and seen item; even though it's beginning part talks about the unseen and its latter part talks about both the unseen and the seen.

From another perspective, the beginning of the verse deals with the unseen that is in the treasures of the unseen under the covers of secrecy and the locks of obscurity. The Almighty Allãh says: And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure, (15:21). Verily the things that are in 'the treasures of the unseen with Him' are not entities that can be comprehended by visible boundaries nor can they be quantified by known measures. Moreover, there is no doubt that they are 'unseen treasures' because they are beyond the determination of boundary and measure; and we cannot comprehend any information unless it is limited and measured. Furthermore, the things in the treasures of the unseen are – before descending to the level of visibility and declining to the stage of limit and measure; and, in short, before they come to exist in a measured form – without any boundary and measure even though they exist in a kind of [abstract] existence with the Almighty as mentioned in the verse.

The entities that exist in this visible world, bound by time, existed before their [material] existence with Allãh in His treasures in a kind of existence that is abstract and without measure even if we are unable to comprehend their form of existence; they existed within the keys of the unseen and its treasures before their [material] existence and their settling down at the stage of measure and time.

Perhaps there are other things preserved within these treasures that are not comparable to the things that are time-bound, and known and familiar to us. This kind of the unseen that has not yet emerged on the scene of visibility is known as "al-ghaybu 'l-muṭlaq – the absolute unseen."

[Then there is "al-ghaybu 'n-nisbi – the relative unseen"]. The things that are wrapped in the cover of [physical] reality and descend to the level of limits and measures were [previously] in the treasures of the unseen, that is, in the category of the absolute unseen. However, these same entities – with their limits and measures – can still be comprehended by our eyes and intelligence: So, when we come to know about them, they are considered as 'seen'; and when we don't know about them, then they are considered as 'unseen'. When such things are unknown to us, it is appropriate to name them as "the relative unseen". For example, something that is inside a house, it is 'seen' in relation to those who are inside it; and it is 'unseen' in relation to those who are outside it. These descriptions are relative to those inside or outside the house. This relativity can also be seen in lights and colours: they are discernible by the vision and so are 'seen' in relation to the eyes but 'unseen' in relation to the ears. Similarly, the sounds that are discernible by the ears are 'seen' in relation to the ears but 'unseen' in relation to the eyes; and both are 'seen' in relation to a human being who has eyes and ears but 'unseen' to those who are blind and deaf.

What Allãh has mentioned in [the latter part of] the verse: "and He knows what is in the land and the sea; and there falls not a leaf but He knows it, nor a grain in the darkness of the earth, nor anything green nor dry but (it is all) in a clear book", refers to the relative unseen since all these items are limited and measured that can be either comprehended by us or they could be hidden from us.

Then the verse says that these things are: "in a clear book": So, what is the status of these things that are in the clear book? Are these things in it in form of "the unseen" as well as "the seen" or only in form of "the unseen"? In other words, does the term "a clear book" refer to the world that consists of things that are never hidden from it (even though they be unseen to one another)? Or does it refer to a reality beyond this world in which these things have been recorded and preserved in it in a peculiar way that that they are unseen to the people of this world and so whatever is in the book is the absolute unseen?

In still other words, the things that exist in the limited existence that have been mentioned in this verse, do they themselves exist in the clear book just as the letters exist in the books that are with us? Or do they exist in form of their names in it just as the physical items exist in meaning only when we write about them in the papers and the books, and the these words mirror the outside reality according to the absolute knowledge?

[The answer is the second of the two alternatives.] The Word of the Almighty: No misfortune befalls on the earth nor in your own selves, but it is in a book before We bring it into existence… (57:22), proves that the relationship of this book to the real events is like that of a book in which the program of the event is written down to the actual event. Closer to this are the following verses: …and there does not lie concealed from your Lord the weight of an atom in the earth or in the heaven, nor anything less than that nor greater, but it is in a clear book, (10:61); …not the weight of an atom becomes absent from Him, in the heavens or in the earth, and neither less than that nor greater, but it is in a clear book, (34:3); He said: "Then what is the state of the former generations?" He said: "The knowledge thereof is with my Lord in a book: errs not my Lord, nor does He forget," (20:51-52); and other verses like it.

So: "a clear book", whatever may it be, is an entity different from the real things; it existed before the things and will remain after they perish just like the programs written for activities before their occurrence that remain recorded even after their occurrence.

Nonetheless, these entities and events in our world are variable and changing under the general law of movement whereas the verses state that there is no possibility of change or error in the contents of the Book. The Almighty says: Allãh erases what He pleases and establishes (likewise), and with Him is the basis of the Book, (13:39). In a guarded tablet, (85:22). …and with Us is a writing that preserves (50:4). As you can see, the verses prove that this book, while containing all details of events and persons that are variable and changing, does not itself change nor does any variation and error reach it.

Thus, it becomes clear from this that "the Book" that is with the Almighty Allãh is separate from "the keys of the unseen" and the treasures of things. Allãh has described the keys and the treasures as being beyond measure and limit, and that the limits and measures come upon those things when they descend from the treasures of the unseen to this world that is the level of visibility. Also, He has described that this book contains the details of the perimeters of these things and events. So, from that perspective: "a clear book" would be different from "the treasures of the unseen" that are with Allãh and, in reality, it is creation of Allãh that precisely records the other creations and preserves them after their descent from the treasures of the unseen and before they reach to the stage of [physical] materialization and also after their materialization and demise.

It also proves that the Almighty Allãh mentioned this book in this verse to describe the encompassing nature of His knowledge about the items and events that occur in the world no matter whether they were unseen for us or visible. As for "the absolute unseen" that no one but the Almighty can know, that has been described by Him as being in "His treasures"; and "the keys of the unseen" that He possesses, no one knows that except Him. However, some verses indicate that while it is possible for others to know what is in "the book", no one can know what is in "the treasures". For example: In a book that is hidden; none do touch it save the purified ones, (56:78-79).

So, there is nothing in the creation of Allãh but that it has its origin in "the treasures of the unseen" from which it is sustained; and there is nothing in what Allãh has created but that "the clear book" contains it before its [physical] existence, at the time of its existence, and after it perishes. However, "the clear book" is a degree lower in status than "the treasures". An intelligent observer can discern that "the clear book", even though it is simply a book, is not like the parchments and material papers; the material scrolls – whatever their size and their quality – are incapable of recording its own history let alone the perpetual history of other items.

From this discussion, two points become clear:

Firstly, the meaning of "the keys of unseen" is the Divine treasures that contains things before it branches out into mould of measures, and it contains the unseen status of everything as declared in the following verse: And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure, (15:21).

Secondly, the term "a clear book" refers to its relationship to all things like the relationship of a book that contains program of action to the action itself; therein is a kind of measure for things except that the Book exists before the things, with them and after them; and it contains the knowledge of the Almighty about things, a knowledge which has no room for error or omission. That is why it is sometimes surmised that "a clear book" refers to the real status of things and their physical materialization (which is immune to any change) since nothing is subject to change except after its existence; and that is the meaning of the idiom: "verily once an entity is created it does not change."

In short, this book contains everything that happens in the world of creation and invention – whatever happened in the past, whatever is happening now, and whatever will happen in the future without any doubt. However, it also contains things that are in the realm of limits and measures, and scrolls and books that allow change and alteration, and accept the process of erasing and reinstating as stated in Allãh's words: Allãh erases what He pleases and establishes (likewise), and with Him is the basis of the Book; [13:39]. The erasing and confirming – especially when it is contrasted with the basis of the Book – happens in the Book.[22]

Thus, the connection of the verse: "And with Him are the keys of the unseen" with the previous verses becomes clear. The conclusion of the two previous verses was that: 'what you are demanding of me for the decisive sign between us is not within my power, neither is the final judgement with me, instead it is in the knowledge and power of my Lord; if it were in my power, the matter would have been decisively settled between us, and the chastisement would have seized you, that it does not seize anyone but the unjust ones since Allãh knows that you are, indeed, the unjust ones; because He is the Knowledgeable Who is not ignorant of anything. Hence, there is no way to know and [22] The discussion on the Knowledge of Allãh in this verse may be summarized as follows:

First, we have "Mafãtīḥu 'l-ghayb – The Treasures of the Unseen or the Keys of the Unseen".

i.) This refers to the exclusive Knowledge of Allãh that is not accessible to anyone but Him.

ii.) Things in The Treasures of the Unseen have an abstract existence and are beyond the realm of limits and measures.

1. Since these things are beyond the realm of limits and measures, they are unseen in relation to the human beings.
2. Ghayb or unseen can be absolute (muṭlaq) or relative (nisbī).

Then at a slightly lower level, we have "al-Kitãbu 'l-Mubīn – The Clear Book".

i.) It contains the records of every person, thing and event from the time they existed in "The Treasures of the Unseen" to the time they emerge onto the physical realm and until they perish.

ii.) al-Kitãbu 'l-Mubīn contains what is known as "Ummu 'l-Kitãb – The Basis of the Book" that is also known as "Lawḥ Maḥfūz – The Guarded Tablet" and its contents are immune from any change or alteration.

iii.) It also contains "Lawḥ Maḥw wa Ithbãt – The Tablet of Erasure and Reaffirmation". This refers to the partial knowledge that Allãh gives to some angels and prophets which is changeable from their perspective.

iv.) While "The Treasures of the Unseen" is exclusively for Allãh, "The Clear Book" is accessible to chosen humans depending on the will and permission of Allãh. (tr.)

control what He intends and decides eventually because the keys of the unseen are with Him, none knows them but He; and He best knows the unjust ones and does not confuse them with others since He knows what is in the land and the sea, and knows every minute and grand thing, and everything is in the clear book.'

So, His Word: "and with Him are the keys of the unseen" refers to the absolute unseen to which none other than Him has access. The statement "no one knows them" is a circumstantial phrase and it proves that the keys of the unseen is from category of knowledge, however it is unlike the knowledge with which we are familiar. What naturally comes to our minds about the meaning of 'knowledge' refers to the images that have been derived from things after they come to exist and can be measured by their perimeters while "the keys of unseen" – as mentioned earlier – refers to knowledge of things [in their abstract form] that have not yet come to [physical] materialization and cannot be measured by their physical perimeters. In other words, the unlimited knowledge not influenced by anything.

And His Word: "and He knows what is in the land and the sea" show the expansive bounds of His knowledge that can be comprehended by others, both those items that are sometimes visible to some people as well as those that are invisible to some others. 'the land' has been mentioned first because it is more known to the people who are being addressed.

And His Word: "and there falls not a leaf but He knows it" specifically talks about leaves since it is difficult for a human being to know about them because of the excessively great quantity of the leaves on the trees and that makes it impossible for a person to distinguish them one from the other or to monitor them all together with the variance in their state ending in falling off and decaying.

Also, His Word: "nor a grain in the darkness of the earth, nor anything green nor dry but (it is all) in a clear book" is contextually connected to the term "a leaf". The expression "the darkness of the earth" refers to its dark depths that contain the grains, some of which grow while others perish. So, the meaning of the verse would be: 'no grain falls in the dark depths of the earth nor do anything green nor dry – whatever it may be – falls on it but Allãh knows it.' Based on this, the words "but (it is all) in a clear book" replaces the expression "but that He knows it"; and implication of its missing syntactical part is the following: "but that it is found written in the clear book."

The adjective of the book as "al-mubīn = clear" could have two meanings: If it is in the meaning of 'the clarifying book', then it is so because it clarifies for its reader everything in its true form without allowing any shadow of change, alteration, and concealment in its description. If it is in the meaning of 'the clear book', then it is so because the book is in essence of a written entity and the written entity is recited, and if it is clear without any concealment or ambiguity, then the Book is also the same.

QUR'ÃN [6:60]: And He it is Who takes your souls at night* (in sleep), and He knows what you acquire in the day…: at-Tawaffã (اَلتَوَفِّي) means to take something in full; and Allãh uses it in His statements in the meaning of taking the living soul the way it happens at time of death as He has said in the next verse: …until when death comes to one of you, Our messengers (i.e., angels) cause him to die… [6:61] at-Tawaffã is also used in meaning of putting one to sleep just as it is used in meaning of causing death as seen in: Allãh takes completely the souls at the time of their death, and those that die not during their sleep… [39:42], since both actions are similar in preventing the soul from its function on the body [partially in case of sleep and fully in case of death].

Similarly, the term 'a*l-ba'th*' is used in meaning of awaking someone from sleep as it is used in meaning of raising someone after death – both reconnect the soul's function on the body [partially in the former and fully in the latter].

And qualifying at-tawaffã with 'At night' and al-ba'th with "during the day" is based on what happens normally since people are asleep at night and awake during the day.

So, the word "yatawaffãkum (يَتَوَفَّكُمْ) – He takes your souls in full" proves that the soul is the complete essence of a human being which is reflected by the term 'I' and not like what we sometimes are made to think that the soul is one of the two parts of a human being and not its complete being or that it is a form or a quality accidental to him. A clearer verse in this matter is 32:10-11: And they say: "What! When we have become lost in the earth, shall we then indeed be in a new creation?" Nay! They are disbelievers in the meeting of their Lord. Say: "The angel of death who is given charge of you shall take you completely, then to your Lord you shall be brought back." The astonishment of the unbelievers was based on their assumption that the essence of a human being is the body which perishes and decays when its limbs disintegrate because of death and so it is 'lost' in the earth. Hence the answer is based on the view that a human's essence is the soul (the spirit), and when the angel of death takes the soul in full and secures it, nothing of it is lost.

And His Word: "and He knows what you acquire in the day" ["Jaraḥtum = you acquire" is from] al-jarḥ (اَلْجَرْح) that refers to the action done by the limb, and it means whatever a person acquires. The sentence means that Allãh knows what you have acquired [of deeds] in the day. It is better to consider "wa = and" and the sentence following it as a circumstantial phrase [and not a conjunction] of the earlier active verb. [So, the sentence should then start with: "while He knows what you acquire in the day."] Consequently, the sentence "then He raises you up therein" connects with "He it is Who takes your souls" without any interruption of an irrelevant statement in between since the two verses intend to explain the Divine design about human life in this world, at time of death and after it until he is returned to his Lord.

The main purpose of the two narrative sentences is to explain the meaning of the Almighty's Word: "And He it is Who takes your souls at night (in sleep) while He knows what you acquire in the day, then He raises you up therein – in the day – in order to fulfill an appointed term… and He sends keepers over you until when death comes to one of you, Our messengers take him completely, and they are not remiss. And then they are returned to Allãh, their True Master." This is the actual intent of this statement, and everything else is of secondary status. In short, the meaning is that He it is Who takes your souls at night (in sleep) while He knows what you acquire in the day, then He raises you again up in the day.

QUR'ÃN: then He raises you up therein that an appointed term may be fulfilled; then to Him is your return, then He will inform you of what you were doing**:

Awakening someone or making someone alert has been described by the word "ba'th" in order to contrast it with the word "tawaffã" used for putting someone to sleep. The purpose of *ba'th/*awakening is to complete the appointed term [of death], a time known to Allãh that cannot be missed by the worldly life of a human, as He has said: …so when their term comes they shall not remain behind (even) an hour, nor shall they go before (7:34).

Fulfillment of the appointed term is justification [for awakening] because the Almighty is Swift in reckoning, and had it not been for the previously determined term, He would have surely seized them for their deeds and evil consequences of their sins. He said: And they did not become divided until after the knowledge had come to them out of rivalry among themselves; and had not a word gone forth from your Lord till an appointed time, certainly judgment would have been decided between them… (42:14); the previous determined term can be seen in Allãh's Word in the story of Adam ('a.s.)'s descent: "…and there is for you in the earth an abode and a provision for a time." (7:24).

So, the meaning of the verse is that verily Allãh takes your souls at the night and although He knows what you have earned of evil deeds during the day, He does not hold back your souls (to finalize your death) rather He awakens you during the day after taking your souls so that your determined time [of death] be fulfilled; and with death and resurrection, you shall return to Him who will inform you of what you were doing.

QUR'ÃN [6:61]: And He is the Supreme, above His servants…: Some discussion on this sentence has passed in the commentary of the 17th verse of this chapter.

QUR'ÃN: and He sends keepers over you; until when death comes to one of you, Our Messengers take him completely, and they are not remiss:

Expressing the process of sending the keepers without any qualifying term and linking it to the time of death is not without indication that the role of these keepers is to protect the human from every calamity that he faces, every misery that follows him, and every tribulation that approaches him. After all, our life in this world is a life of interaction and competition in which everything is affected by rivalry with others from all directions because every part of this physical world is occupied with seeking perfection and increasing its share of existence. Moreover, nothing can increase in its share except that it diminishes an equal share from something else; so things are constantly in state of struggle and domination. Thus, part of this world is the human being whose physical constitution is the most delicate of existing constitutions and the most elegant of what we know; and his rivals in nature are numerous and his enemies in life are more dangerous. Therefore, Allãh has sent to him the angels as protectors from a variety of calamities, impacts of disasters and misfortunes; and they constantly protect him from death until when his determined term [of death] comes, they leave him to his tribulations which will eventually cause his death as it has been mentioned in the aḥãdīth.

As for the verse where the Almighty says: And most surely there are keepers over you, honourable recorders, they know what you do, (82:10-12). The word 'keepers' refers to those angels who record the deeds. However, some exegetes have taken the verses under discussion as a commentary of this verse. Even though this verse does not totally discount that interpretation but the words: "until when death comes to one of you" support the earlier interpretation.

And His Word: "Our messengers take him completely, and they are not remiss." Apparently, the meaning of 'remiss' is negligence and carelessness in implementing the Divine Command of causing death. Almighty Allãh, however, has declared the angels as those who do what they are commanded to do. And He has also said that every nation is tied to its [determined] term, and when their term comes, they will not remain behind even for a moment nor shall they die before it. The angels assigned to the task of taking the soul fully do not fall short of the necessary limit that are clearly delineated for them about the death of a given person at a given time in such-and-such conditions; and so they do not neglect, even for a moment, in taking the soul of a person whose death has been assigned to them and so they do not remiss.

Are these angels (assigned to cause death) the same as those who were mentioned earlier as keepers? The verse is silent on this matter although there is a remote indication about their being the same. However, these angels assigned to cause death (to whatever category they may belong) are indeed helpers of the Angel of Death as the Almighty has said: Say: "The angel of death who is given charge of you shall take you completely, then to your Lord you shall be brought back." (32:11).

Relating the action of taking the soul to these angels and then to the Angel of Death in the verse mentioned above and further more to the Almighty Allãh as in the verse: Allãh takes completely the souls at the time of death… (39:42) – is kind of a variety in the levels of reference. To Allãh ends everything and He is the Master Who is absolutely free in whatever He does; and the Angel of Death is connected [to the Almighty] in his function of taking the souls with his helpers who are functionaries of the task and his means and tools.

This is just like the line that is drawn by a pen behind which is a hand [which holds and moves it] and behind them both is the person who is writing.

QUR'ÃN [6:62]: Then are they sent back to Allãh, their Master, the True One…: The verse refers to their return to the Almighty Allãh through resurrection after death. His description as: "their Master, the True One" indicates that He is the cause of all the functions mentioned earlier such as putting to sleep awakening, maintaining [their lives], causing death, and bringing about resurrection. It also has analysis of the concept of mastership and then proof of the right of mastership for Him: the master is one who owns the slave, and among his rights is to act about him as he wills. Since the Almighty has the real ownership and He is the One who brought about creation, management, and resurrection, then He is the True Master for Whom is established the meaning of mastership in a way that it can never be diminished ever.

QUR'ÃN: now surely His is the judgment and He is swiftest in taking account: Since the Almighty has explained the exclusivity of the treasures of the unseen to Himself, His knowledge about the clear book that contains everything, and His management of the affairs of His creatures from the time they came to exist until their return to Him, He now explains that the judgement belongs to Him and not to anyone else. As He has mentioned earlier: the judgment is only Allãh's, He now announces the conclusion of His statement by saying: "now surely His is the judgment" in order to draw their attention to what they have ignored.

That is His Word: "and He is swiftest in taking account" is another conclusion of the previous statement. He clarifies that He does not delay the reckoning of people's deeds from its appropriate time; rather He delays whenever He delays in order to fulfill the term that has been determined for it.

QUR'ÃN [6:63]: Say: "Who is it that delivers you from (the dread of) darkness of the land and the sea (when) you pray to Him (openly) humiliating yourselves, and secretly: 'If He delivers us from this, certainly we shall be of the grateful ones.' **"

"Deliverance from the dread of darkness of the land and the sea" means to rescue from the difficulties that a person faces while travelling on the land or in the sea such as severe cold, rain, snow, storm, robbers, etc. This becomes more difficult for a person in darkness of the night or the clouds or the winds that cause swirling dust – all this elevates a person's anxiety, hopelessness, and disorientation in finding ways to prevent it. That is why deliverance has been linked to [levels of] darkness.

The actual question was about who delivers the human from the difficulties that he faces in his travels in the land and the sea. Then the difficulties were linked to the land and the sea since they denote the space; and then the darkness was linked to the land and the sea because darkness has a definite impact in intensifying these difficulties. Finally, 'the difficulties' was replaced by 'the [levels of] darkness' and deliverance was linked to it: "delivers you from darkness of the land and the sea". Even though the Almighty Allãh delivers people from all distress and sadness as He has mentioned in the next verse, the term darkness has been specifically mentioned because hardship, discomfort and calamity are normally associated, in human's mind, with the journey on the land and in the sea.

"at-Taḍarru' ((اَلتَّضَرُّع" means openly expressing humiliation (i.e., humbleness and submission) as mentioned by ar-Rãghib [in his al-Mufradãt]; and therefore it has been contrasted with "al-khufyah (اَلخُفْيَة) = secretly" (i.e., privately and covertly). Openly expressing humiliation and secrecy in prayer refers to asking openly and secretly respectively. When someone faces a calamity, he begins praying secretly and in whispers; but when the calamity becomes severe, and signs of hopelessness and being cut off from the safety appear, then he does not care whether the people around him will see his humility and imploring gesture – he prays openly in as well as in whispers.

Mentioning 'openly' and 'secretly' is an indication that the Almighty delivers people from the calamities of the land and the sea, the severe ones as well as the lighter ones.

And in His Word: "If He delivers us from this, certainly we shall be of the grateful ones" indicates that when a person prays under such a situation to be relieved from it, he adds a pledge and a promise to His Lord that if Allãh relieves him from that situation he will surely be among the grateful ones and will abandon his previous ungrateful state.

The origin of this promise is based on the norm prevailing among the people in their interaction with one another. When one of us becomes helpless and surrounded with a trial from a severe calamity or poverty or an enemy, he will seek help from someone whom he considers to be capable to remove that problem and promises him something that will please him and strengthen his determination and manliness. And that could be in form of a good praise or wealth or work or loyalty. This is based on the social interaction between us that all exist as interchange is done between two parties in which one gives something and takes something in return, since need is essential to a human in the sense that he does nothing but for sake of a benefit which will come in his way. Other creatures are also the same.

The Almighty Allãh's status, however, is nobler than any need or any loss, and He does not do anything but that its benefit is for His creatures. That is why the concept of monotheism has been placed in contrast to the human being's promise of gratitude and obedience in his natural prayer. [In other words,] whenever a disaster falls upon a human being, and he is cut off from elements of safety and the means of rescue disappear, he comes to realize that indeed Allãh, Glory be to Him, is the only entity capable of removing grief from him, and that He is the one who manages his affairs from the time He created him and He also manages every means [in the system of universe]. It is then that he finds himself as unjust and transgressor in relation to Allãh, Glory be to Him, not deserving the removal of grief and fulfillment of need by the Almighty because of the sins that he has accumulated and the consequences of evil deeds that he has earned. So, he promises his Lord to be grateful and obedient in order to improve his eligibility for acceptance of his prayer and deliverance from his calamity.

Thus, we see that when he is delivered from the calamity, he goes away forgetting the pledge he made with his Lord and the promise of being grateful, as Allãh has said at the conclusion of the next verse: yet again you associate (others) with Him.

QUR'ÃN [6:64]: Say: "Allãh delivers you from them and from every distress, yet again you associate (others) with Him**:

ar-Rãghib in his al-Mufradãt said: "al-Karb (الكَرْب) means severe distress as the Almighty says: And We delivered him and his family from a mighty distress. [37:76]. 'a*l-Kurbah* (الكُربَة)' is similar [in meaning]. Its origin is from [the idiom], 'karbu 'l-arḍ (كَرْبُ الْأَرْض)' in the meaning of digging the earth inside out so distress also arouses the anxiety inside a person. It is said that it could be from [the idiom]: 'a*l-kirãb ʻala 'l-baqar* (اَلكِرَابْ عَلَى الْبَقَرْ) = ploughing is upon the cow.' And it is surely not from the saying, 'a*l-kilãb ʻala 'l-baqar* = [sending] the dogs upon the cattle' [an idiom that means creating chaos among people]. It is also possible that al-karb is from [the idiom], 'karabati 'sh-shams (كَرَبَتِ الشَّمْس)' in the sense that the sun is about to set. The saying, 'inãu kurbãn (إِنَاءُ كُرْبَان) = the container is about to fill up' [kurbãn] means nearness like qurbãn (قُرْبَان). It could be from 'a*l-karab* (اَلْكَرَبْ)' and that means a strong knot in the rope of the bucket; it is said, 'Akrabtu 'd-dalw (أَكْرَبْتُ الْدَلْوُ) = I put a knot on the bucket.' Sometimes 'al-gham (اَلْغَمْ) = anxiety' is described as a knot on the heart."

The expression 'every distress' has been linked in this verse to: the darkness of the land and the sea, in order to encompass all humans since there is not a single human being who has not faced in his lifetime one or another kind of distress and anxiety; consequently, pleading and praying [for relief] is common among them whether they express it openly or secretly.

In short, the meaning of this verse is that when you are faced with difficulties in the darkness of the land and the sea, and are cut off from the normal means [of rescue] and are at the end of your wits, you come to realize, by reverting to your human nature, that the Almighty Allãh is your Lord besides Whom there is no lord and you become absolutely certain that worshipping other than Him is unjust and sinful. The proof of this is that you pray to Him at that time openly with humiliation as well as secretly, and you promise Him to be grateful to Him thereafter and not to disbelieve in Him if He delivers you. But after being delivered, you break your pledge that you made with Him and you continue on your previous disbelief.

These two verses are arguments against the polytheists and rebuke for them on breaking the oath and not fulfilling the pledge.

QUR'ÃN [6:65]: Say: "He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement from above you or from beneath your feet, or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties; and make some of you taste the fighting of others." See how repeatedly We display the signs that they may understand…**:

ar-Rãghib in his al-Mufradãt says: "The origin of 'al-ba'th (اَلبَعْث) = to send' is raising up something and giving it a direction. It is said: 'ba'athtuhu fã'nba'atha (بَعَثْتُهُ فَانْبَعَثَ) = I sent him and he was dispatched.' al-Ba'th differs in meaning depending on the difference in its point of reference. So 'ba'athtu 'l-ba'īr (بَعَثْتُ الْبَعِيْر) = I sent the camel' means I caused it to rise and move; whereas the Almighty's Word: and (as to) the dead, Allãh will (يَبْعَثُهُمْ) raise them [6:36], that is, He will raise them from death and make them move to the judgement… So, al-ba'th is of two kinds: i.) Human, such as in causing the camel to rise and move and to send a person for a task. ii.) Divine, which is of two types: a) to create items, things and entities from nothing; and this is exclusively for the Almighty Creator and no one can do that. b) To raise the dead back to life, and this power has been bestowed to some of His chosen ones such as Jesus ('a.s.) and others like him."

In short, in the term al-ba'th, there is kind of an indication of raising and lifting up someone or something. And with consideration, it is used for giving direction to and sending someone since giving direction towards a task and sending someone towards a nation normally only happens after calmness and immobility. Therefore, 'ba'th = sending' of a chastisement has within itself an indication that the nature of chastisement is that it be directed towards the people and come upon them, and this necessary consequence is only prevented by a barrier such as belief and obedience to Allãh. This discussion has a concluding part that will come later on.

[On the term "yalbisakum (يَلْبِسَكُم) = throw you into confusion", aṭ-Ṭabrisī] says in Majma'u 'l-bayãn: "[The expression:] 'I made the matter confused for them,' means when I did not clarify it and mixed some issues with the other… al-Labs/al-lubs (اللبس) means confusing the issue and confusing the statement… ash-Shiya' (اَلشِّيَعُ) means the sects; each group is a sect by itself; shī'ah of so-and-so means his followers. at-Tashayyu' means following [someone] on basis of faith and love."

Based on this, the verse "or that He should throw you into confusion (making you) of different parties," means that to mix one with another and confuse them while they were groups and sects.

So, His Word: "Say: 'He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement from above you or from beneath your feet,'" apparently means to prove Allãh's ability for sending on them a chastisement from above or beneath them. To prove the capability to do something does not necessarily mean actually doing it; proving His capability of sending chastisement is sufficient to frighten and warn them. The context, however, indicates that the verse does not only want to prove the capability; rather it shows that they deserve this kind of chastisement; and that the chastisement itself demands that it be send upon them if they don't agree on faith in Allãh and His revelation as we saw in the implication of the meaning of al-ba'th. This understanding is supported by the latter verse: For every prophecy is a term and you will come to know (it). This is a clear threat.

The Almighty Allãh clearly threatens this nation with chastisement in other similar verses in the Qur'ãn such as: And every nation had a messenger, so when their messenger came, the matter was decided between them with justice… till: And they ask you: "Is that true?" Say: "Aye! By my Lord! It is most surely the truth, and you will not escape;" (10:47-53). Surely this community of yours is one community, and I am your Lord so worship Me. And they broke their religion (into sects) between them… (21:92-97). Then set your face upright for religion in natural devotion (to truth)… and be not of the polytheists, of those who divided their religion and became sects… (30:30-45).

It has been said that the chastisement: "from above them" refers to the forms of chastisement like the cry, the stone, the flood and the wind as it was done to the people of ʿÃd, Thamūd, Shuʿ*a*yb and Lūṭ; and: "from beneath their feet" refers to sinking into the ground as it was done to Qãrūn.

It has also been said that the chastisement: "from above them" refers to the chastisement that will come to them from their elders and their tyrant rulers; and: "from beneath their feet" refers to the chastisement that will come to them from the lowly people and their evil slaves.

It has been further said that the chastisement "from above them" and "from beneath them" refers to the deadly weapons and firearms that humans have lately invented such as the fighter-planes and tanks that discharge explosive and destructive bombs, etc., and underwater submarines that drown the ships and boats. So, the warning has occurred in this verse while He very well knows what will happen in His Kingdom.

The truth is that the expression used in the verse can be applied to all these explanations mentioned above, and some similar chastisements that have been sent down after the revelation of this verse can be applied to the verse. The common cause for these events that has facilitated its path is the differences of opinion and divisions that appeared in the ummah and went contrary to the call of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) who used to call them to unity of the word of truth: This indeed is my straight path, so follow it, and do not follow [other] ways, for they will separate you from His way… [6:154].

QUR'ÃN: or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties; and make some of you taste the fighting of others…: Apparently, it refers to the groupings that emerged after the Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) and that led to appearance of various schools of thought that had acquired the flavour of partisanship and the fervour of jãhiliyyah; and this was followed by wars and battles in which each group allowed violation of all that was sacrosanct to the other and dismiss them, in their views, from the sanctity of the faith and the territory of Islam.

Therefore, the words: "or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties; and make some of you taste the fighting of others" refer to one chastisement, not two chastisements even though it is possible, in a way, to consider the act of throwing them into confusion and the act of making them taste the infightings as separate chastisements. Division between the ummah has another evil consequence and that is creeping weakness, depleted power, and divided resources. However, if the expression, "make some of you taste…" is taken as an indication of separate chastisement then it would be considered as a qualifying phrase to the general statement ("throw you into confusion"). However, placing a qualifying statement alongside a general statement is not appropriate except by extra emphasis in the speech. [Such an emphasis does not exist here] and the conjecture 'And' support what we have said.

In conclusion, the verse means: Tell them, O the Messenger of Allãh, and warn them about the consequence of their refusal to join together under the banner of Islam and to heed to the true call; and that for their attitude, there is an evil consequence within the power of the Almighty Allãh by which He can seize them by sending upon them a chastisement from which there will be no escape or refuge, and that is the chastisement from above them or from beneath their feet, or He can make some of them taste the fighting of others by which they will end up becoming groups and sects, differing from one another in dispute with one another and at war against one another – thus they will taste the fighting of one another. Then Allãh ends the statement by addressing the Holy Prophet: See how repeatedly We display the signs that they may understand. Its meaning is clear.

QUR'ÃN [6:66]: And your people call it a lie and it is the very truth. Say: "I am not placed in charge of you." The people of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) are the Quraysh or the tribe of Muḍar or the Arabs in general. The purport of some verses in other places is that the Holy Prophet's people are the Arabs: And if We had revealed it to any of the non-Arabs so that he should have recited it to them, they would not have believed therein. Thus have We caused it to enter into the hearts of the guilty. They will not believe in it until they see the painful punishment. And it shall come to them all of a sudden, while they shall not perceive, (26:198-202). And We did not send any messenger but with the language of his people, so that he might explain to them clearly… (14:4).

Anyway, Allah's statement: "And your people call it a lie and it is the very truth," serves as a justification for materialization of the news that was contained in the previous warning. As if it was said: O the ummah, get together in the monotheism of your Lord and get united in following the true word; otherwise there is no protector who can protect you from the chastisement that will come from above or from beneath or from the division and groupings that is followed by armed fight of one against the other. Then the Holy Prophet was addressed and it was said to him: Verily your people rejected that and so they deserve the evil chastisement or severe pain that they will taste.

It is clear, firstly, from this that the pronoun in "call it a lie" refers to the chastisement as al-Ãlūsī has attributed this view to the majority of commentators. Sometimes it is said that it refers to the "repeatedly displaying of the signs" or to the Qur'ãn. However, this is far-fetched. It is not far-fetched to link the pronoun to the news that is contained in the previous verse.

Secondly, based on the context, this news: "And your people call it a lie and it is the very truth" is the first news that prepares the ground for the threat of chastisement. It is as if someone says: It is necessary for your people to unite on believing in Allãh and His signs and to be vigilant and watchful against getting into rejection of Allãh and His signs; and against creating differences among themselves so that the chastisement of Allãh, Glory be to Him, does not come upon them. Then it is said: Your people – among your entire ummah and those who are of your contemporary or from the people who came after you – quickly moved to violate what they were obliged to confirm and they belied the news [of chastisement] so they were discredited because of this and they shall soon know. Moreover, that those who rejected the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) or the Qur'ãn or this chastisement are not only the Arabs who are his people, rather he was rejected also by the Jews and other communities of his era as well as those who came after him. Their rejection and their division altogether had a positive impact in the warning given about the chastisement. So, specifically relating the rejection to his people even though others were part of this rejection proves what we have said earlier.

An analytical discussion on the psyche of the Islamic society supports the conclusion that we have derived from the verse: The decaying psyche of the present Muslim ummah, the lack in its strength and its dissolving unity can be traced upon analysis to the differences and disputes of the early days after the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.)'s demise; and that can be linked to the events of the early days of the hijrah and [even] before it to what the Prophet faced from his own tribe and how they boldly defied him by rejecting and ridiculing his thoughts.

Even though these people gathered around the banner of Islam and sought the protection under its shadow after the faith prevailed [in the society] and its lamp was illuminated, the noble religious society was not free from the ill of hypocrisy as many verses of the Qur'ãn have confirmed it. The number of the hypocrites was not insignificant and it was impossible for the society to be safe from their evil impact on its psyche, and it could not absorb them fully in order to transform them into good members of the society during the Holy Prophet's lifetime, and their embers did not take long to be reignited and increase its inflammation as it continues even now. After all, everything returns back to its origin and there are all kinds of game in the belly of the wild ass.

Thirdly, Allãh's statement: "Say: 'I am not placed in charge of you'," is an indirect statement which says to ignore them and say to them: 'I am not responsible for your actions nor am I liable [for them] so that I should prevent you from rejecting [the message] out of concern for you. The only duty that I have as a Messenger is to warn you about a severe punishment which is hidden from you.' This also clarifies that His statement: For every prophecy is a term, and you will come to know (it), is part of the Holy Prophet's speech to his people as the words "you will come to know (it)" supports this interpretation. The people are addressed by the Holy Prophet's speech and not by the Almighty Allãh.

QUR'ÃN [6:67]: For every prophecy is a term and you will come to know (it): This is a clear threat and warning of an event that will imminently occur. The correctness of referring the warning to the polytheists [of Mecca] is obvious by the previous discussion since the roots of divisions and problems that the Muslim ummah is to face can be traced back to them. After all, people are one community; its latter generations are affected by what happens to the earlier ones, the defects that appear in the latter ones can be connected to the first ones, no matter whether they realize that or not or they see that or not. The Almighty Allãh says: Nay, they are in doubt, the sport. Therefore keep waiting for the day when the heaven shall bring a clear drought that shall overtake men; this is a painful punishment. Our Lord! Remove from us the punishment; surely we are believers. How shall they be reminded, and there came to them an Apostle making clear (the truth), yet they turned their backs on him and said: "One taught (by others), a madman." Surely We will remove the punishment a little, (but) you will surely return (to evil), (44:9-15).

Reflect on the verses how Allãh seized the latter communities because of the crimes of their predecessors. Are not they in the same category as verses quoted earlier from the chapters: "Yūnus" [10:47-56], "al-Anbiyã'" [21:92-97], "ar-Rūm" [30:30-45]? There are many verses in the Noble Qur'ãn that talk about the evil consequences and ill fortunes that will overtake the ummah followed by the Divine Favour [of forgiveness and blessings]. The worst negligence committed by our commentators [of the Qur'ãn] is in matter of reflection on these blessed verses in spite of their numerousness, importance and strong connection to the status and good fortune of the ummah in this world and the hereafter.

QUR'ÃN [6:68]: And when you see those who engage in vain discourses about Our signs, withdraw from them until they enter into some other discourse, and if the Satan causes you to forget, then do not sit after recollection with the unjust people…:

ar-Rãghib, in his al-Mufradãt, says: "al-Khawḍ (اَلخَوْض) means to enter the water and pass through it; then it was borrowed for other actions. It has mostly occurred in the Qur'ãn in meaning of entering into something blameworthy." It means entering into vain talks and engaging deeply into it; for example, quoting the true Qur'ãnic verses, and then ridiculing them and being insolent about them.

"Withdraw from them" means not to participate with them in what they are engaged in by standing up and moving away from them or something like it that will demonstrate non-participation. The phrase: "until they enter into some other discourse" is a conditional clause which proves that the prohibition of being in their company and sitting with them is not general, covering even a right purpose; the prohibition is only for sitting with them while they are deeply engrossed in the Divine verses [for the purpose of ridiculing them].

It is clear, therefore, that there is kind of an ellipsis. So in the statement: "and when you see those who engage in vain discourses about Our signs, withdraw from them until they enter into some other discourse," there is an implied sentence which is omitted because it is not required. And so the meaning – and Allãh knows better – is as follows: 'And when you see the people who engage in and ridicule Allãh's verses continue in their engagement of and ridiculing the Divine verses, withdraw from them and do not sit in their circle until they engage in other discourse. So, when they enter into other discourse, then nothing prevents you from sitting with them.' Although the verse came in the context of the argument against the polytheists, but the criterion mentioned therein is of a general nature and so it covers others equally.

At the end of the verse, Allãh says: "…then do not sit after recollection with the unjust people." Engaging negatively in Allãh's verses is injustice; and the verse prohibits from participating with the unjust people in their injustice. In a similar verse, the Almighty says: …surely then you would be like them… (4:140)

So, it becomes clear that the verse does not command to withdraw from those who engage negatively in Almighty Allãh's verses; rather it commands to withdraw from them as long as they are engaged negatively in Divine verses.

The pronoun: "hu – in غَيْرُهُ" refers to the discourse in which they engage negatively in Divine verses since it is a negative engagement that has been forbidden.

QUR'ÃN: and if the Satan causes you to forget, then do not sit after recollection with the unjust people: The letter "مَا = mã in (wa imma yunsiyannaka) وَإِمَّا يُنْسِيَنَّكَ " is superfluous and denotes a kind of emphasis or reduction; and the letter "ن – nūn" [in يُنْسِيَنَّكَ] is for emphasis and its origin form was " وَإِنْ يُنْسِكَ(wa-in yunsīka)". The statement consists of emphasis and intensified pronunciation for prohibition; in other words, 'even if you forgot Our prohibition because the Satan made you to forget it and then you remembered it, so do not be neglectful of it and don't lose time in withdrawing from them since those who fear displeasing Allãh should in no way participate with those who negatively engage in the Divine verses, ridiculing them.'

Although the verse addresses the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.), the intended addressee is the ummah. In the discussion on infallibility of the Prophets ('a.s.) we had negated occurrence of such kind of forgetfulness, the forgetfulness of the Divine Law [by the prophets would amount to] neglecting it and that in turn could be used as an argument against them and a justification for the opponents.

This is supported by the statement after the verse addressing the pious among the ummah: And nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil), but (theirs) is only to remind, haply they may guard.

More clearer proof for this is in Allãh's statement in "Sūratu 'n-Nisã'": And indeed He has revealed to you in the Book that when you hear Allãh's communications disbelieved in and mocked at, do not sit with them until they enter into some other discourse; surely then you would be like them; surely Allãh will gather together the hypocrites and the unbelievers all in Hell; (4:140). The reference in this Medinan verse about what: He has revealed to you in the Book is to the verse of "Sūratu 'l-An'ãm" under discussion and not any other verse. And the command revealed previously was addressed to the believers; and so it follows that although the verse: And when you see those who engage in vain discourses… is addressed to the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.), it actually is intended for someone else – as the saying goes: "Although I address you but I would like the neighbour to hear me."

QUR'ÃN [6:69]: And nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil), but (theirs) is only to remind, haply they may guard:

It means that the sin of those who engage negatively [in Divine verses] will not be carried by anyone but themselves and it will not affect others unless the others also act like them and participate with them in the sin or be pleased with their sin. Indeed, no one will be held accountable for an act except the doer. But we remind them haply they may guard themselves against evil. [Why?] Because a person may attend their gathering and even though it is possible for him not to indulge in their negative engagement [with Divine verses] nor is he pleased in his heart with their act and it is also possible for him that he does not consider his participation in their gathering as a way of support for their sin or their statement but just the fact of witnessing a transgression and seeing a sin desensitizes his heart about the sinful act and minimizes the mistakes in his views – and when the seriousness of a sin is minimized, it is likely that he will fall for it because the hearts are inclined to sins. Thus, it is incumbent upon a righteous person (who possesses piety and exercises precaution in prohibited things by Allãh) to refrain from mixing with those who ridicule and show insolence towards Allãh just as it is incumbent upon those who are in company of the ones who engage negatively in Allãh's verses to do the same so that he is not desensitized to insolence towards Allãh and His verses, and ends up committing that sin and putting himself on the verge of perdition. Whoever hovers around the fire is likely to fall into it.

From this explanation, it becomes clear, first of all, that it is only the pious who have been separated from the accountability of those who engage negatively [in Divine verses] – even though others [in principle] do not share the punishment of the sinners' deeds – in order to emphasize the point that one who participates in their gatherings and sits with them is not immune from sharing in the punishment of their sins. So, the implied missing part in the statement would be as follows: Those who don't engage negatively will not be responsible in any way as long as they safeguard themselves from such engagement with them; but yet We prohibit them from sitting with them so that they may continue their refrain from such engagement or so that they may enhance their piety and sensitivity regarding prohibitions given by Allãh, Glory be to Him.

Secondly, the meaning of "taqwã (تَقْوَى)" in the verse: "and nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil)" is the general taqwã, that is, refraining and staying away from whatever displeases Allãh, the Sublime. And in the verse: "haply they may guard" the taqwã refers to the specific sin of engaging negatively in the verses of Allãh. It could also be that the taqwã in the first verse refers to the basic level of taqwã but in the second it refers to its perfect form; or the first one could be the general taqwã while the second could be its expanded form which is applied to a given situation such as the act of engaging negatively in Allãh's verses. Yet there is another explanation also: the first one could be the taqwã addressed to the believers and the second one could be the taqwã addressed to those who are engaging negatively; and in this case the implied statement would be: 'give an advice to those who engage negatively so that they may refrain from such engagement.'

Thirdly, the term "dhikrã (ذِكْرَى) = to remind" is an unconditional object for an implied verb. The implied [verb] is: 'but We counsel them by that reminder' or 'counsel them of the reminder'. Or "dhikrã" could be a predicate of an omitted subject and so the implied subject would be: 'but this command is a reminder'. Or it could be a subject for an omitted predicate and so the implied meaning would be: 'it is your duty to counsel them'. The second of these variations seems closer to the mind.

QUR'ÃN [6:70]: L*eave those who have taken their religion for a play and an idle sport, and whom this world's life has deceived, and remind* (them) thereby lest a soul should be fettered with what it has earned; it shall not have besides Allãh any guardian nor an intercessor, and if it should seek to give every compensation, it shall not be accepted from it; these are they who shall be fettered with what they earned; they shall have a drink of boiling water and a painful chastisement because they disbelieved:

ar-Rãghib says: "al-Baṣl (اَلْبَصْل) means contracting something or separating it. Because of its meaning of contraction, it has been borrowed for 'scowling face;' and so it is said: 'He is bãṣil, fearless' and 'mubtaṣilu 'l-wajh, courageous face'. And because of its meaning of separating, 'baṣl' is used to describe something forbidden or mortgaged such as in Allãh Word: "and remind (them) thereby lest a soul should be fettered with what it has earned;" which means it will be deprived from the reward. The difference between al-ḥarãm and al-baṣl is that the former is general in the sense something that is forbidden by law and by force whereas the latter refers to something forbidden by force only such as in His Word: "these are they who shall be fettered with what they earned;" which means they are deprived of the reward.

[aṭ-Ṭabarsī] in Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn says: "It is said: 'Abṣaltuhu bi jarīratihi = I surrendered him [to you].' al-Mustabṣil means the one who surrenders himself since he knows that he has no way to escape. al-Akhfash said: 'The word tublaṣa [in the verse under discussion] means you will be punished. And it is said that tublaṣa means to be mortgaged. These meanings are close [in their import].'"

"And leave those who have taken their religion for a play and an idle sport…" Adhering to their evil desires has been described [in this verse] as a play and a sport with their religion. This sentence presupposes a true faith for them, a faith towards which their pure nature calls them; and it was incumbent upon them to adhere to it seriously and to protect it from confusion and change, but they took it as a play and a sport, altering it from one state to another and changing it from one form to another according to the dictates of their evil desires.

The above sentence was followed by the words: "and whom this world's life has deceived," because of the close connection between the two, since settling down comfortably in earnestly acquiring and indulging in the enjoyments of this materialistic life compels one to abandon the true faith and to consider it as a play and a sport.

Then Allãh said: "and remind (them) thereby", i.e., counsel them "by the Qur'ãn" so that a person would not be fettered to the transgressions that he has committed, or so that a person is not surrendered for accountability and punishment on account of what he had committed. Hence, such a person has no master and no intercessor other than Allãh; and no weight [of gold] nor any kind of redemption will be accepted on that day, because that day is the day of compensation for the deeds, not the day of buying and selling. These are the ones who shall be fettered to what they had earned or will be prevented from Allãh's reward or will be surrendered for their punishment; they shall have a drink of boiling water and a painful chastisement because of their disbelief.

QUR'ÃN [6:71]: Say: "Shall we call on that besides Allãh, which does not benefit us nor harm us…*: This is an argument against the polytheists in form of a rhetorical question; and only two of the qualities of their idols – inability to benefit and inability to harm – have been mentioned here because taking someone or something as god is based on one of the two reasons: hope [of something] or fear [of something]; and if the idols neither benefit nor harm us, then there is no impetus to pray to them, worship them or seeking closeness to them.

QUR'ÃN: "and shall we be returned back on our heels after Allãh has guided us, like him whom the Shayãṭīn have made to fall down perplexed in the earth? He has companions who call him to the right way, (saying)*: 'Come to us.'"

"al-Istihwã' (اَلْإِستِهْوَاء)" means fulfilling the desire and falling down; and "ar-rad 'ala 'l-a'qãb (اَلرَدْ عَلَى اَلْأَعْقَاب) = turning back on heels" means straying from the right path and abandoning true guidance. True guidance indeed ends in finding the straight path and treading upon it whereas 'turning back on heels' means not treading the path and turning back, and that is indeed misguidance. That is why the verse says: "and shall we be returned back on our heels after Allãh has guided us," qualifying the 'return' occurring after the Divine guidance.

It is indeed strange to see that some people have taken the argument of this verse: "and shall we be returned back on our heels after Allãh has guided us," and other similar verses such as the statement of Shu'ayb ('a.s.), as quoted by the Almighty Allãh: The chiefs, those who were proud from among his people, said: "We will most certainly turn you out, O Shu'ayb, and (also) those who believe with you, from our town, or you shall come back to our faith." He said: What! Though we dislike (it)? Indeed we shall have forged a lie against Allãh if we go back to your religion after Allãh had delivered us from it, and it befits us not that we should go back to it, except if Allãh our Lord please…" (7:88-89).

They have argued thereby that the Prophets, peace be upon them, before being raised as Prophets and donning the mantle of prophethood, were on the path of kufr (disbelief) because of the words 'returning on the heels after Allãh has guided us,' and 'back to your religion after Allãh had delivered us from it' that they have taken as proofs that the Prophets were followers of kufr before being delivered from it.

This is a false argument. These words and expressions are used by the prophets in the language of the religious society whose members were idol-worshippers until Allãh guided them through their prophets. We don't mean to say that since majority of the people were polytheists before therefore it is valid to relate their previous disbelief to all members of the society including their prophets – Allãh's true statement cannot be such. Rather we mean that it is okay to say about a religious society – that includes the prophet and his community – which its members were delivered from shirk after being guided by the Almighty Allãh; without Him, there will be nothing but misguidance. As for the community, they were on polytheism in the period before they were guided to the true faith [through the prophets]; as for their prophets, they were always guided by Allãh and they, without the [constant] Divine guidance, would have faced nothing but misguidance. [The emphasis here is that] if it had not been for the Divine guidance, they would have faced nothing for themselves except misguidance since other so-called gods don't possess any loss or benefit for themselves. So, it is appropriate to say about them that there is no basis for them to return on the heels after Allãh has guided them or to return to polytheism after Allãh has delivered them from it.

In short, the statement [that they were polytheists before being believers] is applicable to them in the true sense even though some members of their society – such as their Prophets – were not disbelievers before the prophethood. Faith and guidance was with them in all situations from the Almighty Allãh – if they had been left by themselves [without Allãh's guidance], there would be nothing but misguidance as you already know. And you also know from various past discussions on the infallibility of the Prophets that the Noble Qur’ãn has clearly stated the purity of their persons from the smallest of minor sins, let alone the major ones, especially the most serious of the major ones and that is shirk, ascribing a partner to Almighty Allãh.

And His Word: "like him whom the Shayãṭīn have made to fall down perplexed in the earth?" This is the portrayal of a perplexed person who lacks insight in his affairs and strong determination in seeking his felicity; and so he abandons the best and the upright path towards his goal which has been treaded by the rightly-guided companions of him. So, now he is confused between the Satan (and his agents) who invite him towards misguidance and perdition on the one hand and his rightly-guided companions – who have reached to their stations and attained the goal – who invites him towards the guidance saying: 'come to us.' He doesn't know what to do; he is between those who are pulling him down and those who are pulling him up!

QUR'ÃN [71]: Say: "Surely the Guidance of Allãh, which is the* (true) guidance, and we are commanded to that we should submit to the Lord of the worlds.: If the choice is between the call of Allãh, Glory be to Him, which is according to the human nature, the fiṭrah, which is known as 'Allãh's guidance,' and between the call of the Satan (and his agents) which is based on evil desires and taking the faith as a play and an idle sport, then Allãh's guidance is, indeed, the only true guidance.

What accompanies the call of fitrah is Allãh's guidance; and there is no doubt in it because the true guidance is also proclaimed by the creation and invention that is from Allãh only. And we don't wish for any religion or belief except to seek the truth, and there is no truth but with Allãh and so His guidance is never devoid of truth. The fact that Allãh's guidance is the true guidance which should be adopted and not the satanic call is obvious because all our affairs reside with Allãh: our origin, our final destination as well as our needs of this world and the Hereafter.

And His Word: "and we are commanded that we should submit to the Lord of the worlds." [aṭ-Ṭabrisī] says in Majmaʿu 'l-bayãn: "The Arabs say: 'Amartuka li taf'al' or 'Amartuka an taf'al' or 'Amartuka bi'an taf'al' [all meaning: 'I commanded you so that you may do it']. So, 'Amartuka bi'an taf'al' has the proposition letter 'bã' and the meaning would be: the command is applied to this act. In the format 'Amartuka an taf'al' the proposition letter has been deleted. Whereas 'Amartuka li taf'al' simply means: I commanded you for the act. az-Zajjãj [referring to the words in the verse] says: 'It means: "We are commanded so that we should submit."'"

The sentence: "and we are commanded that we should submit" is an explicative appositive for: "surely the Guidance of Allãh, which is the (true) guidance", the command to submit is the application of Allãh's guidance. So, the meaning is: 'Allãh has commanded us to submit to Him' and the active subject of this verbal clause [i.e., 'Allãh'] has been kept vague in order to facilitate the clause 'to the Lord of the worlds' thus replacing the pronoun 'Him'. This explains the reason for the command: We have been commanded by the revelation to submit to Allãh because He is the Lord of the worlds altogether – there is no other god or gods for all the worlds or for some of them (as believed by the dualists).

'Submitting' in this verse apparently means submitting all affairs to the Almighty and not just uttering the two testimonies of faith; and that is the apparent means of His Word: Surely the religion with Allãh is Islam (3:19), as mentioned earlier.

QUR'ÃN [6:72]: And that you should keep up prayer and be careful of (your duty to) Him; and He it is to Whom you shall be gathered: This displays skilful coherence of the speech wherein the command [in the previous verse] has been taken in the sense of the statement and follows the same course. As if it is said: 'We have been told to submit to the Lord of the worlds and to keep up prayer and be careful of Him.' The verse has summarized the detailed religious duties in the term: "and be careful of (your duty to) Him." It has, however, specifically singled out, from all the duties, the daily prayers by name in order to emphasize its importance and honour its status; the importance that the Noble Qur'ãn has given to the daily prayer is no doubt obvious.

His, the Sublime's Word: "and He it is to Whom you shall be gathered." It is obligatory to submit to Him and to be careful of Him because the return of humans is to Him and reckoning and compensation is in His hands.

QUR'ÃN [6:73]: And He it is Who has created the heavens and the earth with truth; and on the day He says: "Be", it is. His word is the truth and His is the Kingdom on the day when the trumpet shall be blown; the Knower of the unseen and the seen; and He is the Wise, the Aware**:

A number of names and qualities of Almighty have been mentioned here in order to clarify and justify what has been said previously. The Almighty has mentioned that the true guidance belongs to Him; and that was further explained by submitting to Him, praying to Him and being careful of Him – that is indeed the entirety of the faith. Then He explained the reason why His guidance is the true guidance that cannot be ignored: all will be gathered to Him. He further gives the full explanation by His Word: "And He it is Who has created the heavens and the earth…" These names and qualities are such that even if one of those were missing, the statement would not have been complete.

And His Word: "And He it is Who has created the heavens and the earth with truth", means that the entire creation is His work and that He had done it on basis of truth, not falsehood; and if the work is not based on falsehood, then it must have a purpose and there is a purpose to creation – to return to the Almighty [for reckoning and compensation]. This is one of the two arguments that the Almighty has mentioned in these words: And We did not create the heavens and the earth and what is between them in vain; that is the opinion of those who disbelieve… (38:27). So, creating the heavens and the earth on basis of truth leads to the point that the creation will be gathered to Him [on resurrection].

And His Word: "and on the day He says: 'Be', it is." The context shows that the objective of the statement 'Be' is the Day of Resurrection even though it could be applied to every existing creation as the Almighty says: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it, "Be," and it is, (36:82). So, 'the day' is an adverb denoting time connected to 'Be'; and the meaning is: The day He says to the Day of Resurrection, 'Be' and it will be. It is also said that the objective of the statement 'Be' is the thing [as in example of 36:82], then it comes to exist. However, what we have mentioned is closer to the context.

And His Word: "His word is the truth" This is a justification for the preceding sentence that is why it appears as a separate sentence. "al-Ḥaqq – the truth", means something that exists in the real sense of existence, an external existence [as opposed to a mental existence in the mind only]. If Allãh's word is His action and creation (as stated in "and on the day He says, 'Be', it is"), so His word is the truth itself, and therefore none can oppose or change His Word: He said: "The truth then (it) is and the truth do I speak," (38:84).

And His Word: "and His is the Kingdom on the day when the trumpet shall be blown;" This refers to the Day of Resurrection as He (s.w.t.) has said: (Of) the day when they shall come forth… (40:16). The meaning of the phrase: "His is the Kingdom on the day of trumpet" – even though the kingdom belongs to Him at all times – is its manifestation when all means of support will disappear and all relationships and family ties will be cut off. Some segment of this theme has occurred in previous discussions and more discussions on it and on the meaning of the trumpet will come in its appropriate place, Allãh willing.

His, the Sublime's Word: "the Knower of the unseen and the seen; and He is the Wise, the Aware." Its meaning has occurred in the past; and it is a name of the Almighty that incorporates the process of reckoning and compensation. Similarly, the two names: the Wise, the Aware. So, Allãh, by His knowledge of the seen and the unseen, knows everything inside out; neither is its outward dimension hidden from Him because of its appearance nor is its interior because of its being inside. By His Wisdom, He perfectly manages the process of creation, and separates the necessary compensation as required so that He does not do injustice or deal blindly [with the people]. By His awareness, neither a small entity escapes His attention because of its minuteness or a great entity because of its greatness.

These names and attributes perfectly clarify that all the people will be gathered to Him; and that His guidance is the true guidance; and that the religion of fiṭrah that He has ordered us to follow is the true faith. So, the Almighty has created the universe for a specific purpose: it should return to Him; and when He wants it to return, He shall say to it 'Be', and it will come to existence because His Word is the truth that no one can oppose. It will be clearly manifest on that day that the kingdom belongs to Him and nothing has any power on anything. On that day, on basis of wisdom and awareness, He will separate those who obeyed Him from those who disobeyed because He knows every unseen and seen reality.

The conclusions of the above discussion are as follows:

Firstly, the meaning of "with truth" is that the creation of the heavens and the earth was with truth in the sense that 'truth' is its quality. The discussion on the meaning that Allãh's actions and statements are with truth just passed above. So, the opinion expressed by some that the verse means 'He created the heavens and the world with a true word' is far-fetched. ["Truth" in this verse is the attribute of the Allãh's action, i.e., creation; and not of His word.]

Secondly, the apparent meaning of: "and on the day He says, 'Be', it is", based on the context, refers to the command for bringing about the Day of Resurrection even though the command 'Be' is commonly used for creation of all things.

Thirdly, the purpose of specifically mentioning the blowing of the trumpet (out of the various signs of resurrection) in: "on the day when the trumpet shall be blown", is to emphasize the general nature of the gathering that ties in with the preceding verse: and He it is to Whom you shall be gathered. "al-Ḥashr – the gathering" refers to the resurrection of the people and marshalling them all together in a state of confusion. The trumpet is normally blown to gather the soldiers of a barrack for an important matter; similarly, the trumpet will be blown (i.e., the second trumpet on the Day of Resurrection) in order to gather the people at the place of assembly for judgement. So this day no soul shall be dealt with unjustly in the least; and you shall not be rewarded aught but which you did, (36:54).

The term 'day' has occurred twice in this verse but in different meanings: the first instance is in form of an adverb denoting general time such as the time for the Resurrection Day, as we would say: 'the day when Allãh created the movement' and 'the moment when Allãh created the days and the nights'. Here 'the day' is part of the movement, depending on it, and 'the moment' is the day and the night. The second instance is in the meaning of the Day of Resurrection itself.

TRADITIONS

1. as-Suyūṭī, in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, under the verse: He separates the truth… [6:57] says that ad-Dãrquṭnī, in al-Ifrãd, and Ibn Marduwayh have quoted from Ubay ibn Ka'b who said: "The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) recited it for a person as يَقُصُّ – yaquṣṣu: He separates the truth and He is the best of separators (between truth and falsehood)." [That is, as it has occurred in the common recitation of the Qur'ãn.]

2. He also quoted under the verse: And with Him are the keys of the unseen – none knows them but He… [6:59], that Aḥmad, al-Bukhãrī, Ḥashīsh ibn Aṣram in al-Istiqãmah; Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Ibn 'Umar that the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) said: "The keys of the unseen are five, none knows them but Allãh: no one knows what will happen tomorrow except Allãh; no one knows when the wombs will let go their burden except Allãh; no one knows when the rain will come except Allãh; no soul knows in what land will it die except Allãh; and no one knows when the Hour [of Doom] will come except the Almighty Allãh." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: If this narration is authentic, it should not be considered as contrary to the general import of the verse since numbers are not to be taken literally. All the examples mentioned in the narration can be summarized in one category of future events; and there are other applications of the unseen other than these five as proven in the verse itself.

3. as-Suyūṭī also says that al-Khaṭīb has quoted in his at-Tãrīkh a narration from Ibn ʻUmar, through a weak chain [of narrators] that the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) said: "There is not a grain on the face of the earth or a fruit on the trees but on it is written: 'In the name of Allãh, the Compassionate, the Merciful; this is the sustenance of so-and-so.' And that is the meaning of the Sublime's Word: and there falls not a leaf but He knows it, nor a grain in the darkness of the earth, or anything green or dry but (it is all) in a clear book." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: Besides the weakness in its chain of narrators, the content of this narration does not properly fit the verse.

4. al-ʻAyyãshī in his at-Tafsīr narrates from Abu 'r-Rabīʻ ash-Shãmī who said: "I asked Abū ʻAbdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] (ʻa.s.) about the Word of Allãh: and there falls not a leaf but He knows it, nor a grain in the darkness of the earth, or anything green or dry but (it is all) in a clear book." He [ʻa.s.] said: "The leaf refers to the miscarriage, the grain refers to a child, the darkness of the earth refers to the wombs, and green refers to the child who will be born while dry refers to the miscarried [foetus]. And all of that is in a clear book."

The author says: This has also been narrated by al-Kulaynī and aṣ-Ṣadūq from Abu 'r-Rabīʻ, and by al-Qummī without a sanad. This narration does not fit with the apparent meaning of the verse.[23] There is a similar narration quoted by al-ʻAyyãshī from al-Ḥusayn ibn Saʻīd from Abu 'l-Ḥasan (ʻa.s.).

5. aṭ-Ṭabrisī in Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn [under verse 6:65] says: "The verse Say: 'He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement from above you…' means the tyrant rulers; and: '…or from beneath your feet…' means the evil slaves and one who has no goodness in him. This has been narrated from Abu ʻAbdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] (ʻa.s.)."

Then he said: "As for the verse: …or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties…, it has been said that it means to put one against the other by placing enmity and prejudice among them; and this has been narrated from Abū ʿAbdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] (ʿa.s.)." Then he said: "As for statement: ...and make some of you taste the fighting of others, it has been said that it refers to bad neighbours; and that has been narrated from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (ʿa.s.) as well."

[23] Nonetheless, this narration can easily qualify as the esoteric interpretation of the verse. (tr.)

6. al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr [under the verse 6:65] says: "The verse: ...He should send on you a chastisement from above you..., means the tyrant ruler; and: ...or from beneath your feet..., means the low class and those in whom there is no goodness; and: ...or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties..., refers to tribal prejudice; and: ...and make some of you taste the fighting of others, refers to bad neighbours."

7. al-Qummī says: "In the narration of Abu 'l-Jārūd who quotes Abū Jaʿfar [al-Bãqir] (ʿa.s.) saying about the His Word: 'He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement from above you, means the smoke and sky from the heaven; and: or from beneath your feet, means the sinking of the ground; and: or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties; refers to difference in religion and mutual accusation among the Muslims; and: and make some of you taste the fighting of others, refers to some of you killing the others. All this is related to the people of the qiblah (the Muslim ummah) as Allãh says: See how repeatedly We display the signs that they may understand.'" (at-Tafsīr)

8. Also, in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr ʿAbdu 'r-Razzãq, ʿAbd ibn Ḥamīd, al-Bukhãrī, at-Tirmidhī, an-Nasã'ī, Nuʿaym ibn Ḥammãd in al-Fitan, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, Ibn Ḥibbãn, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh and al-Bayhaqī in al-Asmã' wa 'ṣ-ṣifãt narrated from Jãbir ibn ʿAbdillãh who said: "When this verse: He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement from above you, was revealed, the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) said: 'I take refuge by Thy Honour!' ...or from beneath your feet, he (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) said: 'I take refuge by Thy Honour!' ...or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties; and make some of you taste the fighting of others. He (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) said: 'This is lighter' or 'easier.'" (as-Suyūtī)

The author says: Also, similar to this (ḥadīth) has been quoted by Ibn Marduwayh from Jãbir.

9. as-Suyūṭī says that Aḥmad, Tirmidhī, Ḥassanah, Nuʿaym ibn Ḥammãd in al-Fitan, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim and Ibn Marduwayh have quoted from Saʿd ibn Abī Waqqãṣ a statement from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) about this verse: Say: "He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement from above you or from beneath your feet," The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.‘a.w.a.) said: "This is surely going to happen, and its interpretation has yet to come." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: There are many narrations from the Sunnī sources as well as from the Shī‘ī sources from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (‘a.s.) which say that the punishment that Allãh has threatened from above them and from beneath their feet refers to the cry from the heaven and the sinking of the land that will happen to this ummah. As for throwing them into confusion, dividing them in groups and making them taste the atrocities of one another, these have already occurred.

10. as-Suyūṭī in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr and Ibn Kathīr in his at-Tafsīr have narrated many reports showing that when the verse: Say: "He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement from above you or from beneath your feet, or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties; and make some of you taste the fighting of others." See how repeatedly We display the signs that they may understand; was revealed, the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.‘a.w.a.) sought refuge with his Lord and prayed that He would not punish his ummah with a variety of punishments. His Lord responded positively in case of some punishments but not in case of other punishments: throwing them into confusion and thereby dividing them into groups, and making them taste the fighting of one another.

The author says: These narrations, in spite of their numbers and a mixture of strong and weak chains of narrators, are all feeble because they go against the apparent meaning of the verse. Indeed the two verses following the verse under discussion: And your people call it a lie and it is the very truth. Say: "I am not placed in charge of you. For every prophecy is a term, and you will come to know (it)," [6:66-67] are explicit warning about occurrence [of the chastisement]; moreover, these verses from sūrah of "al-An‘ãm" were revealed all together and Allãh, the Sublime, commanded His Prophet (ṣ.a.‘a.w.a.) to convey them to his ummah. If there had been any change in form of lifting the chastisement, then it was imperative to see that in His revelation, that cannot be affected by falsehood from any direction; and we don't see any trace of such a change, instead what we see is contrary to that as seen in the discussion above that many verses from the Holy Qur’ãn support these verses in their message such as the ones in the *sūrah*s of: "Yūnus", "Rūm", etc. Furthermore, these narrations contradict many other narrations from both the Sunnī and Shī‘ī sources demonstrating the occurrence of the chastisement on the ummah in future.

In addition to this, these narrations [quoted by as-Suyūṭī and Ibn Kathīr], in spite of their numbers and agreement that the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) prayed after revelation of verse: Say: "He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement…", they are not united in the number of [items in the prayer]: some say that there were three while others say that there were four; nor are they united in the number of cases that Allãh accepted for him: some say one while others say two. They also disagree in the category of the items: some say that it was a plea about protection from stones raining from the sky, sinking into the earth, being divided into groups and fighting against one another while some say that it was for protection against drowning into the sea, drought and infighting among the ummah. Still, others say it was for protection against wide-spread drought, being overpowered by a foreign enemy and infighting among the Muslims. In some it says that the subjects of the prayer was that the ummah would not unite on misguidance and that a foreign enemy would not overpower them and that He would not destroy them by drought and protect them from division and infighting. Still other narrations say that the plea was for not being overpowered by others and that He would not destroy them by drowning and would not make them fight one another. In some narrations, it says that the plea was that Allãh would not destroy the ummah by means of chastisement used to destroy the previous nations; He would not impose others over them, would not make them divided and not make them fight one another. Some narrations say that he [ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.] pleaded that the ummah be protected from the chastisement from their above and from beneath their feet and from being divided and from infighting.

Finally, many of these narrations say that the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) prayed while he was in Ḥurrah of Banū Muʿãwiyah, a village from the villages of the Anṣãr, in the northern part of Medina. This means that the prayer was made after the hijrah while we know that sūrah of "al-Anʿãm" is a chapter that was revealed in Mecca, all together, before the hijrah! And there are many other differences in the narrations which are obvious for anyone who looks into them.

If it is necessary for me to take something from these narrations, then I will choose what was narrated by ʿAbdu 'r-Razzãq, ʿAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Ibn Marduwayh from Shadãd ibn Aws who has narrated a marfuʿ ḥadīth from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) who said: "Verily Allãh contracted the earth for me until I was able to see its easts as well as its wests, and [I came to realize that] my ummah will reach to the areas that had been contracted for me; and that I was gifted with two treasures: 'red' and 'white'. I prayed to my Lord not to destroy my people by a general drought, or confuse them in sects, or make them taste the violence of one another. He [s.w.t.] said: 'O Muḥammad, once I decree something, it cannot be changed and I, hereby, grant you, for your ummah, that I will not destroy them by a general drought and I will not impose on them an enemy besides them to destroy them until they destroy and kill one another and take one another as prisoners.' The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) said: 'I fear for my ummah the misguiding leaders; when the sword is unleashed in my ummah [against one another], it will not be relieved from them until the Day of Resurrection.'"

This narration and its content are free from most of the objections raised above, and there is no indication that this prayer was after the revelation of the verse [under discussion]. It should, however, be taken in the meaning of the total destruction and widespread drought that would obliterate the ummah; otherwise, the droughts, disasters and bloodsheds that the ummah has faced in wars imposed by the Mongols, the Crusaders and [the Christians] in Spain and other places cannot be denied. It should also be said that this prayer and plea was in the early days of Islam before this sūrah was revealed. The Holy Prophet (s.a.ʻa.w.a.), after all, is well-aware of the status of his Lord and is on a high status himself to ask his Lord to change His decree after having received these verses and being ordered to convey them and to warn his ummah about it.

After lengthy discussion, the verses of the Noble Qur'ãn prove that it is engulfed by the truth; and the truth is that this religion of Islam is to stay till the Day of Resurrection and that the ummah will not be totally annihilated, and the means by which Allãh has tested the past nations will be used to test this ummah also in a completely identical manner without any difference and failure. Numerous narrations from the Holy Prophet and the Imãms of Ahlul 'l-Bayt (ʻa.s.), that are authentic and clear, confirm this truth.

11. as-Suyūṭī says: "In his an-Nãsikh, an-Naḥḥãs has quoted Ibn ʻAbbãs regarding the verse: Say: 'I am not placed in charge of you;' [6:66], he said: 'This verse has abrogated the verse: then slay the idolaters wherever you find them, [9:5].'"

The author says: From our previous discussion, it is clear that the statement Say: "I am not placed in charge of you;" is an introductory context for the warning which occurs in the next verse: For every prophecy is a term, and you will come to know (it), [6:67]. A statement such as this cannot be abrogated [since it is not a command, but a prediction].

12. In the discussion on verse: And when you see those who engage in vain discourses about Our signs… [6:68], al-Qummī quotes ʻAbdu 'l-Aʻlã' ibn Aʻyan through his chain of narrators that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.ʻa.w.a.) said: "Whoever believes in Allãh and the Last Day, he should not sit in a gathering wherein an Imãm is being insulted or a Muslim is being slandered because verily Allãh says in His Book that: And when you see those who engage in vain discourses about Our signs, withdraw from them until they enter into some other discourse, and if the Satan causes you to forget, then do not sit after recollection with the unjust people." (at-Tafsīr)

13. as-Suyūṭī quotes from ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr and Abū Nuʻaym in his al-Ḥilyah from Abū Jaʻfar [al-Bãqir] who said: "Do not sit with the argumentative people since they are the ones who negatively engage in Allãh's verses." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

14. as-Suyūṭī quotes from ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibn Mundhir from Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī [al-Bãqir] who said: "Verily the dissenters are those who negatively engage in Allãh's verses." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

15. al-ʻAyyãshī quotes from Rubʻī ibn ʻAbdillãh from someone whom he mentioned from Abū Jaʻfar [al-Bãqir] (ʻa.s.) about the Word of Allãh: And when you see those who engage in vain discourses about Our signs… He [ʻa.s.] said: "[Engaging in vain discourses about Our signs, means] to dispute about Allãh and to argue about the Qur'ãn." And about: withdraw from them until they enter into some other discourse, he [ʻa.s.] said: "The story-teller." (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: As you can see, these narrations are broader than the content of the verse, and it's actually applying the criterion on similar examples.

16. aṭ-Ṭabrisī quotes Abū Jaʻfar [al-Bãqir] (ʻa.s.) who said: "When the verse: then do not sit after recollection with the unjust people, was sent down, the Muslims said: 'What should we do? Whenever the polytheists would ridicule the Qur'ãn, we used to get up and leave them; we stopped entering the Sacred Mosque and doing the circumambulation of the Sacred House.' So, Allãh revealed: And nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil), but (theirs) is only to remind, haply they may guard; [6:69], commanding them to counsel them as much as they could." (Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn)

The author says: As you can see, this narration has taken the word 'reminding' as a general passive particle and has related the pronouns in 'haply they may guard' to the polytheists thus implying the following meaning: 'but remind them the reminder, haply they may guard themselves.' A problem still exists since the sūrah was revealed altogether while the narration talks of a specific incident regarding this verse.

17. as-Suyūṭī narrates from Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Abu 'sh-Shaykh from Ibn Jarīj who said that the polytheists used to sit with the Holy Prophet (s.a.ʻa.w.a.) wishing to listen from him. But once they had heard [the verses], they used to ridicule them. Therefore, the verse: And when you see those who engage in vain discourses about Our signs, withdraw from them…, was revealed. He said: "Whenever they used to ridicule, he would stand up and go away. Some of them realized this and said: 'Don't ridicule since he goes away.' This is reflected in the words: haply they may guard against negatively engaging in the Qur'ãnic verses and he would consequently stand up. Then the verse: And nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil),' was revealed so that you would sit with them but you shouldn't sit. Then this verse was abrogated in Medina by the verse: And indeed He has revealed to you in the Book that when you hear Allãh's communications disbelieved in and mocked at, do not sit with them until they enter into some other discourse. Surely then you would be like them [4:140]. This verse abrogated the verse 6:69." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: If the verse: and indeed He has revealed to you… [4:140] which is identical in meaning to: when you see those who engage in vain discourses, abrogates the verse: and nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil), then the verse: and nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil), abrogates the verse: when you see those who engage in vain discourses. This is not compatible with the fact that this sūrah was revealed altogether.

Moreover, the meanings of the three verses [6:68; 6:69; 4:140] do not have any conflict so that the second could abrogate the first and then be abrogated by the third one. This is obvious.

18. Similar to this narration is another one which as-Suyūṭī quotes from an-Naḥḥãs in his an-Nãsikh from Ibn ʻAbbãs about verse: And nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil), who said: "This is a Meccan verse that was abrogated in Medina by the verse: And indeed He has revealed to you in the Book that when you hear Allãh's communications disbelieved in and… [4:140], (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

19. Sayyid Hãshim, under the verse: His word is the truth and His is the Kingdom…, quotes from Ibn Bãbawayh, through his chain of narrators, from Thaʻlabah ibn Maymūn from his companions from Abū ʻAbdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] (ʻa.s.) about the Word of Allãh: the Knower of the unseen and the seen, that he [ʻa.s.] said: "The Knower of 'the unseen' means of what is not yet existing, and 'the seen' means what is already existing." (Tafsīru 'l-burhãn)

The author says: This ḥadīth mentions the most known examples of the unseen and the seen in our world. In the previous discussion under the verse and in other places, it was mentioned that there are other examples of the unseen also.

COMMENTARY

These are ten verses in which the Almighty Allãh mentions the arguments that He had granted to the great Prophet Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) against polytheists thereby guiding him towards His Unity and pure concept of Divinity. Then He mentions the guidance that He provided to His prophets by purifying their nature from polytheism; among them He has named Nūḥ ('a.s.), who was before Ibrãhīm ('a.s.), and sixteen prophets from the descendants of Nūḥ ('a.s.).

In reality, these verses are elucidation for a perfect example of living by the religion of nature (fitrah) and standing up for spreading the belief of monotheism and purifying the concept of divinity from polytheism and idolatry; that is the faith for which Ibrãhīm stood up and defended against idolatry when the whole world was seemingly engulfed by it and had forgotten the path of monotheism that Nuḥ ('a.s.) and the prophets from among his descendants had introduced to the human society. These verses – consisting of arguments and guidance towards the religion of nature (fitrah) – are like further reflection upon the arguments that passed earlier in this chapter that Almighty Allãh has taught to His Prophet (s.a.'a.w.a.) by His Word like "Say this" and "Say that". The word "Say" has occurred in this noble chapter forty times, about twenty times before these verses. It seems as if it said: in what you say to your people and present to them the arguments of monotheism and rejection of polytheism that We have taught you, remember what Ibrãhīm said to his father and his people of what We had given to him of Our arguments against his people based on what We showed him of the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth. Ibrãhīm used to argue against them on basis of Divine blessings of knowledge, wisdom and demonstration of His Kingdom based on conviction and not on fabricated idea founded on imagination and concoction that is rejected by the voice of the pure nature.

If we ponder on the tone of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) in what Allãh, the Sublime has quoted of him in these verses with minds that are free of the details seen in the narrations and history with their obvious contradictions, and that are untainted by disputes put forth by the commentators of the Qur'ãn who have contaminated their exegeses with the narrations, historical tales, stores from the Old Testament and other materials that become popular from Isrã'īliyãt. In short, such a reflection will clearly show that Ibrãhīm's tone in these verses was a speech emanating from a pure mind, void of the variety of ideas and imaginations, put in form of words by his pure nature which was in its initial stages of intellection and reflection and had subtlety of consciousness and feelings.

An unbiased observer who reflects on these verses will not doubt that Ibrãhīm's statement with his people was closest to the speech of a primitive and simple human being who lived in an underground tunnel or a cave in the mountain; who did not associate with people except for obtaining the necessary food and clothing; who had not surveyed the sky with its stars and celestial bodies or the rising of the sun and the moon; who had not stayed in a highly populated society with its vast cities, divergence of ideas, differences of goals and objectives, and varieties of its religions and sects. Then by chance he happened to enter the organized societies and observed unusual issues unfamiliar to him such as the celestial bodies, vast land mass, groups of people busy in their jobs struggling to obtain their goals and objectives without being distracted by anyone whether moving or standing, worker or employer, servant or master, superior or subordinate, leader or follower, busy in work or devotedly worshiping Allãh.

Whatever he saw bewildered him, whatever he observed overwhelmed him, and so he started asking his associates about everything that he saw, and whatever drew his attention that surprised him just like a child who observes the vastness of the sky with its shinning sun and moon, as well as the necklace of bright stars, and asks his mother: 'What are these things that I see that fills me with delight and amazement? Who has decorated them in the sky? Who has illuminated them? Who has made them?'

We, of course, don't doubt that the initial questions that this person asks about the reality of things that he observes and that surprise him are closer to his state of loneliness and isolation from the society; and that he is asking about the purposes and goals of these entities that cannot be answered through the senses only. A human being seeks answers regarding the unknown based on whatever initial information that he possesses; he does not discover the answer regarding the unknown but by means of the information that he already possesses. This is an obvious matter seen in simple-minded people such as children and Bedouins when they come face to face with things that they had not known or seen before, so they start inquiring about what they know briefly and asking about its reality, its origins and its goals.

The person in consideration here is the person of pure nature who had engaged in only simple means of survival and therefore his mind was not occupied the way the mind of a city dwelling person would be occupied who is surrounded by a variety and countless natural activities which does not relieve him even for a moment. The thoughts and mind of the person in consideration are untainted, and now he is surrounded with the celestial and earthly incidents whose natural causes are unknown to him. His mind, therefore, is more receptive in reaching [directly] to the cause that is superior to the natural causes – a conclusion to which a city dwelling person reaches after completing the survey of the natural causes for the incidents, that also if he has the time! Consequently, it was faster for the mind of the person in consideration to reach to the supreme cause when he saw the city-dwellers busy in adhering and worshipping Him.

A proof for what we have mentioned above can be found in what we observe: adherence to religious rituals and discussion about metaphysics is more prevalent and more important in Asia than compared to Europe; and in villages and small towns it has more prestige than compared to bigger cities, and on same basis between the bigger cities and mega cities. This is so because the more the society expands, its basic needs increase and its activities multiply manifolds which leaves no opportunity for a person to easily get in touch with his spirituality and focus on the issue of the origin and the end.

In short, when we survey the story of Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) mentioned in these verses and similar ones in verses of chapters "Maryam", al-"Anbiyã'", "aṣ-Ṣãffãt", etc. We find his situation in his arguments with his sire and his people to be similar to the situation of a simple person whom we find asking about the idols and disputing with the people about them, and talking about the stars, the moon and the sun – asking questions like one who was not familiar with what the people were doing, especially when it came to his own people who were worshipping idols. He says to his sire and his people: When he said to his father and his people: "What are these images to whose worship you cleave?" (21:52); When he said to his father and his people: "What do you worship?" They said: "We worship idols, so we shall be their votaries." He said: "Do they hear you when you call? Or do they profit you or cause you harm?" They said: "Nay, we found our fathers doing so." (26:70-74)

This is the statement of a person who had neither seen an idol nor observed an idolater worshipping an idol even though he was in the cradle of idolatry, Babylon of Chaldea, and lived among them for a time. So was Ibrãhīm's expression, 'What are these images?', a way of belittling the idols and an indication that he does not accord them the same place accorded to them by the people, and that he does not see any sacredness and virtue in them? It seems as if he does not know them the way Pharaoh talked to Moses ('a.s.) when he said: "And what is the Lord of the worlds?" (26:23); or the way the polytheists of Meccan talked to the Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) as the Almighty Allãh has quoted: And when those who disbelieve see you, they do not take you but for one to be scoffed at: "Is this he who speaks of your gods?" And they are deniers at the mention of the Beneficent God, (21:36).

It seems far-fetched to think in that way since Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) used nothing but the best of manners in his speech to his father Ãzar. Even when his father shunned him and threatened him with stoning, Ibrãhīm ['a.s.] said to him: "Peace be on you, I will pray to my Lord to forgive you; surely He is ever Affectionate to me." (19:47)

It is far-fetched to believe that in the first discussion that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) had with his father, he would belittle the lofty status of his gods in abusing and insulting tone, and thus provoke his prejudice and idolatrous tendencies. Moreover, Allãh, the Glorified, had forbidden in this religion, the pure religion of Ibrãhīm, to abuse the gods of the polytheists, so that it does not provoke them to respond to the Muslims in kind. The Almighty says: And do not abuse those whom they call upon besides Allãh, lest exceeding the limits they should abuse Allãḥ out of ignorance, (6:108).

After having argued with his father, Ãzar, and his people about the idols, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) focuses his attention on their lords: the star, the sun and the moon. When he saw the star, he said: "This is my Lord;" then he saw the moon rising, he said: "This is my Lord;" but then he saw the sun rising, he said: "This is my Lord, this is bigger." These expressions also reflect the situation of a person who had neither seen the star nor the moon and the sun. His clearest form of argument is when he said about the sun: "This is my Lord, this is bigger." This seems to be the statement of someone who did not know anything about the sun or the moon or the star other than the fact that he saw the people humbling themselves towards them, worshipping them and giving offerings for them as the history of the Babylonians shows.

It is just like a situation when you observe a blurred human shape and do not know whether it is a man or a woman, you would ask: " مَنْ هَـذَا Who is this?" You will then be told: "This is so-and-so woman or so-and-so man." And when you observe a blurred shape and you cannot discern whether it is a human or an animal or a tree, you would ask: "مَا هَذَا What is that?" You will then be told: "This is Zayd or this is so-and-so woman or it is shape of such-and-such item." In these situations, you being ignorant of the reality will ask about the identity of the shape whether it is of an intelligent human or an animal or whether it is a male or a female based on what you can discern from the vague shape. But the person giving the answer, since he is aware of the reality, will respond according to the reality.

The appearance of Ibrãhīm's statement that: "This my Lord" and "This is my Lord, this is bigger", show that he did not know much about the sun other than the fact that it rises; and that it is bigger than the moon and the star; and that people refer to it for worship and rituals. Referring to this kind of [partial] knowledge by the expression "this – هَذَا [hadhã in masculine form]" is no doubt appropriate. But the reality that the sun was the celestial body that manages the world by its light and facilitates the night and the light by its movement as discerned by our senses or that the moon or the star rise every night from the eastern horizon and set in the opposite horizon in the west – he did not know these realities as can be seen from his expressions. If he had known this, he would have said about sun: "This – هَذِهِ [hãdhihi in feminine form] is my Lord, this is bigger", or he would have said: "Surely she is my Lord, she is bigger". [Note: In Arabic language, 'sun' is a feminine noun; and so the appropriate indication to it should be hadhihi and not hadhã.] Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) realized this fine point later on as can be seen in his argument with Namrūd (Nimrod) when he said: "So surely Allãh brings the sun from the east, then bring it (you) from the west," (2:258). Referring to the sun in "bring it", he did not say 'bihi' [being a masculine pronoun, rather he said 'bihã' which is a feminine pronoun].

Similarly, when he ['a.s.] said to his father and his people as quoted by Allãh: "What do you worship?" They said: "We worship idols, so we shall be their votaries." He said: "Do they hear you when you call? Or do they profit you or cause you harm?" They said: "Nay, we found our fathers doing so;" (26:70-74). Ibrãhīm started by asking about their gods by using the term "mã – مَا what" [which is used for inanimate things rather than "man – مَنْ who"] since he had no knowledge about it other than the fact that it is an object. Then when they mentioned the idols (and they didn't believe that they had consciousness and will), they said: "so we shall be their votaries – fa-naẓallu lahaã" with the feminine hã. When he heard from them about the idols [being considered as gods], then it became compelling to describe them with the power to benefit, harm and hearing in response to those who call them, so now Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) describes them with being with intelligence. But then in the story of smashing the idols, they said: "Certainly you know that they do not speak," [21:65] in response to his question: "...therefore ask them, if they can speak." – Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) stripped them of the quality of intelligence and said: "What! Do you then serve besides Allãh what brings you not any benefit at all, nor does it harm you? Fie on you and on what you serve besides Allãh; what! Do you not then understand?" (21:66-67)

We cannot arbitrarily ignore these fine points and say that when Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) used the masculine form hadhã in "This my Lord, this is bigger," he was referring to the celestial body [as a body and not necessarily to the sun] or to the aforementioned entity or that in his Syriac language, like most non-Arabic languages, feminine is not taken into consideration. This is just an arbitrary view. Moreover, when his talk with the king about the sun, he specifically said: "So surely Allãh brings the sun from the east, then bring it (you) from the west," (2:258), [in which he uses the feminine pronoun 'hã']. If the Qur'ãn did not use the style of his own language in this case, then why did he say, "This is my Lord, this is bigger" [using the masculine form]?

The same question will come when Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) asked his people about the idols: "What are these (هَذِهِ) images to whose worship you cleave?" (21:52). And also in his prayer: "...save me and my sons from worshipping idols. My Lord! Surely they (هُنَّ) have led many men astray..." (14:35-36). [In both these cases, feminine pronouns have been used.]

Neither is it acceptable to say that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) used masculine form in the demonstrative pronoun for the sun in order to safeguard Allãh's honour from the blemish of femininity or because the predicate has to follow the subject of the nominal clause which was masculine: "My Lord" [being the subject clause] and "bigger" [being the predicate]. All this arbitrary interpretations have no proof to stand on. The details will follow later on.

In summary, these verses and other similar verses in which the Almighty Allãh has described the arguments of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) to his father and his people on Allãh's unity and negating partners from Him are statements that contextually prove that he previously lived in an environment away from that of his father and his people and was not familiar with what the people knew as far as details of the celestial bodies and social norms prevalent among them are concerned. And that it was during his early age of maturity and discernment that he left his isolation and joined his father and found idols with him; so he inquired about their status and when he was informed about them, he argued against their divinity and put across a convincing proof. Then he argued with his people about the idols and silenced them.

Then he looked at their worshipping of a variety of idols from the stars, the moon and the sun, and he seemingly joined them in believing in them as gods, one after another: he monitored them continuously and whenever one of them would set, he would reject it and deny its divinity; then he would go to other body that they worshipped until that also would set in the day or the night as it is normal for the celestial bodies. Finally, he turned to the pure monotheism by saying: "Surely I have turned my face, being up-right, wholly to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth, and I am not of the polytheists;" [6:79]. It seems that he completed his arguments in two days and a night in between as we shall discuss soon, inshã' Allãh, High be He exalted.

Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was aware that the universe has a creator who brought forth the heavens and the earth, and that is Allãh alone who has no partner in this matter. He was discussing whether the people, including himself, had a lord other than Allãh, from His creation such as the sun, the moon etc., who provide for them, manage their affairs and are partners of Allãh in His decisions or that there is no lord for them but the Almighty Allãh alone with no partner?

In all these stages of discussions that Ibrãhīm covered, the Almighty Allãh helped him and supported him by showing him the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth, and disposed his noble soul to the direction in which all things were related to the Almighty Allãh in their creation and management. So, whenever he would look at a thing, he would see its connection to Allãh, and His creation and management of it before even he sees itself and its effects. This is clear from His Word: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and so that he might be of those who are sure; [6:75], and later on in that passage: And this was Our argument which we gave to Ibrãhīm against his people; We exalt in dignity whom We please; surely your Lord is Wise, Knowing; [6:83]. And certainly We gave to Ibrãhīm his rectitude before, and We knew him fully well (21:51). Also, from Ibrãhīm's conversation to his father: "O my father! Truly the knowledge has come to me which has not come to you, therefore follow me; I will guide you on a right path;" (19:43). That can also be seen in his arguments against King Namrūd who claimed divinity as was common for many of the tyrants in the past, and from that sprouted the idea of duality; and that his people had many gods and idols that they worshipped, including the major ones such as the sun, the moon and the star (most probably the Venus) that the Noble Qur'ãn had mentioned.

This is the summary of what can be gleamed from the noble verses, and we shall discuss its contents in detail as much as we can, inshã' Allãh, High be He exalted.

QUR'ÃN [6:74]: And (remember) when Ibrãhīm said to his sire, Azar: …

In the [canonical] seven recitations of the Qur'ãn, the last letter of "Azar*a* – آزَرَ" has the vowel point fatḥa [denoting the sound a] and so it becomes explicative apposition or substantive apposition for "لِأَبِيهِ – abīhi, his sire." In some [non-canonical] recitation, the last letter of "Azar*u*" appears with the vowel point ḍumma [denoting the sound u], in which case it is indicative noun in the vocative form and would mean: "O Azar, do you take idols for gods." Yet another recitation starts with interrogative ḥamza: "أ أزَرَاَ – a azra'a" followed by "أزَرَاَ – azra'a" in subjective form as vernal noun of azara, ya'ziru in the meaning of support, and the it would mean: "And (remember) when Ibrãhīm said to his sire: 'Do you take the idols for gaining strength and support?'"

The commentators have differences of opinion on the first common as well as the second no canonical recitations on the word 'Azar': is the proper name of Ibrãhīm's father or is it a nickname used for praise in the meaning of the supporter or for blame in the meaning of the lame or the crocked, etc. The reason of these differences is the number of narrations in which his name has occurred as 'Tãriḥ' or 'Tãrikh' which is supported by the historical records, and even the present Old Testament says that Ibrãhīm was 'son of Tãrikh.'

They also differ in their opinions about the meaning of the word "ab – اَبْ ": does it mean the father, or the uncle, or the maternal grandfather, or a person of rank and authority. The basis of these differences is also the difference in narrations: some of them indicate that he was his father and that Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) will intercede on his behalf on the Day of Judgement but that his intercession will not be granted rather Allãh will transform him into a smelly hyena and so Ibrãhīm will disassociate himself from him. Other narrations say that he was not his father rather his father was a monotheist, not an idol worshipper, as is also indicated in narrations that the ancestors of the Holy Prophet Muḥammad (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) were all monotheists, not polytheists, etc.

Even in other dimensions of Ibrãhīm's story, the commentators have differences to a strange degree to the extent that some examples, such as those seen in the Old Testament, strip him of his status of being Allãh's friend, prophethood and messengership. They have stretched out these kinds of discussions until it ends in far-fetched conclusions that are outside the norms of the exegesis of the Qur'ãn as described by the holy verses about the purpose of pondering on them. Whoever wants to know about this may refer to the extensive commentaries, especially those on the pattern of exegesis based on the traditions.

What the reflections on the verses pertaining to the story of Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) indicate is that his first point of contact with his people was with a person mentioned in the Qur'ãn as his father Azar, and that he urged him to abandon the idols and to follow the religion of monotheism so that he can guide him until when his father forsaken him and asked him to leave him alone: And mention Ibrãhīm in the Book; surely he was a truthful (man), a prophet. When he said to his father: "O my father! Why do you worship what neither hears nor sees, nor does it avail you in the least. O my father! Truly the knowledge has come to me which has not come to you, therefore follow me; I will guide you on a right path..." He said: "Do you dislike my gods, O Ibrãhīm? If you do not desist I will certainly revile you, and leave me for a time." (19:41-46). So, Ibrãhīm bade him farewell and promised to pray for his forgiveness, hoping to entice him to the faith, the true success and the guidance: He said: "Peace be on you, I will pray to my Lord to forgive you; surely He is ever Affectionate to me; and I will withdraw from you and what you call on besides Allãh, and I will call upon my Lord; may be I shall not remain unblessed in calling upon my Lord." (19:47-48). The second verse is the best indication that Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) promised to pray for his forgiveness in this world and not that he will intercede on his behalf on the Day of Judgement even if he remained a disbeliever or on the condition that he didn't know about his disbelief.

Then the Almighty Allãh narrated the fulfillment of Ibrãhīm's promise and his prayer for forgiveness of his father: "My Lord: Grant me wisdom and join me with the good ones. And make for me a truthful tongue (goodly mention) among posterity; and make me of the heirs of the garden of bliss; and forgive my father, for surely he is of those who have gone astray. And disgrace me not on the day when they are raised, the day on which neither property will avail, nor sons, except him who comes to Allãh with a submissive heart," (26:83-89). The words: for surely he is of those who have gone astray; clearly show that Ibrãhīm prayed for his father after his death or after separating from and abandoning him by the term 'is'. The latter part of the verses indicate that Ibrãhīm's pray was done only in order to fulfill the promise that he had made as he himself says: 'Forgive this misguided person on the day of resurrection,' then he describes the day of resurrection as the day when nothing will be of use (neither wealth nor children) except the submissive heart.

The Almighty Allãh has clarified this reality in His Word that are in form of justification: And Ibrãhīm asking forgiveness for his sire was only owing to a promise which he had made to him; but when it became clear to him that he was an enemy of Allãh, he declared himself to be clear of him; most surely Ibrãhīm was very tender-hearted, forbearing, (9:114). The context of the verse shows that this prayer was done by Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) in this world so was the act of disassociating from him, not that he will pray for him and disassociate from him on the Day of Judgement. The context of the verse is the context of a general prohibitive command from which Ibrãhīm's prayer has been exempted by explaining that it was done in reality to fulfill his promise – there is no sense in exempting something that is going to take place in the future (for example on the Day of Judgement) from a legislative command given in this world and then talk about disassociation in the Hereafter.

In short, the Almighty describes the prayer of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) for his father and then his disassociation from him during the earlier stages of Ibrãhīm's era when he migrated to the holy land based on his plea for wisdom, for being included among the good-doers and for good descendents as seen in the verses above: "My Lord: Grant me wisdom and join me with the good ones;" [26:83]. And also the verse which includes the act of disassociating from his father and his people: Indeed, there is for you a good example in Ibrãhīm and those with him when they said to their people: "Surely we disassociate from you and from what you worship other than Allãh; we renounce you, and enmity and hatred have appeared between us and you for ever until you believe in Allãh alone" – but not in what Ibrãhīm said to his father: "I would certainly ask forgiveness for you, and I do not control for you aught from Allãh," (60:4).

Then, the Almighty Allãh mentions his intention to migrate to the holy land and his prayer for good descendents: And they desired a war against him, but We brought them low. And he said: "Surely I go to my Lord; He will guide me: My Lord! Grant me of the good ones," (37:98-100). Then He talks about his travel to the holy land and granting of good children to him: And they desired a war on him, but We made them the greatest losers. And We delivered him as well as Lūṭ (removing them) to the land which We had blessed for all people. And We gave him Isḥãq, and Ya'qūb as a father gift; and We made (them) good ones, (21:70-72). "And I will withdraw from you and what you call on besides Allãh, and I will call upon my Lord; may be I shall not remain unblessed in calling upon my Lord." So when he withdrew from them and what they worshipped besides Allãh, We gave to him Isḥãq and Ya'qūb, and each one of them We made a prophet, (19:48-49).

Finally, the Almighty describes Ibrãhīm's last prayer in Mecca which had taken place towards the end of his life after his migration to the holy land, after his children were born, after he had settled Ismã'īl in Mecca, after the town was settled and the Ka'bah had been built – that is the last statement of Ibrãhīm quoted in the noble Qur'ãn: And when Ibrãhīm said: "My Lord! Make this city secure, and save me and my sons from worshipping idols…O our Lord! Surely I have settled a part of my offspring in a valley uncultivatible near Thy Sacred House, our Lord! That they may establish prayer …Praise be to Allãh, Who gave me in old age Ismã'īl and Isḥãq; most surely my Lord is the Hearer of prayer…O our Lord, grant me protection and my parents and the believers on the day when the reckoning shall come to pass," (14:35-41).

The sequence of the verse and its context are the best indication that Ibrãhīm's father for whom he prayed in this verse is other than the person mentioned in the verse: "to his father, Azar". The verses clearly state that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) prayed for his forgiveness based on the promise that he made to him and then he disassociated from him when he found out that he was Allãh's enemy. There is no sense in him repeating the prayer for someone from whom he has disassociated and sought refuge with his Lord. So "his father Azar" is not his real father for whom he prayed along with his mother in his last prayer.

A subtle proof in this last prayer of Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) is the term "wãlidayya – وَلِوَالِدَيَّ – my parents": the term 'wãlid' is not used but for the real father from whom one is born, whereas in the previous prayer "and forgive my father, for surely he is of those who have gone astray;" [26:86], and other verses where Azar has been mentioned, Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) has used the term "ab – أَبْ " which can also be used for the grandfather, uncle and others. The Holy Qur'ãn contain examples of this usage [of ab or its plural ãbãʾ]: Or, were you witnesses when death approached Yaʿqūb, when he said to his sons: "What will you worship after me?" They said: "We will worship your God and the God of your fathers, Ibrãhīm and Ismãʿīl and Isḥãq, One God only, and to Him do we submit;" (2:133). Ibrãhīm was the grandfather of Yaʿqūb, and Ismãʿīl was his uncle, but were described as 'ab'. Also, the verse where Yūsuf (ʿa.s.) says, "And I follow the religion of my fathers, Ibrãhīm and Isḥãq and Yaʿqūb…" (12:38). Isḥãq was the grandfather of Yūsuf, and Ibrãhīm was his great grandfather, but both were described as 'ab'.

In conclusion, the Azar mentioned in the verse under discussion is not the real father of Ibrãhīm rather he had certain qualifications that allowed the usage of 'ab' for him, and so Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) addressed him by saying "O my father". Arabic language permits the usage of 'ab' for the grandfather, the uncle, the stepfather, the guardian and every elder who commands authority. This extensive usage of the term 'ab' is not confined to the Arabic language rather other languages also have similar kind of usage for the terms like mother, uncle, brother, sister, head, eye, mouth, hand, arm, finger, etc., which can be discerned by one who is familiar with the subtlety and the delicacy in comprehension and expression.

It is clear, firstly, that there is no need to get into the traditional, historical and literal discussions about the term 'ab' and whether 'Azar' is a proper name or a good or bad nickname or name of an idol. There is no need for any of this in understanding the meaning of this verse. Moreover, most of what exists on this subject is arbitrary views without any proof, disturbing the apparent meaning of the verse and its context by bringing in astonishing combinations that they mention for the sentence "Azar: Do you take idols for gods?" in form of relocating the phrases or deleting them and adding in implied phrases.

Secondly, Ibrãhīm's real father is other than Azar but the Qur'ãn has not spelled out his name; it has indeed occurred in the traditions and is supported by what is seen in the Old Testament that his name is Tãrikh.

One of the delusions of some commentators is that the Noble Qur'ãn while mentioning the history of the prophets and the nations and the stories of the past, ignores important points that are considered essential elements of the stories such as the date of the event, its location, and its geographical, social and political circumstances which were crucial in formation of the inner dynamics in occurrence of the events. From such points in the matter under discussion are elements crucial in understanding this story, such as the information about the name of Ibrãhīm's father, his genealogy, the history of the era of his childhood, movement, call and migration. [But the Qur'ãn is silent about it.]

This is so, in their view, because the Qur'ãn in its stories has adopted the path guided by the art of true story-telling: the story-teller selects in his story every possible method that takes him to his goal and purpose in a good way and represents the objective in a full and mature form without putting extra efforts in distinguishing the true elements of the story from the defective ones. Therefore, in order to achieve its goal of guidance towards the success, it was okay for the Qur'ãn to adopt stories that were in circulation among the people or among the Ahlu 'l-Kitãb of the Prophet's days even if their authenticity was not verified and lacked the crucial elements or was just an imaginary story (such as the story of Moses and the young lad or those who abandoned their cities in thousands in order to flee death, etc.) – the art of story-telling does not exclude anything of this category after the story-teller has determined that the story is the most eloquent means and the most easy method of reaching the goal.

This is, of course, incorrect. What has been mentioned about the art of story-telling is valid but it does not apply to the Qur'ãn because the Qur'ãn is not a book of history nor a page from the pages of the imaginary stories rather it is a glorious book which is protected from falsehood from all directions. It is definitely the speech of the Almighty Allãh and He does not say anything but the truth. There is nothing after truth but misguidance; He does not use falsehood in order to promote the truth nor does He support guidance by means of misguidance. It is a book that guides to the truth and the right path; in it is a convincing proof for one who beholds it, and it is against him who forsakes it.

How can a scholar who researches for the purpose of the Qur'ãn believe that it contains wrong ideas or false stories or superstitions or fanaticisms?

I don't mean to say that believing in Allãh, His Messenger and what His Messenger has brought necessarily means that one should deny that the Qur'ãn contains anything falsehood or lie or superstitious – even though it is such; nor do I mean that every person with valid intelligence and sound thoughts should humble himself to the Qur'ãn by affirming its truth and denying every falsehood and misguidance from it through the means of knowledge that he has attained to understand it – even though the Qur'ãn is such.

What I am actually saying is that the Qur'ãn itself claims that it is the Divine Speech, written for guiding the people to their real success, it guides by the truth and towards the truth; and therefore it is necessary for one who interprets such a book and looks for its purpose and message that he should consider it as truthful in its speech, factual in its reports and whatever it explains, or he should evaluate it on basis of its purposes and goals as a guide to the path which is free from falsehood, conveying the wayfarer to an immaculate destination.

How can it be that the goal is absolutely true yet falsehood creeps along its path which calls to that goal? How can an issue be the final word yet is considered as superstitious? How can it be that the statement or news is Allãh's speech who knows the unseen of the heavens and the earth yet ignorance, stupidity, and error would advance towards it? Can light produce darkness or ignorance produce knowledge?

This is the only method that an interpreter is not allowed to ignore in exposition of the verses of the Holy Qur'ãn while he believes that it is the true speech which cannot be touched by falsehood, neither in its destination nor in its path.

As for the discussion where the Qur'ãn is true in its claim that it is Allãh's speech and that it is absolutely true in its path as well as its goal or that what does the previous holy books (the Bible and Avesta) say about the Qur'ãn and its decisions or how does it relate to other historical or natural or mathematical or philosophical or social scholarly discourses? These and similar discussions are out-side the realm of Qur'ãnic exegesis and it is not permissible to combine them with it.

Yes, Allãh's statement: Do they not then mediate on the Qur'ãn? And if it were from any other than Allãh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy; (4:82), says that there are doubts and thoughts that come to the minds giving rise to the idea that the Qur'ãn has differences in the sense that one of its verse might seem to contradict another or that the contents of its verse might go against the truth and reality. If the Qur'ãn categorically states that it guides to the truth while its two verses contradict one another (in the sense that whatever is contained by one is the truth while the contents of the other one is not the truth), then the verse: Do they not then mediate on the Qur'ãn?... clearly states that some verses of the Qur'ãn are sufficient to dispel the ambiguity from other verses and that some of its verses clarify the unclear concepts of other verses. A scholar searching for the meaning and message of the Qur'ãn must seek help of some verses in order to understand the others, cite some verses to comprehend the others, and make some verses speak about the others. The Holy Qur'ãn is a book of call and guidance that does not deviate from its path, even by a step; it is not a book of history or story; its purpose is not that of a historical study nor is its style of the art of story-telling; it does not intend to give the genealogies or the mechanism of time and space nor other details that would enrich a historical study or fictional story.

What is the religious benefit in giving the genealogy of Ibrãhīm: son of Tãrikh (Terah), son of Nãḥūr (Nahor), son of Sarūj (Serug), son of Raʿau (Reu), son of Fãlij (Peleg), son of 'Ãbir (Eber), son of Shãliḥ (Salah), son of Arkshãdh (Arphaxad), son of Sam (Shem), son of Nūḥ (Noah)? Or to say that he was born in Ur of Chaldea around 2000 years before Christ in reign of so-and-so king who was born in such a place and reigned for this number of years and died in year so and so?

After the discussing the verses of this section, we shall put together a summary of Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.)'s story scattered in the Qur'ãn and then what is found in the Old Testament and other sources about his life and personality so that the insightful researcher can fairly see and then judge what the Qur'ãn has selected and confirmed.

Nonetheless, the Qur'ãn has not ignored whatever was necessary of the beneficial knowledge and did not forbid any discussion about the universe and its heavenly and earthly dimensions nor did it prevent anyone from enquiring about the stories of the past nations, social norms, previous generations, and seeking help through all that to acquire the necessary knowledge. The Qur'ãnic verses highly praise knowledge and encourage reflection, contemplation, deliberation and mediation in so many verses that there is no need to list them here.

QUR'ÃN: "Do you take idols for gods? Surely I see you and your people in manifest error."

ar-Rãghib in al-Mufradãt says: "The idol (صَنَمْ – ṣanam) is a body made from silver or copper or wood that they worshipped in order to seek closeness to the Almighty Allãh, and its plural is aṣnãm, اَصْنَامْ . The Almighty Allãh said: 'Do you take idols for gods?' [6:74]; 'I will certainly do something against your idols…' [21:57]." What ar-Rãghib says about the idol made from silver or copper or wood is just an example and not the exclusive source of its manufacture, rather it was made from whatever could be used to make an image from a variety of metals, stones and etc. It has been narrated that Banū Ḥunayfah, from al-Yamãmah, used to make an idol from cottage cheese; and sometimes they used to make it from the clay and at other times, it was just an illustrated picture.

In any case, the idols sometimes represented intangible dogmatic entity such as the god of the heaven and the earth, and the god of justice; and sometimes they represented tangible entity such as the sun and the moon. Both types of idols were found among the people of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) as seen from the archaeological finds of the ruins of Babylon; they used to worship them in order to seek nearness to their gods and through their gods to Almighty Allãh. This is an obvious example of the foolishness of human thoughts in the sense that he expresses ultimate humility – humility of a servant to his Lord – for an image which [erroneously] represents an entity of great importance, and glorifies it; in reality it means that the ultimate humility expressed by the created being for his Creator is now being expressed by the creator (i.e., the human) for his own creation (i.e., the idol). A person would take a piece of wood and carve an idol, and then he would place it [in a sacred area], worship it, express humility to it, and humble himself to it! That is why Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) has used the term "al-aṣnãm, the idols" in the verse as an indefinite noun [in other words, without the 'al'] in order to show their insignificance and ignominy since they are their products, created by their own hands as has been quoted in his statement to his people: Said: "What! Do you worship what you hew out?" (37:95), and also because they lack the most obvious qualities of divinity: knowledge and power as he said to his sire: What he said to his father: "O my father! Why do you worship what neither hears nor sees, nor does it avail you in the least." (19:42)

So, his statement: "Do you take idols for gods? Surely I see you and your people in manifest error," means: Do you take idols that have no significance in them as gods while God is an entity of great importance and so I consider you and your people to be in manifest error. How can this error not be clear to you because it entails worship and expression of humility from the maker [of the idol] who has knowledge and power of his product that lacks knowledge and power?

Although the verse under discussion is one of the arguments (rather summary of many arguments that Ibrãhīm presented to his father and his community as described in details in many verses of the Qur'ãn), it is the first argument he had with his father and his community. The arguments of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) that the Almighty Allãh has described consists of his argument with his father and his community on idol-worshipping, his argument on worshipping the star, the sun, and the moon, and his argument with the king.

As for his argument against worship of the star, the moon and the sun, the verses prove that it was done after the argument against idol-worshipping. Reflection and deeper insight [into the verses] show that his argument against the king occurred after his mission was known, and his opposition to paganism and Sabianism had spread, and after breaking of the idols; and the beginning of his arguments was his opposition to the faith of his father and those associated to him before he confronted the people and opposed them. The first argument that he presented for monotheism was his argument with his father and his community regarding idol-worshipping.

QUR'ÃN [6:75]: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and so that he might be of those who are sure*:

The context shows that the term "كَذَٰلِكَ – thus" refers to what was contained in the previous verse: "…I see you and your people in manifest error" in the sense that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was shown the truth in that [argument]. So the meaning would be: 'And with such an example of demonstration, We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth.' Based on this demonstrative pronoun and the indication in the following verse: (when the night over-shadowed him) which shows the connection of the later verses to the previous ones, the word "We show" refers to the past event [even though it has occurred in a future tense] just like the verse: And We desired to bestow a favour upon those who were deemed weak in the land… (28:5).

So, the meaning of this verse would be as follows: Verily We have shown Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth that caused him to argue with his father and his people in the matter of the idols making manifest to them their error. Hence We supported him with this providence and gift (i.e., showing of the Kingdom), so he was under this state [of Divine Grace] until the night over-shadowed him and he saw the star.

Therefore, the opinion expressed by some commentators that the words "And thus We show…" is like a parenthetical clause with no connection to verses before and after it, is not valid and should not be accepted. Same goes for their opinion that Ibrãhīm was shown the Kingdom first time when the night over-shadowed him and he saw a star.

As for: "the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth": "the kingdom – اَلمَلَكُوت , al-malakūt" is from "اَلمُلْك – al-mulk, authority, dominance" which is a verbal noun and implies the intensity of the meaning of dominance (like aṭ-ṭãghūt, اَلطَاغُوت the oppressor, and al-jabarūt, اَلجَبَرُوت powerful, in relation to aṭ-ṭughyãn, اَلطُغيَان and al-jabr, اَلجَبْر or al-jubrãn, اَلجُبْرَان respectively).

The meaning used in the Qur'ãn is its actual literal meaning without any modification like the other words used in the Divine Speech; of course, the corroborative application of that what be different. For example, the terms al-mulk, اَلمُلْك and al-malakūt, اَلمَلَكُوت is used by us for a kind of dominance which is of subjective and relative meaning which we have taken into consideration because of the social necessity of organizing the actions and the persons into a system that will lead to peace, justice and collective energy. Also, this dominance has the potential of being transferred, gifted, usurped and taken by force as we always witness in human societies.

Even though this subjective and relative meaning of al-mulk can be applied to the Almighty Allãh in the sense that the true dominance in human society belongs to Allãh, as He says: ...the judgement is only Allãh's... (6:57); All praise is due to Him in this (life) and the hereafter... (28:70), but deeper insight into the conventional meaning of al-mulk (dominance) reveals its application on entities in such a way that it can neither end nor be transferred. For example, a person has mulk, dominance, upon himself in the sense that he has complete power on his hearing, sight and other actions that emanate from his limbs; so his ears hear and his eyes see, based on his intention and command, and they don't follow the intentions and commands of other people. This is the real meaning of mulk and we don't doubt its existence within ourselves in such a way that it can neither end nor be transferred. So, a person has dominance over his own strength and actions, and all of them neither is dependent on his existence, neither independent from it nor free from its need. An eye sees by the permission of the person who sees through it and the ear hears by his permission; if the person didn't exist, there would be no eyes nor any act of seeing and no ears nor any act of hearing. Similar to the situation of the citizen of a society: he acts within it by the permission of the king or the ruler, if there was no managing power that coordinates the elements of the society, there would be no society; if he disallows certain activities, a citizen would not be able to do that [without facing the consequences].

No doubt, this meaning of mulk (dominance) exists for Almighty Allãh on whom depends the creation of things and managing of the system [of universe]; no creation is free from need of the Glorified Creator, neither in his own being nor in the powers and activities related to him, he has no freedom, neither alone nor when he is part of the various elements of the universe, connected to the energy of the world where some of its parts are mixed with the other forming this general visible system.

The Almighty Allãh says: Say: "O Allãh, Master of the Kingdom!" (3:26); Allãh's is the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth… (5:120); Blessed is He in whose hand is the Kingdom, and He has power over all things; who created death and life…Who created the seven heavens one above another… (67:1-3). These verses, as you can see, relate the mulk (dominance) to creation and to the existence of things from Him; relating the creation and existence of things to Him is the basis for His dominance and that is the meaning of His mulk in which no one is His partner nor does it disappear from Him, it is neither transferable nor can it be delegated in the sense that He is no more required and is replaced by someone else.

This is the meaning of malakūt (kingdom) that has been explained in Allãh's Word: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it: "Be" and it is. Therefore, Glory be to Him in Whose hand is the Kingdom of every thing, and to Him you shall be brought back, (36:82-83). The second verse clarifies that the domination on everything depends on the word 'kun, say' that is uttered by the Almighty and His Word is His Action and that is His creation. Thus it becomes clear that malakūt means the relationship of Allãh to the existence and survival of things; and this relationship of the Creator and the created does not tolerate any partnership, it belongs to Him alone. The status of being the Nourisher that signifies dominance and management does not allow any room for delegation nor transfer of ownership.

Therefore, reflection upon the Kingdom of the universe certainly leads a person to tawḥīd, the concept of monotheism as Allãh says: Do they not consider the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and whatever things Allãh has created, and that may be their doom shall have drawn nigh; what announcement would they then believe in after this? (7:185). As you can see, this verse follows the verse in the beginning of sūrah of "al-Mulk" (ch.67) quoted earlier.

So, by reflecting on the other relevant verses, it becomes indeed clear that the meaning of 'showing the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth to Ibrãhīm' is that He guided the blessed soul of Ibrãhīm to realize the connection of the existence of things to the Almighty, and since this connection does not accept any partnership, he immediately concluded that nothing can be nourished by other than Allãh who has taken upon Himself the management of the system and supervision of the affairs [of the universe]. That the idols were images that humans had carved themselves and gave them names that was not authorized by Allãh – such things cannot nourish the humans nor own them while humans have built them with their hands. Moreover, the celestial bodies such as the star, the sun and the moon constantly change from one state to another; they appear and then disappear from people – such things cannot dominate or take upon themselves the management of the universe, as we shall discuss later on.

His Word, the Sublime: ...and so that he might be of those who are sure. The letter lãm [in لِيَكُونَ – li-yakūna, so that he might be] is for explanation; and the sentence is connected to another implied sentence as follows: 'so that he might be this and that and so that he might be of those who are sure.'

Conviction or surety (اَلْيَقِين – al-yaqīn) means the knowledge that is not contaminated by doubt in any way or shape. Probably, the verse means that he might be sure of Allãh's signs to the level described by the Almighty: And We made of them Imãms to guide by Our command as they were patient, and they were certain of Our signs (32:24). This leads to conviction in the Beautiful Names of Allãh and His great attributes. The same kind of conviction has been described regarding the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) in what He said: Glory be to Him Who made His servant to go on a night from the Sacred Mosque to the remote mosque of which We have blessed the precincts, so that We may show to him some of Our signs... (17:1); and also what He said: The eye did not dazzle, nor did it exceed the limit. Certainly he saw of the greatest signs of his Lord, (53:17-18). However, as for the conviction about the Exalted Essence of Allãh is concerned well, the Qur'ãn places it above the level where any doubt, let alone the knowledge, could perceive it; His Essence is only to be acknowledged submissively.

According to the Divine Word, among the special impacts of "the convincing knowledge" in Allãh's signs is the lifting of the veil of materialism from the realities of the creation to the extent willed by the Almighty as He says: Nay! If you had known with knowledge of certainty, you should most certainly have seen the hell (102:5-6); and: Nay! Most surely the record of the righteous shall be in the 'Illiyīn. And what will you know what the 'Illiyīn is? It is a written book; those who are drawn near (to Allah) shall witness it, (83:18-21).

QUR'ÃN [6:76]: So when the night over-shadowed him, he saw a star; he said: "This is my Lord." So when it set, he said: "I do not love the setting ones."…

ar-Rãghib in his al-Mufradãt says: "The origin of al-jannu (اَلْجَنُّ [translated here as over-shadowing]) means to cover or conceal something from the senses. It is said: 'jannahu 'l-layl (جَنَّهُ الَّيْل), ajannahu (اَجَنَّهُ) and janna 'alayhi (جَنَّ عَلَيْهِ)': so jannahu means covered it, ajannahu means he made something that would cover it just like 'qabartuhu, aqbartuhu, saqaytuhu (قَبَرْتُهُ ، اَقْبَرْتُهُ ، سَقَيْتُهُ) and asqaytuhu (اَسْقَيْتُهُ);' and janna 'alayhi means something covered it. The Almighty has said: 'So when the night (janna 'alayhi) over-shadowed him…'" So the night over-shadowing him means that it let down the darkness on him which does not occur simply with the setting of the sun.

The verse: "So when the night over-shadowed him" is a follow up of what had passed earlier about negating the worship of idols since both are connected to Allãh's Word: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth. Based on that, the meaning would be: 'We indeed were showing him some portions of the Kingdom and thus he negated the worshipping of the idols by that, and this situation continued and so when the night over-shadowed him, he saw a star and said so-and-so.'

In the sentence: "he saw a star (كَوْكَبًا, kawkaban)", the word kawkab has come as an indefinite noun [i.e., without alif and lam] since the passage is linked to narration of and discussion about [Ibrãhīm's argument], and it does not intend to specify that star, whether it was from the planets or the fixed stars because the main argument could apply to any of the stars that rises and sets. However, this does not mean that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) pointed to just any star from among the stars without specifying it in any way: Firstly, because the word [as used in this verse] does not support that; it cannot be said about a person who points towards a star from among the countless stars and says: 'This is my Lord,' that he just saw a random star and said: 'This is my Lord.' Secondly, the context of the verses show that they were a people there who worshipped the specific star towards which Ibrãhīm pointed and said what he said about it.

Moreover, the Sabaeans did not worship any star and they did not hold anything sacred except the planets. What supports the view that the star under discussion here was the Venus is because the Sabaens adored and assigned the wordly events only to the seven celestial bodies that they used to call "the seven planets": the Moon, the Mercury, the Venus, the Sun, the Mars, the Jupiter, and the Saturn. The people of India were those who used to adore the fixed stars and assign the worldy events to them; so were some sorcerers and Arab idol worshippers and others.

Obviously, the star [mentioned in the verse] was one of the seven planets. The Moon and the Sun have been mentioned later on [in Ibrãhīm's conversation] while the Mercury is rarely seen because of its constrained orbit. Therefore, it must have been one of the remaining four: Venus, Mars, Jupiter and Saturn. Among these, Venus is the only star whose restrained orbit prevents it from moving away from the Sun more than 47 degrees, and therefore it always follows the Sun without fail: Sometimes it would precede it and rise before the sunrise, and at that time it is known as 'the morning star' and then it sets after the sunrise. At other times it follows the Sun and appears after sunset on the western horizon and it stays for a short while in early night before setting – if it is the nights after the middle of the lunar month, e.g., 18^{th}, 19^{th} and 20^{th}, it sets at the time of moonrise; so you will observe that the Sun has set and the Venus will appear on the western horizon and then it will set an hour or two after the sunset, and then at that time or shortly thereafter the Moon will rise. From those four planets, these characteristics are peculiar to Venus, and in other planets like Jupiter, Mars and Saturn these are only incidental which occur only in special situations that it does not register in the mind, and thus it assumes that that star is the Venus. In any case, Venus is the most beautiful, the most delightful and the most shinning of the twinkling stars that attracts the eyes of a person who is looking at the sky when night descends and darkness overshadows the horizons.

This is the best explanation of the verse based on what comes to the mind when the Almighty says: "So when the night over-shadowed him, he saw a star; he said: 'This is my Lord. So when it set, he said: I do not love the setting ones,' (76) Then when he saw the moon rising…" What we have said above is also supported by what has been mentioned in some of the narrations of the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt ('a.s.) that the star [under discussion] was the Venus. Based on this, we can say that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) had seen the Venus and that the people believed in the obligation of worshipping it in form of devotion, prayer and offering of sacrifice; and that the Venus was following the Sun at its setting time, and that the night was of the later half of the lunar month. When the night over-shadowed him, he saw the Venus on the western horizon until it set and then he saw the Moon rising thereafter.

Then we come to the sentence: "…he said: 'This is my Lord.'" The meaning of "rabb = Lord" is the owner of things possessed by him, the one who manages their affairs, not the one who created the heavens and the earth and originated everything from non-existence. Allãh, the Almighty is not a body or bodily entity, and He does not occupy space nor can He be an object of indication. What is undoubtedly clear from the statement quoted of the conversation of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) with his people concerning the idols is that he had been blessed with proof from His Lord and that he had knowledge about Allãh and His signs – and all these clarified for him that the Almighty Allãh is exalted above any form of body, image and limitations. Allãh quotes his conversation with his father: "O my father! Truly the knowledge has come to me which has not come to you, therefore follow me; I will guide you on a right path…" (19:43).

However, the idol worshippers and the Sabaeans did not ascribe an equal partner to the Almighty Allãh in creation, rather they ascribed the partner in form of someone or something – while being created by Allãh or at least whose existence depended on Him – was assigned by the management of the creation like the god of beauty, the god of justice, the god of fertility or to manage some of the creation, for example, the god of human or the god of a tribe or the god of specific kings and aristocrats. Discoveries of their ruins, their historical reports as well as the existing idol worshippers prove this fact. So, Ibrãhīm's statement about the planet that: "This is my Lord," intended to prove that it was the god who managed the issues, and not God, the Creator and the Originator.

This is also proven by what been mentioned at the end of the verses under discussion: …he said: "O my people! Surely I am clear of what you set up (with Allãh). Surely I have turned my face, being upright, wholly to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth, and I am not of the polytheists." 6:79-80). It obviously means that he is moving away from polytheism and reaches to the conclusion that God has no partner; he does not talk about proving God's existence.

The apparent meaning of the verses show that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) accepted the fact that for all things there is God, the Originator, the Unique, Who has no partner in His Creation and Origination, and that is Allãh, the Sublime; and that humans have a Lord who obviously manages their affairs. His search was only to see whether this Lord who manages the affairs is the same Almighty God to Whom creation and origination is attributed or one of His creations whom He has taken as a partner for Himself and delegated the task of management to him. Therefore, he presents the hypothesis about the star (that they worshipped) and then the moon and then the sun, and looks into each one of them to see whether they are capable of handling the task of managing [the universe in general] and the management of people's affairs [in particular].

Although this proposition and consideration obviously occurs before attaining the convincing proof of the result – since the result is subsequent to the rational proof – it does not harm Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) [and his status as a believer]. As we had explained earlier, the verses describe the story of Ibrãhīm (and the human being) in the first phase of discerning [truth from falsehood] and of being capable of taking on the religious obligations by contemplating in matters of monotheism and other fundamental thoughts, and that he was like a slate devoid of any shapes and writings at all. Then he starts searching and begins by proving certain things and rejecting certain others in order to reach to the true belief and sound faith. All the while, he is on the path of truth and there is no blame on him during the time when he goes through the process between rejecting certain things out of lack of distinction and accepting other things on basis of complete understanding and full knowledge of the truth.

Human life by necessity goes through the stage when it transforms from lack of knowledge about essential beliefs to the stage of awareness when rationally he is obliged to seek and consider [the truth]. This is a general phenomenon in human life in which he progresses from deficiency to perfection; all humans are equal in this matter. Of course, there are exceptions in case of some individuals that goes against this general phenomenon in which they demonstrate perceptive faculty and knowledge before the normal age of discernment and maturity as the Qur'ãn has mentioned about 'Īsã ('a.s.) and Yaḥyã ('a.s.) – that is indeed against the prevailing norm and not all human have that quality nor all prophets have done such a thing.

In short, the human being does not possess the conditions that will obligate him to have sound belief or do good deeds from the first day when the soul is breathed into him; he gradually gains that ability until the conditions are fulfilled which then obligates him to seek and consider the truth. So, his life is indeed divided into two parts: before the age of discernment and maturity and after the age of discernment and maturity, and it is in the latter stage that he is capable of dealing with matters of belief and confronts them in that stage of life. Between these two phases, there is an intermediary stage where he is confronted with the duty of seeking and considering the truth. Therein he seeks the true belief to which his nature guides him by means of arguments: Does he or the universe exist without a creator or do they have a creator? If yes, is the creator one or has he a partner? Then he looks at the signs visible in the universe for these propositions and reflects on them whether they support or deny his propositions, and so he accepts one and rejects the other. As long as his process of arguments does not reach a solid conclusion, he is uncertain and undecided; he is only at stage of assumption and reflection on the idea.

Based on this reflection, the statement of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) about the star: "This is my Lord," as well as his forthcoming statements about the moon and the sun are not based on certainty and firmness that would be considered as polytheism. It is just a proposition that needs to be considered in relation to the signs that prove and support it. This may be proved from the verses that appear to say that he was in the state of anticipation and expectation. This is one perspective.

However, Ibrãhīm ['a.s.]'s statement in his argument with his father that the Almighty Allãh has narrated in sūrah of "Maryam" (ch.19): "O my father! Truly the knowledge has come to me which has not come to you, therefore follow me; I will guide you on a right path. O my father! Serve not the Satan; surely the Satan is disobedient to the Beneficent (Allãh). O my father! Surely I fear that a punishment from the Beneficent (Allãh) should afflict you so that you should be a friend of the Satan." He said: "Do you dislike my gods, O Ibrãhīm? If you do not desist, I will certainly revile you, and leave me for a time."

He (Ibrãhīm) said: "Peace be on you, I will pray to my Lord to forgive you; surely He is ever Affectionate to me;" (19:43-47), proves that he ['a.s.] was fully aware of the reality, and that the one who manages his affairs is affectionate towards him and greatly honours him, is the Almighty Allãh and none else.

Therefore, his statement: "This is my Lord", is of a genre in which a person considers himself to be like them, goes along with them [in their ideas], and then presents them with the evidence that proves the weakness of their idea and the falsity of their statement. This method of argument is most appealing to the opponent's sense of justice, most effective in subduing his bias and prejudice, and most suitable in making him listen to the argument.

The sentence: "So when it set, he said: 'I do not love the setting ones.'" al-Ufūl (اَلأُفُوْل) means setting [of something; here it means setting of the star]. It proves the falsity of the star's lordship by attributing the quality of setting to it. The star that sets is cut off from those upon whom it had risen, and the task of managing the creation does not sit well with being cut off.

Indeed, godship and dependency is a real relationship between the Lord and the one who is nourished by Him, and that leads to the love of nourished one towards His Lord because of the natural attraction towards Him and being linked to Him. Love cannot be based on something that perishes and whose beauty ends, the same beauty that was reason for love. What we observe in the human that he often falls in love with the present and prevailing beauty because he is intensely engrossed into it and he does not pay any attention to the fact that one day it will end and vanish. Therefore, the Lord must be ever-living and not subject to change like the embellished decorations that live and then die, exist and then perish, rise and then set, appear and then disappear, attain youthfulness and then become old, are delightful and then become disfigured. This is a rational argument even though it might appear as rhetoric or poetry. Ponder on it.

Anyway, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) invalidated the lordship of the star on basis of its setting dimension in two ways: Either by alluding to the fact that he does not love it because of its setting since dependency and servitude is based on love, and one who does not love something cannot worship it. It has been narrated from Imãm aṣ-Ṣãdiq ['a.s.]: "Is religion anything but love?" We have explained that earlier. Or by basing on absence of love and the issue of setting was mentioned as a justification for not loving it since it is contrary to lordship and divinity.

Being object of love is an essential concomitant for lordship and divinity; and something that lacks the true and lasting beauty cannot be an object of love, and therefore it cannot be the lord. The context of the argument in this verse is apparently based on this point.

In this conversation of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.), following points can be discerned:

Firstly, there is an indication of essential link between love and lordship or between love and sense of servitude.

Secondly, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) has used the attribute common between the star and between the moon and the sun [i.e., all of them rise and then set], and has repeated the argument in their cases also. This was done either because he was unaware, as mentioned earlier, that the moon and the sun also rise and set in the same way as the star or because the people in all three cases were different groups.

Thirdly, in his statement of negating the love when he says: "I do not love the setting ones", he has used the style [al-ãfilīyn (اَلْآفِلِين), the setting ones] that is used for intelligent beings [and not for inanimate objects like the moon and the sun]. This was sort of an indication that something that lacks perception and reason does not at all deserve lordship as he has indicated in his statement: "O my father! Why do you worship what neither hears nor sees, nor does it avail you in the least;" (19:42), and his other statement: When he said to his father and his people: "What do you worship?" They said: "We worship idols, so we shall be their votaries." He said: "Do they hear you when you call? Or do they profit you or cause you harm?" They said: "Nay, we found our fathers doing so." (26:70-74). First he asked them about their idols as if he did not know anything about them; and so they replied to him that they are statues and images devoid of perception and sensation. Then he asked them about their knowledge and power while he used terms associated with those who have intelligence as an indication that Allãh must possess this quality of intelligence.

QUR'ÃN [76]: Then when he saw the moon rising, he said: "This is my Lord." So when it set, he said: "If my Lord had not guided me, I should certainly be of the erring people."

al-Buzūgh (اَلْبُزُوْغ) means the rising. As for the discussion about "Then when he saw…" that has already passed earlier because of its connection to the previous argument. Ibrãhīm's statement that "This is my Lord" is of a genre in which a person goes along with the others as was discussed in the previous verse.

When the moon set, he said: "If my Lord had not guided me, I should certainly be of the erring people." Here Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) has taken into consideration what he had said earlier in invalidating the argument for lordship of the star – since both the star and the moon rise and set, and setting is not suitable for lordship as he said: I do not love the setting ones, so the conclusion is the same for both. So his statement: "If my Lord had not guided me…" is linked to the observation he had made [earlier] concerning the moon that "This is my Lord": if he had continued to insist on it, then he would have been in error and one of those misguided individuals who believed in the lordship of the moon. The statement about the moon was an error for the same reason as given earlier about the star since the quality of setting is not exclusive to it; rather it can apply to it as well as other similar entities.

From the above, we can surmise the following:

Firstly, there were people there who believed in the lordship of the moon just as those who believed in the star. Moreover, the verse that follows: "O my people! Surely I am clear of what you set up (with Allah)," (6:78) is also indicative of this fact.

Secondly, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was at that time in state of search, hoping to attain Divine guidance and expecting his Lord's grace in form of the sound belief and the indisputable perspective irrespective of the fact whether his statements are taken in the literal sense (supposing that he was indeed seeking the truth) or in the rhetoric sense (in which he initially agrees with a hypothesis in order to show its flaw). This was discussed earlier.

Thirdly, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was certain that he has a Lord who manages his guidance and his other affairs and that he was only seeking Him, either in the real sense or in the sense of pretence, so that he may identify Him: is He Himself the one who created the heavens and the earth or was it created by some of His creation? And when it dawned upon him that the star and the moon are incapable of such a task because of their setting, he expected his Lord to guide him towards Himself and purify him of the misguidance of those who were in error.

QUR'ÃN [6:77-78]: Then when he saw the sun rising, he said: "This is my Lord; this is the greatest." So when it set, he said: "O my people! Surely I am clear of what you set up (with Allãh)."*

"Then when" is an indication of the connection of this statement with the previous argument; and even the words: "This is my Lord" has occurred either in hypothetical sense or in the style of initially agreeing with the view [in order to disprove it] as was discussed in previous verse.

* * *

[On Usage of Masculine Pronoun for a Feminine Noun]:

The words: "This is my Lord" was also repeated in case of the moon when he saw it rising after having seen the star; and that is why, in this third case, he added the description: "this is the greatest" for the sun as final hypothesis of its lordship after proving the first two cases as invalid. It was mentioned earlier that using of the pronoun "hãdhã = this" while pointing to the sun was done because Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) didn't know that it was a celestial body that rises and sets from our perspective every day and night, and that the phenomenon of day and night as well as the four seasons are related to it.

Using the masculine pronoun is an indication that the person was not able to clearly distinguish the entity of his point of reference: it is just like the situation when you see shape of a person coming to you from far but you are unable to distinguish it as male or female, and so you say: "Who is this?" [This (هذا hãdhã) is masculine.] Similar to a situation where you cannot discern whether the shape is of a living being or an object, and so you say: "Who is this?" [Using the same hãdhã.] Probably this was the first time that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) had come out to his uncle and his people from isolation and had not witnessed the outside world and the human society, and so when he saw a celestial body like the star and the moon and the sun – whenever he saw each one of them as a shinning lamp – he said: "This is my Lord", as if he had no complete knowledge of it as we had mentioned earlier.

This is supported in a way by his statement: So when it set, he said: "I do not love the setting ones." There is an indication in it that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) assumed momentarily that the star was the Lord until he saw its setting and then decided that his assumption was wrong and it can't be the lord. If he had known that the star sets, then he would have denied its lordship earlier as he had done in case of the idols when he said to his uncle: "Do you take idols for gods? Surely I see you and your people in manifest error," [6:74]; and: "O my father! Why do you worship what neither hears nor sees, nor does it avail you in the least," [19:42].

It is also possible to say that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) delayed his statement: "I do not love the setting ones", until the star set so that he could prove to them what could be discerned by sense of observation as he had done when he smashed the idols except the biggest one so that they can see the inability of the idols and that they are just inanimate objects that cannot prevent any harm or evil from themselves.

* * *

In explaining the masculine usage of the demonstrative pronoun ("this = hãdhã"), the exegetes have treaded different paths:

i.) Some say that using the masculine pronoun was in order to link it to the point of reference or the celestial bright body; in other words, it says: "this point of reference or this celestial bright body is my Lord since it is the greatest." [That is, it does not refer to the sun, which is a feminine noun.]

Although using the masculine pronounce with such an explanation is valid but there must be a reason to justify such a usage. It is not correct to do so without a proper justification, otherwise it will be permissible to change every feminine pronoun into masculine arbitrarily and that will ruin the language itself.

ii.) Some say that [the usage of masculine pronoun for a feminine object] is based on the rule of the subject following the predicate in its gender since the terms "the Lord" and "the greatest" are masculine therefore the demonstrative pronoun has followed the masculine form. An example of a reverse form can be seen in the Almighty's Word: Then their excuse would be nothing but that they would say… [6:23] in which the masculine predicate [لَم تَكُنْ] has followed the feminine subject [فِتْنَةٌ].

Moreover, there is a view that the people of Ibrãhīm ['a.s.]'s era believed in feminine gods also as they believed in masculine ones, and they describe the female gods as "ilãhah (إلَهَة) = god", "rabbah (رَبَّة) = lord" [both ending with a feminine ـه*…h*], "bintu 'llãh (بِنْتُ اللّه) = Allãh's daughter" and "zawjatu 'r-rabb (زَوْجَتُ الرَّبُّ) = wife of the lord". Based on this, it was appropriate to use the feminine "rabbah (رَبَّة)" [instead of rabb] and so the sentence should have been "hãdhihi rabbatī" or "Ãlihatī". The criticism on the predicate following the gender of the subject in: "This is my Lord", also applies to the subject following the predicate. Thus there would be no meaning in the rule of following the pronouns.

The sentence: This is greater is the predicate which has an elative noun ['greater'] and the rule in elative noun is that if it comes as a predicate, it should come in the noun form of af'al (أفْعَلْ) and it is neutral as far as gender is considered. So, it can be said that "Zayd is afḍal (better) than ‘Umar" and also "Laylã is ajmal (more beautiful) than Salmã." With such a gender-neutral entity, we do not accept that it is from the masculine words that follows the subject.

iii.) Some say that using masculine form in the demonstrative pronoun was for honouring the sun since lordship is attributed to it – this is done to shield the Lord from quality of femininity.

However, they did not consider femininity as an inferior quality that needed to be shielded from divinity. The people of Babylon themselves had female gods such as Ninmah, the mother goddess, Ninkarrak, the daughter of Anu [a god of heaven], Mylitta, wife of Shamash, Zarbanit, the goddess of nursing, and goddess Anunnaki. A group of Arab polytheists used to worship the angels and consider them as Allãh's daughters. In interpretation of the verse: They did not call besides Him on any thing but females; (4:117), it is said that they used to call their gods by female names and would say: 'female of so-and-so tribe' referring to the idol that the tribe worshipped.

iv.) Some among the exegetes say that the people of Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) used to worship the sun as the male god and believed that he had a wife by the name of Anuunit. And so the verse under discussion reflects their belief.

However, their belief that the sun is male does not justify changing the femininity of the word to masculine. Moreover, Ibrãhīm's statement to Nimrod: So surely Allãh brings the sun from the east, then bring it (you) from the west; (2:258) ["ها, it' is a feminine pronoun] while referring to the sun defies their claim.

v.) Some say that Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) spoke Syriac language, the language of his people, and they did not differentiate between the pronouns and the demonstrative pronouns on gender lines rather they used masculine form for all; and that the Noble Qur’ãn has maintained his statement accordingly in masculine form.

However, this is not an acceptable explanation since it is common to follow the grammar rules of the words in spite of difference in languages; it is actually permission to follow the grammar rules especially when it comes to the meaning that is not dependent on specific wordings. Moreover, the Almighty has quoted many arguments and prayers from Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) in the Qur’ãn and in many of those cases the feminine gender has been considered appropriately. So, why should this case be different by ignoring the femininity of the pronouns? Even in his statement when arguing with the king of Babylon: So surely Allãh brings the sun from the east, then bring it (you) from the west, (2:258). Ibrãhīm has used a feminine pronoun while referring to the sun.

vi.) The most surprising of the views on this matter is what has been mentioned by some commentators stubbornly that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) as well as Ismã'īl and Hãjar used to speak the old Arabic language. The summary of his argument is the following: The anthropologists have proven that the Arabs of the Peninsula, from dawn of history, had colonized the Chaldean cities as well as Egypt and their language had dominated those regions. Some of them have clearly stated that King Hammurabi, who was a contemporary of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.), was an Arab; and that Hammurabi was a kind and peaceful ruler, and has been described in the Old Testament as a great priest. It also says that Hammurabi blessed Ibrãhīm and that Ibrãhīm gave him the tenth of everything. He also says: It is known in the books of ḥadīth and Arabic history that Ibrãhīm settled his son, Ismã'īl ('a.s.), with his Egyptian mother Hãjar in the valley which emerged later on as the city of Mecca, and that Allãh made a group from the Jurham tribe to settle with them and be subservient to them; and that Ibrãhīm used to periodically visit them both, and that he and Ismã'īl built the Holy House of Allãh and spread the faith of monotheism in the Arab land. It says in a ḥadīth that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) came once to Mecca to visit his son, who had gone for hunting, and so he talked with his wife who was from Jurham tribe and he was not pleased with her attitude. Then he came again to visit his son and did not find him, and so he talked with his another wife who invited him to come in and washed his head. Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was pleased with her and prayed for her. All this proves that he used to speak Arabic. This is the summary of that commentator's argument.

However, this is not a plausible explanation because proximity of the Arabs of the Peninsula to Egypt and Chaldean land, and their interaction with them or colonizing and dominating them does not necessarily mean that their language was changed to Arabic. The language of Egypt was Egyptian and the language of Chaldean and Assyrian people was Syriac. Yes such interaction mutually influences the languages as far as some names and words are concerned as we see in the Holy Qur'ãn example of words like al-qisṭãs and al-istabraq, etc.[24]

[24] al-Qisṭãs (اَلقِسْطَاس see 17:35) means balance, scale; it is an Arabized word of Roman origin. al-Istabraq (اَلْاِسْتَبْرَق see 55:74) means brocade; it is an Arabized word of Persian origin. (tr.)

As for his statement that Hammurabi was a contemporary of Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.), that cannot be collaborated by reliable historical sources, the ruins of Babylon that have been discovered, and the stone known as Code of Hammurabi (that was devised and implemented by him in his kingdom and it is known as the most ancient code of law in the world). Some scholars have said that Hammurabi's reign was between 1686 BC and 1728 BC; while other have said that he ruled Babylon during 2232–2287 BC. Whereas Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) lived around 2000 BC. Moreover, Hammurabi was an idol worshipper, and under the code of law in the stone [known as the Code of Hammurabi], he seeks help from gods for perpetuity of his laws, popular support for it and punishment for those who intend to change or oppose it.

As for his statement about Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) settling his son and his slave-girl in the southwest plains of Arabia, building of the Holy Kaʻbah, spreading Allãh's religion, and his mutual understanding with the Arabs – none of this proves that he used to talk in Arabic language. This is obvious.

* * *

Let us now return to our discussion. Allãh's statement: "then when" in [6:78] Then when he saw the sun rising, shows its connection to the earlier verse: So when it set, he said: "If my Lord had not guided me, I should certainly be of the erring people." It proves that the moon had already set when Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) saw the sun rising. This could have happened only in autumn or winter in northern altitudes (that had the lands of Chaldea) when nights are longer, especially when the moon is in the southern constellation like the Archer and the Capricorn. During such conditions, the moon can set before the sun in the latter half of the lunar month. We earlier saw Allãh's statement: So when the night over-shadowed him, he saw a star; he said: "This is my Lord." So when it set, he said: "I do not love the setting ones." Then when he saw the moon rising, he said: "Is this my Lord?" [6:76-77]. Upon added reflection, the statement proves that the night was from the latter half of the lunar month and that the star was the Venus which Ibrãhīm saw first in the west while it was descending and then he witnessed its setting and then the rising of the moon from the east.

The verses prove that Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) disputed with his people about the idols during the daytime and was engaged with them on that day till the night over-shaded him and at that time he saw the Venus and the people who worship it. So, he went along with them in [believing in] its lordship by saying: "This is my Lord." He continued to observe it until it set. And that night was from the long nights of the latter half of the lunar month and perhaps the moon was in orbit in the shorter circle from the southern circles of the orbit but when it set, he rejected its lordship. He continued to look for his Lord and sought His refugee against misguidance until the sun rose. He saw it rising and of bigger size than whatever he had seen earlier of the star and the moon; so he again joined them in [believing in] its lordship even though the falsity of the lordship of the star and the moon was clear to him and they were both celestial bright bodies like it but he took its bigger size as a justification to accept its lordship and ended up saying: "This is my Lord; it is bigger." He sat anticipating the future until the sun also set and so he rejected its lordship and polytheism of his people by saying: "O my people! Surely I am clear of what you set up (with Allãh)." And he affirmed the lordship of Almighty Allãh as he had affirmed His divinity in the sense of creating the heavens and the earth and originating them. So he said: "Surely I have turned my face, being upright, wholly to Him – i.e., being submissive to the Divinity – Who originated the heavens and the earth, – without any deviation to the right or the left – and I am not of the polytheists," – by associating anything from His creation and invention to Him in worship and submission, (6:79).

It has been mentioned earlier that the presence of Allãh's statement: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and so that he might be of those who are sure, in midst of these verses proves that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) indeed deduced the arguments (that he used against his father and his people) from what he used to see of the kingdom of the heavens and the earth and that Allãh has blessed him with the surety – the result of showing him the kingdom – upon his heart. And this is clear evidence that the arguments that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) used were demonstrative proof emanating from the breast of conviction as seen in our explanation of his words: "I do not love the setting ones."

* * *

The following points become clear from the previous discussion:

Firstly, Ibrãhīm's statement that: "I do not love the setting ones," is a demonstrative convincing argument based on him not loving the setting ones and the incompatibility of setting with divinity.

A commentator has apparently opined that Ibrãhīm's argument was a common argument and not a demonstrative argument. He says: "The truth is that the statement [of Ibrãhīm] was a subtle allusion, not an explicit speculative argument," in which he is alluding to his people's ignorance in worshipping the stars: they are worshipping something that hides itself from them and is unaware of their act of worship. This is the basis of considering 'setting' as incomputable with divinity (as opposed to 'rising' and 'appearing') and he based his argument on it since one of the qualities of divinity is appearance even though His appearance is different to that of His creation.[25]

This commentator is, first of all, oblivious of the fact that placing of the Almighty's statement: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and so that he might be of those who are sure, among the verses containing the arguments is the strongest evidence that his arguments were based on what he saw of the Divine Kingdom which is the basis of his conviction about Allãh and His signs. With this proof, how is it conceivable that his argument was a common and not a demonstrative one?

The second point of this commentator's oblivion is that the argument is based on love and absence of love, not on the issue of 'setting'. Moreover, even if the argument is based on the issue of 'setting', that does not exclude it from being a demonstrative argument. Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) indeed described his reason for repudiating their divinity by saying that he found them to be setting and that he does not love the setting ones and so he does not worship them. It is a fact that a human being worships his Lord because He is the Lord, i.e., He manages the affair of the human being, and grants him life, sustenance, health, wealth, safety, power, knowledge and others things that he needs for his survival, so he is connected to His Lord from all aspects of existence. Thus, it is part of human nature that he should love whatever he needs and he should love whoever provides those needs; no sensible person can doubt this reality. So, the human being worships the Lord because he loves Him in order to seek his benefits or to avert harm from himself or both.

It is also human nature that he does not link himself to something that has no permanence except that sometimes greed or lust diverts his nature towards the enjoyment and turns him away from reflecting on its temporary and passing phase. The Noble Qur'ãn has frequently used this style to condemn the world and has discouraged the people from excessive attachment to its beauties and submerging into its desires. For example: The likeness of this world's life is only as water which We sent down from the sky; by its mingling the herbage of the earth of which men and cattle eat grows; until when the earth puts on its golden raiment and it becomes garnished, and its people think that they have power over it, Our command comes to it, by night or by day, so We render it as reaped, as though it had not been in existence yesterday… (10:24); What is with you passes away and what is with Allãh is enduring… (16:96); and …what is with Allãh is better and more lasting… (42:36).

So, Ibrãhīm's statement that: "I do not love the setting ones", proves that a thing that disappears from humans and has neither permanence nor stability does not deserve to be loved by them or be attached to them. The God that a human being worships should be such that he can love Him, and so it follows that God cannot disappear from him and lose him; and therefore these celestial bodies do not deserve the title of divinity. This is, as you can see, an argument that is known to the common person as well as the scholars.

A third point of this commentator's confusion is between the rising (al-buzūgh, اَلْبُزُوغ) and the appearance (aẓ-ẓuhūr, اَلظُّهُور), and he has concluded that "the rising" is compatible with divinity; rather Ibrãhīm's statement is based on the fact of rising since one of the qualities of the Lord is to be visible. [Our response is that] what has been mentioned in the verse – and that is not the basis of the argument – is al-buzūgh which means rising and appearing after being in concealment and that is incompatible with divinity. Moreover, the question: "Why did Ibrãhīm base his argument on setting (al-ufūl, اَلأُفُول) and not on rising (al-buzūgh)?" remains unanswered.

Secondly, considering "the setting" (al-ufūl) as part of the argument and not "the rising" (al-buzūgh) is so because rising, unlike setting, does not emanate the lack of love which is the basis of the argument. This explains the response given [by az-Zamakhsharī] in al-Kashshãf about using al-ufūl instead of al-buzūgh: "If you say: 'Why did he argue against them on basis of setting and not rising while both have phenomenon of change from a state to another?' I would say: 'The argument based on setting is clearer since its change is associated with disappearance and concealment.'" The argument, as you now know, is based on lack of love and not the setting itself that would demand the shift from rising to setting. [And so this question and its answer are redundant.]

Thirdly, the argument only intends to negate the 'lordship' of the three celestial bodies in the sense of managing the world or the human life, and not the 'lordship' in sense of creation and management altogether. The idol-worshippers and star-worshippers themselves do not deny that their gods are not the Lord [in sense of the Creator] that is in fact Allãh the One only who has no partner.

This explains the opinion of some theologians who say that "the setting" has been taken as basis of the argument since it denotes a possible being, and whatever is possible is dependent on a cause and stands at the end of the chain of causes linked to the Necessary Being. This is similar to the understanding of other scholars who say that "the setting" negates divinity because it is a movement and every movement must have a mover, and that chain must stop at the First Mover who does not need anyone and does not change, and that is the Almighty Allãh.

Both these arguments, while being demonstrative arguments, are actually negating from the dependent and moving entities the status of lordship in the sense of the First Cause upon whom all the causes are dependent, and in the sense of the Creator and Sustainer upon whom all the causes rely. However, the worshippers of the stars such as the Sabaeans and others, even though they believed that the celestial bodies were eternal, everlasting and constantly in movement, yet they did not deny that all these are effects dependent in their existence and their power upon the Almighty. So these two explanations are relevant to the atheists who deny the existence of the Creator, and not to the Sabaeans and the idol-worshippers of multiple gods whom Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) was addressing in his arguments. Moreover, you know that the argument was not based on the phenomenon of 'setting' rather on the lack of love for something that sets and disappears.

As for the justification of basing the argument on the concept of possible being (that is dependent) and the concept of movement (by explaining "the setting" as something that is dependent and moved) is not valid since the Arabs did not equate 'setting' with dependence or createdness nor with change or movement. The commentator is oblivious of the fact that they don't claim that "the setting" in the verse means dependency or movement, rather they say that "the setting" is used as an argument to prove dependency or movement and change. As for the meaning of "the setting" as disappearance after visibility and concealment after appearance, that is incompatible with the status of divinity but is compatible with lordship [in the meaning of lesser gods] as the commentator himself has confessed to it.

Moreover, even the Almighty Allãh is absent from our perception even though no change occurs in neither Him nor the phenomenon of disappearance after visibility, and concealment after appearance occur in His case. Thus, the argument that the disappearance and concealment in case of the Almighty is from our perspective, not from His perspective; and because of our preoccupation with things that divert our attention from Him, not because of limitation in His Being and lack in His power – this argument is not helpful because the disappearance of these celestial bodies, especially the daily movement of the sun, is also from our perspective since we are part of the earth that rotates daily on its own axis and turns us away from the direction of these celestial bodies; so in reality, it is us who set down from them after having risen up towards them, and it is just delusion in perception that makes us think otherwise.

ar-Rãzī has tried to reconcile all these views in his commentary as follows: "al-Ufūl means disappearance of a thing after its visibility. Once you know this, a person can raise a question: al-Ufūl indeed proves createdness since it is part of a movement; and in that sense, rising also proves createdness. So, why did Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) abandon the rising as basis of the argument and moved on to the setting to prove his point?

"The answer is: No doubt that rising and setting both are equal in proving the createdness of the sun. However, the proof that the Prophets use in calling the people towards Allãh should definitely be obviously clear in a way that it can be understood by the clever, the less intelligent and the intelligent person alike. Although the argument based on movement is strong but it is subtle and only the learned people can perceive it. Whereas the argument based on setting is a clear proof known to everyone: the power of the star disappears with its setting. And so the argument of setting proved the point fully.

"Some research scholars have said that: The act of setting down as dimension of createdness is also ufūl; and the best argument is the one that is suitable for all levels: the experts, the average persons, and the common people: The specialists connect ufūl to the phenomenon of possible and dependent being, and every dependent entity is perpetually in need and the chain of dependence must end with an Omnipotent Being as the Qur'ãn says: and to your Lord is the goal; [53:42]. The average persons connect ufūl to movement, and every moving entity is a created being and every created being is eventually in need of an Eternal and Omnipotent Being; therefore, whatever sets cannot be god since God is the one who is needed by the one who sets. The common people perceive ufūl simply as setting; and they see that whenever a star nears setting, its radiance diminishes, its light decreases and its power vanishes, and it becomes like an abdicated ruler and with such an attribute it lacks divinity. So, this one sentence: 'I do not love the setting ones' is comprehensive enough to cover all levels from 'the ones b near [to Allãh]' (al-muqarrabūn) to 'the People of the Right Hand' (aṣḥãbu 'l-maymanah) and 'the People of the Left Hand' (aṣḥãbu 'l-mash'amah). Hence, it becomes the most complete of the proofs and the best of the arguments.

"It also has another subtle point: Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was arguing against those who were [not only star-worshippers but also] astrologers. The opinion of the astrologers is that when the star is in the eastern quarter of the horizon rising towards the sky's zenith, it has strong impact but when it is in the western horizon close to the setting point, it loses the intensity and becomes weaker. Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) used this subtle point to prove that God is a reality whose power never decreases nor does His perfection ware off while your belief is that the star, when it is in the western horizon, becomes weak, less effective and incapable of having any impact on the world. This proves the fault in the star's lordship. So, based on the beliefs of the astrologers' themselves, the phenomenon of setting has stronger appeal in showing the fault in the lordship of the star." Thus ends the relevant quotation from ar-Rãzī in its entirety.[26]

By pondering on what has been quoted, you will realize that ar-Rãzī's mastery in categorizing the argument into various parts based on difference among the people and his various explanations cannot be proven by even a single word of the verse under discussion. Nor does it negate the belief of the Sabaens and the star-worshippers since they do not believe in the celestial body as the Supreme God who has unlimited and absolute power; rather they believe in it as a dependent created being which is perpetually in motion and the earth is managed by its movement. None of the explanations of ar-Rãzī negate this belief. He apparently realized the objection after the passage quoted earlier and so further elaborated the issue and tried at length to get out of the riddle without any success.

Moreover, the second argument that he presented [on the concept of movement] is incomplete. Movement only proves the createdness of the moving entity from perspective of its quality, i.e., the movement itself, and not by itself. The details of this argument should be sought in its appropriate place.

Fourthly, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) arranged his arguments in accordance with the signs of the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth that Almighty Allãh had shown to him, and whenever the opportunity availed itself to discuss with his father and his people. In this, he used the perceivable items because he had not seen the daily changing phenomenon of the celestial bodies as mentioned earlier or because he wanted to discuss with them on basis of what was physically perceivable to them. Therefore, when he saw one of the three celestial bodies bright and rising, he said: "This is my Lord"; but when he saw it setting, he said: "I do not love the setting ones".

This will explain the plausible question that arises out of Ibrãhīm's statement: "And when the night overtook him, he saw the star…", it proves that he was with the people on the day preceding the night, so why did he not first mention the sun to negate its divinity?

It is possible that he came to his people for discussion when the time did not allow him more that whatever he argued with them concerning the idols; and so he was arguing with them during the daytime or for so long until the night overtook him.

There are other possibilities also such as the cloudy skies or that the people used to gather for worship and sacrifice only at the beginning of sunrise and he wanted to physically show them the argument.

Fifthly, it is said that the verses prove that guidance comes from Almighty Allãh, and these verses do not relative misguidance to Him. Indeed His Word: "If my Lord had not guided me, I should certainly be of the erring people;" partly proves that the human being, if left on his own nature, would be inflicted with misguidance if his Lord does not guide him. This is also the import of the verse: …and were it not for Allãh's grace upon you and His mercy, not one of you would have ever been pure… [24:21]. Surely you cannot guide whom you love, but Allãh guides whom He pleases… [28:56] – these verses clarify that the act of misguidance that is attributed to the Almighty refers to the misguidance in form of punishment [for ignoring the divine guidance] and not to initial misguidance. Detailed discussion on this has passed in volume one of this book.[27]

Sixthly, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) based his argument in negating the lordship of the three celestial bodies on the premise of not loving the setting ones because of their ufūl, the setting phenomenon. Ufūl means losing something after having found it; and this is an attribute incompatible with the feeling of love that would justify the worship of the beloved. If setting is a repelling attribute in case of material entities (compelling them to cessation, death, perdition and passing away), it will be a convincing argument against polytheism and idol worshipping. It can actually even be an argument against the views of some idol-worshippers who believe in divinity of gods of various categories and luminous entities, and consider them to be beyond the realm of materialism and nature, higher than body and movement – for they clearly confess that even though these entities have pure essence and noble existence, they are perishable in face of the Eternal Light and humble under the Divine Power. With such a quality, their love will be attached only to the One who manages them and not to various gods.

* * *

QUR'ÃN [6:79]: "Surely I have turned my face, being upright, wholly to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth, and I am not of the polytheists."

[On faṭara, originated:]

ar-Rãghib says in his al-Mufradãt: "The origin of al-faṭr (اَلفَطْر) means the vertical rapture or rip: it is said: 'Faṭar فَطَر – so-and-so ripped.' [Its other derivatives give other means:] Afṭara أَفْطَرَ – he broke the fast; and infaṭara إِنْفَطَر it sprouted [as in a plant rupturing the earth]. Sometimes it occurs in a negative sense such as: he said, 'Do you see any fuṭūr – فُطُوْرٌ (i.e., any defect and weakness) in it?' And sometimes it occurs in a positive sense such as: The heaven shall rend asunder thereby; His promise is ever brought to fulfillment, [73:18]. 'Faṭartu 'sh-shãt' means 'I milked the sheep with two fingers' 'Faṭartu 'l-'ajīn' means 'I kneaded the dough and then baked a bread immediately.'

"Also, from al-faṭr comes al-fiṭrah (اَلْفِطْرَة), the nature. 'Faṭara 'llãhu 'l-khalq' (فَطَرَاللّٰهُ الْخَلْق) means Allãh created something and made it in specific mold part of His various actions as He says in His statement: ...the nature made by Allãh (فِطْرَتَ الله) in which He has made men; [30:30] – this refers to the innate knowledge of the Supreme that He has created among the people. 'The nature made by Allãh' means the ability of knowing the true faith that He has instilled in human being as He says: And if you ask them who created the heavens and the earth, they will certainly say: "Allãh." [31:25]"

[27] See al-Mīzãn (Eng. transl.) vol.1, p.70 onwards. Misguidance when attributed to the Almighty is better explained by the term "abandonment, khidhlãn" (tr.).

[On ḥanīf, being upright, wholly:]

ar-Rãghib also says: "al-Ḥanf (اَلْحَنْف) means turning away from error towards rightfulness while al-janf (اَلْجَنْف) means turning away from rightfulness towards error. Arabs describe one who had done the pilgrimage or has done circumcision as ḥanīf (حَنِيْف) as an indication that he is following the tradition of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.). Aḥnaf (اَحْنَف) means a person with a distortion in his foot. It is said that this usage of the word is based on at-tafã'ūl (اَلتَّفَاؤُل) form of the word; it is also said that this usage is based on borrowing of the idea of simple deviation."

* * *

When Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) exculpated from their polytheism and idols by saying: "O my people! Surely I am clear of what you set up (with Allãh)," he had done so by gradually expressing his inner dislike for a partner of God by saying: "I do not love the setting ones," and then indicated that worshipping idols was an error by saying: "If my Lord had not guided me, I should certainly be of the erring people." After an explicit exculpation in his words: "O my people! Surely I am clear of what you set up (with Allãh)," Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) returns to the absolute unity in lordship – i.e., proving the lordship and worship for He who created the heavens and the earth – and denial of partnership from Him by saying: "Surely I have turned my face, being upright, wholly to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth…"

'Turning of the face' is an indication of exclusive focus towards the Almighty Allãh in worship for the act of veneration and dependency demands that the dependent slave should attach himself to his Lord with full force and determination, and pray to Him and refer to Him in all his activities – and no prayer or attention can happen except by turning the face towards Him. Therefore, 'turning of the face' is considered as an indication of worship in the sense of praying to and focusing on God.

Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) describes his Lord – the Exalted Allãh towards whom he turns his face – by a quality that is incontestably unique: He originated the heavens and the earth. He has used the relative pronoun and the syndetic relative clause [i.e., "لِلَّذِي (lilladhī) = Him Who"] in order to prove the known entity so that no one is left in confusion. Therefore, he said: "to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth", that is, 'I have turned in my worship to One to whom every thing is linked in its origination and creation.' This is what is proven by him and by them above all others.

By adding the word: "ḥanīf – being upright, wholly", Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) rejects all others whom they call as God's partners in the sense that he is turning towards Him away from others whereby denying any partnership for Him. He further affirms that by saying: "and I am not of the polytheists." So the import of his words staring with "I have turned…" is to prove the servitude towards Almighty Allãh and to deny a partner for Him; this is very similar to the import of the noble creed of Islam: lã ilãha illa 'llãh – there is no god but Allãh.

The letter lãm in "lilladhī – لِلَّذِي is for end or goal and denotes the meaning of "ila = to"; the use of lãm (ل) in the meaning of ila is common as seen in: ...whoever submits himself entirely to Allãh... (2:112); and And whoever submits himself wholly to Allãh... (31:22).

Exclusively concentrating on the attribute of Allãh as the Originator (al-Fãṭir, اَلفَاطِر) as opposed to al-Bãrī (اَلبَارى), al-Khãliq (اَلخَالِق) and al-Badī' (اَلبَدِيع) [all eventually convey the meaning of creation], shows the preference that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) had for the concept of "the religion of fiṭrah, nature". The Noble Qur'ãn has repeated this description of the true faith as "the pure faith of Ibrãhīm" and "the religion of fiṭrah" in the meaning of the religion whose ideas and teachings emanate from nature of the human being and the manner of his creation that does not ever change. Verily religion is the path adopted in order to reach to the real success, and the real success refers to the desired end that an entity truly and actually seeks based on the way it was created and was equipped with the means of perfection. Never can a human being or anything else from the creation attain success if he seeks it by other than the way he was created or equipped for: he cannot attain success by abandoning food or marriage or total seclusion from the society since he has been equipped otherwise; nor can he succeed in flying like the bird or living under the sea like the fish because he is not equipped for it. So, the true religion is in accordance with the essence of fiṭrah, nature; and never can the holiness of Divinity guide a person (or any other potential creature obliged to follow the religion) to a successful and blessed end without creating him accordingly or without equipping him with the means to reach the goal. Indeed the religion in the eyes of Allãh is Islam: submission to Allãh according to His guidance based on His creation.

QUR'ÃN [6:80]: And his people disputed with him He said: "Do you dispute with me respecting Allah? And He has guided me indeed; and I do not fear in any way those that you set up with Him, unless my Lord pleases; My Lord comprehends all things in His knowledge; will you not then mind?

[In these series of verses,] the Almighty has divided Ibrãhīm's arguments into two parts: in the first one, he initiated the discussion and argued against them; in the second one, the people initiated the discussion and argued against him when he repudiated their gods. The present verse: ["his people disputed with him"] contains the second of the two parts of arguments.

The Almighty Allãh does not mention the argument that had been presented to him but it is inferred to in His Word where He quotes Ibrãhīm ('a.s.): "I do not fear in any way those that you set up with Him," This refers to their argument that it is necessary to worship their idols out of fear. We have mentioned earlier and will discuss further that the impulse in believing in the idols as gods and worshipping them was based on two factors: either fear of their displeasure and power (since they have control over the events of this world) or hope of blessings and success from them. The more compelling of these two in their hearts was the first one, i.e., the fear. Why? Because people naturally consider what is in their hands of the material blessings and success as their property that they have acquired by their hard work in the process of their livelihood (in seeking wealth, position and status) or what they have come to own from affluent ancestor or good luck like one who has inherited wealth from a remote ancestor or found a treasure and owned it or became leader of his people in succession to his father.

So, the path of hope has lesser of an impact in pushing one towards worship; even the Muslims, with complete divine teachings at their disposal, are influenced less by promise and good-tidings compared to the impact of threat and warning. Therefore, you see that the Qur'ãn, while describing the duties of the Prophets, mentions their warnings more than their good-tidings while both are part of their duties and the methods that they use for promoting the faith.

In short, in their argument with Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) about their gods, his people chose the element of fear and warned him of the gods' power and displeasure, and advised him to adopt their path and stick to their way in seeking nearness to the gods, and to reject the lordship of the Almighty Allãh and to only believe in Him as they believed in Him just as the final point for everything.

When Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) realized that their statement can be divided into two parts: i.) Rejecting the belief in the lordship of the Almighty Allãh, and ii.) Promoting the belief in the lordship of their gods, he disputed with them on both levels but in a way that the first one is dependent on the second.

In the argument that he presented to them about Almighty Allãh, he says: "Do you dispute with me respecting Allah? And He has guided me indeed;" In other words: 'I am in a settled situation and have already been guided by my Lord when He made me aware of the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth, and thereby inspired to me the argument by which I can reject the lordship of others from the idols and the stars, and [made me aware] that I am in need of a Lord who manages my life; so it dawned upon me that He is the Only Lord who has no partner. Since He has guided me towards Himself, I don't need to heed to your argument and search for god-ship again since search is only relevant when a person is in search; and so search after reaching the goal is futile.'

This meaning comes to mind upon the initial reading of the verse. However, a deeper meaning manifests upon contemplation: Ibrãhīm's words: "and He has guided me indeed;" is an argument by guidance itself; in other words, guidance does not eliminate the need for an argument. This may be explained as follows: 'Verily, Allãh has guided me by teaching me the argument on falsehood of lordship of others and proving His Lordship. The guidance itself is a proof that He is the Lord and there is no lord other than Him. Guidance to the Lord is part of the actions that reflect divinity. If the Almighty Allãh had not been my Lord, He would not have guided me; instead the one who is the Lord would have provided guidance but Allãh is the One Who guided me, therefore He is my Lord.'

It was not valid for them to say that the one who has taught you what you know and inspired to you the argument is one of our gods because nothing will guide a person to something that is detrimental to it, destroys its name and denies its existence. So, the fact that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was taught to reject the godship of idols cannot be attributed to any of them.

However, what they could have said or what they have actually said is as follows: [The knowledge and inspiration that you have received] is from the act of one of our idols who has done this to you out of his anger and displeasure by distancing you from the belief in our gods, inspiring these arguments to you since he found crookedness in your mind and soul. This is similar to what the people of ʻÃd said to Hūd (ʻa.s.) when he called them towards belief in One God only and argued that it is Allãh only in Whom they should place their hopes and One Whom they should fear, and that their gods can neither benefit them nor harm them. They responded to him by saying that one of our gods has deceived you maliciously as seen in their story narrated by the Almighty: "And, O my people, ask forgiveness of your Lord, then turn to Him, He will send on you clouds pouring down abundance of rain and add strength to your strength, and do not turn back guilty." They said: "O Hūd! You have not brought to us any clear argument and we are not going to desert our gods for your word, and we are not believers in you. We cannot say aught but that some of our gods have smitten you with evil." He said: "Surely I call Allãh to witness, and do you bear witness too, that I am clear of what you associate (with Allãh) besides Him, therefore scheme against me all together; then give me no respite," (11:52-55).

So, the statement of Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.): "and I do not fear in any way those that you set up with Him, unless my Lord pleases;" rejects the dubious thought [of fearing the idols] and it is, at the same time, a complete argument in rejecting the lordship of their associate-gods.

The summary of his argument is as follows: 'You are calling me towards the belief in lordship of your associate-gods and the rejection of the lordship of my Lord by threatening me that your associate-gods will inflict harm upon me, and you are warning me by putting doubt in what I have been guided to. But I surely do not fear the gods that you associate with Allãh because all of them are creatures managed [by Him], they don't possess any benefit nor any harm [for me], and since I don't fear them, your argument stumbles down and the doubt created by you evaporates.'

[Referring to: "unless my Lord pleases;" he says:] 'And if I fear them, this fear would not be from the doing of your associate-gods since they are not capable of anything, rather it will be from the doing of my Lord and He would be the One Who pleased that I fear your associate-gods and so I fear them – this fear itself would be another proof of His Lordship and another sign from the signs of His Unity which compels one to exclusively worship Him, it cannot be a proof for the lordship of your associate-gods nor an argument compelling one to worship them.'

'The proof that the fear could be from my Lord is that: "my Lord comprehends all things in His knowledge;" He knows whatever of good and evil that occurs in His Kingdom which He has created for valid and solid purposes. So, how can it be possible that He knows about something that can benefit or harm but He is silent about it and does not confront it either by preventing it or by allowing it? Thus, if a fear comes into my heart, it is by Allãh's will and permission as per His sublime status; and this itself would be a way to prove His Lordship and reject the lordship of others. "Will you not then mind" and reflect upon what you can comprehend by your intelligence and be guided to what your pure nature indicates?'

This is explanation of his argument when he says: "I do not fear in any way those that you set up with Him, unless my Lord pleases; My Lord comprehends all things in His knowledge; will you not then mind?"

Based on the above, Ibrãhīm's statement: "I do not fear in any way those that you set up with Him," is like an appendage to the argument: "Do you dispute with me respecting Allãh? And He has guided me indeed." Nevertheless, at the same time, it is a complete argument in itself to deny the lordship of their associate-gods by not fearing them. Also, his statement that: "unless my Lord pleases," is an argument of a hypothetical nature: you are arguing for necessity of worshipping the idols out of fear while there is no fear in my heart; and if supposedly there were that fear in my heart, then that would be a proof for my Lord's godship and not for the lordship of your associate-gods since that fear would be from the will of my Lord. His statement: "My Lord comprehends all things in His knowledge," explains the basis of the supposed fear – that also would be by Allãh's will since the Creator of the heavens and the earth is not oblivious of whatever happens in His Kingdom, and so nothing happens but by His will as He is the one who manages it and sustains it. His statement: "will you not then mind," is a question coupled with rebuke, and it is an indication that the argument is based on pure nature.

* * *

The exegesis of the Qur'ãn have a variety of opinions about this verse:

As for the sentence: "Do you dispute with me respecting Allah? And He has guided me indeed;" most of them have mentioned first of the two explanations that we have given above which, in short, says that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) responds to their objection against God's unity by saying that he is not in need of arguing on this issue since Allãh has guided him and with such a guidance, there is no need for arguments.

However, the apparent context of the verse[does not support this view] since Ibrãhīm was in the state of argumentation, and this means that his statement was an argument for monotheism, not that he was not in need of any arguments.

As for the sentence: "and I do not fear in any way those that you set up with Him, unless my Lord pleases;" they have explained the first part of this sentence almost similarly to what we have said above but they have given a different explanation for the latter part: "unless my Lord pleases." They have said: 'It means: I do not fear them except if my Lord overcomes these idols, and gives them life and power so that they can harm and benefit.' Of course, this ability to harm and benefit becomes a proof of their creation and a proof of the Almighty Allãh's Unity. In other words, the meaning would be that I do not fear them at all except if my Lord decides to give life to these associate-gods so that they can then harm and benefit – then I will fear them. Nonetheless, the lordship will still belong to Allãh and it will demonstrate that their associate-gods are created entities.

Although this explanation is closer to what we had said above, the attribution of benefit and harm to the associate-gods if they were alive – in their belief some of them are indeed alive such as the angels, gods of various categories, and some of them apparently harm and benefit such as the sun – goes against the divine teachings as the Qur'ãn clearly states that ultimately benefit and harm comes from none but the Almighty Allãh.

Moreover, describing that as a proof that their associate-gods were created entities would have no impact on the idol-worshippers since they do not deny that idols and gods are creatures of Allãh; and their belief in 'eternity' of some of their gods does not conflict, in their views, with them being dependent upon a truly Eternal God.

Another commentator says that the meaning of the latter part of this sentence is that 'I do not fear their associate-gods and exclude from the general fear a fear that might be created by my Lord to punish me for some of my sins or to inflict harm upon me initially.' In other words, the exceptional clause (in the latter part of the sentence) is an exception to earlier part denying the fear of the associate-gods, and the words 'unless my Lord…' is an exception of fear in general. The meaning would be as follows: 'I do not fear the gods that you associate with Allãh nor anything else except from the fear that my Lord may inflict upon me initially or as retribution – which I would fear.' There is no need to elaborate on the arbitrary nature of this argument.

As for His Word: "My Lord comprehends all things in His knowledge," one of them has said that this is Ibrãhīm ['a.s.]'s praise for his Lord after completion of the argument. It is also said that it is an implied criticism of their idols since neither do they know nor feel anything. This explanation is rejected by the fact that an implied criticism by contrasting with Allãh's power would be more appropriate to the situation than with His knowledge, and so what was the justification for moving from the power to the knowledge? This objection is also valid for the previous explanation [i.e., if Ibrãhīm wanted to praise Allãh, it would have been better to describe His power].

Another commentator said that since the Lord exempted Ibrãhīm from the distress that could have fallen upon him, he describes His knowledge of the unseen by the sentence: "My Lord comprehends all things in His knowledge," and so He does not do anything but what is beneficial, good and wise. If this explanation were valid, then it would have been better for Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) to describe His wisdom instead of His knowledge, at the least by combining wisdom with knowledge as it has occurred in many places.

Yet another commentator said that this sentence is like a justification for the exceptional clause and it means that Allãh knew beforehand that he could be inflicted with evil because of the idols (e.g., if He had willed that an idol fall down upon him and crush him or heat of the sun causes illness or kills him). However, describing the power and the wisdom would have been better justification than just talking about knowledge.

One of them said that it means that the knowledge of my Lord covers and encompasses everything, and His will is connected to His eternal and comprehensive knowledge, and His power generates His will; and, therefore, nothing from His creation that they worship can have any impact neither in His attributes nor in His actions that emanate from them, neither by intercession nor by any other means. Thus, that impact and effect could only exist if the Almighty Allãh's knowledge did not encompass everything. Therefore the intercessor would be in a position to inform the Lord of the preferred action or inaction and that knowledge would have made it possible for the intercessor to harm or benefit someone or to bestow or withdraw something. This commentator further says: "We have derived this meaning of the sentence from the Almighty's arguments on negation of polytheistic intercession by verses such as: ...who is he that can intercede with Him but by His Permission? He knows what is before them and what is behind them, and they cannot comprehend anything out of His Knowledge except what He pleases... [2:255]. He also said that this is the best of explanations on this verse and it is an example of the interpretation of the Qur'ãn by the Qur'ãn itself. This is the summary of his arguments.

The conclusion of his view is that the verse: "My Lord comprehends all things in His knowledge," is an explanation and reason for total rejection of any fear from the gods and others as if Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) said: "I don't fear any sort of fear from your gods and other creatures since my Lord knows everything and He will decides by His will and implements it by His power, and therefore He does not need any intercessor to inform Him of what He didn't know so that the intercessor could have any impact on the Almighty's actions and intercession."

You can realize that negating this impact as much as it depends on the Almighty Allãh's vast knowledge also depends on absolute power and will – as such, the will is an attribute of action and not of person as this interpretator has assumed – so what would be the benefit of the comprehensive knowledge if His power and will is not absolute? This can be seen in his statement in which he explains the knowledge, the will and the power altogether.

In short, this interpretation is not valid on basis of vastness of knowledge alone, it can be conclusive if it were based on absoluteness of power and will as well. But the verse mentions vastness of knowledge only. His statement that the verses on intercession also indicate this meaning is not valid either: those verses actually prove intercession in the sense of intervention in causes by the Almighty Allãh's permission, they do not negate intercession as surmised by the interpretator and so he has assumed that he is interpretating the Qur'ãn by the Qur'ãn! The attempt to negate the causes from the visible world is an unattainable task; and the Qur'ãn, from its beginning to its end, speaks about causality and confirms the general principle of cause and effect. This discussion has occurred many times in the previous volumes of this book.

QUR'ÃN [6:81]: "And how should I fear what you have set up* (with Him)*, while you do not fear that you have set up with Allãh that for which He has not sent down to you any authority; which then of the two parties is surer of security, if you know?

Then Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) approaches the idol worshippers with another argument that proves contradiction between their words and their actions. In other words, their action belies their statement which can be summarized as following: 'You are asking me to fear the idols that should not be feared while you yourselves do not fear the God who should be feared; so I am more secure than you if I disobey you and don't follow your command.

'What you are asking me to fear, they don't need to be feared because there is no evidence to prove that their smaller and bigger idols are independent in harming and benefitting so that one should fear them. As for your lack of fear regarding the one who should be feared, well, you yourselves have assigned partners to the Almighty Allãh in lordship while Allãh has not sent down any proof on which you can rely since creation and origination is from the Almighty Allãh, to Him belongs the Kingdom and to Him belongs the command. If He had taken some of His creation as a partner unto Himself, making incumbent upon us to worship His partner, then it was upon Him, and not anyone else, to clarify the matter to us and show the reality in it. This could have been done by linking it with signs and proofs proving that He has partners in such and such issues, and that also either through revelation or through argument of tangible nature. And none of these exist.'

Based on this explanation, the words: "what you have set up (with Him)…" is contextually linked to the statement: "…for which He has not sent down to you any authority." However, this clause has come after the interjecting statement about them not fearing Allãh for their polytheism because it was more appropriate at this place as is obvious.

And His Word: "which then of the two parties is surer of security, if you know?" is the conclusion of the argument. All together, this is an argument against them in contradicting themselves by asking Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) to fear their gods as they were asking him to fear something which should not be feared while they themselves do not fear Allãh who should be actually feared.

It is clear from the above that the clause about idol worshipping: "…for which He has not sent down to you any authority" is just a hypothetical statement as required by the type of argument used in the discussion, it is not a real concept. In other words, it does not prove the possibility that Allãh could allow assigning of partners to Himself who could then be worshipped. No, not all. This clause is similar to our day-to-day conversation when we say: 'You don't have any evidence to prove your claim' in response to a person who threatens us with a superstitious issue claiming that it could benefit or harm us. As followers of tawḥīd, we can present this statement as follows: 'Allãh has not sent down any evidence.'

Based on analytical logic, the statement in the verse could be presented as qiyãs istithnã'ī (i.e., a mixed hypothetical syllogism in modus tollen form) in which the first conditional premise has an exceptional clause in order to prove the second premise. For example, we can say:

'If Allãh had sent down a proof that the idols have power to harm, then your fear of the idols would be valid.

'Allãh has not sent down any proof.

'Therefore, your fear of the idols is invalid.'

And it is known that there is no reality in the first premise of this argument. So there is no need to say that the conditional clause: 'He has not sent down any authority' is for sarcasm or that it is for indication that this was an essential condition for idol-worshipping similar to the verse: And whoever invokes with Allãh another god – he has no proof of this… (23:117), or other such assumptions.

The bã in the sentence: "لَمْ يُنَزِّلْ بِهِ – lam yunazzil bihi" is in the meaning of 'with' or 'for'. Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) has described them and himself as "the two parties" and did not say: "You and me" or something similar to it in order to refrain from any provocation of prejudice or egoism, and in order to show that the difference and separation between the two is in fundamental issue and the basic tenet of the faith which cannot be mixed in any way.

QUR'ÃN [6:82]: "Those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice, those are they who shall have the security and they are those who go aright."

While presenting his argument in the previous verse, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) had asked them who is worthy of having security: "…which then of the two parties is surer of security, if you know?" Then he responded to them since the answer was obvious in which the two parties cannot differ – a response of this nature cannot be delayed by the questioner waiting for the respondent since the respondent does not oppose the questioner in this matter and so there was no fear of rebuttal from him.

The Almighty Allãh has narrated their confession in this matter in the story of the breaking of the idols: He said: "Surely (some doer) has done it; the chief of them is this, therefore ask them, if they can speak." Then they turned to themselves and said: "Surely you yourselves are the unjust." Then they were made to hang down their heads [saying]: "Certainly you know that they do not speak." (21:63-65)

The context shows that this verse is the statement of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.). And the view that this could be the statement of his people or that it is the Almighty Allãh's statement as a judgement between the two opposing parties – the context does not support this view at all.

In any case, the verse contains a strong emphasis [on security for the believers] as reflected in multiple predicates in the nominal clause such as: "they who shall have the security" a nominal clause which is a predicate of "those" and all together they form a nominal clause and are a predicate for "those who believe…" Similarly, the sentence following "those who shall have the security", i.e., "they are those who are aright" is a nominal clause. It concludes that those who believe and have not mixed up their faith with injustice are undoubtedly deserving of security and guidance. There is no doubt in this.

There is no ambiguity in the conclusion of the verse that security and guidance are from fruits of the faith provided it is not mixed with injustice. "al-Lubs or al-labs (اَللَّبْسُ or اَللُّبْسُ)" means covering, concealing as ar-Rãghib has mentioned in his al-Mufradãt: "The origin of al-labs means concealing." [In this verse,] it has been used metaphorically in order to show that this "injustice" does not negate the root of faith since it is part of human nature that cannot be totally eradicated, rather injustice conceals it, nullifies its impact and does not let it manifest its right effect.

"aẓ-Ẓulm (اَلظُّلْمُ) injustice" means moving away from the equilibrium of justice. Although the word has occurred in this verse as an indefinite noun in a negative context implying a general meaning that cannot be associated with faith (īmãn) in any shape or form, but the context shows that the injustice that prevents the manifestation of faith and of its desired, good, results is a kind of injustice which has a negative impact upon faith and not the injustice which has no impact upon it.

Indeed aẓ-ẓulm in its first impression in people's mind refers to the social injustice: violation of the social right by taking away a person's life or his honor or his property without any legitimate reason. But then the people extended its meaning and named every violation of law or social norm as injustice; rather any sin or disobedience of a legislative order was known as injustice committed by the sinner in regard to himself. Furthermore, disobeying the Almighty Allãh (since He has the legitimate right of obedience) or opposing the religious duties was also known as injustice even if it was done by mistake or out of forgetfulness or ignorance – even though such a violator of duties was not to be punished. In addition to all this, even ignoring an advice and the Divine recommendations unknowingly is considered as being unjust to oneself. This also covers a person who was negligent in following the health guide-lines or ignored the effective ways of improving his health. The basis of expanding the meaning of ẓulm was analysis of the cause of violation.

In short, the meaning of ẓulm has been expanded greatly but not all its applications have negative impact on the faith. Those applications of ẓulm that do not cover sins and disobedience of divine orders – such as the acts committed by mistake or out of forgetfulness or ignorance – do not have any impact on the faith whose function is to bring a person closer to bliss and true success by the pleasure of the Lord, the Almighty. Such things have no impact on the faith.

So, His Word: "Those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice, those are they who shall have the security" means that the faith which gives security – against every sin and disobedience that hinders its effect – is dependent on absence of injustice.

However, herein is the fine point of reflection: the intentional sin (that we discussed fully at the end of 12th [Eng.] volume of this book) is of a variety of degrees depending on the difference in perspectives. An intentional sin may be considered ẓulm in views of one people but not by another.

So, a person who is at the crossroad of monotheism and polytheism, and then believes that the world has a Creator who has brought forth its various components, divided its various parts, and has kept its earth and sky apart, and considers himself and other creatures as being sustained and nurtured by Him, and that the real human life can only be attained by believing in Him and submitting to Him – the obstinate ẓulm for such a person is ascribing partners to Allãh and believing in other gods like the idols, the stars, etc. as shown by Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) in his previous statement: And how should I fear what you have set up (with Him), while you do not fear that you have set up with Allãh that for which He has not sent down to you any authority…

A person who has treaded this path and believes in Allãh alone, when he is confronted with the injustice of the major sins (such as causing distress to the parents, devouring an orphan's wealth, killing an innocent soul, committing adultery and drinking intoxicants), he knows that the manifestation of good results of his faith depends on refraining from this kind of injustice. Allãh has promised him to forgive the minor sins if he refrains from the major ones: If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins and cause you to enter an honourable place of entering; (4:31). Losing this result of faith is the misfortune of being chastised for these sins even though this will not be the everlasting chastisement like the chastisement of idol-worshipping (shirk), rather it will eventually come to an end either when its term expires or through intercession, etc.

Whoever acquires this level of righteousness and attains a share of awareness of his Lord's status, he recognizes a higher form of injustice such as doing the disliked (makrūh) actions, neglecting the recommended (mustaḥab) deeds and indulging in the permissible (mubãh) activities. A level higher than this would be the injustice of neglecting the noble traits and spiritual potentials in one's self. At even a higher level, the barriers in the path of love for Allãh and seeking His nearness are considered as injustice.

So, faith (īmãn) at all these various stages gives security to the faithful one and keeps misfortune away from him provided he refrains from that same level of injustice (ẓulm).

Therefore, the term "ẓulm" in the verse: "those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice" is of general import but its application varies depending on the difference in the level of faith. However, since the context of Ibrãhīm's statement was of debate against the idol-worshippers, the ẓulm here would refer to the ẓulm of polytheism only; and the "security" which follows this faith is the security against the fear of perpetual misery and ever-lasting chastisement. Nonetheless, the message of the verse is independent from its context and explains that security and guidance are indeed results of faith provided it is devoid of all types of injustice that conceal its impact as mentioned earlier.

As for the "īmãn = faith" mentioned in the verse, it is of a general type and it means the belief in divinity, a belief that can be conditional to what preserves it or what destroys it. When it is contextualized by the words: "and do not mix up their faith with injustice," it refers to belief in divinity of Allãh and rejection of associate-gods. In the previous verse, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) quoted the idol-worshippers' statement about their associate-gods and belief in them even though they were God's creation as a statement that has no proof or authorization from Allāh, and that by believing in their associate-gods, they are seeking to avert evil and misery even though they cannot harm nor benefit anyone. Whereas Ibrāhīm ('a.s.) fears and believes in Him Who is his Creator Who provides guidance and manages the universe with His command and will in all issues because of His comprehensive knowledge. Then he asked the question: which of the two parties is worthier for security and success by belief in the Lord: both parties believe in the Lord but with a major difference – one believes in a Lord based on proof and the other believes in a Lord without any proof, rather the proof is against them.

It is, therefore, clear that the meaning of "īmān, faith" in "those who believe" is the general belief in divinity which has been further restricted by the words: "and do not mix up their faith with injustice," thus focusing on the belief in Almighty Allāh which is the true belief. Think and reflect.

So, the following points became clear from the above:

Firstly, the faith in this verse refers to the faith in the Divinity and not the faith in the Creator of the universe – the opponents were not atheists but polytheists.

Secondly, the injustice mentioned in this verse is of general type that can harm the faith and corrupt it by sins. Similarly, the security mentioned in this verse is a general security from misery of disobedience and sins. "To go aright" is also of general nature and it means to be free from misguidance, even though contextually it is applied to the misguidance of polytheism.

Thirdly, the term injustice is also general depending on the different levels of faith (īmān).

* * *

While talking about the general meaning of ẓulm, a commentator says:

The security mentioned in the verse is restricted for those who believe and do not mix their faith with injustice. If the general meaning is applied without considering the context of faith, then the meaning will be as following: Those who believe and do not mix their faith with any kind of injustice – neither against themselves nor against their īmān, neither against their physical and psychological actions of religious or worldly nature nor against other creatures from the intelligent beings or non-intelligent beings – such people shall have security against Allãh's religious punishment for sins and evil deeds as well as from His worldly punishment for not observing the norm in the chain of cause-and-effect (e.g., poverty, diseases, illnesses, etc.). This security will not cover those who are unjust to themselves or others since the unjust would have no security; actually, every unjust person will face punishment even though the Almighty Allãh, out of His vast mercy, will not punish every unjust person for every injustice, rather He will forgive many of the sins of this world; and He will punish whomsoever He wants and forgive whomsoever He wants in the hereafter with the exception of shirk (idol-worshipping).

He further says: This meaning of the verse is right by itself; and it follows that no responsible person should feel general amnesty from all types of fears (religious and worldly chastisement or legal and natural punishment) except the fear of the awe and majesty of the Almighty that is the hallmark of those who have attained the level of perfection.

He also said: If the meaning of security is not applied generally then the meaning of the verse would be that those who believe and do not mix their faith with the great injustice (i.e., shirk – ascribing partners to Allãh), they shall have security from the religious chastisement (which is related to the principles of faith): perpetuity in the abode of chastisement. In the world, they shall be in the state of fear and hope. He then concludes that the apparent meaning of the verse denotes the general meaning, and has based his argument on the understanding of the Prophet's companions who said that when the verse was revealed, it created extreme anxiety among the people and they said: "O Messenger of Allãh! Who among us has not been unjust to himself?" He (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) informed them that the injustice [in the verse] refers to shirk. The context of the verse also perhaps indicates this as well as the fact that its subject is īmãn, faith. This was the summary of his statement.

There are several problems with this interpretation:

Firstly, what he has tried to prove from the understanding of the companions does not correlate to the meaning that he has presented: what they understood from injustice was equal to sins and disobedience whereas what he has presented is broader than that in meaning.

Secondly, what he has proven as the general injustice (even in cases that are not really in the list of sins), and then judged it to be a correct interpretation is actually far-fetched from the meaning of the verse. The verse intends to say that security and guidance are effects of the faith, provided it is not tainted with injustice that engulfs it and neutralizes its effect. This injustice is indeed the act of disobedience in form of sins. However, what is not considered a sin – for example, inadvertently eating a food that is harmful to the bodily health – obviously does not neutralize the effect of the faith, i.e., security and guidance. The verse does not speak about the effects of injustice outside the context of faith as the Almighty said: "those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice" in which He has made faith (īmãn) the subject and tied it to absence of injustice, and made security and guidance as its effects; He did not make injustice the subject so that the verse would be expected to explain its effects. The verse intends to enumerate the effects that emerge from the true faith; whereas injustice – with its very vast subject and its ensuing effects – is not subject of the verse at all. Therefore, his statement that 'this meaning of the verse is correct by itself' is positively invalid.

Thirdly, his statement that: 'And it follows that no responsible person should feel general amnesty from all types of fears' is a clear confession that there is no application for the general meaning of security, and its necessary conclusion is that his statement loses its validity. What is the benefit of a statement in supporting arguments that has no application?

Fourthly, the meaning that he has finally chosen, i.e., injustice refers to the specific injustice of shirk, is not valid either since the wording in the verse is general. Of course, it says that faith should not be tainted with shirk so that it does not obstruct its impact but that is an example of applying a general term to a specific case. But to take a specific meaning from a general word – without any circumstantial or verbal, attached or detached, indication – is not acceptable in the art of eloquence. This is obvious. As for the Prophet's statement that he has quoted: 'This refers to shirk'; this does not clearly indicate that shirk is the literal meaning of the verse and its application. We shall discuss this further, Allãh willing, in the section of Traditions.

QUR'ÃN [6:83]: And that was Our argument which we gave to Ibrãhīm against his people; We exalt in ranks whom We please; surely your Lord is Wise, Knowing:

The use of "tilka (تِلْكَ) that" for indicating something from a distance [instead of "this"] denotes eminence and greatness for the argument since it is a convincing argument based on nature and whose premises are derived from it.

As for the Almighty's Word: "We exalt in ranks whom We please;" The term "darajãt (دَرَجَات)" [translated as "ranks"] was initially used for steps of the ladder and then its usage was expanded and was applied for levels of perfection in moral arena such as knowledge, faith, honour and dignity, etc. Allãh's act of exalting whomever He pleases in ranks means that He bestows a person with moral perfection and real virtues in qualities that are humanly attainable such as knowledge and piety as well as qualities that are humanly non-attainable [rather they are bestowed by Divine Grace] such as prophethood, messenger-ship, sustenance, etc.[28]

Although the term darajãt has occurred as an indefinite noun, in a general sense, it is nonetheless certain contextually that it refers to the ranks of knowledge and guidance. Allãh has indeed exalted Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) by guiding him, showing him the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth, giving him conviction, decisive arguments and knowledge. While talking about the ranks of knowledge, the Almighty says: Allãh will exalt those of you who believe, and those who are given knowledge, in high rank... (58:11).

The verse ends with the words: "surely your Lord is Wise, Knowing," in order to emphasize that all this was done by the wisdom of the Almighty and His knowledge just as the arguments that He had given to the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) as mentioned earlier in this chapter before these arguments were based on His, the Sublime's Wisdom and Knowledge.

Finally, the change in this verse from the first person to third person [while talking about Ibrãhīm] was done in order to please the heart of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) and to confirm the matters discussed inhere.

1. aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates in al-ʻUyūn from Nuʻaym ibn ʻAbdillãh ibn Tamīm al-Qarashī, may Allãh be pleased with him, said: My father narrated to me from Ḥamdãn ibn Sulaymãn an-Nayshãbūrī from ʻAlī ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Jahm who said that he attended the gathering of

[28] Adding 'sustenance' alongside prophethood and messengership might seem odd but it refers to the Islamic belief of Divine Decree about the means and maximum limit of sustenance (rizq) – that is entirely at Allãh's discretion and not fully result of the human exertions. (tr.)

al-Ma'mūn while ar-Riḍã ('a.s.) was with him. al-Ma'mūn said to him: "O Son of the Messenger of Allãh! Do you believe that the prophets are infallible?" He ['a.s.] said: "Yes." Then al-Ma'mūn asked him about some Qur'ãnic verses on this issue, and among those questions that he asked him was the following: "Can you tell me about the Word of Allãḥ, to Whom belong Mighty and Majesty, about Ibrãhīm: So when the night over-shadowed him, he saw a star; he said: 'This is my Lord.'" ar-Riḍã ('a.s.) said:

"Verily Ibrãhīm found himself among three groups of people: a group that worshipped Venus, a group that worshipped the moon and a group that worshipped the sun; and this was at that time when he came out from the den in which he was hidden. When the night overshadowed him, he saw the Venus and said: 'This is my Lord' in order to negate and inquire about it. And when it set down, he said: 'I do not love the setting ones' because setting was a quality of the created being and not a quality of the Eternal God. When he saw the moon rising, he said: 'This is my Lord' in order to negate and inquire about it. And when it set down, he said: 'If my Lord had not guided me, I should certainly be of the erring people.' Then when he saw the sun rising, he said: 'This is my Lord, this is bigger than the Venus and the moon' in order to negate and inquire about it, not for accepting. And when it also set, then he addressed all the three groups (worshippers of the Venus, the moon and the sun): 'O my people! Surely I am clear of what you set up (with Allãh). Surely I have turned my face, being upright, wholly to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth, and I am not of the polytheists.' Ibrãhīm only said what he said in order to show them the falsity of their belief and to prove to them that worship of entities that have the [setting] quality of the Venus, the moon and the sun is not valid, and that worship is valid for their Creator and Creator of the heavens and the earth. Moreover, he had argued against his people by what Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, has inspired to him as He [s.w.t.] said: And that was Our argument which we gave to Ibrãhīm against his people." al-Ma'mūn said: "May Allãh keep you long, O son of the Messenger of Allãh!" ('Uyūnu akhbãri 'r-Riḍã)

The author says: This narration, with its contents, clearly supports a number of points that we derived from the context of the holy verses. Some other supporting narrations will come below. As for what the narration says about Ibrãhīm's statement: 'This is my Lord' that it was actually in order to negate and inquire rather than to inform and agree – this is one of the ways of interpretation of the verses that was presented by the Imãm ('a.s.) in order to reject the argument of al-Ma'mūn, and that does not contradict the other ways of its interpretation, if there are any, as we shall see later on.

The Imãm's statement "setting was a quality of the created being" does not necessarily mean that the argument is based on "setting quality" of the created being as some have mentioned since it is possible that the argument was based on "not loving" and that in turn was based on the phenomenon of setting as a quality of the created being which cannot be an object of love. Think and ponder.

2. aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates from his father and Ibnu 'l-Walīd who both narrate from Sa'd from Ibn Burayd from Ibn Abī 'Umayr from Hishãm ibn Sãlim from Abū Baṣīr from Abū 'Abdillãh ('a.s.) who said: "The father of Ibrãhīm was an astrologer of Namrūd (Nimrod) ibn Kan'ãn; and Namrūd did not do anything but after consulting him. So, he looked at the stars, in one of the nights, and in the morning, he reported to Namrūd: 'I saw last night something surprising!' Namrūd asked: 'What was it?' He said: 'I saw a child being born in our land in whose hands will be our destruction; and it will not be long before he is conceived.' Namrūd was surprised by this and asked: 'Has he already been conceived by a woman?' He replied: 'No.' Part of the knowledge that was given to the astrologer was that the fire will burn that child but he was not told that Allãh will rescue him from it." The Imãm then continued: "The women were then separated from their husbands so that no one could be conceived. However, Ibrãhīm's father met his wife and Ibrãhīm was conceived. He thought that this is the child and so he sent for the mid-wives to come and check his wife. The Almighty Allãh made the foetus cling to the back and the midwives said: 'We don't see anything in her womb.' Finally, when Ibrãhīm's mother gave birth, his father decided to take him to Namrūd. His wife pleaded: 'Don't take your son to Namrūd so that he may kill him. Let me take him to some cave and place him in it until he dies; don't be the one to have killed your own son!' He said: 'So go.' She took him to a cave, nursed her [and placed him inside] and put a stone on the cave's entrance and left him. So, Allãh placed his sustenance in his thumb; whenever he would suck it, milk will come out of it; he would develop in one day like others develop in one week, and he would develop in one week like others develop in one month, and he would grow in one month like others grow up in one year. He stayed as long as Allãh wanted him to stay [in the cave].

"Then his mother told his father: 'Would you allow me to go to that child and see what happened to him?' He allowed her. She went to the cave and saw Ibrãhīm with his eyes lightening up like two lamps; she picked him, held him to her chest and nursed her. Then she went back to her home. His father inquired about him. She said: 'I have buried him in the ground.' She would go outside on the pretext of having work to do and then go to Ibrãhīm, hold him, nurse him and returns home. Once he started moving, his mother went to visit him as usual. When she started to leave, he got hold of her dress. She said: 'What is the matter?' He said: 'Take me with you.' She said: 'I will have to ask your father.'

"So, Ibrãhīm continued to stay in ghaybah, hidden physically, concealing his reality until he made his appearance with truth by Allãh's command and Allãh manifested His powers in him." (Kamãlu 'd-dīn wa tamãmu 'n-ni'mah)

The author says: [ar-Rãwandī] the author of Qiṣaṣu 'l-anbiyã' has quoted the same narration from aṣ-Ṣadūq from his father and Ibnu 'l-Walīd taking the chain of narration all the way to Abū Baṣīr from Abū 'Abdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq, 'a.s.] who said: "Ãzar, the uncle of Ibrãhīm, was an astrologer of Namrūd who did not do anything but after consulting him, said: 'Verily, last night, I saw something strange!' Namrūd said: 'What was that?' He said: 'I saw a child being born in our land in whose hands will be our destruction.' So, he separated the men from the women; and Tãrikh [Ibrãhīm's father] had [before that] slept with the mother of Ibrãhīm who became pregnant…" Then he ['a.s.] continued the ḥadīth to the end.

The unity in the chain of narrators of both narrations as well as the content of both (with exception about the father vis-à-vis uncle of Ibrãhīm) led the author of al-Biḥãr to write: "It seems that what ar-Rãwandī has narrated is the same narration [as that of aṣ-Ṣadūq] but he has changed [the issue of Ibrãhīm's father] in order to bring it in line with the principles of the [Shī'ah] Imãmiyyah." Then al-Majlisī [the author of al-Biḥãr] has explained this narration and other similar narrations that talk about Ãzar the idol-worshipper as Ibrãhīm's father as narrations based on at-taqiyyah (dissimulation).

A similar ḥadīth has been narrated by al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī in his at-Tafsīr, and it has been narrated in Sunnī sources from Mujãhid by aṭ-Ṭabarī in his Tarīkh and from other sources by ath-Tha'labī in Qiṣaṣu 'l-anibyã'.

At the least, one thing worth mentioning is that the scholars of ḥadīth and history are unanimous that Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.), during his early years, was hidden in the cave out of fear that King Namrūd would kill him. Then he came out of the cave and argued against his father and his people about the issue of idols, the Venus, the moon and the sun, and also argued against the King's claim of divinity. The context of the verses supports this aspect of the narration.

As for the father of Ibrãhīm: The historians have written that his name was Tãrikh or Tãriḥ, and Ãzar was either his title or name of an idol or a positive nickname ('the helper') or a negative nickname ('the lame') in their language given by Ibrãhīm to him.

They have mentioned that this idol-worshipper named by the Qur'ãn as Ibrãhīm's father against whom he argued was Tãrikh, his biological father and his true parent. This is supported by a number of the scholars of ḥadīth and theology from among the Sunnīs but has been rejected by a group of their scholars as well as the Shīʻahs who are almost united against it except for what is seen among some muḥaddithīn who have included such narrations in their books. The best argument that the opponents – i.e., those who say that the idol-worshipper Ãzar was not Ibrãhīm's father rather he was his uncle or his maternal grand-father – are the narrations that have come from both schools of thought that the ancestors of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) were all monotheists and that none among them was an idol-worshipper. The debates between the two groups have continued.

The author says: The discussion of this nature – in whatever way it ends up – is outside the scope of the discussion of Qur'ãnic exegesis. Although the scholars from both groups are in need of presenting their ḥadīth-based proofs and deriving the right conclusion from them but we are not in need of them because the Qur'ãnic verses, as discussed earlier, prove that Ãzar, the idol-worshipper, whom Allãh has mentioned in these verses of sūrah of "al-Anʻãm" was not the real father of Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.). The narrations that say that Ãzar was Ibrãhīm's real father – with all the contradictions that are in the narrations – are against the Holy Book and do not deserve any attention. So, there is no need to explain them away as narrations based on taqiyyah with all the difference among the Sunnīs themselves.

3. ʻAlī ibn Ibrãhīm al-Qummī, under the verse: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth… says: "My father narrated to me from Ismãʻīl ibn Marãr from Yūnus ibn ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥmãn from Hishãm from Abū ʻAbdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] (ʻa.s.) who said:

"He [s.w.t.] opened for him what is on the earth and those who are on it; what is on the heaven and those who are on it and the angel who carries it; and the throne and those who are on it. He similarly did this for His Messenger (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) and the Chief of the Believers [ʻAlī] (ʻa.s.)." (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: A similar narration has been quoted in Baṣã'iru 'd-darajãt by two chains of ʻAbdullãh ibn Muskãn and Abū Baṣīr from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (ʻa.s.) and by a chain of ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥmãn from al-Bãqir (ʻa.s.); and al-ʻAyyãshī has narrated it from Zurãrah and Abū Baṣīr from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (ʻa.s.) and from Zurãrah and ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥmãn al-Qaṣīr from al-Bãqir (ʻa.s.); and [the Sunnī commentator, as-Suyūṭī, has] narrated it in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Ibn ʻAbbãs, Mujãhid and as-Suddī from the earlier commentators.

While talking about the Throne (al-ʻArsh), we shall soon discuss the ḥadīth of ʻAlī (ʻa.s.) about al-ʻArsh that has been narrated in al-Kãfī. He says in it: "Those who carry the Throne and those who are around it are the divine scholars to whom Allãh bestowed His knowledge." Then he said: "This is the Kingdom that Allãh shows to His chosen ones, and showed it to His friend [Ibrãhīm] (ʻa.s.) as He [s.w.t.] said: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and so that he might be of those who are sure." This ḥadīth has commentary on other issues that have come in exegesis of 'showing the Kingdom' and confirmation of what we said earlier. Allãh willing, the full explanation of this ḥadīth will come in sūrah of "al-Aʻrãf" (ch.7).

4. al-ʻAyyãshī in his tafsīr narrates from Abū Baṣīr from Abū ʻAbdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] (ʻa.s.) who said: "When Ibrãhīm saw the Kingdom of the heavens and the earth, he saw a person committing adultery so he invoked evil upon him and the person died, then he saw another person [in the same state] and he invoked evil upon him and he also died, and then he saw three persons [in the same state] and invoked evil upon them and they died as well. So, Allãh revealed to him: 'O Ibrãhīm, your prayers are answered, so do not invoke evil upon My servants; if I wished, I would not have created them [in the first place]. I have created my servants in three categories: a person who worships Me and does not associate anyone with Me; a person who worships other than Me but He can never escape from Me; and a person who worships other than Me but in his loins is one who will worship only Me [and so I spare him].'" (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: This is a mustafīḍah narration,[29] and al-Kulaynī has narrated it in al-Kãfī with a full chain from Abū Baṣīr from the Imãm ['a.s.]; aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated it in 'Ilalu 'sh-sharãyi' from the Imãm ['a.s.]; and aṭ-Ṭabrisī has narrated it in al-Iḥtijãj from al-'Askarī ('a.s.). [Among Sunnī commentators,] as-Suyūṭī has narrated it in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Ibn Marduwayh from 'Alī ('a.s.) from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.), and [in another chain] from Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh. al-Bayhaqī has narrated it in Shu'abu 'l-īmãn from the chain of Sharḥ ibn Ḥawshab from Ma'ãdh ibn Jabal from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) and from a number of commentators without full chain of narrators.

5. al-'Ayyãshī narrates in his at-Tafsīr from Muḥammad ibn Muslim from one of the two Imãms [al-Bãqir or aṣ-Ṣãdiq] who said about Ibrãhīm ['a.s.] when he saw the star: "He was looking for his Lord and had not disbelieved; and anyone from the people who thinks like that [i.e., is in search of the truth], he is like him."

6. al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr says that Abū 'Abdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] ('a.s.) was asked about Ibrãhīm's statement: "This is my Lord." Did he commit shirk by his statement: "This is my Lord?" He ['a.s.] said: "Whoever says that today is a polytheist; but in case of Ibrãhīm, there was no shirk since he was seeking his Lord. However, that statement from someone else would be shirk."

The author says: The opposite of the seeker of the truth is someone for whom the guidance and clear proof has been established; such a person cannot just suppose something as god that shirk.

7. al-'Ayyãshī in his at-Tafsīr narrates from Ḥujr who said that al-'Alã' ibn Sayyãbah sent someone with a question to Abū 'Abdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] ('a.s.) about Ibrãhīm's statement: 'This is my Lord': "If someone says this now, he is considered by us as a polytheist." He ['a.s.] said: "It was not shirk in case of Ibrãhīm since he was in search of his Lord. From other than him, it would be shirk."

He also narrates from Muḥammad ibn Ḥumrãn who asked Abū 'Abdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] ('a.s.) concerning Allãh's statement about what Ibrãhīm said: "This is my Lord." He ['a.s.] said: "He didn't reach to anything [of shirk]; he intended something other than what he said." (at-Tafsīr)

[29] If a khabar wãḥid has multiple narrators, it is known as mustafīḍah narration and its status is elevated closer to that of the mutawãtir ḥadīth. (tr.)

The author says: Perhaps the Imãm meant that by saying: "This is my Lord" Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) did not mean anything more than the word itself and did not have any other meaning beyond that. In other words, he said it as a hypothetical statement or accepted the premises in order to prove its falsity as mentioned earlier [in the commentary].

8. as-Suyūṭī in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr under verse: Those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice, says that Aḥmad, al-Bukhãrī, Muslim, at-Tirmidhī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, ad-Dãrquṭnī in al-Afrãd, Abu 'sh-Shaykh and Ibn Marduwayh have quoted from ʿAbdullãh ibn Masʿūd who said: "When the verse: Those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice, was revealed, it distressed the people and they said: 'O Messenger of Allãh! Who among us has not being unjust to himself?' He [ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.] said: 'It is not what you think; have you not heard the virtuous servant saying that: Verily, polytheism (shirk) is the great injustice? It is indeed shirk.'

The author says: 'The virtuous servant' refers to Luqmãn as Allãh has quoted him in sūrah of "Luqmãn" (ch.31). This ḥadīth shows that the sūrah of "al-Anʿãm" was revealed after the sūrah of "Luqmãn". We have mentioned earlier that explaining the term 'injustice' as shirk is actually applying its most appropriate example and that shirk is an unforgiveable sin unlike any other sin whatever it may be. The proof for what we have said will come in the narrations [below].

9. as-Suyūṭī says that Aḥmad, aṭ-Ṭabarãnī, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, Ibn Marduwayh and al-Bayhaqī in Shuʿabu 'l-īmãn have narrated from Jarīr ibn ʿAbdillãh who said: "We departed with the Messenger Allãh (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) from Medina when a rider appeared towards us. When he came close, he greeted us. The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) said to him: "From where do you come?" He said: "I am coming from my family, my children and my tribe seeking the Messenger of Allãh." He [ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.] said: "You have found him." The person said: "Teach me what is the faith (īmãn)?" The Holy Prophet [ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.] said: "Testify that there is no god but Allãh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allãh; and establish the prayer, give the charity, fast in Ramaḍãn and do the pilgrimage of [Allãh's] House." He said: "I accept."

Then his camel's forelimb went into the rats' hole and he fall over with his head down and died. The Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.ʿa.w.a.) said: "He is of those who did a little [as far as deeds are concerned] but will be rewarded abundantly; he is from those whom Allãh had described as: "T*hose who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice – they are those who shall have security and they are those* who go aright." I saw wide eyed houris putting a fruit of Paradise into his mouth, and so I came to know that the person had died hungry." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has also narrated this from al-Ḥakīm at-Tirmidhī[30] and Ibn Abī Ḥātim from Ibn ʻAbbās a similar narration; al-ʻAyyāshī has narrated the same in his at-Tafsīr from Jābir al-Juʻfī from an unnamed person from the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.).

as-Suyūṭī also says that ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd has narrated from Ibrāhīm at-Taymī that a person asked the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) about this verse but he [ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.] was silent till a person came and accepted Islam and didn't live long before he joined a battle in which he was martyred. The Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.ʻa.w.a.) said: "This person is among: those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice."

10. as-Suyūṭī says that al-Fāriyābī, ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Abu 'sh-Shaykh, al-Ḥākim (who has even authenticated the narration) and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from ʻAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib about the verse: "those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice" who said: "This verse was revealed about Ibrāhīm and his companions especially, and it is not for this ummah."

The author says: This narration does not conform to the general principles derived from the Qur'ān and the sunnah. Verily the verse does not contain any special command specific to one community and not the other like the practical laws legislated for one era and not the other. As for the faith (īmān) with its effects on different levels as well as the injustice (ẓulm) on different levels (affecting the īmān negatively), this is an issue bestowed in the human nature with no difference in time or nations.

Some commentators have tried to explain this ḥadīth by saying that perhaps he meant that Allāh has specifically granted to Ibrāhīm and his people a security against the general chastisement of the here-after and not just the security against perpetuity in it. Probably the reason for this exclusivity – if it were valid – is that the Almighty Allāh did not impose upon them anything but monotheism leaving the matters of laws to their strict civil system in matters of personal and behavioural laws.

[30] al-Ḥakīm at-Tirmidhī was a Ḥanafī Sūfī scholar, not be confused with at-Tirmidhī, the famous compiler of Jāmiʻu 't-Tirmidhī, one of the six canonical compilations of ḥadīth among the Sunnīs. (tr.)

Researchers have discovered the Code of Hammurabi, the righteous king who lived during Ibrãhīm's era and whom he welcomed and took one-tenth tax from him as it has been mentioned in the Book of Genesis (in the Old Testament); and so the Code is similar to the Torah in most of its laws. As for Allãh introducing the ritual ḥajj through Ibrãhīm, that was only for the people among the descendants of his son Ismã'īl and not among his Chaldean people. As for this ummah: its followers of tawḥīd will still be punished for sins according to their level of gravity since they were charged with a complete code of law and will be accountable for its implementation. Here ends the commentator's argument.

There is obvious arbitrariness in his argument. We have already mentioned earlier that King Hammurabi lived in the beginning of the year 1700 BC while Ibrãhīm lived approximately in the beginning of 2000 BC.

Hammurabi was a good king in his own religion, just to his people, practically committed to the laws that he legislated, diligently imposed the laws in his domain in the best way, and, as it is said, they were the earliest civil laws – in spite of all this, he was an idol-worshipper and sought help from the gods of idol-worshippers as he himself wrote after completing his Code as seen in the tablet discovered in the ruins of Babylon. Those gods he mentioned in his statement at the end of the Code, he thanked them for granting him the great kingdom and made him successful in spreading justice and laying down the laws. The gods that he prayed for their help in preserving the laws from distortion are Mīrudãkh, the god of gods and god of law and justice, Zamãmã and Ishtãr, the gods of war, Shãmãsh, the god who maintains justice in the sky and the earth, Sīn, the god of the heavens, Ḥãdãd, the god of fertility, Nīrghãl, the god of victory, Bal, the god of destiny, and other gods like Biyltīs, Nino, Sãjīlã, etc.

Moreover, what the commentator has said that Allãh did not impose on Ibrãhīm's people anything but monotheism leaving the matters of laws to their strict civil system is rejected by the Qur'ãnic narrations which talks about Ibrãhīm's prayer (as seen in his prayers in the sūrah of "Ibrãhīm" [ch.14]), it mentions how Allãh revealed to him the doing of good deeds and giving charity (as seen in the sūrah of "al-Anbiyã'" [ch.21]), and legislated ḥajj and permissibility of cattle's meat (as seen in the sūrah of "al-Ḥajj" [ch.22]). Part of his sharī'ah was also the disassociation with the idol-worshippers (as seen in the sūrah of "al-Mumtaḥinah" [ch.60]), and he used to prohibit every kind of injustice that was against human nature (as seen in the "Sūratu 'l-An'ãm" [ch.6], etc.). Also, part of Ibrãhīm's sharī'ah was physical purity (as seen in the sūrah of "al-Ḥajj" [ch.22]), and there are narrations that he introduced the ḥanīfiyyah tradition which consists of ten things: five related to the head and five related to the body, including circumcision. He used to greet by the greeting of peace (as seen in the "Sūratu 'l-Hūd" [ch.11] and "Maryam" [ch.19]).

Allãh, the Sublime, has indeed said that: ...the faith of your father, Ibrãhīm... (22:78) and: Say: "Nay! (We follow) the religion of Ibrãhīm, the upright one..." (2:135), whereby He has described Islam, with its doctrines and practices, as the religion of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.). Although this does not mean that Islam with its elaborate code of law was introduced from days of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) – rather the reality is contrary to that as mentioned in: He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and that which We have revealed to you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrãhīm and Mūsã and 'Īsã... (42:13) – it proves that Allãh's laws are based on a principle or general principles that emanate from the nature: whatever conforms to it is subject to commandments and whatever does not conform to it is subject of prohibitions. After mentioning the arguments against shirk, and some general commandments and prohibitions, the Almighty Allãh addresses His Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) as follows: Say: "Surely, (as for) me, my Lord has guided me to the straight path; (to) a most right religion, the faith of Ibrãhīm the upright one, and he was not of the polytheists." (6:161)

If what the above-mentioned commentator has said was the fact that Allãh did not lay down any code of law for Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) and his people, rather He left them to the prevailing civil laws of the time, i.e., the Code of Hammurabi – then that Code would be endorsed and valid in Allãh's eyes, and would be part of Ibrãhīm's religion, and so shall the Islamic faith (that has been described in the Qur'ãn as the pure religion of Ibrãhīm) [be linked to the Code of the idol-worshipping king] thus making it one of the Divine faiths with a revealed scripture!

The undeniable truth is that it was the Divine revelation that provided the past prophets and their peoples with the general principles for social life in this world and [success] in the hereafter (such as the acts of worship), and the general norms (of good and evil) that would guide the sensible human being towards forming a good society and refraining from injustice, extravagance and supporting the tyrants, etc; and then enjoin them to be members of the society equipped with such guidance and to call for acquiring good and piety, and refraining from evil, indecency and mischief irrespective of the socio-political nature of those societies whether they were governed by oppression of the unjust and tyrants or by benevolence of the just rulers and their organized political systems.

However, no elaborate code of laws was sent down before the advent of Islam except in the Tawrãt (Torah) which had some laws similar to what was in the Code of Hammurabi. It is true that the Tawrãt was sent down by Allãh to Mūsã ('a.s.) and it was preserved by the Israelites but it is also a fact that they lost it during the conquest of [the Babylonian King] Nebuchadnezzar II (Bakhtnaṣr) who annihilated them, destroyed their Temple and only a few of them survived who were enslaved and taken to Babylon and lived there until [the Persian] King Cyrus (Kūrush) conquered Babylon, emancipated the Israelites and allowed them to return to Jerusalem. Ezra, the High Priest, was allowed to write the Tawrãt for them after its copies had perished and its contents were forgotten, and they had become used to the Babylonian laws that were prevalent among the Chaldeans.

With such a history [of losing the Tawrat and the rewriting of it in an environment influenced by Babylonian laws] how can it be said that Allãh has endorsed whatever of Hammurabian Code is found in the Jewish laws? The Qur'ãn confirms only some of what is in the present Tawrãt. Nonetheless, one cannot deny that some man-made laws (established outside the Divine revelation) contain some useful and good laws.

11. al-Kulaynī narrates in al-Kãfī through his chain of narrators from Abū Baṣīr from Abū 'Abdillãh ('a.s.) who explained the verse: those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice, as shirk, polytheism.

12. al-Kulaynī narrates through another chain of narrators from Abū Baṣīr from him [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] ('a.s.) who explained the verse [and the term 'injustice'] as "doubt." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: al-'Ayyãshī has also narrated this ḥadīth from Abū Baṣīr from him ('a.s.).

13. al-'Ayyãshī in his at-Tafsīr narrates from Abū Baṣīr from Abū 'Abdillãh ('a.s.) that he said: "I asked him ['a.s.] about the Word of Allãh: those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice. He ['a.s.] said: 'We seek Allãh's protection, O Abū Baṣīr, from being among those who have mixed up their faith with injustice.' Then he ['a.s.] said: 'Those are the Khawãrij (Khãrijites) and their companions.'"

14. al-ʻAyyãshī narrates from Yaʻqūb ibn Shuʻayb from Abū ʻAbdillãh (ʻa.s.) about His [s.w.t.]'s Word: those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice. He [ʻa.s.] said: "It means misguidance and whatever is beyond it." (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: It seems that the meaning of misguidance in this narration is shirk which is the source of all the injustice and the sins and disobedience beyond it. Or it could refer to the lowest level of injustice which manifest in form of sins, and beyond it would be shirk which is an intensified form of misguidance – after all, all sins are misguidance.

These narrations, as you can see, give multifarious meanings in explaining the term "ẓulm, injustice" in the verse: idol-worshipping, doubt, and the ideas of the Khawãrij; and some narrations have explained it as the love for the enemies of Ahlu 'l-Bayt (ʻa.s.). All this proves what we had said earlier that the "ẓulm" mentioned in the verse is of a general meaning and it applies to its various levels based on the level of understanding.

THE STORY OF IBRÃHĪM, PEACE BE UPON HIM, AND HIS PERSONALITY

This section consists of various Qur'ãnic, academic, historical and other discussions.

1. The Story of Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) in the Qur'ãn:

From his childhood until the beginning of his discernible age, Ibrãhīm used to live in isolation from the society of his people. Then he came to them and joined his father, and found him and his people worshipping the idols. He was not pleased with what he saw since his nature was pure and blameless, blessed by Allãh, the Glorified who showed him the truth and the kingdom of everything – in short, the true word and the good deed.

Therefore, Ibrãhīm [ʻa.s.] started arguing with his father against worship of the idols and calling him to abandon them and to adopt monotheism of Allãh, Glory be to Him and to follow Him so that He may guide him to the right path and remove him from the control of the Satan. He continued to argue against his father and to insist upon him [to abandon idolworshipping] until the latter scolded him, pushed him away from himself and threatened to stone him if he does not stop criticizing his idols and disliking them.

Ibrãhīm ('a.s.), however, was courteous towards his father out of kindness and compassion as he possessed noble character and pleasant speech so he bade him farewell and promised to ask forgiveness for him. Then he separated himself from him, his people and whatever they worshipped besides Allãh, (19:49).

Thereafter, he argued against the people in matter of idols (21:51-52; 26:69-77; 37:83-87) and argued against others who worshipped the sun, the moon and the star until he proved the truth to them and he came to be known as one who opposed the idols and gods (6:73-82). [This continued without any incident] until one day, the people went for a collective worship out of the town and he pretended to be sick and so didn't go out with them and stayed back. Then he entered the temple of idols and planned to trick them by cutting their idols into pieces except the big one so that they may refer to it when they returned. When the people returned and saw what had happened to their idols, they investigated about the perpetrator. Some of them said that they had heard a young man known as Ibrãhīm talking ill of them.

They summoned him to their gathering; then brought him to the public so that the people may be witness. They asked him: "Did you do this to our gods, O Ibrãhīm?" He replied: "Actually, this big one seems to have done it; ask them, if they can speak?" He had left the big one intact without breaking it into pieces and had placed an axe on its shoulder or something similar to it so that they may see that he is one who has broken the idols.

Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) had said that while he knew that they did not believe him since they knew that the idol is an inanimate item which cannot speak. He, however, said whatever he said so that he could say to them: 'Ask them, if they can speak,' in order to make them openly confess that the idols are inanimate objects that do not have life and consciousness. It is then that they turned to one another and said: "Surely you yourselves are the unjust;" and they reflected within themselves and said: "You surely know that they do not speak." He said: "What! Do you worship, besides Allãh, what neither harms you nor helps you? Fie on you and on what you worship besides Allãh! What! Do you not then understand? Do you worship what you curve yourselves while Allãh has created you and what you do?"

They said: "Burn him and help your gods." So they built a pit and started a blaze of fire; all the people joined in this matter and threw him into the fire. Allãh, however, made the fire cool and harmless for him, and defeated their plan. (21:57-71; 37:88-98). It was during these events that he was presented to the king whom people worshipped and considered as a god. The king argued with Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) about his God. Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) said: "My Lord gives life and causes death." The king challenged this argument by saying: "I also give life and cause death" by killing one prisoner and releasing another. So, Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) now argued more clearly so as to nullify his fallacy; he said: "So surely Allãh causes the sun to rise from the east, then make it rise from the west; thus he who disbelieved was confounded," (2:258).

When Allãh rescued him from the fire, Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) started calling the people towards the pure faith, the faith of monotheism. Just a few people believed in him. Among those few, Allãh has named Lūṭ and Ibrãhīm's wife with whom he had migrated; he had married her before traveling from his place to the holy land.[31]

Then Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) and the believers who were with him repudiated from their people, and he personally repudiated from Ãzar whom used to call 'father' but who was not his real father. He then migrated alongwith his wife and Lūṭ to the holy land so that he may worship Allãh, Glory be to Him, without any hindrance from the unjust and tyrannical group of his people (60:4; 21:71). It was there when Allãh, Glory be Him, gave him the good tidings of Ismãʻīl and Isḥãq, and after Isḥãq, Yaʻqūb, while he had become an elderly and reached the old age. Ismãʻīl was born to him, then Isḥãq, and Allãh, Glory be to Him, blessed him, his two son and their children.

Thereafter, upon the command of his Lord, Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) went to the land of Mecca that was without any vegetation, and settled his son Ismãʻīl who was an infant [and his mother] therein and then returned to the holy land. Ismãʻīl grew up in Mecca and later on a group from the Arab who lived close by settled around him and that was the beginning of the city of Mecca.

[31] The proof of the faith of some of his community members can be seen in: Indeed, there is for you a good example in Ibrãhīm and those with him when they said to their people, "Sure we disassociate from you…" (60:4); and the proof that he had married before leaving for the holy land can be seen in his prayer for a righteous son from his Lord in: And he said, "Surely I go to my Lord; He will guide me; my Lord! Grant me (a son from) among the doers of good deeds." (37:100)

Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) used to occassionally visit Ismãʻīl in the land of Mecca before the city and the Kaʻbah was established, and even after that (2:126; 14:35-41). Then he built the Kaʻbah, the Sacred House, with the help of Ismãʻīl – that was the first house established for the people from Allãh as a blessing and guidance for the world, in it are clear signs such as the Maqãm Ibrãhīm; and whoever enters it will be secure (2:127-129; 3:96-97). He called people for ḥajj and instituted the rituals of pilgrimage (22:26-30).

Allãh then ordered him to sacrifice his son Ismãʻīl (ʻa.s.). So, when his son was with him in the rituals, and when he reached the age of working with him, Ibrãhīm said to him: "O my son! Surely I am seeing in dream that I am sacrificing you; consider then what you see." He said: "O my father! Do what you are commanded; if Allãh pleases, you will surely find me of the patient ones." So when both submitted and he threw him down upon his forehead, We called out to him saying: "O Ibrãhīm! You have indeed proved the vision true; surely thus do We reward the doers of good." (37:101-107)

The last that the Noble Qur'ãn relates of Ibrãhīm's stories are his prayers when he was in Mecca as quoted in the sūrah of "Ibrãhīm" (14:35-41) which ended with his words: "O our Lord, forgive me and my parents, and the believers on the day when the reckoning shall come to pass."

2. The Status of Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) Before Allãh, Glory be to Him, and his State of Worship:

The Almighty Allãh, in His Book, has bestowed upon Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) the most beautiful of praises, thanked his struggle in His way the best of thanks, repeatedly mentioned him by name in more than seventy places in His Book,[32] and enumerated many of His blessings upon him.

Here are some of those blessings: Allãh granted him his rectitude before (21:51); selected him in this world [among the chosen ones] and promised that he will be placed among the righteous ones in the Hereafter – this is when his Lord said to him, "Submit!" and he said, "I submit myself to the Lord of the universe;" (2:130-131). He [s.w.t.] is the one who made him turn his face towards His Lord being upright, [32] To be precise, the name of Ibrãhīm (ʻa.s.) has occurred sixty-nine times in the Qur'ãn. Of course, his mention without using his name would be more than that (tr.) wholly to Him and was not to be among the polytheists (6:79); He is the one granted tranquility to his heart and gave him certainty by showing him Allãh's Kingdom of the heavens and the earth (2:260; 6:75); Allãh took him as His friend (4:125); placed His mercy and blessings upon him and his family, and described him as one who was satisfied (53:37); He praised him as forbearing, tender-hearted and oft-returning (to Allãh) (11:73-75); and He also described him as a nation which was sincerely obedient to Allãh and he was not one of the polytheists, rather he was grateful for His blessings; He chose him and guided him to the right path, He gave him good in this life and promised to place him among the righteous ones in the Hereafter. (16:120-122)

Allãh also described him as a true prophet (19:41); and counted him among His believing servants and among the good ones; and greeted him with peace (37:83-111); and that he is mentioned among those who were men of strength and insight, (38:45-46). Allãh appointed him as a leader for the people (2:124) and made him one of the five Major Prophets who were given the scripture and law (33:7; 42:13; 87:18-19); Allãh gave him the knowedge, the wisdom, the Book, the kingdom, the gifts and gave perpetuity to his descendents. (4:54; 6:74-90; 43:28); and He placed prophethood and revelation among his descendents (57:26), and blessed him with a truthful tongue among the people of the Hereafter (26:84; 19:50).

These are the divine positions and spiritual statuses that Almighty Allãh has bestowed to Ibrãhīm ('a.s.); and the Holy Qur'ãn has not described the qualities of any of the prophet and noble messengers, and their statuses, the way it has fully described his qualities and noble statuses. Refer to the interpretation of each of these positions that we have described in its appropriate place in what has already passed or what I shall, God willing, explain since getting into them at this place would take us away from the purpose of this section.

The Almighty Allãh has preserved Ibrãhīm's noble life and religious personality by naming this upright religion as Islam just as Ibrãhīm had named it, and He has attributed it to him: ...the faith of your father Ibrãhīm; he named you Muslims before... (22:78); and he said: Say: "Surely, (as for) me, my Lord has guided me to the straight path; (to) a most right religion, the faith of Ibrãhīm the upright one, and he was not of the polytheists," (6:161).

He also made the Ka'bah, the Sacred House, that Ibrãhīm had built as the qiblah of the people, and instituted the ḥajj rituals – these are actually rituals that depict the story of him settling his son and his slave-girl [in Mecca] and of sacrificing his son Ismã'īl and how he strived to move in the direction of the Lord and patiently bore challenges and difficulties for His sake as it was mentioned in the commentary of: And (remember) when We made the House a rendezvous for men… (2:125), in Volume One of this book.

3. Ibrãhīm ['a.s.]'s Blessed Impact in Human Society:

One of his overwhelming impact is that the faith of monotheism, wherever and with whomsoever it exists, is traced back to him. The religions that are today described as monotheistic are: the Jewish faith which is traced to Prophet Mūsã s/o 'Imrãn ('a.s.) whose geneology goes back to Isrã'īl who is Ya'qūb s/o of Isḥãq s/o Ibrãhīm ('a.s.); the Christian faith which is traced to Prophet 'Īsã s/o Maryam ('a.s.) who is a descendent of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.); and the Islamic faith whose founder is the Messenger of Allãḥ, Muḥammad (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) whose geneology goes back to Ismã'īl s/o Ibrãhīm ('a.s.). So the belief of monotheism is his noble legacy for the world.

Moreover, in Islam, one can also observe Ibrãhīm's teachings such as ritual prayer, charity, pilgrimage, permissibility of eating the meat of cattle, repurdiation of Allãḥ's enemies, the greeting [of peace], the ten rituals about physical cleanliness (five in the head and five in the rest of the body) – those of the head are cutting of the mustache, lengthening the beard, combing the hair, brushing the teeth and using toothpick; those of the body are shaving the bodily hair, circumcision, clipping of the nails, washing the body after major impurity and purifying oneself by water.[33]

A comprehensive search proves that whatever good traditions (in beliefs and deeds) in the human society exist are from the legacy of the noble prophethood as we indicated in the previous discussions. Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) has a positive legacy on all humans of this era irrespective of the fact whether they realize it or not.

4. Ibrãhīm ['a.s.]'s Story in the Present Torah:

The Torah says: And Te'rah lived seventy years, and begat Abram, Nahor, and Hâ'ran. Now these are the generations of Te'rah. Te'rah begat Abram, Nahor, and Hâ'ran; and Hâ'ran begat Lot. And Hâ'ran died before his father Te'rah in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the

Chăl'dees. And Abram and Nahor took them wives: the name of Abram's wife was Sâ'raī; and the name of Nahor's wife, Mĭl'cah, the daughter of Hâ'ran, the father of Mĭl'cah, and the father of Ĭs'cah. But Sâ'raī was barren; she had no child. And Te'rah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Hâ'ran, his son's son, and Sâ'raī his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chăl'dees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Hâ'ran, and dwelt there. And the days of Te'rah were two hundred and five years; and Te'rah died in Hâ'ran.[34]

The Torah further says: Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto the land that I will shew thee: And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed. So Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him: and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Hâ'ran. And Abram took Sâ'raī his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Hâ'ran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came.

And Abram passed through the land unto the place of Sī'chem, unto the plain of Mô'reh. And the Canaanite was then in the land. And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land: and there builded he an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him. And he removed from thence unto the mountain on the east of Bĕth-el on the west, and Hā'ī on the east; and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord. And Abram journeyed, going on still toward the south.

And there was a famine in the land: and Abram went down into Egypt to sojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land. And it came to pass, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he said unto Sâ'raī his wife, Behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon. Therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife; and they will kill me, but thee they will keep alive. Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister: that it may be well with me for thy sake; and my soul shall live because of thee. And it came to pass, that, when Abram was come into Egypt, the [34] The Book of Genesis, chap.11, vrs.26-32 (tr.).

Egyptians beheld the woman that she was very fair. The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh: and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house. And he entreated Abram well for her sake: and he had sheep, and oxen, and he-asses, and men-servants, and maid-servants, and she-asses, and camels.

And the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sâ'raī Abram's wife. And Pharaoh called Abram, and said, What is this that thou hast done unto me? why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife? Why saidst thou, She is my sister? so I might have taken her to me to wife: now therefore behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way. And Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him: and they sent him away, and his wife, and all that he had.[35]

Then the Torah says: And Abram went up out of Egypt, he, and his wife, and all that he had, and Lot with him, into the south. And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. And he went on his journeys from the south even to Bĕth-el, unto the place where his tent had been at the beginning, between Bĕth-el and Hā'ī; unto the place of the altar, which he had made there at the first: and there Abram called on the name of the Lord. And Lot also, which went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents. And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together. And there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle: and the Canaanite and the Pĕr'izz-īte dwelled then in the land. And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left.' And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of the Jordan, that it was well watered every where, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Go-mŏr'rah, even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zō'ar. Then Lot chose him all the plain of the Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: and they separated themselves the one from the other. Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom.[36]

[36] The Book of Genesis, chap.13, vrs.1-12 (tr.).

It further says: And there went out the king of Sodom, and the king of Gŏmor'rah, and the king of Ad'mah, and the king of Zeboi'im, and the king of Bē'la (the same is Zō‘ar;) and they joined battle with them against them in the vale of Sĭd'dĭm; With Chĕd-or-lā'ō-mer the king of Ē'lam, and Tĭ'dal king of nations, and Ăm'ra-phĕl king of Shĭ'när, and A'rī-ŏch king of Ĕl'la-sär; four kings with five. And the vale of Sĭd'dĭm was full of slimepits; and the kings of Sodom and Gŏ-mor'rah fled, and fell there; and they that remained fled to the mountain. And they took all the goods of Sodom and Go-mŏr'rah, and all their victuals, and went their way. And they took Lot, Abram's brother's son, who dwelt in Sodom, and his goods, and departed.[37]

The Torah says: And there came one that had escaped, and told Abram the Hebrew; for he dwelt in the plain of Măm're the Ămorīte, brother of Ĕsh'cōl, and brother of Aner: and these were confederate with Abram. And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained servants, born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them unto Dan. And he divided himself against them, he and his servants, by night, and smote them, and pursued them unto Hō'bah, which is on the left hand of Damascus. And he brought back all the goods, and also brought again his brother Lot, and his goods, and the women also, and the people.[38]

And the king of Sodom went out to meet him, after his return from the slaughter of Chĕd-or-lā'ō-mer and the kings that were with him, at the vale of Shā'veh – the same is the King's Vale. And Mĕl-chĭz'e-dĕk king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him, and said, 'Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; And blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand.' And he gave him tithes of all.

And the king of Sodom said unto Abram: Give me the persons, and take the goods to thyself. And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lifted up my hand unto the Lord, the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth, That I will not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, and that I will not take anything that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich: Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Ĕsh'cōl, and Măm're, let them take their portion.'[39]

Until it says: And Sâ'raī Abram's wife bare him no children: and she had an handmaid, an Egyptian, whose name was Hā'gär. And Sâ'raī said unto Abram, Behold now, the Lord hath restrained me from bearing: go in unto my maid; it may be that I may obtain children by her. And Abram hearkened to the voice of Sâ'raī. And Sâ'raī Abram's wife took Hā'gär her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abram to be his wife.

And he went in unto Hā'gär, and she conceived: and when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was despised in her eyes. And Sâ'raī said unto Abram, My wrong be upon thee: I have given my maid into thy bosom; and when she saw that she had conceived, I was despised in her eyes: the Lord judge between me and thee. But Abram said unto Sâ'raī, Behold, thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee. And when Sâ'raī dealt hardly with her, and she fled from her face. And the angel of the Lord found her by a fountain of water in the wilderness, by the fountain in the way to Shur. And he said, Hā'gär, Sâ'raī's maid, whence camest thou? and whither wilt thou go? And she said, I flee from the face of my mistress Sâ'raī. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands.' And the angel of the Lord said unto her, I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ish'mael; because the Lord hath heard thy affliction. And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren. And she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God seest me: for she said, Have I also here looked after him that seest me? Wherefore the well was called Be'er-la-haī'-roi; behold, it is between Kā'desh and Be'rĕd. And Hā'gär bare Abram a son: and Abram called his son's name, which Hā'gär bare, Ish'ma-el. And Abram was fourscore and six years old, when Hā'gär bare Ish'ma-el to Abram.[40]

The Torah says: And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly. And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, saying, As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee. And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God.[41]

It further says: And God said unto Abraham, Thou shalt keep my covenant, therefore, thou, and thy seed after thee in their generations. This is my covenant, which ye shall keep, between me and you and thy seed after thee; Every man child among you shall be circumcised. And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you. And he that is eight days old shall be circumcised among you, every man child in your generations…[42]

The Torah says: And God said unto Abraham, As for Sâ'raī thy wife, thou shalt not call her name Sâ'raī, but Sarah shall her name be. And I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her: yea, I will bless her, and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of peoples shall be of her. Then Abraham fell upon his face, and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? and shall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear?

And Abraham said unto God, O that Ish'ma-el might live before thee! And God said, Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son indeed; and thou shalt call his name Isaac; and I will establish my covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him. And as for Ish'ma-el, I have heard thee: Behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation. But my covenant will I establish with Isaac, which Sarah shall bear unto thee at this set time in the next year. And He left off talking with him, and God went up from Abraham.[43]

Then it narrates the story of the Lord coming with two angels to destroy the inhabitants of Sodom, the people of Lūṭ. They came to

[41] The Book of Genesis, chap.17, vrs.1-8 (tr.).
[42] The Book of Genesis, chap.17, vrs.9-12 (tr.).

Ibrāhīm who hosted them and they ate from the food that he had prepared from the calf that he had slaughtered and the curd and milk that he offered them. The angels gave the good news to Sārah of giving birth to Isḥāq; and they also mentioned the matter of the people of Lūṭ. Ibrāhīm tried to disduade them from destroying them but they convinced him, and then the destruction took place.

The Torah then describes Ibrāhīm's move to Ge'rar and how he settled therein and told its king, Abim'e-lech, that Sarah was his sister. The king took Sarah for himself but God came to him in dream and told him not to take someone's wife. He called Ibrāhīm and rebuked him for calling his own wife as his sister. Ibrāhīm apologized and explained that he had done so out of fear of death. The king returned Sarah to him and gave him plentiful wealth. (Similar to the story of Fir'awn [of Egypt mentioned earlier].)

The Torah says: And the Lord visited Sarah as He had said, and the Lord did unto Sarah as He had spoken. For Sarah conceived, and bare Abraham a son in his old age, at the set time of which God had spoken to him. And Abraham called the name of his son that was born unto him, whom Sarah bare to him, Isaac. And Abraham circumcised his son Isaac being eight days old, as God had commanded him. And Abraham was an hundred years old, when his son Isaac was born unto him. And Sarah said, God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me. And she said, Who would have said unto Abraham, that Sarah should have given children suck? for I have borne him a son in his old age. And the child grew, and was weaned: and Abraham made a great feast the same day that Isaac was weaned.[44]

And Sarah saw the son of Hā'gär the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking. Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this bondwoman and her son: for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac. And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son. And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bondwoman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called. And also of the son of the bondwoman will I make a nation, because he is thy seed.'[45]

And Abraham arose up early in the morning, and took bread and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hā'gär, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away: and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Be'er-shē'ba. And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lifted up her voice, and wept. And God heard the voice of the lad; and the angel of God called to Hā'gär out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hā'gär? fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is. Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thy hand; for I will make him a great nation. And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went, and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad drink. And God was with the lad, and he grew; and dwelt in the wilderness, and became an archer. And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran: and his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt.[46]

[44] The Book of Genesis, chap.21, vrs.1-8 (tr.).
[45] The Book of Genesis, chap.21, vrs.9-13 (tr.).

The Torah continues: And it came to pass after these things, that God did tempt Abraham, and said unto him, Abraham: and he said, Behold, here am I. And He said, Take now thy son, thine only son Issac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Mō-rī‘ah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of. And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him. Then on the third day Abraham lifted up his eyes, and saw the place afar off. And Abraham said unto his young men, Abide ye here with the ass; and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you. And Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together. And Isaac spoke unto Abraham his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I, my son. And he said, Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt offering? And Abraham said, My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering: so they went both of them together.[47]

And they came to the place which God had told him of; and Abraham built an altar there, and laid the wood in order, and bound Isaac his son, and laid him on the altar upon the wood. And Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son. And the angel of the Lord called unto him out of heaven, and said, Abraham, Abraham: and he said, Here am I. And he said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me. And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold behind him a ram caught in the thicket by his horns: and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt offering in the stead of his son. And Abraham called the name of that place Je-hō'vah-jī'reh: as it is said to this day, In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen. And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time. And said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son: That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice. So Abraham returned unto his young men, and they rose up and went together to Be'er-she'ba; and Abraham dwelt at Be'er-shē'ba.[48]

Then the Torah describes Isḥãq's marriage to a girl from his own tribe, and then death of Sãrah at the age of 127 years in Hebron, and thereafter Ibrãhīm's marriage to Keturah who bore him sons; then it talks about the death of Ibrãhīm at the age of 175 years and his sons Isḥãq and Ismã'īl buried him in the cave of Machpelah and that is in the present-day city al-Khalil (Hebron).

This is the summary of the stories of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) and his life history as seen in the Torah (in the Book of Genesis, chapters 11 to 25). It is necessary for a critical scholar to compare what has come in the Old Testament with Ibrãhīm's story in the Holy Qur'ãn, and then he can form his opinion.

5. [Contradictions & Inconsistencies in Torah's Narration:]

The inconsistencies in the sentences of the story mentioned in the Torah and contradictions in its conclusions confirm what the Holy Qur'ãn says that the Bible has been subjected to interpolation.

[A] The major flaw in the story is that it has neglected to describe his early struggles and his arguments with his people, and the trials and tribulations that they inflicted upon him; and these are the shinning aspects of his history.

[48] The Book of Genesis, chapt.22, vrs.9-19 (tr.).

Among its flaws of neglection is Ibrãhīm's task of building the Sacred Kaʻbah, declaring it as a secure sanctuary, and instituting the pilgrimage. No religious scholar or a social critic would doubt that this ancient structure which continues to stand on its foundations since 4000 years is from the major Divine signs that reminds the people of Almighty Allãh, it has preserved the truth for a long time, and it is the first house of Almighty Allãh that was established for the people as a source of blessing and guidance for the world.

This neglect stems from nothing but the Israelite bias of the writers and authors of the Torah that pushed them to erase any mention of the Kaʻbah and only to enumerate the altars of sacrifice that Ibrãhīm built in Shechem [present day Nablus], East Jerasulem, and the hill of the Lord.

[This is also reflected] in the way they have described the noble prophet, Ismãʻīl: that he was a wild ass of a man against every man and every man's hand against him; and that he had no nobility rather he was banished by his father, and grew up becoming an archer! They desire to extinguish with their mouths the light of Allãh; but Allãh will perfect His Light [Qur., 61:8].

[B] Among other flaws of the Torah is that it attributes actions to Ibrãhīm that do not fit the status of prophethood or the spirit of righteousness and magnanimity: for example, the statement that Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine to Ibrãhīm and blessed it; and he was the priest of God the Most High.[49]

[49] Some commentators have explained this by saying that this Melchizedek was the same as Amraphel, the king of Shinar, mentioned in the earlier part of the story, and that he was actually Hammurabi, the author of the Hammurabi Code, who was from the early kings of Babylon.

There is a great dispute about the time-frame of Hammurabi's reign, and most of what is said about him does not does fit the era of Ibrãhīm's lifetime who lived 2000 BC. For example, in the book al-ʻArab qablu 'l-Islãm it said that Hammurabi reigned in Babylon in years 2232–2287 BC while in the Hammurabi Code, as quoted in Aqdam sharãyiʻ 'l-ʻãlam by F. Edward, it says that his reign was in years 2167–2205 BC; and yet the Qãmūs aʻlãmi 'sh-sharq wa 'l-gharb says that he reigned in Babylon in the years 1686–1727 BC, and the Qãmūsu 'l-Kitãbi 'l-muqaddas says that he reigned in 1920–1975 BC.

The most obvious proof that denies the suggestion [that Melchizedek was Hammurabi] is the discovery of the rock in the ruins of Babylon that has the Hammurabi Code which contains names of the Babylonian idols – this proves that Hammurabi was an idol-worshipper and he could not have been the priest of God the Most High. (Author's note)

[C] Among its inconsistencies is that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.), in one instance, told the princes of Pharoah of Egypt that Sãrah was his sister (and he advised her to support his statement by saying to her: "Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister; that it may be well with me for thy sake, and that my soul may live because of thee.") And, in another instance, he told Abimelech, the king of Gerar, that Sãrah was his sister. So the Pharoah took her as a wife once, and then Abimelech took her as a wife the second time. And in the first case, he explains away his statement as "his sister in faith" and in the other case as "his father's daughter from a woman other than his mother."

The mildest conclusion of Ibrãhīm's statement (that does not fit the status of one who was God's friend) is that he was presenting his wife to the Pharoah and Abimelech deceitfully so that they make take her as their wife while she is a married woman! He does this in order to acquire precious gifts and gain the wealth from them both!

All this inspite of the Torah's clear statement that Sãrah, at that time and in particular when Abimelech took her, was an old woman of seventy years or more – an age when normally a woman loses the grace of her youthfulness and the purity of her beauty. Moreover, the flamboyant kings and the tyrants are attracted only to young girls who are exceptionally beautiful and stunningly gorgeous.

* * *

[D] [Comparing such narrations in ḥadīth literature:]

Similar stories can be seen in the narrations of Ṣaḥīḥu 'l-Bukhãrī and Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim from Abū Hurayrah that the Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) said:

Ibrãhīm did not tell a lie except on three occasions. Twice for the sake of Allãh when he said: "I am sick," and he said: "(I have not done this but) the big idol has done it." The (third was) that while Ibrãhīm and Sãrah were going (on a journey) they passed by (the territory of) a tyrant. Someone said to the tyrant, "This man (i.e. Ibrãhīm) is accompanied by a very charming lady." So, he sent for Ibrãhīm and asked him about Sãrah saying: "Who is this lady?" Ibrãhīm said: "She is my sister." Ibrãhīm went to Sãrah and said: "O Sãrah! There are no believers on the surface of the earth except you and me. This man asked me about you and I have told him that you are my sister, so don't contradict my statement." The tyrant then called Sãrah and when she went to him, he tried to take hold of her with his hand, but (his hand got stiff and) he was confounded. He asked Sãrah: "Pray to Allãh for me, and I shall not harm you." So Sãrah asked Allãh to cure him and he got cured. He tried to take hold of her for the second time, but (his hand got as stiff as or stiffer than before and) was more confounded. He again requested Sãrah: "Pray to Allãh for me, and I will not harm you." Sãrah asked Allãh again and he became alright. He then called one of his guards (who had brought her) and said: "You have not brought me a human being but have brought me a devil." The tyrant then gave Hãjar as a girl-servant to Sãrah.

Sãrah came back (to Ibrãhīm) while he was praying. Ibrãhīm, gesturing with his hand, asked: "What has happened?" She replied, "Allah has spoiled the evil plot of the infidel (or immoral person) and gave me Hãjar for service."

(Abū Hurayrah then addressed his listeners saying, "That [Hãjar] was your mother, O Banū Mã'u 's-Samã' [i.e. the Arabs, the descendants of Ismã'īl, Hãjar's son])."

There is a ḥadīth in Ṣaḥīḥu 'l-Bukhãri through multiple narrators from Anas and Abū Hurayrah, in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim from Abū Hurayrah and Ḥudhayfah, in Musnad of Aḥmad from Anas, Ibn 'Abbãs, and it has also been produced by al-Ḥãkim from Ibn Mas'ūd, by aṭ-Ṭabarãnī from 'Ubãdah ibni 'ṣ-Ṣãmit and Ibn Abī Shaybah from Salmãn, by at-Tirmidhī from Abū Hurayrah, and by Abū 'Awãnah from Ḥudhayfah from Abū Bakr – the ḥadīth of intercession of the Holy Prophet (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) on the Day of Resurrection. It is a long narration which says that the people will approach the prophets, one after another, asking them for intercession with Allãh; and whenever they would approach a prophet and ask him for intercession, he will send them to the next prophet and apologize because of his mistakes until they reach to the Last of the Prophet, Muhammad (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.), who will positively respond to their plea. In that narration, it says that when they will approach Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) asking him to intercede on their behalf with Allãh, he will say to them: "I am not fit for this because I have lied three times," referring to his statements: "I am sick", "the big idol has done this" and "tell him that I am your brother."

Proper reflection does not support the contents of these two narrations, as mentioned by some researchers. If the narrations suggest that the three statements described as lies were not outright lies but kind of double-entendre and amazing expositions (as eluded in some words of the narration in some versions of the Prophet's saying that, "Ibrãhīm did not utter a lie except three, all of them for the sake of Allãh"; and his description that, "none of them are lie, rather they are for support for Allāh's religion") – then why did Ibrāhīm, in the narration of the Day of Resurrection, count them as his sins and as barriers for intercession, and apologizes on that account? Moreover, with such an interpretation, the lies would be counted as his struggles for the sake of Allāh and as his good deeds for the faith, if at all it were permissible for any prophet to lie for the sake of the faith. However, you know from the previous discussion on "Prophethood" in volume two[50] of this book that lying is absolutely not permissible for prophets ('a.s.) since it will totally erode the trust in their information [from the Divine revelation] and statements.

If such types of statement can be considered as a lie and a barrier from intercession with Almighty Allāh, then Ibrāhīm's statement when he saw the star, the moon and the sun, "this is my Lord, this is my Lord" is more deserving of being described as a lie that prevents intercession that stems from nearness to Almighty Allāh.

Furthermore, Ibrāhīm ('a.s.)'s statement quoted by the Almighty Allāh, Then he looked at the stars, looking up once, then he said, "Surely I am sick." [37:88-89], is devoid of any context that shows that it was a lie and unreal; it is most probable that he was sick with a kind of illness that did not prevent him from smashing the idols.

Similarly, when the people asked him: "Have you done this to our gods, O Ibrāhīm?" he answered them (while they knew that the idols were inanimate items devoid of any sense or will), "Surely this their chief must have done it;" and then added the remarks, "therefore ask them, if they can speak" – this cannot be counted as a lie since it is a statement in circumstances of rebuke in order to lead the opponent to accept the error in his views. And so the people had no way out but to confess by saying: "Certainly you know that they do not speak." That is when Ibrāhīm said: "What! Do you then serve besides Allāh what brings you not any benfit at all, nor does it harm you? Fie on you and on what you serve besides Allāh…?" (21:62-67)

If the narration intends to say that the three statements of Ibrāhīm ('a.s.) were real lies, then that would constitute an obvious denial of the Book of Almighty Allāh! We leave that to the understanding of a serious scholar by referring to the second section of this discussion on "Ibrāhīm's status with Allāh and his state of worship" that Allāh has praised him with the best of praises and appreciated him in the best way. How can the mind of a serious scholar aceept or apply the words of the Almighty: And mention Ibrãhīm in the Book; surely he was a truthful (man), a prophet (19:41) on a lying person who easily lies when he finds himself in difficulties? How can Allãh shower those noble praises upon a person who does not care about Him in matters of right or truthfulness? Exalted is the personality of Allãh's friend from such thoughts!

[50] See al-Mīzān, Eng. transl., vol.3, p.204. (tr.)

* * *

As for the reports narrated from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt ('a.s.), they affirm the substance of the story of the Torah but they exalt Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) beyond any attribution of lie and other actions that are not appropriate for his noble character.

The most comprehensive story of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) appears in al-Kãfī: [al-Kulaynī] from ʻAlī [ibn Ibrãhīm] from his father and a number of our companions from Sahl [ibn Ziyãd], altogether from [al-Ḥasan] ibn Maḥbūb from Ibrãhīm ibn [Abī] Zayd al-Karkhī who said: I heard Abū ʻAbdillãh [aṣ-Ṣãdiq] ('a.s.) saying:

"Verily Ibrãhīm was born in Kūthã-Rubã[51] and his father hailed from that place. The mother of Ibrãhīm and the mother of Lūṭ, Sãrah, and Waraqah (or Ruqayyah) were sisters who were daughters of Lãḥij; and Lãḥij was a prophet (nabī) but not a messenger (rasūl).

During his youth, Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was on the religion of fitra (the innate faith that Almighty Allãh has created within the people) till He guided him to His religion and chose him.

He married Sãrah, the daughter of Lãḥij, thus she was his materinal cousin. Sãrah owned many sheep, vast land and had good status [financially]. She gave all her possessions to Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) who managed it, improved it; and the sheep and the agricultural produce increased to the extent that there was no one in Kūthã-Rubã more financially stable than him.

When Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) smashed the idols of Namrūd, the latter ordered him to be arrested and tied, and prepared an enclousure [for firebond] which was filled with firewood and the fire was lit in it. Then he ordered Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) to be thrown into the fire to burn him. Then they waited for the fire to die out and then went to the enclourse – lo, they found Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) safe from the bounds.

When Namrūd was informed of this, he ordered to exile Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) from the town and to prevent him from taking his sheep and possessions. So, Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) protests against it and said: "If you take away my sheep and my wealth, then it is right upon you that you should return to me the time of my life that I spent in your town." They took the issue to the judge of Namrūd who pronounced the judgement that Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) should hand over what he has acquired in their town and that Namrūd's people should return to Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) whatever of his life he spent in their town. Namrūd was told of this judgement and he ordered them to leave him, his sheep and his wealth alone but to expel him [from the town]. He said: "If he says in your town, he will corrupt your religion and harm your gods." So, they expelled Ibrãhīm alongwith Lūṭ (peace be upon both) from their land towards Syria. So, Ibrãhīm left with Lūṭ (who did not part from him) and Sãrah. He said to them: "Surely I am going to my Lord; He will guide me," [37:99] that is to al-Quds.

[51] It was a suburb of Kūfah, and al-Jazarī [in Mu'jamu 'l-buldãn, vol.4, p.487] has written it as 'Kūthī.' (Author's note)

Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) took his sheep and wealth, and made a box and placed Sãrah into it and locked it tightly out of sense of honour of her. He travelled until he left the realm of Namrūd and reached the domain of an Egyptian known as ‘Arãrah. Then he passed by the tithe collector who approached him to tax his possessions. When the tithe collector reached to the box, he said to Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.): "Open this box so that we can tax what is in it." Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) said: "Estimate whatever you like of gold or silver that can be in it so that we pay its tithe but don't open the box." The tithe collector insisted to open it. Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) angrily opened the box. When Sãrah – who was known for her beauty – appeared to him, the tithe collector asked: "What is this woman to you?" Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) said: "She is my wife and my maternal cousin." The tithe collector asked: "What caused you to hide her in the box?" Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) said: "Out of sense of honour for her so that no one sees her." The tithe collector said: "I will not leave you till I inform the king about you and her."

The collector sent a messenger to the king with the information. The king sent a word to bring the box to him. When they came to take the box with them, Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) said: "I will not leave the box until my soul leaves my body." They informed the king about him who said: "Bring him as well as the box with him."

So, they brought him, the box and all his possessions to the king. The king asked for the box to be opened. Ibrãhīm said: "O the King, in it is my wife and my maternal cousin. I am willing to sacrifice all that I have instead of opening it." The king forced Ibrãhīm (‘a.s.) to open it. When he saw Sãrah, his conscience was not able to restrain his foolishness from extending his hand towards her. Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) placed himself between him and her out of sense of honour and said: "O Allãh! Prevent his hand from my wife and maternal cousin." His hand froze, neither could he reach her nor take it back towards himself. The king said: "Is it your Lord who has done this to me?" He said: "Yes; my Lord has sense of honour and dislikes something forbidden; He is the One Who has come between you and the immoral act that you intended to do." The king said: "Ask your Lord to return to me my hand [as normal]; if He responds positively, I shall not touch her." Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.): "O my Lord! Restore to him his hand so that he may stay away from my wife." The Almighty Allãh restored his hand. The king then looked to her with his eyes, and then turned towards her with his hand. Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) placed himself before him out of sense of honour and prayed: "O Allãh! Prevent his hand from her." The king's hand became stiff [again] and couldn't reach her. The king said to Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.): "Indeed your Lord has sense of honour and so do you; ask your Lord to restore my hand; if He does so, I will not repeat [my mistake]." Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) said: "I will pray to Him provided you don't ask me again to pray if you do the mistake again." The king said to him: "Yes." Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) said: "O Allãh: If is he true, then restore his hand." And so his hand was restored.

When the king saw the sense of honour and the [Divine] sign concerning his hand, he gave importance to Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.), respected him, honoured him and extended protection to him. He said to him: "You are indeed secure from me as far as she is concerned or whatever that you possess; so go wherever you wish. But I have a request of you." Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) said: "What is it?" He said: "I want you to allow me to serve her [Sãrah] through a beautiful and intelligent Egyptian [slave] who will be her maid." Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) agreed to it. So, the king called the maid and gifted her to Sãrah; that maid was Hãjar, the mother of Ismãʿīl (ʿa.s.).

[While biding Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) farewell,] the king walked behind him out of respect and honour for him. So, the Exalted Allãh revealed to Ibrãhīm to stop and not walk ahead of a arrogant ruler, rather he should walk behind him as I have placed him ahead of you; so walk behind him out of respect and honour for him as he is in control and there must be a chief in the land, whether good or evil.

So, Ibrãhīm (ʿa.s.) stopped and said to the king: "Go forward as my Lord has revealed to me momentarily to respect and honour you, and to place you ahead of myself and to walk behind you out of respect for you." The king said: "He revealed to you this?" Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) said: "Yes." The king said: "I testify that your Lord is Friendly, Forbearing and Generous, and you are indeed attracting me to your faith."

The king then bade farwell to him. Ibrãhīm travelled until he reached northern part of Shćmćt (Greater Syria) and left Lūṭ ('a.s.) in the southern part of Shãmãt.

When Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was delayed in getting a child, he said to Sãrah: "If you wish, you can sell Hãjar [to me] hopefully, Allãh can bless us with a child through her, and so he shall be an offspring for us." So Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) bought Hãjar from Sãrah, had relations with her, and thereafter Ismã'īl ('a.s.) was born.[52]

* * *

[E] [Who was the sacrifice: Ismã'īl or Isḥãq?]

Among the inconsistences of what has been mentioned in the Torah is the story of the sacrifice that the child to be sacrified was Isḥãq and not Ismã'īl. It is so while the story of settling Ismã'īl in the land of Tahãmah (i.e., Mecca), building the Sacred Ka'bah, instituting the ritual of pilgrimage which talks about suffering and hardships that he and his mother faced for the sake of Allãh, and the ṭawãf (circumambulation around the Ka'bah), the sa'ī (walking between the hills of Ṣafã and Marwah), and the ritual of sacrifice – all these confirm that the sacrificed one was Ismã'īl and not Isḥãq ('a.s.).

The Gospel of Barnabas says that Jesus rebuked the Jews for their statement that the sacrificed one was Isḥãq and not Ismã'īl. In its chapter 44 (verses 11-12), it says: "Then spake God, saying to Abraham: 'Take thy son, thy firstborn Ishmael, and come up the mountain to sacrifice him.' How is Isaac firstborn, if when Isaac was born Ishmael was seven years old?"

As for the Qur'ãn, its verses are almost clear that the sacrificed son was Ismã'īl ('a.s.). After describing the story of smashing the idols and him being put in the fire that Almighty had made cool and safe, He [s.w.t.] says:

And they desired to outwit him (Ibrãhīm) but We made them the lowest. And he said, "Surely I go to my Lord: He will guide me. My Lord! Grant me (a son from) among the doers of good deeds." So We gave him the good news of a forbearing boy. And when he reached

[52] al-Kãfī, vol.8, p.370-373; in its new edition produced and annotated by Dãru 'l-Ḥadīth (Qum), see vol.15, p.815-819 (tr.)

(the age of) working with him, he said, "O my son! Surely I am seeing in dream that I am sacrificing you; consider then what you see." He said, "O my father! Do what you are commanded; if Allãh please, you will surely find me of the patient ones." So when they both submitted and he threw him down upon his forehead, We called out to him (saying): "O Ibrãhīm! You have indeed proved the vision true; surely thus do We reward the doers of good. Most surely this is a manifest trial. And We ransomed him with a great sacrifice; and We perpetuated (praise) to him among the later generations. Peace be upon Ibrãhīm; thus do We reward the doers of good; surely he was of Our believing servants. And We gave him the good news of Isḥãq, a prophet among the good ones. And We showered Our blessings on him and on Isḥãq; and of their offspring are the doers of good, and (also) those who are clearly unjust to their own soul, (37:98-113).

Anyone who reflects on the holy verses has no choice but to accept that the sacrificed son whose birth was annunciated by the Glorified Allãh in His Words (So We gave him the good news of a forbearing boy), and that the other annunciation which He [s.w.t.] mentioned later on in that passage (We gave him the good news of Isḥãq, a prophet among the good ones) is different from the first good tiding. The latter good news was about Isḥãq ('a.s.) which is other than the one annunciated earlier and which is linked to the story of sacrifice.

The narrations in the Shī'ī sources from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-Bayt ('a.s.) say that the sacrificed son was Ismã'īl ('a.s.) whereas the narrations from the Sunnī sources are different: some mention Ismã'īl ('a.s.) and others mention Isḥãq ('a.s.). However, you know that the first set of narrations are in accordance to the Qur'ãn.

* * *

aṭ-Ṭabarī, in his at-Tãrīkh, says: "The early scholars of the community of our Prophet Muḥammad (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.) differ on the son that Ibrãhīm was ordered to sacrifice. Some of them say that it was Isḥãq while the others say it was Ismã'īl. Indeed, both types of narrations have come from the Messenger of Allãh (ṣ.a.'a.w.a.). If there were an authentic narration among them, we don't need to refer to the other [but it is not so]. However, the proof from the Qur'ãn about validity of the narration which says that it was Isḥãq is more clear and obvious compared to the other version."

He goes on to say: "As for the proof from the Qur'ãn that we said earlier that the narration of Isḥãq is more correct, is based on Almighty's statement informing us of His friend Ibrãhīm's prayer when he left from his people and migrated towards his Lord towards Greater Syria with his wife Sãrah. He said: 'Surely I go to my Lord: He will guide me. My Lord! Grant me (a son from) among the doers of good deeds.' This was before he came to know Hãjar and before Ismã'īl's mother came to him. Our Exalted Lord then continues the narration about accepting Ibrãhīm's prayer and giving him the good news of a forbearing son, and then Ibrãhīm's dream that he is sacrificing his son when he reached the age of working.

"And we don't know of any good news given to Ibrãhīm in the Qur'ãn about a male child except Isḥãq; and that is His Word: 'And his wife was standing (by), so she laughed; then We gave her the good news of Isḥãq and after Isḥãq of Ya'qūb' (11:71). And His words: So he conceived in his mind a fear on account of them. They said: 'Fear not.' And they gave him the good news of a boy possessing knowledge. Then his wife came up in great grief, and she struck her face and said: 'And old barren woman!' (51:28-29).

"This is so because in all instances that the good news of a son to Ibrãhīm has been mentioned, God's good news to him is mentioned in relation to his wife Sãrah. Therefore, it follows that the good news in His word: So We gave him the good news of a forbearing boy' is similar to other instances in the Qur'ãn which talks about the good news given to him from his wife Sãrah.

"The objection that Allãh did not order the sacrifice of Isḥãq and that the good news from Allãh about his birth and birth of Ya'qūb came after him the sacrifice does not support the validity of what has been alleged otherwise. This is so because Almighty Allãh indeed ordered Ibrãhīm to sacrifice Isḥãq after Isḥãq reached the age of working; and it is possible that Ya'qūb was born before Isḥãq's father was ordered to sacrifice him.

"Similarly, there is no ground for the objection to allege otherwise on basis of the sheep's horn seen hanging in the Ka'bah since it is not improbable that it was carried from Greater Syria to the Ka'bah and was hung in it."

I wish I could know how aṭ-Ṭabarī was oblivious to the fact that when Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) prayed to his Lord for a son (when he migrated towards Greater Syria while Sãrah was with him and there was no news of Hãjar at that time), he prayed in the following words: My Lord! Grant me (a son from) among the doers of good deeds – he asked his Lord for a son but did not specify that he be granted through Sãrah in order to link the good news that followed thereafter to the good news about Isḥãq. He just said: "My Lord! Grant me…" and did not say, "My Lord, grant me through Sãrah…"

As for aṭ-Ṭabari's statement that it is wellknown from other instances in the Qur'ãn that the good news was about Isḥãq and therefore the good news in this case should also be applied to him (and we shall discuss those instances later one) – this is itself a supposition without any proof. Rather the proof is against him because Almighty Allãh, in these verses, mentioned the good news of "a forbearing son" followed by the story of sacrifice, and then again mentioned the good news regarding Isḥãq. No one who reflects on the context of these verses would doubt that the subject of the second good news is other than that of the first good news. Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) was given the good news, before Isḥãq, of another son and that is none other than Ismã'īl. The narrators, the reporters and the historians are all unanimous that Ismã'īl was born to Ibrãhīm before Isḥãq.

* * *

[F] Among the examples of inconsistence is the obvious contrast in what the Torah says about Ismã'īl: it clearly says that Ismã'īl was born to Ibrãhīm before Isḥãq by almost fourteen years and [then it says] that Ibrãhīm banished him and his mother Hãjar after Isḥãq's birth when he laughed at Sãrah. Then it continues the story of their settlement in the desert and the running out of water that Hãjar was carrying and about Ismã'īl's thirst, and that the angel showed her the water. Any serious reader of this story of Ismã'īl can discern that he must have been a breast-feeding infant at that time. So, you should reflect and ponder over those verses [quoted earlier from The Book of Genesis, chap. 21, vrs. 14-21]. And this is in accordance to what has come in our narrations.

6. [The Torah Ignores Ismã'īl ('a.s.):]

The Holy Qur'ãn gives the best of attention to the story of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) himself as well as in relation to his two noble sons, Ismã'īl, Isḥãq and their descendants. This is contrary to what we see in the Torah which exclusively pays attention to Isḥãq and the Israelite people while it does not pay attention to Ismã'īl except to put him down and to degrade his status. Even the sparse mention that it has in this regard is not without inner inconsistences: it once mentions the Exalted Allãh address to Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) that 'verily your remaining descendants will be from Isḥãq;' and then in another instance, it quotes His address that 'verily Allãh will bless your descendants from seed of Ismã'īl and make him a great nation.' On the one hand, it describes him as a wild ass constantly fighting the people and the people fighting him, who grew up as an archer, banished from his father's home, and on the other hand, it says that God is with him!

[G] Two Objections on the Qur'ãnic Narration of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.):

By pondering on what we said about the story of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) in the Qur'ãn, the response to two objections raised against the Holy Book will be clear.

First Objection: Some of the Orientalists have made an observation that the Qur'ãn, in its Meccan chapters, does not mention Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl (peace be upon them both) except in the way it mentions other prohets that they were on the monotheistic path, warning the peolpe [against polytheism] and calling them toward the Glorified Allãh. It does not mention the building of the Ka'bah and its connection to Ismã'īl, and that both [the father and the son] were calling the Arab people to the religion of nature and pure faith. However, the Medinan chapters such as "al-Baqarah," "al-Ḥajj" and other chapters describes the father-son relationship of Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl, and presents them as fathers of the Arab people to whom they introduced the religion of Islam and as builders of the Ka'bah, the Sacred House of Allãh.

"And the reason for this difference is that Muḥammad relied on the Jews in Mecca. But so when they constantly took an antagonistic stand against him [in Medina]; he had to find other supporters. This is when his shrewdness lead him to a new appraisal of Ibrãhīm as the father of Arabs – this is how he was able to distance himself from the Jews of his own time and establish his ties with 'Jewishness' of Ibrãhīm by considering him as the father of the Arabs, the founder of their religion (Islam), and the builder of their holy mosque in Mecca, a city which was preoccupation of his mind."[53]

Reply: The Orientalists have degraded themselves by attributing such a lie to the Noble Qur'ãn, a book which is universally known and is not hidden to any easterner or westerner. Any serious scholar will notice that the Holy Qur'ãn does not flatter any polytheist or Jew or

[53] This has been quoted by an-Najjãr in Qiṣaṣu 'l-anbiyã' [Beirut: Iḥyãu 't-Turãthi 'l-'Arabī, n.d.; p.73-74] from [Snouk] Hurgronje and [Arent Jan] Wensinck in [the Arabic version of] the Encyclopedia of Islam [vol.1, p.28]. (Author's note)

Christian neither in Meccan chapter nor in Medinan chapter; and its tone in rebuking the Jews and others does not change because of it Meccan or Medinan time of revelation.

However, since the Qur'ãnic verses were revealed gradually according to the events related to the religious call and since the challenges related to Jewish community occurred [in Medina] after the migration, obviously any remark about them and any explanation about their antagonistic attitude will be found in the verses that were revealed in numerous Medinan chapters. This is similar to the details of the religious laws that were revealed in Medina whenever the need was felt in relation to the events unfolding.

As for the claim of two Orientalists that any mention of the relationship of Ismã'īl to Ibrãhīm, the building of the Ka'bah and the establishment of the pure religion [of monotheism] is to be only found in the Medinan chapters, this is rejected by what the Almighty Allãh has said in s*ūrah* of "Ibrãhīm", a Meccan chapter, when He quotes the prayer of Ibrãhīm: And when Ibrãhīm said, "My Lord! Make this city secure, and save me and my sons from worshipping idols…O our Lord! Surely I have settled a part of my offspring in a valley uncultivated near Thy Sacred House, our Lord! That they may establish prayer; therefore make the hearts of some people yearn towards them and provide them with fruits; haply they may be grateful… Praise be to Allãh, Who gave me in old age Ismã'īl and Isḥãq; most surely my Lord is the Hearer of prayer." (14:35-39) Similar verses revealed in sūrah of "aṣ-Ṣãffãt" were quoted earlier about the story of the sacrifice.

As for the 'Jewishness' of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.), the Qur'ãn rejects that affiliation in the Word of the Almighty: O people of the Book! Why do you dispute about Ibrãhīm, when the Torah and the Injīl were not revealed till after him? Do you not then undersand? ...Ibrãhīm was not a Jew or a Christian, but he was (an) upright (man), a Muslim, and he was not one of the polytheists. (3:65-67)

Second Objection: The Sabaeans, the star-worshippers who have been mentioned in the Qur'ãn when Ibrãhīm confronted their gods by saying: So when the night over-showed him, he saw a star; he said, "This is my Lord…" lived in the city of Ḥarrãn to which Ibrãhīm migrated from Babylon or from Ur. This means that his argument with the star-worshippers took place a while after his argument with idol-worshippers, the smashing of the idols, and him being put into the fire. This does not correspond to what appears in the Qur'ãnic verses that the arguments with the idol-worshippers and the star-worshippers happened altogether in two days within his arrival to his father and his people as discussed earlier.

Reply: This criticism is actually related to the interpretation that occurred in explanation of the relevant verses and not to the Qur'ãn itself.

Nonetheless, the critic has ignored the conclusions of history and the correct reflection in this matter.

As for the point of reflection: The religion of the Sabaeans was prevalent and famous in some major cities of the country those days, and so its presence in its other cities and the spread of its adherents in its various regions is not that a far-fetched idea.

[A Brief History of the Sabaeans:] As far as history is concerned, it talks about the spread of the Sabaean faith like the spread of idol-worshipping in Babylon and the presence of many temples built in the names of the stars, and their corresponding idols were placed therein. The history of Babylon and its surrounding area talks about the temple of the sun-god and the moon-god around 3200 BC; and the names of the sun-god and the moon-god can even be seen carved in the Code of Hammurabi that was close to the era of Ibrãhīm ('a.s.).

We have earlier quoted from al-Ãthãru 'l-bãqiyah of Abū Rayḥãn al-Bīrūnī[54] that Yudhasaf appeared in India at the end of the first year of the reign of Tahmūrth; and he invented the [ancient] Persian script, and called the people to the Sabaean religion and a great many people followed him. It was also mentioned that the Pishdadian kings and some of the Kayanis who resided in Balkh held the sun, the moon, the planets, and the other elements in high esteem until Zoroaster appeared at the end of the thirtieth year of Peshtasav's reign.

al-Bīrūnī's discussion continued to the point where he said that the Sabaeans attributed the management of all affairs to the sky and the heavenly bodies, and believed that they are living things having the characteristics of speech, hearing and sight; they revered the light. One of their legacies is the dome above the niche in the Umayyad Mosque of Damascus: it was their prayer house, and at that time even the Greeks and the Romans followed the same religion. With the passage of time, it came under Jewish control and they turned it into a synagogue. Later the Christians took it over and converted it into a church. Then came the Muslims, and they made it into a mosque.

[54] See al-Mīzãn [Eng. transl.], vol.1, p.278, under "A Historical Discussion" [2:62], (tr.)

He further said that the Sabaeans had numerous places of wroships, and their idols were named after various names of the sun, and were shaped with fixed patterns, as mentioned by Abū Ma‘shar al-Balkhī in his book, Buyūtu 'l-‘ibãdãt. For example, there was a temple of Ba‘lbak that housed the idol of the sun; a temple of Qirãn that was related to the moon and was built in its shape like a shawl worn over head and shoulders. And there was a village nearby, Salamsīn by name which is corruption of its original name, Ṣanam Sīn, the idol of the moon; likewise, there was another village called Tar‘ūz, that is, the gate of Venus.

They also claim that the Ka‘bah and its idols belonged to them and that the Meccan idol-worshippers were adhering to the Sabaean religion; and that Lãt (the [famous] idol) was named after Saturn and ‘Uzza (another [famous] idol) was named after Venus. This is the summary of Abū Rayḥãn al-Bīrūnī's statement from al-Ãthãru 'l-bãqiyah.

al-Mas‘ūdī says that the Sabaean religion perhaps evolved from idol-worshipping, and that it evolved from idol-worshipping perhaps because of the similarity in their origins. The idol-worshippers were worshipping the idols of the sun, the moon, the Venus and other stars in order to seek nearness to their gods and from them to the Supreme God.

al-Mas‘ūdī, in Murūju 'dh-dhahab, says that most of the people of India, China and others nations believed that Allãh, to Whom belong Might and Majesty, was a physical entity, and that angels have bodies with fixed dimensions and weights; they believed that Allãh, the Sublime and His angels where concealed by the sky. This prompted them to adopt images and idols of various forms and shapes that they worshipped as representation of God's image or the angels' image, and some were in image of human being, etc. They used to offer sacrifices to the idols and made vows regarding them as a way of seeking nearness to the Almighty.

They continued on this for some time until some wise men among them pointed out to them that the planets and the stars were closest visible entites to Almighty Allãh, and that they had characteristics of life and speech; and that the angels were the link between them and Allãh. They also believed that whatever happens on this earth is the reflection of the movement of the stars based on Allãh's command. So, they started venerating the stars and offering sacrifices to them so that they may benefit them. This continued for some time.

When they saw that the stars disappeared during the daytime and sometimes in the night also because of atmospheric obstructions, some of their wise men suggested to them to make idols and statues in image of the stars – and so they ended up making idols and statues based on the number of the bigger and famous stars. Each group of them started venerating one of those stars and offering sacrifices to it that was different from what was offered by others. They believed that if they venerate the idols that they had carved, the seven celestial bodies will do for them whatever they wished. And they built an exclusive temple for each idol and named the temples by the names of those stars.

Some believe that the Sacred House [in Mecca] is the temple of the Saturn; and that this House has survived during the passing eras and venerated during most of its history because it is the temple of the Saturn; and the Saturn has protected it since longevity and stability is from its characteristics. They believed that anything releated to the Saturn will not perish. They also believed in other supersptitions whose narration here will tire the reader.

Anyhow, with the passage of time, they started worshipping the idols as a means of seeking nearness to God and abandoned the worship of the stars. They continued in this way until Yudhãsaf appeared in India. Yudhãsaf, an Indian, then left India for Sind and then went to Sajistãn and Zãbulistãn (these were ruled of Fīrūz bin Kabak), and then he went back to Sind and then to Kirmãn. Then he claimed to be a prophet and thought that he was God's messenger, and an intermediary between God and the people. He came to Persia at the beginning of the reign of Tahmūrth, the Persian king; some say that it was in reign of King Jam. Yudhãsaf is the first to start the Sabaean traditions as we mentioned earlier in this book.

Yudhãsaf called people towards asceticism in this world, and to concentrate on the higher spiritual realm that is the origin of the human souls and is considered the heart of this world. By proposing some specious arguments, he revived the worship and veneration of the idols among the people; and by using a variety of deceitful and dubious means, he justified idol-worshipping in their minds.

Those who are expert in this area and this era of history say that it was King Jim [of Pishdadian dynasty] who glorified the fire and called the people to venerate it. He used to say that the fire resembles the light of the Sun and the stars, and light was in his views better than darkness. He also believed that light has a variety of degrees. Those who came after him went their different ways in venerating whatever they thought would get them closer to the Almighty Allãh.

al-Masʿūdī then describes their major temples which were seven in number: The Kaʿbah was the temple of Saturn; a temple at the top of Mars mount near Isfahan; the temple of Mandustãn in India; the temple of Nawbahãr, near Balakh, named after the Moon; the temple of Ghamdãn, in Sanʿã' (Yemen), named after Venus; the temple of Kãwsãn, in Farghãnah, named after the Sun; a temple in highlands of China, named after the First Cause. And there were major temples in Greece, Rome and in the lands of the Slavs that were named after the stars such as the temple of Venus in Tunis.

Then al-Masʿūdī mentions that the Sabaeans of Ḥarrãn[55] had temples named after the substantial ideas and stars such as the temple of the First Cause, the temple of intellect, the temple of chain [of cause and effect], the temple of physical form, and the temple of soul – all these were build in a circular form. Then there was the temple of Saturn in hexoganal form, the temple of Jupiter in a triangle form, the temple of Mars in a square form, the temple of the Sun in a square form, the temple of Mercury in a triangle form, the temple of Venus which was internally in a triangle form and externally in a square form, and the temple of Moon in a octogon form. As we mentioned earlier, the Sabaean has codes and secrets that they conceal [from others]. This is the end of what al-Masʿūdī had said and it is similar to what ash-Shahristãnī has mentioned in his al-Milal wa 'n-niḥal.

* * *

From what we have described, the followings become clear:

Firstly, the polytheists who worshipped idols as their gods also worshipped images of stars, the sun and the moon, and that they had temples named after them. Therefore, it is possible that Ibrãhīm's argument against the stars, the moon and the sun was with the polytheists who believed in them also and not with the Sabaeans. It is also possible that it was aginst some Sabaeans in the city of Babylon or Ur or Kūthã-Rabã as mentioned in some narrations quoted earlier.

The story as narrated in the Holy Qur'ãn apparently shows that Ibrãhīm ('a.s.) argued against his father and his people, and patiently endured their aggression for the sake of Allãh until he separated himself from them and abandoned them by emigrating from their land towards the holy land without first diverting his journey to Ḥarrãn and then from there to the holy land. What the history books have said about his migration first to Ḥarrãn and then from Ḥarrãn to the holy land has no basis other than the Torah or some unreliable reports from the Isrã'ilite spittles – this is obvious to anyone who ponders upon Tãrīkh of aṭ-Ṭabarī and other sources. Moreover, some sources[56] mention that the Ḥarrãn described in the Torah was a city near Babylon between Euphrates and Khãbūr, and that it is other than the present-day Ḥarrãn which is near Damascus.

[55] Since Sabaean faith was prevalent in Ḥarrãn, the Sabaeans were also known as Ḥarrãniyūn. (Author's note)

Yes, al-Mas'ūdī mentions that the remnant of the major Sabaeanes' temples during this time – that is year 332 AH – is a temple in the city of Ḥarrãn at the Bãbu 'r-Raqqah known as Maghlitiyã and that is known among them as the temple of Ãzar, the father of Ibrãhīm al-Khalīl ('a.s.). The Sabaeans have many stories on Ãzar and his son Ibrãhīm – of course; none of their statements has any validity.

Secondly, just as the polytheists were sometimes worshipping the sun, the moon and the stars, similarly the Sabaeanes erected places of worship and temples for worship of entites other than the stars, the moon and the sun. They even established temples for the First Cause, the intellect, the soul, etc., just like the idol-worshippers and sought nearness to them. Herodotus, in his History, describes the temple [of Jupiter] in Babylon that it consisted of eight towers raised upon one another and that the topmost tower had a spacious temple, and inside the temple stands a couch of unusual size, richly adorned, with a golden table by its side. There were no statue of any kind set up in the temple, nor was the temple occupied of nights by anyone except a single whom the people affirmed to be chosen by Allãh for service and companionship.[57]

Perhaps this temple [at the eighth tower of Babylon] was dedicated to the First Cause which is devoid of any shapes and images even though sometimes they would portray Him as per their own imaginations as mentioned by al-Mas'ūdī. It is confirmed that their philosophers deemed Almighty Allãh above the physical forms, shapes and material attributes, and described Him with appropriate qualities. These philosophers, however, were afraid of the masses in expressing their true belief about Allãh either because the people did not have the capacity to understand that aspect or because of political expediency and interest that compelled them to hide the truth.
