Allāh (s.a.w.a.); he came and admonished them and established peace between them. They heeded his call and obeyed. Then Allāh revealed about Aws and Jabbār: 'O you who believe! if you obey a party from among those who were given the Book ...'; and about Shāsh ibn Qays: 'Say: ''O People of the Book! why do you hinder him who believes from the way of Allāh?'' ' ''

This tradition is abridged from the one narrated (by as-Suyūṭī) in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr in detailed form from Zayd ibn Aslam; he has narrated nearly similar traditions from Ibn ʻAbbās and others.

However, these verses obviously fit more properly on the explanation given by us than on this tradition. Moreover, they speak about disbelief and belief, and also about testimony of the Jews, recitation of the revealed verses to the believers, and things like that; and all these matters are more revelant to the explanation given by us. It is also supported by the words of Allāh: Many of the People of the Book wish that they could turn you back into unbelievers after your faith, out of envy on their part, (even) after the truth has become manifest to them ... (2:109). Therefore, the fact is, as we have said, that these verses are a sort of prologue to the preceding ones.

QUR'ĀN: Say: ''O People of the Book! why do you disbelieve in the communications of Allāh and ... '': The continuation of the context indicates that ''the communications'' refers to the lawfulness of food before the revelation of the Torah and to the Kaʻbah being the qiblah in Islam.

QUR'ĀN: Say: ''O People of the Book! why do you hinder him who believes from the way of Allāh? You seek (to make) it crooked,: ''aṣ-Ṣadd'' (اَلصَّدُّ = to hinder; to divert); ''you seek it,'' that is, you want this way to be crooked; '' 'iwajan'' (عِوَجاً = crooked, perverted); it refers to the fact that they wanted the way of Allāh to be deviated, not straight.

QUR'ĀN: ''while you are witnesses, and ... '': You know very well that all food was lawful before the revelation of the Torah, and that one of the signs of the promised prophet was that he would change the qiblah to the Kaʻbah. The Jews have been counted as witnesses in this verse, while the preceding verse declared Allāh to be a witness of their activities and disbelief. The implication of this fine juxtaposition cannot be lost on a man of literary taste. They are witnesses of the truth of what they deny; and Allāh is a witness of their denial and disbelief. As ‘‘witnessing’’ was ascribe to them in this verse, the ending clause of the preceding verse (And Allāh is a witness of what you do) was changed here to: ‘‘and Allāh is not heedless of what you do’’. The implication is that they are witnesses for the truth of the Prophet’s claim while Allāh is a witness for everyone and everything.

QUR’ĀN: O you who believe! If you obey a party from among those who were given the Book, ... and among you is His Messenger? ...: As mentioned earlier, ‘‘a party’’, refers to the Jews or a Jewish group. ‘‘while it is you to whom the communications of Allāh are recited, and among you is His Messenger’’: It is possible and easy for you to hold fast to the truth (which has been sent and explained to you) if you just listen to the verses recited to you and then meditate on them; then if you encounter any difficulty because of faulty meditation, you may to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) for clarification; you may refer to the Messenger even before meditating on the verses to explain it to you: he is present among you, it is not difficult for you to approach him because he is neither hidden nor far away from you; you may easily find the reality by referring to him, then you may clear the doubts which the Jews try to create in your minds. To hold fast to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and the Divine Communications is to hold fast to Allāh; ‘‘And whoever holds fast to Allāh, he indeed is guided to the straight path.’’

The disbelief, mentioned in the clause, ‘‘But how can you disbelieve’’, refers to disbelieving after believing; the clause, ‘‘while it is you to whom the communications of Allāh are recited,’’ points to the possibility of holding fast to the communications of Allāh and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) in order to protect oneself from disbelief; the clause, ‘‘And whoever holds fast to Allāh,’’ is a sort of the major premise of a syllogism, [the full form of which has been given above]. The guidance to the straight path means being guided to the firmly-rooted true belief; it is the path that does not deviate nor does it fail to reach the destination; it keeps all those who proceed on it in proper line without letting them deviate hither or thither lest they go astray.

The Arabic word translated here as, ‘‘is guided’’, is a past tense in passive voice; it implies that they have been guided without realizing who has guided them.

The verse shows that the Book of Allāh and the verbal and practical guidance given by the Messsenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) are sufficient to guide a man to every truth and reality in which he could possibly go astray.

COMMENTARY

The verses conclude the speech addressed to the believers, warning them of the People of the Book and their machinations. It reminds them that they have got a life-line which if they hold fast to they shall not perish, shall not go astray and shall not fall into pits of perdition. It is a speech branching from the preceding talk. However the previous context, that is, exposition of the behaviour of the People of the Book, has not been concluded yet, as may be seen from the verses coming after these: They shall by no means harm you but with a slight distress.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him,: We have explained that ''at-taqwā'' (اَلتَّقْوي = to be on guard; fear; piety) when related to Allāh, means to be on guard against His punishment, to fear His chastisement. Allāh says: then be on guard against the fire of which men and stones are the fuel (2:24). One may guard oneself from the Divine Wrath by behaving according to Allāh's pleasure. In other words, it is doing what He has enjoined one to do, and abstaining from what He has forbidden; being grateful for His favours and patient when He puts one in adverse conditions. The last two attributes are actually two facets of gratefulness — because gratefulness is to put a thing in its proper place. In short, fear of Allāh means that man should obey (and not disobey) Him, and should submit to Him in all that He bestows or withholds.

But the verse talks of at-taqwā as it rightfully should be done, that is, a piety that is not tainted by the least wrong. Such piety is the pure servitude which is never marred by an iota of obliviousness or heedlessness; it is obedience without disobedience, gratitude without ingratitude, remembrance without forgetfulness; it is the true Islam, that is, the highest grade of Islam. Accordingly, the words, and do not die unless you are Muslims, would mean: Continue on this condition of ideal at-taqwā until you die.

This verse gives a different ideal than the words: Therefore fear Allāh as much as you can (64:16). This command enjoins man not to leave fear of Allāh in anything as much as he can. But ability differs from man to man according to people's strength, understanding and will. There is no doubt that the ideal piety is not within easy reach of a majority of men. There are, in this spiritual journey, many stations, locations and danger points which cannot be spotted except by those who know. Also there are many delicate points and subtle differences which cannot be recognized except by those who have been purified. There is many a stage of piety which a common man would say, was beyond human ability; he really believes it to be far above the human strength — while the truly pious people have long past that stage and are now progressing towards even more difficult goal, through much more harder terrains.

The verse, Therefore fear Allāh as much as you can, has been so worded that different minds would interpret it in different ways, according to one's perceived strength and ability. This will provide a means to proceed to the real goal which is given in the verse under discussion: ''fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him, and do not die unless you are Muslims.'' They will then understand that the main purpose is for them to take to the path of the ideal piety and to progress towards that lofty station. In this respect, it is not different from being guided to the Straight Path: Although all men are invited to it, only the true believers, the pure monotheists, get to that path.

The two verses (fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him; fear Allāh as much as you can) then give the following connotation: All people are called and invited to the ideal piety; then they are told to proceed to that goal as much as they can, everyone according to his own ability and strength. In this way, all will come on the path of piety; but they will be in different stages and various stations according to their own understanding and ambition, coupled with the Divine help and support, that is, bestowed on deserving servants. (This is what one understands after pondering on the two verses.)

It is clear from the above explanation that the two verses are neither different from each other in meaning nor identical; rather, the first verse (fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him) points to the ultimate goal, while the second (fear Allāh as much as you can) shows the way.

QUR'ĀN: and do not die unless you are Muslims: Death is a creative affair that is beyond the circle of our will and power. An order or a prohibition concerning this or similar things shall be a creative order or prohibition, as Allāh says: Then Allāh said to them, Die (2:243); ... is only that He says to it, 'Be', and it is (36:82).

But sometimes an affair beyond our control is joined to one within our control, and then the combined phrase comes within our power, control and authority. At this stage, it may become a subject of legislative order or prohibition, as Allāh says: therefore you should not be of the doubters (2:147); and be not with the unbelievers (11:42); and be with the true ones (9:119), and many similar verses. Obviously, ‘‘to be’’ is an intransitive creative affair upon which man has no control or power; but when it is joined with an action within his power, like doubting, disbelieving and holding fast to the true ones, it comes within our power; and then it may become subject of legislative order and prohibition.

In short, the prohibition that they should not die unless they are Muslims is a legislative one because the said proviso has made it a voluntary action; and it implies that man should hold fast to Islam in all conditions and at all times, until death comes to him in one of those conditions. Thus he would die on Islam.

QUR’ĀN: And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together and be not divided: Allāh has said before to the believers: But how can you disbelieve while it is you to whom the communications of Allāh are recited and among you is His Messenger; and whoever holds fast to Allāh, he indeed is guided to the straight path (3:101). It had shown that holding fast to the communications of Allāh and to His Messenger (the Book of Allāh and the sunnah of the Prophet) is to hold fast to Allāh; and whoever holds fast to Allāh is safe and secure and his guidance is guaranteed; also holding fast to the Prophet is holding fast to the Book, because it is the Book itself that enjoins us to do so: and whatever the Messenger gives you, take it, and from whatever he forbids you, keep it back (59:7).

Now the verse under discussion has changed the phraseology; instead of telling us to hold fast to Allāh, it enjoins to hold fast to the cord of Allāh. It shows that the cord of Allāh is the Book revealed by Allāh; it is the cord that joins the creature to his Lord, that connects the heavens to the earth. You may also say that the Divine Cord is the Qur’ān and the Prophet because the end result of all is the same.

The Qur’ān invites only to the ideal piety and firm Islam. Yet the aim of this verse is different from the preceding verse that had enjoined ideal piety and the death on Islam, inasmuch as that verse was concerned with guidance of the individual, while this looks at the good of the society. The words ‘‘all together’’ and ‘‘be not divided’’ point to this fact. The verse therefore orders the Muslim society to hold fast to the Book and the sunnah, as they had earlier enjoined the individual to do so.

QUR'ĀN: and remember the bounty of Allāh on you when you were enemies, then He united your hearts so by His favour you became brethren;: The clause ''when you were'' explains the bounty of Allāh, and the next clause, and you were on the brink of a pit of fire, then He delivered you from it, is in conjuction with it.

The order to remember this Divine bounty and favour is based on the established Qur'ānic system: it builds its education on explanation of its reasons and causes; and invites to the good and the guidance through proper door; it does not demand blind following from its adherents. Far be it from the Divine Teaching to guide the people to eternal happiness — that is useful knowledge and good deed — and then to tell them to wander in the darkness of ignorance and blind following.

But the reader is warned here not to confuse the subject matter. Allāh teaches men the reality of their happiness and then shows them its proper way and reason, in order that they would understand the mutual relationship between the realities and know that all emanate from the fountain-head of monotheism. It continues side by side with men's obligation to totally submit to Allāh because He is Allāh, the Lord of the universe, and to hold fast to His cord because it is the cord of Allāh Who is the Lord of the universe. The last two verses (These are communications of Allāh which we recite to you ...) point to this fact.

In short, Allāh has ordered them not to accept any word, nor to obey any order, except after knowing its reason. At the same time He has told them to surrender totally to Him, giving for its reason the fact that He is Allāh Who owns them totally and unconditionally, they have got nothing except that which Allāh has willed for them and done for them; also He has ordered them to unconditionally obey what His Messenger has brought to them, giving for its reason the fact that he is His Messenger who conveys to them only that which he has been entrusted by Allāh to do; then Allāh explains to them the realities of knowledge and describes the ways of happiness, giving them a comprehensive reason in order that they could understand the inter-relation of the spiritual knowledge and the ways of happiness, and thus arrive at the root of monotheistic belief; it provides them with a Divine Training which enables them to think what is correct and speak what is true. Thus they would be alive with knowledge, free from blind following. Result: If they would understand the reason of any established religious reality (or any related thing) they would accept it; and if they did not understand they would not reject it outright; instead they would try to understand it by research and meditation without rejecting, or objecting to, it — because it is an established reality.

But it does not mean that one should not accept anything — even from Allāh and His Messenger — without asking for its reason. Such a proposition would be the height of folly, as it would imply that Allāh wants His creatures to demand for proof after the proof is given to them: His lordship and His ownership is the basic reason and argument that makes it incumbent on everyone to submit to Him and obey His command. Likewise, the messengership of His Messenger is the solid reason and proof to prove that whatever he says has come from Allāh. Otherwise, we would have to say that Allāh has no authority in that which He manages by His authority. Is it but a contradiction in terms? In short, the Islamic way and the prophetic method calls only to knowledge, and not to blind following as these so-called critics — who are nothing if not blind followers themselves — claim.

Perhaps that is why Allāh has called it a favour (the bounty of Allāh on you). It indicates the reason as to why We enjoin you to unite together: you have already experienced the bitterness of enmity and sweet taste of love and brotherhood; you have seen that you were on the brink of the pit of fire and Allāh has saved you; We point this reason to you not because We have to support our sayings with some proof (obviously, Our saying is true whether We point to its reason or not), but only to let you know that it is a favour of Us on you, in order that you may appreciate that in this unity — like everything else We enjoin on you — lies your felicity, comfort and success.

Allāh has given here two proofs, one of which (... you were enemies...) is obviously based on their experience, while the other (... you were on the brink of a pit of fire...) is based on rational explanation.

The clause ‘‘so by His favour you became brethren’’ reminds the Muslims a second time of the Divine Favour mentioned in the preceding clause ‘‘and remember the bounty of Allāh on you’’. The bounty and favour refers to their unity; hence the brotherhood too (which results from this bounty) refers to the same love and unitedness. The brotherhood, as used here, is therefore a claimed reality.

Also possibly it may be a reference to the brotherhood that has been legislated as between the believers, vide the verse: The believers are but brethren (49:10); this legislated brotherhood creates very important mutual rights and duties between one believer and the other.

QUR'ĀN: and you were on the brink of a pit of fire, then He delivered you from it:: ''Shafā ḥufratin'' (شَفَا حُفْرَةٍ = brink or edge of a pit where one is in danger of falling down); ''fire'' may be of the hereafter or of this world. If former, then it would refer to the fact that previously they were unbelievers and about to fall down in the hell the moment they died — and death is nearer to man than is the iris of eye from its white — then Allāh saved them from it through the true faith. And if the aim is to point to their evil society which they were living in before they accepted Islam and became brethren, and the fire refers to their wars and conflicts — and it is a commonly used metaphor — then the meaning would be as follows:

A society built on disunited hearts and divergent minds cannot proceed under one leader or in one direction; it is bound to turn into a disorientated and deranged collection of people — each one pulling it to his side, as it suits his own wishes and desires. Such a society would be a cauldron of dissension and strife, always pushing its members to ever-new conflicts, embroiling them in wars and fights, and threatening them with decline and extinction. It is the fire that neither allows one to endure nor does it leave one alone, raging in the pit of ignorance from which no inmate could hope to escape.

The immediate audience of this verse, were the Muslims who before the vesrse was revealed, had accepted Islam after their disbelief. They had spent all their pre-Islamic lives in constant threat of battle and war. There was no security, no peace, no law and order. They did not understand what constituted public safety — the concept that covers the society in all its aspects like property, honour and life, etc.

When they joined hands to hold fast to the cord of Allāh, perceived the signs of happiness and felicity, and tasted the sweetness of Divine Bounties, they understood by this experience the truth and reality of what Allāh reminds them of His pleasant favours and the resulting wholesome felicity. In this background, this speech was bound to win their hearts — as well as of the others — most effectively and in all totality.

That is why the call to unite has been based on their own experience and observation instead of just philosophical presumptions. One picture is worth a thousand words. And it is because of the same reason that the next warning (And be not like those who became divided and disagreed after clear evidences had come to them ...) points to the condition of those who had preceded them. The believers have seen and heard what happened to those nations — how they declined and fell — because of their disunitedness and internal strife; the believers should learn lessons from them; they should not walk on the same path, should not proceed in the same direction.

Then Allāh draws their attention to the special nature of this speech and says: thus does Allāh make clear to you His signs that you may follow the right way.

QUR'ĀN: And from among you there should be a party who invite to good and enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong, and these it is that shall be successful.: Experience shows that the knowledge a man acquires in his life (and he acquires and preserves for himself only that which may be of some use to him) is soon forgotten if not repeatedly remembered, if not frequently put in practice and acted upon — it makes no difference how that knowledge was acquired and preserved. Also there is no doubt that action, in all its aspects, turns on the pivot of knowledge; its strength or weakness, its efficiency or deficiency all depends on the stength or weakness, efficiency or deficiency of knowledge. Allāh has given a likeness of knowledge and action in the following verse: And as for the good land, its vegetation springs forth (abundantly) by the permission of its Lord, and (as for) that which is bad (its herbage) comes forth but scantily; thus do We repeat the communications fora people who give thanks (7:58).

Undoubtedly, there is an interaction between knowledge and action. Knowledge is the strongest motive of action, and action is the greatest teacher that imparts knowledge.

This reality binds a good society (that which has got useful knowledge and virtuous action) to preserve and keep intact their knowledge and culture; and obliges them to bring a deviator back to the right path, to make sure that nobody goes astray leaving the known way of righteousness for the unforgiving desert of evil — they must protect him from falling into the pit of sin and error by forbidding him to go near it.

This is the call to educate the society members; the obligation of enjoining the good and forbidding the evil. It is this important obligation to which Allāh refers when He says: ‘‘... who invite to good and enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong’’.

The Arabic words translated here as ‘‘right’’ and ‘‘wrong’’ (enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong) are ‘al-ma‘rūf’ (اَلْمَعْرُوْفُ) and ‘al-munkar’ (اَلْمُنْكَرُ) which literally mean ‘‘known’’ and ‘‘unknown’’ respectively. Ponder on the explanation given above and you will understand why Allāh has used these expressions. The verse under discussion is based on the preceding one, And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together and be not divide ... A society which follows this guidance must be the ideal society. It would only be the right and the good which they would recognize, which would be ‘‘known’’ to them; and only the wrong and the evil which they would not recognize, which would be ‘‘unknown’’ to them. If this fine point is not kept in mind, then the only possible explanation would be that the right and the wrong were respectively known and unknown in the eyes of religion — but not in actual practice of the society.

The clause ‘‘And from among you there should be a party’’: It has been said that ‘‘from among’’ indicates portion, obliging only a party among the Muslim ummah to enjoin the good and forbid the evil and call to the truth. Others have said that the particle ‘min’ (مِنْ = from among) has here an explanatory connotation; that the sentence means as follows: If you unite together you will become a party who invite to good, enjoin the right and forbid the evil. In other words it is as we say: ‘I should find in you a friend’, which actually means: ‘Be my friend’. Apparently, the said explanatoriness of ‘‘from among’’ means that the whole Muslim ummah is obligated to call to the good.

Actually, the controversy whether ‘‘from among’’ is for division or explanation is quite irrelevant. Calling to good, enjoining the right and forbidding the wrong are things which, even when obligatory, cannot be obligatory except on a few; because once the goal is achieved it would not be necessary for others to do so. Even if we were to say that the whole ummah invited to good, enjoined the right and forbade the wrong, it would only mean that there were some people in the ummah who did so. Thus the responsibility lies on only a selected group in any case. If the verse is addressed to a group of the ummah, the matter is clear; but if it is addressed to the whole nation, that is because of that particular group. In other words, initially the responsibility lies on everybody's shoulders, but when some perform the duty, they get its reward and the others are then exempted from the obligation. That is why the verse ends with the clause ''and these [i.e., those who perform this duty] it is that shall be successful''

It appears from the above that ''from among'' indicates here a portion; it is this meaning that is generally understood from such combinations in common conversation, and it is not right to go for another meaning without a good reason.

The three — inviting to good, enjoining the right and forbidding the wrong — are profoundly extensive subjects which require deep exegetic discourse, and we shall write about it, Allāh willing, in proper places; also we shall deal there with its academic psychological and social aspects.

QUR'ĀN: And be not like those who became divided and disagreed after clear evidences had come to them, and.... Probably the clause, ''after clear evidences had come to them'', is an adverbial phrase related to the verb, ''disagreed'', only. If so, then the ''disagreement'' would refer to difference of belief while the ''division'' to their physical separation and dissociation. Division has been mentioned first, because it is the prelude to divergence of belief. As long as the members of a community remain in contact with each other, there continues a harmony in their ideas and ideals, and their constant meetings — and the inevitable interaction — welds their beliefs into a single entity, protecting them from ideological differences. If on the other hand, they lose contact and become separated the process of mutual action and reaction comes to a standstill; their views and ideas start developing independently, each going his own way, and it does not take each group very long to develop its own views, ideals, theories and beliefs. It is in this way that ideological disagreements are born and unity of nations is shattered. It is as though Allāh was warning the Muslims not to be like those who began their journey to disaster by separating from each other, losing mutual contacts and remaining aloof from the community, and ended by having different beliefs and divergent ideas.

Allāh has mentioned in various places that this disagreement and difference springs from revolt and envy; for example: And none differed about it but the very people who were given it, after clear signs had come to them, revolting among themselves (2:213).

Of course, it is inevitable for ideas and opinions to differ, because knowledge and understandings differ from individual to individual; but at the same time it is essential for a society to remove that difference and bring back the deviators to the fold of unity. It is possible to remove the differences through various means; and if the ummah neglected this duty, it would in itself be a revolt which would throw them into perdition.

The Qur'ān has given utmost importance to unity and forcefully warned the Muslims against disunity. Why? Because it knew which path this ummah would take; they would differ, disagree and disunite not only as the previous people did, but even more. A peculiarity of the Qur'ānic style has already been mentioned in several places: When it emphatically warns against some pitfall, it serves as a prophecy that the Muslim ummah was going to fall into it, nevertheless; the more forceful the admonition, the more likely the people were to violate it. This difference and disunity was foretold by the Prophet as well as by the Qur'ān; he said that difference would creep into his ummah, then it would raise its head in the form of divergent sects; also he prophesied that the ummah would become divided as the Jews and the Christians were before. Some of those prophecies will be given under ''Traditions''.

History testifies to the truth of this prophesy. No sooner was the Prophet gone than the people scattered in all directions; they were divided into several sects, each accusing others of apostasy. This has been going on since the days of the Companions to this time of ours. Every attempt at uniting two sects, results in the creation of a third.

Experience and analytical study of Islamic literature and history prove that the fount-head of this difference were the hypocrites. Read the Qur'ān and you will see how forcefully it speaks against them and condemns them; how seriously it denounces their schemes; and how dangerous it takes their plans to be. Ponder on what Allāh has said about them in the Chapters of: The Cow, The Repentance, The Confederates, and The Hypocrites, etc., and you will be stunned. This was their condition and behaviour during the lifetime of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), when the revelations were regularly coming from Allāh. But as soon as the Prophet departed, the hypocrites were immediately forgotten;

we find no mention of them in the Muslim literature; it was as though they vanished the moment the Prophet died!

(It was) as though there never was any intimate friend between al-Ḥujūn and aṣ-Ṣafā,
Or there never conversed at night any talker at Mecca.

Soon the people found themselves scattered to the four winds and sectarian differences cut them asunder. Despotic and tyrannical governments succeeded in subjugating them, and their felicity of life was transformed into infelicity of error and straying. And we seek help from Allāh. We hope, by the grace of Allāh, to write on this subject in detail in the Chapter of The Repentance.

QUR'ĀN: On the day when (some) faces shall become bright and (some) faces shall turn black;... they shall abide.: As the talk centres around ungratefulness which, like treachery and breach of trust, causes shame and bashfulness, Allāh has selected here a chastisement of the hereafter that is analogous to it, that is, blackness of face which metaphorically denotes shamefacedness, abashment and disgrace. It is implied, or rather clearly shown, by the words of Allāh: ''then as for those whose faces will have turned black: Did you disbelieve after your believing?''

For the same reason, those who are grateful for this Divine Favour, shall be given a reward that will be appropirate for thankfulness, and that is brightness of face, which is metaphorically used for contentment and delight.

QUR'ĀN: These are communications of Allāh which We recite to you with truth,: The clause, ''with truth'' is related to the verb, ''We recite'', that is, the recitation is the recital of truth, it is not false, nor is it form Satanic whisperings. Alternatively, it may be related to ''communications'' giving it an adjectival meaning, that is, true communications. Or it may be related to a deleted word. In any case, the verse means as folows: These verses which describe what Allāh will do with two groups — the ungrateful and the grateful — are accompanied by and based on truth, there is no falsehood or injustice in them. This meaning is more appropriate because the verse ends on the words: and Allāh does not desire any injustice ...

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh does not desire any injstice to the creatures: The word ''injustice'', is a common noun used in a negative context, implies comprehensiveness, that is, every type of injustice is negated. Likewise ''the creatures'' being a plural with definite article ''the'' denotes comprehensiveness. Therefore, the meaning will be as follows: Allāh does not desire any injustice — of whatevery type it may be — to any of His creatures or a group of creatures.

It is a fact that difference and conflict among the people is such a bad thing that its evil consequences adversely affect all the creatures, the whole mankind.

QUR'ĀN: And whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's; and to Allāh all things are returned.: After the declaration that Allāh desires no injustice whatsoever, this verse gives its reason to remove any possible misunderstanding to the contrary. Allāh owns everything in all its aspects; He has right and authority to manage it in any way He likes. There is nothing outside His ownership. Had there been anything outside His ownership, only then He would do any injustice or exceed the limit by managing or usurping that ''unowned'' thing. Moreover, man inclines to injustice when he has a need which cannot be fulfilled except by manipulation of something he does not own. But Allāh is Self-sufficient to Whom belongs all that is in the heavens and all that is in the earth. (This argument has been given by an exegete, but it is not in conformity with apparent meaning of the verse. This reply is based on the Self-sufficiency of Allāh, and not on His ownership, while the verse mentions the latter, not the former.) However, the Divine Ownership offers irrefutable proof that Allāh is not unjust.

Then comes another proof: Everything and every affair, whatsoever it may be, returns to Allāh. If anyone other than Allāh would have had any authority on any thing. or affair, only then Allāh would have been committing injustice if He would have removed it from that other's authority and manipulated it according to His own will. This proof is pointed at in the concluding statement: ''and to Allāh all things are returned''.

The two proofs, as you see, are complementary. One is based on the premise that everything belongs to Allāh, and the other on the principle that no affair belongs to anyone other than Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: You are the best nation raised up for the (benefit of) men; ...: The word translated as ''raised up'' is ''ukhrijat'' (أُخْرِجَتْ = lit. taken out); it has a connotation of introduction. Taking out also implies incidence, bringing forth and creation. Allāh says: And Who brought forth herbage (87:4). The verse is addressed to the believers; therefore, the word ''men'' should mean general public, the humanity at large. Someone has said that the verb, 'kuntum' (كُنْتُمْ = lit.: you were), is here devoid of time factor and means 'you are'. The word 'ummah' (أُمَّة = nation, group), is used for a party as well as for individual — when they have the same goal which they aim to reach; it is derived from 'al-amm' (اَلَمُّ = to intend, to aim). The clause, ''and you believe in Allāh'', has been placed after mentioning the enjoining the right and forbidding the evil; it is like mentioning the whole thing or the root after describing some components or branches. According to the above explanation, the verse means as follows: O Muslims! you are the best group which Allāh has brought out for the mankind by guiding it; because you are united, you believe in Allāh, and perform the twin duties of enjoining the right and forbidding the wrong. Obviously, this honoured title has been given to the whole ummah only because some of them have attained to the true belief and do fulfil the obligations of enjoining the good and forbidding the evil. This is in short what some exegetes have written about it.

But obviously the word 'kuntum' (كُنْتُمْ = you were), is not devoid of time factor; it is a past tense and refers to the believer's condition in the early days of Islam. It speaks about those who were foremost among the Emigrants and the Helpers; the belief here refers to their positive response to the call of holding fast to the cord of Allāh without being divided; this belief is opposite of the disbelief in that call — the disbelief that is mentioned in the words: Did you disbelieve after your believing? The same is the import of the belief as related to the People of the Book in this verse, ''and if the People of the Book had believed.'' In short the meaning will be as follows:

O Muslims! you were — when you were brought forth first of all and appeared for the people — the best group that was ever formed, because at that time you enjoined good and forbade evil, and holding fast by the cord of Allāh you became united and unified like one body and one soul;

and if the People of the Book too were like that it would have been better for them, but they are divided and disunited — some of them are believers while most of them are transgressors.

Many times in these verses the talk switches from third to the second person, and from plural to the singular number, and vice versa. Also there are clauses where noun has been used instead of pronoun, for example, the Divine Name ‘‘Allāh’’ has been repeated several times. The reasons for these changes are not difficult to find after meditation.

TRADITIONS

Abū Baṣīr says: ‘‘I asked Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him, and he said: ‘He should be obeyed, and not disobeyed; remembered, and not forgotten; and thanked, and not shown ingratitude.’ ’’ (Ma‘āni ’l-akhbār; at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

al-Ḥākim and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated through another chain from Ibn Mas‘ūd that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Fear Allāh as He should be feared; (it means) that He should be obeyed and not disobeyed, and remembered, and not forgotten.’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

al-Khaṭīb narrates from Anas that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘No servant fears Allāh with the fear which is due to Him until he knows that what has befallen him could not miss him, and what has missed him could not reach him.’ ’’ (ibid.)

The author says: We have explained in the Commentary how the meaning given in the first two traditions could be inferred from the verse. As for the third one, it gives a concomitant of the Qur’ānic meaning, and it is clear.

Ibn Shahrāshūb quotes from at-Tafsīr of Wakī‘ that ‘Abd Khayr said: ‘‘I asked ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: O you who believe! fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him, (and) he said: ‘By Allāh, no one acted upon it except the House of the Messenger of Allāh; we remembered Him, so we do not forget Him; and we thanked Him, so we are never ungrateful to Him; and we obeyed Him, so we never disobeyed Him. When this verse was revealed, the Companions said: ‘‘We are unable to do it.’’ Then Allāh revealed, Therefore fear Allāh as much as you can.’’ ’ ’’ Wakī‘ said: ‘‘that is, as much as you are able to do.’’ (al-Burhān [fī tafsīri ’l-Qur’ān], al-Bahrānī)

Abū Baṣīr said: ‘‘I asked Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him. He said: ‘(It is) abrogated.’ I said: ‘And which (verse) abrogated it? He said: ‘The words of Allāh, Therefore fear Allāh as much as you can.’ ’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-Ayyāshī)

The author says: It may be inferred from the tradition of Wakī‘ that ‘‘abrogation’’ (as mentioned in the tradition of al-‘Ayyāshī) refers to various stages of piety and fear of Allāh. But it does not mean abrogation in the sense of cancellation (as some exegetes have said) because it is against the apparent meaning of the Qur’ān.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) explained the clause, unless you are Muslims, in these words: ‘‘unless you are submissive.’’ (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

as-Suyūṭī writes under the words of Allāh: And hold fast by the cord of Allāh ...: ‘‘Ibn Abī Shaybah and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī that he said: ‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘The Book of Allāh, it is the cord of Allāh (which is) outstretched from the heaven to the earth.’’ ’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibn Abī Shaybah narrates from Abū Shurayḥ al-Khuzā‘ī that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Surely this Qur’ān is a rope, one end of which is in the hand of Allāh, and the other end is in your hands; therefore hold fast to it; because you shall never slip nor will you ever go astray after (holding fast to) it.’ ’’ (ibid.)

as-Sajjād (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a ḥadīth: ‘‘And the cord of Allāh — it is the Qur’ān.’’ (Ma‘āni ’l-akhbār)

The author says: There are other traditions on this theme, narrated by both sects.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ‘‘The progeny of Muḥammad, they are the cord of Allāh which He has ordered (the believers) to hold fast to; so He has said: And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together and be not divided.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: There are other traditions of the same meaning; they are supported by what has been written in the Commentary; also other traditions given below, support it.

aṭ-Ṭabarānī has narrated from Zayd ibn Arqam that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), said: 'Surely, I am to depart from you; and surely you are to come to me near the 'ḥawḍ' (اَلْحَوْضُ = reservoir, i.e., of 'al-Kawthar' = اَلْكَوْثَرُ). Therefore be careful how you follow me about the two weighty things.' He was asked: 'And what are the two weighty things? O Messenger of Allāh!' He said: 'The greater one is the Book of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, (it is) a rope one end of which is in the hand of Allāh and (another) end is in your hands; therefore hold fast to it, you shall never slip up nor will you ever go astray. And the smaller one is my progeny. And surely they will never separate from each other until they reach me near the waterreservoir; and I have asked for them this (especiality) from my Lord; therefore do not precede them lest you be destroyed; and do not (try to) teach them because they are more knowledgeable than you .' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: The tradition of the ''Two Weighty Things'' is among the mutawātir ones, which has been narrated unanimously by both the Sunnīs and the Shī'ahs. We have mentioned in the beginning of the chapter that some scholars of traditions have narrated it from thirty-five different narrators — males and females — and a multitude of narrators and scholars have narrated it from those original narrators.

Ibn Mājah, Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from Anas that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'The Children of Israel became divided into seventy-one sects, and surely my ummah will soon be divided into seventy-three sects — all of them shall be in the fire except one.' They said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! and who is this one?' He said: 'The party.' Then he recited: And hold fast to the cord of Allāh all together.' '' (ibid.)

The author says: This too is one of the famous traditions. The Shī‘ahs have narrated it in a different way, as may be seen in al-Khiṣāl, Ma‘āni ’l-akhbār, al-Iḥtijāj, al-Amālī, the Kitāb of Sulaym ibn Qays and at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī. We quote it here from the first-named book. aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chains from Sulaymān ibn Mihrān who narrates from Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad (peace be on them both) who narrates, through his forefathers, from the Leader of the Faithful (peace be on them all) that he said: ‘‘I heard the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) saying: ‘Verily, the ummah of Mūsā became divided after him, into seventy-one sects, one of them (was) saved, and seventy (were thrown) into the fire. And the ummah of ‘Īsā became divided after him, into seventy-two sects, one of them (was) saved, while seventy-one (were thrown) into the fire. And surely my ummah will soon.be divided after me, into seventy-three sects, one of them (will be) saved, and seventy-two (will be thrown) into the fire.’’

The author says: It conforms with the next tradition.

Abū Dāwūd, at-Tirmidhī, Ibn Mājah and al-Ḥākim (who has confirmed correctness of this ḥadīth) have all narrated from Abū Hurayrah that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘The Jews were divided into seventy-one sects; and the Christians were divided into seventy-two sects; and my ummah will be divided into seventy-three sects.’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: This theme is found in other traditions narrated through other chains from Mu‘āwiyah and others.

al-Ḥākim has narrated from Ibn ‘Umar that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘There will happen in any ummah all that happened in the Children of Israel in a completely identical manner, so much so that if there were among them someone who had openly had incestuous relation with his mother, there would be someone like that in my ummah too. Verily the Children of Israel were divided into seventy-one sects, and my ummah will become divided into seventy-three sects — all of them (will go) into the fire except one.’ He was asked: ‘Which one?' He said: 'That on which are I and my Companions today.' '' (ibid.)

The author says: A similar tradition has been narrated in Jāmi'u 'l-uṣūl (by Ibnu 'l-Athīr) from at-Tirmidhī, on the authority of the son of 'Amr ibn al-'Āṣ from the Prophet.

aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated through his chains from Ghiyāth ibn Ibrāhīm, from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) (through his forefathers, peace be on them all) that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'All that happened in the previous nations will surely happen in this ummah in a completely identical manner and exactly alike way.'' (Kamālu 'd-dīn)

The Prophet said: ''Most surely you will follow the customs of those who were before you, in a completely identical manner and exactly alike way; you will not deviate from their path; you will imitate them faithfully (in every conceivable manner), span to span, hand to hand and arm to arm; so much so that if someone in previous nations had entered an iguana's den, you will surely enter it.'' They said: ''Do you mean the Jews and the Christians? O Messenger of Allāh!'' He said: ''Who (else) do I mean? Surely you will unravel the rope of Islam strand by strand; the first thing you will destroy of your religion shall be trustworthiness, and the last of it (to go, shall be) the prayer.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author of Jāmi'u 'l-uṣūl has narrated on the authority of the correct books — also at-Tirmidhī has narrated it — from the Prophet that he said: ''By Him in Whose hand my soul is, most surely you will follow the custom of those who were before you.'' And Razīn has added the words: ''in a completely identical manner and exactly similar way; so much so that if there were among them one who had cohabited with his mother, someone among you too would do so. But I do not know whether you would worship calf or not.''

The author says: This too is a famous tradition. The Sunnīs have narrated it in their correct and other books, while the Shī'ahs have recorded it in their collections of traditions.

Anas said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Surely there will arrive at the Reservoir a group of my Companions, until when they shall be removed (from there) they shall tremble before me. So I shall say: O Lord! my Companions.' Then it will be said: 'You do not know what they did do after you.' '' (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, al-Bukhāri; aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, Muslim)

Abū Hurayrah said that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said. ''There will arrive near me on the Day of Resurrection a group of my Companions (or according to another report: of my ummah), and they will be evicted from the Reservoir. Then I will say: 'O Lord! my Companions.' And (Allāh) will say: 'You have no knowledge of what they did do after you; they became apostates, going backwards (to their previous disbelief).' Then they will be avicted.'' (ibid.)

The author says: This tradition also is very well-known; both the Sunnīs and the Shī'ahs have recorded it in their correct books and collections, on the authority of many Companions, like Ibn Mas'ūd, Anas, Sahl ibn Sā'id, Abū Hurayrah, Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī, 'Ā'ishah, Umm Salmah, Asmā' bint Abī Bakr, and others, and also from some Imams of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.).

These traditions, numerous and varied as they are, confirm what we have inferred from the verses; and the historical events and strifes confirm these traditions.

al-Ḥākim has narrated (and confirmed its correctness) that Ibn 'Umar said: ''Verily the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Whoever went out of community about a hand-span, he surely removed the collar of Islam from his neck — until he returns. And whoever died without having a leader of community over him, then surely his death shall be a death of ignorance (i.e., disbelief).' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: The theme of this ḥadīth too is well-known. Both the Sunnīs and the Shī'ahs have narrated from the Prophet that he said: ''Whoever died without knowing the Imām of his time, he died the death of ignorance (i.e., disbelief).''

It is recorded in the Sunans of at-Tirmidhī and Abū Dāwūd that the Prophet said: ''There shall always be a group of my ummah on truth.'' (Jāmi'u 'l-uṣūl)

The Leader of the Faithful ('Alī, a.s.) said about the words of Allāh: Did you disbelieve after your believing?: ''They are the people of innovations and heretic tendencies and wrong views from this ummah.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

Abū 'Amr az-Zubayrī narrates from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: You are the best nation raised up for the (benefit of) men ..., that he said: ''(Allāh) means the ummah (group, nation) for which the prayer of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was granted; and they are the people Allāh raised (His Messenger) among them, and from them and to them; and they are the medium nation, and they are the best nation that has been raised up for the people.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān; at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: We have explained this tradition under the Commentary of the following verse: ... and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting Thee (2:128).

Ibn Abī Ḥātim has narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said about the verse: You are the best nation raised up for the (benefit of) men ...: ''The People of the House of the Prophet.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Aḥmad has narrated through good chains from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said : ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'I have been given that which no prophet was given: I have been helped with awe, and I have been given keys of the earth, and I have been named Aḥmad, and the earth has been made a means of cleansing for me, and my ummah has been made the best nation.'' (ibid.)

COMMENTARY

The verses, as you see, now revert to the original theme, describing the behaviour of the People of the Book — and particularly the Jews — exposing their disbelief in the Divine Revelation, their going astray and their hindering the believers from the way of Allāh; the preceding ten verses were a talk within talk, a parenthetical speech. The verses are thus connected with the foregoing discourse.

QUR'ĀN: They shall by no means harm you ... they shall not be helped: ''al-Adhā'' (اَلْاَذٰي = slight distress) denotes a harm suffered by a creature, either to his soul or body or to those related to him, be it of this world or of the hereafter — as ar-Rāghib has said in Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān.

QUR'ĀN: Abasement is brought down upon them wherever they are found, except under a protection from Allāh and a protection from men;: ''adh-Dhillah'' (اَلذِّلَّةُ = abasement) denotes here species of abasement; 'adh-dhull' (اَلذُّلُّ) is the humiliation imposed by someone else; 'adh-dhill' (اَلذِّلُّ) is that which results from one's own obstinacy — as ar-Rāghib has written. However, its general import is the condition of humiliation and degradation. Its opposite 'al-'izz' (اَلْعِزُّ) means honour, strength and pride.

The word 'thuqifū' (ثُقِفُوا) means ''are found''; 'al-ḥabl' (اَلْحَبْلُ) literally means rope or cord which provides protection to one who holds fast to it; it is metaphorically used to everything that provides a kind of safety, security and protection, e.g., a covenant, guarantee or amnesty. The meaning is as follows — and Allāh knows better: Abasement is stamped on them as a design is stamped on a coin, or it encompasses them as a tent encompasses a man. Anyhow, they are either branded with, or overwhelmed by abasement and humiliation — except when they get a protection or guarantee from Allāh and a protection or guarantee from men.

The word ''protection'' is repeated when referring to Allāh and then to men, because the connotation differs from one place to the other. Protection given by Allāh is His decree and command, either creative or legislative; and that provided by men is their decision and action.

Abasement is stamped on them; it means that Allāh has ordained a law affirming their abasement. This meaning is supported by the proviso ''wherever they are found''. Obviously, it means that wherever the believers find them and subjugate them; this proviso is obviously more appropriate to legislative abasement, one of whose effects is the imposition of jizyah.

The meaning of the verse therefore is as follows:

They are abased and humiliated, according to the law of Islamic sharī'ah, except when they come under the protection of an Islamic State, or somehow get protection from people.

One of the exegetes has said that the clause ''Abasement is brought down upon them'' is not a legislative order; it is rather a statement of fact describing what they had suffered by the Divine decree and measure — because when Islam came, the Jews were paying jizyah to the fire-worshippers of Persia, and some of them were subjects of the Christians.

COMMENT: This meaning could be correct; and the end portion of the verse might even support this view, because it apparently explains the reason of their being branded with abasement and humiliation in terms of their misdeeds, e.g., their disbelief in the signs of Allāh, their slaying the prophets and their continuous transgression. But then we would have to apply this verse exclusively to the Jews — and there is apparently nothing in the verse to suggest such exclusiveness. We shall write some more on this subejct under the following verse: and We have put enmity and hatred among them till the Day of Ressurection (5:64).

QUR'ĀN: and they have become settled in wrath from Allāh, and humiliation is stamped upon them;: ''Bā'ū'' (بَاءُوا = they settled in; they returned with); 'al-maskanah' (اَلْمَسْكَنَةُ) translated here as humiliation, literally means extreme poverty. Apparently it is used when a man finds no way of escape from a threatening poverty or need. Accordingly the end of the verse conforms with its beginning.

QUR'ĀN: this is because they disobeyed and used to exceed the limits: They disobeyed, and, even before that, they were habitually and continuously transgressing the limits.

QUR'ĀN: They are not all alike; ... and Allāh knows the pious ones: ''as-Sawā' '' (اَلسَّوَآءُ = literally, to be equal) is a maṣdar which is used in the meaning of adjective, that is, equal, alike. The People of the Book are not all alike in their behaviour, nor in the rules applying to them; there is among them an upright group whose attributes the verse describes. Obviously, the phrase ''of the People of the Book there is ...'' shows the reason as to why the People of the Book are not all alike.

Various meanings have been given for the word 'qā'imah' (قَآئِمَةٌ = literally, standing; translated here as upright): It is said that it means 'firm in obeying the command of Allāh', or 'just', or 'proceeding on straight path'. The fact is that the word is of a general nature which could be interpreted in any of the above meanings. But the mention of the Book and of their good deeds makes it certain that it has been used here in the meaning of being standing or firm in belief and obedience.

'Ānā' ' (اَنَآء) is plural of 'inan' (اِنًي) or 'anan' (اَنًي) or reportedly 'anū' (اُنُو), all of which mean ''time''.

'al-Musāra'ah' (اَلْمُسَارَعَةُ = to vie with one another in hastening); it is on paradigm of 'al-mufā'alah' (اَلْمُفَاعَلَةُ) from the root verb 'as-sur'ah' (اَلسُّرْعَةُ = to be fast, to make haste). It is explained in Majma'u 'l-bayān

as follows: ‘‘The difference between as-sur‘ah and ‘al-‘ajalah’ (اَلْعَجَلَةُ) is as follows: as-Sur‘ah is to go ahead in a matter in which going ahead is allowed; it is a praiseworthy trait, and its opposite is ‘al-ibṭā’ (اَلْاِبْطَآءُ = to be late) which is a disliked action. And al-‘ajalah is to go ahead in a matter in which one should not go ahead; it is a disliked trend, and its opposite is ‘al-anāh’ (اَلْاَنَاةُ = deliberateness) which is a good trait.

Apparently, as-sur‘ah is an attribute of movement, while al-‘ajalah shows an attribute of the one who moves.

‘al-Khayrāt’ (اَلْخَيْرَاتُ) means good deeds in general — be it worship, or spending in the way of Allāh, or justice or looking after the needs of needy persons. It is a plural with prefix ‘al’ (اَلْ) which denotes comprehensiveness. It is mostly used for monetary good deeds, as its singular ‘al-khayr’ (اَلْخَيْرُ = good) is mostly used for wealth and property.

In these verses, Allāh has enumerated most of the basic good attributes, i.e., belief, enjoining the good and forbidding the evil, and hastening towards good deeds; then He has praised them that they are among the good people. It means that they are the people of the straight path, and among the companions of the prophets, the truthful ones and the martyrs. Read, for proof, the following verses: Guide us to the straight path, the path of those upon whom Thou hast bestowed favours, not of those inflicted with Thy wrath, nor of those gone astray (1:6 — 7); in conjuction with: And whoever obeys Allāh and the Messenger, these are with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favours from among the prophets and the truthfuls and the martyrs and the good ones; and excellent are these as companions (4:69).

It has been said that the verses under discussion refer to ‘Abdullāh ibn Salām and his companions.

QUR’ĀN: And whatever good they do, they shall not be denied it: ‘‘Lan yukfarūh’’ (لَنْ يُكْفَرُوهُ = they shall never be denied it); the root word is ‘al-kufrān’ (اَلْكُفْرَانُ = ungratefulness) which is opposite of ‘ash-shukr’ (اَلشُّكْرُ = gratefulness). Allāh will reward them for whatever good they do, they will receive its recompense from Allāh, He will not let it be lost; He says: and whoever on his own accord does good, then surely Allāh is Grateful, Knowing (2:158). Also He says: and whatever good thing you spend, it is to your own good; ... and whatever good thing you spend shall be paid back to you in full, and you shall not be wronged (2:272).

QUR'ĀN: (As for) those who disbelieve, surely neither their wealth nor their children shall avail them ...: The continuation of context apparently shows that the phrase ''those who disbelieve'' refers to the other groups of the People of the Book which did not respond to the call of the Prophet; those were the people who used to hatch conspiracies against Islam and had left no stone unturned in extinguishing the light of the truth.

Some people have said that this verse refers to the idol-worshippers; according to them, it paves the way for the story of the Battle of Uḥud which comes after a few verses. But this explanation does not take into account the next statements, that is, and you believe in the Book (in) the whole of it, and when they meet you they say: ''We believe''... Obviously it describes the Jews' behaviour with the Muslims, not that of the idol-worshippers. It proves that the context is the same; it has not changed yet.

An exegete has tried to combine both explanations by applying the verse under discussion to the idolaters and the next one to the Jews. But it is a mistake.

QUR'ĀN: The likeness of what they spend ...: ''aṣ-Ṣirr'' (اَلصِّرُّ = intense cold). What they spend has been qualified with the proviso ''in this life of the world'' to indicate that they are completely cut off from the life of the hereafter; whatever they spend is related only to this life. The smitten tilth is qualified by the phrase ''of a people who have done injustice to their souls'' this proviso perfectly meshes with the coming statement, ''and Allāh does no injustice to them''.

The verse means that whatever they spend in this life (in order to better their conditions and achieve their evil goals) brings nothing to them except infelicity and unhappiness; it destroys what they ardently desire and which they think would bring happiness to them. It is like an intensely cold wind that smites the farm produce of an unjust people; it is because they had done injustice to their own selves — after all, an evil deed can bring only evil results.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! do not take for intimate friends from among others than your own people; ...: Intimate friend has been called 'al-biṭānah' (اَلْبِطَانَةُ = inner lining of a garment) — i.e., opposite of 'aẓ-ẓihārah' (اَلظِّهَارَةُ = outer side of a garment) — because such a friend knows the inner thoughts and secrets of man; ‘‘they do not fall short,’’ i.e., they leave no stone unturned; ‘khabālan’ (خَبَالاً = harm, mischief); insanity is called ‘al-khabl’ (اَلْخَبْلُ) because it harms or destroys understanding; ‘‘they love what distresses you’’: ‘‘what’’ in this sentence is for maṣdar, and it means: they love your distress, your grievous harm; ‘‘vehement hatred has already appeared from out of their mouths’’: it means that their enmity and hatred is very obvious from their way of talking, from slips of their tongues; it is a fine metaphor; the verse does not describe what they have kept hidden in their hearts, it just says: ‘‘and what their breasts conceal is greater still’’; this apparent vagueness indicates that the hatred hidden in their hearts is so varied and so great that it is beyond description — this vagueness puts even greater stress on the word ‘‘greater’’.

QUR’ĀN: Lo! you are they who will love them while they do not love you,... Allāh knows what is in the breasts: Apparently ‘ūlā’i’ (اُولاَء = they, these) is demonstrative pronoun, and ‘hā’ (هَا = lo!) is exclamatory particle, and between the two has been inserted the pronoun ‘‘you’’; the meaning thus will be, ‘you these’, as we say ‘Zayd this did so’, or ‘Hindah this did so’.

The article ‘al’ (اَلْ = the) in ‘‘the Book’’ denotes genes, i.e., you believe in all the Books which have been revealed by Allāh — your Book as well as their Books — while they do not believe in your Book.

The clause ‘‘and when they meet you they say: ‘We believe,’ ’’ shows that they are hypocrites; ‘‘and when they are alone, they bite the ends of their fingers in rage against you’’: ‘al-‘aḍḍ’ (اَلْعَضُّ = to bite forcefully); ‘al-anāmil’ (اَلْاَنَامِلُ) is plural of ‘al-unmulah, (اَلْاُنْمُلَة = fingertip); ‘al-ghayẓ’ (اَلْغَيْظُ = rage, wrath, anger); to bite fingertips against something proverbially expresses one’s anger or sorrow on that thing.

The clause ‘‘Say: ‘Die in your rage,’ ’’ is a curse against them in the form of command. It connects the foregoing sentences to the next one ‘‘surely Allāh knows what is in the breasts’’. The meaning together will be as follows: ‘‘O Allāh ! cause them to die in their rage; surely Thou knowest what is in the breasts, that is, what is in their hearts or souls.’’

QUR’ĀN: If a good befalls you, it grieves them ...: ‘‘al-Masā’ah’’

(اَلْمَسَآئَةُ = to grieve) is opposite of 'as-surūr' (اَلسُّرُوْرُ = to make happy; happiness). The verse shows that the believers may protect hemselves only if they have patience and piety.

In the Name of Allāh,
The All-compassionate, The All-merciful

Praise belongs to Allāh, the Lord of all being;
the All-compassionate, the All-merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement;
Thee only we serve, and to Thee alone we pray for succour;
Guide us in the straight path;
the path of those whom Thou host blessed,
not of those against whom Thou art wrathful,
nor of those who are astray.

FOREWORD

1. al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī (1321/1904 — 1402/1981) — may Allāh have mercy upon him — was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān.

2. al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabātabā’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzān fī tafsīri ’l-Qur’ān which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allāmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzān because.we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustādh al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and its discussions.

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the seventh volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān. This volume corresponds with the first half of the third volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allāh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendixes included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of the English translation of al-Mīzān: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

* * * * *

We implore upon Allāh to effect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work which we have started. May Allāh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Heipr.

COMMENTARY

Now the discourse turns back to what the chapter had begun with: Warning the believers of the serious situation they were in; reminding them of Allāh's favours bestowed on them, that is, true belief, divine help and the fact that Allāh is sufficient for them; teaching them what would lead them to their noble goal; and guiding them to what would make them happy in this life and the hereafter.

It describes the battle of Uḥud. There are some verses referring to the battle of Badr, but they are like supplement inserted here for cross-reference, and as we shall explain later, they are not meant as main topic here.

QUR'ĀN: And when you did go forth early in the morning from your family to lodge the believers in encampments for war:''When'' in Arabic is adverb of time related to a deleted verb e.g. ''Remember'' or similar verbs; ''ghadawta'' (غَدَوْتَ) translated here as ''you did go forth early in the morning'' is derived from al-ghadw (اَلْغَدْوُ = to come out early in the morning); at-tabw'ah (اَلتَّبْوِئَةُ) means to prepare a place for someone, or to put him in a place; maā'id (مَقَاعِدُ) is plural [of مَقْعَد = seat; translated here as encampment). Ahl (اَهْل) of a man, according to ar-Rāghib, are those who are joined to him in geneology or house or other such things like religion, town or handicraft. Thus ahl of a man refers to his wife and all those who are in his house, like wife, child, servant, etc.; also it denotes all who are related to him like his family or clan; residents of a town or followers of a religion are called ahl of that town or religion; artisans and masters of a handicraft are called ahl of that art or handicraft. The word ''ahl'' is used for masculine and feminine both; also for singular and plural alike. Its use is exclusively reserved for human beings; ahl of a thing are the people related to it exclusively.

''Ahl'' of the Messenger of Allāh are therefore the people exclusively related to him. Here it refers to a group — not to a single person. It may be understood from the expression, ''you did go forth early in the morning from your family '', because it may be said, ''You went forth from your relatives and your group''; but it cannot be said, ''You went forth from your wife'' or ''from your mother''. An exegete mistakenly has thought that ahl refers to singular only, and therefore has had to say that there was some word deleted (but understood) from the verse; according to him the verse means, ''did go forth ... from the house of your family'' . But as you have seen nothing in this verse demands such interpretation.

The preceding and following verses are addressed to the believers as a group. But the verses under discussion turn from plural to singular; they are addressed not to the believers but to the Messenger of Allāh alone. Apparently this diversion has some connection with the shade of displeasure found in the verses dealing with this battle; there is an undercurrent of reproach, censure and stricture running throughout for what the Muslims had done [in the battle of Uḥud] where they had shown cowardice and lack of will-power and courage. Therefore, whenever a topic comes which exclusively concerns the Prophet, Allāh ignores and disregards the believers and speaks to the Prophet alone. Thus Allāh says: And when you did go forth early in the morning from your family; When you said to the believers: ''Does it not suffice you that your Lord should assist you ...''; You have no concern in the affair; Say: ''Surely the affair is wholly (in the hands) of Allāh'' [3:154]; Thus it is due to the mercy from Allāh that you deal with them gently, and had you been rough, hardhearted, they would certainly have dispersed from around you [3:159]; And reckon not those who are killed in Allāh's way as dead [3:169].

In all the above verses plural verbs and pronouns have been changed to singular. It seems as though the speaker is not in a mood to continue the preceding style [of speaking to the whole community] because he is very much annoyed and displeased with them.

It is unlike some other verses coming in between where effectiveness and sharpness of admonition depended on direct talk with the believers and therefore the plural was used. For example: And Muḥammad is no more than a messenger, the messengers have already passed away before him; if then he dies or is killed, will you turn back upon your heals? [3:144]; When you ran off precipitately and did not turn towards any one, and the Messenger was calling you from your rear [3:153].

Also it is unlike another intervening verse, that is: Certainly Allāh conferred a benefit upon the believers when He raised among them a Messenger from among themselves, reciting to them His communications [3:164]. Here Allāh describes His favour on the believers of sending the Prophet to them; and it could be effective and more impressive only if it was supposed as if the Prophet himself were not present there. Ponder on all these verses and you will appreciate the relevance of what we have written.

The verse under discussion means as follows: O Prophet, remember when you did go forth early in the morning from your family in order that you should place the believers in their sectors for war; and Allāh is Hearing (He had heard what was said there) and Knowing (He had known what was hidden in their hearts). The expression, ''you did go forth early in the morning from your family'', indicates that the battle-ground was nearer to the Prophet's house. It clearly shows that the two verses refer to the battle of Uḥud, and in this way they are related to other verses which would follow later and which describe the battle of Uḥud. All these verses fit the events which had taken place in Uḥud.

This shows the weakness of the claim that these two verses were revealed about the battle of Badr, or, as someone else said, about the battle of the Confederates. And it is obvious [from the context].

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh is Hearing, Knowing: He is Hearing, He had heard what was spoken there; and Knowing, He knew what was hidden in their hearts. It indicates that some Muslims had spoken there some [undesirable] things, and there were other things which they had not disclosed to others.

Apparently the next clause, ''When two parties from among you had determined that they should show cowardice'', is related to these two attributes, [i.e., Allāh heard and knew the conspiracy and intention of the two parties when they had determined to show cowardice.]

QUR'ĀN: When two parties from among you had determined that they should show cowardice, and Allāh was the guardian of them both: ''al-Hamm'' (اَلْهَمُّ = what you determine in your heart; intention); al-fashl (اَلْفَشْلُ = weakness with cowardice).

''and Allāh was the guardian of them both'': This is a circumstantial clause, related to the verb, ''had determined''. It is meant as an admonition and reproof, as is the concluding sentence, ''and in Allāh should the believers trust''. The connotation is as follows: The two parties had determined to show cowardice although Allāh was their guardian — and a believer should not show weakness and cowardice when he believes that Allāh is his guardian and when he is supposed to entrust all his affairs to Allāh, and whoever trusts in Allāh then He is sufficient for him.

This explanation shows the weakness of an interpretation offered by an exegete who says: This intention of the two parties was merely a thought, a notion, not a determination, because Allāh has praised them and said that He was their guardian. Had it been a firm determination and intention, they should have been blamed rather than praised.

But I do not understand what he means when he says that it was merely a thought, a notion. Does he mean merely a passing thought, a knowledge what cowardice means? If so, then everyone present there knew the meaning of cowardice, and it makes no sense to mention it in this context; nor is it called ''determination'' in Arabic language. Or, does he mean knowledge of cowardice coupled with some intention; a notion with determination to act upon it? [If so, then it was not merely a thought or a notion.] Also, the verse shows that the condition of the two parties was obvious to the others; had it been merely a passing thought without showing any effect on their behaviour, others would not have known that they had determined to show weakness and cowardice. Moreover, the reminder that Allāh was their guardian and that the believers must put their trust in Allāh, dove-tails with firm determination, not with a passing thought. And in any case, we have explained that in the present context, the clause, ''and Allāh was the guardian of them both'', is not intended as a praise, it is a reproof, an admonition.

Perhaps this misunderstanding has sprung up from a tradition attributed to Jābir ibn 'Abdillāh al-Anṣārī, in which he says: ''(This verse) was revealed about us; and I would not prefer if it were not revealed, because Allāh has said, and Allāh was the guardian of them both.'' The said exegete probably thought that Jabir had taken the clause as a praise.

Even if the said tradition be accepted as correct, Jābir's theme is different from what that exegete has thought. Jābir means that Allāh then accepted their belief and confirmed that they were believers, because He counted Himself as their guardian, and Allāh is the guardian of those who believe, and as for the unbelievers their guardians are the rebels. Jābir does not mean that this clause implies any praise, when it has been put in this contact of clear reprimand and censure.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh did certainly assist you at Badr when you were weak; fear Allāh then, that you may give thanks: The context obviously shows that this verse has been revealed here as a supporting evidence to emphasize the stricture, to complete the reproof. If so, then this too would be a circumstantial clause, like the preceding one, ''and Allāh was the guardian of them both.'' Its connotation then would be as follows: You should not have determined to show cowardice while Allāh had certainly assisted you at Badr when you were weak. On the other hand, it might be an independent sentence revealed here to remind them of the wonderful assistance provided to them at Badr, when Allāh had sent down the angels to help them when they were weak.

Allāh mentions here the help sent by Him to them at Badr, and compares their present condition with that; and it is known that whoever becomes strong, does so only with Allāh's help and His assistance, because man, per se, has nothing except neediness and weakness. That is why Allāh says: ''when you were weak''.

It many be understood from the above that the statement, ''when you were weak'', does not disagree with such other divine words as, and to Allāh belongs the might and to His Messenger and to the believers [63:8], because the believers' might springs from the might of Allāh, as He says: Then surely all might is for Allāh [4:139]; and it proceeds from the divine help given to the believers, as Allāh says: And certainly We sent before you messengers to their people, so they came to them with clear arguments, then We gave the punishment to those who were guilty; and helping the believers is ever incumbent upon Us [30:47]. In this situation if we look at the condition of the believers, per se, they have got nothing except weakness.

Apart from that, if we look at the believers' condition in Badr, we shall have to admit that they were certainly weaker in comparison to the strength, might and elan the polytheists had had. And there is no difficulty in ascribing a relative weakness to otherwise mighty ones. Allāh has ascribed it to a people whom He has praised very extensively, when He says: ... then soon Allāh will bring a people that He shall love them and they shall love Him, humble (adhillah, اَذِلَّةٍ = lit: weak) before the believers, mighty against the unbelievers ... [5:54].

QUR'ĀN: When you said to the believers: ''Does it not suffice you that your Lord should assist you ... ''al-Imdād'' (اَلْاِمْدَادُ) is derived from al-madd(اَلْمَدُّ) and signifies giving al-madad (اَلْمَدَدُ = help) continuously.

QUR'ĀN: ''Yea! if you remain patient and are on your guard (against evil), and they come upon you in a headlong manner ... '': ''Balā'' (بَلٰي = Yea) is used for affirmation; al-fawr and al-fawrān (اَلْفَوْرُ،اَلْفَوْرَانُ) means to boil; they say, fāra 'l-qidr (فَارَالْقِدْرُ = the cooking-pot boiled up) ; then the word was used to denote hurry and haste. Thus the phrase, min fawrihim hādha (مِنْ فَوْرِهِمْ هٰذَا = translated here as, in a headlong manner) means, 'at once'; 'immediately'.

Obviously, the promise refers to the battle of Badr. It is a conditional promise, and the conditions are given in these clauses, ''if you remain patient and are on your guard and they come upon you in a headlong manner''.

An exegete has written that it is a promise to send down the angels if they came upon the believers (not ''immediately'', i.e. not on the day of Badr, but) after the immediate time, i.e. after the battle of Badr. Another one has written that it is a promise to send down the angels in all the battles after the Badr, like Uḥud, Ḥunayn and the Confederates. But the wording of the verse does not agree with it.

As for Uḥud, there is obviously nothing in the verses that might allude to coming of the angels on that day. So far as the battles of the Confederates and Ḥunayn are concerned, the Qur'ān, of course, says [in other places] that the angels were sent on those days: It says about the battle of the Confederates: ... when there came down upon you hosts, so We sent against them a strong wind and hosts that you saw not ... [33:9]. And it says about the day of Ḥunayn: ... and on the day of Ḥunayn ... and sent down hosts which you did not see ... [9:25 — 26]. Nevertheless, the wording of the verse under discussions, ''Yea! if you remain patient and are on your guard (against evil) and they come upon you in a headlong manner'', does not show any general promise.

There is no conflict between this verse which speaks of three thousand angels being sent down at Badr, and the statement of the chapter of al-Anfāl, which says: ... so He answered you: ''I will assist you with a thousand of angels following (after others)'' [8:9]. The word, ''following'', indicates that they would follow others — the ''others'' referring to the remaining two thousand who would complete the number promised in this verse.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh did not make it but as good news for you, ... and help is only form Allāh, the Mighty, the Wise: The pronoun ''it'' refers to the help. 'Ind (عِنْد = near) is an adverb of place, indicating presence. Initially it was used for nearness and presence in place; obviously it was reserved for physical things. Then its circle widened and it was used for nearness in time. Finally it was used for general, and even spiritual, nearness. The Qur'ān has used it in various connotations.

The theme of the statement, ''and help is only from Allāh, the Mighty, the Wise'', when seen in conjunction with the preceding words, ''And Allāh did not make it but as good news for you, and that your hearts might be at ease thereby'', implies that the phrase, min 'indi 'llāh (مِنْ عِنْدِاللهِ = lit: from near Allāh) refers to that ''station'' of Lordship which every affair and every order emanates from; and without which nothing can suffice, nor can any cause be independent of it. The meaning therefore is as follows: The helper angels have in fact no concern with the promised help; they are merely apparent causes — they bring to you good news and satisfaction of heart. The reality of help is from Allāh, nothing can suffice from Him; He is Allāh, the final destination of every thing; the Mighty Who cannot be subdued, the Wise Who is not unaware of any thing.

QUR'ĀN: That He may cut off a portion from among those who disbelieve, or abase them ... and chastises whom He pleases; and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful: ''That'' is related to the verb, ''And Allāh did certainly assist you at Badr''. [He assisted you so that He may cut off ...]. 'Cutting off a portion' metaphorically means decreasing their number and debilitating them with slaying and imprisoning, as had happened at Badr where seventy idolworshippers were killed and seventy arrested. al-Kabt (اَلْكَبْتُ = to abase, to exasperate).

The clause, ''You have no concern in the affair'', is a parenthetic one. It emphasizes the proposition that the authority of cutting off a portion from, or abasing them, is entirely in the hand of Allāh; the Prophet has no concern in this matter — that they should praise and acclaim him if they vanquished and defeated their enemy, and should blame him and remonstrate with him if things went against them; they should not be infirm and grieving, as they had done on the day of Uḥud — as Allāh has narrated.

The next clause, ''whether He turns to them (mercifully) or chastises them'', is in conjunction with the preceding, ''That He may cut off ...'', and the sentence is continuing. The next verse, ''And whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's'', is explicative clause describing why the matter of repentance and forgiveness rests exclusively in the hand of Allāh. The meaning is as follows: The sound arrangement [at Badr] were made by Allāh in order that He might cut off a portion of the polytheists through slaughter and imprisonment, or abase them and disappoint them of attaining what they had desired, or that He might turn to them mercifully or chastise them. As for the cutting off a portion of them and abasing them, it is because all affairs are in His hands, you have no concern in it, (so they should neither praise nor blame you in this affair); and as for repentance and forgiveness, it is because Allāh is the Owner of everything, He forgives whom He pleases and chastises whom

He pleases. Even then, His forgiveness and mercy surpasses His chastisement and anger, because He is Forgiving, Merciful.

We have treated the sentence, ''And whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's'', as explaining the reason for the preceding two clauses (whether He turns to them [mercifully] or chastises them), because the concluding clauses specifically explain this matter: ''He forgives whom He pleases and chastises whom He pleases.''

The exegetes have described other ways to show the connection of the words, ''That He may cut off a portion ...'', and the significance of conjunction in the words, ''whether He turns to them or chastises them''; also, they have given other justifications for the words, ''You have no concern in the affair'', and for the sentence, ''And whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's''. We have ignored them as there was no use of commenting upon them, because they go against the apparent meanings and the context of the verses. Anyone wanting to see them should consult other bigger commentaries.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The cause of the battle of Uḥud was as follows: When the Quraysh returned from Badr to Mecca — and it had befallen to them from slaughter and imprisonment what had befallen, because seventy of them were killed and seventy imprisoned — Abū Sufyān said: 'O people of Quraysh! Do not let your women weep on your dead, because if tear is shed it would remove the grief and (lessen) the hatred of Muḥammad.' And when they fought the Messenger of Allāh on the day of Uhud, they allowed their women to weep and lament; and they proceeded from Mecca with three thousand horse and two thousand foot and brought their women with them.

''When the news reached the Messenger of Allāh, he gathered his companions and exhorted them to fight. 'Abdullāh ibn Ubayy ibn Salūl said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! Do not go out of Medina, so that we fight in its alleys; thus even a weak man, a woman, a slave-boy and a slave-girl would fight on the entrances of the lanes and on the roofs; because never did any people (who attacked us) defeat us when we were within our fortresses and homes; and never did we go out to meet an enemy of ours but they vanquished us.'

‘‘Then Sa‘d ibn Mu‘ādh and others from the tribe of Aws stood up and said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! Never did anyone from the Arabs have any ambition against us while we were polytheist worshipping idols; how can they then be emboldened against us and you are among us? No: (we shall not rest) until we go out to them and fight them; whoever then among us will be killed shall be a martyr, and whoever among us is saved will have fought in the way of Allāh.’

‘‘So, the Messenger of Allāh accepted his advice and came out with a group of his companions, fixing their places at the battle-ground; as Allāh says: And when you did go forth early in the morning from your family ... But ‘Abdullāh ibn Ubayy ibn Salūl and a group of Khazraj who followed his opinion, held back from [the Prophet].

‘‘The Quraysh appeared at Uḥud. The Messenger of Allāh had positioned his companions — they were seven hundred men — and lodged ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr with fifty archers at the mouth of the mountain-pass; [the Prophet] was worried that the [enemy] might ambush from that side. Therefore, he said to ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr and his companions: ‘If you see that we have defeated them until we have pushed them inside Mecca, you should not leave this place; and if you see that they have overcome us until they have pushed us into Medina, you should not leave [here], but stick to your posts.

‘‘Abū Sufyān hid khālid ibn Walīd with two hundred horse with this [very idea of] ambush, and said to him: ‘When you see that we [two forces] have mixed together, you come over to them from this mountain-pass, so that you will be [attacking them from] behind them.’

‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) mobilized his companions; and gave the standard to the Commander of the faithful (‘Alī - a.s.). The Helpers attacked the polytheists of the Quraysh, and [the enemy] suffered an ignominious defeat. The companions of the Messenger of Allāh laid hold of the masses of the [Quraysh]. Khālid ibn Walīd came with his two hundred horse over ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr; but they confronted them with arrows, and Khālid retreated. The group of ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr saw the companions of the Messenger of Allāh looting the masses of the enemy; they said to ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr: ‘Our companions are taking away (all) the booty; should we remain without any booty?’ ‘Abdullāh told them: ‘Fear Allāh, because the Messenger of Allāh had indeed directed us not to leave our post.’ But they did not listen to him, and began slinking away one by one, until they left their station unattended, and ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr was left there with (only) twelve men.

‘‘The standard of the Quraysh was in the hand of Ṭalḥah ibn Abī Ṭalḥah al-‘Abdī (from Banū ‘Abdu ’d-Dār); ‘Alī (a.s.) killed him; then Abū Sa‘īd ibn Abī Ṭalḥah took the standard and ‘Alī killed him. The standard fell down. Then Musāfi‘ ibn Abī Ṭalḥah took it but ‘Alī killed him too — until he killed nine people from Banū ‘Abdu ’d-Dār. Finally their standard was taken up by a black-slave of theirs, Ṣawāb by name. ‘Alī reached him and cut off his right hand; he took the standard in his left hand; ‘Alī struck at it and cut it off too, but he embraced it to his chest with his two amputated hands. Then he turned towards Abū Sufyān and said: ‘Have I absolved Banū ‘Abdu ’d-Dār from blame?’ Then ‘Alī struck at his head and killed him. The standard fell down; then Ghamrah bint ‘Alqamah al-Kināniyyah took and raised it.

‘‘Khālid ibn Walīd came down to ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr — and his companions had fled leaving him with a few persons. [Khālid] killed [all of] them at the mouth of the pass, and then attacked the Muslims from behind. Quraysh were fleeing away when they saw their standard raised again, and they gathered around it, and the companions of the Messenger of Allāh suffered utter defeat. They started climbing the mountains helter-skelter.

‘‘When the Messenger of Allāh saw the rout, he removed the helmet from his head and called (them, saying): ‘Come to me; I am the Messenger of Allāh; come to me; where are you running away from Allāh and His Apostle?’ Hind bint ‘Utbah was in the middle of the (Quraysh’s) army; whenever any Qurayshite fled, she offered him a kohl-stick and a kohl-container, telling him: ‘You are but a woman, better use this kohl.’

‘‘Ḥamzah ibn ‘Abdi ’l-Muṭṭalib was attacking the enemy. When they saw him, they fled; none stood against him. Hind had promised Waḥshī that if he killed Muḥammad or ‘Alī or Ḥamzah, she would give him so-and-so much. (Waḥshī was an Ethiopian slave of Jubayr ibn Muṭ‘im.) Waḥshī said: ‘As for Muḥammad, I was unable (to harm) him; and as for ‘Alī, I found him on his guard, always looking (all around him), so there was no hope of getting at him; therefore, I decided to ambush Ḥamzah. I saw him knocking the people down, destroying them. Then he passed by me, stepped on an undercut bank of a stream and fell down; I took my spear, shook it (taking aim) and threw it to him; it pierced his waist and came out between his legs (pubic region); then I went to him, ripped his stomach open, took out his liver and brought it to Hind; I said to her, ‘‘This is Ḥamzah’s liver.’’ She put it into her mouth trying to chew it. But Allāh made it in her mouth like a knee-cap, so she took it out and threw it.’ (The Messenger of Allāh [s.a.w.a.] said: ‘Allāh sent an angel who took it and returned it to its place.’) Waḥshī said: ‘Then I came (back) to him, and I cut his genitals, removed his ears and amputated his hands and legs.’

‘‘There remained no one with the Messenger of Allāh except Abū Dujānah Simāk ibn Kharashah and ‘Alī. Whenever any group attacked the Messenger of Allāh, ‘Alī faced them and repulsed them; (it continued) until his sword was broken; then the Messenger of Allāh gave him his sword, Dhu ’l-Fiqār. The Messenger of Allāh retired to a side of Uḥud and stood there; and ‘Alī continued fighting them so (valiantly) that he had got seventy wounds on his head, face, body, belly and legs — as narrated by ‘Alī ibn Ibrāhīm in his at-Tafsīr. Thereupon, Jibrīl said: ‘Verily, this is indeed the support, O Muḥammad!’ Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) replied; ‘Surely he is from me and I am from him.’ Jibrīl said: ‘And I am from you two.’ ’’

Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh looked at Jibrīl (sitting) on a golden chair between the heaven and the earth, and he was saying: ‘There is no sword except Dhul ’1-Fiqār, and there is no hero except ‘Alī.’ ’’ (Majma‘u ’l-bayān) al-Qummī narrates: ‘‘There (also) remained with the Messenger of Allāh Nasībah bint Ka‘b al-Māziniyyah — and she used to go with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) in his battles to treat the wounded — and her son was with her. He wanted to retreat and go back (to Medina); but she attacked him and said: ‘O my son, where are you fleeing from Allāh and His Messenger?’ Thus she made him come back. Then a man attacked and killed him,. Thereupon, she took her son’s sword and attacked that man, and striking at his thigh she killed him. The Messenger of Allāh said (to her): ‘May Allāh bless you, O Nasībah.’ She was protecting the Messenger of Allāh with her chest and breasts until she was extensively wounded.

‘‘Ibn Qamī’ah attacked the Messenger of Allāh; and he had said: ‘Show me Muḥammad. May I be damned if he gets away (from me).’

Then he hit [the Messenger of Allāh] on his shoulder and cried: ‘I have killed Muḥammad, by al-Lāt and al-‘Uzzā.’ ’’ (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: There are some other traditions about the events of Uḥud, some of them disagree with this one in some details. For example:

a) This tradition gives the number of the polytheists as five thousand, while most of the traditions say three thousand.

b) It says that it was ‘Alī (a.s.) who killed all the nine standard-bearers of the enemy. Other traditions support it; and Ibnu ’1-Athīr has narrated it in his history, al-nil, from Abū Rāfi‘. But another group of narrations attributes slaying of some of them to some others. But meditation on these events supports what the present tradition says.

c) It says that it was Hind who made a covenant with Waḥshī regarding the murder of Ḥamzah. Some Sunnī narrations say that it was not Hind but Waḥshī’s master, Jubayr ibn Muṭ‘im, who had entrusted this task to Waḥshī, promising to emancipate him on his slaying Ḥamzah. But the fact that Waḥshī had taken Ḥamzah’s liver, not to Jubayr, but to Hind, supports the present tradition.

d) This tradition says that all Muslims had fled away, except ‘Alī and Abū Dujānah. It is agreed upon by almost all traditions. But some other narrations add some more names, and if you add all the names it would appear that there had remained about thirty persons with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). But those traditions cancel each other. If you ponder on the events and the circumstantial evidence, the truth will become clear to you. You should not forget that these stories and traditions are a sort of witness for various tendencies — for and against — and have passed through many bright and dark strata before reaching us.

e) This tradition says that Allāh sent an angel who returned Ḥamzah’s liver to its place. This statement is not found in most of the traditions. A different version is found in some other narrations. For example, (the author of) ad-Durru ’l-manthūr, narrates from Ibn Abī Shaybah, Aḥmad and Ibn al-Mundhir from Ibn Mas‘ūd, inter alia, in a ḥadīth that he said: ‘‘Then Abū Sufyān said: ‘There was some mutilation of the people [i.e: of Muslim martyrs], although it was not done by the majority of us. Neither I ordered it nor forbade it; neither I liked it nor disliked it; neither it pleased me nor displeased me.’ ’’ [Ibn Mas‘ūd] said:

‘‘Then they looked, and there was Ḥamzah with his belly ripped open. Hind took his liver and chewed it, but she could not eat it. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) asked: ‘Did she eat any part of it?’ They said: ‘No.’ [The Messenger of Allāh] said: ‘Allāh could not allow any part of Ḥamzah to enter the Fire.’ ’’

Traditions, both ours and others’, say that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was seriously wounded that day; there was skull fracture in his forehead, and his incisors were broken and middle incisor damaged ...

Ibn Isḥāq, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr and Ibn al-Mundhir narrate from Ibn Shahāb, Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyā ibn Ḥayyān, ‘Āṣim ibn ‘Amr ibn Qatādah and al-Ḥaṣīn ibn ‘Abdi ’r-Raḥmān ibn ‘Amr ibn Sa‘d ibn Mu‘ādh and others — all have narrated some of the events of the battle of Uḥud: They have said: ‘‘When Quraysh suffered on the day of Badr, and the scattered remnants of their army reached Mecca, and Abū Sufyān too returned with his trade-caravan, then ‘Abdullāh ibn Abī Rabī‘ah, ‘Ikrimah ibn Abī Jahl and Ṣafwān ibn Umayyah together with some other Qurayshites (whose fathers, sons and/or brothers were killed in Badr), went to him. They talked with Abū Sufyān and all those who had any trade-goods in that caravan and suggested [as follows]: ‘O people of Quraysh, surely Muḥammad has aggrieved you and killed your best personalities. Therefore, help us with this wealth to fight against him, in order that we may take revenge of our casualties from him.’ They did so. Then the Quraysh resolved to fight the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and came out with the flower of their army. They also took their women with them for their protection and also in order that they would not flee (from the battle-ground). Abū Sufyān came out at the head of the army. They proceeded until they came down at ‘Aynayn — a mountain in the depth of as-Sanjah on a canal in the valley adjoining Medina.

‘‘When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and the Muslims heard about the polytheists that they had come down where they did, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘I have seen (in dream) a cow slaughtered, and saw the tip of my sword jagged, and saw that I had put my hand in an invulnerable coat of mail, and I interpreted it (to mean) Medina. Therefore, if you think (it advisable), you should stay inside Medina and leave them where they have come down; then if they stayed (there) they would be staying in the worst place, and if they entered [our City] we should fight them in it.'

''The Quraysh occupied their position at Uḥud on Wednesday, and stayed there on Thursday and Friday. The Messenger of Allāh proceeded after praying the Friday-prayer and reached the mountain-pass of the Uḥud. The two [forces] met on Saturday, 15th Shawwal, the third year [of hijrah].

''Abdullāh ibn Ubayy agreed with the opinion of the Messenger of Allāh that they should not go out to meet the enemy; and the Messenger of Allāh disliked going out of Medina. But some Muslims — some from among those whom Allāh later honoured with martyrdom in Uḥud, and some others who had missed the battle of Badr and were not present on that occasion — said: 'O Messenger of Allāh, come out with us against our enemies, so that they should not think that we were afraid of them or felt weaker.' 'Abdullāh ibn Ubayy said: 'O Messenger of Allāh, stay inside Medina and do not go out to meet them. Because, by God, we never went out of it to meet an enemy of us but he bested us, and never did an enemy enter Medina to fight us but we vanquished them. Therefore, let them be, O Messenger of Allāh; then if they stayed they would stay with difficulty; and if they entered [the City] even the women, children and men would fight them with stones from above [the roofs]; and if they returned, they would return disappointed as they had come.'

''But the people were still urging the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) [to proceed out of Medina] — these were the people who wanted to fight against the enemy. [This continued] until the Messenger of Allāh entered [his house] and wore his cuirasses — and it was on Friday after the prayer — then he came out to [the companions]. In the meantime the people regretted [their persistence] and said [to the Prophet]: 'We have compelled the Messenger of Allāh and it was not good of us. Thereore you may sit back if you wish.' The Messenger of Allāh said: 'It is not proper for a prophet — once he has put on his cuirasses — to remove them without waging the war.'

''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) came out with one thousand of his companions. When they were proceeding between Medina and Uḥud, 'Abdullāh ibn Ubayy went back with one-third of the people, [leaving the Prophet]. The Messenger of Allāh proceeded on. When he was passing through the story-field of Banū Ḥārithah, a horse whisked its tail which caught the sword-tip [of the rider] and pulled it out. The Messenger of Allāh (who liked good omens but did not believe in bad ones) said to the owner of the sword: ‘Gather your sword, because I find that swords will surely be drawn today.’ The Messenger of Allāh went on until he came down at the mountain-pass of the Uḥud from the run of the valley to the mountain. He kept Uḥud at his back, and took position for the battle — and there were seven hundred persons with him.

‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) gave the command of the archers — and they were fifty in number — to ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr, and said to him: ‘Protect us from the mountain [side] by arrow, so that they do not come to us from our behind; you stay at your place, no matter the battle goes against us or for us; [because] we shall be attacked from your side.’ The Messenger of Allāh was wearing two coats of mail.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibn Jarīr narrates from as-Suddī in a ḥadīth, enter alia: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) proceeded to Uḥud with one thousand men. He had promised them victory if they would remain patient. Then ‘Abdullāh ibn Ubayy returned back with three hundred persons. Abū Jābir as-Salamī persued them to call them back; but they thwarted his efforts and said to him: ‘We do not know how to fight; and if you listen to us you too should come back [to Medina] with us.’ ’’ (ibid.)

as-Suddī said about the words: When two parties from among you had determined that they should show cowardice: ‘‘They were Banū Salmah and Banū Ḥārithah who wanted to return when ‘Abdullāh ibn Ubayy went back, but Allāh protected them; and the Messenger of Allāh remained with seven hundred men.’’ (ibid.)

The author says: These were two clans from among the Helpers: Banū Salmah from the Khazraj and Banū Ḥārithah from the Aws.

Ibn Abī Isḥāq, as-Suddī, al-Wāqidī, Ibn Jarīr and others have narrated: ‘‘The polytheists reached Uḥud on Wednesday in Shawwāl, 3 A.H., and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) proceeded to meet them on Friday; and the battle took place on Saturday, 15th Shawwāl. The incisors of the Messenger of Allāh were broken and his face was wounded. Then the Emigrants and the Helpers returned after fleeing away; and seventy of the Muslims were martyred. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) stood firm accompanied by those who had remained with him until he removed [the enemies]. The polytheists had mutilated a group [of martyrs], but Ḥamzah was mutilated worst of all.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The author says: There is a great number of traditions about the events of Uḥud. We have narrated, and shall narrate later, only a few of them, on which depends understanding of the verses revealed on this subject. These verses throw light on its various aspects:

Some deal with the cowardice of those who retreated or disagreed with each other or wanted to return to Medina cowardly.

Others admonish and censure those who had fled leaving the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) in the thick of the battle — although Allāh had forbidden them to do so.

Still others praise those who were martyred before the others had fled, and those who bravely stood firm and did not leave the Prophet, and continued to fight till their last breath.

Lastly, there are verses extolling those who steadfastly continued to fight till the end of the battle but were not martyred.

COMMENTARY

The verses call to the good and restrain from the vice and evil. Yet they are not without some connection with the preceding and following verses dealing with the battle of Uḥud. They describe some undesirable conditions and reprehensible traits which were found in the believers at that time and which Allāh was not pleased with. It were such things which had made them vulnerable to weakness and infirmity and led them to disobedience of Allāh and His Messenger. The verses thus focus on the events of Uḥud from another angle.

Also, the verses guide the believers as to how they can protect themselves from these devastating entanglements and ruinous obstacles; they invite them to piety, fear of Allāh and trust in Him and exhort them to be firm in obedience of the Allāh's Messenger. These nine verses therefore contain exhortation and warning: they awaken in the believers longing to hasten towards good, that is, spending in the way of Allāh in ease as well as in straitness, restraining their anger and forgiving the people's faults; all is joined together under the heading of spreading good in the society, patience in face of grievance and injury, and refraining from repaying evil with evil. It is the only way of preserving the society and making it strong and energetic. Refraining from interest is a very important concomitant of this spending benevolently and doing good to others. That is why the verses begin with it; it paves the way for exhortation to good-doing and spending. We have already explained — under the verses of spending and interest in the chapter of The Cow — that spending in all its aspects is the cornerstone of society; it is the virtue that vitalizes the human society with the spirit of unity; it channels its scattered resources to achieve happiness and felicity in this life, and strengthens it to ward off every pernicious perversion. Interest is diametrically opposed to benevolent spending in this respect.

Allāh exhorts them to these virtues. Then He encourages them to return to their Lord again and again even if they have committed sins and errors; they should not lose hope of His mercy even if they have done something which is not liked by Him; they must repent and seek pardon from Him repeatedly without indolence or negligence.

By doing good to others and returning to Allāh in time and again, they would proceed on the straight path of happy life; they will never go astray nor will they stop at any dangerous point.

This Qur'ānic description is the best way for guiding man to perfect himself when he finds some defects in his life; the finest means of curing spiritual ailments which sometimes creep into otherwise good souls and threaten man with downfall and ruin.

QUR'ĀNIC TEACHING: HOW IT JOINS KNOWLEDGE WITH PRACTICE

The Qur'ān uses a special method for its divine teachings. During the whole period of twenty-three years when it was revealed, it demonstrated all the basic principles through practical primary elements. When the audience put it in practice, the resulting picture was used as the primary element for teaching the next higher principle. At this stage, if there were any defects in the result of the first practical test, they were corrected and the good components were reused; the bad elements were condemned and the good and correct ones praised and their doer was promised success and accorded appreciation. The Mighty Book of God is a Book of knowledge and practice — it is not a book of theories and hypotheses, nor a mysterious tome to be accepted blindly.

This Divine Book is like a teacher. The teacher puts before his students academic principles without giving them too much detail in the beginning; then he tells them to act upon it [doing practical tests, or solving mathematical problems]; then he checks what they have done and analyses its correct and wrong procedures; he explains to them where they have gone wrong, where they have strayed from the right path, admonishing them [to be careful in future] and threatening [to punish them if the same mistake happened again]; he praises where they have used right procedure and arrived at correct result; he promises them of reward and appreciates their diligence. Then he tells them to do it again. He goes on training them until they reach the point of perfection and their efforts are always crowned with success.

What we have just said, is among the Qur'ānic realities which may be seen by anyone who meditates on the initial stages of Qur'ānic teachings. Take the subject of jihād, for example. First it describes the basic principles of jihād: Fighting is enjoined on you ... [2:216]. It enjoins the believers to fight in the way of Allāh; then it comments on the events of Badr and throws light on its various aspects giving them further guidance; then it takes up the story of Uḥud, then of another battle, and so on. Likewise, Allāh tells the stories of previous prophets and their peoples, and after showing the truth behind them, turns them into lessons to be learnt, and code of life to be followed. There are some verses within these sets which are based on the same principle. For example: ''therefore travel in the earth and see what was the end of the rejecters'' [3:137]; And how many a prophet has fought with whom were myriads of godly men ... [3:146].

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! Do not devour interest ... that you may be shown mercy: We have explained how ''devouring'' is used for ''taking''. The phrase, ''making it double and redouble'', points to overriding characteristic of interests; interest, per se, multiplies and increases the lender's wealth many-fold — by depleting debtor's money adding it to the creditor's capital.

The sentence, ''And guard yourselves against the fire which has been prepared for the unbelievers'', indicates that the interesttaker is unbeliever, as has been explained under the verses of interest in the chapter of The Cow: And Allāh does not love any ungrateful sinner [2:276].

QUR'ĀN: And hasten to forgiveness from your Lord, and a Garden ... ''al-Musāra'ah'' (اَلْمُسَارَعَةُ = to rush, to make haste); it is commendable in good deeds and reprehensible in bad ones.

The Qur'ān, in most of the places, joins forgiveness with the Garden. It is because the Garden is a place of purity and cleanliness; the impurities of sins and filth of vices cannot enter it, nor can a person tarnished by them — except after forgiveness and removal of that filth.

The forgiveness and the Garden — described in this verse — run parallel to what is mentioned in the following two verses. The forgiveness corresponds with the verse, ''And those who when they commit an indecency or do injustice to their souls ...''; and the Garden stands face to face with the verse, ''Those who spend (benevolently) in ease as well as in straitness ...''

The clause, ''and a Garden, the extensiveness of which is (as) the heavens and the earth'': ''al-'Arḍ'' (اَلْعَرْضُ = lit: width) denotes here spaciousness, extensiveness; it is a common usage; the expression metaphorically implies that it is spacious to the utmost, or to an extent that human imagination cannot reach it. Also, it has another meaning which we shall explain under the ''Traditions''.

The clause, ''it is prepared for the pious ones'', paves the way for description of the characteristics of the pious ones which is given in the coming verses. The main idea is to describe those characteristics of the believers which are relevant to the present situation, i.e., after the battle of Uḥud (when they had displayed, and suffered from, weakness and disobedience), because they were expected to participate in other similar battles and undergo similar situations, where they would be in great need of unity, harmony and solidarity.

QUR'ĀN: Those who spend (benevolently) in ease as well as in straitness, and those who restrain (their) anger, and forgive men; and Allāh loves the doers of good (to others): as-Sarrā' and aḍ-ḍarrā' (اَلسَّرَّآءُ وَ اَلضَّرَّآءُ = that which pleases man or displeases him) i.e., ease and difficulty. al-Kaẓm (اَلْكَظْم) literally means to tie the mouth of water-skin after filling it; then it was metaphorically extended to a man filled with anger or sorrow who restrains or suppresses his emotions. al-Ghayẓ (اَلْغَيْظُ = translated here as ‘‘anger’’) denotes stirring of feeling of revenge, when one faces many unpleasant things; it is different from al-ghaḍab (اَلْغَضَبُ = generally translated as ‘‘wrath’’) which refers to the intention of revenge or punishement. That is why we say ‘‘Allāh afflicted them with His wrath’’, but do not say, ‘‘Allāh was angry with them’’.

The sentence, ‘‘and Allāh loves the doers of good (to others)’’, indicates that the preceding characteristics define ‘‘the doers of good’’, i.e., to other people. As for doing good in relation to Allāh is concerned, it is defined in the following verse: ... and as good news for the doers of good. Surely those who say, Our Lord is Allāh, then they continue on the right way, they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve. These are the dwellers of the Garden, abiding therein: a reward for what they did [46:12 — 14].

The doing of good, mentioned in the verse under discussion, is delineated by the preceding words, ‘‘Those who spend (benevolently) in ease as well as in straitness ...’’; these good characteristics have no value in the eyes of Allāh if they were not done ‘‘for Him’’, as has been described in many preceding verses, e.g.: The likeness of what they spend in this life of the world is as the likeness of wind ... [3:117].

The above reality may also be inferred from ch. 29, vr. 69: And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them onto Our way; and Allāh is most surely with the doers of good. One may be said to be striving hard only if one does something against one’s desires and natural instincts. It may happen only when a man firmly believes in matters which demand such sacrifice and steadfastness in face of natural desires and longings. It requires firm faith and true belief — they must say, Our Lord is Allāh, and then continue steadfastly on it — and demands relevant action, i.e., they must strengthen this belief by striving in sincere worship of Allāh, spending benevolently in His way and living in the society with good conduct and irreproachable behaviour. It appears from it that doing good, means performing all actions in proper way by remaining firm and steadfast in the divine faith, in the belief in Allāh.

QUR’ĀN: And those who when they commit an indecency ... and excellent is the reward of those who act (righteously): ‘‘al-Fāḥishah’’ (اَلْفَاحِشَةُ = indecent, shameful action); it is generally used for fornication.

As the word, az-ẓulm (اَلظُّلْمُ = injustice) has been used parallel to indecency, it should denote all other big or small sins. Alternatively, if ‘‘indecency’’ is taken to mean big sins, then ‘‘injustice’’ would mean small sins only. The clause, ‘‘remember Allāh and ask forgiveness for their faults’’, indicates that the plea for forgiveness should emanate from remembrance of Allāh — it should not be just a verbal repetition, based on habit. The sentence, ‘‘and who forgives the faults but Allāh?’’, encourages man to return to Allāh, and reminds him to take refuge, and seek shelter, in Him. The proviso, ‘‘and (who) do not knowingly persist in what they have done ’’, is an essential part of asking forgiveness from Allāh. Persistence in sins distorts the psyche to such an extent that remembrance of Allāh does not bring any benefit to it; such behaviour shows that the person concerned gives no importance to divine command, dishonours the sanctity of religion and behaves arrogantly against Allāh; in such a situation neither servitude can survive nor remembrance can be of any use. For the same reason was added another proviso, i.e., ‘‘knowingly’’. This phrase indicates that ‘‘injustice’’ (in the preceding clause) includes small sins too; persistence in sins — whether big or small — shows disregard to the divine command, indifference towards His authority. The phrase, ‘‘what they have done’’, therefore covers big as well as small sins, and refers to the indecency and injustice mentioned in the beginning of the verse: but small sin is not included in indecency, therefore it is injustice to one’s soul indeed.

Their great reward is described in the next verse, ‘‘(As for) these — their reward is forgiveness from their Lord, and gardens ... ’’ It is the same things which the believers are exhorted to hasten to: ‘‘And hasten to forgiveness from your Lord and a Garden ...’’ Looking at this beginning and end, it may be seen clearly that they have been enjoined to hasten to spending benevolently, restraining their anger, forgiving the people and asking forgiveness for their faults.

QUR’ĀN: Indeed there have been examples before you; therefore travel in the earth and see what was the end of the rejecters: ‘‘as-Sunan’’ (اَلسُّنَنُ) is plural of as-sunnah (اَلسُّنَّةُ = the way or tradition followed by the society). The believers have been told to travel in the earth, in order that they could learn lessons from archeological remains of ancient people and bygone generations. They should ponder about those pharaohs and nimrods, those kings and emperors — where did all of them go to? Their towering palaces, their accumulated treasures, their gilded thrones and their fully-equipped armies — nothing could avail them in the least; now they are just a few names to serve as examples and lesson for those who meditate, and as tourist attraction for the carefree and oblivious persons.

As for protecting their monuments, preserving their statues and endeavouring to find out how great they were in their times and how magnificent their splendour was in that era, it is a matter which the Qur'ān does not care about. It is nothing but idolatry in a new disguise. We shall explain this topic, God willing, in a separate discourse in which we shall analyse the meaning of idolatry.

QUR'ĀN: This is a clear statement ... for the pious ones: The classification looks at the degrees of its effect. It is just a clear statement, a faithfully transmitted message for some people, while for others it is an admonition and guidance.

TRADITIONS

The Prophet was asked about the words, a Garden, the extensiveness of which is (as) the heavens and the earth. ''If the extensiveness of the Garden is as the heavens and the earth, then where will the Fire be?'' He (s.a.w.a.) said: ''Glory be to Allāh ! When the day comes, where does the night go?'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated in, ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, from at-Tanūkhī that [the Byzantine Emperor] Heraclius had written to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) a letter in which, inter alia, he had asked about this verse, and the Prophet had replied it as described above. He has also narrated through another chain from Abū Hurayrah that someone asked the Prophet this question and he replied as above.

The above reply has been interpreted as follows: The Fire is in the Knowledge of Allāh as night remains in the Knowledge of Allāh when day comes.

COMMENT: If it means that the Fire is not away from the Divine Knowledge, then it does not solve the problem, because the question was about the place of the Fire, not about the Knowledge of Allāh. If, on the other hand, it means that possibly there could be another place for the Fire beyond the heavens and the earth, then it might be tenable, but then the comparison of the Garden and the Fire with day and night would be out of place — because the night does not go out of the heavens and the earth when the day comes. Obviously this interpretation does not offer an acceptable explanation of the ḥadīth.

I believe that the tradition points to another theme: The hereafter (with all its felicity and infelicity) is similar to this world with all its happiness and sorrow. Likewise, the man in the hereafter will be the same man who was in this world — as appears from the Qur'ān and traditions. Nevertheless, the system governing the hereafter will be different from the ones permeating this world. The hereafter is the place of eternity and infinity, while this world is transitory and evanescent. That is why man would eat and drink, marry and enjoy all comforts of the Garden but would not undergo the consequences attendant to those enjoyments in this world. In the same way, man would burn in the fire of the Hell and suffer pain and agony in food and drink, abode and companions, yet would not be affected by it in the way he would have been in this life. In the hereafter, he would live eternal life without being affected by middle or old age or becoming senile or decrepit. It is because these effects and concomitants are products of the system of this world; they are not essential parts of every system — they would not be found in the next world's system. It is this world, not the hereafter, which is the place of conflict and struggle, contrast and contradiction.

Now ponder on our own observation of the events. When we look at current happenings, we cannot see the previous events; if we see the night, then the day is absent from us. But nothing is absent from Allāh; past, present and future — all is present before Allāh, and there is no contrast or contradiction between them on that level. It means that the day and the night and their concomitant events contradict and cancel each other when they are governed by material system and movement. But when the same day and night and their concomitants are put under another system, there remains no contrast and contradiction among them. It may be inferred from the words of Allāh: Have you not considered (the work of) your Lord, how He extends the shade? And if He had pleased

He would certainly have made it stationary; then We have made the sun an indication of it, Then We take it to Ourselves, taking little by little [25:45 — 46].

If it is possible in contradictory things like day and night, it may equally be possible for the heavens and the earth to house the Garden equal in size to themselves and then accomodate another thing like the Hell of the same size; it will be possible, not under this worldly system, but according to the system prevailing in the hereafter. There may be found similar expressions in traditions. For example: ‘‘Verily grave is an orchard from the orchards of the Garden, or a pit from the pits of the Fire.’’ Or, ‘‘The grave of a believer is widened for him to the extent of his sight.’’

In the same way should be explained these words of the Prophet. Otherwise, if it is taken to mean that Allāh is not oblivious of the night when He knows the day, it would not dovetail with the question. Likewise, if it were to mean that the night exists somewhere else when the day comes, it would invite another objection: The night cannot co-exist with the day at any place; and if we look at its reality then the night is a conic shade of the earth resulting from the sunlight — the light and shade rotating around the earth. Thus the day and the night are continuously revolving around the earth — without one merging into, or cancelling, the other.

There are other traditions of similar style. For example, it has been narrated about the Qur’ānic words: That Allāh may separate the impure from the pure ... [8:37]: ‘‘When the sun sets, where does this light, spread on the earth, go?’’ We shall explain it later on.

It has been narrated in, ad-Durru ’l-manthūr, about the words: and those who restrain (their) anger and forgive men: al-Bayhaqī has narrated from ‘Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn (a.s.) that a slavegirl was pouring water on him in preparation for prayer. The pitcher fell from her hand on his face contusing it. He raised his head (looking) at her. She said: ‘‘Verily Allāh says: ‘and those who restrain (their) anger.’ ’’ He said: ‘‘I have restrained my anger.’’ She recited: ‘‘and forgive men.’’ He said: ‘‘Allāh has forgiven you.’’ She recited: ‘‘and Allāh loves doers of good (to others).’’ He said: ‘‘Go, you are free.’’

The author says: It is narrated also from the Shī‘ī chains. The tradition obviously shows that the Imām (a.s.) interprets ‘‘good-doing’’ as something more than the preceding two virtues, and in fact it is so in its general terms, although the above virtues are concomitants of good-doing, and possibly they may be used for defining the ‘‘good-doing’’.

There are very numerous traditions on good manners and virtuous conduct, e.e., spending benevolently, restraining anger and forgiving faults, narrated from the Prophet and the Imāms of the Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.); we shall quote them later in a more appropriate place.

It is narrated from ‘Abdu ’r-Raḥmān ibn Ghanm ad-Dawsī that the verse, And those who when they commit an indecency ..., was revealed about Bahlul, the grave-digger. He used to dig graves [to steal shrouds]. Once he dug the grave of a girl from the Anṣār, took out her body and removed her shroud. She was beautiful and of fair complexion; so the Satan tempted him and he committed fornication with her. Then he felt remorse and came to the Prophet, but he turned him out. Then the people dissociated from him; and he too secluded himself from others, spending his time in worship and repentance in some mountains of Medina — until Allāh accepted his repentance and revealed this verse about him. (al-Majālis, aṣ-Ṣadūq)

The author says: It is a detailed tradition which we have abridged here. If it is a correct ḥadīth, then it would be a separate cause for the verse’s revelation apart from the general reason which covers all the verses of the story of Uḥud.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said concerning the words, and (who) do not knowingly persist in what they have done: ‘‘Persistence is that a sinner commits a sin and does not ask Allāh for forgiveness nor does he make up his mind to repent — so that is persistence.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

Aḥmad has narrated from the Prophet that he said: ‘‘Iblīs said: ‘O Lord, by Thy Honour! I shall not cease leading children of Adam astray as long as their souls shall remain within their bodies.’ Allāh then said: ‘By My Honour! I shall go on forgiving them as long as they ask Me for forgiveness.’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘There is no small (sin) with persistence, and there is no big (sin) after seeking (Allāh’s) forgiveness.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The same Imām (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a ḥadīth: ‘‘... and there is in the Book of Allāh a deliverance from ruin, an insight from blindness, and a healing for what is in the breasts; (found) in what Allāh has enjoined you to seek (His) forgiveness and to repent. Allāh says: ‘And those who when they commit an indecency or do injustice to their souls remember Allāh and ask forgiveness for their faults — and who forgives the faults but Allāh? — and (who) do not knowingly persist in what they have done.’ And He says: And whoever does evil or acts unjustly to his soul, then asks forgiveness of Allāh, he shall find Allāh Forgiving, Merciful’ [4:110]. So this is what Allāh has enjoined about asking (His) forgiveness, and has put with it the condition of repentance and refraining from what Allāh has forbidden. (It is) because He says: ‘To Him do ascend the good words and the good deed lifts them up’ [35:10]. This verse implies that the plea of forgiveness is not lifted up to Allāh except by good deed and repentance.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: The Imām (a.s.) has inferred abstinence from sin and not repeating it after repentance from the word, do not knowingly persist; likewise the fact, that repentance and plea of forgiveness require good deed afterwards, has been inferred from the generality of ‘‘good words’’ in the verse, To Him do ascend the good words.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘When the verse, And those who when they commit an indecency ..., was revealed, Iblīs ascended a mountain in Mecca, Thawr by name, and screamed very loudly to his afreets. They all gathered near him and said: ‘O our leader, why have you called us?’ He said: ‘This verse has been revealed; now who would deal with it?’ An afreet from among the ratans stood up and said: ‘I will see to it with such and such means.’ (The Iblīs) said: ‘You cannot do it.’ Then another (afreet) stood up and said something similar (to the first one) and (Iblīs) said: ‘You are not for it.’ Then the Whispering Slinking (satan) said: ‘I shall deal with it. [Iblīs] said: ‘By what means?’ He said: ‘I shall promise them and tempt them until they would commit a sin; and when they have committed it, I would make them oblivious of asking for forgiveness.’ [Iblīs] said: ‘You are [fit] for it.’ Then he entrusted this task to him upto

the Day of Resurrection.'' (al-Majālis, aṣ-Ṣadūq)

The author says: This tradition has also been narrated through Sunnī chains.

COMMENTARY

The verses, as you see, complete the talk which had begun with the words, O you who believe! ... [3:130], while those verses with their orders and prohibitions had paved the way for these which contain the main purpose including command, prohibition, praise and stricture.

QUR'ĀN: And be not infirm, and be not grieving, and you shall have the upper hand if you are believers: ''al-Wahn'' (اَلْوَهْنُ), according to ar-Rāghib, is infirmity and weakness in body or character. Here it refers to their weakness of will-power, carelessness in establishing the religion and lack of courage in face of its enemies. al-Ḥuzn (اَلْحُزْنُ = grief) is opposite of al-farḥ (اَلْفَرْحُ = joy, happiness); it afflicts a man when he loses a favourite possession, or something which he thinks belongs to him.

The words, ''and you shall have the upper hand if you are believers. If a wound has afflicted you (at Uḥud), a wound like it has also afflicted the (unbelieving) people'', indicate that the believers had felt infirmity and grief because they had seen themselves afflicted by wounds and found the unbelievers gaining upper hand. Although the polytheists could not get total victory over the believers, nor the battle ultimately ended with the believers' decisive defeat, yet what had afflicted them was really hard and painful — martyrdom of seventy of their brave warriors. Add to it the humilitation that they had been overwhelmed on their own ground. All these factors together had caused extreme dejection and pessimism. The clause, ''and you shall have the upper hand if you are believers'' (which stands as the reason of these two prohibitions), shows that the prohibition was related to actual infirmity and grief, not to some expected behaviour in future.

The promise, ''you shall have the upper hand'', is general and unrestricted, but it is followed by the proviso, ''if you are believers''. It therefore gives the following meaning: You should not be weak in your will-power, nor should you grieve for the lost victory, if you are true believers. It is because belief is bound to give you upper hand over your enemies — belief is accompanied by piety and patience, and these two are the basis of victory and triumph. As for the wound which has afflicted you in this battle, you are not alone in it; the unbelievers too had suffered similar casualties. If you think it over, they have not gained over you in any way. Therefore, you should not feel depressed or grieved.

The address had started with the words, O you who believe; yet their gaining upper hand has been made conditional on their being believers. It implies that although the masses were not devoid of faith and belief, they had not adhered to the concomitants and requirements of that belief, like patience and piety; otherwise it would have brought out the desired effects.

This phenomenon is found in every group which is composed of people having different grades of belief; while there are some true believers, there are some of weak faith and yet others of sick hearts. This type of talk creates enthusiasm in believing souls, admonishes and revives the weak ones and censures and reprimands the hearts ailing with hypocrisy.

QUR'ĀN: If a wound has afflicted you (at Uḥud), a wound like it has also afflicted the (unbelieving) people: ''al-Qarḥ'' (اَلْقَرْحُ) is used for effect of an external wound, while al-qurḥ (اَلْقُرْحُ) denotes the effect of an internal wound like pimple or pustule. This difference has been given by ar-Rāghib. The word metaphorically refers to all the calamities that had befallen the Muslims on the day of Uḥud; it looks at the whole Muslim community as a single body which had received a wound inflicted by the enemy — the wound referring to the martrydom of the martyrs and injuries of the injured, and the tragedy that victory slipped through their fingers.

The sentence, ''If a wound had afflicted you ... and destroy the unbelievers'', gives the reason of the command, ''And be not infirm, and be not grieving''; as does the sentence, ''and you shall have the upper hand if you are believers''

The difference between the two sets of reasons is as follows: The sentence, ''and you shall have the upper hand if you are believers'', corrects their misconception. They had become disheartened and pessimistic because they thought that the polytheists had gained upper hand. Allāh points out to them that it is they, not the polytheists, who have got the essential prerequisite of victory 'if they are believers'; and Allāh had already declared: and helping the believers is ever incumbent on Us [30:47].

The second reason describes the condition of the two parties — the believers and the polytheists — or explains the underlying rationale, that is, the invarying Divine practice to turn the fortunes among men.

QUR'ĀN: and We bring these days to men by turns: ''al-Yawm'' (اَلْيَوْمُ = day) is a considerable span of time that is necessary for an occurrence — thus its duration would differ from occurrence to occurrence. Generally it is used for the period between sunrise and sunset. Often it is used for kingdom, reign, power, etc., putting the time in place of the thing covered by it. They say, 'day of this group', 'day of such and such dynasty', i.e., their precedence and rule over others; sometimes it denotes the period itself. It is this connotation which is meant in this verse. al-Mudāwalah (اَلْمُدَاوَلَةُ = taking of a thing by many people one after another).

The sentence thus means: It is an invariable practice of Allāh that He rotates these days among men by turns; these are not restricted to any one group nor prevented from another people; this system is based on common benefits only a part of which may be comprehended by your minds.

QUR'ĀN: and that Allāh may know those who believe and take witnesses from among you ... eradicate the unbelievers: The conjunction ''and'' joins it to a deleted clause; it was deleted to imply that human understanding cannot comprehend all of its aspects, it may know only a few features of it. What the believers would benefit from is mentioned in these two verses: ''that Allāh may know those who believe and take witnesses from among you; ... that Allāh may purge those who believe and eradicate the unbelievers.''

As for the words, ''that Allāh may know those who believe'', they imply manifestation of their belief after its being hidden. Allāh's knowledge of events and things is the same as their existence. The things are known to Allāh by their very existence. His knowledge is not like ours — because our knowledge and perception come through a form abstracted from the thing concerned. To say that Allāh wills to know a thing, is the same as saying that Allāh wills to bring it into being. In the verse under discussion, Allāh says, ''that Allāh may know those who believe''; the clause shows that there were believers already in existence; therefore, it would mean that He wished to make their belief manifest. As every thing in this world is governed by the system of cause and effect, it was necessary that some things should happen which would make the belief of the believers manifest after it was hidden. (Try to understand it.)

It is followed by the clause, ''and take witnesses from among you'' ash-Shuhadā' (اَلشُّهَدَآءُ) refers to the witnesses of deeds. The Qur'ān has never used this word for ''martyrs''. Its use in the meaning of ''those who are killed while fighting in the way of Allāh'' is a later usage, as we had explained under the verse, And thus We have made you a medium nation that you may be witnesses for the people ... [2:143]. Moreover, the word ''take'' which has been used here, is not very appropriate for the martyrs of the battlefield; it is not said' 'Allāh has taken Zayd as a martyr in His way'. But it is said: 'Allāh has taken Ibrāhīm as a friend'; or 'Allāh has taken Mūsā as one spoken to; or 'Allāh has taken the Prophet as a witness for giving evidence for his ummah on the Day of Resurrection'.

Significantly, Allāh has said, ''and take witnesses from among you'', instead of saying, take you as witnesses. Although verse 143 of the chapter of The Cow escribes witnessing to the ummah (And thus We have made you a medium nation that you may be witnesses for the people ...), but as we explained under that verse, it is a metaphorical use, ascribing to the whole; nation what in fact belongs to a particular group of the nation — it is not the whole ummah but only a few of them who will bear witness for the nation. This interpretation may possibly be supported by the ending clause, ''and Allāh loves not the unjust.''

Then comes the verse, ''And that Allāh may purge those who believe and eradicate the unbelievers. ''at-Tamḥīṣ'' (اَلتَّمْحِيصُ = to purge) denotes purifying something from extraneous pollutions. al-Maḥq (اَلْمَحْقُ = to eradicate, to efface) signifies gradual depletion of a thing, eradicating it bit by bit. The said purification is one of the benefits of rotating the days among the people. It is separate from the above-mentioned benefit that Allāh may know the believers. Distinguishing a believer from an unbeliever is one thing, and purifying his belief from pollutions of disbelief, hypocricy and immorality is another. That is why it has been put side by side with eradication of the unbelievers. Allāh removes the ingradients of disbelief from a believer's character little by little until nothing remains there but the belief, pure and unsullied; and likewise He eradicates ingradients of disbelief, polytheism and deceit from the unbeliever bit by bit, until all is destroyed.

These are some of the reasons why Allāh brings the days to men by turn, and why power does not remain confined to a particular group forever; and all affairs belong exclusively to Allāh, He does whatever He pleases; and He does not do except that which is most suitable and most beneficial [to His creatures]; as He says: thus does Allāh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it remains in the earth [13:17]. Also, He has said shortly before the verses under discussion: That He may cut off a portion from among those who disbelieve, or abase them so that they should return disappointed of attaining what they desired. You have no concern in the affair whether He turns to them (mercifully) or chastises them, for surely they are unjust [3:127 — 8]. Allāh has denied here that His Prophet had any authority in the affair, reserving that power exclusively to Himself ; He decides about His creatures as He pleases.

Look at the matters described in these verses: The days rotate among the people; it is done for the purpose of test and trial, in order that believers may be separated from unbelievers; believers may be purged and purified and unbelievers obliterated gradually. Add to it the declaration that the Prophet had no authority in this matter. All this together shows that a majority of the believers was under the impression that their being on the true religion was the complete cause of their victory — wherever they happened to fight. They thought that just because they were on truth, they must overpower the falsehood, no matter what their own condition; to them belonged all affairs, and they could not be deprived of it. They were further encouraged in this miscalculation when angels were sent to help them in Badr and they found themselves quite unexpectedly victorious over unbelievers.

But that was a misunderstanding which could nullify the system of test and purification; and that in its turn would negate the underlying rationale of command and prohibition, reward and punishment. That would lead to destruction of the foundation of religion. After all, divine religion is a religion of nature, it is not based on nullification of the customary procedure or of divine practice permeating the universe — the system that victory and defeat result from their normal causes.

After explaining that the days rotate among the people for their test and trial, Allāh now begins admonishing them for this serious misunderstanding of theirs, and explaining the real position to them.

QUR'ĀN: Do you think that you will enter the Garden ... while you look (at it): The misconception that they would enter the Garden without being tested, was an inseparable concomitant of the previously mentioned misunderstanding. They thought that because they were on truth and truth is not overwhelmed, they would always be victorious; that they would never be defeated, would never be vanquished. Obviously, if it were true, then every one who believed in the Prophet and entered into the believers' society, would find' felicity in this world through victory and booty, and felicity in the hereafter in the form of forgiveness and the Garden. Then there would be no difference between the felicity in the hereafter in the form of forgiveness and the Garden. Then there would be no difference between the appearance of belief and its reality, no distinction between various ranks [of belief and piety]; the belief of a fighter and that of a patient fighter would be of the same value; a man who intended to do a good deed and actually did it when its time came, would be equal to him who intended but turned on his heels when faced with it.

Accordingly, the words, ''Do you think that you will enter ...'', have metaphorically put the effect in place of the cause. The complete meaning therefore is as follows: You thought that power is reserved for you; you would not be put to test, rather you would enter the Garden without going through a trial to separate the deserving from underse.rving, to distinguish believers of highter ranks from those of lower grades.

The next verse demonstrates that that thinking was wrong. The words, ''And certainly you desired death before you met it, so indeed you have seen it (even) while you look (at it)'', show that they had desired death before arriving at the battlefield; but when the desired death came to them and they looked at it, they did not come forward to get what they longed for; instead they showed cowardice and fled away. How can it be possible for them to enter into the Garden merely because of that expressed desire without being tested, without any procedure of purification? Was it not necessary to test them [to separate the truth from the falsehood]?

It shows that there is a deleted clause near the end of the verse. The complete sentence would be as follows: So indeed you have seen it, yet you did not come forward to get it even while you looked at it. Another possible interpretation: You just looked at the death, i.e. without doing any thing to meet it. Thus ‘‘looking’’ would metaphorically imply not grappling with the death. It is a reproach and censure.

TEST AND ITS REALITY

There is no doubt that the Qur’ān exclusively reserves the guidance to Allāh. But according to the Qur’ān, it is not limited to the voluntary guidance leading to the felicity, and happiness of this world or the hereafter. Allāh says: ... Who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (to its goal) [20:50]. Everything is guided by Allāh — those endowed with cognizance and understanding as well as the others. Also, the verse has left the guidance unrestricted so far as the goal and destination is concerned. Also, He says: ... Who created, then made complete, and Who made (things) according to a measure, then guided (them to their goal) [87:2 — 3]. These verses too are unrestricted like the former.

Obviously, this [general] guidance is other than the special guidance which is used as opposite of misleading, leading astray. This special guidance has in several cases been negated, giving way to error and straying, but the general guidance cannot be negated or erased from any creature. Allāh says: and Allāh does not guide the unjust people [62:5]; and Allāh does not guide the transgressing people [61:5].

Also, it is obvious that this general guidance is separate from that guidance which merely points the way to the believer and the unbeliever alike. As Allāh says: Surely We have shown him the way: he may be thankful or unthankful [76:3]. And as to Thamūd, We showed them the right way, but they chose error above guidance [41:17]. The guidance, mentioned in these two and similar other verses, is reserved for those who have understanding and cognizance, while that mentioned in [20:50 and 87:2 — 3] ''then guided it'', and, ''Who made (things) according to measure, then guided'', is comprehensive and general in its subject as well as the goal.

Moreover, the latter verse bases the guidance on measuring; but the particular [voluntary] guidance does not mesh with measurement, i.e. preparation of causes in order to guide a thing to the goal of its creation. Although the voluntary guidance, being a part of the general system of this world, is also covered by divine measure, but here we are not looking at it from that angle.

However, this general guidance means that Allāh guides every thing to the perfection of its existence, and conveys it to the goal of its creation. It is because of this guidance that every thing longs for, and resorts to, its basic requirements, like growth and development, completion and perfection, movements and action, etc. (This topic needs further explantion; God willing, we shall write on it later on.)

The divine words prove that the things are driven to their destinations and goals by a general divine guidance; nothing is outside this guidance. Allāh has made it incumbent on Himself and He does not break His promise. He says: Surely on Us is the guidance, and most surely Ours is the hereafter and the former [92:12 — 13]. Added to the previously mentioned two verses, this verse too, in its generality, covers collective guidance for the societies as well as the individual guidance.

It is a right of the things on Allāh that He should guide them, creatively, to their destined perfection, and legislatively to their appointed perfection. You have seen in the discourse of the Prophethood, how legislation becomes a part of creation, and how it is encompassed by divine decree and measure. Human species has an existence which demands for its completion a series of voluntary actions; and those actions in their turn spring from ideological beliefs and practical cognizance. It is therefore necessary for man to live under some laws and rules, no matter whether those laws are good or bad, right or wrong. Accordingly, it was necessary for the Creator to prepare for him a series of orders and prohibitions (i.e. the Sharī'ah), and another chain of collective events and individual happenings. These events, inter-acting with those laws, shall bring man's potentials to fruition, turn his abilities into accomplishments. On reaching this stage, he shall be either happy or unhappy — the hidden secrets of his existence will be open. When this happens, then those events and that sharī'ah will be called for test or trial.

Whoever does not heed the divine call and thus becomes liable to infelicity, the word of punishment is proved true against him — if he continues in that condition. All the things that happen to him — which are covered by divine commandment and prohibition — and which bring his potential to accomplishment, add more to his infelicity and unhappiness, even if he considers himself pleased with his current condition and feels happy with himself. This apparent happiness is just a divine plan [to let him sink deeper into error]. Ultimately he will find his infelicity and unhappiness in the very thing which, he thought, was the source of his felicity and happiness; his failure will spring from what he mistook for his achievement. Allāh says: And they planned and Allāh (also) planned, and Allāh is the best of planners [3:54]; ... and the evil plan does not beset any save the authors of it ... [35:43]; ... that they may plan therein; and they do not plan but against their own souls, and they do not perceive [6:123]; ... We draw them near (to destruction) by degrees from whence they know not. And I grant them respite; surely My scheme is effective [7:182 — 183]. The conceited man, in his ignorance of divine schemes, brags of his disobedience and recalcitrance thinking that he has succeeded in going ahead against the divine commands — while in fact his every step fulfils the divine plan against him. Allāh says: Or do they who work evil think that they will escape Us? Evil is it that they judge [29:4]. The most wonderful word on this subject is found in the verse 42 of ch. 13: ... but all planning is Allāh's ...

All this planning, disobedience, injustice and transgression that these people indulge in against their religious responsibilities; all the events and happenings which they are faced with, and which serve to expose their hidden intentions, are all just a divine plan, a respite and a reprieve. They had a right on Allāh that He should guide them to the end of their affairs — and He has done it; and Allāh is predominant on His affairs.

When the same things are ascribed to the Satan, then [the terminology changes, and] various types of disbelief and disobedience are called Satanic misguidance; temptation towards them becomes Satanic call, his whispering, and his misleading inspiration; the events leading to that transgression are called Satanic embellishment and are regarded as his instruments, tools and traps. We shall describe it in the seventh chapter, God willing.

As for the believer in whose heart the belief is firmly rooted, whatever acts of obedience and worship are done by him and likewise the events occuring in his life that lead to those good deeds — they, in a way, deserved to be called divine help, Allāh's guardianship and His especial guidance. Allāh says: ... and Allāh aids with His aid whom He pleases ... [3:13]; ... and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers [3:68]; Allāh is the Guardian of those who believe; He brings them out of darkness into the light ... [2:257]; ... their Lord will guide them by their faith ... [10:9]; Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people ... [6:122]. These terms are used when these affairs are attributed to Allāh. If they are ascribed to the angels, then they are called angelic helping and strengthening. Allāh says: ... these they are in whose hearts He has impressed faith and whom He has strengthened with a spirit for Him [58:22].

One thing more: The general guidance begins with the first moment of a thing's creation and accompanies it to the last point of its existence — as long as it is proceeding on its return journey to Allāh. Likewise, it is being pushed on by the divine measure continuously, as is shown by the words, And Who made (things) according to a measure then guided (them to their goal) [87:3]. It is divine measures which cover the causes that govern a thing's existence, and it is the same measures which launch a thing progressively from one condition to the next and so on. Thus the measures constantly push the things forward.

As the measures drive them from behind, the appointed term (the last point of a thing's existence) pulls them from the front, as the divine words show: We did not create the heavens and the earth and what is between them two, save with truth and (for) an appointed term; and those who disbelieve turn aside from what they are warned of [46:3]. This verse ties the things with their final stage, i.e. the appointed terms. When one of the two related things dominates the other, then its relationship with the weaker partner is called attraction; and as the appointed terms are decisive and unalterable, they obviously pull and attract the things from the front.

Accordingly, every thing is encompassed by divine forces: There is a force to push it, another to pull it, and a third to accompany it and bring it up. These are the basic forces confirmed by the Qur'ān, apart from other forces which protect, watch over and accompany it like angels, satans and things like that.

Sometimes we arrange a thing's affairs in such a way as to ascertain whether it is fit for a certain purpose. It is called test or trial. Sometimes you do not know whether it is fit for the said purpose or not. At other times you know it but you want its hidden ability to be known to all. In both cases you oblige it to undergo certain relevant procedures — in order that by accepting or rejecting them, it may expose its hidden characteristics. This procedure is called test, trial or examination. This same meaning fits the divine managements. Allāh obliges rational creatures (like man) to follow the rules of the sharī'ah, and involves him into various happenings and events. All these [creative and legislative] impositions demonstrate the man's real worth, vis-a-vis, the purpose to which he is invited through religious call. And they are therefore called 'divine tests'.

But there is a difference between our test and the divine one. We generally do not know the hidden reality of the things; therefore when we conduct an examination, our real aim is to discern its hitherto unknown reality. But it is impossible for Allāh not to know, and with Him are the keys of the unseen. Therefore, when He examines us, His aim is to train us by calling us to good result and felicity. He, by such test and trial, demonstrates to one and all the reality of the person so examined, in order that it may be known to all what should be his destination, whether he should be sent to the place of good reward or to the abode of chastisement.

That is why Allāh has named such arrangements of His — legislating the sharī'ah and assigning visitation and tribulation — as test and examination. In some verses He has described the general rule: Surely We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment for it, so that We may try them (as to) which of them is best in deed [18:7]; Surely We have created man from a small drop of intermingled life-germ; We mean to try him, so We have made him hearing, seeing [76:2]; ... and We try you by evil and good by way of probation ... [21:35]. Some other verses give specific details. For example: And as for man, when his Lord tries him, then treats him with honour and makes him lead an easy life, he says: ''My Lord has honoured me.'' But when He tries him (differently), then straitens to him his means of subsistence, he says: ''My Lord has disgraced me'' [89:15 — 16]; Your possessions and your children are only a trial ... [64:15]; ... but that He may try some of you by means of others ... [47:4]; ... thus did We try them because they transgressed [7:163]; … and that He may test the believers by a gracious trial ... [8:17]; Do men think that they will be left alone on saying, We believe, and not be tried? And certainly We tried those before them, so Allāh will certainly know those who are true and He will certainly know the liars [29: 2 — 3]. Even for a prophet like Ibrāhīm, He says: And when his Lord tried Ibrāhīm with certain words ... [2:124]. He says regarding the sacrifice story of Ismā'īl: Most surely this is a manifest trial [37:106]; and says to Mūsā: ... and We tried you with (a severe) trying ... [20:40]. There are many verses of this connotation.

As you see, these verses prove that test and trial bestrides every thing related to man. It includes his existence and its various aspects like hearing, sight and life; the extraneous things that are somehow connected to him, like children, spouses, family, friends, possessions and prestige; and the things which he makes use of in one way or the other. The same is the case with their opposites, like death and all the troubles, hardships and misfortunes affecting a man. In short, the verses count every thing, affair and situation of the world, related in any way to man, as a test and trial pre-scribed by Allāh for him.

The verses also prove the generality of test as about the examinees. Each and every man has to undergo the test — be he a believer or unbeliever, a good man or bad, a prophet or someone else. It is an all-encompassing system and law, and none is exempted from it.

It appears from the above that the test is an established divine system, a practical procedure based on another creative system, i.e., the general divine guidance — as far as it is related to those creatures who are held responsible for their actions like man — together with the measure and the appointed term which precedes and follows it, respectively.

It shows that this system is not abrogateable, because its abrogation would be tantamount to undermining the creation itself — which is impossible. This reality is implied by the verses which say that the creation is with truth and that Resurrection is truth. Allāh says: We did not create heavens and the earth and what is between them two, save with truth and (for) an appointed term [46:3]; What! did you then think that We had created you in vain and that you shall not be returned to Us? [23:115]; And We did not create the heavens and the earth and what is between them in sport. We did not create them both but with the truth, but most of them do not know [44:38 — 39]; Whoever be hoping to meet Allāh, the term appointed by Allāh will then surely come [29:5]. There are many other verses of the same theme; and they prove that the creation is with the truth; it was not created in vain or without an aim, a goal. As all things are proceeding towards their destinations with truly appointed terms, pushed forward by true measures, and accompanied by true guidance, a general collision is bound to occur; and especially the persons held responsible for their actions are bound to be put to test; the test would involve them in such affairs which would bring their potentials — perfection and defect; happiness and unhappiness — into the realm of reality. This is what is called test and examination — so far as the man is obliged to follow the dictates of religion is concerned. (Try to understand it.)

The above discourse also clarifies the meanings of eradication and purge. When a believer undergoes test and trial, it separates his hidden virtues from vices; also when a group labours under difficulties, it sets the believers apart from the hypocrites — those in whose hearts there is a disease. Both these situations are called purge, that is, purification, distinction.

Likewise, when an unbeliever or a hypocrite — with apparently good characteristics and enviable conditions — is regularly put under the divine tests, it gradually brings out his hidden evil and vice; and whenever a bad charateristic comes to surface, it removes and obliterates an apparent virtue. This is what the Qur'ān calls eradication, i.e., gradual obliteration of his shallow virtues. As Allāh says: ... and We bring these days to men by turns, and that Allāh may know those who believe and take witnesses from among you; and Allāh loves not the unjust. And that Allāh may purge those who believe, and eradicate the unbelievers [3:140 — 141].

The unbelievers also face another type of eradication: Allāh informs us that the world is relentlessly driven towards the good of human beings when the religion will be purely for Allāh. The Qur'ān says: ... and the (good) end is for guarding (against evil) [20:132]; ... that the earth shall inherit it My righteous servants [21:105].

QUR'ĀN: And Muḥammad is no more than a messenger; the messengers have already passed away before him; if then he dies or is killed, will you turn back upon your heels? And whoever turns back upon his heels, he will by no means do harm to Allāh in the least; and Allāh will reward the grateful: Death is passing away, end of the body's life. Slaying or killing denotes death arising from extraneous cause — intentional or otherwise. When the words, 'death' and 'killing', are used separately, the 'death' signifies a general meaning which includes killing too; but when they are used side by side, then 'death' means natural death as opposed to killing. Turning back upon one's heels means returning. ar-Rāghib has said: ''They say, He turned back upon his heels, when he returns; 'he turns back upon his heels' is synonymous to 'it turns on its hooves'; also it is like the [Qur'ānic] words: so they returned retracing their footsteps [18:64], or the idiom, 'he went back to his origin'.''

Turning back on one's heels is dependent on the conditional clause, ''if then he dies or is killed''; it implies their apostasy — going out of religion — not merely retreating from the fight; because fleeing from battle-ground has no connection with death or martyrdom of the Prophet, while there is a clear relation between his death or martyrdom and people's renouncement of Islam for disbelief. Moreover, it was not only in Uḥud that they had fled away from the battlefield; they had done so in some other battles too like, Ḥunayn, Khaybar, etc.; but Allāh did not address them in such a severe tone, nor did He use such expression for their retreat. For example, He says regarding the battle of Ḥunayn: ... and on the day of Ḥunayn, when your great numbers made you vain, but they availed you nothing and the earth became strait to you notwithstanding its spaciousness, then you turned back retreating [9:25]. Therefore, it is clear that 'turning back upon your heels' in this verse means 'returning to your previous disbelief'.

The meaning of the verse — in its context of censure and stricture — is as follows: Muḥammad is but a messenger of God, like other messengers sent earlier by Him; his task is to convey the message of His Lord; he has no authority in the affairs; all the affairs are in the hand of Allāh, and the religion is His religion; it will continue with Allāh's authority — because Allāh is to preserve it. Why should then your belief depend on Muḥammad's life? Why should you behave as if your religion would not survive the Prophet? Why do you give rise to the assumption that if Muḥammad were to die or be killed you would run away from Allāh's religion, would return back on your heels to your previous disbelief? Will you go back to misguidance after finding the guidance?

This context provides a very strong proof that when the fighting became fierce on the day of Uḥud, the Muslims thought that the Prophet was killed, and they fled away from the battle-field. It confirms the reports of the traditions and history. For example, Ibn Hishām narrates in his as-Sīrah that Anas ibn an-Naḍr (uncle of Anas ibn Mālik) reached where 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb and Ṭalḥah ibn 'Ubaydillāh had gathered with other persons of the Emmigrants and the Helpers — and they had given themselves up. He asked: ''What is holding you back?'' They said: ''The Messenger of Allāh has been killed.'' He said: ''Then what will you do with life after him? Die on what the Messenger of Allāh has died on.'' Then he faced the (unbelieving) people, and fought them until he was martyred.

This retreat, this surrender, this giving themselves up, had only one meaning: Their belief depended on the Prophet; it would continue as long as he lived, and would disappear the moment he died. In other words, they wanted reward of this world for their belief, and it was this matter for which they were reprimanded by Allāh. This connotation is supported by the concluding clause, ''and Allāh will reward the grateful''. Note that the same clause has been repeated in the next verse, after the words, ''and whoever desires the reward of this world. We shall give him of it and whoever desires the reward of the hereafter, We shall give him of it.'' (Ponder on its significance.)

The clause, ''and Allāh will reward the grateful'', is a sort of exception — as the context shows; and it proves that among them there were a few who were grateful, who did not turn back on their heels nor did they retreat.

What is the reality of gratefulness? It is manifestation of the favour, display of the bounty. Its opposite is ungratefulness, which means hiding the bounty. How does one display a favour? It is done by using it in the place the donor had intended, in the way he would be pleased with, and to remember and mention the donor by tongue (and it is called praise) and heart (without forgetting him). For thanking Allāh for any of His favours and bounties, you should remember Him at the time of using it, and should use it in the way He is pleased with — without transgressing the limits. There is nothing in this world but it is a bounty from the bounties of Allāh; and He does not want us to use any of His bounties but in the way of His worship, in His obedience. He says: And He gives you of all that you ask Him; and if you count Allāh's bounties, you will not be able to compute them; most surely man is very unjust, very ungrateful [14:34].

Accordingly, His absolute thank — without any restriction — means to remember Him without forgetting Him, and to obey Him without disobeying Him. Allāh says: ... and be thankful to Me, and do not be ungrateful to Me [2:152]. It means as follows: Remember Me without polluting the remembrance with forget-fulness; and obey My command without spoiling it with disobedience. (The reader should not listen to him who says that it would oblige us to do something beyond our power. Such comment arises from not paying attention to these divine realities, from being distant from the plane of servitude.)

We have explained in previous volumes the difference between verb and adjective. The verb shows the active agent (the doer) doing the work — no matter how temporary, how transitory, his relation with that work may be. But an adjective shows permanent relation between the agent and the attribute; it implies that the attribute has become an inseparable characteristic of the man. There is a word of difference between the phrases, 'those who worshipped idols', 'those who were patient', 'those who did injustice', and 'those who transgressed', on one hand, and the adjectives, 'the idol-worshippers', 'the patient ones', 'the unjust', and 'the transgressors', on the other. Here, in the verse under discussion, Allāh has used the adjective, ''the grateful''; it refers to those in whom the attribute of gratefulness is firmly rooted, who have inseparable connection with this virtue. Also, we have described that absolute gratitude demands that man should never remember any thing — as every thing is a divine bounty — without remembering Allāh; and should not use anything — the divine bounty — except in His obedience. It is now clear that gratitude and thank cannot be complete except with total sincerity towards Allāh, with purification in knowledge and action. The grateful ones are those who are purified, sincere servants of Allāh — those in whom the Satan can have no hope, who are beyond the Sanatic designs and plans.

This fact is clear from the words of the Satan quoted in the Qur'ān: He (Satan) said: ''Then by Thy Might I will surely beguile them all, except Thy servants from among them, the purified one'' [38:82 — 83]; He said: ''My Lord! because Thou hast left me to stray, I will certainly make (evil) fair-seeming to them on earth, and I will certainly cause them all to go astray, except Thy servants from among them, the freed (purified) ones'' [15:39 — 40]. Note that Allāh did not refute this claim of the Satan. Again Allāh quotes him as saying: ''He said: 'As Thou hast caused me to go astray, I will certainly lie in wait for them in Thy straight path. Then I will certainly come to them from before them and from behind them, and from their right-hand side and from their left-hand side; and Thou shalt not find most of them thankful' '' [7:16 — 17]. The last clause is an implied exception that some of them shall be thankful. Here the adjective, ''purified'' has been changed to ''thankful''. It can only mean that it is the purified ones who shall be grateful, and on whom the Satan has got no hold. The Satan's design is to make man forget his Lord and to call him to sin and disobedience; [but he cannot ensnare the purified and grateful servants in this trap].

This explanation is further supported by a verse, coming later, which was revealed about this very battle: (As for) those of you who turned back on the day when the two armies met, only the Satan sought to cause them to make a slip on account of some deeds they had done, and certainly Allāh has pardoned them; surely Allāh is Forgiving, Forbearing [3:155]. Read it in conjunction with the end of the verse under discussion, ''and Allāh will reward the grateful'', and the end clause of the next verse, ''and We will reward the grateful''; and keep in mind that these clauses are a sort of exceptions. Think over these verses together and you will discover sublime realities.

But someone has given a really astonishing explanation. He thinks that the verse just quoted, ([As for] those of you who turned back ... only the Satan sought to cause them to slip ...) refers to the story which says that the Satan cried aloud on the day of Uḥud that Muḥammad was killed; and this cry made the believers lose their hearts and flee from the battle-ground. Looking at this explanation, in light of the one given by us, one is amazed as to how trivially they have treated the Book of Allāh, bringing it down from that height of reality and knowledge to such a lowly level.

The verse shows that there were a few believers on the day of Uḥud who did not show any weakness nor did they lose courage; nor did they give up the cause of Allāh. It is they whom Allāh calls ‘‘the grateful ones’’, and has confirmed that the Satan has got no power over them, nor has he any hope of ensnaring them. They have remained steadfast, grateful, not only in this battle; it is an inseparable characteristic of theirs, a deeply-rooted attribute. The Qur’ān has nowhere used the adjective ‘‘the grateful’’ in appreciation except in these two verses, that is, ‘‘And Muḥammad is no more than a messenger ... and Allāh will reward the grateful. And it is not for a soul to die ... and We will reward the grateful.’’ Yet, He has not mentioned in either place what their reward will be; this silence speaks a lot about its greatness and value.

QUR’ĀN: And it is not for a soul to die but with the permission of Allāh (according to) the term that is fixed; ... and We will reward the grateful: It is an adverse allusion to their talk about their slain brethren which is referred to in a forthcoming verse: O you who believe! be not like those who disbelieve and say of their brethren when they travel in the earth or engage in fighting: Had they been with us, they would not have died and they would not have been slain ... [3:156]; also it refers to the talk of a group among them: ‘‘Had we any hand in the affair, we would not have been slain here’’ [3:154]. It should be noted here that these people were from among the believers, not the hypocrites who had already left the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and had not participated in the fighting at all.

This talk of theirs implies that a person’s death was not dependent on Allāh’s permission, nor was it a decisive process emanating from firm divine decree. If such an idea were correct then it would negate the Kingdom of Allāh, nullify the precise divine arrangements. (We shall explain, God willing, in the beginning of the chapter of The Cattle, what fixation of the term means.)

It necessarily follows that those who had spoken such words, had accepted Islam becauses they thought that all affairs were in the hands of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and the believers. In other words, when they accepted Islam, their aim was to gain worldly benefits, as we have explained earlier. But those who desisted from such thoughts, their goal was the hereafter. That is why Allāh says: ‘‘and whoever desires the reward of this world, We shall give him of it, and whoever desires the reward of the hereafter, We shall give him of it.'' Here Allāh has said, ''We shall give him of it'', instead of saying, ''We shall give him it.'' It points to a fine distinction: Often man has some desires, but fails to provide total causes leading to the total desires, and consequently is not given all that he had desired. Therefore, if the causes conform with all the desires, he shall be given all desires; and if the causes agree with some of the desires, he will get only some of it. Allāh says: Whoever desires this present life, We hasten to him therein what We please for whomsoever We desire, then We assign to him the hell; he shall enter it despised, driven away. And whoever desires the hereafter and strives for it as he ought to strive and he is a believer; (as for) these their striving shall surely be thanked [17:18 — 19]. Also He says: And that there is not for man (aught) except what he strives for [53:39].

Thereafter, He has specially mentioned the grateful ones, excluding them from both groups; saying, ''and We will reward the grateful''. It is because they work only for the sake of Allāh, without looking at any thing of this world or the hereafter — as we have explained earlier.

QUR'ĀN: And how many a prophet has fought ... and Allāh loves those who do good (to others): ''Ka-ayyin'' (كَاَيِّنْ = how many), indicates great number; min (مِنْ = from), here is an explicative particle. ar-Ribbiyyūn (اَلرِّبِّيُّوْنَ), plural of ar-ribbī (اَلرِّبِّي), like ar-rabbānī (اَلرَّبَّانِي), denotes a divine person, someone who is exclusively attached to God. Also it is said that it is plural of rabā (رَبِي = thousand) and thus means, thousands. al-Istikānah (اَلْاِسْتِكَانَةُ = to submit, to abase oneself).

The verse contains advice, sermon and lesson with a shade of admonition, together with some encouragement to the believers to follow in those Godly men's footsteps, so that Allāh should give them the reward of this world and an excellent reward of the hereafter (as he had given those Godly men) and should love them for their good-doing, as He had loved them for it.

Allāh has described some of their words and deeds in order that the believers may learn lessons from it, and adopt it as their motto. Then they would not be afflicted with what had afflicted them on the day of Uḥud (where they were involved in undesirable words and deeds, which Allāh was not pleased with). If they followed those Godly men, then Allāh would join for them the rewards of both worlds as He had done for those Godly men.

Allāh has characterized the reward of the hereafter as ‘‘excellent’’; it points to its sublimity and high prestige in comparison to this world’s reward.

COMMENTARY

It is the continuation of the verses revealed about the battle of Uḥud. These verses exhort and encourage the believers to obey none except their Lord, because He alone is their Guardian and Helper; it calls them as witness that Allāh had fulfilled His promise to them, and the debacle and disaster which they suffered on that day was brought upon them by their own hands, because they had transgressed the limits of what Allāh had told them and His Messenger had invited them to; in spite of that Allāh has forgiven them of their sins because He is Forgiving, Forbearing.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! if you obey those who disbelieve ... He is the best of the helpers: It may possibly be inferred from the context that the unbelievers — after the battle of Uḥud, when these verses were revealed — were putting ideas in the believers' minds (just as ''friendly'' advice!) to hold them back from fighting and to incite strife and disunity among them, in order to create rift and division in the camp of Islam. This implication might probably get support from the verses 173 — 175 coming later: Those to whom the people said: ''Surely men have gathered against you, therefore fear them'' ... It is only the Satan that frightens his friends; so do not fear them, and fear Me if you are believers.

It has also been said that the verse alludes to the shouting by the Jews and the hypocrites on the day of Uḥud, ''Muḥammad has been killed; you should return to your families.'' But this explanation is nothing.

The verse first made it clear to the Muslims that if they obeyed the unbelievers and were inclined towards their friendship seeking their help, they would suffer a great loss, that is, they would turn back to infidelity, would become unbelievers themselves. Then it strikes at this idea by showing them the bright reality that ''Allāh is your Guardian and He is the best of the helpers.''

QUR'ĀN: We will cast terror into the hearts ... and evil is the abode of the unjust: It is a beautiful promise to the believers that Allāh will help them through terror and scare. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to mention ''scare'' among the special bounties which Allāh had reserved for him — not giving it to any other prophet. Such traditions have been narrated by both sects.

The clause, ''because they set up with Allāh that for which He has sent down no authority'', points to the fact that the polytheists set up such things as partners or colleagues for Allāh, which have got no authority, no proof for it. The Qur'ān repeatedly says that there is no authority, no proof, which could prove any partner or colleague for Allāh. Among many types of polytheism is the rejection of the Creator by saying that some thing other than Allāh — like time or matter — has caused the creation and goes on managing it.

QUR'ĀN: And certainly Allāh made good to you His promise, ... and Allāh is Gracious to the believers: ''al-Ḥass'' (اَلْحَسُّ = to extirpate by slaying).

The traditions unanimously say, and history records, that on the day of Uḥud, at first the believers overpowered the enemy and defeated them; they started slaughtering them and plundering their goods. But then most of the archers left their position at the mountain-pass, and Khālid ibn Walīd with his group attacked and slaughtered 'Abdullāh ibn Jubayr and the few archers who had remained with him. Now the way was clear for them to attack the believers from the rear — which they did. Seeing this, the fleeing polytheists turned back and put the Muslims to the sword, killing seventy of the companions and bringing utter defeat upon them.

Accordingly, the words, ''And certainly Allāh made good to you His promise'', affirms that Allāh's promise of help — on the condition that they should remain on guard and be patient — was certainly fulfilled; the clause, ''when you were extirpating them by His permission'', is applicable to the victory which Allāh gave to them to begin with on the day of Uḥud; and the next clause, ''until when you became weak-willed and disputed about the affair and disobeyed after He had shown you that which you loved'', may be pointing to what the archers had done; they disputed one with the other, an overwhelming majority of them left their position and ran away to join those companions who were busy in gathering the booty. In this way they showed their lack of will-power; they differed among themselves and disobeyed the Prophet's order not to leave their place no matter what happened to the others. Accordingly, al-fashal (اَلْفَشَلُ = generally translated as 'to lose heart', 'to be weak-hearted'), would imply here, weakness or lack of will-power; obviously the meaning of weak-heartedness or cowardice would not be appropriate in this context, because they had not left their position because of any fear; rather it was because of the avarice of war-booty. If we take al-fashal for cowardice, then it would apply to the whole 'army'; and in that case, the adverb, ''then'', in the clause, ''then He turned you away from them'', would denote ordinal sequel, not sequence of time. The word, ''disputed'', proves that not all of them were united in that weak-willedness and disobedience; some of them were determined to carry on the order, and to continue in the obedience. That is why Allāh follows it with the comment: ''of you were some who desired this world, and of you were some who desired the hereafter''

QUR'ĀN: then He turned you away from them that He might try you;...: Allāh stopped you from entangling with the idol-worshippers, after you manifested your lack of will-power, disputed one with the other and disobeyed the Prophet — in short, after you became disunited. He did so in order that He might examine you and test your faith and patience in His cause. When the hearts and minds are disunited, it provides the strongest reason to conduct an examination, so that a believer may be distinguished from a hypocrite; such a test would also separate a believer who is firmly-rooted in belief and steadfast in conviction from the one who is inconsistent and fickle. Nevertheless, Allāh has forgiven them by His grace, as He says, ''and He has certainly pardoned you''.

QUR'ĀN: When you ran off precipitately and did not turn towards any one and the Messenger was calling you from your rear: ''al-Iṣ'ād'' (اَلْاِصْعَادُ = to go far away on the gound) is different from aṣ-ṣu'ūd (اَلصُّعُوْدُ) which means to rise up, to ascend. They say, Aṣ'ada fi jānibi 'l-barr (اَصْعَدَ فِي جَانِبِ الْبَرِّ = he went far in the land), and Ṣa'ada fi 's-sullam (صَعَدَ فِي السُّلَّمِ = he climbed up the ladder). It is said that al-iṣ'ād is, sometimes, used in the meaning of aṣ-ṣu'ūd.

The adverb, ''when'', is related to an implied verb, ''remember'' (i.e. remember when you ran off ...); or to the verb in the preceding verse, ''He turned you away''; or to the one after that, ''He might try you'', according to various explantions. al-Layy (اَللَيُّ = to turn towards, to incline). According to Majma'u 'l-bayān, it is always used in negative (and never in affirmative), i.e. they do not say, Lawaytu 'alā kadhā (لَوَيْتُ عَلَي كَذَا = I turned towards so-and-so).

The clause, ''and the Messenger was calling you from your rear'', the word, ''rear'' here is opposite of front. The fact that the Prophet was calling them from their rear, shows that they had fled away en masse from around him in such a way that the mob in forefront was far off from the Prophet and the rear group was nearer; he was calling them but nobody was turning towards him — neither those in the front nor those in the rear. They ran off precipitately to save their own skins, leaving the Messenger of Allāh (blessings of Allāh be on him and his progeny), almost alone surrounded by the hordes of the blood-thirsty enemies.

Of course, the words in the the verse 144, ''and Allāh will reward the grateful'', (as explained earlier) prove that there were a few among them whose determination was not shaken; they did never retreat — neither in the beginning nor after the rumour spread that the Prophet was martyred, as is clear from the words, ''if then he dies or is killed, will you turn back upon your heels?''

The words under discussion, ''and did not turn towards any one, and the Messenger was calling you from your rear'', clearly show that the rumour of the Prophet's martyrdom spread among them after they had retreated and run away from him.

QUR'ĀN: so He gave you another sorrow instead of (your) sorrow, ... of what you do. He changed their sorrow to another sorrow in order to divert their attention from this grief. This ''another sorrow'' that afflicted them was, in any case, a divine grace; because Allāh says: ''so that you might not grieve at what had escaped you, nor (at) what befell you;'' and He has condemned such grief in His Book where He says: So that you may not grieve for what has escaped you, nor be exultant at what He has given you [57:23]. Obviously, this another sorrow that would prevent them from that disliked grieving would be a grace and bounty. Accordingly, this ''another sorrow'' should refer to the remorse that overwhelmed them for what they had done, to the distress they felt for the victory that had slipped from their hands because of their weak will-power. Consequently the second sorrow mentioned in the clause, ''instead of (your) sorrow'', would refer to that undesirable grieving; the preposition ''bi'' (بِ) in ''bi-ghammin'' (بِغَمٍّ = instead of sorrow) indicates exchange. The meaning is therefore as follows: You were grieving at what had escaped you and what had befallen you; Allāh changed it to the remorse and distress for the lost victory.

Another alternative: ''athābakum'' (اَثَابَكُمْ = translated here as ''He gave you'') may contain the connotation of change. The meaning in this case will be as follows: He changed your remorse and distress to the grief, entitling you for its reward. The the meanings of the two ''sorrows'' will interchange, vis-a-vis, the preceding explanation.

In either case, the sentence, ''so He gave you another sor-row'', branches out from the clause, ''and He has certainly pardoned you''; and the next verse, ''Then after sorrow He sent down security upon you ...'', is closely related to it. The meaning: He pardoned you, then changed your sorrow to another sorrow to prevent you from that grief of yours which He was not pleased with, then He sent down upon you security in the form of slumber which overtook you.

A third alternative is apparently supported by the context, in that the sentence, ''so He gave you another sorrow ...'', would branch from the immediately preceding clause, ''When you ran off precipitately ...''; in this case, ''another sorrow'' would refer to their running off and retreating from the battlefield; and the next phrase, bi-ghammin (بِغَمٍّ) would be translated ''because of the sorrow'' (taking the preposition bi بِ for the cause); it would then refer to the polytheists' attack on them from the rear which in its turn was the direct result of their disputation and disobedience. It is a good meaning. In this case, the clause, ''so that you might not grieve ...'', would mean as follows: We explain these facts to you so that you might not grieve. Thus, it would fall into line with the words of Allāh: No misfortunate befalls you on the earth nor in your own souls, but it is in a book before We bring it into existence; surely that is easy to Allāh: So that you may not grieve for what has escaped you, nor be exultant at what He has given you; and Allāh does not love any arrogant boaster [57:22 — 23].

[The meaning: He gave you another sorrow that you ran away from the battle-ground, because the polytheists attacked you from the rear when you disputed among yourselves and disobeyed the Prophet. We explain it to you so that you might not grieve at what had escaped you, nor at what befell you.]

These three possible grammatical structure maintain the order of the verse and keep the sentences well-connected to each other. The exegetes have written many other possibilities. For example, to which sentence does the conjunctive, ''so'', join the words, ''so He gave you another sorrow''. What are the connotations of the first and the second ''sorrow''? What is the import of the preposition ''bi'' in ''bi-ghammin'' (translated here as ''instead of'')? What is the significance of ''so that you might not''? But they are not tenable in the least, and there is no use of quoting and commenting on them.

In the light of the first two meanings given by us, ''what had escaped you'', (in the clause, ''so that you might not grieve at what had escaped you, nor [at] what befell you'') would refer to victory and war booty; and ''what befell you'' to their slaughter and injuries.

QUR'ĀN: Then after sorrow He sent down security upon you, a slumber coming upon a party of you: ''al-Amanah'' (اَلْاَمَنَةُ = security); an-nu'ās (اَلنُّعَاسُ = lethargy before sleep; light sleep; slumber); ''slumber'' is appositional substantive standing for ''security''. It is also possible to take al-amanah as plural of al-'āmin (اَلْاَمِنُ = peaceful) like aṭ-ṭālib and aṭ-ṭalabah; in that case it will be circumstantial clause related to ''you'' in ''upon you''; and ''slumber'' will become object of the verb, ''sent down''. al-Ghashayān (اَلْغَشَيَانُ = to cover, to envelop).

The verse shows that this slumber had overtaken only some, and not all, of the believers, as the clause, ''a party of you'', clearly says. These were the people who had come back to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) after retreating and running off precipitately, and felt remorse and sorrow for what they had done. Far be it from Allāh to pardon them mercifully while they were still fleeing away from the jihād, and were thus engaged in one of the greatest sins. Allāh says about them, ''and He has certainly pardoned you, and Allāh is Gracious to the believers'', and it is unthinkable that Allāh's grace would cover a sinner when he was actively engaged in open defiance and sin — until and unless he repented. But as explained above, Allāh looked on them graciously when He changed their sorrow to another sorrow in order that they might not grieve, lest their hearts be polluted with something disliked by Allāh; [and it proves that they had come back and repented before that].

So, these were some of the believers; they were those who felt remorse for what they had done, and returned to the Prophet gathering around him. Probably it was at the time when the Prophet separated himself from the hordes of the polytheists and reached the mountain-pass — although they returned to him gradually, one by one, when it was known that the Prophet was not slain.

The other group is referred to in the next sentence, ''and (there was) another party who cared only for their own selves''

QUR'ĀN: and (there was) another party who cared only for their own selves: This was another group of the believers. The word ''believer'' is used here only to distinguish them from the hypocrites who have been mentioned later on [in 3:167 — 168]: And that He might know the hypocrites and it was said to them: ''Come, fight in Allāh's way, or defend yourselves.'' The said: ''If we knew fighting, we would certainly have followed you'' ... Allāh did not give this second group (that cared only for itself) the honour accorded to the first one (who were pardoned, then given another sorrow and lastly provided security and slumber). This second party, on the other hand, was left on their own; they were wholly engrossed in their own selves, oblivious of every thing else.

Allāh mentioned here their two characteristics although one was a concomitant or branch of the other. First, that they cared only for themselves. It does not mean that they wanted for their own selves the happiness — in its real sense. After all, even the believers want the same thing — the happiness for themselves. Not only the man, every creature that has a little bit of will and volition thinks only about itself. What this clause connotes is that their whole attention was riveted to save their own skins — lest they lose their lives and be slain. In other words, their only aim in accepting the religion — or doing any other work — was to let their own selves have the usufruct of this world. They had professed Islam only because they thought that it was an unconquerable factor, and that Allāh would not like it to be overwhelmed by His enemies — even if the enemies had all the factors in their favour. These people sought to gain benefits from the religion as long as it went on giving them something to their advantage. But if the situation changed and the tables were turned against them, they would turn back on their heels, retreating into disbelief.

QUR'ĀN: they entertained about Allāh thoughts of ignorance ... the affair is wholly (in the hands) of Allāh: They entertained about Allāh a thought that was not correct, was actually a thought of ignorance. They ascribed to Him a characteristic that was not true, and was like that which the people of ignorance used to ascribe to Him. Whatever that thought, it was related to their words, ''Do we have any hand in the affair?''. It may also be inferred from the reply Allāh taught His Prophet, i.e., ''Say: 'Surely the affair is wholly (in the hands) of Allāh.' '' This reply evidently shows that according to their thinking some affairs were in their own hands. That is why as soon as they were defeated and massacred, they started having doubts about religion, and said to each other, ''Do we have any hand in the affair?''

It is clear from the above that they thought that outright victory and triumph was their right. Why? Because they were Muslims ! They believed that the true religion cannot be vanquished, and consequently the followers of that religion cannot be defeated — because, according to them, it was incumbent on Allah to help it unconditionally, without any restriction, because He had promised to help.

So that was the unjust thought, the thought of ignorance. The idol-worshippers of the days of ignorance believed that Allāh was the Creator of every thing; that at the same time there was a separate Lord for every phenomenon, like sustenance, life, death, love, war, etc. Also, every species and every part of creation like man, earth, river, etc., had a Lord of its own; each Lord managed the affair of his subjects and none could overpower him within his jurisdiction. They worshipped those lords so that they would provide them with sustenance, give them happiness, and protect them from evil and misfortune; and Allāh was like an overlord, allotting each group of His subjects and each part of His Kingdom to a lord who had full authority to do whatever he liked within his jurisdiction and in his domain.

If someone thinks that the true religion could not be over-powered in its advancement, and that the Prophet — being the first to receive it from his Lord and be responsible for it — could not be defeated in his mission or could not die or be killed, then surely such a man entertains about Allāh thoughts of ignorance. He has taken a partner for Allāh, and idolized the Prophet as a deity who has been given domain over victory and war booty — while in fact Allāh is One Who has no partner, and in Whose hand lies every power and every authority; and none else besides Him has any authority at all. That is why when Allāh said in a preceding section, ''That He may cut off a portion from among those who disbelieve, or abase them so that they should return disappointed of attaining what they desired'', He cut short the speech, turning towards His Prophet to tell him, ''You have no concern in the affair''. He did so, lest someone thought the Prophet had any concern or authority in that cutting off a portion of unbelievers or abasing them. It is Allāh Himself Who has established the system of cause and effect. The stronger the cause the surer the appearance of its effect, no matter whether that effect is right or wrong, virtue or vice, good or bad, guidance or misguidance, justice or injustice. Also, it make no difference whether the person involved is believer or unbeliever, beloved or hated, Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) or Abū Sufyān.

Of course, Allāh has special providence for His religion and for His friends. It is because of that concern that the system in the creation is run in such a way that it would finally lead to the victory of religion, and prepare the earth for His friends — and the end is for the pious ones [7:128].

It is a universal law and no exception has been made for prophethood and divine mission. That is why we find that when the normal factors and causes were present for the advancement of the religion and victory of the believers (as was the case in some battles of the Prophet), the believers triumphed; and when there was any weak link in the chain (for example, hypocrisy raised its head, or they disobeyed the Prophet, or became weak-hearted or nervous) the polytheists got the upper hand, defeating the believers. The same was true in case of other prophets, vis-a-vis, their people. The enemies were men of the world, whose only aim was to gain benefits of this life; they had overwhelming powers and gathered strength upon strength, and mobilized army after army. Naturally, they got upper hand and crushed the prophets — some were slain like Zakariyyā, others were beheaded like Yaḥyā, yet, others had to leave their place like ‘Īsā and so on.

Nevertheless, if the truth of the religion could not be established without disturbing the normal casuality — in other words when it was a question of life or death for the truth — then it was necessary for Allāh to stregthen the religion in an extraordinary and supernatural way, lest evidence of its truth be destroyed. Some details of this subject were given in the discourses on Miracle[1] in volume one, and on Deeds[2] in volume three.

However, to return to our topic: When these people (who did not care except for their own selves) asked each other whether they really had any authority in the affair, it showed that they entertained doubts about the truth of the religion, and as we have explained above, their religion had the spirit of idolatry in its body. Therefore, Allāh told His Prophet to reply them in these words: ‘‘Surely the affair is wholly (in the hands) of Allāh’’. Before that He had told the Prophet himself that he had no concern, no authority, in the affair. All this made it clear that the religion of nature, the religion of monotheism, is the one in which all authority is reserved for Allāh; the rest of the things — including the Prophet — have got no authority at all; rather they are links in the chain of cause and effect, governed by the divine system that leads to the law of test and trial.

QUR’ĀN: They conceal within their souls what they would not reveal to you ... and Allāh knows what is in the breasts: It exposes their lack of belief in a much more harsher light than their words, ‘‘Do we have any hand in the affair?’’, had shown. Those words had expressed their doubt in the form of a question. But the idea hidden in their hearts (‘‘Had we any hand in the affair, we would not have been slain here’’), is an argument to prove according to their thinking untruth of the religion! That is why although they had dared to uttter the former question before the Prophet, they kept the later words concealed in their hearts, as it would have clearly shown that they gave preponderance to disbelief over belief.

Allāh therefore told His Prophet to reply their undisclosed thought in these words: ''Say: 'Had you remained in your houses, those for whom slaughter was ordained would certainly have gone forth to the places where they (now) lie;' and that Allāh might test what was in your breasts and that He might purge what was in your hearts.'' These words made it clear to them that:

First: When the martyrs were slain in the battlefield, it was not because you were not on truth nor because the authority was not in your hands — as you think. Rather, it had happened because the divine decree — which is enforced without fail — had ordained that those martyrs would lie in this place. If you had remained behind, those for whom martyrdom was ordained would surely have gone ahead to the place of their martyrdom. There is no way of escaping from the appointed time of death; when it comes nobody can delay it an hour nor can he bring it on before its times.

Second: It is a divinely established system that test and purge would encompass each and every human being; it would inevitably cover one and all, you as well as them. Neither you could avoid coming out of your homes nor the battle could be put off. All this was necessary in order that the martyrs might arrive at their right positions and achieve their high ranks, and you might reach your due places. In this way, everyone would be placed in his proper place — either felicity or infelicity, happiness or unhappiness — after the testing of the thoughts and ideas hidden in your breasts, and the separation of belief and polytheism concealed in your hearts.

It is amazing to see a number of exegetes writing that the group mentioned in this verse refers to the hypocrites — when the context clearly shows that it describes the condition of some believers. As for the hypocrites (i.e., the group of 'Abdullah ibn Ubayy that had withdrawn from the battle in the very beginning even before the battle had started), their condition has been described much later. Of course, that explanation might be in place if they use the word, ''hypocrites'', for those of weak faith, who were so confused in their belief that it ultimately boiled down to rejection of faith (in reality) although they professed Islam (in words). It is they whom Allāh describes as 'those in whose hearts was disease'. He says: When the hypocrites and those in whose hearts was disease said: ''Their religion has deceived them'' [8:49]; and among you there are those who hearken for their sake [9:47]. Or may be they want to say that all hypocrites had not gone back to Medina with ‘Abdullāh ibn Ubayy.

Even more amazing is some others’ assertion that these people were good believers. They say that these people thought that the affair of divine help and victory was in their hands because they were on the true religion, and they had seen how in the battle of Badr they were given victory and how angels were sent to help them. According to these exegetes, when they said, ‘‘Do we have any hand in the affair?’’, and thought, ‘‘Had we any hand in the affair, we would not have been slain here’’, it was actually their way of confessing that the affair was in the hands of Allāh, not theirs, otherwise they would not have been massacred.

If we accept this interpretation then the replies (Say: ‘‘Surely the affair is wholly [in the hands] of Allāh’’, and, Say: ‘‘Had you remained in your houses, those for whom slaughter was ordained would certainly have gone forth to the places where they [now] lie’’), would be totally irrelevant. Some people have realized this defect and then have tried to explain it away in a way that has compounded the confusion. In any case, we have already explained its true meaning to you.

QUR’ĀN: (As for) those of you who turned back on the day when the two armies met, only the Satan sought to cause them to make slip,on account o f some deeds they had done: ‘‘Istazallahumu ’sh-shayṭān’’ (اِسْتَزَلَّهُمُ الشَّيْطانُ = the Satan wanted them to slip); he wanted so only because they had acquired some evil traits in their psyches, and done some bad deeds; one evil leads to another, because it emanates from following the heart’s desires — and the heart desires only that which has some affinity to it.

Someone has taken the preposition ‘‘bi’’ (بِ = on account of) as indicative of instrument, and said that ‘‘some deeds’’ refers to their turning back on the day of fighting. But this interpretation is far fetched; because ‘‘some deeds they had done’’ manifestly shows that their deeds had preceded their turning back; the two cannot refer to the same thing.

In any case, the verse shows that some sins and evil deeds done by them had given the Satan power to mislead them by making them retreat and flee from the jihād. Consequently, there is no ground to suppose that the verse points to the Satanic cry on the day of Uḥud that the Prophet was killed (as has been narrated in some traditions), because such interpretation is not supported by the wordings of the verse in any way.

QUR'ĀN: and certainly Allāh has pardoned them; surely Allāh is Forgiving, Forbearing: This pardon was granted to those who turned back on the day of battle, as mentioned in the beginning of the verse. The verse is unrestricted, and therefore covers all those who fled on that day. In other words it includes both groups: those on whom slumber was sent down and those who cared only for their own selves. But there is a difference between the two, as the former has been honoured by Allāh, but not the latter. Because of that difference, this general pardon (which covers both groups) does not mention the aspects of honour related to the former's pardon (as mentioned earlier).

It also shows that the pardon mentioned in this verse is not the same as the one described [in 3:152] above, ''and He has certainly pardoned you''. That the two pardons are different may be gathered from different tones used in the two verses. Look first at the former where Allāh says, ''and He has certainly pardoned you, and Allāh is Gracious to the believers''. It clearly, shows Allāh's grace and mercy on them, and mentions them as ''believers''; thereafter it goes on saying that He changed their sorrow to another sorrow in order that they might not grieve; then tells them that He sent down security on them in the form of slumber. How different is that tone from the one employed in this verse where it merely says: ''and certainly Allāh has pardoned them; surely Allāh is Forgiving, Forbearing''. Note that it speaks only about the pardon, but is silent about all the abovementioned aspects of honour; then it ends with the adjective, ''Forbearing'' — focusing the attention on the fact that Allāh does not make haste in giving punishment. A pardon accompanied by forbearance indicates that although the Master has overlooked the sin but still He is not pleased with the sinner.

Suggestion: Those who think that both groups are equal in rank, do so because both have been granted pardon.

Reply: The former pardon is different from the latter in its connotation, although both denote pardoning. There is no proof to show that pardon, forgiveness and things like that have the same connotation everywhere; and we have explained how the two differ in these verses.

PARDON AND FORGIVENESS IN THE QUR'ĀN

What is pardon? As ar-Rāghib has said (and it is the meaning derived from its various uses): ''al-'Afw (اَلْعَفْوُ = pardon) originally means to proceed straight away to get something. They say: 'afāh or i'tafāh (عَفَاهُ،اِعْتَفَاهُ = he proceeded towards him to take a certain thing from him); 'afati 'r-rīḥu 'd-dār (عَفَتِ الرِّيحُ الدَّارَ = the wind proceeded to the house taking away its traces or vestiges).'' They say, 'afati 'd-dār (عَفَتِ الدَّارُ) when they want to say that the house has become effaced, obliterated; probably there is a fine literary point in this usage: It is as though the house itself came cover its traces and decorations, got hold of them and disappeared from sight. It is in this meaning that al-'afw is attributed to Allāh; as though Allāh goes to His servant and takes away whatever sins he might be having — thus the servant is left without any sin.

It appears from the above that al-maghfirah (اَلْمَغْفِرَةُ = forgiveness; lit. = to cover) in a way emantes from al-'afw. The sin is first taken away then it is covered up so that it cannot be seen — neither by the sinner nor by others. The Qur'ān says: and pardon us and forgive us [2:286]; and Allāh is Pardoning, Forgiving [4:99].

Also it is clear that pardon and forgiveness — although having different meanings, the one branching out from the other, academically — are one and the same for all practical purposes. Also, these meanings are not reserved for Allāh; these words may be used for others too in the same meanings. Allāh says: ... unless they remit [ya'fūna يَعْفُوْنَ]or he remits [ya'fuwa يَعْفُوَ] in whose hand is the marriage tie [2:237]; Say to those who believe (that) they forgive those who do not hope the days of Allāh [45:14]; pardon them therefore and ask forgiveness for them, and take counsel with them in the affair [3:159]. Here Allāh enjoins His Prophet to pardon them; he should not mete out to them the consequences of their disobedience, like censuring and admonishing them or shunning and avoiding them. He should also beseech Allāh to forgive them (and He will grant that prayer without fail) in order that they are saved from punishment of their sins.

Also, it is clear that the theme of pardon and forgiveness may be related with creative phenomena and legislative effects, as well as with affairs of this world and the next. Allāh says: And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults) [42:30]. This verse definitely includes pardon of worldly consequences of the sins and faults. The same is the apparent significance of the words of Allāh: ... and the angels declare His glory with the praise of their Lord and ask forgiveness for those on earth [42:5]. Also the words of Adam and his wife, quoted in the Qur'ān, point to this reality: They said: ''Our Lord! We have been unjust to ourselves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers'' [7:23]. Certainly this injustice to their own selves and the forgiveness asked for were not related to the hereafter, because the prohibition which they had contravened was in nature of an advice, not of a law.

Many Qur'ānic verses prove that nearness and proximity to Allāh and enjoyment of the paradise's blessings cannot take place unless and until the rust of polytheism and sins are removed by repentance, etc., followed by the divine forgiveness. For example, Allāh says: Nay! rather, what they used to do has become (like) rust upon their hearts [84:14]; and whoever believes in Allāh, He guides aright his heart [64:11].

Pardon and forgiveness are, in short, like removal of impediments and eradication of contrary antagonistic facotrs. Allāh has counted belief and the hereafter as ''life''; and the effects of belief, the deeds of the people of the hereafter and their lively progress as ''light''. He says: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth? [6:122]; and as for the next abode, that most surely is the life [29:64]. Thus, polytheism is death, and sins are utter darkness. Allāh says: Or like utter darkness in the deep sea: there covers it a wave above which is another wave, above which is a cloud, (layers of) utter darkness one above another; when he holds out his hand, he is almost unable to see it; and to whomsoever Allāh does not give light, he has no light [24:40]. Forgiveness then removes the death and darkness; it takes shape through the life (i.e., belief) and the light (i.e., divine mercy).

An unbeliever has neither life nor light. A believer whose sins are forgiven, has the life and the light both; on the other hand, a believer who is encumbered with sins is alive but with diminished light; his light will become perfect when he is forgiven. Allāh says: their light shall run on before them and on their right hands; they shall say: ''Our Lord! make perfect for us our light and grant us forgiveness [66:8].

The above discourse makes it clear that when pardon and forgiveness is attributed to Allāh regarding creative affairs then it means removal of impediment (by creating a factor to erase it); in the context of legislative matters, it indicates removal of such factors that would prevent man's success in the hereafter; while in the circle of happiness and unhappiness it would entail removal of those things that would impede his happiness.

O you who believe! be not like those who disbelieve and say of their brethren when they travel in the earth or engage in fighting: ''Had they been with us, they would not have died and they would not have been slain;'' so Allāh makes this to be an intense regret in their hearts; and Allāh gives life and causes death; and Allāh sees what you do (156). And if you are slain in the way of Allāh or you die, certainly forgiveness from Allāh and mercy is better than what they amass (157). And if indeed you die or you are slain, certainly to Allāh shall you be gathered together (158). Thus it is due to mercy from Allāh that you are lenient to them, and had you been rough, hard-hearted, they would certainly have dispersed from around you; pardon them therefore and ask forgiveness for them, and take counsel with them in the affair, but when you have decided, then place your trust in Allāh; surely Allāh loves those who trust (in him) (159). *If Allāh assists you, then there is none that can overcome you, and if He forsakes you, who is there then that can assist you after Him? COMMENTARY

It is the continuation of the verses revealed especially about the battle of Uḥud. It deals with another affair affecting them, i.e., the grief and sorrow that had overwhelmed them because so many of their braves and notables had been slaughtered. The overwhelming majority of the martyrs was from the Helpers; as reportedly no more than four of the Emigrants were martyred. It gives rise to the surmise that most of the resistance was from the Helpers' side and that the Emigrants had left the battleground long before them.

In short, these verses explain the error and mistake in sorrowing and grieving; then turn to another matter resulting from that grief, that is, their critical attitude towards the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), thinking that it was he who had brought them to that disaster and put them into that perdition. It may be inferred from their talk alluded to herein: ''Had they been with us, they would not have died and they would not have been slain.'' In other words, if they had listened to them and not obeyed the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) they would have been alive today. It means that it was he who had led them to the slaughter. The verses make it clear that it was not meet for the Prophet that he should deceive anyone; he is Allāh's Messenger, noble of heart, sublime in character; he is lenient to them by mercy of Allāh, pardons them and seeks Allāh's forgiveness for them and takes their counsel by permission of Allāh; and Allāh has conferred His favour on them by sending him to them in order that he may take them out of error bringing them to the guidance.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! be not like those who disbelieve ... and Allāh sees what you do: The word, ''those who disbelieve'', refers to the unbelievers — not to the hypocrites, as some people think. It is not the hypocrisy, per se, which incites such talks — although the hypocrites had uttered these words. Such talk, in reality, is a product of disbelief. Thus it was necessary to ascribe it to the unbelievers. aḍ-Ḍarb fi 'l-arḍ (اَلضَّرْبُ فِي الْاَرْض = lit., striking in the earth) metaphorically means travelling. al-Ghuzzā (اَلْغُزَّي) is plural of al-ghāzī (اَلْغَازي = fighter) like aṭ-ṭālib and aṭ-ṭullāb (اَلطَّالِبُ،اَلطُّلَّابُ) or aḍ-ḍārib and aḍ-ḍurrāb(اَلضَّارِبُ،اَلضُّرَّابُ) ''so Allāh makes this to be an intense regret in their hearts'' , i.e., so that Allāh may punish them through this intense regret; it has thus put the means in place of the end. The words, ''Allāh gives life and causes death'', explain the reality about which the unbelievers had gone astray, and had said, ''Had they been with us, they would not have died and they would not have been slain.'' The words, ''death'', as used here, covers natural death as well as slaughter — we have explained earlier that when used alone, this word covers every type of death. The clause, ''and Allāh sees what you do'', explains the reason for the prohibition contained in the words, ''be not like those who disbelieve''.

In the clause, ''they would not have died and they would not have been slain'', death is mentioned before slaying; the sequence follows that of the preceding clause, ''when they travel ... or engage in fighting''. Also, unlike slaying (which is an abnormal happening) death is a natural and normal phenomenon; therefore the normal was mentioned before the abnormal.

The verse, in short, admonishes the believers not to be like the unbelievers; they should not say about someone who dies outside his home town or among strangers, or is slain when engaged in jihād, that if he had been with them he would not have died or been killed. This type of talk throws one into mental agony and divine punishment — it is the intense grief put in their hearts. Moreover, it emanates from sheer ignorance: Being near them or away from them neither gives life nor causes death. Giving life and death is among the affairs exclusively reserved for Allāh — the One Who has no partner or colleague. Therefore, the believers should fear Allāh and not be like the unbelievers; and Allāh sees what they do.

QUR'ĀN: And if you are slain in the way of Allāh or you die, certainly forgiveness from Allāh and mercy is better than what they amass: Obviously, ''what they amass'', refers to property and wealth as well as to its concomitants, as these are the best objects of desire in this life.

This verse mentions martyrdom before normal death, because being slain in the way of Allāh is nearer to divine forgiveness compared to other deaths. This fine point has caused this change of sequence. Thereafter, the next verse, ''And if indeed you die or you are slain ... '', reverts to the normal pattern, putting death before slaughter, because there is no such fine point there to justify any change.

QUR'ĀN: Thus it is due to mercy from Allāh ... should the believers rely: ''al-Faẓẓ'' (اَلْفَظُّ = rude, rough); hard-heartedness metaphorically means unkindness, ill-nature and intolerance; al-infiḍāḍ (اَلْاِنْفِضَاضُ = to disperse).

The verse turns away from the believers, addressing the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) directly, although the real import is as follows: It is due to Our mercy that Our Messenger is lenient to you; that is why We have ordered him to pardon you, ask forgiveness for you and take counsel with you in the affair, and to place his trust in Us when he has taken any decision.

In spite of that meaning, the mode of address was changed (and we have explained this reason in the beginning of this topic of Uḥud) because there is a current of censure, admonition and stricture running throughout the narrative, and the Qur'ān turns its face from the believers whenever a chance occurs. This situation is one of them, because it touches a condition of theirs which tends to put blame on the Prophet. Their grieving for the slaughter of their martyrs might sometimes lead them to find fault with the Prophet's actions and to accuse him of bringing them to the hazardous eventuality where they were killed and extirpated. That is why Allāh turned away from them and addressed His Prophet directly: ''Thus it is due to mercy from Allāh that you are lenient to them ...''

This talk is based on another implied one which may be understood from the context: ''If they are entangled, as you see, in such undesirable condition that they resemble the unbelievers and intensely grieve for their martyrs, then it is only due to Our mercy that you are lenient to them; otherwise, they would have dispersed from around you.'' (And Allāh knows better.)

The clauses, ''pardon them therefore and ask forgiveness for them, and take counsel with them in the affair'', endorse the precedent established by the Prophet, as he was doing all this from the beginning, and he had taken their counsel shortly before the battle of Uḥud. The verse points to the fact that the Prophet does what he is told by Allāh to do, and Allāh is pleased with his performance.

Allāh told His Prophet to pardon them (i.e., he should not mete out to them the consequences of their disobedience), and to ask Allāh to forgive them (and in that case He would certainly do so). The word, although general and unrestricted, does not include the sharī'ah's penal code and things like that; otherwise it would result in discarding the whole Sharī'ah. Moreover, the next clause, ''and take counsel with them in the affair'', implies that the preceding two orders too are related to the matters of government and public affairs — in which he is required to take counsel with them.

Now we have reached the last sentences: ''but when you have decided, then place your trust in Allāh, surely Allāh loves those who turst (in Him).'' When He loves, He will be your Guardian and Helper; and will never forsake you. The next verse makes it clear and even invites the believers to have trust in Him: ''If Allāh assists you, then there is none that can overcome you, and if He forsakes you, who is there then that can assist you after Him?'' Then He orders the believers to have trust in Him and says: ''and on Allāh should the believers rely.'' The sentence metaphorically puts the effect in place of the cause. They should rely on Allāh because they believe in Him, and there is no helper or supporter except Him.

QUR'ĀN: And it is not attributable to a prophet that he should defraud ... and Allāh sees what they do: ''al-Ghill'' (اَلْغِلُّ = to defraud, to act faithlessly). We have mentioned in verse 3:79 (It is not meet for a man that Allāh should give him the Book and the wisdom and prophethood, then he should say to men: ''Be my servants rather than Allāh's'') that this mode of speech is intended to declare the purity and blamelessness of the Prophet showing that he was far removed from evil and indecency. This verse means as follows: Far be it from a prophet to defraud or be faithless to his Lord or the people (and defrauding the people too is another form of defrauding Allāh); it is because he who defrauds will have to meet his Lord with that which he has defrauded and shall be paid back fully what he has earned.

Then He declares that accusing the Prophet of defrauding is an unjust and untenable idea, because he follows the pleasure of Allāh, he never goes beyond His pleasure; and the man who defrauds, brings upon himself severe wrath of Allāh and his abode is the hell, and it is an evil destination. The verse, ''Is then he who follows the pleasure of Allāh ...'', gives the above connotation.

Then He says that the various groups (i.e., those who follow the pleasure of Allāh and those who bring wrath of Allāh upon themselves) are of diverse grades; and Allāh sees what they do. The people should not think that Allāh loses sight of even an iota of good or evil done by them; they should not be careless in following His pleasure or avoiding His wrath.

QUR'ĀN: Certainly Allāh conferred (His) favour ... they were surely in manifest error: Again the mode of address has changed, taking the believers as absent. The general reason of such changes has already been explained. As for this particular verse, the reason is as follows: The verse intends to describe Allāh's favour upon the believers — because of their belief. That is why it has used the adjective, ''the believers'', and not the verb, ''those who believe'', because only an adjective shows inseparable relationship, and only the adjective could show the causality (as has been said) or could show it more perfectly. The verse's meaning is clear.

There are other matters worth explaining in this verse; and, God willing, some will be given in appropriate places.

COMMENTARY

It is the conclusion of the verses about the battle of Uḥud. These verses describe the position of some hypocrites who had deserted the believers when they were proceeding from Medina to Uḥud, and refute what they were saying about those who were slain in the way of Allāh; then the verses extol the condition of the martyrs saying that they were enjoying Allāh's bounties in His presence and were happily waiting for their brothers who were left behind in this world.

QUR'ĀN: What! when a misfortune befell you ... Allāh has power over all things'': First they were told not to be like the unbelievers — grieving and feeling intense sorrow for their slain brethren. It was explained to them that life and death were exclusively in the hands of Allāh, they had no concern in this affair; and it would have made no difference whether the martyrs were near them or far from them, or whether they had gone forth to fight or sat behind. After making all this clear, now Allāh explains the immediate cause of that disaster according to the law of causality. He tells them that debacle was caused by their disobedience which they committed on that day: the disobedience of the archers when they left their position, and then the disobedience of all those who fled away from the battlefield. In short, the disaster took place because they disobeyed the Messenger, their Commander, and showed lack of courage and disputed among themselves. All this led to their retreat according to the law of nature and custom.

The verse's meaning is therefore as follows: Do you know how this misfortune befell you? Was it not a misfortune that you had previously inflicted twice as much on your enemies, the unbelievers? This time the disaster was brought on you by your own selves. It were you who undermined the means of victory with your own hands; it were you who did not follow the clear order of your Commander, fell into temptation and disputed one with the other.

The clause, ''while you had certainly afflicted (the unbelievers) with twice as much'', prompts them to compare their losses in Uḥud (martyrdom of seventy believers) with those suffered by the unbelievers in Badr when they had suffered twice as many casualties — as seventy of the unbelievers were slain and seventy taken prisoners.

This description is intended to soothe the believers' feelings, making the calamity look less devastating. After all, they have suffered only half of that which they had inflicted on their enemies; so they should not grieve, should not be distressed.

Some people have explained it differently. According to them the clause, ''It is from your own selves'', means that you yourselves had opted for this misfortune. It happened like this: They had chosen to release the prisoners of Badr in exchange for ransom. But the initial order was to kill them; and they were warned that if they accepted the ransom, a similar number from their side would be killed next year; but they said: ''We agree to this condition. We shall take the ransom and enjoy its benefits; and if one of us is killed later on, he shall be a martyr.''

The ending clause of this verse (surely Allāh has power over all things) supports, or rather proves, this latter explanation; as this clause does not connect properly with the former meaning. We shall quote in the next ''Traditions'' aḥādīth from the Imāms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.)

regarding this topic.

QUR'ĀN: And what befell you on the day ... and Allāh best knows what they conceal: The first of these two verses supports the above theme that the clause, ''Say: 'It is from you own selves' '', refers to their opting for the ransom in exchange of Badr's prisoners and agreeing to the attached condition. Only in this way, it can be said that the misfortune that befell them in Uḥud was with Allāh's permission. As for the former explanation, (that the immediate cause of this misfortune was your disobedience), it has no relevance with this verse; obviously, there is no sense in saying that their disobedience was by permission of Allāh.

Accordingly, the statement that the misfortune that had befallen them was by Allāh's permission, explains the preceding declaration that it was from their own selves. It paves the way of the next clause, ''and that He might know the believers'', which in its turn opens the way to deal with the hypocrites, together with their talk and its refutation; and to unveil the reality of this especial death, i.e., martyrdom in the way of Allāh.

The clause, ''or (at least) defend yourselves'', intends to persuade them to fight; if you do not fight in the way of Allāh, then at least defend your families and your own selves. ''They were on that day much nearer to unbelief than to belief'' The preposition ''li'' (ل) in ''li 'l-kufr'' (لِلْكُفْر = to unbelief) and ''li 'l-īmān'' (لِلْاِيْمَان = to belief) has been used in meaning of ''to''. It shows their position vis-a-vis open disbelief; as for hypocricy, they had certainly fallen in it.

The word, ''with their mouths'', in the sentence, ''They say with their mouths what is not in their hearts'', has been put here for emphasis and as a counter-balance to the clause, ''in their hearts''.

QUR'ĀN: Those who said of their brethren ... if you are truthful. The word, ''brethren'' refers to those with whom they had family ties from among the martyrs. Allāh has mentioned here their ''brotherhood'', side by side with the comment, ''while they (themselves) held back''; it is meant to put them to shame in a most vivid and crushing way, showing that they held back from helping their own brothers who were meanwhile massacred by the enemy. The sentence, ''Say: 'Then ward off death from yourselves' '', refutes their talk. ad-Dar' (اَلدَّرْءُ = to ward off; to avert).

QUR'ĀN: And reckon not those who are killed in Allāh's way ... provided sustenance from their Lord: Again the speaker turns away from the Muslims and speaks with the Prophet alone; and its reason has been mentioned several times in Commentaries of the relevant verses.

Also, it is possible to treat this address as continuation of the preceding sentence where it addresses the Prophet, ''Say: 'Then ward off death ...' ''

Death in this verse means nullity of consciousness and action. That is why Allāh explains the martyrs' life by showing that they receive sustenance (and it is action) and rejoice in Allāh's grace (and it shows their feeling which proves consciousness).

QUR'ĀN: Rejoicing in what Allāh has given them ... nor shall they grieve: ''al-Faraḥ'' (اَلْفَرَحُ = joy) is opposite of ''al-ḥuzn'' (اَلْحُزْنُ = sorrow). al-Bishārah and al-bushrā (اَلْبِشَارَةُ،اَلْبُشْرِي = good news); al-istibshār (اَلْاِسْتِبْشَارُ = to seek happiness through a good news). The verse means: They rejoice in what they have received of Allāh's grace and which is always present with them; they feel happy when they receive the good tidings regarding those who have not yet joined them — are still in this world — that they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve.

Two things are clear from the above:

First: Those who are killed in the way of Allāh continue to receive the news about good believers whom they had left alive in this world.

Second: The good news concerns the reward of the believers' deeds — that they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve. It happens that they see this reward in the abode which they abide in. It is because their knowledge of things emanates from observation, not from arguments.

The verse therefore proves that after death man's existence continues between his death and the Day of Resurrection. We have described it in detail under ''The Life of al-Barzakh'' under the verse, And do not speak of those who are slain in Allāh's way as dead [2:154].[1]

QUR'ĀN: They rejoice on account of favour from Allāh and (His) grace ... the reward of the believers: This rejoicing is more comprehansive and covers their joy for others as well as for themselves. It is proved from the clause, ''and that Allāh will not waste the reward of the believers'', which being unrestricted covers all the believers. Pehaps this is the reason why the ''rejoicing'' — and also ''grace'' — have been repeated here. Meditate on this verse.

The words, ''favour'' and ''grace'', have been used as common nouns, and ''sustenance'' has been left unspecified. This style gives the hearer's imagination full rein; he is free to visualize whatever he likes. Likewise fear and grief are left vague, so that put in negative form they would signify comprehensiveness.

One finds on meditating on the verse that:

First: The verses intend to describe the believers' reward;

Second: That reward consists of their sustenance near Allāh;

Third: That sustenance is a favour and grace from Allāh;

Fourth: That favour and grace is mirrored in the fact that they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve.

The clause, ''that they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve'', is really wonderful; the more you meditate on it, the more expansive and extensive its meaning will be, with its subtility, sublimity and graceful flow. The thing that comes before the eyes is that the fear and sorrow are removed from the martyrs. Fear takes shape when there is possibility of something occurring which would nullify an existing happiness of man; sorrow appears when that thing has already happened. Misfortune — or any undesirable phenomenon — is feared as long as it has not befallen; but once it has begun, the fear gives way to sorrow. There is no fear after a misfortune has taken shape, and no sorrow before that.

Fear — with all its aspects — may be removed from man only when there is no chance of deterioration or extinction for any bounty that he enjoys and possesses. Sorrow — with all its aspects — may be removed from him only when he is not deprived of any such bounty to begin with, nor has he lost it after finding it. When the Qur'ān says that Allāh has removed general fear and general sorrow from a man, it means that He has given him all possible bounties and favours for his enjoyment; and those bounties and favours will never deteriorate or be taken away from him. In other words, man will remain alive for ever enjoying the everlasting happiness.

It is evident that removal of fear and sorrow means the same as man's receiving sustenance from Allāh; He says: and that which is with Allāh is best for the righteous [3:198]; and what is with Allāh is enduring [16:96]. These two verses show that what is with Allāh is everlasting and enduring bounty, not tainted by any affliction, not liable to extinction.

Also, it is clear that negation of fear and sorrow is one with affirmation of favour and grace, that is, divine bounty. But we have explained in the beginning of the book (and further details will be given under the verse, ... with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favours ... 4:69) that ''favour'', whenever used in the Qur'ān, means divine guardianship. Therefore, this verse means that Allāh is their Guardian Who manages their affairs and bestows on them exclusive grace.

Some people have supposed that ''grace'' means a bounty given in excess of what a man's deeds have made him eligible to; and ''favour'' means the bounty equal to the deeds. But it does not enmesh with the end clause, ''and that Allāh will not waste the reward of the believers''. The word, ''reward'', shows that they are ''eligible'' for grace and favour both; and you have seen that all these clauses, ''are provided sustenance from their Lord'', ''Rejoicing in what Allāh has given'', ''They rejoice on account of favour from Allāh and (His) grace'', ''and Allāh will not waste the reward of the believers'', lead to one and the same reality.

There are other aspects of these verses, some of which were explained under the verse, And do not speak of those who are slain in Allāh's way as dead [2:154]; hopefully Allāh will help us to complete, according to our capacity, other related matters in other oppropriate places, God willing.

These verses have connection with those revealed about the battle of Uḥud, as may be understood from the clause, ''after the wound had afflicted them'', when read in conjunction with the preceding words, ''If a wound has afflicted you (at Uḥud), a wound like it has also afflicted the (unbelieving) people''.

QUR'ĀN: (As for) those who responded to the call of Allāh and the Messenger ... shall have a great reward: ''al-Istijābah'' (اَلْاِسْتِجَابَةُ) and al-ijābah (اَلْاِجَابَةُ) both reportedly have the same meaning: You ask for something and get positive response.

Allāh and His Messenger both have been mentioned here, although either word would have sufficed. Perhaps it is because the Muslims in Uḥud disobeyed Allāh and the Prophet both. They disobeyed Allāh by fleeing and retreating from the battlefield, while Allāh had ordered them to fight and forbidden them to flee. They disobeyed the Prophet when the archers violated his order not to leave their post in any case, and when the rest of the Muslims ran off precipitately and did not respond to his call although he was calling them from their rear. Now that they did respond positively on this later occasion, they were described as responding to Allāh and the Messenger both, to set the matter in parallel.

The clause, ''those among them who do good (to others) and guard (against evil) shall have a great reward'', restricts the promise to only a group among those who had responded. It is because the response is an external action which does not necessarily spring from the reality of doing good and guarding against evil — on which the great reward depends. It is an amazing watchfulness of the Qur'ān that one topic does not distract it from other realities. It is evident from above that not all of the responders were sincere to Allāh in this matter; some of them were not true doers of good to others nor did they sincerely guard themselves against evil — and these are the important characteristics which make one eligible for great reward from Allāh.

Some people have said that ''min'' (مِنْ = from, among) in ''minhum'' (مِنْهُمْ = among them), is not here to indicate a portion; rather it is explanatory, in the same way as it is in verse 48:29, where it says: Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh; and those with him are severe against the unbelievers ... Allāh has promised those among them who believe and do good, forgiveness and a great reward. But it is an interpretation which does not agree with the context.

Also, it is clear that their praise contained in later verses, ''Those to whom the people said ...'', is intended for a selected band of them although in wordings it is attributed to the whole group.

QUR'ĀN: Those to whom the people said: ''Surely men have gathered against you ... and Allāh is the Lord of mighty grace: ''an-Nās'' (اَلنَّاسُ = people, men) is used for human beings when no distinguishing factor (to separate one from another) is taken into account. The first an-nās (translated here as ''people'') is different from the second (translated as ''men''); the latter refers to the enemy that was gathering army to fight the believers, while the former were those who had forsaken the believers in Uḥud and held back from them and were now talking with them in this way to keep them back, so that they (the believers) would not proceed forth to fight the polytheists. In other words, the latter refers to the polytheists and the former to their agents within the Muslim camp who insidiously worked against the believers. The verse manifestly shows that they were a group not one person. It supports the report that the verses were revealed not about the events of the Lesser Badr, but about the Prophet's campaign when, after Uḥud, he went forth with the remnants of his companions in pursuit of the polytheists. Both events will be narrated in the coming ''Traditions''.

''Surely men have gathered against you'', that is, they have gathered to attack you again. (And Allāh knows better.) ''but this (only) increased their faith'': It is but natural that when a man intends to do something, and someone whom he does not trust advises him not to do it, then that prohibition gives an impetus to do it by all means; his powers and faculties become geared to do that work, and his intention becomes firmer. The more the said advisor persists in prohibition, the more determined the man becomes to do it. This effect is even more stronger when the man so advised believes that he is on right and that he must do what his duty requires him to do. That is why whenever someone blamed the believers regarding some divine orders or put hindrance in their way, their belief increased even more and their determination and courage became much more stronger.

Possibly one factor that helped to increase their faith was the confirmation that such news produced of the revealed information that they had had in advance that they would have to suffer trouble, harm and damage in the divine cause until their affairs were favourably settled by Allāh's permission. Allāh had promised to help them, and naturally that type of help presupposes fighting and war. ''and they said: 'Allāh is sufficient for us and most excellent Protector is (He)' '': Ḥasbunā (حَسْبُنَا = sufficient for us); this word is derived from al-ḥisāb (اَلْحِسَابُ = to count, to reckon), because sufficiency is reckoned, vis-a-vis, the need. The sentence portrays their total dependence on Allāh, because of their faith — without caring about external causes which the divine system has created in the world. al-Wakīl (اَلْوَكِيْلُ = agent, manager, representative) refers to one who manages the affairs on behalf of someone. The connotation of the verse is therefore similar to that of the verse 65:3: and whoever trusts in Allāh, He is sufficient for him; surely Allāh attains His purpose. That is why this clause (and they said: ''Allāh is sufficient for us and most excellent Protector is [He]'') has been followed by the words, ''So they returned with favour from Allāh and (His) grace; no evil touched them.'' Therefore, when they followed His pleasure, He praised them in these words, ''and they followed the pleasure of Allāh; and Allāh is the Lord of mighty grace''.

TRUST IN ALLĀH

The fact is that fulfilment of desire and success of design in this material world depends on some material and other psychological causes. When man intends to do something and produces its necessary material causes, then the only thing that can prevent his realization of his wishes is some shortcoming in its psychological causes, in his mental attitude; like weakness of will-power, fear or sorrow, recklessness or covetousness, foolishness or distrust, and things like that — and they are important and common factors. But when a man relies on Allāh, he is connected to the unconquerable cause that can never fail — the cause above all the causes. This connection strengthens his will to such an extent that no adverse psychological cause can overpower it — and it spells success and triumph.

There is another aspect to the trust in Allāh which in effect joins it to super-natural miraculous phenomena, as is evident from the words of Allāh: and whoever trusts in Allāh, He is sufficient for him; surely Allāh attains His purpose [65:3]. Some aspects of this subject have already been described under the topic of ‘‘Miracle’’.[1]

QUR’ĀN: That is only the Satan that frightens ... and fear Me if you are believers: Evidently the demonstrative pronoun ‘‘dhālikum’’ (ذٰلِكُمْ = that) refers to the people who had brought the quoted news. It is therefore one of the occasions where the Qur’ān has used the word, ‘‘Satan’’, for man; as is apparent also from the verses: ... from the evil of the whispering of the slinking (Satan), who whispers into the hearts of men, from among the jinn and the men [114:4 — 6]. This explanation is supported by the next sentence, ‘‘so do not fear them’’, that is, do not fear the people who have spoken to you in that manner, because they are only Satans. (We shall later on explain this matter, unveiling the reality behind it, if Allāh so wills.)

TRADITIONS

Innumerable traditions have been narrated concerning the battle of Uḥud; but there is so much contradiction and conflict among them — about various aspects of the event — that it is difficult to trust all of them. The most glaring contradictions are seen in those traditions which try to explain the reasons of revelation of most of the verses (there are nearly sixty verses in all). One is amazed to look at those traditions; a contemplating reader finds himself bound to decide that various sectarian inclinations have filled them with their own spirits — making them to speak what would benefit narrators in their sectarian causes. That is why we have not quoted them in this discourse; whoever is interested, should consult various collections of traditions and biger books of exegesis.

Ibn Abī Ḥāim narrates from Abu ’ḍ-Ḍuḥā that he said: ‘‘The verse was revealed: and take (‘‘ash-shuhadā’ ’’ اَلشُّهَدَآءُ) witnesses from among you [3:140]; so seventy of them were martyred on that day: four from the Emigrants — Ḥamzah ibn ‘Abdi ’l-Muṭṭalib, Muṣ‘ab ibn ‘Umayr (from Banū ‘Abdu’d-Dār), ash-Shammās ibn ‘Uthmān al-Makhzūmī and

The author says: The tradition shows that Abu ’ḍ-Ḍuḥā has taken the word ash-shuhadā’ for ‘martyrs’; and an overwhelming majority of the exegetes has followed suit. But we have explained in the relevant Commentary that apparently no proof can be found in the Book for this meaning; evidently the word refers to the witnesses of the deeds.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, Do you think that you will enter the Garden while Allāh has not yet known those who strive hard from among you ...: ‘‘Certainly Allāh did know what He was going to create before He created it, when they were tiny particles; (likewise) He knew who would strive and who would not, as He knew that He would give death to His creatures (even) before He caused their death — while their death was not yet seen, (and) they were still alive.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: The tradition points to what has been explained earlier that there is a difference between knowledge before creation and the factual knowledge which is the same as the action. When this verse says, Allāh has not yet known those who strive ..., it does not speak about the knowledge before creation.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, And certainly you desired death before you met it, so indeed you have seen it (even) while you look (at it): ‘‘When Allāh, the High, informed the believers what (favour) He had done to their martyrs of Badr in their abodes in the Garden, they coveted that (honour), and said: ‘O Allāh, show us [i.e. provide for us] a fighting in which we should be martyred.’ Therefore Allāh showed it to them on the day of Uḥud; but they did not remain firm except him whom Allāh wished among them. So this is the word of Allāh, And certainly you desired death ...’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: This meaning has been narrated in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from Ibn ‘Abbās, Mujāhid, Qatādah, al-Ḥasan and as-Suddī.

The Imām said: ‘‘Surely the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was wounded on the day of Uḥud, and observers saw him in that condition; then they started telling whomever they met, ‘Certainly the Messenger of Allāh has been killed; (look for) safety.’ So when they returned to Medina, Allāh revealed: And Muḥammad is no more than a Messenger, the messengers have already passed away before him; if then he dies or is killed, will you then turn back upon your heels? (He means: to the disbelief?) And whoever turns back upon his heels, he will by no means do harm to Allāh in the least.’’ (ibid.)

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from ar-Rabī‘ about the above verse; ‘‘It was on the day of Uḥud when they were afflicted with what afflicted them of slaughter and injury, and they talked among themselves about the Prophet of Allāh; they said: ‘He has been killed.’ Others among them said: ‘Had he been a prophet he would not have been killed.’ But some high-ranking Companions of the Prophet said: ‘Fight for what your Prophet had fought for, until Allāh gives you victory or you join him (after martyrdom).’ And we have been told that an Emigrant passed by a Helper who was struggling in his blood, and said: ‘O so-and-so! do you know that Muḥammad has been killed?’ The Helper said: ‘If Muḥammad has been killed, then surely he had (already) conveyed (the divine message); so fight in the cause of your religion.’ Then Allāh revealed: And Muḥammad is no more than a Messenger, the messengers have already passed away before him; if then he dies or is killed, will you then turn back upon your heels? He means: Will you then turn back to disbelief after believing?’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from as-Suddī that he said: ‘‘(A rumour) spread among the people on the day of Uḥud that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was killed. Then some Companions of the rock [i.e. the people who had fled on the mountains] said: ‘Would that we had a messenger to ‘Abdullāh ibn Ubayy so that he could obtain protection for us from Abū Sufyān. O people! Muḥammad has been killed; so return back to your people [to polytheism], before they come to you and kill you.’ [Hearing this] Anas ibn an-Naḍr said: ‘O people! If Muḥammad has been killed, the Lord of Muḥammad has not been killed. Fight there-fore for what Muḥammad had fought for. O Allāh ! I apologize to Thee from what these people say, and disavow before Thee what they have brought.’ [Saying this] he drew his sword and fought until he was martyred. Then

Allāh revealed: And Muḥammad is no more then a Messenger ...'' (ibid.)

The author says: This theme has been narrated through numerous other chains of narrators.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ''Surely ‘Alī was afflicted with sixty wounds. The Prophet told Umm Salīm and Umm ‘Aṭiyyah to treat him. They said: ‘No sooner do we dress him [his wounds] in one place than another place is torn apart; and we are afraid about him [his life].’ Then the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) entered, and the Muslims were visiting him (‘Alī) — and he [his body] was one [big] wound. [The Prophet] started wiping him [‘Alī’s body] with his hand; and was saying: ‘Certainly a man who met this [much affliction] in [the way of] Allāh, has proved himself brave and is absolved [from every blame].’ And no sooner did the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) touch a wound than it was healed. Then ‘Alī said: ‘Praise be to Allāh as I did not flee and did not turn [my] back.’ So Allāh thanked him for it in two places in the Qur’ān; and it is His word, and Allāh will reward the grateful, and, We will reward the grateful.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: It means that Allāh thanked ‘Alī’s steadfastness and firmness, not his words, ‘Praise be to Allāh.’

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) recited, ''And how many a prophet has fought with whom were myriads of Godly men'', and said: ''Thousands and thousands.'' Then he said: ''Yes, by Allāh, they were martyred.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: This recitation and meaning has been reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Ibn Mas‘ūd and others; and it has been narrated that Ibn ‘Abbās was asked about this word and he said: ''gatherings.''

‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from Mujāhid that he said about the words of Allāh, after He had shown you that which you loved: ''Allāh helped the believers against the polytheists until the women of the polytheists rode every spirited and feeble [camel]. After that the polytheists were let to triumph over them because of their (the Muslims') disobedience of the Prophet.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Rāhwayh, 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn al-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Bayhaqī (in his Dalā'ilu 'n-nubūwwah) have narrated from az-Zubayr that he said: ''You would have seen me with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); when the fear overwhelmed us, Allāh sent sleep on us; then there was not a man among us but his chin was on his breast. Then, by Allāh, I was hearing the talk of Mu'tab ibn Qushayr — and I heard it as if it were in a dream — 'Had we any hand in the affair, we would not have been slain here.' So I remembered it from him; and it was about it that Allāh revealed: Then after sorrow He sent down security upon you, a slumber coming upon a party of you, ... we would not have been slain here, because of the talk of Mu'tab ibn Qushayr.'' (ibid.)

The author says: This information has been narrated from az-Zubayr ibn al-'Awwām through numerous chains of narrators.

Ibn Mandah has narrated in, Ma'rifatu 'ṣ-ṣaḥābah, from Ibn 'Abbās that the verse, ''(As for) those of you who turned back on the day when the two armies met ..., was revealed about 'Uthmān, Rāfi'ibn al-Mu'allā and Ḥārithah ibn Zayd.'' (ibid.)

The author says: Nearly similar traditions have been narrated through several chains from 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān ibn 'Awf, 'Ikrimah and Ibn Isḥāq. In some of them the names of Abū Ḥudhayfah ibn 'Aqabah, al-Walīd ibn 'Aqabah, Sa'd ibn 'Uthmān and 'Aqabah ibn 'Uthmān, have been added.

In any case, the names of 'Uthmān and others have been mentioned in these traditions as examples only. Otherwise, the verse covers all those Companions who had fled away and disobeyed the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). Of course, there is a reason why 'Uthmān has especially been mentioned in the traditions: He and those who fled with him continued running away until they reached al-Jal'ab (a mountain in the region of Medina near al-Aghwaṣ), and they remained there for three days; then they came back to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), who said to them:

‘‘You had indeed gone very far in it!’’

As for the Companions of the Prophet in general, there are numerous traditions that all of them had fled; and there was none left with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) except two persons from the Emigrants and seven from the Helpers; then the polytheists attacked the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and all the Helpers, one after the other, gave their lives defending the Prophet; none of them survived.

It has variously been reported that eleven persons remained with the Prophet, or eighteen or even thirty — but this tradition is the weakest of all.

Perhaps, this difference emanates from different information reaching the narrators, or for some other reasons. The traditions which describe how Nasībah al-Māziniyyah defended the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) prove that at that particular time nobody was with the Prophet and that those who had remained steadfast — had not fled away — were busy in fighting the polytheists. The only person who, the traditions unanimously say, had not fled was ‘Alī; and probably Abū Dujānah al-Anṣārī, Simāk ibn Kharashah also comes into this category; but he fought with the sword of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), thereafter when the Companions left the Prohet alone, Abū Dujānah continued shielding him with his own body, deflecting the arrows from him with his shield until he fell down seriously wounded. May Allāh be pleased with him.

As for the rest of the Companions, some returned to the Prophet when they recognized him and realized that he was not killed; some others came back after sometime. It were these returning Companions on whom Allāh had sent the slumber. However, Allāh pardoned all of them. You have seen in the preceding Commentary what pardon means. Some exegetes have said that pardon in this verse means that Allāh diverted the polytheists from them, so that they (the polytheists) did not exterminate them (the Muslims) completely.

Ibn ‘Adiyy and al-Bayhaqī (in his Shu‘abu ’l-īmān) have narrated through good chain from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘When the verse (and take counsel with them in the affair) was revealed, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘As for Allāh and His Messenger, they are in no need of it [counsel]; but Allāh has made it a mercy for my ummah; therefore whoever among them shall consult [others] will not be deprived of guidance, and whoever leaves it will not avoid misguidance.’ ’’ (ibid.)

aṭ-Ṭabarānī has narrated in his, al-Awsaṭ, from Anas that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘He who asks (Allāh) for good, does not go wrong; and he who takes counsel does not regret.’ ’’ (ibid.)

‘‘He who proceeds independently in his opinion is destroyed, and he who seeks advice of men becomes partner in their wisdom.’’ (Nahju ’l-balāghah)

‘‘To seek advice is the guidance itself; and he who proceeds independently with his opinion incurs the danger.’’ (ibid.)

The Prophet said: ‘‘There is no solitude more dreary than pride; and no support stronger than consultation.’’ (at-Tafsīr aṣ-Ṣāfī)

The author says: There are numerous traditions about consultation. The consultation is valid in those matters where one has the choice of doing or not doing a thing as would seem more preferable. As far as the definite divine rules and laws are concerned, there is no question of consultation about them, as no one has got any authority to change them. Otherwise, it would be as though current events and new trends would abrogate the words of Allāh!

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘People’s pleasure cannot be controlled, and their tongue cannot be restrained. Did not they accuse him [i.e., the Prophet] on the day of Badr that he had taken for himself a red velvet from the war booty? Until Allāh informed him of [the whereabouts of] the velvet and absolved His Prophet from [embezzlement and] faithlessness; and revealed in His Book: And it is not attributable to a prophet that he should defraud ...’’ (al-Majālis)

The author says: al-Qummī has reported it in his, at-Tafsīr; and there it says: ‘‘Then a man came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said: ‘Surely so-and-so has fraudulently taken a red velvet and has buried it in that place.’ So the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) ordered to dig that place; and the velvet was found out.’’

This and nearly similar meanings have been narrated in ad-Durr ’l-manthūr through numerous chains. Perhaps when the traditions say that this verse was revealed about that event, they mean that it points to that; otherwise, as we have already explained, the context shows that it was revealed after the battle of Uḥud.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ‘‘He who defrauds something, will see it on the Day of Resurrection in the Fire; then he will be charged to enter therein and take it out of the Fire.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: It is a fine inference from the words of Allāh: ‘‘and he who defrauds shall bring (with him) that which he has defrauded.’’

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, They are of (diverse) grades with Allāh: ‘‘Those who follow the pleasure of Allāh are the Imams, and they are, by Allāh, of grades with Allāh for the believers; and through their love and devotion to us, Allāh increases their deeds for them, and Allāh enhances (their) high grades for them; and those who have brought upon themselves the wrath from Allāh are those who rejected the right of ‘Alī (a.s.) and the right of the Imāms from us, Ahlu ’l-bayt; so in this way they brought upon themselves Allāh’s wrath.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: It is based on the ‘flow’ of the Qur’ān, and applies the verse to its most prominent example.

ar-Riḍā (a.s.) said: ‘‘The ‘grade’ is (the distance) between the heaven and the earth.’’ (ibid.)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, What! when a misfortunate befell you while you had certainly afflicted (the unbelievers) with twice as much .... ‘‘The Muslims had afflicted at Badr one hundred and forty (unbelievers) people — they had killed seventy men and imprisoned seventy. When there came the day of Uḥud, the Muslims were afflicted with seventy men, and they were grieving for them; so (this verse) was revealed.’’ (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah, at-Tirmidhī (who said that this tradition is good), Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from ‘Alī (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘Jibrīl came to the Prophet and said: ‘O Muḥammad! Surely Allāh is displeased with what your people have done in taking the prisoners; and He has ordered you to give them option between two things: Either they [the prisoners] are brought forward and beheaded; or they [the Muslims] take ransom [for the prisoners] on the condition that an equal number from among them [the Muslims] shall be killed [later].’ So the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) called the people and explained the matter to them. They said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! [they are] our clans and our people; we shall take their ransom and shall strengthen ourselves by it for fighting against our enemy; and there shall be martyred from among us equal to their number but it is not something that we might be displeased with.’ Thus were martyred seventy men from among them on the day of Uḥud — the number of the prisoners of Badr.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: [aṭ-Ṭabrisī] has narrated it in Majma‘u ’l-bayān from ‘Alī (a.s.); and also al-Qummī has quoted it in his at-Tafsīr.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) has said about the verse, And reckon not those who are killed in Allāh’s way as dead ..., that it was revealed about the martyrs of Badr and Uḥud together. (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

The author says: Numerous traditions of the same meaning have been narrated in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr and other books. But you have seen that the verses are general and cover everyone who is actually martyred in the way of Allāh or is counted as a martyr.

Sometimes it is said that these verses were revealed about the martyrs of Bi’r [i.e. Well of] Ma‘ūnah. They were seventy or forty Companions of the Prophet whom he had sent to call ‘Āmir ibn aṭ-Ṭufayl and his people to Islam; and they were near that water. [The Companions] sent Abū Milḥān al-Anṣārī ahead to convey the message; but they killed him, then they attacked the rest of the Companions of the Prophet and fought them until they [the enemy] killed all of them. May Allāh be pleased with them.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about this verse: ‘‘They are, by Allāh, our Shī‘ahs. When their souls enter the Garden and they receive the honour from Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, they acquire knowledge and certainty that surely they were on the truth and on the religion of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great; so they rejoice on account of those who have not yet joined them, from among their brothers, who are behind them from among the believers.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: It is based on the ‘‘flow’’ of the Qur’ān. That they would acquire knowledge and certainty of their being on the truth, means that they would perceive it by the eye of certainty, after they had known it in this world by knowledge of certainty. It does not mean that before that they had any doubt or uncertainty about it.

Aḥmad, Hannād, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Abū Dāwūd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn al-Mundhir, al-Ḥākim (who said that this tradition is correct) and al-Bayhaqī (in his Dalā’ilu ’n-nubūwwah) have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘When your brethren were afflicted (i.e. martyred) in Uḥud, Allāh put their souls inside the green birds, who come to the Garden’s rivers, and eat from its fruits and lodge in golden candelabra suspended in shadow of the Throne.

‘So when they found the goodness of their food and drink, and beauty of their resting place, they said: ‘‘Would that our brothers knew what Allāh has done for us.’’ ’ Another narration says: ‘They said: ‘‘[Would that our brothers knew that] we are alive in the Garden, getting sustenance, so that they would not abandon jihād and would not shrink from fighting’’ Thereupon, Allāh said: ‘‘I shall convey to them [this message] on your behalf.’’ So Allāh sent down these verses: And reckon not those who are killed ...’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: There are numerous traditions of this theme, narrated from Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī, ‘Abdullāh ibn Mas‘ūd, Abu ’l-‘Āliyah, Ibn ‘Abbās and others. Some of these traditions, like that of Abu ’1-‘Āliyah, use the phrase, ‘in the forms of green birds’; others like that of Abū Sa‘īd say, ‘in the green birds’; yet others like that of Ibn Mas‘ūd say, ‘like green birds’; but all the wordings convey almost similar meanings.

It has come to us through the chains reaching to the Imāms of the Ahlu ’l-bayt that the above tradition was put before them and they denied that it was said by the Prophet; some traditions say that they interpreted that tradition in some other way; and there is no doubt that — keeping in view the confirmed and accepted principles — that tradition has to be interpreted away, if it is not rejected altogether.

In any case, those traditions do not purport to describe the martyrs’ condition in the Garden of the hereafter; rather they refer to the Garden of al-Barzakh. It is proved by the tradition of Ibn Jarīr from Mujāhid in which he says: 'They are given sustenance from the fruit of the Garden and feel its scent but they are not in it.' Also, Ibn Jarīr narrates from as-Suddī in which he says: 'Surely the souls of the martyrs are inside the green birds in golden candelabra hanging from the Throne; so they pick their food in the Garden in morning and evening, and lodge at night in the candelabra.' As you have seen in the earlier discourse on al-Barzakh that these themes may fit the Garden of this world, but not on that of the hereafter.

As regards the verses: (As for) those who responded to the call of Allāh and the Messenger ..., Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr and al-Bayhaqī (in his ad-Dalā'il) have narrated from 'Abdullāh ibn Abī Bakr ibn Muḥammad ibn 'Amr ibn Ḥazm that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) came out [proceeding] towards Ḥamrā'u 'l-Asad; and Abū Sufyān [and his retreating army] had unanimously decided to return to [reattack] the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and his Companions. They said [to each other]: 'We have returned before annihilating them (i.e. the Muslims); certainly we must attack their remnants again.' Then news reached him (i.e. Abū Sufyān) that the Prophet had come out with his Companions in his pursuit. This (news) dissuaded Abū Sufyān and his army [from pursuing their plan]; Some riders from the tribe of 'Abdu 'l-Qays passed them; so Abū Sufyān. said to them: 'Give the news to Muḥammad that we [the Quraysh] have decided to reattack his Companions aiming at their annihilation.' The riders met the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) at Ḥamrā'u 'l-Asad, and informed him as Abū Sufyān had asked them to do. But the Messenger of Allāh and the believers with him said: 'Allāh is sufficient for us and most excellent Protector is He.' Thereupon Allāh revealed about it: (As for) those who responded to the call of Allāh and the Messenger ... (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: al-Qummī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr in detail; he reports, inter alia, that the Prophet had taken with him to Ḥamrā'u 'l-Asad only those of the Companions who had been wounded [at Uḥud]. Some other traditions say that he had taken only those who were with him at Uḥud. Practically the import of both reports is the same.

Mūsā ibn ‘Aqabah (in his al-Maghāzī) and al-Bayhaqī (in his al-Dalā’il) have narrated from Ibn Shahāb that he said: ‘‘Surely the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) called the Muslims together to be at the appointed time at Badr for [fighting] Abū Sufyān [about a year after the battle of Badr]. The Satan thereupon instigated his friends among the men who went to the people frightening them and saying: ‘We have been informed that they (the polytheists) have gathered for fighting you an army like the (dark) night, they hope to attack you and plunder you. Therefore, beware, beware.’ But Allāh protected the Muslims from the frightening [campaign] of the Satan; and they responded to the call of Allāh and His Messenger, and came out with their [trade] articles; they said: ‘If we meet Abū Sufyān, then it is for what we have come forth; and if we did not meet him then we would sell our articles.’ (Badr was the site of an annual trade-fare.] So, they went forth until they reached the fare-ground of Badr, and they fulfilled their needs there; while Abū Sufyān failed to reach the rendezvous — neither he nor his companions did come forth. Meanwhile, Ibn Ḥamām passed from near them (the Muslims) and asked: ‘Who are these?’ People told him: ‘(They are) the Messenger of Allāh and his Companions (who are) waiting for Abū Sufyān and his group of the Quraysh.’ He then went to the Quraysh and told them the news. This frightened Abū Sufyān who went back to Mecca. And the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) returned to Medina with Allāh’s favour and grace. This al-ghazwah (اَلْغَزْوَةُ)[1] is called the Expedition of the army of as-sawīq (اَلسَّوِيْقُ)[2];and it was in Sha‘bān, the third year of hijrah.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: [as-Suyūṭī] has narrated it from another chain too. [aṭ-Ṭabrisī] has narrated it in Majma‘u ’l-bayān, in detail, from al-Bāqir (a.s.), in which he, inter alia, says that the verses were revealed about the ghazwah of Lesser Badr; and that the army of sawīq refers to that of Abū Sufyān, because he had come out from Mecca with an army of the Quraysh; and they had with them loads of sawīq (as provision). They

[1] al-Ghazwah, means military expedition; in Islamic terminology it is used for every expedition in which the Prophet participated — irrespective of whether there was any fighting or not. (tr.)

[2] as-Sawīq, means a kind of mush made of wheat or barley. (tr.)

camped out of Mecca and sustained themselves with the sawīq, and then they returned to Mecca because they became frightened of meeting the Muslims at Badr. Therefore, the people called them the ‘‘army of sawīq’’, in mockery and derision.

an-Nasā’ī, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and aṭ-Ṭabarānī have narrated through correct chain from ‘Ikrimah from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘When the polytheists returned from Uḥud, they said [to each other]: ‘Neither you killed Muḥammad, nor you took buxom girls with you [as captives] on the camels. Wretched is what you have done! Return [to attack the Muslims].’ The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) heard the news; so he called the Muslims and they gathered until he reached Ḥamrā’u ’l-Asad or the Well of Abū ‘Utbah. (The doubt is from Sufyān, [one of the narrators]). Then the polytheists said: ‘We shall come back next year.’ Therefore, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) too returned. So it was counted as al-ghazwah. Thereupon, Allāh revealed, (As for) those who responded to the call of Allāh and the Messenger ... Indeed Abū Sufyān said to the Prophet: ‘Your appointed place and time is the fare of Badr where you had slain our companions.’ So as for the coward, he returned, and as for the brave, he took (his) fighting arms and trade-articles; then they came there (i.e. Badr) but did not find anyone there; so they sold and bought [at the fare]; then Allāh revealed: So they returned with favour from Allāh and (His) grace ...’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: We have quoted this tradition here although it goes against the principle of brevity and abridgement which we generally observe in the traditions. We have quoted here comprehensive examples of every theme, in order that a discerning research scholar may understand that what the scholars have written regarding the causes of revelation is — all or most of it — based on personal views; that is, generally they would describe historical events, then write after it the Qur’ānic verses which would correspond with the theme; and then they would count that event as the cause of that verse’s revelation. Often this results in fragmentation of a single verse, or a set of verses of a single context, and then they ascribe each part to an independent cause of revelation — even if it disturbs the verse’s structure or negates its context. It is one of the causes of weakness in those traditions that are narrated about the occasions of revelation.

Add to it what we have mentioned in the beginning of this topic that sectarian differences and inclinations have greatly influenced the style and tone of these traditions as everyone has tried to pull them in the direction of his particular belief and view.

Moreover, political environment and ruling atmosphere has in every era strongly put its stamp on the realities either by hiding it completely or covering it in ambiguity. Therefore, a thinking scholar should never close his eyes from these factors which have utmost relevance to the understanding of realities. And Allāh is the Guide.

THE MARTYRS OF UḤUD

Seventy Muslims were martyred on the day of Uḥud, the list of their names being as follows:

1. Ḥamzah ibn ‘Abdi ’1-Muṭṭalib ibn Hāshim.
2. ‘Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh.
3. Muṣ‘ab ibn ‘Umayr.
4. Shammās ibn ‘Uthmān. (These four martyrs were from the Emigrants.)
5. ‘Amr ibn Mu‘ādh ibn an-Nu‘mān.
6. al-Ḥārith ibn Anas ibn Rāfi‘.

COMMENTARY

The verses have some connection with those revealed about the battle of Uḥud. These and especially the first four of them are probably a sort of epilogue to the preceding ones. The most important theme of the preceding talk was the principle of test and trial which Allāh makes His servants to undergo. Therefore, these are like the sum total of the verses of Uḥud. Allāh describes here that the test and trial is an established and continual system from which no one — neither a believer nor an unbeliever — can escape; Allāh will certainly test both in order to expose and unveil the hidden realities of their souls; in this way the unbeliever will become totally fit for the Fire, and the evil will become separated from the good in the believer.

QUR'ĀN: And let not those grieve you ... and they shall have a painful chastisement: The verse consoles the Prophet and removes sorrow by describing the reality of the whole affair. The unbelievers compete with each other in rushing towards disbelief; they help one another to extinguish the light of Allāh and sometimes even succeed in overpowering the believers. It sometimes grieves the believers as it seems as if they (the unbelievers) have scored against Allāh by thwarting His plan to make the word of truth triumphant. But if the believer ponders on the system of general and all-encompassing test, he will become sure that it is Allāh Who is victorious; and that all persons are relentlessly proceeding to their destination in order that their creative and legislative guidance to their goals may be completed. The unbeliever is driven to that goal by the health and strength, bounty and comfort that he is provided with — Allāh in this way draws him nearer to his destruction in degrees and unfolds His plan against him — enabling him to go to the furthest possible limit of transgression and disobedience. The believer on the other hand is continuously scraped through test and trial until his belief and faith is cleansed from all rust and pollution, and he becomes absolutely pure for Allāh; while the unbeliever's polytheistic tendencies are purged of every shade of belief and he falls down where other friends of false deities and leaders of infidelity have gone.

The verse therefore means as follows: You should not grieve on account of those who proceed with increasing haste towards disbelief. Why should you grieve? Do you think as if they can do any harm to Allāh? Certainly you cannot think so, because they cannot do any harm to Allāh; they are under complete control of Allāh, and He is driving them in their lives' journey to their goal where they will be left with no portion, no share, in the hereafter (and it is the final limit of their infidelity); and they shall have a painful chastisement. The prohibition, therefore, in the clause, ''And let not those grieve you'', is of advisory nature; the clause, ''surely they can do no harm to Allāh'', describes the reason of that prohibition; and the next words, ''Allāh intends that He should not give them ...'', explains why they are unable to do any harm to Allāh.

Thereafter Allāh makes it clear that no unbeliever — whether he hastens to fall into disbelief or not — can do any harm to Him. The next verse thus states the general principle after mentioning a particular case. This may serve as the reason for the preceding prohibition, ''And let not those grieve you'', or it may be treated as the reason of the preceding reason, ''surely they can do no harm'' — because it has a general import which may explain the reason of a particular reason. The meaning thus will be as follows: We have said that those who fall into disbelief hastily can do no harm to Allāh, because no unbeliever can do any harm to Him.

QUR'ĀN: And let not those who disbelieve think ... a disgraceful chastisement: After putting the Prophet's mind at rest regarding the unbelievers' falling into unbelief hastily, and explaining that in all this they are in fact subservient to Allāh's plan, Who is driving them to a stage where they shall have no share in the hereafter, Allāh now turns to the unbelievers themselves. He tells them that they should not be happy with the respite granted to them by Allāh, because Allāh through this respite is giving them a chance to pile up sins over sins, and behind it all there is a disgraceful chastisement waiting for them — there is nothing for them except shame and ignominy in the hereafter. This all is based on the divinely established system of completion that every creature should bring his potentials to fruition, according to his own choice.

QUR'ĀN: On no account will Allāh leave the believers ... then you shall have a great reward: Now the Speaker turns to the believers. He explains to them that the system of test and trial covers them too, in order that they too should reach the stage of completion; and the purified believer may be distinguished from the unpure, and evil and wicked ones may be separated from the good and virtuous ones.

The next sentence aims at removing a possible misconception. It could be assumed that there was another way of distinguishing evil from good; that is, Allāh could let the believers know who was wicked and evil so that they could avoid him. Thus, they could easily be saved all these troubles and turmoils which they had to suffer because of their commingling with hypocrites and those whose hearts were diseased. Allāh erases such erroneous impression by pointing out that He has exclusively reserved the knowledge of unseen to Himself, He does not reveal it to anyone except to some chosen messengers whom He might acquaint with it. This is the import of the sentence, ''nor is Allāh going to make you acquainted with the unseen, but Allāh chooses of His messengers whom He pleases''.

Thereafter, Allāh says to them: As there is no escape from test and trial, nor from turning the potentials into accomplishments, it is in your interest that you should believe in Allāh and His messengers, so that you should be counted among the good ones — and not among the evil ones. But mere belief is not sufficient to preserve the blessedness of the life, it is also necessary to support it with good deeds that would raise the belief up to Allāh and preserve its blessings — it is then that the reward would be complete. It was with this connotation in view that the Qur'ān first said, ''therefore believe in Allāh and His messengers'', and then completed it with the next clause, ''and if you believe and guard (against evil), then you shall have a great reward''.

It is evident from this verse that:

First: Every soul has to reach its perfection, has to be brought to its goal and destination — be it felicity and happiness or infelicity and unhappiness. It is an issue which cannot be avoided, a proposition from which there is no escape.

Second: The good and the evil are attributed to the ''self'' or ''soul'' of the persons, but at the same time and in the same context they depend on the belief and the disbelief respectively — and these two are within man's power and emanate from his will and choice. This is among the finest Qur'ānic realities which opens the door to many secrets of monotheism. It may be understood from the words of Allāh: And every one has a direction to which he would turn; therefore hasten to (do) good works [2:148], when read in conjunction with the words: but that He might try you in what He gave you, therefore strive with one another to hasten to virtuous deeds [5:48]. We shall write on this topic in full detail under the verse: That Allāh may separate the impure from the pure, and put the impure, some of it upon the other, and pile it up together, then cast it into hell [8:37].

Third: The belief in Allāh and His messengers is the essence of the goodness of life, i.e., goodness of ''person'' or ''soul''. So far as reward is concerned it depends upon piety and good deeds. That is why Allāh has first mentioned the subject of separating the good from the evil; then basing on that, has given the order to believe in Allāh and His messengers; thereafter when He wanted to mention the reward, He added piety (guarding against evil) to the belief; and said: ''and if you believe and guad (against evil), then you shall have a great reward''.

From the above, you may easily understand the connotation of the verse 97 of chapter 16: Whoever does good whether male or female and he is a believer, We will most certainly make him live a happy life, and We will most certainly give them their reward for the best of what they did. Evidently his happy life is the result of his belief, and emanates from it; but the reward is the result of the good deeds. Therefore, belief is the soul of the good life. But its continuity — so that it may produce the desired effects — requires good deeds. It is like the natural life which depends on a soul for its coming into being but its continuity depends on the use of its powers and organs — if all become still, all will die and life will end.

The name, Allāh, has been repeated several [i.e. four] times in this verse. There was a possibility of using pronouns in place of the latter three, but the proper Divine Name was used so that it might clearly guide to the Source of all greatness and beauty, because the verses were related to those affairs which are exclusively reserved to Him in His divinity, that is, test of the creatures, knowledge of the unseen, selection of the messengers and man's ability to believe in Him.

QUR'ĀN: And let not those deem, ... and Allāh is aware of what you do: The preceding verse has described how Allāh gives respite to the unbelievers. The case of niggardliness, of not spending the wealth in the way of Allāh, is not different from that; a niggardly person rejoices in, and boasts of, the riches he has amassed. Therefore Allāh now addresses them and shows that what they are proud of, is actually worse for them. The wealth is described as, ''that which Allāh has granted them out of His grace''; it shows how mean they are and how much they should be condemned. The description, that the wealth which they are so niggardly about shall become like iron collar around their necks, shows why their niggardliness is worse for them. The clause, ''and Allāh's is the heritage of the heavens and the earth'', is apparently a circumstantial one related to ''the Resurrection Day'', that is, on the Resurrection Day when to Allāh will belong the said heritage. The same is the position of the last clause, ''and Allāh is aware of what you do''.

As a remote possibility, the words, ''and Allāh's is the heritage ..., may be treated as the circumstantial clause of the verb, ''are niggardly''; while the next clause, ''and Allāh is aware of what you do'', may have the same position [i.e. circumstantial clause of, ''are niggardly''], or may be treated as an independent sentence.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) was asked about the unbeliever whether death was better for him or life. He said: ‘‘Death is better for the believer and the unbeliever (both); because Allāh says, and that which is with Allāh is best for the righteous [3;198], and He (also) says: ‘And let not those who disbelieve think that Our granting them respite is good for their souls ...’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: The argument given in this tradition does not fully conform with the style of the Imāms of the Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.), because the word, ‘‘righteous’’, refers to only a particular group of the believers, not to all of them. Although it may be said that the word covers all the believers because each of them has got some portion of righteousness in him.

A tradition of the above meaning has been narrated in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr, from Ibn Mas‘ūd.

COMMENTARY

The verses are connected with the preceding ones. The general import of the preceding verses was to invigorate the believers and inspire them to fight in the way of Allāh with their properties and their lives, as well as to warn them against weakheartedness, cowardice and niggardliness. This connects it to the Jews' talk that ''Allāh is poor and we are rich'', together with their upsetting the Muslims' affairs, rejecting the evidence of messengership and hiding what they had been enjoined to make known. These are the very topics which these verses deal with. In addition, they strengthen the believers' hearts to remain firm and steadfast; urge them to be patient and courageous; and exhort them to spend in the way of Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: Allāh has certainly heard the saying of those who said. ''Surely Allāh is poor and we are rich'': The sayers were the Jews, as may be understood from the next clause which mentions their slaying of the prophets, apart from other indications.

They said it after they had heard such divine words as, Who is it that will lend to Allāh a goodly loan ... (2:245). This view is somewhat strengthened when it is noted that this verse comes immediately after the one which condemns niggardly person: ''And let not those deem, who are niggardly in giving away ... ''. Or may be they said it when they saw the poverty and starvation of most of the believers. They taunted them saying that had their Lord been rich, He would have taken care of them and made them rich; therefore He is but poor while we are rich.

QUR'ĀN: We shall certainly write ... the chastisement of burning: Writing here means preservation and recording; or it may refer to the writing in the scroll of their deeds — the net result is the same in both cases. Their killing the prophets unjustly means that they had killed them knowingly and intentionally — not by mistake, ignorance or misunderstanding. Allāh has joined this utterance of theirs to their slaying of the prophets because this was a very grievous word; ''al-ḥarīq'' (اَلْحَرِيْقُ = translated here as burning) refers to the Hell-fire; or flame; it has been said that it has a transitive sense, that is, that which burns something.

QUR'ĀN: ''This is for what your (own) hands ... to the servants'': This clause, ''what your (own) hands have sent before'', means 'whatever deeds you have sent before'; hands have been mentioned because usually they are instrumental in sending a thing somewhere. The clause, ''and because Allāh is not in the least unjust to the servants'', is in conjunction with the words, ''what your (own) hands have sent'', and they explain the reason for writing and punishment. If Allāh had not recorded their deeds and not rewarded or punished them accordingly, it would have been tantamount to neglecting the system of the deeds; and this in its turn would have been a gross and enormous injustice because huge number of deeds would be involved — in this way Allāh would become most unjust to the servants; far above is He from such things.

QUR'ĀN: (Those are they) who said: ''Surely Allāh has enjoined us ... if you are truthful'': It is related to the preceding, ''those who said''. ''al-'Ahd'' (اَلْعَهْدُ = enjoining; order); al-qurbān (اَلْقُرْبَانُ = that which is offered, is sacrificed like sheep, etc.); ''fire consumes'' means the fire burns it. The clause, ''indeed, there came to you messengers before me'', refers to such prophets as Zakariyyā and Yaḥyā — those Israelite prophets who were slain by the Jews.

QUR'ĀN: But if they reject you, so indeed were rejected before you messengers ...: It aims at consoling the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) when they belied him. ''az Zubur'' (اَلزُّبُرُ) is plural of az-zabūr (اَلزَّبُوْرُ = a book of wisdom and sermons). The phrase, ''scriptures and the illuminating book'', refers to such revelations as the book of Nūḥ, scriptures of Ibrāhīm, the Torah and the Injīl.

QUR'ĀN: Every soul shall taste of death ... a provision of vanities: The verse contains a good promise for the believer and a threat to the rejector. It begins with a general rule that encompasses every living being.

''at-Tawfiyah" (اَلتَّوْفِيَةُ = full payment). Someone has proved the existence of al-Barzakh from this verse, because it implies some partial recompense before the Resurrection Day, when the full payment will be made. It is a good argument.

''az-Zaḥzaḥah'' (اَلزَّحْزَحَةُ = to remove far), it in fact imlies repeated pulling with haste; al-fawz (اَلْفَوْزُ = to attain the desired object); al-ghurūr (اَلْغُرُوْرُ) is either infinitive of gharra (غَرَّ = he deceived; he deluded), or plural of al-ghārr (اَلْغَارُّ = deceiver).

QUR'ĀN: You shall certainly be tried respecting your wealth and your souls ...: ''al-Iblā' '' (اَلْاِبْلاَءُ = to test; to try). Allāh first described the tests and trials that had afflicted the believers; then He mentioned the utterances of the Jews which could weaken the believers' will. Now He informs them that such divine tests and such annoying talks of the People of the Book and the polytheists will repeatedly affect the believers; that they will have to face such things and bear such talks. They should remain patient and pious, should guard themselves against evil, in order that Allāh may protect them from mistakes and weak-heartedness; so that they should emerge as people of strong and firm determination.

This prophecy gives them advance news of what they would have to suffer in future; it aims at preparing them mentally for it before hand, so that they may reconcile themselves to it. ''Adhan kathīran'' (اَذيً كَثِيْراً = much annoyance) has been used for ''annoying talk''; it is a metaphorical use of effect in place of cause.

QUR'ĀN: And when Allāh made a covenant ... evil is that which they buy. ''an-Nabdh'' (اَلنَّبْذُ = to cast away; to throw away); ''they cast it behind their backs'' is an idiom meaning 'they left it', 'they neglected it'. Its opposite idiom, 'he put it before his eyes', means 'he directed his attention to it'.

QUR'ĀN: Do not think those who rejoice ... Allāh has power over all things: The phrase, ''for what they have brought about'', means the wealth that Allāh has bestowed upon them [1], which is accompanied by

[1] Evidently it is a slip of pen. The meaning given by the author could be in place if the verb had been in passive voice, that is, ūtū (اُوتُوْا = they were love of riches and niggardliness. ''al-Mafāzah'' (اَلْمَفَازَةُ = deliverance; safety). These people were destroyed because their hearts were attached to the falsehood, and consequently they removed themselves from the protection of the truth.

At the end Allāh mentions His Kingdom of the heavens and the earth and His power over every thing. These two attributes may explain the reason of all things described in the preceding verses.

TRADITIONS

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn al-Mundhir have narrated from Qatādah about the verse, Allāh has certainly heard the saying of those ..., that he said: ''It has been reported to us that it was revealed about Huyayy ibn Akhtab; when the verse [2:245] was revealed that: Who is it that will lend to Allāh, a goodly loan, so He will multiply it for him manifold, he said: 'Our Lord asks loan from us! Surely a poor (man) asks loan from a rich one.' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr) aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said regarding this verse: ''By Allāh, they had not seen Allāh so that they could know He was poor. But they saw the friends of Allāh (who were) poor. So they said: 'Had He (Allāh) been rich He would have made His friends rich.' Thus, they boasted against Allāh of (their) riches.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ''They are those who think that the Imām is in need of what they bring to him.'' (al-Manāqib)

The author says: As described in the Commentary, the first two meanings correspond to the verse. The third tradition is based on the ''flow'' of the Qur'ān.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''There was, between those who uttered (this word) and those who killled (the prophets), a gap of five hundred years; but Allāh attached to them the (crime of) murder because they were pleased with what they [i.e., their ancestors] had done.'' (al-Kāfī) given; they were brought). But it is in active voice, that is, ataw (اَتَوْا = they brought; they gave). (tr.)

The author says: The gap mentioned in it does not agree with the current Christian Era. See the historical discourse given earlier.

It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr under the verse: Every soul shall taste of death: ''Ibn Abī Ḥātim has narrated from 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.) that he said: 'When the Prophet died and the condolence began, there came to them a comer — they heard his voice but did not see his person — and he said: ''Peace be upon you, O People of the House! and mercy of Allāh and His blessings. Every soul is to taste of the death, and you shall only be paid fully your reward on the Resurrection Day. Indeed, there is in Allāh consolation for every misfortune, and successor of everyone who dies, and overtaking everything that is lost. Therefore, in Allāh put your trust, and to Him attach your hope; because afflicted is he who is deprived of reward.'' ' Then 'Alī (a.s.) said: 'He was al-Khiḍr.' ''

Ibn Marduway has narrated from Sahl ibn Sa'd that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Verily, a place in the Garden (just sufficient) to put a whip of one of you in, is better than the world and all that is in it.' Then he recited this verse: then whoever is removed far away from the fire and is made to enter the Garden, he indeed has attained the object.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: [as-Suyūṭī] has narrated this meaning in that book through other chains from other Companions. It should be noted here that there are numerous traditions purporting to give the reason of revelation of these verses; but we have left them out because evidently they are merely people's attempts to apply the verses to various events; they are not real reasons of revelation.

COMMENTARY

The verses give the resume of the conditions of the believers, the polytheists and the People of the Book as represented in this chapter. They explain the characteristics of the righteous believers that they always remember Allāh and reflect on His signs; they seek Allāh's protection from His chastisement and beseech for His forgiveness and the Garden; and that Allāh has accepted their prayers and will surely give them what they have asked for. This is the general condition of the believers. As for the unbelievers, although they fearlessly roam the earth, but it is a brief enjoyment; and soon they will abide in the Hell-fire. One should not compare the believers with them. The only exception is of those People of the Book who have left their evil ways to follow the truth — they are with the believers.

QUR'ĀN: Most surely in the creation of the heavens and the earth and the alternation of the night and the day there are signs for men of understanding: Most probably, the word, ''creation'', here has a comprehensive connotation, denoting as to how these things came into being, what are their characteristics, properties and other concomitants like movement and stillness, changes and variations. In that case, the creation of the heavens and the earth and the alternation of the night and the day would encompass all the great phenomena of creation. Its explanation has been given in the chapter of The Cow [1]; so has also the meaning of the ''men of understanding''[2]

QUR'ĀN: Those who remember Allāh standing and sitting and lying on their sides and reflect on the creation of the heavens and the earth: That is, they remember Allāh in every condition — whether they are standing, sitting or lying down. We have earlier explained the meaning of ''remembrance'' and ''reflection''. The gist of the two verses is as follows: Observation of the signs of the heavens and the earth and the alternation of the night and the day has made them remember Allāh continuously and at all times; they never forget Him in any situation. Also that observation has led them to reflection and meditation on the creation of the heavens and the earth; through it they remember that Allāh will surely raise them again for awarding the recompense; therefore, they ask from Allāh His mercy and beseech Him to fulfil His promise.

QUR'ĀN: ''Our Lord! Thou hast not created this in vain! ...: The demonstrative pronoun used here is ''hādhā'' (هٰذَا = this) which is singular and masculine, although the things referred to are plural and faminine. It is because the speakers are not concerned with particular names or distinct identification of each and every item; they look at the whole as a single creation. It is the same style that has been used in 6:78, where Ibrāhīm (a.s.) is quoted as saying: Then when he saw the sun rising, he said: ''This is my Lord; this is greater!'' [In this verse, where Allāh describes the rising and setting of the sun, the faminine words have been used — as is normally done. But Ibrāhīm is reported to use masculine pronouns and words for it. Ibrāhīm did so] because at that time he was completely unaware of its name or its characteristics — except that it was a ''thing'', [and ''thing'' in Arabic is masculine].

''al-Bāṭil'' (اَلبَاطِلُ = untrue, futile, vain) is that which has no purpose, no aim. Allāh says: then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people it remains in the earth [13:17]. That is why when they realized that the creation was not in vain, they understood that Allāh would surely gather the people for recompense; and that at that time Allāh would mete out to the unjust people a disgraceful punishment, i.e., the Hell. They also knew that there was none who could ward off the underlying principle of chastisement; otherwise, the creation would be in vain. It is the connotation of their prayer: ''save us then from the chastisement of the Fire: Our Lord!

surely whosoever Thou makest to enter the Fire, him Thou hast indeed brought to disgrace; and there shall be no helpers for the unjust''.

QUR'ĀN: ''Our Lord! surely we heard a crier calling to the faith, saying: `Believe in your Lord' ...'': The crier or caller refers to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). The clause, ''saying: Believe'', describes the cry or call; ''an'' (اَنْ = translated here as, saying) is explicative. They affirm before Allāh that they have believed in the crier, i.e., the Messenger. He has brought to them news of many things from Allāh; some of which he has warned them against, e.g., sins, faults, death in infidelity and transgression; and some others he has exhorted them to do or seek, e.g., forgiveness, mercy, details of the Garden (which Allāh has promised his believing and righteous servants). Therefore, they pray to their Lord to forgive them, to cover their faults, and to make them die with His righteous servants. Also, they ask Him to fulfil His promise to them — the Garden and the mercy — which the messengers have guaranteed to them by Allāh's permission. Thus they said: ''forgive us therefore our faults ...''; 'alā rusulika (عَلٰي رُسُلِكَ = translated here as, by Thy messengers) literally means, 'on Thy messengers'; i.e., the promise which Thou didst give to Thy messengers, and they guaranteed it to us on Thy behalf; ''and disgrace us not'', i.e., by not fulfilling the promise; it is because of this implication that the verse ends on, ''surely Thou dost not break the promise''.

These verses clearly show that those believers acquired the belief in Allāh and the hereafter and believed that Allāh had been sending His messengers — they got these beliefs by reflecting on the signs of Allāh. As for the details of that which the Prophet had brought, they learned them by believing in the Prophet. They, thus, follow the nature in that which may be known by reflecting on the nature and creation; and in other matters they accept and obey what they are told by the Prophet.

QUR'ĀN: So their Lord accepted their prayer ...: Using the word, 'Lord,' and relating it to them [''their Lord''] points to the quickening intensity of the divine mercy. Also the unrestricted sentence, ''I will not waste the work of a worker among you'', points to this reality. There is no discrimination between one work and the other, nor between one worker and another.

The next sentence (that branches out from the above), i.e., ''they, therefore, who emigrated, and were turned out of their homes, and were persecuted in My way, and fought, and were slain ...'', aims at describing some good deeds for the description of their reward. The conjunctive (''and'') have been used for enumeration only, not for combination; otherwise the described reward would be reserved for only those Emigrants who were martyred and combined all these attributes.

Even then, the verse mentions only those virtues and deeds which this chapter exhorts the believers to acquire and do, which it puts utmost emphasis on, i.e., giving preference to religion over one's home town or country, patiently bearing the troubles in the way of Allāh and fighting in the cause of religion.

Apparently, emigration encompasses all types of fleeing, be it from polytheism, or family, or home. This may be inferred from three factors: 1) The word used, ''emigrated'', is unrestricted and unqualified; 2) it is followed by the phrase, ''and were turned out of their homes'', which denotes a particular type of emigration and it shows that the former refers to all types of ''going out''; and 3) it is followed later by the clause, ''I will most certainly cover their evil deeds''; in the Qur'ānic language the word, as-sayyi'āt (اَلسَّيِّئَاتُ = evils; evil deeds) is apparently used for small and minor sins [1]; it means that they have already fled from major sins earlier through abstaining or repenting from them. All this shows that the emigration or fleeing mentioned here is more comprehensive. (Try to understand it.)

QUR'ĀN: ''Let it not deceive you ... in the cities (fearlessly): It purports to remove a possible misunderstanding. The meaning: This is the condition and reward of the righteous believers. But as for the unbelievers, you should not be deceived by their affluence and opulence, their luxurious life and abundant riches (the pronoun, being singular, addresses the Prophet, but the talk is actually meant for the ears of the other people); after all, it is but a brief enjoymnet which has no permanence.

[1] Not always. The verse 78 of chapter 11 uses this word for sodomy, one of the greatest sins. (tr.)

QUR'ĀN: But as to those who fear (the wrath of) Allāh ... is best for the righteous: ''an-Nuzul'' (اَلنُّزُلُ = food, drink and other things served to a guest; here it has been translated as ''entertainment''). The phrase, ''those who fear (the wrath of) Allāh'', refers to the righteous, as may be understood from the last clause of the verse. It supports what we have written above that the verse, ''Let it not deceive you ... the resting place'', aim at removing an unspoken but possible misunderstanding.

QUR'ĀN: And most surely of the followers of the Book ... quick in reckoning: It means that they, like other believers, will get the better reward. It purports to affirm that the next life's happiness is not reserved to any particular nation or tribe — so that the People of the Book would be debarred from it even if they believed. Rather, it depends on believing in Allāh and His messengers. Therefore if they accept true belief, they will become eligible to the hereafter's reward like other believers.

This verse praises these People of the Book in a special manner. It removes from them all those evil traits for which the preceding verses had been condemning other Jews and Christians — differentiating between the messengers of Allāh, hiding what they had made a covenant with Allāh to make known, and selling Allāh's signs and communications for a small price.

A COMPARISON BETWEEN THE QUR'ĀN AND THE BIBLE REGARDING TREATMENT OF WOMEN

Observation and experience confirm that man and woman are two classes of the same species, i.e., human being. All the effects and characteristics that are found in man are also found in woman — without any difference. Undoubtedly when all the characteristics of a species are found in a being it must belong to that species. Of course, some shared traits or characteristics may appear more strongly — or more weakly — in one group than the other; but it does not make that group [for example, woman] less human [than man] . It is clear from the above that the specific potential perfections that are available to one group, are available to the other too. It includes spiritual perfection that is acquired through belief, obedience and other deeds that bring a human being nearer to Allāh. Now it should be clear to you that the best and most comprehensive statement to convey this theme is found in these words of Allāh: ''I will not waste the work of a worker among you, whether male or female, the one of you being from the other.''

Compare it with what the Bible says on this subject, and you will clearly see the difference between the positions taken by the two Books. We find in the Ecclesiastes the following observations:

> I turned my mind to know and to search out and to seek wisdom and the sum of things, and to know the wickedness of folly and the foolishness which is madness. And I found more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and whose hands are fetters; ... One man among a thousand I found, but a woman among all these I have not found. [1]

Most of the ancient peoples believed that woman's deeds were not acceptable to God. In Greece she was called an abomination from the Satan's handiwork. The Romans and some Greeks said that she did not have a soul — although man did have an abstract immaterial human soul. The Christians in the Council of 586 C.E. held at France, decided after a lengthy debate that woman was a human being, but she was created to serve man. In England, just a hundred years ago, she was not considered a part of human society. For details refer to the books written on ancient beliefs and opinions as well as on mythology and anthropology — you will find a lot of amazing beliefs.

TRADITIONS

Abū Nu'aym has narrated in Ḥilyatu 'l-awliyā' from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Meditate on the creation of Allāh, and do not meditate on Allāh (Himself).' '' (ad-Durru'l-manthūr)

[1] Ecclesiastes (Revised Standard Version), chapter 7, vrs. 25 — 28. (tr.)

The author says: This theme has also been narrated from the Prophet through other chains from a number of the Companions, like ‘Abdullāh ibn Salām and Ibn ‘Umar. It is narrated through Shī‘ah chains too.

Meditation on Allāh (or according to another version, on the person of Allāh) which has been forbidden means meditating on Allāh’s ‘‘essence’’; because Allāh has said: ... they do not comprehend Him in knowledge [20:110]. So far as His attributes are concerned, the Qur’ān is the best witness that it is through them that Allāh may be known; numerous verses exhort the people to know Him by His attributes.

Abu ’sh-Shaykh has narrated in al-‘Aẓamah from Abū Hurayrah that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said: ‘One hour’s thought is better than sixty years’ worship.’ ’’ (ibid.)

The author says: Some traditions say, ‘‘one night’s worship’’; others say, ‘‘one year’s worship’’; and it is also narrated through Shī‘ah narrators.

It has been reported through Sunnī chains that the word of Allāh: So their Lord accepted their prayer ..., was revealed because of the Mother of the believers Umm Salamah. She had said to the Prophet: ‘‘O Messenger of Allāh! I have not heard Allāh mentioning anyhow the women regarding (their) emigration.’’ Thereupon Allāh revealed the verse, So their Lord accepted their prayer: That I will not waste the work of a worker among you, whether male or female ...

The Shī‘ah traditions say that the words: they, therefore, who emigrated, and were turned out of their homes ..., were revealed about ‘Alī (a.s.) when he emigrated with the Fāṭimahs, i.e., Fāṭimah bin Asad, Fāṭimah bint Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and Fāṭimah bint az-Zubayr. Then reached to them at Ḍajnān, Umm Ayman and a few of the weaker believers. So they travelled and they were remembering Allāh in every condition, until they came to the Prophet and (by that time) these verses had been revealed.

The Sunnī traditions say that it was revealed about the Emigrants.

Also, it has been reported that the verse: Let it not deceive you that those who disbelieve ..., was revealed when some believers expressed the desire for the good life enjoyed by the unbelievers. Also, it has been said that the verse: And most surely of the followers of the Book there are those who believe …, was revealed about Negus and some of his companions. When he died, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) prayed his funeral prayer at Medina. Some hypocrites blamed him that he was praying for someone who was not on his religion. Then Allāh sent this verse: And most surely of the followers of the Book there are those who believe ... surely Allāh is quick in reckoning.

But all these traditions represent the narrators' endeavours to fit the verses on various events or stories; they do not give the actual reason of revelation.

O you who believe! be patient and help each other in patience and remain lined up; and fear (the wrath of) Allāh, that you may be successful (200).

* * * * *

This final verse is like the sum total, giving a gist of all that has been said in this chapter. It ends the chapter with a summary of its main theme.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! be patient and help each other in patience: The order is unrestricted. The clause, ''be patient'', covers every type of patience: Patience in hardships, patience in the obedience of Allāh, and patience against the disobedience of Allāh. However, it refers to individual's patience, as the next clause shows.

''al-Muṣābarah'' (اَلْمُصَابَرَةُ) translated here as helping each other in patience, literally means vying with one another in being patient. It implies collective patience — when individuals bear a common hardship together and each one's patience is augmented by others' steadfastness.

In this way, their strength is enhanced, their patience redoubled and its effect multiplied. This phenomenon may easily be experienced, if we first look at an individual as a single person, and then look at his behaviour in a group when he becomes a part of a collective whole, each one acting on and reacting towards the others. We shall describe this topic in detail, God willing, in its place.

QUR'ĀN: and remain lined up; and fear (the wrath of) Allāh, that you may be successful: ''al-murābaṭah'' (اَلْمُرَابَطَةْ) is more comprehensive than al-Muṣābarah (اَلْمُصَابَرَةْ = vying with one another in patience; helping each other to be patient), because al-murābaṭah[1] implies people's linking up with one another in their powers, faculties, and activities in all affairs of their religious life — in time of ease as well as in difficulties. As the main aim of these orders is to let the believers attain the reality of happiness of this world and the next — otherwise only partial worldly happiness can be achieved which obviously is not the real happiness — these orders have been followed by the words, ''and fear (the wrath of) Allāh, that you may be successful'', i.e., you may achieve total and real happiness and success.

A DISCOURSE ON BELIEVERS' MUTUAL CONNECTION IN ISLAMIC SOCIETY

1. Man and Society

There is no need to bring a lot of arguments to prove that mankind is a social species. Every member of this species is created with this instinct. Man has always lived in society, as the history says and the archaeological finds show (the finds that are related to the earliest eras when this species lived in and dominated this globe.)

The Qur'ān has described this reality in the best possible way in many verses. For example:

[1] al-Murābaṭah, in post-Qur'ānic era is used for troops being garrisoned, posted, stationed. Many translators have rendered it as, ''be ever-garrisoned''; but the author has taken it in its literal and original sense, i. e., to be linked with each other. I have used a word (i.e. remain lined up) which may be interpreted both ways. (tr.)

O you people! surely We have created you of a male and a female and made you nations and tribes that you may recognized each other ... [49:13];
We have distributed among them their livelihood in the life of this world, and We have exalted some of them above others in degrees, that some of them may take others in subjection ... [43:32];
... the one of you being from the other ... [3:195];
And He it is Who has created man from the water, then He has made for him blood-relationship and marriage-relationship ... [25:54].
There are many other such verses.[1]

2. Man and the Growth of his Society

Human society, like man's any spiritual characteristics or its related factors, was not born — when it was born — in its complete and perfect shape; there was a lot of room for development and improvement. Like all other concomitants of humanity, the society too kept growing and improving with man's progress in his material and spiritual journey. It would be unrealistic to expect this human characteristic to be different from other factors — to think that it would appear from the very beginning in its perfect shape. Rather it, like man's other characteristics related to his knowledge and will, has gradually progressed from the primitive to the advanced stage, and the process continues.

It appears from history that the first social group that appeared was the domistic circle based on marriage, because its natural agent (the procreative organs) was the most powerful factor in bringing people together. It was not, for example, like food gathering and eating which could be done alone. Satisfaction of sexual urge required union of two persons [and it laid the foundation of society]. From it gradually emanated the instinct which we have earlier called the instinct of exploitation. It takes shape when a man, dominating over and forcing another person, uses him to fulfil his [dominating one's] needs and plans. Then it took the shape of headship or leadership, e.g., head of the family, patriarch of the clan, chief of the tribe, and president of the nation. Naturally, in the beginning the leadership went to the strongest and bravest; after sometime it was given to him who was bravest and richest, and also had many children. Thus, the views kept changing until now it goes to him who is thought to be the most efficient in administration and the most expert in diplomacy and politics. This was the primary reason why and how idol-worship raised its head and why it looks strong even today; we shall write about it in detail, God willing, somewhere else.

[1] Look into the places related to each verse to see how they prove our theme. (Author's Note)

Social institution with all its manifestations (family as well as other groupings) has always existed with mankind since the dawn of humanity. But man was not consciously aware of it in the beginning. It was there growing with man's other natural instincts and characteristics like exploitation, self-defence and things like that.

The Qur'ān informs us that it was the institution of prophethood which made the man aware of society and social bonds in detail and exhorted him to preserve and protect it as a distinct factor of humanity. Allāh says: And mankind was naught but a single people, then they differed [10:19]. Also He says: Mankind was but one people; so Allāh sent the prophets as bearers of good news and as warners, and He sent down with them the book with truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed [2:213]. It shows that mankind in its earliest days was one nation, simple and uncomplicated; there was no diffference among them. Then differences occurred and disputes appeared; so Allāh sent the prophets and revealed the books to them in order that it might remove the said disputes and differences, and bring them back to social accord and unity which in its turn would be protected through ordained laws.

Again Allāh says: He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and that which We have revealed to you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and 'Īsā, that establish the religion and be not divided therein [42:13]. This verse too informs us that it was the call to establish the religion without being divided therein which removed the discord among the people and united them on one word. Thus, it was religion that had guaranteed the safety of their good social order.

As you see, the verse attributes this call (of society's good and unity) to Nūḥ who was the first prophet to be given a law and a book; then it ascribes it to Ibrāhīm, then to Mūsā, then to 'Īsā (peace be on them all). The sharī'ah of Nūḥ and Ibrāhīm contained very small amount of rules and regulations. Of the four prophets, the most elaborate was the sharī'ah of Mūsā, which was followed by 'Īsā — as the Qur'ān says and the Gospels show — but the sharī'ah of Mūsā contains only about six hundred rules, as has been reported.

In any case, the call to live in a society — a distinct and clear call — was not given except by the prophets in the mould of religion, as the Qur'ān clearly says and — as will be seen — the history confirms.

3. Islam and the Attention it gives to Society

Undoubtedly, Islam is the only religion which has purposely laid its foundation on human society, on community life. It has never neglected the social aspects in any of its affairs. If you want to know more, then look at the mass and volume of human actions and activities (which imagination cannot fully grasp) and their branching into various categories, classes and orders and you will be really astonished to see how this divine sharī'ah covers all those actions and activities, and gives direction for every conceivable situation. Then see how it has moulded all those rules and regulations in the mould of social life. Then you will realize how it has filled it with the spirit of communal life to the maximum limit.

Then compare your findings with every divine sharī'ah to which the Qur'ān has given any importance, that is, the sharī'ah of Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm, Mūsā and 'Īsā; and you will realize that those laws cannot bear comparison with Islam, they cannot stand at its side.

As for those systems which the Qur'ān does not think worthy of consideration — like idolatry, Sabi'ism, Manichaeism, dualism, etc. — the difference is too clear to need description.

As for the groups and nations — be they civilized or otherwise — the history only says that they used to follow what they had inherited from ancient times — that social life gave rise to exploitation and people were united under autocratic or monarchic rules; tribal, national and regional societies lived under the domain of a king or chief, whose selection was governed by factors of heredity, place of origin and things like that. No nation was paid any particular attention in its affairs; no discussion was held or views exchanged to better their condition. Even the great nations which dominated the known world at the time when the divine religion illuminated the earth — i.e., the Roman and Persian empires — were nothing more than autocratic and despotic rules of Caesar and Khusraw; subject nation were ‘‘united’’ under the banner of the king or emperor; and the society progressed if the empire developed; otherwise it regressed.

Of course, they had inherited some treatises on sociology, among the writings of their philosophers like Socrates, Plato, Aristotle and others. But they were just papers which were never acted upon, merely mental images which never took shape outside imagination. The history that has come to us is the most reliable witness of what we have said.

Therefore, the first call that reached the human ear and invited this species to pay attention to the society’s affairs — by making it an independent subject, taking it out from oblivion and insignificance — was the voice of the Prophet of Islam (on whom be the best blessings and peace). He invited the people, through the divine messages revealed to him, towards happy life and good living — all together. Allāh says:

And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together, and be not divided, ... And from among you there should be a party who invite to good and enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong. [Here Allāh draws men’s attention to protect the society from division and disunity.] and these it is that shall be successful. And be not like those who became divided and disagreed after clear evidences had come to them [3:103 — 105];

And (know) that this is My path, the straight one, therefore follow it; and follow not (other) ways, for they will scatter you away from His way [6:153];

Surely they who divided their religion into parts and became sects, you have no concern with them [6:159].

There are many other unrestricted verses which call the people to live together in society.

Also, Allāh says:

The believers are but brethren, therefore make peace between your brethren [49:10];

... and do not quarrel, for then you will be weak in hearts and your power will depart [8:46];

... and help one another in goodness and piety ... [5:2];

And from among you there should be a party who invite to good and enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong [3:104].

There are many such verses that exhort the Muslims to build the Islamic society on the foundation of unity and harmony acquiring and protecting its spiritual and material benefits and distinction — as we shall later describe in short.

4. Relationship of Individual and Society in the Eyes of Islam

While manufacturing or inventing something, one first makes its elementary parts, each part has its own properties and effects. Then one joins them together — in spite of their separate identities — and obtains from the whole new benefits in addition to the sum total of the various parts' benefits. Man, for example, has parts, limbs, organs and powers, each of which has distinct material and spiritual benefits. Sometimes they are compounded, and are thus strengthened and enhanced, like the weight of each part and that of the whole, or its power and turning from one direction to the other, etc. At other times the parts do not combine but continue as separate entities like the powers of hearing, seeing, tasting, will and movement; yet all these different parts are jointly placed under the control of one being, i.e., man. Then the benefit of the whole collection far exceeds the sum total of those found separately in various parts; they are immense benefits, like action and reaction, as well as the spiritual and physical uses. One of the benefits is the presence of this astonishing plurality within the framework of unity itself. When the human matter, i.e., the sperm and ovum completes its growth, it gets the power to separate a part from itself and bring it up as another perfect man, able to do all the spiritual and material activities the former man used to do. All human beings in spite of their vast number are human being, i.e., one; and their activities although plentiful in number are one in species; they are capable of uniting and joining. It is not unlike water — when put in various pots it is called many waters, but it is in fact one species; it has many properties but under one species; and the more water you gather in one place the more powerful are its characteristics and the far greater its impact.

Islam, in bringing up the individuals of this species and guiding them to their real happiness, looks at this real import of humanity; it could not do otherwise. Allāh says:

And He it is Who has created man from the water, then He has made for him blood-relationship and marriagerelationship [25:54];

O you people! surely We have created you of a male and a female [49:13]; the one of you being from the other [3:195].

This real relationship between individual and society inevitably leads to another actuality in the society inasmuch as people individually feed it with their existence and powers, especialities and characteristics; thus the society itself — like its members — acquires a sort of independent entity and characteristics, and it is a fact known to and seen by every one. That is why the Qur'ān considers a nation as having an existence with an appointed term of its own; accordingly every nation has got a book; it has a perception and an understanding; it acts and obeys or disobeys Allāh.

Allāh says:

And for every nation there is an (appointed) term, so when their term is come they shall not remain behind (even) an hour, nor shall they go before [7:34];

... every nation shall be called to its book ... [45:28];

Thus have We made fair-seeming to every people their deeds ... [6:108];

... there is a group of them keeping to the moderate course ... [5:66];

... there is an upright party; they recite Allāh's communications ... [3:113];

... and every nation purposes against their apostle to destroy him, and they disputed by means of the falsehood that they might thereby render null the truth, therefore I destroyed them; how was then My retribution! [40:5];

And every nation had a messenger; so when their messenger came, the matter was decided between them with justice and they shall not be dealt with unjustly [10:47].

That is why you see that the Qur'ān pays attention to histories of nations as much as it does to individuals' stories — or even more. It did so at a time when the history was only a record of achievements or failures of kings and nobles. It was long after the revelation of the Qur'ān that the historians deigned to concern themselves with the histories of nations and societies. A few of them like al-Mas'ūdī and Ibn Khaldūn wrote on this line to a certain extent, until the changes were lately affected in narrative history and individuals gave way to the nations.

Reportedly, the first [Westerner] to lay the foundation of the new history was Frenchman, August Kent (d. 1857 C.E.).

However, as we have said above, society's power and characteristics are necessarily stronger than those of an individual. In case of conflict or discord between the two, the former must overwhelm the latter. Perception and experience are best witnesses for this phenomenon — in active as well as passive powers and traits all together. A group's will in any matter, e.g., in crowds and mobs, cannot be restrained by any individual's contrary will or opposite intention. A part cannot escape from following the whole — it must proceed as the whole does. So much so that the whole suspends the individual member's perception and thinking. The same is the effect of general terror and common fright as, for example, at times of retreat, during riots and disorder, in aftermath of earthquake, in periods of famine or epidemic. Even some less frightening things have the same effect; for example, traditional rites or national attires and things like that, which an individual feels himself obliged to follow — they deprive him of his thinking power or perception.

It is for this reason that Islam has paid so much attention to the affairs of society. We do not find — and cannot find — such care and attention given to it in any other religion, nor in any civilized nation. (Probably you will find it difficult to accept!) The fact is that although individual is the foundation of society, giving only an individual a good upbringing and training him to be of virtuous character can hardly produce desired effect if the society is permeated with opposite atmosphere and environment. Only a negligible number can withstand such pressure and preserve their good character.

Thus Islam has built its most important rules and laws — like ḥajj, prayer, jihād, spending in the way of Allāh, and in short, the religious piety — on the foundation of social life. And how did it arrange to preserve it? Apart from the authority of Islamic government (which is responsible to protect the general religious ceremonies and their boundaries), and in addition to the obligation of inviting to good, enjoining virtue and forbidding evil (which is a common obligation for the whole ummah), it has prescribed an important goal for the Islamic society — and no society can survive without a common goal — and that is the true happiness and nearness to Allāh and honour in His presence. This goal is an unseen but vigilant supervisor, from which even secret thought of man cannot remain hidden — let alone the manifest action — although the preachers and those engaged in enjoining good and forbidding evil may fail to see it. It is this reality which led us to declare that the care and concern shown by Islam to the affairs of its society excels all systems and cultures.

5. Is Islamic social System capable of Implementation and Continuation?

Someone may say:

‘‘You claim that Islamic ideology for creating good society is the strongest in foundation and loftiest in structure, and even the societies evolved by the advanced and civilized nations cannot reach its standard. Well, if it is so, then how is it that it could not be implemented except for a very short period, and then it changed into blatant despotic rule? Did it not turn into an imperialism more atrocious and horrid than all that had preceded it? Compare it with the Western civilization that is so enduring.

‘‘This in itself is a proof that their civilization is more advanced and their culture and tradition more vital and sound. They have laid the foundation of their social order and legal system on the people’s will and their natural inclination. They give credence to the will and resolve of the majority, because usually it is impossible for the whole community to achieve unanimity on any matter; and dominance of majority is a perpetual natural phenomemon. We find that every natural cause and physical source succeeds in bringing about the effect in majority of the cases — not always. The same thing happens when diverse and conflicting causes act on one thing — only the majority succeeds in affecting the object, neither all causes nor the minority has any effect. Therefore, it is proper that the structure of social order be built on the majority’s will, and it should apply to the goal of the society as well as to the systems and laws enforced therein. As for the hypothesis of religion, in the present world it is nothing but a wishful thinking that does not pass the stage of theory, an intellectual ideal that cannot be put into practice.

‘‘The modern civilization, in the countries where it has taken root, guarantees the power and felicity of the society, purifies its members and cleanses them from evil traits and bad characteristics, i.e., the things which the society does not approve, like falsehood, fraud, unjustice, oppression, rudeness and things like that.''

The above contains a gist of what preoccupies the minds of a group of our oriental scholars, and especially some of our eminent sociologists and psychologists. Unfortunately they have taken a wrong way to approach the subject, and it has caused confusion in their minds, as will be seen from the following explanation:

They have said: The Islamic social order — unlike the modern civilization — cannot be implemented in the world in its present environment; it means that the situation prevalent in today's world is not propitious for the laws legislated by Islam.

COMMENT: Agreed. But it proves nothing. Every system now prevalent in various human societies came into being after it was not there; it appeared when the then prevalent conditions and surroundings were against it; then it stood up and struggled against the previously deep-rooted system. Often it was repulsed and defeated in the first attempt; then it rose again and again until finally it gained upper-hand, triumphed and got dominance over the society. Sometime it perished and became extinct if the conditions and factors were not favourable. History testifies to it regarding every religious and temporal system, not excepting democracy and communism. [1] It is such instances that the divine words point to: Indeed there have been example [lit., systems] before you; therefore travel in the earth and see what was the end of the rejecters [3:137]. The verse implies that the systems accompanied by rejection of divine commands do not have a happy ending, do not take one to a desirable goal.

[1] Here is one of the clearest examples: After the World War I, the system of democracy (and today it is considered the only acceptable system in the world) changed in Russia to the Communism and the Socialist system of government. After the World War II, the countries of Eastern Europe and China followed suit. Thus almost half of human populace was lost to the democracy. Then about one year ago [i.e., in 1956. tr.] it was announced in the Communists' Congress that their late leader, Stalin, during his reign extending to nearly 30 years after Lenin's death, had turned the socialist rule into autocratic despotic reign of terror. Even now a group starts believing in Stalin after disbelieving, while another disbelieves in him after believing! This up and down continues. We may find many such examples in the pages of history. (Author's Note)

Therefore, merely the fact that a system is not agreeable to, or goes against the current social environment does not prove that it is wrong or erroneous. In fact, this is a well-established natural phenomenon through which every new idea and event reaches its final goal, after various actions and reactions, as a result of interaction of diverse causes and factors.

Islam is not exception to this principle; it like all other systems is governed by the same physical and social factors in its progress or retrogress, and is influenced by the same agencies and conditions. Islam's position today — when it has captured the hearts of more than four hundred million people [1] — is not weaker than it was in the days of Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm or Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). Each of them began his call alone, while the world in their times knew nothing except disorder and depravity. Then their message spread, took roots and became a living phenemenon that continues upto these days of ours.

The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) began his mission while there was none to support him except a man and a woman [2]; later people joined them one after another; the days were full of privation — and what a privation it was! Then came to them the help from Allāh and they established a good social order; a society whose members were — for a major part — governed by goodness and piety; until after the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) the strife and intrigues did to the Islamic society what they did.

It did not take long for even such a small model of Islamic social order, in spite of its short life and narrow range, to spread itself, in less than fifty years, from one corner of the Earth to the other; it turned the history of mankind to a new direction, and brought a fundamental and substantial change in it, whose overwhelming effects are seen even today — and will continue to do so for ever.

Sociological and psychological discourses within the framework of ideological history cannot escape from admitting that the immediate and sufficient cause of the world's contemporary advancement is none other than the Islamic civilization and the light it spread over the Earth. Of course, most of the European scholars have neglected to give Islam its due credit, for which we may thank either religious prejudice or political expediency. How can a knowledgeable research scholar, looking at modem civic and social progress, say with justice that it was a contribution of Christianity? How can Christ (a.s.) be counted as its leader and standard-bearer, when he himself clearly says [1] that he was concerned only with spiritual affairs and had nothing to do with body or its affairs, and did not care about governmental and political affairs? While Islam clearly invites towards social life and mutual cooperation, and guides about and manages all aspects of human society and its members without exception. Why do the Westerners shut their eyes from this manifest reality? To what should we ascribe this silence of theirs, if not to their desire to extinguish the light of Islam (while Allāh refuses but to perfect His light) and to put out its flame from the hearts by their envy and enmity — so that they could present Islam as a nation which has left no imprint on modem civilization?

However, Islam has proved its ability to guide the mankind to their happiness and their good lives. Such a phenomenon cannot be dismissed as a hypothesis inapplicable to human life. Nor can it lose hope of one day dominating the world (inasmuch as its objective is the mankind's true happiness). We have already mentioned [2] in the Commentary of the verse, Mankind was but one people ... [2:213], that deep research in the conditions of creation leads us to the conclusion that the human species will surely reach its destination and achieve its goal — and it means the total domination of true Islam over the world, its complete authority over the social order. Allāh has promised, according to this very principle, in His Mighty Book: ... then Allāh will bring a people that He shall love Him, humble before the believers, mighty against the unbelivers, they shall strive hard in Allāh's way and shall not fear the censure of any censurer ... [5:54]; Allāh has promised to those of you who believe and do good that He will most certainly make them successors in the earth as He made successors those before them, and that He will most certainly establish for them their religion which He has chosen for them, and that He will most certainly, after their fear, give them security in exchange; they shall worship Me, not associating aught with Me [24:55]; that the earth, shall inherit it My righteous servants [21:105].

There is another dimension to this question which these people are totally oblivious of. The motto of Islamic social system is to follow the truth in theory and practice; while the ideal of today's civilization is to follow the views and desires of the majority. This basic difference in outlook has resulted in difference in the aims and goals of the respective societies. The goal of Islamic society is the real and rational happiness and felicity. It means that man should practise moderation in giving his various powers their demands; he gives to his body what it desires but to the extent that it does not hinder him from knowing Allāh through the path of servitude; rather it becomes a means of reaching that destination. In this way, man attains happiness through the happiness of all his powers and faculties. It is the greatest Comfort (although today we do not fully perceive it because we lack the proper Islamic training). That is why Islam has laid the foundation of its commandments on wisdom and intellect which by its nature follows the truth and reality; and it has very strongly prohibited all that disturbs the healthy intellect. It has laid the responsibility of enforcing all activities, moral and basic gnosis on the shoulders of the society. It is in addition to what the Islamic government is expected to do, like enforcing the penal code, etc. This aspect in any case would not be palatable to the general public. Such ideal would be intolerable to those who are astonishingly immersed in their desires and lusts — as we see today in all classes of society, be they affluent or hard pressed. Islamic system based on wisdom and intellect curbs people's freedom of enjoying whatever pleasure they like, whatever entertainment they desire, of attacking or devouring whom they are angry with. Naturally people would not like such restrictions, such limitations, except after intense efforts and tireless endeavours for spreading the message, and after intensive and extensive training given to the people; it is not different from other development affairs in which man needs firm determination, sufficient training and never ending vigilance.

On the other hand, the goal of the modern civilization is material enjoyment. Obviously it encourages a sensual life that follows heart's desire — no matter whether it conforms with rational truth or not. It follows intellect only when it does not go against its desires or ambitions.

That is why today's law follows, in its legislation and implementation, the pleasure of the majority of society and the desire of their hearts. Apart from that, only those laws may be guaranteedly implemented that are concerned with overt actions. But as far as ethics and fundamental gnosis are concerned, there is no way of enforcing them; people are at liberty to adopt or reject them — except when these factors go against the law of the land, as then they are expressly forbidden.

Consequently, such a society would be wont to do what falls in line with its desire like base lust and inordinate rage. Such people would prefer most of the things condemned by religion; they would take good morals and high spiritual knowledge as mockery, shielding themselves behind ''constitutional freedom''.

As a result of this phenomenon the ideology is bound to change its course from rational to sensual. What the wisdom treats as immorality and depravity, is glorified by sensual outlook as chivalry, manhood and good manners. Look at what is happening in Europe between the youths, between men and married or unmarried women, between women and dogs, and between men and their own daughters or other women within prohibited degrees; look at what is done in festivities and dance parties, etc. — the things which a person brought up in religious atmosphere feels ashamed even to bring on his tongue.

Sometimes religious rites appear in these people's eyes as odd curiosities and laughing matters — and vice versa. This is because the thinking and perceptions are completely different in their essence as well as in modality. These social orders based on sensuality take no benefit from intellect — as you have seen — except for paving the way for sensual enjoyment. This enjoyment is their only goal; nothing is allowed to oppose it, nothing can stand in its way — except when one has to choose between two enjoyments of equal degree. After all there were — and still are — among the legislated laws things like suicide and duel, etc. One gets what he wants and desires except when it is in conflict with the will and desire of the society.

Ponder on this difference; then you will understand why the western social order — unlike the religious one — seems more agreeable to the human society. Nevertheless, it should not be forgotten that it is not only the present day's western social order that has proved consistent with people's nature (so that it may be given preference over other civilizations for this reason); all the social systems which were or are found in any society, from the early dawn of humanity to this day of ours, right from roaming nomands to the flourishing settlements, had and have one thing in common: People give preference to them over the religion that invites them to reality and truth; it is their first reaction when they are called to the true religion — because they are enthralled by material idolatory.

If you ponder deeply you will find that the modern civilization is nothing more than a collection of various customs of early idolatory; but it has ''progressed'' from individual to collective level, from the stage of simple rites to that of technical finesse.

What we have said — that the Islamic social order is based on following the truth and reality, not on conformity with hearts' desires — is amongst the clearest declarations of the Qur'ān. Allāh says:

He it is Who sent His Messenger with guidance and the religion of truth ... [9:33];

And Allāh judges with the truth [40:20];

(Also He says commending the believers) ... and enjoin on each other truth ... [103:3];

Certainly We have brought you the truth, but most of you are averse to the truth [43:78].

Here it is clearly stated that truth is not agreeable to the majority and their desires. Then Allāh totally rejects the idea that the majority's will should be followed. Why this rejection? Because it results in depravity and destruction. Allāh says: Nay ! he has brought them the truth, and most of them are averse from the truth. And should the truth follow their desires, surely the heavens and the earth and all those who are therein would have perished. Nay! We have brought to them their reminder, but from their reminder they turn aside [23:70 — 71].

Have a bird's-eye view of the world history; see the manmade calamities taking shape one after another; chaos and disaster, depravity and iniquity piling up one over another. Then you will appreciate how true the divine words have proved. Allāh again says: ... and what is there after the truth but error, how are you then turned back? [10:32]. There are many many verses of this or similar theme. If you want to gain more insight then study Chapter 10, Yūnus, where ''the truth'' [and its derivatives] have been mentioned more than twenty times.

They have said: To follow the majority is a regular trait of the nature.

COMMENT: No doubt that the nature follows its major effects; but it never nullifies or contradicts the obligation of following the truth and reality. Nature itself is a truth. How can it negate its own self?

For proper understanding of this statement, a few premises should be explained here:

First: The external things and affairs, which are found outside man's imagination, are the basis of his cognitive beliefs and practical ideas; in their genesis and development, they depend on the system of causality — a permanent and all-encompassing system that allows no exception. All knowledgeable thinkers are unanimously agreed on this fact, and the Qur'ān too testifies to its truth as we have described earlier[1]. Such external happenigs appear and continue without fail [following their sufficient cause]. Even the effects appearing in majority of cases are — from the point of reason — permanent in their majorityness. For example, fire that — looking at all its uses — brings heat most of the times, its ''heat-giving in majority of cases'' is its permanent property. Likewise there are other exmaples; and this is the truth.

Second: Man by nature follows what he finds in any way a real external thing or affair. He follows the truth by dictate of nature. Even those [agnostics] who deny definite knowledge, if you tell one of them something which he has no doubt about, he will surely accept it.

Third: Truth, as you have seen, is an external thing which man accepts in belief and follows in deeds. Man's own views or perceptions are just a means to reach that external truth — as mirror is a means to see the image.

Now that you have understood these premises, it should be clear to you that truth or reality, i.e., something's happening in nature in all or majority of the cases, is an attribute of an external thing that exists outside imagination and happens always or in most of the cases; but it is not knowledge or perception. In other words, truth is attribute of a thing that is known, not of the knowledge itself. A thing that occurs always or in majority of cases is in a way the truth. But the view of the majority of the people, or their aspiration or belief, vis-a-vis, that of the minority, is not always truth. It may be truth — when it conforms with reality; or it may be falsehood if it does not. In the latter case, man should not submit to it; nor would he do so if he became aware of its falsity. When you were sure of a thing and then all the people said you were wrong, you would not accept their view; and even if you made a show of submitting to them, you would do so only out of fear, embarrassment or some other factor — but not because you believed their view to be correct. The following verse is one of the best statements to show that the majority's views and opinions were not necessarily truth that must be followed: Nay! he has brought them the truth, and most of them are averse from the truth [23:70]. If every opinion of the majority were truth, they would not have been averse or opposed to it.

The above discourse shows clearly the untenability of the argument that to follow the majority is the dictate of the nature. This natural system applies to external happenings and things — which are subject of knowledge — not to the knowledge or thought itself. According to this principle, man should follow in his intention and action that which happens — externally — most of the times; not that he should follow what a mjority of the people believes. In other words, his activities and actions should be based on the good of the majority; and it is the principle upon which the Qur'ān has based its legislations and ordinations. Allāh says: Allāh does not desire to put on you any difficulty, but He wishes to purify you and that He may complete His favour on you, so that you may be grateful [5:6]; ... fasting has been prescribed for you, as it was prescribed for those before you, so that you may guard (against evil) [2:183]. There are many other verses that describe the underlying reasons of given orders which are found in most of the cases.

They have said: The modern civilization has provided the developed countries with society's happiness, has refined its members and purified them from evil characteristics which are disapproved by the community.

COMMENT: This talk is not free of confusion and medley. Probably when they say ''society's happiness'', they mean its superiority in technology and power, its exploitation — to the maximum — of natural resources. But you have repeatedly seen that Islam does not count it as happiness and felicity. Rational arguments too support this principle.

Mankind's happiness is in fact a combination of the felicity of the spirit and that of the body. This bestows on man the material bounties, and at the same time adorns him with excellent character and true divine gnosis. It is the felicity that guarantees to him his happiness in this life and in the hereafter. If one submerges oneself in material enjoyments and ignores spiritual felicity, then it is nothing but infelicity, unhappiness.

As for their marvelling at the good characteristics — like truth, sincerity, trustworthiness and fine manners, etc. — which they find in the people of advanced countries, again they are confused. The trouble is that most of our oriental scholars are unable to think in a collective framework, to look at a society as a social unit; they look at an individual as an individual, and that is that. They see a man and think that he is a being who is independent of all things and has no such connection with anything as to affect his independent existence. (But the reality is otherwise.) Also, when such a scholar thinks about his life, his only aim is to gain benefits for himself and ward off harms from himself. He is always involved in his own affairs — and it is individualistic thinking. Then he weighs others with the same measure and decides that they too are individualistically independent.

Such judgment can be true, if at all, about that man only whose thinking is individualistic. But it cannot be applied to a person who is conditioned to think in the framework of society: he considers himself an inseparable part of his society, who has no existence separate from it; his benefits are a part of his society's benefits; the society's good is his good; and its harm, is his harm; every attribute and condition of the society is his own attribute and condition. Such a man thinks in an entirely different way. When it comes to establishing relations with other persons, he only concerns himself with relations outside his society; as for relations with other parts of the same society, he does not care in the least.

Let us give you an example. Man is a compound, made of numerous limbs and faculties, all of which are combined together to give them a real oneness which we call ''humanity''. This makes them merge their separate identities and actions in the man's independent existence. Eyes, ears, hands and feet, see, hear, attack and walk for the man; each of these organs enjoys its activity when the man enjoys it. Each of them aspires to establish contact with some separate identity whom the man wants to link with — either with good intention or bad. Eyes, ears, hands or feet want to do good or bad to him whom the man wants to do good or bad. But as for the organs' own mutual relation and contact — when all of them are under the banner of one human being — seldom does one of them any harm to any other, nor is any of them discomforted by any other.

This is then the condition of the parts of a man, and theirs is one unified collective progress. The same is the position of individual members of a human society when their thinking is moulded in collective mould. Their good or evil, piety or depravity, benevolence or malevolence are one with those of the society when looked at as one single identity.

The Qur'ān has done the same when it has judged various nations and groups whose thinking, because of their religious or national prejudice, was moulded in collective mould, like the Jews, the Arabs, and a number of ancient nations. Thus, you will find it censuring the present generations for the sins of their progenitors, blaming the contemporary groups for the misdeeds of their predecessors. All this because it is a fair and true judgment regarding those who think in a collective way. The honoured Qur'ān has so many verses of this theme that it is not even necessary to quote them.

Of course, justice demands that if there be some good people in that same society, their due rights should not be suppressed. Although they live in that corrupted social order and mingle with their compatriots, their hearts are not pulluted by their society's evil thinking and widespread inner sickness. They are in it but — like extra limbs — are not a part of it. The Qur'ān has taken the same view when, in middle of general censure, it excepts good and righteous persons.

It is clear from the above description that while deciding about the goodness or badness of the members of advanced civilized societies — in contrast to those of other nations — one should not see as to how they live with one another, how they deal with their compatriots, how in short is their internal life. Rather, one should look at their collective personality as it shows itself when they deal with other weaker nations, as they behave with other collective societies of the world. It is this criterion that should be kept in mind when one wants to judge the worth of a society — its goodness or badness, its felicity or infelicity. It is from this angle that our scholars should approach the subject. After that they are at liberty either to admire that social order or to be scandalized by it.

By my life, if a thoughtful observer looks at the history of their collective life since the European renaissance, and ponders on what they have done to other poor helpless nations .and tribes, he will at once realize that these people (who supposedly are full of mercy and sincerity for mankind; who serve the humanity with their lives and properties; who have bestowed freedom and given helping hand to oppressed and suppressed nations; and who have abolished slavery and bondage) have no other goal except subjugating weak and poor nations as long as they can, by any method at hand. One day it is done through military campaign, another day by colonial intrigues; some day it is by outright annexation, on other occasions in the guise of suzerainty; one day they establish themselves in the name of guarding the joint interests, another day on the pretext of helping to preserve the independence; sometimes they establish foothold in the name of peace-keeping or repulsing a danger, at other times to defend the rights of deprived and disloged groups; and so on and so forth.

Healthy human nature does not agree to treat such societies as good ones, nor to praise them as happy ones — even if we shut our eyes from the meaning given to happiness by religion, revelation and prophethood.

How can human nature agree to this paradox? It equips all its members equally with all faculties; then how can it contradict its own decision and give some men a charter to own the others? An ownership that gives the ‘‘owners’’ authority on lives, honour and properties of the ‘‘subjects’’, and paves the way for them to play with their (the subjects’) lives and existence, to control their perception and will? And all this savagery to a degree not seen or experienced even by primitive men? For reference you should study the history of these nations and have a look at what present generation is suffering on their hands. If such a situation is called happiness and goodness, it could only be in an ironical and sarcastic sense.

6. What is the Basis of Islamic Society? How it lives on?

Society — of any type — comes into being when a common goal and ambition unites its individual members. That goal is a single spirit spread throughout the society that makes it one entity. In non-religious societies that goal is man’s worldly life seen collectively — not individualistically

— i.e. collective enjoyment of the advantages of physical life.

What is the difference — in characteristics — between collective and individualistic enjoyments? If man is able to live alone, he will be unhindered, unrestricted, in all his enjoyments; there will be nothing to oppose or prevent him. The only restriction will come from the limitations put by his own limbs. For example, he cannot breath in all the air in atmosphere — even if he wants to — because his lungs are not so big; he cannot take the food except to a certain amount, because his digestive system would not tolerate it. The same applies to other faculties and limbs that restrict each other's activities. But, as we have supposed that there was no other human being to demand share in exploitation of natural resources and benefits, there would be nothing to put restriction on his activities or to hinder him in his desires and actions.

But the position is different for a man living in a society. If he were to act without any restraint, with a will of his own, it would create friction and collision, life would become intolerable and the mankind would perish. (We have fully described it under the discourse of Prophethood.[1])

That is the only reason that leads people to the rule of law in society. But uncivilized societies do not consciously realize its need; they just follow their customs and traditions which in their turn give rise to discord and quarrel among the members; thus all of them feel obliged to observe some rules that could give some protection to the society. As those laws are not based on a solid foundation, they are liable to imperfection and nullification, alteration and invalidation.

On the other hand, civilized societies base their laws on solid foundation — according to their degree of progress and advancement. Through those laws they remove the discord and difference appearing in the society's intentions and activities, inasmuch as they put some restrictions and limits on them. Then they concentrate the power and authority in a centre which is given responsibility to enforce the law and implement its provisions. It appears from the abvoe that:

First: Law, in fact, is the factor that moderates people's desires and actions, by putting limitations on them and thus removing the sources of discord and difference.

Second: The society governed by law allows its members complete freedom in matters not covered by the law; and it is as it should be, because man has been equipped with perception and will, and once these factors are moderated further restriction is uncalled for. That is why modern laws do not care about divine knowledge or ethics. Consequently, these two important things appear to the people in the shape given to them by the nature of law. They have to compromise and conform with the law — as its dependent. Thus sooner or later they turn into external rituals devoid of inner purity. Also, it is for this reason that we see the politics playing with the religion: one day it (politics) decides against religion and makes it illegal; another day it relies on it and goes to the extreme to keep its banner aloft; a third day leaves it alone in benign neglect.

Third: This system is not free from defect. Although the society has given an individual or some individuals responsibility to enforce the law, yet ultimately there is no guarantee that it would be enforced. If the person who has final power and authority deviates from truth, and changes the collective power into personal hold; and ignores or nullifies the law to establish his own rule over mankind, then there will be nothing to subdue this despot or to bring him back to the path of justice. There are countless examples of this phenomenon even in this time of ours, this age of culture and civilization — let alone the historical proofs of earlier days.

Add to this defect another shortcoming: Many is a time when the executive authority remains completely unaware that law had been broken. Or, the criminal manages to go out of its jurisdiction.

Now, we come back to our original topic: A society is held together by a single shared goal, i.e., enjoyment of this worldly life's advantages. It is what general public calls happines. But from Islam's point of view, human life has a much wider circle than this worldly life — it encompasses also the life hereafter which is the real life. Islam knows that nothing will be of any use in that next life except divine gnosis — all of which is concentrated in monotheism. Also it realizes that this knowledge cannot be preserved or protected except through noble moral values and by purifying the self from all base traits. It recognizes that these meritorious characteristics cannot be completed and perfected unless man lives in a healthy society which relies on divine worship, which submits to the demands of Allāh's Lordship, and wherein each member deals with all others according to social justice. In short, from Islamic point of view the unifying goal on which human society is based is the religion of montheism; it has the same principle of montheism. It has not stopped — in this legislation — at merely moderating the intentions and actions; rather it has completed it with the acts of worship and added to it true divine knowledge and noble moral traits.

Thereafter, it gave the responsibility of its enforcement first to the Islamic government and then to the whole society. The latter would do it through good training in knowledge and practice and by enjoining the good and forbidding the evil.

One of the most important aspects of this religion is the fact that all its parts, all its components, are so well-knit together that the whole constitutes one perfect unit: The spirit of monotheism permeats all the virtuous characteristics and ethics which this religion invites to; and the spirit of good character is spread throughout the deeds which the society members are obligated to perform. Thus all the components of Islamic religion, in final analysis, return to monotheism; and monotheism on exoteric level become noble ethics and good deeds. When monotheism comes down, it becomes ethics and deeds; and when they ascend, they become monotheism. To Him do ascend the good words; and the good deed lifts them up [35:10].

Question: The objection laid down against civil laws (when, for example, the executive authority refuses to implement them or fails to detect the law-breakings) may also be brought against Islam with equal force. Its clearest proof may be seen in the present condition of Islam, when it has become so enervated that it has lost all its grip over the society. The reason here too is the same: There is no one who could enforce its tenets among the people — even for a day.

Reply: What is the reality of law in general, be they divine or man-made? They are only imaginative forms in people's minds, some cognition retained in hearts. It is by appropriate human will that they are implemented and thus perceived and observed. Obviously, if the will is lacking, nothing can be found to apply the laws to. The same is the case of those factors which maintain the relation of this will with law's enforcement — in order to preserve and strengthen the law. However, secular laws are concerned with no more than connecting the actions with intentions of the majority; but they do not care to arrange for preservation of that intention. As long as the intention is alive, perceptive and active, the law is implemented. But if that will die (because of deterioration in the people's spirit, or decrepitude eating away the society's structure); or if it was alive but was bereft of perception and cognition (because the society was submerged in vain distractions, or inordinately involved in luxuries and material enjoyments); or even if it was alive and perceptive but became ineffective (because some other stronger power imposed its own will over that of the majority); in all these situations the nation would not attain its ambition of enforcing the law and protecting the society from destruction and annihilation. The same would be the case in the events like secret crimes which the executive could not detect; or which it cannot deal with — like the events occurring outside its jurisdiction. The discords and splits appearing within European nations after the World Wars I and II give a clear picture of this syndrome.

This breakdown of laws and destruction of society occurs only because society does not care to establish the real factor that preserves the nation's will and keeps it strong and dominant — and it is the high morality, the noble character. The nation's will, in its survival and continuation of existence, gets support from relevant characteristics only — as is explained in psychology. If the nation's traditions and applied laws are not based on sound foundation of high morality, they would be like an evil tree pulled up from the earth's surface, that has no stability.

Ponder, for example, on the appearance of communism. It is but a natural child of democracy; it came into being because some classes of the society were extremely opulent while the others were totally deprived. There was a huge distance between the two extremes; on one side was cruelty and oppression, on the other was growing impatience and accumulated hatred and rage. The same happened in the World Wars, coming one after the other, and the third is waiting on the side to pounce on humanity any moment. It has undermined the earth and destroyed the tilth and the stock; and it did not, and does not, have any reason except the ''civilized and advanced'' nations' arrogance mischief and greed.

On the other hand, Islam has laid the foundation of its traditions and laws on morality and has put utmost efforts in training the people in noble character, in order that it may ensure that the laws shall be enforced practically. This noble moral character is with the man in secret and in open, in private and in public; it does its duty and discharges its responsibility — far better than any guarding police, more effectively than any other authority that engages itself in maintaining the law and order.

Of course, the educational institutions in these countries try to train the people in meritorious characteristics, and vigorously exhort the people to it. But it proves of no use.

First: The only fountain-head of evil traits is extravagance and inordinate material enjoyment on one side and extreme deprivation on the other. The civil laws have given the people unrestricted freedom in this respect; it has provided one class with all privileges and left the others destitute. In this background, is not the call to sublime morality a call to two mutually contradictory things? An attempt to join two opposites?

Moreover, as you have seen, these nations have adopted a collective thinking. Their societies even today endeavour their utmost to oppress weaker societies and trample on their rights; they exploit these poor nations' resources, subjugate their people, and dictate their own decisions to them to the utmost possible extent. What is this call to goodness and piety — with these characteristics? Is it not a self-contradicting call that could bring no result?

Second: Even sublime morality needs — for its continuation and preservation — a guarantor to protect it and keep it alive; and there can be no guarantee for it other than monotheism, i.e., the belief that there is one God for the universe, Who has beautiful names; He has created the creatures in order that they should attain to their perfection and happiness; He loves good and virtue, and dislike evil and mischief ; He will surely gather all for deciding between them and awarding them their recompense; thus He will reward the good-doer for his good deeds and punish the evil-doer for his evil.

Obviously, if you remove the belief in the Day of Judgment, there would be no genuine reason why one should not follow one's desires, why should one desist from material enjoyments and physical lust. The human nature wants and demands what a man himself desires, not what would benefit someone else — except when the other person's desire somehow becomes this man's. (Think over it properly.)

Suppose a man desires something that he cannot obtain without trampling on someone else's rights. There is nothing to restrain him, no judge to punish him, no censurer to censure him and no reprover to reprove him. Now, what hindrance is there to stop him from committing the crime and perpetrating the injustice, no matter how serious and heinous it might be? As for some imaginary restraints (and often scholars are misled in this matter!), like patriotism, love of humanity, exalted commendations or things like that, they are merely heart's inclinations and inner feelings; there is nothing to sustain them except education and training — and that too is not based on any solid reason. Thus these things are just conventional attributes and common occurrrences; there is no guarantor to prevent their obliteration. Why should a man sacrifice his life in order that someone else might live after him, when he believes that death is complete annihilation and total extinction? As for the exaltation and praise, it depends on others' tongues; and how can he enjoy it after he has sacrificed himself and become ''nothing''?

In short, no thinking person can deny that man would never opt for a deprivation whose recompense would not reach him, whose benefit would go to someone else. As for the promise in such situations that his good memory would remain alive for ever and he would ''enjoy'' eternal wonderful praise, it is just a deceit and delusion in which he allows himself to be entrapped. It is self-delusion that lets him think that even after death and extinction his condition would be the same as before death; that he would know about and enjoy the good things told about him after his death. But surely it is nothing except self-deception, a fantasy of imagination. His condition is not unlike a drunk man driven by his emotions; he pardons his enemies, offers his life and honour, wealth and prestige, for causes which he would never approve of, if he were in his senses; but he is drunk and unable to understand, and therefore thinks that it is heroism — while in fact it is nothing but foolishness, madness.

Man cannot safeguard against this or other such misjudgments and blunders except through belief in monotheism mentioned above. That is why Islam has built the noble character (which is an integral part of its ordained laws) on the foundation of monotheism — a concomitant of which is the belief in the Day of Judgment. If a man believed in these realities, he would feel bound to do good and abstain from evil, wherever and in whatever situation he might be, whether anybody knew of his action or not, whether anyone praised him or not, whether or not there were someone to exhort him to do it or not to do it. He would know that Allāh was with him, the Knower, the Preserver, Who watched what every soul was doing; he would also know that later on a day was coming when every soul should find present what it had done of good and what it had done of evil, and in which every soul would be given recompense of what it had earned.

7. Two Logics: Logic of Understanding and Logic of Sensuousness

The logic of sensuousness calls to worldly benefits and drives one to it. If an action is profitable and man is aware of its profitability, then his senses intensely yearn to do it. If, on the other hand, he does not see any benefit in it then he remains inactive and inert.

The logic of understanding, on the other hand, motivates one to follow the truth, and believes that it is the best thing which may benefit the man, no matter it is accompanied by worldly benefit or not; because that which is with Allāh, is better and more enduring.

To see the difference between the two logics, compare two lines of a poem of ‘Antarah (which is based on the logic of sensuousness) with a Qur’ānic verse [on the same subject] based on the logic of understanding. Antarah says:

And my saying (to my soul) whenever it belched or was agitated:
‘(Stay) at your place; you shall either be praised or shall get rest.’

He wants to say: I keep my soul steadfast (whenever it is shaken in dangerous and fearsome war situations) by saying to it: Be calm and remain steadfast; if you are killed, people will praise you for your steadfastness and remaining firm in the midst of the danger; and if you kill the enemy you will be rid of him and thus get peace of mind. Therefore, remaining steadfast is good in either case.

Check it with the divine words (based on the logic of wisdom): Say: ‘‘Nothing will afflict us save what Allāh has ordained for us; He is our Patron; and on Allāh should the believers rely.’’ Say: ‘‘Do you await for us but one of the two most excellent things? And we await for you that Allāh will afflict you with punishment from Himself or by our hands. So wait; we too will wait with you.'' [9:51 — 52].

The believers believe that it is only Allāh Who is their Guardian and Patron; and it is entirely .in the hand of Allāh to support and help them. They do not care about whatever good or evil comes to them; they long only for the reward which He. has promised them for being submissive to Him and holding fast to His religion. As He says: ... this is because there afflicts them not thirst or fatigue or hunger in Allāh's way, nor do they tread a path which enrages the unbelievers, nor do they attain from the enemy what they attain, but a good work is written down to them on account of it; surely Allāh does not waste the reward of the doers of good. Nor do they spend anything that may be spent; small or great, nor do they traverse a valley, but it is written down to their credit, that Allāh may reward them with the best of what they have done [9:120 — 121].

Accordingly they say to their enemies: If you kill us or do us any harm, we shall get great reward and good result from our Lord; and if we killed you or afflicted you with some misfortune, we shall again get great reward and good result from our Lord in addition to the victory we shall get over you in this world. In either case, we shall be happy and our position is enviable; whatever you await for us is one of the two good things, we shall be successful and happy in either case. But according to your belief, you will attain your goal and will get happiness only in one case, i.e., if you were to vanquish us. We therefore await for you what would displease you, while you await for us only that which would please us, would make us happy.

These, therefore, are the two logics. One tries to build courage and steadfastness on foundation of sensuousness; it teaches that he who would stand firm in battle would get one of the two benefits: either people's admiration and praise or deliverance from enemy; and that too on the condition that there was some benefit in it for the figher who was exposing himself to danger; if there was no benefit coming to him (e.g., people were not expected to applaud and acclaim him because they did not appreciate war; or did not distinguish faithful service from betrayal; or the service was of a type that they could not know about; or faithfulness and faithlessness were equal in their eyes; or his heart was not at rest by destruction of enemy) then this logic becomes totally ineffective, inoperative and useless.

The above examples cover most of the usual reasons involving injustice and wrong, fraud and crime. An embezzler, when going against the law, says: 'My services are not properly appreciated by the people; a faithful servant and a faithless one are all equal in their eyes; the faithless one enjoys rather a more pleasant life, his condition is far better than mine.' A criminal thinks that he would surely wriggle out of the clutches of law; that the supervising authorities could not catch him out; his affairs would remain a secret and people would not be able to detect his misdeeds. One who is apathetic and sluggish in establishing the truth and rising against its enemies, and fraternizes with the forces of untruth, offers the plea that standing for truth would humiliate him in people's eyes, the modem world would laugh at him and would look down at him as a relic of the middle ages or the pre-historic times. If you talked to him about spiritual purity and moral decency, he would reply: Of what use to me shall the spiritual purity be if it leads to misery, hardship and shortened life?

On the other hand, the other logic, the Islamic one, has built its structure on following the truth and seeking the reward and recompense from Allāh. As for the worldly aims and goals, they occupy secondary position in its scheme. It is clear that no situation in life can remain out of the above-mentioned basic and primary goal — it is all-encompassing general aim which covers all human activities. According to this logic, every action — be it an act of commission or omission — is done for the pleasure of Allāh, in submission to His will, for following the truth which He has ordained; and He is the Guard, the Knowing that neither slumber overtakes Him nor sleep; none can protect from Him, nor anything in the earth or in the heavens is hidden from Him; and Allāh is Aware of what you do.

Thus there is for every soul, in whatever it does or fails to do, an Observer, a Witness Who preserves what is done by man. It makes no difference whether the people witness in it not, admire it or not, appreciate it or not.

Islamic training had been so effective that people used to come to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and confess to him the sins and crimes they had done in secret, and accepted the penalty and punishment given to them (from death sentence downwards); their only motive being to seek the pleasure of Allāh, and to cleanse their souls from the filth of sins and rust of evil.

If a scholar ponders on those events, he would understand how wonderful the effect of religious training was on the people's souls, and how it had trained them to gladly offer to Allāh the most desired and most important things they had — that is, the life and all that it covers. If this discussion were not Qur'ānic, we would have given some relevant examples from Islamic history.

8. What is the Meaning of seeking Reward from Allāh, and turning away from others? Someone might ask:

To make the reward of the hereafter as the common and primary goal of human social life would entail discarding this life's aims which the human nature invites to; it would destroy the social system and drive people to monasticism. After all, how could it be possible to attach oneself exclusively to one goal and at the same time preserve other important goals too? Is it not a contradictory statement?

Reply: It is an erroneous impression emanating from ignorance of divine wisdom and secrets which the Qur'ān has so clearly described. Islam has based its legislation on the foundation of creation, as we have repeatedly shown in many discourses in this book. Allāh says: Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion in natural devotion (to the truth), the nature made by Allāh in which He has made men; there is no alteration (by anyone else) in the creation of Allāh; that is the right religion [30:30].

In short, the series of actual creative causes by linking together have brought the human species into being, and are driving it to its life's goal that is presecribed for it. It is therefore essential for man to develop his life in the framework of free will and struggle, according to the laid down causes to attain his goal, in order that his life does not turn into a battle between cause and goals — otherwise it would lead to destruction and annihilation. This then is the religion of Islam — if the questioner would understand it. Of course, there is one Single Cause above all the causes Who has created all causes and manages all its big and small affairs; and He is Allāh, Who is the Complete Cause above all the causes (in the correct meaning of this word). Man is obliged to surrender to His will and submit to His command. This is what we mean when we say that monotheism is the only foundation of Islamic religion.

It is clear from the above that preserving the belief of monotheism, surrendering to Allāh's will and seeking His pleasure throughout one's life follows entirely the system of causality by giving everyone his due right — without polytheism or heedlessness. A Muslim has some worldly goals and some Of the hereafter, some material objectives and some spiritual. But he does not involve himself with material or worldly goals more than what is rationally required of him. That is why we find Islam calling to the belief of monotheism, to attach oneself exclusively to Allāh, to have pure belief in Him turning away from every other cause, every other goal; and yet it orders the people to follow the laws of life, to proceed on the path of nature.

Again, it is obvious that it is only the members of Islamic society who are truly happy — both in this world and the next; that their objective — to seek the pleasure of Allāh in all activities — does not conflict with life's other objectives, provided it has the upper hand.

The above discourse removes one more misunderstanding, which has been shown by some sociologists. They think that the reality of religion and its fundamental objective is to establish social justice, and the matters related to divine worship have secondary position — they are mere shoots branching from that root. Whoever therefore establishes social justice is on religion, even if he had no belief nor did he perform any worship.

But if a scholar meditates on the Qur'ān and the sunnah, and especially on the life history of the Prophet, he would at once see through the falsity of this ''argument'', without any trouble or effort. Moreover, this talk that intends to discard the belief of monotheism and noble virtues from religious tenets, actually is an attempt to change the religious objective (i.e., belief of monotheism) into secular objective (i.e., material enjoyment); and you have seen that these are two opposite objectives, none of them can be changed into the other — neither in roots, nor in shoots, nor in its fruits.

9. What is the Meaning of Freedom according to Islam?

The word, 'Freedom', in the sense it is used nowadays, is not older than a few centuries. Probably, its genesis dates from the Europeans renaissance a few hundred years ago. Yet, its idea was present in minds — a choicest desire of hearts — since ancient times.

The creative natural basis, which this idea emanates from, is the will the man is equipped with in his existence and which gives rise to his actions; it is a psychological condition nullification of which would nullify perception and sensation, that in its turn would lead to the nullification of humanity.

But man is a social being; his nature drives him to living in society, cooperating with others, co-ordinating his will and aligning his activity with the will and activities of others. This leads him to submit to a law that would regulate people's wills and actions by demarcating proper boundaries for each. The same nature that has given the man freedom of will and action, puts also limitations on that will and action and restricts that initial freedom.

As the modern civil laws have built their regulations on the foundation of material enjoyment — as you have seen — it has resulted in freedom from religion: man is free in matters of basic religious knowledge to adhere to it or not; in moral issues (and in all things beyond the sphere of civil laws) to choose, and act on, whatever he desires. This is what the freedom means in modern times.

But as for the Islam, as you know, it has based its laws on monotheism, and secondarily on noble moral values. Then it has given guidance for all types of personal and social activities, be they big or small; there is nothing related to man but the Islamic sharī'ah has a law prescribed for it. Therefore, there is no room here for the freedom (in the above sense).

Of course, it has freed man from the fetters of serving other than Allāh. It is a short sentence; but has a vast meaning. Its significance may be appreciated when you ponder deeply on Islamic system and the practical way of life which it guides to and which it establishes among the society's members and its various classes. Then compare it with what you see of the systems of domination, control and power found in the civilized societies, as between its own members and classes and also between a strong and a week nation.

As for the Islamic commandments, it has given choice and freedom in all those things which Islam has made lawful of good sustenance and advantages of moderate life without inclining to either extreme. Allāh says: Say: ''Who has prohibited the embellishment of Allāh which He has brought forth for His servants and the good provisions?'' [7:32]; He it is Who created for you all that is in the earth [2:29]; And He has made subservient to you whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is in the earth, all, from Himself [45:13].

It is really astonishing to see an exegete labouring to ''prove'' freedom of belief in Islam on the evidence of the verses like: There is no compulsion in religion [2:256]. We have explained its true significance in its Commentary in the chapter of The Cow. Here it should be added that, as you know, monotheism is the foundation of all Islamic tenets and beliefs. How is it possible, then, to allow freedom of belief? Is it not just a clear contradiction? The idea of freedom of belief has the same position in Islam as the idea of freedom from the rule of law would have in the civil laws.

Look at it from another angle. Belief (i.e., attainment of affirmative knowledge firmly-rooted in mind) is not a voluntary action of man, so that it could be a subject of permission or prohibition, compulsion or freedom. What can be prohibited or permitted is the action resulting from that belief. For example, propagation of that belief, canvassing for it, writing and publishing it, undermining the opposite belief and activity of the people — these are the things which may be allowed or forbidden. Obviously if such activities are against the laws of the. land, or go against the constitution or principles on which the laws are based, then there is no alternative to prohibiting them by law. The basis of Islamic legislation is the religion of monotheism (the belief in the Oneness of God, the prophethood and the Day of Judgment); it is what is unanimously believed by all the Muslims as well as the People of the Book (i.e., the Jews, the Christians and the Zoroastrians). The Islamic freedom is confined within this limit. To claim freedom beyond this limit is tantamount to destroy the foundation of religion.

Of course, there is one more freedom, i.e., freedom of describing one's belief for debate or discussion, as we shall explain below in item 14.

10. What is the Way to Change and Perfection in Islamic Society?

It might be said: Agreed that the Islamic system encompasses all that is necessary for a happy life, and that the Islamic society is enviably happy and pleasant. But this system, because of its allpervasiveness and lack of freedom of belief, leads to stagnation of society, retards its evolutionary progress, and blocks the way to change and perfection — and, as they say, it is a serious defect for a society which claims to be perfect. Evolutionary process demands presence of opposite forces in a thing: those forces, through mutual action and reaction [through conflict between an original direction and its direct opposite], would bring about a new position free from the defects of the original forces. If we admit that Islam removes the opposite tenets and especially the beliefs opposed to its fundamentals, then such a society would be brought to a standstill in its evolutionary progress.

COMMENT: It is one of the objections of the dialectical materialism; but it is based on an astonishing confusion. Human knowledge and belief is of two kinds: One, that which accepts change and evolution: these are technical subjects that serve to raise the standard of material life and to subdue the natural forces, e.g., the mathematics, the physics, etc. Whenever these subjects and technologies would progress from lower to higher level, from defectiveness to perfection, the society would accordingly change and progress.

The other type of knowledge is that which does not accept change — although it accepts perfection in another sense. This is the metaphysical divine knowledge and cognition, that unveils the genesis and resurrection, happiness and unhappiness, etc. It explains these affairs definitely and finally; there is no change or evolution in it — although it accepts development and perfection in the sense of depth and detail. This knowledge and this cognition do not effect societies and ways of life except in a general manner. If this knowledge and these beliefs remain standstill in one condition, it would not cause the society to stop in its developmental progress. We know that we have a lot of general ideas which are unchangeable and static, but they have not hindered the society's progress. For example, we say and believe that man should work to protect his life; that the work should aim at a benefit returning to the man; that man should live within a society; that the universe exists in reality, it is not a delusion; that man is a part of the universe, a part of the planet called the Earth; and that he has got some limbs and organs, some powers and faculties. There are a lot of other such confirmed and unchangeable informations and beliefs, and their unchangeability does not affect the progress of the society, nor does it make the society stagnant. In this category comes the belief that the universe needs, and is created by, One God, Who has ordained for the people a comprehensive law that combines all the ways of happiness, and which was sent to us through the prophets, and He will gather all people on a day when He will award them the recompense of their deeds. It is the only foundation on which Islam has built its social order, and which it jealously guards. As is known, it is such a proposition that, if made subject to dialectical conflict between thesis and anti-thesis producing a synthesis, it would cause decline and retrogress of the society — as we have explained several times. This is also the case with all real facts and truths related to metaphysics; their rejection cannot do any good to the society, it can bring only its decline and fall.

In short, human society in its evolutionary progress needs day to day change and perfection only in the ways of exploiting natural resources. It takes place through continuing technical research and application of knowledge to practical needs; and Islam does not hinder this process in the least.

As for the changes in the principles of sociology, in the theoretical aspects of social order — like autocratic monarchy, democracy, communism and theories like that — they become necessary only when the prevalent system fails to bring the society nearer to social perfection. It is not an evolution from defectiveness to perfection. If there is any relation between one theory and the other, it is that of wrong and right, not that of defective and perfect, nor of undeveloped and developed. Now suppose that a social order is firmly established exactly as man's nature desires, i.e., on social justice; people under its beneficial training are equipped with useful knowledge and good deeds; then enhancing the level of the knowledge and activities, they are proceeding joyfully and energetically towards their happiness; in this way they are continuously perfecting themselves and increasing the sphere of their happiness and felicity. What is the need, in this case, to change such a social order? What do they want more than that? No thinking person will say that man must change every thing around himself even if there is no need for any change.

Objection: You cannot avoid change even in those things which you claim to be above the change, like beliefs, noble ethics, etc. All these things do change with the passage of time when social conventions change and new environment replaces the old. No one can deny that the thinkings of modem man are so different from those of the ancient ones. Likewise, his ideas are affected by variation in his habitat, i.e., whether he lives in equatorial, polar or moderate zone. Also, his way of life affects his thinking, depending on whether he is a boss or a servant, a Bedouin or a townsman, prosperous or unprosperous, rich or poor and so on. No doubt, ideas and opinions differ with difference in influencing factors, and change when the times change.

Reply: This objection is based on the theory of relativity of human knowledge and ideas. According to this theory, truth and falsehood, good and evil, are relative affairs. General theoretical knowledge concerned with genesis and resurrection, as well as general practical opinions (e.g., the proposition that society is good for man, or that justice is a virtue — a general proposition, not as applied to practical conditions) have only relative values which always change with the change of time, environment and conditions. But we have described in another place falsity of this theory in its generality. [1]

The sum total of our discourse there was that this theory does not cover general theoretical propositions and a part of general practical ideas.

It is enough to show invalidity of generality of this theory that: If we agree that this theory is in fact general, unrestricted and unchangeable, then it entails acceptance of [at least] one unrestricted general proposition that is not relative — and that is this theory, this proposition, itself. Alternatively, if we say that it is not an unrestricted generality, but only a partially correct proposition, then it proves — as a concomitant — existence of unrestricted general propositons. Thus, the theory is not general, in any case. In other words, if it is correct that `Every opinion and belief must change at some time', then this theory itself must change one day, i.e., there should be some beliefs and opinions that will never change. (Think it over.)

11. Is Islamic Sharī'ah competent to bring happiness in the modern Life?

Someone might ask: Let us say that Islam had provided comprehensive guidance for all situations of life as it was in those days when the Qur'ān was revealed; and was thus able to lead that society to its true happiness and to all its ambitions. But times have changed; and so have the ways of human life. The culture and mechanical life of modern civilization is totally different from the simple life of fourteen centuries ago that was confined to primitive natural resources. Now man, as a result of his long and arduous struggles, has reached a level of development and civilization which, if compared to his condition of a few centuries earlier, would look like a comparison between two different species. How can the laws made to regulate the life of that time solve the problems of modern times' complicated and ingenious life? How can either of the societies take the burden of the other on itself?

Reply: Obviously, there is difference between the two eras — in the forms of life. But it does not mean difference in general principles and substance of life. What has changed is not the principle, but its application. Man even today needs food to eat, clothes to wear, house to live in, means of transportation to carry him and his goods from one place to another, and a society to belong to, as well as associations and connections of various types — sexual, commercial, technical, professional, etc. This need is general and universal; it will not change as long as man is man with this nature and physique, as long as his is a human life. There is no difference in this matter between a primitive man and a modern one. The difference is only in the means and equipments which he uses to satisfy his material needs. The primitive man used to eat fruits, vegetables and game meat, which he obtained in simple ways. Today he has got thousands of preparations for food and drink, of various qualities beneficial to his nature, different colours pleasing to his eyes, various flavours delicious to his taste, attractive shapes and forms pleasant to his touch, with a lot of other variations in its specifications. But all this variation does not change the basic reality that both categories are food, which man eats to satiate his hunger and satisfy his desire.

These general conditions and ideas of man have not changed with the change of times; it is only their applications that have taken other shapes. In the same way, the general laws of Islam — that have been laid down according to the demand of nature for attainment of happiness — are not nullified just because a new means has replaced the old one, if the conformity with basic nature is not affected, if the new means has not deviated from nature. But if there is any conflict with the nature, then Islamic system never agrees with it, neither in old days nor in modern times.

As for rules concerned with day to day affairs and happenings, which by their nature are subject to rapid change, like monetary and administrative matters related to defence, means of communications, transport, municipal affairs and things like that — they are left to the discretion of the ruler. A ruler has the same position within his domain as a head of the family has within his family. The ruler may take decisions about these matters as the family head may do for his family. The ruler may decide about the internal and external affairs of his country — regarding war or peace, financial or other matters — keeping in view the interest of the society, after holding consultations with the Muslims. As Allāh says: and take counsel with them in the affairs; but when you have decided, then place your trust in Allāh [3:159]. All this concerns the public affairs.

However, these rules and decisions are of specific nature, not general. They may change according to the situation and condition; policies may change because of new factors coming up and old ones going away. But divine rules are not so, they do not come and go; they are based on the Book and the sunnah, and they are not subject to abrogation. (Its detail will be given somewhere else.)

12. Who is entitled to rule over the Islamic Society? What Characteristics he should have?

The authority to rule over the Islamic society belonged to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); and the Qur'ān clearly says that the people were obliged to obey him and follow his commands.

Allāh says:

And obey Allāh and obey the Messenger [64:12];
... that you may judge between people by means of that which Allah has taught you [4:105];
The Prophet has a greater claim on the believers than they have on themselves [33:6];
Say: ''If you love Allāh, then follow me, Allāh will love you'' [3:31].

There are many such verses that describe one or the other aspects of his all-encompassing general authority over the Islamic society.

The best way to understand this reality is to study deeply the life of the Prophet and then to ponder collectively on the verses revealed about ethics and laws covering the divine worship, mutual dealings, politics, and other common and social affairs. The picture that will appear on his mind from the sum total of this divine revelation will speak more eloquently than that which may be seen from one or two sentences.

There is another point that a research scholar must keep in mind. Generally the verses dealing with the subjects of the rites of worship, fighting in the way of Allāh, enforcement of the penal code and other such subjects are addressed to the believers collectively, not especially to the Prophet. For example:

... and establish prayers ... [4:77];
... and strive hard in His way ... [5:35];
... and give upright testimony for Allāh ... [65:2];
... fasting has been prescribed for you ... [2:183];
And spend in the way of Allāh ... [2:195];
And from among you there should be a party who invite to good and enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong [3:104];
And strive hard in (the way of) Allāh a striving as is due to Him ... [22:78];
(As for) the fornicatress and the fornicator, flog each of them, (giving) a hundred stripes ... [24:2];
And (as for) the man who steals and the woman who steals, cut off their hands ... [5:38];
And there is life for you in (the law of) retaliation ... [2:179];
And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together and be not divided ... [3:103];

... that establish the religion and be not divided therein ... [42:13];

And Muḥammad is no more than a messenger, the messengers have already passed away before him; if then he dies or is killed, will you turn back upon your heels? And whoever turns back upon his heels, he will by no means do harm to Allāh in the least; and Allāh will reward the grateful [3:144].

There are many verses of this nature, and all taken together make it clear that the religion is a collective matter which Allāh has made people responsible for; He is not pleased with disbelief for His servants; and He intends only that all of them together should establish the religion. The society of which they are members should be managed by themselves — none of them should be less responsible than the others. Enforcement of law is not an especial prerogative of some to the exclusion of the others — be he the Prophet or the others. Allāh says: That I will not waste the work of a worker among you, whether male or female, the one of you being from the other [3:195]. The verse is unrestricted; and it shows that Allāh has kept in consideration the natural effect the members of the Islamic society have on their social order — He cares for it in legislation as He has done in creation. He will not let it waste. He says: Surely the land is Allāh's; He causes such of His servants to inherit it as He pleases, and the end is for those who fear (Allāh) [7:128].

Of course, to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) belongs the mission, the guidance and the training. Allāh says: ... who recites to them His communications and purifies them, and teaches them the Book and the Wisdom ... [62:2]. He was appointed by Allāh to look after the ummah, and manage its affairs in this world as in the hereafter, and he continued to lead them as long as he was alive.

But one should not forget that this system was totally different from a monarchic rule — the rule which treats Allāh's wealth as personal booty of the monarch, and the servants of Allāh as his slaves; giving him full authority to do with them whatever he wants and rule over them in any way he pleases. Nor was it like the social orders based on the principle of material enjoyment, like democracy, etc.; because there are so many distinguishing factors that separate Islam from these systems, and which have left no room for any mix-up.

One of the greatest differences is found in the fact that these societies, being based on material enjoyment, are motivated by the spirit of exploitation and utilization. It is another name of man's arrogance, that wants everything — even other human beings — subjugated to his will and actions. It permits him to take any route to reach that end; to use any means to get what he desires, to acquire what he wants. In olden days it was known as despotic monarchy; now it appears before our eyes wearing the mask of development and civilization. We are daily witnessing the oppressions, injustices and arrogance meted out by strong nations to the weaker ones; is there any need to remind ourselves of their tyrannies and high-handedness recorded in the histories?

A Pharaoh, a Caesar or a Kisra behaved despotically towards weaker sections of his reign, and played with their lives, properties and dignity in any way he liked. His excuse — if any excuse was ever offered — was that it was a necessary ingredient of rulership which contributed to the efficiency of government and strengthened the Kingdom. He believed that it was a tribute due to his outstanding qualities, to his sovereign status — and his sword spoke for him. Exactly the same thing is happening even now. Look at political relationships of today's strong nations with the weak ones; you will find the history repeating itself. Of course, the sceptre previously held by an individual is now carried collectively by the society, but the spirit is the same and the ambition unchanged.

On the other hand, Islamic system is free of such ambitions and desires; and its proof may be found in the life of the Prophet as evidenced by his conquests and treaties.

Another difference: No human society, that ever appeared on the stage of history, was free from various types of disparity among its members, a factor that always led to discord and chaos. If there are various strata, different classes, in society, it is ultimately bound to destroy the social order: when a few persons hoard treasures of wealth while the common people do not get necessities of life; when elites or nobles get all the privileges which public is deprived of; when so-called ''public servants'' become overlords of the country, then the nation is bound to fall into perdition.

Islamic society presents a pleasant contrast. It is a social order whose parts are all alike; no one has precedence over the others; there is no prvileged class, no dignified lords, no distinguished group. If there is any distinction it is the one loudly demanded by human nature; it is the superiority accorded to piety — and it is a factor which is in Allāh's hand to decide, men have nothing to do with it. Allāh says: O you people! surely We have created you of a male and a female, and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allāh is the one among you who is most pious [49:13]; therefore hasten to (do) good works [2:148]. The ruler and the ruled, the leader and the follower, the superior and the subordinate, the free man and the slave, the man and the woman, the rich and the poor, the big and the small, all of them have equal status in Islam. The legal code is equally applied to all; there is no class at all in social affairs and civil aspects — as may be seen in the life of the Prophet.

A third distinction: The executive power in Islam is not confined within a separate class; implementation of Islamic laws is the responsibility of all members of the society. Each and every individual is obligated to call to the good, to enjoin what is good and forbid the evil. There are many other distinguishing features which a research scholar may easily find out.

This was the condition during the lifetime of the Prophet. As for the subsequent period, the majority of the Muslims believe that it is the Muslims who have the right to choose a caliph to rule over the society; but the Shī'ī Muslims believe that the caliph must be appointed by Allāh and His Messenger, and that they are the twelve Imāms (as explained in detail in theological books).

In any case, there is no doubt that in these days, when the Prophet has died and the twelfth Imām is in occultation, the authority of the Islamic government lies in the hands of the Muslims themselves. It may be inferred from the Divine Book that they are required to appoint a ruler for the Islamic society according to the tradition established by the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) — and that is the tradition of imāmah, not of monarchy or imperialism. That ruler has the responsibility of enforcing the Islamic laws without any change. As for other matters — apart from the laid down laws — he has to manage the affairs with consultations according to the time and situation.

The proof of the above may be inferred from the verses describing the overall authority of the Prophet when read in conjunction with the verse, Certainly there is for you in the Messenger of Allāh an excellent example ... [33:21].

13. The Boundary of Islamic State is Ideology and Belief, not physical Landmarks, nor Man-made Borders

Islam has totally refused the theory of national separateness to have any effect or influence on the society. What is the basic factor of nationalism? It has emanated from nomadism and tribal and clannish way of life; another influencing factor was the physical differences in regions or habitat where various groups lived. These two — nomadic wanderings and natural differences in various geographical regions, like hot or cold climate, barrenness or fertility of land, and other features like that — led to the division of mankind into various clans and tribes, as well as to the differences in their languages and colours, as has been explained in its place.

Later these two factors led every group to take possession of the piece of land or region where they lived — it depended on their endeavour and strength. They reserved it for themselves, called it their ‘‘home country’’; gradually they came to love it and repulse the intruders from it with all their powers.

Although this phenomenon came into being for satisfying a natural need, yet it contained a characteristic which was diametrically opposed to the demand of basic human nature, that is, the demand that mankind should live as one single society. It is self-evident that nature wants various scattered powers to join hands and unite, in order that they may get strengthened by that consolidation and union; it will help it to attain its desired good purpose in the best and most perfect way. We may observe this phenomenon in the upward progress of primary matter — it appears first as an element, then passing through different stages it becomes a vegetable, then an animal, then a human being.

When mankind is divided according to the countries people live in, then inhabitants of a country join hands together and unite as citizens of that country; as a result they are separated from other nationalities. They together constitute a ‘‘nation’’, a unit that is totally separate — in body and spirit — from other nations, other units. In this manner, humanity is deprived of its unity and wholeness; and is afflicted by discord, difference and disunity — the very trap which it wanted to avoid. Now this ‘‘new’’ unit starts treating other ‘‘new’’ units (i.e. other nations) in the same way as it treats other natural things; i.e., it wants to exploit and subjugate other nations. The experience — from the early dawn of humanity to this day — testifies to this truth; and the same theme may be inferred from many verses quoted in earlier discourses.

That is why Islam has discarded these differences, divisions, and separations altogether; and has based the society on the foundation of faith and belief, instead of race, origin, domicile or other such considerations. Even in such matters as matrimony and consanguinity, the criterion for the conjugal rights and inheritance is not the the home or country, but identity of monotheistic belief.

The best proof for this reality may be seen in various facets of this religion's laws, as it has not neglected any aspect of human life without giving a clear direction for it. If the Islamic society is dominating over the world, then the Muslims are obligated to establish the religion and not be disunited. If it is oppressed and overpowered, then again they must try to revive and revitalize the Islam, and to raise its prestige as much as they can. Even if there is only one Muslim in a place, it is his duty to hold fast to the religion, to act according to its laws and to implement it as much as he can — even if it is only by having belief in the heart and praying just by gestures.

It is clear from the above that the Islamic society has been framed in such a way that it can be lived in all conditions, and in every situation — no matter whether Muslims are rulers or ruled, victorious or vanquished, advanced or backward, conspicuous or hidden, powerful or powerless. Particularly, the Qur'ānic verses dealing with the subject of at-taqiyyah (اَلتَّقِيَّةْ = dissimulation of one's religion under duress or in face of threatening harm or damage) make this reality abundantly clear. Allāh says: He who disbelieves in Allāh after his having believed, not he who is compelled while his heart is at rest on account of faith ... [16:106]; ... except when you guard yourselves against them for fear of them ... [3:28]; Therefore fear Allāh as much as you can [64:16]; O you who believe! fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him, and do not die unless you are Muslims [3:102].

14. Islam cares for social Order in all its Aspects

The verse under discussion, O you who believe! be patient, and help each other in patience and remain lined up, and fear Allāh, that you may be successful, proves this fact (as explained earlier) apart from many other verses.

Islam makes it a point to establish collectivity in every law and rule which can be observed jointly or performed collectively in relevant manner, ordering and exhorting the Muslims in a way that would lead to the desired goal. A research scholar should look at it from two angles:

First: One should keep in view the difference in degrees of emphasis on collectivity. The Law-Giver has ordained joint efforts directly in jihād to the extent that is necessary for the defence. This is the highest category. Then fasting and ḥajj have been made obligatory for everyone who is able to do so (and has no genuine excuse for exemption); and as a concomitant people are bound to gather together for these two rites of worship; then they have been sealed by the two 'īds and their prayers. Then come the daily five-time prayers which are obligatory for every adult and sane Muslim, but congregation is not compulsory in them. Even then, one congregational prayer has been made obligatory once a week on Fridays within a radius of one farsakh (اَلفَرْسَخُ = a distant of 6000 yards). So it is another category.

Second: As we have seen, Islam has prescribed congregation for some things directly. Further we find that in some other things it has put emphasis on gathering and collectivity without making it directly obligatory, e.g., obligatory prayers performed in congregation; it is sunnah and highly recommended, as it is a tradition established by the Prophet, and people are exhorted to establish the Prophet's traditions.[1] The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) once said about a group of the Muslims who avoided coming to the congregational prayer: ''We are on the verge of ordering — about a group that has left praying in the mosque — that firewood be brought and put on their doors; then fire be kindled over them and their houses be burnt down on them.'' That is the way to be followed in all the traditions established by the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); the Muslims are obligated to preserve his traditions by all possible means and at all costs.

These are the subjects related to ijtihād based on the Book [of Allāh]

and the sunnah; and their explanations and details may be seen in the Islamic Jurisprudence.

Now that we know that Islam emphasizes collectivity in all laws (rites of worship, mutual dealings, and political affairs) which it has laid down for the people, as well as in noble manners and basic beliefs, the time has come to turn our eyes to another direction, that is, the collectivity of Islam in its basic knowledge and fundamental gnosis.

We find that Islam invites the people to the natural religion on the ground that it is the manifest truth in which there is no doubt. There are numerous Qur'ānic verses of this theme, which need not be quoted here. This in itself is the first step in joining and uniting different minds; because people — in spite of their differences, and their attachments to various customs and characteristics — are united in the belief that: ''Truth must be followed''.

Then we see that Islam accepts the excuse of a person for whom the proof has not been furnished, and the path not made clear, even though he might have heard some arguments. Allāh says: ... that he who would perish might perish by clear proof, and he who would live might live by clear proof ... [8:42]; Except the weak from among the men and the children who have not in their power the means nor can they find a way (to escape); so these, it may be, Allāh will pardon them, and Allāh is Pardoning, Forgiving [4:99]. Look at the unrestrictedness of the verse and the position of the clause, ''who have not in their power the means nor can they find a way''. These words give complete freedom to every thinker (who is able to think, examine and research) to meditate on matters connected with religious cognition and to ponder on them deeply. Moreover, the Qur'ānic verses are full of exhortation to meditate, contemplate and ruminate.

It is not a secret that various internal and external factors affect people's thinking in different ways — in its imagination and confirmation as well as in its achievements and decisions. Consequently, it leads to difference in those fundamental principles upon which the Islamic society is based (as we have earlier explained).

However, the difference in understanding of two persons (as explained in psychology, ethics and sociology) emanates from one of the following factors:

1. It may issue from the difference in psychological traits and intrinsic characteristics — be they good or bad. Such factors have great effect on human knowledge and cognition, because they affect intellectual capacity and ability. The perception and intellectual performance of an upright and just man cannot be compared to that of a headstrong tyrant; a moderate and dignified person will receive knowledge in a way that cannot be imitated by a rash, prejudiced and narrow-minded man; nor by a barbarian who follows every Tom, Dick and Harry; nor by a misguided person who does not know where he is rushing to or what is going to happen to him. This difference can easily be overcome through religious training. This training agrees with religious principles and cognitions, and creates such characteristics that coform with those principles, i.e., noble virtues. Allāh says: ... a Book revealed after Mūsā verifying that which is before it, guiding to the truth and to a right path [46:30]; With it Allāh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of safety and brings them out of utter darkness into light by His permission and guides them to the straight path [5:16]; And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them onto Our ways; and Allāh is most surely with the doers of good [29:69]. The relevance of these verses with the subject matter is obvious.

2. Or it may be a result of the difference in actions. Anti-truth activities like sins and various kinds of lust, temptations and wicked thoughts, teach a man — especially if he is simple-minded — wrong ideas; and prepare his mind for infiltration of doubts and penetration of erroneous thoughts. In this way is created difference in thinking and resistance against the truth.

Islam has laid down some rules to overcome this difficulty:

Firstly, it has obligated the society to call the people to the religion — continuously;

Secondly, it has ordered the society to enjoin the good and forbid the evil;

Thirdly and lastly, it has made it compulsory to dissociate from deviating persons and doubting groups.

Allāh says: And from among you there should be a party who invite to good and enjoin what is right and forbid the wrong ... [3:104]. Inviting to good would confirm the true belief and let its roots grow deep in the hearts — through constant teachings and reminders. Then enjoining what is right and forbidding the evil would erase adverse traits that could prevent the true belief from taking root. Also Allāh says: And when you see those who engage in vain discourses about Our signs, withdraw from them until they enter into some other discourse; and if the Satan causes you to forget, then do not sit after recollection with the unjust people. And nothing of the reckoning of their (deeds) shall be upon those who guard (against evil), but (theirs) is only to remind, haply they may guard. And leave those who have taken their religion for a play and an idle sport, and whom this world's life has deceived, and remind (them) thereby lest a soul should be fettered with what it has earned ... [6:68 — 70]. Here Allāh admonishes the Muslims not to join in a discourse that aims at creating doubt, directing objections or casting aspersions upon religious facts, and divine realities — even if by allusion or implication. He reminds us that it can happen only if man does not take his religion seriously, treats it only as a vain sport or on idle game; it happens when man is beguiled by this transient life; and it may be remedied only through good training and constant reminder of Allāh's majesty.

3. Or this difference may be a result of some extraneous factors; for example, if the man lives in a remote corner where the message of true faith has not reached; or has reached only superfluously or in a distorted form. Or if the man does not have enough understanding to properly grasp the realities of religion, as in the case of idiots or simpletons.

Islam has prescribed for it two remedies: the propagation of religion should cover each and every corner of the world, and the people should be invited to Islam patiently with politeness and good manners. These two factors are the especialities of Islam's missionary activities. Allāh says: Say: ''This is my way: I invite (you) to Allāh; with clear sight (are) I and he who follows me ... '' [12:108]. It is known that a proficient and discerning speaker gauges how much his words would influence a man, what would be their effect on different people of different types; therefore, he speaks only what would be listened to. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said — and it has been narrated by both sects: ''We, the group of prophets, talk with people according to the measure of their understanding.'' Allāh says: ... why should not then a company from every party from among them go forth that they may acquire (proper) understanding in religion, and that they may warn their people when they come back to them, so that they may be cautious? [9:122].

These in short, are various ways for avoiding difference in belief, and of removing the difference if it appears.

Islam has also laid down a further sociological rule to prevent the difference creeping into the society (which could lead to disorder and weakness of the social order). Allāh says: And (know) that this is My path, the straight one, therefore follow it; and follow not (other) ways, for they will scatter you away from His way; this He has enjoined you with that you may guard (against evil) [6:153]. This verse makes it clear that if they remained united in following the straight path, and cautious against following the other ways, they would be saved from disunity; and their unity and identity would be preserved. Again He says: O you who believe! fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him, and do not die unless you are Muslims. And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together and be not divided ... [3:102 — 103]. It has already been explained that ''the cord of Allāh'' refers to the Qur'ān which explains the realities of religion, or to the Qur'ān and the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) together, as may be inferred from the verses preceding these: O you who believe! if you obey a party from among those who were given the Book, they will turn you back as unbelievers after you have believed. But how can you disbelieve while it is you to whom the communications of Allāh are recited, and among you is His Messenger. And whoever holds fast to Allāh, he indeed is guided to the straight path [3:100 — 101].

These verses emphasize the importance of unity in religious beliefs, identity of ideas and ideals and cooperation in seeking and imparting knowledge. Whenever the people are confronted with a new ideology or assailed with a doubt, they should resort to the Qur'ān that is recited to them, and meditate on it, so that the roots of difference are pulled out. Allāh says: Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ān? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy [4:82]; And these examples, We set them forth for the people and none understand them but the learned [29:43]; so ask the followers of the Reminder if you do not know [16:43]. The verses show that differences may be removed by meditating on the Qur'ān or by referring the matter to those who do meditate.

Also, they prove that referring to the Messenger — and he has the overall responsibility of religion — would remove the discord and disunity from the society and explain the truth which they were obligated to follow. Allāh says: ... and We have revealed to you the Reminder that you may make clear to men what has been revealed to them, and that haply they may reflect [16:44]. Nearly the same is the import of the verse: ... and if they had referred it to the Messenger and to those in authority among them, those among them who (can) draw out (the truth) in it, would have known it ... [4:83]; O you who believe! obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you; then if you quarrel about anything; refer it to Allāh and the Messenger if you believe in Allāh and the last day; this is better and very good in the end [4:59].

This then is the picture of collective thinking in Islam.

The above discourse also shows that this religion allows the people complete freedom of thought in the same way as it safeguards the especial divine cognition. The way shown by it is as follows:

It is obligatory for the Muslims to meditate on the realities of religion and to try their utmost to think and research for its cognition — collectively and in cooperation with each other. They should not be worried if in this process they are assailed with a doubt or conflicting pointers. What is required in this case is to review his doubt or thought with the help of the Qur'ān — through collective meditation. If that does not remove the trouble, then he should refer it to the Messenger or his successor so that his doubt is removed, and (if it was not valid then) its invalidity is explained to him. Allāh says: Those who listen to the word, then follow the best of it; these are they whom Allāh has guided, and those it is who are the men of understanding [39:18].

Freedom of belief and thought (as we have described above) is something different from the freedom to propagate that idea or belief before referring it to the Qur'ān and the Messenger or his successors. Such propaganda would lead to disunity and discord which in its turn would damage the foundation of the healthy society.

What has been mentioned above is the best possible system for running the society's affairs, inasmuch as it opens the door to intellectual development, and at the same time preserves man's personal freedom. On the other hand, imposition of belief on the people, putting seals on their hearts, crushing the thinking power of men by suppression and oppression, and keeping them in line through whip or sword, anathema or excommunication, boycott or banishment — far be it from Islam to allow or agree to such tactics. In fact, such tactics were and are the trademark of the Christianity. The history of the Church is replete with its misdeeds, misconducts and high-handedness — particularly between the fifth and the sixteenth centuries of the Christian era. You would look in vain for any parellel in history to the tyrannies, oppressions and cruelties perpetrated by the Christian Church.

Regrettably, we Muslims are now deprived of this bounty and its concomitants (i.e., collective thinking and freedom of belief), just as we have been deprived of many other great bounties which Allāh had bestowed on us. It is because we have fallen short of our duties towards Allāh; and Allāh does not change the condition of a people unless they change their own condition. Now, the churchly behaviour has taken root in our society, with the result that there is disharmony among the hearts and discord in the society; and various sects and groups have raised their heads. May Allāh forgive us, and help us to do what He is pleased with, and guide us to His straight path.

15. The true Religion will ultimately prevail over the world

The good end belongs to piety, to fear of Allāh. Human species, by its nature that is ingrained in it, is seeking its true happiness looking for its real felicity. In other words, it is striving to sit firmly on the throne of its spiritual-cum-physical life — a social life that would give the soul its full share in this world as well as in the hereafter. We have already told you that it is what is known as Islam, the religion of monotheism.

There have appeared there deviations in humanity's march towards its destination, in its ascension to the pinnacle of perfection. But it happens not because the nature has lost its hold, but simply because of some error of judgment, some mistake in applying a principle to a particular situation. The goal decided by creative nature has to be reached sooner or later, it cannot be avoided. Allāh says: Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion in natural devotion (to the truth), the nature made by Allāh in which He has made men; there is no alteration in the creation of Allāh; that is the right religion, but most people do not know. (That is, they do not have its detailed knowledge, although their nature is aware of it in a general way.) ... So as to be ungrateful for what We have given them; but enjoy yourselves (for a while), for you shall soon come to know ... Mischief has appeared in the land and the sea on account of what the hands of men have wrought, that He may make them taste a part of that which they have done, so that they may return [30:30 — 41]. Again He says: ... then soon Allāh will bring a people that He shall love them and they shall love Him, humble before the believers, mighty against the unbelievers, they shall strive hard in Allāh's way and shall not fear the censure of any censurer [5:54]; And certainly We did write in the Zabūr after the reminder that the earth shall inherit it My righteous servants [21:105]; and the (good) end is for guarding (against evil) [20:132]. These and similar other verses tell us clearly that Islam is bound to prevail, appearing one day in its most perfect and complete form; and then it will rule over the world.

Question: Islam appeared on the world's stage at a certain time; it was a link in the chain of history, and it left its effects on the succeeding links. The modern civilization is, wittingly or unwittingly, much indebted to Islam. In spite of that, it is just a wishful thinking that Islam would prevail over the world, that this religion — with all its elements, in its complete form — would ever rule over the earth and attain its goals. It is a proposition which human nature does not accept and would never agree with. Moreover, it, has never been tested in this role, so that we may say that it could really happen and that Islam could ever dominate over the humanity.

Reply: This objection is untenable. We have explained earlier that Islam — in the meaning we have been using it for — is the final destination of mankind, the perfection of humanity to which it is driven by nature; it makes no difference whether man recognizes that goal in its full details or not. Definite experiences, obtained from other species, prove that every species is proceeding towards the goal which is relevant to its being; it is driven to its final destination by the system of creation — and man is not an exception to this universal rule.

Moreover, no system, no ''ism'', that had ever prevailed, or now prevails, in any human society, was ever proved by any previous experiment before it was enforced. Look at the sharī'ahs brought by Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm, Mūsā and 'Īsā — they just appeared on the scene and were implemented. The same was the case with the laws brought by Brahma, Buddha, Māni and others. In the same way, the secular systems, like democracy and communism, etc., were established in various societies in different manners — all without any previous experimentation.

What is required for a social system to be established and to take its roots, is a group of persons with courage of their convictions, endowed with firm determination and high ideals, who would not rest until they have reached their goal; who would not tire, would not be weakened; who would not be assailed by doubts and misgivings about their ultimate success; they would never entertain the idea that perchance they could fail, that perhaps their endeavours would not succeed. They would go on trying determinedly until they have succeeded. This principle applies everywhere, and it makes no difference whether the goal itself is divine or Satanic.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, O you who believe! be patient and help each other in patience and remain lined up: ‘‘Have patience in misfortunes, and help each other to be patient in trial [and temptation], and be lined up with him whom you follow.’’ (Ma‘āni ’l-akhbār)

The same Imām said: ‘‘Be patient about your religion, and have patience against your enemy and be linked up to your Imām’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: Nearly the same theme has been narrated from the Prophet through the Sunnī chains.

The same Imām said: ‘‘Be patient about the obligatory commandments, and help each other to be patient in misfortunes, and be linked up to the Imāms.’’ (al-Kāfī)

‘Alī (a.s.) said: ‘‘Be lined up for the prayers.’’ He said: ‘‘That is, remain waiting for them, because (the system of) garrisoning did not exist at that time.’’ (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

The author says: The difference in the traditions springs from the generality of the orders, as we had mentioned earlier.

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Ḥayyān have narrated from Jābir ibn ‘Abdullāh al-Anṣārī that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Should not I guide you to that by which Allāh erases the mistakes and covers the sins?’ We said: ‘Yes, indeed, O Messenger of Allāh!’ He said: ‘To perform al-wuḍū’ properly in spite of inconveniences, and to walk many times to the mosques, and to wait for the (next) prayer after the prayer; so that is the lining up.’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: [as-Suyuṭī] has narrated it from the Prophet, also through other chains. There are innumerable traditions about excellence of being lined up or linked up.

In the Name of Allāh, the Beneficent, the Merciful. [1]

O people! fear your Lord, Who created you from a single being and created its mate of the same (kind) and spread from these two, many men and women; and fear Allāh, by Whom you demand one of another (your rights), and (be mindful of) relationship; surely Allāh is vigilant over you (1).

* * * * *

[1] Bismillāhi 'r-Raḥmāni 'r-Raḥīm is a part — in fact, the first verse — of every chapter except the ninth. It is the well-known and unanimous verdict of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) who according to the Prophet (s.aw.a.) were inseparable Companions of the Qur'ān. According to az-Zamakhsharī, the reciters and jurists of Mecca and Kūfah, as well as ash-Shāfi'ī and his followers are of the same view, as was Ibn 'Abbās, who said that whoever leaves Bismillāh ... , leaves 114 verses of the Book of Allāh. (Vide al-Kash-shāf, Beirut, vol. 1, pp. 24 — 26)
But the author has followed the system of numbering used by the majority of the Muslims (including the Ḥanafits, the Mālikites and the reciters of Baṣrah and Syria) whereby they do not count it as a verse. Probably, he has done so to avoid confusion in references. (tr.)

COMMENTARY

The chapter aims — as may be seen from this opening verse — describing matrimonial laws, like the number of wives allowed, the women with whom marriage is forbidden and things like that; together with the laws of inheritance. It also touches some other matters, e.g., some rules of prayer, jihād, evidence, commerce, etc., and some comments on the People of the Book.

The subject matters indicate that it is a Medinite chapter revealed after hijrah. Apparently it was revealed piecemeal, not all at one time, although we find in most of the verses some sort of connection with one another.

This verse (as well as a few following ones which touch the subject of orphans and women) are a sort of prologue to prepare the minds for the rules of inheritance and marriage. The permissible number of wives that comes in the third verse — although an important subject — has been mentioned here just as a side-line, taking advantage of the talk preceding it, as we shall describe in its Commentary.

QUR'ĀN: O people! fear your Lord, Who created you from a single being and created its mate of the same (kind) and spread from these two, many men and women: The verse calls them to the fear of their Lord, to the piety, concerning their selves, as they all are human beings, identical in their humanity; there is no difference among them in this reality; man and woman, big and small, old and young, weak and strong, all are the same in their humanity. Therefore, man should not oppress woman, nor should a big and strong person trample on his smaller or weaker fellow, neither in their society to which Allāh has guided them for completion of their happiness, nor in the laws or rules adopted by them which Allāh has inspired them to. They have been given the laws in order that they may live easy life, their existence may be protected and they may continue in this world, as individuals and as members of society.

This explains why the verse is addressed to the ''the people'', and not only to the believers. It also shows why they have been admonished to fear their ''Lord'', instead of saying ''fear Allāh'' or using some other divine name, because the condition attributed to them, ''Who created you from a single being ... many men and women'', encompasses the whole mankind and is not confined to the believers; and these are the attributes more relevant to Lordship (i.e., concerned with the affairs of managing and perfecting) and not with the attributes of worship or divinity.

The words, ''Who created you from a single being and created its mate of the same (kind)'': ''an-Nafs (اَلنَّفْسُ = translated here as ''being'') according to the dictionary and language denotes the thing itself. They say: ''He came to me (nafsuhu; نَفْسُهُ =) himself''; or ''He came to me ('aynuhu; عَيْنُهُ =) the self same''; although the basis for use of these two words, ''an-nafs'' and ''al-'ayn'' in this meaning (self; same; quiddity of a thing) is etymologically different. an-Nafs of a man is that because of which man is man; and it is the combination of soul and body in this life and only the soul in the life of al-Barzakh, as we have explained in the Commentary of the verse: And do not speak of those who are slain in Allāh's way as dead; nay, (they are) alive, but you do not perceive [2:154].

The context obviously shows that the words, ''a single being'', refer to Adam (a.s.) and ''its mate'' to Adam's wife. These two were the progenitors of this species to which we all belong; and all the human beings return to the same root, to those two parents, as Allāh says in other verses too: He has created you from a single being, then made its mate of the same (kind) [39:6]; O children of Adam! let not the Satan cause you to fall into affliction as he expelled your parents from the Garden [7:27]; and the Satan is quoted as saying: If Thou shouldst respite me to the Day of Resurrection, I will most certainly cause his progeny to perish except a few [17:62].

Some exegete has opined: The words, ''a single being'' and ''its mate'', in this verse refer to human couple of male and female in general, on which human progeny depends. The verse in effect means: 'Allāh has created everyone of you from a human father and mother, there is no difference among you in this respect.' Thus it goes parallel to the words of Allāh: O you people! surely We have created you of a male and a female, and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allāh is the one among you who guards himself most (against evil) [49:13]. Apparently, it shows that there is no distinction among individuals inasmuch as each has been born of a couple of the same species — from a male and a female.

But this interpretation is patently false. The said exegete has missed the clear difference between this verse of the Chapter of the ‘‘The Women’’ and that of the Chapter 49 (The Chambers). The latter intends to show that all human beings are one inasmuch as all are human beings, and there is no difference among them in this respect because everyone is born of a human father and a human mother; therefore no one should think himself as superior to the others, as there is no distinction or superiority except through piety. On the other hand, the verse under discussion intends to show their unity in their reality, that all human beings, in spite of their great number and their division between males and females, are the branches of the same root; and although they are now numerous, all of them have sprung from the same source, as the apparent meaning of the phrase, ‘‘and spread from these two, many men and women’’, shows. This idea is lost if we take the words, ‘‘a single being’’, and ‘‘its mate’’, to mean human males and females in general who are the means of producing children. Moreover, this interpretation is not in keeping with the Chapter’s main aim, as explained above.

The phrase, ‘‘and created its mate of the same (kind)’’: ar-Rāghib has said: ‘‘Each member of a pair of opposite sexes in living creatures is called az-zawj (اَلزَّوْجُ = pair, couple, mate); so is a pair in animate and inanimate things, e.g., a pair of socks or shoes; also it is used for anything taken together with another, whether they are similar or opposite to each other ... [Use of] az-zawjah (اَلزَّوْجَةُ = wife) [to denote female or the abovementioned pairs] is bad language.’’

The clause, ‘‘and created its mate of the same’’, apparently is meant to show that its mate was of the same species — similar in humanity to the [original] ‘‘single soul’’; and that all these human beings are the offspring of the original couple — the two similar human beings. The preposition min (مِنْ = from, of) therefore signifies origin. The verse has the same import as the others given below:

And Allāh has made wives for you from among yourselves, and has given you sons and grandchildren from your wives ... [16:72];

And one of His signs is that He created mates for you from yourselves that you may find rest in them, and He put between you love and compassion [30:21];

The Originator of the heavens and the earth; He made mates for you from among yourselves, and mates of the cattle too, multiplying you thereby [42:11];

Of similar connotation is the verse: And of every thing We have created pairs that you may be mindful [51:49].

In spite of this clear meaning, some exegetes have written that the verse tends to show that the mate was derived from that single being and created from one of its parts. This explanation aims at making the verse conform with some traditions which say that Allāh had created Adam's wife from one of his ribs. But the fact remains that the verse does not support this view.

The clause, ''and spread from these two, many men and women: ''al-Baththʼʼ (اَلْبَثُّ = to spread, to propagate through dissemination or scattering, etc.); Allāh says: So that they shall be as scattered dust [56:6]. On this connotation is based the idiom, to spread the sorrow; and that is why sometimes they use the word al-baththʼ to denote grief and sorrow itself, because it is something which man by nature spreads [to his friends and relatives]; Allāh says: He said: ''I only complain of (baththi, بَثِّي =) my grief and sorrow to Allāhʼʼ [12:86].

The verse apparently shows that the present human race originates from Adam and his wife without anyone else having any share in it; Allāh says: ''and spread from these two, many men and women;'' He has not said: 'and spread from these two and some others'. Proceeding from this interpretation we arrive at the following two conclusions:

First: The words, ''many men and women'', refer to all human beings from their progeny, be they their immediate children or children's children how low so ever. Thus the words mean: and spread you, O people! from these two.

Second: Marriage of the first generation after Adam and his wife (i.e., of their immediate children), was done between brothers and sisters (i.e., Adam's sons married his daughters), because they were the only human males and females at that time. There was no harm in this; because it is a legislative matter and it depends on the discretion of Allāh; He may allow it one day and disallow it another day. Allāh says:

Judgment is only Allāh's [12:40];

And Allāh pronounces an order — there is no repeller of His decree [13:41];

... and He does not make any one His associate in His judgment [18:26];

And He is Allāh, there is no god but He! All praise is due to Him and this (life) and the hereafter, and His is the judgment, and to Him you shall be brought back [28:70]. [1]

QUR'ĀN: and fear Allāh by Whom you demand one of another (your rights), and (be mindful of) relationship: ''at-Tasaā'ul'' (اَلتَّسَآءُلُ = to ask one another); here it refers to people's asking one another in the name of Allāh. One says to his companions: I ask you by Allāh to do so and so; it is adjuration by Allāh. To ask one another by Allāh is an allegorical expression alluding to the reverence and love they have for Allāh, because man swears by only that which he respects and loves.

As for the word, ''and relationship'', the conjunctive apparently joins it to the name ''Allāh''. Thus it would mean fear Allāh and (be mindful of) relationship. Another explanation joins it to the pronoun ''whom'' which is in position of accusative; it gets support from Ḥamzah's recital (wa 'l-arḥāmi وَالْاَرْحَام) whereby the last letter ''m'' is recited with the vowel point ''i'' [instead of the ''a'' which is the more common recital] to make it conform with the joint pronoun ''whom'' — although the grammarians do not give much credence to such construction. However, in this case the meaning would be as follows: and fear Allāh by whom and by the relationship you ask one of another your rights; you say to one another, I ask you by Allāh, and I ask you by the relationship. This was the explanation given by some people, but the context and the Qur'ānic style in general do not agree with it: If ''relationship'' is treated as an independent aṣ-ṣilah (اَلصِّلَةُ = syndetic relative clause) of the relative pronoun al-ladhī (اَلَّذِي = he who, that which), then the reconstructed sentence will be as follows: and fear Allāh, He who, by relationship you ask one of another; this construction omits the pronoun ''by whom'', which is not correct. And if the whole phrase beginning with ''Allāh'' is taken together as one aṣ-ṣilah, [fear Allāh by whom and by the relationship] then it would make relationship equal to Allāh in majesty and grandeur, and it is totally against the Qur'ānic manners.

Of course, there is no harm if one is told to fear Allāh and be mindful of relationship in the same breath, because the preceding sentence has clearly shown the relationships as a creation of Allāh. Also, at-taqwā (اَلتَّقْوي = guarding against, piety, fear) has also been attributed in divine speech to others than Allāh.

[1] We shall comment later on this hypothesis of the author. (tr.)

For example:

And fear an affliction which may not smite those of you in particular who are unjust [8:25];

And fear the day in which you shall be returned to Allāh [2:281];

And guard yourselves against the fire which has been prepared for the unbelievers [3:131].

In any case, this section of the speech coming after the first part (O people! fear ... and women) is a sort of particularization after generalization, a restriction after liberalization. The first part in effect says: Fear Allāh because He is your Lord and because He has created and made you, 0 people! from one root that is preserved in your being, from one substance that is preserved and propagated through your propagation; and it is the species known as humanity. On the other hand, the second part implies as follows: Fear Allāh because you believe in His majesty and Power (and it is an aspect of His Lordship, and one of its concomitants); and remain mindful of the unity of relationship which He has created in you (and relationship is a branch of unity and an aspect of the essence that permeates all the human beings).

It shows why the order to fear Allāh has been repeated in the second sentence. The second sentence itself is a repetition of the first with an additional import: It throws full light on the importance of relationship.

''ar-Riḥm'' (اَلرِّحْمُ) means uterus, womb, the internal reproductive organ of a woman, whose function is to develop the sperm into a child. Then they began using it for relationship, because of the association between a receptacle and its content, as the relatives issue forth from the same womb. ar-Riḥm therefore is relative, plural ''al-arḥām'' (اَلْاَرْحَامُ = relatives). The Qur'ān has given full importance to relationship as it has done to the community and nation. Relationship is a small society, while nation is a big one. The Qur'ān has concerned itself with the affairs of society, and has counted it as a reality having its own special characteristics and effects. Likewise, it has concerned itself with the affairs of individual man, and has counted him as a reality having its own characteristics and effects which spring from his existence. Allāh says:

> And He it is Who has made two seas to flow freely, the one sweet that subdues thirst by its sweetness, and the other salt that burns by its saltness; and between the two He has made a barrier and inviolable obstruction. And He it is Who has created man from the water, then He has made for him blood-relationship and marriage-relationship, and your Lord is powerful [25:53 — 54];
>
> … and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other ... [49:13];
>
> ... and the possessors of relationship have the better claim in the ordinance of Allāh to inheritance ... [33:6];
>
> But if you held command, you were sure to make mischief in the land and cut off the ties of kinship [47:22];
>
> And let those fear who, should they leave behind them weakly offspring, would fear on their account ... [4:9].
> There are many other verses of the same import.

QUR'ĀN: surely Allāh is vigilant over you: ''ar-Raqīb'' (اَلرَّقِيْبُ = guard; preserve); al-murāqabah (اَلْمُرَاقَبَةُ = to watch; to keep an eye on); may be it is derived from ar-raqabah (اَلرَّقَبَةُ = neck) because they used to watch the necks of their slaves. Or it may be based on the fact that a watcher or guard usually stretches his neck for looking towards the object he is watching or guarding. However, this word does not imply mere watching or guarding; it means watching over activities of the watched person — all his acts of commission and omission — in order to reform the defects and make up the deficiencies, or just to keep the record; in other words, it implies guarding a thing with special concern towards it in knowledge and observation. That is why it is used for vigilance, observation, supervision, guarding, awaiting and controlling. Allāh is called ar-Raqīb because He preserves the actions of the people in order to give them their recompense. He says:

> ... and your Lord is the Preserver of all things [34:21];
> ... Allāh watches over them, and you have no charge over them [42:6].

Therefore your Lord let fall upon them the whip of chastisement. Most surely your Lord is on watch [89:13 — 14].

Look at the command of being mindful of humanity's unity (which pervades each and every human being) and of preserving its characteristics; and note that this order is followed by the reminder that Allāh watches everything. Then you will appreciate the great threat it poses, and the ominous warning it gives to the transgressors. Also, if you ponder on this reality, you will realize that all the verses dealing with the topics of transgressing the limit, oppressing the people, doing mischief in the land, exceeding the bounds and things like that (and which generally have prescribed such harsh and painful chastisement for the offenders) have very strong connection with the divine purpose, i.e., protecting the humanity's unity from disorder, decline and fall.

HOW OLD THE HUMAN SPECIES IS; THE FIRST MAN

The Jewish history says that the present human species is not older than seven thousand years [1] ; and contemplation supports this view.

Let us suppose there is a pair of a man and a woman, and that they live an average span of life in average health and average environment so far as peace, food production, comfort and other factors affecting human life are concerned. They are married and produce children in average environment and condition. Then we repeat exactly the same cycle of events for the said children — males and females — all in an average way. We will find that in a hundred years the original population of two will increase to one thousand persons; in other words, one person will beget about five hundred souls in a hundred years.

Then we look at the adverse factors affecting a human life, the general calamities with which he is faced, e.g., heat and cold, flood and earthquake, draught and famine, plague and epidemics, landslide and avalanche, massacres and genocide, and other unusual general catastrophes. Let us suppose that these disasterstake their full toll of the human population until nine hundred and ninety-nine are dead and only one out of the thousand offspring remains. It means that reproduction would increase the population at the rate of 50% in a hundred years — the originaltwo with addition of one (1000-999) becomes three in a century.

[1] Obviously, the author refers to the Old Testament. But he himself has mentioned in the sixth volume how unreliable these books were; and I have proved in the footnotes there that these books were not authored by Mūsā and were full of contradictions right from the first chapter. How can such a contradictory, and inaccurate book of dubious origin be relied upon for deciding such an important question? (tr.)

If we compute the original two at this rate of seven thousand years (seventy centuries), we will arrive at a total of more than two and a half billion — and it is the total human population these days — as the world census indicates. [1]

This contemplation supports the above-mentioned age of the human race. But the geologists say that the age of this species exceeds million of years. They have found human fossils, bodies and artifacts which are older than five hundred thousand years, as they have estimated. This is in short their proof. But they have not produced any satisfactory evidence to show that this present generation is unbrokenly descended from those ancient groups and vanished races. Is it not possible that a certain race appeared on this earth, reproduced, increased and inhabited the land for a time and then vanished, became extinct? Then in the same way other

[1] It was written in 1957. However this argument is patently untenable; it is neither sound in theory nor correct in practice. The writer seems unaware of the fact that the population increases not in arithmetical, but geometrical, proportions. This has led him to fix a constant rate of increase for the whole human history — 50% in a hundred years. This is an arbitrary figure, not supported by data. It is estimated that from the beginning of the Christian Era to 1650 C.E. (in $16^{1/2}$ centuries) the world population only doubled, while it took it only 150 years (1650-1800) to double again. In 1900 the world population was 1610 million; in 1950 it rose to 2509 million; in 1970 it shot up to 3650 million; in 1987 it has passed 5000 million; and according to the U. N. O. World Population Projection of 1969, it will reach 6100 million by end of the century. Thus the increase in this one century (1900 — 2000) will be at the rate of 379%, nearly fourfold. And it will shoot upto 11000 million by 2050. Vide The New Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th ed. vol. 14 (under Population & Demography); Harver World Encyclopedia, vol. 16. This type of computation therefore cannot help us at all in deciding the age of the human race. (tr.) races appeared and vanished? This cycle could have been repeated several times until this race of ours appeared after all the previous extinct ones.

As for the Holy Qur'ān, it does not say clearly whether the appearance of this species is confined to this present cycle (which we are passing), or there were various cycles of which this one is the latest. Although it may be inferred from the verse 30 of Chapter 2 (And when your Lord said to the angels, ''Verily lam going to make in the earth a vicegerent,'' they said: ''Wilt Thou place in it such as shall make mischief in it and shed blood ...'') that there had passed on the earth a cycle of humanity before this one of ours; and we had hinted to it in the Commentary of the said verse.

Of course, some traditions narrated from the Imāms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) show that there have passed many cycles of humanity before this cycle [which has begun with Adam - a. s.]; and we shall quote them under ''Traditions''

THE PRESENT HUMAN RACE BEGINS WITH ADAM AND HIS WIFE

It is sometimes said: Human beings are of different colours, the main ones being the white (e.g., the colour of Europeans and Asians living in the Temperate zones), the black (e.g., the colour of the people in the southern Africa), the yellow (like that of the Chinese and the Japanese), and the red (as that of the American Red Indians). This difference shows that the origin of each race is different from that of the others — people of each colour have separate origin — because colour difference emanates from difference in the nature and composition of their respective bloods. Accordingly there must have been at least four different and independent pairs of human beings from which the four colour groups have originated.

It is also urgued that when the Western Hemisphere was discovered, it was already inhabited by human beings. There was such a great distance between them and the people living in the Eastern Hemisphere as to render any contact between the two groups impossible; and thus ruled out the possibility of both groups originating from the same father and the same mother.

But both these arguments are defective:

Let us look at the question of difference in blood because of colour difference. Scientific discussions nowadays are based on the theory of the evolution of species. If so, then how can we be sure that the difference in blood — and consequently in colour — is not caused by evolution or adaptation in a single species. They believe that there had been many changes in various animal species, e.g., horse, goat, sheep, elephant and many others. Research has unearthed many geological remains and fossils which throw light on it. Apart from that, scientists today do not give so much importance to this difference.[1]

Coming to the question of human presence across the oceans, the scientists say that the human life has existed for millions of years; the transmitted history however does not go further back than six thousand years. In this background, could not some events have taken place in pre-historic days which would have separated the Western Hemisphere from other continents? There are many geological findings which show many basic changes that have appeared in the crust of the Earth extending to far distant eras. Oceans have turned into dry lands and vice versa; plains have become mountains and moutains, plains. Even the Poles are said to have turned upside down, and various zones to shift places. All this may be learnt from geology, astronomy and geography. Keeping all this in view, all that remains for these people to fall back upon is their feeling of improbability!

As far as the Qur'ān is concerned, it says in an apparent, nay rather clear-cut, way that this present human race goes back to one male and one female, who were the father and the mother respectively of all the human individuals. The father is named by Allāh in the Qur'ān as Adam, but his wife is not named in His Book, although the traditions call her Ḥawwā', as does the present Torah. Allāh says:

> ... and He began the creation of man from dust. Then He made his progeny of an extract, of water held in light estimation [32:7 — 8];
> Surely the likeness of 'Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of [1] It was published recently in the magazines that some doctors have discovered a medical formula which changes man's skin colour, e.g., from black to white. (Author's Note)

Adam; He created him from dust, then said to him, ''Be'', and he was [3:59];
And when your Lord said to the angels, ''Verily I am going to make in the earth a vicegerent;'' they said: ''Wilt Thou place in it such as shall make mischief in it and shed blood, while we celebrate Thy praise and extol Thy holiness?'' He said: ''Surely I know what you do not know.'' And He taught Adam the names, all of them ... [2:30 — 31];
When your Lord said to the angels: ''Surely I am going to create a man from dust: So when I have made him complete and breathed into him of My spirit, then fall down making obeisance to him ...'' [38:71 — 72].

The verses, as you see, make it clear that the system made by Allāh for continuation of this species is by means of sperm. But when He brought him into being for the first time, he was created from dust; Adam was created from dust and the people are his children. There is no doubt therefore that this species, going back, ends at Adam and his wife — although other interpretations could be advanced for these verses.

Also sometimes it is claimed that the word, Adam — in the verses of creation and prostration — signifies not an individual, but the species. According to them, man has been called Adam because his creation originates from the earth and because he is the means of procreation and impregnation. Sometimes support is sought for it from the verse: And certainly We created you, then We fashioned you, then We said to the angels: ''Prostrate before Adam'' [7:11]. The argument runs as follows: The verse indicates that the angels were ordered to prostrate before the same whom Allāh had created and fashioned, and the beginning of the verse (And certainly We created you, then We fashioned you) shows that it refers to the whole mankind [as it uses plural pronouns], not to a particular human being. The same idea is inferred from the following verse: He said: ''O Iblīs! what prevented thee that thou shouldst not obeisance to him whom I created with My two hands?...'' He said: ''I am better than he; Thou hast created me of fire, and him Thou didst create of dust.'' ... He said: ''Then by Thy Might, I will surely beguile them, all, except Thy servants among them, the purified one'' [38:75 — 83]. It is pointed out that the same Adam who in the beginning is mentioned by singular pronouns, is then referred to with plural ones.

But this view is totally untenable, as it goes against the obvious meanings of the verses quoted above. Moreover, Allāh says in the Chapter Seven, after narrating the story of Adam, prostration of the angels and refusal of Iblīs: O children of Adam! let not the Satan cause you to fall into affliction as he got your parents out from the garden, pulling off from them both their clothing that he might expose to them both their shame [7:27]. The verse [by using dual pronouns] clearly establishes the individual identity of Adam, in a way that leaves no room for any doubt.

Then there are the verses 61 — 62 of the Chapter 17: And when We said to the angels: ''Make obeisance to Adam;'' they made obeisance, but Iblīs (did it not). He said: ''Should I make obeisance to him whom Thou hast created of dust?'' He said: ''Tell me, is this he whom Thou hast honoured above me? If Thou shouldst respite me to the Day of Resurrection, I will most certainly cause his progeny to perish except a few.'' Likewise the verse under discussion makes it abundantly clear: ''O people! fear your Lord, Who created you from a single being and created its mate of the same (kind) and spread from these two, many men and women,'' as we have already explained.

These verses, as you see, refute the idea that man has been called Adam, in one respect, and 'son of Adam' in another. Likewise they refuse to ascribe the creation to the dust from one angle and to the sperm from the other. It applies even more particularly to the verse like 3:59: Surely the likeness of 'Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam; He created him from dust, then said to him, ''Be'', and he was. Otherwise, the argument of the verse will not stand that 'Īsā's creation was something exceptional, against the normal process.

Thus the view that ''Adam'' refers to the human species is inordinately extreme. The opposite extreme is the view that it is al-kufr (اَلْكُفْرُ = disbelief) to say that more than one Adam had been created. This extreme was held by the Sunnī scholar, Zaynu '1-'Arab.

MANKIND IS AN INDEPENDENT SPECIES, NOT EVOLVED FROM ANY OTHER SPECIES

The earlier quoted verses have already decided this question. They have made it clear that the present species, which is propagated through sperm, ends at Adam and his wife, and that they two were created of earth. The human species begins with them and they two were not connected with any other analogous or resembling species. Theirs was original creation.

The theory prevalent today among the scientists is that the first man evolved [from a lower species] and developed into homo sapiens, that is, human being. Although the particular hypothesis is not definitely and unreservedly agreed upon, and is the target of many objections which may be seen in relevant books, yet the basic theory, that man is an animal that evolved into human being, is accepted by them and constitutes the basis of all research in human nature.

According to their theory, the earth, one of the planets in the solar system, was a part of the sun, which had separated from it; it was then a mass of burning molten liquid which gradually began to cool under the influence of cooling factors. Torrential rains poured on it, heavy floods inundated it, mass of water collected as oceans. Water and earth reacted to each other; algae appeared; aquatic plants continued to develop; its living cells evolved into fish and other aquatic animals; then came flying fish adapted for both water and land; it gradually evolved into land animals, which in their turn developed into homo sapiens. All this happened through evolution: the lower order of life developed into the next higher one, and so on. First there were simple cells, then came aquatic plants, then aquatic animals, then amphibious animals, then land animals and finally man.

This theory is based on obsevation: One finds systematic gradual perfection in creatures placed on evolutionary rungs, graduating from imperfection to perfection in ascending order. Also, they argue on the basis of experiments which have created partial changes.

This theory was invented to explain the new characteristics and faculties which appear more developed and advanced in each succeeding species. But no proof has been given to show that only this theory is correct and others were untenable. After all, these species could possibly have been created separate from each other, without any evolutionary connection between them. Also, the changes occurring in a species might be limited to its conditions and concomitants, not to its person; the experiments done in this field are all confined to the concomitants. Experiments have not found or produced a single individual in all these species that would have actually changed from one species to another, e.g., from ape into homo sapiens. All these experiments touch only some characteristics or concomitants.

Detailed discussion of this topic should be sought somewhere else. Our aim is only to show that it is just a hypothesis which was invented to answer some problems concerned, without there being any definite argument or clear-cut proof. The reality that the Qur'ān points to — that man is a species separate from all other species — remains undisputed by an academic argument.

HOW MAN'S SECOND GENERATION PROCREATED

The first ''generation'' of man — Adam and his wife — procreated by marriage and begot sons and daughters who were brothers and sisters to one another. The question is: How did this second generation procreate? Did the brothers and sisters marry one another? Or was there any other way? As we have explained before, the verse, ''and spread from these two, many men and women'', with its unreserved apparent meaning, shows that the present generation of man ends on Adam and his wife, and no other male or female had joined them in this process. The Qur'ān has not attributed ''the spreading'' except to these two; if anyone else would have shared in it, the verse would have said: and spread from these two and from others than them; or would have used some other suitable words. And we know that the restriction of the origin of this race to Adam and his wife means that their sons had married their daughters.[1]

[1] No record has reached us from Adam or his children. Now the only thing that could enlighten us on this subject is the Creator's word. It is a question of fact, of what really happened in that distant part. There is no room for the so-called philosophical arguments in this field as they would be mere speculations. Therefore, I shall confine my comments to only those arguments of the book which are based on the Qur'ān and the traditions.

It should be said at the outset that the author's view goes against correct traditions of the Imāms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.), which say that Shīth and Yāfith, two sons of Adam, were married to two houris (or to a houri and a jinn, respectively), and one brother's children were married to those of the other, and it was in this way that human race spread.

The author's main argument is based on the clause, ''and spread from these two'', as he says: ''The present human race emanates from Adam and his wife; ... the Qur'ān has not ascribed this spreading except to these two; and if any other person had been involved in this process, it would have said, 'and spread from these two and from other than the two' '' But the question is: Has the Qur'ān said: 'from these two only'? It seems strange that while the author gives so much importance to the prepostion min (مِنْ = from) in the clause, ''from these two'', he explains it away in the first part of this very verse where it literally says: and created its mate from it The obvious meaning of this clause would be that Ḥawwā' was created from Adam (as the Jewish and Sunnī traditions allege that she was made from one of Adam's left ribs). But the author has summarily (and rightly) dismissed it claiming (not so rightly) that ''the verse does not support this view''. This much about his argument from the Qur'ān. As for the traditions, it will be seen later that out of numerous traditions he has selected only one from al-Iḥtijāj of Abū Manṣūr aṭ-Ṭabrisī (d. 620 A.H.). That narration is attributed to as-Sajjād (a.s.) and mentions the followings:

1. Qābīl and a daughter, Lawzā, were twins; so were Hābīl and Iqlīmā; Qābīl was married to Iqlīmā and Hābīl to Lawzā.
2. They begot children. After the immediate children of Adam, marriage of brothers with sisters was prohibited.
3. Ḥawwā' was created from Adam. Allāh allowed Adam's marriage with her; after that, such marriage (i. e., with a part of one's own body or let us say, between father and daughter!) was prohibited.

First of all, this tradition of al-Iḥtijāj is without any sanad (السَّنَدُ = chain of narrators) and therefore cannot be relied upon.

Secondly, it says that Ḥawwā' was created from Adam, a view which the author himself rejects. The question is: How can one accept one half of a tradition and reject the other half?

Thirdly, this tradition is contradicted by numerous traditions of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.), at least four of which are with good chains of narrators, which the traditionalist, Muḥammad Muḥsin al-Fayḍ al-Kāshānī (d. 1091 A.H.) confirms as ṣaḥīḥ (الصحيح = correct) and reliable.

I think it is advisable to mention here some other traditions which the author has not quoted.

There are two traditions supporting his view: The first is narrated by Abū 'Alī aṭ-Ṭabrisī (d. 548 A.H.) in his Tafsīr Majma'u 'l-bayān, in explanation of the verse 27 of the Chapter 5. It is attributed to al-Bāqir (a.s.) but has no sanad. It says that Qābīl killed Hābīl because the sister that was to be married to Hābīl was prettier than the one to be given to Qābīl.

This tradition is contradicted by two aḥādīth from the same Imām (a.s.) narrated with asnād (الاسناد = chains of narrators) in two of the four basic books, al-Kāfī and Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l faqīh. Moreover, this tradition ascribes the crime to passion and love of beauty, while another narration given by al-'Ayyāshī (died in 2nd half of the 3rd century A.H.) in his Tafsīr attributes it to a more serious matter. That tradition inter alia says that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was told of the people thinking that Qābīl had killed Hābīl because of the jealousy for their sisters-wives. The Imām (a.s.) said: ''You say this? Are you not ashamed of narrating such a thing about Adam, the prophet of Allāh [that he married brothers to sisters]?'' He was then asked as to the reason of that murder. He said: ''For the excutorship of the will'', i.e., for successorship of Adam. ''Verily, Allāh revealed to Adam to entrust Hābīl with the executorship and the great name of Allāh. But Qābīl was the eldest (son) and on getting this news be became angry. He said that he was more deserving to (that) honour and executorship. Then Adam acting on the divine revelation, ordered them to offer sacrifices. They did, and Allāh accepted the sacrifice of Hābīl. Qābīl became jealous and killed Hābīl.''

(Incidently, this tradition too is without sanad; but al-'Ayyāshī lived in the 3rd century in the days of the Lesser Occultation, and his narration, even without sanad, would naturally have less chance of alteration or interpolation than those narrated without sanad in the middle of the sixth or beginning of the seventh centuries, as is the case with the traditions of Majma'u 'l-bayān and al-Iḥtijāj, respectively.)

The second tradition, supporting the author's view, is narrated from ar-Riḍā (a.s.) in Qurbu 'l-isnād of al-Ḥimyarī (d. 297 A.H.). It mentions the story of the marriages of Hābīl and Qābīl, ending with the words: ''Then prohibition came [of such marriages] after that.''

But as mentioned above, this one tradition is opposed by at least four with good or correct asnād, and which forcefully refute the story of the alleged marriages between brothers and sisters.

There are two traditions narrated by aṣ-Ṣadūq (d. 381 A.H.) in his 'Ilalu 'sh-sharāyi' (ch. 17); both are narrated by Zurārah from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.). In both the Imām (a.s.) is reported to vehemently reject that story about Adam (a.s.) and his children. He said: ''Glory be to Allāh! He is far above such things. Those who say it (actually want to) say that Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, has made His chosen servants and beloved ones — His prophets and His messengers, the believing men and women, and the submitting men and women — issue forth from unlawful root; and that He did not have power to create them through lawful means, while He Himself had taken covenant from them to (use only) lawful (ways) and clean, pure and good (things).'' Then the Imām described that even some animals abstained from such sexual relations.

In the second tradition, the Imām (a.s.) inter alia says: ''But a group of these people do not like the knowledge (obtainable) from their prophet's houses, and seek it from where they have not been ordered to; they therefore have gone to what you see — to misguidance and ignorance.'' Further he says: ''I tell you the truth; those who say this or similar things, their only aim is to strengthen the arguments of the Majūs (the fire-worshippers). What has happened to them! May Allāh kill them!''

Then the Imām (a.s.) describes how two houris were sent for Shīth and Yāfith, sons of Adam, and how sons and daughters were born to both, and then the cousins were later married to each other, and human race spread.

One of the above traditions is narrated by him also in Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh. He has also narrated a third tradition in this latter book from al-Bāqir (a.s.) in which the Imām (a.s.) says that one of Adam's sons was married to a houri from the Garden and another to a jinn woman. ''Now whatever beauty and good characteristics are found in men, they emanate from the houri, and whatever bad characteristics are there, they originate from the jinn.''

Before all these comes the tradition supporting our view, narrated by al-Kulaynī (d. 329 A.H.) in al-Kāfī from the same Imām (a.s.). There appears to be a variation in detail, as it says that four sons of Shīth (born of a houri) were married to four jinn women. But another tradition narrated by al-'Ayyāshī may solve this problem. It says that four sons of Shīth (born of the houri mother) were married to four daughters of Adam's another son (born of the jinn mother).

Looking at these traditions together (four with asnād and two without asnād) we find that, in spite of some differences in details, they are agreed on the following points:

1. The human race did not spread through Hābīl or Qābīl It spread through Shīth and Yāfith (or through Shīth). By the way, this point is accepted even by the Sunnī historian aṭ-Ṭabarī in his Tārīkh (vol. 1, p. 103), where he narrates a tradition (with his sanad) through Abū Dharr from the Prophet in which he (s.a.w.a.), inter alia, says: ''The genealogies of all people today (go) to Shīth, peace be upon him.''
2. There never was any marriage between brothers and sisters.
3. Emanating from the above premises, obviously it was not any passion or love affair that motivated Qābīl to kill his brother; it was the really serious matter of Adam's successorship. Incidentally, the Sunnī scholar, ath-Tha'labī reportedly says the same thing in his al-'Arā'is (p. 26).

The Shī'ah traditionalist al-Fayḍ al-Kāshānī in his Tafsīr aṣ-Ṣāfī (vol. 1, pp. 413 — 418) accepts the authenticity of these traditions, saying that ''they are

Of course, such marriage is prohibited in Islam, and also reportedly in previous sharī'ahs. But it is a legislative order based [like all such rules] on benefits or harms, it is not a creative decree which does not admit any change; its rein is the hand of Allāh, He does what He pleases and orders what He intends. It is possible that He should allow it one day because it was then necessary, and prohibit it thereafter because the need was fulfilled, and if that permission were allowed to remain, it would have created indecency in the society.

It is said that it is against the nature, and what Allāh had given to His prophets was the natural religion. Allāh says: Then set your face uprightly for religion in the natural devotion (for the truth), the nature made by Allāh in which He has made men; there is no alteration in the creation of Allāh; that is the right religion [30:30]. But this argument is wrong; when nature rejects it and exhorts against it, it does not do so because it thinks such sexual intercourse (between brother and sister) loathsome; it does so rather because it would lead to increase in indecency and reprehensible behaviour, which in its turn would nullify the instinct of chastity and erase decency from human society. We know that today this type of relationship and sexual intercourse is considered debauchery and immoral throughout the world. But imagine a time when Allāh's creation consisted of only brothers and sisters, and divine will intended to increase and spread them; we cannot apply today's norms on that society.

The evidence, that nature does not eschew such relations because of any instinctive aversian, may be found in Zoroastrian society which, according to history, practised such marriages for a long time; and in Russia where it is reportedly legalized; also in the fact that in Europe incest is widespread.[1]

It is sometimes said that such relation is against natural laws — the laws which guided man before he established a good society to ensure his correct and reliable''; and rejects the earlier-mentioned narrations (which speak about brothers-sisters marriages) because ''they agree with the view held by 'āmmah, and as such cannot be relied upon.'' (tr.)

[1] Nowadays, it is very common in civilized nations of Europe and America for the girls to lose their virginity before they are legally married, or even before they reach the age of marriage; available data shows that some of them are deflowered by their fathers or brothers. (Author's Note) happiness; it is because familiarity and constant mingling within family circle negates the sexual inclination and desire between brothers and sisters — as has been said by some experts of law.[1]

This argument too is defective, because:

First, the premises are not correct, as we have explained just now;

Second, its putative undesirability is confined to a- situation where it is not essentially required; and Third, it is restricted to a time when there are no legislated unnatural laws to safeguard the essential well-being of society, to ensure the happiness of its members. Otherwise, most of the laws and principles, that governs the lives and are prevelant today, are unnatural.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said in a ḥadīth, inter alia; ''Perhaps you think that Allāh had not created any man other than you? Certainly, by God, Allāh had created a million Adams; you are at the end of those human beings.'' (at-Tawḥīd)

The author says: Ibn Maytham has quoted in his Sharḥ Nahju 'l-balāghah, a tradition to the same effect from al-Bāqir (a.s.), and aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated it in al-Khiṣāl too.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) has said: ''Surely Allāh has created twelve thousand worlds, each of those worlds is greater than the seven heavens and the seven earths. None of (those) worlds thinks that Allāh has got any other world.'' (al-Khiṣāl)

Abū Ja'far (a.s.) has said: ''Surely Allāh had created in the earth — since He created it — seven worlds; they were not from the children of Adam; He created them from the surface of the earth, then He placed them in it one after another with its world. Then Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, created Adam, the father of mankind, and created his progeny from him ...''(ibid.)

ash-Sahybānī narrates from 'Amr ibn Abi '1-Miqdām, from his father that he said: ''I asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.): 'From what did Allāh create Ḥawwā'?' He (a.s.) said: 'What do these people say?' I said: 'They say that Allāh created her from one of the ribs of Adam.' He said: 'They have said a lie. Was Allāh incapable of creating her from (something) other than his ribs?' I said: 'May I be made your ransom, from what did He create her?' He said: 'My father informed me through (the chain of) his fathers that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''Verily, Allāh, Blessed and High is He, took a handful of dust and mixed it with His right hand — and both His hands are right — and created Adam from it; and there remained (some) residue from the dust, so He created Ḥawwā' from it.'' ' '' (Nahju 'l-bayān)

The author says: A similar tradition has been narrated by aṣ-Ṣaduq from 'Amr. There are some other traditions to the effect that she was created from the shortest left rib of Adam. The same thing is said in Chapter 2, of the Genesis. Although this story is not impossible in itself, but as we have explained earlier, it is not proved by the Qur'ānic verses.

A tradition given in al-Iḥtijāj quotes a talk of as-Sajjād (a.s.) with a Qurayshite, in which the Imam is said to describe how Hābīl was married to Lawzā, sister of Qābīl, and Qābīl to Iqlīmā, sister of Hābīl. Then the tradition continues: ''The Qurayshite asked him: 'Did they beget from them?' He said: 'Yes.' The Qurayshite said: 'But this is what the Majūs do today?' He said: 'Surely the Majūs are doing it after Allāh has prohibited (it).' Then he explained: 'Do not deny it. These were but divine laws which were enforced. Was it not that Allāh created Adam's wife from him, and then made her lawful to him? Thus it was a sharī'ah from their commandments; then Allāh sent down the prohibition after that ...' '' (al-Iḥtijāj)

The author says: What has been narrated in this tradition agrees with the apparent meaning of the Qur'ān and with contemplation. There are other traditions which oppose this theme. They say that they had married with houri and jinn that had been sent to them. But you have seen what the truth is.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh: and fear Allāh by Whom you demand one of another (your rights), and (be mindful of) relationship: ''And be mindful of relationship lest you severe it.''

(Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

The author says: This explanation is based on [the usual] recital, that is, with vowel point ‘‘a’’ on the last letter ‘‘m’’ of al-arḥāma.

Another tradition: ‘‘It refers to people’s relationship; verily Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, has ordered to join it and has shown its greateness. Don’t you see that He has placed it with Himself?’’ (al-Kāfī; at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: The Imām’s words (Don’t you see ...?) explain how Allāh has shown its greatness; ‘‘He has placed it with Himself’’: These words refer to the joint mentioning in the verse; and fear Allāh ... and relationship.

‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd has narrated from ‘IKrimah that Ibn ‘Abbās said about the verse, ... by Whom you demand one of another (your rights) and (be mindful of) relationship: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: Allāh, the High, says: ‘‘Join your relationship, because it is more preserving to you in this life and good for you in your hereafter.’’ ’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: The words, ‘‘it is more preserving to you’’, point to what has been said in nearly-mutawātir traditions that joining the relationship, that is, behaving lovingly towards relatives, increases the life; while its opposite shortens it. Its reason may possibly be understood from the forthcoming Commentary of the verse, And let those fear who, should they leave behind them weakly offspring, would fear on their account ... [4:9]

Possibly the statement, that joining the relationship is more preserving, means that it is its natural effect to preserve life longer. This good behaviour strengthens the family ties and revitalizes the unity found in the clan; in this way man gets courage and strength to face the adverse conditions of life — the misfortunes, afflictions and enemies — which might otherwise poison the spring of life.

al-Aṣbagh ibn Nubātah said: ‘‘I heard the Leader of the faithful (‘Alī

- a.s.) saying: ‘Surely one of you becomes angry and (then) is not conciliated until he enters the fire. Therefore, whoever of you becomes angry with his relative, should get closer to him, because womb (relationship), when touched by womb (relationship), calms down; and it is suspended from the Throne; it rings (the Throne) as iron is rung [by striking at it] , and cries out: ‘‘O Allāh! join him who joins me and cut him off who cuts me off’’: And it is the words of Allāh in His Book: and fear Allāh by Whom you demand one of another (your rights) and (be mindful of) relationship, surely Allāh is vigilant over you. And who over becomes angry while he is standing, should at once cling to the earth [i.e., should sit down], as it removes the filth of the Satan.’ ’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: The ‘‘womb’’, as you have seen, refers to that unity which is found between individuals inasmuch as they share the same life substance originating from the same father and mother (or from one of them). The relationship is a real and factual aspect running through all the relatives; it has real effects — on character and appearance, on psyche and body. These effects are undeniable, although at times some contrary factors may weaken its force, they may even nullify those effects to almost extinction point — but they can never be erased altogether.

In any case, relationship is one of the most potent causes of natural harmony among family members; it has overpowering ability to effect [their psyche and behaviour]. That is why a good done to a relative brings far better and firmer results than the one done to a stranger. Likewise, ill behaviour of a relative hurts the feelings more grievously than it does in case of strangers.

The reason behind the order, ‘‘whoever of you becomes angry with his relative, should get closer to him ...’’, may be understood from the above explanation. When one would go closer to a relative — in obedience to this order and to strengthen its effect — one would naturally be awakened to its cause [i.e., relationship which binds them together], and its effect would be revived — the anger would change into kindness and love.

Also clear is the import of the last sentence: ‘‘And whoever becomes angry while he is standing, should at once sit down.’’ Anger is a product of spirit's rashness and fickleness. It comes to surface and flares up because of passion — as then the Satan makes it oblivious (of reality) and turns its attention to imaginary and trivial matters. If an angry man sits down, he turns his attention to a new position, focusing his mind to a new activity. It would divert him from the anger and rage, because human soul by nature is more inclined to mercy than to anger. That is why some traditions direct a man to change his position if he feels angry. aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) narrated from his father (a.s.) that, talking about anger, he said: ''Surely man becomes angry so much so that he is never conciliated, and because of it he enters the fire. Therefore, any man who feels anger while he is standing should sit down, as it would surely remove the Satan's filth from him; and if he is sitting, he should stand up; and any man who becomes angry on a relative, should go to him, get near him and touch him — because when relationship touches relationship it quites down.'' (al-Majālis)

The author says: Its effect is a phenomenon perceived and experienced.

The words of the Imām, ''and it is suspended from the Throne; it rings (the Throne) as iron is rung [by striking at it]'' mean: it causes it to sound as a bell is rung by striking at it. aṣ-Ṣiḥāḥ says: ''al-Inqāḍ (اَلِانْقَاضُ = sounding like banging or striking).'' We have hinted when speaking about the Chair (and more details will be given in the talk on the Throne) that the Throne is the level of the general [divine] knowledge which is related to the events; it is that stage of existence where various expediencies, different influences and creative causes converge. It alone moves the chains of various causes and influencing factors; it is the motive force that pervades the whole system and keeps it running, as the affairs of a kingdom — with its various aspects, forms and conditions — are attached to the king's throne, and a single word spoken by him moves the chains of authority and effects the whole bureaucracy throughout the kingdom; its effects appear everywhere in appropriate forms and shapes.

The womb or relationship, as you have seen, is in fact a spirit pervading the personalities of all those who share a common lineage. As such, this too is attached to the Throne. When it is subjected to injustice and oppression, it seeks protection and help from the Throne to which it is attached. It is this reality which the Imām (a.s.) alludes to when he says: ‘‘It rings the Throne as iron is rung’’. It is a very fine and original simile; it describes the effect of its cry for help on the Throne as the ringing of a bell; when a bell is rung, the vibration permeates its whole being and the sound comes out reverberating as it it were trembling.

The reported prayer, ‘‘O Allāh! join him who joins me and cut him off who cuts me off’’, is the interpretation of its mute expression — which it would have said had it had a tongue.

It has been emphasized in numerous traditions that joining the relationship prolongs the life, and severing it decreases it. We have already described in the second volume, when writing on the Relation between actions and natural phenomena[1] under the heading, ‘‘An essay on the rules governing actions’’, that the Administrator of this universe is driving it to an excellent goal and good destination; He will not ignore or neglect its well being. If one or more parts of it go wrong, he rectifies the situation, either by repairing the parts or removing and discarding them. The man who cuts his relationship off, actually wages a war against Allāh in His creation. If he refuses to mend his ways, Allāh cuts his life short and destroys him.

The fact that man today does not perceive this or other similar realities, does not diminish its importance. Today, humanity’s body is so much affected by moral depravity and spritival diseases that it has lost its sense, feeling and perception; the sickness has numbed and paralysed the whole system, and man is no more able or free to feel the pain or realize the chastisement.

GENERAL COMMENT

The verses are part of the prologue which began with the first verse. The aim is to pave the way for the laws of inheritance and basic rules of marriage like the number of wives allowed and the women within prohibited degree. These two are among the greatest and most important laws governing human society; and they have profound effect on its formation and continuation. Matrimony controls affinity and genealogy of society members, and deeply affects other constituent factors. Inheritance regulates the distribution of wealth existing in the world — the factor on which a society depends for its life and continuity.

As a sine qua non the chapter prohibits fornication and illicit sexual relations, and forbids devouring others' property unlawfully — except that it be a trade deal with the parties' consent. In this way two fundamental principles have been established for regulating the two most important aspects of society, i.e., the subjects of affinity and property.

We may now understand why it was necessary to prepare the minds before promulgating the laws for these subjects which concerned the whole society and which were enmeshed with the roots of the social system. It is really not an easy thing to divert the people from the social norms which they are accustomed to and which have nurtured their ideas and ideals; to make them discard the systems which they grew up believing in, and which the generations of ancestors had sanctified by faithful adherence; to cast off the customs and traditions which had moulded their character and outlook.

It was in this difficult situation that the laws revealed at the beginning of this chapter were promulgated. It may easily be appreciated if we look just briefly at the world's situation at that time, and particularly at the condition of Arabia — the place of the revelation of the Qur'ān and rise of Islam. Also, it will make it clear why the Qur'ān was sent down piecemeal, and why the Islamic laws were promulgated gradually.

THE ERA OF IGNORANCE

The Qur'ān calls the pre-Islamic days of Arabia the Era of Ignorance. It is a clear indication that at that time they were in the grip of ignorance, and knowledge was a thing alien to them. Falsehood ruled over them, and truth was an unknown commodity. This fact appears from what the Qur'ān describes of them. Allāh says: they entertained about Allāh thoughts of ignorance quite unjustly [3:154]; Is it then the judgment of (the times of) ignorance that they desire? [5:50]; When those who disbelieve harboured in their hearts chauvinism, the chauvinism of (the days of) ignorance [48:26]; and do not display your finery like the displaying of the ignorance of you [33:33].

At that time, Arabia was surrounded by three big powers: In the south ruled Christian Ethiopia; the west lorded over by the Romans, again a Christian Empire; in the north was Fars, the Zoroastrian Empire. At some distance were India and Egypt, both idol-worshippers. There were also a few tribes of the Jews in Arabia. However, the Arabs were idolaters and most of them lived tribal life. All this together had created a barbaric nomadic society that had some traces of Judaism, Christianity and Mazdaism — and they were intoxicated of their ignorance. Allāh says: And if you obey most of those in the earth, they will lead you astray from Allāh's way; they follow but conjecture and they only (falsely) guess [6:116].

The nomadic tribes, with their despicable and miserable lives, lived on foray and plunder; they forcibly seized others' property and tarnished their honour. There was neither safety nor integrity, neither peace nor security. The authority belonged to whoever subdued others, and the sceptre of power to whoever snatched it.

As for the menfolk, their superiority and excellence consisted of bloodshed and chauvinism of ignorance; pride and hauteur; cooperation with the oppressors and devouring the rights of the oppressed; mutual antagonism and rivalry; gambling games, intoxicating drinks and illicit sexual relations; and feasting on dead animals, blood, and inferior quality dates.

As for the women, they were deprived of every privilege of society. They had no will of their own, nor did they possess any of their work. They had no right in inheritance; and men married as many of them as they liked; the position was the same as with the Jews and some idolaters: there was no limit to the number of the wives. On the other hand, they appeared in public adorned with fineries, inviting to themselves anyone who caught their fancy. Fornication and adultery was their morality; their love of displaying themselves sometimes led them to go on pilgrimage completely naked.

As for the children, they were affiliated to their fathers, but the minor ones had no share in inheritance, which was taken away by the elder ones — and the widow was a part of the inheritance. In short, the minor children — both male and female — and the women did not inherit.

Of course, if the deceased left only a minor, he inherited him, but an elder relative acting as his guardian devoured the orphan's property; and if it was a daughter, he took her as his wife, swallowed her property and divorced her; she was thus left in the lurch: neither she had any money to live on nor there was anyone willing to marry and maintain her. Most of the time there were problems concerning one orphan or the other, because the chains of wars, battles and forays were unending, and consequently people lost their lives like flies.

One of the misfortunes fatally affecting their children was the country's terrain — a desolate desert and barren wasteland, where famine and hunger were norms of the day. Therefore, people killed their children for fear of poverty (vide 6:151); and buried their daughters alive (81:78); to them the most disgusting thing was the news of the birth of a daughter (43:17).

As for their governmental system, sometimes some rulers established their monarchies in the periphery of Arabian peninsula under protection or suzerainty of some strongest neighbouring power, for example, under Iran in the northern region, and under Rome and Ethiopia in the western and southern regions, respectively. Yet the central towns, i.e., Mecca, Yathrib and Ṭā'if, etc., lived under a system which was the nearest thing to democracy — but it was not exactly that. The tribes in the desert, and even in the towns, were ruled by oligarchies of chiefs and shaykhs, which sometimes changed into monarchy.

This was the chaotic muddle which appeared in every group in a new colour, in every quarter in a new form — with all the strange myths and superstitious rites prevelant among them. Add to it the scourge of ignorance and lack of teaching and learning that blighted their towns, let alone the nomadic tribes.

All that we have mentioned above concerning the prevailing conditions, activities, customs and rites, may be clearly inferred from the context of the Qur'ānic verses which it has addressed to them. Just ponder on the themes of the verses revealed at Mecca and then of those revealed after triumph of Islam at Medina; then look at the characteristics it attributes to them, the affairs it criticizes and blames them for, the prohibitions of various customs and habits — with varying degrees of stricture. If you meditate on these lines, you will see the truth of what we have described above. Of course, the history records all these things in detail, but we have not given their specificities, because the verses have not gone into detailed description. The shortest, yet most comprehensive, word used to describe their situation was coined by the Qur'ān when it called that period, 'the era of ignorance'. All the details are compressed in this name. So, this was the situation in the Arab world in those days.

As for the countries surrounding them like Rome, Fars, Ethiopia, India, etc., the Qur'ān mentions them only briefly.

As for the People of the Book among them, i.e., the Jews, the Christians and their fellows, their societies were controlled and managed by despotic desires and individual vagaries of the emperors, lords, officials and bureaucrats. Consequently, the society was divided in two classes: 1) The ruling class which was all-powerful; it did whatever it liked, and played with people's lives, honour and property; 2) The subjects, enslaved and oppressed; they had no security for their property, honour or life, nor had they any freedom of will — except the freedom to agree with their overlords. The ruling class had won over the religious scholars and the guardians of sharī'ah and joined hands with them. In this way, it had captivated the masses' hearts and minds. This class was the real ruler that ruled over the religion of the people as well as their worldly life; it ruled over their religion as it thought expedient, through the tongues and pens of religious scholars; and over their worldly life with whip and sword.

The subjects, in their turn, were likewise divided in two strata, according to their strength and wealth (and people follow the system adopted by their rulers!). There was a class of wealthy people living in ease and luxury; and another of weak and poor as well as of slaves. The same was the situation within a household where the head of the family lorded over the women and children. Another division was between the males and the females: the men were privileged to have freedom of will and action in every walk of life while the women were deprived of it all; they were merely adjuncts of men; they served their men in all their (men's) whims, without having least independence.

These historical facts may clearly be seen in miniature in the words of Allāh: Say: ''O People of the Book! come to a word common between us and you that we shall not worship any but Allāh and (that) we shall not associate anything with Him, and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh''; but if they turn back, then say: ''Bear witness that we are submitting ones'' [3:64]. The Prophet had included these words in his letter to Heraclius, the Roman Emperor, and also reportedly in those written to the kings of Egypt, Ethiopia and Fars as well as to the people of Najrān.

There are also other verses that throw light on their condition at that time. For example: O you people! surely We have created you of a male and a female and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allāh is the one among you who guards himself most (against evil) [49:13]. Also see the instruction concerning marriage with slave-girls and other believing maidens: ... you are (sprung) the one from the other; so marry them with the permission o f their people ... [4:25]; and about the women in general: That I will not waste the work of a worker among you, whether male or female, the one of you being from the other ... [3:195]; there are many other verses relevant to this topic.

As for others than the People of the Book, i.e., the idolworshippers and those similar to them, their condition was more unfortunate and disastrous then the People of the Book. The verses revealed in rebuttal of their ‘‘arguments’’ show clearly how their endeavours had failed and their ambitions frustrated in all affairs of life and means of happiness. For example:

> And certainly We did write in the Zabūr after the reminder that the earth, shall inherit it My righteous servants. Most surely in this is a message to a people who worship (Us)... Say: ‘‘It is only revealed to me that your God is one God; will you then submit?’’ But if they turn back, say: ‘‘I have given you warning all alike ... [21:105 — 109]; ... and this Qur’ān has been revealed to me that with it I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches ... [6:19].

ISLAM ARRIVES ON THE SCENE

So, this was the condition of human society at that time — in the era of ignorance; people were blissfully inclined to falsehood, and mischief and injustice dominated all aspects of life. It was in this situation that Islam, the religion of monotheism and truth, came on the scene. Its aim was to put sceptre of power in the hand of truth and give it absolute authority over mankind, in order that their hearts might be cleansed of the filth of polytheism and their actions and activities be purified; the goal was to establish an ideal social order at a time when corruption and decay had completely destroyed its roots and shoots, its exterior and interior.

In short, Allāh wished to guide them to the clear truth; He did not want to put any difficulty on them but He wished to purify them and that He might complete His favours on them. They were at that time steeped in falsehood, and Islam wanted them to join together on the word of truth. The two positions were poles apart, diametrically opposed to each other. What was Islam to do? Should it have tried to gain favour with a few people among them and then use them to reform other adherents of falsehood? Then used some to transform some others — all this in its eagerness to make the truth prevail in any way possible, through any means available? After all, people say: The end justifies the means — however objectionable it may be. It is the normal way of politics which the politicians always use.

This method seldom fails to achieve its aim — whatever the goal might be. But it is not suitable for arriving at the clear truth, which the Islamic call aims at. The end is obtained through its means, the result from its premises; how could a falsehood bring forth the truth, or a rotten tree bear good healthy fruits — when a child is a composite originating from its parents.

Politics desires and aspires to acquire authority and domination; to go ahead and enjoy fruits of power, no matter how it is achieved, or whatever shape it takes — whether it is good or evil, whether it is based on truth or falsehood. But the mission of truth does not want any goal except the truth. If it were to achieve that goal through falsehood it would be a confirmation of falsity, and then it would no longer remain a mission of truth — it would become one of falsehood.

This reality clearly shines in the life histories of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and his purified progeny (a.s.).

This was what his Lord ordered the Prophet; and which was reiterated by the Qur'ān whenever the misguided people tried to tempt him to show some indulgence or go easy (even a little) in matters of religion. Allāh says: Say: ''O unbelievers! I do not worship that which you worship, nor do you worship Him Whom I worship; nor am I going to worship that which you worship, nor are you going to worship Him Whom I worship; unto you be your religion and unto me my religion'' [109:1 — 6]. Also He says in a somewhat threatening tone: And had it not been that We had already firmly established you, you would certainly have been near to incline to them a little; in that case We would certainly have made you to taste a double (punishment) in this life and a double (punishment) after death [17:74 — 75]. Again He says: ... nor could I take those who lead (others) astray for aiders [18:51]. Also He says — and it is a parable of wide application: And as for the good land, its vegetation springs forth (abundantly) by the permission of its Lord, and (as for) that which is bad (its herbage) comes forth but scantily [7:58].

As the truth cannot mix with falsehood, Allāh ordered the Prophet — when the mission's burden made him weary — to proceed gradually in this respect on three sides: concerning the mission itself, those to whom the call was addressed and the mode of approach.

First: Concerning the mission itself with all its true knowledge and ordained laws. These are intended to reform the society's condition and uproot the decay and depravity. As we know, it is extremely difficult to change people's ideas and beliefs, especially if they are enmeshed with their character and activities; if they have become the norms of the day, entrenched by passage of centuries, sanctified by convention of ancestors, faithfully followed by succeeding generations. The task becomes even more herculean if the religion which is intended to replace the ancient system is all-encompassing, if it covers all affairs of life and ordains laws for all human movements and stillness; if it looks at the exterior as well as the interior, at all times and for all individuals and societies without any exception — as the Islam does. It is a venture that boggles the minds and looks practically impossible.

The task is even harder and tougher in actions than in beliefs. Because man becomes familiar with customs and rites and becomes habituated to them long before he starts believing in any thing. Action is perceived by perceptions more clearly and is more closely attached to man's desires and cravings. That is why, in the beginning, the Mission announced only the true beliefs — and that too in general terms. It was later that it gradually unfolded the divine laws and rules one after another.

In short, Islam revealed its secrets, step by step, so that people do not balk at accepting them, and hearts do not tremble at stacking one rule upon another. This fact is clear to anyone who meditates on these realities. He will see a clear difference between Meccan and Medinite verses of the Qur'ān, so far as exposition of divine knowledge and ordained laws is concerned. The Meccan verses call to the basic principles couched in general terms, while the Medinite ones (i.e., those revealed after hijrah [emigration], wherever they might have been revealed) explain the matters and give the details of the commandments which were communicated in general or vague terms during Meccan period. Allāh says: Nay! man is most surely inordinate, because he sees himself free from want. Surely to your Lord is the return. Have you seen him who forbids a servant (of Allāh) when he prays? Have you considered if he were on the Guidance, or enjoined guarding (against evil)? Have you considered if he (i.e., this unbeliever) gives the lie to the truth and turns (his) back? Does he not know that Allāh does see? [96:6 — 14]. These verses were revealed at the beginning of the Messengership after the Prophethood, as was mentioned in the second volume under the verses of the Fast[1] and they point out in general terms to the Oneness of God and the resurrection, as well as to piety and worship.

Also He says: O you who are enwrapped! Arise and warn, and your Lord do magnify [74:1 — 3]. These verses too were revealed at the beginning of the Call. Again He says: And (I swear by) the soul and Him Who made it perfect, then He inspired it to understand what is wrong for it and right for it, he will indeed be successful who purifies it, and he will indeed fail who corrupts it [91:7 — 10]; He indeed shall be successful who purifies himself, and remembers the name of his Lord and prays [87:14 — 15]; Say: ''I am only a human being like you; it is revealed to me that your God is one God, therefore follow the right way to Him and ask His forgiveness''; and woe to the polytheists, who do not give zakāt and they are unbelievers in the hereafter. (As for) those who believe and do good, for them surely is a reward never to be cut off [41:6 — 8]. All these verses were revealed during the early days of the Call.

Also Allāh has said: Say: ''Come, I will recite what your Lord has forbidden to you — (remember) that you do not associate anything with Him and do good to (your) parents, and do not slay your children for (fear of) poverty — We provide for you and for them — and do not draw near to indecencies, those of them which are apparent and those which are concealed, and do not kill the soul which Allāh has forbidden except for (the requirements of) justice; this He has enjoined you with, that you may understand. And do not approach the property of the orphan except in the best manner until he attains his majority; and give full measure and weight with justice — We do not impose on any soul a duty but according to its ability; and when you speak, then be just though it be (against) a relative, and fulfil Allāh's covenant; this He has enjoined you with, that you may be mindful. And (know) that this is My path, the straight one, therefore follow it; and follow not (other) ways, for they will scatter you away from His way; this He has enjoined you with, that you may guard (against evil)'' [6:151 — 153].

Look at the style of these verses; how they speak about religious prohibitions in general terms, and also about religious commandments in the same manner. See how all prohibitions have been summarized in one word which even a layman's mind will not balk at, because no sane person will hesitate in admitting that ''indecencies'' are bad and man should desist from them. Likewise, no one can doubt that uniting on the straight path is a good thing, as it prevents division and weakness and protects the society from destruction and decay. The Qur'ān in this way has appealed to the natural instincts of its audience. It is for this reason that some prohibited things have been described in detail, for example, disobedience of, and misbehaviour towards the parents, killing the children for fear of poverty, unjustified slaying of a human being, devouring an orphan's property and other such things; human instinct supports this call because in normal conditions it baulks from committing these sins and crimes. There are other verses of this type, and on meditation one will find the same style and the same condition in all of them.

In any case, the Meccan verses give only a general outline, details of which were filled by the Medinite ones; and the same gradual approach is seen within the Medinite verses themselves, because not all the religious laws and rules were sent down there at once — they were revealed little by little, step by step.

Only one example — mentioned earlier — will suffice here, and that is of the verses prohibiting the intoxicants. Allāh said: And of the fruits of the palms and the grapes — you obtain from them intoxication and goodly provision [16:67]. It is a Meccan revelation; it mentiones intoxication and remains silent — except putting it vis-a-vis the phrase, ''goodly provision'', and thus hinting that intoxicants were not goodly provision. Then came another verse: Say: ''My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed, and sin ...'' [7:33]. This too belongs to the Meccan period; it prohibits ''sin'' clearly but does not say that drinking liquor is a sin. It treads softly, preparing the minds gradually to leave a bad habit to which they were pulled by their desires, and on which their flesh had grown and bones strengthened. Then came the Medinite verse: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance. Say: ''In both of them there is a great sin and (some) profit for men; and their sin is greater than their profit'' [2:219]. The verse pointed out that drinking liquor was a sin which had earlier been prohibited by the verse 33 of the chapter seven. Yet, you may see that the language of the verse is advisory, its tone gentle. Lastly it was revealed: O you who believe! intoxicants and games of chance and (sacrificing to) stones set up and (dividing by) arrows are only an abomination of Satan's handiwork; shun it therefore that you may be successful. The Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst by means of intoxicants and games of chance, and to keep you off from the remembrance of Allāh and from prayer. Will you then desist? [5:90 — 91]. This verse revealed at Medina finally sealed the prohibition.

The same gradual approach is seen in the matter of inheritance. The Prophet first established brotherhood between his companions and ordained that one such brother would inherit from the other. It was in the beginning and the aim was to prepare the Muslims to readily accept the laws of inheritance which were soon to be promulgated. Then came the revelation: and the possessors of relationship have the better claim in the ordinance of Allāh to inheritance, one with respect to another, than (other) believers and (than) those who have fled (their homes) [33:6]. It is this same consideration which is seen in many abrogated and abrogating verses.

In these and other similar matters, the Call went ahead step by step in promulgation and enforcement of the laws. It dealt with people gently in order that they might easily and gladly accept and obey the orders. Allāh says: And a Qur'ān which We have revealed in portions so that you may read it to the people by slow degrees, and We have sent it down in portions [17:106]. If the Qur'ān had been revealed to the Prophet all at once, he would have been obliged to explain the deails of his sharī'ah to the people (as the divine words clearly show: and We have revealed to you the Reminder that you may make clear to men what has been revealed to them [16:44]). Then it would have been necessary for him to describe in the very early day all the matters concerning the belief and ethics, as well as the whole set of the acts of worship and the rules regarding mutual dealings, social affairs, political matters, penal codes and other factors. Obviously, the minds at that time could not even imagine and tolerate such subjects, let alone accepting and practising them — and the sharī'ah could never control their hearts (in their will and intentions) nor their limbs and bodies (in their actions). It was the gradual revelation which prepared the way for the religion to be accepted and to capture the hearts. Allāh says: And those who disbelieve say: ''Why has not the Qur'ān been revealed to him all at once?'' Thus, that We may strengthen your hearts by it and We have arranged it well in arranging [25:32]. This verse shows that Allāh had intended the graudal revelation to be a kindness to His Messenger (s.a.w.a.) as well as to his ummah. Ponder on this point and especially on the last clause, and We have arranged it well in arranging.

It is necessary to point out here that proceeding from general to particular, and going step by step in promulgation of law — for using gentle approach towards people and training them effectively stage by stage, keeping the ultimate good before one's eyes — is completely different from compromise and indulgence; and this distinction, needs no elaboration.

Second: Gradual increase in the circle of people to whom the call is addressed. We know that the Prophet was sent to the whole mankind; his call was not meant for a particular nation to the exclusion of the others; nor was it confined to a specific time or place. (The latter clause in effect means the same as the former.) Allāh says: Say: ''O people! surely I am the Messenger of Allāh to you all, of Him Whose is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth [7:158]; and this Qur'ān has been revealed to me that with it I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches [6:19]; And We have not sent you but as a mercy to the worlds [21:107].

Apart from that, the history records his invitations to the Jews (and they were Israelites) as well as the rulers of Rome, Persia, Abyssinia and Egypt, and they were non-Arabs. Among the well-known believers were Salmān (from Persia), his mu'adhdhin, Bilāl (from Abyssinia), and Ṣuhayb (from Rome). Thus the fact, that his prophethood was universal and meant for the whole world since his own days, is beyond doubt; the abovequoted verses too are not confined to any time or place.

Also there are following two verses which prove universality of his prophethood and show that it is meant for all times and all places. Allāh says: and most surely it is a Mighty Book: Falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor from behind it; a revelation from the Wise, the Praised

One [41:41 — 42]; ... but he is the Messenger of Allāh and the Last of the Prophets ... [33:40]. Detailed descriptions of these verses shall be given in their Commentaries.

In any case, his prophethood is all-encompassing and universal. If we ponder on the vast range of Islamic knowledge and laws, and see the condition the world was in, the day Islam came on the scene — the dark ignorance, the repulsive depravity and the filthy transgression — then we shall certainly realize that it was just impossible to face the whole world at once, or to struggle against polytheism and depravity all at one go.

The reason demanded that, to begin with, the Call should be addressed to only a small portion of humanity — and that it should be the people of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) himself. After they were well-imbued with religion, the Call could be extended to others — and that is what was done. Allāh says: And We did not send any messenger but with the language of his people, so that he might explain to them clearly [14:4]; And if We had revealed it to any of the foreigners, so that he should have recited it to them, they would not have believed therein [26:198 — 199]. The verses that imply some link between the Call and the Arabs, show only that they were included among those to whom the Call and the Warning were addressed. The same is the position of the verses which offer the Qur'ān as a challenge to the mankind — if there were anything in them which implied the restriction of the challenge to rhetorics, then it would be just because rhetoric was one of the aspects of its miraculousness; it does not mean that the Call was confined to only the Arabs.

Of course, language by itself plays a very important role in communication and explanation, as has been described in several verses; for example: And We did not send any messenger but with the language of his people, so that he might explain to them clearly [14:4]; We narrate to you the best of narratives, by Our revealing to you this Qur'ān [12:3]; And most surely this is a revelation from the Lord of the worlds. The faithful Spirit has descended with it upon your hearts, that you may be of the warners, in plain Arabic language [26:192 — 195]. The Arabic language has unparallelled capacity of expressing the ideas and mental images in the most perfect style. That is why Allāh selected it from among all languages for His Mighty Book, and said: Surely We have made it an Arabic Qur'ān so that you may understand [43:3].

However, Allāh ordered the Prophet, when he took up the Call, to begin with his nearest relations: And warn your nearest relatives [26:214]. The Prophet, obeying the command, gathered his relatives and called them to what he was sent with; he further promised them that the first one to answer his call would be his successor after him. ‘Alī (a.s.) answered his call; the Prophet appreciated his response while the others mocked him for it — as the correct traditions and books of history and biography have recorded [1]. Then other people from his family adhered to him, like his wife, Khadījah, his uncle, Ḥamzah ibn ‘Abdi ’l-Muṭṭalib, ‘Ubayd, and his uncle, Abū Ṭālib — as is recorded in Shī‘ite traditions, and declared and implied in his own poems [2], (although he did not announce his acceptance of faith in order that he could continue protecting the Prophet.

Then Allāh ordered him to extend the circle of the mission to the whole nation, as is shown by the following verses: And thus have We revealed to you an Arabic Qur’ān, that you may warn the mother city (i.e., Mecca) and those around it ... [42:7]; ... that you may warn a people to whom no warner has come before you, that they may follow the right direction [32:3]; and this Qur’ān has been revealed to me that with it I may warn you and whomsoever it reaches [6:19]. This last verse is a clear proof that the Call was not confined to them, although it had begun with them for underlying benefits.

Lastly Allāh ordered him to spread the Call to the whole world, to include followers of every religion and creed, as the earlier quoted verses show. See for example: Say: ‘‘O people! surely I am the Messenger of Allāh to you all ...’’ [7:158]; but he is the Messenger of Allāh and the Last of the prophets [33:40]; and other verses quoted above.

Third: Proceeding step by step in calling and guidance as well as in enforcement of the law. [It has three stages:] Inviting them by word of mouth, passive resistance and jihād.

Invitation by Word: It is seen throughout the Qur’ān, all by itself. Allāh had directed the Prophet to pay regard to human dignity and observe good manners in his missionary activities. He says: Say: ''I am only a mortal like you; it is revealed to me ...'' [18:110]; ... and make yourself gentle to the believers [15:88]; And not alike are the good and the evil Repel (evil) with what is best, when lo! he between whom and you was enmity would be as if he were a warm friend [41:34]; And bestow not favours that you may receive again with increase [74:6]. There are numerous verses of similar theme.

Also, Allāh told him to use all methods and levels of explanation having regard to the understanding and mental capacity of the individuals. He says: Call to the way of Thy Lord with wisdom and goodly exhortation, and have disputations with them in the best manner [16:125].

Passive Resistance: It means that the believers were to cut themselves off from the unbelievers in their belief and activities. In this way there were to establish an Islamic social order unalloyed with any non-monotheistic belief or non-Islamic action (e.g., sins and ethical shortcomings) — except mingling with non-Muslims to the extent required by dictates of life. Allāh says:

> Unto you be your religion and unto me my religion [109:6].
>
> Stand fast then (in the right path) as you are commanded, as also he who has turned (to Allāh) with you, and be not inordinate (O men!), surely He sees what you do. And do not incline to those who are unjust, lest the fire touch you, and you have no guardians herides Allāh, then you shall not be helped [11:112 — 113];
>
> To this then go on inviting, and go on steadfastly (on the right path) as you are commanded, and do not follow their low desires, and say: ''I believe in what Allāh has revealed of the Book, and I am commanded to do justice between you: Allāh is our Lord and your Lord; we shall have our deeds and you shall have your deeds; no plea need there be (now) between us and you: Allāh will gather us together, and to Him is the return'' [42:15];
> O you who believe! do not take My enemy and your enemy for friends: would you offer them love while they deny what has come to you o f the truth ... Allāh does not forbid you respecting those who have not made war against you on account of (your) religion, and have not driven you forth from you homes, that you show them kindness and deal with them justly; surely Allāh loves the doers of justice. Allāh only forbids you respecting those who made war upon you on account of (your) religion, and drove you forth from your homes and backed up (others) in your expulsion, that you make friends with them, and whoever makes friends with them, these are the unjust [60:1, 8 — 9].

There are numerous verses with the theme of keeping aloof and remaining separate from, and clear of, the enemies of religion; and as you see they explain the meaning of this aloofness, its method and its particulars.

Jihād: This subject has already been explained under the verses of jihād in the Chapter of The Cow.[1]

However, these three stages are the special feature and exclusive property of Islam. The first is inseparably included in the latter two, and the second in the third one. The Prophet, in all his battles, invariably always called the unbelievers to the right path and exhorted them to submit to the One God — before the hostilities started, as he was commanded by his Lord to do: But if they turn back, say: ''I have given you warning all alike ...'' [21:109].

One of the vulgarest charges against Islam is the cliche that it is a religion of sword, not of preaching. The Qur'ān, the biographies of the Prophet and the history, all together throw light on the reality, but ''to whomsoever Allāh does not give light, he has no light.''

Many of these critics belong to a Church that had established the Inquisition and run it for centuries to convict the so-called heretics and bum them alive — as if it were the divine court on the Day of Resurrection ! Its agents roamed the Christian countries and caught and sent to the Inquisition whomsoever they accused of atheism or heresy — often it meant only having modem views in the fields of physics and mathematics which went against the ''philosophy'' of scholasticism propagated by the Church.

Would that I knew which was more important in the eyes of the reason: spreading the monotheism, uprooting idol-worship and cleansing the earth of depravity [as Islam did], or strangling a scholar who said that the earth revolved round the sun, or who denied the Ptolemaic sky.

Also, it was the Church that incited and agitated the Christian world against Islam, in the name of fighting against ''idolatry''. Thus began the wars known as Crusade which continued for about two hundred years; it devastated the regions, annihilated millions of lives and tarnished the dignity of countless women. [1]

There are other detractors, outside the Church, who are supposedly imbued with ideals of civilization and freedom. These are the very people who have no hesitation in detonating the fuse of world wars and turning the world upside down whenever they perceive some of their material interests threatened by a small danger. The question is: What is more disastrous to the mankind: Consolidation of polytheism in the world, moral decadence, lapse of virtue and suffocation of world with depravity and corruption? Or losing one's grip on a few yards of land or incurring loss of a few dollars? Yes, ''certainly man is ungrateful to his Lord.''

Here I would like to quote what one of the great scholars has written on this subject in one of his booklets. He says:

The methods used for reforming social order, uprooting injustice and establishing justice, and fighting against corruption and evil are almost confined to three categories:

1. Methods of propagation and guidance through lectures, articles, books and publications. It is the noble way pointed to by Allāh as He says in His Book: Call to the way of Thy Lord with wisdom and goodly exhortation, and have disputations with them in the best manner. Also, He says: Repel (evil) with what is best, when lo! he between whom and you was enmity would be as if he were a warm friend. This was the method used by Islam in the beginning of the mission ...

[1] The spirit of Crusade is still alive in Christiandom which, taking advantage of the Zionist movement and internal strifes of the Muslim world, has won the latest round of the battle by putting the State of Israel like a dagger in the heart of the Muslim land. After the Europe was devastated in the Second World War, the super powers have learned to fight their wars by proxy in the third world, e.g., in Korea, Vietnam and Nicaragua. Using the same principle, the Christians are now continuing the Crusade by proxy, through Israel. For the time being they have won the battle, but the war continues. (tr.)

2. Methods of peaceful and passive resistance, like demonstrations, strikes, economic boycott, and non-cooperation with the tyrants by remaining aloof from their services and governments. Believers in this method do not agree with methods of killing, war and violence. This is the way pointed out by Allāh in His words: And do not incline to those who are unjust, lest the fire touch you. Again He says: Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends. There are a lot of verses in the Qur'ān pointing to this method. Prominent among its advocates were the Indian prophet, Buddha and 'Īsā (a.s.) as well as the Russian writer, Tolstoy and the Indian leader, Mahatma Gandhi.

3. War, uprising and fighting.

Islam proceeds by degrees in these three methods. First comes good exhortation and peaceful invitation. If it fails to repulse the unjust people and to remove their corruption and despotism, then the second method is adopted, and that is peaceful boycott, passive resistance and non-cooperation with them, withholding all assistance from them. If this too proves ineffective, then the only alternative is the third one, that is, armed confrontation, because Allāh is never pleased with injustice; and he who silently agrees with an unjust person, is his partner in injustice.

Islam is a belief. He is completely mistaken and has crossed the limits of reason who says that Islam was spread by sword and wars. Islam is a faith and belief, and faith cannot be created by compulsion and coercion; it comes from proofs and arguments. The Honoured Qur'ān announces this fact in many verses, e.g., There is no compulsion in religion; truly the right way has become clearly distinct from error [2:256].

Even when Islam drew sword and took up arms against the unjust people (who had disregarded the divine communications and proofs), it used the force only to remove those who had become like stumbling blocks in the way of the Call of the truth. In other words, it used the arms to repel the enemies'mischief, not to make them enter the fold of Islam. Allāh says: And fight with them until there is no more mischief [2:193]. Thus the fighting was resorted to, for erasing mischief, not for compelling them to accept the faith and religion.

Islam therefore does not wage war arbitrarily or by its own choice. It is the enemies who push it into a corner and then it has to resort to war. Even then it uses noble ways to fight. It has forbidden — both in war and in peace — destruction and arson, poisoning and cutting off water from enemy. Likewise, it prohibits killing of women, children or prisoners — instead it orders the Muslims to deal with them gently, to do good to them, no matter how much enmity and hatred towards the Muslims they might have shown. It disallows assasination in war and in peace, as well as killing aged men and women or him who had not participated in the war. It does not allow attacking the enemy at night; [and if you fear treachery on the part of a people,] then throw back to them on terms of equality [8:58]. It forbids killing someone just on suspicion, or punishing him before he has committed a sin. It has prohibited many such practices which are rejected by sense of nobility and ideals of manhood, and which spring from meanness and cruelty, vileness and barbarity.

All the above-mentioned deeds which Islam in its nobility refused to do against its enemies in any of its battles or wars, have been committed, in their most heinous form and in the most horrid way, by the ‘‘civilized’’ nations of this era — the era of enlightenment. Yes, this enlightened era has allowed massacre of women and children, old and sick; it practises nightsorties, and attacks in middle of night with arms and bombs against defenceless civilians. In short, it has ligalized murder in all its various shapes.

Did not Germany in World War II send rocket on London, demolishing the buildings and killing the women, children and civilian population? Did not they exterminate thousands of prisoners? And did not the Allies [in their turn] send thousands of bombers against Germany to destroy its cities and towns? Did not the U.S.A. drop atomic bombs on the Japanese towns?

Now that even more modern means of destruction have been invented, like the missiles and atomic and hydrogen bombs, nobody — except Allāh — knows what disasters and destructions, tragedies and calamities would fall on the earth if a World War III were to erupt and the fighting parties resorted to these bombs [1] May Allāh guide the man to the right path and lead him to the straight way.[1]

[1] The nuclear arms race continues unabated, in spite of the pious verbal professions of the super powers to ‘‘limit’’ it. The U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. have amassed between themselves enough nuclear war-heads to pulverize the earth several times over. Now their attention is focused on colonizing the outer space and — even before that — on finding the ways to destroy it. They are rushing towards ‘‘Star War’’ when the majority of mankind (including millions of Americans and Russians) are either living below the

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: And give to the orphans their property ... a great crime: It is an order to return to the orphans their property, and it paves the way for the next two sentences (and do not substitute ..., and do not devour ...); or the latter two serve as explantion of the former. But as the reason given at the end (this is surely a great crime) refers to the latter two or the last one sentence, it supports the view that the first sentence is put here as a prologue to the next two.

The main prohibition that one should not use an orphan's property in a manner detrimental to his interest, in itself prepares the ground for the soon-coming laws of inheritance, and of the marriage described in the next verse.

The words, ''and do not substitute worthless for good'', mean: Do not substitute your worthless things for their good ones; if there is any good property belonging to them, you should not keep it for yourself returning to them some worthless property of yours in exchange. Some people have explained it as follows: Do not substitute unlawful things for lawful ones. But the former meaning is more obvious, because apparently the two sentences (do not substitute ..., and do not devour ...) describe a particular type of unlawful management, and the first sentence (And give the orphans ...) paves the way for both. In the last clause, ''this is surely a great crime'', al-ḥūb (اَلْحُوْبُ = sin; crime) is infinitive verb and also verbal noun.

QUR'ĀN: And if you fear that you cannot act equitably towards orphans, then marry such (other) women as seem good to you: We have mentioned previously that there was always a great number of orphans poverty line or dying of starvation. Allāh says:

Chaos has appeared in the land and the sea on account of what the hands of men have wrought, that He may make them taste a part of that which they have done ... [30:41]. (tr.)

among the Arabs of the era of ignorance — who were seldom free from war, fighting, murder and forays, and among whom death by killing was a very common occurrence. Usually, the leaders of tribes and people of power and influence took the orphan girls (with properties) as wives; they devoured their (i.e., the orphans') properties with their own and then behaved with them unjustly. Often they turned them out after swallowing their property; the helpless girls became poverty-stricken destitutes; neither they had any money to live on, nor was there anyone willing to marry and maintain them. The Qur'ān has reproached them very severely for this evil habit and disgusting injustice, and prohibited very strongly doing any injustice to orphans or devouring their property. For example, Allāh says:

> (As for) those who swallow the property of the orphans unjustly, surely they only swallow fire into their bellies and soon they shall enter burning fire [4:10].
> And give to the orphans their property, and do not substitute worthless (things) for (their) good (ones), and do not devour their property (as an addition) to your own property; this is surely a great crime [4:2].

As a result, the Muslims reportedly became afraid for their own souls and were so panic-stricken that they turned out the orphans from their own homes in apprehension, lest they inadvertently do something wrong with those orphans' property or fail to give them their just dues. If someone kept an orphan with him, he set apart the orphan's share in food and drink; if the orphan could not finish it, nobody else would touch it — it remained as it was until it was spoiled. It caused difficulties for the people; and they complained to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) asking for his guidance. Then Allāh revealed: And they ask you concerning the orphans. Say: ''To set right for them (their affairs) is good; and if you mingle with them, they are your brethren; and Allāh knows the mischief-maker from the well-doer; and if Allāh had willed, He would certainly have made it harder for you; surely Allāh is Mighty, Wise'' [2:220]. Thus, Allāh allowed them to give shelter to orphans and to keep them with themselves for looking after their affairs, and to mingle with them because they were their brethren. In this way, their difficulties were removed and their worries dispelled.

When you ponder on this fact, and then look at the verse under discussion (And if you fear that you cannot act equitably towards orphans, then marry such (other) women as seem good to you ...) — and remember that it comes after the verse, ''And give to the orphans their property ...'' — it will be clear to you that the verse raises the prohibition a degree higher. Its connotation will be as follows — and Allāh knows better: Be careful regarding the orphans and do not substitute your bad or worthless property with their good ones; nor should you devour their property with your own; so much so that if you are afraid that you would not be able to treat the orphan girls equitably and therefore you do not like to take them as your wives, then better do not marry them; instead you should marry other such women as seem good to you — two, three or four.

The conditional sentence (And if you fear that you cannot act equitably towards orphans, then marry such [other] women as seem good to you ...), actually means: If you do not like to marry the orphan girls because you fear that you cannot act equitably towards them, then do not marry them, and marry such women as seem good to you. Obviously the clause, ''then marry ...'' is substitute of the real al-jazā' (اَلْجَزَآءُ = second construct of the conditional sentence), [i.e., then do not marry the orphans]; the clause, ''such women as seem good to you'', makes further description [i.e., women other than the orphans] unnecessary. The verse does not say, those women who seem good to you; instead it says: such women as seem good to you; it is because it points to the number mentioned later: two and three and four. The verse begins with the clause, ''if you fear that you cannot act equitably'', while it actually means, if you do not like to marry the orphans because of fear; thus it has allegorically put the cause in place of the effect, pointing to the deleted effect later where it says: ''as seem good to you''.

Many other things have been written in explanation of this verse, as may be seen in bigger exegeses. They are in short as follows:

1. The Arabs used to marry four, five or more wives; their thinking was as follows: Why should I not marry as has Mr. X done? When his own property was finished, he spent the property of orphans under his care. Therefore, Allāh forbade them to marry more than four wives, so that they should not be compelled by circumstances to unjustly use the orphans' property.
2. They were strictly honest in matters affecting the orphans, but did not observe the same standard in affairs of women; so they married numerous wives without maintaining equity and justice. Therefore, Allāh said: If you are afraid about orphans, you should likewise be careful about women; you should marry only one or upto four.

3. They were reluctant to accept guardianship of orphans or to eat their property. So Allāh said: If you are reluctant of these things, you should also desist from fornication; instead you should marry such women as seem good to you.

4. If you fear that you cannot act equitably towards the orphans brought up under your care, then marry other lawful women from the orphans among your relatives, two and three and four.

5. If you are reluctant of eating together with orphans, then likewise avoid marrying more than one wife; if you are afraid of not acting equitably with them, do not marry except her whom you can treat with justice and equity.

These were the explanations given by them. But it is clear that none of them properly fits the wordings of the verse. Therefore the only interpretation is the one we have written.

QUR'ĀN: two and three and four: the paradigms, maf'al and fu'al (مَفْعَلُ،فُعَالُ), when applied to numbers, signify repetition of the root word; thus the clause, mathnā wa thulātha wa rubā'a (مَثْنى وَ ثُلثَ وَ رُبعَ) means, two two and three three and four four [or twos, threes and fours]. The verse is addressed to all individuals, and the numbers have been separated by ''and'' which implies choice; these factors together show that every believer has a right to marry two wives, or three, or four. When looked at together, they would be grouped as twos, threes and fours.

The above explanation, coupled with the next clause, but if you fear that you will not do justice (between them) then (marry) only one or what your right hands posses, together with the following verse, And all married women ... [4:247], disproves the idea that the verse allows to marry two, three or four wives in one contract of marriage; or that it permits to marry two together, then two together and so on, and likewise three or four together, then other three or four together; or that it approves polyandary — marriage of several men with one woman. These are ideas which the verse does not tolerate at all.

Apart from that, it is a self-evident truth that Islam does not allow a man to gather more than four wives at a time, or a woman to have more than one husband at a time.

Likewise, there is no room for the hypothesis that the word, ‘‘and’’, between the numbers, is for conjunction, and that the verse accordingly allows marrying nine (i.e., 2 + 3 + 4) wives at a time. Majma‘u ’l-bayān says as follows: Using the total in this manner is not a possibility at all. If someone says, ‘‘The people entered the town in twos, threes and fours’’, does not mean the total of these numbers — in other words, it does not imply that they entered in groups of nine. Moreover, there is a proper word, ‘‘nine’’, to denote that number; so leaving the correct word and changing it to ‘two and three and four’, shows an incapability of proper expression — Too exalted and sanctified is His speech from such defects.

QUR’ĀN: but if you fear that you will not do justice (between them) then (marry) only one: That is, marry only one, not more. Allāh has made this order conditional on fear, not on knowledge, because knowledge in such matters is usually difficult to achieve, especially when thought is clouded by temptation; the underlying benefit would be lost if the rule were made dependent on knowledge.

QUR’ĀN: or what your right hands possess: That is, slave-girls. If a man is afraid that he will not do justice between many wives, then he should marry only one; and if he wants more, then he should take slave-girls, because they are not entitled to division of nights.

Obviously, the provision of the alternative — taking the slave-girls — does not mean that one may misbehave with, or do injustice to them; Allāh does not like the unjust, nor is He unjust to His servants. It only means that it is easier to maintain justice with them because they are not included in the rule of division of nights. This very reason shows that this clause refers to taking, and living with them by virtue of possession, not by marriage; the matter of marrying them has been described later in the verse: And whoever among you has not within his power ampleness of means to marry free believing women, then (he may marry) of those whom your right hands possess from among your believing maidens ... [4:25].

QUR'ĀN: this is nearer, that you may not deviate from the right course: ''al-'Awl', (اَلْعَوْلُ = to deviate from the right course). The law as ordained above brings you nearer to the point whence you shall not deviate from justice or transgress the wome's rights.

Someone has written that al-'awl means burden; but it is a far-fetched interpretation, both in word and in meaning.

This sentence — which mentions the underlying reason of this legislation — proves that the foundation of the marriage laws is laid on justice and equity as well as on rejection of oppression and usurpation of rights.

QUR'ĀN: And give women their dowries as a free gift ... with enjoyment (and with) wholesome (result): aṣ-Ṣaduqah, aṣ-ṣadaqah, aṣ-ṣadāq and aṣ-ṣidāq (اَلصَّدُقَةُ،اَلصَّدَقَةُ،اَلصَّدَاقُ،اَلصِّدَاقُ), all mean dowry; an-niḥlah (اَلنِّحْلَةُ = gift, a thing given freely without bargaining).

The possessive construction, ''their dowries'', shows that the order to give dowry to woman is based on the usage prevalent among the people: it was customary in marriage to reserve for the wife some property or anything of value as her dowry. Seemingly it has the same position vis-a-vis the conjugal relationship as the price does vis-a-vis the commodity sold; and as we shall describe in the forthcoming Academic discourse, customarily it is the man who proposes and asks for marriage as a buyer brings the price to the seller and receives the purchased item. In any case, the verse endorses this prevalent custom.

It was possible to think that the husband was not allowed to use the dowry at all — even if the wife was pleased with it. Probably it was to remove that possible misunderstanding that the conditional clause was added: ''but if they of themselves be pleased to give up to you a portion of it, then eat it with enjoyment (and with) wholesome (result).'' The imperative, ''eat it'', is qualified with the words, `with enjoyment and with wholesome result.' It puts emphasis on the previous sentence containing basic rule and also shows that the order is elective, not compulsory.

al-Hanā' (اَلْهَنَآءُ = being easily digested, being agreeable); it is used for food. al-Marī' (اَلْمَرِئ) is derived from ar-riyy (اَلرِّيّ = quenching of thirst); it has some connotation regarding drinks as al-hanā' does about food, but with one difference: al-Hanā' may be used for food and drink both; but when the combined phrase, hanī'an marī'an (هَنِيْأً مَرِيْأً) is used, the former word refers exclusively to food and the latter to drink.

QUR'ĀN: And do not give away your property which Allāh has made for you a (means of) support to the weak of understanding: ''as-Safah'' (اَلسَّفَهُ = feeble-mindedness; weakness or slightness of understanding). Probably, its basic meaning was lightness of a thing which by nature should not be light; thus they say: az-Zamāmu 's-safīh (اَلزَّمَامُ السَّفِيْهُ = a rein or halter that shakes too much); thawb safīh (ثَوْبٌ سَفِيهٌ = a badly-woven cloth); now it is mostly used for lightness of soul, and its implication varies with context; in worldly affairs, as-safīh means feeble-minded, weak of understanding; in religious context, it means a dissolute person, one who does not follow religious commandments; and so on.

It is obvious from the verse that one should not spend too much of feeble-minded persons, should not give them more than is needed for their necessary expenses. But the context — the verse is among the ones dealing with orphans' property which is managed and looked after by guardians — provides a definite association that ''the weak of understanding'' refers to the orphans of immature mind; and that ''your property'' actually means the orphans' property, although it has been ascribed to the guardians because of a certain consideration; this explanation is further supported by the clause, ''and maintain them out of it, and clothe them.'' If one insists on interpreting the word, ''the weak of understanding'', in general terms, then it should be generalized to include orphans and non-orphans both. Yet the former meaning carries more weight.

In any case, if the word refers to the orphans of feeble understanding, then ''your property'' means the orphans' property; it has been ascribed to the guardians — whom the verse addresses — keeping in view the fact that all the property and riches found in the world are for the whole mankind. Some individuals keep some portions of these riches, and others some other portions; it is done for general good, on which is based the principle of ownership and exclusive possessive relationship. Accordingly, it is necessary for people to grasp this reality and appreciate that they are all members of a single society, and the whole property belongs to the whole society. Consequently, it is each one's responsibility to protect and preserve it, one should not let it be wasted or squandered by people of weak understanding, nor should it be left under the management of such persons (like minor children or insane people) as are not capable of admininistering it properly. So this is the significance of the possessive case here; it is not unlike the verse: And whoever among you has not within his power ampleness of means to marry free believing women, then (he may marry) of those whom your right hands possess from among your believing maidens [4:25], as it is known that the phrase, ''your believing maidens'', does not refer to the slave-girls owned by the one who wants to marry them.

The verse contains a general rule ordained for the whole society. The society is a single entity — or let us say a [legal] personality — that owns all the riches which Allāh has given it for its livelihood, and with which He has strengthened it. Accordingly, it is the society's responsibility to manage it and to keep it in good order; it should invest it in profitable ventures and use the profit for one's sustenance on a medium scale; it is also obliged to protect it from waste and loss. This basic principle gives rise to the rule that the guardians are obliged to look after, and manage, the affairs of the people of weak understanding; they should not hand over their wards' property to them, lest they waste it through mismanagement. The guardians must hold back the property, manage it profitably and let it grow through earning, trades and profit-sharing; they should maintain those feeble-minded wards with its profit and growth — not with its capital. This law has been laid down, so that the capital is not decreased little by little until a time comes when the ward is left in wretched poverty without any means of livelihood.

It appears from the above explanation that the clause, ''and maintain them out of it and clothe them'', implies that a feeble-minded ward should be maintained from the growth and profit of the capital, not from the capital itself. He should not be allowed to start eating from the capital, keeping it idle without circulation, lest it is eaten up completely. As az-Zamakhsharī has said, it was to show this fine point that Allāh has said, ''out of it'', and not, 'from it'.

Also it is not unreasonable to infer from the verse the principle of general guardianship of the wards, that is, Allāh is not pleased that the affairs of such wards be neglected; nay! the Islamic society is obliged to look after their affairs: If there is any guardian in the family, like the father and paternal grandfather, he will be his guardian and will manage his affairs; otherwise the responsibility falls on the Islamic government, and lastly on other believers, to look after his affairs — detailed rules of which are given in the books of jurisprudence.

ALL THE RICHES BELONG TO THE WHOLE MANKIND

The above is a Qur'ānic reality which forms the basis of many important rules and laws in Islam, and which is inferred from the verse under discussion:

All property and riches belong to Allāh in real ownership; He has made it a means of support and a source of livelihood for the human society, without bequeathing it on a particular person to the exclusion of the others (as a permanent irrevocable endowment); without bestowing it on someone as a gift transferring the authority of lawful management to the new owner. Then Allāh allowed individual members to have exclusive relation with a portion of the riches (which was originally bestowed to the whole humanity), provided that that possessive relationship is established through lawful means, like inheritance, taking possession, and trade, etc. He then laid down some conditions which have to be fulfilled before the individual might be allowed to manage his property, e.g., sanity, majority and so on.

The firm root which has to be respected at all times and which has developed many branches is this: All property belongs to all men. The individuals' interest should be respected if the common interest of the society is protected, i.e., if the private interest is not in conflict with the public weal. Otherwise, public welfare will take precedence over private one, definitely and without any hesitation.

Numerous important laws and rules in Islam are solidly based on this foundation; for example, the regulations related to maintenance, and most of the rules governing mutual dealings and other such aspects of life. Allāh has confirmed it in many places in His Book, e.g., He it is Who created for you all that is in the earth [2:29]. We have written some things related to this topic under the verses of maintenance in the second chapter which may be referred to.

QUR'ĀN: and maintain them out of it, and clothe them and speak to them with kind words: We have fully explained the meaning of sustenance or maintenance under the verse; and Thou givest sustenance to whom Thou pleasest, without measure [3:27].[1]

The clause, ''and maintain them out of it and clothe them'', has the same significance here as does the one in 2:233: and their maintenance and their clothing must be borne by the father. The maintenance refers to the food that nourishes man; and clothing is the dress that protects him from heat and cold. But the phrase, ''maintenance and clothing'', as used in the Qur'ānic language (as in our own) metaphorically points to all the things that together fulfil man's material needs in life; it thus covers all necessities of life including house and other such things. It is not unlike the word, eating, which has a particular meaning, yet metaphorically refers to the use (in general), as the Qur'ān says: ''but if they of themselves be pleased to give up to you a portion of it, then eat it with enjoyment (and with) wholesome (result).''

QUR'ĀN: and speak to them with kind words: It is an ethical guidance for improving the standard of guardianship. The wards may be weak of understanding who are prevented from managing their own properties, yet they are neither dumb animals nor grazing cattle; they are human beings, and they should be treated as such; they should be spoken to in good manner, not harshly or insultingly; and dealt with, dignity.

Apparently it is possible to take this clause as a metaphorical expression for good dealing and commendable social intercourse — not objectionable one, as was explained under the verse: ... and speak to men good (words) ... [2:83].

QUR'ĀN: And test the orphans until they reach (age of) marriage; then if you find in them maturity of intellect, make over to them their property: ''al-Ibtilā' '' (اَلِابْتِلاَءُ = to test); reaching age of marriage, thus it contains a rational allegory; al-'īnās (اَلِايْنَاسُ = to see, to find); the word has a connotation of ''friendliness'' and ''geniality'' because its root is al-uns (اَلْاُنْسُ = friendly atmosphere); ar-rushd (اَلرُّشْدُ = translated here as maturity of intellect) is opposite of al-ghayy (اَلْغَيُّ) and means to find way to the goals of life. Handing over to the orphans their property means to give it back to them, into their possession; [the verb used is ad-daf' (اَلدَّفْعُ = to repulse, to push away]; it is as though the guardian pushes the property away from himself; thus it is in spite of its triteness, a very fine metaphor.

The clause, ''until they reach (age of) marriage'', is related to the verb, ''test''; it thus shows that the testing should be a continuous exercise. The guardian should start testing the orphan as soon as he shows some discretion and appears ready for such tests; it should continue until he reaches marriageable age and becomes a ''man''. The order by nature demands this continual process, because one cannot find out whether the child has attained maturity of intellect just by testing him once or twice; the test must be repeated again and again until the guardian finds out the orphan's maturity of mind and it becomes a part of his nature until he reaches puberty and then the marriageable age.

The words, ''then if you find in them maturity of intellect'', branches from the imperative verb, ''And test''; and the meaning is as follows: Test them, and if you find in them maturity of intellect, hand over their property to them. The wording shows that the orphan's reaching the age of marriage is the basis of returning his property to him and of bestowing on him the power to manage his estate independently. Maturity of intellect is the necessary condition for bestowal of authority of independent management.

Islam has laid down two different standards regarding al-bulūgh (اَلْبُلُوْغُ = majority, adulthood) for two different sets of responsibilities: As for the acts of worship and matters like penal code the majority begins on reaching a prescribed age, but for financial affairs, acknowledements and other such dealings (details of which are given in the books of jurisprudence) mere attainment of age is not enough, he must also achieve maturity of intellect. This differentiation throws light on the highest refinement and sophistication which Islam has maintained in its legislative programmes. Had it disregarded the maturity of intellect in financial and similar dealings, the social life would have suffered disorder and chaos — as far as orphans and other wards were concerned. Had they been given power [just on reaching a certain age] to independently manage their finance or to make agreements or acknowledgments, etc.; it would have given a chance to mischief-makers to mislead and deceive them. Cunning hoaxers could have defrauded them of all their means of livelihood, with their smooth talks, false promises and swindling deals. Therefore, it was essential to impose the condition of maturity of intellect in such matters. But obviously there was no need to put this condition in the things like acts of worship, etc.; also it was not necessary in such affairs as penal code. One does not need sharp mind or maturity of intellect to understand and perceive the evil of these crimes and sins or to realize that one should desist from them. Man understands such things long before attaining maturity of intellect, and one finds no difference, in these matters, between the perception gained before maturity of intellect and that achieved afterwards.

QUR'ĀN: and do not consume it extravagantly and hastily, lest they attain to full age ... and Allāh is enough as a Reckoner: ''al-Isrāf'' (اَلْاِسْرَافُ = extravagance, immoderateness) is exceeding the medium course of action. al-Badār (اَلْبَدَارُ = hurry, haste). The clause, ''and hastily, lest they attain to full age'', means: and hastily fearing that they would grow up and then would not allow you to consume their property. (The phrase, ''lest they attain'', begins in Arabic with an [اَنْ = that] and has no particle of negation; thus it may also be translated, 'that they attain'). Omission of particle of negation before an or in (اَنْ،اِنْ = that) is consistent with norms of language, as grammarians have said: Allāh says: Allāh makes clear to you, lest you err [4:176], i.e., fearing that you would err.

The two phrases, ''extravagantly'' and ''hastily, lest they attain ...'', have been put parallel to each other. This setting points to their difference.

Consuming the orphans' property extravagantly refers to the situation when the guardian eats it without needing or deserving it, unjustly and carelessly. Consuming it hastily, to the condition where the guardian takes from the estate only the normal and usual fee for his services, but with an eye on the possibility that the orphan might stop it when he grows up. All such consumptions are forbidden, except when the guardian is poor and in such a position that either he earns his livelihood somewhere else or looks after the orphan's affairs and meets his necessities of life from his ward's estate. It would be just like a worker in trade or construction, etc. taking his wages from his employer. It is this aspect which Allāh mentions in the sentence: ''and whoever is rich''

(i.e., is not in need of taking from the orphan's property for his livelihood). ''let him abstain altogether'' (i.e., he should follow and adhere to the path of abstinence and continence, and should not take anything from the orphan), ''and whoever is poor, let him eat reasonably''.

An exegete has opined that it means that the poor guardian should eat as usual from his own property, not from that of the orphan. But if that was what Allāh had intended to say, then why did He bring in the difference between rich and poor?

The words, ''then when you make over to them their property, call witnesses in their presence; and Allāh is enough as a Reckoner'', ordain the law to call witnesses at the time of handing over the estate to the wards. It is done to affect the transition in proper way and to remove the danger of dispute and controversy [in future]; lest the orphan — after attaining maturity and receiving the property — makes claims against the guardian. The verse ends on the words, ''and Allāh is enough as a Reckoner''; and it relates the order to its original and basic source — the fountain-head of every rule from Allāh's names and attributes. Allāh is the Reckoner, He would not leave His servants' affairs without meticulously accurate reckoning — and that is His clear legislation. Also the clause completes the Islamic training, because Islam aims at training the people on the basis of monotheism. Although calling the witnesses removes strife and difference in most of the cases, yet sometimes it fails to do so, either because the witnesses deviate from justice or because of other factors. Islam reminds the parties that the spiritual reason [of this law], which is also higher and stronger, is the fear of Allāh Who is enough as a Reckoner. There would never be any discord and difference, if the guardian, the witnesses and the orphan (who is receiving the property) keeps this reality before their eyes.

Look at these two verses and see how singularly and marvelously they explain the subject in such a lovely style:

First, they give basic rules of guardianship over orphans' and other wards' properties; then they explain other important factors: how the property should be taken in trust and protected, how it should be managed to let it grow and bring in profits, how it should be returned to the ward; when the orphans or other wards should be put under guardianship and when should they be given independent authority to manage their affairs.

All this has been reinforced by describing its underlying common benefit, i.e., all property belongs to Allāh Who has made it a means of support for mankind — as we have explained above.

Second, they point to the basic ethical value which man is expected to attain through these laws; it is given by Allāh in these words: ''and speak to them with kind words''.

Third, they show that all these rules are based on the foundation of monotheism. This factor affects and governs all practical laws and ethical values; and its good influence remains effective always and everywhere — even when practical laws and ethical values are enfeebled and their hold on minds and hearts loosened. This reality is described in the last clause, ''and Allāh is enough as a Reckoner''

TRADITIONS

Ibn Abī Ḥātim has narrated from Sa'īd ibn Jubayr (about the verse, And give to the orphans their ...) that he said: ''A man from (the tribe of) Ghaṭfān had with him a great wealth of an orphan nephew of his. When the orphan attained majority, he demanded his property, but (the uncle) held it back from him. So he (the orphan) sued him before the Prophet; then the verse was revealed: And give to the orphans their property ...'' (ad Durru 'l-manthūr)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''It is not lawful for man's water to flow into more than four wombs of free women.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The same Imām said: ''When a man has gathered four (wives) and divorces one of them, then he should not marry the fifth until the waiting period of the woman he has divorced comes to an end.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: There are many traditions on this subject.

It is narrated from Muḥammad ibn Sinān that ar-Riḍā (a.s.) wrote to him inter alia in reply to his questions: ''The reason, why man has right to marry four women and why woman is forbidden to marry more than one, is that when a man marries four women, the child would be affiliated to him; but if a woman had two or more husbands, it would not be known to whom the child belonged, because all of them [i.e., the husbands] would be sharing her marriage, and this would lead to perversion in relationship, inheritance and identification.'' Muḥammad ibn Sinān said: ''One of the reasons of free women (sic) and permission of four women to one man is that they are more (in number) than men. So when [Allāh] saw it — and Allāh knows more — He said: 'then marry such (other) women as seem good to you, two and three and four.' So this is the determination which Allāh has done, to give amplitude to rich and poor, so that man may marry according to his ability ...'' ('Ilalu 'sh-sharā'i')

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said inter alia in a ḥadīth: ''And jealousy is [a characteristic] of men; and for this reason a woman is forbidden (all men) except her husband, and man is allowed four (wives); because Allāh is too gracious to afflict them with jealousy and then allow the man to have three (other wives) with her.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: It may be explained as follows: Jealousy, in the meaning of sense of honour, is a commendable characteristic and noble instinct; it changes equilibrium of man's nature, and it is this emotional agitation that exhorts him to defend what he reveres or holds dear, be it religion, honour or dignity, and provokes him to take revenge on anybody who violates its sanctity. This trait is found — more or less — in every human being, because it is a part of human nature. Now, Islam is a natural religion. It looks at all the natural instincts and traits and moderates them, restricting them to what is good for human life, and omitting that which is not necessary, e.g., the defective and imperfect ways of obtaining or hoarding the wealth, or matters connected with food and drink, clothes and spouses, and so on.

Now suppose that Allāh allowed man to marry three more wives in addition to the one he had before — and we know that this religion pays full attention to the dictates of nature. It follows that what is seen of a woman's reaction when her husband brings another wife, and the change that occurs in her attitude towards her husband, is in fact envy, not jealousy. Further explanation will be given in the forthcoming discourse on polygamy, to show that this reaction of theirs is not a part of their nature, it is an extraneous accident.

Zurārah narrates from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said: ''The man shall not take back whatever he gives in gift to his wife, nor shall she do so regarding whatever she gifts to her husband — whether she was compensated for it or not. Does not Allāh, the Blessed, the High, say: 'and it is not lawful for you to take any part of what you have given them' [2:229]? Again He says: 'but if they of themselves be pleased to give up to you a portion of it, then eat it with enjoyment (and with) wholesome (result)'; and it is applicable to dowry and gift (both).'' (al-Kāfī)

'Abdullāh ibn al-Qaddāḥ narrates from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) who narrates from his Father (a.s.) that he said: ''A man came to the Leader of the faithful (a.s.) and said: 'O Commander of the faithful! I have got stomach pain.' The Commander of the faithful (a.s.) asked him: 'Do you have a wife? He said: 'Yes.' He said: 'Ask her to give you in gift something from her property which she be pleased to give you; then buy with it some honey; then pour on it some rainwater and drink it. Because I have heard Allāh saying in His Book: ''And We send down from the cloud water abounding in good ...'' [50:9]; and He has said: ''There comes forth from within it [i.e., the bee] a beverage of many colours, in which there i s healing for men'' [16:69]; and He says: ''but if they of themselves be pleased to give up to you a portion of it, then eat it with enjoyment (and with) wholesome (result)''. You will be cured, God willing.' '' (The Imām, a.s.) said: ''So he did it and was cured.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: Also as-Suyūṭī has narrated it in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from 'Abd ibn Ḥumayd, Ibn al-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim from the Imām (a.s.). It is a fine inference, and is based on extension of meaning. There are many traditions, based on the same principle, narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.), some of which shall be quoted in appropriate places.

al-Baqīr (a.s.) said: ''When I tell you something, ask me (where it is) in the Book of Allāh.'' Then he said in one of his talks: ''Verily the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has forbidden idle talk, spoiling of property and asking too many questions.'' He was asked: ''Where is it in the Book of Allāh? O Son of the Messenger of Allāh!'' He said: ''Verily Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says: 'There is no good in most of their secret talks except (in his) who enjoins charity or goodness or reconciliation between people.' [4:114]; and He has said: 'And do not give away your property which Allāh has made for you a (means of) support to the weak of understandin'; and He has said: 'do not put questions about things which if declared to you, may trouble you' [5:101].'' (al-Kāfī)

Yūnus ibn Ya'qūb said that he asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, And do not give away your property ... to the weak of understanding'; he said: ''Whom you do not trust.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

Ibrāhīm ibn 'Abdu 'l-Ḥamīd said that he asked the same Imām (a.s.) about the same verse, and he said: ''Anyone who drinks intoxicant is weak of understanding.'' (ibid.)

'Alī ibn Abī Ḥamzah narrates from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.). He says: ''I asked him about the verse, And do not give your property ... He replied: 'They are the orphans; do not give them their property until you recognize maturity of intellect in them.' So I said: 'Then how will their property become our property?' He said: 'If you are their heirs.' '' (ibid.)

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said about this verse: ''So the weak of understanding are the woman and child. When a man knows that his woman is foolish and spoils (the property), and his child is foolish and spoils (the property), he should not give any of them control of his property which Allāh has made for him a support — i.e., a means of livelihood ...'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: There are may traditions on this subject, and they support what we have described earlier that as-safah (اَلسَّفَهُ) has a wide range of meaning, having different grades, like the weak of understanding who is prevented by law to administer his estate, a child before attaining maturity of intellect, a woman who is fond of amusement and fantasy, one who drinks intoxicants, and generally the one whom you do not trust. The implications of giving the property will change with change of context, and so will do the possessive case of ''your property''; you should apply the meanings accordingly.

The Imām's words in the tradition of Ibn Abī Ḥamzah, ''If you are their heirs'', point to the reality we had mentioned earlier that all the property primarily belongs to the whole society, and then it comes to individuals and particular interests secondarily; it is because the whole society primarily shares the property that it is transferred from one person to another.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘Orphanhood of an orphan ends with nocturnal discharge and that is his maturity; and if he got nocturnal discharge, but no maturity of intellect was found in him — he was foolish or weak — then his guardian should hold back his property from him.’’ (Man lā yaḥḍuruh ’l-faqīh)

The same book narrates from the same Imām (a.s.) about the verse, And test the orphans ..., that he said: ‘‘To find the maturity of intellect is protection of property.’’

The author says: We have described earlier how the verse points to this meaning.

The same Imām (a.s.) said about the verse, and whoever is poor, let him eat reasonably: ‘‘He is the man who holds back himself from (earning his) livelihood; there is no harm (for him) in eating [from his ward’s property] reasonably, if he makes (things) better for them (i.e., the wards); but if the property is small then he should not eat anything from it.’’ (Tahdhību ’l-aḥkām)

Aḥmad, Abū Dāwūd, an-Nasā’ī, Ibn Mājah, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and an-Naḥḥās (in his an-Nāsikh) have narrated from Ibn ‘Umar that he said: ‘‘A man asked the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said: ‘I do not have any property, and I have an orphan [under my guardianship].’ (The Prophet) said: ‘Eat from the property of your orphan, (but) not extravagantly nor wastefully; neither consolidating (your) property, nor protecting your property with his property.’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: There are numerous traditions of this theme from the Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.) and others. There are relevant laws of jurisprudence, and also traditions related to them. Anyone who wants them, should look in the collections of taditions and books of jurisprudence.

Rifā‘ah narrates from the Imām (a.s.) about the verse, ... let him eat reasonably, that he said: ‘‘My father used to say that it was abrogated.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

Abū Dāwūd and an-Naḥḥās (both in an-Nāsikh) and Ibn al-Mundhir have narrated through the chain of ‘Aṭā’ from Ibn ‘Abbās about the verse, and whoever is poor, let him eat reasonably, that he said: ‘‘It has been abrogated by (the verse), (As for) those who swallow the property of the orphans unjustly, surely they only swallow fire into their bellies.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: The claim that this verse was abrogated does not agree with the criteria of abrogation. No verse in the Qur’ān could stand vis-a-vis this verse in the way an abrogating verse does with the abrogated one. The verse, (As for) those who swallow the property of the orphans unjustly, surely they only swallow fire into their bellies, does not go against the theme of this verse, because the eating allowed in this verse is conditional to being ‘‘reasonable’’, while the eating forbidden in the other verse is conditional to being unjust; and there is no contradiction between permission to eat reasonably and prohibition to eat unjustly. Therefore, the truth is that the verse is not abrogated, and the two above-mentioned traditions are not in agreement with the Qur’ān — it is apart from their weakness.

‘Abdullāh ibn al-Mughīrah narrates from Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad (peace be on them both) about the words of Allāh, then if you find in them maturity of intellect, make over to them their property, that he said: ‘‘If you see them loving the progeny of Muḥammad, then raise them up in grade.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: It is based on the flow of the Qur’ān, of the esoteric meaning of the Book. The Imāms of the religion are the fathers of the believers; and the believers, when they are unable to reach the Imāms, are orphans of the knowledge. Therefore, if their affiliation to the Ahlu ’l-bayt is established by their love, they should be raised in status and degree by teaching them true knowledge — which is the inheritance of their fathers.

AN ACADEMIC ESSAY IN THREE CHAPTERS

1. Marriage is one of the Goals of Nature

The basic reality of sexual relation between man and woman is most clearly established by human — nay, even animal — nature; Islam being the religion of nature, confirms it without any doubt. Procreation — the goal nature wants to achieve with this union — is the basic factor and the only reason which has transformed cohabitation into marriage, and raised it from mere carnal relation to a durable union. That is why we see that the species of animals in which both parents jointly bring up their offspring — like the birds in their guarding the eggs and feeding and bringing up the chicks, and those animals who need a den or lair for giving birth to and bringing up their offspring and for preparation and protection of which the female needs cooperation of the male — have opted for a constant attachment and exclusive relationship between the male and the female. In this manner they come together, and share the tasks of guarding and hatching the eggs, and this cooperation continues till the chicks grow up and go their own way; then the parents separate (if they separate at all), then a new cycle begins. It shows that the real cause of marriage and the rationale for matrimony is the instinct of procreation and bringing up the children. As for the satisfaction of sexual urge or joining hands in struggle of life, like earning and saving money, preparation of food and drink, obtaining household effects and, in short, managing the domestic life — these things are not a part of the goal of nature; they are mere preliminaries of, or benefits accruing from, marriage.

It is clear from the above that:

Freedom and licentiousness shown by the couples — husband or wife cohabiting with other than his or her spouse without any restraint whenever and wherever he/she desires, like animal world where male mounts female wherever he gets the chance — as is the norm of the day in ‘‘civilized’’ countries; likewise fornication and particularly adultery;

Treating the marriage as a permanent union; and prohibition of divorce and separation, not allowing either party to dissolve the marriage and marrying another spouse — as long as the couple is alive;

Elimination of procreation and refusal to rear children; laying the foundation of marriage-tie on sharing the domestic life, as is prevelant in ‘‘advanced’’ countries; and consequently sending the newborn children to public nurseries established for their nursing and bringing up;

All this goes against the laws of nature. The nature has equipped human being with instincts and organs which totally oppose these ‘‘modern’’ habits, as we have mentioned above.

Of course, there are animals in whose birth and rearing male’s continued presence is not needed. Once the female becomes pregnant, she takes on herself all the duties of pregnancy, and of nursing and rearing the offspring. In such cases there is no natural need of durable union between male and female. Such animals are free to cohabit as and when they feel the urge, to the extent that does not disturb the nature’s aim of preserving the species.

It would be a folly to think that it won’t harm man to disturb the system ordained by creation, to go against the dictates of nature, provided one compensated for the resulting defects with thought and deliberation; and that in this way he would freely enjoy the life and its blessings.

But such thought is nothing short of madness. These natural structures — including the human personality — are composites made of innumerable parts. When each part is kept in its proper place, following the laid down conditions, it creates an overall effect agreeable to the goal of nature, the aim of creation. This effect leads the species to its perfection. It is not unlike the medical mixtures and compounds, which require particular ingredients with especial qualities and prescribed measure and weights, and are dispensed with laid down process; and if changes are made even slightly in its weight or quality it will lose its effects.

Man is a being, naturally created of various parts compounded in a particular way; this especial process results in some inner qualities and psychological characteristics, which in their turn produce various actions and activities. If some of these actions are changed from their natural position, it will badly disturb the alignment of those qualities and characteristics, which in its turn will dislocate all the intrinsic characteristics and qualities from their natural position, will deviate the whole being from the path of nature; this would severe man’s link with his natural perfection, and turn him from the destination the nature was urging him to reach.

If we look at the general calamities mankind is submerged in nowadays, which render people’s endeavours to achieve comfortable and happy life null and void, and which are threatening the humanity with downfall and ruination, we shall find that it has been caused, in the main part, by the total absence of piety, and by the mastery that stupidity and cruelty, violence and greed, have got over human psyche; and the biggest factor in this mastery is this licentiousness and permissiveness, this discarding of natural laws concerning marital responsibilities and rearing of children. The system adopted nowadays for domestic life and for bringing up the children, kills the instincts of mercy and kindness and erases the traits of chastity, modesty and humility from man's psyche, from the first moment of his awareness to his last breath.

Can't we compensate for these deficiencies through our reason and contemplation? Forget it. Reason and understanding, like other faculties of life, is a tool acquired by nature as a means to bring the deviating factors back to the natural path. It is not meant to negate the endeavours of creation and dictates of nature; otherwise it would be tantamount to killing the nature by the very sword it had given in man's hand to defend himself. Moreover, if the reason (a tool of nature) is used to support the depravity and decay of other natural faculties, this tool also would be damaged and misaligned like those others.

We are witnessing today that whenever man tries to remove, through his thinking, one of the catastrophes threatening the society, he opens the gate of a greater and more disastrous calamity; and sufferings and travails extend their tentacles some more.

Someone among these people might say: The psychological traits like chastity, generosity, modesty, kindness and truthfulness, which are called spiritual virtues, are relics of the era of superstition and barbarity; they are not good for the modern advanced man. Chastity puts fetters on man's many desires. Generosity negates man's endeavours for gathering money, and disregards all the troubles he had undergone in earning it; moreover, it encourages the poor to remain idle and degrade himself by begging here and there. Modesty is a bridle that prevents man from freely expressing his ideas or demanding his rights. Kindness weakens the heart; and truth does not agree with demands of today's life.

COMMENT: This talk in itself is an example of the deviated thinking which we have mentioned above. This man is oblivious of the fact that these virtues are essential for a human society; if they are removed, the society cannot remain alive as society even for an hour.

What will happen if these characteristics were removed from the society? Everyone will exceed his limits to snatch others' rights, properties and honour; nobody will offer any help to meet dire needs of society; nobody will feel any shame in breaking the laws of the land; no one will show any mercy to weaker groups — who cannot be held responsible for their weakness — like children and others; everyone will lie to everyone else, giving him wrong information and false promises. The society will disintegrate at once.

This man should understand that these virtues have not gone, nor will they ever go, away from this world. Human nature adheres to them and it will keep them alive as long as it is calling the mankind to live in society. The most important thing is to arrange and moderate these traits, so that they conform with the goal of nature, which invites man to a happy life. If the attitudes reigning nowadays over the advanced societies were really virtuous or truly well-balanced, they would not have pushed the society to such depravity and disaster; instead they would have led mankind to safety and peace, comfort and happiness.

To come back to our original topic: Islam has put the institution of matrimony in its natural place — as we have mentioned earlier. It has allowed marriage and forbidden fornication and illicit sexual relations. It has established the marriage tie, putting up with possibility of its dissolution, that is, divorce; and made this bond exclusive to a certain extent, as we shall explain below. The foundation of this bond was laid on procreation and bringing up the children; there is a well-known saying of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): 'Marry, procreate, increase your number ... ''

2. Domination of Males over Females

Observation of animals' sexual behaviour shows that the males have a sort of domination and authority over the females in this matter. It is as though the male considers himself to be the master of the female, possessing the right to mount her. That is why we see the males fighting each other for the females, but not vice versa; the female does not stand up to fight another female if the male goes to the latter. Likewise, love-rites, the equivalent of proposals in our society, are initiated in animal kingdom by the males, not the females. It only means that the female is by nature aware that in this respect the male is the active and dominant agent, while she is only a passive receiver. Do not be mislead by occasional ingratiating behaviour of the male with the female when he fawns on her by doing whatever would please her; it is but a part of love-play, which he does to heighten the desire and increase the pleasure. But as far as the domination and mastery is concerned, it springs from his virility and its natural function.

The idea that strength and power are inseparable concomitants of the males, and softness and submissiveness, the characteristics of the females, is found more or less in all nations, and has filtered into various linguistic idioms and expressions. They call a tough unbendable thing as ‘‘male’’, and a tender pliable item as ‘‘female’’; e.g., [in Arabic] they say: Male iron, male sword, male grass, male place, and so on.

This idea is generally common to the whole human species, prevalent in different societies and various nations — although there might be some difference in degrees.

Islam has kept this reality in view in its legislation. Allāh says: Men are the maintainers of women, because of that with which Allāh has made some of them to excel the other ... [4:34]. Islam has made it obligatory for a wife to submit to her husband if he wants to cohabit with her — whenever possible.

3. Polygamy

As far as we have observed, the question of ‘‘monogamy or polygamy’’ in the animal world is not definitely settled. In cases where the male and the female have to live together (because the male remains busy whole time in helping his mate in ‘‘domestic’’ affairs, raising the children and looking after them) ‘‘monogamy’’ is the rule, i.e., the female remains exclusively attached to the male. Yet sometimes the system may be changed through skill, planning and guarantee of security, i.e., by domestication and training, as is seen between cock and hens and even pigeons, etc.

Coming to our own species, polygamy was a custom prevalent in most of the ancient nations like Egypt, India, China and Persia; and even Rome and Greece, who supplemented the wife with concubines who lived with her in the same house. Some nations, like the Jews and the Arabs, observed no limit; some married ten, twenty or even more wives; reportedly the king Solomon had married hundred of women.

Mostly, polygamy was prevalent in tribal and other similar communities, like villagers and highlanders. A head of family in such societies always felt a pressing need for a large coterie of followers.

Polygamy was his way of achieving this goal; increased births gave him a large number of sons, who in some years became a force for defending his interests — a necessary part of life in those communities — and raising him to the leadership of the community. Also, the increased number of marriages increased the circle of relatives through affinity.

Some scholars have said that the main factor leading tribesmen or villagers to polygamy was their preoccupation with a lot of back-breaking jobs, like carrying and transporting loads; shepherding and cattle grazing; farming and irrigation; hunting, cooking and weaving; and things like that.

This theory is correct to a certain extent; but contemplation of their psychological traits proves that these factors had a secondary importance in their eyes. What we have mentioned earlier was the primary and basic concern or a nomad. Also it was this factor which led them to gather adopted sons around themselves.

There was one more basic reason which increased the number of wives in those societies, and that was the presence of women in much greater number than men. In those tribal societies battle and war was a never ending phenomenon, as was assasination and murder. Such killings continued to decrease the male population, and women's number increased to a level where the only way to fulfil their natural needs was through polygamy. Think over it.

Islam has ordained marriage with one wife, and allowed marrying upto four, provided the man is able to treat them equitably; it has at the same time taken steps to remove the difficulties and shortcomings found in polygamy, as we shall mention later. Allāh says: and they (women) have rights similar to those upon them in a just manner [2:228].

Objections against Polygamy:

First Objection: It creates evil effects in society. It hurts the feelings of women, frustrates their hopes and stops the fountain-head of love in their hearts. The love is transformed into a desire for revenge. They neglect the household, do not look after children's welfare, and pay their men in their own coin. Thus they indulge in adultery, embezzle their property, and tarnish their honour. The society immediately sinks to the lowest level possible.

Second Objection: Polygamy goes against the system which the nature has obviously established. Census figures, obtained from various communities generation after generation, show that the male and female populations are almost equal. It means that nature provides only one woman for one man. To disturb this balance goes against the nature's programme.

Third Objection: Allowing polygamy encourages men to lust and avidity, and gives boost to such tendencies in society.

Fourth Objection: Polygamy degrades women in society, as it counts four women as equal to one man; and it is an unjust assessment, even from Islamic point of view which treats two women as equal to one man, e.g., in inheritance and evidence, etc. On that basis too, marriage with only two women should have been allowed — not with four. Marriage with four is deviation from justice, however we look at it.

These objections have been written by Christians or by those sociologists who advocate equal rights for both sexes in society.

Reply to the First Objection: We have repeatedly explained that Islam has laid the foundation of human society on rational, not emotional, life. In sociological field, it follows what is good for the society in reason, not what is desired by emotions or feelings.

It does not mean that Islam kills the emotions and feelings, or negates the divine gift of natural instincts. It is accepted in the Psychology that difference in education and training creates difference quantitatively and qualitatively in psychological traits and inner feelings and emotions. For example, many rites and customs that are highly appreciated by the Orientals are looked down upon by the Occidentals, and vice versa. Every community differs from the others in one way or the other.

Religious education and training in Islam raises the woman to a level where her feelings are not injured with such things. Of course, the Western woman has become accustomed since many centuries to being the only wife, and has been taught this idea generation after generation. This has created in her a psychological aversion against polygamy. Proof of this may be found in the shocking licentiousness and promisquity of men and women prevalent in the ‘‘advanced’’ nations nowadays.

Do not their men satisfy their lust with anyone they like and who responds favourably to their advances — no matter whether she is within prohibited degree or outside, is virgin or deflowered, is married or unmarried. It has reached a stage where one cannot find among them a single man or woman in a thousand who has not indulged in illicit sexual relations. Not only that; now they have plunged into sodomy to the extent that no one seems clean of it. The debauchery has become a norm of the day, so much so that just last year it was proposed in the British parliament to legalize the sodomy — after it had spread among them ‘‘illegally’’. As for the women, and especially virgins and spinsters, their affairs are even more amazing and more shocking.

Would that I knew why the women in those countries are not sorry for this state of affairs? Why are they not embarrassed by it? Why are their hearts not broken by it? Why are their feelings not injured when they see all this debauchery from their men? Also, why is the man not annoyed when he marries a girl and finds her deflowered and comes to know that she had already been bedded not only by one or two men? Why does he start boasting in the morning that her bride had been so popular with men that tens, rather hundreds, had vied with each other to win her favours? Why this insensitivity? Is there any reason except that this wantonness and immorality has been going on for so long, and this licentiousness and lasciviousness has so captured their minds, that now it has become a second nature to them; now it neither hurts their feelings nor looks strange or objectionable to them. It is as we had mentioned earlier that the prevalent customs mould the feelings and emotions in their own mould, and do not let them take any other shape.

As for the claim that polygamy makes the women neglect their house, ignore the children’s education and incline towards illicit sexual relations and embezzlement, experience shows hollowness of such talks. This law was ordained and enforced in the early days of Islam, and no scholar of history can claim that it had caused any disturbance in the social order. The reality was poles apart from such claims.

Moreover, the women who marry a man as his second, third or fourth wife — in Islamic or other polygamous societies — enter into marriage contract willingly, with their open eyes. They belong to the same society, they are not captured from other countries, nor have they been brought here for this purpose from outer space. Yet they willingly agree to such marriage for one or the other sociological reason. It follows that woman by nature is not against polygamous marriage; nor are her feelings injured by it. If there is any resentment it should be shown by the first wife; when a woman has remained alone with her husband, she would not like intrusion of another woman in her house, lest her husband show more attachment to the new wife, or the new wife acquire more authority, or differences raise their heads between the two wives' children, or things like that. It shows that unhappiness and resentment, if there be any, springs not from natural disposition, but from an incidental situation, that is, remaining for sometime alone with the husband.

Reply to the Second Objection: The argument by the equality that nature supposedly maintains between numbers of males and females is untenable for many reasons:

1 — Marriage does not depend on equal rates of birth alone; there are many other factors and conditions that control it. First of all, maturity of mind and capability of marriage appears sooner in girls than in boys. Girls, and especially in hot climates, are ready for marriage as soon as they reach the age of nine; while boys do not attain puberty before the age of sixteen (and this is what Islam has kept in view for deciding the age of marriage).

Its evidence may be found in the behaviour prevalent among the girls in the ''civilized'' countries: Rarely does a girl remain virgin upto the age of the ''legal adulthood''; and the only reason is that nature makes her ready for marriage long before bestowing that ability on boys.

Now, let us look at a group of boys and girls born during the last sixteen years — and supposedly both sexes are equal in number. How many marriageable boys will be there in the group? Only those who are sixteen years old, that is, those born in the first year of the period under study. But how many girls of marriageable age will be there in the group? All those who were born from the first to the seventh year of this period [i.e., the marriageable girls will be seven times more than the marriageable boys]. Increase the period under study to twenty-five years (the age when men usually reach their full maturity and strength). How many men and women of marriageable age you get in this group? The men who were born during the first ten years, and the women who were born during the first fifteen years. It gives us an average of two women for each man, by natural law.

2 — Census reportedly shows that expectancy of life is greater in woman than in man. In other words, men die earlier, leaving some women who would remain alone, with no man to marry them if monogamy is to be the rule.[1]

3 — The ability to procreate continues longer in men than in women. Usually women reach menopause at the age of fifty, while men's virility continues for years and years after that. Sometimes his ability to procreate continue to the end of his natural age, i.e., a hundred years. Accordingly a man's reproductive period, about 80 years, would be double of that of a woman (which is about 40 years). This premises in conjunction with the preceding one proves that the creative nature allows the man to marry more than one wife. How can nature bestows the ability to reproduce and then prohibit the use of receptacles suitable for that reproduction? Such contrariness is not the way natural causality works.

4 — The carnages like battles and wars liquidate mainly the male population, compared to which women remain almost unaffected. As mentioned above, it was a strong factor in the spread of polygamy in the tribal societies. If those widows and spinsters are not cared for through polygamous marriages, then what are the alternative available to them? Either fornication or negation and nullification of their natural faculties!

This problem had raised its head in West Germany a few months before writing these lines. There the spinster women spoke about the hardships and difficulties they were facing because they could not find any man free to marry them; they demanded from the government to allow them to contract polygamous marriage — in Islamic manner. The idea was to permit the men to marry more than one wife in order that those spinsters should not be deprived of their natural rights. But the government rejected the demand, and the Church refused to agree — although tacitly they agreed to the spreading of adultery and fornication

[1] It is supported by a report published recently in a newspaper (Iṭṭilā'āt, Tehran, 11th Dey, 1335 A.H. Solar [= 1st January, 1957]), quoting the Census report of France as follows: The census shows that in France 105 boys are born for every 100 girls. Yet the women have a plurality of 1,765,000 over men in a population of about 40 million. The reason for this disparity lies in the fact that the boys have less resistance to diseases than the girls, and consequently by the age of nineteen boys' number decreases by 5 per cent. Then their number continues to decrease upto the age of 25 — 30, and by the time they reach 60 — 65 years of age, only 750,000 males remain alive vis-a-vis 1,500,000 females. (Author's Note) and to the ruining of would-be generation.

5 — Even if we close our eyes from all the above factors, the argument of equality of the numbers of both sexes would stand only if we suppose that every man in the society marries polygamously — upto four wives. But nature has not prepared every man for it; only a few, and not all, can marry more than one wife. Islam has not made it compulsory for every man to enter into many marriages; it has only made it lawful — for him who is able to treat all wives equitably. This permission does not create any difficulty or disturbance; and its clearest proof may be found in the Muslim and other polygamous societies where it has not created any shortage of women and no man fails to find a wife for him. In contrast with that, we find in the monogamous societies thousands of women who are left in the lurch as they cannot find anyone to marry them and provide them a chance to settle in life; their only outlet is fornication.

6 — Apart from that, this objection could only be advanced if Islam had not had provided this rule with checks and balances for keeping it safe from those imaginary defects. Islam has made it compulsory for a man who wants to marry more than one wife to behave with them with justice and equity, to live with them in fairness, and divide the nights between them; it has obliged him to maintain them and their children equitably. Obviously, not every man can easily spend on, let us say, four wives and their offspring, keeping within the circle of justice and fairness in his dealings with them; it may be done only by some of the well-to-do people.

Moreover, there are some lawful Islamic ways which may be used by a woman to encourage and oblige her man not to marry another wife after her.

Reply to the Third Objection: This objection springs from not looking attentively at the Islamic way of education and training or at the goals of this Sharī'ah. The education given to women in an Islamic society — as approved by religion — trains them to keep themselves covered, makes chastity and modesty their second nature, and protects them from breach of decency. Consequently, a Muslim woman grows up with far less sexual desire than is found in a man. This is in spite of common belief that sexual desire in a woman is stronger and greater.

Why has this idea spread? Just because by nature a woman seems more concerned with her adornment and beauty. But the fact is otherwise; and no Muslim man (who has married women grown up in Islamic atmosphere) can have an iota of doubt about it. In reality, an average man's sexual desire far exceeds that of a single woman — even of two or three of them.

Let us look at it from another angle. Islam is very concerned that none should be deprived of necessary natural desires or essential biological demands. From religious point of view, it is not good for a man to dam up his sexual desire and remain frustrated, as it would lead him to indecency and immorality. But a woman remains justifiably incapable of sexual relations for about a third of her married life, e.g., during monthly periods, advanced stages of pregnancy, delivery, breast-feeding and for similar other reasons. But it is necessary to provide for prompt satisfaction of the husband's desire. It is the necessary conclusion of the repeatedly mentioned principle that Islam has laid the society's foundation on rational, not emotional, basis. It is therefore a great danger from Islam's point of view to leave the man unmarried or in his above-mentioned sexual frustration, as it would lead him to lustful thoughts and immoral activities.

Apart from that, the Law-giver of Islam considers it very important that the Muslims should have lots of offspring, in order that the Earth should flourish with goodly prosperity at the hands of a Muslim society, erasing polytheism and mischief from the World.

It is these and similar other considerations which have led the Islam to legalize the institution of polygamy; it was not for spreading lustful ways or encouraging lecherous behaviour. Had our detractors followed the dictates of justice, their own social customs — popular among them who have built their society on the foundation of material enjoyment — more deserving to be accused of spreading immorality and encouraging licentiousness, than the Islam which has based its social order on the foundation of religious bliss and felicity.

Furthermore, just the fact, that man has the permission to marry other wives, pacifies and calms down the avidity, which a sense of deprivation could have agitated. Every deprived one is greedy; when one is forbidden a thing, his mind remains continually busy in devising plans to 'get that thing. Every Muslim — even if he has only one wife — is satisfied and contended that he is not prevented from satisfying his sexual desires if a need arose in future to do so. This in a way calms down his such desires, and protects him from inclining towards indeceny and tarnishing other's honours.

A Western scholar has rightly said that the strongest factor that has contributed in spreading adultery and immorality in the Christian nations is the Church's prohibition of polygamy.[1]

Reply to the Fourth Objection: This allegation is totally unacceptable. We have described in a previous discourse, when writing on the rights of women in Islam [2], that no social system whatsoever — be it religious or secular, ancient or modern — has ever honoured the women as much, and cared for their rights so comprehensively and perfectly, as the Islam has done; and we shall further explain it somewhere else. As for allowing a man to marry more than one woman, it is not intended to be a negation of women's social prestige, nullification of their rights or degradation of their status in life; it is founded on several underlying benefits, some of which have been mentioned above.

A lot of the Western scholars — both men and women — have admitted the goodness and perfectness of this Islamic law, and the social disorder and dangers inherent in prohibition of polygamy. Interested readers should look for their comments in their books.

The strongest argument used by the Western detractors of polygamy, which they offer before their audience with much embellishment, is the condition found in those Muslim families where there are two or more wives. Such houses are devoid of happy life and good living. No sooner do the two rival wives enter the house than they start envying each other.

Mr. Sa'īdī has translated the title of the said work of Davenport as: عذرخواهي به بارگاه محمد و قرآن — which if retranslated into English would mean 'Offering Apology to Muḥammad and the Qur'ān'. He seems unaware of the difference between 'apology for' and 'apology to', and of the fact that the word 'apology' as used in this title, means, explanation or defence of belief", etc. The title, therefore, means 'In Defence of Muḥammad and the Qur'ān'. (People call envy, the disease of rival wives.) Thereafter all the kind of feelings and noble characteristics which are ingrained in woman's nature — love and tender-heartedness, kindness and gentleness, compassion and affection, good advice and looking after husband's honour in his absence, faithfulness and devotion, mercy and sincerity for husband and his children from other women, and care for the house and household — are changed to their opposites. The home — the place intended for man's comfort, where he expects to rest and relax after his daily toils and troubles, when he is dead tired in body and mind after the drudgery of earning his livelihood — is transformed into a battlefield where life and honour, wealth and prestige are freely attacked and violated; nothing is safe from any side; horizon of life becomes cloudy, pleasant existence, a thing of the past. In place of bliss and happiness, appear hitting and slapping, abuse, invective and curse, backbiting and tale-bearing, spying, intrigue and trickery. Children quarrel and dispute with one another. Things sometimes reach a stage where the wife plans to kill the husband, and some children kill the others or even their father. Kinship is metamorphosed into a never ending feud that for generations causes bloodshed, genocide and downfall of the house. Add to it the effects it brings to the society: unhappiness, moral corruption, cruelty, injustice, transgression, indecency and lack of security and trust. [There is also another dimension to this problem,] when you add legality of divorce to the permission of polygamy. These two factors, combined together, create in the society connoisseurs, who live luxurious lives and whose interest is centred on satisfaction of their lust and avidity; their passion revolves around getting this woman and discarding that one, raising one's status and lowering the other's. It is nothing less than thwarting and frustrating a half of the mankind, i.e., the females, and submerging them into sorrow and grief. Their degradation results in depravity of the other half [and the whole society is demoralized].

COMMENT: This was the gist of what they have said, and the objection is true — but its targets are the Muslims, not the Islam or its teachings. When have the Muslims truly followed the Islamic teachings, that Islam could be held responsible for the consequences of their misdeeds? Centuries have passed that there is no good government which could train them with noble teachings of the sharī'ah. On the contrary, the first people to rip apart the curtain put up by the religion, to break the laws of the sharī'ah and to violate its limits were the very Muslim rulers and people in power — and people follow the customs of their rulers. It is not possible to narrate here even a small portion of the life style in the ''Muslims'' Kings' palaces, or the scandals indulged into by the sultans and governors, since the days the religious government turned into monarchy and sultanate; otherwise we will have to write a complete book on this subject. In short, the objection, if valid, can be laid against the Muslims: that they adopted a way of life which could not bring any happiness in their homes, and followed a policy which they could not prevent from deviating from the straight path. The whole blame lies on the men, not on their women or children — although every soul is responsible for what it has earned of sin. Why? Because it was these men's behaviour — they thought nothing of sacrificing their own happiness, and that of their families and children together with the clean environment of the society, on the altar of their greed, lust and ignorance — that was the root cause of all these disasters and fountan-head of all these destructive troubles.

As for the Islam, it has not legislated polygamy as a compulsory and obligatory duty of every man. It looked at the people's nature and at the difficulties some of them faced now and again, and so it concluded that polygamy contained definite goodness [for solving those problems], as was described above in detail. Then it looked minutely at the negative effects of polygamy and its dangers. Consequently, it allowed polygamy for the underlying benefit of humanity, but at the same time imposed such a restiction on it as to remove the chances of all those disgraceful depravities — that the man should be confident that he would live with them in equity and treat them justly and fairly. Islam allows plurality of wives only to him who is sure of himself in this respect. As for those who do not care for their own or their families' and children's happiness and felicity, whose only mark of honour is satisfaction of their stomachs and genitals, and in whose eyes woman is only a means to satisfy man's lust and to give pleasure to him, Islam is not concerned with them, nor does it allow them to marry more than one — if we say that they are allowed to marry even the one, with that mentality of theirs!

Moreover, there is a mix-up in this objection between two completely separate aspects of religion, i.e., the legislation and the governmental authority. It may be explained as follows:

According to modern scholars the criterion to judge about a laid down law or prevalent tradition whether it is a good law and tradition or bad, is to look at the acceptable or unacceptable effects and results obtained from enforcement of that law in the societies, and whether or not the societies in the prevalent condition accept the law faithfully. I do not think they are oblivious of the fact that society sometimes is fettered by some customs, traditions or accidents that do not agree with the law under study; in such a condition, the society should be reformed in a manner as not to hamper or negate the said law or tradition, in order that it may be seen how the law works, and what effect it brings in its wake — whether it is good or bad, beneficial or harmful. The only difference is that their criterion for a laid down law is the currently prevailing desire and demand of the society — whatever that demand may be. Thus what agrees with their current wishes and demands is considered a good law, and what goes against it, is bad.

That is why when those Westerners saw the Muslims wandering in the valley of error, steeped in immorality in this life and wickedness in the next, they attributed to the Islamic sharī'ah (which the Muslims supposedly followed) all the evils found among the Muslims, e.g., falsehood and embezzlement, indecency and usurpation of rights, prevalent transgression and ruined homes, and in short the whole spectrum of corrupted social order. They thought that the Islamic tradition and system is like other social systems in its implementation and effects. The other systems conform with their members' desires and demands. So, those scholars thought that Islam too has the same quality, and that all these social disorders have been generated by Islam; that it is this religion that gives rise to depravity and corruption (and among them are found the most depraved and the most immoral persons; as they say, there are all kinds of game in the belly of the wild ass). Had it been a real religion, and its laid down laws really good and containing people's welfare and felicity, it would have produced good and beautiful effects in the society, instead of becoming a curse for it.

But these people have confused the nature of a good and beneficial law with the nature of a corrupt and harmful people. Islam is a composite unit of spiritual knowledge, moral teachings and practical laws — all of which are interrelated. If one part is damaged or tampered with, the whole is damaged, and its effects are changed. It is not unlike the medical compounds and mixtures which require, for their health-restoring effects, their proper ingredients and a proper place to prepare them. If some ingredients are spoiled or adulterated, or if the directions for its use are not properly followed, it will not bring the desired effect; rather it may produce opposite result [and harm the patient].

At this juncture let us admit, for the sake of argument, that the Islamic system could not reform the people, and could not erase common social vices and depravities — because its legislative base was unsound. But why is it that the democratic system has not succeeded in our eastern countries as it has in Europe? Why is it that the more we try to go ahead on this path the farther back we fall? No one has any doubt that the vices and depravities have taken deeper roots in our society today (when we have become civilized and enlightened) than it was fifty years ago (when we were uncivilized barbarians!). Today our society is devoid of social justice; we trample on human rights; we do not give higher education to our masses; and we lack all the social benefits and blessings — for us these are merely names without substance, words without meaning.

Ask them the reason, and they will say: This good system has not worked among you because you have not really put it into practice, have not tried to implement it properly. Well, why this excuse is acceptable in case of democracy, but not in case of Islam?

Let us suppose that Islam, because of the weakness of its foundation (God forbid!), could not capture the people's hearts and could not take deep roots in the society; and consequently its rule could not continue, it lost its vitality in the Muslims' social order and was discarded at the first opportunity. But why did the democratic system — the universally appreciated system — go away, after the World War I, from Russia? Why were its traces lost there? Why was it replaced by the communist system? Again, why did it give way, after the World War II, to the communist system in China, Lithuania, Estonia, Albania, Rumania, Hungary, Yugoslavia, etc.? Why does it pose a danger to other countries, after having established considerable influence in them?

Now let us look at the communist system. It flourished for about forty years; and spread to, and ruled over, nearly half of the mankind. Its rulers and champions are never tired of boasting of its excellence and superiority. According to them it is the only clean stream that is unpolluted by dictatorial tendencies and democracy's exploitation; the countries where it has taken roots have turned into Utopia. If this claim is correct, then why did the same rulers and champions, some two years back, stand up to condemn the rule of its matchless leader, Stalin, who had led and governed Russia for thirty years? Why did they announce that his rule was despotic and dictatorial, and that it was nothing but enslavement in the guise of communism? Everyone agrees that Stalin had great influence in legislation of the laid down laws and their enforcement and all that follows. In other words, all this was produced by the will of an enslaving dictator; it was a one man's rule, which revived thousands and killed thousands; made some people happy and kept others oppressed, deprived and unhappy. Only Allāh knows who will come after these [present rulers] to condemn them as they had done with their predecessors.[1]

Look into history books and you will find mention of a lot of systems, civilizations and cultures that governed the societies for sometime; some were good, others bad; then they passed away because of various factors — the strongest being the treachery of the leaders and feeble will of the masses.

Would that I knew what is the difference between Islam (as a social system) and those other transformed and changed systems, that the excuse [of leaders' treachery and followers' weak-willedness] is accepted in their case and rejected in the case of Islam? Yes, today the word of truth has fallen between a formidable western might and an imitative eastern ignorance; neither any sky shelters over it nor any earth raises it up. However, it should be clear from what we have mentioned above that whether a system is effective or not, and whether its hold on the people remains strong or it loosened, depends not so much on its correctness or incorrectness — so that this aspect could be used to prove its truth or falsity. It is rather affected by so many other causes and reasons. There was not a single system in the long human history but it produced results for sometimes and then became barren; it ruled over the society for a stretch of time and then passed away — all this for some factors acting for or against it; and We bring these days to men by turns, and that Allāh may know those who believe and takes witnesses from among you [3:140].

In short, the Islamic sharī'ah and its laws differ in their fundamental philosophy from all other social orders prevalent in various human societies. These [man-made] social systems go on changing with change of times and policies, but not so the Islamic laws. The Islamic laws — consisting of obligatory, prohibited, like, disliked and permissible — never change. Of course, those actions which a person has the choice to do or not to do, and every disposition which he has right to enact or leave, the Islamic ruler has got authority to order the people to do it or forbid them doing it; he can dispose such matters as if the society were a single body and the ruler its thinking mind and soul.

Had there been an Islamic ruler there, he could have prevented the people from the inequities and injustices they commit in the name of polygamy or for other pretexts, without affecting any change in the divinely given permission. It would have been a general executive order based on an underlying benefit, just as a man might decide for his personal reasons not to marry more than one wife — not because the rule had changed but because it was only a permission which he had full right not to avail himself of.

ANOTHER RELATED ACADEMIC DISCOURSE ON MANY MARRIAGES OF THE PROPHET

Another target of their objection is the many marriages of the Prophet. They say: Plurality of marriage in itself points to avidity and to yielding to lust and desire; and the Prophet was not content with four wives which he had allowed to his ummah, but exceeded even that limit and married nine women.

This question is related to many different verses of the Qur'ān, and detailed discussion of its every aspect should be given under those verses. Therefore, we are leaving the details for the relevant places, restricting ourselves to a short description here in a general way.

It is necessary to point out that the plurality of the Prophet's marriages is not such a simple matter as to be dismissed in a sentence that ‘he was inordinately fond of women, so much so that he married nine wives.’ The fact is that he had married each one of his wives for some particular reason in particular circumstances during his long life. His first marriage was with Khadījah (may Allāh be pleased with her), and he lived with her alone for more than twenty [1] years, and it constitutes two-thirds of his married life — and covered [almost] the whole Meccan period of the prophethood. Then he emigrated to Medina and began spreading the Call and raising the words of religion. Thereafter he married several women — virgin and widows, young, old and middle-aged. This continued for about ten years, then the women were prohibited to him other than those who were already in his marriage. Obviously, these happenings with this peculiarities cannot be explained just by love of women or desire and passion for them, because his early life and the later period both contradict this assumption.

Just look at a man with a passion for women who is infatuated with carnal desire, and enamoured of female companionship, with a sensual lust for them. You will find him attracted to their adornment, spending his time in pursuit of beauty, infatuated with coquetry and flirtation, and craving for youth, tender age and fresh complexion.

But these peculiarities were diametrically opposite of the Prophet’s character. He married widows after virgin, old-aged women after young girls. He married Umm Salamah (an aged woman) and Zaynab bint Jaḥsh (who was more than fifty years of age) after marrying ‘Ā’ishah and Umm Ḥabībah, and so on.

Then he offered his wives a choice that he should give them a provision and allow them to depart gracefully (i.e., divorce them) if they desire this world and its adornment, or they should renounce the world and abstain from adornments and embellishments if they desired Allāh and His Messenger and the latter abode. It may be seen in the following words of Allāh: O Prophet! say to your wives: ‘‘If you desire this world’s life and its ornature, then come, I will give you a provision and allow you to depart a goodly departing. And if you desire Allāh and His Messenger and the latter abode, then surely Allāh has prepared for the doers of good among you a mighty reward’’ [33:28 — 29]. As you see this is not the attitude of a man who is enamoured of women’s love and infatuated with carnal desire.

If a scholar, after deeply studying this matter, follows the dectates of justice, he will have to look for some reasons, other than avidity and lust, for his plurality of wives, beginning with his early life to the latter days.

In fact he (s.a.w.a.) had married some of them to add to his strength by increasing relationships and helping hands; some of them were taken into marriage to win the enemies' hearts and as a protection from some of their evils. He married some others to maintain and protect them, in order that it might become a regular practice among the believers for the protection of widows and aged women against poverty and degradation. Some marriages were performed to practically affirm and enforce a lawful order, for abolition of evil traditions and false innovations which were prevalent in the society. This was the case of his marriage with Zaynab bint Jaḥsh; she was first married to Zayd ibn Ḥārithah, then Zayd divorced her; this Zayd was called ''son of the Messenger of Allāh'' by the [pre-Islamic] custom of adoption; the pagans considered wife of an adopted son like the wife of an actual son and the ''father-in-law'' could not marry her. Therefore the Prophet married her [to confirm abrogation of adoption and the related customs], and several verses were revealed on this subject.

The first woman to be married to the Prophet after the death of Khadījah, was Sawdah bint Zam'ah, whose husband had expired after returning from the second migration of Abyssinia. Sawdah was a believing lady who had migrated [for her faith]. If she were left to return to her own family who at that time were unbelievers, they would have tortured and tormented her as they were doing with other believing men and women using suppression and killings and forcing them to renounce their faith.

He married Zaynab bint Khuzaymah after her husband, 'Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh, was martyred in Uḥud. She was one of the most generous ladies even in the era of ignorance, and was called ''Mother of the poor'', in recognition of her generosity and kindness towards needy people. The Prophet, with this marriage, preserved her prestige and dignity.

He also married Umm Salamah, whose actual name was Hind. Before that, she was married to 'Abdullāh Abū Salamah, who was a cousing of the Prophet (son of his paternal aunt) and his foster brother; Abū Salamah [and his wife] were among the first to emigrate to Abyssinia.

She had renounced the worldly pleasure and was highly distinguished in piety and wisdom. When her husband died she was very advanced in age and had many orphan children. That is why the Prophet married her.

Ṣafiyyah was daughter of Ḥuyayy ibn Akhṭab, the chief of Banū 'n-Naḍīr. Her husband was killed in the battle of Khaybar, and her father with Banū Qurayẓah, and she was among the captives of Khaybar. The Prophet chose her for himself and married her after emancipating her. With this marriage he protected her from humilitation and established affinity with the Children of Israel.

The marriage with Juwayriyyah, i.e., Barrah, daughter of al-Ḥārith, the chief of Banū 'l-Muṣṭaliq, was performed after the battle of Banū 'l-Muṣṭaliq. The Muslims had arrested two hundred of their families together with women and children. The Prophet married Juwayriyyah; so the Muslims said: ''These are the relatives of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) by marriage; they should not be held captives.'' So they freed all of them. Impressed by this nobility, the whole tribe of Banū 'l-Muṣṭaliq entered into the fold of Islam. It was a very large tribe, and this [generosity of the Muslims as well as the Islam of that tribe] created a good impression throughout Arabia.

One of his wives was Maymūnah, whose name was Barrah bint al-Ḥārith al-Hilāliyyah. She was the one who gifted herself to the Prophet after the death of her second husband, Abū Ruhm ibn 'Abdi 'l-'Uzzā (al-'Āmirī). The Prophet then married her, and a verse was revealed regarding her marriage.

Also he married Umm Ḥabībah, i.e., Ramlah daughter of Abū Sufyān. She was married to 'Ubaydullāh ibn Jaḥsh and had emigrated with him to Abyssinia in the second Migration. While there, 'Ubaydullāh was converted to Christianity, but she remained steadfastly on Islam; while her father, Abū Sufyān, in those days, was gathering army after army to annihilate the Muslims. Therefore, the Prophet married her and afforded protection to her.

Ḥafṣah bint 'Umar was married to him after her husband, Khunays ibn Ḥudhāfah, was killed in Badr, and she was left a widow.

And he married 'Ā'ishah bint Abī Bakr, and she was a virgin.

When one looks at these details, and ponders on what we have mentioned above regarding the Prophet's life from his early days to the end, and on his self-denial and rejection of worldly embellishments, and his exhortation to his wives to do the same, one can have no doubt that the marriages which he had contracted with these women were not like those done by other people. And to it the benevolence with which he treated the womanhood, revived their rights which the centuries of ignorance and barbarism had put to sleep, and restored their prestige and honour in the society. [He was so much concerned with women's welfare that] reportedly the last words he uttered were addressed to the men about their women. He had said: ''(Be careful about) prayer, (be careful about) prayer; and (about) what your right hands possess, do not impose on them what they have no strength for; (fear) Allāh, (fear) Allāh about the women, because they are helpless in your hands ...''

His behaviour was matchless in dealing equitably with his wives, living with them gracefully and paying regard to their feelings and wishes (as we shall describe some aspects of it when writing on his characteristics in the coming discourses, God willing.) As for the permission to marry more than four, it was, like the fasting continuously for two days without any break at night, an order exclusively reserved for the Prophet — the ummah was prohibited it. It was these especial characteristics — and the fact that all people were clearly aware of them — that did not have any room for objection to his enemies, although they were always on the look out for some openings to attack him.

COMMENTARY

Now begins the legislation of inheritance laws, after paving the way for it. These verses give a precis of the said laws in its basic form, to let the people know that nobody can be deprived of inheritance after the proof of his birth or relation, as they used to debar minor heirs and women. Further it warns them against depriving the orphans from inheritance, as it would result in swallowing by others heirs of the orphans' share unjustly, and Allāh has very severely prohibited it. The verses also recommend giving something from the estate to relatives, orphans and poor who, although not included among the heirs, might be present at the time of dividing the property.

QUR'ĀN: Men shall have a share ... a decreed share. ''an-Naṣīb'' (اَلنَّصِيْبُ = share, portion) is derived from an-naṣb (اَلنَّصْبُ = to make something stand, to lift up, to raise); this name points to the fact that at the time of division, every share is put separately to prevent its mixing with the others'. at-Tarikah (اَلتَّرِكَةُ = the heritage, the property left by the deceased); it is as though he goes away leaving it; thus initially it was an allegorical usage, then became common. al-Aqrabūn (اَلْاَقْرَبُوْنَ = the nearer ones) refers to nearer relatives; choice of this word [of comparative degree] in preference to al-aqribā' (اَلْاَقْرِبَاءُ = the near ones) and ulu 'l-qurba (أُولُوالْقُرْبٰي = relatives) , etc., gives an indication that it is the essential pre-requisite of inheritance that the deceased should be nearer to the heir, as will be explained under the verse, your parents and your children, you know not which of them is nearer to you in usefulness [4:11]. al-Farḍ (اَلْفَرْضُ) originally meant to cut a hard thing and to detach its parts from one another; that is why it is used for obligatory rules, because to follow and obey it is ''determined'' without any doubt; ''a decreed share'' means a determined and fixed portion or ratio.

The verse ordains a comprehensive law and legislates a new system which was unfamiliar to the people. The people had never known any system similar to this inheritance law, as ordained in Islam. Traditionally they used to deprive many heirs of inheritance, and it had become a second nature to them; so much so that if anything was said against it, the minds were agitated and feelings hurt.

Islam paved the way for this new system, first by strengthening the ‘‘love in Allāh’’ and giving perference to religion among the believers. Thus it established ‘‘brotherhood’’ between the believers and then made one ‘‘brother’’ inherit the other. This wiped out the previous succession rules, and the believers abondoned the old pride and prejudice. When the religion became strong and could stand on its feet, this final system of inheritance between the relatives was introduced — at a time when they were enough believers to accept this law with open arms.

The above discussion shows that this verse aims at clear description, and removal of all possible misunderstandings, by giving a fundamental and comprehensive basis of the law. Thus it says: ‘‘Men shall have a share of what the parents and the near relatives leave.’’ The rule is general and unrestricted, it is not qualified by any condition, attribute or other such things. Likewise the subject, i.e., ‘‘men’’, is general and not qualified in any way; therefore the minors shall inherit like the adults.

Then it says: ‘‘and women shall have a share of what the parents and the near relatives leave.’’ Like the preceding sentence it is a general statement, without any shade of restriction; thus it covers all women without any qualification or condition. The clause, ‘‘of what the parents and the near relatives leave’’, has been repeated, although it could be replaced by a pronoun; the reason is to make the topic as clear as possible. It is followed by the clause, ‘‘whether there is little or much of it’’; it makes the matter even more clear, and shows that there is no room for any indulgence or negligence in this matter thinking that the deceased’s estate was very small or the value negligible. The verse ends on words, ‘‘a decreed share’’; it is a circumstantial clause, related to the preceding word, ‘‘a share’’, as it contains a connotation of masdar; it gives a double emphasis and makes the declaration even more clear that the shares are definitely fixed, and there is no room for any confusion or ambiguity.

It has been proved with this verse that the general law of inheritance covers the estate of the Prophet as well as of other Muslims, and that the doctrine of at-ta‘ṣīb (اَلتَّعْصِيْبُ = giving preference of agnates) is invalid.

QUR’ĀN: And when there are present ... kind words: Apparently the verse refers to these people’s presence at the time when the heirs are dividing the estate among themselves, and not to their presence near the dying person when he is bequeathing his estate — as someone has written.

Accordingly, ''the relatives'', would refer to the poor among them; it is also proved from the fact that they have been mentioned with the orphans and the needy. The tone of the clauses, ''give them (something) out of it and speak to them kind words,'' obviously exhorts the hearers to mercy and kindness, and therefore it is addressed to the heirs and executors of the will.

There is a difference of opinion whether the order given in this verse (to give those people something from the estate) is obligatory or only a desirable act. It is a matter of jurisprudence beyond the scope of this book. Also there is disagreement whether the verse is decisive or has been abrogated by the verse of inheritance. But the relation between the two verses is not that of contradiction, because the verse of inheritance fixes the shares of the heirs, and this verse speaks about the non-heirs — either as obligation or recommendation — without fixing any share; therefore there is no ground for saying that it was abrogated, and especially if the described ''giving'' is only a recommendation — as the verse somewhat apparently shows.

QUR'ĀN: And let those fear ... speak right words: Fear is a psychological effect caused by nearness of a somewhat great danger or evil; as-sadād and as-sadad (اَلسَّدَادُ،السَّدَدُ) of a talk means its being right, correct, straight, relevant.

Probably the verse has a sort of connection with the previous one, ''Men shall have ...'', because that verse with its generality contains the laws of the orphans' inheritance; now this one in a way is a warning and a threat to him who wants to follow the old system of depriving small heirs of inheritance. In that case, the clause, ''and let them speak right words'', will be an adverse and unfavourable allusion to their habit as they did not give any share to, and swallowed the rights of, the minor orphans. The allegorical use of ''word'' for ''deed'' is very common because of their mutual association. Allāh has said: ... and speak to men good (words) ... [2:83]. This idea is also supported by the use of the adjective, ''right'' for ''words'' instead of ''kind'' or ''gentle''; apparently a word may be called right when it can be believed and acted upon — not when it can only preserve people's dignity and honour.

In any case, the clause, ''And let those fear who, should they leave behind them weakly offspring, would fear on their account'', is obviously a simile to animate and stimulate mercy and compassion for small weakly children who have lost their guardian and protector (who could have looked after their welfare and saved them from humiliation and disgrace). The implied threat and warning is not directed to only him who may at the material time be actually having some weakly offspring; it uses the conjuction law (لَوْ = if) [which as a rule introduces hypothetical conditional clauses], and does not say, 'should they leave behind their weakly offspring'. It is rather a simile to present a clear image of the situation. The connotation therefore would be as follows: Let those fear who have in their hearts mercy for humanity and compassion and sympathy for those weakly small children who have lost their fathers and are orphaned — only such people are real Muslims who are imbued with divine characteristics and graced with Allāh's manners. In other words: Let those people fear and be afraid of Allāh in matters of the orphans, because they are like their own orphans, small and weak; the people must fear for them and care for their welfare; these helpless children should not be oppressed nor their rights usurped. The style is the same as we say: ''Let him who fears dishonour and humiliation, try his level best to earn his livelihood'' — and who does not fear it?

People have not been ordered here to show mercy and compassion, etc.; they have been told to fear and be afraid of Allāh. It is a threat that whatever they do to other people's orphans by usurping their rights and swallowing their property unjustly, would befall their own orphans after them; whatever misfortunes and miseries they cause to others' orphans would return to their own orphans after their passing away.

As for the clause, ''so let them fear Allāh and let them speak right words'', we have already explained that apparently the ''words'' connotes practical behaviour; also possibly it may mean views, ideas and advice.

THE DEED RETURNS TO ITS DOER

Whoever deals unjustly with an orphan in his property, his injustice will surely return to his own orphans, to the orphans from his offspring. It is one of the marvellous Qur'ānic realities. It branches from a divinely revealed reality that there is a connection between the good and bad deeds and the natural phenomena. We have thrown some light on it while discussing the Rules Governing Actions in the second volume of this book. [1]

People, on the whole, believe that man reaps what he sows, that he harvests the fruits of his deeds; a benevolent good-doer gets bliss and felicity in his life, while an oppressive evil person has to taste the evil consequences of his misdeeds. There are many verses in the Qur'ān which prove this fact with their unrestricted style. Allāh says:

Whoever does good, it is for his own soul, and whoever does evil, it is against it [41:46].

So, he who has done an atom's weight of good shall see it. And he who has done an atom's weight of evil shall see it [99:7 — 8].

He said: ''I am Yūsuf and this is my brother; Allāh has indeed been gracious to us; surely he who guards (against evil) and is patient (is rewarded) for surely Allāh does not waste the reward of those who do good'' [12:90].

... for him is disgrace in this world ... [22:9].

And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought [42:30].

There are many such verses which show that good and evil deeds react on, and return to, their doer in this world too.

Our thoughts are conditioned by our experiences in the society; and when we hear such statements, the first thought that comes to our minds is that the doer himself reaps the fruits of his actions. But there are verses that show that the affair is much wider and more encompassing; that man's deeds — good or bad — sometimes return to his progeny. Allāh says: And as for the wall, it belonged to two orphan boys in the city, and there was beneath it a treasure belonging to them, and their father was a righteous man; so your Lord desired that they should attain their maturity and take out their treasure, a mercy from your Lord [18:82]. It is obvious from the verse that their father's righteousness had had some hand in what Allāh intended for them as a mercy from Him. On the other hand, Allāh says in the verse under discussion: ''And let those fear who, should they leave behind them weakly offspring, would fear on their account.''

Therefore, the matter of deeds' effects is wider and more general; and the blessing of misfortune that befalls a man results sometimes from his own actions and sometimes from what his progenitors had done.

Meditation on the divine words leads us to the basic cause of this phenomenon. We have described in the second volume [1] on the topic of Invocation, under the verse: And when My servants ask you concerning Me, then verily I am very near [2:186], that according to the divine words, whatever comes to man from Allāh is because of an invocation which he addresses to his Lord; whatever preliminaries and causes a servant prepares, are in reality a sort of supplication and invocation addressed by him to his Lord; and it brings to him the effects and results from the Lord. Allāh says: All those who are in the heavens and the earth do beseech Him; every day He is in a (new) state (of glory) [55:29]; And He gives you of all that you ask Him; and if you count Allāh's bounties, you will not be able to number them [14:34]. It should be noted that Allāh has not said, 'and if you count it, you will not be able to number it.' [In other words, He has not used pronouns which would refer to all that they had asked for and was consequently given to them by Allāh; instead, He has used the clear expression, ''Allāh's bounties''] because not all that they had [practically] asked for was a bounty (and the verse aims at showing His favours to them and admonishing them for their ungratefulness]; that is why He mentioned only a part of what they had asked for, and that is the bounties.

Whatever man opts for himself, or whatever he does to another person — whether good or bad — shows that he is pleased that it should befall the other person who is a human being like himself. In this way he practically asks for that thing for himself and shows his pleasure that it should befall him — because he too is a human being like his victim. It clearly means that when a man does good to someone else, he in reality asks Allāh to do exactly the same good to himself — an invocation that is bound to be answered and cannot be rejected. Also when he does an evil or injustice to someone, he in effect asks for it for himself and shows his pleasure with it. Thus whatever he is pleased to do with others' children and orphans, in effect he is pleased that it be done to his own children, and practically asks it to be done to his own orphans — be it good or bad.

Allāh says: And every one has a direction to which he would return; therefore hasten to (do) good works [2:148]; i.e., hasten towards good works so that your direction should be good.

All human beings have a common blood in their veins and have come out from the same womb. It makes the descent, i.e., progeny, a single unit. Whatever condition affects any side of this unit, and whatever misfortune befalls it, in reality affects and befalls the main body and reaches through it to all sides [including the doer's]. We have thrown some light on womb (relationship) at the beginning of this chapter.

Now it is clear without any doubt that whatever a man does to another person or to that person's progeny, is bound to come back to him or his progeny, except that Allāh should decide otherwise. We have inserted this exception because there are many causes and factors affecting one's existence which we are not even aware of, and possibly some of them might exert an opposite influence on one's affairs. Some hint of it may be found in the divine words, And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hand have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults) [42:30].

QUR'ĀN: (As for) those who swallow the property of the orphans unjustly, surely they only swallow fire into their bellies and soon they shall enter burning fire: The sentences, 'He swallowed it', and, 'He swallowed it into his belly', both have the same meaning, but the latter is clearer and more emphatic. This verse too, like the preceding one, is related in theme with the opening sentence, ''Men shall have a share ...'' It threatens people and deters them from swallowing the orphans' shares of inheritance.

The verse is one of those which prove embodiment of deeds, as was explained in the first volume [1], under the verse: Surely Allāh is not ashamed to set forth any parable ... [2:26]. Perhaps it is this idea which an exegete had in mind when he wrote that the words, ''surely they only swallow fire into their bellies'', have been used in their literal, not metaphorical, sense. Another exegete has unjustifiably taken exception to this statement. He has said: The verb, ''they only swallow'', is used here as a present, not future, tense, because the future is described by the subsequent clause, ''and soon they shall enter burning fire''. (Note the word, ''soon''.) Now if swallowing the fire is taken in its literal meaning — and it is to happen on the Day of Resurrection — then this sentence too should have contained the word, ''soon''. Therefore, the clause is, in fact, used in allegorical sense and means that in swallowing the orphans' property they resemble someone who swallows fire into his belly.

This is the gist of his objection; but it shows that the objector was oblivious of the import of embodiment of deeds.

The end clause, ''and soon they shall enter burning fire'', points to the chastisement in the hereafter. ''as-Sa'īr'' (السَّعِيْرُ = burning fire) is one of the names of the fire of the hereafter; [yaṣlawna, يَصْلَوْنَ = translated here as ''they shall enter'', is derived from] ṣaliya 'n-nār, yaṣlā, ṣalyan (صَلِيَ النَّارَيَصْلي صَلْيًا i.e., he broiled and burned into fire; he underwent ordeal of fire).

TRADITIONS

Majma 'u 'l-bayān says about the verse, Men shall have a share of what the parents and the near relatives leave: ''People have two views about this verse; one is that it is decisive and not abrogated; and this has been narrated from al-Bāqir (a.s.).''

The author says: It is narrated from at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī that this verse was abrogated by the verse, Allāh enjoins you concerning your children ... But there is no justification for this view. We have explained in the above Commentary that this verse gives a precis of the coming inheritance laws; and there is no contradiction at all between this and the other decisive verses of inheritance, so that it could be said to have been abrogated.

Ibn Jarīr, Ibn al-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from 'Ikrimah about this verse: ''It was revealed about Umm Kulthūm and daughter of Umm Kuḥlah or Umm Kuḥḥah herself and Tha'labah ibn Aws and Suwayd (all of them from the Anṣār). One was her husband and the other the paternal uncle of her child. She said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! My husband died leaving me and his daughter, but we were not given anything from his inheritance.' The uncle of her child said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! (How can she get his inheritance when) she neither rides a horse nor attacks an enemy, and while she needs others to earn for her and she does not earn? Then the verse was revealed: Men shall have a share ... (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: Some other traditions say that it was revealed about a man from the Anṣār who died leaving two daughters. Then his two cousins came and they were his agnates [to take his inheritance]. His wife told them: ''Marry these two (girls)'' — and they were not beautiful. So they refused. Then she brought the matter before the Messenger of Allāh (s.s.w.a.); then the verses of inheritance were revealed ... As we have repeatedly said, there could be more than one reason for revelation of a verse.

Majma'u 'l-bayān says about the verse, And when there are present ...''People have two different opinions about this verse; one is that it is decisive, not abrogated, and it is narrated from al-Bāqir (a.s.).'' ash-Shaybānī says that the above is narrated from both al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (peace be on them). (Nahju 'l-bayān)

The author says: Some traditions say that it is abrogated by the verses of inheritance; but we have mentioned earlier that it is not repealable.

Abū Abdillāh and Abu 'l-Ḥasan (peace be on them) have said: ''Allāh has threatened two punishments concerning the orphan's property: One is the punishment of the hereafter, (and that is) the fire; and as for the other, it is the punishment of this world, (and it is) His words: And let those fear who, should they leave behind them weakly offspring, would fear on their account; so let them fear Allāh and let them speak right words.'' (Then) he said: ''He means that he should fear that Allāh would requite him in his offspring as he had done with these orphans.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: A similar tradition is narrated in al-Kāfī from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.), and in Ma'āni 'l-akhbār from al-Bāqir (a.s.).

‘Abd ’l-A‘lā, mawlā (freed-slave) of Āl Sām, says: ‘‘Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) said (without anybody asking him): ‘Whoever does injustice, Allāh shall give someone power over him, who will oppress him; or over his children or over his grandchildren.’ So I thought and said in my heart: ‘Injustice is committed by him and someone is imposed on his children and grandchildren?!’ The Imām then said to me before I could speak: ‘Surely Allāh says: ‘‘And let those fear who, should they leave behind them weakly offspring, would fear on their account; so let them fear Allāh, and let them speak right words.’’ ’ ’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd has narrated from Qatādah that he said: ‘‘We have been told that the Prophet of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Fear Allāh regarding to weaklings: the orphan and the woman; (Allāh) made him orphan, then urged (people) to take care of him; and put him to test, and put (others) to test through him.’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: There are a lot of almost mutawātir traditions narrated through the chains of both sects, in condemnation of swallowing the orphan’s property, showing that it is a major and mortal sin.

In the Name of Allāh,
The All-compassionate, The All-merciful

Praise belongs to Allāh, the Lord of all being;
the All-compassionate, the All-merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement;
Thee only we serve, and to Thee alone we pray for succour;
Guide us in the straight path;
the path of those whom Thou hast blessed,
not of those against whom Thou art wrathful,
nor of those who are astray.

FOREWORD

1. al ‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī (1321/1904 — 1402/1981) may Allāh have mercy upon him — was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān.

2. al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzān fī tafsīri ’l-Qur’ān which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allāmah has achieved in the Islamic world

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzān because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustādh al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task, because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and its discussions.

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the eighth volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān. This volume corresponds with the second half of the fourth volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allāh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendixes included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of -the English translation of al Mīzān: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

* * * *

We implore upon Allāh to effect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work which we have started. May Allāh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: Allāh enjoins you concerning your children: The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females;: ''al-Īṣā' '' and ''at-tawṣiyah'' (اَلْإِيْصَآءُ،اَلتَّوْصِيَةُ = to entrust, to enjoin); ar-Rāghib says in Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān: ''al-Wasiyyah (اَلْوَصِيَّةُ) = to direct someone — with a shade of exhortation — to do something.'' The use of the word al-awlād (اَلْاَوْلَادُ = children) instead of al-abnā' (اَلْاَبْنَآءُ = sons) shows that the rule of one or two shares is restricted to the deceased's immediate children. As for the children's children, how low so ever, they should get the share'of their progenitor through whom they are connected to the deceased; thus a son's daughter would get two shares while a daughter's son would be given one share — provided there is no one nearer to take their precedence. Likewise, the offspring of brothers and sisters would get the share of him or her through whom they are connected to the deceased. [All this is inferred from the word, al-awlād whose root word signifies birth.] But the word, al-ibn (اَلِابْنُ = son) does not necessarily mean immediate child, as the word, al-ab (اَلْاَبُ = father) may be used in a general sense for other than the immediate progenitor.

As for the divine words at the end of the verse: your parents and your children, you know not which of them is the nearer to you in usefulness, we shall explain later that there is a special consideration which has made the word, al-abnā' (اَلْاَبْنَآءُ = lit. sons) preferrable to al-awlād (اَلْاَوْلَادُ = children).

The expression, ''The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females'', was chosen to point to the nulification of the system prevalent in the era of ignorance whereby women were not given any share in inheritance. This expression takes the females's share as granted and confirmed,and based the male's share on it — that it is double of it. Or let us say that the female's share is treated as the yardstick of legislation and the male's share is fixed with its help. If it were not for this consideration, it could simply be said: the female shall have the half of the male's share; but it would not have given that connotation, and the context would have changed — as you may see. This theme has been mentioned by a scholar and the point seems well-established. The idea is also strengthened by the fact that the verse does not describe explicitly and independently except the women's shares; if and when it explains some of men's shares it is always done as an adjunct to the women's shares, as may be seen in the following verse and in the verse at the end of this chapter.

In short, the statement, ''The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females'', explains the beginning clause ''Allāh enjoins you concerning your children''. The definite article in ''the male'' and ''the two females'' denotes genes or category, i.e., the category of male is equal in share to the two of the female category. This principle shall be applied when there are males and females among the heirs, as the male shall have twice the share of a female. The verse did not use such expressions as, ''The male shall have equal to two shares of a female'', or, ''double of a female's share''; because the chosen expression explains also the share of two females when they are the only heirs, as will be explained later — and all this with such brevity.

In any case, when there are males and females among the heirs, every male shall have two shares and every female one share — no matter what their number may be.

QUR'ĀN: then if they are more than two females, they shall have two-thirds of what (the deceased) has left,: This sentence, coming after the preceding one, The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females, apparently shows that it is in conjunction with a deleted but understood clause, i.e., 'This law is when there are males and females among the heirs', but if they are more than two females ... Such deletion is common in usage. For example, look at the following two verses:

> And complete the ḥajj and 'umrah for Allāh, but if you are prevented, (send) whatever offering is easy to obtain (2:196).
> For a counted number of days; but whosoever among you is sick or on a journey, then (he shall fast) a (like) number of other days (2:184).

The conjunctive personal pronoun hidden in the verb kunna (كُنَّ = they are) refers to the 'children' (in the phrase, ''your children''); the feminine gender has been used to make it agree with the predicate 'females'; the other such pronoun hidden in the verb, ''has left'', refers to 'the deceased', which is understood from the context.

QUR'ĀN: and if there is one, she shall have the half,: The pronoun refers as above to the ‘‘the child’’, understood from the context, and its feminine form agrees with the predicate; ‘‘the half’’ refers to the half of what the deceased has left — thus the definite article stands for the second construct of the genitive case.

The verse is silent about the share of two females, because it may be understood from the clause: The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females. Let us suppose there is a male and a female heir; according to this verse, the female shall have a third of the estate and the male, the two-thirds — as it is the share of the two females. In other words, two females shall have two-thirds of the inheritance. This much may be inferred from the verse in a general way, but it is not in itself the verse’s definitely fixed connotation; there would have been no contradiction if the verse had continued to say, for instance, and if there are two females they shall have a half (or the whole) of the estate. But the verse by its silence about their share confirms the inferred meaning; and the clear statement about the share of the more than two females indicates that that silence is intentional, and not an oversight. Moreover, the fact that they should get two-thirds of inheritance is confirmed by the Prophet’s practice, and the said sunnah has continued uninterrupted since the days of the Prophet till this day, with complete unanimity of the Muslim jurists — except one reported dissent by Ibn ‘Abbās.

This is the best explanation why the two females’ share has not been clearly stated. al-Kulaynī (may Allāh have mercy on him!) has written in al-Kāfī: ‘‘Surely Allāh has appointed the two females’ share as two-thirds; because He says: The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females; so when a man leaves a daughter and a son, the male shall get the equal of the two females’ share, that is, two-thirds; therefore the share of two females is two-thirds. After this, there was no need to say that two females would get two-thirds.’’

The same explanation has been quoted from the exegete, Abū Muslim: ‘‘(The said rule) is inferred from the divine words, The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females. A male with a female gets two-thirds; thus two-thirds shall be the share of two females.’’ But these two explanations are not perfect; they should be completed in the light of what we have written above. Ponder on it.

There are some other explanations given for this verse which are quite unworthy of divine words. For example, someone has written that the words; if they are more than two females, means, two females or more; thus this sentence contains the description of the share of two females as well as of more than two. Another writer has said that the share of two daughters is known by analogy from the law concerning two sisters (coming at the end of the chapter) where it apportions two-thirds to them. There are other similarly ridiculous claims.

QUR'ĀN: and (as for) his parents, each of them shall have the sixth of what he has left if he has a child ... then his mother shall have the sixth: The conjunction of parents with the law of the children, shows that the parents are co-sharers with the children and together they constitute one class. The words: ''and (only) his two parents inherit him'', indicate that they are the only heirs. The words: ''but if he has brothers'', (coming after the clause: ''but if he has no child and [only] his two parents inherit him'') show that brothers come into second class, after the class of sons, daughters [and parents], and they would not inherit as long as there is an heir of the first class — but the brothers shall partially exclude the mother from one-third [as it would be reduced to one-sixth].

QUR'ĀN: after (the payment of) any bequest he may have bequeathed or a debt;: Bequest and will has been enjoined by the divine words: Bequest is prescribed for you when death approaches one of you, if he leaves behind wealth ... (2:180). Although in this verse bequest precedes debt, it does not contradict the sunnah which says that debt takes precedence of bequest at the time of paymnet; because sometimes during a talk one mentions less important things first and then progresses towards more important ones. It is done when an important matter, because of its position and strength, does not need as much emphasis as the unimportant one does — and giving precedence in description is one way of emphasizing. Accordingly, the words: ''or a debt'', put the things in ascending order or importance.

This also shows why ''bequest'' has been qualified by the words, ''he may have bequeathed''; it puts further emphasis on it, and also points to the necessity of showing reverence to the deceased and honouring his wishes when he has made a bequest. Allāh has said: Whoever then alters it [i.e., the bequest] after he has heard it, the sin of it then is only upon those who alter it (2:181).

QUR'ĀN: your parents and your children, you know not which of them is nearer to you in usefulness;: It is addressed to the heirs, that is, the general public, inasmuch as everyone inherits his deceased relatives. The sentence alludes to the reason why the inheritance share of the parents differs from that of the children. It also provides a sort of education to them; that is why they have been addressed with the words: ''you know not''; and such expressions are commonly used by the people.

Had the verse been addressed to other than the heirs, i.e., to the dying people who would, after their death, be inherited by their parents and children, there would have been no reason to say: ''which of them is nearer to you in usefulness''; because apprently usefulness and benefit implies making use of, and benefitting from, the inherited property, and it fits on the heirs, not on the deceased.

The parents have been mentioned before the children; it is a sort of a hint that the parents are nearer in benefit than the children. It is like the verse: Surely the Said and the Marwah are among the signs of Allāh ... (2:158), as we had quoted the tradition that the Prophet had said: ''I begin with what Allāh has begun ...''

From the point of view of relationship and considering the human sentiments, it is a fact that man feels more compassion towards his children than towards his parents. In his eyes, his child's existence is his own — but not so that of his parents. Man's parents have stronger connection with him, when compared to his children's attachment to him. When usefulness is based on this principle, then at the time of dividing an inheritance, man should naturally get, for example, from his father a greater share than he would from inheriting, for example, his son — although it would appear from a superficial glance that the opposite should be the case.

This verse (i.e., your parents and your children, you know not which of them is nearer to you in usefulness) proves that Allāh has based the inheritance law on a creative reality found outside imagination — like other natural Islamic laws.

This principle is also supported by other unrestricted Qur'ānic verses which speak about legislation in general. For instance: Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion in natural devotion (for the truth); the nature made by Allāh in which He has made men; there is no alteration in the creation of Allāh; that is the right religion (30:30). In presence of such verses, it is unthinkable that the sharī'ah would contain such compulsory and unchangeable rules and laws, without there being to a certain extent basis for them in the creation.

It may possibly be inferred from this verses (your parents and your children ...) that children's children would have precedence over grandfathers and grandmothers; the grandparents will not inherit as long as a child or a child's child [how low so ever] is present.

QUR'ĀN: an ordinance from Allāh ..: Apparently it is in accusative case governed by a deleted verb, e.g., obey, or, hold fast, etc. It has a reinforced emphasis that the described shares are decreed and fixed, and that they cannot be changed.

This verse prescribes the shares of the first class of the heirs, i.e., the children, the father and the mother, with all the variations, either explicitly or implicitly.

Explicitly: Shares of the father and the mother: They get a sixth each if the deceased has a child or children; but in the absence of children, the mother gets either one-third or one-sixth (depending on the details mentioned in the verse);

Share of a single daughter: She gets a half;

Share of several daughters when they are the only children: They get two-thirds;

Shares of sons and daughters when they are together: The male shall have the equal of the share of two females;

And to this is added the share of two daughters, and it is two-thirds, as explained above.

Implicitly: Share of the only son: He shall get the whole property; it is understood when we read the clause: The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females, in conjunction with the clause, and if there is one [daughter], she shall have the half.

Likewise, when he has left only the sons as heirs, they shall share it among themselves equally, because the clause, The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females, indicates that the males shall have equal shares among themselves.

The verse is truly amazing in its comprehensiveness with such brevity.

It should be noted here that the verse with its unrestrictedness shows that there is no difference whatsoever — in matters of inheritance — between the Prophet and the other people. We have seen similar unrestrictedness or generality in the divine words: Men shall have a share of what the parents and the near relatives leaves, and women shall have a share ... (4:7). Someone has opined that the general Qur'ānic declarations are not applicable to the Prophet, because he had announced them himself. But such views are not worth looking at. Of course, there is a dispute between the Sunnīs and the Shī'ahs whether a prophet is inherited by his heirs or whatever he leaves goes to charity. This originates from the tradition which Abū Bakr had narrated in the case of Fadak. This discussion is beyond the scope of this book; therefore we think it better not to go into it here; the reader should consult relevant books for it.[1]

QUR'ĀN: And you shall have half of what your wives leave if they have no child ... after (payment of) any bequest they may have bequeathed or a debt;: The meaning is clear. The half share has been described in

[1] The alleged tradition of Abū Bakr and the opinion based on it — that the prophets neither inherit anyone, nor anyone inherits them — is not so irrelevant to the exegesis of the Qur'ān; because it goes directly against several Qur'ānic verses, and accordingly it is necessary, for the purpose of removing any possible misunderstanding, to point to this contradiction. Suffice it to say that this tradition and the opinion are not only against the general and clear meanings of the verses of inheritance, but are also contradicted by some other verses. Allāh says: And Sulayman inherited from Dawud (27:16); again He says quoting Zakariyyā's invocation: And surely I fear my relatives after me, and my wife is barren, therefore grant me from Thyself an heir, who should inherit me and inherit from the children of Ya'qūb (19:5 — 6). These verses cannot refer to prophethood or divine knowledge, because prophethood and divine knowledge come directly from Allāh, they are not a thing to be inherited, nor was there any need for Zakariyyā (a.s.) to be afraid of his relatives that they would take over the prophethood after him. The verses simply refer to inheritance of property (or, in case of the first verse, the Kingdom). Here we find Sulayman and Yaḥyā (a.s.) inheriting properties from their fathers, Dāwūd and Zakariyyā (a.s.) respectively; and all of them were prophets. Thus according to the Qur'ān two prophets left their properties to their heirs, and two prophets inherited them. (tr.).

possessive case, ‘‘half of what your wives leave’’; but the one-fourth share is disconnected; and they shall have the fourth from what you leave; when on such occasions a possessive construct is disjointed, it becomes necessary to complete it with min (مِنْ = from) — either in words or implied and understood. This min gives the connotation of taking from and beginning; this meaning seems appropriate when the word related to min is a negligible portion of the whole, when it is a small part or ratio of the original, like one-sixth, one-fourth or one-third; but not when it is a larger portion like a half or two-thirds. That is why Allāh has said: sixth from what he has left; the mother shall have the third; you shall have a fourth from what they leave — all this with disjointed possessive. But He has said: half of what your wives leave; two-thirds of what (the deceased) has left — all this in possessive case; also He has said: she shall have the half as the definite article, ‘‘the’’, stands for the second construct of the possessive case, i.e., half of what he has left.[1]

[1] This explanation may be correct to a certain extent only. It is not allinclusive. For instance, the author has had to explain a single construction in two different ways to suit his purpose. Where the Qur’ān says that, the mother shall have the third, he has implied that there is a min (= from) hiddden after it; but in another exactly the same construction, she shall have the half, he says that the word, the, stands for the deleted possessive construct, i.e., it means, half of what the deceased has left. It is an arbitrary way of interpretation.

We may interpret the verses in a more realistic way if we take the preposition, min (from) to denote, not the beginning, but at-tab‘īḍ (اَلتَّبْعِيْضُ = portioning), e.g., if we interpret, fourth from what you leave, as a fourth of a portion of your estate.

Where the Qur’ān uses the possessive case, it means that the prescribed share or ratio is to be taken out from the whole of the estate; and where it prescribes a certain share ‘‘from it’’, it means that the said heir shall get that share, not from the whole estate, but only from a part of it.

Now let us look at each clause in this light:

and (as for) his parents, each of them shall have the sixth from what he has left if he has a child: The eldest son is entitled to al-ḥabwah (اَلْحَبْوَةُ = lit, gift; here it denotes gift of some personal effects of his father, like ring, sword, etc.) from the original estate before it is divided among the heirs. Therefore, the parents will not get one-sixth of the whole estate, as they will not get any share from the said ḥabwah; hence ‘the sixth from’, not ‘the sixth of’.

QUR'ĀN: and if a man or a woman leaves property ... and Allāh is Knowing, Forbearing: 'al-Kalālah' (اَلْكَلَالَةُ) is in fact a maṣdar which means to encompass; from it is derived al-iklīl (اَلْاِكْلِيْلُ = icrown) because it encircles the head; also al-kull (اَلْكُلُّ = whole, all, total) comes from it because it encompasses its parts; another derivative is al-kall (اَلْكَلُّ = to be tired, dull); it implies a sort of wearisome encompassing against the one on whom he depends. ar-Rāghib says: ''al-Kalālah is an heir other than the child and the father.'' Again he says: ''It has been narrated that the Prophet was asked about al-kalālah. He said: 'He who dies and does not leave behind a child or a parent.' Thus he (the Prophet) has taken it as an attribute of the deceased; and both explanations are correct, because al-kalalāh is a masdar which encompasses the inheritor and the inherited, both.''

The author says: In that case, it is possible to treat 'kāna' (كَانَ = was

And you shall have half of what your wives leave if they have no child, but if they have a child, then you shall have a fourth from what they leave: When there is no child, the husband gets half of the whole property. But when there is a child, the son shall get the ḥabwah before the estate is divided, so the husband will get a fourth of a portion of estate.

and they [wives] shall have the fourth from what you leave if you have no child, but if you have a child then they shall have the eighth from what you leave: The wives naver get their one-fourth or one-eighth share from the whole estate. It is because they are not entitled to any share in land; and as for other immovable property (like house, garden, etc.) they get only the price of their prescribed share, but not the property itself; and in case of there being a son he is given the ḥabwah before the division. Thus the wife always gets her one-fourth or one-eighth from only a portion of the estate.

Other clauses, where possessive case has explicitly or implicitly been used, indicate that the heir gets his/her share from the whole estate. For example:

then if they are more than two females,they shall have two-thirds of what (the deceased) has left; and if there is one,she shall have the half:

but if he has no child and (only) his two parents inherit him, then his mother shall have the third.

It is now clear that the two different styles have been used to describe two different legal eventualities. There is a solid legal reason behind the use of possessive case and that of the preposition, from. It is neither for literary beauty nor for denoting largeness or smallness of a prescribed share. (tr.).

— it is not included in the translation of the verse,) as an auxiliary verb, and ‘‘a man’’, as its subject, with ‘‘to be inherited’’, as an adjectival phrase related to the said subject, and al-kalālah as its predicate. Then the meaning will be as follows: and if a man or a woman who is to be inherited is neither a parent nor an offspring of the heir.

Also, we may take kāna (was) as a perfect verb, with, ‘‘a man or a woman to be inherited’’, as its subject, and kalālah as a maṣdar used as a circumstantial clause. The meaning again will be the same: that the deceased is neither a parent nor an offspring of the heirs. az-Zajjāj has reportedly said: According to those who have recited yūrithu (يُوْرِثُ = makes someone his heir), kalālah will be the object; and according to those who recite yūrathu (يُوْرَثُ = is inherited by), kalālah is a subjective, being a circumstantial clause.

The clause, that does not harm (others), also is a subjective and a circumstantial clause. al-Muḍārrah (اَلْمُضَارَّةُ = to harm, to impair). Obviously, it forbids the dying person to harm the heirs through the debt; he should not indulge in borrowing with intention of harming the heirs and depriving them of inheritance. Another interpretation: He should not harm their interest by bequeathing more than one-third of his property.

QUR’ĀN: These are Allāh’s limits, ... And whoever disobeys ... he shall have an abasing chastisement: al-Ḥadd (اَلْحَدُّ) means a barrier between two things which prevents their mixing together and keeps their mutual distinction and differentiation intact, like the limit or boundary of a house or a garden. The word, as used here, refers to the inheritance laws and the decreed shares. Allāh has shown their utmost importance by describing, in these two verses, the reward of obeying Allāh and His Messenger in this respect, and the abasing everlasting chastisement for him who disobeys Allāh and His Messenger.

A GENERAL DISCOURSE ON INHERITANCE

These two verses: Allāh enjoins you concerning your children ... Allāh is Knowing, Forbearing; together with the verse at the end of the chapter: They ask you for a decision of the law. Say: ‘‘Allāh gives you a decision concerning the person who has neither parents nor offspring ... ’’ [4:176], in conjunction with the previously explained verse: Men shall have a share of what the parents and the near relatives leave ... [4:7] and the verse: and the possessors of relationship have the better claim in the ordinance of Allāh to inheritance ... (33:6; 8:75), give the fundamental Qur'ānic principles of inheritance in Islam; and the traditions provide the explanations in clearest terms.

The principles, which are inferred from them and form the basis of detailed laws, are as follows:

1. The principle already explained under the verse: your parents and your children, you know not which of them is the nearer to you in usefulness. It shows clearly that nearness and distance from the deceased has effect on inheritance. Also, this sentence, read in conjunction with the rest of the verse, shows that this matter affects the share of inheritance — whether the heir would get a larger or smaller portion. When it is read togther with the divine words: and the possessors of relationship have the better claim ... to inheritance, it guides us to the principle that a nearer relative debars a remoter one from inheritance.

The nearest of all to the deceased are his father, mother, son and daughter, because their relationship with the deceased is direct; there is no intermediary between him and them. The son and the daughter debar the grandchildren from inheritance, because the grandchildren are related to the deceased through the children. Of course, if there is no child, then grandchildren will take their place.

Then comes the second class of heirs, i.e., the deceased's brothers, sisters, grandfathers and grandmothers; they are related to him through one intermediary link only, i.e., through his father or mother. [If there is no brother or sister, then] their children will take the place of their father or mother. Every nearer generation will debar the remoter one, as explained above.

After that comes the third class of the heirs. They are the deceased's paternal uncles and aunts and maternal uncles and aunts. There are two intermediary links between them and him, i.e., a parent and a grandparent. The other details are the same as above.

The principles of nearness and remotness also shows that an heir having a double relationship will debar the one having a single relationship. For example, a consanguine brother or sister debars an agnate brother or sister, although an uterine brother or sister is not debarred.[1]

2. There is found another type of precedence or sequence among the heirs from another angle. Sometimes various shares combine in such a way that their sum-total exceeds the original. Now there are some heirs whose share has been reduced to another fixed ratio in case of such ‘‘crowding’’; for example, husband’s share is a half, but when he is joined by a child, his share is reduced to one-fourth; the same thing happens to the wife with her one-fourth and one-eighth. Likewise, mother is allotted a third, but in case of there being a child or brothers, her share is reduced to one-sixth; but father’s share remains the same — one-sixth — whether there is a child or not.

On the other hand, there are heirs whose share has been fixed, but nothing has been said about it in case of ‘‘crowding’’. For example, one daughter or sister, and two or more daughters or sisters have been given a half and two-thirds, respectively, but nothing has been said concerning them when the heirs seem to crowd together.

It is inferred from this difference in approach that the former heirs are not to suffer any further loss in cases where the sum-total of shares exceeds the original; the loss, whatsoever, shall be borne by the latter heirs who have been allotted any reduced fixed share for such contingency.

3. Sometimes shares exceed the original [as mentioned just above]; for example, let us say, there is the husband and two or more consanguine sisters; their shares are a half and two-thirds respectively, [but 1/2 + 2/3 = 1.1/6] i.e., more than the original [because the total of all shares should come to ‘one’ only]. Likewise, if the deceased has left her father, mother, two daughters and husband, their shares will exceed the original, because it will be 1 /6 + 1 /6 + 2/3 + 1 /4 [with a sum-total of 1.1/4].

On the other hand sometimes the property exceeds the shares. For example, if there is only a daughter [who shall get a half] or only two daughters [with a share of two-thirds; leaving another half or one-third un-allotted, respectively].

[1] The term, consanguine, is used for a relative who is connected to someone through father and mother both, e.g., two brothers having the same father and mother are called consanguine brothers.

Agnate is a relative connected only through father or through other males, while uterine is one related only through mother or through other females. (tr.).

The traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) which explain and expound the Divine Book — clearly say that in former cases, when the shares exceed the original, the loss shall be borne by those heirs who have been allotted only a single share, and they are the daughter/s and sister/s, but not the mother or husband whose shares have been fixed — albeit on a reduced scale — for the changed conditions too. Likewise if the property exceeds the shares, the excess shall be returned to only those heirs who are expected to bear the loss in the former example. For example, if there is a father and a daughter, then the father shall get his one-sixth, and the daughter her one-half by allotment; and also she shall be given the remaining one-third by return, [thus she shall get five-sixths of the property].

'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, during his reign, started the system of al-'awl (اَلْعَوْلُ = to provide, to deviate; in Islamic law it refers to the system by which all the shares are proportionately reduced in case they exceed the original); and people in early days of Islam resorted to at-ta'ṣīb (اَلتَّعْصِيْبُ = to wrap around; in Islamic law it refers to the system by which agnate relatives were given preference). We shall write about these two systems under the coming ''Traditions''.

4. On pondering on the shares of men and women in inheritance, we find that on the whole a woman's share is less than that of a man — except in the shares allotted to the parents. A mother's share sometimes exceeds that of the father. The mother has been given equal to, or more than, the father's share: it is probably because, in the eyes of Islam, she is more strongly attached to her child, and she undergoes a lot of troubles and hardships during pregnancy and delivery, as well as in looking after the child and bringing him up. Allāh says: We have enjoined on man doing of good to his parents; with trouble did his mother bear him and with trouble did she bring him forth; and the bearing of him and the weaning of him was thirty months (46:15). The fact that her share — instead of being half of man's portion — is equal to, and sometimes double of, the father's share, gives precedence to her without any doubt.

However, the question arises why man's share in general has been fixed as double of that of woman. Two factors have been kept in view concerning this matter: Man's excellence over woman in rationally managing the affairs of life; and his responsibility to maintain the woman and spend on her. Allāh says: Men are the maintainers of women because of that with which Allāh has made some of them to excel the others and because of what they spend out of their property (4:35). ''al-Qawwām'' (اَلْقَوَّامُ = translated here as maintainer) is derived from al-qiyām (اَلْقِيَامُ = to stand up) which refers to management of livelihood; the excellence points to man's superiority in rational thinking. Man's is a life dominated by intellect while that of woman is run by emotions and sentiments. It is much better and more proper to leave financial affairs in the hand of a thinking and contemplating person than to an emotional and sentimental being. If we look at all the wealth found in the world — which is to pass from the present generation to the next one — and consider this Islamic arrangement, we should find that two-thirds of this wealth would come under the authority and management of men, and the remaining one-third would be managed and administered by women. In this way the intellectual management will dominate the sentimental administration; the society will reap its benefits, and life will be happier and more worthy of living.

The deficiency in woman's share has nevertheless been made up in an amazing way. Allāh has enjoined man to treat his woman with justice and equity. Man accordingly is expected to treat her as an equal partner in his two-thirds. In other words, the woman would have the benefit and usufruct of [another one-third, i.e.,] a half of the two-thirds which man has got, and it would be in addition to her own one-third.

The net result of this marvellous ordinance is that man and woman have inverse relation in the spheres of possession and usufruct: Man owns two-thirds of the world's wealth but uses only one-third; while woman, who owns only a third of that wealth, has usufruct of two-thirds. As mentioned above, consideration has been given to predominance of contemplation and intellect over emotion and sentiment in man (and financial management, saving, exchange, production and investment are more germane to rational thinking than to emotion) and to primacy of sentiment over intellect in woman (and that is more relevant to making use of, and benefiting from, a property). This is the underlying reason why Islam has differentiated between men and women in matters of inheritance and maintenance.

Obviously, it is this natural pre-eminence in man of intellect and rationality and his superiority over woman in this field which Allāh has described in His speech as excellence: Men are the maintainers of women because of that with which Allāh has made some of them to excel the others (4:34). Apparently it does not refer to men's superiority in strength, hardiness and intrepidity. Admittedly, roughness and hardiness is a distinguishing feature of man, and many great things in society depend on it, like defence, security, hard labour, endurance of hardships and afflictions, and steadfastness and composure in face of commotion and horror. These are essential aspects of life which nature has not equipped women for. It has equipped them instead with opposite qualities, i.e., delicate emotions and benevolent sentiments — which no society can flourish without. These are essential factors of life which give rise to love and affection, mercy and kindness; they enable the woman to bear the burdens of pregnancy and delivery; and create in her a natural inclination for bringing up the children and looking after them; and it is this quality which makes them pre-eminently suitable for nursing and house-keeping. Humanity cannot progress with roughness and hardiness alone, it also needs softness and kindness; mankind will be incomplete if its anger is not balanced with desire. World's affairs are not run by repulsion if it is not counterpoised with attraction.

In short, these two qualities maintain an equilibrium between man and woman and keep the scales of life well-balanced in a society which necessarily is constituted of both sexes. Far be it from Allāh to commit injustice in His speech, action or judgment: Or do they fear that Allāh and His Messenger will act wrongfully towards them? (24:50); and your Lord does not deal unjustly with any one (18:49). He Himself has said [about men and women]: the one of you being from the other (3:195); and it is to this mutual complementariness and interlocking existence that Allāh refers in His words: because of that with which Allāh has made some of them excel the others.

He has also said: And one of His signs is that He created you from dust, then lo! you are mortals (who) scatter. And one of His signs is that He created mates for you from yourselves that you may find rest in them, and He put between you love and compassion; most surely there are signs in this for a people who reflect (30:20 — 21). Ponder on the marvellous description the verses contain. Mortal (i.e., man — as it stands parallel to the ''mates'', i.e., women) scatters, i.e., goes here and there to earn his livelihood; he it is who is made responsible to gather and obtain all necessities of life with his strength and hard labour — even leading to conflicts, forays and wars. Nevertheless, if this scattering were the only characteristics of mankind, the whole human race would have been devided between the attackers and the attacked, the pursuers and the pursued. But Allāh created women and equipped them with qualities which men find comforting. He puts between them love and compassion. They attract the men with their beauty and glamour, love and kindness. Thus the women are the premier cause and the basic agent for bringing the civilization into being.

That is why Islam has made the domestic life, i.e., marriage, the basis of society. Allāh says: O people! surely We have created you of a male and female, and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allāh is the one among you who guards (himself) most (against evil) (49:13). See how the verse first describes the marriage of male and female, and goes to the spreading of human race, and then proceeds to the larger society made of tribes and nations.

The end of the verse shows that the detail given in the verse: Men are the maintainers of women because of that with which Allāh has made some of them to excel the others ..., looks at equipping both sexes with faculties and characteristics necessary for managing the affairs of the worldly life in the best possible way, and which may keep the society in the best condition. Obviously, the ‘‘excellence’’ mentioned in the above verse does not mean the real superiority and honour in Islam, which denotes nearness to Allāh. Islam in reality does not care about material amplitude or temporal or bodily strength which can be useful in the physical life only — these things are mere tools which have to be used to receive spiritual favours from Allāh.

The above discourse makes it abundantly clear that men have been given excellence over women in their intellectual power, and this difference has led to the difference in inheritance and other similar matters; but this ‘‘excellence’’ means only increase [in intellectual power]. As for the excellence in the meaning of honour before Allāh — which is the main concern of Islam — it entirely depends on piety and fear of Allāh, wherever it is found [be it in a man or a woman].

TRADITIONS

‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, al-Bukhārī, Muslim, Abū Dāwūd, at-Tirmidhī, an-Nasā’ī, Ibn Mājah, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated from Jābir ibn ‘Abdillāh, that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and Abū Bakr came walking to visit me (in my illness) in Banū Salamah. The Prophet found me unconscious; so he called for some water and made ablution with it; then he sprinkled (it) on me, and I gained consciousness. So I said: ‘What do you order me to do with my property? O Messenger of Allāh!’ Then (the verse) came down: Allāh enjoins you concerning your children: The male shall have the equal of the portion of two females.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: It has been repeatedly mentioned that it is possible for several ‘‘reasons of revelation’’ (which have been narrated to us) to combine in respect of one verse; nor is there any difficulty if the verse goes beyond the scope of those specific reasons; also possibly an event might have coincided with the revelation and the theme of the verse corresponded with that happening. Therefore, there is no difficulty in the above tradition because of Jābir’s report that he had asked: ‘‘What do you order me to do with my property? O Messenger of Allāh!’’, and then this verse was revealed. We should not worry how Jābir could have asked that question when the division of inheritance was not his responsibility.

Even more strange is another tradition narrated in the same book through ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd and al-Ḥākim from Jābir that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to visit me when I was sick. So I said: ‘How should I divide my property among my children?’ But he did not give me any reply; and then the verse was revealed: Allāh enjoins you concerning your children ...’’

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from as-Suddī that he said: ‘‘The people of (the era of) ignorance did not give inheritance to the girls, nor to weak boys. Only that man inherited his father who had strength to (participate in) war. Then ‘Abdu ’r-Raḥmān, brother of the poet Ḥassān, died, leaving a wife, named Umm Kuḥḥah, and five girls. (Other) heirs came and took away the inheritance. Umm Kuḥḥah complained to the Prophet about it. Then Allāh revealed this verse: then if there are more than two females, they shall have two-thirds of what (the deceased) has left, and if there is one, she shall have the half; then it was revealed about Umm Kuḥḥah: and they shall have the fourth from what you leave if you have no child, but if you have a child then they shall have the eighth from what you leave ...'' (ibid)

The same two scholars of tradition have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘When the verse of shares [of inheritance] was revealed, in which Allāh ordained what He ordained [of the shares] for male and female child and (for) parents, people (or, some of them) disliked it and said: ‘(How is it that) woman is given one-fourth or one-eighth, and daughter gets a half, and a small child is given (his share), while none of them can fight the people, nor can he gather booty?’ They used that (system) in the (era of) ignorance: They did not give inheritance except to him who could fight the people; and they gave it to the eldest, then elder [and so on].'' (ibid.)

The author says: at-Ta‘ṣīb (اَلتَّعْصِيْبُ = agnacy) was a part of that system of ignorance. They gave the inheritance to the agnates of father if the deceased had not left a big son capable of fighting. The Sunnīs follow the same system in the excess property which is left after giving the prescribed shares. Perhaps something may be found about it in their traditions; but the traditions coming from the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) totally reject this theory and say that the excess property shall be returned to those heirs who at other times bear the loss, and they are children, consanguine or agnate brothers and in some cases, the father. As mentioned earlier, the verses in their connotation agree with this verdict.[1]

[1] The system of at-ta‘ṣīb which Islam had taken such pain to abolish and eradicate, was revived for political reasons by the second ‘Abbāsid caliph, al-Manṣūr, in the middle of the second century of hijrah. First a short description of that system in practice:

Mr. Justice Ameer Ali (who, it is necessary to mention, was a Mu‘tazilite, and not a Shī‘ah, as he himself has repeatedly said in his hook, Mahommedan Law) says that in Arabia, prior to Islam, the inheritance ‘‘was governed by the rule of agnacy.'' It means that only the relatives connected with the deceased ‘‘through males'' were recognized as entitled to take a share in his inheritance. But neither women nor persons connected to the deceased through them had any right of succession.

‘‘Thus it was that whilst adopted sons and even slaves had rights, the children of daughters and sisters had no place in the customary rules which regulated succession.’’ (Ameer Ali,Mahommedan Law, vol.2,p.11)

Now a background of the ‘Abbāsid dynasty:

The ‘Abbāsids were descendants of al-‘Abbās, an agnate uncle of the Prophet. The descendants of Fāṭimah (a.s.) were also descendants of ‘Alī (a.s.), son of Abū Tālib who was a consanguine uncle of the Prophet.

Before coming to power, the family of ‘Abbās, like other Hāshimites, generally followed the madhhab of the Ahlu ’l-Bayt (a.s.). As an example, we may refer to several traditions narrated in coming pages from both Shī‘ī and Sunnī chains, from Ibn ‘Abbās, in which he has strongly denounced the system of al-‘awl (اَلْعَوْلُ), innovated by ‘Umar.

When the Hāshimites were planning to overthrow the Umayyad dynasty, the ‘Abbāsids had joined hands with the Ḥasanid branch of the Fāṭimids, although al-Imām Ja‘far as-Sādiq (a.s.) had remained aloof from all these activities. It was agreed among the ‘Abbāsids and the Ḥasanids that on achieving success they would install Muhammad an-Nafsu ’z-Zakiyyah (The Pure Soul) as caliph. (He was a son of ‘Abdullāh ibn al-Ḥasan [al-Muthannā II] ibn [al-Imām] al-Hasan, a.s.). Among those who did bay‘ah (اَلْبَيْعَةُ = to give allegiance) to him, were Abu ’l-‘Abbās as-Saffāh and al-Manṣūr.

Their slogan of ‘‘riḍā’u āli Muḥammad’’ (رِضَاءُ آل مُحَمَّدٍ = to please the progeny of Muhammad) proved a success. People-gathered behind their agents thinking that they wanted to remove the tyrant dynasty of the Umayyads and install a descendant of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in their place. When the Umayyads, were overthrown in 132 AH, it was not Muḥammad an-Nafsu ’z-Zakiyyah who was put on the thrown, but the ‘Abbāsid, Abu ’1-‘Abbās as-Saffāh, who was succeeded four years later by his brother, al-Mansūr.

‘‘They [the ‘Abbāsids] made the affection of the people for the children of Fātima the means for their own elevation, and when they had attained the desired end they rewarded the Fātimides with bitter persecution.’’ (Ameer All, The Spirit of Islam, p.304)

When conflict started between Muḥammad an-Nafsu ’z-Zakiyyah and al-Manṣūr, the latter left no stone unturned to prove the legitimacy of his claim. Among other devices (which this is not the place to mention) he revived the system of agnacy.

Mr. Justice Ameer Ali writes:

‘‘When the Abbasides (sic.) succeeded in overthrowing the ‘Ommeyades (sic.) they found it necessary to legitimatise their title to the Caliphate, for the eyes of the Moslem (sic.) world were still turned to the descendants of a1-Ḥākim and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘The first person to introduce the system of al-‘awl (= to reduce all shares proportionately) was ‘Umar. The shares crowded over and began pushing each other aside. So he said: ‘By Allāh! I do not know what to do with you. By Allāh! I do not understand which of you Allāh has given precedence to, and which of you He has deferred. And I do not find for this property anything better than this: that I should divide it among you the Prophet as the rightful heirs to his temporal and spiritual heritage — and in effecting this they found their chief support in the doctrine of agnacy. They claimed that as descendants of the Prophet’s uncle, ‘Abbās, they were his ‘agnates’ and as such had a better title than the descendants of his daughter Fātima. And this was the keystone of the fabric built up by the ablest monarch of the House of ‘Abbās, Manṣūr, the real founder of the Sunnī Church (sic.).’’ (Mahommedan Law, vol.2, pp.11 — 12).

He further says:

‘‘The rule of agnacy has thus remained, chiefly from dynastic reasons, a part of the Sunni system. In early times it was as strongly enforced as under the old Romans. If a person died without leaving any ‘agnatic’ relation but a daughter’s or sister’s child, his property did not go to the latter but escheated to [i.e., was taken over by] the Caliph. In 896 AC the Caliph M‘utazid b’lllāh (sic.) abolished this cruel rule; and laid down that in the absence of sharers and ‘agnates’ (‘Asabāh), the ‘uterine relations’ should succeed. And this has remained the law ever since.’’ (ibid., p.12)

Even then, according to him, the uterine relations are placed in the last category, and it is only in the absence of sharers, agnates and even the emancipator that they receive any share in the inheritance. (ibid. p.68)

This was in short the origin of at-ta‘ṣīb (agnacy) in Islam. It is necessary to point out two things before ending this note:

First: As Ameer All has pointed out (and we have mentioned above) the ‘‘descendants of Fāṭimah were also descendants of ‘Alī, who, as son of Abū Ṭālib, was an agnate relative of the Prophet.’’

In fact, ‘Alī (a.s.) was nearer than al-‘Abbās to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), because Abū Ṭālib (a.s.) was a consanguine uncle of the Prophet, and not merely an agnate like al-‘Abbās.

Second: This whole argument was in fact falacious and deceptive. In the heat of their political polemics neither Muhammad an-Nafsu ’z-Zakiyyah nor al-Mansur paused to think that Imamate was not an inheritance. It was based on appointment by Allāh which is announced through the Prophet or the preceding Imam. an-Nafsu ’z-Zakiyyah had based his claim on a falsity and al-Mansur replied him with a greater falsehood. (tr.) proportionately.' '' Then Ibn 'Abbās said: ''By Allāh! if he had given precedence to him whom Allāh had given precedence, and put behind the one whom Allāh had put behind, there would have been no need for proportionate reduction of shares.'' He was asked: ''And which of them has been given priority by Allāh?'' He said: ''Every share which Allāh has not brought down from a prescribed share but to (another) prescribed share, then that is which has been given precedence by Allāh; and every share that — when it leaves its (original) position — does not get except the residue, then it is (the share) which Allāh has put behind. Thus the share that is given precedence is like that of husband, wife and mother; and that which is put behind is like that of sisters and daughters. Therefore, if there gather together those who have been given precedence by Allāh and those who have been placed behind, the division should begin with those having precedence, and he shall be given his complete share; then if something remains (of the property) it shall be for those [who have been placed behind] and if nothing is left they shall get nothing.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Sa'īd ibn Manṣūr narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ''Do you suppose that He Who knows the number of the sands of the valley, 'Alij, has prescribed in the property one half, plus one-third plus one-fourth?'' (ibid.)

'Atā' says: ''I said to Ibn 'Abbās: 'People do not follow my word or your word; and when you and I shall be dead, they will not divide the inheritance according to your verdict.' He replied: 'Then let them gather, and then we (i.e., both parties) should put our hands on the rukn (of the Ka'bah), then we should earnestly pray and put the curse of Allāh on the liars. Allāh has not ordered that which they say.' '' (ibid.)

The author says: This theme has been narrated from Ibn 'Abbās also through the Shī'ī chains, as is quoted below.

az-Zuhrī quotes 'Ubaydullāh ibn 'Abdillāh ibn 'Utbah as saying: ''I was sitting with Ibn 'Abbās when the talk turned towards description of inheritance-shares. Ibn 'Abbās said: 'Allāh, the Great, be praised! Do you think that He Who knows the number of the sands of (the valley) 'Alij, has appointed one-half plus one-third in a property? Well, these two halves have finished the whole property; now where is the slot of the (remaining) one-third?' Zufar ibn Aws al-Baṣrī then asked him: 'O Abu 'l-'Abbās! Who was then the first to reduce these shares?' He said: ''Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb. When several shares gathered near him, pushing each other, he said: ''By Allāh! I do not know which of you Allāh has given precedence to, and which of you He has deferred. And I do not find anything more accommodating than this: that I should divide this property among you proportionately, and let every right-owner get his right.'' In this way he introduced the proportionate reduction of shares. By Allāh! if he had given precedence to him whom Allāh had given precedence to, and put behind whom Allāh had put behind, there would be no need for proportionate reduction of shares.' Zufar ibn Aws asked him: 'And which of them has He given precedence to, and which has He kept behind?' He said: 'Every share which Allāh has not brought down from a prescribed share but to another prescribed share, that is which Allāh has given precedence to. And as for that which Allāh has kept behind, it is every share that — when it leaves its (original) place — does not get except the residue, it is (the share) which Allāh has put behind. As for that which has been given precedence, [it is these]: the husband gets a half, but if a situation arises to bring his share down, he comes to one-fourth, nothing removes him from there; and the wife receives one-fourth, but when she comes down to one-eighth, nothing removes her from there; and the mother is allotted one-third, but when she moves from it, she goes to one-sixth, and nothing removes her from it. These are therefore the shares which Allāh has given precedence to. As for that which He has kept behind, it is the share of the daughters and sisters — they are entitled to one-half or two-thirds, and when [other] shares remove them from it, they do not get except what is left, so these are whom Allāh has kept behind. When there gather together those whom Allāh has given preference and those whom He has kept behind, it (i.e., the division) will begin with those whom Allāh has given precedence, and he shall be given his full share; then if something remains, it will be for him who has been kept behind; and if nothing is left, he shall get nothing.' Then Zufar said to him: 'Then what prevented you from offering this opinion to 'Umar?' He said: 'His dread.' '' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: 'Alī (a.s.) had rejected the theory of proportionate reduction of share, long before Ibn 'Abbās did so. And it is the madhhab of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) as is described below:

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a ḥadīth: ''The Leader of the faithful (a.s.) used to say: 'Most surely, He Who knows the number of the sands of 'Alij, (also) knows that the shares should not be deviated (i.e., reduced) from six; had you looked at its (proper) direction, it would not be more than six.' '' (ibid.)

The author says: It is written in aṣ-Ṣiḥāḥ: '' 'Alij is a place in a valley with sands.'' The Imām's words, ''the shares should not be deviated from six'', means that no share could deviate in a way to change the six prescribed portions to some other portion. The six shares, explicitly mentioned in the Qur'ān are as follows: a half, one-third, two-thirds, one-fourth, one-sixth and one-eighth.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The Leader of the faithful (a.s.) said: 'All praise is due to Allāh; there is none to let precede what He has set behind, and none to set behind what He has let precede.' Then he struck his one hand with the other and again said: 'O nation (that is) bewildered after its Prophet! If you had let that precede which Allāh had given precedence to, and kept behind that which Allāh had set behind; and had put authority and inheritance where Allāh had put it, no friend of Allāh would have remained in poverty, and no share from Allāh's ordained shares would have decreased, nor two people would have differed in Allāh's commandment; and the ummah has not disputed about any command of Allāh but that 'Alī has its knowledge from the Book of Allāh. So (now) taste evil consequences of your affair and of your inordinateness in that which your hands have sent before; and Allāh is not unjust to the servants; and they who act unjustly shall soon know to what final place of turning they shall turn back.' '' (ibid.)

The author says: A further explanation of how some heirs' shares are decreased is given below:

The shares, according to the Qur'ān, are six: a half, two-thirds, one-third, one-sixth, one-fourth and one-eighth. Sometimes these shares gather together in a way it creates problem. For in-stance, in the first class of heirs, there may exist a daughter, father, mother and husband.

Their respective shares are a half, two-sixths and one-fourth — the total [1.1/12] exceeds the original property [which is 'one']. Likewise, if there are two daughters, both parents and husband, their shares, two-thirds, two-sixths, and one-fourth [total = $1^1/4$] exceed the original. In the same way, in the second class of heirs, there may exist together a sister, a paternal and a maternal grandfather, and a wife; and their shares, a half, one-third, one-sixth and one-fourth [total = $1^1/4$] would exceed the original. Or, if there are two sisters, two grand-fathers and a husband, their shares — two-thirds, one-third, one-sixth and a half [total = 1.2/3] — would far exceed the original.

If we reduce all the shares proportionately, it would be al-'awl. On the other hand, if we leave the shares of parents, husband, wife and uterine relatives (i.e., one-third, one-sixth, a half, one-fourth and one-eighth) intact — because Allāh has explicitly prescribed them and has not left them un-explained in any eventuality — then the deficiency will always fall on the shares of one or more daughters, and one or more consanguine or agnate sisters, and on the shares of male and female children — when there is one or more, for the reason explained earlier.

As for ''returning'' to the latter group the property left after distribution of prescribed shares, the reader should consult books of ḥadīth and jurisprudence.

al-Ḥākim and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated about Zayd ibn Thabit that he used to partially exclude mother [i.e., reduced her share from one-third to one-sixth] if the deceased had left two brothers. People said to him: ''O Abū Sa'īd! surely Allāh says: and if he has brothers ... [and plural in Arabic indicates at least three], and you are partially excluding her by [only] two brothers?'' He said: ''Verily the Arabs call two brothers al-ikhwah (اَلْاِخْوَةُ = brothers [in plural]).'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: The same theme is narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.); although it is generally said that al-ikhwah is plural of al-akh (اَلْاَخُ = brother) and plural is not used for less than three.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The mother is not partially excluded from one-third except by (presence of) two consanguine of agnate brothers or four consanguine or agnate sisters.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: There are many traditions of the same theme. As for uterine brothers, they are connected to the deceased through the mother who by her presence debars them from inharitance. It is narrated in the traditions of both the Shī‘īs and the Sunnīs that the brothers partially exclude the mother, but they themselves do not get any share in inheritance because of the presence of the parents who have precedence over them in class. Thus the law, that the brothers partially exclude the mother while they themselves do not inherit anything, has been laid down keeping in view the position of the father — because the excess portion shall be returned to him. That is why the uterine brothers do not partially exclude the mother, because they are not the father's dependants.

The Leader of the faithful (a.s.) said regarding the clause, after (the payment of) any bequest he may have bequeathed or debt: ‘‘Surely you recite in this verse the bequest before the debt, but the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has decreed (to pay) the debt before the bequest.’’ (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

The author says: This tradition has also been narrated by as-Suyūṭī in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from several traditionalists and exegetes.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) explained al-kalālah in these terms: ‘‘Other than parent and child.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The same Imām (a.s.) says about the clause: and if a man or a woman leaves property to be inherited by neither parents nor offspring, that Allāh has meant by it specifically the uterine brothers and sisters. (ibid.)

The author says: There are numerous traditions of this theme and the Sunnīs too have narrated them. The number of such traditions reaches near to mutawātir. These traditions also say that the law regarding consanguine and agnate al-kalālah is mentioned in the last verse of the chapter which says: They ask you for a decision of the law. Say: ‘‘Allāh gives you a decision concerning the person who has neither parents nor offspring ... [4:176].

It is a further proof of this explanation that the shares allotted to those relatives in that last verse exceeds the shares mentioned in this verse by double or even more. We know from the context and the above-mentioned verses that Allāh has made a male's share generally equal to that of two females — as far as possible. Relatives other than parents and children are connected with the deceased either through father and mother both, or through father or through mother alone. Naturally, the difference maintained between father and mother will be carried over to those relatives too, because they are connected through them. In other words, the consanguine or agnate relatives will get a larger share than the uterine relatives. It leads us to the above-mentioned conclusion that the verse giving smaller shares speaks about the uterine relatives and that prescribing larger shares about the consanguine or agnate relatives.

Muḥammad ibn Sinān has narrated that Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍā (a.s.) wrote in reply to his questions, inter alia: ''The reason why women are given half of men's share in inheritance: It is because when a woman marries she receives (the dowry) and it is the man who pays; that is why men have been given more. Another reason why male is given twice of what female gets: It is because female is a dependant of male if she is in need; the male is obliged to maintain her and he is responsible for her sustenance; the woman is not liable to maintain the man nor is she held responsible to give his sustenance if he is in need; that is why men have been given more; and that is the word of Allāh: Men are the maintainers of women because of that with which Allāh has made some of them to excel the others and because of what they spend out of their property.'' (Ma'āni 'l-akhbār) al-Aḥwal said: ''Ibn Abi 'l-'Awjā' said: 'Why is it that a poor weak woman takes one share and men take two shares?' Some of our companions mentioned this to Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) and he said: 'Verily, there is no jihād on woman, nor maintenance nor blood-money, (all) this is on men, that is why woman was allotted one share and man two shares.' '' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: There are very many traditions of this import, and we have shown that the Qur'ān too shows the same thing.

AN ACADEMIC ESSAY ON INHERITANCE

1. How Inheritance Began

Inheritance — taking possession, by some living persons, of the property left by the deceased — is one of the most ancient traditions of human society. It is impossible to find out from the available histories of nations and countries when this custom began — not unexpectedly it is hidden in the mist of antiquity. We understand by pondering on man's social nature that man yearns to get a property — and especially if it is not in any one's hand — longing to use it for his needs. It is one of his primary and most encient customs to gain control of a property, especially if there is none to stop him. Also man, be he primitive or civilized, cannot be oblivious of the notion of nearness and close association (which give rise to the concept of being nearer and closer in relationship) between various members of society. It is this concept which has led to establishment of home, family, clan and tribe, etc. Inevitably, in a society some persons will be nearer to one another than the rest, like a child to his parents, a relative to another relative, one friend to another, a master to his slave, husband and wife to each other and a head to his followers; even a powerful person to a weak one — although different societies have different concepts and standards for identifying this nearness, a difference which it is almost impossible to record.

These two factors make us believe that inheritance is a custom prevalent in human beings since the earliest days of society.

1. Gradual Development of Inheritance

This system, like all other social traditions, was intermittently changing from one position to another; evolution and gradual development playing a hand in it since its first appearance. But the primitive society was never well-organized and consequently no historical record can be found to give us a reliable picture of its gradual development.

Nevertheless, it is certain that they did not give any share to women and weak persons; inheritance was exclusively reserved for strong males. It was only because in their eyes, women and weak persons (like slaves and small children) were in the same category as that of tamed animals and merchandise — these things are always used by man without themselves getting any benefit from man or his property, nor are they entitled to the social rights that are accorded to the human race.

However, the connotation of 'strong' varied from time to time. Sometimes it meant head of the community or clan; at other times, it was head of the family; occasionally, it implied the bravest of the community. Such changes naturally meant fundamental alterations in inheritance rules.

Those customs prevalent from time to time were devoid of the bliss and felicity which human nature aspires for; and consequently each was altered [or discarded] before long. Even civilized nations which were governed by legal codes or some well-established tribal laws, like Rome and Greece, went the same way. Uptil now no inheritance law prevalent in any community or nation has stood the test of time and remained alive as long as the Islamic inheritance law has — it has ruled over the Muslim nations from the day it was ordained to this day, foraboutfourteen centuries.

3. Inheritance in Civilized Nations

The Romans had a peculiar social theory: A house was a selfcontained social entity, independent of the greater society; its members were beyond the jurisdiction of the government.in all their social rights; the house had its own rules and regulations and [consequently] its own system of reward and punishment, and so on. The head of the family was the deity of his family — of his wife, children, slaves and dependants. He was their absolute owner — no other person owned anything as long as he remained a member of the house. The head had total power over them and managed their affairs by his absolute authority. He in his turn worshipped his predecessor — the previous head of the family.

Whatever property there was, it was inherited by the house. Suppose a son died leaving some property (which he had earned and owned with permission of the family-head), or a daughter expired leaving what she had been given possession of (as dowry, etc.) with permission of the family-head, or some other relative died — in all such cases the property was inherited by the head of the family, because it was the inevitable consequence of his godship and absolute ownership of the house and its members.

When the head of the family died, one of his sons or brothers inherited him — who could do so. When several sons inherited him, then if they separated and established new houses, each became the deity of his house. But if they continued to live in the old house, their position vis-a-vis the new deity (their brother, for example) would be the same that was under their late father — all would come under the authority and absolute guardianship of the new deity.

Adopted sons had the right to inherit him; the system of adoption was prevalent among them just like the pre-Islamic Arabs. As for women (like wife, daughter and mother), they were not given any share of inheritance — lest the property of the house be transferred to another house if they changed residence on marriage; for it was not lawful to transfer a property from one house to another. It is probably this concept which someone had in mind when he said that they believed in society's communal ownership, not in private or personal one. But I think that it was based on something other than socialistic ownership. Even primitive barbaric communities, since early dawn of humanity, prevented other tribal groups to share or encroach in the pasture and fertile lands which they had taken under their hold; they protected it and even fought for it. It was a sort of common public property which was owned not by individuals but the society. Nevertheless, it was not disallowed for an individual member to reserve a portion of that common property for himself.

It was a valid kind of possession, although they could not keep balance in its management and use. Islam respects such possessorship as we have mentioned earlier. Allāh says: He it is Who created for you all that is in the earth (2:29). Therefore, the human society, i.e., the Islamic society and those who are under its protection, do own the riches of the earth in this sense; thereafter, the Islamic society is the owner of all that it has under its control. That is why Islam does not allow a non-Muslim to inherit from a Muslim.

Even today some nations follow a similar principle and do not allow foreigners to acquire ownership of any land or immovable property, etc., in the country.

As the house, in ancient Rome, had complete independence by itself, this old system had taken root therein like other independent nations and countries.

Now, the Romans followed the above-mentioned inheritance code; and also they did not allow marriage within the prohibited degrees. These two things together obliged them to divide the relationships in two categories: First, the natural relationship, originating from a common blood. On it was based the illegality of marriage within the prohibited degree and its lawfulness outside that cirlcle. Second, the official or legal relationship. On this relationship depended inheritance or disinheritance, maintenance, guardianship and things like that. The sons had both types of relationship-natural and legal — with the head of the family and with each other; but women were recognized only as natural, but not legal, relatives. Consequently, they inherited from none: neither from father nor son, neither from husband nor brother, nor from anyone else. This was the inheritance code of the ancient Rome.

As for Greece, their old custom in establishment of the houses was almost similar to that of the ancient Rome. They gave inheritance to the most mature of the male children; women were totally debarred from it, be they wife, daughter or sister; also small children and others like them were not entitled to any share. But the Greeks, like the Romans, sometimes devised plans to give inheritance to small children or those women — like wives, daughters or sisters — whom they loved and were apprehensive for their welfare; with these devices, like will, etc., they could easily give them a small or large portion of property. We shall speak on it under the ‘‘Will’’.

India, Egypt and China were not different from Rome and Greece in totally excluding the women from inheritance and debarring weaker children from it — or they continued to live under the authority and guardianship of the stronger male heirs.

As mentioned earlier, the Persians allowed polygamy and marriage with women within ‘prohibited degrees’; adoption was legal; the most beloved wife sometimes had a status equal to that of an adopted son and shared the inheritance equally with the son and the adopted son, debarring other wives. A married daughter was not entitled to inheritance, lest the property go out of the family: but an unmarried daughter was given half of a son’s share. In short, the wives (except the senior-most) and married daughters were debarred, while the senior-most wife, son, adopted son and unmarried daughter shared in the inheritance.

The Arabs gave no share to women or minor sons; the inheritance was taken by the mature sons who could ride a horse and defend the honour (of the family); if there were no such child, the agnatic relatives took away the property.

This was the state of affairs in the world when the verses of inheritance were revealed. These matters are described in detail or mentioned in short in various histories dealing with customs and civilizations of ancient communities, in travelogues, law books and other such writings which may be consulted by anyone who wants more information.

The above description shows, in short, that in those days it was the common practice throughout the world to deprive the women of the inheritance — be it a wife or mother, a daughter or sister. If one wanted to give them a share, one had to devise a plan for it. Also it was an established system to debar small children and orphans — except in some cases where they were taken under other relatives' guardianship — a perpetual guardianship that was never terminated.

4. What Islam did in such a Situation

It has been repeatedly said that according to Islam the correct foundation of rules and laws is the nature on which people have been created — and there is no alteration in the creation of Allāh. Islam has laid down the inheritance on the 'womb' that is, relationship, which is a part of nature and an established creative factor. For the same reason, it has negated the custom of adopted sons' inheritance. Allāh says: ... nor has He made those whom you assert to be your sons your real sons; these are the words of your mouths; and Allāh speaks the truth and He guides to the way. Assert their relationship to their fathers; this is more equitable with Allāh; but if you do not know their fathers, then they are your brethren in faith and your friends (33:4 — 5).

Then it removed the bequest from the general rule of inheritance and gave it an independent legal status, by which a dying person may bestow and a beneficiary may receive — although before that even bequest was called inheritance. But in Islam it is not just a nominal difference; there are two separate principles governing the inheritance and the will or bequest, respectively, with an independent natural basis for each. The factor that governs inheritance is relationship, and the deceased's wish or will does not effect it at all; while the basis of bequest is in compliance with the deceased's wish after his death (you may say, at the time of his bequeathing) in the property he owned when he was alive; implementation of bequest shows. respect to the deceased's wish. If one included the will under the heading of inheritance, it would be merely in name, not in reality.

What the people, like the ancient Romans, called inheritance did not take into consideration the two factors of relationship and respect to the deceased's wishes. It was only based on the deceased's desire to prevent the transfer of property to another house; the intention was to keep it in the hands of the head of the family, (i.e., its deity); or on his desire to transfer it to someone he loved and was apprehensive of his welfare. In any case, it only looked at the deceased's desires. Had it been founded on relationship and common blood, many of those who were deprived would have shared in inheritance.

After that, Islam turned its attention to the inheritance. In its eyes, there are two basic factors affecting it:

[First:] The factor of relationship. It is the common bond that unites a man to his relatives. There is no difference in this respect between a male and a female, nor between an adult and a minor (or even a foetus in the womb). Nevertheless, various relationships have different effects; some get priority, others are kept behind, some prevent the others from inheriting. All this is related to the strength of a relationship, which in its turn depends on a relative's nearness or distance from the deceased — whether his relationship with the deceased is direct or through some intermediaries, and whether there are less or more intermidiate links, for instance, son, brother and uncle. This principle bestows the right of inheritance on the relatives, and at the same time establishes different classes of the heirs according to their nearness or distance from the deceased.

[Second:] The factor of natural difference between male and female. It creates difference in their respective capabilities, as one group is more equipped with intellect while the other is more endowed with sentiments. Man by nature is a contemplating human being, while woman is an embodiment of sentiments and emotions. This difference very clearly affects their lives as far as management of property and its usufruct are concerned. This factor has led to the difference in the shares of men and women — even when they happen to be in the same class, like son and daughter, or brother and sister, as we shall explain below.

The first factor has led to grading of heirs in classes according to their nearness or distance from the deceased, keeping in view whether their connection with the deceased is direct or through one or more intermediary links. The first class consists of the heirs related to him directly — without any intermediary. They are son, daughter, father and mother. The second class is of brother, sister, grandfather and grandmother. They are connected to him through one link, that is, either through father, or mother or both. The third class consists of paternal and maternal uncle and aunt. They join the deceased through two intermediate links, that is, through a parent and a grandparent. In every class, children take the place of their parents in their absence and debar the next class.

As for husband and wife, marriage had mingled their blood, and accordingly they share with every class; neither any class debars them, nor they debar any class.

The second factor, that is, the difference between man and woman, has led to the principle of a male getting equal to the share of two females — except in case of the mother and the relatives connected through her.

The laid down shares are six (a half, two-thirds, one-third, one-fourth, one-sixth and one-eighth) although they may occasionally change. Likewise, the property received by an heir may differ at times from his prescribed share because of decrease or 'return'. Also, the share of father vis-a-vis mother and the relatives connected through her does not conform with the general principle of the male's share being double that of female. Such variations make it difficult to give here a comprehensive description of Islamic inheritance laws. Nevertheless, the whole structure, inasmuch as the preceding generation gives place to the succeeding one, is based on the principle that one spouse is succeeded by the other, and the progenitors (i.e., fathers and mothers) give place to the progeny (i.e., children). And the shares, as decreed by Islam for both groups (spouses and children), give a male double of that allotted a female.

This general review shows that Islam provides for division of the world's wealth in two portions of one-third and two-thirds. The one-third belongs to the female and the two-thirds to the male. This is on the level of possession. But as far as the usufruct is concerned, it is governed by another principle. It says that maintenance of the wife is the husband's responsibility, and that he has to treat her with justice — both should equally share and use the man's wealth for their needs. Also it has given the woman freedom of will and independence of action in the wealth she herself owns — her husband cannot interfere in it. These three factors prove that woman has the right to make use of the two-thirds of the world's resources (one-third her own property plus a half of the two-thirds belonging to man) while man may use only a third.

5. The Position of Women and Orphans in Islam

The orphans do inherit like stronger adult men. They are brought up, and their property continues growing, under their guardians' care, like the father [sic.] and grandfather, or the believers in general, or the Islamic government. When they attain to marriageable age and show the signs of maturity of intellect, their property is handed over to them, and they begin their independent life. It is the most just and equitable system that can be imagined for such cases.

As for women, as described above, from a general point of view they own one-third of the world's wealth and have the usufruct of its two-thirds. They are independent and absolute owners of what belongs to them; they are not put under any guardianship, be it permanent or temporary; and it is no concern of the men what the women do about themselves in a lawful and proper manner.

In Islam woman is recognized as an individual personality equal in every legal aspect to that of man; she has freedom of will and action in every way. Her position is not different from that of men, except as much as is demanded by her especial psychological traits that differ from those of man — that is, hers is a sentimental life while that of man is intellectual. For this reason, man has been given a major share in general wealth, in order that the management based on intellect and contemplation — in the world in general — may outbalance the management based on feelings and sentiments. But the deficiency of her share has been more than made up by giving her overwhelming share in usufruct. Also, she is obliged to obey her husband in conjugal relations, and has been compensated for it with dowry. Likewise she is disqualified from occupying the position of a judge, a ruler or a fighting soldier, as these are the responsibilities that can best be discharged through contemplation, rather than emotion. This has been balanced by making the men responsible for the women's security and safety, for protection of their honour and dignity. Man bears the burden of earning the livelihood and maintaining the wife, the children and the parents; while woman has been given the right of custody of children — without making it obligatory for her. All these rules have been counter-balanced with other things the women are obliged to do, like wearing ḥijāb (اَلْحِجَابُ = veil), not mingling with men, looking after the household and bringing up the children.

The question may be asked: Why has Islam not allowed the [women with their] emotions and sentiments to occupy such public offices as defence, judiciary and rulership? Why does it refuse to give these departments into her hands? The answer may be found in the bitter harvest which humanity is reaping in modern days as a result of the domination of sentimentality on thought and contemplation. Just ponder on the great World Wars (the gifts of the modern civilization) and on the conditions prevailing throughout the world; then review them in the light of intellect and emotional feeling; you may then easily see where the temptation springs from and what offers good and sincere advice. And Allāh is the Guide.

Moreover, the civilized nations of the West, since last many centuries, have spared no effort — have rather gone out of their way — to teach and train the girls together with the boys, in order that their potentials of perfection may be turned into reality. Nevertheless, if you look at the Who's Who of politicians and statesmen, legislators and judges, and military leaders and generals (the three above-mentioned fields of gevernment, judiciary and war) you will not find women's names there in any considerable number, nor can their numbers be compared with the hundreds, rather thousands, of men's names. This in itself provides the most telling evidence that women by their nature, are not suitable for training in these fields — which per se require deep contemplation and planning; and the more chance is given to emotions to infiltrate into them, the more frustration and failure follows.

This and other similar observations provide conclusive rebuttal to the well-known theory that the only reason why women lag behind in society is the insufficient training given to them since the earliest days of human history; had they been given good and useful training, then — with their sentimentality and fine feelings — they would have overtaken or gone ahead of the men in all aspects of perfection. But this argument is almost like a selfdefeating syllogism. [The reality is the other way round.] Because it is the women's exclusive — or predominant — attachment to emotional feelings, that has kept them behind in all those fields which demand strong reasoning and domination of thinking over sentiments, like governing and judiciary; and has let the group having these qualities, that is, men, go ahead of them in these professions. Definitive experiments have proved that when a person possesses some psychological traits in strong measures, his/her training in related professions and occupations can be carried out very successfully. It naturally follows that men can be successfully trained in the fields of government and judiciary, and will surpass the women in achieving perfection in these spheres. On the other hand, the women's training in matters connected with sentiments and feelings can succeed tremendously, as for example in some branches of medical profession, painting, weaving and embroidery, as well as bringing up children, nursing sick persons, decoration, cosmetics and things like that. In other fields both sexes have equal chances of advancement.

Moreover, if, as is claimed, the women's backwardness in the above-mentioned masculine fields is attributed only to chance, it should have, at least for some eras in the long human history, broken down or reversed itself — and they say that mankind is millions of years old. The same applies to those typically feminine activities in which men are behind. Really these are inherent characteristics which are inseparable from human society; and if we start counting these realities as mere casual and chancy affairs — especially when they are in total conformity with inner workings of human physique — then we cannot put our hands on a single characteristic in the whole human world which we could say was natural and intrinsic to man, be it his inclination to social life and society, his love of knowledge, or his curiosity that leads him to discover the hidden secrets of nature, and things like that. These too are inseparable attributes of humanity, and human structure is in complete agreement with these traits and characteristics. That is why we say they are natural attributes.

The same principle applies to women's advancement in luxuries and sentimental affairs and to their backwardness in intellectual matters or the affairs entailing severe hardships and dangers. This too is based on their natural characteristics. The opposite is true in those matters in which men are advanced or behind.

The only thing that remains is the offence that women might take at attribution of perfect intellect to men and of perfect sentimentality and feelings to them (women). But this objection is not tenable. In the eyes of Islam, intellect and sentiments both are valuable divine gifts, ingrained in human nature for truly divine purposes; neither has any excellence over the other. [Neither has any hand in achieving any honoured position before Allāh.] Honour entirely depends on piety. As for other attributes — whatever they may be — they grow and develop only if they proceed on the right path; otherwise they turn into evil burdens, undesirable loads.

6. Modern Inheritance Laws

These laws and codes had got support from, and were influenced by, Islamic laws of inheritance — although they differ from it in quantity (of shares) and mode (of division) as we shall describe here in short. There is a lot of difference between the stand taken by Islam and that of these legislations as far as women's inheritance is concerned.

As for Islam, it had initiated a thing which the world had never known, nor the earlier generations were ever told of by their progenitors; while these later laws were legislated when the Islamic laws were firmly established and constantly implemented in the Muslim ummah inhabiting a greater part of the then known world; hundreds of millions of people had been practising this code for more than a millennium, the progenies inheriting it from their ancestors. Obviously when a novel idea is put into practice and is accepted and implemented, and thus becomes a permanent feature of the society, then it becomes very easy for similar principles to appear on the scene. Every preceding social custom provides the ideational substance for similar following customs; rather the former becomes the substance that is reshaped into the latter. Therefore, no social scientist should spurn the fact that the modern inheritance laws have got support from the Islamic inheritance code that had preceded them, and that it is the Islamic code which they have remoulded into their statutes — we are not concerned here whether they could do justice to it or not.

The most amusing is the claim sometimes made — may Allāh destroy the ignorance of the yore! — that the new laws have got their ideas and substance from the ancient Roman code. You have already seen what that ancient Roman custom was, and what the Islamic sharī'ah has offered to the mankind. The Islamic code came into being and was implemented after the old Roman code and long before the modern Western laws; it was deeply rooted in the societies of millions, nay, hundreds of millions, of people continuously for long centuries. It is impossible to suggest that such a living code remained ineffective and did not influence the thinkings of these legislators.

Even more strange is the assertion by some writers that the Islamic code of inheritance was adapted from the ancient Roman code!

However, the modern laws prevalent in the Western nations, in spite of their differences in some details, are almost unanimous on one point: They treat females as equal to males in inheritance shares; the daughters and sons get equal shares as do the mothers and fathers, and so on.

The French code has divided the heirs in the following classes: i) Sons and daughters; ii) fathers and mothers, and brothers and sisters; iii) grand-fathers and grand-mothers; iv) Paternal and maternal uncles and aunts. It has kept the marriage-tie separate from this classification, saying that it is based on the foundation of love. We are not concerned here with its details or description of other classes. If anyone wants it he should look into the relevant books.

But what we are concerned with is the net result of this prevalent customs. This type of legislation makes the woman equal partner of man in the wealth of the world — taken as a whole. Yet they have put the wife under the guardianship of the husband; she has no right to manage or control her own inherited property — except with the consent and permission of her husband. It means that although the world's wealth is divided half and half between man and woman (so far as ownership is concerned), the total wealth is placed in the hands of the man (so far as its management and control is concerned). Now, some groups and parties have risen up which are trying to make women truly independent owners of their properties, taking them out of men's control and guardianship. If they succeed, then the men and the women would be really equal in ownership as well as in control and management.

7. Comparison of these Codes: One with Another

We have already described.in short the customs which were prevalent in ancient nations in old days. Now we leave it to research scholars to compare one with another and deliver their judgment for each, whether it was perfect or defective, and whether it was beneficial for human society or harmful — in short, whether it was on correct footing on the highroad of felicity and happiness. Then, he may compare the Islamic code with each and judge accordingly.

The basic difference between the Islamic laws and the others is in the respective aims and objectives. Islam intends that the world should achieve its righteousness, goodness and probity; while the other laws want it to get what it desires. All the branches sprout from these two different roots. Allāh says: and it may be that you dislike a thing while it is good for you, and it may be that you love a thing while it is evil for you, and Allāh knows, while you do not know (2:216); and live with them kindly; then if you hate them, it may be that you dislike a thing while Allāh has placed abundant good in it (4:19).

8. Will and Testament

It has been explained that Islam has given the will an independent status, unlinking it from the general rules of inheritance. It is because the will has an independent basis, that is, respecting the owner's wishes concerning what he had possessed in his life. In ancient nations, will was a device which the testator used to give his property — or a part of it — to someone who customarily was not entitled to it, to prevent it from going to the recognized heir, for instance, the father or the head of the family. That was why they were always busy enacting laws putting restrictions on testamentary bestowals lest it nullify the rules of inheritance completely; and such efforts are continuing in those societies upto these days of ours.

On the other hand, Islam has restricted the application of will to a third of the property; it is invalid beyond that limit. Some modern codes, like the French one, has imitated the Islamic principle in this respect; but the aims differ. That is why Islam exhorts people to bequeath, while other laws discourage it or are silent about it.

Meditate on the verses concerning bequest, alms, zakāt, khums, and general spending in the way of Allāh; and you will realize that these laws pave the way for setting aside about half of the properties and two-thirds of their benefits for philanthropy charity, for meeting the needs of the needy and poor. This brings various classes nearer, and narrows the gaps between them, thus strengthening the weaker sections of the society. It is in addition to the guide-lines given to wealthy persons as to how they should use their wealth — which brings them nearer to the poor. We are not going into details of this topic, as it will be written, Allāh willing, in another place.

* * * * *

QUR'ĀN: And as for those who are guilty ... from among you: Atāh and atā bihi (اَتَاهُ،اَتي به = translated here as being guilty) actually means ''doing it''. al-Fāḥishah (اَلْفَاحِشَةُ) is derived from al-fuḥsh (اَلْفُحْشُ = indecency); thus al-fāḥishah means indecent behaviour ; it is generally used in the meaning of fornication; it has also been used in the Qur'ān for sodomy or for sodomy and lesbianism both, as Allāh quotes Lūṭ (a.s.) as saying: Most surely you are guilty of an indecency which none of the nations has ever done before you (29:28).

Apparently this word refers here to fornication, as explained by all the exegetes. They have narrated that when the verse of flogging was revealed, the Prophet said that the flogging is the way Allāh has opened for them when they are guilty of fornication. It is also supported by the style of the verse which clearly shows that this order was to be abrogated soon, as Allāh says: or Allāh makes some way for them; and nobody has said that the penalty of lesbianism was abrogated by any succeeding order, nor that this penalty [of flogging] was meted out to anyone guilty of lesbianism; [all this together shows that this verse is not concerned with sodomy or lesbianism]. The phrase, ''four (witnesses) from among you'', indicates that the witnesses should be males [because the pronoun used for 'you' is of masculine gender].

QUR'ĀN: then if they bear witness confine them ... some way for them: The confinement, that is, perpetual imprisonment, depends on the evidence, not on actual guilt without the required evidence — although it might be known; it is one of the mercies of Allāh on the ummah showing His magnanimity and forbearance.

The punishment is perpetual confinement; it is clearly indicated by the prescribed limit, ''until death takes them away''. But Allāh has not used the word, imprisonment or internment; instead He has said, fa-amsikūhunna (فَأَمْسِكُوهُنَّ) which literally means, then restrain them; the use of this mild word is another clear indication of His indulgence and tolerance.

The clause, ''until death takes them away or Allāh makes some way for them'', means: or Allāh opens a way for them to be free from perpetual confinement. The alternative indicates probable abrogation of the order; and it happened when the rule of flogging replaced this order. Everyone knows that the penalty given to fornicating women — since the later period of the Prophet and in practice among the Muslims after him — is the flogging, not confinement to the houses. The verse, supposing that it contains the rule about the fornicating women, has been abrogated by the verse of flogging; and the way mentioned in this verse undoubtedly refers to flogging.

QUR'ĀN:And as for the two who are guilty of it from among you, afflict them both: The two verses are inter-related, and certainly the pronoun 'it' refers to 'indecency'. It supports the view that both verses deal with punishment of fornication. The second verse therefore completes the order given in the first one; the first one had explained the law only to the extent it affected the women, while the second one describes the rule as it affects both parties — and it is the 'affliction'. So the two verses together explain the rule of fornicating man and fornicating woman both — that both should be afflicted and the confinement of the women to the houses.

But this explanation does not agree with the following clause: then if they repent and amend, turn aside from them; obviously it does not fit in with the order of confining the women for the life. Therefore, it is necessary to say that turning aside from them refers to discontinuation of their punishment while the confinement continues as before.

That is why sometimes it is said — following some traditions which shall be quoted later — that the first verse speaks about those women who are not virgin while the second one gives the order about the virgins; accordingly the virgins who commit fornication should be punished by confining them to the houses until they repent and amend their behaviour, and then they may be released from the confinement. But this explanation leaves two problems unsolved:

First: Why should the first verse be reserved for non-virgins and the second one to virgins when there is nothing in the wordings to support this differentiation?

Second: Why does the first verse speak about the fornicating women only, while the second one talks about both parties: ''And as for the two who are guilty of it from among you ...''?

It has been said that according to the exegete, Abū Muslim, the first verse ordains the law about lesbianism, and the second one about sodomy, and that both verses are un-abrogated.

But that view too is obviously wrong. As for the first verse, the explanation given by us earlier (for the words, As for those who are guilty of indecency from among your women ...), proves untenability of Abū Muslim's interpretation. As for his explanation of the second verse, it is rejected by the well-established sunnah that the penalty of sodomy is death. The correct ḥadīth of the Prophet says: ‘‘Whoever among you commits the sin of the people of Lūṭ, kill (both) the doer and (the man) done to.’’ This law is either from the beginning (which has not been abrogated); or is a subsequent law which has abrogated the verse; in any case, it refutes Abū Muslim’s views.

Looking at the apparent meaning of the two verses (which come to the mind at once), and at the associations found with them; and keeping in view the difficulties arising out of the given explanations, we may interpret the verses as follows — and Allāh knows better:

The verse lays down the law concerning adultery by married women. Also the fact that the verse mentions only women, and not men, indicates this meaning; the word, ‘women’, is commonly used for ‘wives’ and especially when it appears as first construct of a genitive case where the second construct is ‘men’, as is the position in this verse: ‘‘you [i.e., you men’s] women’’; also Allāh says: And give women their dowries as a free gift (4:4); ...of your women to whom you have gone in (4:23).

Accordingly, the first and temporary order was to confine them to the houses; then stoning was ordained for them. al-Jubbā’ī has used this example to prove that the Book may be abrogated by the sunnah; but it is not so. Abrogation repeals an order which was apprently meant to continue for ever; while this order of confinement contains a clause that points to its temporariness, and it is the words: or Allāh makes some way for them. These words clearly show that there was another order that would be promulgated later. Even if it were called ‘abrogation’, there would be no trouble; because it would not contain those difficulties which were inherent in abrogating the Book with the sunnah — the Qur’ān itself indicates here that this order was to be repealed after sometime; and the Prophet is the one who explains the meaning of the honoured Qur’ān.

The second verse promulgates the rule about fornication (other than adultery), that the parties should be afflicted; that punishment includes confinement, hitting them with shoes, admonishing and shaming them by harsh words or other such ways of hurting them. Accordingly this verse stands abrogated by the verse of flogging in the chapter of ‘The Light’. As for a tradition that this verse speaks about virgin girls who commit fornication, it is a khabaru 'l-wāḥid [1], apart from being al-mursalah [2], and therefore weak. And Allāh knows better. (However, this interpretation is not free from weakness, because prior indication that a certain rule would be abrogated later, does not water down the abrogation.)

QUR'ĀN: then if they repent and amend, turn aside from them: Repentance is qualified by amendment; it is to establish the reality of repentance, to make it clear that repentance is not mere utterance of some words or just to be carried away by some pangs of conscience; [it requires definite improvement of behaviour and character].

TRADITIONS

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said about the word of Allāh: And as for those who are guilty of indecency from among your women ..., that it was abrogated and that the 'way' [referred to here] was the laid down penal code. (al-Kāfī)

al-Bāqir (a.s.) was asked about this verse and he said: ''It is abrogated.'' He was asked: ''How was it?'' He said: ''When a woman committed indecency [i.e., fornication], and four witnesses stood (to give evidence) against her, she was confined to a house; no one spoke to or talked with her, nor anyone sat with her; she was provided her food and drink — [this was to continue] until she died or Allāh made some way for her.'' Then he said: ''Making way (for her) is the flogging and stoning.'' It was said: ''(And what is the meaning of the words of Allāh:) And as for the two who are guilty of it ...?'' He said: ''It means, when a virgin is guilty of the indecency which was done by this non-virgin.'' [He was asked the import of the words:] afflict them both. He said: ''She will be confined.'' ... (ibid.)

The author says: The story that the rule in the early days of Islam

But you have seen what is to be said in this context.

COMMENTARY

These two verses are not without a certain connection with the preceding two which had ended on the theme of repentance, possibly all four might have been revealed together. Nevertheless, these two independently throw light on a theme which is among the most sublime Islamic realities and highest Qur'ānic teachings, and that is the reality of repentance and its significance as well as the rules governing it.

QUR'ĀN: Repentance with Allāh is only for those who do evil in ignorance, then turn (to Allāh) soon: ''at-Tawbah'' (اَلتَّوْبَةُ) means to return. It signifies returning of a servant to Allāh with remorse for his misdeeds and a firm intention to leave the way that was distancing him from the path of servitude. When ascribed to Allāh, it means that Allāh returns towards His servant with mercy, (first) forgiving his sin. We have repeatedly said that, according to the Qur'ān, a servant's single repentance is flanked by two returnings from Allāh. The fact is that repentance is a good deed, a virtuous act which requires strength and will-power; and all virtues emanate from Allāh, and all power and strength belongs to Him. It is Allāh who manages the affairs in a way that the servant becomes able to repent, gets strength to cut himself off from the factors which were taking him away from Allāh, and thus he returns to his Lord. After being helped in this way to repent from his sins and to return to Allāh, he again needs a second 'returning' by Allāh in order that he could be cleansed from those impurities, purified from those pollutions, so that he may reach and be settled near his Lord — this second returning again shows divine mercy and compassion as well as His forgiveness and pardon.

These two divine returnings are the two 'repentances' which surround a servant's repentance and returning. Allāh says: then He turned to them (mercifully) that they might turn (to Him) ... (9:118). This refers to the first returning. Again He says: these it is to whom I turn (mercifully) ... (2:160); and this is the second returning; between these two divine returnings comes the servant's returning, his repentance.

The starting clause, ''Repentance with Allāh is only for those ...'' literally means: Repentance on (عَلي = 'alā) Allāh is only for (لِ = li) those ... 'alā (on) and li (for) denote harm and benefit, respectively; as we say: 'Adversities came on 'Amr (عَلي عَمْرٍو = 'alā 'Amr) to the benefit of (لِزَيْدٍ = li Zayd) Zayd. Or as we say: The race was for (li) X on ('alā) Y, that is, X won the race against Y. It is because 'alā (on) implies height and domination; and li (for) denotes possession and right. Consequently, in the matters involving two parties (like war, fighting and dispute, in which one party gets some benefits and the other is harmed, one overpowers and the other is overpowered), the victor acquires some rights over the vanguished, and the latter is prevailed upon, ruled over. The same is the case in similar situations. Look, for example, at the effect between an influencing factor and the influenced, or at the link a promise creates between the giver of promise and the one to whom it was given, and so on. It is now clear that the two prepositions ('alā and li) have acquired the connotations, of harm and benefit, respectively, because of contexts in which they are frequently used — not because it is their original meaning.

Now, let us see, how repentance succeeds, why it benefits the servants of Allāh. It is because of a promise which Allāh has given to the servants; in this way He Himself has made it obligatory for Himself to accept their repentance. He has said in this verse: ''Repentance with (on) Allāh is only for those who do evil in ignorance''. In this way it becomes obligatory for Allāh to accept His servant's repentance. It does not mean that anyone else can obligate Allāh to do something, or can prescribe a duty for Him — it makes no difference whether you call that one the reason, the nature of the affair, the reality, or the truth; or give it any other name, Allāh is Greater and Holier than such ascriptions. Rather this matter is based on the fact that Allāh has promised His servants that He would accept the repentance of those who would repent; and He does not break His promise. This is the implication of the statement that it is obligatory for Allāh to accept and grant the repentance in relevant situations. And it is the connotation of every declaration where we say that a certain action is al-wājib (اَلْوَاجِبُ = obligatory) for Allāh.

Obviously, the verse is focussed not on a servant's repentance, but on Allāh's returning with mercy towards that servant, although in this process it inevitably throws light on matters related to the servant's repentance. Allāh's returning (with all its conditions) cannot remain separate from the servant's repentance (with all its conditions fulfilled). This topic, that the verse is meant to describe Allāh's returning, does not require further explanation.

Secondly, it covers all types of repentance, whether the servant repents from polytheism and disbelief and returns to the true faith, or from sin and disobedience and returns to obedience (if he is already a believer). The Qur'ān calls both aspects as repentance. Allāh says: Those who bear the throne and those around it celebrate the praise of their Lord and believe: ''Our Lord! Thou embracest all things in mercy and knowledge, therefore grant forgiveness to those who turn (to Thee) and follow Thy way ... (40:7). Here, the words, 'those who turn (to Thee)', mean, those who believe, because previously it has been said: and ask forgiveness for those who believe. Thus belief has been called at-tawbah (اَلتَّوْبَةُ = repentance), In another verse, Allāh says (referring to some believers): then He turned to them (mercifully) that they might turn (to Him), (9:118).

The generality found in the next verse, And repentance is not for those ..., proves that repentance, as envisaged in these verses, covers repentance from polytheism and disbelief as well as from sin and disobedience, because the verse comments on situations of disbelievers and believers both. Accordingly, the clause, ''those who do evil in ignorance'', encompasses both the believers and the disbelievers; a disbeliever is included, like a disobeying believer among ''those who do evil in ignorance''. How? It is because disbelief is an action of heart and 'doing evil' covers deeds of heart too like those of other organs; or because disbelief always brings evil actions in its wake. Therefore, ''those who do evil in ignorance'', refers to a disbeliever as well as to a disobeying believer — provided they are not wilfully obstinate in their disbelief or sin.

As for the words, ''in ignorance'', obviously ignorance, per se, is opposite of knowledge. People are conscious of the fact that they do all their deeds with knowledge and will; and that the will emanates from a certain love or longing. It makes no difference whether that action is likeable in the eyes of the society's sages or not; but it is believed that a man of discriminating intelligence will not commit an evil censured by the sages. Based on this assumption they believe that anyone who, being overcome by psychological bent, or motives of desire or anger, commits any blameworthy evil deed, does so only because he becomes oblivious of knowledge, and consequently loses his sagacity which distiguishes between good and bad, between praiseworthy and blameworthy: in this manner, he is overpowered by desire and commits evil. That is why they call it ignorance, although in reality it could not be done without a degree of knowledge and will. But as his knowledge of the indecency and evil of that action did not prevent him from falling into that trap, that knowledge was discounted as nonknowledge, and he was called ‘ignorant’. That is why they call a young inexperienced person ‘ignorant’ as his actions are governed by desire, and raw sentiments and emotions dominate his life. Also it is for the same reason that they do not call an unrepentant sinner (who feels no remorse for his sins and does not turn away from desires and sentimentalities) ‘ignorant’; his condition is rather called obstinacy and willfulness, etc.

It is now clear that ignorance in this context means doing an evil deed under the influence of desire or anger — without being obstinate in face of truth. It is an intrinsic nature of such deeds (done in ignorance) that when the storm subsides and the inflamed desire or anger is extinguished — be it because of doing that evil, or because of some hindrance, or because of passage of time, or weakening of powers, or through ill health — the man returns to the knoweldge and that ignorance goes away; then he feels remorse for what he had done.

But this process does not take place in the evil which is done because of obstinacy and willfulness, etc. Such evil is not done because of some agitation of a power or inflamation of desire or sentiments; its root cause is what they call malevolence of nature, wickedness of heart. There is no hope that one day it will go away after the inflamed passion has subsided. It would rather continue throughout the life without his feeling any remorse in near future — except that Allāh wills it.

Of course, it happens sometimes that an obstinate stubborn person turns away from his obstinacy and stubborness; and instead of confronting the truth he now submits to it and enters into the fold of servitude. This change proves that even his obstinacy was based on ignorance. And why not? In actuality every disobedience emanates from man’s ignorance. From this point of view, no one could be called an obstinate and stubborn sinner except the one who never turns away from his evil deeds to the last moment of his life and health.

The above discourse shows the significance of the divine words, ‘‘then turn (to Allāh) soon’’. The man who does evil because of ignorance, would not remain busily engaged in his misdeed, addicted to it all his life; he would not do as obstinate stubborn ones do who never show any sign of returning to piety and submission. He would rather turn away from that misdeed and return to Allāh soon. The adverb. ‘soon’, refers to nearness of time; and it means, ‘before death comes to him and before the signs of the other world appear before his eyes'.

Of course, every obstinate and stubborn person becomes contrite when he is faced with unpleasant consequences and chastisement of his evil deeds; he then disavows his deeds, shows repulsion towards them. But actually he is not repentant in his heart; his remorse does not emanate from any reform of character. It is merely a device, his wicked soul has adopted for saving himself from the consequences of his evil activities. Proof? As soon as that particular punishment is averted, he returns to the same evil-doing. Allāh says: and if they were sent back, they would certainly go back to that which they are forbidden, and most surely they are Tiers (6:28).

Why do we say that the word, 'soon', here means: before the signs of death appear before him? It is because Allāh says in the second verse: And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds, until when death comes to one of them, he says: ''Surely now I repent.''

Accordingly, the clause, ''then turn (to Allāh) soon'', is an adverse indirect allusion to those who go on postponing repentance until its chances are lost for ever.

The above discourse shows that the two clauses, ''in ignorance'' and ''then turn (to Allāh) soon'', are exclusive conditions. The former means that the servant does not do evil in arrogance and obstinacy; the latter, that he does not delay his repentance until the death-time — showing his indifference, negligence and procrastination. Repentance, after all, is man's returning to Allāh with firm intention of serving Him. Allāh's turning then means that He accepts that servant's return to Him. But service and worship of Allāh has no meaning if there is no time left in this world; because it is this worldly life which is the arena of the free choice and the place of obedience and disobedience. When the signs of death appear, the free will and choice — the basis of obedience and disobedience — ceases to exist. Allāh says: On the day when some of the signs of your Lord shall come, its faith shall not profit a soul which did not believe before, or earn good through its faith (6:158); But when they saw Our punishment, they said: ''We believe in Allāh alone and we deny what we used to associate with Him.''But their belief was not going to profit them when they had seen Our punishment; (this is) Allāh's law, which has indeed obtained in the matter of His servants, and there the unbelievers are lost (40:84 — 85).

In short, the verse says that Allāh accepts the repentance of a disobedient and sinner servant, provided the sin was not committed in haughtiness, showing arrogance towards Allāh (because it would then kill the spirit of repentance and submission to Allāh) and provided the man does not display indifference and tardiness in repentance, neglecting it until death arrives and the chance is lost for ever.

Also, it is possible to treat the clause, ‘‘in ignorance’’, as an explanatory description. The meaning then would be as follows: ‘... those who do evil; and evil is always done in ignorance, as with it man puts himself in danger of painful chastisement’, or, ‘... evil is always done in ignorance, because the evil-doer does not know the reality of disobedience nor the resulting dangers’.

If we adopt this explanation, then the clause, ‘‘then turn (to Allāh) soon’’, would signify their repenting before appearance of signs of death; it would not be an allusion to tardiness in repentance. Why? Because, according to this explanation, those who commit evil deeds because of arrogance, and because they do not submit to their Lord, would be excluded, not by the words, ‘‘in ignorance’’ but by the clause, ‘‘then turn (to Allāh) soon’’; and in that case, this latter clause cannot be an allusion to indifference and negligence. Ponder on it.

But probably the first explanation is more in conformity with the apparent meanings of the verse.

Someone has reportedly said: The words, ‘‘then turn (to Allāh) soon’’, signify that repentance should occur nearer to the time of disobedience, that is, immediately after committing a sin or soon enough to be thought as connected to it. One should not neglect it until the time of death.

Reply: This explanation is wrong, because it undermines the second verse’s meaning. The two verses aim at giving the basic comprehensive principle concerning Allāh’s turning, that is, how and when Allāh accepts a servant's repentance. It may clearly be understood from the particle of exclusion and restriction in the first verse, ‘‘Repentance with Allāh is only for those ...’’. The second verse describes the situations when repentance is not accepted; and it mentions only two situations: i) Repentance of that sinner who goes on neglecting and delaying it until the death arrives; ii) Repentance of an unbeliever who dies in his disbelief. Now, if only that repentance were acceptable which would follow the sin without delay — that which could be thought connected to the sin — then it would give us a third situation where repentance was unacceptable. But the verse mentions only two.

QUR'ĀN: so these it is to whom Allāh turns (mercifully); and Allāh is All-knowing, Wise: The demonstrative pronoun ulā'ika (أُولَٰئِكَ = translated here as 'these') actually means, 'those', and points to distant objects. Its use might be a symbolic expression of the honour and dignity which Allāh wants to bestow on them. The same is the implication of the singular, 'evil', as it indicates an indulgence in reckoning of their sins. Compare it with the plural in the next verse: And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds ...

The verse ends on the clause: ''and Allāh is All-knowing, Wise''; it does not say, Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful. The two divine attributes show why Allāh has opened the door of repentance. It is because He knows His servants' condition, and the effects of their weaknesses and ignorance; and because He, in His wisdom, found it necessary to open some ways to strengthen the system and put the things in good shape. Also, the attributes remind the repenting servant that Allāh is not deceived by appearance, He examines the hearts; deceit and cunning cannot deceive Him; therefore, a repenter must repent in a proper and sincere way, so that Allāh should answer him with mercy and forgiveness.

QUR'ĀN: And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds ... ''Surely, now I repent'': Note that the words, with Allāh, have not been repeated here, although the connotation is the same. This omission gives a clear hint that they have been cut off from the especial divine mercy and care. Also the use of plural, ''evil deeds'', shows that all their misdeeds will be counted and recorded for the final reckoning, as we have mentioned earlier.

The clause, ''who go on doing evil deeds'', as qualified by the following clause, that is, ''until when death comes to one of them'' indicates continuation of action. It is either because carelessness in repentance, postponing it day after day, is in itself a continuously repeated sin; or because it is as though he was going on committing sins incessantly; or because indifference towards repentance generally makes one commit the same or similar sins again and again.

The verse says: ‘‘until when death comes to one of them’’, instead of saying, until when death comes to them. It points to the disdain and indifference with which they treat this matter. Its connotation: Repentance, in their eyes, is such an un-important matter, such an easy thing, that they go on doing what they desire, going the way they wish, without any care. Then when death comes to one of them he says: ‘Surely, now I repent.’ And he thinks that merely by uttering these words, or by just thinking of them in the last moment of his life, the consequences of sins, the perils of disobeying divine commands, will be everted.

This explanation makes it clearer why the words, ‘I repent’, have been qualified by ‘now’. It shows that the speaker is only repenting — in words or thought — because death has overtaken him and now he sees the next world’s overwhelming power before his eyes. In effect it means: I repent as I have now seen the inescapable death and inescapable recompense. Allāh describes a similar plea to be made by the guilty ones on the Day of Resurrection: And could you but see when the guilty shall hang down their heads before their Lord: ‘‘Our Lord! we have seen and we have heard, therefore send us back, so that we do good; surely (now) we are certain.’’ (32:12).

So, that is a repentance that is not acceptable at all: because it is his losing hope of worldly life and the fright of the newly seen horizon that have forced him to feel remorse for his misdeeds and to resolve to return to his Lord. But where is there any chance of returning, when there is no worldly life left and no practical choice available?

QUR’ĀN: nor (for) those who die while they are unbelievers: This is the other case where repentance is not accepted. It concerns a man who continues in his disbelief and dies in disbelief. Allāh does not accept his returning, because on that day his repentance, i.e., his belief, will not benefit him at all. The Qur’ān repeatedly says that there is no deliverance after death if one dies in disbelief, and that they will not get any reply even if they asked and prayed. Allāh says: Except those who repent and amend and make manifest (the truth), these it is to whom I turn (mercifully); and I am the Oft-returning (to mercy), the Merciful. Surely those who disbelieve and die while they are disbelievers, these it is on whom is the curse of Allāh and the angels and men all; abiding in it; their chastisement shall not be lightened nor shall they be given respite (2:160 — 62). Also He says: Surely, those who disbelieve and die while they are unbelievers, the earth full of gold shall not be accepted from one of them, though he should offer to ransom himself with it; these it is who shall have a painful chastisement, and they shall have no helpers (3:91). As explained in the third volume under this verse, the negation of helpers means that they shall have no intercessors.[1]

The qualifying phrase, ‘‘while they are unbelievers’’, indicates that there is a possibility of ‘return’ for a disobedient believer if he dies in disobedience — but without arrogance or negligence. Of course, death will make the idea of the servant’s repentance (his return to the fold of servitude by his own choice) irrelevant, as described above. But Allāh’s return to the servant with forgiveness and mercy may still happen because of the intercessors’ intercession. This in itself is a proof that the two verses primarily aim at describing Allāh’s return to His servant; if they throw some light on the servants’ repentance, on their return to Allāh, it is only incidentally and in passing.

QUR’ĀN: These are they for whom We have prepared a painful chastisement: Again the demonstrative pronoun for distant objects has been used. (The pronoun translated as ‘these’ literally means, ‘those’.) This word, in this context, points to their distance from the courtyard of proximity and honour. al-I‘tād (اَلْاِعْتَادُ = to prepare; to promise).

ON REPENTANCE

Repentance, in its full significance as laid down in the Qur’ān, is among those positive teachings which are exclusive property of the Qur’ān. Repentance, in the meaning of belief after disbelief and polytheism, was common in all divine religions, vis. the religions of Mūsā and ‘Īsā (peace be on both); but it was seen as ‘belief’ and that was that; there was nothing like analysing the reality of repentance and extending it to the belief.

[1] See the Eng. transl. vol.6, pp.235 — 7 (tr.)

Not only that. It appears from the foundations on which the Christianity was built as an independent religion, that repentance is useless and man cannot gain any benefit from it. This may easily be seen in the arguments offered for explaining the crucifixion and atonement; as narrated in the third valume [1] of this book where we have discussed the creation of Christ.

Nevertheless, the Church went so far in the matter of repentance that it was selling indulgence certificates turning it into a merchandise; and the priests were [and are] pardoning sins of those who confessed before them. But as for the Qur'ān, it has analysed man's condition seeing that he has been invited to Allāh and provided with guidance; and looking at the perfection, honour and felicity he is entitled to in the hereafter near Allāh; which is indispensable in his intended journey to his Lord — and that .analysis has found the man utterly poor in his person, empty-handed in his entity. Allāh says: O men! you are the ones who stand in need of Allāh, and Allāh is He Who is the Self-sufficient, the Praised One (35:15). Also He says: ... and they control not for themselves any harm or profit, and they control not death, nor life, nor raising (the dead) to life (25:3).

Therefore, man has fallen in the pit of unhappiness, away from divine proximity, isolated in his neediness, as the words of Allāh point to it: Certainly We created man in the best make. Then We rendered him the lowest of the low (95:4 — 5); And there is not one of you but shall come down to it; this is a decided decree of your Lord. And We will deliver those who were pious, and We will leave the unjust therein on their knees (19:71 — 72); ... therefore let him not drive you both from the garden so that you should be put to toil (20:117).

Consequently, if he wants to achieve the position of honour and enjoy ever-lasting happiness, he must come out from that pit of unhappiness, return from the far away station, and transfer himself to the proximity of his Lord. It is what is called his returning to his Lord in the basic happiness, i.e., true faith, and in secondary happiness, i.e., all good deeds. This is what is called repentance and returning from root of happiness, i.e., polytheism, and branches of unhappiness, i.e., evil deeds other than polytheism. It is on repentance (i.e., returning to Allāh and removing all the pollutions of infelicity and disobedience) that settlement in the abode of honour through true belief depends, as does enjoyment of various bounties of obedience and proximity. In other words, man can reach nearer to Allāh in the appointed abode of honour only if lie repents from polytheism and all disobedience. Allāh says: ... and turn to Allāh all of you, O believers! so that you may be successful (24:31). Thus repentance, in the meaning of returning to Allāh, covers both types of repentance; rather it covers these two and other kinds also, as we shall describe later, Allāh willing.

Man is needy in himself and does not control for himself any good or happiness except by favour of his Lord. Consequently, for this return too, he needs a favour from his Lord and a divine help in his affairs. The servant's return to his Lord with feelings of servitude and dependence needs first a return of his Lord to him with help and support; and it is a return of Allāh to the servant that proceeds repentance of the servant to his Lord, as Allāh has said: ... then He turned to them (mercifully) that they might turn (to Him) ... (9:118). But repentance and return to Allāh is of no use unless Allāh accepts it by forgiving his sins and cleansing him of the pollution of separateness; and this is the second returning of Allāh that follows the servant's repentance, as Allāh has said in the verse under discussion: so these it is to whom Allāh turns (mercifully) ...

On meditating deeply, it will be realized that this plurality of divine returning occurs only when one looks at it vis-a-vis servant's repentance. Otherwise, it is actually a single return; that is, Allāh turns to His servant with mercy and compassion; and it takes place when a servant repents and returns to Allāh — and that mercy covers the servant from before his repentance till after it. Moreover, that merciful divine turning sometimes takes place even without the servant's repentance, as we have earlier inferred from the divine words: nor (for) those who die while they are unbelievers. It has also been explained that granting intercession for sinner servant on the Day of Resurrection is an example of turning mercifully to him. The following verse points to that connotation: And Allāh desires that He should turn to you (mercifully), and those who follow (their) lusts desire that you should deviate (with) a great deviation (4:27),

Nearness and remoteness are relative terms. Therefore, it is quite possible that within circle of nearness some areas would be remoter than the others. In this way, 'repentance' may be used for even those good servants who are nearer to Allāh, when they rise to a station that is even higher and nearer than their previous place. This phenomenon is seen in the verses where Allāh mentions 'repentance' of the prophets even though they are sinless as other verses clearly say For example:

Then Adam received (some) words from his Lord, so He turned to Him mercifully (2:37).

And (remember) when Ibrāhīm and Ismā'īl were raising the foundations of the House: ''Our Lord! accept from us: ... and turn to us (mercifully), surely Thou art Oft-returning (with mercy), the Merciful.'' (2:127 — 8).

... he (Mūsā, a.s.) said: ''Glory be to Thee, I turn to Thee, and I am the first of the believers.'' (7:143).

Therefore be patient (O Prophet!); surely the promise of Allāh is true; and seek pardon for your fault and sing the praise of your Lord in the evening and the morning (40:55). Certainly Allāh has turned (mercifully) to the Prophet and those who fled (their homes) and the helpers who followed him in the hour of straitness ... (9:117).

This is the general 'return' of Allāh which is referred to by many Qur'ānic verses, as for example: The Forgiver of the faults and the Accepter of repentance ... (40:3); And He it is Who accepts repentance from His servants .. (42:25).

The above discourse may be summarized as follows:

First: Bestowal of Allāh's mercy on a servant by forgiving his sins and removing the darkness of disobedience from his heart — whether polytheism or other evils — is Allāh's merciful returning to His servant; and return of a servant to His Lord seeking pardon of his sins and removal of his disobedience — whether polytheism or lesser evils — is the servant's repentance, and his return to his Lord.

It shows that a true Divine Call should be as much concerned with the subject of sins as it should be with polytheism and disbelief; it should invite men to a comprehensive repentance covering polytheism as well as other sins.

Second: Return of Allāh to His servant both the first and the second one — is a grace of Allāh like other bounties which He bestows on His creatures without any coercion or constraint from anyone else. When it is said that by reason it is obligatory for Allāh to accept repentance, its connotation is not different from what is mentioned in many Qur'ānic verses. See, for instance, the following verses: ... and the Accepter of repentance ... (40:3); ... and turn to Allāh all of you, O believers ... (24:31); ... surely Allāh loves those who turn much (to Him) ... (2:222); ... so these it is to whom Allāh turns (mercifully) ... (4:17). These and other such verses praise Allāh for His acceptance of repentance, call people to repent, exhort them to seek forgiveness and turn to their Lord; as such they contain promise of acceptance of repentance, either explicitly or implicitly; and Allāh does not break His promise.

Obviously, Allāh is not under any compulsion to accept repentance; His is the Kingdom and authority without any exception; He does what He pleases to do and decides what He wishes. It is for Him to accept a repentance according to His promise; or to reject that which He rejects, as is clear from the divine words: Surely, those who disbelieve after their believing, then increase in unbelief, their repentance shall never be accepted ... (3:90). Possibly the same is the connotation of the following verse: Surely (as for) those who believe then disbelieve, again believe and again disbelieve, then increase in disbelief, Allāh will not forgive them nor guide them in the (right) path (4:137).

A very strange interpretation has been advanced by a writer concerning the Qur'ānic verses narrating the story of Pharaoh's drowning and repentance: ... until when drowning overtook him, he said: ''I believe that there is no god but He in Whom the children of Israel believe and I am of those who submit.'' What! now! and indeed you disobeyed before and you were of the mischiefmakers (10:90 — 91).

His interpretation, in short, is as follows: The verse does not indicate that Pharaoh's repentance was rejected, nor is there anything in the Qur'ān to show his ever-lasting perdition. It is difficult, for someone who ponders on the spaciousness of God's mercy and its precedence over His wrath, to believe that Allāh would drive him away who was seeking shelter at the door of His mercy and grace, abasing and humiliating himself with abject desperation. Even a human being, after acquiring natural good characteristics of generosity and benevolence, does show mercy to such persons when they are really sorry for the evil deeds they had done before. Then how much mercy will be shown by Him Who is the Most Merciful of all, the Most Generous of all and Who is the Refuge of the refuge-seekers?

Reply: This hypothesis is rebutted by the divine words: And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds, until when death comes to one of them, he says: ''Surely, now I repent,'' nor (for) those who die while they are unbelievers. We have already explained that repentance and regret at that late hour is a falsity; man shows that remorse only because he now clearly sees the consequences of his sins, and looks at the misfortunes of the next life rushing towards him.

Not every remorse is repentance, nor every repentance acceptable. See how Allāh describes the condition of the guilty on the Day of Resurrection: And they shall conceal regret when they shall see the punishment (34:33). There are many other verses describing their regret for what they had done and their plea to be sent back to this world in order that they could do good deeds, and its rebuttal that even if they were returned they would do what they were forbidden to and that they were liars.

You should not imagine even for a moment that the earlier explained Qur'ānic analysis of repentance is merely a mental exercise having no relation with realities. If you contemplate on human felicity and infelicity, goodness and wickedness, you will not get any result other than repentance. Look at a normal man in society, keeping in view the effect of education and bringing up on him. You will find that he by himself is devoid of sociological good and evil; his psyche is capable of accepting both imprints — without any preference to either. Now, let us suppose that he wants to adorn himself with merit and virtue, to acquire piety and righteousness. It will not be possible unless all necessary factors join together to rescue him from the evil conditions he is surrounded with. In spiritual context, it is like the first returning of Allāh to His servant. Then comes the stage of taking himself out of, and away from, the shabby condition and the fetters of tardiness. It is a repentance like that of the servant returning to his Lord. Thereafter comes the final step of removing the rust of mischief and depravity from his heart, so that virtuous characteristics and light of goodness may take its place; because the heart cannot accomodate goodness and vileness together. This is equivalent to the acceptance of repentance and forgiveness — in the context of the subject under discussion. The same process takes place in the matters of collective good of society in which man lives according to natural dictate. All the rules and effects which the religion considers important in matters of repentance are applied in individual and social context too, according to the natural trait which Allāh has created in man.

Third: As may be inferred from all the verses of repentance, including the ones quoted in this discussion, repentance is a reality having real effect on human psyche. It reforms and prepares it for human good which contains felicity of this world and the next. In other words, repentance proves effective — when it does — in removing spiritual evils which pull man to all kinds of infelicity in this life and the hereafter and prevent him from settling on the throne of felicity. But so far as the rules of sharī'ah and laws of religion are concerned they stay in their place. No repentance can waive them as no disobedience can remove them.

Nevertheless, there are some rules which have some links with repentance, and are waived if one repents. This is ordained, keeping in view the interest of the creation; but in no way it means that repentance, per se, waives any of the divine laws. Allāh says: And as for the two who are guilty of it (i.e., indecency) from among you, afflict them both; then if they repent and amend, turn aside from them; surely Allāh is Oft-returning (to mercy), the Merciful (4:16); The punishment of those who wage war against Allāh and His Messenger and strive to make mischief in the land is only this, that they should be killed or crucified or their hands and their feet should be cut off on opposite sides or they should be imprisoned; this shall be as a disgrace for them in this world, and in the hereafter they shall have a grievous chastisement; except those who repent before you have them in your power so know that Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful (5:33 — 34). There are a few other verses of this import.

Fourth: The basic purpose for which the institution of repentance has been established, (as is clear from the above discourse) is to get deliverance from perdition of sin and disaster of disobedience, because repentance is a means of success and is instrumental in achieving felicity, as is implied in the verse: ... and turn to Allāh all of you, O believers! so that you may be successful (24:31).

One of its benefits, apart from the above, is this: It preserves the spirit of hope, lest it be overwhelmed by desperation. Man cannot proceed straight on the path of life unless there is a perfect balance between hope and fear. It is this equilibrium that attracts him to what is beneficial to him and repulses him from what is harmful; otherwise he would have perished. Allāh says: Say: ''O my servants who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allāh; surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. And return to your Lord ...'' (39:53 — 54). Any scholar of human psychology will tell you that man perseveres in his efforts with zeal and ardour as long as his labour seems to bear fruits. But if he finds his efforts going to waste, he feels dejected and depressed, hope gives way to despair and his actions lose vigour and vitality. Often he stops whatever he was doing, as he feels that he can in no way achieve success; he loses heart and is overwhelmed by pessimism. Repentance is the only cure for this disease; it revives his heart even when he has reached the brink of disaster and perdition.

Some people have misunderstood repentance and said that establishment of the institution of repentance and calling people to avail themselves of its benefits was tantamount to inciting them to commit sins and encouraging them to disobey Allāh. When man is sure that if he committed a sin Allāh would accept his repentance, it will surely embolden him to violate the sanctity of divine law, to dive headlong in the abyss of sins and crimes. He will go on committing sin after sin intending to repent after each transgression.

But, in view of what we have explained above, there is no room for this misunderstanding. Apart from the fact that acquirement of virtues depend on remission of sins, repentance is meant to keep the hope alive; and this revival of optimism has its own good effects. There is no question here of a man committing a sin thinking that he would repent afterwards. This objection has missed the point altogether; because such a repentance is totally devoid of the reality of repentance. Repentance is renouncement of sins, and there is no renouncement in the situation mentioned by the objector. Why? Because he had planned to repent before the sin, and with the sin, and after the sin; and how can one feel remorse (i.e., repentance) before the action? The fact is that, in such cases, the whole activity — the sin and the so-called repentance — taken together is one action with one intention; and that is trickery and deception, with which he tries to deceive the Lord of the worlds. But evil plan does not beset any except its authors.

Fifth: Sin is an evil stand of man and has bad effect on his life. Consequently, he cannot repent, cannot turn away from it, unless first he realizes, and is sure of, its evil. This knowledge and certainty cannot fail to produce regret and remorse for it. Remorse is a particular psychological response to committing an evil deed. When that remorse takes hold, then man may change his direction to do some good deeds, opposite to that evil one. This second step will be a proof that he has really repented and returned to his Lord.

This forms the basis of all the formalities and manners of repentance laid down by the sharī'ah, e.g., expressing regret, asking for forgiveness, acquiring habit of doing good deeds, discarding evil deeds, and other related things described in the traditions and the books of ethics.

Sixth: Repentance means returning, by one's free will and choice, from evil and sin to obedience and servitude. As such, it can take place only where man has free choice, i.e., in the life of this world. But where there is no freedom to choose between good and bad, between felicity and infelicity, there is no room for repentance. The preceding discourse throws light on this aspect.

A field where repentance is ineffective and inadmissible, is violation of other people's rights; because repentance is beneficial concerning Allāh's rights only. If a sin has violated other people's rights, more repentance will do no good at all; the victims' pleasure must be obtained if the sinner wants to erase that sin. Allāh has given some rights to people in their properties, honour and lives. According to the divine law, it is an injustice and transgression to violate these rights. He cannot grant remission if someone transgresses any of these rights. Otherwise it would be tantamount to depriving the victims of their due rights without any mistake on their part. Far be it from Him to do injustice when He has forbidden us to do it; He has said: Surely Allāh does not do any injustice to men (10:44).

Nevertheless, Islam — being repentance from polytheism — erases every preceding evil, every past sin, which concerns the branches of religion. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has said: ''The Islam cuts away all (that had happened) before it''. This is the connotation of those verses which declare that all sins will be forgiven. For example, Allāh says: Say: ''O my servant! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allāh; surely Allāh forgives the faults altogether; surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. And return to your Lord and submit to Him ... (39:53 — 54).

Another example is the repentance of a person who originates an evil custom or leads people astray. According to numerous traditions, his chastisement will be equal to that of all those who followed him in that evil custom or went astray. Obviously, reality of 'return' cannot take place in such cases, because he had established something whose effect would persist as long as that thing continues. Unlike those sins which are confined between the servant and his Lord, it is almost impossible for an originator of an evil custom to undo what he has done.

Seventh: No doubt, repentance erases the sins where it is effective and admissible, as Allāh says: To whomsoever then the admonition has come from his Lord, then he desists, for him shall be what has already passed, and his affair rests with Allāh (2:275), as has already been explained in the second volume [1] . Also look at the following verse: Except him who repents and believes and does a good deed; so these are they of whom Allāh changes the evil deeds to good ones; and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful. And whoever repents and does good, he surely turns to Allāh a (goodly) turning (25:70 — 71). Its apparent meaning, especially in view of the second verse, shows that repentance, by itself or in conjunction with belief and good deeds, causes evil deeds to change to good ones.

All this is true. But the fact remains that keeping away from evil deeds is far better than committing a sin and then erasing it through repentance. Allāh has made it clear in His book that sins, of whatever type they may be, ultimately have some links with Satanic insinuation and temptation. On the other hand He has portrayed His pure-hearted servants, those who are free from sins and evils, in a way that cannot be equalled by all praises revealed for the others: [Satan] said: ''My Lord! because Thou hast left me to stray, I will certainly make (evil) fair-seeming to them on earth, and I will certainly cause them all to go astray. Except Thy servants from among them, the freed ones.'' He said: ''This is a straight path with Me. Surely, as regards My servants, thou hast no authority over them ... (15:39 — 42). Also Allāh says quoting Iblis in the same story: ... and Thou shalt not find most of them thankful (7:17).

So, these sinless people have a especial prestigious position in the circle of servitude that is not shared by other good repenting servants.

TRADITIONS

The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, inter alia, in his last sermon: ‘‘Whoever repents one year before his death, Allāh will turn (mercifully) to him.’’ Then he said: ‘‘Surely, a year is too long; whoever repents one month before his death, Allāh will turn (mercifully) to him.’’ Then he said: ‘‘Surely a month is too long; whoever repents one day before his death, Allāh will turn (mercifully) to him.’’ Then he said: ‘‘Surely a day is too long; whoever repents one hour before his death, Allāh will turn (mercifully) to him.’’ Then he said: ‘‘Surely an hour is too long; whoever repents while his soul has reached here’’ — and he pointed with his hand to his throat — ‘‘Allāh will turn (mercifully) to him.’’ (Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l faqīh)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said when he was asked about the word of Allāh, And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds, until when death comes to one of them, he says: ‘‘Surely now I repent’’: ‘‘That is, when he looks at the affairs of the next world.’’

The author says: al-Kulaynī has narrated the first tradition in al-Kāfī through his chain from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.); it is also narrated through the Sunnī chains, and there are other traditions too of the same import.

The second tradition gives the explanation of the verse; also it explains those traditions which say that repentance in presence of death is not accepted. Accordingly ‘‘in presence of death’’ means ‘when man knows that the process of death has begun, and sees the signs of the hereafter’; it is at that point that the door of repentance is closed against him. But if a man is unaware of his impending death, then there is no snag in acceptance of his repentance. Some of the following traditions have similar meaning.

Zurārah has narrated from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘When the soul reaches here’’, pointing to his larynx, ‘‘then there is no repentance for the knower; but there is repentance for the ignorant.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr that Aḥmad, al-Bukhārī (in his at-Tafsīr), al-Ḥākim and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Abū Dharr, that he said: ''Surely the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Surely Allāh accepts repentance of His servant, or forgives His servant, until the curtain comes down.' It was asked: 'And what is the coming down of curtain?' He said: 'The soul goes out while a polytheist.' ''

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from al-Ḥasan that he said: ''[A report] has come to me that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Verily Iblīs said when he found that Adam had cavity [in his body]: ''By Thy honour! I will not leave his cavity as long as there was soul inside him.'' Then Allāh, the Blessed, the High, said: ''By My honour! I will not come between him and repentance as long as there was soul inside him.'' ' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

'Alī al-Aḥmasī has narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: ''By Allāh! None gets deliverance from sins except he who confesses them.'' Also he has narrated from the same Imām (a.s.): ''Enough is remorse for repentance.'' (al-Kāfī)

It is narrated in al-Kāfī through two chains from Ibn Wahb that he said: ''I heard Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) saying: 'When the servant repents, a sincere repenting, Allāh loves him and covers him.' I said: 'And how does He cover him?' He said: 'He makes his two angels forget what they had written against him; then He inspires his limbs and the areas of the earth to conceal his sins. Thus he meets Allāh — when he meets Him — and there is nothing to give evidence against him concerning his sins.' ''

Muḥammad ibn Muslim has narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: ''O Muḥammad ibn Muslim! sins of the believer are forgiven to him when he repents from them. Therefore, the believer should perform his deeds afresh after repentance and forgiveness. But, by Allāh! it is not but for the people of faith.'' ''I said: 'But what if he relapses into sins after repentance and forgiveness, and then repents again?' He said: 'O Muḥammad ibn Muslim! do you think that a believer servant feels remorse for his sin and asks forgiveness from Allāh for it and repents and then Allāh will not accept his repentance?' I said: 'Then if he does so repeatedly; commits sin and repents and asks forgiveness?' Then he said: 'Whenever the believer returns asking for forgiveness and repenting, Allāh the High, returns to him with forgiveness; and surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful; He accepts repentance and pardons the evils.

Therefore, be careful, lest you make the believers lose hope of Allāh's mercy.' '' (al-Kāfī)

Abū 'Amr az-Zubayrī narrates from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, And most surely lam most forgiving to him who repents and believes and does good, then continues to follow the right direction [20:82], that he (a.s.) said: ''This verse has an explanation, which explanation is proved [by the fact] that Allāh does not accept any deed from any servant except from him who meets Him with fulfilment of that explanation, and with that condition which Allāh has imposed on the believers.'' And he said: ''Repentance with Allāh is only for those who do evil in ignorance; Allāh means that every sin which the servant does — although he may be aware of it — he is ignorant when he thinks in his heart to disobey his Lord; and Allāh has spoken about it quoting the talk of Yūsuf to his brothers: Do you know how you treated Yūsuf and his brother when you were ignorant? [12:89]. So he charged them with ignorance because they planned in their hearts to commit sin against Allāh.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: The text of the narration is not free from confusion and disarray. Apparently the ealier portion is meant to show that good deed is accepted when the servant fulfils its condition and does not destroy it. After all, repentance is acceptable only when it restrains and prevents the repenter from sin — even for a limited time.

And probably the text, ''And he said: Repentance with Allāh is only for those ... '', is a new topic, to show that the word, in ignorance, in this verse is an explanatory clause, and that sin in general is ignorance — it has already been given as an alternative explanation in the commentary. This latter part is narrated also in Majma'u 'l-bayān from the same Imām (a.s.).

COMMENTARY

The talk returns to the subject of women, guiding the Muslims about some related matters. This piece contains the clause, and live with them in a proper manner; then if you hate them, it may be that you dislike a thing while Allāh has placed abundant good in it. It is a basic Qur'ānic principle which regulates woman's social life.

QUR'Ā: O you who believe! it is not lawful for you that you should inherit women against (their) will: The Arabs of the era of ignorance counted wives of a deceased person as part of his inheritance if the woman was not the heir's mother, as history and traditions have reported. The heirs took the widow as part of their share; one of them threw a cloth on her and she became his property. If he wished, he married her, inheriting the deceased's marriage — without giving her a fresh dowry. If he disliked marrying her, he held her in his custody; then if he was so pleased, he gave her in marriage to someone and used her dowry himself; and if he wished, he kept her in straitened condition, not allowing her to marry, until she died and he inherited her property, if she had any.

Apparently, the verse forbids some custom that was prevalent among them; and as some exegetes have written, it could be the above-mentioned system of inheriting the widows. But the clause, ''against (their) will'', does not agree with this interpretation, whether we take it as an explanatory clause or a restrictive one. If it were taken as explanatory clause, it would imply that that inheritance was always disliked by women, always happened against their will — and obviously it was not so. If it were taken as a restrictive clause, it would mean that that inheritance was unlawful nly if it took place against the woman's will, but there was no harm if she freely agreed to it — but this too is not correct.

Of course, dislike and unwillingness was a certainty when the heirs prevented them from re-marrying, coveting, in all or most cases, their property after taking their possession by inheritance. Obviously, it is this factor — contriving to inherit the woman's property against her will — which this verse has forbidden.

As for marrying them by inheritance, this verse does not deal with it; that is forbidden by a coming verse, which says: And marry not women whom your fathers married ... So far as the custom of giving them in marriage to someone else and usurpation of their dowry by the concerned heir is concerned, it is forbidden by such verses as: and women shall have the benefit of what they earn (4:32). Also the verse: ... then when they have fully attained their term, there is no blame on you for what they do for themselves in a proper manner (2:234), discredits the whole custom, guiding the people to the Islamic way.

As for the words: and do not straiten them in order that you may take ..., they do not refer to the afore-mentioned prevention of their re-marrying (with intention of getting their property on their death), because the subsequent clause: in order that you may take part of what you have given them, clearly speaks about taking away part of the dowry which the oppressing husband himself had given her; it does not refer to any property which she might have got from other sources.

In short, the verse stops men from inheriting women's property against their will; it is not concerned with the custom of taking women themselves as part of inheritance. Accordingly, either the word, 'women', metaphorically refers to their property, or the word, 'property of', is implied before it.

QUR'ĀN: and do not straiten them in order that you may take part of what you have given them, unless they are guilty of manifest indecency: The conjunctive, 'and', conjoins it either with the preceding: that you should inherit, (in which case it should be translated: nor that you should straiten them), or with: it is not lawful for you, (taking the negative present tense as equivalent to prohibitive mood). al-'Aḍl (اَلْعَضْلُ = to prevent, to straiten, to put in difficulty); al fāḥishah (اَلْفَاحِشَةُ = indecency; it is mostly used for fornication); al-mubayyanah (اَلْمُبَيَّنَةُ = clear). Sībawayh has reportedly said that abāna, istabāna, bayyana, tabayyana (اَبَانَ،اِسْتَبَانَ،بَيَّنَ،تَبَيَّنَ) all have the same meaning, and are used both as transitive and intransitive — all of them are used to say, for example: The thing became clear, or, I made the thing clear.

The verse makes it unlawful to put the wife in straitened condition — in any way — with intention of compelling her to pay back to the husband a part of dowry for dissolution of marriage-tie, so that she may extricate herself from that difficult life. Imposing such difficulties with this intention is unlawful for the husband. Of course, if the wife commits manifest indecency, i.e., adultery, then he may put restrictions on her, keeping her in straitened condition, in order that she may pay him something to obtain divorce.

This verse is not in conflict with the verse 229 of the chapter of 'The Cow': and it is not lawful for you to take any part of what you have given them, unless both fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh; then if you fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh, there is no blame on them for what she gives up to become free thereby. It is a specification; the verse of the chapter of 'The Women' specifies the one of the chapter of 'The Cow', by restricting it to the case of fornication. Moreover, the payment mentioned in the chapter of 'The Cow' refers to that which is given by mutual agreement, and that cannot particularize this verse.

QUR'ĀN: and live with them in a proper manner; ... abundant good in it: ''al-Ma'rūf'' (اَلْمَعْرُوفُ) is that thing or custom which people recognize in their social structure, which they do not reject or disapprove. As the order to live with them is qualified with al-ma'rūf, it tells men to live with women in a manner that is known and recognized by the society.

The living together that is known and recognized by the people is as follows:

Every individual is an integral part of society, having equal importance with all other parts; they all together constitute human society; and each of them has a responsibility to strive as much as he can to make up the society's deficiencies. He earns and makes what is beneficial, takes from it according to his requirements, and gives the surplus to the society. If someone is treated in a different way, and is oppressed in a manner that his identity as an integral part is nullified, then he becomes a vassal, he is exploited but is given nothing in lieu of his labour. But it is exceptional case.

Allāh has described in His book that all people — men and women alike — are branches of a single human root; parts and components of one human species. Society, for its existence, needs males as much as it needs females — in equal degree. Allāh has said: you are (sprung) the one from the other (4:25).

There is nothing contradictory when we see that each sex has been bestowed some distinct characteristics which are not found in the other. For instance, men on the whole are distiguished for their strength and hardiness; and women by nature are more endowed with sentiments and soft-heartedness. Humanity, in its creative and social lives, needs demonstration of strength and hardiness as much as it requires permeation of love and mercy. The two qualities together represent the forces of attraction and repulsion which are prevalent in human society.

Thus the two sexes are equally balanced in weight, effect and influence; in the same way as individual males are equal in their affect and influences on this structure, in spite of their difference in natural and social matters, like strength and weakness, knowledge and ignorance, intelligence and obtuseness, smallness and greatness, leadership and subordination, mastership and servitude, nobleness and vileness, and so on.

This is the social order emanating from perceptivity of a normal society that continues on the natural way without deviation. Islam has fulfilled all requirements of society and removed its deficiencies. No wonder that it had to establish the system of equality in society; and it is this equality that is called social freedom. It gives freedom to the women like the men.

Man, per se, has got the faculty of understanding and free will; with that independent will he chooses what is beneficial to him and discards what is harmful. Living in society he has the right to choose whatever he wants — as long as it does not go against the society's well-being — with independent will without any hindrance from anyone; he is not bound to opt for someone else's choice without any will of his own. But, as you have seen, this principle is not in conflict with specialization that some classes, or a few members of the same class, should be distiguished with some especial qualities — or should be particularly devoid of some qualities. As for example, Islam has reserved judiciary, administration and jihād for men; also they have been given responsibility of maintaining the women. Or, as minor children are not competent to make any acknowledgement or deal, and are exempted from the sharī'ah's obligations. These examples show that different classes and individuals are governed by different laws — which are based on difference of their weight in society — although all of them are equal in their basic value in human social structure, where the only criterion is that all are human beings having understanding and free will.

Such restrictions and exclusions are not peculiar to the Islamic laws; they are found, in varying degrees, in all civil codes; nay, in all human systems, even in primitive customs. The clause, that encompasses all these meanings, is the word of Allāh: and live with them in a proper manner, as explained above.

As for the words of Allāh: then if you hate them, it may be that you dislike a thing while Allāh has place abundant good in it, it presents a known and definite fact in the shape of a doubtful matter. Often this style is used to prevent incitement of antagonism and prejudice in the audience. The same style is seen in the following verses: Say: ''Who gives you the sustenance from the heavens and the earth?'' Say: ''Allāh. And most surely we or you are on a right path or in manifest error.'' Say: ''You will not be questioned as to what we are guilty of, nor shall we be questioned as to what you do.'' (34:24 — 25).

At the time when the Qur'ān was revealed, human societies did not accord the women the status of human being; they were not considered as integral component of humanity. Some welladvanced civilizations treated them as an appendage — beyond the human circle — whose only purpose was to be used and exploited by man. Others recognized that women were human beings, but of inferior quality; they were deficient in humanity, like children and idiots, but with one difference: While children's or idiot's deficiency was removable (after adulthood or by treatment, respectively) women could never attain full human status. Consequently, it was necessary for them to live as a dependent under total authority of men for ever. It is interesting to note that Allāh has not said: if you dislike their marriage; He has ascribed the dislike and hate directly to their person: ''if you hate them''; probably this expression was used keeping the above-mentioned social norm in view.

QUR'ĀN: And i f you wish to have ... manifest wrong?: al Istibdāl (اَلْاِسْتِبْدَالُ = to seek a substitute); it is used here for replacement of a wife with another; or it implies taking a wife in place of another by substitution. That is why ‘‘you wish’’ has been used with the istibdāl, although the latter’s paradigm itself gives the meaning of wishing and wanting. Accordingly, the meaning is as follows: And if you wish to take one wife in place of another by substitution.

al-Buhtān (اَلْبُهْتَانُ) is what stuns and bewilders someone; it is generally used in meaning of false accusation. Grammatically, it is al-maṣdar, but in this verse it has been used for an action, i.e., taking back a part of dowry. Syntactically it describes state of the verb, ‘‘would you take it’’; and so does the phrase, ‘‘manifest wrong’’. The question shows disapproval.

The meaning: If you wish to divorce a wife and marry another in her place, do not take back from the divorced wife any part of the dowry which you had paid her — even if the amount you had given her was huge and you want to take only a small portion.

QUR’ĀN: And how can you take it ... a firm covenant? ...: The question creates a sense of astonishment. ‘‘al-Ifḍā’ ’’ (اَلْاِفْضَآءُ = to reach, to arrive at) is used for intimate touching; it is derived from al faḍā’ (اَلْفَضَآءُ = space, vastness).

As taking back a portion of dowry is an oppression and injustice, and the parties had lived in intimacy and union, it was really an amazing situation. Marriage and the resulting intimate sexual relation makes husband and wife like one being; and it is really strange that one should oppress one’s own self, or one part of a body should oppress the other part.

Apparently, the clause, ‘‘and they have made with you a firm covenant’’, refers to the union which the man had firmly established through marriage-tie; and one of whose concomitants is the dowry fixed at the time of marriage and which the woman receives from the man by right.

Someone has said that the firm covenant refers to the promise taken from man for woman that he would either retain her in a proper way or let her go with fairness, as Allāh has mentioned [in 2:231]. Someone else has said that it refers to their becoming lawful to each other as a result of marriage. But quite obviously, these interpretations are far-fetched, as the words of the verse show.

TRADITIONS

Hāshim ibn ‘Abdillāh narrates from as-Sariyy al-Bajalī that he said: ‘‘I asked him about the word of Allāh, and do not straiten them in order that you may take part of what you have given them: Then he quoted a talk and then said: ‘As the Nabateans say that when he threw a cloth on her, he restrained her, so that she could not marry anyone else. It was a custom in the (era of) ignorance.’ ’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

Abu ’l-Jārūd narrates from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) about the word of Allāh, O you who believe! it is not lawful for you that you should inherit women against (their) will: ‘‘It was [a custom] in the [era of] ignorance [and] when the Arab tribes first accepted Islam, that when a relative of a man died leaving a woman, that man threw his cloth on her and thus inherited her marriage by the same dowry which the [deceased] relative had given her; the man inherited her marriage as he inherited his (the deceased’s) property. When Abū Qays ibn al-Aslat died, Muḥaṣṣan son of Abū Qays threw his cloth on the woman of his father; and she was Kubayshah bint Mu‘ammar ibn Mu‘bad. So, he inherited her marriage; then he left her — he neither went in to her nor spent on her (maintenance). So, she came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! Abū Qays ibn al-Aslat died and his son, Muḥaṣṣan, inherited my marriage. Now he does not come to me, nor does he spend on me, nor does he release me so that I may join my own people.’ The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Go back to your house; and if Allāh ordains something concerning your matter, I will inform you.’ Then it was revealed: And marry not women whom your fathers married, except what has already passed; this surely is indecent and hateful, and it is an evil way. Thus she joined her own people. Also there were (other) women in Medina whose marriage, like that of Kubayshah, was inherited; but they were inherited from sons. Then Allāh revealed: O you who believe! it is not lawful for you that you should inherit women against (their) will.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: The ending clause of the tradition is not free from muddle and confusion. However, several Sunnī traditions too have narrated this story and that the verse was revealed in that connection. All or most of the traditions say that the verse; O you who believe! it is not lawful for you that you should inherit women ... , was revealed about the above-mentioned event. But you have seen in the commentary that the wording of the verse does not agree with this claim. However, there is no doubt that the said event had happened, and that the verses are somehow related to it and to the prevalent custom of the era of ignorance. Therefore, what we have written earlier should be relied upon.

aṭ-Ṭabrisī has written about the clause, unless they are guilty of manifest indecency, that it is better to apply this word to every sin; and has said that it is narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.). (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

ash-Shaybānī has said: ''Indecency is adultery, and the verse means that if man comes to know of her indecency, then he may take ransom (from her); and it is narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.).'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Burhān)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Jābir: ''Verily, the Messenger of Allāh has said: 'Fear Allāh about women; because you have taken them in Allāh's trust, and have made their bodies lawful (to you) by the word of Allāh; and it is your right on them that they should not let anyone you dislike trample your bed; if they do so then you (may) hit them (but) not violently; and they have a right on you for their maintenance and clothing in a proper way.' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Ibn 'Umar that he said: ''Verily, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'O people! Verily, the women near you [i.e., your wives] are [like] conscript labour [i.e., they are joined to you for ever]; you have taken them in Allāh's trust, and have made their bodies lawful (to you) by the word of Allāh. So you have got right on them, and it is among your rights on them that they should not let anyone trample your bed, nor should they disobey you in any good (thing); and when they do so [i.e., fulfil these rights] then they have got right of maintenance and clothing in a proper way.' '' (ibid.)

The author says: The meaning of these traditions may be understood from ealier explanations.

Abū Ja'far (a.s.) has said about the word of Allāh, and they have made with you a firm covenant: ''Covenant is the word with which marriage is contracted ...'' (al-Kāfī; at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

aṭ-Ṭabrisī has said: ''Firm covenant is the commitment made by the husband at the time of marriage that he will either retain her properly or let her go in fairness. This meaning is narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.).'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The author says: This meaning is narrated from several early exegetes like Ibn 'Abbās, Qatādah and Abū Malīkah. The wording of the verse is not out of tune with it, because this also is a covenant women make with men; although more obviously it means the marriage formula which is recited to establish marriage-tie.

az-Zubayr ibn Bakkār has narrated in al-Muwaffaqiyyāt from 'Abdullāh ibn Muṣ'ab that he said: '' 'Umar said: 'Do not give to women a dowry more than forty ūqiyyah [1] . If anyone exceeds [this limit] I will put the excess amount in the treasury.' A woman said: 'You have no such authority.' He said: 'Why?' She said: 'Because Allāh says: ''... you have given one of them a heap of gold ...'' ' Thereupon 'Umar said: 'A woman hit the mark and a man missed.' '' (ad Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has also narrated it from 'Abdu 'r-Razzāq and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir from 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān as-Salamī; and from Sa'īd ibn Manṣūr and Abū Ya'lā through a good chain from Masrūq (and that tradition says ''four hundred Dirhams'' in place of ''forty ūqiyyah''); and also from Sa'īd ibn Manṣūr and 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd from Bakr ibn 'Abdillāh al-Muzanī; and all traditions have nearly the same meaning.

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from 'Ikrimah that he said about the word of Allāh, And marry not women whom your fathers married, that it was revealed about Abū Qays ibn al-Aslat who took Umm Ubayd bint Ḍamrah who was the widow of his father, al-Aslat; and about al-Aswad ibn Khalaf who had taken the daughter of Abū Ṭalḥah ibn 'Abdi 'l-'Uzzā ibn 'Uthmān ibn 'Abdi 'd-Dār, who was the widow of his father, Khalaf;

[1] A weight of varying magnitude. Nowadays it ranges from 37.44 gr. in Egypt to 320 gr. in Aleppo. (tr.)

and about Fākhitah, daughter of al-Aswad ibn al-Muṭṭalib ibn Asad, who was the wife of Umayyah ibn Khalaf and then she was taken by his son, Ṣafwān ibn Umayyah; and about Manẓūr ibn Rabāb who had taken Malīkah daughter of Khārijah, who was the widow of his father, Rabāb ibn Sayyār. (ibid.)

Ibn Sa‘d has narrated from Muḥammad ibn Ka‘b al-Quraẓī that he said: ‘‘When a man died leaving a woman, his son had the right to marry her if he so wished — provided she was not his own mother — or to give her to someone else in marriage. When Abū Qays ibn al-Aslat died, his son, Muḥaṣṣan, succeeded him and inherited the marriage of his widow; but he did not give her maintenance nor he gave her any property as [her husband's] inheritance. Thereupon, she came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and described the situation to him. He said: 'You go back; perhaps Allāh will send down something about you.' Then it was revealed: And marry not women whom your fathers married ...; also it was revealed, ... it is not lawful for you that you should inherit women against (their) will.'' (ibid.)

The author says: We have already given Shī‘ī traditions of the same meaning.

Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘The people of [the era of] ignorance prohibited [marriage with] all whom Allāh has prohibited except the father's wife and having two sisters together as wives. Then Allāh revealed: And marry not women whom your fathers married; and, [it is unlawful] that you should have two sisters together.'' (ibid.)

The author says: There are other traditions also of the same meaning.

COMMENTARY

These are decisive verses which anumerate the women with whom marriage is prohibited — and those who are allowed. The preceding verse, which prohibited marriage with fathers' wives, is connected in theme with these verses; but its style was more in agreement with the preceding verses; that is why we included it in the preceding commentary, as it had some thematic relevance with those verses also.

The verses give a list of all those women with whom marriage is absolutely prohibited without any condition or exception. This is clear from the words immediately after enumeration of prohibited relatives: and lawful for you is (all) besides that ... That is why all scholars unanimously say that the verse prohibits son's daughter and daughter's daughter as well as father's mother and mother's mother; and that the verse: do not marry women whom your fathers married, prohibits grandfather's wife too. From this, we may easily understand the Qur'ānic view about sons and daughters and that who are included in these terms according to the sharī'ah, as will be explained later, Allāh willing.

QUR'ĀN: Forbidden to you are your mothers and your daughters and your sisters and your paternal aunts and your maternal aunts and brother's daughters and sister's daughters: It is the list of those who are prohibited by blood-relation; they are seven in number. 'Mother' is a woman from whom man is born, either direct or through an intermediary, like father's mother or mother's mother, how high so ever. 'Daughter' is a woman who is born of the man, either direct or through an intermediary, like son's daughter or daughter's daughter, how low so ever. 'Sister' is a woman having affinity with the man by common birth from the same father and mother, or same father or same mother without any intermediary. 'Paternal aunt' is father's sister, as well as paternal or maternal grandfather's sister. 'Maternal aunt' is mother's sister, as well as paternal or maternal grandmother's sister.

Prohibition of mothers and the others described in the verse, means prohibition of marriage with them, as is understood from the subject and the order. It is not different from other such expressions; for example: Forbidden to you is that which dies of itself, and blood and flesh of swine ... (5:3), i.e., eating it; and the words: ... So it shall surely be forbidden to them for forty years. (5:26), i.e., living in it. Such metaphorical expressions are very common in every language.

Nevertheless, it seems a bit difficult to say that it is 'marriage' which is implied by the word, 'forbidden', because of the exceptional clause coming later: except those whom your right hands possess. Sexual intercourse with one's slave women is lawful without marriage. Therefore, it would seem more appropriate if prohibition is taken to refer to sexual intercourse, and not to marriage alone, as will be explained later. The same is the implication of the words: that you seek (them) by means of your wealth ..., as will be described afterwards. Thus the fact emerges that the implied word after 'forbidden' is cohabitation, or another similar word, not marriage. Allāh has avoided mentioning it explicitly, because the divine speech refrains from such words and maintains a high moral decorum.

The talk is addressed to men. It does not say: Forbidden to women are their sons, or, for example, there is no marriage between woman and her son. It is because by nature it is the man who seeks the woman and proposes marriage.

The verse addresses the men (in plural), and also the prohibited women are mentioned in plural, e.g., 'mothers' and 'daughters', etc. It implies comprehesive distribution. In other words, it means: Forbidden to each man among you is his mother and his daughter, etc. Obviously, it does not mean that the whole group of these women is forbidden to the whole group of men. Nor does it mean that every woman who happens to be a mother or a daughter is forbidden to every man. Otherwise, it would result in abrogation of the institution of marriage altogether. The verse, therefore, means that each man is forbidden to marry his mother, daughter and sister, etc.

QUR'ĀN: and your mothers that have suckled you and your foster-sisters: Now begins the list of the women prohibited by other than blood-relationship. They too are seven — six are mentioned in this verse and one in the preceding one: and marry not women whom your fathers married.

The style of the verse establishes motherhood and sonship between a woman and the child whom she suckles; likewise it creates brotherhood and sisterhood between man and his foster-sister; note how it uses the words ‘mothers’ and ‘sisters’ for them as an accepted reality. Therefore, according to the sharī‘ah, breast-feeding creates relationship parallel to blood-relationship; and as will be described later, it is a special feature of the Islamic laws.

Both sects have narrated a correct tradition from the Prophet that he said: ‘‘Verily Allāh has prohibited through suckling what He has prohibited through blood-relationship.’’ It follows that suckling creates prohibition parallel to the prohibited blood-relationship, that is, foster-mother, foster-daughter, foster-sister, foster paternal aunt, foster maternal aunt, daughter of foster brother and daughter of foster-sister — a total of seven groups.

How the suckling relationship is established; what conditions are necessary concerning its quantity, quality and duration, to create the prohibition; and other relevant rules — these topics are explained in the Islamic jurisprudence, and are outside the scope of this book.

The words translated as, ‘‘and your foster-sisters’’, literally means, ‘and your sisters from suckling’, and the phrase refers to those sisters whom the man’s mother had suckled with the milk flowing because of his father.

QUR’ĀN: and mothers of your wives: It makes no difference whether the man had established sexual relation with that wife or not. The word ‘women’, when used in genitive construction with ‘man’, means wives — unconditionally. This generality is clearly proved from the condition mentioned in the next sentence: ... (born) of your wives [lit. ‘women’] to whom you have gone in; but if you have not gone in to them ...

QUR’ĀN: and your step-daughters who are in your guardianship, (born) of your wives to whom you have gone in; but if you have not gone in to them, there is no blame on you (in marrying them): ar-Rabā’ib (اَلرَّبَائِبُ) is plural of ar-rabībah (اَلرَّبِيْبَةُ); it means daughter of a man’s wife from a previous husband; because it is the present husband who looks after the children whom his wife brings with her. It is he who in most, if not all, cases looks after them and brings them up.

The clause translated as, ‘‘who are in your guardianship’’, literally means, ‘who are in your lap’. This too denotes majority of cases, although not all step-daughters grow up in laps of their step-fathers. That is why it is said that the words, ‘‘who are in your guardianship’’, merely denote general situation, because step-daughter is forbidden whether she grows up in the lap of her mother’s husband or not. The clause, therefore, is explanatory, not restrictive.

It is possible to maintain that the clause, ‘‘who are in your guardianship’’, points to the underlying reason of the law prohibiting women of blood- and other relations, as will be described later. There is continuous and constant mingling between men and these women; they are almost always together in the homes. Consequently, it would have been impossible to avoid incest (merely with prohibition of fornication) if they were not prohibited for ever — as will be explained later.

Accordingly, the clause, ‘‘who are in your guardianship’’, indicates that the criterion and underlying reason of prohibition is applicable to your step-daughters as validly as it is to other groups of prohibited women, because mostly these daughters grow up in your laps and live with you together.

In any case, the clause, ‘‘who are in your guardianship’’, is not a restrictive proviso to limit the prohibition. In other words, it does not mean that a step-daughter is lawful to her step-father if she is not in his guardianship; let us say, if there is an adult daughter whose mother has married another husband. Note for proof the clear wordings of the next clause, ‘‘but if you have not gone in to them, there is no blame on you (in marrying them)’’. Obviously, establishing sexual relation with her mother has a bearing on the law of prohibition, and, therefore, its absence negates the prohibition. If the daughter’s being in the step-father’s guardianship had any bearing on the prohibition, it was necessary to describe it in the same way.

There is a phrase, that is, ‘in marrying them’, implied after the words, ‘‘there is no blame on you’’. It was deleted for brevity's sake as the context had made the meaning clear.

QUR’ĀN: and the wives of your sons who are of your own loins: al-Ḥalā’il (اَلْحَلَائِلُ) is a plural of al-ḥalīlah (اَلْحَلِيْلَةُ). It is written in Majma‘u ’l-bayān: ‘‘al-Ḥalā’il is plural of al-ḥalīlah which is a synonym of al-muḥallalah (اَلْمُحَلَّلَةُ = lawful); it is derived from al-ḥalāl (اَلْحَلَالُ = legal, lawful); its masculine gender is al-ḥalīl (اَلْحَلِيْلُ = lawful) and its plural is aḥillah (اَحِلَّةُ) on the paradigm of ‘azīz and a‘izzah (عَزِيْزٌ،اَعِزَّةٌ = powerful). Husband and wife were given this name because each of them is lawful to his/her spouse. There is another view that it is derived from al-ḥulūl (اَلْحُلُوْلُ = to enter into something), because each spouse enters into bed with his/her partner.''

The word, 'sons', denotes male child begotten by a human being through birth, either direct or through a son or daughter, [how low so ever]. The conditional clause, ''who are of your loins'', excludes wives of the so-called sons of adoption.

QUR'ĀN: and that you should have two sisters together ...;: It ordains prohibition of marrying sister of a wife as long as the wife is alive and is married to the man. It is the best and the shortest construction to express this idea. The expression makes it clear that man is forbidden to have both sisters together in his marriage at the same time. There is no hindrance if a man marries a woman and then, after her divorce or death, marries her sister. The proof may be seen in the well-established conduct of the Muslims going back to the Prophet's time.

The exceptional clause: except what has already passed, has the same implication here as it had in the preceding verse: And marry not women whom your fathers married, except what has already passed. It looks at the custom, prevalent among the Arabs of [the era of] ignorance, of having two sisters in marriage together. This clause proclaims pardon to what they had done in the past — before this verse was revealed. It does not mean that such marriages — if they were contracted earlier — could continue even after the revelation. The verse clearly shows that from now such marriages, being prohibited and unlawful, cannot continue. We have quoted in the ''Traditions'', under the verse: And marry not women whom your fathers married, except what has already passed, how the Prophet had separated between the sons and the wives of their fathers, at once after that verse was revealed, although the marriages had been contracted before its revelation.

Question: What is the use of pardoning a previous marriage which was dissolved soon after revelation of the verse, and did not continue? What was the benefit of saying that that past union was not prohibited — was lawful — when it had already ceased to exist?

Reply: It had great benefits, because the effects of that marriage were continuing even after the marriage was dissolved, like legitimacy of children, recognition of various relationships and other related matters.

In other words, there is no use in saying that a past marriage, which had joined two sisters together, was lawful or unlawful — when both or one of them had died, or both or one of them had been divorced. But it is quite meaningful to declare that that past conjunction was not unlawful at that time. It was necessary for the welfare of the offspring of such marriages, as it gave them legitimacy and established relationship between the children and their natural fathers and other relatives, which in its turn had bearing on inheritance, marriage and other so many family affairs.

Accordingly, the clause:‘‘except what has already passed’’, regularize the resulting legal aspects of that marriage — not the marriage itself which had anyhow ceased before this legislation. It shows that both sides of this exception are inter-related, are not of two different categories, as many exegetes have written.

Also it is possible to apply this exception to all the clauses mentioned in the verse — without restricting it to the last clause, ‘‘and that you should have two sisters together’’. It is true that the Arabs did not marry any of the women mentioned in the verse, except having two sisters together; they did not marry their mothers, daughters or other prohibited relatives. But, at the time of the revelation of these verses, there were many societies, like the Persians, the Romans and several other civilized and uncivilized nations, which married various prohibited women, each society following its own custom. Islam recognizes the validity of the prevalent marriage-systems of non-Muslim societies — provided it was considered lawful by their religion or tradition. Thus, the exception confirms the legitimacy of their children and recognizes the validity of their relationships even when they enter into the fold of Islam.

Even so, the first explanation is more obvious.

QUR’ĀN: surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful: It explains the reason of the above-mentioned exception. It is one of those places where divine forgiveness refers to the external effects of a deed, and not to the sins and disobedience.

QUR’ĀN: And all married women except those whom your right hands possess,: al-Muḥṣanāt (اَلْمُحْصَنَاتُ) is the nomen patientis (passive participle) of al-iḥṣān (اَلْاِحْصَانُ = to make inaccessible); they say: al-ḥiṣn al-ḥaṣin (اَلْحِصْنُ،اَلْحَصِيْنُ = invulnerable fortress). When this verb is ascribed to woman as, for example, aḥṣanati 'l-mar'ah (اَحْصَنَتِ الْمَرْأَةُ), it gives one of the following three connotations: i) The woman, being chaste, protected herself and abstained from illicit sexual relations, as Allāh says: ... who guarded her chastity (66:12); ii) The woman married, so her husband, or her marriage, protected her from others; in this sense, the verb may be used in passive voice; also iii) She is a free woman and it keeps her away from illicit sexual relations — because fornication was common among slave women.

Obviously, the word, al-muḥṣanāt, in this verse, has the second connotation, i.e., married women. It cannot have the first or the third meaning, because apart from the fourteen groups (mentioned in the preceding two verses), the only thing prohibited is marriage with a married woman; there is no snag at all in marrying other women, whether they be chaste or unchaste, free or slave. There is, therefore, no reason for interpreting the word, al-muḥṣanāt here as chaste women (because the prohibition is not confined to the chaste women) and then attaching to the verse a condition that they should not be in other's marriage. Nor is there any justification for explaining the said word as free women (because the rules about slave women are the same as those for free ones) and then attaching to the verse a condition of their being un-married. Such interpretations are not agreeable to good literary taste.

al-Muḥṣanāt, therefore, means married women, i.e., those who are presently married to a husband. The word is in conjunction with your mothers and your daughters ... The meaning: Forbidden to you are all married women as long as their present marriage continues.

Consequently, the exceptional clause, ''except those whom your right hands possess''; will exclude one's married slave girl from this prohibition. It has been narrated in traditions that the master of a married slave woman may take away that woman from her husband, keep her untouched for the prescribed term, then have sexual relation with her, and thereafter return her to her husband.

Some exegetes have opined: The exception, ''except those whom your right hands possess'', means, except those chaste women whom you possess by marriage or as slave. Possession thus implies the right of having sexual pleasure.

But this opinion is not correct, because:

First: It interprets the word, al-muḥṣanāt (اَلْمُحْصَنَاتُ = married women) as chaste women, and you have already seen how wrong that interpretation is.

Second: The Qur'ān always uses the phrase, ''those whom your right hands possess'', for slaves; not for any other right of benefitting from something.

Likewise, someone has said: The phrase refers to unbeliever married women imprisoned in jihād. A tradition from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī is offered in support, in which he says: ''This verse was revealed about the captives of Awṭās, where the Muslims had captured some women of the polytheists, whose husbands were in (their) non-Muslim region. When this verse was revealed, an announcer announced on behalf of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) 'Be careful! The pregnant ones should not be approached for sexual intercourse until they deliver, nor the non-pregnant ones until they complete (their) waiting period.' ''

But apart from weakness of this tradition, it amounts to particularization of the verse without a particularizer.

Therefore, only the meaning given by us is to the point.

QUR'ĀN: (this is) Allāh's ordinance to you: The phrase, ''Allāh's ordinance to you'', means: Adhere to Allāh's command which is ordained and prescribed for you. The exegetes have said: ''Allāh's ordinance to you'' is a cognate accusative of an implied verb. The original sentence is supposed to be: Allāh has ordained an ordinance for you; the verb was then deleted and the accusative — ordinance — attached to the subject — Allāh — in a genitive construction, taking the place of the subject. They have not taken the phrase, ''to you'', as verbal-noun [in the meaning of, 'It is incumbent on you']; because the grammarians say that this phrase, as a verbal-noun, is weak in effect and its object cannot precede it [as it does in this verse].''

QUR'ĀN: and lawful for you is (all) besides that: [The construction, mā warā'a dhālikum (مَا وَرَآءَ ذٰلِكُمْ = what is besides that) requires careful consideration.] It uses, mā (مَا = what) which is obviously used for 'un-rational' things; the demonstrative pronoun, dhālikum, is used for masculine singular object. Also the phrase is followed by the words: that you seek by means of your wealth. All these factors together make it clear that the relative and demonstrative pronouns refer to the same thing which was implied by the beginning word, ‘‘Forbidden’’, i.e., sexual intercourse, or words like that. Meaning: It is lawful for you to have it with other than what has been described above, that is, to have sexual intercourse after marriage with other than the fifteen prohibited groups — or after obtaining in slavery some other women. In this way the appositional substantive (that you seek them by means of your wealth ...) will perfectly enmesh with the rest of the sentence.

Many exegetes have explained this exceptional clause in very amusing ways. One says that the clause, ‘‘and lawful for you is (all) besides that’’, means that all other relatives are lawful to you. According to another, it means that it is lawful for you to have less than five — i.e., four or less — women that you seek them for marriage by means of your wealth. A third one opines that, it is lawful for you to have slave women outside the mentioned fifteen groups. Still another says that it means: Lawful for you is all besides the prohibited relatives — provided the number does not exceed four — that you seek by means of your wealth to marry them or purchase them in slavery.

All these interpretations are simple absurd, because none is supported by the wordings of the verse. Moreover, all of them apply the relative pronoun, ‘what’, to rational beings, without any justification, as you have seen above. Apart from that, the verse aims only at explaining as with whom conjugal relations cannot be established. In this context, it anumerates the prohibited groups of women — without looking at their number. There is no reason why the exceptional clause should be explained in term of numbers. The fact is that the verse aims at describing permission for the acquisition of women — other than those mentioned in the preceding two verses — by marriage or by possession.

QUR’ĀN: that you seek (them) by means of your wealth, taking (them) with chastity, not committing fornication: The clause is neither an appositional substantive standing for the preceding clauses, (all) besides that; or is in explicative apposition with that. In any case, it explains the lawful way of approaching women and having sexual intercourse with them. The preceding exceptional clause: and lawful for you is (all) besides that, if left at that, could be applied to three things: Marriage, possession by slavery and fornication. This clause, ‘‘that you seek ...’’, forbids fornication and restricts permission to the remaining two: marriage and possession by slavery. Then it attaches importance to seeking them by means of one’s wealth: In marriage, it is dowry, which is one of its chief elements; in possession, it is price, which is the main procedure of acquiring slaves. The meaning now will be as follows: Apart from the above-mentioned prohibited categories, you are allowed to seek other women by spending your wealth on dowry of those whom you marry, or on price of slave girls — in all this you have to remain chaste and avoid illicit sexual relations.

It is now clear that the word, muḥṣinīn (مُحْصِنِيْنَ) in this clause denotes chastity; it cannot imply being married or free. The phrase ‘‘seek (them) by means of your wealth’’, covers marriage and possession both; there is no reason to restrict it to marriage: therefore, the word, muḥṣinīn, should not be restricted here to married ones. Also chastity does not mean celibacy; otherwise, the word would be irrelevant here. The word, chastity, as used here is opposite of illicit sexual relations of all types. It tells men to restrain themselves from unlawful sexual activities and restrict themselves to what Allāh has allowed of the sexual enjoyment — to which man is attracted by natural instinct.

Someone has said that the clause, ‘‘that you seek (them)’’, means ‘in order that you may seek them’. But this view is not correct. This clause explains the same thing which was said by the preceding one: and lawful for you is (all) besides that. Therefore, it is appositional substantive standing for the preceding clause; it does not mention anything that springs from the preceding one, or which is the effect of that.

Likewise, another writer has opined that the verb, al-musāfaḥah (اَلْمُسَافَحَةُ = to spill or shed something; metaphorically used in meaning of fornication) used here in the form of ghayra musāfiḥīn (غَيْرَ مُسَافِحِيْنَ = translated here as, not committing fornication) has actually been used in its literal sense, and the verse forbids merely ejaculating semen in womb, without intending to achieve the goal for which Allāh has created the natural sexual urge in man, i.e., without wanting to establish a family and procreate. Conversely, al-iḥṣān (اَلْاِحْصَانُ) implies permanent marriage which aims at producing children.

Reply: The only thing that can be said about the writer is that he is confused. Generally, there are two ways of discussing a law: Sometimes one looks at its underlying reason and benefit; at other times, talk is focused at the law itself. That writer has muddled the two together, inadvertently putting himself in a corner.

Discussion about underlying reason of a law is rational in nature, based on intellect; while discussion of the law itself — togetherwith its subject, concomitants, conditions and impediments — is based on its wordings, and its expansion or constriction depends entirely on that of the phraseology chosen by the Law-giver. Of course, there is no doubt that all the divinely ordained laws are based on genuine reasons and benefits. The ordainment of marriage laws too is based on real benefit, genuine underlying reason, and that is procreation. We also know that the system of creation wants human species to continue through successive existence of its individual members — as long as Allāh wished. To achieve that goal, human body has been equipped with procreative organs; which take a minute part of human bodies, nurture and develop it until it becomes a new human being, ready to take the place of the preceding generation. In this way the species continues without interruption. At the same time, sexual urge was ingrained in human beings in order that they should not neglect using the said organs. It is because of this urge that each group — male and female — is attracted to the other and establishes sexual relations. All this was perfected with the power of understanding, which prevents human beings from subverting this process to which the system of creation invites.

Even so, although the natural system has achieved its goal, that is, continuation of human species, we know that not every sexual intercourse between man and woman achieves that goal. Cohabitation is the initial step on that path. But not every union is blessed with child, nor every sexual intercourse results in pregnancy, nor every lust brings about that effect. Not every man or woman, nor every marriage, is inexorably pushed to cohabitation and procreation. These things happen in many, but not in all, cases.

The natural faculty exhorts man to marry, seeking procreation through sexual urge; and the reason ingrained in him restrains him from indecency, from unlawful carnal activities, as such deviation spoils felicity of life, demolishes foundation of family and desrupts procreation.

This composite benefit — procreation and prevention of indecency — is the underlying reason (which takes place in most of the cases), on which the institution of marriage is based in Islam. But this 'appearance in most of the cases', this generality, governs the underlying reason only. So far as the related ordained laws are concerned, they are not for 'most', but for all, human beings and for all times.

Therefore, it is not correct to say that marriage or cohabitation should be lawful or unlawful depending on whether or not the afore-said benefit can be obtained from it. It will be absurd to claim that marriage is not lawful without intention of procreation. Otherwise, such people will have to say that: marriage of an infertile man or woman is unlawful; marriage of a woman in menopause is unlawful; marriage of a minor girl is unlawful; marriage of a fornicator is unlawful; intercourse with a pregnant wife is unlawful; intercourse without ejaculation is unlawful; marriage, before establishing a household is unlawful; and so on and so forth.[1]

The fact is that marriage between male and female is a lawful institution, and it has its own permanent rules and regulations [which apply to the whole mankind for all times to come — without any exception]. This institution was established for protection of common benefits which are obtained from it in most cases, as you have seen. But it is meaningless to make this ordained institution dependent on that benefit for its existence [or lawfulness], or to say that every marriage or its every rule or aspect that did not lead to procreation was unlawful.

QUR'ĀN: Then as to such of them with whom you have mut'ah give them their dowries as appointed; ...: Probably, the word, mā (مَا = translated here as 'such') is relative pronoun; the verb,''you have

[1] The Vatican seems oblivious of this simple difference between underlying reason of a law and the law itself. That is why it has totally prohibited use of contraceptives, on the plea that it goes against the philosophy of marriage. But does Vatican have the conviction of courage to take this 'argument' to its logical end? Is it prepared to forbid intercourse with a pregnant wife, or ban marriage of infertile men or women? They should have banned these and other examples given in the text because they too cannot produce pregnancy. The prelates of the Roman Catholic Church — all unmarried men — are perhaps unaware that lawful satisfaction of sexual urge is in itself a valid underlying reason of marriage. (tr.)

mut'ah'' is its antecedent; the pronoun in bihi (به = with whom) refers to the relative pronoun, and the words, ''of them'' to the antecedent. Meaning: Then as to Such of the women with whom you have mut'ah.

Another possible grammatical explanation: The pronoun in bihi (with which) refers to cohabitation (which was implied in the clause: and lawful for you is (all) besides that; 'mā' then would denote time and mean 'whenever'; and the words, 'of them', would be connected to the verb, istamta'tum (اِسْتَمْتَعْتُمْ) which may literally be translated as, 'you seek to enjoy'. In this case, the translation would be as follows: Then whenever you seek to enjoy (sexually) with any of them, give them their dowries as appointed.

This sentence, ''Then as to such of them ...'', undoubtedly branches out from the preceding talk — as the letter, fa (فَ = then) shows — as a component is described after the whole, or a particular is explained after the general. As was explained, the preceding sentence: that you seek (them) by means of your wealth ..., is certainly a branching of a component or particular from a whole or general concept.

Such branching is very common in the divine book. For example: For a counted Number of days; then whoever among you is sick or on a journey ... (2:184); ... when you are secure, then whosoever enjoys by the 'umrah until the ḥajj ... (2:196); There is no compulsion in relgion; truly the right way has become clearly distinct from error; therefore, whoever disbelieves in the rebels (false deities) and believes in Allāh ... (2:256); there are many such examples.

There is no doubt whatsoever that the word, al-istimtā' (اَلْاِسْتِمْتَاعُ = lit., to enjoy) used in this verse means mut'ah marriage. The verse is Medinite, and a part of the chapter of 'The Women', that was revealed in the first half of the Prophet's life at Medina, as the majority of its verses indicate; and in that period this type of marriage, i.e., mut'ah, was, without any doubt, a common practice, a prevalent custom among the Muslims — and the traditions unanimously accept this fact. It makes no difference whether or not it was Islam which had originated this system; what is important is the fact that this marriage was in vogue within the sight and hearing of the Prophet; and it had this very name, mut'ah; no other word was used to denote this type of marriage. Accordingly, there is no escape from applying the clause, fa-māsta'tum bihi minhunna (فَمَا اسْتَمْتَعْتُمْ بِه مِنْهُنَّ) to the mut'ah marriage. There were so many customs, practices and cohabits prevalent among the Arabs at the period of the revelation, which had their own well-known and well-understood names; and whenever a verse was revealed concerning them using their names — whether it was confirmation or rejection, order or prohibition — there was no other way but to apply that nomenclature to their usual meanings — i.e., to the customs concerned; nobody ever thought of interpreting those names in their literal sense. For example, Qur'ān has used the words, ḥajj, trade, interest, profit, booty, and many similar names, but no one could ever think that, for instance, ḥajj of the House meant planning to go to the Ka'bah; nor were other such names ever explained in their literal meanings. Likewise, the Prophet (s.a. w.a.) brought many items of the sharī'ah, and they spread with their given religious names, like ṣalāt, ṣawm (fast), zakāt, ḥajju't-tamattu', etc. After the establishment of these names, nobody would think of applying these words, when they appear in the Qur'ān, to their original literal meanings — once the words have been established for their terminological meanings — in the usage of the religion or the people of religion.

Therefore, the only possible way is to apply the word, al-istimtā', of this verse, on the mut'ah marriage, because it was known with this very name when this verse was revealed. It is quite irrelevant whether or not the mut'ah marriage was later abrogated by the Qur'ān or tradition.

In short, the verse speaks about an aspect of the mut'ah marriage; and it is the explanation which is narrated from the ancient exegetes among the Companions and their disciples, like Ibn 'Abbās, Ibn Mas'ūd, Ubayy ibn Ka'b, Qatādah, Mujāhid, as-Suddī, Ibn Jubayr, al-Ḥasan and others. The same is the madhhab of the Imams of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.).

This shows the incorrectness of the following two interpretations:

Some exegetes have written that al-istimtā' (lit., to seek enjoyment) means marriage, because marriage-tie is established in order to get enjoyment from it.

Someone else has said that istamta'tum (اِسْتَمْتَعْتُمْ) actually means tamatta'tum (تَمَتَّعْتُمْ = you enjoy); and 's' and 't' (س، ت) have been added only for emphasis, [not to indicate seeking of something].

But both opinions are wrong, because prevalence and currency of rnut'ah marriage (with this very name) among them does not leave any room to its literal meaning to enter the hearers' minds.

Moreover, if we accept [for the sake of argument] that the verse means seeking enjoyment, or enjoying, then this conditional clause would not agree with the resulting clause. It will be wrong to say that when you enjoy (sexually with) or seek to enjoy with, a woman, then give her dowry to her. The wife becomes entitled to dowry just on recitation of the formula of marriage; it does not depend on sexual relation, nor on the pursuit of the same (a term which may apply even to proposal of marriage, recitation of marriage formula, foreplay and sexual intercourse, etc.). Of course, half of the dowry is payable on recitation of the formula and the balance on coition.

Apart from that, many verses, which were revealed before it, had fully established the obligatoriness of paying dowry, with all its various propositions. Accordingly, there was no reason to repeat the order of its obligatoriness here. Vide, for example:

And give women their dowries as a free gift (4:4).

And if you wish to have (one) wife in place of another and you have given one of them a heap of gold, then take not from it anything ... (4:20 — 21).

There is no blame on you if you divorce women while yet you have not touched them or appointed for them a dowry, and make provision for them, on the wealthy according to his means and on the straitened in circumstances according to his means, ... And if you divorce them before you have touched them and you have appointed for them a dowry, then (pay to them) half of what you have appointed, unless they remit or he remits in whose hand is the marriage-tie; and it is nearer to piety that you should remit;... (2:236 — 7).

Someone has proposed that this sentence may be aiming at putting emphasis on the law of dowry. But the above-mentioned verses, and especially the ending clauses of the verses: And if you wish to have (one) wife in place of another ..., are much more forceful and stronger than the verse under discussion. Therefore, how can this verse be supposed to put emphasis on those verses?

Now, a look at the question of abrogation:

It has been said that this verse was abrogated by the following verses of the chapter of 'The Believers':... And who guard their private parts, except before their mates or those whom their right hands possess, for they surely are not blameable; but whoever seeks to go beyond that, these are they that exceed the limits (23:5 — 7).

Another suggestion: It was abrogated by the verse of al-'iddah (ٱلْعِدَّةُ = waiting period after divorce or death of husband): O Prophet! when you divorce women, divorce them for their prescribed time, and calculate the number of the days prescribed (65:1); And the divorced women should keep themselves in waiting for three monthly courses ... (2:228). Their argument: The marriage is dissolved by means of divorce and waiting period, but mut'ah marriage has neither.

A third suggestion: It was abrogated by the verse of inheritance: And you shall have half of what your wives leave ... (4:12). There is no inheritance in mut'ah marriage.

Fourth suggestion: It is abrogated by the verse of prohibition: Forbidden to you are your mothers and your daughters ... (4:23), as this verse is about marriage.

Fifth: It is abrogated by the verse of number: ... then marry such (other) women as seem good to you, two and three and four ... (4:3).

Others have said that the verse of mut'ah is abrogated by tradition. [But they seem unable to agree on its details:]

It is said that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) abrogated the mut'ah marriage in the year of Khaybar [i.e., 7 A H].

Others say: It was abrogated in the year of the Conquest [of Mecca, i.e., 8 AH].

Third claim: It was abolished in the Last Ḥajj [i.e., 10 A H].

A fourth claim is that mut'ah was allowed, then forbidden; and this alternate permission and prohibition happened twice or thrice, and the last order was of prohibition.

Let us look at the claims of abrogation by the Qur'ān:

1. As for the verse of the chapter of 'The Believers', first of all it cannot abrogate the verse of mut'ah, because it is of Meccan period while the verse of mut'ah is of Medinite period, and a Meccan verse cannot abrogate a Medinite one.

Second: The claim that mut'ah is not a marriage, or a woman married in mut'ah is not a wife, is totally unacceptable. You will see the truth if you just look at the sayings of the Prophet and wordings of the early Muslims, including the Companions and their disciples, who always called it mut'ah marriage.[1]

[1] A part from that, the arguments about the mut'ah are intended to

2. As for the claim of abrogation by the verses of inheritance, divorce or number, the relation between these and the verse of mut'ah is not that of abrogator and abrogated. It is the relation that exists between general and particular, or between unrestricted and restricted. Let us look, for example, at the verse of inheritance; it is general and covers all wives whether married in parmanent marriage or temporary one; and then the tradition particularizes it by removing some groups from its jurisdiction, i.e., it excludes wives of mut'ah marriage from inheritance.[1] The same is obviously the case with the verses of divorce and number. Probably those who claimed abrogation could not distinguish the two relations.

Of course, some scholars of the Fundamentals of Jurisprudence have said that if a particular order is given then a contradictory general order follows, it abrogates the previous particular one. But apart from weakness of this view (as has been explained in its place), it cannot be applied to this case, because:

The verse of divorce (the general order) is in the chapter of 'The Cow', which is the first Medinite chapter revealed before the chapter of 'The Women' which contains the verse of mut'ah.

Likewise, the verse of number, a part of the same chapter of 'The Women', precedes [and is not preceded by] the verse of mut'ah; the same is the case with the verse of inheritance, which comes before the verse of mut'ah in one uninterrupted sequence and context in the same chapter. The particular order, therefore, was given later than the general one, in any case.

3. The claim, that this verse was abrogated by this very verse of prohibition is most astonishing of all. First, because the whole verse establish whether mut'ah is a valid form of marriage or not; whether the woman of mut'ah is a lawful wife or not. Now to assume that the word, 'mates' (or wives), used in this verse excludes the mut'ah wife, is to beg the question. (tr.).

[1] There are other examples where a wife is not entitled to her husband's inheritance. For example, if she is a slave or has killed the husband, she is debarred from his inheritance. Likewise, the Sunnīs allow marriage with a Jewish or Christian woman, but she, being an unbeliever, does not get any share in the husband's inheritance. Nobody would suggest that this exclusion affects her status as wife in any way. (tr.) containing details of prohibited women and permission of mut'ah is one single speech, having one context; its sentences are interlinked, its parts interconnected. How could it be imagined that one of its clauses would legalize the mut'ah marriage and the preceding sentences would revoke this subsequent order?

Second: This whole verse says nothing, explicitly or implicitly, about prohibition of temporary marriage. It only aims at describing the categories of the women who are prohibited to man, and then at declaring that all other women are lawful to them, either with marriage or possession; and as we have explained, mut'ah is a marriage. The two things are not contradictory to each other, so that it could lead to abrogation or revocation.

Objection: The clauses: and lawful for you is (all) besides that — that you seek (them) by means of your wealth, taking (them) with chastity, not committing fornication, makes it difficult to interpret this verse in terms of mut'ah. The former has made lawfulness of women conditional on dowry and on marriage without fornication; and there is no marriage in mut'ah; that is why if a man (who has a mut'ah wife) commits adultery, he is not stoned, because he is not considered as married.

Reply: First, this argument is not based on solid grounds. We have already described (while explaining the phrase, taking [them] with chastity, not committing fornication) that al-iḥṣān in this context means chastity, not marriage, because the phrase covers union with one's slave girls as well.

Second: There will be no difficulty even if we agree, for the sake of argument, that al-iḥṣān refers here to marriage. It would only mean that the law of stoning an adulterer was not applicable to a man who had a wife of mut'ah, and that this exclusion was based on the tradition, not on the Qur'ān. After all, the law of stoning itself is not mentioned anywhere in the Qur'ān.

4. As for the claim of abrogation by tradition, we shall discuss it in detail under the ''Traditions''. At this juncture, it is enough to point out that such abrogation is invalid ab initio, as it goes against the mutawātir traditions ordering the Muslims to judge the traditions with the help of the Qur'ān and reject what does not agree with it.

QUR'ĀN: And whoever among you has not within his power ampleness of means to marry free believing women, then (he may marry) of those whom your right hands possess from among your believing maidens;:aṭ-Ṭawl (اَلطَّوْلُ = riches; ampleness of ability); either meaning fits in the context. al-Muḥṣanāt (اَلْمُحْصَنَاتُ) in this verse means free women, because it has been used in contrast to slave women; this also shows that it has not been used in the meaning of chaste; otherwise it would have been contrasted with unchaste. Obviously, it does not refer to married women either, because they cannot be married again [as long as their present marriage continues]; nor does it mean Muslim women; otherwise there was no need to qualify it with the adjective, 'believing'.

The words, ''those whom your right hands possess'', actually means slaves of other believers than him who intends to marry, because a man is not allowed to 'marry' his own slave girl — such a marriage is void. Possession has been ascribed to all the believers — not excepting the suitor — because Islam counts all believers as one body, not separate from one another, inasmuch as their religion is one and their benefits are one; it is as though they were one person.

The words, 'free women' and 'maidens', have been qualified with the adjective, 'believing'. It indicates unlawfulness of marriage with non-believing woman, be she a Jewish, a Christian or a polytheist. This topic has a supplement which will be found in the beginning of the fifth chapter, 'The Table', Allāh willing.

The verse says that whoever among you is unable to marry free believing woman, inasmuch as he does not have means to pay dowry and meet her expenses, then he may marry believing slave-girls, in order that he should not face difficulties (because of his inability to marry free women) and should not put himself in danger of indecency and spiritual infelicity.

The marriage, in this verse, refers to permanent marriage. The verse provides an alternative (of an inferior category), i.e., if you are unable to do that, then do this. The talk has been confined to only one group of the higher category, i.e., to the permanent marriage, to the exclusion of the temporary one, because it is the permanent marriage which is more popular and which a man — who wants to establish a house, procreate and leave an heir — naturally opts for. As for the mut'ah (temporary) marriage, it is a facility provided by the religion, which Allāh has used to lighten the burden of His servants, in order that the path of indecency should be closed and social evils be uprooted.

Not infrequently, the Qur'ān narrows an ongoing talk to its well-known aspects which generally come to mind at the first glance — and especially so in ordaining the sharī'ah's rules and regulations. For example, Allāh says:

... so whoever of you witness the month, he shall fast therein, and whoever is sick or on a journey, (he shall fast) the same number of other days (2:185). But we know that genuine reasons of postponing a fast are not confined to sickness and journey.

... and if you are sick, or on a journey, or one of you come from the privy or you have touched the women, and you cannot find water, betake yourselves to clean earth ... (4:43). As you see, the verse mentions only the more common and well-known causes of at-tayammum (اَلتَّيَمُّمُ = ritual ablution with earth). There are many examples of this style.

This explanation has been written keeping in sight the general view that this verse refers to the permanent marriage. But its wordings can easily be applied to marriage in general — permanent and temporary alike — as will be shown in explanation of the rest of the clauses.

What we have shown here is that even if we apply the word 'marriage' here to permanent one, and look at the inferior alternative it provides and the latitude it gives, it does not necessarily follow that the marriage in preceding verse should exclusively refer to the permanent one and that the verse: Then as such of them with whom you have mut'ah ..., should have nothing to do with mut'ah marriage — as some people have said. The fact is that both sides of this latitude — the original order and the alternative — are found in this very clause, ''And whoever among you has not within his power ampleness of means ... then (he may marry) of those whom your right hands possess ...''. There is no need to go further back to explain this verse.

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh knows best your faith: you are (sprung) the one from the other;:As this order was conditional on belief; and belief is a matter of heart, the reality of which cannot be known by others. There was a possibility for people to think that the permission was conditional on something difficult or next to impossible; this could have prevented them from making use of it. Therefore, Allāh declared that He knows the faith of His believing servants. It implies that people are required to base their mutual dealings on apparent signs that point to the faith, like the two witnessings, attending congregational prayers and discharging common religious duties. Thus, the criterion is the apparent belief, not its reality.

The direction given to non-affluent Muslims to marry slave-girls, had another apparent disadvantage, which could affect compliance: Common people looked down at slaves, who generally suffered from disrespect and dishonour, indignity and humiliation. This created in the people a sort of disinclination towards mingling and mixing with them socially, and particularly towards establishing marriage-ties with them, which is a lifelong partnership and unites both parties in heart and body.

[To erase that aversion] Allāh has said, ‘‘you are (sprung) the one from the other’’. It is a clear reality which would, if pondered upon, remove this wrong impression, this prejudice. Slave is as much a human being as is a free man;there is no difference between them in any aspect of humanness. The only difference is in some laid down rules which were necessary for maintenance of human society, so that they could lead to people’s felicity. But such distinctions have no validity before Allāh. What is recognized there is the piety with which man finds honour before Allāh. It is not good for the believers to be influenced by such imaginary allusion which would remove them from knowledge, the real knowledge that ensures their success and happiness in both worlds. It should not be forgotten that deviation from the straight pathway — even if it looks slight in the initial stages — continues to take man further and from the path of guidance until it throws him into the valley of perdition.

It is now clear that the sequence in the beginning of the verse that contains a condition and implies a sort of concession and latitude (whoever among you has not within his power ampleness of means to marry free believing women, then [he may marry] of those whom your right hands possess ...), is just a way of talking, using the same style which the audience generally did under the influence of its habit and custom. But it is not an obligatory condition that the believers must follow this sequence. In other words, it is not that one has to be too poor to marry a free woman before he is allowed to marry a slave girl. It is just that the Qur’ān has addressed the people in their own language. That is why it has said that if you are unable to marry free women, you should marry slave girls without any hesitation. Then it has drawn their attention to the fact that the free and the slave both are members of the same humanity, each of them is related to the other.

It also shows incorrectness of what someone has written under the clause, ‘‘and that you abstain is better for you’’, that it means: if you abstain from marrying slave women and remain chaste, it is better for you than marrying them — as it may bring disgrace and indignity to you. The fact is that the clause, ‘‘you are (sprung) the one from the other’’, contradicts such interpretations.

QUR’ĀN: so marry with the permission of their people and give them their dowries justly, they being chaste, not fornicating, nor receiving paramours;: In this paragraph, al-muḥṣanāt refers to chaste women; it cannot mean married ones, because there is no question of marrying them while they are married. al Musāfiḥāt (اَلْمُسَافِحَاتُ = fornicating women) is placed parallel to the phrase, ‘‘receiving paramours’’. al-Akhdān (اَلْاَخْدَانُ) is plural of al-khidn (اَلْخِدْنُ = friend, paramour); it is used for masculine as well as faminine, and for singular as well as plural; this verse uses the plural form to clearly point to numerousness; when one takes a paramour for fornication, one generally does not stop at one or two, because man’s appetite does not stop at any point once it exceeds the limit.

It is looking at this contraposition that someone has said: The word, fornication, as used in this verse, means open illicit sexual relation, and receiving paramour implies secret liaison. Such secret affairs were commonplace in Arabia; even among free women it was not frowned upon; while open fornication was criticized if done by other than slave girls.

The clause, ‘‘so marry them with the permission of their people’’, advises them to marry slave women provided it is done with permission of their masters; because the rein of their affairs is held by none other then their masters. The masters have been called their ‘people’ in accordance with the preceding clause: you are (sprung) the one from the other; thus the slave girl is a member of the family of her master, and the master is her guardian, her people.

One has to give them their dowries in a proper way. In other words, the suitor should fix her dowry according to prevalent standard; paying it to her actually means paying it to her master. The clause guides the people to appoint and pay their dowries without reduction, without delay and without hurting the feelings.

QUR'ĀN: and when they are taken in marriage, then if they are guilty of indecency, they shall suffer half the punishment which is (inflicted) upon free women: The verb uḥṣinna (أُحْصِنَّ = they are taken in marriage) is in passive voice; some have recited it in active voice, and that recitation is rather preferable.

If al-iḥṣān refers to their marriage, then it was included in the conditional clause just because the preceding talk had circled around their marriage. [It has no legalistic significance] because if a slave fornicates, she gets only half the punishment of a free woman who is guilty of the same offence; and it makes no difference whether the slave-girl is married or not; her being married does not increase her sentance in any way.

But if al-iḥṣān refers to their being Muslims — which the recitation of active voice would support — then the meaning will fit the wordings effortlessly. They shall suffer half the punishment of the free women, no matter whether they are married or not.

The punishment refers to flogging, not stoning, because stoning cannot be halved. This in its turn proves that the word, al-muḥṣanāt (translated here as 'free women') refers to unmarried ones, and not to the married ones who are mentioned by the same word, in the beginning of the verse [24: And all married women ...]. The definite article in 'the punishment', refers to the well-known punishment. The meaning: If believing slave women commit indecency, i.e., fornication, they shall be given half the punishment of unmarried free women, that is, they shall receive fifty stripes.

Another possible explanation: al-Iḥṣān may imply chastity. The salve girls in those days were not free to do as they liked; they had to obey the orders of their masters, especially in indecency and debauchery. When they indulged in prostitution, it was usually by the order of their masters who exploited them and used them as a source of income. The masters sold their slaves' honour to increase their wealth. This aspect is implied in the prohibition contained in the verse: and do not compel your slave girls to prostitution when they desire to keep chaste, in order to seek the frail good of this world's life (24:33). Obviously when they sold their bodies and indulged in prostitution, it was done by the order of their masters, without any choice left to them. If the masters did not compel them for fornication, then the believing slaves among them would have observed Islamic piety, at least in appearance, and would have preserved their chastity as was expected of a believer. But if they indulged in fornication after that, then they would be given half the punishment of free women. It is this aspect to which the verse points, ‘‘and when they are taken in marriage, then if they are guilty of indecency, they shall suffer half the punishment which is (inflicted) upon free women’’.

But if the word uḥṣinna (أُحْصِنَّ translated here as, ‘‘taken in marriage’’),is taken to indicate chastity [‘and when they become chaste’], then the conditional clause would be superfluous, because if they were not chaste then they would be under duress, compelled to do as their masters said. Likewise, there would be no meaning in the words: and do not compel your slave girls to prostitution, when they desire to keep chaste (24:33), because if they do not want to be chaste, there is no question of compulsion by the masters — they would indulge in fornication willingly. Think over it.

QUR’ĀN: This is for him among you who fears falling into evil ... Forgiving, Merciful: al-‘Anat (اَلْعَنَتُ) literally means affliction, hardship and perdition; in this context, it implies fornication, which takes place when man is afflicted by lust, suffers from hardship of sexual desire and thus falls in perdition. The demonstrative pronoun, ‘This’, reportedly refers to the marriage with slave girls mentioned in this verse. Accordingly, the next clause, ‘‘and that you abstain is better for you’’; would mean: If you abstain from marrying slave girls, or from fornication, it is better for you. Also, possibly the pronoun refers to obligatoriness of marriage with slave girls, or marriage in general — if such ideas could be inferred from the context of the preceding verse; and Allāh knows better.

However, abstinence and patience is better, in any case. If it indicates abstaining from marrying slave girls, it is because of the rights their masters have on them and on their offspring — as described in books of jurisprudence; and if it implies abstaining from illicit sexual relations, then it looks at the purity of character that the patience and abstinence create, and at the trait of piety which is strengthened when man refuses to yield to his lustful desires — no matter whether he is married or not; ‘‘and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful’’: He erases, through His forgiveness, the effects of evil thoughts from the minds of His pious servants, and has mercy on them.

QUR’ĀN: Allāh desires to explain to you: This sentence and the subsequent ones indicate and explain the ultimate goal of various laws ordained in the preceding three verses; and the benefits that are derived when society follows them scrupulously. The meaning, accordingly, will be as follows: Allāh desires to explain to you the rules of His religion, as it leads you to the good of this world and the next one, and contains many underlying benefits and reasons. According to this explanation, the object of this verb was deleted to show its greatness and importance. Another possibility: The verbs, ‘‘to explain to you’’, and ‘‘to guide you’’, may be having a common object, i.e., ‘the ways of those before you’.

QUR’ĀN: and to guide you into the ways of those before you: That is, the life-styles of the prophets and the good people, who spent their days seeking Allāh’s pleasure, and through it enjoyed the happiness of this world and the hereafter. If this interpretation is correct, then ‘‘the ways’’ would indicate their way of life in general terms, not all their customs and traditions with all their details and particulars. Accordingly, there would be no room for the objection, that the ancients had some laws which these very verses have revoked, like marriage between brothers and sisters in Adam’s time, and having two sisters together (in the sharī‘ah of Ya‘qūb, who, according to some reports, had two sisters together — Leah, mother of Judah, and Rachel, mother of Joseph).[1]

There is another interpretation offered by some people: The clause speaks about guiding to the ways of all previous societies, no matter whether they were on the right path or the wrong. Accordingly, it means:

[1] We have already shown that the hypothesis of marriage between Adam’s immediate sons and daughters was not correct; [see note, vol.7, p.222]. As for Ya‘qūb (a.s.) having two sisters together, it is reported in the Old Testament, and we have described in vol.6 how unreliable those writings of dubious origin are. It is unrealistic to base one's argument on such writings. (tr.)

We have explained to you all the previous customs — right and wrong, all — in order that you may have an insight into them, adopt the right customs and reject the wrong ones.

There is no difficulty in accepting this meaning, except that guidance has not been used in this meaning in the Qur'ān. It has always been used for conveyance to the truth or to show the truth. Allāh says: Surely you cannot guide whom you love, but Allāh guides whom He pleases (28:56); Surely We have shown him the way; he may be thankful or unthankful (76:3). It is more appropriate to the Qur'ānic taste to express such ideas, as given by that exegete, with the words, explanation or narration, etc.

Nevertheless, if the verb, ''to explain to you'' and ''to guide you'' are taken to have the common object, ''the ways of those before you''; and the subsequent verb, ''to turn to you (mercifully)'', is also taken to refer to the same, then the above explanation will fit the verse properly. The meaning, then, would be as follows: 'Allāh explains to you the ways of those before you, and guides you to the correct ones among them, and turns mercifully to you concerning the wrong customs which you had adopted.' The preceding verses have mentioned previous people's customs — right and wrong both — and have proclaimed pardon for the wrong practices of the past.

QUR'ĀN: and to turn to you (mercifully), and Allāh is knowing, Wise: at-Tawbah (اَلتَّوْبَةُ) here refers to Allāh's turning to His servant with favour and mercy, ordaining the sharī'ah and explaining the reality, and guiding him to the right path. All these are various facets of Allāh's turning, as is the acceptance of the servant's repentance and erasure of sin's effects and consequence from him.

The ending clause, ''and Allāh is Knowing, Wise'', covers all the clauses of the verse. Had it been connected only to the last one, it would apparently have been more appropriate to say: and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh desires that He should turn to you (mercifully) and those who follow (their) lusts desire ... a great deviation: The verse reiterates Allāh's turning to the believers to indicate that the following sentence, i.e., ''and those who follow (their) lusts desire that you should deviate (with) a great deviation'', stands face to face with the only last of the three clauses of the preceding verse. If there were no repetition, the sentence, ‘‘and those who follow ...’’, would have looked as standing parallel to all three preceding clauses, and would have seemed irrelevant.

The great deviation implies transgression of Allāh’s limits described in these verses: Having incestuous relations; disregarding the effects of blood-and marriage-relationships; licentiousness and debauchery; and refusal to follow the right path laid by Allāh.

QUR’ĀN: Allāh desires that He should make light your burdens, and man is created weak: Man is weak. Why? Because desire is an integral part of his creation; it unceasingly incites him to indulge in lust, and thus creates an internal turmoil. Allāh in His mercy and favour, has made lawful for them the ways to calm down their desire, i.e., He has ordained the institution of marriage to lighten their burdens and lessen their hardships, as He has said: and lawful for you is (all) besides that. This includes marriage and possession; in this way He has guided them to the ways of those who were before them. Then He has given them another concession by legalizing the mut‘ah marriage, as it does not entail as much hardships as the permanent marriage does, i.e., heavy dowry, regular maintenance, etc.

Someone has said: The lightening of burdens refers to the permission of marrying slave girls in times of need. But this explanation is not to the point. Arabs used to marry slave girls at times of need even in pre-Islamic days; this custom was prevalent among them, although they did not like it, and, considered it degrading to themselves. What these verses have done is to erase that stigma and removes that dislike and aversion, by explaining that a slave girl is as much a human being as a free woman is, without there being any difference between them in any way. The status of slavery does not make a slave unworthy of social mingling and family ties.

Undeniably, the verses are clearly addressed to the believers of this ummah. Accordingly, the said lightening of burdens concerns this ummah only, and it means what we have described.

Now, the given reason that, ‘‘man is created weak’’, is not confined to this ummah; it is common to all humanity, be they of this ummah or of the previous ones; while the lightening of burdens was ordained for this ummah only. The verse, thus, gives a general cause but keeps silent about what restricts its effect. It is as though it was saying: We have lightened your burdens, because the weakness pervading the mankind was always demanding this lightening; but there were always some impediments there, which prevented it from taking effect — the impediments which hindered lightening of burdens and spreading of mercy in previous nations. Then came your turn and the divine mercy has now encompassed you and its effects are now appearing among you. Now the said cause has brought its effects into being and Allāh has reduced your burdens — although the previous nations were not allowed this concession. This fact may be gleaned from the following two verses: ''Our Lord! do not lay on us a burden as Thou didst lay on those before us'' (2:286); He has chosen you and has not laid upon you any hardship in religion (22:78).

It appears from the above that this general cause also aims at showing that all the favours bestowed on humanity have appeared in their complete form in this ummah.

TRADITIONS

The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said: ''Verily, Allāh has forbidden by reason of breast-feeding what He has forbidden by reason of blood-relationship.''

Also he (s.a.w.a.) has said: ''Suckling is a relationship like blood-relationship.''

Mālik and ʻAbdu 'r-Razzāq have narrated from ʻĀ'ishah that she said: ''Among what was revealed of the Qur'ān was (the verse of) ten known sucklings; then it was abrogated by (the verse of) five known (sucklings); and the Messenger of Allāh expired and those (verses) were a part of what was recited of the Qur'ān.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated in his above book other traditions from ʻĀ'ishah, through other chains. But they are among the traditions which imply distortion and alteration of the Qur'ān; such reports are totally rejected because of their inconsistency with the Qur'ān.

ʻAbdu 'r-Razzāq, ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and al-

Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated through two chains from ‘Amr ibn Shu‘ayb, from his father, from his grandfather from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: ‘‘When a man marries a woman, then it is not lawful to him to marry her mother, whether he has gone into that girl (his wife) or not; on the other hand, if he marries the mother and divorces her before going into her, then he may marry (her) daughter, if he so wishes.’’ (ibid.)

The author says: This meaning is narrated through the Shī‘ī chains from the Imams of Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.), and it is their known madhhab, and the same is inferred from the Qur’ān, as was explained in the preceding Commentary. But the Sunnīs have narrated from ‘Alī (a.s.) that there was no harm in marrying the mother of the wife (if one divorces the latter) before establishing sexual relations with her; and that she was in this respect like the step-daughters; also that it was not unlawful for a man to marry his step-daughter if she was not under his guardianship. But such assertions are contrary to all that is narrated from them (Imāms, a.s.) through the Shī‘ī chains.

al-Kulaynī has narrated through his chains from Manṣūr ibn Ḥāzim that he said: ‘‘I was with Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) when a man came and asked him about a man who had married a woman, but she died before he could establish sexual relations with her — ‘Can he marry her mother?’ Thereupon, Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) said: ‘A man of us had done so and had not considered it objectionable.’ Then I said: ‘May I be made your ransom! The Shī‘ah do not boast except by the judgment of ‘Alī (a.s.) concerning this (problem) about al-mashīkhah [1], about which Ibn Mas‘ūd had given a ruling that there was no snag in it. Then he came to ‘Alī (a.s.) and asked him. ‘Alī (a.s.) said to him: ‘‘From where [i.e., on what authority] will he take her?’’[2] He said: ‘‘From the word of Allāh, the

[1] Probably the correct word is ash-Shamakhī (اَلشَّمَخي = one belonging to the tribe of ash-Shamakh اَلشَّمَخْ). Some Sunnī traditions say that he was a man from the tribe of ash-Shamakh. Or, the correct text may be: ‘about the woman from the tribe of ash-Shamakh concerning whom Ibn Mas‘ūd had given a rulling.’. (Author’s Note)

[2] The text of al-Wāfī says: ‘From where did he take it?’ (Author’s note)

Mighty, the Great: and your step-daughters who are in your guardianship, (born) of your wives to whom you have gone in; but if you have not gone in to them, there is no blame on you (in marrying them).'' ‘Alī (a.s.) said: ‘‘This is conditional, while that (i.e., prohibition of the mother-in-law) is unconditional.'' '' Then Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) said to the man [who had asked the question]: ‘Do you not hear what this (man) narrates from ‘Alī (a.s.)?'

‘‘Thereafter when I stood up, I felt remorse and said (to myself): ‘What have I done? He [i.e., the Imām, a.s.] says: ‘‘A man of us had done so and had not considered it objectionable'', and then I [contradict him and] say: ‘‘ ‘Alī (a.s.) had given such ruling on this (matter)''.' So I met him afterwards and said: ‘May I be made your ransom! Concerning that man's enquiry, it was a mistake on my part that I spoke as I did; so what do you say in this respect?' He said: ‘O Shaykh! You inform me that ‘Alī (a.s.) had decided this matter and then you ask me what I say about it!' '' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: The story of his judgment concerning the ruling of Ibn Mas‘ūd, as narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from as-Sunan, is as follows: A man from (the tribe of) Banū Shamakh married a woman, but before establishing sexual relations with her, he saw her mother and liked her. He asked Ibn Mas‘ūd about it; and he told him to leave (i.e., divorce) the said wife and then marry her mother. He did so, and got children from her. Then Ibn Mas‘ūd came to Medina and was told that she was not lawful (for him). Therefore, on returning to Kūfah he informed the man that she was forbidden to him; and he separated from her.

But this story does not ascribe that judgment to ‘Alī (a.s.). It rather says that he had asked the Companions of the Prophet about it. Another text says that he had asked ‘Umar about it. A third narration says that he was informed that his ruling was not correct and that that condition applied to the step-daughters only.

[ash-Shaykh narrates] through his chains from Isḥāq ibn ‘Ammār from Ja‘far (a.s.) from his father (a.s.) that ‘Alī (a.s.) used to say: ‘‘The step-daughters are forbidden to you (who are born) of the mothers with whom you have cohabited, no matter whether they are in your guardianship or not; and (the wives') mothers are (forbidden) unconditionally, whether sexual intercourse was established or not.

Therefore, treat as unlawful and unconditional what Allāh has kept unconditional.'' (al-Istibṣār)

The author says: Some Sunnī traditions ascribe to ʻAlī (a.s.) that prohibition of step-daughters was conditional on their being in one's guardianship. But this is rebutted by the traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.), and as was explained earlier, the latter was in conformity with the connotation of the verse.

al-Mubhamāt (اَلْمُبْهَمَاتُ = translated above as 'unconditionally,) is derived from al-buhmah (اَلْبُهْمَةُ), which implies a thing that has a single colour, unmixed with another colour. This adjective is used for those categories of prohibited women whose prohibition is general and unconditional, that is, mothers, daughters, sisters, paternal aunts, maternal aunts, brother's daughters and sisters's daughters, as well as foster relatives, mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law.

Zurārah narrates from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he asked him about a man who has a slave girl with whom he has cohabited — ''Is it lawful for him to marry her daughter?' The Imām (a.s.) said: 'No. She is as Allāh has said: and your step-daughters who are in your guardianship ...' '' (ibid.)

Abū ʻAwn has reported that he heard Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Ḥanafī saying: '' ʻAlī (a.s.) said one day: 'Ask me (whatever you wish to ask).' Ibn al-Kawwā' said: 'Tell me about the daughter of the foster sister, and about two sisters in possession (of one master).' (The Imām, a.s.) said: 'Surely you are wan dering;(better) ask about that which concerns you or may be useful to you.' Ibn al-Kawwā' said: 'We ask you only about what we do not know; as for that which we know, we do not ask you about.' Then (the Imām, a.s.) said [inter alia]: 'As for the two slave sisters, one verse makes them lawful, while another prohibits them; and I neither allow them nor forbid them; but I do not do it nor does anyone of my household.' '' (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

It is narrated from Muʻammar ibn Yaḥyā ibn Sālim that he said: ''We asked Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) about what the people narrate from the Leader of the faithful (a.s.) concerning somethings which he neither allowed nor prohibited except his own self and his children; and I said: 'How is it possible that he said, ''One verse allows it and another forbids it''.' We said: 'First of all, either, one of them had abrogated the other, or both were decisive which should be followed.' (The Imām, a.s.) then said: 'He made the matter clear to them when he forbade himself and his children.' We said: 'What prevented him from explaining it [in clear words] to the people?' He said: 'He was afraid that his (orders) would not be obeyed; because if the Leader of the faithful could firmly establish his authority, he would have enforced the Book of Allāh, all of it, and the truth, all of it!' '' (at-Tahdhīb)

The author says: The tradition of 'Alī (a.s.), referred to, is the one narrated from him through the Sunnī chains. It is quoted in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from al-Bayhaqī and others that 'Alī (a.s.) said about two sister slave girls: ''One verse makes them lawful while another one prohibits them; and I neither allow (it) nor disallow (it); nor do I make them lawful or unlawful; and I do not do it, nor do the people of my household (do so).'' The same book narrates from Qubayṣah ibn Dhu'ayb that someone asked 'Alī (a.s.) about it and he said: ''If I had any authority and had found anyone doing it, I would have made him a warning example (i.e., would have given him exemplary punishment).''

'Abdullāh ibn Sinān said: ''I heard Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) saying: 'If a man has two [slave] sisters in his possession, and has sexual relations with one of them, and then wishes to have the same [relations] with the other, it is not allowed to him to do so, until the former goes out of his possession — either he gifts her (to someone) of sells her. Thus it will be sufficient if he gives her as a gift to his son.' '' (at-Tahdhīb)

'Muḥammad ibn Muslim said: ''I asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.) about the word of Allāh: and all married women except those whom your right hands possess. He said: 'It is [like] this, that a man orders his slave (whom is married to his slave girl), and tells him, ''Put aside your wife and do not go near her''. Then he keeps her confined until she sees her blood; after that he touches her. There after when she again sees blood after his touching her, he returns her to him [i.e., to her slave husband] without [any need of a new] marriage.' '' (al-Kāfī; at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

Ibn Muskān has narrated through Abū Baṣīr, from one of the two Imāms (a.s.), about the word of Allāh: And all married women except those whom your right hands possess, that he said: ''They are the women having husbands except those whom your right hands possess. If you have given your slave girl in marriage to your slave boy, you may remove her from him if you so wish.'' ''I said: 'Do you see, if he has given her in marriage to other than his own slave boy?' He said: '(Then) he has no right to remove (her from him) until she is sold away; then if he sells her, her affair is transferred to other than him (i.e., to the buyer); then the buyer may separate (her from her husband) if he so desires, and may reconfirm (the marriage) if he so wishes.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

as-Suyūṭī has narrated from Aḥmad, Abū Dāwūd, at-Tirmidhī (who has said that the tradition is good) and Ibn Mājah, from Fīrūz ad-Daylamī, that he entered into Islam and there were two sisters under him (i.e., he had gathered two sisters in marriage); so the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said to him: ''Give divorce to whomever you wish (to leave) of the two.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Ibn 'Abdi 'l-Barr has narrated in al-Istidhkār, from Ayās ibn 'Āmir that he said: ''I asked 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib and said: 'I have two sisters among my slaves, with one of whom I have established sexual relations and she has borne children for me; then I am attracted to the other; now what should I do?' He said: 'You should emancipate the one you had cohabited with, then you (may) cohabit with the other.' Then he said: 'Surely, all the categories of free women forbidden to you in the Book of Allāh, are also forbidden to you from among those whom your right hands possess, except the number (or he said, 'except the limit of four') and all the categories forbidden to you in the Book of Allāh through kinship, are also forbidden to you through breast-feeding.' '' (ibid.)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated it from 'Alī (a.s.) through other chains too.

Abū Hurayrah said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'A woman and her paternal aunt are not gathered together, nor are a woman and her maternal aunt.' '' (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, al-Bukhārī, Muslim)

The author says: This theme is found also in some Sunnī traditions narrated through other chains; but the traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) refute it, and the Qur'ān supports them.

aṭ-Ṭayālisī, 'Abdu 'r-Razzāq, al-Fariyābī, Ibn Abī Shaybah, Aḥmad, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Muslim, Abū Dāwūd, at-Tirmidhī and an-Nasā’ī; as well as Abū Ya‘lā, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, aṭ-Ṭaḥāwī, Ibn Ḥibbān and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated from Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī that he said: ‘‘Verily, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) sent an army, on the day of Ḥunayn, to Awṭās. They met the enemy and defeated them. after a fight and took captives. Some companions of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) refrained from cohabiting with them, because they had their polytheist husbands. Then Allāh revealed: And all married women except those whom your right hands possess, that is, except those whom Allāh has given to you as booty. So we treated them as lawful to us on that authority.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: The same book narrates it through aṭ-Ṭabarānī from Ibn ‘Abbās.

‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd has narrated from ‘Ikrimah: ‘‘This verse in the chapter of ‘The Women’, i.e.: And all married women exept those whom your right hands possess, was revealed about a woman, called Ma‘ādhah, who was married to an old man of Banū Sadūs, named Shujā‘ ibn al-Ḥārith. There was his other wife with her, who had borne to him children, [now grown-up] men. Shujā‘ went to Hajar to get provisions for his family. In the meantime, a cousin of Ma‘ādhah passed from there, and she said to him: ‘Take me away to my people, because there is no good with this old man.’ So he carried her away with him. (Their departure almost) coincided with the old man’s arrival. He went to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh, and the most excellent of the Arabs! I had gone out in [the month of] Rajab to get provisions for her; and and she fled away; and she is the worst dominator for anyone who is dominated; she saw a boy sitting on the hump; there is a desire in her and in him.’ The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Bring (them) to me! Bring (them) to me! If the man has opened her cloth (i.e., committed adultery with her), then stone her; otherwise, return to the old man his wife.’ So Mālik, son of Shujā‘ from the other wife, went out in pursuit and and brought her back and she came down to her house.’’ (ibid.)

The author says: It has repeatedly been mentioned that such stories purpoting to describe the occasion when a verse was revealed — and especially those dealing with some parts or clauses of a verse — are merely the attempts of the narrators to fit some events to some verses or sentences; they do not give the real reasons of revelation.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked about the word of Allāh, And all al-muḥṣanāt (اَلْمُحْصَنَاتُ) women: He said: ‘‘It means those who are married.’’ Then he was asked about the words, and al-muhsanāt from among those who have been given the Book before you [5:5]; he said: ‘‘The chaste women.’’ (Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l-faqīh)

The author says: al-‘Ayyāshī too has narrated it from the same Imām (a.s.).

aṭ-Ṭabrisī has explained the words, And whoever among you has not within his power ampleness of means, as ‘‘whoever among you does not have riches’’; and according to him it is narrated from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.). (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘Today a free man should not marry a slave girl. It was (allowed) as Allāh has said, And whoever among you has not within his power ampleness of means; and ampleness of means refers to dowry, but today the dowry of a free woman is (just like) the dowry of a slave girl or even less.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The author says: Wealth and riches is one connotation of ‘ampleness of means’, as was explained earlier. The tradition does not show more than undesirability of such marriages.

Abu ’l-‘Abbās al-Baqbāq has said: ‘‘I said to Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.): ‘Can a man marry a slave girl without the permission of her people?’ He said: ‘It is fornication. Surely Allāh says: so marry them with the permission of their people.’ ’’ (at-Tahdhīb)

Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad ib Naṣr says: ‘‘I asked ar-Riḍā (a.s.): ‘Can mut‘ah be done with a slave girl with the permission of her people?’ He said: ‘Yes. Surely Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says: so marry them with the permission of their people.’ ’’ (ibid.)

Muḥammad ibn Muslim says narrating from one of the two Imāms

(a.s.): ‘‘I asked him about the word of Allāh regarding the salve girls, and when they are taken in marriage — ‘What was the connotation of al-iḥṣān (اَلْاِحْصَانُ) here?’ He said: ‘Consummation of marriage.’ I said: ‘Then if the marriage is not consummated, there is no [fixed] punishment prescribed for them?’ He said: ‘Certainly.’ ’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

Ḥarīz said: ‘‘I asked him about al-muḥṣin (اَلْمُحْصِنُ). He said: ‘He who has that which suffices him.’ ’’ (ibid.)

Muḥammad ibn Qays narrates from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘The Leader of the faithful (a.s.) used to sentence slave men and women, if any of them committed fornication, to be flogged fifty stripes — whether he/she be a Muslim or unbeliever or Christian; and he/she was not to be stoned or banished.’’ (al-Kāfī)

Abū Bakr al-Ḥaḍramī narrates that Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) said about a slave who defamed a free man [of fornication]: ‘‘He shall be flogged eighty stripes; it is among the rights of the people; as concerning that which is among the rights of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, he shall be given half of the prescribed punishment.’’ ‘‘I said: ‘What are the things among the rights of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great?’’ He said: ‘When he fornicates or drinks liquor; it is among those rights for which he shall be given half of the punishment.’ ’’ (ibid.)

Barīd al-‘Ijlī narrates from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said about a slave girl who commits fornication: ‘‘She shall be given half the prescribed punishment, no matter whether she has a husband or not.’’ (at Tahdhīb)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘al-Musāfiḥāt (اَلْمُسَافِحَاتُ)refers to those who commit fornication openly; and muttakhidhāt akhdān (مُتَّخِذَاتُ اَخْدَانٍ), to those who have only one paramour.’’ Also he said: ‘‘The people of the (era of) ignorance considered fornication unlawful if it was done openly; but what remained concealed was treated as lawful. They used to say: ‘What becomes known is ignoble, but there is no blame in that which remains secret.’ Then Allāh revealed: and do not draw near to indecencies, those of them which are apparent, and those which are concealed.’’ [6:151], (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: There are numerous traditions on the themes described above; but we have quoted only a few of them as samples.

A REVIEW OF TRADITIONS ABOUT MUT'A MARRIAGE

Abū Baṣīr says: ''I asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.) about the mut'ah. He said: 'It has been revealed in the Qur'ān: Then as to such of them with whom you have mut'ah, give them their dowries as appointed; and there is no blame on you about what you mutually agree after what is appointed.' '' (al-Kāfī)

Ibn Abī 'Umayr narrates through his narrator from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: ''It was revealed (as follows): Then as to such of them with whom you have mut'ah — for a fixed period — give them their dowries as appointed.'' (ibid.)

The author says: This recital has been narrated by al-'Ayyāshī from Abū Ja'far (a.s.); also the Sunnis have narrated it by various chains from Ubayy ibn Ka'b and 'Abdullāh ibn 'Abbās, as will be described below. Probably, such traditions aim at describing the intended meaning of the verse, rather than asserting that the actual revelation contained these words.

Zurārah said: '' 'Abdullāh ibn 'Umayr al-Laythī came to Abū Ja'far (a.s.) and asked: 'What do you say about mut'ah with women?' He replied: 'Allāh has made it lawful in His Book and on the tongue of His Prophet; therefore, it is lawful upto the Day of Resurrection.' He said: 'O Abū Ja'far! (a person) like you says this while 'Umar had prohibited and made it unlawful?' He said: 'Even if he did so.' Then (al-Laythī) said: 'I seek Allāh's protection for you that you should consider a thing lawful which 'Umar had made unlawful.' ''

Zurārah says: ''Then the Imām said to him: 'Well, you adhere to the word of your companion, while I am on the word of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). Well, come on, let me utter imprecations against you that the (right) word is that which the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had said, and that false is that which your companion had uttered.' Thereupon 'Abdullāh ibn 'Umayr turned to him and said: 'Would you like it if your women, and your daughters, and your sisters, and your cousins did it?' '' Zurārah says: '' 'Then Abū Ja'far (a.s.) turned away from him when he mentioned his women and cousins.'' (ibid.)

Abū Maryam narrates that Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) said: ''As for the mut'ah, the Qur'ān was revealed for it (i.e., the Qur'ān allowed it), and the tradition of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) put it in force.'' (ibid.)

'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān ibn Abī 'Abdillāh said: ''I heard Abū Ḥanīfah asking Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about mut'ah. (The Imām, a.s.) said: 'About which mut'ah you are asking?' He said: 'I have already asked you about the mut'ah of ḥajj [i.e., ḥajju 't-tamattu']; now tell me about the mut'ah of women, is it right?' Then (the Imām, a.s.) said: 'Allāh be praised! Have you not read the Book of Allāh: Then as to such of them with whom you have mut'ah, give them their dowries as appointed?' He said: ''By Allāh! (It seemed as if) it was a verse I had never read.' '' (ibid.)

Muḥammad ibn Muslim narrates from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: ''Jābir ibn 'Abdillāh has narrated from the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) that they [i.e., the Muslims] went on an expedition with him [the Holy Prophet], and he made mut'ah lawful for them and (then) did not prohibit it; and 'Alī used to say: 'Had not the son of Khaṭṭāb (i.e., 'Umar) gone ahead of me in this matter [i.e., had he not forbidden it before I came to power], none would have committed fornication except a scoundrel'[1] ; and Ibn 'Abbās used to say: 'Then as to such of them with whom you have mut'ah — for a fixed period — give them their dowries as appointed; and these people deny it, while the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had allowed it and not forbidden it.' '' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

Abū Baṣīr narrates from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said about mut'ah: ''The verse was revealed; then as to such of them with whom you have mut'ah, give them their dowries as appointed; and there is no blame on you about what you mutually agree after what is appointed.'' Then he said: ''There is no blame if you increase her (dowry) and she increases your (period), when the period (fixed) between you two expires. You may say, with her consent, 'I make you lawful for me for another (fixed) period.' But she is not lawful for other than you until her waiting period expires; and her waiting period is two monthly courses.'' (ibid.)

ash-Shaybānī narrates from Abū Ja'far and Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) that they said regarding the verse, and there is no blame on you about what you mutually agree after what is appointed: ''It means that he increases her dowry or she increases his (fixed) period.''

[1] Another version says: 'except the most scoundrel.' (Author's Note)

The author says: There are mutawātir or nearly mutawātir traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt on the above themes; but we have quoted only a few of them. Anyone wanting to study the lot, should refer to the collections of traditions.

[Traditions on the Recitation: ''For a Fixed Period'']

Ibn Abī Ḥātim has narrated from Ibn ʻAbbās, that he said: ''The mutʻah of women was in the beginning of Islam. A man used to arrive at a town; there was none with him to mend his things or to look after his property. Therefore, he married a woman for as long as he thought his work (there) would last; and she looked after his property and mended his things.'' And he [Ibn ʻAbbās] used to recite: ''Then as to such of them with whom you have mutʻah — for a fixed period.'' ''It was abrogated by the words: with chastity, not committing fornication. [1] And marriage-tie was in the hand of man, he kept (her) as long as he wished, and let (her) go when he wished.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr) al-Ḥākim narrates through his chains from Abū Naḍrah, that he said: ''I recited before Ibn ʻAbbās, Then as to such of them with whom you have mutʻah, give them their dowries as appointed; Ibn ʻAbbās said: 'Then as to such of them with whom you have mutaʻah — for a fixed period.' I said: ''We do not read it like that.' Ibn ʻAbbās said: 'By Allāh! Allāh had revealed it like that.' '' (al-Mustadrak)

The author says: This tradition has also been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from al-Ḥākim, ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu '1-Anbārī (in al-Maṣāḥif).

ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from Qatādah that he said: ''Ubayy ibn Kaʻb used to recite: Then as to such of them with whom you have mutʻah — for a fixed period.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Muḥammad ibn Kaʻb narrates from Ibn ʻAbbās that he said: ''The mutʻah was in the beginning of Islam. A man used to arrive at a town which he did not know. So, he married a woman for as long as he thought he would stay there; so she looked after his property and mended his things. (It continued) until the verse was revealed: ... except before their

[1] How can a preceding phrase of the same verse abrogate the clause of mutʻah which comes after it? (tr.)

mates or those whom their right hands possess'' [23:6]; Ibn ‘Abbās said: ''Now every woman except these two (categories) is unlawful.' '' (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, at-Tirmidhī)

The author says: It implies that the mut‘ah was abrogated in Mecca [before hijrah], because the purportedly abrogating verse is of Meccan period!

‘Abdullāh ibn Abī Malīkah says: ''I asked ‘Ā'ishah (r.a.) about the mut‘ah of women. She said: 'The Book of Allāh is between me and you.' Then she recited: And who guard their private parts, except before their mates or those whom their right hands possess, for they surely are not blameable, [23:5 — 6]; but whoever seeks to go beyond what Allāh has given in his marriage or in his possession, he surely exceeds the limit.''[1]

[Some Traditions showing that the Mut‘ah was abrogated by the Qur'ān]

Abū Dāwūd (in his an-Nāsikh), Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and an-Naḥḥās have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that the verses, Then as to such of them with whom you have mut‘ah, give them their dowries as appointed, was abrogated by the verses, O Prophet! when you divorce them for their prescribed time [65:1]; And the divorced women should keep themselves in waiting for three monthly courses [2:228]; And (as for) those of your women who have despaired of menstruation, if you have a doubt, their prescribed time shall be three months [65:4]. (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Abū Dāwūd (in his an-Nāsikh), Ibnu '1-Mundhir, an-Naḥḥās and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyab that he said: ''The verse of inheritance has abrogated the mut‘ah.'' (ibid.)

‘Abdu 'r-Razzāq and Ibnu ''l-Mundhir have narrated from ‘Alī, that he said: ''Ramaḍān abrogated every (other) fast; and az-zakāt abrogated every (other) alms; and mut‘ah was abrogated by divorce, waiting period and inheritance; and the sacrifice (of ḥajj) abrogated every (other) slaughter.'' (ibid.)

---

[1] As the author has commented above, such claim would antedate the supposed prohibition of mut‘ah prior to hijrah, which even the Sunnīs do not claim. Moreover, as I have noted earlier, the whole argument for or against mut‘ah is meant to establish whether a women of mut‘ah is a lawful wife or not. Now to assume that the word, 'mates', used in this verse excludes the mut‘ah wife is begging the question. (tr.)

[Some Traditions showing that the Mut'ah was abrogated by the Sunnah]

'Abdu 'r-Razzāq, Aḥmad and Muslim have narrated from Sabrah al-Juḥanī that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) allowed us, in the year of the Conquest of Mecca, to marry women in mut'ah. So I went out with a man of my tribe; I was his better in beauty while he was almost ugly. Each of us had a garment; my garment was worn and shabby, while my cousin's was brand new and fresh. When we reached upper region of Mecca, a girl came before us — like a beautiful young she-camel. We said (to her): 'Do you agree that one of us should marry you in mut'ah?' She said: 'And what will you pay?' So each of us spread his garment. She kept looking at two of us. When my companion saw her (hesitation), he said: 'Surely, his garment is old and worn; and my garment is new and fresh.' She kept replying: 'Even his garment is not bad.' So, I did mut'ah with her. We had not even departed from Mecca when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) prohibited it.'' (ibid.)

Mālik, 'Abdu 'r-Razzāq, Ibn Abī Shaybah, al-Bukhārī, Muslim, at-Tirmidhī, an-Nasā'ī and Ibn Mājah have narrated from 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib: ''Verily, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) forbade the mut'ah of women on the day of Khaybar; and (the same day, prohibited) eating the flesh of domesticated donkeys.'' (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah, Aḥmad and Muslim have narrated from Salamah ibn al-Akwa' that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) allowed us to do mut'ah with women, in the year of Awṭās for three days, then he forbade it.'' (ibid.)

Ibnu 'l-'Arabī writes in his Commentary of Ṣaḥīḥ at-Tirmidhī: ''Ismā'īl narrates from his father, from az-Zuhrī, that Sabrah said that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) prohibited it in the Last Pilgrimage. It has been narrated by Abū Dāwūd, ... and it has been narrated by 'Abdu 'l-'Azīz ibn 'Umar ibn 'Abdi 'l-'Azīz from ar-Rabī' ibn Sabrah from his father, in which he says that it was in the Last Pilgrimage, after it was allowed, and that it was [marriage] for a fixed period; and al-Ḥasan has said that it was (forbidden) in the 'Umrah of al-Qaḍā'.''

The same book narrates from az-Zuhrī that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) forbade mut'ah in the expedition of Tabūk.

The author says: As you see, the traditions contradict each other in identifying the time when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) prohibited the mut'ah. Some say it was prior to hijrah;others that it was after hijrah. A group says it was abrogated by the verses of marriage, divorce, waiting period and inheritance, while others claim that it was prohibited by the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in the battle of Khaybar [Rajab, 7 AH], or at the 'Umrah of al-Qaḍā' [end of 7 AH], or in the year of Awṭās or the Conquest of Mecca [8 AH], or the year of Tabūk [9 AH], or after the Last Pilgrimage [end of 10 AH]. That is why the Sunnī scholars say that it was prohibited several times, and each of the above traditions describes one or the other of the occasions. But some of the narrators, like 'Alī, Jābir and Ibn Mas'ūd, were too great to remain unaware of the Prophet's orders — especially when we remember that they were constantly with him (s.a.w.a.) and knew every big and small matter of his life.[1]

al-Bayhaqī narrates from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) forbade mut'ah. It was only for him who did not get [means for permanent marriage]; but when (verses of) marriage, divorce, waiting period and mutual inheritance (rights) of husband and wife were revealed, it was abrogated.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr) an-Naḥḥās has narrated that 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib said to Ibn 'Abbās: ''Surely, you are a straying man; verily, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had forbidden mut'ah.'' (ibid.)

al-Bayhaqī narrates from Abū Dharr that he said: ''The mut'ah was allowed for the companions of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) only for three days; then the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) forbade it.'' (ibid.)

Abū Jamrah says that Ibn 'Abbās was asked about mut'ah, and he allowed it. Thereupon a slave of his said to him: ''Surely it was (allowed) when the number of women was small and the condition was hard.'' Ibn 'Abbās said: ''Yes.'' (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, al-Bukhārī)

[1] Other scholars say that it was allowed and disallowed repeatedly. Muslim has given the following heading to the chapter of ''Mut'ah'' in his aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ: ''Chapter of the mut'ah marriage, and that it was allowed, then abrogated, then again allowed, and then abrogated ...'' ash-Shāfi'ī says: ''I do not know anything in Islam that was allowed, then prohibited, then allowed and then prohibited.'' Some have said that it was allowed and abrogated three times; others have said, more than three times. Vide Tafsīr Maẓharī, by Qāḍī Thanā'ullāh Pānīpatī, p.72. (tr.)

al-Bayhaqī has narrated that ‘Umar delivered a lecture in which he said: ‘‘How is it that some men marry (in) this mut‘ah form, and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had forbidden it? None will be brought before me who had married (in) this (form) but I shall stone him.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibn Abī Shaybah, Aḥmad and Muslim have narrated from Sabrah that he said: ‘‘I saw the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) standing between the Rukn and the door [of the Ka‘bah], and he was saying: ‘O people! I had allowed you to marry in mut‘ah form; well, Allāh has prohibited it upto the Day of Resurrection. Now, if anyone has got any (woman) from them, he should let her go, but do not take back anything from what you have given them.’ ’’(ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah narrates from al-Ḥasan that he said: ‘‘By Allāh! Mut‘ah was not but only three days, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had permitted them in that (period); it was not before that, nor after that.’’ (ibid.)

[Some Traditions of some Companions and their Disciples about Lawfulness of the Mut‘ah]

Mujāhid has said about (the verse), Then as to such of them with whom you have mut‘ah: ‘‘It is the mut‘ah marriage.’’ (at-Tafsīr, aṭ-Ṭabarī)

as-Suddī said about this verse: ‘‘It is mut‘ah; a man marries a woman on the condition of a fixed period; and when the term expires, he has no authority on her and she is free of him; but she is obliged [to observe the waiting period] to be sure of what is in her womb; and there is no inheritance between them, neither will inherit the other.’’ (ibid.)

It is narrated in aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, al-Bukhārī and aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, Muslim, and reported in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from ‘Abdu ’r-Razzāq and Ibn Abī Shaybah, from Ibn Mas‘ūd that he said: ‘‘We used to go on expeditions with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and our women were not with us. So we said: ‘Should not we castrate ourselves?’ But (the Prophet) forbade us to do so; and allowed us to marry a woman on (dowry of) a garment for a (fixed) period.’’ Then ‘Abdullāh recited: O you who believe! do not forbid (yourselves) the good things which Allāh has made lawful for you [5:87].

Ibn Abī Shaybah narrates from Nāfi‘ that Ibn ‘Umar was asked about mut‘ah, and he said that it was unlawful. It was said to him: ‘‘Verily, Ibn ‘Abbās declares it as lawful.’’ He said: ‘‘Why did not he open his mouth in the reign of ‘Umar?’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, aṭ-Ṭabarānī and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Sa‘īd ibn Jubayr that he said: ‘‘I said to Ibn ‘Abbās: ‘What have you done? Travellers have carried your ruling (far and wide), and poets have composed poems about it.’ He said: ‘And what have they said?’ I said: ‘They have said:

‘‘I say to the old man, as he has stayed a long time,
O my companion! Are you interested in the rulling of Ibn ‘Abbās?
Would you like to have a chubby unmarried girl?
Who would be your resting place, until the people depart
[from here].’’ ’

(Ibn ‘Abbās) said: ‘Surely, we are Allāh’s, and to Him we shall surely return. No, By Allāh! I have not given this ruling, nor is this which I have meant. I have not allowed it but to one who is hard-pressed; and I have not allowed of it except what Allāh has allowed of dead body, blood and flesh of swine.’ ’’ (ibid.)

Ibnu ’l-Mundhir narrates from ‘Ammār (slave of ash-Sharīd) that he said: ‘‘I asked Ibn ‘Abbās regarding the mut‘ah, whether it is marriage or fornication. He said: ‘Neither marriage nor fornication.’ I said: ‘Then what is it?’ He said: ‘It is mut‘ah, as Allāh has said.’ I said: ‘Does it have a waiting period?’ He said: ‘Its waiting period is one monthly course.’ I said: ‘Do they inherit each other?’ He said: ‘No.’ ’’ (ibid.)

‘Abdu ’r-Razzāq and Ibnu ’l-Mundhir have narrated through ‘Aṭā’ from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘May Allāh have mercy on ‘Umar. Mut‘ah was but a mercy from Allāh, which He had bestowed on the ummah of Muḥammad. If he (‘Umar) had not forbidden it, none but the most wicked would have needed fornication.’’ Also he said: ‘‘It is that which is in the chapter of ‘The Women’: Then as to such of them with whom you have mut‘ah to such and such a period on such and such a dowry.’’ Again he said: ‘‘There is no inheritance between them. If they decide to agree after the term [to extend it], then, yes; and if they separate, then, yes; and there is no [permanent] marriage between them.’’ ‘Aṭā’ said that he heard from Ibn ‘Abbās that in his opinion it was lawful (even) now. (ibid.)

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr, aṭ-Ṭabarī and also in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from ʻAbdu 'r-Razzāq and Abū Dāwūd (in his an Nāsikh) from al-Ḥakam that he was asked about this verse [of mutʻah] whether it was abrogated. He said: ''No.'' Also ʻAlī (a.s.) has said: ''If ʻUmar had not forbidden mutʻah, none but a scoundrel would have committed fornication.''

[Some Traditions showing that it was ʻUmar who had forbidden the Mutʻah]

Jābir ibn ʻAbdillāh said: ''We used to do mutʻah on a handful of date and flour, for fixed days, in the time of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and Abū Bakr — until ʻUmar disallowed it in the affair of ʻAmr ibn Ḥurayth.'' (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, Muslim)

The author says: This tradition has also been quoted in Jāmiʻu 'l-uṣūl (of Ibnu 'l-Athīr),Zādu 'l-maʻād (of Ibnu 'l-Qayyim), Fatḥu 'l-bārī (of Ibn Ḥajar) and Kanzu 'l-ʻummāl.

Mālik and ʻAbdu 'r-Razzāq have narrated from ʻUrwah ibn az-Zubayr that Khawlah bint Ḥakīm came to ʻUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb and said: ''Rabīʻah ibn Umayyah had done mutʻah with a woman of not pure Arab blood, and she had become pregnant from him.'' [Hearing this] ʻUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb came out, trailing his robe in dismay, and said: ''This is mutʻah! Had I gone ahead about it [i.e., Had I forbidden it before], I would have stoned (the person concerned).'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: It has also been reported from ash-Shāfiʻī (in his Kitābu 'l-umm) and from al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan).

Sulaymān ibn Yasār narrates from Umm ʻAbdillāh, daughter of Abū Khaythamah, that a man came from Syria and stayed with her. Then he said: ''Verily, bachelorhood has become hard for me to bear; therefore, find for me a woman with whom I should do mutʻah.'' She says: ''So, I led him to a woman and he made conditions with her, and got men of probity as witnesses for it. He remained with her as long as Allāh wished him to; and then he went away. Then ʻUmar was informed of it. He called for me and asked: 'Is it correct what I have been told?' I said: 'Yes.' He said: 'If he comes (back), let me know.' When he came back, I informed ʻUmar; and he called for him and asked: 'What made you to do what you did?' He said: 'I did so in the days of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and he did not forbid us to do so until Allāh took him (to Himself); then (we did it) in the days of Abū Bakr, and he too did not forbid us to do so, until Allāh took him away; then (we did so) during your days and you did not issue to us any prohibition against it.' Then 'Umar said: 'Well, by Him in Whose hand my soul is, if I had gone ahead with its prohibition, I would have stoned you; announce it, in order that marriage might be distinguished from fornication.' '' (Kanzu 'l-'ummāl)

'Aṭā' has said: ''Jābir ibn 'Abdillāh came for 'umrah; so we went to him at his staying place, and people asked him regarding various things, then they mentioned mut'ah. He said: 'We did mut'ah in the time of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and Abū Bakr and 'Umar.' '' Aḥmad's narration adds: ''until it was the last period of 'Umar's (r.a.) caliphate.'' (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, Muslim; Musnad, Aḥmad)

Nāfi' reports that 'Abdullāh ibn 'Umar was asked about mut'ah and he said: ''(It is) forbidden. Why, look, if 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb had caught anyone doing it, he would have stoned him.'' (as-Sunan, al-Bayhaqī)

Ibnu 'l-Jawzī says: '' 'Umar (r.a.) used to say: 'By Allāh! Nobody will be brought before me, (accused of) practising mut'ah, but I shall stone him.'' (Mir'ātu 'z-zamān)

Ibn Rushd narrates from Jābir ibn 'Abdillāh that he said: ''We did mut'ah in the days of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and Abū Bakr, and during half the reign of 'Umar; then 'Umar forbade people to do so.'' (Bidāyatu 'l-mujtahid)

Ibn al-Kalbī has said: ''Verily, Salamah ibn Umayyah ibn Khalaf al-Jumaḥī did mut'ah with Salmā, slave girl of Ḥākim ibn Umayyah ibn al-Awqaṣ al-Aslamī, and she bore from him a child, but he denied (paternity of) her child. This news reached 'Umar; therefore he forbade mut'ah.'' (al-Iṣābah)

Ayyūb says: '' 'Urwah said to Ibn 'Abbās: 'Do you not fear Allāh, that you allow mut'ah?' Ibn 'Abbās said: 'Ask your mother, O 'Urwah!' Then 'Urwah said: 'But Abū Bakr and 'Umar did not do it!' Thereupon, Ibn 'Abbās said: 'By Allāh! I do not think you will stop (in your arrogance) until Allāh chastises you. We talk to you from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and you talk to us from Abū Bakr and 'Umar.' '' (Zādu 'l- ma‘ād)

The author says: The mother of ‘Urwah [mentioned in the above tradition] was Asmā’, daughter of Abū Bakr, who was married in mut‘ah form by az-Zubayr ibn al-‘Awwām, from whom she bore ‘Abdullāh ibn az-Zubayr and ‘Urwah.

ar-Rāghib writes: ‘‘ ‘Abdullāh ibn az-Zubayr reproached ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Abbās because the latter considered mut‘ah as lawful. ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Abbās told him: ‘Ask your mother how the censers glowed between her and your father?’ So he asked her and she replied: ‘I did not give birth to you but in mut‘ah’ ’’(al-Muḥāḍarāt)

Muslim al-Quriyy says: ‘‘I asked Ibn ‘Abbās about mut‘ah; and he allowed it; but Ibn az-Zubayr used to reject it. So (Ibn ‘Abbās) said: ‘This is the mother of Ibn az-Zubayr, who narrates that the Messenger of Allāh had allowed it; so go to her and ask her.’ ’’ Muslim says: ‘‘So we went to her and, lo! she was a stout blind woman. She said: ‘The Messenger of Allāh has allowed it.’ ’’ (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, Muslim)

The author says: The context shows that the question was about the mut‘ah of women; and other traditions too give the same meaning.

Abū Naḍrah said: ‘‘I was with Jābir ibn ‘Abdillāh when someone came to him and said: ‘Ibn ‘Abbās and Ibn az-Zubayr have differed about the two mut‘ahs [i.e., mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj and mut‘ah of women].’ Jābir said: ‘We did both with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), then ‘Umar forbade us both, but we did not deviate from them.’ ’’ (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, Muslim)

The author says: Reportedly al-Bayhaqī too has narrated it in his as-Sunan; and the same theme has been narrated in aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim, in three places with different wordings, one of which reports Jābir as saying: ‘‘But when ‘Umar stood up [i.e., came to power], he said: ‘Surely Allāh used to allow for His Messenger whatever He wished in any way He wished. Therefore, you complete the ḥajj and the ‘umrah, as Allāh has ordered, and stop marrying these women. No man shall be brought to me who would have married a woman for a [fixed] period but I shall stone him.’

Also this theme has been narrated by al-Bayhaqī in his as-Sunan and al-Jaṣṣāṣ in his Aḥkamu 'l-Qur'ān; also it is reported in Kanzu 'l-'ummāl and ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, as well as in at-Tafsīr of ar-Rāzī and Musnad of aṭ-Ṭayālisī.

al-Qurṭubī has narrated, in his at-Tafsīr, from 'Umar that he said in his lecture: ''Two mut'ahs were [practised] in the time of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); but I forbid them and shall inflict punishment on them; the mut'ah of ḥajj and the mut'ah of women.''

The author says: This lecture of his is among the things unanimously accepted by all narrators; and they have reported it as an undisputed fact. Vide, for example, at-Tafsīr of ar-Rāzī, al-Bayān wa 't-tab'īn, Zādu 'l-ma'ād, Aḥkāmu 'l-Qur'ān, [at-Tārīkh of] aṭ-Ṭabarī and of Ibn 'Asākir among other references.

aṭ-Ṭabarī has narrated from 'Umar that he said: ''There were three things in the time of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); but I am forbidding them; and shall give punishment on them: mut'ah of ḥajj, and mut'ah of women, and ḥayya 'alā khayri 'l-'amal in the adhān (call for prayer).'' (al-Mustabīn)

'Imrān ibn Sawādah says: ''I prayed dawn (prayer) with 'Umar; he recited (the chapter of) Subḥān and another one with it; then he returned and I stood with him. He said: '(Do you have) any work (with me)?' I said: '(Yes,) there is (some) work.' He said: 'Then join (me).' I joined him. When he entered (his house), he gave permission to me. I found him on a bare bed-stead which had nothing on it. I said: '(I have come with) a sincere advice.' He said: 'Welcome to the adviser, day and night.' I said: 'Your people blame (you) for four things.' (Hearing this) he put the handle of his whip under his chin and its tip on his thigh, and said: 'Let me hear it.' I said: 'They say that you have prohibited 'umrah during the months of ḥajj, while neither the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) nor Abū Bakr (r.a.) had done so, and it is lawful (in sharī'ah).' He said: 'Is it lawful? If they do 'umrah during the months of ḥajj, they will think it suffices them from ḥajj; and will go out at once like a chick from it shell; and the ḥajj (days) will be empty (of people), while it is a splendour from Allāh's spleandours; and I have done right.'

‘‘I said: ‘Also they say that you have prohibited the mut‘ah of women, while it was a permission from Allāh. We used to do mut‘ah on a handful [of date, etc.] and separate after three (days).’ He said: ‘Surely, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had allowed it at a time when there was need (of it), then the people did get affluence; thereafter, I do not know any Muslim who did it or resorted to it. Now let anyone who so wishes marry [permanently] on a handful [of date] and separate the third day by divorce; and I have done right.’

‘‘Then I said: ‘You have granted freedom to a slave girl if she delivers a child, even without being emancipated by her master.’ He said: ‘I have joined honour with honour; and I did not mean but good; and I ask pardon of Allāh.’

‘‘I said: ‘And they complain against your reviling the public and your harsh demeanour.’ (Hearing this,) he drew the whip and wiped it until he came to its end, then said: ‘I am a travelling-companion of Muḥammad and was his travelling-companion in the expedition of Qarqaratu ’l-Kidr. By Allāh! I put (animals) to pasture until I satiate, and I give (them) drink until I quench their thirst; I hit the unruly camel and restrain the untamed one; and I defend my cooking-pot and drive my steps; and gather obdurate ones, and join slow ones; and I often admonish but seldom strike; and make a show of whip but repulse by hand. (Even) if it had not been so, I would have had an excuse.’ ’’

(‘Imrān) said: ‘‘This narrative reached Mu‘āwiyah, and he said: ‘He was, by Allāh, knowledgeable of his subjects.’ ’’ (at-Tārīkh, aṭ-Ṭabarī)

The author says: Ibn Abi ’l-Ḥadīd has narrated it in his Sharḥ Nahji ’l-balāghah from Ibn Qutaybah.

These are some of the traditions regarding the topic of mut‘ah of women.

A discerning scholar, looking at them, cannot fail to see:-

First: The contradictions and irreconcilibility so glaringly found in them. The scholar cannot reach at any conclusion from them except that it was ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb who, during his reign, forbade and prohibited it because of his personal opinion, which he formed after hearing the stories of ‘Amr ibn Ḥurayth and Rabī‘ah ibn Umayyah ibn Khalaf al-Jumaḥī. As for the claim of its abrogation by the Qur’ān or tradition, you have already seen that it has no leg to stand on. It is quite apart from the fact that whatever stand one takes, some traditions contradict the others. The only point of agreement is that it was ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb who prohibited it and enforced his prohibition, who decided that the action was forbidden and laid down the punishment of stoning for him who did it.

Second: That it was a custom that was prevalent in the time of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) by his permission; it makes no difference whether he had established that custom, or had let an old custom continue. Also that it was practised by such of his companions who cannot be accused of fornication, by any stretch of imagination. For instance, Jābir ibn ‘Abdillāh, ‘Abdullāh ibn Mas‘ūd, az-Zubayr ibn al-‘Awwām and Asmā’, daughter of Abū Bakr, who had given birth to ‘Abdullāh, son of az-Zubayr through this very mut‘ah marriage.

Third: That there were among the companions and their disciples, people who continued to believe and declare that mut‘ah was lawful, like Ibn Mas‘ūd, Jābir, ‘Amr ibn Ḥurayth and others (among the companions); and Mujāhid, as-Suddī, Sa‘īd ibn Jubayr and others [among the disciples].

This open and clear conflict among the traditions has led the Sunnī scholars, first to disagree among themselves whether mut‘ah was lawful or unlawful, and then compelled the protagonists of prohibition to opt for diverse opinions as to how it was prohibited. In all, they have adopted not less than fifteen views — each different from the others and all amazing.

One may discuss this topic from many angles, but we are concerned here with some of them only. There is a sectarian polemic going on between the Sunnīs and the Shī‘ahs. There is a jurisprudential aspect, whether mut‘ah is lawful or not. Lastly, there is the exegetical angle, dealing with the exegesis of the verse: Then as to such of them with whom you have mut‘ah ...: Does it ordain the lawfulness of the mut‘ah? If yes, then was it abrogated by any other verse, like that of the chapter 23 (The Believers) or those of marriage, prohibition, divorce, waiting period or inheritance? Or was it abrogated by the sunnah of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.)? Also, if it was legalized, had Islam initiated a new system? Or had it just confirmed an old custom? And so on and so forth.

It is this third aspect, i.e., exegetical, that we shall discuss in this book. We have already explained these matters in the Commentary; but here we shall give some more details, by drawing the readers' attention to what has been said [by some non-Shī'ahs] against the verse's implication regarding the mut'ah marriage and its legislation.

[An Exegete's Claims and our Comments]

A writer, after insisting that the verse only implies that one should pay dowry in full in permanent marriage, expresses his views as follows:

''The Shī'ahs say that the verse refers to the mut'ah marriage, i.e., marrying a woman for a fixed term, e.g., one day, one week or one month. They argue by an irregular recital of the Qur'ān which is narrated from Ubayy, Ibn Mas'ūd and Ibn 'Abbās (may Allāh be pleased with them), and by the reports and traditions that have been narrated about mut'ah.

''As for the recital, it is irregular, which is not proved to be [a part of] the Qur'ān. It has been explained earlier that if there are correct traditions as khabaru 'l-wāḥid in such matters, then the added words are treated as explanation; and it shows what the man concerned had understood [from the verse]; but understanding of a companion is not a proof in matters of religion, especially when the sequence and context [of the verse] rejects it — as it does here. Because the man who marries in mut'ah for a fixed term does not intend chastity instead of fornication; rather his first intention is sexual satisfaction. Therefore, even if there is a sort of chastity for man (as it prevents him from free indulgence in fornication), there is surely nothing of chastity for the woman who hires out her body every now and then to a new man; she becomes, as has been said:

A ball that is struck by bats
And is dealt with by man after man.''

COMMENT: He claims that the Shī'ahs argue by a recital of Ibn Mas'ūd and others. But anyone who refers to the Shī'ī books and arguments will see that, when they mention that recital, they do not do so because they think it to be a reliable and independent proof in itself. How can they do so when they do not accept the authoritativeness of irregular recitals, even if they are attributed to their own Imāms? How can they argue by something they do not accept as authoritative against someone who does not accept its authority? Such an idea is nothing but a joke.

The Shī'ahs' actual argument is this: Those companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to recite the verse in that way. It means that they believed it to be the verse's connotation. It is irrelevant whether they recited it as a part of the Qur'ān, or just as its explanation which showed that they had understood this meaning from the wordings of the verse.

This argument is useful to the Shī'ahs in two ways:

First: It shows that a number of the companions believed as the Shī'ahs do. As the reports show, a number of the companions and their disciples believed in the lawfulness of the mut'ah, and if one wants to verify it, one is free to consult the relevant books.

Second: It proves that the verse means exactly what the Shī'ahs say, and the recital of those companions supports it. Not only that. Even the claim that the verse was later abrogated, clearly shows that the claimants accepted that the verse proved the lawfulness of the mut'ah marriage; otherwise, there was no need for them to say that it was abrogated or to narrate traditions of its abrogation. There are a lot of such traditions, a number of which was quoted above. The Shī'ahs make use even of the traditions of abrogation in the same way as they do with the above-mentioned irregular recital. It does not mean that they accept authority of irregular recitals, as it does not mean that they accept the verse's abrogation. What they want to prove is that those reciters and narrators believed that the verse spoke about the lawfulness of the mut'ah marriage.

As for the claim that the context of the verse does not agree with this meaning, his whole argument seems to be based on the assumption that the verb, al-musāfaḥah (اَلْمُسَافَحَةُ = fornication) has been used in this verse in its literal sense, i.e., ejaculation of semen, and then he links this meaning with its intention. Thus he claims that the temporary marriage for satisfaction of sexual desire is as-sifāḥ (اَلسِّفَاحُ = fornication), and not an-nikāḥ (اَلنِّكَاحُ = marriage). He seems unaware of the fact that even an-nikāḥ literally means sexual intercourse. It is written in Lisānu 'l-'Arab: ''al-Azharī says: 'The basic meaning of an-nikāḥ in Arabic is to have sexual intercourse.' '' Therefore, it will be necessary for him to say that even an-nikāḥ was fornication! Thus, his supposed contraposition between an-nikāḥ and as-sifāḥ loses its bearing.

Moreover, if the intention of satisfying sexual urge turns the temporary marriage into fornication, then what if someone marries permanently with the same intention? Surely that permanent marriage too must turn into fornication. But is there any Muslim prepared to say so?

May be someone will say: There is a difference between permanent and temporary marriages. The permanent marriage by its very nature is meant to maintain chastity, procreate children and establish a household. But it is not so in a temporary marriage.

But it is just superciliousness. All the benefits attributed to the permanent marriage are obtainable from the temporary one; protects from fornication, saves the geneology from mix-up; children may be born and cared for, and a house-hold may be established. That is apart from the added benefit which this ummah could derive from it because it is much more easier to do; and even he who because of various reasons (poverty, inability to maintain a wife permanently, being on a journey or other such reasons) is unable to marry permanently, may utilize this permission and save himself from sin.

On the other hand, all presumed defects of the temporary marriage — which have led him to say that mut'ah was fornication — may be found in the permanent marriage too, like the intention of satisfying sexual desire by ejaculating semen in the woman. Therefore, the claim that permanent marriage was made in its very nature for the claimed benefits, while temporary marriage was made in its very nature for the supposed defects, is just a claim that is not supported by any evidence and whose incorrectness is crystal clear.

Another claim: Mut'ah marriage is as-sifāḥ (ejaculation); therefore it is fornication that is opposite of marriage. But when you interpret as-sifāḥ as ejaculation of semen, then it will cover not only fornication but permanent marriage also — especially if the latter was done for satisfaction of sexual desire.

It is really emazing to read his claim that even if there is a sort of chastity for the man, there is no chastity for the woman. Would that I knew what was the difference between man and woman in this respect. How is it that a man can preserve his chastity and protect himself from fornication through the mut'ah, but a woman cannot? Is it anything except foolhardiness?

Now we come to the poetry lines quoted by him. The discourse is on a serious subject, by which we are trying to discover a religious reality which has very important bearing on the life of this world and the next — no matter whether at the end mut'ah is proved lawful or unlawful. What is the use of poetry in such a discourse? Poetry is just an imaginary composition;it recognizes falsehood more than it does truth; and has more affinity with error than with guidance.

One wonders why did he not recite these lines when discussing the above-mentioned traditions, and especially after the words of ‘Umar (in the tradition of aṭ-Ṭabarī quoted above): ‘‘Now let anyone who so wishes marry [permanently] on a handful [of date] and separate the third day by divorce.’’

And who is the real target of his calumination except Allāh and His Messenger who had legalized this type of marriage, either as a new institution or by endorsement of an established custom? After all, it was undeniably a system prevalent among Muslims in the early Islam within the sight and hearing of the Prophet.

Question: The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had allowed it in exigency, because in those days the Muslims were poor, and poverty overwhelmed the ummah; also they had to participate in expeditions, as some of the above-quoted traditions imply.

Reply: Once you admit that mut‘ah was prevalent among the people in the early days of Islam, and that it was known by the names of mut‘ah marriage, or istimtā‘, there is no escape from admitting that the verse shows its lawfulness; that it is an unconditional verse and no other verse or tradition has capability of abrogating it. In this background, the claim that it was somehow abrogated is nothing but a willful misinterpretation without any proof.

Let us accept [for the sake of argument] that it was allowed by the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) as a matter of exigency. Now let us ask ourselves: Was the need during the time of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) greater and more pressing than in the post-Prophetic era? Especially during the reigns of the ‘rightly-guided’ caliphs, when the armies of the Muslims in their thousands were always on move to the east and the west? What was the difference between the first and the second halves of the caliphate of ‘Umar in this respect? How had the exigency vanished? Were there no poor Muslims in those days? Or had they stopped going to wars or journeys, etc.? Why one type of need had justified its legislation, but other types could not?

Compare the situation of the Muslim societies today with that of the time of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the first half of the ‘‘rightly-guided caliphs’’. Is not the need that justified its legislation greater and more pressing now that it was in those days? Backbreaking poverty reigns over the Muslim countries, and the colonial governments and imperial powers as well as the Pharaohs who rule these places are sucking the blood of the masses, and usurping all green and dry produce of their labour.

Today licentiousness manifests itself everywhere; libertinism appears in ever-more attractive and eye-catching garb; there is ever more effective exhortation to indulge in carnality and debauchery. This trend is spreading its tentacles wider and wider; the trouble is reaching every corner of the world and infecting more and more people. Immorality, illicit sexual behaviour, is engulfing all the youths — be they students, soldiers or factory workers — and this group constitutes the majority of the human population.

Nobody can ever be in doubt about the basic needs which push these youths to fornication, homosexuality and all types of sexual aberrations. They are unable to establish and run a household; they are engaged in temporary occupations, or posted to a base for a fixed term, and it does not allow them to establish a home and marry permanently — no matter whether they are in service or studies or journey, etc. Now, how is it that these necessities could legalize mut‘ah marriage in the early days of Islam — when they were comparatively less prevalent and much easier to bear, but cannot make it lawful in other times even when the calamity has overwhelmed the mankind, and mischief has greatly increased?

The said writer has further written: ‘‘Furthermore, the mut‘ah goes against what has been established in the Qur’ān about this subject [of marriage]. Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says praising the believers: And who guard their private parts, except before their mates or those whom their right hands possess, for they surely are not blameable; but whoever seeks to go beyond that, these are they that exceed the limits (23:5 — 7). That is, they exceed the limit of what Allāh has made lawful for them, and go into what He has forbidden. These verses are not in conflict with the verse under discussion, i.e.: Then as to such of them with whom you have mut‘ah ... [which he takes to mean, with whom you have cohabited]; they are rather of the same connotation, and there is therefore no abrogation. The woman in mut‘ah is not a wife, who could have rights on man similar to man’s rights on her, as Allāh has said. It has been reported from the Shī‘ahs that they themselves do not apply the rules of marriage on her, nor do they give her the concomitants of matrimony: They do not count her among the four wives a man is allowed to have together in marriage (if there is no danger of injustice); they rather allow him to marry in mut‘ah a lot of women. Likewise, they do not prescribe the punishment of stoning for a fornicator when he has a mut‘ah wife — because they do not count him as married; it shows their conviction that the words of Allāh about those married in mut‘ah, taking them with chastity, not committing fornication, [which he interprets as, ‘in marriage, not committing fornication’] is not applicable to him — and it is a clear contradiction in term. Also some exegetes have narrated from them that a woman of mut‘ah is not entitled to inheritance or maintenance; and that there is no divorce or waiting period for her. In short, the Qur’ān is far away from this opinion, and there is certainly no proof, or even a quasi-proof, for it in this verse.’’

COMMENT: His claim, that the mut‘ah goes against what has been established in the Qur’ān, boils down to this: First, the verses of the chapter of ‘The Believers’: And who guard their private parts ..., confine the lawfulness to the wives, and a woman in mut‘ah is not a wife; therefore, the verses refute the lawfulness of the mut‘ah. Second, these verses do not permit the verse, Then as to such of them with whom ..., to be interpreted as speaking about mut‘ah.

As for the claim that the verses of the chapter ‘The Believers’ prohibit the mut‘ah, he has ignored the fact that these are Meccan verses, while mut‘ah was prevalent even after hijrah. The question arises: When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) allowed the mut‘ah [after hijrah], was he allowing what the Qur’ān had prohibited? But the Qur’ān itself declares that the Prophet’s words were final authority of religion, so there seems to be a contradiction in terms in the Qur’ān itself. Or, had his legalization abrogated the verses of [presumed] abrogation (And who guard their private parts ...), and then the mut‘ah was forbidden again (either by the Qur’ān or the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), thus reviving the prohibiting verses after their death? Did this verse (of The Believers) become decisive after its abrogation? It is such an alternative which no Muslim would ever agree to, nor anyone has ever said so; nor is it ever possible to say.

This analysis is in itself a good proof that the woman of mut'ah is a wife, that the mut'ah is a marriage, and that these verses, of the chapter of 'The Believers', prove that mut'ah marriage is a proper matrimonial state: Otherwise, it will follow that the said verses were abrogated by the permission the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) gave for mut'ah, [but nobody would admit it]. Therefore, the said verses actually prove the lawfulness, not prohibition, of the mut'ah.

Let us explain it in another way:

The verses of the chapters, 'The Believers' [23:5 — 7] and 'The Stairway' [70:29 — 31], i.e.: And those who guard their private parts, except before their mates ..., are the strongest of all the verses to prove the lawfulness of the mut'ah. It is agreed by all that these verses are decisive and unabrogated; and that they are of the Meccan period. Also, it is crystal clear from history and traditions that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had allowed mut'ah. If the woman of mut'ah was not a wife, then obviously the Prophet's permission would abrogate the said verses — but they are not abrogated. The only conclusion is that the mut'ah was a lawful marriage. Now that it is clear from the above that the said verses prove lawfulness of the mut'ah, then the claim, that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) [subsequently] prohibited it, is also proved wrong, because such claim goes contrary to the Qur'ānic verses and would entail the verses' abrogation; but, as you know, all are agreed that these are decisive ones and were never abrogated.

In any case, the woman married in mut'ah is a wife, and mut'ah is a nikāḥ (marriage), contrary to what its detractors claim. It is enough, in this respect, to draw your attention to the traditions quoted above, in which the companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and their disciples have used the name, 'mut'ah marriage', for this union. Even 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb has used the same name in the traditions which describe his prohibition; for example, see the report of al-Bayhaqī narrated from 'Umar (quoting his lecture), and the tradition of Muslim narrated from Abū Naḍrah. Not only that. Even 'Umar's words (quoted in the tradition of Kanzu 'l-'ummāl from Sulaymān ibn Yasār), ''announce it, in order that marriage may be distinguished from fornication'', are based on the same nomenclature; as it implies that the mut'ah is a marriage but is not distinguished from fornication; therefore it is incumbent upon Muslims to announce it; they should solemnize a marriage that is known and distinguishable from fornication. This connotation is inferred from his order to 'announce it'.

In short, there is no room for any doubt that, according to the language of the Qur'ān and that of the companions and their disciples, mut'ah is nikāḥ (marriage) and the woman so married is wife. It was only after 'Umar's prohibition that the two words, an-nikāḥ and at-tazwīj (اَلنِّكَاحُ،اَلتَّزْوِيْجُ = marriage), became [gradually] reserved for the permanent marriage, because mut'ah marriage went out of practice, and the people performed permanent marriage only. Thus there remained no other application for the two words, and the permanent marriage became the only meaning that immediately came to the minds. The case of the two words is not different from many other words that have acquired a new or restricted meaning in the language of the Muslims.

The above also shows baselessness of what the said writer has written later that the Shī'ahs themselves do not apply the rules of marriage on the woman of mut'ah. We have a right to ask him what he means by the word, 'wife'. If he uses the word as it is used in the language of the Qur'ān, then the Shī'ahs apply all its rules on the mut'ah wife — without any exception. But if he means the wife as is understood in the language of the Muslims — as explained above — which they use in their jurisprudence, then the Shī'ahs do not apply all its rules on her — but there is no harm in it.

Now we come to his argument that 'the Shī'ahs do not prescribe stoning for a fornicator who has a mut'ah wife, and it shows their conviction that the words of Allāh, muḥṣinīn ghayr musāfiḥīn (مُحْصِنِيْنَ غَيْرَ مُسَافِحِيْنَ = which he interprets as 'in marriage') are not applicable to him; and it is a clear contradiction in term.'

First of all, we have explained in the commentary of this verse that, because this clause includes conjugal union with one's slave girls too, it obviously means 'chastity', not marriage. Even if we accept that muḥṣinīn (مُحْصِنِيْنَ) means 'in marriage', not, 'in chastity', [as translated by us] , then the verse includes mut'ah marriage in any case. As for non-stoning of the fornicator who has a mut'ah wife (apart from the fact that stoning is not a Qur'ānic law), it is based on explanation or restriction by the sunnah, like other matrimonial laws — inheritance, maintenance, divorce and waiting period.

To put the above statement more clearly, if a verse relating to laws is taken to be vague — because it only aims at ordaining the basic rule — then whatever restrictions are attached, they will amount to its explanation; they will not be counted as a restriction or a condition. If, on the other hand, the said verse is taken to be a general or unconditional one, then the explanations given in the sunnah will be counted as restrictions or conditions. There will not arise any question of contradiction in terms in such cases. See for details the books on the Principles of Jurisprudence.

These verses of inheritance, divorce and maintenance, like other verses, are not free from restrictions and conditions. An apostate wife is debarred from inheritance, and separates without any divorce; the husband may cancel the marriage without giving divorce, if the wife has certain defects; a recalcitrant wife loses her right of maintenance. With all these restrictions, what objection is there if a few other rules are restricted because of the mut'ah? The statements that remove the mut'ah marriage from the rules of inheritance, divorce and waiting period are either restrictions or conditions.

As for the fact that, in the language of the Muslims, the words, an-nikāḥ and at-tazwīj are now exclusively used for permanent marriage, it creates no difficulty for our stand, even if the said writer thinks otherwise. When a jurist says: 'A permanently married (al-muḥṣin, اَلْمُحْصِنُ) fornicator shall be stoned;'and then says: 'A fornicator who has a mut'ah wife shall not be stoned because he is not al-muḥṣin'; it only shows that in his terminology al-iḥṣān (اَلْاِحْصَانُ) implies permanent marriage that has certain especial effects. But it does not effect the language of the Qur'ān in which al-iḥṣān has been used together for both — permanent and temporary — marriages; and which establishes especial rules for each.

As for his claim that the Shī'ah do not prescribe waiting period for a mut'ah wife, it is a shameless slander. There are the collections of Shī'ī traditions and the tomes of their jurisprudence, all of which clearly say that the waiting term of a wife of mut'ah is two monthly courses. Some relevant traditions narrated through Shī'ī chains from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt have earlier been quoted in this discourse.

The said writer further writes: ''The traditions and aḥādīth that have been narrated on this subject, all together show that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to allow mut'ah to his companions in some expeditions, then he forbade them, then again allowed it to them once or twice, then prohibited them to do so — a perpetual prohibition.

''He had allowed it only because he knew that it was difficult for them to abstain from fornication when they were away from their wives. Thus the mut'ah was a sort of lesser evil. It was much better if a man married an unmarried girl for a fixed term and stayed with her during the agreed period, rather than being occupied in fornication with any woman he could seduce.''

COMMENT: What he has said that the traditions on the whole show that it was allowed in some expeditions, then disallowed, then again allowed once or twice, then prohibited for ever, does not agree with any of the traditions with all their mutual contradictions and irreconcilability. Just have a look at them (and we have quoted earlier most of them) and you will find that they all together refute word by word what he has offered as a way of reconciliation amongst them.

He has further written: ''The Sunnīs are of the opinion that the permission of mut'ah, once or twice, was a sort of a gradual step in final prohibition of fornication, as had been done in the case of intoxicants. Both these evils were wide-spread in the era of ignorance, but fornication was prevalent in the slave girls, not the free women.''

COMMENT: His claim, that permission of mut'ah was a step by step approach to the final prohibition of fornication, implies that in their eyes mut'ah was a sort of fornication, and that, like other ways of fornication, it was wide-spread in pre-Islamic days; and for this reason the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) took gradual steps — a soft approach — before finally forbidding fornication, hoping that in this way this prohibition would prove acceptable to the people. Therefore, first he prohibited other kinds of fornication and let the fornication of mut'ah continue. He first allowed it, then prohibited and again allowed it until he could forbid it for ever, and then he enforced perpetual prohibition.

By my life, it is the most ignominious mockery of the pure religious laws, which Allāh had promulgated with the sole aim of purifying this ummah and completing His favours on them. Now let us look at this opinion:

First: We have already explained that the claim that the Prophet

(s.a.w.a.) prohibited mut'ah then allowed it, then again prohibited and again allowed it, when seen in the background of the verses: And those who guard their private parts ..., which form the parts of the chapters of 'The Believers' and 'The Stairway' — the Meccan chapters — and which, the said writer insists, prove the prohibition of mut'ah, would mean only one thing: That the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) first abrogated these verses by allowing the mut'ah, then abrogated the abrogation and revived and re-confirmed the verses; then again abrogated the verses and then again revived them and made them decisive, and this cycle was repeated several times. Is it anything but accusing the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) of playing with the Book of Allāh?

Second: Some verses of the Divine Book which prohibit fornication are as follows:

And go not near to fornication; surely it is an indecency and evil is the way (17:32).

What language can be clearer than this? And it is a Meccan verse that forms a part of a chain of several other prohibitions.

Say: ''Come, I will recite what your Lord has forbidden to you ... and do not draw near to indecencies, those of them which are apparent and those which are concealed ... ''(6:155)

The word, al-fawāhish (اَلْفَوَاحِشُ = indecencies) is plural, preceded by the article, al, within a prohibitory sentence. It means that the prohibitionary order covers all types of indecency or fornication. This verse too is of Meccan period.

Say: ''My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed ...'' (7:33)

The same word, al-fawāḥish, with the same grammatical details, is used in this verse, and this too is of Meccan period.

And who guard their private parts, except before their mates or those whom their right hands possess, for they surely are not blameable. But whoever seeks to go beyond that, these are they that exceed the limits (23:5 — 7; 70:29 — 31).

Both these are Meccan chapters, and the verses prohibit all types of fornication, and, according to the writer's claim, that includes mut'ah too.

These are the bulk of the verses which prohibit fornication, the unlawful indecency; all of them were revealed in Meccan period, and all of them are very clear about the prohibition. So, from where did he get the idea of graduality in prohibition? Or does he say — as is the clear implication of his claim that the verses of the chapter, 'The Believers' show prohibition of the mut'ah — that Allāh had prohibited it for ever; still the, Prophet (s.a.w.a.) preferred the step by step approach in enforcing this prohibitory order, by allowing it time after time to humour the people, so that in the end they would accept total prohibition. But Allāh had very strongly admonished His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) against this very policy, when He revealed to him: And surely they had purposed to turn you away from that which We have revealed to you, that you should forge against Us other than that, and then they would certainly have taken you for a friend. And had it not been that We had already firmly established you, you would certainly have been near to incline to them a little. In that case We would certainly have made you to taste a double (punishment) in this life and a double (punishment) after death, then you would not have found any helper against Us (17:73 — 75).[1]

Third: We should think about this permission which the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) is suppossed to grant time after time. Was he allowing the mut'ah without there being any divine order to make it lawful? (We should not forget that the mut'ah is presumed to be fornication and indecency.) If he was doing it on his own, then it would be a clear contravention of his Lord's command — but the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was protected by Allāh from every error and deviation. Or was he doing it by Allāh's order, then it would mean that Allāh was enjoining indecency. But Allāh has clearly refuted such suggestion when He addresses His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in these words: Say: ''Surely Allāh does not enjoin indecency'' (7:28).

If, on the other hand, the Prophet was allowing it because there was a divine order to make it lawful, then it was not fornication, nor indecency. It was an ordained institution with its clearly defined boundary. It was not to be done with a woman in prohibited degrees — like the permanent marriage. Also, like the permanent marriage, there was the obligation of dowry, the waiting period (to prevent mixing of sperm and confusion of paternity). Add to it the advantage of satisfying the people's needs. Then why should it be called indecency? What is indecency? It is that evil deed which the society considers repugnant or repulsive because of its moral depravity and licentiousness, or because it disturbs public weal and puts hindrance in fulfilment of the society's needs.

Fourth: The claim, that the mut'ah was a sort of fornication prevalent in pre-Islamic days, is a fabrication of history, a fiction that has no historical proof. No history book mentions it, either explicitly or implicitly. It was a system originated by Islam, a concession given by Allāh to this ummah to provide for their needs, and to protect the Muslim society from spreading of fornication and other indecencies. Would that they had established this system. Then the Muslim governments would not have felt so much constrained to turn a blind eye to fornication and other indecencies, which have gradually become a part of their social structure — thanks to the secular codes — and which have filled the earth with depravity and wickedness.

As for his claim that ''both indecencies were wide-spread in pre-Islamic days; but fornication was more common among slave girls, not free women'', apparently by the two indecencies he means fornication and drinking intoxicants. This much is correct. But there is no ground to claim that fornication was wide-spread in slave girls and not in free women. Numerous historical proofs of diverse nature prove otherwise. Look, for example, at their poems which describe their exploits. Also, the narration of Ibn 'Abbās has been quoted earlier that, according to the people of the era of ignorance, there was no harm in fornication if it was not done openly.

Also, there was the custom of claiming paternity of one's illegitimate child, and of adoption, that was wide-spread in the era of ignorance. It was not merely a nominal thing to establish whom the child belonged to. It was prevalent because the powerful persons wanted — through this affiliation — to increase their preparedness [for fights] and their man-power. They relied for this matter on illicit sexual relations which they established with free women — even the married ones. So far as the slave girls were concerned, the Arabs, and especially the powerful ones, thought it a disgrace to mix with them, or to court and woo them. As for the slave girls, their only role in this was that their masters coaxed them for prostitution, exploiting them for their own monetary gains.

The above situation may be comprehended from the stories of affiliations described in traditions and biographies, like the story when Mu'āwiyah, son of Abū Sufyān, attached Ziyād (the bastard) to his father, Abū Sufyān, and the evidence given by [Abū Maryam, the wine merchant] concerning that affair, as well as other such episodes that are narrated in the books.

Maybe someone would quote the words of Hind [wife of Abū Sufyān] spoken to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) at the time of offering her bay'ah (allegiance): ''Does a free woman commit adultery?'', and offer it as a proof that adultery and fornication was not common among the free women. But if you look at the collection of the poems of Ḥassān [ibn Thābit al-Anṣārī] and ponder on the satiric poems he had composed to ridicule this same Hind, after the battles of Badr and Uḥud, you will remain in no doubt and will see the reality in its true perspective.[1]

Thereafter, the said writer has tried to clarify the meaning of the traditions, and vainly attempted to reconcile them to one another, and finally has said: ''According to the Sunnīs, there are [three] main proofs of the mut'ah's unlawfulness: First: As you have seen, it goes against the apparent meanings, if not the clear Wordings, of the Qur'ān, concerning the marriage, divorce, and waiting period. Second: The traditions which clearly say that it was forbidden perpetually upto the Day of Resurrection ... Third: Its prohibition by 'Umar and his indication, from the pulpit, of its being prohibited, and the confirmation of his views by the Companions; and it is known that they had never remained silent on any unlawful thing, and used to argue with him if he was in wrong.''

Then he has taken the stand that '' 'Umar had not prohibited it by his own ijtihād; that he had done so relying on the prohibition that was well-

[1] This Hind was very much attracted to the black youths, and whenever she gave birth to a black-coloured child, she killed it. (Vide: Sibṭ Ibnu 'l-Jawzī, Tadhkirat khawāṣi 'l-ummah, p.186.) As for Ḥassān's poems, these are very explicit and were recited in presence of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Four rather mild lines are as follows:

Have you forgotten the adultery you have committed?
O Hind! Curse be on you to the end of the time!
The midwives believe that she has given birth to *An infant that is the product of adultery. (tr.)*

established by the prohibitory order of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), and that this prohibition is attributed to him only because he had made it clear or enforced it, as they say: ash-Shāfi'ī has prohibited wine and Abū Ḥanīfah has made it lawful.''

The author says: As for his first and second proofs, you have seen the reality in the preceding description, as well as in the Commentary, in its utmost clarity. Now comes his third argument: We agree that 'Umar had made it unlawful; it is irrelevant whether he did so by his own ijtihād, or relying on Prophetic prohibition (as this writer claims); it is equally immaterial whether the Companions had remained silent because of his fear and dread, being intimidated with his threats, or because they agreed with his prohibition (as the writer claims), or because a certain group did not agree with it, as is seen in the traditions narrated from 'Alī, Jābir, Ibn Mas'ūd and Ibn 'Abbās. The fact remains that 'Umar's prohibition and his swearing that he would stone anyone who would do it or would say it was lawful, cannot have any effect whatsoever on the verse under discussion which clearly shows its lawfulness; and whose connotation has not been blunted by the Qur'ān or the sunnah. There is no doubt about the meaning of the verses and their decisiveness.

Another writer has really overdone his 'argument' when he claims that the mut'ah was only a custom of pre-Islamic days, which had never entered the Islamic boundary; so there was no need of removing it from Islam, or of abrogating it through the Qur'ān or the sunnah; the Muslims had never known it, and it is not found except in the Shī'ī books!

The author says: This writing, which by one stroke of pen has wiped off the Qur'ān, the traditions, the consensus and the history, has brought the ever-shifting position [of the Sunnīs] on this subject to an amazing point. The mut'ah was an established custom during the days of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Then came the reign of 'Umar and he forbade it and the prohibition was enforced among the masses. That prohibition was justified on the grounds that the verse of mut'ah was abrogated by other verses, or by prohibitory order of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). But several companions [1] and a lot of their followers from among the jurists of al-Ḥijāz and al-Yaman as well as others opposed that prohibition. This list includes the likes of Ibn Jarīḥ [2] (one of the Imāms of al-ḥadīth) who staunchly believed in its lawfulness, so much so that, in all, he had done mut'ah with seventy women; and Mālik [3] (one of the four Imāms of Jurisprudence).

This continued for some time. Then the later days' exegetes turned a blind eye to the meaning of mut'ah that was clearly understood from the word, istamta'tum, and tried to interpret it as permanent marriage; as for the mut'ah marriage, they said that it was a system originated by the Prophet's order which was later abrogated by his subsequent tradition. Lately, they claimed that mut'ah was a kind of fornication prevalent in the era of ignorance, which the Prophet repeatedly allowed and disallowed until it was perpetually forbidden upto the Day of Resurrection. Now comes this latest 'scholar' who says that mut'ah was only a sort of fornication in pre-Islamic days, which had never been known in Islam and which is not found outside the Shī'ī books!

Only Allāh knows what turn this subject will take in coming days.

[1] A truly astonishing comment on this verse has been written by az-Zajjāj who says: ''A group has committed a great blunder in this verse, because of their ignorance of the language. That is, they have said that the verb, istamta'tum (اِسْتَمْتَعْتُمْ = you have mut'ah) is derived from al-mut'ah, which, all scholars unanimously say, is unlawful.'' Then he claims that ''the said verb means marriage''.

Would that I knew which part of his writing can be mended! Can anyone repair his accusing the people like Ibn 'Abbās and Ubayy of ignorance of language? Or, his claim that all scholars unanimously agree on prohibition of the mut'ah? Or, his claim of expertise in Arabic language while he translates al-istimtā' (اَلْاِسْتِمْتَاعُ = to do mut'ah) as marriage? (Author's Note)

Detailed juristical and theological discourses on mut'ah may be found in the writings of the scholars of these subjects, be they of early days or of later periods — and especially the modern eminent personalities who have scholastically reviewed all the arguments. AN ACADEMIC DISCOURSE
[MEANING OF ''SON'' IN SHARĪ'AH]

The bond of relationship — which connects one person to another by birth — is in fact a natural bond, based on creation, from which originate the clans and tribes; it carries with the blood the hereditary traits and characteristics. Togetherwith other active and passive factors, it is the source of all national characteristics, traditions and customs.

Human societies, whether advanced or primitive, generally give importance to it in their social laws and customs, like marriage, inheritance, etc. Even then, they have often been tampering with it — expanding or contracting its circle — as demanded by exigencies of a given environment. You have seen in the previous discourses, for example, that many ancient nations did not recognize a woman as having the legal relationship with man, while at the same time they accorded such recognition to an adopted son. In the same way, Islam does not recognize any kinship between a belligerent unbeliever and a Muslim; it also affiliates a child to the husband of its mother. And so on and so forth.

As you have seen in the preceding discussions, Islam accords full rights of kinship to women, making them full partners in properties and giving them complete freedom of will and action. Thus son and daughter both stand on the same level so far as relationship and legal kinship are concerned. The same is the case with father and mother, brother and sister, grandfather and grandmother, paternal uncle and aunt, and maternal uncle and aunt. In this way, the vertical column of lineage officially and legally descends through a daughter exactly as it does through a son. A son of the daughter is the son of the grandfather exactly like a son of the son — generation after generation. Likewise, a daughter of the daughter and a daughter of the son, both are the grandfather's daughters — on equal footing. The rules of marriage and inheritance are based on this very foundation. You have seen that the verse: Forbidden to you are your mothers and your daughters ..., reconfirms this reality.

Our ancient scholars have missed the point while writing on this and other similar questions. Although it is a sociological and legal matter, they have treated it as a literary problem, which could be solved with the help of lexicon and literary references. Consequently, there arose a very severe conflict among them on such questions as, for example: What was the actual meaning for which the word, 'son' was made. Some have enlarged its circle while others have reduced it. But both have taken the wrong approach.

Someone has said: ''Sonship, as is known in the language, continues through a son only. As for the son of a daughter, and all realtionships joined through her, they are affiliated to their fathers, not to their maternal grandfather; and the Arabs do not count them as their maternal grandfather's sons. As for the words of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) for Ḥasan and Ḥusayn: 'These my two sons are Imāms, whether they stand up or sit down', and other similar pronouncements, they are merely honorific expressions.'' Then he has quoted the lines of a poet:

Our sons are the sons of our sons; and as for our daughters,
Their sons are sons of other people.

And likewise, another one has said:

The mothers of the people are merely receptacles To deposit [the sperm], and the lineage is taken from the fathers.

The author says: The above writer seems confused about the scope of the discussion. He thinks that it is a literary question; according to him, if the Arabs had coined the word, son, for a wider meaning that would have included daughter's son, the result of the discussion would have changed. He seems oblivious to the fact that the laws and effects emanating — in various human societies — from fatherhood, sonship and other such factors, do not depend on language; they are based on the social structures and prevalent customs and traditions. Sometimes, when the social customs change, the laws and effects are also changed without bringing any change in the language. It proves that this question is sociological (or is related to sociology), and not merely a literary discussion related to language.

As for the lines of poetry quoted by him, what value does a poetry have in the market of realities? It is an imaginary embellishment and nothing else. How can he argue on the strength of some words spoken by a blabbermouth poet — especially in matters concerning the Qur'ān, the divine book that is a decisive word, and not a jest?

As for the argument that sons are affiliated to their fathers and not to their maternal grandfathers: first of all, it is not a question of language; secondly, it is not connected with the principles of lineage (so that if a son or daughter is affiliated to the father, it might result in cutting his/her lineage from the mother's side). This affiliation to father emanates from the fact that the man has dominant authority on the household, in maintaining it, bringing up the children and similar other matters.

In short, the mother transfers the relationship of lineage to her male and female children, in the same way as the father does. Its most obvious effects may be seen in the Islamic laws of inheritance and prohibitions of marriage. Of course, there are other rules and directives which are based on other principles, e.g., rules governing paternity, maintenance and distribution of the share of al-khums (اَلْخُمُسُ = one-fifth of saving, etc.) among the Prohet's relatives. Each law is governed by a principle that is relevant to it.

ANOTHER ACADEMIC DISCOURSE [PHILOSOPHY OF PROHIBITION OF THE WOMEN OF PROHIBITED DEGREE]

According to the historical evidence available to us, marriage is among the social traditions which have always been prevalent in all types of human societies. This by itself proves that marriage is a natural way of life.

Moreover, its strongest proof may be found in the complementary reproductive system with which males and females have been equipped, (as we have repeatedly said). Both sexes (male and female) are equal in this pursuit, although the female has been additionally equipped with suckling organs and imbued with love and sentiments necessary for bringing up the children.

In addition, there are natural instincts, which manifest themselves in many ways. They instil love of children, enforce the feeling that a person survives through his/her progeny, strengthen the belief that woman is a comfort for man and vice versa, recognize the principle of inheritance (after accepting the basic principles of private property and exclusive attachment), and emphasize the necessity of establishing a household.

The societies which accept, in general, these natural laws and principles, have no escape from establishing and recognizing the marriage system, in the meaning that a woman is exclusively attached to a man, so that men and women do not mingle together in such a way as to nullify the lineage. This factor alone would make the institution of marriage indispensable even if there could be found a way of protecting the public from various diseases and from degeneration of reproductive powers (which is the inevitable result of widespreading fornication and promiscuous sexual behaviour).

These principles are recognized by all nations who accept the institution of marriage, no matter what system they followed, whether it was monogomy, polygamy or polyandry — or even if they allowed a group of husbands for a group of wives. In any case, recognition of marriage is there — in the meaning of an especial type of attachment and companionship between the spouses.

As for indecency and fornication (which by its very nature destroys lineage and corrupts geneology), human nature is the first to abhor it, because the nature demands marriage. The signs of that abhorance and repulsion are visible in various nations and societies, even among those nations which practically grant full freedom of sexual liasions between men and women. Even they are now alarmed of this debauchery and licentiousness, and are enacting laws that could somewhat preserve the lines of descent and geneology.

However, man, while believing in the institution of marriage, does not feel bound by nature to any other restriction. His nature does not tell him that a certain related or unrelated female is unlawful to him. Thus a male may establish sexual relations with his mother, sister, daughter or others like them. Likewise, a female may not consider her father, brother or son as unlawful to herself. This is, of course, if they are left to their desire. Recorded and oral history clearly shows that marriage with mothers, sisters, daughters and other nearest relatives was widespread in all nations — advanced ones and backward ones alike. News media is full of reports of incest between brothers and sisters, and fathers and daughters, in the modern ‘civilized’ nations. When the sexual desire is aroused, nothing can stand in its way. Of course, these nations do not allow marriage with mothers, sisters, daughters and other near relatives; but this restriction is merely a custom they have inherited, and which perhaps goes back to some ancient national traditions and taboos.

Look at the laws ordained by Islam for regulating matrimonial affairs; compare them with all other codes and customs prevalent in the world. You will find that the Islamic laws are most comprehensive, and give fullest guarantee for avoiding all risk of mix-up in lineage, and provide for complete natural benefit and human welfare. All the regulations laid down by Islam concerning marriage and its concomitants have two objectives in view: To protect the lineage and to block the path of fornication.

The rules which directly ensure the lineage against a mix-up, include prohibition of marriage with a woman presently married to another man. In this way polyandry has been nullified, as it would have caused mix-up of progeny. The same is the underlying reason for fixing a waiting period for woman after divorce — that she should not marry another man upto three monthly courses — so that the two men's sperm is not mixed up.

As for the other prohibited women — the fourteen categories mentioned in the verses of prohibition — the reason for their prohibition is to shut up the door of fornication. Man lives his domestic life, mostly, with these fourteen groups of women; he mingles and intimately associates with them. Continuous association and intimate proximity was enough to fix the man's attention, to focus his thoughts, on them; awakening his animalistic desires and lustful cravings, inciting him to what his libido longs for and base nature tempts to; and whoever hovers around a demarcated area may easily slip in it.

Therefore, it was necessary, in these cases, not to rely too much on the general prohibition of fornication. Regular proximity and repeated craving of lust and desire do not help a human being in guarding oneself against illicit sexual involvement. It was, therefore, essential to prohibit these women perpetually, for ever. Also the society members should be trained and brought up with this idea and belief firmly fixed in their mind, in order that they should have no hope at all that they could ever get these women. This would kill every base desire for them, and root all such evil craving out.

This is what we see in the Muslim societies; even those Muslims, who might be steeped in debauchery, would never think of any indecency with the women of prohibited degrees, or of committing incest with mothers, daughters or such relatives. Surely, without this perpetual prohibition, no household could be free from incest, etc.

As regards the women other than those of prohibited degrees, Islam has blocked the way of fornication with them by making it compulsory for them to observe ḥijāb (veil), and prohibiting the mingling of men with women. Without this rule, prohibition of fornication alone could not stop man from that shameful deed. In fact, there were only these two ways of eradicating illicit sexual conduct. Either the two sexes are prevented from mingling with each other, as Islam has done regarding one group of women; or all thoughts of getting a woman is erased from a man's mind, by making perpetually unlawful to him, so that he grows up with this belief and does not see, or even hear of, any such material union anywhere in the society, and therefore such evil idea never crosses his mind.

Do you want to see the proof? Well, look at the western societies. These Christians believed that fornication was unlawful, and even treated polygamy as adultery. At the same time, they allowed and practised mingling of men and women. Before long, fornication spread all over the society ; now it is almost impossible to find even one person in a thousand who is free from this desease; nor one man in a thousand who can be sure that the children born in his house were really his own. Soon afterwards, the condition deteriorated even further, with men having sexual affairs with their sisters, daughters and mothers. The degeneration of society continued; now men commit sodomy with boys, or youths do it among themselves; and so the debauchery spreads and spreads. Allāh had created the fair sex as a comfort for man, a boon to strengthen the back-bone of humanity, and to make the human life pleasant. But these people have turned woman into a 'hunting gear', which they use to achieve their political, economic and social ambitions; she is a means by which men obtain their objectives — mostly the things that corrupt the society and individuals. Human life has turned into an imaginary hope, a sport and an amusement — in true literal sense of these words. Now the rent is beyond repair.

That was the underlying reason which led Islam to perpetually prohibit those women (either with some condition or unconditionally) — except the married women, whose case is different, as was explained above. This rule protects family from involvement in incest and indecency, and corruption, as you have seen.

Also, it was mentioned earlier that the sentence: ... and your step-daughters who are in your guardianship ..., gives a sort of indication of this underlying benefit. Moreover, the last part of the verses of prohibition, Allāh desires that He should make light your burdens, and man is created weak (4:28), probably points to the same reality. As these fourteen categories of women have been prohibited for ever by Allāh, it has removed the burden of temptation from man; otherwise, the case would have been quite different, and man would have looked towards them with carnal desire; and man is created weak, he finds it difficult to stand against lust and libido. Allāh says: Surely your guile is great (12:28). It really would require extra-ordinary self-control for a man to live with one or more non-relative women, spend his time with them alone and in public, remain near them day and night, when his hearing and sight are constantly filled with their sweet talk and attractive demeanour; and yet to remain firm against devilish thoughts about them, and to restrain himself against temptations. We know that sexual desire is one of the two basic needs — the other being the food. All other needs are subsidiary, springing from these two. Probably, it is this reality which the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was pointing to, when he said: ‘‘Whoever marries, safeguards half of his religion; so he should fear Allāh regarding the other half.’’ [1]

* * * * *

The verses have a sort of connection with the preceding ones, inasmuch as these contain prohibition of swallowing up properties by wrongful means, while the former had, inter alia, prohibited usurping women's dowries by confining and restraining them and exceeding the limit. We may say that these verses describe a rule in its general form while the former had given one of its specific examples.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! do .not swallow up your property among yourselves by wrongful means, except that it be trading by your mutual consent;: The connotation of:eating is well-known; it means using up an edible items bit by bit by swallowing. As it implies mastery, control and consumption, they say: The fire ate the fire-wood; as the fire annihilates the wood by burning, it is likened to consuming the food by eating and swallowing. Also they say: He ate the property; i.e., he consumed it by getting control over it. This is because the main use a man makes of a property is to eat it, as taking food is the most essential thing man needs for his existence; that is why, if he uses a thing, it is said, He has eaten it. But this word is not applied to every use; it implies the use with complete mastery over the item in a way that removes all other's control over it; it may be through possession or such other authority. In short, he consumes the goods by having mastery over it as an eater uses up the food by eating.

An action is called 'wrongful' when it does not have a right purpose, a wise objective. ''at-Tijārah'' (اَلتِجَارَةُ = trade) entails managing the capital to get profit, as ar-Rāghib has said in his Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān; he has also said: ''There is no other word in Arabic in which ta (ت) is followed by jim (ج).'' However, it implies a deal of sale and purchase.

Why has the clause, ''do not swallow up your property'', been qualified with the words, ''among yourselves''? The qualifying phrase connotes collective earnings and joint usage of property. Consequently it implies, or shows, that the forbidden swallowing up refers to that usage where the property is variously rotated and circulated among themselves. Thus the sentence, when further qualified with, ''by wrongful means'', makes such dealings unlawful which do not lead the society to happiness and success, which bring harm to it and push it to corruption and destruction; these are the dealings which are unlawful in the eyes of sharī'ah, like interest, gambling and deceptive trade, e.g., selling something for stone-fruit or rubble and things like that.

Accordingly, the excepted clause, ''except that it be trading by your mutual consent'', is unrelated to the main sentence; it is a disjointed exception; yet it was put here to remove a possible misunderstanding. When the verse prohibited eating up people's property by wrongful means — and a lot of dealings prevalent in a corrupted society, through which properties change hands, are unlawful in the sharī'ah's eyes, like deals involving interest, cheating, gambling, etc. — someone could think that it would demolish the pillars of society, and tear the social fabric to pieces, leading people to perdition and destruction.

To remove that misgiving, the excepted clause mentions one type of dealing which can regulate the diverse affairs of the society, strengthen its back-bone and keep it steadfast, and that is the trade with mutual consent, done in correct way, which can easily fulfil all needs of society.

This exception is not unlike that used in the verses: The day on which neither property will avail nor sons, except him who comes to Allāh with a submissive heart (26:88 — 89). As the first sentence had asserted that property or sons will be of no avail on the Day of Resurrection, a misgiving could creep into hearts that there was no way of succeeding on that day; because the main things which benefit a man were property and sons; and if these two could not help, then what was left there except failure and hopelessness? The excepted clause provides answer to this unspoken question; it shows that there was another factor which could bring complete success on that day (although it is neither property nor sons); and that is a submissive heart.

The view we have taken — that it is a disjointed exceptional clause — is more in conformity with the context. The clause, ‘‘by wrongful means’’, is a basic factor, as is the case in verse 188 of chap.2: And do not swallow up your property among yourselves by wrongful means, neither seek to gain access thereby to the authorities, so that you may swallow up a portion of the property of men wrongfully while you know.

Accordingly, there is no need to suppose that the verse is particularized by other lawful dealings and recognized transfers — other than trade — which transfer possession and regularize management, like gift, compromise, prize, as well as dowry, inheritance and similar things.

Some people have said that the exception in this verse is jointed and the clause, ‘‘by wrongful means’’, has only explanatory value; and that it shows the condition of the main clause, after exclusion of the excepted clause (i.e., the remainder is covered by prohibition). Accordingly, the meaning will be as follows: Do not swallow up your property among yourselves, except that it be trading by your mutual consent; if you ate it by any means other than trade, it would be swallowing it up wrongfully which is prohibited. It is the same style as you say: Do not hit an orphan except for teaching him.

COMMENT: Although such usage is correct and well-known among the Arabists, yet you have seen that taking it as a disjointed exception is more in conformity with the context.

Someone has said: What this verse disallows is spending wealth in ways not liked by Allāh; and 'trade' refers to its use in what Allāh is pleased with. A third one has said that this verse implies total prohibition of eating other people's property without giving something in exchange. He claims that after this verse was revealed, people refrained from eating anything in one another's house; it continued until this rule was abrogated by verse 61 of chap.24: There is no blame ... on yourselves that you eat from your houses, or your brothers' houses ... It is no sin in you that you eat together or separately.

COMMENT: As you have seen, such interpretations are far-fetched, having no connection with the wordings of the verse.

A really amazing explanation has been given by someone who has tried to combine between the claim that the exception here was a jointed one and the view that the qualifying phrase, ''by wrongful means'', was a basic condition — not merely an explanatory clause. The following is the gist of what he has written:

'' 'Wrongful means' implies swallowing up a property without giving in exchange something equal in value. The main sentence shows that it is unlawful to take someone's property wrongfully without giving something in return. Then trade has been excepted from it, although most of the trade is not free from wrongful ways; because it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to fix the exact return, even with the help of the most sensitive balance, in such a way that the price is exactly equal to the commodity in value.

''Accordingly, the exception implies that the sharī'ah would tolerate a deal in which goods were more valuable than the price, or vice versa, or where a deal was done because the trader had made his goods seem beautiful and attractive, using rhetorical flourishes — but without adulteration, cheating or deception — as happens in many cases, or because of other similar reasons. All this is wrongful trade, but the sharī'ah has allowed it, giving the traders some latitude and indulgence. Otherwise, none would have gone into trading profession, and the social system based on religion would have been disturbed.''

COMMENT: Its incorrectness is clear from the afore-mentioned explanation. ''al-Bāṭil'' (اَلبَاطِلُ = wrong; void), as understood by scholars of the language, is that which does not lead to the desired effect. What is the desired effect of sale or trade? It is to exchange the goods and price and reciprocally transfer their possession from the buyer to the seller and vice versa. This fulfills the needs of both parties and each gets through this deal what he wants. This effect is achieved when both goods and price are equal as well as when there is some difference — if the deficiency is compensated with some other factor, e.g., the longing of the buyer to acquire that item, or his apprehension in case he does not purchase it, or some other benefits found in it.

We know that some such factors are involved, when both parties agree to the deal; and after the agreement, the exchange is not counted as wrong or void.

Moreover, no one familiar with the Qur'ānic style can ever doubt that it is impossible for the Qur'ān to order and ordain a thing after counting it as void and wrong. Allāh has praised the Qur'ān that it: guides to the truth and to a right path (46:30). How can something guiding to wrong and vain be called a guide to the truth?

Also, this interpretation implies that a man is rightly guided by nature, for fulfilment of his needs, to the exchange of goods; then he is rightly guided in the same manner to the exchange through comparison between the goods and the price; then what he has been rightly guided to, cannot rightly fulfil his needs until some portion of falsehood and wrongfulness is added to it! How is it possible that nature is guided — rightly — to something which is not sufficient to fulfil its needs? A thing which can only partially satisfy its demands? How is it possible for the nature to be rightly guided to falsehood? Is there any distinctive factor between truth and falsehood except the same guidance or absence of guidance? Keeping all these aspects in view, there is no alternative for a man, who takes the exception in this verse as jointed, but to say that the clause, ''by wrongful means'', is just an explanatory one.

Even more strange is the following explanation which someone has reportedly written: ''This disjointed exception indicates that all that is in this world — be it trade or some other similar thing — is just vain and void, because it is not ever-lasting, not enduring. A wise person should not involve himself in wordly affairs lest he neglects preparation for the next world which is far better and more abiding than this life.''

COMMENT: This too is wrong. If it is accepted, then it will be a point in favour of taking it as a jointed, not disjointed, exception. Moreover, such spiritual realities may be suitable for the explanation of the verses as the following: And this life of the world is nothing but a sport and a play; and as for the next abode, that most surely is the life (29:64); What is with you passes away and what is with Allāh is enduring (16:96); Say: ''What is with Allāh is better than sport and (better) than merchandise'' (62:11). But in the context of the verse under discussion, applying such points would mean legalizing of wrongful things. The Qur'ān is too sublime to allow wrongfulness by any means.

QUR'ĀN: and do not kill your selves ...: Apparently the sentence prohibits suicide. Yet, it comes after the words, do not swallow up your property among yourselves, which obviously treat the whole community of the believers as one individual being who owns a property which he should eat by other than wrongful means. This conjunction may imply, or clearly show, that the word, ''yourselves'', refers to all members of the believing society, taken as one individual, each individual's soul is the other's. In such a society, man's life is his own, and also others' lives are his own. Whether he kills himself or kills someone else, he actually destroys his own self. Seen in this light, the sentence, ''do not kill your selves'', will have a general import, covering suicide and murder both.

It may be inferred from ending clause, ''surely Allāh is Merciful to you'',that the above prohibition of killing oneself covers also the situations where man puts his life in danger, or commits such acts as might result in his being killed. Obviously, the reasoning — Mercy — given for the prohibition is more agreeable to this meaning. It will increase the scope of the verse. This appropriateness supports the view that the end clause gives only the reason of the order, ''do not kill your selves''.

QUR'ĀN: And whoever does this ... and this is easy to Allāh: ''al-'Udwān'' (اَلْعُدْوَانُ) literary means exceeding — whether it be lawful and praise-worthy or unlawful and blameworthy. Allāh says: then there should be no hostility ('udwān) except against the oppressors (2:193); and help one another in goodness and piety, and do not help one another in sin and aggression (5:2). Accordingly, its use is more general than 'injustice'. In this verse it connotes exceeding the limits laid down by Allāh. Nuṣlihi nāran (نُصْلِيهِ نَاراً = We shall burn him into fire).

The verse, unlike the preceding one, addresses the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), not the believers, because it contains the demonstrative pronoun dhālika (ذٰلِكَ = translated here as 'this') [and it, in its turn contains the second person singular pronoun,ka = ك]. It implies that whoever among them does so — and they are one soul, one self, and a person should not try to destroy his own self — he is not a part of the believing community; therefore the believers should not be addressed when his punishment is pronounced; the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) is therefore the proper addressee, because Allāh speaks to him on all subjects concerning the believers as well as the unbelievers. Also, that is the reason why the sentence is general (And whoever does this in aggression ...), and not specific, i.e., it does not say, whoever among you does this ...

The ending clause, ''and this is easy to Allāh'', supports the view that the demonstrative pronoun, 'this'', here refers to the prohibition of killing people; because the end of the last verse, surely Allāh is Merciful to you, was more appropriate to that prohibition, and the two ending clauses are very much in agreement with each other. Apparently the connotation is this: It is a mercy from Allāh that He forbids you to kill your own selves; otherwise it would be very easy for Him to punish a murderer by casting him in fire.

Even then, it is not very difficult to take both — the reasoning of the first verse and the threatening of the second — as related to both prohibitory orders of the first verse, i.e., not eating a property by wrongful means and not killing.

Someone has said that the reasoning and the threatening both, or at least the threatening, refers to all the prohibitions from the beginning of the chapter to this verse. Some others have said that it refers to all prohibitory orders beginning from the verse 19 of this chapter (O you who believe! it is not lawful for you that you should inherit women against [their] will); because nowhere else in these verses any punishment is pronounced for contravention.

COMMENT: There is nothing to give credence to such views.

The style has been changed twice in this verse. The first verse ended on the words: surely Allāh is Merciful to you, which referred to Allāh as a third person. Then comes the clause: We will soon cast him into fire, where the Almighty speaks in first person. This change is related to the earlier mentioned change, as now the talk is addressed directly to the Prophet, and not to the believers. Finally, it again reverts to the third person: and this is easy to Allāh; this is done to describe the reason of this statement — This is easy to Him because He is Allāh.

TRADITIONS

aṭ-Ṭabrisī says in Majma'u 'l-bayān about the words of Allāh, by wrongful means, that there are two explanations given for it, one of which says that it means: usury, gambling, paying less than fair price, injustice. And he says that this meaning is narrated from al-Bāqir (a.s.).

al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) have said that it means gambling, forbidden deals, usury and (false) oaths. (Nahju 'l-bayān)

Asbāṭ ibn Sālim has said: ''I was with Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.). A man came to him and said: 'Tell me about the words of Allāh, O you who believe! do not swallow up your property among yourselves by wrongful means.' He said: 'He refers here to gambling. And as for the words, and do not kill your selves, He refers by it to a Muslim who attacks polytheists on his own, and enters their camps and is killed. So, Allāh has forbidden them to do so.' '' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: The verse is general and covers all unlawful ways of swallowing up. Gambling and other similar things have been mentioned only as examples. In the same way, what has been said in explanation of killing oneself, actually enlarges the circle of prohibition instead of reducing it; it does not limit the meaning to the given example.

Isḥāq ibn 'Abdillāh ibn Muḥammad ibn 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn has said: ''al-Ḥasan ibn Zayd narrated to me, from his father, from 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.) that he said: 'I asked the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) concerning the splints that are put on broken (bones); how should such a man perform wuḍū'? And how will he take bath if he is in a state of major ritual impurity? He said: ‘‘It is enough for him to wipe his wet hand on it in the ritual bath and wuḍū’ both.’’ I said: ‘‘If there is cold and he is afraid about his self (i.e., health, or life), if he poured water on his body?’’ Then the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) recited: and do not kill your selves; surely Allāh is Merciful to you.’ ’’ (ibid.)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) has said: ‘‘Whoever intentionally kills himself, he shall enter the fire of hell, abiding therein for ever. Allāh, the High, has said: and do not kill your selves; surely Allāh is Merciful to you. And whoever does this in aggression and injustice, We will soon cast him into fire; and this is easy to Allāh.’’ (Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l faqīh)

The author says: As you see, these traditions generalize the meaning of the words, and do not kill your selves ..., as we have already inferred earlier. There are other traditions of similar import.

Ibn Mājah and Ibnu ’l-Mundhir have narrated from Ibn Sa’īd that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said: ‘Surely, trade is by mutual consent.’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās (that he said): ‘‘Verily, the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) sold (something) to a man; then he said to him: ‘Exercise your option.’ (The man) said: ‘I have opted (for it).’ Then (the Prophet) said: ‘In this manner (should be) trade.’ ’’ (ibid.)

al-Bukhārī, at-Tirmidhī and an-Nasā’ī have narrated from Ibn ‘Umar that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said: ‘The two parties of a sale have the option (to cancel it) as long as they have not separated, or one of them says to the other, ‘‘Exercise your option.’ ’’ (ibid.)

The author says: The words of the Prophet, ‘‘The two parties of a sale have the option (to cancel it) as long as they have not separated’’, are also narrated through the Shī‘ī chains. The words, ‘‘or one of them says to the other, ‘Exercise your option’,’’ show a way to ascertain the other party’s consent.

COMMENTARY

The verse is not without some connection with the preceeding ones which had mentioned some great sins.

QUR'ĀN: If you avoid great sins ... your (small) sins: al-Ijtināb (اَلِاجْتِنَابُ = to avoid, to shun), is derived from al-janb (اَلْجَنْبُ = [right or left] side of body); the verb is made from that noun in a metaphorical sense; when man wants to take something, he turns to it with his face and frontal part of the body; and if he wants to avoid or shun it, he turns away from it putting it to his side; thus al-ijtināb implies avoidance and shunning. ar-Rāghib has said that ''It is more eloquent than the word, 'leaving' ''. This eloquence comes from its having a metaphorical sense. From the same root come al-jānib (اَلْجَانِبُ = side), al-janbah (side, region) and al-ajnabiyy (اَلْاَجْنَبِيُّ = foreigner, alien).

at-Takfīr (اَلتَّكْفِيْرُ = to expiate, to forgive) is derived from al-kafr (اَلْكَفْرُ = to cover, to hide). Generally the Qur'ān uses it for forgiveness of sins. al-Kabā'ir (اَلْكَبَائِرُ) is plural of al-kabīrah (اَلْكَبِيْرَةُ = the big one); this adjective has been used in place of a deleted noun which it qualifies, like 'sins', etc. 'Greatness' is a relative idea; it cannot exist without correlation with 'smallness'. That is why the words, ''great sins which you are forbidden'', imply existence of some forbidden sins which are small. The verse, therefore, shows two things:

First: The sins are of two types, great and small.

Second: as-Sayyi'ah (اَلسَّيِّئَةُ = evil; sin) mentioned in the second clause refers to small sins, because it is put parallel to 'great sins'.

Of course, disobedience and insubordination, of any type, is great when we look at the insignificance of the created and sustained man vis-a-vis the greatness of Allāh. But in this case we are making a comparison between man and his Lord, not between one sin and another. There is no contradiction, therefore, in saying that every sin is great (by one criterion) and that some sins are small (by another criterion).

A sin is considered great if its prohibition has been given much more emphasis than that of some other sins. Probably, the words, ''which you are forbidden'', imply, or point to, this reality. We may realize the importance of a prohibitory order if its language is severe, or if it has been much emphasized, or is accompanied by a threat of punishment of fire, etc.

QUR'ĀN: and cause you to enter an hounable place of entering: al-Mudkhal (اَلْمُدْخَلُ = place of entering) is an adverb of place; and refers either to paradise or to a position of nearness to Allāh — although the end result of both is the same.

GREAT AND SMALL SINS AND EXPIATION OF EVILS

There is no doubt that the verse, If you avoid great sins ..., confirms the division of sins into two categories: great and small; the latter has been mentioned here as 'evils'. Likewise the verse 49 of chap.18 proves this fact: And the Book shall be placed, then you will see the guilty fearing from what is in it, and they will say: ''Ah! woe to us! what a book is this! it does not omit a small one nor a great one, but numbers them (all)''. Their fear of the book shows that small one and great one mean small sin and great sin.

As for as-sayyi'ah (اَلسَّيِّئَةُ), looking at its root and paradigm, it signifies a happening or action which brings evil. That is why sometimes it is used for those affairs or misfortunes which cause grief. Allāh says: and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself (4:79); And they ask you to hasten on the evil before the good (13:6). Sometimes it is used for consequences and effects of sins in this world and the next, as Allāh says: So the evil (consequences) of what they did shall afflict them ... (16:34); So there befell them the evil (consequences) of what they earned ... (39:51); this connotation actually corresponds with the first meaning. Also, it is often used for the sin itself, as Allāh says: And the recompense of evil is punishment like it ... (42:40). In this sense it is sometimes used for sins in general, and covers great and small ones alike, as Allāh says: Nay! do those who have wrought evil deeds think that We will make them like those who believe and do good — that their life and their death shall be equal? Evil it is that they judge (45:21). There are many other verses of the same implication. And sometimes it is used particularly for small sins, as in the verse under discussion: If you avoid great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins; because if man avoids great sins, then nothing remains there except the small ones.

In short, without any doubt, the verse proves that there are two categories of sins: great ones and small ones, when comparison is made between the sins themselves.

Also, there is no doubt that the verse is meant to show the divine grace and favour for the believers; it conveys to them the affectionate message of Allāh that if they avoided some sins, He would expiate from them the other sins. Not that they are encouraged to commit small sins; the verse undoubtedly exhorts them to shun great sins, and if somebody committed a small sin thinking that it was of no importance and that there was no harm in doing it, it would turn that sin into the worst arrogance and transgression, as it would show his disdain to Allāh's command — and that is one of the greatest sins. What the verse implies is only this: The small sins will be forgiven because they are minor slips, and hardly a man can remain free from them, seeing that man has been created weak and ignorant and it is really difficult for him to avoid small errors when he comes under the influence of desire or ignorance. The verse in this respect describes the same reality which the following verse expounds: Say: ''O my servants! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allāh; surely Allāh forgives the faults altogether, surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful: And return to your Lord and submit to Him ...'' (39:53 — 54). No one can claim that this verse encourages man to commit sins, by opening the door of repentance and comforting them with it. In the same way, no objection can be raised against the verse under discussion. In fact, such verses revive dead hearts by giving them hope in place of despair.

The verse does not imply that it was impossible to identify great sins, and, therefore, one must avoid all sins, lest one commits great ones and falls into perdition. Such interpretation would be far-fetched. The verse implies that the addressees identify the major sins and recognize them from the relevant prohibitory orders. The least that can be said is that the verse obligates people to recognize the major sins in order that they could be on guard against them; at the same time they should not treat small sins lightly, because as you have been told, such attitude in itself is one of the mortal sins.

When man will know the great sins, and recognize and identify them, he willunderstand that these were the limits put by Allāh, and no one transgressing that boundary would be forgiven unless he showed definite remorse and sincere repentance. This knowledge in itself will serve as a warning and prevent, him from sinning.

As for the intercession, it is a fact. But you have seen in the preceding relevant discourses that it would not benefit a man who treats divine commands with disdain or takes repentance and remorse lightly. To commit a sin relying on intercession shows indifference and carelessness towards divine orders. This is such a major sin that it definitely closes all the ways of intercession.

The above talk makes clear what we have earlier said that the greatness of a sin is known from severe language of the prohibitory order or from threat of chastisement for it.

This sufficiently throws light on all the views given about great sins. [Many explanations are seen in Islamic books which are given here in short]:-

1] Great sins are those for which Allāh has threatened chastisement in the hereafter and prescribed a fixed punishment in this world.

COMMENT: Persistence in committing a minor sin is a great sin. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has said: ‘‘No great sin remains with repentance, and no minor sin remains (minor) with persistence.’’ It has been narrated by both sects; but the sharī‘ah has not prescribed any fixed punishment for it. The same is the case with being friends with unbelievers and eating up interest, although these two are among the greatest sins forbidden in the Qur’ān.

2] Great sins are those for which Allāh has threatened punishment of fire in the Qur’ān. (Some have added, ‘‘and in the traditions.’’)

COMMENT: This criterion is neither all-inclusive nor exclusive.

3] All those sins are great which show the doer as being indifferent to religion and heedless to the sharī‘ah. This has been said by Imāmu ’l-Ḥaramayn and appreciated by ar-Rāzī.

COMMENT: This is called transgression and rebellion; and it is one of the mortal sins. There are many other mortal sins (even if they are not committed with obstinacy) like eating up an orphan’s property, incest, and unlawfully killing a believer.

4] That sin is great which is forbidden on its own, not because of some incidental concomitants.

COMMENT: It is in a way opposite to the preceding explanation. But transgression and indifference to the sharī‘ah, etc. are among the mortal sins, while they are merely concomitants which turn into mortal sins when they occur with any sin.

5] The sins mentioned in this chapter [The Women] from the beginning to the end of the verse 30 are great. Probably, the idea is that the words, great sins which you are forbidden, refer to the sins mentioned before this verse, e.g., misbehaving with relatives, eating orphan’s property, fornication, etc.

COMMENT: Generality of the verse does not agree with this restriction.

6] Every deed prohibited by Allāh is a great sin. (This explanation is attributed to Ibn ‘Abbās.) Perhaps it is because disobeying Allāh is a very serious matter, a major transgression.

COMMENT: You have already seen that the division of sins into great and small is based on their comparison with one another, while this interpretation looks at the status of man, a humble servant, vis-a-vis Allāh Who is the Lord of everything. Probably someone may be inclined to this view, thinking that the genitive construction in the clause, great sins which [lit., of what] you are forbidden, was explanatory. This, however, is not correct; because the implication then would be as follows: If you avoid all sins, We shall expiate from you your small sins. But if one avoids ‘all’ sins, where will the small sins come from?

If it is said that the verse speaks about expiation of the believers’ sins committed prior to its revelation, then it would be exclusively reserved for those who were present at the time of revelation, and it does not agree with generality of the verse.

If the verse is still taken as a general one, it would mean: If you firmly decide to avoid all sins, and then actually avoid them, We shall expiate your previous sins. But it is such a difficult condition that one can hardly find a single example of such fortitude; such a general and comprehensive verse cannot be applied to such a rare occurance; because human beings are not free from evils and errors except those whom Allāh takes under His especial protection. Think over it.

7] The small is that sin whose punishment is less than the total reward of its doer; and the great is that whose punishment is greater than the doer’s total reward. This interpretation is attributed to the Mu‘tazilites.

COMMENT: It is an interpretation which is supported neither by this verse nor by any other in the whole Qur’ān. Of course, the Qur’ān says that certain sins cause forfeiture of deeds in certain cases, but it is not a general rule covering all sins — whether or not it is taken in the sense they mean. We have discussed in detail the meaning of forfeiture in the second volume of this book [1].

They have also said that expiation of small sins is obligatory [on Allāh] when a servant avoids great sins; and that it would not be proper then to mete out any punishment to him. But the verse does not prove this theory either.

[1] al-Mīzān [Eng. transl.], vol.3, pp.245 — 52 (tr.)

8] Greatness and smallness are two aspects which are found in every sin. A sin is great when committed in disregard or indifference to the divine command; but the same sin is counted as small if done when one is incensed with anger, overcome by desire or frightened by cowardice — all this is forgiven if one avoids great sins.

As the above criteria of greatness of sin may be combined under the heading of arrogance and transgression of limits, this explanation may be summarized as follows: Every forbidden sin is great if done with arrogance and haughtiness, otherwise it is small and forgiven if not accompanied with arrogance and haughtiness.

Someone has said: There are, in every evil and every divine prohibition, one or more great sins as well as one or more small sins. The greatest of all, in every sin, is indifference to divine order and prohibition, and disdain of the sharī'ah; it also includes repeatedly committing a sin, because such a person manifests his disrespect to, and carelessness about, divine orders or prohibitions; while Allāh says: If you avoid the great sins of what you are forbidden, i.e., the great sins which are found in every thing you are forbidden, We shall expiate from you your sins, i.e., We shall forgive you the smaller aspects of that sin and shall not ask you about it.

COMMENT: It is correct that every sin done in a mariner as to show the doer's arrogance and haughtiness becomes a great sin. But it does not mean that it is the only criterion of the greatness of sins. There is no doubt that some sins are great in themselves even without the aforesaid arrogance, etc. Incest when compared to looking at a stranger woman, and murder in comparison to beating, are great sins — whether there was any arrogance there or not. Of course, if indifference, arrogance or haughtiness accompanied a sin, the prohibition will accordingly increase in severity and intensity; the sin will be even greater and the disobedience even more condemnable. Obviously, fornication under overwhelming influence of lust and ignorance is not like the same when committed arrogantly thinking that there was no evil in it.

Moreover, the purported meaning ('If you avoid in every sin its great aspects, We shall expiate from its smaller ones') is in bad taste, not in harmony with the context of the verse: If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins ...; as will be vouched by anyone who has a little familiarity with literary styles.

9] Now we come to al-Ghazālī's reported [1] explanation which apparently is a synthesis of the above views; a gist of which is given below:

''Sins are of two types — great and small — when compared with one another. For example,incest with a married woman within prohibited degree vis-a-vis looking at a stranger woman. At the same time, some sins become great when they appear with some serious aspects, for example, when a small sin is committed again and again, it becomes great, although to begin with it was not so.

''It shows that sins are divided into two categories — great and small — when looked at the actions, per se, in comparison with one another. Even so, they are also divided into these two categories when seen in the perspective of their evil effects and consequences — whether they nullify good deeds or merely reduce the rewards. If the evil deeds are stronger or more numerous than the good ones, the former would erase and nullify the latter; otherwise, the evil deed would be wiped off taking with it an equal amount of reward as its indemnity. Every act of obedience has a good effect on the soul; it raises it in rank, and extricates it from darkness of ignorance. Likewise, every disobedience has an evil effect, degrading the soul and pushing it into abyss of remoteness and darkness of ignorance.

''When a man, who has acquired some light and purity through his obedience, commits a sin, then naturally the darkness of sin collides with the light of obedience. If the darkness of sin and consequences of evil overpower the light of obedience, then the latter is extinguished and forfeited. Such a sin is called great. If, on the other hand, the obedience with its light and purity overcomes the darkness of ignorance and dirtiness of sin, by sacrificing an equal amount of its light, then the remaining [albeit diminished] light and purity will continue to brighten and illuminate the soul. This is the meaning of at-taḥābuṭ (اَلتَّحَابُطُ = a Mu'tazilite theory that good and evil actions cancel each other); and it is exactly the meaning of forgiveness of small sins and expiation of evil deeds. Such sins are called small.

‘‘Apparently it is not unreasonable to expect some cases where perfect equivalence might be found between evil and good deeds. It means that there may be a man in total abeyance having in his account neither any obedience nor any disobedience — without any light or darkness. But the words of Allāh refute it, as He says: a party shall be in the garden and (another) party in the burning fire.[42:7]’’ ar-Rāzī has refuted it, saying that this explanation is based on the Mu‘tazilite tenets which, according to him, are wrong.

The author of Tafsīru ’l-manār in his turn has very severely reproached ar-Rāzī on this line of argument. He says:

‘‘When this (i.e., division of sins, per se, into great and small) is explicitly mentioned in the Qur’ān, then is it imaginable that Ibn ‘Abbās would deny it? Not at all. On the other hand, ‘Abdu ’r-Razzāq has narrated from him that he was asked: ‘Is the number of great sins seven?’ He said: ‘They are nearer to seventy.’ Ibn Jubayr has narrated that he had said: ‘They are nearer to seven hundred.’

‘‘Actually it is the Ash‘arites who are said to deny the division of sins to great and small. Probably those Ash‘arites who were of this view wanted to refute the Mu‘tazilites — even if it took some explaining away. This may be seen in the writing of Ibn Fawrak, as he has confirmed the Ash‘arite view and has said: ‘All the sins of Allāh are great; it is only relatively [1] that one or the other of them is called great or small. The Mu‘tazilites say that sins are of two categories, small and great; but it is not correct.’ Then he has written a far-fetched interpretation of the verse.

‘‘Well, should the verses and traditions be explained away, just for opposing the Mu‘tazilites? Even in matters where they are right? People are not above such pet mindedness. Religious bigotry and partisanship have prevented many intelligent scholars from using their sagacity for their own benefit and that of their followers, and turned their books into a source of strife for the Muslims. They are too busy with polemical arguments to look at reality of religion. You will soon see how ar-Rāzī quotes from al-Ghazālī and then refutes it just for this reason; but where is ar-Rāzī from al-Ghazālī, and where is Mu‘āwiyah from ‘Alī?’’ (The last sentences refer to the writings of al-Ghazālī and ar-Rāzī which we have quoted earlier.)

Be that as it may. What al-Ghazālī has written is sound to a certain extent; still it is not free from various defects and shortcomings:

First: According to him, the division of sins into great and small is based on mutual cancellation or reduction of reward and punishment. Again, he believes that sins are also divided into great and small on their own. But the two divisions do not always correspond. A person has a lot of reward to his credit; then he commits many sins which are known to be great in themselves and they drastically decrease his reward, leaving a small residue in his account. Now he commits a small sin and that cancels out the remnant of his reward. In both cases, what was great by one criterion, becomes small by another; and vice versa. Thus the two divisions are not always identical.

Second: It is true that there occurs some collision between the effects of obedience and disobedience in certain cases. But it is not an all-encompassing principle. The hypothetic generality has never been supported by apparent meanings of the Qur’ān and the sunnah. Let him show if there is any proof whatsoever from the Qur’ān and the sunnah which could prove general and all-encompassing mutual cancellation and reduction between punishments of sins and rewards of obedience.

As for the detailed discourse about the noble and brilliant spiritual status, and the opposite vile, darkened condition, it is marred by the same defect. True that the spiritual light and darkness usually collide, acting on, and reacting to, each other — thus cancelling out, or reducing the strength of, the opposite force. But this too is not a general non-changing rule. Sometimes, virtue and evil both stay in their places, co-existing with each other, and bringing about a split personality. A Muslim, for instance, eats interest, swallows up people’s property, and turns a deaf ear to the cries of an oppressed victim of injustice, and at the same time pays particular attention to obligatory prayers, and entreats his Lord with utmost devotion and humility. Or, another one cynically sheds blood, shamelessly violates people’s honour and creates chaos and mischief on the earth, and then very faithfully carries out other religious commands with complete sincerity. It is the phenomenon the psychologists call schizophrenia or Jekyll and Hude syndrome, in which various opposing trends fight each other to gain the control of a man's psyche; the man is continually distracted by this inner turmoil — until both traits become firmly set in their places and a sort of truce is affected between them: When one trait raises its head, the other disappears from the scene, leaving the field to its rival to stalk its victim, and pounce on it — as the above examples have shown.

Third: It follows from al-Ghazālī's exposition that avoidance of great sins should not have any role in the expiation of small sins. Suppose there is a person who does not commit any great sin: not because he volitionally avoids it even when he has an urge and ability to do it; he rather does not do it only because he cannot do it. His small sins will however be cancelled by his good deeds, because in this case his rewards will be greater than his punishment — and it is exactly what the expiation of small sins means. And, it does not leave any meaningful function for volitional avoidance of great sins.

al-Ghazālī himself has written in Iḥyā'u 'l-'ulūm: ''Avoidance of great sin causes expiation of small sins when one shuns them in spite of ability and urge to do them. For example, a man gets hold of a woman and has a chance of establishing sexual relations with her, and yet he keeps aloof from it and restricts himself to looking at, or touching her. His inner struggle against his base desire is much more effective in illuminating his heart when compared to the darkness caused by his audacity in looking at her. This is what brings about expiation of small sins. If, on the other hand, he was impotent, or avoided it because of some other inability, or because of fear of the affairs of the hereafter, it would not lead to any expiation. Suppose, someone does not like liquor at all, and would not take it even if it was allowed, then his avoidance of liquor would not expiate the smaller sins which are considered preliminary stages of drinking, e.g., listening to music and songs. Of course, if someone longs to drink liquor and listen to music, and struggles with himself to avoid drinking and restricts himself to the listening to music, then probably his inner struggle to shun the liquor would remove from his heart the darkness brought about by the sin of listening to music. All these are the rules of hereafter.''

Again he says in another place: ''A darkness rising to the heart cannot be erased except by a light brought in by an opposite good deed — and opposites have reciprocal relation with each other. It is therefore necessary that each evil should be erased by a good deed of the same category, in order that it could counteract it. Whiteness is removed by blackness, not by heat or cold. This step by step approach is a sort of favour in erasure of sins; because hope in this way is much stronger, and trust more effective than, for example, in a case when one continues performing only one type of worship — although this too has some role in the said erasure.''

These words of al-Ghazālī clearly show that, according to him, only that avoidance can expiate minor sins which is done volitionally by preventing oneself from a longed for great sin. But his earlier quoted explanation does not necessarily lead to this conclusion.

To sum it up, all that can be said here, relying on the Qur'ānic verses, is this: It is true that the good and bad deeds cancel out, or decrease the force of, each other — in certain cases. But there is no evidence to show that every evil affects every good deed in this way, and vice versa. This fact may be appreciated if we look at moral and psychological conditions — they are the best tools for understanding the Qur'ānic realities regarding reward and punishment.

As for the great and small sins, you have seen that the verse apparently connotes that, compared with one another, some of them are great and others small. For example, killing an inviolable person unjustly, vis-a-vis looking at a stranger woman, or drinking liquor claiming that it was allowed vis-a-vis drinking it when overcome by desire — without its having any connection at all with the theory of forfeiture and expiation.

Moreover, the verse, being without any restriction, clearly shows that Allāh has promised him who avoids great sins to expiate all his small sins — both, of past and future. Obviously this avoidance implies that every believer should avoid great sins as much as he can, in a way that it would constitute the avoidance in view of his particular situation. It surely does not mean that he should avoid it after first intending to do it and then shunning it. Anyone who has a cursory glance at the list of great sins will undoubtedly realize that the man has not been born yet who would be inclined to commit all of them and also have ability to do so — even if such a case is ever found, it would be so rare as to make it practically non-existent. It would be in bad taste to apply such a general verse to such a rare and imaginary case.

The verse therefore means that whoever avoids the great sins which are within his power and which his heart longs for, (and these are the great sins which he can and does avoid), Allāh will expiate his small sins, whether or not the latter have any reciprocal relation with the former.

Question: Is this expiation, because of avoidance, in the sense that the avoidance, per se, is an act of obedience which brings the expiation in its wake, just like repentance? Or is it that when man does not commit sins, then he is left with only his small sins and good deeds, and then the good deeds expiate his small sins? As Allāh says: surely good deeds take away evil deeds (11:114). Apparently, the verse (If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your [small] sins), shows that the avoidance has something to do with the expiation. Otherwise, it would have been more appropriate to say that acts of obedience expiate evil deeds (as was said in the verse, surely good deeds take away evil deeds); or, that Allāh will forgive small sins whatever they may be; there was no need then of setting forth a conditional sentence.

A sin is great if the prohibitive order is given in a severe language, or if it contains threat of fire or something similar, whether it is found in the Qur'ān or sunnah. But these criteria are not exclusive.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) has said: ''Great (sins) are those for which Allāh has imposed (the punishment of) the fire.'' (al-Kāfī)

al-Bāqir (a.s.) has said about the great sins: ''Every (sin) which Allāh has threatened to punish with fire.'' (Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l faqīh)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) has said: ''Whoever avoids that which Allāh has threatened (to punish) with fire — if he is a believer — Allāh will expiate his (small) sins from him, and will cause him to enter an honourable place of entering; and the seven great (sins) which impose (punishment of fire) are (as follows): Murder of an inviolable person; disobedience to parents; eating usury; going back to nonIslamic places [where one cannot perform his/her Islamic worship] after hijrah [i.e., after emigration to an Islamic centre]; slandering a married woman (of adultery); swallowing up orphan's property; and fleeing from jihād.'' (Thawābu 'l-a'māl)

The author says: There are many Shī‘ī and Sunnī traditions which have enumerated great sins, some of which will be given later. Most of them count polytheism as one of the seven great sins, although the above tradition does not mention it; probably the Imām (a.s.) has removed it from this list because it is the greatest of the great sins; and the words, ‘‘if he is a believer’’, point to it.

Abdu ’l-Aẓīm ibn ‘Abdillāh al-Ḥasanī has narrated from Abū Ja‘far Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī, (who narrates) from his father ‘Alī ibn Mūsā ar-Riḍā (who narrates) from (his father) Mūsā ibn Ja‘far (peace be on them all!) that he said: ‘‘ ‘Amr ibn ‘Ubayd al-Baṣrī came to see Abū ‘Abdillāh Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.). When he saluted and sat down, he recited this verse: And those who shun the great sins and indecencies [42:37]. Then he stopped. Abū ‘Abdillāh said: ‘What made you to be silent?’ He said: ‘I would like to know the great sins from the Book of Allāh.’ (The Imām) said: ‘Yes! O ‘Amr, the greatest of the great is to ascribe a partner to Allāh, because Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says: Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him [4:48;4:116]; and He has said: Surely whoever associates (others) with Allāh, then Allāh has forbidden to him the garden, and his abode is the fire;[5:72].

‘‘ ‘After that comes despairing of Allāh’s mercy, because Allāh says: ... surely none despairs of Allāh’s mercy except the unbelieving people [12:87];

‘‘ ‘Then is feeling secure from Allāh’s plan, because Allāh says: But none feels secure from Allāh’s plan except the people who shall perish [7:99];

‘‘ ‘And among (the great sins) is disobedience to parents, because Allāh has counted a disobedient (child) as insolent (and) unblessed, in the verse [quoting ‘Īsā, a.s.]: And dutiful to my mother, and He has not made me insolent, unblessed [19:32];

‘‘ ‘And among them is killing a soul whom Allāh has given protection to — except with [judicial] authority — as He says: And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his punishment is hell; he shall abide in it ... [4:93];

‘‘ ‘And slandering married women, because Allāh says: Surely those who accuse chaste believing women, unaware (of the evil), are cursed in this world and the hereafter, and they shall have a grievous chastisement. [24:23];

‘‘ ‘And swallowing the property of an orphan, for He says: (As for) those who swallow the property of the orphans unjustly, surely they only swallow fire into their belies and soon they shall enter burning fire. [4:10];

‘‘ ‘And fleeing from jihād, as Allāh says: And whoever shall turn his back to them on that day — unless he turns aside for the sake of fighting or withdraws to a company — then he, indeed, becomes deserving of Allāh’s wrath, and his abode is hell; and an evil destination shall it be. [8:16];

‘‘ ‘And swallowing interest, because Allāh says: Those who swallow down interest cannot stand except as one whom Satan has confounded with (his) touch does stand. [2:275]; and He (further) says: But if you do (it) not, [i.e., if you do not forgo the interest], then be apprised of war from Allāh and His Messenger;[2:279];

‘‘ ‘And sorcery, for Allāh says:... and certainly they knew that he who bought it (i.e., sorcery) should have no share (of good) in the hereafter, ... [2:102];

‘‘ ‘And fornication, because Allāh says:... and he who does this (i.e., fornication) shall find a requital of sin; the punishment shall be doubled to him on the Day of Resurrection, and he shall abide therein in abasement. [25:68 — 69];

‘‘ ‘And false oath, for Allāh says: (As for) those who take a small price for the covenant of Allāh and their (own) oaths — surely they shall have no portion in the hereafter, and Allāh will not speak to them, ... [3:77];

‘‘ ‘And defrauding; Allāh says: ... and he who defrauds shall bring (with him) that which he has defrauded, on the Day of Resurrection; [3:161];

‘‘ ‘And withholding the obligatory zakāt, for Allāh says: ... and (as for) those who hoard up gold and silver and do not spend it in Allāh’s way, announce to them a painful chastisement, on the Day when it shall be heated in the fire of hell, then their foreheads and their sides and their backs shall be branded with it; this is what you hoarded up for yourselves, ... [9:34 — 35];

‘‘ ‘And false testimony and concealing (true) testimony, because

Allāḥ says:... and whoever conceals it [i.e., testimony], his heart is surely sinful;[2:283];

‘‘ ‘And drinking liquor, because Allāh has made it equal to idol-worshiping [in the verse 5:90];

‘‘ ‘And neglecting prayer or any of the things made obligatory by Allāh, because the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) says: ‘‘Whoever neglects prayer intentionally, he goes out from the protection of Allāh and the protection of His Messenger’’;

‘‘ ‘And breaking a promise and misbehaving with relatives, because Allāh says (about these): ... (as for) those, upon them shall be curse and they shall have the evil (issue) of the abode [13:25].’ ’’

(Imām al-Kāẓim, a.s.) said: ‘‘Then ‘Amr ibn ‘Ubayd went away crying out loudly, and he was saying: ‘Perished he who spoke by his own opinion and contended with you in virtue and knowledge.’ ’’ (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

The author says: A ḥadīth of nearly the same meaning has been narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās through Sunnī chains. This tradition makes two things clear:

First: The great sins are those which have been very strongly prohibited, either by using forceful language or by threatening with the fire, in the Qur’ān or the tradition (as may be seen in the proofs put forward by the Imām, a.s.). It clarifies the meaning of al-Kāfī’s ḥadīth, ‘‘Great (sins) are those for which Allāh has imposed (the punishment of) the fire’’; and also that of Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l faqīh and at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī, that great sins are those which Allāh has threatened (to punish) with fire. The imposition and the threat mentioned in these traditions are general; they may be explicit or implied, in the Book of Allāh or in the ḥadīth of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

I think that the same is the import of the interpretation ascribed to Ibn ‘Abbās; and when he speaks about threat with fire he uses it in general terms which covers explicit as well as implicit threat, whether it is found in the Qur’ān or the tradition. It is supported by another tradition found in at-Tafsīr of aṭ-Ṭabarī, and attributed to Ibn ‘Abbās in which he says: ‘‘Great are those sins which Allāh ends with (the threat of) fire, or (His) wrath or curse or chastisement.’’ This also makes it clear that what has been narrated from him in at-Tafsīr of aṭ-Ṭabarī and other books that, ‘‘Every sin prohibited by Allāh is great’’, does not give a different meaning of great sins; it merely says that every sin is great when looked at in the perspective of man’s insignificance vis-a-vis the majesty of his Lord, as was explained earlier.

Second: Some of the preceding and the following traditions give the number of the great sins as eight or nine (as some Sunnī traditions narrated from the Prophet [s.a.w.a.] do), or twenty (as seen in this tradition), or seventy (vide some other narrations). This difference reflects the difference in degrees of greatness of sins, as may be seen in the Imām’s words in this very tradition, ‘‘the greatest of the great is to ascribe a partner to Allāh’’.

al-Bukhārī, Muslim, Abū Dāwūd, an-Nasā’ī and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from Abū Hurayrah that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said: ‘Keep away from seven mortal sins.’ They said: ‘And what are they? O Messenger of Allāh!’ He said: ‘Ascribing a partner to Allāh; slaying the soul that Allāh has forbidden except by right; sorcery; devouring usury; devouring the property of an orphan; turning back (from the enemy) on the day of marching (to battle); and accusing the married believing women (of adultery) while they are unaware (of such false accusation).’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibn Ḥibbān and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Abū Bakr ibn Muḥammad ibn ‘Amr ibn Ḥazm, from his father, from his grandfather that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) wrote a letter to the people of Yemen, which listed obligatory and recommended deeds and indemnity for bodily injuries; and sent it with ‘Amr ibn Ḥazm, who said: ‘It was written in the letter, inter alia, that the greatest of the great sins near Allāh on the Day of Resurrection is associating someone/something with Allāh; killing the soul of a believer without right; fleeing (from war) on the day of marching (to battle); disobeying the parents; slandering a married woman; learning sorcery, devouring interest; and devouring the property of an orphan.’ ’’ (ibid.)

‘Abdullāh ibn Aḥmad has narrated in Zawā’idu ’z-zuhd, from Anas that he said: ‘‘I heard the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) saying: ‘Well, surely my intercession is for those of my ummah who might have done great sins.’ Then he recited the verse, If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins ...’’ (ibid.)

The verses are connected with the preceding laws of inheritance and marriage; they reinforce the preceding rules and promulgate some general principles that would effect reconciliation in some cases of strained relationship between husband and wife.

QUR'ĀN: sAnd do not covet that by which Allāh has made some of you excel others: Coveting is to say: 'Would that this were like that'. Such words are called ceveting because they describe the covetousness hidden in the heart. It is an exclamatory construction that shows a psychological attitude as when one loves something which is difficult or almost difficult to obtain, whether one declares it in words, or not. Obviously, the verse forbids people to covet the extra bounties granted to others — that bestowal of additional bounties is the cause of covetousness. But one should not attach oneself to those who enjoy such abundance; rather a man should attach himself to Allāh, asking Him to bestow on him such bounties from His treasures. Obviously, the 'extra bounties' specifically refers to the special rights granted to a particular group — men or women — by the divinely ordained law; for example, man has been given the right to marry more than one wife, and gets a double share in inheritance, while woman is entitled to receive her dower and maintenance from her husband.

Coveting such rights exclusively given to a particular sex has been forbidden in order to completely uproot the tree of evil and disorder. These bounties are coveted by human beings because by nature they love such things and try to achieve and obtain what others have got. At first, it is just a desire and covetousness. When it continues for some time, it changes into hidden envy. When the envy takes root in the heart it shows itself in talk and action. When many people suffering from this disease join together, they cause disorder on the earth and destroy the tilth and the stock.

Also, it shows that this prohibition is of advisory nature, not a legislative order; it aims at safeguarding the preceding legislated regulations.

The verse ascribes the bestowal of bounties to Allāh; also both groups have been described as ‘‘some of you over the others’’. The aim is to awaken their submissiveness to Allāh’s decrees because they believe in Him, and to strengthen their mutual love by reminding them that the receiver of the coveted bounty is not some alien body; but an integral part of him/her.

QUR’ĀN: men shall have the benefit of what they earn and women shall have the benefit of what they earn: ar-Rāghib has said, ‘‘ ‘al-Iktisāb’ (اَلْاِكْتِسَابُ = to earn) is used for what a man earns or acquires for himself; while ‘al-kasb’ (اَلْكَسْبُ = to earn) denotes what he acquires for himself or for someone else..’’ [This verse uses the former verb; and] it appears from the above that this sentence explains the preceding prohibition of coveting and describes its underlying reason. That is, you should not covet these things because this excellence, found exclusively with one or the other group, has been granted because that group has earned it through natural traits or physical diligence. For example, men and not the women, have been allowed to marry upto four wives, because men’s place in human society demands it — to the exclusion of women. The same is the reason of their having been allotted double shares in inheritance. Likewise, women have been given half of men’s shares in heritance, while the responsibility of their maintenance is put on men’s shoulders and they have exclusive right to take dower — all this because women’s position in the society demands it. Also, whatever wealth is earned by one group — by trade or in other ways — is exclusively reserved to it; and Allāh does not want injustice to His servants.

It is now clear that the 'earning' mentioned here actually means a sort of acquisition and reservation; it makes no difference whether this happens through voluntary activity (e.g., handcraft or business;) or otherwise. What is important is that the person concerned has some characteristic which entitles him/her to that excellence; for example, the person's being male or female which makes him/her entitled to a certain fixed portion in inheritance.

Philologists have opined that the verbs, al-kasb and al-iktisāb, both are reserved for what a person acquires through voluntary action; even so, they say that the basic element in their meaning is 'acquisition'. It may be said that 'He has earned fame by his beauty.' Some exegetes have explained the verb in this verse in the same meaning. It may be said that the verb, al-iktisāb, in this verse has been used in this meaning by way of simile or extended simile.

In any case, the verb here cannot be restricted to what man acquires by his own efforts; because it would then mean: Men shall have benefit of the wealth they earn for themselves through their activities; and so shall the women. It would be a prohibition of coveting what other people have acquired through craft and production. This meaning is correct in itself, but the verse cannot be confined to it; otherwise it will have no relevance to the preceding verses of inheritance and marriage.

However, the correct meaning of the verse is as follows: Do not covet the financial and non-financial advantages and excellence which Allāh has exclusively given to either men or women, and has thus given some of you excellence over the others; this bounty has been given to the concerned group because it has acquired and proved its entitlement by its psychological traits or physical activities (like trade, etc.); so it shall have its benefit, and every body shall have the benefit of what he or she has acquired.

QUR'ĀN: and ask Allāh of His grace ...: When one bestows something on someone else, usually it is a surplus which the bestower does not need himself, that is why it is called ''al-faḍl'' (اَلْفَضْلُ) which is translated here as `grace' but literally means surplus. Allāh has ordered people to turn their faces away from the bounties bestowed on others. But the desire of excellence in life and livelihood — rather, love of monopolizing it and surpassing all fellow beings in this respect — is an inseparable human trait. Therefore, the Qur'ān tells them to look towards Allāh Himself and to ask Him for His grace. They should turn away from what the others have got and look towards Allāh to ask for His grace; the grace is in Allāh's hands, and it is He Who has given everyone his or her excellence; He alone can give you the means to surpass others — the others whose bounties you desire and whose excellence you covet.

The grace to be asked for has been left vague by adding the preposition 'of' before it. It has two implications:

First: It teaches the manner of invocation and prayer addressed to Allāh. Man is basically ignorant of what would benefit — or harm — him in the long run, while Allāh is aware of what would in reality be beneficial or harmful to His creatures, and He has power over all things. Therefore, it is only proper to ask Him for the best in what the invoker desires; he should not go on specifying what he wants and how should it reach him. Many times we have seen someone with intense desire of some things like wealth, child, honour or health; he was persistently praying for it, fixing his eyes on that goal; but when his prayer was answered and his desire fulfilled, it brought nothing but destruction and disaster, nullifying all his life's efforts.

Second: It is an indication that one should not ask for something which would be contrary to the underlying divine reason of a certain creative or legislative excellence bestowed. It is imperative that one should not ask of the excellence exclusively reserved for others. If men ask the bounty given to women, or vice versa, and Allāh grants their prayer, the underlying reason would be negated and the laid down laws and regulations nullified. Think it over.

When man prays to Allāh for one of his pressing needs, he should not ask Him for what is given to other people; rather he should ask Him from what is in His hands; even then he should not teach his Lord what is good for him, nor how should that benefit be brought to him. The only proper way is to ask Allāh to fulfil his need in a way He deems best.

The concluding sentence, surely Allāh knows all things, explains the reason of the preceding prohibition: You should not covet the bounties which Allāh has bestowed on others; Allāh knows everything, He is not unaware of underlying reasons, nor does He make error in His decisions.

A QUR'ĀNIC REALITY

Difference in men's aptitudes and abilities in acquisition of the life's advantages is based on natural creative phenomenon which inevitably brings about differences in the lives' grades. And, as far as we know, this phenomenon has always been evident in human societies from the earliest times to this day.

In ancient times strong people subjugated weaker persons, using them according to their whims to fulfil their desires without any restraint or hindrance. The poor wretcheds had no choice but to submit to their orders, and to do as their 'masters' required them to do. But their hearts overflowed with rage and hatred, and they always waited for a chance to throw away that yoke. This system continued in history changing its appearence from time to time, beginning from shaikhdom and ending on monarchy and imperialism.

At last, human beings succeeded, through rising after rising, in bringing down this overpowering citadel of usurpation forcing the rulers to abide by the constitutions and laws made for society's well-being and happiness. On the surface, it puts an end to whimsical rules of tyrants. Human beings were no longer divided into various strata; there was no longer an autocratic ruler to lord over slaves whose rein was in his (master's) hand.

Even so, the tree of disorder and mischief continued to grow — finding another base to spread its roots, appearing in another shape — but the fruit was the same, the result unaltered. There remained the same difference between various classes, based on economic disparity. Some had wealth and riches piled up while others' hands were empty. The two groups were poles apart; the wealthy interfered in all aspects of society, because of their wealth, while the poor had no option but to stand and fight against oppression.

This resulted in appearance of communism which believed in sharing all resources of livelihood, by nullifying private property and taking away all capital from private hands. It said that every individual should enjoy the fruits of his labour, accomplished by his personal experties. This erased the difference that was based on personal wealth and affluence. But it opened some new avenues of disorder and mischief which were unheard of in previous systems — it totally destroyed the free will of the individual and stripped him of all discretion and choice. But nature does not agree with it nor does human instinct allow it. And how can something continue if nature rejects it and human instinct discards it.

Apart from that, the communism has not removed the basic disorder. Human beings by nature do not like to exert themselves except where there is a possibility of gaining distinction and acquiring honour and position. Remove the element of competition and distinction and you have destroyed the work itself; it will result in negation of human nature.

The communists have tried to remove this basic difficulty by trying to fix the workers' eyes on immaterial distinction and glory. But it has brought the difficulty back in toto. If a man does not accept those distinctions as real, he will not try for them; and if he believes in them, it will have the same effect as the material incentive.

Democracy resorted to a strategy to remove the disorder sneaking into it. First, it employed wide spread propaganda to expose the defects of communism. Second, it levied heavy taxes that ate away a greater part of the profits of business and industry. But it was of no use. Exposition of the defects of their adversaries' system could not block the way of the defects and disorder infiltrating into their own system. Nor could the gathering of most of the profit in the treasury prevent the affluent classes from their luxurious life and the resulting oppression. Now, their strategy is to get power and authority over the collected wealth, instead of personally owning it. They get the same benefits from that money by having authority over it and by managing it according to their wish, as they would have done it if was owned by them outright.

Neither the democrats could cure the disease nor the communists; and there is no medicine after burning.

All this is because the purpose and goal chosen by man for the society leads to the core of mischief and disorder; his adopted goal is enjoyment of material life by all means; and it cannot be divested of its basic conflict and disorder, whatever changes are brought into its appearance.

And what is the way adopted by Islam to uproot this disorder? It has given the man total freedom in all matters to which his nature leads. Then it has brought the two groups nearer by raising the have-nots' standard of life through levying various taxes on the 'haves', and lowering the haves' standard by prohibition of extravaganza and show of affluence that would increase their distance from middle classes; then it has created a balance with unity and good manners, and has diverted people's attention from material distinction to the honour of piety; and taught them to ask Allāh for whatever bounty and excellence they desire.

This is to which the Qur'ānic verses points: and ask Allāh of His grace; surely the most honourable of you with Allāh is the one among you who is most pious (49:13); Therefore fly to Allāh (51:50). We have already explained that by turning their faces towards Allāh people would inevitably hold fast to the real and genuine causes for their desired goals — without resorting to lethargy in earning their livelihood or laziness in getting at their happiness and bliss. Strangely enough, some people say that Islam is a religion of idleness which discourages man from acquiring material benefits in life. Such assertion is totally off the mark and shows ignorance of the speakers.

This is a short note on this subject; and we have written in detail on various points of this subject in various discourses of this book.

QUR'ĀN: And to every one We have appointed heirs of what parents and near relatives leave ...: ''al Mawālī'' (اَلمَوَالِي = translated here as 'heirs') is plural of al-mawlā (اَلمَوْلي) which is synonymous to al-waliyy (اَلوَلِيُّ), although mostly it is used for some particular cases of al-wilāyah (اَلوِلايَةُ = rule, sovereignty, friendship, authority). For example, a slave's master is called his mawlā, as he has authority over him; a helper is called mawlā, because he manages the affairs of the helped one; an uncle's son is called mawlā as sometimes he acts as guardian of his uncle's daughter in matters of marriage. Most probably it is an infinite verb beginning with mim (م) or an adverb of place, indicating a person having in him some kind of authority — as today we say 'government' or 'court' and mean the ruler or the judge.

''al-'Aqd'' (اَلعَقْدُ = to tie) is opposite of ''al-ḥall'' (اَلحَلُّ = to unite); ''al-yamīn'' (اَليَمينُ) is opposite of ''al-yasār'' (اَليَسَارُ = left hand); al-yamīn means right hand, and is also used for oath; it has some other meanings also.

The verse follows the preceding one: And do not covet ..., having the same context, and contains the admonition to give due share to every one who is entitled to it, and declares that Allāh has appointed for every one heirs in all that is left by parents and near relatives. It shows that this second verse, in conjunction with the preceding one, gives a gist of all the rules and laws laid down by the verses of inheritance; and sums up the detailed regulations. It is not unlike the verse: Men shall have a share of what the parents and the near relatives leave ... [4:7] which, coming before the verses of inheritance stated a general principle which served as the basis and referring point of the inheritance laws.

It follows that the heirs and the inherited ones (summed up in the verse) would refer to those who have been described in detail in the verses of inheritance. Thus, al-mawālī would refer to all who have been enumerated as heirs in those verses, like children, parents, brothers, sisters and so on.

Also, the three categories mentioned here — parents, near relatives and those with whom your right hands have ratified agreements — will apply to the three categories mentioned in the verses of inheritance, i.e., parents, near relatives and husband and wife. Thus the phrase: those with whom your right hands have ratified agreements, would refer to the husband and the wife.

The meaning, therefore, will be as follows: And to every one of you, whether male or female, We have appointed heirs to inherit whatever property you leave behind. The preposition min مِنْ = translated here as 'of') may also mean 'from'; in that case it would be connected with 'heirs', i.e., inheritance originates from the property; it may alternatively be connected to a deleted but understood verb, 'they shall inherit', i.e., the heirs shall inherit from what you leave. What they leave refers to the property left by the deceased relatives — the parents, the near relatives and the husband and wife.

The phrase, ''and those with whom your right hands have ratified agreements'', alludes to husband and wife; it was a custom to shake hands at the conclusion of an agreement or deal; it was as though it was their right hand which had concluded the deal and ratified it. The meaning, therefore, will be as follows: those with whom you have established material relationship through formula of marriage.

''So give them'', i.e., to the heirs, ''their portion'', which has been described in the verses of inheritance. The conjunction, 'so' connects the sentence with, and bases it on, the sentence, ''And to every one We have appointed heirs ...''. The order to give them their share has been further emphasized by the concluding sentence, surely Allāh is a witness over all things.

The above is the most appropriate of the meanings given by the exegetes. [The following are examples of some unsuitable explanations given by them:]

Some have said that al-mawālī (heirs, relatives, etc.) refers to agnates other than the heirs who are more entitled to the inheritance. But the wording of the verse does not support this view.

Also it has been said that min (from, of) in ''mimmā tarak'' is explanatory, and refers to the heirs, i.e., to every one We have appointed heirs who shall inherit him, and they are those whom he has left behind, that is, the parents and near relatives.

Further it is said that the phrase, ''those with whom your right hands have ratified agreements'', refers to the allies. In preIslamic days a man used to make agreement with another, saying: 'My blood is your blood, my war is your war, my peace is your peace; and you shall inherit me and I shall inherit you; and you shall pay blood money for me and I shall pay blood money for you.' Such an ally used to get one-sixth of the estate of his deceased ally. According to this interpretation, the sentence will be disconnected from the preceding one, and would mean, 'give the allies their one-sixth share'. And then it will have to be treated as abrogated by the verse: and the possessors of relationship are nearer to each other in the ordinance of Allāh (8:75).

But some say that, ''so give them their portion'', means that they should be helped, advised and given material assistance; it does not refer to inheritance. In that case there will be no abrogation in the verse.

Some others claim that the phrase refers to those whom the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had declared to be 'brothers' to each other in Medina, and they inherited from each other, until the system was abrogated by the verse of inheritance.

Still others have said that it refers to those who were adopted as sons in the era of ignorance. According to them, this verse exhorts the Muslims to bequeath something to them, as it advises to give them their portions.

None of these meanings is supported by the text or the context of the verse, as any thoughtful scholar may realize; and that is why we see no need to rebut them.

QUR'ĀN: Men are the maintainers of women because of that with which Allāh has made some of them to excel the others and because of what they spend out of their property: ''al-Qayyim'' (اَلْقَيِّمُ = one who looks after the affairs of another person); al-qawwām (اَلْقَوَّامُ) and al-qayyām (اَلْقَيَّامُ) give the same meaning in its highly emphasized form. The clause, ''that with which Allāh has made some of them to excel the others'', refers to the natural characteristics of man in which he excels the woman; men have much greater judicious prudence than women, and consequently they are much stronger and braver and more capable of performing strenuous tasks requiring intrepidity and forebearance; while women's life is dominated by feelings and emotions and based on gracefulness and delicateness. The next phrase, ''what they spend out of their property'', refers to the wealth which men spend on women's dower and maintenance.

The generality of these causes shows that the resulting principle, ''Men are the maintainers of women'', is not confined to the husbands. In other words, it does not say that man is the maintainer of his wife; rather it gives authority to the men, as a group, over the whole group of women, in the common affairs which effect lives of both sexes on the whole. The general social aspects which are related to man's excellence as, for example, rulership and judiciary, are the things on which a society depends for its continuence. It is because of the prudence and judiciousness which are found in men in a higher degree than in women. Likewise, the fight and defence depend on strength and far-reaching strategic planning. In such affairs men have authority over women.

Consequently, the order, Men are the maintainers of women, is totally unrestricted and comprehensive, while the next sentence, the good women are therefore obedient ..., is apparently restricted to the relationship between a man and his wife, as will be explained later on. This next declaration has branched out from the above general principle; but it does not restrict its generality in any way.

QUR'ĀN: the good women are therefore obedient, guarding the unseen as Allāh has guarded: ''aṣ-Ṣalāḥ'' (اَلصَّلاَحُ = merit, virtue, goodness); ''al-qunūt'' (اَلْقُنُوتُ = abiding obedience and submission). Its place, opposite to, those on whose part you fear recalcitrance, shows that ''the good women'' means good wives; and that it is applied to them during continuance of matrimony, not before or after that; and that the sentence, ‘‘the good women are therefore obedient ...’’, — which gives an order in the form of praise, and means that they should be obedient and should guard ... — is an order related to matrimonial affairs and domestic life. Even so, it is a command whose scope of jurisdiction depends on its basic cause — the man’s maintaining the woman by virtue of marriage. It is therefore incumbent upon her to obey him and guard their mutual or conjugal affairs.

Let us explain it further. Men as a group have authority over women as a group in those common affairs which have more affinity with man’s enhanced prudence and hardiness, i.e., rulership, judiciary and war; but it does not negate the independence of woman in her individual will and activities, she decides what she wants and acts as she wishes and man has no right to interfere in any way — except when she intends to do something unlawful. In short, there is no restriction on them in whatever they want to do for themselves in a proper way. In the same way, husband’s authority over the wife does not mean that she has lost control over her own self or property or is restricted in her will or action regarding its management; nor does it mean that woman is not free and independent in safeguarding and protecting her personal and social rights, nor is she hindered from adopting suitable means to achieve those rights. Rather it means that when the husband spends his wealth on her in return for conjugal rights, then she must obey and submit to him in all things connected with sexual intercourse (when he is present), and protect him in his absence — she should not betray him behind his back by having unlawful affairs with another man. Also she should not deceive him concerning the property which he gives her by virtue of matrimony as a partner in domestic life.

The sentence, ‘‘the good women are therefore obedient ...’’ means that they should achieve goodness for themselves; then inevitably they would be obedient. In other words, they are obliged to submit to their husbands and obey them without fail in all matters pertaining to conjugal relations. Also they must safeguard their interest in all their rights during their absence.

Apparently the word mā (مَا) in bimā (translated here with ‘as’) in the clause, ‘‘as Allāh has guarded’’, has the import of infinitive verb, and bi (بِ) implies instrumentality. The meaning therefore will be as follows: The good women are obedient to their husbands and guard their interest in their absence, through the husband's rights which Allāh has preserved by giving him the authority and obliging the wives to obey them and guard the unseen for them.

Alternatively, the letter bi may imply exchange. Then it will mean that the wives are obliged to obey and guard the unseen in exchange of the rights which Allāh has bestowed on the wives, as He has given a new life to them in human society and has obliged the men to pay them dower and maintenance. But the former meaning is more obvious.

Some other meanings have been given by exegetes, but it is not necessary to mention them as none of them is supported by the context.

QUR'ĀN: and (as to) those on whose part you fear recalcitrance, admonish them, and leave them alone in the sleeping places, and beat them;: ''an-Nushūz'' (اَلنُّشُوزُ = disobedience, refusal to submit); fear of recalcitrance connotes appearance of the signs of disobedience. The order is based, not on disobedience, but on its fear. It is in order that the man should keep the admonition at the level suitable at a particular stage, because admonition has its place at the beginning of recalcitrance as well as at the appearance of its signs — [but with less intensity].

The three remedies — admonition, leaving them alone in the sleeping places and beating — have to be applied one after another in that sequence, although they have been mentioned together, joined with the conjunctive 'and'. First comes admonition; if that fails, then leaving her alone in the sleeping place; if that too proves ineffective, then the beating. This gradual process is inferred from the sequence wherein these remedies are increasing in intensity from leniency to severity. In short, this graduality is inferred from the context, not from the conjunctive 'and'.

It appears from the words, ''leave them alone in the sleeping places'', that he is not asked to sleep in a separate bad, but he should show his displeasure by turning away from her and not touching her, etc. It is far-fetched to believe that it means leaving her bed altogether. The meaning given by us may be supported by the fact that ''sleeping places'' has been used in plural; apparently there was no need of the plural if the latter meanings were intended.

QUR'ĀN: then if they obey you, do not seek a way against them: That is, if they are obedient to you, then do not be on look out for excuses to trouble them. Why? Because, surely Allāh is High, Great. Greatness and grandeur is reserved for your Lord; do not be deceived by your power and strength nor use it in oppressing your wives, thinking yourselves too high and superior.

QUR'ĀN: And if you fear a breach between the two,... Allāh is Knowing, Aware: ''ash-Shiqāq'' (اَلشِّقَاقْ = breach, enmity). Allāh has ordered to appoint two judges, as it would reduce the possibility of injustice and arbitrariness. If the husband and wife both desire reconciliation, without obstinacy and obduracy, Allāh will create harmony between them. When both parties divest themselves of power, and entrust the two judges with the responsibility of effecting harmony, then reconciliation is bound to follow.

The verse attributes effecting of harmony to Allāh, although there happens to be a normal cause, i.e., the parties' willingness to be reconciled and their acceptance of the judges' decision. It is because Allāh is the real cause; it is he who relates causes to effects, and gives everyone his right. The speech ends with the sentence, ''surely Allāh is Knowing, Aware;'' its appropriateness is self-evident.

A DISCOURSE ON MEN'S AUTHORITY OVER WOMEN

It is not secret that the noble Qur'ān puts great emphasis on healthy human intellect, and prefers it over desire and pleasureseeking. It does not encourage people to follow their excessive passions and emotions. It exhorts man to follow the path of reason, and admonishes him to guard this divine gift, lest it be lost. This Qur'ānic reality is well-known and needs no bookish proof; there are a lot of verses that point to it explicitly and implicitly, in various way and different words.

Even so, the Qur'ān has not neglected good and pure feelings and emotions, nor has it turned its eyes from their important and beautiful effects which help man to properly build his self, and which in its turn gives strength to the society. For example:

... severe against the unbelievers, compassionate among themselves;... (48:29)
... that you may find rest in them, and He put between you love and compassion;... (30:21).
Say: ''Who has prohibited the embellishment of Allāh which He has brought forth for His servants and the good provisions?'' (7:32)

Yet He has balanced it by requiring it to conform with the demands of intellect; thus by following such feelings and emotions, one would in fact be following the intellect.

It has been explained somewhere earlier that it is because of the protection which Islam accords to the intellect (by basing all its ordained laws on reason) that it has prohibited all such actions, and forbidden all such conditions, and declared as unlawful all such characteristics, which confuse the intellect in its judgment and cause it to act haphazardly in its implementation, thus making it lose its bearing in the society's affairs; for example, liquor, gambling, fraudulent deals, lies, slander and backbiting.

This much is enough to convince a thoughtful scholar that as far as the broad issues and general social aspects — like rulership, judiciary and war — are concerned, they have to be controlled by intellect, free from the influence of emotions and feelings. Thus they have to be entrusted, not to women but, to men who are governed more by intellectual power than emotional feelings.

And this is what Allāh has ordained, when He says: Men are the maintainers of women; and the prophetic pronouncements, being the expositions of the Qur'ānic principles, establish its factuality; and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) followed this principle throughout his life; he did not appoint any woman as a ruler or governor of any people, nor did he give her any judicial post, nor were they called upon to participate in any war, i.e., to actively fight in it.

As for other aspects of life, like learning, teaching, trade deals, nursing, medical profession, etc. — the tasks which are not hindered by emotion and feeling — the Prophet's aḥādīth (traditions) do not prohibit it, and the Prophet himself had allowed many of it. The Qur'ān too is not without some hint to its being lawful for the women, because it is a necessary concomitant of the freedom of will and action which women have been allowed in many aspects of life. They have been removed from man's guardianship, and given independent right of owning property and wealth; then how can they be stopped from managing that property and developing it in a way they think fit. Likewise, it would be meaningless to give them the right to lodge a case or to give evidence in a case and then to forbid them to appear before a judge or magistrate. And so on and so forth.

Of course, their freedom will cease if it collides with the husband's right. She is duty-bound to obey him in his presence and protect his interests in his absence, and any right of hers which stands in the way of his rights will cease to exist.

TRADITIONS

The author of Majma'u 'l-bayān explains the verse, And do not covet that by which Allāh has made some of you excel others, in these words. ''One should not say, 'Would that the bounty and the beautiful woman which that man has got were for me'; for it would be jealousy; but one is allowed to say: 'O Allāh! give me similar to that'.'' Then he has written that it has been narrated from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.).

The author says: al-'Ayyāshī too has narrated this tradition in his at-Tafsīr from the same Imām (a.s.).

Ibn Shahrāshūb narrated from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, That is Allāh's grace; He grants it to whom He pleases, and, do not covet that by which Allāh has made some of you excel others, that they were revealed about 'Alī (a.s.).

The author says: This tradition is based on the principle of the flow of the Qur'ān; in other words it points to an application of the verses.

Ibrāhīm ibn Abi '1-Bilād narrates through his father from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: ''There is no soul but Allāh has apportioned for him his sustenance lawfully which is to reach him with ease and comfort; and He has also shown it (the sustenance) to him alternatively by unlawful means; if he takes something by unlawful means, Allāh reduces it from his apportioned lawful (sustenance); and Allāh has with Him plenty of grace, apart from the two (aforesaid portions of sustenance); and that is the (meaning of the) word of Allāh, and ask Allāh of His grace.'' (al-Kāfī, at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: al-'Ayyāshī has narrated it from Ismā'īl ibn Kathīr who has reported it from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Also the same meaning has been narrated from Abu 'l-Hudhayl from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.). A nearly similar tradition has been reported by al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr from al-Ḥusayn ibn Muslim from al-Bāqir (a.s.).

We have already discussed in the second volume the meaning of sustenance, its apportionment and its division into lawful and unlawful, under the verse, and Allāh provides with sustenance whom He pleases without measure (2:212) [1].

Ibn Mas'ūd says that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''Ask Allāh of His grace, because Allāh loves to be asked.'' (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, at-Tirmidhī)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated through Ḥakīm ibn Jubayr from a man whom he has not named who said that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had said: ''Ask Allāh of His grace, because Allāh loves to be asked; and that the best of worship is to wait for ease.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

[ash-Shaykh aṭ-Ṭūsī] has narrated through his chains from Zurārah that he said: ''I heard Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) reciting, And to every one We have appointed heirs of what parents and near relatives leave; then he said: 'He [Allāh] refers [with the word, mawālī] to the relatives who inherit, not to benefactors; the most entitled to (the inheritance of) a deceased is the one who is nearest to the womb that connects him to the deceased'.'' (at-Tahdhīb)

The same author narrates through his chains from Ibrāhīm ibn Muḥriz that he said: ''A man asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.), in my presence, about a person who said to his wife, 'Your affair is in your hand.' [The Imām, a.s.] said: 'How can it be, while Allāh says, ''Men are the maintainers of women''? It is nothing.' '' (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Ḥātim has narrated through Ash'ath ibn 'Abdi 'l-Malik from al-Ḥasan that he said: ''A woman came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) complaining against her husband that he had slapped her. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Retribution.' Then Allāh sent down the verse, Men are the maintainers of women ...; so the woman returned without retribution.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: [as-Suyūṭī] has narrated it from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) through other chains too. Some of them say that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''I wanted one thing but Allāh decided otherwise.'' Probably it was a case of the woman's recalcitrance; otherwise, the verse, then if they obey you, do not seek a way against them, disallows it (the slapping).

Moreover, there is another snag in these traditions' apparent meaning. Apparently the Prophet's word, ''Retribution'', was an answer to a religious question of the questioner to explain the rule of sharī'ah; it could not be a judgment of a case as the opposite party was not present. If so, then it would mean that the said verse was sent down to show the error of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in exposition of the law, but it goes against his being sinless. Again, it could not be an abrogation, because it cancelled the law before it was acted upon. Of course, there were some instances where Allāh had amended some prophetic orders by adding to or deleting from it, but it was only in his administrative orders, not in matters of the law ordained by him for his people; otherwise it would have been an invalid nullification.

Abu 'l-Jārūd has narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that the word, ''qānitāt'' (قَانِتَاتُ) means obedient ones.

Abū Ja'far (a.s.) has said that, leave them alone in the sleeping places, means that man should turn away from her; and beat them, means hitting her with tooth brush (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

[al-Kulaynī] has narrated through his chain from Abū Baṣīr that Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, then appoint a judge from his people and a judge from her people: ''The two judges will make a condition that they may decide to separate them if they so wish, and to join them if they so wish. Then if they caused separation it would be lawful and if they joined them it would be lawful.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: This and nearly similar meaning has been narrated through several other chains in al-Kāfī and at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī.

Ibn Muslim has narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: ''The Leader of the faithful (a.s.) gave judgment concerning a woman whom a man had married with an undertaking given to her and her people that she would be [ipso facto] divorced if he married another woman and neglected her, or if he took a slavegirl in her presence. He [the Leader of the faithful] said: 'The condition laid down by Allāh has precedence over your condition. [It is upto him;] he may fulfil his condition if he so desires; or he may keep this woman and also marry another woman, or take a slave-girl if he so wishes; and then he may leave (this) woman if she comes in his way. Allāh has said in His Book: ... then marry such (other) women as seem good to you, two and three and four ... [4:3]; ... of those whom your right hands possess [4:25]; and (as to) those on whose part you fear recalcitrance, admonish them, and leave them alone in the sleeping places and beat them; then if they obey you, do not seek a way against them; surely Allāh is High, Great'[4:34].'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī).

al-Bayhaqī has narrated from Asmā' bint Yazīd al-Anṣāriyyah that she came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and he was (sitting) among his companions. She said: ''My father and mother be your ransom! I have come to you as representative of the women-folk; and you should know, may I be your ransom! that there is no women, be she in the east or in the west who, having heard of my this deputation, does not agree with my views.

''Surely Allāh has sent you with truth to the men and the women. We do believe in you and your God who has sent you. We women-folk are confined and under pressure, restricted to your houses, satisfying your sexual urge, carrying your offspring; while you men-folk have got superiority over us by Friday and congregational prayers, visiting sick, attending funerals, performing ḥajj after ḥajj, and, even better than that, fighting in the way of Allāh. Even so, when one of you goes out for ḥajj or 'umrah or camping (for jihād), we women guard your properties for you, spin your clothes for you and bring up your properties [1] for you.

[1] Apparently it should be ''your children''.

Then what is our share in reward, O Messenger of Allāh?''

The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) turned his face to his companions, and said: ''Have you ever heard any woman talking in a better way than this question of hers concerning her religious affairs?'' They said: ''O Messenger of Allāh! We never thought that any woman would find her way to a (talk) like this.''

Then the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) turned towards her and said: ''O woman! Go back and inform those women who are behind you that when one of you behaves nicely towards her husband, and seeks his pleasure and pursues his conformance, then this equals (in reward) to all those activities of men.''

The woman then turned back happily saying: ''Lā ilāha illa Allāh'' and ''Allāhu Akbar''. (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: There are numerous traditions of similar import, narrated in the Shī'ah and Sunnī collections of ḥadīth. The most beautiful is the ḥadīth narrated in al-Kāfī from Abū Ibrāhīm Mūsā ibn Ja'far (peace be on both): ''Woman's jihād is (her) nice behaviour towards (her) husband.'' The most comprehensive is the sentence narrated in Nahju 'l-balāghah that also points to the basic reason of this legislation; and it has also been narrated by al-Kulaynī through his chain of narrators from 'Abdullāh ibn Kathīr from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) from 'Alī (a.s.); and also through his chain from al-Asbagh ibn Nubātah from 'Alī (a.s.) quoting a letter which he (a.s.) had written to his son; ''Surely, woman is a flower, and not a steward.''

Also it has been narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: ''Woman is but a doll; he who takes it should not destroy it.'' The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to wonder aloud: ''How can you embrace the woman with a hand you had hit her with?''

It is narrated also in al-Kāfī through his chain from Abū Maryam from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said: 'What! does one of you hit the woman and then goes embracing her?' '' Countless such statements are found in traditions; and one may understand from them the Islamic views on this subject.

Let us turn our attention to the above-mentioned ḥadīth of Asmā' bint Yazīd al-Anṣāriyyah. If we think over this and other similar traditions which show that women used to come to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and talk to him on religious matters that concerned them; and also look at various laws ordained by Islam about them, it will be clear that although they observed ḥijāb (purdah = vail) and confined themselves mostly to the domestic affairs, they were not prevented from approaching the highest authority, trying to solve the problems confronting them which they were unable to solve by themselves. This is the freedom of faith which we had described under the last verse of the chapter of ''The House of 'Imrān''.

It may be inferred from this and other similar traditions that:

First: The woman's life-style, preferred and liked by Islam, is that she should confine herself to the managernent of domestic affairs and bringing up the children. Of course, it is an emphasized sunnah and not an obligatory order. Yet the exhortation and persuasion to follow this highly recommended path had preserved and guarded this system, especially as the atmosphere was that of religion, and environment, of piety, when people sought the pleasure of Allāh and preferred the reward of hereafter over worldly gains, and women were brought up and trained in good characteristics like chastity and modesty, love of children and involvement in domestic life.

Their engagement in these affairs and their focus on revival of pure feelings (ingrained in their beings) prevented them from coming to men's gatherings or mingling with men (even within the permitted limits). Its proof may be found in the un-interrupted continuation of this custom among the Muslims for centuries and centuries after the early days of Islam. This continued until the western licentiousness — called ''freedom of women'' — seeped into the society. It brought in its wake — for both men and women — moral corruption and life's destruction in a way they do not realize — but will soon see. And if the people of the towns had believed and guarded (against evil), We would certainly have opened up for them blessings from the heaven and the earth, but they rejected so We overtook them for what they had earned [7:96]

Second: It is a part of the laid down sharī'ah of Islam to forbid women to fight (in jihād), in the same way as they are prevented from judgeship and rulership.

Third: Islam has not left these deprivations (e.g., woman's inability to participate in jihād in the way of Allāh) without suitably compensating the women for it, nor without making up for it with such virtuous acts of equal value which have intrinsic real glory. For example, it has made good matrimonial behaviour as equal to jihād for women. May be, these virtues and glories have lost their value in our eyes — as we live in these days in this polluted atmosphere. But the Islamic social order evaluates every thing accurately and exhorts people to try to excel one another in human excellence which is appreciated by Allāh (and He measures everything with truth). When a person proceeds on the path he or she is required to walk on, and keeps to the lane prescribed for him or her, the Islamic society evaluates his/her achievement in such a way that various services and activities are considered equal in value to some other services and activities of the same importance. In the eyes of Islam, man's martyrdom on the battle-field and sacrifice of his life's blood — in spite of its great glory — is no better than woman's good matrimonial behaviour. Likewise, a ruler manages the affairs of society, and a judge sits in the judicial court. These are the jobs that give no privileges to their holders. If a ruler or a judge follows the path of truth and justice in his actions and decisions, he gets no worldly reward; on the other hand, he carries a heavy burden of responsibilities on his shoulders, and puts himself in various types of dangers and pit-falls which endanger his spiritual and material well-being — especially in respect of the rights of those who have no protector except the Lord of the worlds, and surely your Lord is on look-out. Now what superiority these officials have got over a woman who has been forbidden by religion to accept such responsibilities, and has been shown a different path and advised not to deviate from it.

Only that society can strengthen and revitalize these sociologically important and essential responsibilities (by encouraging a group to volunteer for them) which trains its members to come forward to do whatever they are called to, without any reservation.

No one can deny that social orders and human behaviour differ with changes in the societies' atmosphere. Look at that soldier who puts his life in the utmost danger — that of high-explosive bombs that would shatter his life. He volunteers for it for glory, hoping that his name will be included in the roll of honour as the one who sacrificed his life for his country. He prides himself on it considering himself superior to all, while he himself believes that death is total annihilation. Thus that supposed honour is mere imagination and that superiority just a myth. In the same way these film stars influence the whole society, basking in a glory which many heads of states would envy. But the work they do and the way they expose themselves to the public was considered for untold centuries the greatest disgrace a woman could face, the ugliest ignominy she could be accused of. Why this change? It is because the social environment decides what should be acceptable to the masses; it glorifies the vulgar and disgraces the respectable. That being the case, what is wrong if Islam exalts some things which we — living in this volatile era — consider vile; or if it regards some things with contempt which we consider good enough to be vied for. Remember that the environment in the early days of Islam was that of piety — where people preferred the hereafter to this world.

COMMENTARY

These seven verses exhort good-doing and spending in the way of Allāh, and promise good reward for it; at the same time, they condemn the opposite conduct, be it miserliness or spending for showing to the people.

QUR'ĀN: And worship Allāh and do not associate any thing with Him,: This is what is called monotheism; but here it refers to the monotheism in practice, i.e., doing good deed (including the benevolence which is the topic particularly mentioned here) only for the sake of Allāh's pleasure, seeking the reward of the hereafter, not for satisfying one's own desire as it would be tantamount to associating (one's desire) with Allāh.

This interpretation is supported by the verse's ending phrase which gives the reason of this order in these words: surely Allāh does not love him who is proud, boastful; and then identifies this unloved person as the one who is niggardly and the one who spends in charity only for showing to the people. These are the ones who associate something else with Allāh and do not worship Him alone. Then the talk proceeds: And what (harm) would it have done them if they had believed in Allāh and the last day ... Obviously, their polytheism emanates from their lack of belief in the Day of Judgment. Allāh says in another place: ... and do not follow desire, lest it should lead you astray from the path of Allāh; (as for) those who go astray from the path of Allāh, for them surely there is a severe punishment because they forgot the Day of Reckoning (38:26). It shows that those who go astray by following their desire — and every type of polytheism is [unmitigated] astraying — do so because they have forgotten the Day of Reckoning. Again Allāh says: Have you then seen him who takes his low desire for his god, and Allāh has made him err in spite of his knowledge ... (45:23). This makes it clear that to follow one's desire is to worship it, associating it with Allāh. It is clear from the above that monotheism in practice demands that whatever good one does, it should be purely for the sake of Allāh — in anticipation of His reward — remembering the Day of Reckoning when rewards and punishments will be awarded. On the other hand, polytheism in practice means forgetting the last day — if he had believed in it, he would not have forgotten it. Such a man does whatever he does, not for the divine reward, but because of what appears to his base desire as attractive, be it niggardliness or spending in charity in order that people should praise him for his generosity and so on. This man treats his desire as equal to his God, and associates it with Him.

The real purpose of the divine worship and unpolluted sincerity is that it should be for seeking Allāh's pleasure and getting His reward, not in pursuance of one's desire.

QUR'ĀN: and do good to the parents ... and those whom your right hands possess;: Obviously, the word ''iḥsānā'' (إِحْسَاناً = to do good) is cognate accusative to emphasize a deleted verb; the completed sentence would mean 'do good to the parents, etc., to your utmost capability'. The infinitive verb, al-iḥsān (اَلْإِحْسَانُ) uses the prepositions, bi (بِ) and ilā (إِلي); it is said: I did good to (بِ = bi) him; or, I did good towards (إِلي = ilā) him.

The words, ''and to the near of kin'' and the following words are in conjunction with ''the parents''. ''The near of kins'' means near relatives. [The neighbours have been classified in two groups:] the neighbour of (your) kin and the alien neighbour. This apposition of adjectives indicates that the former refers to a neighbour whose house is near yours, and the latter to the one who is at a distance, because al-janab (اَلْجَنَبَ) means alien.[1] A tradition narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) limits neighbourhood to forty arm-lengths; while another one says, 'forty houses'. Probably the two traditions separately describe the two categories of the neighbours.[2]

The words, ''the companion at your side'', refer to the one who keeps your company remaining at your side. It covers companions in a journey as well as those who are with you at your residence and so on.

The word translated here as ''the way-farer'', literally means, ''son of the way''; it is as though nothing is known of his details exept that he is travelling on a path, and that there is none he could be related to, except the way he is proceeding on; so he is the son of the way. The phrase does not imply that he should be poor, in need of help, having no transport or provisions. The words, ''those whom your right hands possess''; refer to slaves; male and female, because they are counted here among those whom one must be good to; mostly they are referred to as those who are possessed ''by your right hands'', not as those possessed by you.

QUR'ĀN: surely Allāh does not love him who is proud, boastful;: ''al-Mukhtāl'' (اَلْمُخْتَالُ) means haughty, prancing, lost in his conceited thoughts; a horse is called al-khayl (اَلْخَيْلُ) because of its prancing walk.

[1] This interpretation is far-fetched and the proof does not support the claim. If the second phrase means ''alien neighbour'', then ''near neighbour'' should mean the neighbour who is related to you, as a coming tradition explains. Moreover, the word ''dhu 'l-qurbā'' (ذُوالقُرْبِي) has never been used in the Qur'ān for showing nearness in physical distance. (tr.)

[2] The two definitions could as easily mean that a relative should be treated also as a neighbour even if he lives at a distance of forty houses: while for unrelated persons neighbourhood ends at a distance of forty arm-lenghths.

But, most probably, such traditions do not aim at giving legal definitions enforceable through land measurement. They look at common usage and behaviour prevalent in society. (tr.)

''al-Fakhūr'' (اَلْفَخُورُ) is boastful. The two traits of pride and boastfulness are inseparable concomitants of excessive love of wealth and glory. That is why Allāh does not love a proud and boastful person, because his heart is attached to something other than Allāh. The next two verses expose these two characteristics when they say: Those who are niggardly ..., and, those who spend their property (in alms) to show to the people ...; the first group craves for wealth and the second for glory and fame — although the wealth and the fame are somewhat inseparable from each other.

This speech normally should have begun with exposition of their evil deeds, e.g., niggardliness, hiding the bounties received from Allāh, and other such things; but Allāh first mentioned these two adjectives to clearly show why Allāh does not love them.

QUR'ĀN: Those who are niggardly and bid people to be niggardly ...: It is through their wrong behaviour and bad example that they order people to be niggardly, whether they use any word to this effect or not. They are rich and wealthy; people try to attach themselves to them and therefore follow their examples; this results from the greed ingrained in human nature. In short, these rich people's niggardliness is no less commanding than their words.

How do they hide the bounties which Allāh has given them out of His grace? They behave like, and pretend to be, a needy penniless person; they are annoyed when someone asks them for some help, but at the same time are afraid to refuse lest they are attacked, and it would be more disastrous if people turned their attention to their wealth. [So the remedy is to pretend to be poor.] The adjective, 'un-believers', at the end of the verse refers to these people who hide Allāh's bounties they have received; the same is the root-meaning of the well-known ''al-kāfir'' (اَلْكَافِرُ) because he hides the truth by rejecting it.

QUR'ĀN: And those who spend their property (in alms) to show to the people ...!: That is, they spend for showing to the people. The verse proves that:

Showiness in charity or in any other good work is in fact polytheism, which shows that such a man does not believe in Allāh, because he has more confidence in people and in their appreciation.

It is also polytheism in practice, because that man does not want any reward of the hereafter for his deeds; his entire hope is to reap the fruit of his 'charity' in this world.

The person who does good deeds for showing to the people is associated with the Satan, and the Satan is an evil associate.

QUR'ĀN: And what (harm) would it have done them ...: The question arises from pity or amazement. The verse proves that refraining from spending benevolently in the way of Allāh emanates from lack of true belief in Allāh and the last day — although one may be pretending to have such belief.

The end sentence, and Allāh knows them, prepares the ground for the next verse. It is more in keeping with the import of this sentence to treat it as a circumstantial clause.

QUR'ĀN: Surely Allāh does not do injustice to the weight of an atom ...: ''al-Mithqāl'' (اَلْمِثْقَالُ = weight); ''adh-dharrah'' (اَلذَّرَّةُ) means small red ant; also a single dust particle floating in air which is hardly visible because of its smallness. The word mithqāla dharratin (مِثْقَالَ ذَرَّةٍ) stands in place of a cognate accusative; the meaning will be: Allāh does not do any injustice at all, not even equal in weight to an atom's.

The word ḥasanatan (حَسَنَةً) has also been read as ḥasanatun (حَسَنَةٌ). In latter case, it would mean, 'and if there is a good deed'; in the former case it denotes, 'and if that minute weight of atom is a good deed, Allāh multiplies it'. The verb, wa in taku (وَ اِنْ تَكُ), uses feminine pronoun either because the predicate ḥasanatan is feminine, or because the word mithqāl, being in genitive construction with dharrah — a feminine — has acquired feminity.

The context indicates that this verse gives a sort of reason for the preceding question. The meaning may be as follows: It is regrettable that they do not believe and do not spend in the way of Allāh. Had they believed and spent benevolently — and Allāh knows them well — He would not have done injustice to them even to the weight of an atom they had spent; Allāh would not have neglected it or left out its reward; and if it had been a good deed, He would have multiplied it.

And Allāh knows better.

QUR'ĀN: How will it be, then, when We bring from every people a witness ...?: We have described the meaning of witness to a certain extent when explaining the witnessing over deeds, in the exegesis of the verse, ... that you may be witness for the people ... (2:143).[1] Some more details will be given in a more a propriate place.

QUR'ĀN: On that day will those who disbelieve and disobey the Messenger ...: The clause, ''and disobey the Messenger'' clearly refers to disobeying his administrative orders, and not the disobedience of Allāh in matters of sharī'ah. The clause, the earth were levelled with them, is an indirect allusion to death, that is, nullity of existence. A similar expression appears in the verse, and the unbeliever shall say: ''O! would that I were dust'' (78:40).

QUR'ĀN: and they shall not hide any word from Allāh: It is apparent from the context that the sentence is in conjunction with, ''those who disbelieve ... [will] desire'', and it gives in a way the reason of their desire to die; that is, on that day they will be appearing before Allāh, nothing of their secrets will be hidden from Him because their total condition will be clearly seen by Him — their deeds will be present; their limbs and organs will give evidence against them; the prophets, angels and others will testify against them; and Allāh encompasses them on every side. In that situation they would desire they were non-existent, especially as they would not be able to hide any word from Allāh as their bad deeds and evil actions would be apprent for all to see.

As for the verse, On the day that Allāh will raise them up, then they will swear to Him as they swear to you, ... (58:18), we shall explain it later that their false swearing will be just a reflex action emanating from the habit of lying ingrained in their nature in this life; it will not be for hiding any word from Allāh — on a day when nothing of them will.be hidden from Him.

Salām al-Ju'fī narrates from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) and Abān ibn Taghlib from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.), that the word, the parents, in the clause, and do good to the parents, refers to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and ʻAlī (a.s.), (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī). al-ʻAyyāshī has further written: ''A similar meaning has been narrated in the ḥadīth of Ibn Jabalah. He says: 'It has been narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): ''I and ʻAlī are the two parents of this ummah.'' ' ''

The author says: al-Baḥrānī says, after quoting this tradition in his Tafsīru 'l-burhān: ''I say: It has been narrated also by the author of al-Fā'iq.'' al-ʻAyyāshī has also narrrated it through Abū Baṣīr from Abū Jaʻfar and Abū ʻAbdillāh (peace be on both): and Ibn Shahrāshūb has narrated it through Abān from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.). The meaning exponded in this ḥadīth is from the inner and deeper strata of the Qur'ānic realities, as we have described in the third volume, under the topic of the decisive and ambiguous verses.[1]

The father is the physical progenitor of human being, and brings him up. That is why the teacher who leads the pupil to academic perfection is called his father. In this background, personages like the Prophet and waliyy (the best blessings be on them) have got much stronger right to be called the fathers of the believer (who is guided by them, and enlightened by their knowlege), than the physical father whose contribution is confined to his body's genesis and bringing up. Therefore, the Prophet and the waliyy are the parents; and all the Qur'ānic verses exhorting the people to be good to their parents encompass these two, according to the inner Qur'ānic meaning, although the outer interpretation is restricted to the physical parents.

Abū Ṣāliḥ narrates from Abu 'l-ʻAbbās in explanation of, and the neighbour of (your) kin and the alien neighbour, that he said: ''It is the neighbour who has no relationship with you; and the companion at your side means the companion in journey.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī).

The author says: The explanation of the neighbour cover both categories of neighbours, although it is possible to restrict it to the alien neighbour only. Probably the explanation of the companion with the companion in journey looks at one of its applications.

Mas‘adah ibn Ṣadaqah narrates from Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad from his grandfather (peace be on them) that he said: ‘‘The Leader of the faithful (a.s.) said in a sermon describing the terror of the Day of Resurrection: ‘The mouths will be sealed so they would not speak; and will speak the hands, and will testify the legs, and will declare the skins what they had done; so they shall not hide any word from Allāh.’ ’’ (ibid.)

Many reports have been given through the Sunnī chains that these verses were revealed about the Jews. These may be supported by the speech (beginning from the 44th verse), that describes the behaviour of the People of the Book (and especially the Jews) and condemns them for their miserliness, and their greed in accumulation of wealth; also for their whispering campaign among the believers putting evil thoughts in their minds that they should stop benevolent expenditure in the way of Allāh; for their temptation of the Muslims to lead them away from the right course and then leaving them helpless; and thus disrupting the endeavours of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). Nevertheless, such reports, more probably, merely apply the verses to a known situation, rather than describing the actual reason of revelation — as is the case with most of the reports giving reasons of revelation. That is why, in spite of their number, we have not quoted them here.

There are innumerable traditions reported from the Prophet and his progeny (blessings and peace from Allāh be on them) extolling the virtue of doing good to the parents, the relatives, the orphans and all the groups mentioned in this verse; moreover they are widely known and famous. Therefore, we are not quoting them here. A part from that, each group has been especially mentioned in various places of the Qur’ān, and it would be more appropriate to write traditions relevant to them in those places.

COMMENTARY

It was mentioned [1] under the verse, They ask you about in-toxicants and games of chance, ... (2:219), that there are five different verses on the subject of intoxicants; if we put all of them side by side, it will appear that this verse (... do not go near prayer when you are intoxicated ...) was revealed after the verses, ... you obtain from them intoxication and goodly provision ... (16:67); and, Say: ''My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed, and sin ...'' (7:33); but before the two remaining verses: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance. Say: ''In both of them there is a great sin and (some) profit for men; and their sin is greater than their profit.'' (2:219), and, O you who believe! intoxicants and games of chance and (sacrificing to) stones set up and (dividing by) arrows are only an abomination of Satan's handiwork; shun it therefore, that you may be successful (5:90). This was the last-revealed verse on this subject.

It may be possible in a way to arrange a different sequence for them: First 16:67, then 7:33, thereafter 2:219, fourth the verse under discussion, i.e., 4:43, and lastly 5:90. This will drastically change the description of the final and firm prohibition of intoxicants. It would indicate that the verse 7:33 forbade indecencies and sin in a vague manner, then came 2:219 definitely forbiding intoxicants; yet the Muslims found excuses to violate that order, until they were clearly told not to pray while intoxicated; thereafter came the verse 5:90, forbidding it in all conditions.

But if you ponder, you will appreciate that the former sequence is better and preferable to the latter — how can one justify this prohibition, limited to the prayer-time only, after the unambiguous and definite prohibition given in 2:219? Therefore, this verse (4:43) must have been revealed before 2:219.

Of course, if you say that praying while intoxicated means here praying lazily and sluggishly (as has been interpreted in some coming traditions), then there is nothing to argue.

As for the positioning of this verse between the preceding and following ones, it should be treated as a parenthetical speech. Of course, there is another possibility which would explain such parenthetical insertions, examples of which are not so rare in the divine Book: It could be that some verses, of one context and closely related to one another, were gradually revealed during a few days time; but before the end of the series, something happened which necessitated the revelation of one or more unrelated verses; when the series concluded, those unrelated verses would fail in between like parenthesis; although in reality it would not be totally unrelated, would be like a side talk for removing possible misunderstanding or fulfilling an urgent need. Look for example at the following verses:

Nay! man is evidence against himself, though he puts forth his excuses. Do not move your tongue with it to make haste with it. Surely on Us is the collecting of it and the reciting of it. Therefore when We have recited it, then follow its recitation. Again on Us is the explaining of it. Nay! But you love the present life, and neglect the hereafter (75:14 — 21). Look at the position of the verses: Do not move your tongue ... the explaining of it.

In this background, there is no need to belabour finding some sort of connection for every verse with the preceding and following verses. Moreover, it is known that the Qur'ān was revealed peacemeal, and there is no reason why there should be such connection, except in the chapters which were revealed all at once, or in those verses whose connection with one another is self-evident.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! ... what you say,: Prayer in this verse means mosque; that is why it goes on to prohibit entrance to those who are in a state of major ritual impurity.[1] The question arises as to why the house of prayer has metaphorically been called 'prayer'. The reply: It was necessary because of the clause, ''until you know (well) what you say''. Had Allāh said, 'do not go near mosque until you know what you say', it would have appeared disjointed, or given some other unintended meaning. The real purpose is to make them appreciate that during prayer they stand before the Most High, the Most Great God and get the honour of addressing the Lord of the worlds; it is not proper for them to become intoxicated and lose their sense with the abomination of intoxicant, not knowing what they were speaking. This meaning was more relevant to 'prayer'. But prayer is mostly offered in mosque with congregation, according to the system established by the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); and also it was intended to describe the law about entry of a person in condition of major ritual impurity into mosque. Therefore, brevity demands this metaphorical use and style, as you see.

Accordingly, the words, ''until you know (well) what you say'', give the reason of prohibition of drinking liquor in a way the intoxication continues till beginning of prayer. In other words, We have forbidden you liquor in order that you may know what you are saying; but it is not the main purpose of the prohibition — it does not mean that do not start prayer until you know what you say, but if you know what you say you may drink.

QUR'ĀN: nor when you are in a state of major ritual impurity, unless (you are) travelling on the road ...: It will be explained under exegesis of the verse, O you who believe! when you rise up to prayer, wash your faces ... (5:6).

TRADITIONS

Muḥammad ibn al-Faḍl narrates from Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: do not go near prayer when you are intoxicated ..., that he said: ''It was before liquor was prohibited.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: This tradition must be taken to mean that the verse was revealed before the prohibition of liquor was clearly expounded. Otherwise, it will go against the Qur'ān. The 33rd verse of the seventh chapter had clearly forbidden sin which includes intoxicants; and the 219th verse of the second chapter explicitly says that there is great sin in liquor. It means that liquor was forbidden in Mecca before the hijrah, because the seventh chapter is of Meccan period [and the second chapter was the first one revealed at Medina], and everyone knows that the verse under discussion was revealed at Medina [after the second chapter].

There are several other traditions through Sunnī chains saying that this verse was revealed before the prohibition of liquor. May be all such traditions take the word intoxicated to mean lethargic.

Zurārah narrates from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: ''Do not stand for prayer sluggishly, sleepily or sullenly, because it is a trait of hypocrisy; surely Allāh has forbidden the believers to stand for prayer while intoxicated — that is, from sleep.'' (ibid.)

The author says: The assertion that it is a trait of hypocrisy is based on the opening clause, O you who believe!; thus anyone disregarding this order is a hypocrite, not a believer. The phrase, 'that is, from sleep': May be it is an explanatory note of the narrator; or the wording of the Imām (a.s.) himself. In the latter case it will be an exposition of the inner meaning of the Qur'ān, or even the apparent one.

There are other traditions interpreting the intoxication as sleepiness. al-'Ayyāshī has narrated two such aḥādīith in his at-Tafsīr; and al-Kulaynī has reported it in his al-Kāfī through Zayd ash-Shaḥḥām from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.), and through Zurārah from al-Bāqir (a.s.). Also al-Bukhārī has narrated in his aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ through Anas from the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.).

COMMENTARY

These verses expose the condition of the People of the Book, giving details of their injustice, and also their deceptions concerning the divine religion; and these are more clearly applicable to the Jews. The verses are inter-related, having the same context.

As for the last verse, Surely Allāh commands you to make over trusts to their owners ..., some people have said that it is of Meccan period; they think that while the whole chapter, ‘‘The Women’’, is of Medinite period, two verses are of Meccan era — this as well as the last one of the chapter: They ask you about a decision of the law. Say: ‘‘Allāh gives you a decision ...’’ (4:176). (Vide Majma‘u ’l-bayān.) But the verse’s connection with the preceding ones is quite clear; and the same is the case with the last verse of the chapter, because it promulgates a law about inheritance, and inheritance was ordained at Medina.

QUR’ĀN: Have you not seen those to whom a portion of the Book was given? ...: It has already been mentioned under verse 36 to 42 that they are somewhat connected with these ones, and that they were revealed about the Jews.

It appears from these verses that the Jews were in habit of presenting themselves as sincere well-wishers of the believers; they tempted the believers away from the right path, inciting them to niggardliness, telling them not to spend benevolently. They knew that if the Muslims followed their advice, their (believers’) endeavours would not achieve success, their efforts for advancement and progress would fail. It makes it certain that the verses were revealed about the Jews or about those who secretly talked to Jews and befriended them, then deviated from truth on their advice, tempted to niggardliness and then began telling others to be niggardly.

All this may be inferred from the words, ... and desire that you should go astray from the way. And Allāh best knows your enemies ...

The two verses, thus, mean as follows (and Allāh knows better): We have just described to you the condition of those who avoid spending, in the way of Allāh and indulge in pride, boasting, niggardliness and showiness. Do you want to see its concrete example? Look at the Jews. They were given a portion of the book, not the whole book as they claim. Yet they buy error instead of guidance; and they love that you too should go astray. They meet you with smiling faces, appear to you as good people and pretend to be your friends and helpers. They offer proposals which sometimes might seem good to you, which your hearts might be inclined to agree to. But their only desire is to turn you away from the right path — as they have gone astray themselves. And Allāh recognizes your enemies better than you do; and these are your enemies. Do not be deceived by their apparent good behaviour. Beware of them; do not obey their order; do not listen to their false words, nor be carried away by their sugar-coated talk. You suppose that they are your friends and helpers. Do you really need their false friendship and promised help? While Allāh suffices as a Guardian and Allāh suffices as a Helper. In presence of this Guardianship and Helper, why should you need their friendship and assistance?

QUR'ĀN: Of those who are Jews ... and taunting about religion;: ''Min'' (مِنْ = of, from), in the phrase translated here as ''Of those who are Jews'', is explicative that gives detail of the preceding phrase, ''those to whom a portion of the book was given'', from among the Jews. Or it joins with the preceding words, ''your enemies'', from among the Jews. Also it is said that the phrase, ''Of those who are Jews'', is predicate of a deleted subject (which is understood by the attributive clause) ''alter words''; the meaning: Of those who are Jews, there is a group that alters words; or, there are those who alter words. It is not uncommon to mention an attribute and delete the noun to which it is related, Dhu 'r-Rummah says:

They remained and among them (there were those) whose tears flowed fast,
And there were others whose tears filled the eyes leisurely.

Allāh says that they alter words from their places. It may refer to literal alteration, i.e., they change the position of words, delete from and insert into the book, as is said about the present Torah. Or it may indicate that they misinterpreted the words of Mūsā (a.s.) and other prophets, reported in the Old Testament, giving it some unintended meaning, other than the actual one; as they misinterpreted the prophecies of Torah which referred to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and had earlier done about the prophecies referring to the Christ (a.s.), saying that the promised Messiah had not come yet; and they are waiting for him even today.

A third possibility: May be, the alteration of words from their places refer to their mischief mentioned soon after this sentence, where Allāh says: and [they] say: ''We have heard and we disobey''; and: ''Hear, may you not be made to hear''; and. ''Rā'inā'', distorting (the words) with their tongues ... In that case, these sentences will be in conjunction with the words, ‘‘alter words’’. Alteration of words then will mean using a word in a wrong manner and wrong place. Usually when one says, ‘We hear’, it indicates obedience, and it is generally completed by saying, ‘We hear and obey’. It is totally disgraceful to say, ‘We hear and we disobey’; or to use the word, ‘We hear’, as a mockery or derision. Likewise, when one says, ‘Hear’, or ‘Listen’, it is a good manner to add, ‘May Allāh make you hear’; not ‘may you not be made to hear’, nor to say, ‘Rā‘inā’, which reportedly had in their language the import of, ‘Hear, may you not be made to hear’.

The words: ‘‘distorting (the words) with their tongues and taunting about religion’’: ‘‘al-layy’’ (اَللَّيُّ = to twist, to distort). They twist their tongues and present falsehood in the guise of truth, commit disrespect and ridicule in the form of politeness and courtesy. The believers used to address the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) with the word, ‘‘Rā‘inā’’ (رَاعِنَا = pay attention to us) O Messenger of Allāh!’’ Their meaning: Please listen to us, so that we may fully explain what we want to say. The Jews, taking its advantage, started addressing him with the same word, rā‘inā, which in their language had a disrespectful connotation totally against his high status. That is why Allāh condemned them in this verse, saying, ‘‘Jews alter words from their places’’, and then explaining this alteration with examples: ‘‘[They] say: ‘We have heard and we disobey’; and: ‘Hear, may you not be made to hear’;’’ then adding as an explanatory apposition: rā‘inā. They commit this reprehensible deed by twisting their tongues for taunting at the true religion; as the verse says: ‘‘distorting (the words) with their tongues and taunting about religion’’. Both maṣdars have been put here as circumstantial clause.

QUR’ĀN: and if they had said (instead): ‘‘We have heard and we obey’’, and, ‘‘hearken’’; and ‘‘unẓurnā’’, it would have been better for them and more upright;: It compares these words (which show religious reverence and submission to truth) with what they used to say (which was a result of twisting of tongues and taunting about religion); and declares that the former was better and more upright than the latter. But the fact was that there was no good or uprightness at all in the Jews’ words. [Then why this comparison? And why this comparative degree?]

Reply: The verse compares the good effect of the true words with what the Jews thought was a good effect of their words — although in reality there was no good effect in it at all; thus the comparison is between the real good effect and an imaginary good effect. The meaning: If they had said, 'We have heard and we obey ...', it would have been much better and more upright than the goodness they think is achieved by them through this tonguetwisting and taunting. The style is the same as the one used in the last verse of the chapter 62 (''Friday''): And when they see merchandise or sport they break up for it, and leave you standing. Say: ''What is with Allāh is better than sport and (better) than merchandise'', and Allāh is the Best of sustainers (62:11).

QUR'ĀN: but Allāh has cursed them on account of their unbelief, so they shall not believe but a few: The Muslims should not entertain any hope that the Jews would ever say, 'We have heard and we obey'; because it is the word of faith and belief and these are cursed people who would not enter the fold of true faith. That is why the preceding sentence, ''and if they had said ...'', uses conditional particle, law (لَوْ = if) which denotes impossibility of the conditional clause.

Apparently the preposition, bi (بِ = on account of, with) in the clause, ''on account of their unbelief'', denotes causality; not instrumentality. [They have been cursed because of their unbelief; not that they are cursed with unbelief.] Disbelief may be removed by belief; therefore disbelief, per se, cannot turn into such a curse as to make belief impossible. Rather, when they disbelieved (and Allāh will describe their disbelieving ways at the end of the chapter) Allāh cursed them on account of that unbelief, with such a curse as would make them cling to their faithlessness; so they shall not believe except a few of them. (Ponder on it.)

The words, ''so they shall not believe but a few'': It has been said that, ''but a few'', is a conditional clause, that is, they shall not believe except being in small number.

Others have said that 'a few' is adjective to a deleted noun. it means: They shall not believe but a little belief. This interpretation too, like the preceding one, is acceptable, but it requires further elaboration that attachment of smallness to the 'belief' is a sort of attaching an adjective to a concomitant of its noun — they shall not believe but a belief in which the believers shall be small in number.

Some exegetes have written that ''a little belief'' means imperfect one; accordingly, it would mean: They shall not believe but such a small quantity of belief as would be worthless — it would not rectify the believer's actions, nor purify his self, nor improve his wisdom. But this interpretation is wrong. Belief can be said to be deep-rooted or transient, perfect or imperfect — according to its various degrees. But it is never called 'little' or small in number. Therefore, this adjective cannot refer to 'belief', and especially in a book like the Qur'ān which is the most perfect in rhetorics.

Moreover, the belief mentioned in the verse refers either to the real belief rooted in heart (which is opposite of hypocrisy), or to the apparent belief which is sometimes called Islam. There is no doubt that Islam accords recognition to both types of belief, and the Qur'ānic verses explicitly accept even the latter concept. Allāh says: and do not say to any one who offers you salutation (peace), you are not a believer ... (4:94).

Apart from that, the exception has been made from the sentence, ''Allāh has cursed them on account of their unbelief ...;'' and the least degree of belief or apparent Islam was enough to justify that exception — that they should have maintained correct manners and decorum by saying, 'We have heard and we obey', as the Muslims were doing.

What did put that exegete in this error? It was because he thought that as Allāh had cursed them because of their disbelief, it must be absolutely effective; in other words, not even a few of them would ever accept Islam. That led him to say that the exception means ''but a little quantity'' of faith, that is, an insignificant belief. He thought that only in this way the sentence, ''but Allāh has cursed them on account of their unbelief'', could be correctly explained. But he did not realize that such talks — and what they describe of evil characteristics, accusations and condemnations — apply to the society per se. It was the Jewish society, per se, which was subjected to curse, wrath and other general condemnations. They will not believe, will not attain felicity and will not succeed — and even now that society is in the same condition, and will remain so upto the Day of Resurrection.

As for the exception, it refers to individuals; and it does not effect a firm order decreed against a society if a few individuals are not subjected to it. Why was this exception necessary in this declaration? Because it is the individuals who constitute a society, when taken together. When Allāh said, ‘‘they shall not believe’’, it negated the belief from individuals — although it actually did so looking at them as a society. Still there was room for misunderstanding that the declaration covered every single member and none would ever be free from that curse. It was to remove that misconception that Allāh said, ‘‘but a few’’. The verse, therefore, runs on the line of the verse: And if We had prescribed for them: ‘‘Kill yourselves’’, or ‘‘go forth from your homes’’, they would not have done it except a few of them (4:66).

QUR’ĀN: O you who have been given the Book! ... people of the Sabbath: ‘‘aṭ-Ṭams’’ (اَلطَّمْسُ = to efface, to obliterate); ‘‘al-wajh’’ (اَلْوَجْهُ = face, that part of a thing which is seen, which faces you; a man’s face is the side of head that is seen, which faces the addressee). The word is used in material as well as immaterial sense. ‘‘al-Adbār’’ is plural of ‘‘ad-dubur’’ (اَلدُّبُرُ = rear part, posterior). People of the Sabbath refers to a Jewish group which used to violate the rule of the Sabbath; therefore Allāh had cursed and transformed them. The Qur’ān says: And ask them about the town which stood by the sea; when they exceeded the limits of the Sabbath, when their fish came to them on the day of their Sabbath, appearing on the surface of the water, and on the day on which they did not keep the Sabbath they did not come to them (7:166). And certainly you have known those among you who exceeded the limits of the Sabbath, so We said to them: ‘‘Be apes, despised and hated.’’ So We made them an example to those who witnessed it and those who came after it ... (2:65 — 66).

The preceeding verses, as you know, had exposed the condition of the Jews or a group of them; the talk proceeded to say that they were inflicted with divine curse because they were faithless towards Allāh and His Messenger and corrupted what was good in their religion. That curse covered their whole society and deprived them of the divine help for believing — except for a few of them. [Coming to that stage] now the speech is addressed to all the People of the Book, as may be seen from the words, ‘‘O you who have been given the Book’’: It invites them to believe in the Qur’ān, the revealed Book which verifies that which they have got; then it proceeds threatening them of definite infliction of divine wrath which awaits them in case they unjustifiably and arrogantly rebel against this order — alteration of faces or curse from God.

That threat is given in the words: ‘‘... before We alter faces then turn them on their backs, or curse them ...’’ Alteration of face means here changing a man’s face (with which he goes forward to obtain his life’s aims, to achieve the expected bliss and happiness). It does not mean here effacement that obliterates it, nullifying and erasing all its signs. Rather it denotes a change that will turn it to the back-side. Consequently, the more he advances on his way (going, by natural instinct, to the direction of his face), the more is he retarded backwards (because now he is facing his posterior). The more he goes ‘ahead’ to get what he thinks is good for his worldly life or religion, the more he accumulates evil and mischief. The more he progresses, the more is he retrogressed. Such a man can never succeed in his endeavours.

As for cursing them like the violators of the Sabbath, obviously it means metamorphosis, as the above-mentioned verses show that those violators were transformed into apes. Accordingly, the conjunctive, ‘or’, in ‘or curse them ...’, connotes its literal meaning of alternative. There is a difference between the two threats. The former, that is, alteration of faces, would change the life’s goals of the condemned group without affecting any substantial change in their physique. The latter, that is, curse like that of the violators of Sabbath, would change their goals of life by transmuting their body-structure from that of humans to that of animals like apes.

If these people continued in their rebellion — and they will surely do, as the end of the verse shows — they will be inflicted with one of the two punishments: Either alteration of faces or being cursed like the violators of the Sabbath. At the same time, the verse indicates that the punishment would not cover all of them. The word, ‘faces’, being a plural without definite article, does not connote all-inclusiveness. This in its turn points to another fine point: The talk threatens a people with a consequence which will in fact be inflicted to only a group of them; it was therefore more effective to keep it vague as to who would be punished; this vagueness would keep each of them trembling with fear. The description of the related misdeeds fitted every individual of that society. Therefore, no one could consider himself safe from this dire chastisement. This is a well-known style when delivering threats to a group.

Apparently the pronoun, hum (هُمْ = them) in ‘‘or curse them’’, refers to ‘faces’. But the Arabic pronoun is [of masculine gender, and is] reserved for rational beings [like men, while 'faces' should take a singular feminine pronoun]. This clearly indicates that 'faces' refers to persons inasmuch as they turn towards their goals and objectives. That being the case, little credit can be given to those who interpret the alteration of faces and turning them on their backs in its literal meaning, that is, the physical faces would be turned to the backside. There is strong indication that it means alteration of psyche whereby thinking becomes crooked and reality is distorted; when he sees a truth he turns aside, but as soon as a falsehood appears he runs towards it, craves for it.

This an example of divine management when Allāh wills to show His displeasure, as He says: And We will turn their hearts and their sights, even as they did not believe in it the first time, and We will leave them in their inordinacy, blindly wandering on (6:110).

The above discourse makes it clear that alteration of faces in this verse refers to a sort of divine management of soul which changes its nature. Consequently the psyche is inclined towards falsehood and keeps away from truth, as far as believing in Allāh and His signs is concerned. This is supported from beginning of the verse, where Allāh says: ''... believe that which We have revealed ... before We alter faces ...''. Also it is clear from above that the curse here means metamorphosis.

Someone has said: Alteration of faces means that some people's faces will be turned towards their backs; and that it will happen in the last days of the world or on the Day of Resurrection.

COMMENT: The words, or curse them, goes against this interpretation, as explained earlier.

Someone else has said: This alteration indicates their being deprived of divine help in this world; they will ever remain in disgrace and misery; whenever they would proceed to an intended happiness, Allāh would change it to a mirage, an illusion devoid of good.

COMMENT: Although this explanation is not so far-fetched, the beginning of the verse does not support it, as mentioned above.

A third writer has said that it refers to their exile, and then return to the place they were exiled from. They were expelled from Ḥijāz to Syria and Palestine whence they had originally come.

COMMENT: It has been already said that the verse's beginning as well as the context points to something else.

Nevertheless, all or most of the above explanations may be combined in the following way:-

The phrase, altering of faces, means turning their hearts upside down and changing their inner self, facing from truth to falsehood; thus they shall never be able to believe in Allāh and His signs. Now, the true religion is the path without which man cannot arrive at blessings of worldly life; any one deviating from it must inevitably fall in fire-pit of corruption and mischief and stumble into abyss of destruction. Allāh says: Corruption has appeared in the land and the sea on account of what the hands of men have wrought, that He may make them taste a part of that which they have done ... (30:41); And if the people of the towns had believed and guarded (against evil), We would certainly have opened up for them blessings from the heaven and the earth; but they rejected, so We over-took them for what they had earned (7:96).

According to these premises, if one's face is altered away from true religious realities, it would inevitably be turned away from all kinds of felicities of the worldly life. Whoever is debarred from blessings of religion will also be deprived of worldly blessings, like security of position, well-ordered safety, independence and sovereignty; in short, every thing that contributes to good life and makes a work fruitful. If there happens to be some success there, it would be to the extent the religious discipline has seeped into their societies.

QUR'ĀN: and the command of Allāh shall be executed: What Allāh has decreed must take place without fail; and it has already happened, as Allāh has said in several verses of His Book: They are cursed, have been inflicted with divine wrath; and enmity and hatred has been established among them upto the Day of Resurrection.

QUR'ĀN: Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases; ...: It appears from the context that the verse gives the reason for the preceding order, i.e., ''believe that which We have revealed, verifying what you have, before We alter faces ...''. Thus, its connotation will be as follows: If you do not believe in it, you shall be associating something with Allāh; but He does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him; as a result of this polytheism, you will be inflicted with His wrath and punishment; consequently, He will alter your faces by turning them to your back-side; or He will curse you. This unforgiveness will bring in its wake the worldly consequences of polytheism, i.e., alteration of faces and divine curse.

This is the difference between this verse and another one of this very chapter: Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and He forgives what is besides this to whom He pleases; and whoever associates any thing with Allāh, he indeed strays off into a remote error (4:116). The verse under discussion (4:48) threatens with worldly consequences of polytheism, while 4:116 warns of the consequences in the hereafter. This differences is inferred from contexts, although by themselves both verses encompass both types of consequences.

Divine forgiveness or unforgiveness is not affected haphazadly or at random; it takes place according to some underlying reason — and Allāh is Mighty, Wise. He does not forgive polytheism because creation (being a divine mercy) stands on the foundation of worship and mastership. Allāh says: And I have not created the jinn and the human beings except that they should worship Me (51:56). And there is no worship, no servitude with polytheism. As for His forgiving other sins besides polytheism, it will be affected through intercession of rightful intercessors, like the prophets, the waliyys, the angels and the good deeds, details of which were given under the topic of intercession in the first volume.[1]

This verse does not speak about repentance, as it deals particularly with disbelief, and repentance does not combine with disbelief. Otherwise, every sin — including polytheism — is forgiven through repentance. Allāh says: Say: ''O my servants! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the Mercy of Allāh; surely Allāh forgives the faults altogether; surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. And return to your Lord ...'' (39:53 — 54).

Polytheism, in the verse under discussion, certainly encompasses 'disbelief', because disbelief too shall not be forgiven, although formally it is not called polytheism. The People of the Book are not called by the Qur'ān as polytheists, although their disbelief in the Qur'ān and the message of the Prophet was nothing other than polytheism. (Vide exegesis of the verse 221 of ch.2)[1]. The People of the Book, by not believing in what Allāh had sent down verifying what they had had in their hands, became unbelievers and they associated what was in their hands with Allāh — because Allāh had not ordered them to hold fast to their scriptures, etc., the way they did. When a believer in Mūsā (a.s.) disbelieved in 'Īsā (a.s.), he in fact disbelieved in Allāh and associated Mūsā with Him. Probably that is the reason why Allāh has used the clause, ''does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him'', instead of saying, 'does not forgive polytheists (or polytheist)'.

The proviso, ''to whomsoever He pleases'' removes a possible misunderstanding that anybody can influence the divine judgment and affect forgiveness; nobody can order or compel Allāh, the Great, the High. In many places in the Qur'ān, we find the proviso of 'Allāh's pleasure' after description of confirmed realities; and the reason in all or most of them is the same removal of possible misunderstanding. For example, Allāh says: And as to those who are made happy, they shall be in the garden, abiding in it as long as the heavens and the earth endure, except as your Lord please, a gift which shall never be cut off (11:108).

Moreover, the reason demands that not every sinner should be forgiven; otherwise, it will render all orders and prohibitions ineffectual; promulgation of sharī'ah will be an exercise in futility; and the regimen of spiritual advancement laid down by Allāh will be disturbed. That is why Allāh has said: ''to whomsoever He pleases''. It also shows that for every sin punishment must be given to at least some of its perpetrators; otherwise its prohibition would be futile. This observation does not go contrary to the generality of the verses of forgiveness; we are talking, not about comprehensiveness of the promise, but about its actual occurance. After all, many sins are committed by those who definitely shall not be forgiven because of polytheism or other reasons.

The meaning, therefore, is as follows:
Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, be it done by a polytheist or an unbeliever; He forgives other sins

(besides polytheism) through intercession of a good servant or a good deed; yet He is not bound to forgive every sin of this kind to every sinner; it is for Him to forgive or not to forgive; and whatever He decides is based on reason.

QUR'ĀN: Have you not seen those who attribute purity to themselves?: ar-Rāghib has said, '' 'az-Zakāt' (الزَّكوة) basically denotes the growth emanating from divine blessing ... There are two ways for a man to attribute purity to himself: One is through [good] deeds; it is paiseworthy, and the verse, He indeed shall be successful who purifies himself [87:14], refers to it. The other is by words, e.g., attesting to another person's justice and probity. Such praise, if done for himself, is considered immoral. Allāh has clearly prohibited it: therefore do not attribute purity to your souls [53:32]. In this way, Allāh teaches good manners to man, because his praise for himself is repugnant in reason and sharī'ah both. A wise man was asked: 'What is repulsive, even if true?' He said: 'Man's praising his own self.' ''.

The verse is a part of the series describing the conduct of the People of the Book. Obviously it was the People of the Book — or a group of them — who attributed purity to themselves. Here they have not been identified as ''People of the Book'', because it is not compatible with the knowledge of Allāh's revelation to indulge in such contemptible acts. Those who persist in it have no connection with the Book or its knowledge.

This explanation is supported by their boastings quoted by Allāh in His Book: We are the sons of Allāh and His beloved ones (5:18*); Fire shall not touch us but for a few days* (2:80). Also their claim of being Allāh's friends, as alluded to in 62:6, Say: ''O you who are Jews, if you think that you are the friends of Allāh to the exclusion of other people ...'' The verse under discussion, thus, speaks about the Jews; and is another testimony to the fact described in the preceding verses that they are too arrogant to submit to the truth or to believe in revelation sent by Allāh; the divine curse has engulfed them from all sides; and all this is a result of their self-complacency and self-praise.

QUR'ĀN: Nay, Allāh purifies whom He pleases: The talk turns from their attribution of purity to themselves and rebuts it, by declaring that purifying someone is one of the exclusive prerogatives of Allāh. A man may possibly acquire excellence and achieve a sort of spiritual superiority. But he cannot rely on it, cannot be self-complacent on its account, unless he thinks that he is totally independent and needs no help from God. This is tantamount to the claim of divinity; he associates himself with the Lord of the universe. But how can poor man, who does not control any harm or benefit for his own self, nor has any say about his death or life, be independent of Allāh in any good or excellence? Man in his own self and in all his conditions belongs exclusively to Allāh — without any exception; this includes the good he thinks he has got and all things concerning that good. Now is there anything left for man to call his own?

This vanity and conceit — which incites man to attribute purity to himself — is the self-appreciation which is a fundamental evil. Very soon such a conceited person falls in another vice, and that is pride. That pride reaches its limit when he overpowers others, subjugating the servants of Allāh. It leads to oppression and unlawfully exceeding the limit, sacrilege of inviolable matters, and plunging his hands in other people's blood, honour and properties.

This happens when only an individual is inflicted with this spiritual melady. But if it infects others and turns into a social tradition and national character, then it brings catastrophe in its wake resulting in humanity's destruction and society's corruption. It is the trait Allāh attributes to the Jews when they said: There is not upon us in the matter of the unlearned people any way (to reproach), (3:75).

No man should attribute to himself any praiseworthy characteristic, no matter whether the claim be true or false. It is not he who owns those characteristics for himself; they actually belong to Allāh. Allāh is the real owner of all that He has entrusted to man; it is He Who bestows superiority to whomsoever and in whatever way He pleases. It is His prerogative to purify whomsoever He pleases by bestowing on him superiority and grace; and to announce that servant's purity by extolling and praising him for his perfect virtues. He says about Ādam and Nūḥ: Surely Allāh chose Ādam and Nūḥ (3:33); about Ibrāhīm: surely he was a truthful (man), a prophet (19:41); and the same sentence has been used about Idrīs in 19:56. He says about Ya'qūb: and surely he was possessed of knowledge because We had given him knowledge (12:68); about Yūsuf: surely he was one of Our sincere servants (12:24); about Mūsā: surely he was one purified, and he was a messenger, a prophet (19:51); about ʻĪsā: worthy of regard in this world and the hereafter and of those who are made near (to Allāh) (3:45); about Sulaymān: most excellent the servant! Surely he was frequent in returning (to Allāh) (38:30); and the same sentence is used about Ayyūb in 38:44. Again he directs Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) to say: Surely my Guardian is Allāh, Who revealed the Book, and He takes in hand (the affairs of) the good ones (7:196); and extols him in these words: And most surely you are on sublime morality (68:4). Similar extolling phrases may be seen regarding a number of prophets in chapters 6, 19, 21, 37, 38 and so on.

In short, the right to purify someone is reserved for Allāh. Nobody shares it with Him; anyone trying to do it starts from injustice and ends at injustice, while Allāh purifies with truth and justice in true measure without excess or shortfall. That is why the words, ‘‘Allāh purifies whom He pleases’’, have been followed by the statement, and they shall not be wronged the husk of a date-stone, which gives a sort of reason for above.

It appears from the context that the divine purification mentioned here refers to praise in words, to verbal attribution of excellence to good servants — although the phrase is general and, if not seen within this context, could encompass actual purification as well as the praise in words.

QUR’ĀN: and they shall not be wronged the husk of a date-stone: ‘‘al-Fatīl’’ (اَلْفَتِيْلُ) on paradigm of ‘‘al-fa‘īl’’ (اَلْفَعِيْلُ) is derived from al-fatl (اَلْفَتْلُ = to twist together, to entwine) and means, entwined. It is also interpreted as the husk found in the furrow of, or inside, a date-stone. It is narrated in traditions of the Imams of Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.) that it is the spot on date-stone an-naqīr (اَلنَّقِيْرُ = tiny spot on a date-stone) al-qiṭmīr (اَلْقِطْمِيْرُ = pellicle enveloping a date-stone). Also it is said to mean dirt twisted worm-like with fingers. Anyhow it alludes to something utterly worthless.

The verse proves two things:-

First: No one having any excellence should be proud of it, nor should he indulge in self-appreciation. Rather it is an exclusive prerogative of Allāh, as the verse says, to purify those who deserve it. Let alone self-praise, the verse obviously indicates that one should not attribute excellence even to other virtuous persons, except in the way Allāh has praised them. It follows that excellence is only that which Allāh has praised and extolled. Any excellence that is not recognized by religion as such is not excellence at all. It does not mean that people should ignore other persons' virtues and excellence; nor that they should not recognize others' superiority or refuse to give due respect to them. The virtues and excellence given by Allāh are among the signs of Allāh about which Allāh says: and whoever respects the signs of Allāh, this surely is (the outcome) of the piety of hearts (22:32). Accordingly, it is incumbent on an ignorant one to submit to a scholar, to accord him respect, as in this way he shall be following the truth. Allāh has said: Say: ''Are those who know and those who do not know alike?'' (39:9). At the same time, the scholar is not allowed to brag of his knowledge or to indulge in self-praise. The same applies to all genuine human virtues.

Second: Some of our 'research scholars', following a western ideology, have written that self-reliance is a valuable human virtue. But it is something that religion does not recognize, nor does it conform to the Qur'ānic taste. What the Qur'ān teaches on this subject is reliance on Allāh, getting strength from Allāh. The Qur'ān says: Those to whom the people said: ''Surely men have gathered against you, therefore fear them''; but this only increased their faith, and they said: ''Allāh is sufficient for us and most excellent Protector is (He) (3:174); that the power is wholly Allāh's (2:165); surely might is wholly Allāh's (10:65). There are many verses of the same connotation.

QUR'ĀN: See how they forge the lie against Allāh, and this is sufficient as a manifest sin: Their self-praising — that they were children of God, and His beloveds and friends, etc. — is a lie against Allāh, as Allāh has not given them such distinction. Moreover, attribution of an excellence to oneself is in itself a lie against Allāh, even if the claim be true, (as was described above); because it is tantamount to associating oneself with Allāh, while He has no associate or partner in His Kingdom, as the Qur'ān says: and He has not a partner in the Kingdom (17:111).

Even if there were no evil other than its being a lie against Allāh, it would have been enough as a manifest sin. It is absolutely appropriate to call it a sin. Sin is a condemnable act which prevents man — or delays him — from achieving goodness; and this disobedience is a branch of polytheism which keeps man away from divine mercy. The same condition prevails in polytheism which throws man into disbelief. Compare the clause under discussion with the preceding verse, where the declaration, ‘‘Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing be associated with Him, ...’’, has been followed by the clause, ‘‘and whoever associates any thing with Allāh, he devises (or, forges) indeed a great sin.’’

QUR’ĀN: Have you not seen those to whom a portion of the Book was given? They believe in idols and false deities ...: ‘‘al-Jibt’’ (اَلْجِبْتُ = translated here as idol) and ‘‘al-jibs’’ (اَلْجِبْسُ) means a thing which has no good in it. It has also been interpreted as ‘any thing that is worshipped other than Allāh’. ‘‘aṭ-Ṭāghūt’’ (اَلطَّاغُوتُ = translated here as false deity) is, like ‘‘aṭ-ṭughyān’’ (اَلطُّغْيَانُ = to exceed proper limits; oppression) a maṣdar which is generally used as an active particle. This too is said to mean anything which is worshipped other than Allāh. The verse points to an event in which some People of the Book had supported the unbelievers against the believers, saying that the polytheists’ path was more correct and more straight than that of the believers. They said it while they knew that the believers followed a monotheistic religion revealed in the Qur’ān which verified their own revelation; and that the polytheists believed in idols and false deities. This judgment was an acknowledgement by them that the polytheists had a share in the truth. By assigning truth to idols and false deities they had committed polytheism — they had shown their belief in those false deities which Allāh has accused them of, and then cursed them, saying: ‘‘These are they whom Allāh has cursed ...’’

This supports what has been narrated (about the cause of its revelation) that the Meccan polytheists had asked some People of the Book to adjudge between them and the believers as to whose religion was better; and they had decided in the polytheists’ favour against the believers, as will be narrated under ‘‘Traditions’’.

The verse mentions their having been given a portion of the Book, to put more emphasis on their condemnation. They were supposed to be scholars of the Book which had exposed the falsity of idols, etc.; what could be more abominable, more disgraceful for such people than believing in idols and false deities?

QUR'ĀN: Or have they a share in the Kingdom? ... speck in the date-stone.: ''an-Naqīr'' (اَلنَّقِيْرُ) on paradigm of fa'īl, has the connotation of ''al-manqūr'' (اَلْمَنْقُوْرُ = tiny amount pecked from earth by a bird). Its another meaning has been written earlier under verse 49.

Some exegetes have said that the particle 'or' is unrelated to the preceding sentences. It therefore means 'rather'; and the interrogative implies refutation. The meaning: Rather, do they have a share in the kingdom? That is, they do not have any share.

Others have said that 'or' alludes to a deleted but understood clause. The meaning: Do they have more right of prophethood, or do they have a share in the kingdom? But it has been rebutted by others, saying that such deletion is allowed only in poetry, because of restrictions of meter; and there is no such limitation in the Qur'ān.

Apparently, 'or' is related; and the omitted alternative is the one to which the preceding verse (Have you not seen those to whom a portion of the Book was given?) points. The meaning therefore will be as follows: Do they have right to judge in any way they like, or do they have a share in the kingdom, or do they envy the people? This interpretation shows that all three questions are well-connected and the speech well-organized.

Kingdom denotes authority over material and spiritual affairs. It encompasses the 'kingdom' of prophethood, mastership and guidance, as well as that of people and property. This comprehensiveness is inferred from the preceding and following sentences. The preceding verse points to their claim that they could issue judgment against the believers; in other words, they had authority over spiritual matters. The ending clause,''But then they would not give to people even the speck in the date-stone'', refers to control over material things (or over all things including material ones). Therefore, ''the kingdom'' in the verse covers both material and spiritual authority.

The meaning, therefore, will be as follows: Do they have any share in the kingdom of prophethood, mastership and guidance, etc., which Allāh has bestowed on His Prophet? Had it been so, they, because of their miserliness and evil nature, would not have given to the people even insignificant and worthless things. It is nearer in meaning to the verse 17:100; Say: ''If you control the treasure of the mercy of my Lord, then you would withhold (them) from fear of spending.''

QUR'ĀN: Or do they envy the people for what Allāh has given them of His grace?: It is the last of the three alternatives. The question is addressed to the Jews refuting their statement that the religion of polytheists was better guided and more upright than that of the believers'.

In this context ''the people'' refers to the believers; and ''... what Allāh has given them of His grace'' to the prophethood, the Book and the religious knowledge and realities. But the next sentence, So indeed We have given to Ibrāhīm's progeny the Book and the wisdom ..., restricts the word, 'people', to the progeny of Ibrāhīm; thus ''the people'' would mean the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); because whatever divine grace, mentioned in the verse, was given to others, had come through him and by his blessings. It was already explained under the verse, Surely Allāh chose Ādam and Nūḥ and the descendants of Ibrāhīm ... (3:33), that ''the descendants of Ibrāhīm'' refers to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and his progeny.

There is no difficulty in using the word 'people' for a single person, as it is a usual style of allusion. You say to someone who always gives you trouble: Why do you trouble people? What have you got to do with people? By the word 'people', you mean your own self.

QUR'ĀN: So indeed We have given to Ibrāhīm's progeny the Book and the wisdom: The sentence makes them despair in their envy, cutting off all hopes that this divine grace might be removed from Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), that this bounty might be taken back. Allāh has already given to Ibrāhīm's descendants whatever He intended to give them of His grace, bestowed on them of His mercy as He was pleased to. Now, let them die in their desperation; their envy will not avail them anything. It shows that Ibrāhīm's descendants may mean either the Prophet and his progeny (from among the descendants of Ismā'īl) or all his descendants through Ismā'īl and Isḥāq, in order that it may include the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) who was the one envied by the Jews. But it cannot mean the Children of Israel from among Ibrāhīm's descendants; otherwise, the speech will become topsy-turvy, confirming the Jews in their envy of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), or of the believers (as the Prophet was among them). Obviously it would ruin the whole argument.

Also it is obvious from this sentence, as we have written above, that the envied people are from the progeny of Ibrāhīm, and it supports the view that the word, ''the people'', refers to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). As for the believers, not all of them were from the progeny of Ibrāhīm, nor was there any superiority for the believers of his progeny over those who were not his descendants. The verse therefore cannot be applied to the believers. Also, mere believing in, and following, the religion of Ibrāhīm does not entitle the believers to be named, ‘‘descendants of Ibrāhīm’’. Likewise, the verse, Most surely the nearest of people to Ibrāhīm are those who followed him and this Prophet and those who believe (3:68), shows the nearness of the believers to Ibrāhīm, but does not make them his descendants. Rather, by referring to them as those who followed him, (and not as his progeny), it proves that unrelated believers cannot be called as ‘‘descendants of Ibrāhīm’’.

The Ibrāhīm’s progeny, therefore, refers either to the Prophet alone, or to him together with his (Prophet’s) progeny and his grandfather, Ismā‘īl and others like him.

QUR’ĀN: and We have given them a grand Kingdom: It has already been explained that, in the light of the context, the kingdom here has a comprehensive meaning which encompasses spiritual authority including prophethood and real mastership over the people’s guidance. It should be kept in mind that Allāh does not attribute grandness and greatness to worldly kingdom if it does not lead to spiritual superiority or religious excellence.

This interpretation is also supported by the fact that Allāh has not mentioned prophethood and mastership when enumerating His grace to the progeny of Ibrāhīm (So indeed We have given to Ibrāhīm’s progeny the Book and the wisdom). It makes it certain that the prophethood and the mastership are included in the comprehensive term, ‘‘grand kingdom’’.

QUR’ĀN: So of them is he who believes in him, and of them is he who turns away from him: As translated here, the contrast between the two sides is clear and needs no further elaboration. But the latter clause may also be translated as follows: and of them is he who prevents (others) from (believing in) him. In that case, it would indicate that the Jews were not satisfied with just refusing to believe in Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.); they endeavoured their utmost to hinder people from coming to the way of Allāh and believing in the revelation sent to the Prophet.

QUR'ĀN: and hell is sufficient to burn ...: It threatens them with burning in hell because they prevented people from believing in the Divine Book, and started the fire of mischief against the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the believers.

Then Allāh describes as to how the hell is sufficient for them; He says: (As for) those who disbelieve in Our signs, We shall make them enter fire. It goes on giving a description of their burning which also gives its reason It is followed by the verse, And (as for) those who believe and do good deeds, We will make them enter garden ... Thus the contradistinction between the two groups — those who believe in him and those who turn away, and hinder others, from him — becomes crystal clear; showing that they are poles apart so far as the happiness and unhappiness of the life hereafter is concerned; for one group are the gardens and their dense shade; for the other, blazing fire of the hell and roasting in it — May Allāh protect us from it.

The meaning of the verses is quite clear.

QUR'ĀN: Surely Allāh commands you to make over trusts to their owners and that when you judge between people you judge with justice; ...: The second clause, ''and when you judge ...'', has a clear connection with the preceding verses. The divine speech in those verses revolves around the Jews' judgment that the polytheists were better guided in path than the believers. Allāh had mentioned in that verse that they were given a portion of the Book; and the Book clearly explains the divine signs and religious realities. It was a divine trust for which God had made them promise that they would teach it to people and not hide it from eligible persons.

These associations support the view that the word, 'trusts', has a wider meaning that covers material as well as spiritual trusts like true divine knowledge whose scholars are obliged to convey it to deserving persons.

In short, the Jews betrayed the divine trust they were entrusted with, i.e., they hide the knowledge of monotheism and the prophecies of Muḥammad's advent, and did not disclose them when the time came. Not only that, they perverted justice when they adjudged between the believers and the polytheists, deciding in favour of idolatry against monotheism. Because of all this perfidy, they were cursed by Allāh and it pushed them to the blazing fire of hell. Now, the style changes from first person to third person, commanding people to hand over the trusts to their rightful owners and to do justice in judgment. ‘‘Surely Allāh commands you to make over trusts to their owners and that when you judge between people you judge with justice; ...’’

Of course, here we have extended the meaning of handing back the trust and deciding with justice; but it was done because of the context, as you have seen.

Objection: It is a deviation from the apparent meanings of trust and judgment. What one immediately understands from this verse is that it ordains two laws — obligation of handing back trusts to their owners and of a qāḍī to judge with justice.

Reply: General legislation cannot be restricted to the rules of fiqh (Islamic jurisprudence). For example, the Qur’ān has given general order making it obligatory to make over trusts and to do justice while giving judgment. A jurisprudent infers from it the laws concerning monetary trust and judgment of cases. Likewise, a scholar of theology finds in it reference to fundamentals of religion; and so on.

TRADITIONS

Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Bayhaqī (in his ad-Dalā’il) have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘Rifā‘ah ibn Zayd ibn at-Tābūt was one of the Jewish leaders; when talking to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), he used to twist his tongue, and say: ‘Give us your ear, O Muḥammad! so that we may explain to you.’ Then he attacked Islam and criticised it. So Allāh revealed about him: Have you not seen those to whom a portion of the Book was given?... so they shall not believe but a little’’. (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from as-Suddī, that he said about the verse, O you who have been given the Book! believe ...: ‘‘It was revealed about Mālik ibn as-Sayf and Rifā‘ah ibn Zayd ibn at-Tābūt from Banū Qaynuqā‘.’’ (ibid.)

Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Bayhaqī (in his ad Dalā’il) have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had a talk with some great Jewish rabbis including ‘Abdullāh ibn Sūriyā and Ka‘b ibn Asad. He said to them: ‘O Jewish people! Fear Allāh and accept Islam; for, by God! you surely know that what I have brought to you is certainly true.’ They said: ‘We do not know it, O Muḥammad!’ Then Allāh revealed about them: O you who have been given the Book! believe that which We have revealed ...,’’ (ibid.)

The author says: Obviously the noble verses were revealed about the Jews (among the People of the Book), as has been explained earlier. But the above-quoted reasons of revelation are no more than attempts to apply the verses to some known persons — as is the case with most of traditions purporting to give reason of revelation; and Allāh knows better.

an-Nu‘mānī has narrated through his chain from Jābir a long ḥadīth from al-Bāqir (a.s.), describing the uprising of as-Sufyānī, which inter cilia says: ‘‘And the commander of as-Sufyānī’s army will come down in a desert; and a caller will call from the heaven: ‘O desert! destroy these people.’ So they will be sunk into ground, and none will escape except three persons; Allāh will turn their faces to their back-side; and they will be from (the tribe of) Kalb. It is about them that the verse was revealed: O you who have been given the Book! believe that which We have revealed, verifying what you have, before We alter faces then turn them on their backs, ...’’ (Tafsīr al-Burhān).

The author says: A similar tradition has been narrated by al-Mufīd through his chain from Jābir from al-Bāqir (a.s.).

[aṣ-Ṣadūq] has narrated through his chains from Thuwayr from his father that ‘Alī (a.s.) said: ‘‘No Qur’ānic verse is dearer to me than the words of [Allāh] the Mighty, the Great: Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases.’’ (Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l faqīh).

The author says: [as-Suyūṭī] has narrated it in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from al-Fariyābī and at-Tirmidhī (who has said that it was a ‘good’ tradition) from ‘Alī (a.s.).

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from Ibn ‘Umar that he said: ‘‘When the verse was revealed: Say: ‘O my servants! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allāh, surely Allāh forgives the faults altogether ...’ [39:53], a man stood up and said: ‘And polytheism? O Prophet of Allāh!’ The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) disliked that (question); and then said: Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him ...’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibnu’l-Mundhir has narrated from Abū Mijlaz that he said: ‘‘When the verse was revealed, Say: ‘O my servants! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls ...’, the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) stood on the pulpit and recited it before the people. A man stood up and said: ‘And associating something with Allāh?’ [The Prophet] remained silent. [This happened] two or three times. Then this verse was revealed: Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases ... But that was included in [the chapter of] az-Zumar [The Companies] and this in an-Nisā’ [The Women].’’ (ibid.)

The author says: It has already been explained that the verse of az-Zumar [39:53], in the context of the verses following it, clearly speaks about forgiveness through repentance. There is no doubt that repentance erases all sins including polytheism; and the verse under discussion [4:48] deals with something other than repentance. There is no contradiction between the two, and there is no reason to suppose that either of them abrogates or restricts the other.

There is a tradition on this verse in Majma‘u ’l-bayān, narrated from al-Kalbī which says: ‘‘It was revealed about certain polytheists, Waḥshī and his companions. It so happened that when he killed Ḥamzah — and he was promised emancipation in exchange of Ḥamzah’s murder, which was not fulfilled. When he came (back) to Mecca, he felt remorse for his action — he and his companions. So they wrote to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.): ‘We are sorry for what we have done; and nothing prevents us from (accepting) Islam except that we had heard you saying when you were at Mecca: And they who do not call upon another god with Allāh and do not slay the soul which Allāh has forbidden except in the requirements of justice, and (who) do not commit fornication, and he who does this shall find a requital of sin ... [25:68]. But we have called upon another god with Allāh, and killed the soul which Allāh had forbidden, and committed fornication.Had there not been this snag, we would certainly have followed you.' Thereupon the following [two verses] were revealed: Except him who repents and believes and does a good deed ... he surely turns to Allāh a (goodly) turning (25:70 — 71)

''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) sent these (verses) to Waḥshī and his companions. On reading it, they wrote back to him, 'This is a tough condition indeed; we are afraid that we might not do a good deed and, thus, might not be among the people of this verse.' Then the verse was revealed: Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases ... The Prophet sent it to them; they read it and (again) wrote to him, 'We are afraid that we might not be among the people (worthy) of His pleasure.' Then came down the verse: Say: 'O my servants! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allāh; surely Allāh forgives the faults altogether.' [39:53]. [The Prophet] sent it to them. When they read it, he and his companions entered into the fold of Islam, returned to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and he accepted from them [their conversion to Islam]. Then he said to Waḥshī: 'Tell me how did you slay Ḥamzah?' When he informed him, [the Prophet] said: 'Woe unto thee! Hide yourself from me.' Therefore, Waḥshī went away to Syria and remained there until he died.''

The author says: Also ar-Rāzī has quoted it in his Tafsīr from Ibn 'Abbās. If one ponders on the contexts of the verses which this tradition alleges the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) to go on writing to Waḥshī, he will have no doubt that the 'tradition' was certainly a forgery. The forger wanted people to believe that Waḥshī and his companions were forgiven in advance even if they were to commit every big and small sin. He picked up various Qur'ānic verses from different places, taking an excepted clause from one place, and a general one from another; while each verse has a separate context of its own, and is insepararable from its preceding and following verses with which it is interlinked, and cannot be looked at in isolation. But the forger dissected and re-arranged them in such a way as to suit this astonishing bargaining between the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and Waḥshī. An exegete has aptly commented on this tradition: ‘‘It looks as if they want to prove that Allāh, Glorified be He, was flirting with, Waḥshī!’’

The forger’s only motive was to glorify Waḥshī with an unprecedented excellence — a firm and irrevocable forgiveness which could not be affected by any sin he chose to commit, any depravity he decided to indulge in. This would result in abolition of punishments for sins; in other words, it would abrogate all system of sharī‘ah, freeing mankind from all responsibilities, as the Christians think. Rather it would be more ignominious, because the Christians have abolished the sharī‘ah in exchange of the sacrifice of a person like Jesus Christ, while this forger wants to abolish it just in compliance with Waḥshī’s desire.

This Waḥshī was a slave of Ibn Muṭ‘im; he killed Ḥamzah at Uḥud and went back to Mecca. When Ṭā’if was conquered [after the conquest of Mecca], he accepted Islam; but the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) told him, ‘‘Hide yourself from me.’’ He went to Syria and lived at Ḥimṣ. During the reign of ‘Umar he was employed as an account clerk, but was dismissed because of his alcoholism, for which he was flogged several times. He died during the reign of ‘Uthmān, reportedly of alcoholism.

Ibn ‘Abdi ’1-Barr has narrated through his chain from Ibn Isḥāq, from ‘Abdullāh ibn al-Faḍl, from Sulaymān ibn Yasār, from Ja‘far ibn ‘Amr ibn Umayyah aḍ-Ḍamrī that he said: ‘‘I went out (on a journey) with ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Adiyy; we passed through Ḥimṣ, and Waḥshī was there. We thought, why not go to him and ask him how he had killed Ḥamzah. We met someone while we were enquiring about him. That man said, ‘He is a man worsted by liquor; if you find him in sober condition you will find him an eloquent person who will tell you whatever you want from him; but if you find him in another condition, leave him alone.’ So we proceded until we came to him.’’ (The report continues with description of Waḥshī’s killing of Ḥamzah in the battle of Uḥud.) (al-Istī‘āb).

Muṭrif ibn Shakhīr narrates from ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb that he said: ‘‘In the days of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), when one of us died commiting a major sin, we used to testify that he was among the inmates of fire; until this verse was revealed — then we refrained from (such) testimonies.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

Ibnu 'l-Mundhir has narrated through al-Mu'tamar ibn Sulaymān from Sulaymān ibn 'Utbah al-Bāriqī that he said: ''Ismā'īl ibn Thawbān told us, 'I went to the mosque before the great plaque, and heard them saying: And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his punishment is hell;... [4:93]. The Emigrants and the Helpers then said, ''Hell is firmly decreed for him.'' But when the verse [4:48] was revealed: Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases; they said, ''Whatever God intends; Allāh does what He pleases.'' ' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: Also a nearly similar tradition has been narrated from Ibn 'Umar through several chains. But there is something wrong in all these traditions. We do not think that the companions of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) in general were so ignorant as not to understand that this verse (Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases) adds nothing new to the verses of intercession, as was described earlier. Nor could they be oblivious of the fact that most of the verses of intercession were long ago revealed at Mecca. For example,And those who they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (43:86). Likewise, there are verses in chapters 10, 20, 21, 34, 53 and 74; all of them are of the Meccan period and all prove intercession, as explained earlier. These verses cover all sins; they lay down only two conditions: One on the part of the candidate of intercession, that he should be following the religion approved by Allāh, that is, monotheism and rejection of polytheism; the other on the side of Allāh that He forgives whomsoever He pleases. In short, they say that divine forgiveness encompasses all sins (except polytheism) depending on the pleasure of Allāh. This is exactly what this verse says: Surely Allāh does not forgive that ... and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases.

Now we come to those verses which threaten one who kills a believer without legal justification, or eats interest, or misbehaves towards relatives, with abiding punishment of fire. For example, And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his punishment is hell; he shall abide in it, and Allāh will send His wrath on him ... (4:93); about interest: ... and whoever returns (to it) — these are the inmates of fire; they shall abide in it (2:275); about those who cut asunder the relationship: ... upon them shall be curse and they shall have the evil (issue) of the abode (13:25). There are other verses of the same import; and all of them issue threat of evil consequences of sin and mention the hell as the recompense. Yet there is no clear declaration in them that it is a firmly-decreed punishment which cannot be changed or waived.

In short, the verse under discussion (4:48) does not contain anything more than the verses of intercession; and there was no reason for the companions to behave in the way they are reported to do. They could not have thought that the verses of major sins ordained irrevocable punishment of fire, so that they could testify for a perpetrator of a major sin that he was among the inmates of fire. Nor was it possible for them to understand from the verse 4:48 (the verse of forgiveness) what they had not already understood from the verses of intercession. How could they say that this verse had abrogated or restricted the verses of major sins?

Even one of these traditions gives the same indication. as-Suyūṭī has narrated from Ibnu ’ḍ-Ḍurays, Abū Ya‘lā, Ibnu ’1-Mundhir and Ibn ‘Adiyy, through correct chains from Ibn ‘Umar that he said: ‘‘We used to refrain from asking (from Allāh) forgiveness for perpetrators of major sins, until we heard from our Prophet (s.a.w.a.), Surely Allāh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases. And he (the Prophet, s.a.w.a.) said, ‘I have saved my prayer (and) my intercession for the people of major sins of my ummah.’ Therefore, we stopped from many things that were in our minds, and we talked and entertained hope (for sinners).’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr).

This tradition apparently shows that the companions understood the same thing from the verse of forgiveness which they did from the ḥadīth of intercession. Yet one question remains: How was it that they understood the possibility of forgiveness for major sins from the ḥadīth of intercession, but had not understood the same from the Meccan verses of intercession, in spite of their numerousness, and clarity of meaning, when they were revealed years ago? I don’t know.

There is a tradition about the verse, Have you not seen those to whom a portion of the Book was given? ... better guided in the path than those who believe, narrated by al-Bayhaqī (in the ad-Dalā'il) and Ibn ‘Asākir (in his at-Tārīkh)from Jābir ibn ‘Abdillāh that he said, ‘‘When the affairs of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) reached the stage they did, Ka‘b ibn al-Ashraf withdrew himself and arriving at Mecca stayed there and said, ‘I will not help (anyone) against him (i.e., the Prophet) nor will I fight him.’ He was asked in Mecca, ‘O Ka‘b! Is our religion better, or that of Muḥammad and his companions?’ He replied, ‘Your religion is better and older, while Muḥammad’s religion is new.’ Then the verse was revealed about him: Have you not seen those to whom a portion of the Book was given? ...’’ (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: There are various traditions giving the reason of its revelation in different ways, the soundest of which is the above-quoted one. But all agree on the basic fact, that some Jews had delivered judgment in favour of the Quraysh against the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that the former’s religion was better than the Tatter’s.

ash-Shaykh has narrated through his chain from Jābir about the verse, Or do they envy the people for what Allāh has given them of His grace?, that al-Bāqir (a.s.) has said, ‘‘We are the people.’’ (Tafsīr al-Burhān)

[al-Kulaynī] has narrated through his chain from Barīd that al-Bāqir (a.s.) said in a ḥadīth, inter alia, about this verse, ‘‘We are the envied people.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The author says: This meaning has been narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) through numerous, nearly mutawātir chains, which are found in the books of Shī‘ite tradition, like al-Kāfī, at-Tahdhīb, Ma‘āni 'l-akhbār, Baṣā'iru 'd-darajāt, at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī, al-‘Ayyāshī and others.

There are also traditions from the Sunnī chains which give the same meaning. Ibnu 'l-Maghāzilī has narrated a marfū‘ ḥadīth from Muḥammad ibn ‘Alī al-Bāqir (peace be on both) that he said about this verse: ‘‘We are the people, by God!’’ as-Suyūṭī has narrated from Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and aṭ-Ṭabarānī through ‘Aṭā’ that Ibn ‘Abbās said about this verse, ‘‘We are the people, to the exclusion of (other) people.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The same book narrates from 'Ikrimah, Mujāhid, Muqātil and Abū Mālik that ''the people'' means the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). We have explained that apparently ''the people'' refers to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); and that his Ahlu 'l-bayt are joined to him.

Ḥumrān has narrated about the verse, So indeed We have given to Ibrāhīm's progeny the Book and the wisdom, and We gave them a grand kingdom, that al-Bāqir (a.s.) has said: ''The Book means 'prophethood'; the Wisdom refers to 'understanding and judgment'; and the grand Kingdom is 'obedience'. (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī).

The author says: Obedience means their obedience which is obligatory on the ummah, as has been explained in traditions. There are a lot of aḥādīth giving this interpretation; some of which explain the 'obligatory obedience' as the Imāmate and Caliphate, see for example the one given in al-Kāfī through Barīd from al-Bāqir (as.).

The verse, (As for) those who disbelieve in Our signs ...: al-Qummī writes in his at-Tafsīr that the 'signs' are the Leader of the faithful and the Imāms, peace be on them all.

The author says: It is based on the principle of the flow of the Qur'ān.

[ash-Shaykh] has narrated through his chain from Ḥafṣ ibn Ghiyāth al-Qāḍī that he said: ''I was in the presence of the noblest of all Ja'fars, [that is] Ja'far ibn Muḥammad (peace be on both) when he was (forcibly) brought (to Kūfah from Medina) by al-Manṣūr. Then Ibn Abi'l-'Awjā', an atheist, came to him and said, 'What do you say about this verse: so oft as their skins are thoroughly burned, We will change for them other skins, that they may taste the chastisement? Suppose these skins had disobeyed and were therefore punished; but what about the other (skins)?' Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) said, 'Woe unto thee! It is the same and (yet) it is another.' (Ibn Abi 'l-'Awjā') said, 'I do not understand this reply.' Then he (the Imām, a.s.) said, 'Suppose a man takes a brick, and breaks it; then pours water on it, kneads it and returns it to its former shape. Isn't it the same (brick) and yet another?' He said, 'Certainly. May Allāh let (us) benefit from you!' '' (al-Majālis).

The author says: It has also been narrated in al-Iḥtijāj, through Ḥafṣ ibn Ghiyāth from him (a.s.); al-Qummī too has reported it without chains in his at-Tafsīr. The reply points to the fact that with preservation of the form, the matter remains the same; man's body, like its various organs and limbs, remains the same as long as the man is the same — even if there happen to be some changes in the body.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked about the words of Allāh: they shall have therein pure mates. He said, ''Pure mates are those who do not menstruate nor do they drop excrement.'' (Man lā yaḥḍuruhu'l-faqīh).

It is narrated from Muḥammad ibn Ibrāhīm an-Nu'mānī through his chain from Zurārah that he asked Abū Ja'far Muḥammad ibn 'Alī (peace be on both) about the words of Allāh: Surely Allāh commands you to make over trusts to their owners and that when you judge between the people you judge with justice. (The Imām, a.s.) said, ''Allāh has commanded the Imām to hand over the trust [i.e., the imāmate] to the [next] Imām coming after him; he has no right to keep it from him. Do you not hear the words of Allāh, and that when you judge between the people you judge with justice; surely Allāh admonishes you with what is excellent? They are the judges, O Zurārah! [Allāh] has addressed it to the judges.''

The author says: The former part of the ḥadīth is narrated from the Imāms (a.s.) through numerous chains. The latter part shows that this interpretation is based on the flow of the Qur'ān; and that the verse has been revealed concerning general administration of justice and giving everyone his due right. Consequently, it is applicable also to the Imāmate as explained earlier.

A similar interpretation has been narrated [by as-Suyūṭī] from Sa'īd ibn Manṣūr, al-Fariyābī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, and Ibn Abī Ḥātim from 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib that he said: ''It is incumbent on the Imām to judge according to what Allāh has revealed and to hand over the trusts. When he does so, then it is incumbent on people to listen to him, to obey him and to answer when they are called.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

O you who believe! obey Allāh and the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you; then if you quarrel about any thing, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger if you believe in Allāh and the last day; this is better and very good in the end (59). Have you not observed those who think that they believe in what has been revealed to you and what was revealed before you? They desire to resort to the judgment of ṭāghūt (Satan), though they were commanded to deny him, and the Satan desires to lead them astray into a far-reaching error (60). And when it is said to them: ''Come to what Allāh has revealed and to the Messenger'', you will see the hypocrites turning away from you with (utter) aversion (61). But how will it be when misfortune befalls them on account of what their hands have sent before? Then will they come to you swearing by Allāh: We did not desire (any thing) but good and concord (62). These are they of whom Allāh knows what is in their hearts; therefore turn aside from them and admonish them, and speak to them effectual words concerning themselves (63). And We did not send any messenger but that he should be obeyed by Allāh's permission; and had they, when they were unjust to themselves, come to you and asked forgiveness of Allāh and the Messenger had (also) asked forgiveness for them, they would have found Allāh Oftreturning (to mercy), Merciful (64). But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then do not find any straitness in their hearts as to what you have decided and submit with total submission (65). And if We had prescribed for them:

Kill yourselves or go forth from your homes, they would not have done it except a few of them; and if they had done what they were admonished, it would have certainly been better for them and most efficacious in strengthening (them) (66); And then We would certainly have given them from Ourselves a great reward (67); And We would certainly have guided them in the straight path (68). And whoever obeys Allāh and the Messenger, these are with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favours from among the prophets and the truthful and the witnesses and the good ones; and excellent are these as companion (69). This is grace from Allāh, and sufficient is Allāh as the Knower (70).

COMMENTARY

As you may see, the verses are not without some connection with the preceding ones. Beginning from the words, And worship Allāh and do not associate any thing with Him ... [4:36], the whole speech is directed towards exhorting people to spend in the way of Allāh for strengthening all classes of society and fulfilling the believers' need; and condemning those who refrain, and prevent others, from discharging this obligation; then comes this call to obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority, cutting out the roots of discord and avoiding dispute and disagreement; advising them to refer all disputes — if there be any — to Allāh and His Messenger; they should guard themselves against hypocritical behaviour, and must surrender to the decisions of Allāh and His Messenger. This tenor continues until it arrives at verses calling for jihād, explaining its underlying reason and ordering the believers to band together in the way of Allāh. All these prepare the believers for fighting in Allāh's way, and put their internal affairs in good shape on a sound basis. Here and there one or two verses have been revealed in a parenthetical style which have no adverse effect on continuity of speech, as was pointed out under the verse 43: O you who believe! do not go near prayer when you are intoxicated ...

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you;: After calling the people to worship Allāh alone, and do good to various groups of believers, and condemning those who cast aspersions on this idea or prevent others from Allāh's way, the talk again turns to the basic theme from a different angle, from which grow up other branches. It leads to reinforcing the foundation of Islamic society, as it exhorts and urges the believers to preserve their unity and to remove every type of dispute or discord by referring it to Allāh and His Messenger.

Undoubtedly, the sentence, ''obey Allāh and obey the Messenger'', paves the way for the next order to refer all quarrels to Allāh and His Messenger, although the sentence is in fact the basis of all divine laws and sharī'ah. It is obvious from the order, then if you quarrel about anything, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger, which emanates from this origin; then the speech repeatedly turns to the same theme, as it goes on saying, Have you not observed those who think that they believe in what has been revealed to you ...; then again says: And We did not send any messenger but that he should be obeyed by Allāh's permission; then says: But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them,...

There should be no doubt whatsoever that when Allāh tells us to obey Him, it means that we must obey Him in all the realities and laws which He has sent to us through His Messenger. As for His Messenger, his orders emanate from either of his two lawful authorities: First: His legislative authority based on divine revelation other than the Qur'ān. By this authority, he teaches the people details of what is mentioned in general terms in the Qur'ān, and explains all the related matters. Allāh says: and We have revealed to you the Reminder that you may make clear to them what has been revealed to them (16:44). Second: What he, in his wisdom, decides in administrative and judicial matters by the authourity given him by God. Allāh says: ... that you may judge between people by means of that which Allāh has taught [lit. shown] you; (4:105). It is the opinion with which he used to judge between people according to the laid down judicial laws; and it is the decision he used to take in important affairs. Allāh had told him to consult the people seeking their advice: and take counsel with them in the affair; but when you have decided, then place your trust in Allāh (3:159). Thus the people would participate in consultation; but the decision would be of the Prophet alone.

The above discourse shows that the Messenger's obedience has a connotation distinct from Allāh's obedience, although the Messenger's obedience is in reality the obedience of Allāh Himself, because it is Allāh who has obliged the people to obey the Messenger, as He has said: And We did not send any messenger but that he should be obeyed by Allāh's permission. People have to obey the Messenger in what he explains by divine revelation and in what he decides and orders by his divine wisdom.

It is this variation of connotation which has necessitated repetition of the order of obedience: ''obey Allāh and obey the Messenger''. (And Allāh knows better.) This repetition, however, is not for emphasis, as the exegetes have opined. Had the intention been of emphasis, it would have been more appropriate not to repeat; it would have been more to the point to say, obey Allāh and the Messenger, as it would have implied that obedience of the Messenger is one with the obedience of Allāh; after all, not every repetition shows emphasis.

However, the ''ulu 'l-amr'' (أولو الأمْر = those vested with authority) — whoever they might be — do not have the privilage of revelation; they decide and act according to what is right in their opinion; and their opinion and order must be obeyed just like the Prophet's opinion and order. That is the reason why Allāh has not mentioned them when He orders the believers to refer their disputes to Allāh and the Messenger. He says: then if you quarrel about any thing, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger if you believe in Allāh and the last day. The people thus ordered are the believers, because the verse begins with the address, ''O you who believe!'' and the quarrel mentioned here must be an internal dispute among the believers. We cannot suppose that the believers would quarrel with those who are vested with authority when they are obligated to obey them. So this quarrel must be among the believers themselves, and it cannot be in matters of orders issued by those vested with authority ;[1] rather it has to be about identification of Allāh's command in a particular affair, as may be inferred from the next verses which condemn those who resort to the judgment of ṭāghūt, preferring it to the judgment of Allāh and His Messenger. A believer must resort in such matters to the religious laws laid down in the Qur'ān and the sunnah; and both the Qur'ān and the sunnah are final proofs in all affairs, for him who has the ability to understand the law from them. When the ulu 'l-amr say that this is what the Qur'ān and the sunnah say on this matter, all argument has to stop. When they talk, theirs is the final word, because the verse makes their obedience compulsory without any restriction or condition; and finally every affair returns to the Book of Allāh and the sunnah.

[1] Islam's history belies the assumption that the believers would not quarrel with those vested with authority. What was the reason of all the disputes, wars, bloodshed, oppressions and tortures which have stained the

It shows that the people with authority — whoever they might be — have no authority to legislate a new law or to abrogate a rule established by the Qur'ān or the sunnah. Otherwise, it would serve no purpose to order people to refer their dispute to the Qur'ān and the sunnah, to Allāh and the Messenger, as may be inferred from the verse 36 of chapter 33: And it is not for a believing man or a believing woman to have any choice in their affair when Allāh and His Messenger have decided a matter; and whoever disobeys Allāh and His Messenger, he surely strays off a manifest straying. Allāh decides by giving a law; His Messenger decides by elaborating a divine law, giving an order or pronouncing a judgment. As for the persons vested with authority, they have the power, in executive matters, to decide according to their discretion, and in judicial and general matters, to bring to light the decisions of Allāh and His Messenger.

In short, as the ulu 'l-amr have no power of legislation, nor do they have any order other than that which Allāh and His Messenger have given in the Qur'ān and the sunnah, Allāh did not mention them again in pages of Islamic history, right from the departure of the Prophet to this day, if not the Muslims' rebellion against those vested with authority?

Of course, this premises could be justified if we said that the call, O you who believe! was addressed not to the whole Muslim ummah (as is usually the case with this phrase), but to the true believers only who might have attained a higher level of faith. But in that case, the area of the ulu 'l-amr's jurisdiction and authority would be reduced to such an extent as to render this order devoid of any importance. Also if common Muslims were excluded from this address, they would have committed no sin by disobeying the Imāms. (tr.) connection with referral of disputes, when He said: then if you quarrel about any thing, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger. Thus Allāh's obedience is in one category and that of the Messenger and those vested with authority, in another. That is why Allāh has said: ''Obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you''.

Undoubtedly, the obedience, ordered by the words, ''Obey Allāh and obey the Messenger'', is general, without any condition or restriction. It proves that the Messenger cannot issue any order or prohibition contrary to Allāh's actual order or prohibition. Otherwise, making his obedience compulsory would be a contradiction in terms on the part of Allāh; far be it from His sublime presence. It necessarily follows that the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) was ma'ṣūm (infalible), sinless, free from error.

The same argument applies in case of the persons vested with authority. But the presence of al-'iṣmah (اَلْعِصْمَةُ = sinlessness) in the Messenger is independently established by proofs from the reason and the Qur'ān and the sunnah, without depending on this verse. Apparently, it is not the case with the people vested with authority. Someone therefore could imagine that it was not necessary for these people of authority to be ma'ṣūm, sinless, and that the verse could be explained even without believing in their 'iṣmah.

The argument could be put forward as follows: ''This verse ordains a law aimed at the well-being of the ummah, which would protect the Muslim society from internal discord and disunity. It aims at nothing more than what is found in other nations and societies. They give one of their leaders authority to manage their affairs; they pledge to obey him, and his orders are carried out. But they know that he may sometimes contravene the law or err in his judgment. So, when it is clearly known that he was going against the law, he is not obeyed; rather, his error is pointed out to him. But when there is only a possibility — without certainty — that he might be wrong, his orders are obeyed and implemented although in fact he might have decided erroneously. Yet that mistake is tolerated for the sake of maintaining the society's unity, which is more important and would compensate for such mistakes and errors.

''The case of ulu 'l-amr (those vested with authority) mentioned in this verse is not different from other worldly leaders in their authority. Allāh has ordered the believers to obey them. If they give an order contrary to the Qur'ān or the sunnah, it would be invalid and would not be obeyed; the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said: 'No creature is obeyed in disobedience of the Creator.' This meaning has been narrated by the Shī'ahs and Sunnīs both, and also the generality of the verse proves it. If the ulu 'l-amr commit a mistake, and it is definitely known to be a mistake, it would be changed to conform with the Qur'ān and the sunnah; but if there is no certainty of mistake, the order would be carried out as if there was no mistake. It would not do any harm to obey such an order and implement it even if in reality it was wrong, because the preservation of the ummah's unity and continuance of its power and prestige would compensate for such contravention of the actual divine law. It would not be unlike the established dictum of the Principles of Jurisprudence that the decisions derived from apparent proofs of jurisprudence are binding on man even if they are not in accordance with the actual divine order, although the divine order would not be changed by that man-made decision; and the contrariness would be compensated by underlying good of society.

''In short, it is compulsory to obey the ulu 'l-amr, even if they are not sinless, and could commit mistakes and even debauchery. They shall not be obeyed if they indulge in debauchery; they shall be returned to the Qur'ān and the sunnah when it is known that they had deviated from them, but in all other cases, their orders shall be obeyed and their decisions enforced. There is no harm in implementing an order which does not visibly go against actual divine law (even if in reality it does) for the sake of preserving Islamic unity and for the well-being of the Muslim nation.''

COMMENT: If you ponder on what was written earlier, you will realize that this fallacy has no leg to stand on. It is possible to use this 'argument' for restricting the generality of the verse in case of debauchery, by putting forward the above-quoted Prophet's tradition, ''No creature is obeyed in disobedience of the Creator'', or some Qur'ānic verses of the same import, e.g., Surely Allāh does not enjoin indecency (7:28); and other similar verses. Likewise, comparable cases may be quoted for religious obligatoriness of obeying orders which are apparently binding, like obedience of the commanders of expeditions who were appointed by the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), the governors he sent to various places like Mecca or Yemen, or who were left in charge of Medina when he himself went out. Another is the authoritative nature of rnujtahid's ruling for his followers, and so on.

But all this cannot restrict the generality of the verses in any way. Correctness of a theory is one thing, and its being proved by apparent meaning of a Qur'ānic verse is quite another.

The verse proves obligatoriness of these ulu 'l-amr's obedience, without putting any restriction or condition, without attaching any proviso. Nor is there any other Qur'ānic verse to limit its generality. In short, there is nothing to show that the order ''and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you'', implies, 'obey those vested with authority from among you as long as they do not order you to commit a sin or until you are not sure that they are in wrong; but if they tell you to commit a sin, you are not obliged to obey them, and if you are sure of their mistake then correct them by directing their attention to the Qur'ān and the sunnah.' Certainly the Qur'ān's wording does not support this meaning.

Also we should not forget that when ordering people to obey their parents, Allāh has said: And We have enjoined on man goodness to his parents, and if they contend with you that you should associate (others) with Me, of which you have no knowledge, do not obey them ... (29:8). It should be noted that parents' obedience is much less important [and is restricted to their off-spring]; yet Allāh has attached to it such a clear and unambiguous proviso. How is it that He did not attach any such condition in the verse of obedience which deals with a fundamental religious principles, and on which depends the felicity of mankind?

Moreover, the verse has joined the Messenger and ''those vested with authority'' in this order; and mentions both under one obedience: ''Obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you''; and the Messenger cannot order sin nor can he issue a wrong judgment. If it were possible for the ulu 'l-amr to be wrong in an order or a judgment, it was highly essential to put suitable restriction on this order as far as the ulu 'l-amr were concerned. Thus the only way out is to interpret this verse in its general sense without any condition or restriction. This in its turn proves that the ulu 'l-amr were ma'ṣūm, sinless in the same way as the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) was — without any difference.

al-Amr (اَلْاَمْرُ) in the phrase, ulu 'l-amr the religious or temporal affairs of the believers who have been addressed in this verse; as is supported by the verse, and take councel with them in the affair (3:159), or as is said in praise of the pious, and their system is to take councel among themselves (42:38). Although it may possibly be taken to mean order, which is opposite of prohibition, but it will be a far-fetched interpretation.

This word is qualified with the phrase, from among you. Obviously it is an adverbial phrase of place. That is, the ulu 'l-amr will be raised from among you. It is similar to the words of Allāh, He it is who raised among the Meccans a Messenger from among themselves (62:2); or the prayer of Ibrāhīm, Our Lord! and raise up in them a Messenger from among themselves (2:129); or the divine words, if there come to you messengers from among you, relating to you My communications ... (7:35). This explanation leaves no room for the mistaken thought (expressed by someone) that ''from among you'' indicates that those vested with authority would be normal people like us, as they would be one of us, i.e., mere believers without having the distinction of divine 'iṣmah (protection from sins and errors).

Ulu 'l-amr, being a plural noun, shows that there must be a number of those vested with authority, and it is correct without any doubt. But obviously it is possible for them to come one after another, and the believers would be required to obey the one who manages their affairs at a given time. Thus all of them taken together will be collectively entitled to the believers' obedience, as we say, 'Pray your compulsory prayers and obey your superiors and elders.'

Strangely enough, ar-Rāzī has objected to this idea, saying that ''it would mean using a plural for singular and that is contrary to a word's apparant usage.'' It seems he had forgotten that such usage is very common in literature, and the Qur'ān itself is full of such verses. For example, So do not yield to the rejecters (68:8); So do not follow the unbelievers (25:52), surely we obeyed our leaders and our great men (33:67); and do not obey the bidding of the extravagant ones (26:151); Maintain the prayers (2:238); and make yourself gentle to the believers (15:88) and various other verses containing positive and negative statements, and having declarative as well as exclamatory sense.

It would be against the apparent meaning of a wcrd if a plural was used for only a single individual; but it is not against apparent meaning if it is used for a group of individuals, in a way that it turns into a series of numerous orders. For example, we say, 'Honour the scholars of your town'; meaning: Honour this scholar, and honour that scholar, and so on.

Another suggestion: Ulu 'l-amr, who are entitled to unconditional obedience, may be a group — and may thus be referred to with plural sense. It may be an association of many persons each individual counted as a possessor of authority, inasmuch as he has influence over people and his words are obeyed. For example, army commanders, scholars rulers and community elders. The author of al-Manār has suggested that this refers to ahlu 'l-ḥalli wa 'l-'aqd (اَهْلُ الْحَلِّ وَ الْعَقْدِ = lit. those who tie and untie; i.e., people having influence and authority), who are trusted by the ummah; including scholars, military commanders, leaders in fields of commerce, industry and agriculture, as well as trade-unionists, political leaders, and chief editors of influential newspapers. This is what we mean when we say that ulu 'l-amr means people of influence and authority. It is a collective body of the leaders of the ummah.

COMMENT: The problem is that the complete verse cannot be explained in the light of this suggestion.

As you have seen, the verse proves the sinlessness of the ulu 'l-amr; and even those who support the above suggestion, have to admit that the verse confirms their sinlessness.

The question arises: Who among this body of influential persons is sinless? Is each of its members sinless, so that the collective body could be called sinless? Because a group is but the sum total of the individuals. But it is evident that there never was in this ummah, even for a single day, a group of influential people who had authority to jointly manage the Muslim's affairs and whose every member was sinless and free from error. Obviously, it is impossible for Allāh to order us to obey a group which had never existed in reality.

Or does it mean that sinlessness, a real attribute, exists in that collective body as an adjective exists in its qualified noun? Although each individual member may commit sins, and in common with all other human beings can indulge in polytheism and disobedience, and although the opinion he forms may be erroneous or may lead to sin and straying, but when the said body collectively reaches at a decision it remains safe from mistakes and errors — because the collective body is sinless. But this too is impossible. How can a real attribute, that is, sinlessness, exist in an abstract idea, i.e., the collective body? A real attribute cannot stand in a mentally posited idea.

Or, does it mean that sinlessness of this body is attributable neither to its individual members nor to the collective body? That it only signifies that Allāh protects this body in a way it does not order any sin, nor does it arrive at a mistaken decision. Its case is not different from a mutawātir (اَلْمُتَوَاتِرُ) [1] information which is protected from falsity, although none of its narrators or informants is sinless, nor is this, freedom from falsity attributed to the chain of narrators when looked at as a composite group. All that it means is that a habit has been formed which prevents falsehood from seeping in that information. In other words, Allāh protects a mutawātir information from infiltration of falsehood. In the same way, opinion of ulu 'l-amr is protected from mistakes and errors, although neither the collective body nor its individual members are free from sin and mistake. Nor do they have any special quality or attribute. It is nevertheless safe from falsehood and error, like a mutawātir tradition. This is what sinlessness of ulu 'l-amr means. The verse only shows that their opinion is never confused; it is always right and in conformity with the Qur'ān and the sunnah. It is a special divine providence for this ummah; and it has been narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: ''My ummah will not unite on error.''

COMMENT: As for this tradition, it is totally irrelevant to this subject. Even if it is accepted as correct, it only says that the ummah will not unite on error. It does not say that people of influence and authority from among the ummah would not join hands on error. Ummah has its own meaning, and ahlu 'l-ḥalli wa 'l-'aqd has another; there is no evidence that the former means the latter. Moreover the tradition does not say that whatever they unitedly decided would be free from error; it rather says that they would not be united on error — and the two propositions are not the same.

The tradition accordingly would mean as follows: Never will the entire ummah unite on error concerning any matter; there will always be among them those who would be on right guidance — either all or some of them, at least the sinless one. It will correspond with the verses and traditions showing that Islam; the religion of truth, would never disappear from the earth, would continue upto the Day of Resurrection. Allāh says: ... therefore if these disbelieve in it, We have (already) entrusted with it a people who are not disbelievers in it (6:89); And He made it a word to continue in his posterity (43:28); Surely We have revealed the Reminder and We will most surely be its guardian (15:9); Falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor from behind it; a revelation from the Wise, the Praised One (41:42). There are many verses having the same connotation.

[1] al-Mutawātir: A tradition narrated in every stage by so many narrators as to make their collusion for a lie impossible. (tr.).

Also this is not a speciality of the ummah of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), because the correct traditions prove otherwise. Look at the traditions narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) through various chains of narrators which describe the division of the Jews into seventy-one sects, of the Christians into seventy-two and of the Muslims into seventy-three sects, all of which would go to hell — except one. We have quoted it in the ‘‘Traditions’’ under the verse, And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together ... (3:103).

In short, there is no need to further discuss this tradition, because, even if its chain of narrators be free from defects, it has no relevance to the subject under discussion. We should look at the meaning of sinlessness as applied to the influential people of authority from this ummah, if it is they who are referred to as ‘‘those vested with authority from among you’’.

What is the genesis of ‘iṣmah (sinlessness) of the influential people of authority among the Muslims? What makes their opinion free from error? This body of influential people which manages the public affairs is not something unique for the Muslim ummah. There are found in every big and small nation, and even in the tribes and clans, a number of people who have prestige and influence in their society; and who exercise power and have authority over public affairs. Look into the histories of the ancient people as well as the present nations; you will find countless instances where the people of influence and power unanimously agreed on a course of action about some very important matter and their plan was carried out. Later events sometimes showed the decision was correct; at other times it proved wrong. There is, of course, greater chance of mistake in individual decision than in a collective one; yet there is no guarantee that a decision jointly arrived at after thorough debate and discussion will never be wrong. History and our own experience provide ample proof for it.

Now, if collective decisions of influential and powerful leaders of Muslim ummah are always free from mistakes and errors, we will have to find for it a cause other than the normal ones; it will have to be something supra-natural and miraculous. If so, then it would be a manifest miracle reserved for this ummah, which would strengthen their power, defend their land and protect them from all types of mischief that could endanger their unity. In short, such a cause would be a divinely given miracle parallel to the Glorious Qur'ān, and it would live as long as the Qur'ān lives; it would have the same relation to the practical life of the ummah as the Qur'ān has to its intellectual one. In that case, it was necessary for the Qur'ān to describe its boundary and area; Allāh would have mentioned it as one of His special graces for this ummah, as He has done with reference to the Qur'ān and Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). Also, He should have explained to this group its collective responsibilities as He has done in connection with His Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Likewise, the Prophet should have given detailed instructions to his ummah concerning this extra-ordinary group, and more particularly to his companions; after all, they were the people who bacame ahlu 'l-ḥalli wa 'l-'aqd after him and took the control of the ummah in their hands. The Prophet should have explained about this band which is supposed to be vested with authority what was its reality? What was its boundary? How wide was the area of its jurisdiction? Would there be a single body to rule over the whole Muslim ummah in all public affairs? Or would there be separate bodies of ulu 'l-amr in different Muslim societies to rule over their lives, honour and properties?

Also, it was incumbent on the Muslims — and especially the companions — to pay more attention to it. They should have asked questions and gone into its details. They had asked about things which had no importance compared to this basic matter; they had asked about crescent, the things to be spent and war booty, as Allāh has mentioned: They ask you about crescents [2:189]; They ask you as to what they should spend [2:215]; They ask you about spoils of war [8:1].

So why did they never ask about it? Or was it that they had asked but it was manipulated by people and hidden from us? But this meaning was not against the desire of the majority of the ummah (which follows the same system) so that we could think that they neglected and discarded it until it was completely forgotten!

Also it should inevitably have been quoted during the disputes and strifes which had repeatedly erupted after the Prophet's death. What happened to this 'reality' that it was never quoted or referred to in their argumentations and polemics, while the narrators have transmitted all their arguments word by word? Why is it not found in any speech or letter? Why was it not known to the early exegetes among the companions and their disciples until it was 'discovered' by a handful of later writers like ar-Rāzī and some who came after him?

Even ar-Rāzī has objected to this view after mentioning it. He says that it is against the composite consensus; the phrase, ulu 'l-amr has been explained in not more than four ways: The rightly-guided caliphs, commanders of expeditions, religious scholars and sinless Imāms. This fifth explanation goes against the above composite consensus. Then he has replied that this new explanation is in fact based on the third meaning [i.e., religious scholars]. In this way he has destroyed all that he himself had built. It is now clear that things were not like that at all; nobody ever thought it was a noble and unique divine gift to the clique of influential and powerful leaders of the Muslims, which would constitute a great miracle of Islam.

Or do they want to say that this freedom from error did not emanate from any supra-natural cause? Rather, Islam had generally trained its followers so nicely, basing its teachings on such balanced principles, that it was bound to produce this result — that the people of power and influence among this ummah, be-cause of this training, make no mistake in their collectively arrived at decisions and do not err in the opinions they form.

First of all, this supposition is wrong because it goes against the common sense. Perception of a whole is the sum total of the perception of its components. When each of them is liable to be wrong, the whole group cannot be safe from error and mistake.

Secondly, if the opinion of the group of influential persons is always correct and free from error, and if this extra-ordinary feature is based upon such invincible cause, then it should never fail in producing the desired result. Then what else was the cause of all this falsehood, disturbance and mischief which has overfilled the Muslim world?

There were countless gatherings after the Prophet's death, in which influential and pwerful leaders of the Muslims collectively decided whatever they thought correct, and followed what in their opinion was the right path; but all this led them to nowhere; they went on blundering into far-reaching errors; their attempts to bring happiness to the Muslims increased only the ummah's misfortune and unhappiness. The society which was based on religion turned soon after the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) into an imperialism — oppressive and destructive. Let scholars make in-depth study of the disturbances and mischiefs that raised their head, since the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) departed from this world; and have a look at what followed. On every page of Islamic history they will find blood spilled, honours defiled, properties looted, religious laws ignored and divinely ordained punishments nullified. Let them look for its origin and discover its roots. Was there any effective cause other than the opinions formed and decisions taken by the powerful and influential leaders, which they had yoked the ummah with?

So this is the position of the most important pillar on which they want to build the structure of Islam! This is the effect of the 'opinion' of influential and powerful leaders who, they tell us, are referred to by the words, ulu 'l-amr (those vested with authority), and who, according to them, are free from error in their opinion!

Those who believe that ulu 'l-amr refers to the people of influence and power, have no escape from admitting that those people were not sinless, not free from mistakes and errors. That the ulu 'l-amr, like all other people could be right in some cases and wrong in the others. But inasmuch as theirs was a distinguished group, experienced in public affairs, the ratio of their mistakes was much smaller. Allāh has made their obedience compulsory. Although they could at times be wrong, but Allāh has granted indulgance to such mistakes, keeping in view the overwhelming good emanating from their management of affairs. If they issue an order or give a ruling which contravenes the Qur'ān and the sunnah, and that order or ruling happens to be congruous with the good of the ummah — even if it reinterprets a religious law contrary to what was hitherto done, or changes it to bring it into line with the demands of time or inclinations of the ummah or conditions of the modem world — this new verdict will be followed, and religion will recognize it as good.

Why? Because religion aims only at society's happiness and advancement. This attitude is clearly seen in the way the Islamic governments behaved in the early days of Islam as well as later on. Whenever a law prevalent in the Prophet's days was changed or any system established by him discarded, the only reason given was that that law or system was in conflict with one or another right of the ummah; and that the good of the nation demanded that a new law should be enforced and a new system established which would satisfy people's aspirations for blessings of life. A scholar has openly written [1] that a caliph has full authority to act contrary to explicit religious laws if he thinks it to be in the best interest of the ummah.

Accordingly, the Muslim nation would not be any different from other civilized societies inasmuch as they all have an elected body which decides the laws of the society keeping in view the demands of the situation at a given time.

This opinion, as you see, is held by those who think that religion is a social system presented in the garb of religion. It is governed by the same factors which govern other human societies leading them on the path of evolution step by step. Islam was a high ideal which was perfectly suitable for those who lived during and near the days of the Prophet.

Islam, according to them, is only a link in the chain of human civilization — and the time has left it behind. One should not study it except in the way the archaeologists look at the artifacts from the earth.

We have nothing to discuss about the verse: obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you, with the persons holding the above-mentioned view. That view is based on a theory which would adversely affect all fundamentals of religion and the whole system established by the Prophet's traditions, including the basic gnosis and belief, moral values and rules of jurisprudence. If we look in this light at all that was done by the companions in the days of the Prophet and during his last Illness; at the disputes and strifes they caused; at the changes they made in some laws and systems established by the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); at the happenings in the days of Mu'āwiyah and the caliphs who followed him, the Umayyads, then the 'Abbāsids and then the later ones — and all things resemble one another — we shall arrive at a stunning conclusion.

A most astonishing view has been expressed about this verse by a writer, who has opined, ‘‘The verse, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you, does not imply any of the things said by the exegetes — divided as they are among themselves:-

‘‘First, because the obligatoriness of ulu 'l-amr's obedience — whoever they might be — does not prove that they have any distinction or superiority over others. We are also obliged by religion to obey unjust oppressive rulers when there is no alternative, for the sake of warding off their evil, and those unjust rulers can never be superior to us in the sight of Allāh.

‘‘Second, because the order given in the verse is not unlike other religious commands which can be implemented only when its object is available. For example, it is obligatory to spend on poor, and forbidden to help oppressors; but it is not obligatory for us to create a poor or an oppressor in order that we could spend on him or resist from helping him, respectively.’’

COMMENT: The fallacy of these two ‘reasons’ is transparent. Add to it his supposition that ulu 'l-amr in the verse means rulers and kings, unsoundness of which has already been shown.

As for his first reason, he seems oblivious to the fact that the Qur'ān is full of verses forbidding obedience of the unjust, the oppressors and the unbelievers. It was impossible for Allāh to order us to obey them, after all that prohibition; and then to go a step further and join their obedience with His and the Messenger's obedience. If that obedience were allowed for the sake of one's safety, Allāh would have used words like ‘permission’, etc., as He has done in one place: except when you guard yourself against them for fear of them (3:28). Not that He should clearly make their obedience compulsory, which would lead to all types of horrible results.

As for the second reason, it is based on the same assumption as the first one. However, if it is supposed that their obeidence was made obligatory because they had a special status in religion, then they would be sinless, as explained earlier. And it is impossible for Allāh to oblige us to obey someone who did not exist or who was rarely found — and this too in a verse which contained the most fundamental aspect of religious good, a factor without which the equilibrium of Islamic society could not be maintained. You have seen that the ummah needs ulu 'l-amr for the same reason it needs the Messenger for, that is, for guarding and managing the affairs of the urnmah. We had talked on it when discussing about the decisive and ambiguous verses [1]. Now we return to our original topic.

It is now clear that it would be meaningless to interpret the phrase: those vested with authority from among you, as 'the people having influence and power' (whatever meaning we give to this latter phrase). The only meaning now possible is: Those individuals from among the ummah who are sinless, free from error and mistake in their words and deeds, whose obedience has been made obligatory. The only way to recognize them is through clear divine affirmation, either in His own words or through His Prophet. This explanation corresponds with what has been narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt that it is they.

As for the claim that ulu 'l-amr refers to the rightly guided caliphs, commanders of expeditions or religious scholars whose opinions and words are followed, it is rebuted on two counts:

First: The verse proves their sinlessness, and undoubtedly, none of these three groups was or is sinless — except what a group of Muslims believes about the right of 'Alī (a.s.)

Second: All these interpretations are just claims without any evidence.

Objections have been raised against the explanation that the phrase refers to the sinless Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.):

First Objection: In case this meaning were correct, it was necessary for Allāh and the Messenger to clearly identify them [to the ummah]; and if it were done, no two persons would have disputed about them after the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.).

Reply: It is clearly mentioned in the Qur'ān and the sunnah, like the verses of Guardianship, Purity and others; and the traditions like that of the Ark (The parable of my Ahlu 'l-bayt is like the parable of Noah's Ark; whoever boarded it was saved, and whoever stayed away from it was drowned); and that of the Two Precious Things (Surely I am leaving among you two precious [or weighty] things, the Book of Allāh and my offspring who are my Ahlu 'l-bayt; as long as you would hold fast to both of them you would never go astray after me.). These have been quoted in the discourse on ''Decisive and Ambiguous Verses'' in the third [Ar.] volume [Eng. vol.5, pp.46 — 93]. There are also traditions about the ulu 'l-amr, narrated through Shī'ī and Sunnī chains, some of which will be given under coming ''Traditions''.

Second Objection: Their obedience is conditional to their identification, because an order to obey them without recognizing them would be a command to do the impossible. As their obedience is conditional, this verse cannot apply to them because it is unconditional.

Reply: This objection bounces back to the objector. Every obedience [even of the people of influence and power] is conditional to their recognition. The only difference is that we may recognize the people of influence and power by ourselves without referring it to Allāh and His Messenger, while a sinless Imām can be identified only through an introducer. However the condition of recognition is equally present in both cases; so both should be contrary to the verse.

The fact is that although identification is counted as a condition, it is not like other conditions. It only means that when one is obliged to do something, he has to recognize the object of obligation and its other concomitants; but the obligation does not depend on it. If recognition were like other basic conditions which affect the obligation itself, like 'ability' for ḥajj or existence of water for wuḍū', then nobody would be obliged to do anything at all.

Third Objection: We are unable, these days, to reach a sinless Imām and learn knowledge and religion from him. Therefore, he cannot be the ulu 'l-amr whose obedience is obligatory for the ummah, because there is no way to have any contact with him.

Reply: This problem is created by the ummah itself, not by Allāh or the Messenger. The ummah opted for wrong ways and was untrue to itself. Thus the responsibility and obligation to obedience stays unchanged. Suppose a nation killed its prophet. Can they claim that now they were unable to obey him because he was no more? Morever, the objection may be directed to the objector himself, because nowadays there is not a single ummah in Islam in which the people of influence and power from among themselves could enforce what they would decide for it.

Fourth Objection: Allāh says, then if you quarrel about any thing, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger. If ulu 'l-amr means a sinless Imām, it was necessary to say, 'refer it to the Imām'.

Reply: Its reply has already been given in the Commentary; and it shows that it actually means referring to the Imām.

Fifth Objection: The believers in a sinless Imām say that his obedience rescues the ummah from darkness of strife and evil of disagreement. But evidently the verse ordains a law related to quarrel — in spite of the existence of Imām and obedience of the ummah. It points to disagreement among the ulu 'l-amr themselves in reaching at a dicision about some event or occurance. But according to those who believe so, it is not possible to quarrel or dispute in presence of a sinless Imām, because in their views he is like the Messenger (s.a.w.a.). Accordingly, tnis sentence would be without any purpose or benefit.

Reply: Its reply too is clear from the preceding Commentary. The quarrel mentioned in the verse refers to the believers' disagreement concerning rules of the Qur'ān and the sunnah, not concerning executive orders issued by the Imām in various events and happenings. It was mentioned earlier that no one has any right to legislate a law other than Allāh and His Messenger. If the quarreling parties are capable of inferring its law from the Qur'ān and the sunnah, they have the right to do so, or they could ask the Imām about it, because he is free from error in his opinion. But if they are unable to infer it, then the only way is to ask the Imām. It is just like the days of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) when his contemporaries had the option of inferring the law from the Qur'ān (if they could) or asking the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) about it; but in case they could not infer it, the only remedy was to ask him (s.a.w.a.).

As the verse shows, the ulu 'l-amr are just like the Messenger in obligatoriness of their obedience. As for the believers' quarrel, the verse describes the procedure to be adopted, and it makes no difference whether the Messenger be present (as the following verses show) or absent (as the unrestrictedness of the verse proves). The order to refer the matter to Allāh and the Messenger is, therefore, confined to the dispute among the believers themselves, as is shown by the word if you quarrel; it should be noted that Allāh has not said, if those vested with authority quarrel; nor has He said, if they quarrel. The matter will be referred, in the presence of the Messenger, by asking him the relevant law or inferring it from the Qur'ān and the sunnah (for those who have the ability to do so); and in his absence, the question is to be asked of the Imām, or its reply inferred as discribed above. Obviously, the sentence, then if you quarrel about any thing ..., is not without purpose or benefit, as the objector had claimed.

All this proves that the word, ulu 'l-amr, in this verse refers to some men from among the ummah, each of whom is similar to the Messenger in two aspects: He too is free from sin and mistake, and his obedience too is obligatory and compulsory. However, we do not say that the phrase, ulu 'l-amr, does not have a wider connotation according to language, or that it may not be used in a more general way if one wants to. But meaning of a word is one thing, and applying it to appropriate objects is another. For example, meaning of messenger is general, and it is used in the same meaning in this verse; yet the intended personality is of the Messenger of Allāh, Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.).

QUR'ĀN: then if you quarrel about any thing, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger ...: It branches out from the restriction understood from the context. The proceding sentence, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger ..., makes obedience of Allāh and the Messenger compulsory. This obedience is in the sphere of religion which ensures erasure of every possible dispute and guarantees fulfilment of every possible need. It leaves nothing uncared for, and no referral is required to any one other than Allāh and His Messenger. The sentence, thus, implies: obey Allāh and do not obey ṭāghūt. This is the implied restriction which we have mentioned above.

The speech is addressed to the believers. It shows that the 'quarrel' refers to their dispute among themselves, and not to any putative quarrel between them and the ulu 'l-amr, nor to any supposed dispute among the ulu 'l-amr themselves. It is because the former, i.e., quarrel among the believers and the ulu 'l-amr, goes against the obligation of their obedience, and the latter, i.e., dispute among the ulu 'l-amr themselves, does not conform with obligatoriness of their obedience [which shows that they are always right] because in dispute one party is surely wrong. Moreover, this idea is not in accord with the verse, as it is addressed to the believers; Allāh says: ''then if you quarrel about any thing, refer it ...''.

The word, ‘thing’, is general and could possibly include all decisions and orders given by Allāh, His Messenger and ulu ’l-amr; yet the next words, ‘‘refer it to Allāh and the Messenger’’, show that the verse speaks about quarrel in something outside the direct responsibility of the ulu ’l-amr. They have full authority and control over executive matters which come within the area of their wilāyah (اَلْوِلاَيَةُ = guardianship; mastership), like their order to join an expedition, to fight or to make peace, and so on. The order to refer a matter to Allāh and the Messenger does not cover such things, because people are obliged to obey the ulu ’l-amr in these things. This sentence, therefore, is confined to religious laws only; no one, other than Allāh and the Messenger, has any authority to issue or abrogate a law. The verse somewhat explicitly shows that no one has any right to manipulate any religious law explained by Allāh and His Messenger, and ulu ’l-amr and others all are equal in this respect.

The proviso, if you believe in Allāh and the last day, puts utmost emphasis to this order, and indicates that its contravention emanates from defect in belief. The order has a direct connection with faith; its contravention would show that although the person concerned pretended to believe in Allāh and His Messenger, disbelief was hidden in his heart; and this is hypocrisy, as the following verses prove.

This is better and very good in the end. The indicative, ‘this’, points either to referring the matter in dispute or to obeying Allāh, His Messenger and those vested with authority. ‘‘at-Ta’wīl’’ (اَلتَّأْوِيْلُ = translated here as ‘‘in the end’’) refers to the underlying good on which the order is based and which is realized when the order is carried out. Its meaning has been explained in the third volume [1], under the verse, seeking to give it (their own) interpretation, but none knows its interpretation except Allāh (3:7).

QUR’ĀN: Have you not observed those who think that they believe in what has been revealed to you ...: ‘‘az-Za‘m’’ (اَلزَّعْمُ) means to think, to claim, no matter it conforms with reality or not. It is different from ‘‘al-‘ilm’’ (اَلْعِلْمُ = to know) which is used for a knowledge that conforms with fact. As az-za‘m is generally used for thoughts and claims not conforming with facts, people often think that this non-conformity is part of its connotation; but it is not so. ''aṭ-Ṭāghūt'' (اَلطَّاغُوتُ) is a maṣdar in the meaning of ''aṭ-ṭughyān'' (اَلطُّغْيَانُ = to exceed proper bounds) on the paradigm of ''ar-rahbūt'' (اَلرَّهْبُوت), ''al-jabarūt'' (اَلْجَبَرُوتُ) and ''al-malakūt'' (اَلْمَلَكُوتُ); but generally it is used for active participle in exaggerated sense. The Arabs say: Ṭaghā 'l-mā' (طَغَي الْمَآءُ = Water overflowed the banks). Its use for man began as an extended metaphor; then it became common until it is now taken as its real meaning; it indicates his exceeding the proper limits laid down by reason or sharī'ah. aṭ-Ṭāghūt therefore means oppressor and tyrant, who rebels against, and discards the demands of divine worship showing hauteur against Allāh. That is why scholars say that aṭ-ṭāghūt refers to every one who is worshipped — other than Allāh.

The words, what has been revealed to you and what was revealed before you, mean, what Allāh has revealed to His messengers. This expression was preferred to the phrase, 'they believe in you and in those before you', because the talk is about obligation of referring disputed matters to the Book of Allāh and its laws. It also indicates that the 'command' in the clause, they were commanded to deny him, refers to the order contained in divine books and revelations sent to the prophets, Muḥammad and the preceding ones, may Allāh bless him, his progeny and them all.

The opening words, ''Have you not observed'', clarify a possible query: Why has the order been given to obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority [and to refer the disputes to them]? The reply: Have you not seen how they indulge in disobedience by resorting to the judgment of ṭāghūt? The question reflects pity; it is a matter of pity that they were doing so, while they claimed to believe in the Books revealed to you and the other prophets; these books were sent down to judge between the people in matters they disputed about. Allāh has clearly said in the verse, Mankind was but one nation; so Allāh sent the prophets as bearers of good news and warners, and He sent down with them the book with truth, that it might judge between the people in that in which they differed ... (2:213). Yet they resort to the judgment of ṭāghūt in their disputes, i.e., to the judgment of those who have exceeded the limit, rebelled against divine religion and crossed the boundary of truth. They do so in spite of their being clearly ordered in these books to deny ṭāghūt. Was it not enough reason for forbidding them to resort to ṭāghūt for judgment, that it was tantamount to discarding the books of Allāh and abrogating His laws?

The sentence at the end, and the Satan desires to lead them astray into a far-reaching error, shows that they did so coming under the Satan's influence and his misguidance, as he wanted to lead them into a far-reaching error.

QUR'ĀN: And when it is said to them: ''Come to what Allāh has ate, revealed and to the Messenger;''...: ''Ta'ālaw'' (تَعَالَوْا = come) is imperative of at-ta'ālī (اَلتَّعَالِي = to rise); ''ṣadda'' (صَدَّ = turned away). ''Come to what Allāh has revealed and to the Messenger'', means, come to the law of Allāh and to him who decides according to it.... turning away from you with (utter) aversion: The speech is addressed to the Messenger alone, although they were called not to him alone, but to him and the book together. The verse comments on those who claimed to believe in what was revealed by Allāh; they were not unbelievers that they could openly reject the Book of Allāh. Such people were in fact hypocrites, showing that they believed in what Allāh had revealed, but turning away openly from His Messenger.

It clearly proves that any attempt to differentiate between Allāh and His Messenger by accepting the order of Allāh and hesitating about the order of the Messenger is unmitigated hypocrisy.

QUR'ĀN: But how will it be when misfortune befalls them on account of ...: It is a warning that this turning away from the order of Allāh and His Messenger, and resorting to the judgment of someone else, i.e., ṭāghūt, is sure to bring misfortune in its wake, and its only cause will be this turning away from the order of Allāh and His Messenger, and that resort to the ṭāghūt's judgment. The words, Then will they come to you swearing by Allāh: We did not desire (anything) but good and concord, give prior information of their excuse that it was not with any bad intention that they had resorted to the ṭāghūt's judgment. The meaning thus will be as follows — and Allāh knows better: If they persisted in that behaviour, then how would they feel when its evil consequences overwhelmed them, and then they would rush to you swearing by the name of Allāh that their only desire, in resorting to the judgment of other than the divine book and the Messenger, was to bring good and accord in society and removing the disagreement between the parties.

QUR'ĀN: These are they of whom Allāh knows what is in their hearts; ...: It is a rejection of their excuse. Allāh did not describe what was in their heart, nor did He say that their motive was bad, because the words, turn aside from them and admonish them, were enough to expose it.If their intention was not bad, it would have been true and good; and Allāh would not order His Messenger to turn aside from a person who spoke truth and described fact. The words, and speak to them effectual words concerning themselves, mean: Say to them such words as would reach their hearts and they would come to realize the evil of their activities; they should understand that it was hypocrisy which on coming in open was bound to bring Allāh's wrath and punishment to them.

QUR'ĀN: And We did not send any Messenger but that he should be obeyed ...: It is an all-encompassing refutation of these hypocrites' evil-doings described above: resorting to ṭāghūt's judgment, turning aside from the Messenger, swearing and offering excuse of having intention of good and concord. All this is, in one way or another, disobedience of the Messenger of Allāh, whether accompanied by any excuse or not. Allāh has made his obedience compulsory without any restriction or condition; He has sent him only to be obeyed by Allāh's permission. No one should imagine that it was only Allāh's obedience that was required, while the Messenger was merely one of the human beings, who was obeyed only for people's good; and if such a result could be achieved without his obedience then there was no harm in going ahead independently, leaving the Messenger aside; otherwise it would mean associating him with Allāh, and worshing him. This attitude was reflected, every now and then, in their talk with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), when he took a decision about some important matter, and someone would ask him: Is it by Allāh's order or by yours?

Therefore, Allāh has made it clear that the obligation to obey the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) is all-encompassing and unconditional; it is nothing but Allāh's obedience because it is by His permission. The verse in effect says what is declared in the verse 80 of this same chapter: whoever obeys the Messenger, he indeed obeys Allāh.

Then Allāh says that if they had returned to Allāh and His Messenger, repenting for the sin of disobeying the Messenger and turning aside from him, it would have been better than their swearing in the name of Allāh and offering lame and useless excuses which could not please the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), as Allāh would inform him of the reality behind that facade. This is the import of the second half of the verse: and had they, when they were unjust to themselves, come to you and asked forgiveness of Allāh and the Messenger had (also) asked forgiveness for them, they would have found Allāh Oft-returning (to mercy), Merciful.

QUR'AN: But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement ...: ''ash-Shajr'' and ''ash-shajūr'' (اَلشَّجُورُ،اَلشَّجْرُ = to mingle, to jumble). From it are derived ''at-tashājur'' and ''al-mushājarah'' (اَلتَّشَاجُر،اَلْمُشَاجَرَة = to quarrel, to dispute), as if the claim and counter-claims are mixed up and jumbled together; the same is the root of ash-shajar (اَلشَّجَرُ = tree) because its branches look jumbled and mixed together; ''al-ḥaraj'' (اَلْحَرَجُ = straitness, tightness).

At first glance it appears that it is a rebuttal of the hypocrites' thinking that they believed in the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) even while resorting to the Satan's judgment. It seems to mean: This claim is not correct; they will not be counted as believers until they come to you for judgment and then do not find any straitness in their hearts when you gave your judgment. But the generality of the clause, until they make you a judge ... total submission, and that of the next verse, And if We had prescribed for them ... except a few of them, supports the view that this admonition is not restricted to the hypocrites; it covers others too inasmuch as they apparently think that mere acceptance of what Allāh has revealed including gnosis and commands constitutes true belief in Allāh, His Messenger and all that the Messenger has brought. But it is not so. True belief means total submission from the depth of one's heart as well as in appearance. How is it possible for true believers not to submit to the Prophet's order in appearance (turning aside from him and going against him) or in their inner self by feeling straitness in their hearts when that judgment goes against their wishes. Allāh has said to His Messenger, ... that you may judge between people by means of that which Allāh has taught you (4:105). Now, if any one feels annoyed with the Prophet's judgment, he is in fact annoyed with Allāh's judgment, because it is Allāh who has made his obedience compulsory and given him authority to enforce his decisions.

If they surrendered to the Messenger's order and judgment without finding any straitness in their hearts on that account, they would have in fact surrendered to Allāh's order and judgment, whether it be a legislative one or creative. It is one of the stages of faith, on reaching which a believer attains to many superior virtues (the most prominent being submission to Allāh's order), and becomes free from many bad traits like finding staitness in heart and objecting to divine order by tongue or heart. The 'submission' required in the verse is general and comprehensive.

It is now clear that, although the wording of the verse, But no! by your Lord! they do not believe ... with total submission, apparently makes it restricted to the Prophet's judgment only (because it refers to their resorting to the judgment of someone else even when they were obliged to refer every dispute to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), yet its import is general and covers orders of Allāh and His Messenger both, and in matters of legislation as well as creation, as described above. Not only that. It encompasses all judgments he delivered, all systems he established and all actions he performed, because the order is general; and it is not possible for the one who truly believes in Allāh to reject, be annoyed or feel disturbed on account of a judgment, order or system that in any way emanates from Allāh or His Messenger. Otherwise, it would be, to a certain degree, associating others with Allāh. Allāh says: And most of them do not believe in Allāh without associating others (with Him), (12:106).

QUR'ĀN: And if We had prescribed for them ... except a few of them: It was described under the verse, but Allāh has cursed them on account of their unbelief, so they shall not believe but a few (4:46), that this style indicates that the statement is applicable to the collective body of people, i.e., to the society as a whole, and that the exception only serves to remove any possible misunderstanding that it covers each and every member without sparing a single person. The exception, therefore, is rather separated than attached, or it falls between the attached and the separated exceptions inasmuch as it has two sides.

Therefore, the sentence, ‘‘they would not have done it except a few of them’’, describes the condition of the collective body that as a society they do not obey the orders which seem unpalatable to them and which affect the things to which their hearts are firmly attached like their lives and homes; and the exception of the few has been added to remove a possible misunderstanding.

The meaning: If We had prescribed for them and ordered them to kill themselves or go forth leaving their homes and places of residence which they were emotionally attached to, they would not have done it, would have disobeyed Us. Nevertheless, as the above statement could have given an impression that there was not among them even a single true believer who would submit to the command of Allāh, this misunderstanding was removed by excepting a few of them; although the preceding statement in fact had not included them in the first place, because it had commented on the society per se, and had not looked at individual members except as components of that society.

It shows that the verse speaks about killing of the whole by whole group, and their collective dispersion from their villages and towns. It does not refer to individuals — that every one should kill himself or go out from his personal home. It is the same style as used in the verse, therefore turn to your Creator (penitently), and kill your people [lit.: yourselves] (2:54), because this verse too is addressed to the group, not to individuals.

QUR’ĀN: and if they had done what they were admonished,: The word ‘prescribed’ used at the beginning, has been changed here to ‘admonished’. It is an indication that these directives given as commands and orders are in fact pointers leading to what contains their good and bliss. They are in their essence admonitions and sympathetic guidance ordained for their good.

QUR’ĀN: it would have certainly been better for them and most efficacious in strengthening (them);: That is, in all matters that concerns them in this world and the next. It is because the good of the next world is inseparable from this world’s good; rather the former follows the latter. ‘‘Most efficacious in strengthening’’, i.e., strengthening their hearts and souls with true faith, as the speech revolves around faith. Allāh has said: Allāh strengthens those who believe with the sure word in this world's life and in the hereafter (14:27).

QUR'ĀN: And then We would certainly have given them from Ourselves a great reward;: That is, when they got strengthened with firm faith. The vagueness of ''a great reward'' has the same implication as the unrestrictedness of ''better for them''.

QUR'ĀN: And We would certainly have guided them in the straight path.: The meaning of the straight path was explained in the first volume under the verse, Guide us to the straight path (1:6).

QUR'ĀN: And whoever obeys Allāh and the Messenger, these are with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favours from among the prophets and the truthful and the witnesses and the good ones; and excellent are these as companion: Obedience of Allāh and the Messenger has been joined in this good news although the preceding verses had spoken specifically about the Messenger's obedience and submission to his command and judgment; it is because of some intervening verses referring to Allāh, e.g., And if We had prescribed for them ... The obligation therefore is of obeying Allāh and obeying His Messenger; as was clearly laid down in the beginning of this topic: obey Allāh and obey the Messenger ...

The words, ''these are with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favours'', show that the obedient ones would join the company of the prophets and the other favoured ones, not that they would become one of them. Those bestowed with favours are the people of ''the straight path''; and this phrase has not been attributed in the Qur'ān to any one other than Allāh, with exception of this group, as the Qur'ān says: Guide us to the straight path, the path of those upon whom Thou hast bestowed favours (1:6 — 7). In short, the obedient ones will enjoy the company of the prophets, truthful ones, etc., without becoming themselves prophet, etc. Also, the end clause, ''and excellent are these as companion'', points to this direction. It was explained earlier that the favour specifically refers to mastership and guardianship.

Coming to these four groups, the prophets are recipients of revelation who are given news of the unseen. We know nothing more about them except what is seen of their achievements in society. Also it has earlier been described that ''ash-shuhadā' '' (اَلشُّهَدَآءُ), when used in the Qur'ān, means witnesses of people's actions, not martyrs in the battle-field; and that the good ones are those who deserve favours from Allāh.

As for the truthful ones, the word ''aṣ-ṣiddīq'' (اَلصِّدِّيْقُ) is the exaggerative form of aṣ-ṣidq (اَلصِّدْقُ = truth). Truth occurs in speech as well as in acts. Truth in action means its conformity with the words, because it shows firm belief. When one is true in one's words, it gives a true picture of his inner belief without any contradiction; a word is true when it conforms with reality. As the speech itself is an action, the one who is truthful in action would not say except what he knows to be true and real. His words therefore are doubly true — the narration and the matter narrated both are true

The truthful one, who never lies, is the one who does not do except what he knows to be right, without following his desires, and does not say except what he knows to be truth, and does not think except that which is true; he sees the reality of the things, says truth and does right.

In this way the ranks are fixed: The prophets (and they are the leaders and chiefs); then the truthful ones (and they are witnesses of realities and people's deeds); then the witnesses (who are witnesses of deeds); and lastly the good ones (who are qualified to receive divine favours).

The last word, ''rafīqā'' (رَفِيْقًا = companion) is accusative of specification; and means: as companion, in the manner of a companion. That is why it has been used in singular form. Some others have said that it is a circumstantial clause and means: each of these is excellent as companion. In that case, the style is similar to that found in the verse, ... then We bring you forth as baby ... (22:5).

QUR'ĀN: This is grace from Allāh, and sufficient is Allāh as the Knower: The sentence begins with the indicative pronoun, dhālika (ذٰلِكَ = lit.: that), and that pronoun is made for distant objects; then the predicate al-faḍl (اَلْفَضْلُ = grace) is strengthened with the definite article al (اَلْ).All these literary devices signify the magnificence of the grace, as though it is the grace in its totality. The verse ends with the mention of divine knowledge, because the preceding speech describes the ranks of faith and belief, which cannot be identified except by the divine knowledge.

It should be noted here that these noble verses have changed several times the style from first or second person to the third and vice versa without affecting the flow of speech or weakening their interlinked arrangement. The series begins addressing the believers in second person [O you who believe!], then talks of them in third person (And if We had prescribed for them). Likewise, Allāh has mentioned Himself in the first verse in third person (obey Allāh), then turns to first person plural (And We did not send ...), then at once to the third person in the same verse (by permission of Allāh); then again to the first person plural (And if We had prescribed), and finally to third person (And whoever obeys Allāh).

Likewise, the Messenger of Allāh has been described in the first verse in third person (and obey the Messenger), then addressed in the second person (come to you) and then turns to third person (and the Messenger had asked forgiveness for them), then it turns again to second person (by your Lord!), it then turns third time to the third person (And whoever obeys Allāh and the Messenger), and finally uses the demonstrative pronoun, ulā'ika (أُولَئِكَ = these) with second person pronoun ka (كَ = you). Altogether there are ten changes here, and the reasons are not difficult to understand for anyone who ponders on the context.

TRADITIONS

Ibn Bābawayh has narrated through his chain from Jābir ibn ‘Abdillāh al-Anṣārī that he said: ‘‘When Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, sent to His Prophet, Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), the verse, O you who believe! obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you, I said, ‘O Messenger of Allāh! We know Allāh and His Messenger; but who are those vested with authority whose obedience Allāh has conjoined to your obedience?’ (The Prophet) said: ‘They are my caliphs, O Jābir! and the Imāms of the Muslims after me. The first of them is ‘Alī son of Abū Ṭālib, then al-Ḥasan, then al-Ḥusayn, then ‘Alī son of al-Ḥusayn, then Muḥammad son of ‘Alī who is mentioned as al-Bāqir in the Torah; you will surely meet him, O Jābir! when you see him convey my salām (greetings) to him. Then aṣ-Ṣādiq Ja‘far son of Muḥammad; then Mūsā son of Ja‘far; then ‘Alī son of Mūsā; then Muḥammad son of ‘Alī; then ‘Alī son of Muḥammad; then al-Ḥasan son of ‘Alī; then Muḥammad (whose name and patronym will be the same as mine) son of al-Ḥasan son of ‘Alī, the Proof of Allāh on His earth and Baqiyyatullāh (بَقِيَّةُ اللهِ = the one kept safe by Allāh) among His servants; he is the one by whose hands Allāh, Sublime is His remembrance, will conquer the whole world from the east to the west; he it is who will remain hidden from his followers and friends for such a long period that no one will remain firm on the belief of his imamah except he whose heart has been tested by Allāh for faith.’ ’’

Jābir says: ‘‘I said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! Will his followers get any benefit from him during his occultation?’ (The Prophet, s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Certainly, by Him Who has sent me with prophethood! they will be guided by his light and benefit from his wilāyah (اَلوِلاَيَةُ = love, mastership) during his occultation as people benefit from the sun when it is hidden in cloud. O Jābir! this is part of the hidden secrets of Allāh and the treasured knowledge of Allāh. So keep it hidden except from the people who deserve to know.’ ’’ (Tafsīr al-Burhān)

The author says: an-Nu‘mānī has narrated through his chain from Sulaym ibn Qays al-Hilālī from ‘Alī (a.s.) a tradition of the same meaning as above. Also ‘Alī ibn Ibrāhīm has narrated it through his chain from Sulaym from ‘Alī (a.s.). There are other traditions narrated through Shī‘ī and Sunnī chains, describing the imāmah of the above Imāms together with their names; which may be seen in Yanābi‘u ’l-mawaddah, and al-Bahrārī’s Ghāyatu ’l-marām and other books.

Jābir al-Ju‘fī has said: ‘‘I asked Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) about the verse, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you. He said: ‘The Imāms.’ ’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: al-‘Ayyāshī has narrated in his Tafsīr another similar tradition through ‘Umar ibn Sa’īd from Abu ’l-Ḥasan (a.s.), in which the following reply is given: ‘‘ ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib and the Imāms after him.’’

Ibn Shahrāshūb narrates: ‘‘al-Ḥasan ibn Ṣāliḥ asked aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.)

about it and the Imām replied: ‘The Imāms from the Ahlu ’l-bayt of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.).’ ’’

The author says: A similar tradition has been narrated by aṣ-Ṣadūq through Abū Baṣīr from al-Bāqir (a.s.) in which it is said: ‘‘The Imāms from the children of ‘Alī and Fāṭimah until the Hour (of resurrection) comes.’’

Abū Masrūq has narrated a tradition from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.); he says: ‘‘I told him: ‘We have discussion with theologians and we argue against them with the words of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you; but they say: ‘‘It was revealed about the believers.’’ And we argue against them with the words of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, Say: I do not ask of you any recompense for it except the love for near relatives; and they say: ‘‘It was revealed about the near relatives of the believers.’’ Thus I did not leave anything like this which came to my mind but I mentioned it (to him).’ Thereupon he said to me: ‘In that case, call them to al-mubāhalah (اَلْمُبَاهَلَةْ = imprecation).’ I said: ‘And how should I do it?’ He said: ‘Keep yourself good and happy for three days; keep fast; take bath; and go forth you and he to the mountains; then entwine your right hand’s fingers in his fingers; then show justice to him and begin with yourself and say: ‘‘O Allāh, the Lord of the seven heavens and the Lord of the seven earths, the Knower of the unseen and the seen, the Beneficent, the Merciful! If Abū Masrūq has rejected truth and claimed wrong, then send on him reckoning from the heaven and a painful chastisement.’’ Then turn the same imprecation on him and say: ‘‘And if he (i.e., your adversary) has rejected truth and claimed wrong, then send on him reckoning from the heaven and a painful chastisement.’’ ’

‘‘Then (the Imām, a.s.) said to me: ‘Thus it will not be long that you will see it (chastisement) in him.’ But, by Allāh, I did not find anyone who would answer to this call.’’ (al-Kāfī)

‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Ajlān has narrated from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said about this verse of obedience: ‘‘It is about ‘Alī and the Imāms; Allāh has put them in places of prophets except that they do not make anything lawful or unlawful.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: The exception in this tradition confirms what was written in the Commentary that according to this verse legislating a law was reserved for Allāh and His Messenger.

Burayd ibn Mu‘āwiyah has narrated that Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) recited: ‘‘Obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you; then if you fear a dispute about anything, refer it back to Allāh and the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you.’’ Then he said: ‘‘How can it be that He orders their obedience and then allows disputing with them? He (Allāh) has said it to the rebellious ones who were told, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The author says: All that this tradition shows is that the Imām (a.s.) was explaining the verse and elaborating on it; as we have described in the Commentary. It does not mean that the Imām (a.s.) was giving a separate version of the verse, as might be misunderstood by the word, ‘recited’. A proof of what we have said may be found in the fact that different wordings have been used in other traditions [giving the same meaning, and even in the same tradition recorded in another book]. For example.

Ḥarīz has narrated from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘It was revealed, then if you quarrel about any thing, refer it to Allāh and to the Messenger and to those vested with authority from you.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī). Also al-‘Ayyāshī has narrated from Burayd ibn Mu‘āwiyah from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) (and it is the same tradition which has been quoted above from al-Kāfī), and this narration says, inter alia: ‘‘Then (Allāh) said to the people, ‘O you who believe!’, and He has gathered [in this address] all the believers upto the Day of Resurrection; obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you. He has meant us particularly. Then if you fear a dispute about anything, refer it back to Allāh and the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you. It was revealed in this way. And how would He order them to obey those vested with authority and then allow them to quarrel with them? It was said to those who were ordered [to obey and] who were told: Obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

Abū Baṣīr has narrated from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘It (i.e., the verse of obedience) was revealed about ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.).’’ ‘‘I said to him: ‘People say to us, ‘‘What was to prevent Him from naming ‘Alī and his Ahlu ’l-bayt in His Book?’’ ’ Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) said: ‘Tell them, ‘‘Verily Allāh revealed (the order of) prayer to His Messenger; but He did not name three (rak‘ah) or four, until it was the Messenger of Allāh who explained it; and He revealed (the order of) ḥajj and did not reveal, ‘circumambulate seven times’, until the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) explained it. [Likewise] Allāh revealed: ‘obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you’; and it was revealed about ‘Alī and al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (peace be on them); and he (the Messenger of Allāh, s.a.w.a.) said about ‘Alī: ‘Whoever’s master am I, ‘Alī is his master.’ Also the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘I admonish you concerning the Book of Allāh and my Ahlu ’l-bayt; verily I have asked Allāh not to let them be separated from each other until He brings them to the ḥawḍ (اَلْحَوْضُ = reservoir [of al-Kawthar]), and He has granted it to me.’ And he said: ‘Do not teach them because they are more knowledgeable than you; verily they shall never take you away from the gate of guidance and shall never let you enter the gate of misguidance.’ If the Messenger of Allāh had remained silent and not identified the people (of his Ahlu ’l-bayt), surely the progeny of ‘Abbās, and the progeny of ‘Aqīl and someone else’s progeny would have claimed (to be among them); but Allāh revealed in His Book: Allāh only desires to keep away the uncleanness from you, O people of the House! and to purify you a (thorough) purification [33:33]; and ‘Alī and al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn and Fāṭimah (peace be on them) were the interpretation of this verse; so the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) took the hands of ‘Alī and Fāṭimah and al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (blessings from Allāh be upon them) and entered them under the mantle in the house of Umm Salamah and said: ‘O Allāh! every prophet had had his precious things and his people; and these are my precious things and my people’ Umm Salamah said: ‘Am I not from your people?’ He said: ‘Verily you are (preceeding) to good but these are my precious things and people of my (house).’... (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: al-Kulaynī has narrated in al-Kāfī, through his chain of narrators from Abū Baṣīr from the same Imām (a.s.) a similar tradition with minor differences in wordings.

Ibn Shahrāshūb has quoted from at-Tafsīr of Mujāhid that this verse [of obedience] was revealed about the Leader of the faithful [‘Alī, a.s.] when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) left him in Medina as his deputy. (‘Alī) said: ‘‘O Messenger of Allāh! Are you leaving me to look after the women and the children?’’ He [the Messenger of Allāh] said: ‘‘O Leader of the faithful! Are you not pleased that you should have the same position with me as Hārūn had with Mūsā, when (Mūsā) said to him: ‘Take my place among my people, and act well’? Then Allāh said: ‘and those vested with authority from among you’.’’ (The Imām then) said: ‘‘ ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, Allāh appointed him as the master of the ummah’s affairs after Muḥammad and when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) made him take his place at Medina. Thus Allāh ordered the servants to obey him (‘Alī) and not to go against him.’’ (Tafsīr al-Burhān).

Mujāhid has also narrated from Ibānah al-Falakī that it was revealed when Abū Buraydah complained against ‘Alī (a.s.) (ibid.)

A tradition has been quoted in ‘Abaqātu ’l-anwār from Yanābī‘u ’l-mawaddah of ash-Shaykh Sulaymān ibn Ibrāhīm al-Balkhī who quotes from al Manāqib, from Sulaym ibn Qays al-Hilālī from ‘Alī (a.s.) which, inter alia, says: [‘Alī, a.s.] said, ‘‘The least by which a servant goes astray is that he does not know the Proof of Allāh, the Blessed, the Sublime, and His witness over His servants, whose obedience Allāh has ordered and whose love and obedience made obligatory.’’ Sulaym says, ‘‘I said, ‘O Leader of the faithful! describe them to me.’ He said, ‘(They are) those whom Allāh has joined with Himself and His Messenger, and said: O you who believe! obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you.’ I said to him, ‘May Allāh make me your ransom! explain (it) to me.’ He said, ‘Those (about whom) the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had said in several places and his last sermon on the day when Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, took him to Himself: ‘‘Surely I am leaving among you two things, you shall never go astray after me if you hold fast to them: the Book of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, and my progeny who are my Ahlu ’l-bayt; because [Allāh,] the Kind, the Knower, has promised me that they shall never be separated (from each other) until they come to me at the Reservoir — like these two (saying this, the Prophet joined his index fingers together) and I do not say ‘like these two’ (saying which he joined his index and middle fingers together); so hold fast to them both and don’t go ahead of them, otherwise you would go astray.’’ ’ ’’

The author says: Traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt, giving similar meanings as above are very numerous. What we have presented here gives examples of all types of meanings described in traditions. Anyone wanting more details should consult collections of aḥādīth.

As for ancient exegetes, they are divided about the meaning of the phrase, ulu ’l-amr. Some say, it means the rightly guided caliphs; others say, commanders of expeditions; a third group says, the scholars. aḍ-Ḍaḥḥāk has reportedly said that it refers to the companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); but it boils down to the third interpretation, because reportedly he has said: ‘‘They are companions of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) as they were the callers (to Islam) and narrators of traditions.’, Obviously, this reasoning is based on their knowledge, and this interpretation would ultimately mean the scholars.

It should be noted that many things and various stories have been reported concerning the reason of revelation of this verse; but if one ponders on them one would be in no doubt that all of them are mere attempts by the narrators to apply the verse on one or the other view or situation. We therefore have not quoted any of them as it was of no value. You may look into ad-Durru ’l-manthūr and at-Tafsīr of aṭ-Ṭabarī and other books like them for verification of this observation.

al-Barqī has narrated through his chain from Abu ’l-Jārūd that Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) said about the verse, But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they ... submit with total submission: ‘‘Submission is pleasure and satisfaction with His decree.’’ (al-Maḥāsin)

‘Abdullāh al-Kāhilī has said that Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) said: ‘‘If a people worshipped Allāh alone who has no partner, and established prayer, and gave zakāt, and performed ḥajj of the House, and fasted in the month of Ramaḍān, and then said about a thing done by Allāh or by His Messenger (s.a.w.a.), ‘Why did he do this?’ Or, ‘If he had done it in another way [it would have been better]’ or felt [annoyance] in their hearts, they would become polytheists because of it.’’ Then he recited this verse, But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then do not find any straitness in their hearts as to what you have decided and submit with total submission. Then Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) said: ‘‘It is incumbent upon you to submit.’’ (al-Kāfī)

‘Abdullāh ibn Yaḥyā al-Kāhilī has narrated that he heard Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) saying: ‘‘By Allāh, if a people worshipped Allāh alone who has no partner, and established prayer, and gave zakāt, and performed ḥajj of the House, and fasted in the month of Ramaḍān, and then said about a thing done of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), ‘Why did he do this or that? or felt [annoyance] in their hearts, they would become polytheists because of it.’’ Then he recited, But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then do not find any straitness in their hearts as to what — Muḥammad and the progeny of Muḥammad — have decided and submit with total submission. (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī).

The author says: There are other traditions similar to these two. The meaning given by the Imām (a.s.) extends the theme of the verse on two counts: First, that the verse covers all decisions and decrees, be they legislative or creative; Second, it makes no difference whether the decision or decree was issued by Allāh or by His Messenger.

It should be mentioned here that there are other traditions which apply the verse, But no! by your Lord! they ... submit with total submission, to the wildyah of ‘Alī (a.s.) or the wilāyah of the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.); they provide examples of applying a verse to one or the other of its prominent models. Certainly the verse is applicable to Allāh, His Messenger and the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt, and it continues in them.

ash-Shaykh has narrated through his chain from ‘Alī (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘A man from the Helpers (anṣār) came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! I cannot bear separation from you; so much so that if I enter my home and remember you, I leave my property and come (here) for looking at you, in your love. Then I remembered that when the Day of Resurrection would come, you would be made to enter the Garden and raised to the highest level of ‘illiyyīn (عِلِّيِّين = highest place). Then how could I see you? O Messenger of Allāh!' Then the verse was revealed: And whoever obeys Allāh and the Messenger, these are with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favours from among the prophets, and the truthful, and the witnesses, and the good ones; and excellent are these as companion! Thereupon the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) sent for the man and recited it to him and gave him the good news.'' (al-Amālī, ash-Shaykh)

The author says: This theme is also narrated through Sunnī chains in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr quoting from aṭ-Ṭabarānī, Ibn Marduwayh, Abū Nu'aym (in Ḥilyatu 'l-awliyā') and aḍ-Ḍiyā' al-Maqdisī (in Ṣifatu 'l jannah, saying that this tradition was 'good'), all narrating from 'Ā'ishah; also quoting from aṭ-Ṭabarānī and Ibn Marduwayh both through ash-Sha'bī from Ibn 'Abbās; and through Sa'īd ibn Manṣūr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir from ash-Sha'bī; and through Ibn Jarīr from Sa'īd ibn Jubayr.

Ibn Shahrāshūb has narrated from Anas ibn Mālik from someone he had named from Abū Ṣāliḥ from Ibn 'Abbās that he said about this verse: ''And whoever obeys Allāh and the Messenger, these are with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favours from among the prophets — i.e., Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) — and the truthful — i.e., 'Alī, and he was the first to verify — and the witnesses — i.e., 'Alī, Ja'far, Ḥamzah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, peace be on them.'' [1] (Tafsīr al-Burhān)

The author says: There are other traditions giving the same meaning.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ''Help us with piety, because whoever met Allāh with piety, would get happiness near Allāh, as Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says: And whoever obeys Allāh and the Messenger ...'' After reciting the verse, he said: ''So from us is the Prophet, and from us is the truthful, and from us are the witnesses and the good ones.'' (al-Kāfī) aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) has said: ''The believers are of two kinds: (One is) a

[1] This tradition obviously interprets the word ash-shuhadā' (اَلشُّهَدَآءُ) as martyrs, not witnesses. (tr.)

believer who fulfils the conditions Allāh had imposed on him; he will be with the prophets, and the truthful, and the witnesses, and the good ones; and excellent are these as companions! and he is among those who will intercede and will not need intercession (by others); and he is among those who are not inflicted with terror of this world, nor of the hereafter. (Another is) a believer who has made mistakes. He is like a green stalk, which inclines to whichever direction wind pushes it and then returns to its position. He is among those who are inflicted with terrors of this world and that of the hereafter, and he would be interceded for; and he is on good.'' (ibid.)

The author says: aṣ-Ṣiḥāḥ says: ''al-Khāmah (اَلْخَامَة) is a green soft plant.'' The Imām (a.s.) in this ḥadīth points to what was described in the Commentary of the verse, The path of those upon whom Thou hast bestowed favours (1:7), that 'favour' means al-wilāyah (اَلْوِلاَيَة = love, mastership, friendship). This explanation thus corresponds with the verses, Now surely the friends of Allāh, they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve. Those who believed and were pious (10:62 — 63). Terror of mishaps cannot reach the friends of Allāh who rely on none other than Allāh.

COMMENTARY

The preceding verse, as you may see, had prepared the ground for the central theme contained in these verses which stimulate and exhort the believers to fight in the way of Allāh. The believers spent their days under very perilous circumstances, when these verses were revealed, probably during the second spring of the Prophet's stay at Medina.[46] Arabs had risen against them from all around in order to extinguish the light of Allāh and demolish the slowly rising edifice of Islam. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was busy in fighting the Meccan idol-worshippers and Qurayshite friends, sending precautionary expeditions to [46] The ḥadīth of Jābir ibn 'Abdillāh al-Anṣārī about the verse of obedience (quoted in the Traditions above) clearly indicates that it was revealed well after the birth of al-Ḥusayn (a.s.) in Sha'bān, 4th year of hijrah, because it mentions al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (peace be on both) as if Jābir knew them and there was no need for the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to tell him who they were.

---

Now, if these verses, exhorting to take precaution and to fight, were revealed in the second spring, i.e., second year of hijrah, it is very difficult to claim that the preceding verses had prepared the ground for these, or that both series were revealed together. (tr.) various directions and raising structure of religion in the society. But that society was honeycombed with groups of hypocrites, and those internal enemies enjoyed great power and influence. On the day of Uḥud it was clearly seen that their number was not much less than half of the believers' number.[47] Those hypocrites used to upset the plans of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and waited for him to meet with some disaster. They hindered the believers from carrying out their duties, while some of the believers too were not free from spiritual disease, and who used to give various informations to their enemies. All around, Medina was ringed with Jewish tribes who deceived and misguided the believers. From old days, Arabs of Medina respected those Jews and accorded them honour. Taking its advantage, the Jews misled them with false statement and wrong advice, in order to weaken their will and nullify all their endeavours. On the other hand, they used to instigate the polytheists against the Muslims, and encourage the idol-worshippers in their struggle, telling them to remain firm in their denial and disbelief, and to harass and torture the believers who were still in Mecca.

The preceding verses aimed at nullifying the Jewish plots against the Muslims and to erase the effects of their malicious whisperings from the believers' hearts. The comment, in these verses, about the hypocrites aims at completing the believers' guidance and making them aware of the condition prevailing at that time, in order that they might have an insight into their actual position and be on guard against the hidden disease which had seeped into their society and infected a considerable population. It would also help in nullifying the conspiracies of their external enemies who had surrounded them; the light of religion would shine brightly illuminating the world, and Allāh is sure to complete His light even if polytheists and unbelievers disliked it.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! take your precaution, then go forth in detachments or go forth in a body: ''al-Ḥidhr" (اَلْحِذْر = instrument used for precaution, e.g., arms and ammunitions); it is also said that it is a

[47] It was mentioned in the traditions of the Battle of Uhud that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had left Medina for Uḥud with a thousand men, three hundred of whom returned with 'Abdullāh ibn Ubayy (the leader of the hypocrites) and only seven hundered remained with the Prophet. (Auth. 's note)

maṣdar like al-ḥadhar (اَلْحَذَر = to be cautious). ''an-Nafar'' (اَلنَّفَر = to go forth, or proceed, towards intended destination); basically it means to be frightened; it is as though being frightened, one runs away from one place seeking refuge at the other. [The same word is used, with different prepositions, for both starting and finishing points.] ''ath-Thubāt'' (اَلثُّبَاتُ) is plural of ath-thubbah (اَلثُّبَّةُ) which means separate groups or bands; thubātan (ثُبَاتاً) in the verse, therefore, means group after group; one group departs, then the other starts separately, and so on. This meaning is supported by parallellism of the clause, ''go forth in detachments'', and, ''go forth in a body''.

The order to go forth is based on the order to ''take your precaution'', as the conjunctive fa (فَ = then) shows. Apparently it strengthens the view that 'precaution' refers to means of precaution. That is, it alludes to fully-fledged preparation for jihād. The meaning: Take your arms, make full preparation and go forth to your enemy either in separate detachments (for minor expeditions) or all together (for major battles).

Understandably, preparation and equipments would differ from one operation to another, depending on number and power of enemy. The alternatives of going forth in detachments or all togher are not meant to give option or choice to the fighters; rather it looks at the strength and number of enemies — if they are few in number, go in small detachment, but if they are numerous, then go all together.

The verse, specially in the context of the next one, And surely among you is he who would certainly hang back, is a warning to the believers not to let down their arms, not to slacken their efforts and not to show any laxity in the conduct of jihād; otherwise, their morale will go down, their zeal for raising the standard of truth will be inflicted by inertia, holding back from fighting the enemies of Allāh. In this way, they will lose the opportunity to cleanse the earth from uncleanness of disbelief and polytheism.

QUR'ĀN: And surely among you is he who would certainly hang back!: [The Arabic sentence is: wa inna minkum la-man la-yubatt'ianna = وَ اِنَّ مِنْكُمْ لَمَنْ لَيُبَطِّئَنَّ] It is said that the first la (لَ) is for beginning as it is attached to the subject of inna (اِنَّ); and the second one is for oath because it is attached to the predicate; it is a verbal clause, emphasized with nūn (ن) which is intensified with doubling sign. ''at-Tabṭiah'' and

''al-ibṭā' '' (اَلتَّبْطِئَة،اَلْاِبْطآءُ) both have the same meaning: to be tardy, to be late in a work.

The words, ''among you is he'', show that those who would hang back were from among the believers who have been addressed with, O you who believe! This view is supported also by a coming verse, Have you not seen those to whom it was said: ''Withhold your hands''; obviously these also were from among the believers, as the next words show, but when fighting is prescribed for them, lo! a party of them fear men. Then the next verse also points to it: and if a benefit comes to them, they say: ''This is from Allāh''... Likewise the words, Therefore let those fight in the way of Allāh ..., and the following verse, And what reason have you that you should not fight in the way of Allāh ..., as well as the verse, Those who believe fight in the way of Allāh ..., prove it; all these verses aim at exhorting and urging the believers to fight, and the group of hangers back is certainly included among them, as the interlocking of the verses shows.

Apart from that, there is nothing in these verses to suggest that those tardy people were from among the hypocrites who had not believed except by tongue. Moreover, some of their words quoted in these verses show that to a certain extent there was faith and belief in their hearts; for example, If then a misfortune befalls you he says: ''Surely Allāh conferred a benefit on me'' ...; and, ''Our Lord! why hast Thou ordained fighting for us?''.

Of course, some exegetes have written that the words, ''among you is he'', refers to hypocrites, and that they have been described as being 'among' the believers because they were generally counted among the believers' group. Or because they were from the same family tree, so they were from among the believers' clans or families. Or because they were joined with the believers in the laws of sharī'ah, e.g., their lives were protected and they inherited from believers and other rules too applied to them as they had apparently uttered the two witnesses.

But you have seen that such an explanation goes against the apparent meaning of the Qur'ān without any valid reason.

However, let us see what was the reason which had compelled them to adopt this view. It was their inordinately good opinion of all the Muslims of the early days of Islam, i.e., anyone who saw the Prophet and believed in him. But if you make an indepth study of what history has recorded of their character and behaviour during the life-time of the Prophet and after him, this opinion would be completely shaken. This blind faith will lose its hold if you ponder on the cutting remarks the Qur'ān passes about them.

We have never heard till this day of any pure nation or group which was composed of hundered per cent pure members, all of whom were, without any exception, true believers, firmly standing on truth, never slipping even a little from the straight path (except the martyrs of Karbalā', as reports say). The believers of the early days of Islam were no exception. They too, like other human groups had all types of people among them. There were hypocrites; there were those suffering from one or the other spiritual disease; there were some who followed their desire; and others whose weakness of character was open for all to see.

The distinction of the early Muslims rests on the fact that theirs was an excellent society headed by the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); light of faith had enveloped it and rule of religion was enforced in it. This was the condition of the society, per se; although there were among them good as well as bad elements; and there was virtue as well as vice in their psychological make up, and the whole spectrum of mental traits and natural dispositions was found among them.

That is how the Qur'ān describes their condition and comments on their character. Allāh says: Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, and those with him are severe against the unbelievers, compassionate among themselves, you will see them bowing down, prostrating themselves, seeking grace from Allāh and pleasure; their marks are in their faces because of the effect of prostration; that is their description in the Torah and their description in the Injīl; like as seed produce that puts forth its sprout, then strengthens it, so it becomes stout and stands firmly on its stem, delighting the sowers that He may enrage the unbelievers on account of them; Allāh has promised those among them who believe and do good, forgiveness and a great reward (48:29). Mark how the verse begins with description of their collective merits and virtues in general, without attaching any restriction or proviso; but when it comes in the end to individual members of the society, the forgiveness and reward is made conditional to their belief and good deeds.

QUR'ĀN: If then a misfortune befalls you: i.e., if you are slain or wounded; he says: ''Surely Allāh conferred a benefit on me that I was not present with them''; otherwise, I too would have suffered as they did.

QUR'ĀN: And if grace from Allāh comes to you: i.e., spoils or war, etc.; 'grace' refers to wealth and riches, and similar other things; he would certainly cry out, as if there had not been any friendship between you and him: ''Would that I had been with them'': The words portray their condition in dramatic style. After all, they are believers, and the Muslims are limbs of one body; they are joined together with the strongest band — belief in Allāh and His revelation — which controls all other relationships, be it family-tie, guardianship, pledge of allegience or friendship. But their faith is so weak that they do not feel there was any connection between them and the believers. That is why they express their wish to be present with the believers in jihād, as a stranger expresses his desire when he sees someone acquire some wealth: Would that I had been with them, then I should have attained a mighty great fortune. The weakness of their faith and belief is reflected in the high esteem they accord to spoils of war and in their counting the acquirement of worldly riches as 'a mighty good fortune'; while they treat every trouble faced by the believers — being killed or wounded or undergoing other hardships — as 'a misfortune'.

QUR'ĀN: Therefore let those fight in the way of Allāh, who sell this world's lift ... a great reward: ''It is said, ''sharaytu'' (شَرَيْتُ) i.e., I sold; and ishtarayatu (اِشْتَرَيْتُ) i.e., I bought. The meaning will be as follows: They sell this world's life in exchange for the hereafter.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The verse branches out from the preceding exhortation of jihād and condemnation of those who hold back from going forth for it. It urges them again to fight in the way of Allāh by reminding them that all of them were believers who had already sold their worldly life — by accepting the Islam — and bought the hereafter in exchange, as Allāh has said in another place: Surely Allāh has bought of the believers their persons and their properties for this, that they shall have the garden (9:111). Then it exponds the desirable benefit of that fighting, by showing that it brings in a great reward in any case: and whoever fights in the way of Allāh, then be he slain or be he victorious, We shall grant him a great reward.

It makes it clear that the endeavours of a fighter in the way of Allāh are sure to bring in one of the two good results: either he will be killed in the way of Allāh or gain victory over the enemy of Allāh; and in either case he shall find a great reward from Allāh. It does not mention the third possibility, i.e., defeat and retreat; it is a hint that a fighter in the way of Allāh never retreats, never runs away.

The possibility of being slain is mentioned before that of victory, because martyrdom has much greater and more confirmed reward. A fighter who vanquishes an enemy of Allāh is certainly eligible for a great reward; but there is always a danger of forfeiture, if he committed some sins which would make his good deeds forfeit, or if he indulged in evil acts after that. But there is no such risk in martyrdom, as it is the end of this world's life and beginning of that of the hereafter. A martyr therefore is sure to get his great reward in full, while the victorious fighter in the way of Allāh may only hope to get his full reward.

QUR'ĀN: And what reason have you that you should not fight in the way of Allāh and of the weak among the men and the women and the children ...: The word, 'weak', is in conjunction with the name of Allāh. The verse uses the style of questioning for spurring and invigorating the believers to fight. It reminds them that their fighting is in the way of Allāh (and the only goal of your blessed life is to attain His pleasure, and no felicity is more blissful than His nearness), and in the way of your weak men, women and children.

This verse, in fact, uses a very effective style to exhort, urge and incite the whole believing community to fight. As for the sincere pure-hearted believers, it should be enough for them that Allāh was calling them; they would stand up for truth, answer the call of their Lord and respond with all their might to the Messenger's invitation. As for other believers, if that was not enough, they should realize that, apart from its being a jihād in the way of Allāh, it is also a fight in the way of their own men, women and children who are suffering at the hands of the unbelievers; let them have a zealous sense of honour and partisanship and fight for those weakened fellow-religionists.

Islam initially negates every relationship through blood relation or other causes except the relationship of faith. Once a person becomes Muslim, his/her other relationships are re-instated [in the framework of Islam]. Now it becomes incumbent on a Muslim to offer sacrifices to save his Muslim brother who is related to him through faith; also he must do so in case of his other relatives — men, women and children — if they are Muslims, as this sacrifice of wealth and life will actually be an offering in the way of Allāh [as it will be for safety of the Muslims].

Those weak ones who, being related to these believers, are a part of them, are true believers. See how they pray to Allāh, saying: ''Our Lord! take us out of this town''. Also they are humiliated, oppressed and tortured by the polytheists; they are crying out and asking for divine help; ''Our Lord! take us out of this town, whose people are oppressors''. The oppression mentioned here is general; also it does not say that those people were indulging in sins and were therefore unjust to themselves. The clear meaning is that the town's people were oppressing and tormenting them with various kinds of torture — as the history confirms.

Their call for help was couched in a sublime style with excellent wordings. They did not say: 'O our men!', 'O our leaders!', 'O our people!' or 'O our clan!'. Allāh says that they called their Lord and sought help from their True Master; they said: ''Our Lord! take us out of this town, whose people are oppressors''. Then they pointed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and the brave believers who were with him, saying: and make for us from Thee a guardian and give us from Thee a helper. They wished that they should have a guardian and a helper, but they prayed to their Lord, the True Guardian and Helper, to give them human guardian and helper.

SENSE OF HONOUR VIS-A-VIS BIGOTRY

Look at the divine manner manifested by the Honoured Book; and compare it with our own natural instinct — you will see a wonderful reality. No doubt, there is an instinct ingrained in human nature which inspires man to stand for the defence of things he holds dear and considers them as inviolable, like children, women, dignity, national honour and things like that. It is a dictate of nature and is the mainspring of many human actions. But this defence is sometimes praiseworthy, if it is on right course and for right cause; at other times it is blameworthy and causes infelicity and disturbance in society, if it is unjustified and against the truth.

Islam accepts it in principle to the extent the nature demands, but it nullifies all its details. After erasing all traces of base instincts, it diverts it towards Allāh, turning it away from all worldly things. Reaching this stage, it allows it to function in many of the original situations, but moulding it in the matrix of monotheism. It urges man to have a zealous sense of honour for his men, women and children, in short for his every right — gearing it to Allāh's pleasure. Thus Islam confirms the dictate of nature, but cleanses it of pulluted desires and unhealthy emotions; it purifies it and turns it into a safe highway which man proceeds on, helped by his nature. Islam takes it out from darkness of conflict to light of concord and peace. There is no contradiction or disharmony in various parts or aspects of the sense of honour which Islam encourages man to have, and regulates its application. All share the basic characteristics of being various aspects of monotheism, and manifestation of following the truth. Accordingly, all its relevant directives and rules have turned into broad-based, lasting and comprehensive principles, without any contradiction or discordance.

QUR'ĀN: Those who believe fight in the way of Allāh ... Satan: It is a comparison between the believers and the unbelievers in their respective styles of fighting; or more precisely, in the two groups' motives of fighting. This comparison clearly shows the excellence of the believers' way over that of the unbelievers. The way of the believers leads to, and relies on Allāh, in sharp contrast to the unbelievers' way. This provides another motivation for the believers to fight.

QUR'ĀN: Fight therefore against the friends of the Satan; surely the strategy of the Satan is weak: The unbelievers by following the Satan's way have gone out from the guardianship of Allāh. Now they have no guardian or friend except the Satan who is the friend of polytheists and of those who worship other than Allāh. So, he is their friend and they are his friends.

The strategy of the Satan is weak, because it is the way of ṭāghūt which is against the way of Allāh, and all power and strength belongs to Allāh alone. Now, nothing is left for the way of ṭāghūt, that is, for the strategy of the Satan, except weakness. Allāh by expositing the weakness of the unbelievers' way, encourages the believers to fight against them. Obviously, the statement that the Satan's strategy is weak vis-a-vis the power of Allāh, is not a denial of its hold on those who follow their desires.

[aṭ-Ṭabrisī] has written under the verse, O you who believe! take your precaution ...: ''Arms have been called 'precaution', because it is the instrument with which one guards oneself from danger.'' He has further written that this meaning is narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.). Again he writes: ''It has been narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that in detachments means (small) expeditions, and in a body refers to the army.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

Sulaymān ibn Khālid has narrated from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: ''O you who believe!; He has called them believers, but they were not believers, and it is no honour (for them).'' (Then) he recited: O you who believe! take your precaution, ...then I should have attained a mighty good reward; then he said: ''If (all) the inhabitants of the heaven and the earth had said, 'Surely Allāh conferred a benefit on me that I was not with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.)', they would have become polytheists; and when a grace from Allāh comes to the believers, he says: 'Would that I had been with them, then I would have fought in the way of Allāh.' '' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: This theme has been narrated also by aṭ-Ṭabrisī in Majma'u 'l-bayān, and by al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr, from the Imām (a.s.). The polytheism in this ḥadīth refers to the inner polytheism, nat to the open disbelief which deprives man from the protection of Islam — and we have explained it earlier.

Ḥumrān has narrated that al-Bāqir (a.s.) said about the verse, ... and of the weak among the men ...: ''We are those.'' (ibid.)

The author says: The same book has narrated the same meaning through Sumā'ah from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.), and its wording is as follows:

‘‘And as for His word, and of the weak among the men ..., those are we.’’ These two traditions do not aim at giving the explanation of the verse; they fit it on an obviously very apt situation; it is a painful complaint against the rebellious oppressors of this ummah.

[as-Suyūṭī writes:] It has been narrated by Abū Dāwūd (in his an-Nāsikh), Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) through ‘Aṭā’ from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said about the (verse of the) chapter of ‘‘The Women’’: take your precaution, then go forth in detachments, or go forth in a body: ‘‘It was abrogated by (the verse), And it does not beseem the believers that they should go forth all together, ... [9:122].’’

The author says: The two verses are not mutually contradictory, so that it could be said that the latter had abrogated the former, and this non-contradictoriness is quite obvious. Even if there were any contradictoriness, it would have amounted to particularization or restriction, not abrogation.

And all praise is for Allāh.

FOREWORD

1. al ‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī (1321/1904 — 1402/1981) may Allāh have mercy upon him — was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān.

2. al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzān fī tafsīri ’l-Qur’ān which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allāmah has achieved in the Islamic world

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzān because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustādh al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task, because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the eighth volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān. This volume corresponds with the second half of the fourth volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allāh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendixes included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of -the English translation of al Mīzān: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

We implore upon Allāh to effect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work which we have started. May Allāh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

COMMENTARY

The verses are connected to the preceding ones, and all together are in one context. These verses throw light on the affairs of another group of the believers of weak faith; they contain admonition and remind them that this world is transient while the blessings of the hereafter are ever-lasting; and they explain a Qur'ānic reality concerning good and evil.

QUR'ĀN: Have you not seen those to whom it was said . . . or (even) a greater fear: To withhold hands implies refraining from fighting – as the killings (which are a part of fighting) are done by hands. This verse shows that the Muslims, when faced in the beginning with tyrannies and oppressions of the unbelievers, felt unable to restrain themselves and bear the oppressions with patience. They were eager to draw sword. But Allãh ordered them to refrain from fighting; they were rather exhorted to establish the religious rites such as prayer and zakãt, in order to strengthen the religious tenets and faith and establish them on firm footing; only then would Allãh allow them to fight His enemies. Otherwise, the structure of religion would crumble, its pillars would fall down and all its parts would deteriorate.

Obviously, the verses blame those believers: It were they who were impatient to fight the unbelievers, and did not like to withhold their hands even at a time when they did not have any power or armaments to stand before the enemies. But when fighting was prescribed and ordained, a group among them felt terrified of the enemy (who were human beings like themselves) as they should have feared Allãh – or even a greater fear than that.

QUR'ÃN: and say: "Our Lord! why hast Thou ordained fighting for uṣ . . ." : Apparently, it is in conjunction with, a part of them fear men; this explanation looks more appropriate when we ponder on the change of tense from "fear men" (aorist tense) to "say" (which in original text is "said", i.e., past tense). Therefore, the complainants were those very people who in the beginning were so eager to fight and had claimed that they could not bear patiently all those tyrannies of unbelievers; and who at that time were told to restrain themselves.

Again, the sentence, {"Our Lord! why hast Thou ordained fighting for uṣ Wherefore didst Thou not grant us a delay to a near end?"} may be an exposition of their hidden feelings and real condition. Or, it may be a narration of their actual saying. We find many dramatic expressions in the Qur'ãn.

The "end" – i.e., death in normal way – is called "near"; it does not mean that they wanted deliverance from being killed so that they could live a little longer. Rather, it brings into open their feelings that even if they were not killed until they died a natural death, it would still be a short life and near end; so why was not Allãh willing to let them live that short period? Why did He afflict them with quick deaṭh Why did He put them in danger of being killed?

They speak in this manner because their hearts are entangled with this life – which in Qur'ãnic view is but a short provision which is going to end quickly without leaving any trace; and then will come the life hereafter which is the eternal and real life, the really good, rather better, life. That is why their views are rebutted in the words: Say: "The provision of this world is short".

QUR'ĀN: Say: "The provision of this world is short . . . the husk of a date-stone" : Allāh orders the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to reply to these people of weaker faith by exposing their misconception; by showing to them how mistaken they are in preferring this world's short life over the dignity of jihād and martyrdom in the way of Allāh. In short, they are expected to be pious in their belief, when compared to the hereafter, is a short provision, and the hereafter is better for pious ones who guard against evil. Therefore, they should opt for the hereafter which is better than the short provision of this world, for they are believers and on the path of piety. Do they fear that Allāh will harm them or do injustice to them? Is it for this fear that they prefer immediate provision in their hands over the promised good? They should not entertain such ideas because Allāh will never do any injustice to them even like the husk of a date-stone.

This description shows that the word, "for him who guards (against evil)", in a way puts the adjective in place of its qualified noun in order to disclose the underlying reason of this statement and asserts its applicability to the subject in hand. The implication is this – and Allāh knows better: The hereafter is better for you because you, being believers, are supposed to be the people of piety, and the piety makes one achieve the good of the hereafter. In a way, the word, "for him who guards (against evil)", is an indirect criticism of that group.

QUR'ĀN: Wherever you are death will overtake you, though you are in lofty towers : al-Burūj (اَلبرُوُج) is plural of al-burj (اَلبُرْج = tower). It is constructed on forts with extremely strengthened foundation, for repelling the enemy from it and with its help. Its original meaning is show, appearance; and from itis derived al-tabarruj (اَلتَّبَرُّج = displaying the adornments, etc.) at-Tashyīd (اَلتَّشْيِيدُ = setting up) is derived from ash-shayd (اَلشَّيْدُ = mortar), because it strenghtens and raises the building and decorates it. al-Burūju 'l-mushayyadah (اَلبُرُوجُ الْمُشَيَّدَة =) strong lofty edifices built on forts, into which man takes shelter from advancing enemy.

This sentence describes a reality wrapped in an example. The "lofty towers" stands for every strong edifice used as shelter against calamities. In short, it says: Death is something you cannot escape from even if you take refuge in strong shelters. Therefore, you should not think that if you were absent from battle-field or if jihād was not prescribed for you, you would have remained safe from death or that death could not have overtaken you. The death decreed by Allāh will surely reach you.

QUR'ÃN: and if a benefit comes to you, they say: "This is from Allãh;" and if a misfortune befalls them, they say: "This is from you." Say: "All is from Allãh;" but . . . : Two more examples of their foolish talks have been quoted here, and then Allãh orders His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to give its rebuttal by describing the reality about benefit or harm which comes to a man.

The context shows that it was said by the same believers of weaker faith who are mentioned in preceding verses.

It may be based on their actual words, or an inference from their behaviour. There is nothing new in it, because Mūsã (a.s.) also was confronted with a similar accusation; as Allãh has described in the Qur'ãn: But when good came to them they said: "This is due to us;" and when evil afflicted them, they attributed it to the ill-luck of Mūsã and those with him; surely their evil omen is only from Allãh, but most of them do not know (7:131). The same attitude is reported, from all nations vis-à-vis their prophets; and this ummah in its dealings with its Prophet was not behind other nations. Allãh says: . . . their hearts are all alike . . . (2:118; moreover, they resemble most of all to the Children of Israel; and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has said: "They (the Israelites) would not have entered a burrow of a lizard but you too would enter it." We have earlier quoted traditions to this effect from both sects.

Many exegetes have artfully tried to show that these verses were revealed about the Jews, or the hypocrites, or the Jews and the hypocrites together; but obviously the context rejects such interpretation.

In any case, the verse, in this context, shows that the benefit and misfortune here refer to some things which could be attributed to Allãh; but they attributed one group, i.e., benefits and good fortunes to Allãh, and the other group, i.e., harm and misfortunes to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). The good fortunes and misfortunes refer to those occurrences which they were faced with when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) came to them and began raising the edifice of religion and spreading his Call through jihãd; so these words refer, respectively, to victory and war-booty in the encounters and battles which they won, and being slain and wounded and getting troubles in the others. They attributed the misfortunes to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) saying that it was his ill omen, or accusing him of unsound decision and mismanagement. Allãh, then, ordered His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to refute their claim in these words: Say: "All is from Allãh." These are the happenings and misfortunes arranged by the highest authority of this universe, i.e., Allãh alone, Who has no partner or colleague, inasmuch as all things submit to Allãh only – and to no one else – in their existence, continuity and all forthcoming events and incidents. This is what the Qur'ãn teaches us.

Then He asks, like the one who is astonished to see their petrified understanding and dull mind: but what is the matter with these people that well-nigh they do not understand what is told (them), and are unable to know and grasp such a clear reality.

QUR'ÃN: Whatever benefit comes to you, it is from Allãh, and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself*: It was told that: well-nigh they do not understand what is told (them). Therefore, now that Allãh intends to explain the reality, this verse particularly addresses the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) [in 2nd person singular] ignoring those people of low understanding. It explains the reality of good fortune and misfortune that come to a man. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) is not different from others in this reality which is common to all existing things, or at least covers all human beings, believers and disbelievers, virtuous and evil, prophets and common men.

Good or beautiful are the things which man likes by nature, like health, bounties, security and comfort; and they are all from Allãh. Evil or ugly are the things which he dislikes, like disease, humiliation, poverty and mischief; all this in final analysis is caused by man, and is not attributed to Allãh. The verse, in this sense, is not very far from the verse: This is because Allãh does never change a bounty which He has conferred upon a people until they change their own condition, and because Allãh is Hearing, Knowing (8:53). This reality is not contrary to another universal fact – that all good and evil emanates from Allãh, when looked from another angle, as will be explained below.

QUR'ÃN: and We have sent you* (O Prophet!) to mankind as a Messenger, and Allãh is sufficient as a witness: Your only distinction, bestowed by Us, is that you are Our Messenger; you are responsible for conveying Our message to them; and your prestige is of the Divine Messengership. You do not have any other status, nor do you have any power in these affairs. Consequently, you are not responsible for any good luck or misfortune coming to them. You could not bring evil to the people not can you keep any good away from them. It is an indirect refutation of those who attributed bad luck to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and said: "This is from you", perceiving him as an ill omen. Then the refutation is strengthened with the words: "and Allãh is sufficient as a witness".

QUR'ÃN: Whoever obeys the Messenger, he indeed obeys Allãh; and . . . : A new sentence strengthens and reconfirms the preceding statement: and We have sent you to mankind as a Messenger. It also gives the reason for the order given here: You are but Our Messenger; whoever obeys you because of Messengership he indeed obeys Allãh and whoever turns back, so We have not sent you as a keeper over them.

Obviously, the phrase, "Whoever obeys the Messenger", is a sort of adjective put in place of its noun, and it points to the underlying reason of this declaration, as was the case with the sentence: and the hereafter is better for him who guards (against evil); and you shall not be wronged the husk of a date-stone. Accordingly, the theme continues in the same direction, without turning from 2nd person (and We have sent you) to the 3rd. (Whoever obeys the Messenger) and again to the 2nd (We have not sent you . . .).

ATTRIBUTION OF GOOD AND EVIL TO ALLÃH, THE HIGH.

[al-Ḥasanah (اَلْحَسَنَة = good, merit, benefit, beautiful) is opposite of as-sayyiah اَلسَّيِّئَةُ = evil, sin, ugly, misfortune).] Probably, man first became aware of the sense of "beauty" by looking at his fellow human beings' good feature, i.e., balanced stature, well-proportioned limbs and lovely face. Then the meaning was extended to other material objects and phenomena; and finally it was used for "conformity of a thing with its natural purpose".

A human face is called beautiful when its eyes, eye-brows, ears, nose and mouth, etc. are exactly in the shape they should be, and are aligned to one another properly; This in its turn attracts the hearts and excites admiration and love.

If a thing is bereft of beauty, it is called bad, evil and ugly – various words used in different contexts. Ugliness therefore is a negative connotation as beauty is a positive one.

Then the concepts were extended to actions, abstract ideas and other characteristics found in a social set-up, keeping in view whether they were in conformity with society's purpose or not; whether they agree with felicity of human life and its enjoyment or not. Justice is good; doing good to a deserving person is a merit; it is a virtue to educate, to train, to give good advice, etc., where it is needed. Injustice, transgression and similar things are evil and ugly. Why? Because the first group of actions is in accord with the man's felicity and happiness and enables him to enjoy fully the benefits his society offers, while the second is not so. This merit and virtue (and this evil and demerit) get their characteristics from the actions they are related to. There are some actions whose virtue is ever-lasting and perpetual, e.g., justice, because their consistency with the society's aim and purpose is enduring and permanent. Likewise, there are some perpetual demerits like injustice.

On the other hand, there are some actions whose characteristics differ from time to time, place to place and society to society. Laughter and jokes are good in friends' gatherings, but not in presence of elders; in joyous functions, not in mourning assemblies nor in mosques and other places of worship. Fornication and liquor-drinking is good in the Western societies, but evil and sin in the Muslims' eyes.

You should not listen to those who say that [ethical values are relative, and no action has inherent merit or demerit in itself. They say that] virtue and evil are always changing, they have no permanency, no endurance; they are not absolute. They give example of justice and injustice; a system which a group considers based on justice, is diametrically opposed to that which another nation calls just and fair. Flogging a fornicator is justice in Islam, but not so in the Western countries; and so on and so forth. Thus meaning of justice is not fixed and permanent.

But such people are totally confused. They do not differentiate between the meaning [of justice, for example,] and its practical application. We should have no track with people of such a low intelligence.

The fact is that man is ready to change all his social customs, at once or gradually, according to the changing circumstances of the society; but he will never agree that he is deprived of the attribute of "justice", i.e., he is called "unjust". Even if he sees a friend oppressing someone, he will try to find excuses for him [but will not admit that his friend was unjust]. This topic needs detailed discussion, but this is not the place for it, because we are in the middle of a more important discourse. Lastly, the meaning of good and evil was further extended to cover all external happenings which man is faced with in his life owing to various factors. These are the individual or collective events, some of which agree with his expectations and conform with his individual or collective life's felicity, like health and comfort. These are called good or benefits. There are other happenings on the opposite side like calamities and sorrows, poverty or sickness, humiliation or imprisonment, etc.; and they are called evil or misfortune.

It appears from the above that when good and evil are attributed to various affairs or actions, it is done with this criterion in mind: Are these affairs or action in conformity with human perfection or felicity or not. Good and evil are two attributes which are seen in relation to human felicity. This relationship in some cases is lasting and perpetual; while in other things it is changing. For instance, monetary help is good if given to a deserving person, and bad if dished out to an underserving man.

Good is always a positive thing, while evil and ugliness has negative connotation. That is, an evil thing or action lacks the above-mentioned conformity with human felicity. Otherwise, if we ignore this conformity or non-conformity, then the thing or action by itself is one and the same without any difference whatsoever.

Earthquake and flood devastate a community; they are evil and misfortune in their eyes, but their enemies will count them as blessings and good fortune for themselves. Every general calamity, looked from the religion's view-point, is good if it visits the unbelievers, who create mischief in the earth; but the same will be seen as evil and bad if it attacks a believing and good community. Eating food is good and lawful, if it is prepared from one's own money; and the same will become evil and unlawful if it is a part of another man's property taken without his permission. Why? Because it lacks obedience to the prohibition in respect of eating other people's property without permission; or the obedience to the imperative order of restricting oneself to those things only which Allãh has allowed. Sexual intercourse between a man and a woman is good and lawful if it follows marriage; and is evil and sin if it is illicit, without marriage – because the latter lacks conformity with divine commandment. In short, good is a positive aspect of things and actions, and evil is their negative aspect, although the thing or action itself is the same in both cases.

According to Qur'ãn, all that is called "thing" (except Allãh Himself) is created by Allãh. Allãh is the Creator of every thing (39:62); . . . and He created every thing, then ordained for it a measure (25:2). The two verses show that every thing is His creation. Then Allāh says: [Allāh] Who made good every thing that He has created (32:7). Thus, every created thing is good, and this goodness is an integral part of creation which cannot be separated from it; if it is Allāh's creation, it is good.

Every thing has its share of beauty according to its share in creation and existence. If you ponder on the meaning of beauty, described earlier, you will understand our stand more clearly. A thing is good and beautiful if it conforms with the purpose it is intended for; and all parts of existence and all portions of this universe are consistent and in complete harmony with each other. Far be it from the Lord of the universe to create a thing whose parts lack consistency and harmony, or work against each other, as it would negate the intended purpose. Can a created thing overpower the Creator? Or, negate the purpose intended for this wonderful system which astonishes the intelligence and stuns the mind? Allāh says: He is Allāh, the One, the Subduer (of all) (39:4); and He is the Supreme above His servants (6:18); and Allāh is not such that any thing in the heavens or in the earth should weaken Him; surely He is the Knowing, the Powerful (35:44). Thus, nothing can overpower Allāh or weaken Him in anything He intends from His creatures and wishes about His servants.

Consequently, every good blessing in creation is attributed to Him. Likewise, every evil calamity, when seen by itself, and looked according to the basic relationship encompassing the whole creation, is attributable to Allāh – although it seems evil when looked from another angle. It is this reality which is described in some verses of the Qur'ān: and if a benefit comes to them, they say: "It is from Allāh;" and if a misfortune befalls you, they say: "This is from you." Say: "All is from Allāh;" but what is the matter with these people that well-nigh they do not understand what is told (them)? (4:78); But when good came to them they said: "This is due to us;" and when evil afflicted them, they attributed it to the ill-luck of Mūsā and those with him; surely their ill omen is only from Allāh, but most of them do not know (7:131). There are other verses of the same theme.

As for misfortune, the Qur'ān attributes that of the man to the man himself. Allāh says: Whatever benefit comes to you, it is from Allāh, and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself (4:79); And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults) (42:30); Surely Allāh does not change the condition of a people until they change their own condition (13:11); This is because Allãh does never change a bounty which He has conferred upon a people until they change their own condition (8:53); there are many such verses.

In more clear words, the preceding verses show that the calamities and misfortunes too, like good fortunes, are good and beautiful in their creation. Then how do they turn into misfortunes? It is only because they do not agree with some people's, or some thing's, nature and these things or people get hurt by them. It means that Allãh had not created in these items what would agree with these people or things. It is this withholding of generosity which is considered misfortune or calamity for the people or things that get harmed by them, as is clearly seen in the verse: Whatever Allãh grants to men of (His) mercy, there is none to withhold it, and what He withholds there is none to send it forth, and He is the Mighty, the Wise (35:2).

Therefore, Allãh states that this withholding of generosity (when it is withheld), or increase or decrease in sending His mercy forth depends on the ability or capacity of the subject: How much is a person or thing able to benefit from His mercy? Allãh explains it in a similie: He sends down water from the cloud, then the valleys flow (with water) according to their measure (13:17). Also, He says: And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure (15:21). Thus, Allãh bestows a favour on a thing according to what it deserves and keeping its condition in consideration. Does He not know Who has created? And He is the Knower of the subtleties, the Aware (67:14).

We that blessing and affliction, tribulation and comfort from one thing to another according to its particular situation and condition, as Allãh says: And every one has a direction to which he would turn (2:148). Every thing turns to that direction and seeks that item which agrees with its situation.

From the above discourse you will easily understand that happiness and distress, blessing and affliction, vis-à-vis this man, who lives with a free will in the light of the Qur'ãnic teachings, are strongly connected to his own free will; because he is proceeding on a path which will lead him to happiness if followed properly, while deviation from it will put him in turmoil and distress. This, of course, concerns those subjects for which he has been granted free choice.

The Qur'ãn confirms this understanding. Allãh says: That is because Allãh would never change a bounty which He has conferred upon a people until they change their own condition (8:53). Their pure intentions and good deeds have influence on the bounty which they have been blessed with; but when their intention is polluted with insincerity and actions tainted with evil, Allāh changes their condition by withholding His mercy from them. He says: And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults) (42:30). Their actions have a hand in the calamities and misfortunes which befall them, although Allāh pardons most of their misdeeds. Also Allāh says: Whatever benefit comes to you, it is from Allāh, and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself (4:79).

However, you should not imagine that when Allāh revealed this verse to His Prophet (s.a.w.a.), He had forgotten the clear reality which has been stated in the verses which say: Allāh is the Creator of every thing . . . (39:62); [Allāh] Who made good every thing that He has created . . . (32:7). These verses clearly show that every thing has been created by Allāh and is good in itself. And He says: . . . and your Lord is not forgetful (19:64); . . . errs not my Lord, nor does He forget (20:52). So, the verse (Whatever benefit comes to you . . . [4:79]) means that: The good which comes to you – and all that comes to you is good – is from Allāh; and the misfortune which befalls you, it is misfortune for you because it does not agree with your aims and desires, although in itself it is good; you have brought it to yourself by your wrong choice and also you have asked Allāh in the same manner. Allāh is too great to initiate any evil, harm or misfortune for you.

As explained earlier, the verse is particularly addressed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), yet the meaning covers all human beings. In other words, this verse, like the other two (That is because Allāh would never change a bounty which He has conferred . . . [8:53]; And whatever affliction befalls you . . . [42:30]) looks at social affairs as well as individual matters; the human society has its own existence, will and choice distinct from individual ones.

The society is a living entity in which the past generations and ancient people are dissolved [succeeded by coming generations]; in this way, the followers are held responsible for the evil deeds of their predecessors, the living bear the burden of the dead, and the innocent share in the punishment of the wrong-doers – while in the cases of the individuals it is never allowed. We have written about this subject in the second volume of this book in the Essay on the rules governing actions.[1]

[1] al-Mīzān (Eng.), vol.3, pp.251-73. (tr.)

Look at the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) in the battle of Uud. He was inflicted grievous wounds in the face and upper teeth, (and the Muslims too suffered great losses), and he (s.a.w.a.) was sinless prophet. If we attribute this adversity to the society – because they had disobeyed the order given by Allãh and His Messenger – it was a misfortune wrought by the society, and he (s.a.w.a.) was a part of that society. And if it is attributed to his august person, then it was a divinely ordained trial which befell him in the way of Allãh and in course of his sacred divine mission, of which he had full insight and in that case it was rather a grace of Allãh which raised his spiritual status and rank.

Likewise, whatever misfortune befalls a people is attributed to their actions from the Qur'ãnic point of view – and the Qur'ãnic view is but truth; and whatever bounty or benefit comes to them, it is from Allãh.

Of course, there are many verses which attribute the benefits to men themselves to some extent. For example: And if the people of the towns had believed and guarded (against evil), We would certainly have opened up for them blessings from the heaven and the earth . . . (7:96); And We made of them Imãms to guide by Our command as they were patient and they were certain of Our signs (32:24); And We caused them to enter into Our mercy; surely they were of the good ones (21:86).

But at the same time Allãh says that nothing in His creation has power to reach its intended goal or to proceed to any good, except when Allãh gives it such power and guides it to that goal; as He says: "Our Lord is He Who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (to its goal)" (20:50); . . . and were it not for Allãh's grace upon you and His mercy, not one of you would have ever been pure, but Allãh purifies whom He pleases . . . (24:21). These two verses in conjunction with the preceding ones show from another angle how the good comes from Allãh, that is, the man does not possess any good unless Allãh gives it into his possession; therefore all the good is from Allãh and the evil is from the man himself. This further explains the verse: Whatever benefit comes to you, it is from Allãh, and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself.

To sum it up, all good comes from Allãh, because every good thing is His creation and the creation is not separable from goodness; and all good is from Him, because it is good, and He is the owner of all good – others receive goodness only when He gives it into their possession. No harm, evil or misfortune is attributable to Allãh, because evil, per se, is not created, and He is the Creator. So, what is misfortune? When Allāh withholds His mercy from people because of what their hands have done, it is called misfortune, calamity or evil.

As for the good and evil in the meaning of obedience and disobedience, we have discussed about its attribution to Allāh under the verse: Surely Allāh is not ashamed to set forth any parable . . . (2:26), in volume one of this book.[2]

If you see what other exegetes have written on this subject, you will find a great many different views, a lot of conflicting opinions and various objections that will confound you. We hope that what we have written here will be enough for one who contemplates in the words of God. Be careful to keep various aspects of this topic separate from one other, ponder on the Qur'ānic usage of the words, good and evil, bounty and punishment, and differentiate between the entities of society and individual, then you will understand this subject clearly.

TRADITIONS

It is written in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr under the verse, Have you not seen those to whom it was said: "Withhold your hands . . . ": It is narrated by an-Nasā'ī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, al-Ḥākim (who said that this tradition is 'correct') and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) from 'Ikrimah from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān ibn 'Awf and his group came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and said: 'O Prophet of Allāh! We did have power when we were polytheists, but since we accepted the faith, we are humiliated.' The Prophet said: 'I have been ordered to forgive (them); therefore do not fight (these) people.' When Allāh brought him to Medina, He ordered him to fight. But then they withheld (their hands). So, Allāh sent down the verse, Have you not seen those to whom it was said: . . .?

'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir have narrated from Qatādah that he said about this verse: "There were some companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) who were in a hurry to wage war while they were at Mecca before hijrah. They said to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), 'Allow us to take (our) pickaxes in order to fight these polytheists.' And we have been told that 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān ibn 'Awf was among those who had said it. But the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) forbade them to do so and said, 'I have not been ordered this.' When hijrah

came and they were ordered to fight, those people disliked it, and did in this connection what you have heard. Then Allãh said: Say: 'The provision of this world is short, and the hereafter is better for him who guard (against evil); and you shall not be wronged the husk of a date-stone." (ibid.)

Ṣafwãn ibn Yaḥyã narrated from Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) that he said: "Allãh, the High, has said: 'O son of Adam! By My will you have become such that you wish and say; and by My power you discharged the duties imposed by Me (on you); and by My bounty you got power to disobey Me. Whatever benefit comes to you, it is from Allãh; and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself. And it is so because I have more rights on your good deeds than you have yourself; and you are more liable to your sins than Me. And it is because I cannot be questioned concerning what I do, and they shall be questioned.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

The author says: A slightly different version of this tradition has been quoted in volume one of this book under the verse: Surely Allãh is not ashamed to set forth any parable . . . (2:26), and we have discussed it there.[3]

[al-Kulaynī has narrated] through his chains from ʻAbdu 'r-Raḥmãn ibn al-Ḥajãj that he said: "Trial and tribulation was mentioned near Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.), and how Allãh reserves it for the believer. [The Imãm, a.s.] said: 'The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was asked as to who was most severely put to trial in the world. He said: "The Prophets, then the closer to perfection, and then the closer; and the believer is put to test in promotion to his faith and the merit of his deeds; he whose belief is correct and his deeds good, his trial is harder, and he whose belief is feeble and his deeds weaker, his trial is lesser".' " (al-Kãfī)

The author says: There is the famous tradition of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): "The world is the prison of the believer and the paradise of the unbeliever."

It is narrated through several chains from the fifth and the sixth Imãms: "Verily when Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, loves a servant, He immerses him in tribulation thorough immersing." (ibid.)

---

[3] al-Mīzãn, (Eng.), vol.1, p.143. (tr.)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: "The believer is but like the scale of a balance; the more his faith increases, the more his trouble increases." (ibid.)

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: "Verily Allāh takes care of a believer through trials as a man takes care of his family through gifts during (his) absence; and denies to him the world as a physician denies harmful food to a patient." (ibid.)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said: 'Allāh does not need a servant in whose property and body there is no share for Allāh.'"

ʻAlī ibn al-Ḥusayn has narrated from his father (peace be on both) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said: 'If a believer were to live on a mountain, Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, would surely send someone to him to annoy him, in order that He should give him [the believer] its reward.' " (ʻIlalu 'sh-sharāiʻ)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: "Worries and griefs always remain with a believer until they wipe out his sins." (Kitābu 't-Tamḥīṣ)

The same Imām (a.s.) said: "A believer does not pass forty nights without some thing sorrowful happening to him, which reminds his Lord to him." (ibid.)

ʻAlī (a.s.) said: "Even if a mountain loved me it would break down." Also, he (a.s.) said: "He who loves us, the Ahlu 'l-bayt, should prepare for himself a cover against tribulation." (Nahju 'l-balāghah)

The author says: Ibn Abil-Ḥadīd says in his Commentary of Nahju 'l-balāghah: "It is confirmed that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had said to him [ʻAlī, a.s.]: 'No one will love you except a believer, nor will hate you except a hypocrite;' and also it is definitely known that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had said: 'Tribulation runs quicker to the believer than water to a downward slope.' These two premises together lead us to the correct conclusion that even if a mountain were to love ʻAlī, it would break down."

You should know that there are so many traditions of this theme, and they support the Commentary written above.

Ibnul-Mundhir and al-Khaṭīb have narrated from Ibn ʻUmar that he said: "We were with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) together with a group of his companions. He said: 'O people! Don't you know that I am the Messenger of Allāh sent to you?' They said: 'Certainly.' He (again) said: 'Don't you know that Allāh has revealed in his Book that whoever obeys me, he obeys Allāḥ' They said: 'Certainly. We bear witness that whoever obeys you, he obeys Allāh, and that obeying you is a part of His obedience.' Then he said: 'So, it is a part of Allãh's obedience that you should obey me; and it is a part of my obedience that you should obey your Imãms; if they pray in sitting position, you should pray in sitting position.' "

The author says: The last sentence shows that it is obligatory to follow them completely.

C O M M E N T A R Y

The verses are not without some connection with the preceding ones. Apparently, they supplement the previous talk which had admonished the Muslims of weak faith. It aims at exhorting them in a manner that would open their eyes, if they pondered and reflected.

QUR'ÃN: And they say: "Obedience." . . . : Obedience is predicate of a deleted subject, as the scholars have said; and the full sentence is, 'Our business is obedience', that is, 'We obey you totally.' al-Burūz (اَلْبُرُوزُ = to go out); at-tabyīt (اَلتَّبْيِيْتُ = to hatch an evil plan by night); the phrase translated here as, other than what you say, may also be rendered as, other than what they say.

The verse says – and Allãh knows better: When you call them to jihãd, they say to you that they will obey you totally in all matters. But when they go out of your presence, they plan at night to do opposite of what they had told you or opposite of what you had told them. It is reflection on their determination to act against the orders of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). Then Allãh tells His Messenger to turn aside from them and have trust in Allãh, as He says: therefore turn aside from them and trust in Allãh, and Allãh is sufficient as a protector.

There is no proof that the verse speaks about the hypocrites, as some exeget have claimed; the continuation of the context shows that the talk is about the same believers of weaker faith mentioned above.

QUR'ÃN: Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ãn? . . . : It is an exhortation in the form of 'question'. at-Tadabbur (اَلتَّدَبُّرُ = translated here as meditation) literally means to take one thing after another. In this verse it may mean to ponder on one verse after another; or, to ponder on a verse repeatedly. However, as it aims at showing that there was no discrepancy in the Qur'ãn, and it naturally means looking at more than one verse, the former explanation (pondering on one verse after another) seems more appropriate, although the latter cannot be ruled out completely.

It is an exhortation for them to ponder on the Qur'ãnic verses. Whenever they want to look at a revealed order, an expanded wisdom, a story, an admonition or any other themes, they must look at all the relevant verses, of the Meccan period or Medinite, the decisive and the ambiguous ; then they should put them all together to realize that there was no discrepancy or contradiction at all. Rather it will be seen that the earlier verses verify the later ones, and each confirms the other – without a trace of any imaginable discrepancy. There is no contradiction: nowhere a verse negates another, nor do they oppose one another. There is no disharmony: no two verses are asymmetrical in beauty of style or firmness of meanings and themes, because no part of it is weaker or less perfect than the other. It is a Book confirming in its various parts, oft-repeating, whereat do shudder the skins.

This total absence of discrepancy will make them believe that the Qur'ãn is a Book revealed by Allãh, and no one else. If it were from someone else, it could not avoid a lot of discrepancy. Every thing found in this universe – and especially man, who the doubters allege, has written this Book – in its very existence and by its nature is founded on constant movement and change; is always in pursuit of perfection. Every single entity in this world in its life's journey passes through different stages and acquires varying dimensions.

It is hard to find a man who does not think that today he is wiser than he was yesterday. Everyone believes that the work he has done or the opinion he has formed lately is much better and reasonable than the one he had had earlier. Even you ponder on a single but prolonged work, like a book written, a poem composed or a lecture delivered, you will find that its last portion is better than the first, or that some parts excel the others in quality.

No man is free from discrepancy and difference in his work, or even in his own self; and it is not one or two differences or contradictions, but a lot. This is a common trend running throughout the world (including man) which is governed by the laws of gradual change and general advancement towards perfection. Nothing in this creation remains in one condition for two consecutive moments; its specificity and situation constantly change.

This shows the true significance of the word 'many' in many a discrepancy. It is an explanatory adjective, not a restrictive one. It says: If this Qur'ãn were from someone other than Allãh, they would have found discrepancy in it, and those discrepancies would have been in a large quantity, because it is the intrinsic nature of every thing which emanates from other than Allãh. In other words, the verse negates all discrepancies, whether a few or many; not that it denies only 'numerous discrepancies' leaving the door open for a few contradictions.

In short, a meditator on the Qur'ãn will at once realize that it is a book which deals with all the affairs related to humanity. It expounds the knowledge of genesis and resurrection; creation and existence; it explains the general human virtues, and lays down the social and personal laws which encompass the whole human species and guide them in all big and small affairs; then there are stories, lessons and sermons. And all this in such an excellent and succinct style that it challenged the whole world to bring its like. [Then, this book was not written all together in a short period;] it is made up of verses which were revealed piece-meal in a long period of twenty three years, in [different times and] various conditions: at night and in day time, in heat of war and tranquility of peace, in good days and bad, in hardship and ease; [but its excellence remained unaffected]. There never was any change in its miraculous and supernatural rhetorics, nor any discrepancy in its excellent knowledge and sublime wisdom, nor in its social and personal laws. Its later parts agree with what its earlier parts had established, and its details and branches are consistent with its roots and stems.

Analyse its laws and rules and you will find them firmly based on pristine monotheism; and that monotheism when looked vis-à-vis divinely gifted wisdom appears in the details of sharī'ah. So this is the Qur'ãn.

A man, pondering on it in this manner, is bound to admit – because of his vital intelligence and natural discernment – that this book was not written by someone who was subject to change and gradual development which permeate the universe, nor was he affected by passage of time. This is nothing but the speech of Allãh, the One, the Subduer.

The verse shows that:

1. The Qur'ãn is within the reach of the normal understanding;

2. The Qur'ãn is a Book which is not liable to abrogation or nullification; it does not need any completion or refinement; no one has any authority to judge or control it. Because, it it is subject to these things, naturally it will have to undergo change and alternation; but inasmuch as the Qur'ãn is free from discrepancy, it cannot admit any change or alternation. Consequently, it is not liable to abrogation, nullification, etc. It follows that the sharī'ah of Islam will continue upto the Day of Resurrection.

QUR'ÃN: And when there comes to them news of security or fear, they spread it: al-Idhã'ah (الأذاعة = to publish, to spread, to announce). The verse contains a sort of condemnation and reproach to them for this rumour-mongering. The following sentence, and were it not for the grace of Allãh upon you and His mercy, you would have certainly followed the Satan, save a few, clearly shows that the believers were in danger of going astray because of this adverse propaganda. The danger was of disobeying the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); because this is the theme of these verses. This view is supported by the next verse where the Prophet is ordered to fight the disbelievers even if he remained alone without any helper.

All this together proves that the "news of security or fear" refers to the false rumours which the disbelievers' agents used to bring to Medina for creating disharmony and discord among the believers; and the believers of weaker faith spread it without thinking over it. This in its turn caused loss of courage and vigour in the believers. However, Allãh saved them from following those Satans who had brought such news for discouraging the believers.

These verses fit completely on the events of the Lesser Badr,[4] which was described in the chapter of "The House of 'Imrãn". The verses agree in theme with those in that chapter, as will be clear on meditation. Allãh says there: (As for) those who responded to the call of Allãh and the Messenger (even) after the wound had afflicted them, those among them who do good (to others) and guard (against evil) shall have a great reward. Those to who the people said: "Surely men have gathered against you, therefore fear them"; but this (only) increased their faith, and they said: "Allãh is sufficient for us and most excellent Protector is (He)". So they returned with favour from Allãh and (His) grace; no evil touched them and they followed the pleasure of Allãh; and Allãh is the Lord of the mighty grace. That is only the Satan that frightens his friends; so do not fear them, and fear Me if you are Believers (3:172-5).

[4] al-Mīzãn, (Eng.), vol.7, pp.110-13 (tr.).

As you see, these verses describe how the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was calling the people, "after the wound had afflicted them" in the calamity of Uḥud, to come with him to meet the disbelievers, and how some people were demoralizing the believers, trying to turn them away from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and frightening them that the polytheists were gathered together against the believers. Then, the verses assert that all this was a plan of the Satan who spoke through his friends; and exhort the believers not to fear the Satan and his friends; rather they should fear Allãh if they were believers.

Ponder on these verses and then again on the verses under discussion (And when there comes to them news of security or fear . . .). Your will find no room for doubt that the verses under discussion too describe the same episode of the Lesser Badr. The Qur'ãn includes that episode in the list of the behaviours for which it blames the believers of the weaker faith. For example: but when fighting was prescribed for them . . . ; "Our Lord! why hast Thou ordained fighting for uṣ" . . . and if a benefit comes to them . . . ; And they say: "Obedience". And then it goes on to say in the same tone: "And when there comes to them news of security or fear, they spread it."

QUR'ÃN: and if they had referred it to the Messenger and to those in authority among them, those among them who* (can) draw out the truth of it, would have known it: Here they are not required to refer it to Allãh as was done in the preceding verse 59: then if you quarrel about anything, refer it to Allãh and the Messenger if you believe in Allãh and the last day. It is because in that verse the talk was about a disputed legislative order; and on one has any authority in that field except Allãh and His Messenger. But in the verse under discussion they are told to refer a news of security or fear, and such a news cannot be referred to Allãh and His book; the people who could decide about it were the Messenger and those in authority among them. If the news were referred to them they could find out its reality and explain to the believers whether it was true or false, right or wrong.

The knowledge [in "would have known"] means distinguishing truth from falsehood and right from wrong; it is the same connotation as is found in the verses: that Allãh might know who fears Him in secret (5:94); And most certainly Allãh will know those who believe, and most certainly He will know the hypocrites (29:11).

Istinbāṭ (اِسْتِنْبَاطْ = to draw out a talk from ambiguity to distinctness and knowledge); it is derived from an-nabṭ (اَلنَّبَطْ = to gush out, to stream forth). The phrase, "those among them who (can) draw out the truth of it", may point to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and those in authority; that they may investigate the matter and find out the truth. Or, it may point to those who are required to refer it to the Messenger and the people of authority; in that case, it would mean that the believers would know the truth as shown by the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and those in authority.

According to the former interpretation (which is the obvious meaning of the verse), the verse says that the Messenger and the people of authority will distinguish the truth if they draw out the reality, that is, if they think that doing so is in the interest of the religion and society. According to the second interpretation, it will mean: Those believers who ask and are eager to know the truth of the matter will know it [from the Messenger and the people of authority].

The phrase, ulu 'l-amr (= أُولُوالأَمْرِ those vested with authority; those in authority) has the same connotations in the preceding verse 59: O you who believe! obey Allãh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you. As described there, the exegetes have differed much in the explanation of this phrase; however mainly there are five interpretations. The meaning which we have mentioned here is more obvious from this verse [as is explained below].

1. The view that ulu 'l-amr means the leaders of the fighting detachments is not relevant here. Those leaders had no authority except over a particular band of fighters in a particular combat; they had no knowledge or authority beyond that. But the verse here talks about something much bigger and more important: Disturbance of security, spreading of fear and general fright which the polytheists caused by infiltrating spies and secret agents who spread rumours to demoralize the believers. What concern the leaders of fighting bands had with such matterș How could they explain the truth or otherwise of such news if the people referred it to them?

2. The opinion that ulu 'l-amr means scholars is equally irrelevant. The scholars – and in that era they were the narrators of traditions, jurisprudents, reciters of Qur'ãn and theologians – had expertise in tradition, jurisprudence, etc. But this verse speaks about matters of security and general feeling of terror; it is concerned with such news which was deeply connected with political affairs, which if ignored or wrongly handled could disturb the Muslims' lives and result in such sociological calamities which no reformer could ever put right. It could nullify the nation's endeavours in the path of its felicity; or could rob them of their supremacy and make them prey of humiliation and degradation, or leave them to be killed or imprisoned. What expertise did the scholars – in their capacity as narrators of traditions, experts of jurisprudence or reciters of Qur'ãn and so on – have in these matters, that Allãh would order the people to refer such news to them? How could they solve such problems in the political arena?

3. The opinion that it refers to the 'rightly guided' caliphs (Abū Bakr, 'Umar, 'Uthmãn and 'Alī) is more baseless. First of all, there is no proof for it in the Book of Allãh or a definitely accepted tradition. Secondly, we have a right to ask: Was the order given in this verse limited to the time of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.)? Or, was it general – for his time as well as after him? If it was meant for his time only, then the four personalities should have been known as the people of authority o all the people and particularly to the Companions of the Prophet; but the history and traditions do not record any such especial status for them at all. In case it was valid for the post-Prophetic era too, then its validity was bound to expire after those four caliphs had passed away. If so, then the verse should have contained some indication to that effect as is the case with other verses which announce some especial rules for the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); but the verse does not hint at any such limitation.

4. The interpretation of ulu 'l-amr as the people who 'tie and open', the influential persons, is equally out of place. Such exegetes know that there was no group, in the days of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), known as ahlu 'l-ḥalli wa 'l-'aqd, like other civilized societies which do have well-defined committees and councils, e.g. cabinet of ministers, delegations sent to conferences, etc. At that time the only rule implemented in the ummah was of Allãh and His Messenger. This difficulty compelled him to say that ulu 'l-amr were those Companions whose advice was sought and whom the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) consulted.

But, the fact remains that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) included in his consultations not only the believers but even hypocrites like 'Abdullãh ibn Abī and his band. The story of his consultation in the battle of Uḥud is well-known. How can Allãh order the believers to refer such sensitive news to such people?

Moreover, no one denies that 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmãn ibn 'Awf was among those who had this status in the life of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and even after him. And these verses, which admonish the believers of weaker faith and put them to shame for what they had done, have begun with exposing him and his group in these words: Have you not seen those to whom it was said: "Withhold your hands . . ." This tradition has been narrated by an-Nasāī (in his Ṣaḥīḥ), al-Ḥākim (in his al-Mustadrak, declaring that it is a correct tradition) and aṭ-Ṭabarī and others in their books of tafsīr. And the said traditions have been given under "Traditions" under the preceding verses. Keeping this in view, how can one say that the believers were ordered to refer this matter to such people?

Now, remains only the fifth interpretation which we had preferred under the verse: obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you . . . (4:59). [That is: The ulu 'l-amr are the Twelve sinless successors of the Holy Prophet, s.a.w.a.]

QUR'ĀN: and were it not for the grace of Allāh upon you and his mercy, you would have certainly followed the Satan save a few: As stated earlier, the verses apparently point to the events of the Lesser Badr when Abū Sufyān had sent Naʿīm ibn Masʿūd al-Ashjaʿī to Medina to spread fear and fright among the people in order that they should not go forth to Badr. Hence, following of Satan means acceptance of the said news and failure to go to Badr.

In that case, the exception, "save a few", is quite in place; there is no need to strive artfully and stretch its meaning. Naʿīm had informed the Muslims that Abū Sufyān had gathered many groups and readied a huge armies; therefore the Muslims should not go out to fight against them, otherwise they (the Muslims) would be annihilated. This rumour demoralized the people and they offered many excuses for not going to Badr. Only the Prophet and a few persons nearest to him remained steadfast, and it is they who are mentioned in the exception phrase, "save a few". Most of the people had wavered and tried to avoid going out, except a few steadfast ones; then some more joined them and the group proceeded out.

This interpretation of the exception clause is supported by the earlier-mentioned context and association, and the meaning is quite clear.

The exegetes have, however, interpreted this clause in various artful ways, none of them free from distortion or misrepresentation. For example:-

1. The grace and mercy of Allāh points to the divine guidance which led them to the obedience of Allāh, His Messenger and those in authority; and the excepted 'few' refers to the good-natured pure-hearted believers. Thus, the verse means: If Allāh had not guided you to the obedience by ordering you to refer the matter to those in authority, you would certainly have followed the Satan by falling into error and going astray, except a few good-natured believers among you who would not have deviated from truth and goodness.

COMMENT: This interpretation confines the divine grace and mercy to a certain order while there is no reason for such restriction. It is not in keeping with the Qur'ãnic style. Moreover, the verse apparently describes Allãh's favour for something which had already passed and was completed.

2. The verse means what it apparently says. The believers of weaker faith need extra grace and mercy from Allãh, although the sincere ones too cannot manage without divine care.

COMMENT: If it is its apparent meaning, then the Qur'ãn, in its sublime literary style, must have rebutted it here and now. But it has not. Allãh says: and were it not for Allãh's grace upon you and His mercy, not one of you would have ever been pure (24:21); and He says to His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) who was the best of the human beings: And had it not been that We had already established you, you would certainly have been near to incline to them a little; in that case We would certainly have made you to taste a double (punishment) in this life and a double (punishment) after death . . . (17:74-75).

3. The divine grace and mercy means the Qur'ãn and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

4. It means the victory. The exception then is perfectly in place; because the majority stands firm on truth only when their hearts are happy as a result of victory and similar [worldly] benefits, which prove to them that God cares for them. Otherwise, if they were to taste bitter truth, then only a few believers would submit to it, that is, those only who might be having deep insight of the religion.

5. The exception, "save a few", is related to the verb, "they spread it".

6. No. It is related to the verb, "who (can) draw out the truth of it".

7. The exception is in word only; it actually has the connotation of comprehensiveness. Thus the verse actually means, 'and were it not for the divine grace and mercy, all of you would have certainly followed the Satan'. It is not unlike the verse: We will make you recite so you shall not forget, except what Allãh pleases (87:6-7). Because in this case too, the exception emphasises the comprehensiveness of "not forgetting".

COMMENT: All these explanations are merely literary affection and trickery.

QUR'ÃN: Fight then in Allãh's way; this is not imposed on you except in relation to yourself, and rouse the believers to ardour . . . exemplary punishment: at-Taklīf (اَلتَّكْلِيف) is derived from al-kulfah (اَلْكُلْفَه = discomfort, hardship) and means imposition of duty and responsibility, because the person concerned undergoes hardship in discharging his duties. at-Tankīl (اَلتَّنْكِيْل) is derived from an-nakãl (اَلنَّكَال = exemplary punishment). According to Majma'u 'l-bayãn, it means: a punishment which discourages the guilty from committing that error again and makes him into a lesson to others; in short, a punishment fear of which prevents people from doing such mischief in future.

"Fa" (فَ = then, so) in "Fight then in Allãh's way" signifies that the order to fight, [even alone, if necessary] is based on the sum-total of the preceding verses, that is, the people's apathy and lethargy in going forth to face the enemy. It is clearly reflected in the sentences that follow: "this is not imposed on you except in relation to yourself . . . " The meaning, therefore, is as follows: As they are lethargic concerning jihãd and are unwilling to fight, then you, O Messenger of Allãh! should fight the unbelievers on your own; do not be disheartened because of their apathy and disobedience of the divine command; you will no be asked about their obligation, you are responsible only for your own duties. As for the others, your only responsibility is to exhort and rouse them to fight. Therefore, you go forth for fighting and at the same time rouse the believers to ardour. May be, in this way Allãh will prevent the unbelievers from fighting. The sentence, "this is not imposed on you except in relation to yourself", actually means, 'except concerning your own deed'. In other words, there is in this excepted clause a deleted first construct of possessive case.

"may be Allãh will restrain . . .": I was mentioned that 'asã (عَسي = may be) expressed hope. That hope can be found in the mind of the speaker, or the addressee, or it may arise because of the situation. As such, there is no need to assert that 'may be', when used by Allãh, denotes certainty.

Through this verse, Allãh further reviles those people who showed apathy towards jihãd until Allãh ordered His Prophet to go forth for fighting alone; and told him to turn aside from those sluggish people. He should not exhort them to answer the call for jihãd; rather he should leave them alone. He should not be discouraged by their behaviour. His only responsibility is in relation to his own self; apart from that, he should rouse the believers to ardour – and then let him who wants answer the call, and him who wants disobey Allãh and His Prophet.

[al-Kulaynī narrates] through his chains from Muḥammad ibn ʻAjlãn that he said: "I heard Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) saying: 'Allãh had put some people to shame because of their spreading [rumours], as He, the Mighty, the Great, says: And when there comes to them news of security or fear, they spread it. Therefore, take care not to spread [rumours].' " (al-Kãfī)

Also he narrates from ʻAbdul-Ḥamīd ibn Abi d-Daylam from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, has said: Obey Allãh and the Messenger and those vested with authority from among you; also He has said: and if they had referred it to the Messenger and to those in authority among them, those among them who (can) draw out the truth in it would have known it. Thus He has returned the people to ulu 'l-amr from among them, ordering them (the people) to obey them (ulu 'l-amr) and refer all affairs to them." (ibid.)

The author says: This ḥadīth supports the explanation given by us that ulu 'l-amr in this verse refers to the same Imãms who were mentioned in the 59th verse.

ʻAbdullãh ibn ʻAjlãn narrates from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) about the words of Allãh: and if they had referred it ot the Messenger and to those in authority among them, that he (the Imãm, a.s.) said: "They are the Imãms." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

The author says: This meaning has also been narrated from ʻAbdullãh ibn Jundab from ar-Riḍã (a.s.) in a letter which the Imãm (a.s.) had written about the al-Wãqifiyyah. The same meaning is narrated by al-Mufīd in al-Ikhtiṣãṣ from Isḥãq ibn ʻAmmãr from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.), inter alia, in a long tradition.

Muḥammad ibn al-Fuḍayl narrates from Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) about the word of Allãh: and were it not for the grace of Allãh upon you and His mercy, that [the Imãm, a.s.] said: "Grace is the Messenger of Allãh and His mercy is the Commander of the Believers." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

Zurārah has narrated from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.), and Ḥumrān from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.), that they said: "Allāh's grace is His Messenger and His mercy is al-wilāyah (اَلْوِلاَيَة = love and obedience) of the Imāms." (ibid.)

Muḥammad ibn al-Fuḍayl narrates from al-‘Abdu 'ṣ-Ṣāliḥ [the 7th Imām, a.s.] that he said: "The mercy is the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and the grace, ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.)." (ibid.)

The author says: These traditions are based on the flow of the Qur’ān; and they explain the divine grace and mercy in terms of messengership and imāmat. These are the two connected ropes with which Allāh has rescued us from the pit of straying and the trap of the Satan. One of them is the source of bringing the Truth, while the other is the means of keeping it alive. The last tradition is more in keeping with the Qur’ānic point of view, because Allāh has named His Messenger (s.a.w.a.) 'Mercy', as He says in His book: And We have not sent you but as a mercy to the world (21:107).

‘Alī ibn Ḥadīd narrates through Murāzim from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "Allāh imposed a duty on the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) which He had not imposed on anyone before him; then he imposed on him to go forth all alone against all the people, even if he did not find any group to stand by him; and He had not obliged anyone before or after him to do so." Then he recited this verse: Fight then in Allāh's way; this is not imposed on you except in relation to yourself. Then the Imām (a.s.) said: "And Allāh granted him to take for himself what Allāh has taken for himself. Thus Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says: Whoever brings a good deed, he shall have ten like it."[5] And likewise He has made Ṣalawāt for the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) (equal to) ten good deeds." (al-Kāfī)

Sulaymān ibn Khālid says: "I informed Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) about what the people said concerning ‘Alī (a.s.): 'If he had any right then what prevented him from standing up for iṭ' (The Imām, a.s.) said: 'Verily Allāh has not imposed such duty to anyone except the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) as He says: Fight then in Allāh's way; this is not imposed on you except in relation to yourself, and rouse the believers to ardour. So, this is not except for the Messenger; and He has said about the others: [And whoever shall turn his back to them on that day] unless he turns aside for the sake of fighting or withdraws to a company . . . [6]; and at that time there was no group to support him (ʻAlī, a.s.) in his affair." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

Zayd ash-Shaḥḥām narrates from Jaʻfar ibn Muḥammad (peace be on both) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) never said 'No' when he was asked for anything. If he had it, he gave it; if he did not have it, he said: 'It will be if Allāh so wishes'; and he never took revenge of any evil (done to him); and he never met any expedition but he himself was on head of it – ever since the verse was revealed to him: Fight then in Allāh's way; this is not imposed on you except in relation to yourself. (ibid.)

The author says: There are other traditions too of the same meaning.

COMMENTARY

The verses are connected with the preceding ones, as these are concerned with the order of fighting against a particular group of polytheists – the double-faced among them. On meditation it is seen that they were revealed about some polytheists who claimed to accept Islam in presence of the believers, and then they returned to their homes and joined the polytheists in disbelief. [When a chance came to fight them], the believers were divided; one group said that they should be fought against, while the other opposed it and interceded for them because they had accepted Islam. But Allãh offers them only two alternatives: they should [leave their original place and] migrate to medina otherwise they should be struck at. Then He warns the believers against interceding for such people.

Such people will be repeatedly followed by others like them; all of them will be required to offer peace to the Muslims; if they fail to do so, they should be fought. This is the main theme, for which the ground is paved by describing the condition of intercession in one verse, and offering of greetings in another, as it is relevant to offering of peace.

QUR'ÃN: Whoever intercedes a good intercession . . . : an-Naṣīb (اَلنَّصِيْبُ) and al-kifl (اَلْكِفْل) both have the same meaning, that is, share [although we have translated the latter as 'responsibility']. Intercession is a sort of mediation aimed at making up a deficiency or gaining a benefit out the desire defect. Therefore, it cannot escape its responsibility, and will have to share the blame or reward of the thing interceded for. The interceder will have his share of good or evil resulting from the intercession. That is why Allãh says: Whoever intercedes . . . shall have the responsibility of it.

By mentioning this reality, Allãh reminds the believers and warns them to be careful when interceding for someone. They should refrain if the subject of intercession was undesirable and likely to cause evil and mischief. For example, some believers had interceded on behalf of the double-faced polytheists that they should not be attacked. Those interceders should have realized that if a small evil is left unopposed and allowed to grow and spread, it would result in such a great evil that no one would be able to stand against it and it would destroy the tilth and the stock. The verse therefore contains a prohibition of bad intercession, that is, intercession of those indulging in oppression and transgression, hypocrisy and polytheism – in short for those who create mischief on the earth.

QUR'ÃN: And when you are greeted with a greeting . . . : A greeting should be returned with a better or a similar greeting. It is a general order covering all greetings; but in this context it is applicable to the greeting of peace which might be addressed to the Muslims, as the following verses show.

QUR'ÃN: Allãh, there is no god but He – He will most a certainly gather you . . . : Its meaning is clear. It gives a sort of reason to the orders given in the preceding two verses: Adhere to the order given to you regarding good and bad intercession; and do not ignore the greetings offered to you, by turning aside or rejecting it; because a day is sure to come when Allãh will gather you all and reward or punish you for acceptance or rejection of His commandments.

QUR'ÃN: What is the matter with you, then, that you have become two parties about the hypocrites, while Allãh has made them return* (to unbelief) *for what they have earned? . . . : al-Fi'ah (اَلفِئَةْ = group, party); al-irkãs (اَلأركاسُ = to return). The theme shows that the verse in a way branches out from the preceding one which had paved the way for it, that is, Whoever intercedes a good intercession . . . The meaning will be as follows: As a bad intercession makes the interceder share in its bad effects, then what has happened to you, O believers, that you have become divided into two groups regarding the double-faced polytheists? Why are you disputing among yourselves? One party says that those polytheists should be fought against, while the other intercedes for them and exhorts the believers not to fight. This latter group wants you to leave the tree of mischief alone; not realizing that the tree will go on growing with the polytheists' growth, and will bear fruit when those polytheists become stronger. The fact remains that Allāh has let them return to straying after they had got out of it; it was done as a punishment for what they had earned of evil deeds. Do you want – through your intercession – to guide those whom Allāh has left to go astray? But whosoever is left by Allāh to go astray, cannot get to the path of guidance.

The sentence, And whomsoever Allāh forsakes to stray, you [2nd person singular] shall by no means find a way for him, is addressed directly to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), instead of the believers; it is intended to show that those Muslims who had interceded on behalf of the double-faced polytheists were not capable of understanding this speech property; otherwise, they would not have interceded. That is why Allāh has turned away from them and addressed the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), who had true and clear knowledge of these realities.

QUR'ĀN: They desire that you should disbelieve . . . or a helper: It is a further explanation of the words, while Allāh has made them return (to disbelief) for what they have earned? Do you wish to guide him whom Allāh has forsaken to stray? The meaning: They disbelieved, and then went further in disbelief, until now they wish you to join them in their disbelief, so that you too might become like them. Then Allāh forbids the Muslims to take friends from among them except when they leave their homes and migrate in the way of Allāh. If they fail to do so, then your only duty towards them is to seize them and kill them wherever they are found; the believers must refrain from befriending them or seeking their help. The clause, "but if they return back", indicates that the believers must ask them to migrate; if they migrated then they should be taken as friends, otherwise they are to be killed.

QUR'ĀN: Except those who reach a people . . . for you a way against them: Allāh has excepted two groups from the above order (if they turn back then seize them and kill them wherever you find them). One: Those who reach a people who have made a covenant with the Muslims. Two: Those disbelievers who find themselves in a dilemma; they do not like to fight the Muslims, nor do they relish the idea of fighting against their own people. Thus they withdraw from the believers and offer them peace; they are neither with the believers nor against them. These two groups are excepted from the above order.

QUR'ÃN: Shortly you will find others . . . against these We have given you a clear authority: It is a forecast that shortly you will face another group, like the second excepted one. They will try to be safe from you as well as from their own people. But Allãh tells the believers that those people are hypocrites; no trust should be put in their covenants or their offer of peace. That is why Allãh has changed the two positive conditions imposed on the former group (if they withdraw from you and do not fight you and offer you peace) with the negative conditions for this latter one: if they do not withdraw from you, and (do not) offer you peace and restrain their hands. It is a sort of warning that the believers should remain on guard against them. The meaning is clear.

ON GREETINGS

The peoples and nations, civilized and uncivilized, developed and less developed, all have their own ways of greetings used when one person meets another; these greetings take various forms: there is nodding of head or bowing it, raising hand in various ways, removing the hat and many similar gestures. It all depends on different factors active in the society, concerned.

Look at different forms of greetings found in various societies, and you will find that all of them demonstrate a sort of submission, self-abasement and degradation, offered by a lowly person to an august personality, by a plebeian to a high-bred, by an obedient follower to the one in authority, by a slave to his master. In short, all these customs are relics of the slavery system which has prevailed throughout the world from the early primitive ages in one form or the other. That is why these greetings are always offered by a follower to his leader, and a subordinate to his superior. This, in short, is a result of idolatry nurtured by the system of slavery.

As you know, the most important aim of Islam is to erase idolatry and every rite resulting from or based on it. That is why Islam has initiated a system of greeting free from such defects, in contrast to the relics of idol-worship and slavery. The Islamic greeting offers peace to the greeted one. It offers him safety from transgression against his rights, and assures him that he has nothing to fear from the greeter concerning his natural freedom bestowed on him by the Creator. Obviously, it is the first requirement of a social order based on mutual cooperation that the individual members should feel secure and safe from one another as far as their lives, honour and properties are concerned. Every social trouble emanates from one of these three factors .

This is the as-salãm (السَّلامُ = peace, greeting) which Allãh has prescribed for the people when they meet each other. He says: So when you enter houses greet your people with a salutation from Allãh blessed (and) goodly (24:61); O you who believe! do not enter houses other than your own houses until you have asked permission and saluted their inmates; this is better for you, that you may be mindful (24:27). Allãh has taught His Messenger (s.a.w.a.) to greet the believers – although he is their Chief: And when those who believe in Our signs come to you, say: "Peace be on you, your Lord has ordained mercy on Himself, . . . " (6:54); and also ordered him to offer peace to the others: So turn away from them and say, "Peace!" for they shall soon come to know (43: 89).

Greeting, by offering 'peace', was common in pre-Islamic Arabia, as is seen in the poetry and other forms of literature transmitted from them. Lisanu 'l-'Arab says: "The Arabs in pre-Islamic days greeted each other in various ways: one said to one's companion: 'Good morning to you', and 'You be safe from desdain'; also it was said: 'Peace be on you'; in a way it was a symbol of mutual peace and a declaration that there was to be no fighting between them: Then Allãh sent Islam to them and they were told to use only the 'Peace' formula for greeting, and ordered to say it loudly."

At the same time, Allãh mentions it several times in the stories of Ibrãhīm (a.s.). It provides an evidence that this was, like hajj, etc., a relic of the pure religion of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) among the Arabs. Allãh describes him as saying to his father [i.e., uncle]: He said:"Peace be on you! I will pray to my Lord to forgive you; . . ." (19:47). Also He says: And certainly Our messengers came to Ibrãhīm with good news. They said: "Peace!" " Peace," said he . . . (11 :69). This story is narrated in more than one place in the Qur'ãn.

Allãh has taken it as His own greeting and used it in various places in His book: Peace be on Nūḥ in all the worlds (37:79); Peace be on Ibrãhīm (37:109); Peace be on Mūsã and Hãrūn (37:120); Peace be on Ilyãsīn (37:130); And peace be on the messengers (37:181).

Then Allãh says that it is the greeting of the honoured angels: Those whom the angels cause to die in a good state, saying: "Peace be on you! . . . " (16: 32); . . . and the angels will enter in upon them from every gate: "Peace be on you," (13:23-24) And the same will be the greeting of the people of the Garden: and their greeting in it shall be: "Peace," . . . (10:10); They shall not hear therein vain or sinful discourse except the word: "Peace, peace!" (56:25-26).

T R A D I T I O N S

It is written in Majma'u 'l-bayãn under the verse, And when you are greeted . . . : 'Alī ibn Ibrãhīm has narrated in his at-Tafsīr from the two Truthful ones [the 5th and the 6th Imãms, a.s.] "In this verse, greeting means 'Peace' and other [acts of] kindness."

[al-Kulaynī narrates] through his chains from as-Sakūnī that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has said: 'To offer (greeting of) peace is an [act of] voluntary righteousness, and to give its reply is obligatory.'" (al-Kãfī)

Jarrãḥ al-Madãinī narrates from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "A younger should offer greeting to an elder; a walker to the sitter and a small group to the bigger one." (ibid.)

'Uyaynah[7] narrates through Mus'ab from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "A small group should begin salutation to the bigger one; a rider to the walker; riders of mulea to the rideras of donkeys and the riders of horses to the riders of mules. (ibid.)

Ibn Bakīr narrates from one of his fellows from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he heard him saying: "The rider salutes the walker, and the walker (salutes) the sitter; and when [two] groups meet, the smaller one salutes the bigger one; and when one person meets a group, he will offer greeting to the group." (ibid.)

The author says: A nearly similar tradition has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from al-Bayhaqī from Zayd ibn Aslam from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) said: "When a group passes by [another] group, it is enough if one of them offers greeting; and if greeting was offered to a group then it is sufficient if one of them replies." (al-Kãfī) ash-Shaykh narrates through his chains from Muḥammad ibn Muslim that he said: "I visited Abū Ja'far (a.s.) and he was praying; so I said: 'Peace be on you;' he said: 'Peace be on you; ' then I said; 'How do you do?' But he [the Imãm, a.s.] remaind silent [i.e., did not reply]. When he finished the prayer, I said: 'Should one reply to the salutation

[7] 'Anbasah

when one is praying?' He said: 'Yes, in the same words he was saluted with.'" (at-Tahdhīb)

Manṣūr ibn Ḥãzim narrates from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "When a man salutes you and you are praying, you will return [the same words] as he had used (but) in a low voice." (ibid.)

[aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates] through his chains from Masʻadah ibn Ṣadaqah from Jaʻfar ibn Muḥammad from his father (peace be on both) that he said: "Do not greet the Jews, nor the Christians, nor the Fire-worshippers, nor the idol-worshippers; (greet) neither (those who are sitting) on tables where liquor is being used, nor on the people (playing) chess and backgammon; (salute) not an effeminate person, nor a poet who slenders married women; (you should) not greet one who is praying because he is unable to return (your) greeting (inasmuch as greeting a Muslim is a voluntary good act while to return it is obligatory); (likewise, do not greet) an interest-eater, nor a man sitting for evacuating the bowels, nor a person who is in Turkish bath, nor a sinful person who manifests his sins." (Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh)

The author says: There are numerous traditions of the above-quoted themes. The preceding commentary sufficiently explains the traditions. 'Peace' as a greeting announces that there is peace, security and safety extended between the two parties on the basis of equality and balance, and that neither wants to overpower the other. Of course, the traditions guide that a younger should salute his elder; a smaller group or a single man should greet a larger group; but it is not against the principle of equality; it only shows that everyone is bound to respect the others' rights. Islam does not want people to neglect others' rights, or ignore the virtues and excellent found in others. On the contrary, it has ordered its followers to pay respects to those who are more virtuous, and to recognize the rights of the right-holders. At the same time Islam does not allow a virtuous person to be proud of his virtues or to think himself as superior to others, or to transgress the limit by showing arrogance or haughtiness against fellow human beings. Because, such behaviour would disturb the balance between various sections of the society.

The prohibition of saluting some groups is based on the Qurʼãnic injunction against befriending them or inclining towards them. Allãh says: do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends (5:51); do not take My enemy and your enemy for friends (60:1); and do not incline to those who are unjust (11 :113) .

Of course, some times it appears in the interest of Islam to go near some unjust people with an aim to convey the message of religion or to make them hear the word of truth; and then it becomes necessary to greet them in order to establish good rapport with them. For instance, Allãh has told the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): So turn away from them [the unbelievers] and say, "Peace!" . . . (43:89). Also, He praises the believers in these words: . . . and when the ignorant address them, they say: "Peace." (25: 63).

It is narrated that a man said to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.): "Peace be on you." He (the Prophet) said: "And on you be peace and mercy of Allãh." Then another man said: "Peace be on you and mercy of Allãh'; and (the Prophet) said: 'And on you be peace and mercy of Allãh and His blessings." Then a (third) man said: "Peace be on you and mercy of Allãh and His blessings"; and (the Prophet) said: "And on you?" That man said: "You decreased me (i.e. shortened the reply to my greeting); then where is the word of Allãh: And when you are greeted with a greeting, greet with a better (greeting) than it¸ The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said: 'You did not leave for me anything to add, so I returned to you the like of it.'" (at-Tafsīr, aṣ-Ṣãfī) al-Bãqir (a.s.) said: "The Commander of the Believers (a.s.) passed by a group and greeted them. They said: 'On you be peace and mercy of Allãh and His blessings and His pardon and His pleasure.' The Commander of the Believers (a.s.) said to them: 'Do not take us beyond that which the angels had said to our father, Ibrãhīm; they had said: The mercy of Allãh and His blessings be on you, O people of the house (11:73)'" (al-Kãfī).

The author says: A similar tradition has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Aḥmad (in az-Zuhd) , Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, aṭ-Ṭabarãnī and Ibn Marduwayh through good chain from Salmãn al-Fãrisī.

The author says: It indicates that the sunnah in complete greeting (i.e., the words of the greeter, 'Peace be on you and the mercy of Allãh and His blessings') is taken from the pure religion of Ibrãhīm (a.s.), and it supports what we have written earlier that the greeting with 'Peace' is a part of the religion of Ibrãhīm (a.s.).

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s,) said: "The completion of greeting for a resident is to shake hands, and completion of salutation for a traveller is to embrace." (ibid.)

The Leader of the Faithful (a.s.) said: "When one of you sneezes, say: 'May Allāh have mercy on you', and he should reply: 'May Allāh forgive you and have mercy on you.' Allāh, the Sublime, says: And when you are greeted with a greeting, greet with better (greeting) than it . . ." (al-Khiṣāl)

"A maid brought a bouquet of flowers to al-Ḥasan (a.s.). He said to her: 'You are freed for the sake of Allāh. 'Someone told him something about it. He (a.s.) said: 'Allāh, the High, has taught us manners and said: And when you are greeted with a greeting, greet with a better (greeting) than it . . . And better than it (flower bouquet) was her emancipation.'" (al-Manāqib)

The author says: As you see, these traditions extend the meaning of 'greeting' in this verse.

It is written in Majma'u 'l-bayān, under the verse: What is the matter with you, then, that you have become two parties . . . ; that commentators differed in opinion as about whom this verse was revealed. It is said that it was revealed about a group who came to Medina from Mecca and pretended before the Muslims that they were believers. Then they returned to Mecca claiming that Medina's [climate] was unhealthy; and at Mecca they showed polytheism. Later they travelled with the merchandise of the polytheists to Yamāmah. The Muslims wanted to fight them, but then they differed among themselves. Some said: "We should not do so because they are believers." Others said: "They are polytheists." Therefore, Allāh revealed this verse. aṭ-Ṭabrisī says that it has been narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) .

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī under the verse: They desire that you should disbelieve as they have disbelieved . . . : "It was revealed about two tribes, the Ashja' and Banū Ḍamrah. It happened that when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) proceeded to Ḥudaybiyyah, he passed by their places. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had concluded a truce with Banū Ḍamrah and made an agreement with them. The companions of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'O Messenger of Allāh: Here are Banū Damrah nearer to us, and we are afraid they might attack Medina violating [our agreement,] or help the Quraysh against us; so [it would be prudent] if we begin with them.' The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Never. Surely they are the most dutiful of Arabs towards parents, the best to join relationships and the strictest in keeping a promise among them.'

The place of the Ashja‘ was nearer to that of Banū Ḍamrah – and they were a clan of Kinãnah. There was an alliance between the Ashja‘ and Banū Ḍamrah for mutual care and security. There came drought in the area of the Ashja‘ while that of Banū Ḍamrah was green. Therefore, the Ashja‘ proceeded towards Banū Ḍamrah. Hearing this, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) prepared to go to the Ashja‘ for fighting, because of the agreement that he had with Banū Ḍamrah [and he wanted to defend them from the Ashja‘]. Then Allãh revealed: They desire that you should disbelieve as they have disbelieved, so that you might be (all) alike; therefore take not friends from among them until they migrate in Allãh's way; but if they turn back, then seize them and kill them wherever you find them, and take not from among them a friend or a helper.'

"Then Allãh excepted the Ashja‘ and said: Except those who reach a people between whom and you there is a covenant, or who come to you, their hearts shrinking from fighting you or fighting their own people; and if Allãh had pleased, He would have given them power over you, so that they would have certainly fought you; therefore if they withdraw from you and do not fight you and offer you peace, then Allãh has not made for you a way against them.

"The area of the Ashja‘ comprised of al Bayḍã’, al-Ḥill and al-Mustabãḥ, and they had reached in vicinity of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). They were frightened because of this proximity to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) that he might send someone to fight them, while the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was apprehensive that they might attack his outer regions. Therefore, he thought of proceeding towards them. When he was thinking about it, the Ashja‘ came and descended at the reef of Sala‘ – their chief was Mas‘ūd ibn Rujaylah and they were seven hundred strong. It was in the month of Rabī‘u '1-Awwal, 6 A.H. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) called Usayd ibn ḤuṢayn and said to him: 'Go with some of your companions to find out why the Ashja‘ have come here.'

"Usayd went out with three of his companions and stood before them [the Ashja‘] and asked: 'What has brought you here?' Mas‘ūd ibn Rujaylah, the Chief of the Ashja‘, went towards Usayd and greeted him and his companions. Then the Ashja‘ said: 'We have come to make an agreement with Muḥammad.' Usayd returned and informed the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: "They were afraid that I might fight then; therefore they wanted peace between me and them.' Then he sent to them ten camel-load of dates, and said: 'It is a good thing (to send) present before (a serious) work.' Thereafter he went to them and said: ‘O people of Ashja‘! what has brought you here?' They said: 'Our home is near you, and there is none in our nation [i.e., tribe] smaller in number than us; so we were disturbed at the thought of fighting you because we are in close proximity to you; and also we were disturbed at the thought of fighting our own tribe because of the smallness of our number among them; therefore we have come to conclude an agreement with you.' The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) accepted it and made an agreement with them. They stayed there that day and then returned to their area. It was about them that the verse was revealed: Except those who reach a people between whom and you there is a covenant . . . then Allãh has not made for you a way against them."

al-Faḍl Abu 'l-‘Abbãs narrates from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) about the word of Allãh: or who, come to you, their hearts shrinking from fighting you or fighting their own people, that he said: "It was revealed about Banū Mudlij; because they came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and said: 'Our hearts are not ready to bear witness that you are the Messenger of Allãh; therefore we are not with you nor with our people, [i. e., tribe] against you.'" al-Faḍl says: "I said: 'How did the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) treat them? [The Imãm, a.s.] said: 'He entered into a truce with them, until he is finished with [other] Arabs; then he would invite them [to Islam]; if they accepted [then well and good]; otherwise, he would fight them.'" (al-Kãfī)

Sayf ibn ‘Umayrah says: "I asked Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) about [the verse], . . . hrinking from fighting you or fighting their own people; and if Allãh had pleased, He would have given them power over you, so that they would have certainly fought you. He said: 'My father used to say: "It was revealed about Banū Mudlij; they remained neutral, so they did not fight the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and were not with their people.'" I said: 'Then what did he do with them?' He said: 'The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) did not fight them, until he finished with his enemy; then he threw it at them in the same way.'" (at Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī)

It is narrated from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said: "The words of Allãh, a people between whom and you there is a covenant, refers to Hilãl ibn ‘Uwaymir as-Salamī; he made a covenant with the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) on behalf of his people; and he said during that covenant: 'On the condition that we do not frighten whoever comes to us [from you], O Muḥammad! and you do not frighten whoever comes to you [from us].' So Allãh forbade standing against someone with whom agreement was made." (Majma'u 'l-bayãn)

The author says: These and nearly similar themes have been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, through various chains from Ibn 'Abbãs and others.

Also, it is written therein: Abū Dãwūd (in his an-Nãsikh) , Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, an-Naḥḥãs and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated from Ibn 'Abbãs regarding the verse: Except those who reach a people . . . , that it was abrogated by the verse of the chapter of "Repentance": So when the sacred months have passed away, then slay the idolaters wherever you find them . . . [Qur'ãn, 9:6].

C O M M E N T A R Y

QUR'ÃN*: And it does not behove a believer to kill a believer except by mistake:* al-Khaṭã' (اَلخَطأ = mistake) has no elongation; to read it with elongation (al-khaṭa') is wrong; here it gives a meaning opposite of 'intentionally', as the following verse (And whoever kills a believer intentionally . . .) shows.

"It does not behove" in this verse denotes negation of demand or requisition. In other words, it says: When a believer enters the sanctuary of faith and belief, there remains in him nothing to demand the killing of another believer who like himself is within the same sanctuary, except if it happens without his intention. Thus the exception is joined, not isolated. The meaning in simple words is as follows: A believer does not want to kill a believer, per se; he cannot think of killing him knowing that he too is a believer. There are other verses like this sentence in the same style and the same negation of requisition. For a example: And it is not for any man [lit: It does not behove a man] that Allãh should speak to him . . . (42:51); it is not possibe for you [lit: it does not hehove you]; that you should make the trees thereof to grow . . . (27:60); but they would not believe [lit: it would not behove them to believe] in what they had rejected before (10:74) ; and other similar verses.

All the same, the verse indicates a legal prohibition in the form of a statement. That is: Allãh has never allowed, nor will He ever allow, that a believer should kill another believer. He has made it unlawful except in the case of unintentional killing, inasmuch as the killer did not have any intention of killing a believer; therefore the unlawfulness is not applicable there. It could happen if, for example, he had no intention of killing at all, or if he thought that the victim was an unbeliever whose killing was justified.

Some exegetes have said that the said exception was isolated. According to them, if it is taken as a joined and real exception it would mean that unintentional killing is ordered or allowed. However, it has been explained above that its only significance is removal of prohibition from unintentional killing; not that such killing was allowed. There is no difficulty in accepting this interpretation, and the exception is therefore real and joined.

QUR'ÃN: and whoever kills a believer by mistake . . . remit it as alms: at-Taḥrīr (اَلتَّحْرِيْرُ = to free a slave); ar-raqabah (اَلرَّقَبَةُ = neck; used metaphorically for slave); ad-diyah (اَلدِّيَةُ = blood-money; indemnity for bodily injury). It is incumbent (wãjib) upon a believer, if he kills a believer unintentionally, to emancipate a believing slave and pay blood-money to the victim's heirs. However, if the victim's heirs leave the blood-money and remit it then it is waived and the killer is not obliged to pay it.

QUR'ÃN: but if he be from a tribe hostile to you . . . : The pronoun,'he', refers to the slain believer; hostile tribe means the unbelievers who fight the Muslims. If the person slain by mistake was a believer but his heirs were hostile unbelievers, the obligation to free a believing slave will remain in place, but there will be no payment of blood-money, because a fighting unbeliever does not inherit any thing a believer.

QUR'ÃN: and if he is from a tribe between whom and you there is a covenant . . . : As the context shows, in this sentence too the pronoun, 'he', refers to the slain believer. 'Covenant' refers to agreement, whatever its nature; it includes the agreement of adh-dhimmah (اَلذِّمَّة) [by which an unbeliever puts himself under the protection of the Muslims]. Meaning: If the slain believer is from a tribe which has an agreement with the Muslims, the killer is required to pay blood-money together with freeing a slave. In this sentence, payment of blood-money is mentioned first to emphasize the importance of compliance with the agreement.

QUR'ÃN: but he who does not find . . . should fast for two months consecutively: That is: he who is unable to free a slave – as it is the nearest item before this clause – must fast for two consecutively.

QUR'ÃN: a penance from Allãh . . . : This order of fastisg is a penance and mercy from Allãh for the person who does not have means to free a slave; and this fits with lightening burden. This order lightens the burden of the believer who financially incapable of freeing a slave.

Also, it is possible to take the 'penance' as a description of the whole laid down reparations beginning from: he should free a believing slave. Thus the meaning will be as follows: The prescription of these various reparations for a believer who kills another believer by mistake is a divine providence and penance for cleansing the killer from that filth. He should therefore be cautious and should not carelessly indulge in killing. It is like the words of Allãh: And there is life for you in the (law of) retaliation (2:17)

At the same time it is a divine providence and penance for the society, because through this reparation their loss of one free man will be made up with addition of another free person, and the financial loss of the slain believer's family will be made up with the blood-money.

It is clear from the above that Islam deems freedom as life and looks at slavery as a sort of murder; also in its eyes a complete indemnity equals the average earning of a man. This topic will be dealt with in detail somewhere else.

The definitions and exact designation of unintentional and intentional killings, emancipation, indemnity, family of the slain person, and agreement, etc., as mentioned in this verse, may be found in sunnah. For further details see the books of fiqh (jurisprudence).

QUR'ÃN: And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his recompense is hell; . . . : at-Ta'ammud (اَلتَّعَمُّدُ = intention of an act with its specific aspect). Every intentional act must be having a specific aspect; and it is possible for an act to have more than one aspect. It is therefore possible that a single act may be intentional from one angle and unintentional from the other. Let us say that a hunter fires at an indistinct shape thinking that it was an animal, while in fact it was a man, in this case, if that man is killed, the act will be called intentional and wilful hunting but unintentional killing of the man. Likewise, if he beats a child with a stick for teaching him good manners and the child dies of the blow, it will be an unintentional killing. Consequently, killing a believer intentionally means that the killer had the intention of killing the believer, knowing that the blow or fire would kill him and realizing that the viction was a believer.

Allãh has spoken very harshly concerning the punishment of the person who wilfully kills a believer and declared that he would abide in hell for ever. But the verses, Surely Allãh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases (4:48); and, surely Allãh forgives the faults altogether (39:53), may restrict to a certain extent the theme of the verse under discussion. Although it threatens the punishment of ever-lasting fire, it does not indicate an irreversible and final decree; therefore it may be forgiven through repentance or intercession.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! when you march forth (for fighting) in Allãh's way, make investigation, . . . : aḍ-Ḍarb (اَلضَرْبُ) in this context means marching, travelling; the qualifying phrase, "in Allãh's way," shows that it means marching forth for jihãd. at-Tabayyun (اَلتَّبَيُّن = to distinguish); here it means to differentiate between believer and unbeliever, as the next sentence shows: and do not say to any one who offers you (salutation of) peace: "You are not a believer." Offering peace means offering the salutation of the believers, i.e., peace. Some reciters have recited it as-salãm (اَلسَّلَمُ = submission; surrender).

Coveting the good of this world's life, indicates greed of riches and war-booty. But with Allãh there are abundant gains: al-Maghãnim (اَلْمَغَانِمُ) is plural of al-maghnam (اَلْمَغْنَم = gain, war-booty). What is with Allãh is more excellent than this world's benefits; because, the hereafter's gains are limitless and ever-lasting; you should therefore look forward to it.

QUR'ÃN: you were such before, then Allãh conferred (His) grace on you, therefore make investigation; . . . : You too, before entering the fold of Islam, had the same tendency, i.e., were covetous of the worldly riches and booties; then Allãh bestowed His favour and grace on you; as a result, you turned from this world's gains towards the abundant gains of the hereafter, which is with Allãh. In this background it is incumbent upon you to investigate and distinguish a believer from unbelievers. The order to investigate properly is repeated here for emphasis.

The verse obviously shows that there had actually occured a killing of a believer. It contains admonition, but does not indicate that it was an intentional killing. Apparently someone among the believers had killed by mistake someone (from among polytheists) who had greeted him with peace. The said believer was not sure that the greeter was really a Muslim; he thought that he was using that salutation and presenting himself as a believer only to save his life. The verse admonishes the killer that Islam only looks at the appearance; the reality inside the hearts is known only to Allãh, the Subttle, the Knower.

According to the above explanation, the clause: coveting the goods of this world's life, is an allusion to the state and condition of the people concerned. It means: Your behaviour in killing someone who presents himself as a Muslim, without looking properly into his credentials, without investigating whether his claim was right, resembles the behaviour of a person who covets riches and booties, and kills a believer who announces his belief, on petty unacceptable excuses. Of course, all the believers did have the same tendency before they accepted Islam; their only objective at that time was the riches of this world. But now they have been favoured with true faith and Allãh has shown them the right path. Now they should have investigated properly before taking any action. They must discard the behaviour of the days of ignorance and cleanse themselves of all its motives.

TRADITIONS

It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, under the verse, And it does not behove a believer to kill a believer except by mistake: Ibn Jarīr has narrated from ‘Ikrimah that he said: "al-Ḥārith ibn Yazīd ibn Nubayshah (from the tribe of Banū ‘Āmir ibn Luw’ayy), in company of Abū Jahl, used to torture ‘Ayyāsh ibn Rabī‘ah. Then he [accepted Islam and] went forth migrating to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). [When hereached near Medina], ‘Ayyāsh saw him at al-Ḥarrah and attacked [and killed] him with sword, thinking that he [al-Ḥārith] was still an unbeliever. Then [‘Ayyāsh] came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and informed him. Thereupon, the verse was revealed: And it does not behove a believer to kill a believer aceept by mistake . . . The Prophet recited it to him and said: 'Stand up and free [a believing slave].'"

The author says: This theme has been narrated throug other chains too. Some of them say that ‘Ayyāsh had killed him at Mecca on the day Mecca was conquered; ‘Ayyāsh, who till then was imprisoned by the polytheists who tortured him, came out [of prison], and met al-Ḥārith who by that time had accepted Islam although ‘Ayyāsh didn't know it. So ‘Ayyāsh killed him there at that time. But the report of ‘Ikrimah seems more probable and more in keeping with the time of the revelation of the chapter,"The Women".

Ibn Zayd says that the verse was revealed about Abu 'd-Dardā’. He was in an expedition; and went to a gorge to relieve nature. There he saw a man with his sheep. [Abu 'd-Dardā’] attacked him with sword; he said, 'There is no god except Allāh'; but Abu 'd-Dardā’ killed him and brought his sheep to his group. Then some doubt occured in his mind, and he came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and informed him. Thereupon this verse was revealed. (at-Tafsīr, aṭ-Ṭabarī)

Another report quoted in ad-Durru '1-manthūr, and transmitted by ar-Rūyānī, Ibn Mandah and Abū Nu‘aym from Bakr ibn Ḥārithah al-Juhanī narrates al-Juhanī’s claim that it was revealed about him and he tells a story similar to that of Abu ’d-Dardā’. However, all these traditions are merely attempts to fit the verse on some events or episodes.

al-Ḥusayn ibn Sa‘īd narrates through his chain from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Wherever emancipation of slave is prescribed, [freeing of even] a child suffices, except in reparation of killing, because AlIāh, the High, says, he should free a believing slave; it means a slave who has accepted Islam, that is, has reached the age of responsibility [i.e.,has attained maturity] . . . '" (Tahdhību 'l-aḥkãm)

Mūsã ibn Ja'far (a.s.) was asked: "How should a believing slave be recognizeḍ" He said: "According to birth." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) was asked about a Muslim [living] in a land of polytheists who was killed by Muslims, and the leader [of the Muslims] came to know of it afterwards. He (a.s.) said: "He should free in his place a believing; slave; and it is the word of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: but if he be from a tribe hostile to you . . . " (Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh).

The author says: A similar ḥadīth is narrated by al-'Ayyãshī. The word of the Imãm (a.s.), "should free in his place", indicates that the emancipation aims at adding a free Muslim to take the place of the free Muslim who was killed, as we have written earlier. Also it may be inferred from it that the underlying reason of prescribing the emancipation as atonement of some other sins is to add a free person who has not committed any sin to fill the gap of the one who has gone out of the line as a result of that sin.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) has said: "If a man is required to fast for two months consecutively, and he breaks the fast or becomes sick during the first month, he will have to repeat the fast; but if he has fasted the first month and also fasted a few days from the second month, and then is prevented from continuing because of some genuine cause, then he will have to repay the remaining days [only]. (al-Kãfī)

The author says: That is, he will fast only the number of the days he could not fast from the second month. The ruling is inferred from the word, consecutively.

The same Imãm (a.s.) was asked: "Does a believer who intentionally killed a believer have [a chance of] repentence?" He said: "If he had killed him because of his belief, then there is no repentance for him; but if he had killed him in anger or because of some worldly matter, then his repentance is that he should undergo retaliation [i.e., he should be killed in retribution;] and if he is not recognized [i.e., if people do not know the identity of the killer,] he should himself go to the heirs of the killed believer and own his [guilt of] killing their relatives; then if they forgive him and do not kill him, he should pay them the blood-money, emancipate a [believing] slave, fast two months consecutively and feed sixty needy persons – all this for repenting [and returning] to Allāh, the Mighty, the Great." (al-Kāfī; at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

[ash-Shaykh narrates] through his chains from Abu 's-Safātij that Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) said about the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his recompense is hell: "His recompense is hell if Allāh meted out the punishment to him." (Tahdhību 'l-aḥkām)

The author says: The same meaning has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from aṭ-Ṭabarānī and others from Abū Hurayrah from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). The above traditions contain many fine points we have already mentioned in the Commentary. There are many traditions on killing and its retribution which may be seen in the books of traditions.

[aṭ-Ṭabrisī] says about the verse: And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his recompense is hell, that it was revealed about Muqīs ibn Ḍabābah al-Kinānī. He found his brother, Hishām, killed in [the place of] Banu 'n-Najjār; he described it to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), who sent Qays ibn Hilāl al-Fihrī with him and said to him: "Tell Banu 'n-Najjār, 'If you know the killer of Hishām, surrender him to his brother in order that he may avenge himself, and if you do not know him then pay him his blood-money.'" al-Fihrī conveyed the message and they paid the blood-money. When he was returning with al-Fihrī, the Satan tempted him and said: "You achieved nothing. You took your brothers? blood-money and it will be a disgrace for you. Kill him who is with you, and it will be a life for a life and the blood-money will be an extra [bonus]."Thereupon he struck al-Fihrī with a rock and killed him; and rode a camel and returned to Mecca as an unbeliever; and recited (a poem, in which) he said:

I killed Fihrī in his (Hishām's) retaliation while I was given his blood-money too,
By the leaders of Banu 'n-Najjār, the noble and beautiful;
Thus I got my revenge and lied down on pillow,
And I was the first to return to the idols.

Then the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said: "I shall not grant his safety, neither in the sanctuary nor outside it." It has been narrated by aḍ-Ḍaḥḥāk and a group of exegetes. (Majmaʻu 'l-bayān)

The author says: A nearly similar tradition is narrated from Ibn ʻAbbās, Saʻīd ibn Jubayr and others.

It is written in at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī about the verse: O you who believe! when you march forth (for fighting) in Allãh's way . . . : "It was revealed when the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) returned from the expedition of Khaybar and sent Usãmah ibn Zayd with some horsemen to some Jewish villages in vicinity of Fadak in order that he might call them to lslam. There was, in one of the villages, a man called Mirdãs ibn Nahīk al-Fadakī. When he heard of the horsemen of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), he gathered his family and property at the side of the mountain and came forward, saying: 'I bear witness that there is no god but Allãh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allãh.'Usãmah ibn Zayd passed by him, and speared him to death. When he came back to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), he informed him of it. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said to him: 'You killed a man who was bearing witness that there was no god except Allãh and that I was the Messenger of Allãḥ' He said: 'O Messenger of Allãh! he had said it only to save his life.' The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Neither did you remove the covering from his heart [to see what was inside it], nor did you accept what he said by his tongue, nor did you know what was inside his soul!' Usãmah then swore an oath that after that he would never kill any one who bore witness that there was no god except Allãh and that Muḥammad was the Messenger of Allãh. Therefore, he did not join the Commander of the Believers in his battles. It was about this incident that the verse was revealed: and do not say to any one who offers you (salutation of) peace: "You are not a believer," coveting the goods of this world's life . . . "

The author says: The same story has been narrated by aṭ-Ṭabarī in his at-Tafsīr from as-Suddī. ad-Durru 'l-manthūr quotes several other traditions describing why this verse was revealed; some of them say that the event concerned Miqdãd ibn al-Aswad al-Kindī; others mention Abu 'd-Dardã'; yet others, the name of Muḥlim ibn Juthãmah; while some others have left the story vague without mentioning the name of the killer or the killed. Be as it may, the history books mention the oath of Usãmah ibn Zayd and the excuse he offered to 'Alī (a.s.) for remaining aloof from his battles. And Allãh knows better.

C O M M E N T A R Y

QUR'ÃN: The holders back from among the believers . . . are not equal*: aḍ-Ḍarar (= اَلضَّرَرُ the damage and defect in body) which prevents one from participating in jihãd and fighting, e.g., blindness, lameness and sickness. Striving hard with their property means spending it in the way of Allãh in order to gain victory over the enemies of the religion; striving with their persons denotes fighting in Allãh's way.

The phrase: and to each Allãh has promised good, indicates that the verse is speaking about those holders back who had not gone forth for jihãd at a time when their participation was not very vital – because a sufficient number of warriors had already joined the Islamic force. Accordingly, the verse aims at encouraging and exhorting the believers to participate in jihād, to hasten to it and hurry in joining it.

As a further proof, see that Allāh has exempted from jihād those who are not physically fit; then He says that the holders back [with exception of the unfit ones] are not equal to the fighters – yet the fact remains that the physically unfit ones too are not equal to the fighters in the way of Allāh. [So, why this exception?] We may say that Allāh will compensate their inability because their intention was good. Even then, the fighting, and martyrdom or victory over the enemies of Allāh are really great distinctions for those who fight in the way of Allāh over the non-participators.

In short, the verse serves to exhort and encourage the believers and re-awaken their spirit of faith in order that they should hasten and race towards good deeds and excellence.

QUR'ĀN: Allāh has made the strivers with their property and their persons to excel the holders back in rank, . . . : The sentence gives the reason why the two groups are not equal; that is why there is no conjunction etc., attached to it. ad-Darajah (اَلدَّرَجَةْ = degree, rank); ad-darajāt (اَلدَّرَجَاتُ = rank after rank; degree after degree). As for the phrase, and to each Allāh has promised good, it may refer to the two groups of the holders back and the strivers, or to all the three groups: the holders back without any injury, the holders back because of an injury and the strivers in the way of Allāh. The word, "good", is an adjective whose related noun is omitted; it may mean good outcome, good recompense or similar things. This sentence is put here to remove a possible misunderstanding: A holder back from among the believers – hearing the preceding declaration – could have thought that now he had nothing to his credit and that his faith and all other good deeds were now of no value at all. Allāh assures them that to each of them He has promised good.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh has distinguished the strivers above the holders back (by) a great recompense: (high) degrees from Him and pardon and mercy . . . : This distinction and excellence explains in detail the distinction mentioned above. Also it contains another important message: The believers should not remain content with the good promise offered by the phrase: and to each Allāh has promised good; they should not be indolent in striving in the way of Allāh, should not neglect their duty in putting utmost effort to raise the word of truth and to erase the falsehood, because the strivers have been granted considerably great excellence and distinction above the holders back; they shall get very high degrees of forgiveness and mercy.

The verse contains a remarkable style:-

First: The "strivers" have been qualified initially with the phrase: in Allãh's way with their property and their persons; then it has come down to, with their property and their persons; and finally they are mentioned without any qualification or restriction.

Second: Their distinction is described first in singular, rank or degree and then it goes to plural, "degrees from Him."

Why?

As for the qualifications of the strivers, the verse aims at description of the distinction and excellence of jihãd on holding back. Jihãd can only be of any value if it is done in the way of Allãh, not in the way of one's desires, by giving away the most precious thing, i.e., wealth and property, and sacrificing what is even dearer than that, i.e., one's person and life. That is why at the first opportunity it was fully explained with all details, those who strive hard in Allãh's way with their property and their persons, so that no room is left for any misunderstanding or doubt. When it was said, Allãh has made the strivers with their property and their persons to excel . . . there was actually no need to mention any qualifying phrase, because every thing had already been clarified; but as the sentence was to be followed by the phrase, and to each Allãh has promised good, it was appropriate to explain the reason of excellence and distinction, (i.e., spending the wealth and sacrificing the life in spite of their attraction); that is why only these two factors were used to qualify the strivers. When the time came to say, "and Allãh has distinguished the strivers above the holders back (by) a great recompense," there was no need to mention any attribute at all; not even partially. As for the change of singular 'rank' or 'degree' to the plural 'degrees', in the first, (Allãh has made the strivers . . . to excel the holders back in rank) the word darajah (دَرَجَةً = rank, degree) is accusative of specification, and it only describes that the excellence is in rank and degree, without going into detail as to whether the said degree is one or more. On the other hand, when it says: "and Allãh has distinguished the strivers . . . (by) a great recompense: (High) degrees from Him", the word, 'distinguished', implies bestowal, and the word, "(High) degrees", is in explicative apposition to the preceding "a great recompense", or stand for it. The meaning: Allãh, has given the strivers a great recompense, distinguishing them over the holders back by a great reward, that is, the high degrees from Allãh. In short, the speech mentions at first only that the strivers excel the holders back in rank, without saying whether the rank is one or more; while the next sentence says that it is not a single rank, rather there are many degrees and ranks, and that it is the great recompense given to the strivers.

On a cursory glance, it may look as if there was some contradiction in mentioning the rank or degree in singular and then in plural. But the above explanation may remove any such misunderstanding. Many other exegetes have tried to explain this apparent contradiction, but almost all their explanations seem far-fetched. For example:

1. The singular describes their excellence over the holders back who are unfit to fight, while the plural shows the excellence over those not having any injury;

2. The singular indicates the worldly benefits, e.g., war-booty and high prestige etc., while the plural points to the ranks of the hereafter, which surely are much superior, as Allãh says: and certainly the hereafter is much greater in respect of degrees. (17:21)

3. The singular 'rank' shows their status in presence of Allãh which is a spiritual reality, while the plural indicates the grades of the Garden and its high ranks which is a phenomenal affair.

You may see for yourself that there is nothing in the Qur'ãnic text to support any of these explanations.

In the phrase, "(High) degrees from Him," the pronoun 'Him' refers to Allãh, and this explanation is supported by the next words, "and pardon and mercy", assuming that these words describe the degrees, and obviously pardon and mercy comes from Allãh. Alternatively, the pronoun may relate to the "great recompense" preceding it. [In this case, the translation will be changed to `High degrees from it.']

The words, "and pardon and mercy", obviously describe the high degrees; the degrees, i.e, the ranks bestowed by Allãh, whatsoever their nature, are manifestation of divine pardon and mercy; and it has already been explained somewhere that the mercy, i.e, divine bestowal of bounties, depends on removal of all impediments and obstacles which might prevent one from receiving those bounties – and this removal of obstacles is the pardon. Now, each level of divine bounty and favour and each rank and status [is mercy in itself, but it also prepares man to receive still higher rank; in this way] it is 'pardon' when seen in relation to the next higher rank. It is therefore perfectly right to say that the ranks of the hereafter – whatever their nature – are divine pardon and mercy. In most places where mercy, bounty or similar realities are mentioned in the Qur'ãn, it is usually joined with pardon and forgiveness. For example: they shall have forgiveness and a mighty reward (5:9); and forgiveness and an honourable sustenance (8:4); they shall have forgiveness and a great reward (11:11); and forgiveness from Allãh and (His) pleasure (57:20); and forgive us and have mercy on us (2:286) . There are many such verses in the Qur'ãn.

The verse ends on the words: and Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful. Its appropriateness with the theme of the verse in quite clear, particularly as it ends on "pardon and mercy".

QUR'ÃN: Surely (as for) those whom the angels cause to die while they are unjust to their souls: Tawaffãhum (تَوَفَّاهُمُ) translated here as "cause to die" is in aorist tense; in that case its original form is tatawaffãhum (تَتَوَفَّاهُمُ) from which one "ta" (تَ) has been removed for easy pronunciation. The complete form is given in 16:28: Those whom the angels cause to die while they are unjust to themselves. Then would they offer submission.

Alternatively the verb may be taken as a past tense.

As evidenced by this latter verse, the injustice mentioned here refers to the harm they had inflicted on themselves by turning away from the divine religion and neglecting to establish its practices – all because they lived in the midst of unbelievers, among polytheists, and had no means of learning the religion's tenets and implanting what the belief in Allãh's lordship demands. This may be clearly seen from the words: they shall say: "In what state were you?" They shall say: "We were weak in the earth", . . . [Read upto the end of the verse 100.]

Allãh has explained the adjective, 'unjust', (used without a qualifying word) in these words: . . . the curse of Allãh is on the unjust who hinder (people) from Allãh's way and seek to make it crooked . . . (7:44-45; 11:18.-19). These verses define the injustice as turning away from Allãh's way and seeking to make it crooked and altered. This definition fits on the theme of the verse under discussion.

QUR'ÃN: they shall say: "In what state were you" : That is: What was the state and condition of your religion? ma (مَ) [in fīma فِيْمَ = in what] is the shortened form of mã (مَا = what) .

The verse points in a general way to the 'questioning in grave' as the traditions say: that the angels ask the dead person about his religion, This phenomenon is described also in another place: Those whom the angels cause to die while they are unjust to themselves. Then would they offer submission: "We used not to do an evil." Aye! Surely Allāh knows what you were doing, Therefore enter the gates of hell, to abide therein; so certainly evil is the dwelling place of the proud. And it is said to those who are pious: "What is it that your Lord has revealed?" They say: "Good . . ." (16 : 28-30).

QUR'ĀN: They shall say: "We were weak in the earth." They shall say: "Was not Allāh's earth vast (enough), so that you should have emigrated therein?" . . . : The angels' first question. In what state were you? was an enquiry about their religious condition; but the position of the unjust persons in that respect was not satisfactory; therefore they, instead of giving direct answer, tried to explain the reason of their objectionable condition: that they lived in a place, [country or town] where they could not obey the dictates of religion, because its inhabitants were powerful polytheists who oppressed them and prevented them from learning the rules of sharī'ah and acting upon them.

But their weakness – even if their claim was right – emanated from their abiding under the polytheists' sway, in a land under their domination. The enemies had no control or authority outside their boundary. Therefore, these 'weak' people were not really weak; they could easily have changed their condition by emigrating from that place. That is why the angels refuted their claim of weakness, reminding them that Allāh's earth was vast enough for them to go forth and be free from the polytheists' oppression; it was not beyond their power to leave the land of oppression and emigrate to some other place. They actually were not weak people as they could have removed the fetters of oppression from themselves. It was their own wrong choice which had put them in that bad state.

The question, "Was not Allāh's earth vast (enough) so that you should have migrated therein?" is for reprimand and rebuke, as is the first question, "In what state were you?" Alternatively this first question could be just an enquiry, because in the verses 28-30), of chapter 16 the same question has been addressed to the unjust and the pious ones. But in any case the second question is for reprimand.

The angels called the earth "Allāh's earth"; it may be a pointer to the fact that Allāh first gave this vastness to the Earth, and it was Iater that He called them to the faith and good deeds. The same idea may be inferred from the verse coming at the end: And whoever emigrates in Allãh's, way he will find in the earth many a place of refuge and abundant resources.

As the earth has been described as 'vast', the preposition 'in' has been used for emigration: "so that you should have emigrated therein," i.e., migrated from one of its places to another. Had it not been vast enough, the phrase would have been, emigrated from it.

Then after this questioning, Allãh judged their cas e and said: So these it is whose abode is hell, and it is an evil resort.

QUR'ÃN: Except the weak ones from among the men and the women and the children who have not in their power the means nor can they find a way (to escape): The exception is isolated. Allãh calls this group weak and their weakness is explained in this very verse. It proves that the previously mentioned unjust people were not weak because they could liberate themselves from the fetters of oppression by emigrating from that land. Weak in reality are these people mentioned in this verse. To mention them with such detail, "the men and the women and the children" makes the divine order clearer and removes all possible misunderstandings. Ḥīlah (حِيْلَةً = translated here as 'means') is derived from al-ḥaylulah (اَلْحَيْلُوْلَةُ = to interpose, to come between); then it was used for a device which comes between a person and his goaI; it is mostly used for what is done secretly and for objectionable activity – artifice, ruse, subterfuge. Its root contains a connotation of change, as ar-Rãghib has written in his Mufradãtu '1-Qur'ãn.

The meaning: These people are unable to do anything to avert from themselves the oppression perpetrated against them by the polytheists; they cannot find a way to get out from the enemies' clutch. The 'way' in this context means the real path (e.g., the way to Medina for the intending emigrants from Mecca) as well as the metaphorical way, i.e., every means which could free them from the polytheists' hands and put an end to their oppression and tyranny.

ON THE "WEAK ONES"

The verse shows that ignorance of religious tenets is a valid excuse in Allãh's eyes, provided it is caused by such inadequacy and weakness which were not contributed to by the ignorant person himself.

Allāh says that ignorance of religion and inability to establish religious rites and tenets is an inequity which will not be forgiven by Him. Then He makes an exception of the weak persons and accepts their plea of 'weakness', and defines that weakness in a way which includes others too: that is, they are unable to avert the danger from themselves. Now, this inability manifests itself in two ways:

One: A man lives in a place where he does not have access to religious knowledge because there is no scholar there who could teach him the necessary details; or he is unable to act according to sharī'ah because the enemies forcefully prevent him from it and put him under unbearable torture and oppression; and he cannot leave that place to emigrate to a Muslim land and join his fellow Muslims. As a result, this inability may emanate from weakness of mind, sickness physical handicap, lack of money or other such factors.

Two: A man is oblivious of the established truth of the religion and its tenets, and his thoughts have not led him to it, but at the same time he has no enmity towards truth, is not averse to it at all; if he knew the reality he would have readily accepted it; but the truth has remained hidden from him because of some factors [and, therefore, he does not know it].

This too is a 'weak' person who does not have a means and does not find a way to escape from his ignorance – not because of any enemies who might be threatening him from all sides with swords and spears – but because of other factors which have overpowered his thinking and put him under oblivion. Obviously, with this oblivion he has no power and with this ignorance he cannot find a way to the truth.

This explanation is based on the generality of the verse which shows that the given cause is unrestricted [and covers cases of unavoidable ignorance and oblivion]. The theme is supported by some other verses too. For example: Allāh does not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability; for it is (the benefit of) what it has earned, and upon it is (the evil of) what it has wrought (2:286). Obviously, a thing, which one is unaware of, is beyond one's ability in the same way as is a thing which one is forcefully prevented from.

This verse of the second chapter absolves one from responsibility in cases of lack of ability, and at the same time lays down a criterion for distinguishing a genuine inability from a false one. That is, the man should not have contributed towards that inability; if his total or partial ignorance of religion emanates from his own negligence or wrong choice then he should be held responsible for it. In other words, it is he who has committed that sin. On the other hand, if that ignorance is caused – not by his own actions – but by some factors beyond his power, then it cannot be attributed to his own choice – he cannot be accused of committing a sin, or of being arrogant; he has not opposed the truth nor has he rejected it intentionally. In short, for him is what he has earned, and upon him is what he has wrought.

It appears from the above, that a 'weak' person is empty-handed. There is nothing for or against him in his account, because he has not earned anything. His judgement is in the hands of his Lord. This is clear from the next verse: So these it may be, Allãh will pardon them and Allãh is Pardoning, Forgiving; and from the verse 106 of ch. 9: And others are made to await Allãh's command, whether He will turn to them (in mercy); and Allãh is Knowing, Wise. And His mercy is ahead of His wrath.

QUR'ÃN: So these, it may be, Allãh will pardon them, . . . : The weak ones have not earned any sin, because they were unable to remove their ignorance. Yet, as explained before man's affairs are either good or evil, and it is enough for one's infelicity if one does not earn good for himself. Man, whether he is good, evil or just empty-handed, can never be free from the need of Allãh's pardon and forgiveness; it is this divine pardoning which erases the traces of evil and infelicity. That is why Allãh has offered them here a hope of pardon.

First the hope is offered to them of being pardoned, and it is immediately followed by the declaration: and Allãh is Pardoning, Forgiving. It makes it almost definite that the divine forgiveness will cover them [on the day of judgement], as they have been separated, through exception, from the unjust ones who have been threatened that their abode is hell and it is evil resort.

QUR'ÃN: And whoever emigrates in Allãh's way, he will find in the earth many a place of refuge and abundant resources: ar-Rãghib has written: "ar-Raghãm (اَلرَّغَام = fine dust or soil); [they say] his nose fell in the dust, or someone rubbed his nose in dust; it is an idiom to show displeasure. A poet says:

When those noses are rubbed in dust, I do not (try to) please them,

No do I seek their pardon; rather I increase their displeasure.

As the word is placed in opposition to seeking pleasure, it shows that rubbing nose in dust means to enrage, to embitter. That is why it is said: May Allãh rub his nose in dust [i.e., May Allãh cause him to be indignant]; arghamahū (اَرْغَمَهُ = he made him angry); rãghamahu (رَاغَمَهُ = They both tried to spite each other); then al-murãghamah (اَلْمُرَاغَمَةُ) was taken to mean "to quarrel with each other". Allãh says: "He will find in the earth many a murãghaman (مُرَاغَمًا)", that is, ways and paths which he might use and if he saw something undesirable he would feel indignant; as you say: "I was displeased to so-and-so from such and such, [i.e., I did not like that thing so I turned to so-and-so to express my displeasure]."

The meaning is therefore as follows: And whoever emigrates in Allãh's way (i.e., seeking His pleasure by full involvement with religion in theory and practice), he will find in the earth many places, so that if someone prevents him in one place from following the religious tenets he would turn and emigrate to another place, thus rubbing the adversary's nose in dust and letting him be embittered and angry. [It is to convey this connotation that we have translated murãghaman as place of refuge.] And he will find abundance of resources in those new places.

Earlier, the angels had asked: Was not Allãh's earth vast (enough), so that you should have emigrated therein? As the verse under discussion is based on it, it would apparently look appropriate to say, 'And whoever emigrates, he will find in the earth abundant resources.' But as Allãh has added "many a place of refuge", and this refuge was of importance to a person who wanted to proceed in the way of Allãh, the migration too was qualified by the phrase, "in Allãh's way"; thus the whole verse is perfectly integrated and well-adapted to the main theme, i.e., admonishing the believers living in polytheists' midst, exhorting them to emigrate in the way of Allãh, and assuring them of abundant, resources if they emigrated.

QUR'ÃN: and whoever goes forth from his house emigrating to Allãh and His Messenger . . . Forgiving, Merciful: Emigration to Allãh and His Messenger stands for emigrating to the place of Islam, where one can learn the Book of Allãh and the sunnah of His Messenger, and act accordingly. The phrase: "death overtakes him", is an extended metaphor alluding to occurrence of death or sudden death. 'Overtaking' creates a mental image of a person pursuing another until he catches up with him. Likewise, the words, "his reward is surely incumbent on Allãh", literally mean, his reward has surely fallen on Allãh; this too is an extended metaphor alluding to the meaning given in the translation. There is certainly good reward and abundant recompense offered to the servant; and Allãh will deal with him in His divinity, for Whom nothing is difficult, nothing is formidable; whatever He wills happens; and whatever He promises is fulfilled. The speech ends on the phrase, "and Allãh is forgiving, Merciful". It emphasizes the good promise to assure them of full reward and recompense.

In these verses, Allãh has divided those who claim to be believers into various groups according to their residence in the place of Islam or that of polytheism; and has described the appropriate recompense for each. The aim is first to admonish and warn, then to encourage and exhort them to emigrate to the land of Islam and assemble therein in order to strengthen the Islamic society. Thus they shall be able to unite and cooperate with each other in righteousness and piety, to bring up the word of truth and raise the standard of tawḥīd and flag of the religion.

The first main group was of the believers who lived in the land of Islam: among them were those who strived hard in the way of Allãh with their property and their souls. Then there were those who held back without any injury or disability; and finally those who held back because of disabling injury. Allãh promised good to each sub-group, but He made the strivers to excel the holders back in ranks.

Another main group is of those who stayed in the land of polytheism; it is an unjust group which does not emigrate in the way of Allãh; its abode is the hell and it is an evil resort. There is another sub-group of truly weak man, women and children, which is not unjust, they have no means nor do they find any way to escape; and lastly there are those who were not weak, they went forth from their houses emigrating to Allãh and His Messenger, but were overtaken by death; their reward is surely incumbent upon Allãh.

The verses, with all the classifications, are applicable to the Muslims in all eras and periods, although, to begin with, they were revealed to describe the Muslims' condition in Arabia during the Prophet's time between his' emigration to Medina and the conquest of Mecca. The land was divided in those day in two parts:

1. Dãru 'l-Islãm (دَارُالاسْلام = the House of Islam) that is, Medina and the neighbouring regions, dominated by the Muslims (who had complete freedom to observe their religion). Of course, there were some polytheists and followers of other religions too in that land, but they did not interfere with the Muslims because of various agreements, etc., they had with them.

2. Dāru 'sh-shirk (دَارُالشِرْك = the House of polytheism) that is, Mecca and its neighbouring regions, dominated by the polytheists who persisted in idol-worship and prevented those Muslims who lived in their midst from following their religion; they oppressed and tortured those Muslims and put them under utmost pressure hoping to turn them away from Islam.

The principle laid down in these verses provides guidance to the Muslims for all times to come. A Muslim is required to live in a place where he can acquire the knowledge of Islamic tenets and beliefs, can perform religious ceremonies and follow the *sharī'aḥ*s commands and rules. He must emigrate from a country where he is unable to learn religion's realities and finds no way to live according to Islamic principles. It makes no difference whether today that country is called Dāru 'l-Islām or Dāru 'sh-Shirk, because these days the names have changed, the actual meanings have been discarded, religion is just a citizenship and Islam merely a name – without caring whether one called Muslim actually believes in its reality and follows its rules or not.

But according to the Qur'ān, results emanate from the reality of Islam, not its name; and it obliges the Muslims to follow the spirit of its rules, not merely the letters. Allāh says: This shall not be in accordance with your vain desires nor in accordance with the vain desires of the People of the Book; whoever does evil he shall be required with it, and besides Allāh he will find for himself neither a guardian nor a helper. And whoever does good deeds whether male or female, and he is a believer – these shall enter the garden and they shall not be dealt with a jot unjustly (4:123-124). Surely those who believe and those who are Jews and the Christians, and the Sabaeans, whoever believes in Allāh and the Last Day and does good, they shall have their reward from their Lord and there is no fear for them, nor shall they grieve (2: 62).

Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Ibn Marduwayh and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: "A group of Meccans had accepted Islam, but they kept it secret. The polytheists brought them out [i.e., forced them to come out] with them on the day of Badr; some were afflicted, other were killed. The Muslims said: 'These our companions were Muslims and were forced; so let us pray for their forgiveness.' Then the verse was revealed: Surely (as for) those whom the angels cause to die while they are unjust to their souls . . . " He further said: "This verse was then written to those Muslims who were still at Mecca, that they had no excuse (to remain there). So they came out, but the polytheists over-took and harried them [so they returned to Mecca]. Then was revealed the verse: And among men is he who says: "W e believe in Allãh;" but when he is persecuted in (the way of) Allãh, he thinks the persecution of men to be as the chastisement of Allãh; . . . (29:10) The Muslims wrote it to them; so they were afflicted with grief and lost hope of every good. Thereupon the verse was revealed: Yet surely your Lord, with respect to those who emigrate after they are persecuted, then they struggle hard and are patient, surely your Lord after that is Forgiving, Merciful (16:110). The Muslims again wrote to them about it that Allãh has made for you a way out, so come away (from Mecca). They came out, the polytheists (again) overtook them, but the Muslims (this time) fought with them until was saved who was saved and was killed who was killed." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥãtim have narrated from aḍ-Ḍaḥḥãk about this verse that he said: "They were some hypocrites who remained behind the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) at Mecca and did not emigrate with him to Medina; thereafter they came out with Qurayshite idol-worshippers to Badr, and were afflicted in the battle with [other polytheists]. Then Allãh revealed this verse about them." (ibid.)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Ibn Zayd about this verse that he said: "When the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was sent and the (true) faith appeared and spread, hypocrisy too spread side by side. Some people came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and said: ‘O Messenger of Allãh! If we were not afraid of these people that they would torment us and would do and do [unbearable things to us], we would have accepted Islam [openly]; nevertheless we bear witness that there is no god except Allãh and that you are the Messenger of Allãh.' They used to say this to him. When the day of Badr came the polytheists stood up [to fight] and said: 'No one will remain behind from us but that we shall demolish his house and seize his property.' [Hearing it,] those people too went forth (with polytheists) who used to say those words to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); some of them were killed; some others were taken prisoners."

Then (Ibn Zayd) said: "As for those who were killed, they were those about whom Allāh has said: Surely (as for) those whom the angels cause to die while they are unjust to their souls . . . Was not Allāh's earth vast (enough) so that you should have emigrated therein – leaving these oppressors behind? So these it is whose abode is hell and it is an evil resort.

"Then Allāh excused those with genuine inability and said: Except the weak ones from among the men and the women and the children who have not in their power the means nor can they find a way where they can head to; if they went forth they would be destroyed, so these it may be Allāh will pardon them their staying in the midst of idol-worshippers.

"As for those who were captured, they said: 'O Messenger of Allāh: you know that we used to come to you and bear witness that there was no god except Allāh and that you were His Messenger; yet we had to come out with these people fearing (their reprisals)' Allāh said: O Prophet! say to those of the captives who are in your hands: "If Allāh knows anything good in your hearts He will give to you better than that which has been taken away from you and will forgive you the misdeed you have done"; i.e., your coming out with the polytheists against the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) . . . And if they intend to act unfaithfully towards you, so indeed they acted unfaithfully towards Allāh before – when they joined the polytheists in coming out – but He gave (you) mastery over them." (8:70-71)

'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from 'Ikrimah about the verse, Surely (as for) those whom the angels cause to die while they are unjust to their souls . . . and it is an evil resort, that he said: "It was revealed about Qays ibn al-Fākih ibn al-Mughīrah al-Ḥārith ibn Zam'ah ibn al-Aswad, Qays ibn al-Walīd ibn al-Mughīrah, Abu 'l-'Āṣ ibn Munabbih ibn al-Ḥajjāj and 'Alī ibn Umayyah ibn Khalaf." He further said: "When the polytheists of Quraysh and their followers went forth to protect Abū Sufyān ibn Ḥarb and the caravan of the Quraysh from the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and his companions and also intending to take revenge of what they had suffered at Nakhlah; they took with them some youths who were unwilling (to join them as) they had (secretly) accepted Islam. They faced the Muslims at Badr without prior rendezvous. So (those youths) were killed at Badr while they were *kāfir*s and have turned away from Islam; and they were those we have named above." (ibid.)

The author says: There are a lot of traditions, from the Sunnī sources, of the same theme. Apparently all these are attempts to apply the verses to some suitable incidents, yet it is a good application. The most important information gleaned from these traditions as well as from meditating on the said verses is the existence of hypocrites in Mecca [even] before hijrah as well as after it. This fact has a direct bearing on discussion about the hypocrites as will be seen in the chapter of' "Repentance", God willing.

Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from Ibn ʻAbbās that he said: "There was a man, Ḍamrah from Banū Bakr, who was [very] sick. He told his people, 'Take me out of Mecca, because I find it hot (here). 'They said: 'Where should we take you to?' He indicated with his hand towards the way of Medina. They took him out but he expired at (only) two miles from Mecca. Then this verse was revealed: And whoever goes forth from his house emigrating to Allāh and His Messenger, and then death overtakes him . . . " (ibid.)

The author says: There are many traditions of similar theme, but there is much discrepancy about identity of the believer who expired in the way. Various traditions name him as Ḍamrah ibn Jundab, Aktham ibn Ṣayfī, Abū Ḍamrah ibn al-ʻĪṣ az-Zurqī, Ḍamrah ibn al-ʻĪṣ al-Laythī and Jundaʻ ibn Ḍamrah al-Jundaʻī. Some traditions say that it was revealed about Khālid ibn Ḥizām who went out intending to emigrate to Ethiopia, and was bitten by a snake on the way and died.

Some traditions narrate from Ibn ʻAbbās that it was Aktham ibn Ṣayfī. The narrator asked him: "Then where is al-Laythī?" Ibn ʻAbbās said: "It was before al-Laythī, and it is particular (and) general."

The author says: That is, the verse was revealed for Aktham in particular, then it is applied to others in general. It may be gleaned from the traditions that three Muslims had met their death while on their way to hijrah: Aktham ibn Ṣayfī, al-Laythī and Khālid ibn Ḥizām. But [it is difficult] to pinpoint as to whom the verse was revealed about; and the traditions are probably the narrators' attempts to apply the verse to this or that person.

Zurārah says: "I asked Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) about the mustaḍʻaf اَلْمُسْتَضْعَف = weak, weakened). He said: 'He is the one who does not have a means to disbelief (that he may disbelieve), nor does he find a way to belief; he is unable to believe and unable to reject (the belief); among them are the children as well as those men and women whose understanding is like that of the children; they are freed from responsibility." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: The tradition is extensively narrated from Zurãrah; al-Kulaynī, aṣ-Ṣadūq and al-ʻAyyãshī have narrated it from him through numerous chains.

al-Kulaynī narrated through his links from Ismãʻīl al-Juʻfī that he said: "I asked Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) about the religion which no one can afford to be ignorant of. He said: 'The religion is spacious, but the Khãrijites, as a result of their ignorance, have cramped it for themselves.' I said: 'May I be your ransom! should I then relate to you the religion which I follow? He said: 'Yes.' So I said: 'I bear witness that there is no god except Allãh, and Muḥammad is His servant and His Messenger; and I acknowledge (and believe in) what he has brought from Allãh, the High; and I love you and I keep away from your enemies and those who oppressed you and [wrongfully] became your rulers and usurped your rights.' He said: 'By Allãh you have not overlooked anything. It is, by Allãh! the [religion] we are on.' Then I said: 'Can someone not knowing this matter be saved?' He said: '[None] except the weak ones.' I said: 'Who are they?' He said: 'Your women and your children.' Then he said: 'Had you seen Umm Ayman? I bear witness that she was from the people of the garden, but she did not know [in such detail the religion] you are on.'" (ibid.)

Sulaymãn ibn Khãlid narrates that he asked Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) about the weak ones. The Imãm (a.s.) said: "A simple-minded woman in her private room; a slave-girl that you tell her to pray and she prays, she does not know except what you tell her; a foreign slave who does not understand except what you tell him; an aged old man; a child, a small boy: these are the weak ones. But a thick-necked man, disputatious (and) antagonist, who deals in sale and purchase, whom you cannot tire in anything: Will you say, he is weak? No; by no means." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

Sulaymãn has narrated from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) that he said about this verse: "O Sulaymãn! In these weak ones there are those who have thicker necks than yours. Weak are the people who fast and pray, keep their stomachs and genitals away [from forbidden things]; they do not believe that the right is with our adversaries; they are holding the tree's branches; these are that Allãh may pardon them if they keep the hold of the tree's branches and know those. Then if Allãh pardons them it will be by His mercy, and if He punishes them it will be because of their error." (Maʻãni 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: The words, "they do not believe that the right is with our adversaries", mean that they do not have ill-feelings towards us, or that such ideas are not based on their own negligence, as is clear from the following traditions.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) has said that weak ones are of many kinds, differing among themselves; and anyone among the People of the Qiblah (i.e., Muslims) who is not immical to us, is mustaḍʻaf, weak. (ibid.)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said explaining this verse: " 'who have not in their power the means' to our enmity, so that they could have got ill-feelings [towards us], 'nor can they find a way' to the truth, that they could come on the right path; they will enter the garden because of their good deeds and their abstaining from the unlawful things forbidden by Allãh, but they will not get the rank of the righteous ones." (ibid.; at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

Ḍurays al-Kunãsī narrates that he said to Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.): "May I be made your ransom! What is the condition of those who believe in the One God and the prophethood of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), who have committed sins and die without believing in an imãm and do not know about your love and obedience?" He said: "As for these, they shall remain in their graves, and not come out; whoever (among them) had done good deeds and did not show any animosity [towards us], a tunnal will be opened for him to the garden which Allãh has created in the west; thus refreshing breeze will continue reaching him in his grave upto the Day of Resurrection until he comes before Allãh; He will take account of his good and evil, then he will go either to the paradise or to the fire. These are they who depend on the decision of Allãh. "Then he (a.s.) said: "And likewise is done to the weak ones, the idiots, the children and the minor children of the Muslims. And as for [our] antagonists among the People of the Qiblah, a tunnel is dug for them to the fire which Allãh has created in the east, and will reach to him the flames, sparks, smoke and the hell's out-bursts upto the Day of Resurrection; then their destination is the hell." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) narrates from his father, from his and father, from ʻAlī (a.s.) that he said: "Surely the Garden has eight gates: from one gate will enter the Prophets and the Truthful ones; from another gate will enter the Witnesses and the Good servants; and from five gates will enter our Shī‘ahs and lovers; . . . and from [the eighth] gate will enter all the Muslims who bear witness that there is no god but Allãh and in whose heart there is not an atom's weight of animosity towards us, the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.). (al-Khiṣãl)

Ḥumrãn narrates: "I asked Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) about the word of Allãh: Except the weak ones. He said: 'They are the People of al-wilãyah (اَلوِلاَيَة = friendship, authority, power, guardianship.)' I said: 'Which wilãyaḥ' He said: 'It is not the wilãyah in religion, but the wilãyah in marrying each other, inheriting from each other and mixing with each other; they are neither believers nor *kãfir*s, they are the ones made to await Allãh's command." (Ma‘ãni 'l-akhbãr; at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī)

The author says: It refers to the verse: And others are made to await Allãh's command, whether He will chastise them or whether He will turn to them (in mercy) . . . (9:106)

‘Alī (a.s.) said: "The name of weakness is not used for him to whom the proof has reached, and his ears heard it and his heart understood it." (Nahju 'l-balãghah)

al-Kãẓẓim (a.s.) was asked about the weak ones. He (a.s.) wrote: "The weak is he to whom proof has not been conveyed and who is unaware of [religious] difference. But he is no more weak once he knew the difference." (al-Kãfī) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) was asked: "What do you say about the weak oneṣ" He replied in a dismayed manner, 'Have you left anyone who could be called weak? Where are the weak oneṣ Because, by Allãh! this affair of yours [i.e., Shī‘ite faith] has been taken by ladies in their boudoirs to other ladies, and have discussed it the water-carriers in the streets of Medina." (ibid.)

‘Umar ibn Isḥãq says: "Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) was asked as to what was the definition of the weak which has been mentioned by Allãh. He said: 'He who does not properly recite any of the Qur’ãnic chapters, while Allãh has created it in such a way that no one should fail to recite it properly.'" (Ma‘ãni '1-akhbãr)

The author says: There are several other Traditions; but what has been quoted above covers all the themes mentioned therein. Although the traditions apparently seem to differ with one another, yet if we overlook the particulars which throw light on various degrees of weakness, all of them jointly prove one fact which the generality of the verse shows: that weakness means not finding one's way to the right path – without any negligence on one's own part.

COMMENTARY

The verses ordain the prayer of fear and shortened prayer in journey, and they end on exhortation of the believers to pursue the polytheists; they are well-connected with the preceding verses which dealt with jihād and its various aspects.

QUR'ĀN: And when you journey in the earth there is no blame on you that you shorten the prayer : al-Junāḥ (اَلْجُنَاح = sin, impediment, renunciation); al-qaṣr (اَلْقَصْر = shortening of prayer). [aṭ-Ṭabrisī] has said in Majma'u 'l-bayān: "The root q-ṣ-r when used for prayer comes in three stems: The base stem, qaṣara (which has been used in the Qur'ān), qaṣṣara (the stem, taf'īl) and aqṣara (the stem, if'āl)."

Meaning: When you are in journey then there is no ipediment or sin for you if you shorten the prayer. The phrase, "there is no blame on you", apparently shows permission only, but the context points to obligation and incumbency; as is seen in the verse: Surely the Ṣafā and the Marwah are among the signs of Allāh; so whoever makes a pilgrimage to the House or performs 'umrah thereof there is no blame on him to go round them both (2:158); although aṭ-ṭawāf (اَلطَّوَاف = to go round) is wājib (compulsory). The reason why this expression shows obligation is that the position here is that of legislation, and it is enough in this place just to disclose that a certain order has been laid down; there is no need to explain all its aspects and particulars in acomprehensive manner. To a certain extent the same is the position of the verse: and that you fast is better for you if you know (2:184)

QUR'ĀN: if you fear that those who disbelieve will cause you distress; . . . : al-Fitnah (اَلْفِتْنَة = translated here as causing distress) is used for numerous meanings; however when the Qur'ān uses it in connection with disbelievers and polytheists, it refers to the atrocities, like murder, torture, etc., which they inflicted on the Muslims; and the context too points to this meaning, i.e., if you fear that the enemies will attack you putting you to the sword.

This clause is a proviso, limiting the preceding order: there is no blame on you that you shorten the prayer. It shows that shortening of prayer was ordained when there was a fear of disbelievers' mischief. As a second step the rule was extended to all cases of legal journey even if there was no fear. It means that the Qur'ān explained one case where this law was to be applied, and the sunnah of the Prophet described all other situations and cases will be seen in the Traditions.

QUR'ÃN: And when you (O Prophet!) are among them . . . and let them take their precaution and their arms: It explains how to perform prayer of fear. The verse is addressed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) supposing him to be the imãm of that prayer; the order is thus explained through an example – it makes the rule clearer in a fewer words and beautiful style; "and establishing the prayer for them" refers to congregational prayer; "let a party of them stand up with you" points to their standing behind the Prophet following him in the prayer; and it is they who are required to take their arms with them; "when they have prostrated themselves . . . " means, when they have prostrated and completed their prayers, they should go to the rear to take the place of those who have not prayed yet, enabling them to come forward and pray with you and this second group too should "take their precaution and their arms".

The meaning then is as follows – and Allãh knows better: When you, O Messenger of Allãh! are among them, and the situation is fraught with danger, and you establish the prayer for them, i.e., the congregational prayer with you as its leader, then the whole group should not join in the prayer together; only a party of them should stand behind you for prayer (taking their arms with them) and the other group should protect them and guard their possessions; when those who are praying behind you finish their sajdah and their prayer, they should go to the rear to relieve those who were uptil now protecting them and guarding their possessions. Now, this second group who have not prayed yet should come and join you in the prayer, and they too should take their precaution and their arms with them.

Another party who have not prayed: aṭ-Ṭãifah (اَلطَّآئِفَة = party, group) is of feminine gender, but it refers here to those who are able to fight, i.e., men; the feminine adjective ukhrã (أُخْرٰي = another) agrees with the noun ṭãifah which it refers to, while the masculine pronouns in "have not prayed" etc., look at the people described.

The words, "take their precaution and their arms" contain an interesting metaphor, as it treats "precaution" as a sort of arms for defence, using the verb 'take' for both.

QUR'ÃN: (for) those who disbelieve desire that you may be inattentive to your arms and your luggage, so that they may turn upon you with a sudden united attack: It gives the reason for the above law; its meaning is clear.

QUR'ÃN: and there is no blame on you . . . a disgraceful chastisement for the unbelievers: The rule is further relaxed for those who are troubled by rain or are sick, that they may lay down their arms; however it is very much emphasized that they should take their precaution, and not be inattentive to the unbelievers, because they are on the look out for the weak points of the Muslims.

QUR'ÃN: Then when you have finished the prayer, remember Allãh standing and sitting and reclining: Qiyãman قِيَامًا = standing) and qu'ūdan (قُعُودًا = sitting) are either plurals or verbal nouns, and in either case they are circumstantial clauses; the same applies to 'reclining'. These words emphasize that the believers should continuously remember Allãh, in all conditions and in every place.

QUR'ÃN: but when you are secure, keep up prayer: As the context shows, the clause, "when you are secure", is in opposition to: when you journey in the earth, and thus obviously means, when you return to your homes. Accordingly, "keep up prayer" would mean to pray full 4 raka'ãt; because the prayer of fear and danger was called "shortened prayer"

QUR'ÃN: surely prayer is a timed ordinance for the believers : al-Kitãbah (اَلكِتَابه = writing, traslated here as ordinance) implies obligatorness and imperativeness, as Allãh says: . . . fasting is prescribed (lit.: written) for you as it was prescribed for those before you (Qur'ãn, 2:183). al-Mawqūt (اَلمَوْقُوت = timed), shows that prayer is an obligation prescribed for fixed times to be established at known intervals.

Apparently, timeliness of prayer implies its permanence and imperetiveness – it mentions a requirement (of time) to imply the obligatory (prayer). When it says that prayer is a timed ordinance, it means that it is an obligation, confirmed and permanent, not subject to any change; it cannot be avoided or waived at any time. The adjective, 'timed', if taken in its literal meaning has no relevance to the context, because the preceding statements have no connection with prayer being a timed ordinance; while this sentence is meant to explain the reason for the preceding one, that is, when you are secure keep up prayer. Thus apparently, 'timed' means a firm obligation which can never be waived; it is unalterable and can never be replaced by any alternative, unlike the fast which some times is changed to redemption.

QUR'ÃN: And be not weak-hearted in pursuit of the enemy; . . . : al-Wahn (اَلْوَهْن = weakness); al-ibtighã' (اَلْاِبْتِغَآء = pursuit) , al-alam (اَلْاَلَم = pain, to suffer pain); the clause: while you hope from Allãh what they do not hope, is a circumstantial one. You and your enemies both equally suffer pain, so you are not in a worse position than your enemies; rather you are in a more pleasant and comfortable condition, inasmuch as you expect victory over them and hope for forgiveness from your Lord who is your guardian; as for your enemies, they have no guardian, nor do they entertain any hope to cheer themselves or which could incite them to work energetically and push them towards their goal. And Allãh knows what is beneficial to His servants; He is Wise in His orders and prohibitions.

T R A D I T I O N S

According to Tafsīr of al-Qummī, the verse (prescribing the prayer of fear) was revealed when the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was proceeding towards Ḥudaybiyyah, en route to Mecca. When the Quraysh heard the news, they sent Khãlid ibn al-Walīd with two hundred horses to encounter the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). He hindered the (progress of the) Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) on the mountains. Somewhere on the way, the time of ẓuhr prayer came, Bilãl said the adhãn, and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) led the people in the prayer. Khãlid ibn al-Walīd then said: "If we had attacked them when they were praying, we would have got them, because they do not break their prayer. However, now the time of their another prayer is approaching which they love more than their eye-sight; and when they start that prayer we shall raid them. Then Jibrīl (Gabriel) brought to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) the (verses of) prayer of fear: And when you are among them . . .

Majma'u 'l-bayãn says about the verse, and there is no blame on you, if you are troubled by rain . . . , that it was revealed when the Prophet was at 'Usfãn and the polytheists at Ḍajnãn; both parties stopped there; and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) prayed ẓuhr with the Muslims with perfect rukū' and sujūd; then the polytheists wanted to attack them; and some of them said: "[Although we missed this chance] they will pray another prayer [i.e., 'aṣr] which is dearer to them from this one." Then Allãh revealed to the Prophet this verse, and he prayed the 'aṣr with them as the prayer of fear. And this was the reason why Khãlid ibn al-Walīd accepted Islam.

Abū Ḥamzah [ath-Thumãlī] has written in his Tafsīr that the Prophet (s.a.w.a,) went to fight Banū Anmãr, and Allãh vanguished them and the Muslims captured the enemy's children and property. Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and the Muslims alighted; not a single enemy was in sight; so they laid down their arms; the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) went away to relieve himself (and he too had laid down his arms), and he went so far that a [dry] valley sheltered him from his companions. By the time he was finished the river-bed was flowing copiously and the rain was coming down; the flowing valley came between him and his companions. He sat down under a tree. Then al-Ghawrath ibn al-Ḥãrith al Muḥãribī saw him, and his companions said to him: "O Ghawrath! (Look,) here is Muḥammad, separated from his companions." He said: "May Allãh kill me if I don't kill him." He came down the hill with a sword; and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) did not notice him until he stood over him with his unsheathed sword in hand. He said: "O Muḥammad! Who will now protect you from me?" The Messenger (s.a.w.a.) said: "Allãh." [All of a sudden] the enemy of Allãh fell down on his face. Now, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) stood up and took his sword, and said: "O Ghawrath! Now, who will save you from me?" He said: "No one." The Messenger of Allãh said: "Do you bear witness that there is no god but Allãh, and that I am the servant of Allãh and His Messenger?" He said: "No. But I promise that I'll never fight you nor will ever help any enemy against you." Then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a,w.a.) gave his sword back to him. [Seeing this magnanimity,] Ghawrath said to him: "By Allãh! you are certainly better than me." He (s.a.w.a.) said: "I am more entitled to it,"

Then Ghawrath went back to his companions. They said: "O Ghawrath! We saw you standing over his head with sword, then what prevented you from [killing] him?" He said: "Allãh. I inclined towards him with the sword to kill him; then I don't know who it was that pushed me between my shoulders, and I fell down on my face; my sword fell down and Muḥammad took it before I could reach it." Then the valley calmed down and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) went to his companions and told them what had happened; and recited before them: and there is no blame on you if you are troubled by rain . . . (ibid.)

aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated through his chains from 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmãn ibn Abī 'Abdillãh from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) that he said: The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) prayed with his companions in the battle of Dhãtu 'r-Riqã‘; and he divided them in two groups; he told one group to stand before the enemy and the other stood [praying] behind him; so he said takbīratu 'l-iḥrãm, and they said too, and he recited and they listened, then he did rukū‘ and they did, and he did sajdah and they did; thereafter, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) continued in his prayer standing [in the second rak‘ah] while the companions prayed their second rak‘ah individually and said salãm. Then they rushed to their companions and stood before the enemy, and their companions came and stood behind the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and he said takbīr and they said too, and he recited and they listened, and he did rukū‘ and they did, and he did sajdah and they did; then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) sat down and recited tashahhud and salãm; and they stood up and completed the [second] rak‘ah by themselves and then recited [tashahhud and] salãm. And Allãh had said to his Prophet: And when you are among them and establish the prayer for them . . . . . surely prayer is a timed ordinance for the believers. And this is the prayer of fear about which Allãh had ordered His Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

He (a.s.) also said: One who leads (his) people in maghrib in prayer of fear, will pray one rak‘ah with the first group and two raka‘ãt with the second one . . . (Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh) ash-Shaykh has narrated through his chains from Zurãrah that he said: "I asked Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) about the prayer of fear and the prayer of journey, will both of them be shortened? He said: 'Yes; and the prayer of fear is more deserving to be shortened than the prayer of journey in which there is no fear.'" (Tahdhību 'l-aḥkãm) aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chains from Zurãrah and Muḥammad ibn Muslim that they said: "We said to Abū Ja‘far (a.s.): 'What do you say about prayer in journey? How is iṭ and how many [raka‘ãt]?' He said: 'Verily Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, says: And when you journey in the earth, there is no blame on you that you shorten the prayer; accordingly, shortening of prayer during journey is compulsory, as is completing it when in presence [i.e., when not in journey].'" They said: "But Allãh only says; there is no blame on you; He did not say: 'Do it'; how can it convey the connotation of obligatoriness like that of praying full prayer in presence?" He (a.s.) said: "Has not Allãh said: Surely the Ṣafã and the Marwã are among the signs of Allãh; so whoever makes a pilgrimage to the House or performs ‘Umrah thereof, there is no blame on him to go round them both [2:158]? Don't you see that ṭawãf [i.e., sa`y] between the two is wãjib? It is because Allãh has mentioned it in His Book, and His Prophet had done it. Likewise, shortening of prayer during journey is a thing which the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had done [and] Allãh has mentioned it in His Book." Then we said to him: "Then a person who prayed four (raka'ãt) in journey, should he repeat (that) prayer or noṭ" (The Imãm) said: "If the verse of shortening (of prayer) was read and explained to him, and yet he prayed four (raka'ãt), he will repeat it [i.e., will repeat praying two raka'ãt]; and if the verse was not read before him and he did not know it, then there is no repetition. And all wãjib prayers during journey are two raka'ãt except maghrib, as it is three raka'ãt, (and) there is no shortening in it; the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) left it three raka'ãt in journey and in presence . . . " (Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh)

as-Suyūṭī writes: Ibn Abī Shaybah, 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Aḥmad, Muslim, Abū Dãwūd, at-Tirmidhī, an-Nasãī; Ibn Mãjah, Ibnu 'l-Jãrūd, Ibn Khuzaymah, aṭ-Ṭaḥãwī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnul-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, an Naḥḥãs (in his an-Nãsikh) and Ibn Ḥibbãn have narrated from Ya'lã ibn Umayyah that he said: "I asked 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭãb about the verse: there is no blame on you that you shorten the prayer, if you fear that those who disbelieve will cause you distress, [is it valid now when] the people are secured and safe? ' 'Umar said to me: 'I too was wondering about it as you do, so I asked the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) about it and he said: "It is a charity which Allãh has bestowed upon you, so you should accept His charity."'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, an-Nasãī, Ibn Mãjah, Ibn Ḥibbãn and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated from Umayyah ibn Khãlid ibn Asad that he asked Ibn 'Umar: "Do you think that the prayer should be shortened in journey? Surely we do not find it in the Book of Allãh; all that is mentioned therein is the prayer of fear." Ibn 'Umar said: "O my nephew: Surely Allãh sent Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and we did not know anything; so we do only as we saw the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) doing; and the shortening of prayer in journey is the system established by the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.)." (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah, at-Tirmidhī (who has said that it is correct) and an-Nasãī have narrated from Ibn 'Abbãs that he said: "We prayed with the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) between Mecca and Medina two raka'ãt while we were safe and had no fear of anything." (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah, Aḥmad, al-Bukhãrī, Muslim, Abū Dãwūd, at-Tirmidhī and an-Nasãī have narrated from Ḥãrithah ibn Wahb al-Khuzã'ī that he said: "I prayed with the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) ẓuhr and

'aṣr at Minã two raka'ãt, with most numerous multitude of people and in most secured condition." (ibid.)

al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain of narrators from Dãwūd ibn Farqad that he said: "I asked Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) about the word of Allãh, surely prayer is a timed ordinance. He said: '[It means] firm ordinance; however if you make haste a little or delay a little it will do you no harm, provided you do not neglect it altogether, because Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, says: . . . neglected prayers and followed the sensual desires, so they will certainly meet perdition'" (19:59) (al-Kãfī)

The author says: It is an indication that wãjib prayers have some latitude so far as their timings are concerned, as other traditions show.

Muḥammad ibn Muslim narrates from the fifth or the sixth Imãm (a.s.) that he said about the maghrib prayer in the journey: "Do not leave if you are delayed for some time; then you may pray it when you wish to pray the 'ishã'; and if you wish you may continue the journey for sometime until the reddish colour [on the horizon] goes away. Surely, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had prayed ẓuhr and `aṢr together and maghrib and 'ishã' together, and he used to delay and advance. Allãh, the High, has said: surely prayer is a timed ordinance, [and by this expression] He only meant that it was obligatory for the believers, He did not mean anything else. Otherwise, if it meant what they say, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) would not have prayed like this, and he was most knowledgeable and had all the information; and he was as they say; and if it [i.e., always praying separately] were good, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) would certainly have ordered it.

"And in the battle of Ṣiffīn, people, including the Commander of the Believers (a.s.), could not pray ẓuhr,'aṣr, maghrib and 'ishã' and 'Alī, the Commander of the Believers (a.s.) ordered them and they said Allãhu akbar, and lã ilãha illa 'llãh, and subḥãna 'llãh on foot and horse, because Allãh has said: But if you are in danger, then (say your prayer) on foot or on horse-back [2:239].

"So 'Alī (a.s.) ordered them [to do so] and they did." (at-Tafsīr. al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: These traditions, as you see, agree with the preceding Commentary. There are very many traditions of this meaning, and especially from the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.), but we have quoted only a few of them as example. Of course, there are some other traditions from the Sunnī sources which oppose it, but they themselves contradict each other. However, to review those traditions and have a look at all aḥãdīth describing the prayer of fear in particular and prayer during journey in general, is in the domain of Islamic Jurisprudence, not of tafsīr.

It is written in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī that the word: And be not weak-hearted in pursuit of the enemy . . . , is in conjunction with the verse 139 of the chapter of "The Family of ‘Imrãn": If a wound has afflicted you, a wound like it has also afflicted the (unbelieving) people . . . And we have explained there the reason why that verse was revealed.

Surely We have revealed the Book to you with the truth that you may judge between people by means of that which Allãh has shown you; and be not an advocate on behalf of the treacherous (105). And ask forgiveness of Allãh; surely Allãh is forgiving, Merciful (106). And do not plead on behalf of those who act unfaithfully to their souls; surely Allãh does not love him who is treacherous, sinful (107). They hide themselves from men and

Ponder on these verses and you will realize that all are revealed in one context. They exhort one to adhere to justice in judgement and admonish a judge not to incline towards wrong-doers in his decision, as it would be an injustice to the rightful party.

This is done by pointing to some incidents which had happened at the time of their revelation; then they discuss relevant religious realities, telling the Muslims to adhere and abide to them; in this process, they remind the believers that religion is a reality, not only a name; what is important is putting it into practice, not just calling oneself a Muslim.

Obviously, it was that incident to which the Qur'ãnic words refer: And whoever commits a fault or a sin, then accuses of it one innocent, he indeed takes upon himself the burden of a calumny and a manifest sin. It clearly shows that there was some such crime which could be attributed to someone else, like theft, murder, plunder or damage, etc., and there was a possibility that the perpetrators would try to mislead the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in his judgement, but the verses assure the Prophet that Allãh was there to protect him.

Apparently, it was the same incident to which the preceding verses refer, as it is clear from the words: . . . and be not an advocate on behalf of the treacherous . . . They hide themselves from men . . . Behold! you are they who plead for them in this world's life. Treachery and perfidy is obviously used for breach of trust, when one embezzles or meddles with something given to him in trust; but the context of the words, surely Allāh does not love him who is treacherous, sinful. They hide themselves from men . . . shows (as will be explained later) that they refer to treachery concerning theft, etc. It is because all the believers are like one soul, and all are responsible to look after a property belonging to one of them – they have to guard it and keep it secure; in this background, if one embezzles or steals it, it is tantamount to being unfaithful to one's own self.

Meditation on the verses shows that probably someone had committed the theft, the matter was brought to the Prophet's notice, but the thief accused someone else who had nothing to do with the crime, then the relatives of the thief urged the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to give judgement in their favour against the innocent one; but these verses were revealed and Allāh exonerated the accused from their false allegation.

Thus, the verses squarely fit the event narrated concerning their revelation when Abū Ṭu'mah ibn al-Ubayriq had committed the theft, although, as we have repeatedly said, the traditions giving the reasons of revelation, most of the times, are mere attempts to fit the narrated stories on pertinent verses.

The verses prove authoritativeness of the Prophet's judgement, and his sinlessness as well as some other realities which, God willing, will be explained later.

QUR'ĀN: Surely We have revealed the Book to you with the truth that you may judge between people by means of that which Allāh has shown you : Judging between people, apparently, means hearing the cases of their disputes and contentions – the matters dealt by judiciary – and removing their discord through the judgement. This verse says that judging between people was the main objective for which the Book was revealed. This theme squares with the verse 2:213, which says: Mankind was but one people; so Allāh sent the prophets as bearers of good tidings and as warners, and He sent down with them the book with the truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed . . .

The verse under discussion (Surely We have revealed the Book to you . . .) in its particularity is like the other (Mankind was but one people . . .) in its generality; and it further shows that the right ot judge was given to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and that his opinion and view had been stamped with divine authority. Arriving at a judgement, after looking into often-conflicting arguments of the parties concerned, invariably compels a judge to exercise his mental power and form an opinion based on his knowledge of abstract laws and regulations governing the issues at hand. It is one thing to have the knowledge of the laws of jurisprudence and the rights of various people, and quite another to arrive at a definite decision as to which rule is applicable to a particular issue. It all leads us to believe that the word, arãka (اَرَاكَ = translated here as "has shown you") in the clause, "that you may judge between the people by means of that which Allãh has shown you", actually means creation of opinion in his mind and leading him to correct decision, rather than teaching him abstract laws and general rules.

The verse in this context means: Surely Allãh has revealed the Book to you and taught you its laws and regulations; and then has allowed you to exercise your opinion which He has created in you in order that you may judge between the people and thus dispel their strife and dispute.

QUR'ÃN*: and be not an advocate on behalf of the treacherous* : The sentence is in conjunction with the preceding one, which, although a declarative one, has the sense of an imperative; the meaning thus will be as follows: Judge between them and do not be an advocate of the treacherous. al-Khaṣīm (اَلْخَصِيْم = advocate) is the one who speaks in favour of a claim, etc. The sentence orders the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) not to defend the treacherous and dishonest ones, as it would result in nullification of the right of the rightful claimants.

The order to judge between them is unrestricted and general; therefore the second order (which is in conjunction with it) gives the connotation that treachery and dishonesty too refers to general transgression against the others' rights, that it is not restricted to breach of trust only. (Of course, sometimes a particular clause may be placed in conjunction with a general one because of some special reasons, but there is no such reason here at all. We shall further explain it later on.)

QUR'ÃN: And ask forgiveness of Allãh; surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful*: [The literal meaning of al-istighfãr (اَلْاِسْتِغْفَار) is to want to hide, although here it has been as usual translated as asking forgiveness. However, in this context it has been used in the literal meaning; and] apparently it tells the Prophet to ask Allãh to keep in him under cover the natural human tendency of inclining towards desire or violation of others' rights. It has repeatedly been explained that al-'afw (اَلْعَفْوُ) and al-maghfirah (اَلْمَغْفِرَةُ) are used in the divine speech for various connotations, all of which may be combined under the heading "moving away somehow from truth or justice".

The meaning, therefore, is as follows: Do not be advocate of the treacherous, nor be inclined to them; ask Allãh to help you in this endeavour, and protect you from defending their treachery and keep you free from coming under the influence of desire. This meaning is clearly understood when we look at a latter verse which says: And were it not for Allãh's grace upon you and His mercy, a party of them had certainly designed to mislead you and they do not mislead but their own souls, and they shall not harm you in any way. It clearly says that they cannot harm the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) even if they tried their utmost to arouse his feelings in order that he might opt for injustice and neglect the justice. They can never succeed in this endeavour, because the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was under divine protection from such harmful influence, and Allãh was guarding him [in his words and actions]; he did not commit injustice in his judgements, and was not liable to partiality; nor did he follow his desires. It would certainly be a gross injustice and a reprehensible misdeed if one was to differentiate, when sitting for judgement, between strong and weak, friend and foe, believer and unbeliever, near and far. In this context, the Prophet was ordered to "ask forgiveness" not because he had committed any sin which could have brought evil consequences, nor does it show that he was about to do any such improper thing. It only says that the Prophet should ask Allãh to give him power to subjugate his desires; and undoubtedly he was always in need of such divine protection and was never independent of Allãh, although he was ma`ṣũm (protected); and Allãh does what He wills.

This 'protection' covers all that comes under the headings of obedience and disobedience, all actions for which one may be praised or blamed. But it does not cover actual happenings. In other words, the verses show that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was protected from following his desires and inclining towards falsity. But they do not prove whatever judgement a judge gives, based of the rules and regulations enacted for judicial procedures (e.g., the claimant's responsibility is to bring the proof, and the defendant has only to deny on oath) invariably always agree with reality and truth, or that this procedure always gives victory to the rightful person and brings defeat to the wrongful party. Nor do the laid down rules always lead to truth and justice. These procedures and regulation are meant to distinguish between truth and falsity in most of the cases, but not always; and what applies to majority of the cases only, cannot be deemed to apply to all cases.

It becomes clear from the afore-said explanations where an exegete has gone wrong. He says that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was ordered to ask forgiveness of Allãh, because he had intended to defend and protect that treacherous man (mentioned in the verse), as that man's people had requested the Prophet to be his advocate against a Jew. But this exegesis is wrong, because that putative intention would show that he had come under their reprehensible influence, while Allãh says that they could not influence him in any harmful manner.

QUR'ÃN: And do not plead on behalf of those who act unfaithfully to their souls . . . : It is said that unfaithful action has been linked to "their souls" because in the end its evil consequences turn back to the souls. Alternatively, it may count every sin as a treachery against one's own soul, as it has been counted as an injustice against it. Also Allãh says: Allãh knew that you were acting unfaithfully towards your souls (2:187).

If we look at this verse in conjunction with other Qur'ãnic realities that all the believers are like one soul, and one's property in a way belongs to the whole group inasmuch as all are responsible to guard and protect it against loss and waste, then possibly it may be inferred from this verses that a believer usurping or stealing another's property, in fact, acts unfaithfully towards his own soul, his own self.

The divine words: surely Allãh does not love him who is treacherous, sinful, shows that those transgressors persistently indulged in their treachery. It is further emphasized by the word, athīmã (اَثِيْمًا) which, being an adjective with force of a noun, shows that they were deep-dyed in sins. Even the clause, "act unfaithfully to their souls", alludes to their continued faithlessness; the same is the implication of the adjective, 'treacherous', which has been used [in 4:105], rather than the phrase, "those who act unfaithfully". (The latter has been used in 8:71 where it says: so indeed they acted unfaithfully towards Allãh before, but He gave [you] mastery over them.)

It appears from these associations among others that the verse, in context of the reason of its revelation, means as follows: Do not be an advocate on behalf of these people and do not defend them, because they are persistent in their treachery, deep-dyed in unfaithfulness, submerged in sins and transgressions; but Allāh does not love treacherous and sinful persons. This connotation supports the stories that the verses were revealed about Abū Ṭu'mah ibn al-Ubayriq, as will be seen in Traditions

Apart from that story, the verse gives the following guidance: While sitting for judgement, do not support those who persistently indulge in treachery and perfidity; because Allāh does not like treacherous and sinful people. As He dislikes big treacheries, He also dislikes small ones. If it was possible for Allāh to like small treachery, it would have been possible to like big ones too. As it is, Allāh forbids to defend and support small treachery as He forbids supporting big treachery. Of course, if one acted unfaithfully in one case, and later lodged a case about another matter in which he was on right, then the verse does not forbid to defend him, and such advocacy and support is not covered by the sentence: and be not an advocate on behalf of the treacherous.

QUR'ĀN: They hide themselves from men and do not hide themselves from Allāh, . . . : This is one more indication that the verses 105 to 126 were revealed in one context regarding a particularly event and that is the one alluded to in the verse: And whoever commits a fault or a sin, then accuses of it one innocent . . . (4:112). Obviously, hiding can only be tried for deeds like theft, etc., blame for which could be laid at the other's door. It shows that the event mentioned in the verse under discussion and the preceding one is the same which is described in 4:112.

No one can hide oneself from Allāh, because nothing in the earth or in the heavens is hidden from Him. Consequently, its opposite, i.e., not hiding from Allāh, too is a compulsory thing, beyond the orbit of man's power. As such one cannot be blamed or shamed for it as the verse seems to imply. However, "hiding himself" here is apparently an indirect allusion to "feeling shy". That is why the clause, "and [they] do not hide themselves from Allāh", is followed by the clause, "and He is with them when they meditate by night words which please Him not". It exposes their conspiracy which they hatched at night in order that they could deny before the people any involvement in it, and during which they talked what was not pleasing to Allāh. Then the verse goes on to declare, "and Allāh encompasses what they do". It shows that Allāh encompasses them in all conditions, including the time when they committed the crime. These two provisos describe a general condition after the specific restriction; and actually give at first a particular reason why they cannot hide from Allãh, and then describe a general reason.

QUR'ÃN: Behold! You are they who plead for them in this world's life, but who will plead for them with Allãh . . . : The question shows futility of people's pleading for the treacherous ones; such pleading, even if of any use, may help them only in this life, which has no value in the eyes of Allãh. But who will plead for them or argue on their behalf in the life hereafter, which is particularly honoured in Allãh's presence, and where they will really need some advocate to support their cause? There will be no one then to look after their affairs or to explain away their misdeeds.

QUR'ÃN: And whoever does evil or acts unjustly to his soul, . . . : It is an exhortation to those treacherous persons to return to their Lord and ask His forgiveness. This placing of evil and injustices as two alternatives and ascending from evil to injustice may reflect on the fact that evil is done to others while injustice is ascribed to one's own soul. Or it may be because evil is less serious than injustice – not unlike a small sin vis-à-vis a great sin. And Allãh knows better.

This and the following two verses all together throw light on the same theme, i.e., description of the sin resulting from a man's action; and each in its turn looks at a particular aspect of the sin:-

This (first) verse explains that when a man commits a sin, it is his own soul which is held responsible for it and it is recorded in his scrolls of deed. However, he still has been given an opportunity to return to Allãh and beseech Him for forgiveness. If he does so, he will find Allãh Forgiving, Merciful.

The next verse reminds man that the sin he commits affects his own soul; and it cannot be transferred to another person, by means of false accusation, etc.

The third verse explains that if, after committing a fault or sin, he accuses an innocent person for it, that accusation will be a new sin or crime, over and above the original one.

QUR'ÃN: And whoever commits a sin, he only commits it against his own soul; and Allãh is Knowing, Wise : As explained above, this verse is connected with the next one, and as such is a sort of preamble to it. The clause, "he only commits it against his own soul", focuses the responsibility on the perpetrator, and admonishes those who, after committing a crime, try to put the blame on the others. The meaning therefore is as follows: Whoever commits a crime, he does so against his own soul, and it is not written in someone else's account; it is he who has done it, not the other man, even if he accuses that man of it, and even if that another man had undertaken to carry that load on his shoulders. Allāh is Knowing, He knows that the sin was done by this sinner, and not by that accused man; and He is Wise, He does not hold responsible for a sin except that actual sinner, and does not put the burden of a crime except on the actual criminal. Allāh says: . . . for it is (the benefit of) what it has earned, and upon it (the evil of) what it has wroght . . . (2:286); . . . and no bearer of burden shall bear the burden of another . . . (6:164); And those who disbelieve say to those who believe: "Follow our path and we will bear your wrongs." And never shall they be the bearer of any of their wrongs; most surely they are liars (29:12).

QUR'ĀN: And whoever commits a fault or a sin, then accuses of it one innocent, he indeed takes upon himself the burden of a calumny and a manifest sin : ar-Rāghib says in Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān : "When one wants to do one thing and inadvertently does another, it is said, he did a mistake; and if it happens as he had intended, it is said, he has found [his target]. Also if he does something not good, or intends to do something unworthy, he is said to have done a mistake. That is why they say in Arabic: 'He found (i.e., did) the mistake [which he wanted to do]; he missed the right [which he wanted to do]; he found the right; he missed the error or mistake.' Thus the word is used for opposite meanings, and one must ponder before deciding its intended connotation."

Again he says: "al-Khaṭī'ah (اَلْخَطِيْئَة = mistake, fault) and as-sayyi'ah (اَلسَّيِّئَة = evil, sin) have nearly similar connotations. But al-khaṭīah is mostly used when the result that appeared was not the one actually intended; for example , one fires at a wild animal and kills a man, or drinks liquor and commits a crime while intoxicated. Now, the cause of that effect can be either lawful or unlawful. If the cause was unlawful, like drinking liquor, the resulting effect or crime cannot be pardoned; however if it was lawful, like firing at a wild animal, [it might be dealt with leniently]. Allāh says: there is no blame on you concerning that in which you made a mistake, but (concerning) that your hearts do purposely (blame may rest on you) [33:5]; and He has said [in the verse under discussion]: And whoever commits a fault or a sin. Therefore, al-khaṭīah (fault), here means that mistake which just happened inadvertently."

I think that the word, al-khaṭīah, is an adjective which, because of frequent use, does not need any noun. In this respect it is similar to al-muṣībah (اَلْمُصِيْبَة = misfortune), ar-raziyyah (اَلرَّزِيَّة = tradgedy) and as-salīqah (اَلسَّلِيقَة = inborn disposition) inasmuchas all these are adjectives but are used as nouns. The paradigm, fa'īl (فَعِيْل) shows the stocking up and permanency of the root-word; thus al-khaṭīah is an action in which al-khaṭã' (اَلْخَطّاء = mistake) is permanently settled down; while al-khaṭã' refers to an unintended mistake like manslaughter. This was the original meaning. Then it was extended to include those actions which a man would not do if he had not lost his natural uprightness. This extended meaning covers every disobedience and its effect. Thus al-khaṭīah is that action or its effect which was done inadvertently (and it will not be called a disobedience) or which one should not have intended (and it will be counted as a disobedience or its effect).

Allãh has ascribed al-khaṭīah (fault) in this verse to al-kasb (اَلْكَسْب = earning; translated here as 'commits'). Therefore, it must mean the fault which is a disobedience. As such, it means the fault done intentionally; although it was an action which a right-minded man should not have intended.[8]

It was explained under the verse 2:219: (Say: "In both of them is a great sin . . . ") that sin is an action whose evil consequences deprive man of many good and virtues, e.g., drinking liquor, gambling, stealing – the evils which prevent man from acquiring this life's good, and degrade him in the society to such an extent that people do not place any trust in him and do not believe him.[9]

The verse under discussion mentions fault and sin as alternatives and ascribes both to 'earning', that is, wilful action (And whoever commits a fault or a sin). Clearly both have been used in their particular meanings. Thus the meaning will be as follows: Whoever commits a fault whose effect is perpetual (like, unlawful murder or theft) and then puts its blame on an innocent man, then certainly he has burdened himself with a fresh calumny and another clear sin.

The word ar-ramiyy (اَلرَّمِي = translated here as 'accuses') literally means shooting an arrow; and the liability of the sin of calumny is described as being burdened with it. The two together present a fine metaphor: The false accuser shoots the arrow at the innocent victim and kills him; and this crime burdens him with a load which he cannot throw away and which prevents him from every good throughout his life.

From the preceding explanations, it may easily be understood why in these verses disobedience has been variously named sin, fault and evil, or injustice, treachery and misleading. Each word perfectly fits the context where it is placed.

QUR'ÃN: And were it not for Allãh's grace upon you and His mercy, a party of them had certainly designed to mislead you : The context shows that this design of theirs to mislead the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) refers to their attempts to urge him to defend and support those whom Allãh has named in the beginning as "the treacherous". Obviously this group is the same whom Allãh has addressed in these words: Behold! you are they who plead for them in this world's life . . . This fits on the people of Abū Ṭu'mah, as will be described later.

QUR'ÃN: and they do not mislead but their own souls and they shall not harm you in any way : The two sentences taken together clearly show that their attempt to mislead the Prophet, harms their own souls only; it does not affect him in any way. They have mislead themselves through their evil designs; it is nothing but a sin and every sin is delusion.

This expression also has another connotation, given in the exegesis of chapter 3, verse 69: and they lead not astray but themselves, and they do not perceive.[10] But that connotation is not fit in this context.

The verse says: and they shall not harm you in any way, and Allãh has revealed to you the Book; it absolutely dismisses their ability to harm the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); it appears to be qualified by the clause: and Allãh has revealed to you the Book, which is a circumstantial clause related to the pronoun 'you' in the preceding clause. Thus, it totally rebuts the idea that anyone can harm the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in any way whether in knowledge or action.

QUR'ÃN: and Allãh has revealed to you the Book and the Wisdom, and He has taught you what you did not know : As pointed out above it gives the reason why they cannot harm the Prophet in any way. Or may be it shows the reason of the full statement, and they do not mislead but their own souls, and they shall not harm you in any way. In any case, this revelation of the Book and this teaching of the Wisdom is the reason why their attempts to mislead the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) can never succeed. This is the foundation of his al-'iṣmah (اَلْعِصْمَة = sinlessness, infallibility).

[10] al-Mīzãn, (Eng. transl.) vol.6, pp.107-9 (tr.)

THE MEANING OF AL-'IṢMAH

The verse apparently shows that the basic factor from which al-'iṣmah emanates is a sort of knowledge which prevents the knower from indulging in sin and mistake. In other words, knowledge prevents one from going astray. Likewise, all good characteristics, like bravery chastity and generosity are the forms of knowledge which are deep rooted in psyche and create their effects and at the same time prevent one from indulging in their opposites like cowardice or rashness, lack of desire or greed, miserliness or extravagance.

Although beneficial knowledge and perfect sagacity keep one clean and prevent his falling in quagmire of depravity or being soiled with filth of sins, (as we see in the people who have knowledge and wisdom, and steeped in piety and religion). However, it is such a cause as brings its effects most of the times but not always. The same is the case with all material and natural causes which are found in the universe. Look at anyone who is perfect in any field; you will find that his perfection does not protect him from mistake always and without any fail. It is a common trait of all causes which we see and observe.

The reason is that man possesses various powers of consciousness and at times some of them push the others to the back of the mind and man becomes oblivious of those factors. A man with faculty of piety will not be inclined to follow base desires as long as he is conscious of the virtue of his piety; but a time may come when the fire of desire is inflamed and he being tempted by that desire becomes oblivious of the virtue of piety or his consciousness of piety becomes weak, and he commits what piety would never tolerate and indulges in base desires. The same is the case with all conscious causes found in man. Otherwise, man will never deviate from the effects of any of these causes as long as the cause remains intact. In short, whenever man goes against the dictates of virtue, it happens because some causes overpower the others and man forgets dictates of virtue. But as for this faculty which is called the power of al-'iṣmah it is a conscious cause emanating from knowledge which can never be overpowered. Had it been like other consciousness and comprehensions, it could have sometimes failed and deviated from the right path. This knowledge is not like other knowledge and comprehensions which we are familiar with and which can be acquired and learned from teachers.

Allãh has pointed to this unique knowledge in this talk addressed particularly to His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) when he says: and Allãh has revealed to you the Book and the Wisdom and He has taught you what you did not know. It is an exclusive talk which we cannot properly understand because we have not tasted this type of knowledge and consciousness. However, if we look at some of the Divine speeches – for example: Say: "Whoever is the enemy of Jibrīl – for surely he brought it down to your heart by Allãh's command . . ." (2:97). The faithful spirit has descended wit it upon your heart that you may be of the warners in plain Arabic language (26:193-5) – we will clearly see that this sending down of the Book is rooted in knowledge. Some other verses show that this sending down of the Book refers to revelation and talking as may be seen in the following verses: He has made plain to you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and that which We have revealed to you and that We enjoined upon Ibrãhīm and Mūsã and 'Īsã . . . (42:13); Surely, We have revealed to you as We revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him . . . (4:163); ". . . I do not follow aught save that which is revealed to me . . ." (6:50); ". . . I only follow what is revealed to me from my Lord . . . " (7:203).

It is inferred from these various verses that al-inzãl (اَلْاِنْزَال = sending down) means revelation of the Book and the Wisdom – and it is a sort of divine teaching to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Nevertheless, the teaching referred to by the words: and He has taught you what you did not know, is something quite different from the teaching through revelation of the Book and the Wisdom; the verses deal with the judicial decisions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in various events and in the litigations which are brought to him for judgement, and that judgement is given by his own opinion. It has nothing to do with the Book and the Wisdom – although it depends on them – it is the result of his own view and opinion.

It appears from the above that the sending down and the teaching in the words: and Allãh has sent down to you the Book and Wisdom and He has taught you what you did not know, refer to two categories of knowledge: one, teaching through revelation and sending of the faithful spirit to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); two, teaching through inspiration created in the heart and the secret divine thought without the agency of any angel. This is what is supported by the traditions which have come to us about the prophetic knowledge. Therefore, the sentence: and He has taught you what you did not know, means: Allãh has given you a particular knowledge which you could never get through the normal means which help man in learning acquired knowledge; that particular knowledge is given only by Allãh to His chosen ones.

Clearly, this Divine gift which we call al-'iṣmah is a sort of knowledge and consciousness which is totally different from all other types of knowledge inasmuch as this knowledge is never overpowered by any other faculty; rather it overpowers all other faculties and uses them according to its own wisdom. In this way, it fully protects the holder of al-'iṣmah from going astray and committing mistakes. It has come in the traditions that the Prophet and the Imãms do have a spirit which is called the Holy Spirit; and it supports them and protects them from sin and mistake. It is this Spirit which is mentioned in the verse: And thus did We reveal to you a Spirit by Our command. You did not know what the Book was nor (what) the faith (was), but We made it a light guiding thereby whom We please of Our servants (42:52). (This meaning may be inferred if we take the apparent meaning of the verse that a guiding Spirit was sent to the Prophet, s.a.w.a.) Similarly there is the verse: And We made them Imãms who guided (people) by Our command and We revealed to them the doing of good and the keeping up of the prayer and the giving of the alms and Us (alone) did they worship (21:73). We shall explain in its place the meaning of this verse, God willing, that it refers to the support given by the Holy Spirit to the Imãms for doing good and worshipping Allãh.

The above explanations also show that the Book mentioned in the verse: and Allãh has revealed to you the Book and the Wisdom and has taught you what you did not know, refers to the revelations sent for removing the peoples' conflicts; as was mentioned in the verse: Mankind was but one people; so Allãh sent the prophets as bearers of good tidings and as warners, and He sent down with them the book with the truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they differed . . . (2:213), as was explained in the second volume of this book.[11]

The wisdom mentioned in the verse refers to all Divine cognition sent through revelation which were beneficial for this world and the hereafter. The sentence: and He has taught you what you did not know, refers to something totally different from general cognition obtained from the Book and the Wisdom.

The above explanations show the shortcomings of some exegetes regarding exegesis of this verse. Some have taken the Book as the Qur'ān and the Wisdom as the commandments found in it and have said that: what you did not know refers to the sharī'ah and the knowledge of the unseen. Others have explained the Book and the Wisdom as the Qur'ān and the sunnah and what you did not know as the sharī'ah and the stories of the previous prophets and other such informations. There are other such explanations; but what we have written in the explanation shows how weak such other explanations are.

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh's Grace on you is very great : It reminds the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) of the Divine favours.

QUR'ĀN: There is no good in most of their secret counsels except* (in his) *who enjoins charity or goodness or reconciliation between people: ar-Rāghib has said: "Nājaytuhu (نَاجَيْتُهُ = I wispered in his ear). Its literal meaning is that you remain alone with him in a najwah (نَجْوَه = rising ground)." Thus an-najwā (اَلنَّجْوي) means secret counselling, whispered talk. Sometimes the word is used for conspirators or whisperers themselves. Allāh says: when they take counsel secretly (17:47).

The talk, "there is no good in most of their secret counsels", reverts to the preceding sentence, when they meditate by night words which please him not, because all these verses are connected together. Here it condemns all secret consultations whether they are done at night or in daytime. The statement that "there is no good in it" covers all secret counselling or plotting even if it is not done during night time. The same is the coming words: whoever acts hostilely to the Messenger; Allāh did not say, whoever whispers secretly to become hostile to the Messenger, because the described order is for acting hostilely, no matter whether it is done after secret whispering or not.

The exception, "except (in his) who enjoins charity . . . " is isolated. The meaning: but whoever orders charity or goodness there is some good in his order. Secret counselling to do good work has been called enjoinment and order; it is a metaphorical expression. Allãh has mentioned three good works which secret whispering enjoins: charity, goodness and reconciliation between the people. Charity is a part of goodness, yet Allãh has mentioned it separately because it is the most perfect and prominent example of goodness and by nature it entails secret consultation.

QUR'ÃN: and whoever does this seeking Allãh's pleasure, We will give him a mighty reward : It categorises secret counselling describing how it may earn good reward or punishment. It shows what goodness is found in good secret counselling and as for the objectionable counselling, why it is not good.

In short, it shows that those who indulge in secret whispering are of two types: One, there are those who do it seeking Allãh's pleasure; he calls to goodness or strives to bring reconciliation between people seeking nearness to Allãh, and Allãh will surely give him a great reward; two, there are others who plan secretly acting hostilely to the Messenger and following a way other than that of the believers. His recompense is that Allãh leaves him into what he himself has chosen, makes him enter hell and it is an evil resort.

QUR'ÃN: And whoever acts hostilely to the Messenger after that guidance has become manifest to him, and follows other than the way of the believers We will turn him to that to which he has (himself) turned and make him enter hell; and it is an evil resort . . . : al-Mushãqqah (اَلْمُشَاقَّه = acting hostilely) is derived from shiqq (شِقٌّ = a part removed from a whole). Thus, al-mushãqqah and ash-shiqãq (اَلشِّقَّاق) show that you are in the opposite side of your fellow's. It is a metaphorical way to describe difference and disagreement. Acting hostilely to the Messenger after manifestation of the guidance means acting against the Messenger and indulging in his disobedience. Therefore, the phrase, "and follows other than the way of the believers", further explains hostility to the Messenger. The way of the believers means obeying the Messenger because his obedience is the obedience of Allãh. Allãh says: whoever obeys the Messenger, he indeed obeys Allãh (4:80).

The believers are united in the belief and their way is the unity on the obedience of Allāh and His Messenger – you may say in short "the obedience of His Messenger". This preserves the unity of their way as Allāh has said: But how can you disbelieve while it is you to whom the communications of Allāh are recited and among you is His Messenger? And whoever holds fast to Allāh he indeed is guided to the straight path. O you who believe! fear Allāh with the fear which is due to Him and do not die unless you are Muslims. And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together and be not divided . . . (3:101-3).We have explained this verse in volume three of this book.[12] Also Allāh has said: And (know) that this My Path, the Right one, therefore follow it, and follow not (other) ways, for they will lead you away from His way; this He has enjoined you with that you may guard (against evil) (6:153). As the way of Allāh is the way of piety, the way of guarding against evil, and the believers are called to that way; so when they unite on that way they will cooperate with one another in piety. Allāh says: . . . and help one another in goodness and piety, and do not help one another in sin and aggression . . . (5:2). The verse, as you see, forbids the believers to disobey Allāh and to create friction in the Islamic Society; and this is what we have explained about the way of the believers.

The meaning of the verse (and whoever acts hostilely to the Messenger after that Guidance has become manifest to him and follows other than the way of the believers) is similar to the verse which says: O you who believe! when you confer together in private, do not give to each other counsel of sin and revolt and disobedience to the Messenger, and give to each other counsel of goodness and piety . . . (58:9).

The phrase, "We will turn him to that to which he has (himself) turned", means that We will let him continue in the behaviour he has chosen for himself and will let him follow other than the way of the believers; as Allāh says: All do We aid – these as well as those – out of the bounty of your Lord, and the bounty of your Lord is not confined (17:20).

"and make him enter hell; and it is an evil resort": the conjunction, 'and' shows that the whole episode, that is, turning him to his own chosen way and sending him to hell is a single Divine order, some parts will be implemented in this world (letting him proceed to his chosen path) and some will appear in the life hereafter and that is sending him to hell; and it is an evil resort.

QUR'ÃN: Surely Allãh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and He forgives what is besides this to whom He pleases; and whoever associates anything with Allãh, he indeed strays off into a remote error : Apparently, the verse explains the reason of the preceding statement: We will turn him to that to which he has (himself) turned and make him enter hell; because all these verses are interconnected. This verse proves that being hostile to the Messenger is the same as associating something to Allãh, and Allãh surely does not forgive that anything should be associated with Him. The same idea may be inferred from the following verses of ch.47: Surely those who disbelieve and turn away from Allãh's way and oppose the Messenger after that guidance has become clear to them cannot harm Allãh in any way, and He will make null their deeds (32). O you who believe! Obey Allãh and obey the Messenger and do not let your deeds be forfeited (33). Surely those who disbelieve and turn away from Allãh's way, then they die while they are unbelievers, Allãh will by no means forgive them (34). Apparently, the verse 34 gives the reason of the order given in verse 33 regarding obedience of Allãh and of His Messenger. Clearly, disobedience to Allãh and His Messenger is a disbelief which will never be forgiven; in other words, it is nothing but polytheism.

The addition of the phrase, "and He forgives what is besides this to whom He pleases", aims at completing the talk; also it shows how great is this cursed sin, that is, hostility to the Messenger. We have explained shortly this verse at the end of the volume four.[13]

QUR'ÃN: They do not call besides Him on any thing but females: al-Inãth (اَلْاِنَاث) is plural of al-unthã (اَلْاُنْثي = female). They say in Arabic, anatha 'l-ḥadīd (اَنَثَ الْحَدِيْد = the iron became soft). Anatha 'l-makãn (اَنَثَ الْمَكَان = the place brought out its vegetation fast). This word shows the idea of passibity, of being influenced, and that is why a female is called unthã. This verse describes the idols and all those who are worshipped besides Allãh as females, because all of them are manipulated and influenced by man; they have no power to affect any thing which their worshippers expect from them. Allãh says: Surely those whom you call upon besides Allãh cannot create a fly, though they should all gather for it, and should the fly snatch away anything from them they could not take it back from it, weak are the invoker and the invoked. They have not estimated Allãh with the estimation that is due to Him; most surely Allãh is Strong, Mighty (22:73-74). Also He says: And they have taken besides Him gods who do not create anything while they are themselves created and they control not for themselves any harm or profit, and they control not death, not life, nor raising (the dead) to life (25:3).

Apparently, the femininity points to utter passivity which is the characteristic of a created thing vis-à-vis the Creator. This interpretation is better than the one which some people have written that the word females refers to Lãt, ‘Uzzã and Manãt, etc. every tribe had its own idol which was called goddess of that tribe; it was said either because their names were of feminine gender or because they were made of inanimate matters, which are generally given feminine gender. But this interpretation does not conform with the exclusivity which is found in the verse, "they do not call besides Him on anything but females", because among those who are worshipped besides Allãh there are some males like the Jesus Christ, Barahma and Buddha.[14]

QUR’ÃN: and they do not call on anything but a rebellious Satan : al-Marīd (اَلْمَرِيْدُ = stripped of every good; naked). al-Bayḍãwī has said: "al-Mãrid (اَلْمَارِد) and al-marīd: he who is unrelated with any good. The root word denotes touching and that is why they say ṣarḥun mumarrad (صَرْحٌ مُمَرَّد = plastered castle), ghulãmun amrad (غُلَامٌ اَمْرَد = beardless boy), shajaratun mardã’ (شَجَرَةٌ مَرْدَآء = leafless tree)."

Apparently, this sentence explains the preceding one; 'calling' metaphorically denotes worshipping because worship had spread among people for calling the deity to fulfil their needs. Allãh has given to obedience the name of worship as He says: Did I not charge you, O Children of Adam! that you should not serve the Satan? Surely he is your open enemy, and that you should serve Me! this is the right way (36:60-61). The sentence denotes that when they worship anything other than Allãh they actually worship and call the rebellious Satan because it is done in obedience to his suggestion.

[14] Barahma is a mythical figure; and Buddha is not worshipped as God because Buddhism doesn't have any concept of Divinity. Rãmã and Krishnã would serve as better example.

QUR'ÃN: Allãh has cursed him : al-La'n (اَللَّعْن = to keep away from mercy). It is another adjective for the Satan and describes the reason of the previous adjective, 'rebellious'.

QUR'ÃN: and he said: "Most certainly I will take of Thy servants an appointed portion: It points to what Allãh has quoted from the Satan's claim: Then by Thy Might I will surely lead them astray, all, except Thy servants from among them, the purified ones (38:82-83). The phrase, "of Thy servants", confirms that those who go astray are even then Allãh's servants. They cannot discard this servitude; He is their Lord who will decide about them whatever He pleases.

QUR'ÃN: And most certainly I will lead them astray and excite in them vain desires, and bid them so that they shall slit the ears of the cattle, and most certainly I will bid them so that they shall alter Allãh's creation;" and whoever takes the Satan for a guardian rather than Allãh he indeed shall suffer a manifest loss : The phrase, "they shall slit the ears of the cattle", describes the custom of the Arabs in the days of Ignorance when they used to slit the ears of a particular type of she-camel and bullocks to make their meat unlawful for eating. All the customs mentioned in the verse are errors and straying. First, it is said that Satan will lead them astray; it is a general statement; then some examples of that straying are given for putting more emphasis on them. The Satan says: "Most certainly I will lead them astray by making them worship other than Allãh and encouraging them to commit sins. I will excite in them vain desires which will divert their attention from their obligations and duties. I will bid them to slit the ears of the cattle and exhort them to make unlawful what Allãh has made lawful, and I will order them so that they shall alter Allãh's creation." This last phrase may denote castration and various types of mutilations as well as sodomy and lesbianism.

Possibly, alteration of Allãh's creations may connote going against the natural law and discarding the upright religion. Allãh says: Then set your face upright for religion in the right state – the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; there is no altering of Allãh's creation; that is the right religion (30:30).

When one calls the Satan, that is, obey his commands, Allãh counts it as taking the Satan for a guardian, as He says: "And whoever takes the Satan for a guardian rather than Allãh he indeed shall suffer a manifest loss." It should be noted that Allãh has not said: Whosoever the Satan is his guardian; because the previous verses have clearly shown that the guardian is Allāh alone and no one else has any guardianship on anything even if someone takes him as his guardian.

QUR'ĀN: He gives them promises and excites vain desires in them; and the Satan does not promise them but to deceive. These are they whose abode is hell, and they shall not find any refuge from it : The context shows that it gives the reason to the preceding verse, he indeed shall suffer a manifest loss. What loss can be more manifest than the one who changes real happiness and perfection of creation with false promises and imaginary desires. Allāh says: And (as for) those who disbelieves, their deeds are like the mirage in a desert, which the thirsty man deems to be water, until when he comes to it he finds it to be naught, and there he finds Allāh, so He pays back to him his reckoning in full; and Allāh is quick in reckoning (24:39). The promises refer to direct Satanic temptations and desires spring up from those temptations whose imaginary beauties enrapture the mind. That is why Allāh says, "and the Satan does not promise them but to deceive". It should be noted that the Satanic promise has been called deception but not the desires.

Then their end result is described in the next verse: "These are they whose abode is hell, and they shall not find any refuge from it". Maḥīṣ (مَحِيْص = the place to escape; translated here as refuge).

QUR'ĀN: And (as for) those who believe and do good, We will make them enter into gardens beneath which rivers flow, to abide therein forever; (it is) a promise of Allāh, true (indeed); and who is truer of word than Allāḥ : This describes the believers' position to complete the picture by giving a clear contrast with the unbelievers'. In the verse, pronouns have changed from second person plural to the third person. The reason is that Allāh wants to show the importance of the situation and its greatness by using the proper name, Allāh, instead of pronouns of second plural.

There is one more fine point in the phrase, "We will make them enter into gardens"; it indicates that soon they will be present before God Almighty and He will not conceal Himself from His believing servants as He is their guardian.

"And who is truerof word than Allāḥ": It presents a contrast with what has been said in the preceding verse about the Satanic promises that it is nothing but deception while Allãh's promise is a reality and His words true.

QUR'ÃN: (This) shall not be in accordance with your vain desires nor in accordance with the vain desires of the People of the Book; whoever does evil, he shall be requited with it, and besides Allãh he will find for himself neither a guardian nor helper : The talk returns to the topic it had started with. It gives in short the conclusion of the detailed speech. It has been narrated about the actions and speeches of some believers who insisted before the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he must take their side, and help them against their opposite parties in their mutual conflict and litigation. It shows that they thought that by believing in Allãh and His Messenger they had done a favour to Allãh and established a right over the Prophet, by which Allãh and His Messenger were obliged to take their side and give judgement in their favour, no matter whether they are on right or on wrong, and whether that judgement would be just or unjust. It is the same phenomenon which we find in the followers of the leaders of error and the retinues of oppressive rulers; each of them, while humiliating himself before the leaderand obeying him, thinks that by attaching himself to the leader he has done a favour to him; as a result he believes that he has a right on his leader because of which the leader must protect his interests and compulsorily give him precedence over others.

Also, the People of the Book entertained the same ideas as Allãh narrates in His Book about them: And the Jews and the Christians say: "We are the sons of Allãh and His beloved ones" (5:18). Also He says: And they say: "Be Jews or Christians, you will be on the right course" (2:135). Again He says: This is because they say: "There is not upon us in the matter of the unlearned people any way (to reproach)" (3:75).

Allãh has refuted such ideas of that group of believers and joined them with the People of the Book. Allãh has called these assumptions vain desires, because like the desires, these presumptions are merely imaginary forms which have no reality outside the mind. Allãh tells them: 'O group of the Muslims! It is not going to be in accordance with your vain desires nor with the vain desires of the People of the Book; it all depends on deeds; if your deeds are good you will get good reward and if evil, then evil.' The evil has been mentioned in the verse before the good deeds because they had committed great sins. "Whoever does evil he shall be requited with it and besides Allãh he will find for himself neither a guardian nor helper": The sentence begins without any conjunction. It means it is a separate speech; and in a way gives reply to the following unasked question: If entering into the fold of Islam and true belief does not bring every good to a man and does not protect his interests in life then what is the way and where will the man go? And the same is the situation in Judaism and Christianity. In reply Allãh declares: "Whoever does evil he shall be requited with it and besides Allãh he will find for himself neither a guardian nor helper; and whoever does from good deeds, . . . "

The verse, "he shall be requited with it", is general and covers worldly punishments prescribed by the Islamic laws, like retaliation for criminals, cutting of fingers for thief and stoning or whipping for fornicator, etc., as well as the punishments in the hereafter which Allãh has promised in His Book and through His Prophet.

This generality fits perfectly with the occasion of the revelation of these verses. It has been described that the verses were revealed concerning a theft which some Muslims had committed and had accused a Jew or a Muslim for it and then insisted before the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he should give judgement against the accused.

The words, "neither a guardian nor helper", are also general. No guardian or helper can avert a punishment of a crime from the culprit; even the Prophet or Imãm and the honour of Islam and religion cannot help in this matter. The punishment prescribed by Allãh cannot be removed from the does of the evil by anyone. Also, it covers guardian and helper who would be able to remove from him the punishment in the hereafter except what the next verse mentions.

QUR'ÃN: And whoever does from good deeds, whether male or female, and he (or she) is a believer – these shall enter the garden, and they shall not be dealt with a jot unjustly : This is the other alternative which describes the recompense of the doer of good deeds, that is, the garden. In this verse, Allãh has attached a condition which restricts the recompense; and on the other side has given latitude which has expanded the circle of reward. It is the condition of being rewarded with the garden that the doer of a good deed should be a believer, because the reward stands face to face with good deed and an unbeliever has no good deed to his credit. Allãh says: . . . and if they had set up others (with Him) certainly what they did would have been forfeited (6:88). Also, He said: These are they who disbelieve in the signs of their Lord and His meeting, so their deeds become null, and therefore We will not set up a balance for them on the Day of Resurrection (18:105).

On the other hand, Allãh has said, "And whoever does from good deeds", the word 'from' indicates a part, and it means whoever does some of the good deeds. This expands the circle of the promise of the garden. If Allãh had said: 'and whoever does good deeds' and the context requires precise description of the recompense – it would have meant that the garden was for a believer who performed all good deeds; but the Divine Grace has spread the good reward for every believer who performs some good deeds and if he has left any good deed undone or committed any sin, Allãh will make it up through repentance or intercession, as He has said: Surely Allãh does not forgive that anything should be associated with Him and He forgives what is besides this to whom He pleases; . . . (4:116); we have explained in detail about repentance while explaining the words of Allãh: Repentance with Allãh is only for those who do evil in ignorance . . . (4:17) in the fourth volume[15]; and about intercession under the verse: And be on the guard against a day when one soul shall not avail another in the least, . . . (2:48) in the first volume of this book[16].

> Then Allãh says: "whether male or female"; the Divine Decree covers males and females both without any difference of gender. This is totally opposite to the pretensions of ancient people of various religions and communities like India, Egypt and all the idol worshippers. They believed that whatever good deed the womenfolk did it was not credited to their account and they did not get any reward for their virtuous deeds. The same was the ideology of Judaism and Christianity: that all honour and respect is reserved for the men; and the women are disgraced in the eyes of Allãh; there are shortcomings in their creation and they will not get full reward for their deeds. The Arabs' thinking was not much different from these superstitions. Therefore, Allãh has made both sexes equally deserving for His Grace and said, "whether male of female".

Probably, it is for this reason that the sentence, " . . . these shall enter the garden" is followed by, "and they shall not be dealt with a jot unjustly". The first sentence shows that the women do have their shares in the good reward like the men; and the second sentence shows that there shall be no excess or shortfall between their shares in quantity; as Allāh has said: so their lord accepted their prayer: "That I will not waste the work of a worker among you, whether male or female, the one of you being from the other . . . " (3:195).

QUR'ĀN: And who has a better religion than he who submits himself entirely to Allāh. And he is the doer of good (to others) and follows the faith of Ibrāhīm, the upright one, and Allāh took Ibrāhīm as a friend. And whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's, and Allāh encompasses all things : It appears that this is a reply to an unspoken question: If the Islam of a Muslim or belief of the People of the Book has no effect in bringing the good to him and to protect his interest – in short, when belief in Allāh and His signs is worthless and its existence and non-existence make no difference – then what is the honour of Islam? Or the privilege of faiṯ

The reply is given that the religion's honour is a fact without any doubt. It cannot be doubted nor any wise man can be oblivious of its goodness. This ideal is hidden in the phrase, "And who has a better religion than he who submits himself entirely to Allāḥ" The question takes it for granted that there is goodness in the religion. Man cannot get himself freed from religion and the best of the religion is to submit oneself entirely to Allāh who is the Owner of whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth. Man has to surrender himself to Allāh and worship Him; also he should follow the faith of Ibrāhīm, the upright one, because that is the natural religion. And Allāh took Ibrāhīm as a friend; Ibrāhīm was the first to submit himself entirely to Allāh doing good to others and following the upright religion.

Nevertheless, no one should entertain the idea that the Divine friendship is like the friendship found between man and man which overshadows all right and wrong and opens for them the door of recklessness and despotism. Allāh is the owner, not the owned, He encompasses all things and is not surrounded. He is not like the rulers, presidents and kings because when they get any authority over their servants or subjects, they hand over something of their own freedom in its lieu to the public. They overpower some groups with help of some others and rule over one people with help of the other people; when a time comes where their will is opposed by the public's will then they cannot hold their ground, they fall down and their helplessness is clearly seen by one and all.

It is to describe this idea that the speech ends with the verse, "And whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allãh's, and Allãh encompasses all things".

T R A D I T I O N S

It is narrated by al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr that all these verses were revealed about a group of the Helpers from Banū Ubayriq. There were three brothers, all hypocrites; Bashīr, Bishr and Mubashshir. They dug a hole in the wall of the uncle of Qatãdah ibn an-Nu‘mãn – and Qatãdah was a badrī[*] – and stole food grain which he had stored for his family together with a sword and coat of mail.

Qatãdah complained about it to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and said "O Messenger of Allãh, some people dug a hole in the wall of my uncle and took away the food grain he had saved for his family and a sword and a coat of mail, and they are the people of a bad family." A believer man, Lubayd ibn Sahl, was with them when they were planning (the theft). Banū Ubayriq said to Qatãdah, "This is the work of Lubayd ibn Sahl." This news came to Lubayd's ears, he took his sword and went to them and said, "O Banū Ubayriq! Do you accuse me of the theft while you are more deserving for it? You are hypocrites, you lampoon the Messenger of Allãh and ascribe the poems to the Quraysh. You must prove this (accusation), otherwise I will fill my sword with your blood." So, Banū Ubayriq talked with him in a friendly way and said to him, "You go back, may Allãh have mercy on you; because you are free from this claim."

Now, Banū Ubayriq approached a man from their clan, Usayd ibn ‘Urwah by name; he was a good eloquent speaker. He went to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and said, "O Messenger of Allãh! Qatãdah ibn an-Nu‘mãn singled out a family of our clan, a distinguished people of high regard and good family tree, and he accused them of theft and charged them of what they are innocent of[17]

---

[*] i.e., one who participated in the battle of Badr with the Holy Prophet of Islam (ed.).

[17] & [11] The next ḥadīth, narrated by same Qatãdah, is almost identical to this one, with one difference: These two sentences, in the next narrative, end with the proviso, "without evidence of proof." That crucial phrase makes it clear why the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) listened to Usayd (Usayr) and why he admonished Hearing this, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was grieved. Then Qatādah came to him, and looking at him the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, "You pointed out a distinguished family, a people of high honour and good family tree, and you accused them of theft"[18]. (In this way) he admonished him severely. Qatādah was grieved because of it and went back to his uncle and said, "Oh, would that I had died and not spoken to the Messenger of Allāh (in this matter); because he has talked to me in a way I did not like." His uncle said, "Allāh is He Whose help to be sought."

Then Allāh sent down these verses to His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) about this incident: Surely We have revealed the Book to you with the truth . . . when they meditate by night words which please Him not. al-Qummī says: The word, 'words', here means deeds. Allāh has used the word to indicate action: Behold: You are they who plead for them in this world's life . . . And whoever commits a fault or sin then accuses of it one innocent; al-Qummī said: Lubayd ibn Sahl – he indeed takes upon himself the burden of a calumny and a manifest sin.

The same tafsīr narrates: Abu 'l-Jārūd narrates from Abū Ja'far (a.s.): "Some people from the near relatives of Bashīr said: 'Let us go to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), so that we should talk to him about our fellow or explain to him that our fellow is innocent.' When Allāh revealed: They hide themselves from men and do not hide themselves from Allāh . . . who shall be their protector? Then the clan of Bishr turned on him and said: 'O Bishr, seek forgiveness from Allāh and repent to Him from the sins.' He said: 'I swear by whom I swear that nobody stole it except Lubayd.' Then the verses were revealed: And whoever commits a fault or a sin then accuses of it one innocent he indeed takes upon himself the burden of a calumny and a manifest sin.

Then Bishr renounced Islam and fled to Mecca and Allāh revealed about the group who had come to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to plead for Bishr: And were it not for Allāh's Grace upon you and His mercy, a party of them had certainly designed to mislead you, and they do not mislead but their own souls, and they shall not harm you in any way, and Allāh has revealed to you the Book and the Wisdom, and He has taught you what you did not know, and Allāh's grace on you is very great. (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

Qatādah. It was because Qatādah had not offered any evidence or proof for his case and his claim was untenable from legal point of view. (tr.)

as-Suyūṭī writes: at-Tirmidhī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim, Abu 'sh-Shaykh and al-Ḥãkim (who said that this tradition is correct) have narrated from Qatãdah ibn an-Nu‘mãn that he said: "There was a family in our clan who were called Banū Ubayriq – Bishr, Bashīr and Mubashshir. Bishr was a hypocrite. He used to compose poems satirizing the companions of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and then ascribe it to some other Arabs. He used to say: 'That man has said this and this and that man has said so and so.' But when the companions of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) heard that poem, they used to say, 'By Allãh! no one has said this poem except this wretched one himself. Then he (Bishr) said: 'What! whenever people say some poem they join together and say Ubayriq's son has said it!'"

(Qatãdah) said: "They were a needy poor family before Islam and in Islam. The usual food of the people of Medina was dates and barley. If a man was well to do, and a caravan came from Syria loaded with while flour, that man would buy some of it and reserve it for himself. The other members of the family had to be content with date and barley. So, a loaded caravan arrived from Syria and my uncle, Rufã‘ah Ibn Zayd, purchased a bag of the white flour and kept it in his attic room; and in that room were his arms – two coats of mail and two swords and things connected with them. Someone sneaked in the darkness of the night and dug into the wall of the attic and took the food and arms. In the morning, my uncle, Rufã‘ah, came to me and said, 'O my nephew! do you know that someone sneaked to us during night and my attic has been dug into and they took our food and our arms!'"

He (Qatãdah) continues: "We inquired in the neighbourhood and asked the people. Somebody told us, 'We did see Banū Ubayriq lighting fire in the night and we are sure that it was lit only to bake some of your flour.' When we were inquiring in the neighbourhood, Banū Ubayriq told us, 'By God! we don’t think any one has done it except Lubayd ibn Sahl' – he was a man of our clan who was a Muslim of good character. When Lubayd heard it, he raised his sword and went to Banū Ubayriq and said, 'What! I steal? By God! you should prove this accusation or the sword will mingle in your body.' Then they said, 'Go away, O man! By God! you are not the thief.' We continued our investigation in the neighbourhood until we were sure that these Banū Ubayriq were the thieves. Then my uncle said to me, 'O my nephew, if you only go to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and inform him about it.'"

Qatādah said: "I came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, a family among us, a loathsome people went to my uncle, Rufā'ah ibn Zayd, and dug a hole in his attic and took away his arm and food. They should return to us our arm. As for the food, we don't want it.' The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'I will look into this matter.' When Banū Ubayriq heard about it, they went to a man of their clan who was called Usayr ibn 'Urwah, and they told him of this development, and some people of the neighbourhood also joined them. Now, they went to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! Qatādah ibn an-Nu'mān and his uncle proceeded against one of our families who are Muslims of good character, and they have accused them of theft without any evidence of proof.'"

Qatādah continues: "Then I came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and talked to him. He said, 'You have proceeded against a family who have been described (to me) as Muslims of good character and you have accused them of theft without evidence of proof.'"

Qatādah says: "I came back and I wished that I would have lost some of my wealth but had not talked to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) about it. Then my uncle, Rufā'ah, came to me and asked, 'O my nephew, what (progress) have you made?' I informed him of what the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had told me. My uncle said, 'Allāh is He Whose help to be sought.'"

Without any delay, the verses were revealed: surely we have revealed the Book to you with the truth that you may judge between people by means of that which Allāh has shown you; and be not advocate on behalf of the treacherous, i.e., Banū Ubayriq. And ask forgiveness of Allāh, i.e., from what you had said to Qatādah, surely Allāh is forgiving, merciful. And do not plead on behalf of those who act unfaithfully to their souls . . . then asks forgiveness of Allāh, He shall find Allāh Forgiving, Merciful. i.e., if they ask forgiveness of Allāh, He will forgive them. And whoever commits a fault or a sin, then accuses of it one innocent, he indeed takes upon himself the burden of a calumny and a manifest sin – it refers to their accusation of Lubayd. And were it not for Allāh's grace upon you and His mercy, a party of them had certainly designed to mislead you – i.e., Usayr ibn 'Urwah and His companions. And they do not mislead but their own souls, and they shall not harm you in any way, and Allāh has revealed to you the Book and the Wisdom, and He has taught you what you did not know, and Allāh's grace on you is very great. There is no good in most of their secret counsels except (in his) who enjoins charity or goodness or reconciliation between people; and whoever does this seeking Allãh's pleasure, We will give him a mighty reward. When the verses were revealed the arms were brought to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and he returned them to Rufã'ah.

Qatãdah said, "When I brought the arms to my uncle – he was of old age and I used to think that his faith was weak – when I brought the arms to him, he said, 'O my nephew, this is the path of Allãh: Then I understood that his Islam was correct.'"

When the verses were revealed, Bishr went (to Mecca) and joined the polytheists. He stayed with Sulãfah bint Sa'd. Then Allãh revealed the verses: And whoever acts hostilely to the Messenger after that guidance has become manifest to him, and follows other than the way of the believers, We will turn him to that to which he has (himself) turned and make him enter hell; and it is an evil resort. Surely Allãh does not forgive that anything should be associated with Him, and He forgives what is besides this to whom He pleases; and whoever associates anything with Allãh, he indeed strays off into a remote error. When he stayed with Sulãfah, Ḥassãn ibn Thãbit shot at her some lines of poetry. She took his (i.e., Bishr's) baggage and putting it on her head, went out and threw it in the open valley and said, "You have brought to me the poem of Ḥassãn as gift! You were never to bring any good to me." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This theme is narrated through other chains of narrators also.

The same author writes: Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Ibn Zayd about this verse: He said: "There was a man who stole an iron coat of mail and sword during the days of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and put the blame on a Jew. The Jew said, 'By God! I have not stolen it O Abu 'l-Qãsim! but it has been (wrongly) attributed to me.' There were some neighbours of the thief who claimed that he was blameless and they too accused the Jew. Also they said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! Surely, this Jew is a wicked person. He does not believe in Allãh, nor in your prophethood.' This continued until the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) spoke to the Jew on this matter.

"Thus, Allãh censored the Prophet and revealed: Surely We have revealed the Book to you with the truth that you may judge between people by means of that which Allãh has shown you; and be notan advocate on behalf of the treacherous. And ask forgiveness of Allãh – about what you have told that Jew – Surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful. Then Allãh turned to his neighbours and said: Behold! You are they who plead for them in this world's life; but who will plead for them with Allãh on the Resurrection Day or who shall be their protector? Then Allãh gave them a chance of repentance and said: And whoever does evil or acts unjustly to his soul, then asks forgiveness of Allãh, he shall find Allãh Forgiving, Merciful. And whoever commits a sin, he only commits it against his own soul; and Allãh is Knowing, Wise – Why have you involved yourselves, O people! in this man's error pleading on his behalf? And whoever commits a fault or a sin, then accuses of it one innocent – even if he is a polytheist: he indeed takes upon himself the burden of a calumny and a manifest sin . . . And whoever acts hostilely to the Messenger after that gudiance has become manifest to him and follows other than the way of the believers, We will turn him to that to which he has (himself) turned and make him enter hell; and it is an evil resort. But he refused to avail himself of the repentance which Allãh had offered to him. He went to the polytheists at Mecca. There, he dug hole in a house with intention of theft and the house fell down upon him and he was killed." (ibid.)

The author says: This meaning too is narrated through many chains of narrators with minor differences among them.

The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has said, "There is no servant who committed a sin then stood up and performed wuḍū' and asked forgiveness of Allãh from his sin but it shall be incumbent on Allãh to forgive him, because He says: And whoever does evil or acts unjustly to his soul, then asks forgiveness of Allãh, he shall find Allãh Forgiving, Merciful."

Also he (s.a.w.a.) has said, "Verily Allãh puts the servant in suffering (though He loves him) in order to hear his entreaties." Also he (s.a.w.a.) has said, "Allãh was not to open the door of prayer and shut the door of its acceptance, because He says: Call Me, I will answer to you. And He was not to open the door of repentance and shut the door of forgiveness, while He says: And whoever does evil or acts unjustly to his soul, then asks forgiveness of Allãh, he shall find Allãh Forgiving, Merciful." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

'Abdullãh ibn Ḥamãd al-Anṣãrī narrates from 'Abdullãh ibn Sinãn, that he said: Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) said, "Backbiting is that you say about your brother what is (actually) found in him but Allãh has kept it hidden. But if you say what is not in him, then it comes under the words of Allãh: . . . he indeed takes upon himself the burden of a calumny and a manifest sin." (ibid.)

al-Qummī writes under the verse: There is no good in most of their secret counsels . . . : "My father has narrated to me from Ibn Abī ‘Umayr from Ḥammād from al-Ḥalabī from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said, 'Verily, Allāh has made at-tamaḥḥul obligatory in the Qur’ān.' I asked, 'And what is at-tamaḥḥul, may I be made your ransom!?' He said, 'That you should maintain a brighter face than that of your brother (in faith), and have an intent look on him (i.e., you should not turn away your face from him when he consults you); and this is the word of Allāh: There is no good in most of their secret counsels.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

al-Kulaynī narrates through his chains from ‘Abdullāh ibn Sinān from Abu 'l-Jārūd that he said, "Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) said, 'When I narrate any ḥadīth to you, you should ask me (its proof) from the Book of Allāh. Then he said in some of his talks, 'Verily the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has prohibited much talking, squandering the property and too much questioning.' He was asked, 'O son of the Messenger of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says: There is no good in most of their secret counsels except (in his) who enjoins charity or goodness nad reconciliation between people; and He says: And do not give away your property which Allāh has made for you a (means of) support to the weak of understanding (4:5); and He says: O you who believe! do not put questions about things which if declared to you may trouble you, . . . (5:101). (al-Kāfī)

Ibrāhīm ibn ‘Abdi ‘l-Ḥamīd narrates through some reliable persons from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) about the verse: There is no good in most of their secret consels except (in his) who enjoins charity or goodness or reconciliation between people, that goodness means giving loan. (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: al-Qummī also has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr through the same chain and this meaning has also been narrated through Sunnī chains of narrators. In any case, it is based on the flow of the verse and description of a relevant example.

as-Suyūṭī writes: Muslim, at-Tirmidhī, an-Nasāī, Ibn Mājah and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Sufyān ibn ‘Abdillāh ath-Thaqafī that he said, "I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! give me an order I should hold fast to it in Islam.' He (s.a.w.a.) said, 'Say: "I believe in Allāh," then remain steadfast to it.' I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! What is the most dreadful thing you fear about me?' He said, 'This.' (and the Messenger of Allāh [s.a.w.a.] caught the tip of his own tongue)." (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: There are very numerous traditions condemning excessive talks and praising the silence in the books of the Shī'īs and the Sunnīs.

The same book says: Abū Naṣr as-Sijizzī has narrated in al-Ibānah from Anas that he said, "A bedouin came to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); the Prophet said to him, 'O bedouin! Verily Allāh has revealed to me in the Qur'ān: There is no good in most of their secret counsels except (in his) who enjoins charity or goodness or reconciliation between people, and whoever does this seeking Allāh's pleasure, We will give him a mighty reward. O bedouin! the mighty reward is the paradise.' The bedouin said, 'Praise be to Allāh who guided us to Islam.'" (ibid.)

The same book writes about the words of Allāh: And whoever acts hostilely to the Messenger . . . : at-Tirmidhī and al-Bayhaqī (in his al-Asmā' wa 'ṣ-Ṣifāt) have narrated from Ibn 'Umar that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said, 'Allāh will never gather this ummah on error and Allāh's hand is on the jamā'ah, and whoever separates (from it) he separates (for entering) into hell.'" (ibid.)

Also at-Tirmidhī and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has said, "Allāh will never gather my ummah (or, this ummah) on error and Allāh's hand is on jamā'ah. (ibid.)

The author says: The tradition is well known and al-Hādī (a.s.) has narrated it from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) in his letter to the people of Ahwāz as has been quoted in vol.3 of Biḥāru 'l-anwār. The meaning of this tradition has been explained in the preceding commentary.

Ḥarīz has narrated from some of our companions from the fifth and sixth Imām (a.s.) that he said, "When the Commander of the Believers (s.a.) was in Kūfah, the people came to him and said, 'Appoint for us an imām who will lead us (in tarāwīḥ) in the month of Ramaḍān.' The Imām (a.s.) said, 'No' and forbade them to pray it with the jamā'ah. When night came, they began saying, 'Weep in Ramaḍān, alas for Ramaḍān.' Then al-Ḥārith al-A'war came to the Imām (a.s.) with some people and said, 'O Commander of the Believers, people are raising a hue and cry and they have not liked your talk.' At this juncture, the Imām (a.s.) said, 'Leave them to do what they like. Whoever wants should lead them in prayer.' Then he recited: Whoever follows other than the way of the believers, We will turn him to which he has (himself) turned and make him enter hell; and it is an evil resort." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

It is written in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr about words of Allãh, the Almighty: and who is truer of word than Allãḥ: al-Bayhaqī has narrated in ad-Dalãil from 'Uqbah ibn 'Ãmir (inter alia describing the journey of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) to Tabūk):

"Then (the Messenger of Allãh [s.a.w.a.]) arrived at Tabūk and praised Allãh and glorified Him as is His due, and then he said, (after the praise of Allãh): 'Verily the most truthful talk is the Book of Allãh; the most reliable grip is the word of piety; the best of the religions is the religion of Ibrãhīm; the best custom is the custom of Muḥammad; the noblest talk is the remembrace of Allãh; the best story is this Qur'ãn; the best affair is the determined one and the worst affairs are the innovated ones; the most excellent guidance is that of the Prophets; the noblest death is martyrdom; the darkest blindness is going astray after guidance; the best knowledge is that which gives benefit; the best guidance is that which is acted upon; the most evil blindness is the blindness of the heart; upper hand is better than the lower hand,[19] that little which satisfies is better than the abundance which makes one forgetful; the worst apology is (the one offered) when death arrives; the worst remorse is the one (shown on) the Day of Resurrection. Some people don't come to prayer except near the end and some don't remember Allãh but they talk nonsense; the biggest sin is the lying tongue; the best wealth is one's self reliance; the best provision is the piety; the pinnacle of the wisdom is the fear of Allãh, the mighty, the Great; the best thing established in the hearts is certainty. To entartain doubt is a sort of disbelief; to lament for dead is an act of the jãhiliyyah (Ignorance); embezzlement is altogether in the hell; hoarded treasure is (the instrument of) branding with the fire; poetry is among the musical instruments of Satan; wine is the vessel of sin; women are the snares of Satan; youth is a branch of lunacy; the most evil earning is interest; and the most wicked food is the property of the orphan. The blissful is he who learns lesson from (conditions of) the others; wretched is the one who becomes wretched in the womb of his mother; the resort of every one of you is a place of four arms (grave); the affairs (are decided) by their ends; the worst thinking is that of falsity. Everything which is to come is near; to abuse a believer is immorality; to fight him is disbelief; eating his flesh (backbiting him) is the disobedience to Allãh; and the sanctity of his property is like that of his blood. He who (falsely) sears by Allāh, He will refute him; he who forgives will be forgiven; he who pardons, Allāh will pardon him; he who controls his anger, Allāh will give him good reward; he who is patient in misfortune, Allāh will recompense him. He who hankers for good reputation, Allāh makes him disreputable. He who keeps patience, Allāh multiplies (the reward) for him. He who disobeys Allāh, He will give him punishment. O Allāh! forgive me and my ummah (he said it three times); I seek pardon of Allāh for me and for you.'"

Muḥammad ibn Yūnus has narrated through some of his companions from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.); also Jābir has narrated from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.), about the words of Allāh: And most certainly I will bid them so that they shall alter Allāh's creation, that the Imāms said, "Allāh's creation means the commandments of Allāh." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

In the same book, Jābir narrates from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) about the same words of the Qur'ān that he said, "It is Allāh's religion".

The author says: Both traditions give the same meaning and it is as we have explained in the Commentary that Allāh's creation means the natural religion.

The words of Allāh: And bid them so that they shall slit the ears of the cattle, have been explained in Majmaʻu 'l-bayān that they will cut the ears from its base; and it is written there that this meaning has been narrated from Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.).

Muḥammad ibn Muslim narrates from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said, "When the verse was revealed: whoever does evil, he shall be requited with it, some companions of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'How hard is this verse!' the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said to them, 'Are not you afflicted in your properties, your offsprings and in yourselveṣ' They said, 'Certainly.' He (s.a.w.a.) said, '(This is) through which writes good deeds for you and erases the bad deeds.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyāshī)

The author says: This meaning is narrated through many chains from the companions in the Sunnī books of traditions.

as-Suyūṭī writes: Aḥmad, al-Bukhārī, Muslim and at-Tirmidhī have narrated from Abū Saʻīd al-Khudrī that he said, "The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'No believer is afflicted by hardshipor sickness, grief or sorrow, trouble or sadness – even a thorn which pricks him – but Allãh grants remission to his faults.'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This theme has been narrated through numerous chains from the Prophet and the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.).

aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated through his chains from al-Ḥusayn ibn Khãlid that Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍã (a.s.) said, "I heard my father narrating from his father (a.s.) that he said, 'Surely Allãh took Ibrãhīm as a friend because he never returned anyone (empty handed) and never asked anyone (for his needs) other then Allãh, the mighty, the Great.'" ('Uyūnu 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: This is the most correct tradition about the meaning of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) as the friend of Allãh because it fits perfectly with the literal meaning of the word; اَلْخُلَّة (al-khullah) means need; therefore your khalīl (friend) is the one who asks his needs only from you. And there are other narrations giving other reasons for his title.

COMMENTARY

These verses are in conjunction with the ones in the beginning of the chapter which cover the subjects concerning women like marriage, prohibited degrees and inheritance, etc. Keeping it in view, it appears that these verses were revealed after those previous ones when the people asked the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) about the affairs affecting the women. The verses in the beginning of the chapter had resurrected the rights of women in property and social interactions, etc., which the people had previously killed.

Allãh orders the Prophet to tell them in reply to their various queries that the laws establishing their rights on men are Divine decisions about which the Prophet has no say; not only that, but what is recited to them in the Book about the female orphans is also Divine order in which the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has no say; not only that, but Allãh orders them to deal with all the orphans with equity. Then come some rules concerning the discord and dispute between a woman and her husband which are generally found in every society.

QUR'ĀN: And they ask you a decision about women, say: "Allãh makes known to you His decision concerning them: ar-Rãghib has said: "al-Futyã and al-fatwã (اَلْفُتْيَا ، اَلفَتْوي) means reply to difficult rullings; and they say: 'I asked him a decision so he replied to me in this way'."

It is understood from various usages of this word that it means a man's reply concerning difficult affairs according to his opinion based on his ijtihãd; or means the opinion itself concerning difficult matters, as is seen from this verse where al-fatwã has been attributed to Allãh.

Although this verse may possibly be explained in various ways (based on different analyses of the full verse); yet, if we join this verse to those in the begining of the chapter which are also concerned with women's problems, it will be seen that this verse was revealed after those first ones. It means that their enquiries were concerned in a general way with the laws regarding women which Islam had legislated with which the people were not familiar in the days of jãhiliyyah; those laws were exclusively concerned with women's rights regarding inheritance and marriage. Those questions were not about the orphan girls as this subject is not general; it is limited to a certain group and the rule about them has been laid down by the next sentence: And that which is recited to you in the Book concerning female orphans whom you do not give what is appointed for them while you desire to marry them. In short, the enquiry was about those things which cover the whole womenfolk , e.g., inheritance.

Consequently, the words: "Say: 'Allãh makes known to you His decision concerning them . . . ", refers to verses in the beginning of the chapter and shows that decision is reserved for Allãh and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) doesn't have any authority in this respect. The meaning is: They ask you to give them your decision concerning the women. Say: The right to give decision belongs to Allãh and He has given you His decision when He revealed the verses at the beginning of the chapter.

QUR'ÃN: "And that which is recited to you in the Book concerning female orphans whom you do not give what is appointed for them while you desire to marry them, and concerning the weak among children: As described above, the context shows that the rules for female orphans and the weak children has been added here because they have some link with the rules concerning women. Obviously, they were not included in their original enquiry which was limited to the women's affairs only. The sentence, "and that which is recited to you", is in conjunction with the pronoun , "them", preceding it; such conjuction has been allowed by al-Farrã', although other grammarians do not agree with him. Accordingly, the verse, "and that which is recited to you in the Book concerning female orphans . . . " refers to those rules and ideas which were revealed at the beginning of the chapter. at-Tilãwah (اَلتِّلاوَة = recital) denotes recital of the words as well as description of the meaning of the words. The meaning is: Say:

'Allāh makes known to you His decision about the laws which are recited to you in the Book concerning female orphans.

Some people take the word aliftā' in the meaning of explanation. According to them the meaning will be: Say: 'Allāh explains to you that which is recited to you in the Book.'

Many people have given various other constructions to these two sentences, but none of them is free from arbitrariness and inaccuracy which are not suitable for the Divine speech. For example, someone has said that the phrase, "that which is recited to you", is in conjuction with the name, 'Allāh'; or with the implied pronoun in the phrase, 'makes known'. Some have said that it is in conjuctionwith, 'women', in the first sentence which says: a decision about women. Another one has said that the word, 'and', in 'and that which is recited', begins a new sentence, it has no connection with the preceding verse; according to them, "that which is recited to you", is the subject and, "in the Book", is its predicate. Still, others have said that 'wa' in the verse 'wa mā yutlā 'alaykum' is for oath and the verse concerning female orphans explains the words concerning them in the preceding sentence. According to him, the meaning will be: Say: 'Allāh makes known to you His decision – I swear with that which is recited to you in the Book – concerning female orphans . . . ' There is no need to point out the absurdities of these explanations.

"Whom you do not give what is appointed for them while you desire to marry them": The speech describes the female orphans and points to their deprivations which were the main cause why Allāh laid down the rules which were revealed earlier. Those just rules abrogated the prevalent customs and removed the hardships which the women were suffering. It was their custom that they used to take female orphans as their wards together with their properties; if she was beautiful, they married her and enjoyed both her beauty and her property. If, on the other hand, she turned out to be ugly or of plain features, they would not themselves marry her nor would they allow her to marry another man. In this way, they appropriated her property.

It shows that:

First: The words of Allāh, "what is appointed for them", refer to the natural demands ingrained in the creation and that is the Divine Decree. The creation and the ingrained instincts pave for the human beings the path of their lives. It is that decree which has been appointed for him/her and tells him/her to marry when he/she reaches a certain age and which gives him/her the freedom to manage his/her property the way he/she likes. To prevent him/her from marrying or from managing his/her own property is depriving him/her from what Allãh has appointed for him/her at the beginning of the creation.

Second: "while you desire to marry them": It actually means, 'while you are averse to marry them'. Therefore, the preposition 'an (عَنْ = off, away from) is omitted but understood here. This omission is understood from the preceding phrase, "whom you do not give what is appointed for them", and the following words, "and concerning the weak among children".

"the weak among children" is in conjuction with, "female orphans". They used to neglect orphaned children and deprive them from inheritance on the pretext that they were unable to ride and could not fight in defence of the women.

QUR'ÃN: "and that you should deal towards orphans with equity : This is in conjuction with, His decision concerning them. The meaning is: Say: 'Allãh makes known to you His decision that you should deal towards orphans with equity. This widens the circle of this rule from a limited group, that is, female orphans and weak children to all the orphans and in all their affairs, be it their property or other matters.

QUR'ÃN: "and whatever good you do, Allãh surely knows it" : It is a reminder to them that the rules which Allãh has imposed on them about the women and the orphans are for their own good and Allãh knows it. This encourages them to act on these rules because it is for their own good; and also warns them against disobeying the rules because surely Allãh knows what they do.

QUR'ÃN: And if a woman fears ill-usage or desertion on the part of her husband, there is no blame on them, if they effect a reconciliation between them, and reconciliation is better; and avarice has been made to present in the (people's) minds; and if you do good (to others) and guard (against evil), then surely Allãh is aware of what you do : This subject was not included in their enquiry but it has a sort of relevance with it, just like the order coming in the next verse: And you have it not in your power to do justice.

The order is given when the woman feels fear of mistreatment or desertion – and not the actual appearance of mistreatment or desertion – because attempts of reconciliation should be undertaken as soon as some symptoms and signs of ill-usage raise their head. The context shows that reconciliation here should take place when the wife forgoes some or all of her metrimonial rights in order to affect love, accord and genial relations for avoiding separation; and reconciliation is better.

"and avarice has been made to be present in the (people's) minds": ash-Shuḥḥ (الشُّحُّ = miserliness, avarice); it means that avarice has been ingrained in the human nature in order to guard his interests and avoid loss. Thus, every person looks after his own interest; a woman does not want to leave any of her matrimonial rights like dress, maintenance, accomodation and conjugal relationship; and the man does not show any affection and harmony when he wants to separate from the wife and does not like living with her. Therefore, there is no blame on them if they affect a reconciliation between them by forgoing some of their rights.

"and if you do good (to others) and guard (against evil) then surely Allãh is aware of what you do": It is an admonition to men that they should not deviate from the path of doing good and avoiding evil; they should always keep in mind that Allãh knows whatever they are doing; they should not oppress the women in domestic life and should not make them so frustrated that they forego their due rights just to keep peace in the family.

QUR'ÃN: And you have it not in your power to do justice between wives, even though you may wish (it), but be not disinclined (from one) with total disinclination . . . : It gives further explanation of the order given in the beginning of the chapter where it was said: But if you fear that you will not do justice (between them), then (marry) only one. The same ideal of justice is seen in the preceding verse where it says: And if you do good (to others) and guard (against evil) then surely Allãh is aware of what you do. Obviously, this preceding verse contains a shade of threatening. Thus, man is bewildered as to how to affect real justice between the wives. Justice is the exact middle between the two extremes and to pinpoint it exactly is extremely difficult; especially so, because the relationship between the spouses is that of love and one does not have much control on the inclinations of the heart. Therefore, Allãh explains here that justice between the wives in its true sense – to stand exactly in the middle of the extremes – is beyond human power even if one may wish it. What a man is obliged to do is that he should not be totally inclined to one of them, leaving the other one as it were in suspense; that is, she does not feel as if she has a husband because she gets no attention from him, nor is she free of marriage so that she may marry someone else and go her own way. It is wãjib (necessary) on the husband to do justice between his wives, that is, he should treat all of them in equal manner and should fulfiltheir rights without excessiveness. And it is sunnah for him to do good to all of them without showing any dislike to any of them and without subjecting any of them to ill-treatment; this was the behaviour of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) with his wives.

The proviso, "but be not disinclined (from one) with total disinclination, so that you leave her as it were in suspense", proves that the preceding sentence: And you have it not in your power to do justice between wives, even though you may wish (it), doesn't mean that man cannot do justice between his wives at all, as some people have thought. And joining this misconception with the divine words: but if you fear that you will not do justice (between) them, then (marry) only one, they have claimed that Islam does not allow polygamy!

The proviso clearly shows that what has been negated is the real justice in which there is no excess at all and man stands in the exact middle; and what is allowed and made lawful is the practical justice in which minor inclinations are tolerated. Apart from that, the sunnah of the Holy Prophet and the polygamy practised before the eyes of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), as well as the custom prevalent among the Muslims without any break since that time is enough to remove such erroneous impressions. Apart from that, to think that the divine words: then marry such (other) women as seen good to you, two and three and four, are merely imaginary suppositions which have no practical application, will bring down the Divine words to the level of a riddle.

It should be noted that the words: And if you affect a reconciliation and guard (against evil), then surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful, encourage the men with emphasis that whenever any signs of discord and dispute appear, they should try to bring reconciliation; then it goes on to say that it is a part of piety and with piety comes divine forgiveness and mercy. In the preceding verse, it was stated that reconciliation is better and they were exhorted to do good and guard against evil; then comes this verse which puts emphasis over emphsis.

QUR'ÃN: And if they separate, Allãh will render them both free from want out of His ampleness, and Allãh is Ample-giving, Wise.: If the man and the woman separate by divorce, Allãh will make them both free from want out of His amplenes. Making them free from want in this context means that Allāh will give them this freedom in all matters connected with matrimony, like harmony, intimacy and the wife's maintenance and clothing, etc. Allāh has not reserved either party for the other one; so, it is not that if they separate from each other, they will not get another spouse in their long life; rather it is a natural custom which is wide-spread among all the human beings and everyone by nature is inclined to marry.

The words: "and Allāh is Ample-giving, Wise. And whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's", give the reason of the statement "Allāh will render them both free from want out of His Ampleness".

QUR'ĀN: And certainly We enjoined those who were given the Book before you and (We enjoin) you too that you should be careful (of your duty to) Allāh; . . . : It puts emphasis on the call addressed to them that they should pay special consideration to piety in all the stages and in every situation of their matrimonial life. It also shows that going against piety is being ungrateful to Divine favours; the piety which is acquired by Allāh's obedience proves one's gratefulness to Divine favours. Alternatively, we may say that it is only because of disbelief that one discards Allāh's fear: it may be open disbelief (as in the case of unbelievers and polytheists) or hidden disbelief (as in the case those believers who indulge in Allāh's disobedience).

The above explanation makes clear the words of Allāh, and if you disbelieve, then surely whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's, and Allāh is Self-sufficient, Praise-worthy. The meaning is: If you do not remember what We have enjoined you and those who were before you and if you neglect this order and do not acquire piety – and it is disbelief in Allāh or emanates from disbelief in Allāh – it will not harm Allāh at all. Allāh is not in need of you or of your piety, and surely whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's, and Allāh is Self-sufficient, Praise-worthy.

Question: Why have the words: Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's, repeated three times in three consecutive verseș

Reply: In the first instance, it explains the reasons of preceding sentence: and Allāh is Ample-giving, Wise. The second instance is a response to the conditional clause: and if you disbelieve. It means, if you disbelieve, then Allāh is not in need of you; it is made more clear by the ending phrase: and Allāh is Self-sufficient, Praise-worthy. The third sentence starts a new topic and gives a sort of reason to the Divine words: If He pleases, He can make you pass away.

QUR'ÃN: And whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allãh's, and Allãh is sufficient as a protector : We have repeatedly explained the meaning of the ownership of Allãh. He is the Protector who manages His servants' affairs and enough is He as a protector. He does not need any help in His work. If He was not pleased with the deeds of a people and was angry with their behaviour, He could easily make them pass away and bring other people in their place, or He could pull them behind and let others go ahead of them. This meaning, which is pointed out by the context, establishes a connection between this verse and the next one: If He pleases, He can make you pass away O people!

QUR'ÃN: If He pleases, He can make you pass away, O people! and bring others; and Allãh has the power to do this : The preceding verse gives a clarion call for adherence to piety which Allãh has enjoined this ummah and those who were before them from the People of the Book. In this context, it is clear that the declaration that Allãh does not need anything is closely related to the order of piety. The meaning, therefore, will be like this: Allãh has enjoined you all to adhere to piety, so be careful or your dutytowards Allãh. If you disbelieve, then Allãh is Self-sufficient and He is the Owner of everything. He can manage it in any way He pleases, and for any purpose He pleases. If He pleases that He should be worshipped and people should adhere to piety but you did not follow His commands in a proper way, then Allãh has the power to keep you behind and let others to precede you. Those people will do what Allãh is pleased with; and clearly Allãh has power to do so. Accordingly, the verse describes the possibilty of exchanging unpious people with the pious ones. al-Bayḍãwī has narrated a tradition in his tafsīr that when this verse was revealed, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) patted his hand on the back of Salmãn and said, " Surely they are his people." This tradition supports the meaning given by us; and you should ponder on it.

Some exegetes have said that probably it means: If Allãh pleases, He will destroy you all and bring other people in your place or other creation in place of human beings. But this meaning is not supported by the context. Of course, this explanation could be given for the verse: Do you not see that Allãh created the heavens and the earth with truth. If He pleases He will take you off and bring a new creation. And this is not difficult for Allāh (14:19-20).

QUR'ĀN: Whoever desires the reward of this world, then with Allāh is the reward of this world and the hereafter; and Allāh is Hearing, Seeing.*: It is another statement which exposes the error of him who discards piety and neglects Divine enjoinment, thinking that he only needs this world's reward and booty. In fact, such a person has fallen into confusion, because the reward of this world and of the fereafter, both are with Allāh, and in His hand. So, why should a man concentrate on the lower item of the two? Why should he not strive for the higher reward or both of them together? This meaning has been given by others; but more apparently, the meaning is this, and Allāh knows better: Surely the reward of this world and the hereafter and the felicity of both together is with Allāh. Therefore, man should strive to be nearer to Him, even he who wants only the reward and felicity of this world, because man cannot achieve felicity without fear of Allāh and piety which can be obtained only through the Divine religion which He has ordained. Religion is the exclusive path to the real felicity and happiness. How can one get any reward unless Allāh gives and issues it to him, and Allāh is Hearing, Seeing.

T R A D I T I O N S

as-Suyūṭī says: Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir have narrated from Sa'īd ibn Jubayr that he said: "Inheritance was not given except to a matured man who could manage and look after the property; children and women were not given any share in inheritance. When the verses of inheritance were revealed in the chapter of 'The Women', it proved very difficult to the people. They said, 'What! will a child inherit one who cannot manage the property? and the women who are exactly in the same position? will they inherit as a man inherits' They hoped that something will come down from the heavens to rectify the situation. They kept waiting. When they saw that nothing was happening, they said, 'If it was established then it would become an unavoidable obligation.' So, they decided to enquire further. They asked the Prophet (s.a.w.a.); then Allāh sent down the verse: And they ask you a decision about women, say, 'Allāh makes known to you His decision concerning them, and that which is recited to you in the Book concerning female orphans who you do not give what is appointed for them while you desire to marry them . . . '" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

'Abd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from Ibrãhīm that he said about this verse: "If an orphaned girl was ugly, they did not give her anything from the inheritance and prevented her from marrying until when she died, they would take her inheritance. Therefore, Allãh revealed this verse." (ibid.)

The author says: These connotations have been narrated from numerous Shī'ī and Sunnī chains, some of which was given at the beginning of the chapter.

The words: whom you do not give what is appointed for them, mean what has been appointed for them in inheritance. aṭ-Ṭabrisī has said that this meaning is narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.). (Majma'u 'l-bayãn) al-Qummī has said that the verse: If a woman fears ill-usage or desertion on the part of her husband . . . , was revealed about the daughter of Muḥammad ibn Maslamah. She was the wife of Rãfi' ibn Khadīj, and her age had advanced. He married another young woman and she looked more attractive to him than the daughter of Muḥammad ibn Maslamah. So, she said to him: "Don't I find you turning away from me and preferring her?" Rãfi' said: "She is a young woman and is more attractive. If you wish, you may agree on this arrangement that she is given two or three days with me, and you have one day." The daughter of Muḥammad ibn Maslamah refused. So, he gave her one divorce. Then he gave her another divorce. Still, she said, "By Allãh, I will never agree unless you treat both of us in equal manner." (Allãh says: and avarice has been made to be present in the (people's) minds.) And the daughter of Muḥammad ibn Maslamah was not ready to forgo her share and persisted in her demand. Then Rãfi' told her that either she should agree or he would give her the third divorce. She did not like separation from her husband and agreed. She effected the reconciliation as described. So, Allãh said: there is no blame on them if they effect a reconciliation between them, and reconciliation is better. When she agreed and settled down, he could not do justice between them. Then the verse was revealed: and you have it not in your power to do justice between wives, even though you many wish (it), but be not disiclined (from one) with total disinclination; so that you leave her as it were in suspense. It is not proper that you should attend to one wife and leave the other in suspense as though she is neither a widow nor married. When the woman agrees and accepts the terms which the husband had offered for reconciliation, then there is no blame on the husband or the wife to live according to the agreed terms. If she does not agree to forgo any of her rights, then he should either treat them equally or divorce her. There is no third alternative. (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated it in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Mãlik, ‘Abdu 'r-Razzãq, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and al-Ḥãkim(who has confirmed this tradition as correct).

as-Suyūṭī has said: "aṭ-Ṭayãlisī, Ibn Abī Shaybah, Ibn Rãhawayh, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭãlib that he was asked about this verse, and he said: "It is about a man who has two wives; one has become old or is ugly; so he wants to separate from her; she offers a compromise that he should remain with her for one night and with the other one several nights and should not divorce her. As long as it is done on her own free will, there is no difficulty in it. If she returns, he will treat both of them equally." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr) al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain of narrators from al-Ḥalabī, from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "I asked the Imãm about the words of Allãh: And if a woman fears ill-usage or desertion on the part of her husband. The Imãm said, 'It is about a woman who is married to a man and he dislikes her and says to her, "I want to divorce you." She says to him, "Don't do it, I hate that you should make me an object of ridicule in the society. Instead, take away my night and do with it whatever you want. If there is any other thing, that will also be given to you and let me be." This is the meaning of the words of Allãh: there is no blame on them if they effect a reconciliation between them, and this is the reconciliation.'" (al-Kãfī)

The author says: There are other traditions of the same meaning narrated in al-Kãfī and at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyãshī.

al-Qummī narrates about the Divine words: and avarice has been made to be present in the (people's) minds, that he said, "Avarice is ingrained in nature; some things she chooses to keep, some things she forgoes." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

Hishãm ibn Sãlim narrates from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) about the words of Allãh: And you have it not in your power to do justice between wives, even though you may wish (it), that he said, "It refers to love." (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī) al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain of narrators from Nūḥ ibn Shu‘bah and Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan that they said, "Ibn Abi 'l-‘Awjã’ asked Hishãm ibn al-Ḥakam and said, 'Is not Allãh Wise?' He said, 'Certainly; He is the Most Wise.'He said, 'Then tell me about the Divine words: then marry such (other) women as seem good to you, two and three and four; but if you fear that you will not do justice (between them), then (marry) only one. Is it not a decisive order?' He said, 'Certainly.' Then he said, 'Now, tell me about the Divine words: And you have it not in your power to do justice between wives, even though you may wish (it), but be not disiclined (from one) with total disinclination; so that you leave her as it were in suspenses. Does a wise one talk like thiṣ' Hishãm could not reply. So, he went to Medina to Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.). The Imãm (a.s.) said, '(You have come) when it is neither the time of ḥajj nor of ‘umrah!' Hishãm said, 'Yes, may I be made your ransom! I have come for a problem which has kept me worried. Ibn Abi 'l-‘Awjã’ asked me a question and I could not reply him.' The Imãm (a.s.) said, 'What is that ?' Hishãm narrated the full story.

"Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) said to him, 'As for the verse: then marry such (other) women as seem good to you, two and three and four; but if you fear that you will not do justice (between them) then (marry) only one, it speaks about the maintenance; and as for the verse: And you have not in your power to do justice between wives, even though you may wish (it), but be not disinclined (from one) with total disinclination; so that you leave her as it were in suspense, it speaks about love.'

"When Hishãm went to Ibn Abi 'l-‘Awjã’ and told him the reply, he said, 'By Allãh, it is not from you.'" (al-Kãfī)

The author says: A similar ḥadīth has been narrated from al-Qummī which says: An atheist asked Abū Ja‘far al-Aḥwal exactly the same question. He went to Medina and asked Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) for the reply and the Imãm (a.s.) replied him exactly in the same way. Abū Ja‘far returned to the man and gave him the reply, on hearing which he said, "This you have brought from Ḥijãz."

aṭ-Ṭabrisī explains the Qur’ãnic words: so that you leave her as it were in suspense, in this way: You leave the one you are disinclined towards her as if she is neither married to a husband nor is free from marriage. He has said that this meaning is narrated from Abū Ja‘far and Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.). (Majma‘u 'l-bayãn)

The same book states about the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he used to distribute (provisions, time, etc.) among his wives, and then used to pray: "O Allāh! This is my distribution of the things which I possess; do not blame me for the thing which you do possess and I do not." (ibid.)

The author says: This tradition has been narrated in Sunnī books through several chains. The phrase, "which you do possess and I do not", refers to the love. Yet there is something wrong in this tradition. Allāh is far above blaming someone for some thing not in his possession, not in his control. He Himself has said: Allāh does not lay on any soul a burden except to the extant to which He has granted it (66:8); and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was fully cognizantof His Lord's dignity to ask Him to bring into existence a thing already existing.

al-Kulaynī has narrated through his chain of narrators from Ibn Abī Laylā that he said: "Narrated to me ʻĀṣim ibn Ḥamīd and said, 'I was with Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) when a man came to him and complained of his poverty. The Imām (a.s.) ordered him to get married. ʻĀṣim said that (after that) the man's poverty became more serious; so he came to Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.). The Imām (a.s.) enquired about his condition; and he said that the poverty had increased. The Imām (a.s.) said, 'Now, separate (from her).' So, he divorced her. ʻĀṣim reports that he again came to the Imām (a.s.) who asked him how did he do. He said, 'I have become rich and my condition is very good.' Then Abū ʻAbdillāh (a.s.) said, 'I told you to do two things which Allāh had ordered. Allāh has said: And marry those among you who are single and those who are fit among your male slaves and your female slaves; if they are needy, Allāh will make them free from want out of his grace; and Allāh is Ample-giving, Knowing (24:32). And He has also said: And if they separate, Allāh will render them both free from want out of His ampleness (4:130).

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! be maintainers of justice, bearers of witness for Allãh's sake: al-Qisṭ (اَلقِسْط = justice). To stand with justice means to enforce it, to maintain it. Maintainers of justice are those who fully and perfectly establish justice without deviating from, or inclining against, it because of some low desire or sentiment, fear, or greed, or other such factors.

This virtue is the most perfect cause and nearest factor for following the truth and protecting it from getting lost. One of its corollaries is adherence to truth in giving evidence.

This verse has been revealed to describe the rule of evidence, but it has started with talk of justice, and then it proceeds to the rule of evidence. In other words, first a general ideal has been described and then it focuses on one of its aspects. It is as though it says: 'You should be bearers of witness for Allãh's sake but it will be difficult for you unless you become maintainers of justice.' So, you should be maintainers of justice in order to become bearers of witness for Allãh's sake.

The words, "bearers of witness for Allãh's sake", show the purpose of the action; bear witness so that your witness should be for Allãh, as Allãh has said: And give testimony for Allãh (63:2). An evidence will be for the sake of Allãh when it is given in truth for the sake of demonstrating the truth and reviving it, as is clear from the sentence: therefore do not follow (your) low desires, lest you deviate.

QUR'ÃN: though it may be against your ownselves or (your) parents or near relatives : Even if the evidence goes against your own interest or against the interest of your parents or near relatives, it should not prompt you to alter the evidence or hide it. Giving evidence against oneself or against one's parents or relatives means that the evidence, when given, will harm the testifier or hsi parents or relatives. It makes no difference whether the party which would suffer damage is the one against whom the evidence is given directly; for example, if there is a case between his father and someone else and he testifies against his own father; or the damage may reach them indirectly.

QUR'ÃN: If he be rich or poor, Allãh is nearer to them both in compassion: The dual pronoun of "them both" refers to "rich or poor" because the same person can be rich at one time and poor at another; thus the conjunction, 'or' brings the two alternatives together just for describing the situation. There is no plurality in actual fact. This is what has been described by some exegetes. The meaning: Allãh is nearer to the rich in his wealth and to the poor in his poverty. What the verse emphasises is that the wealth of the rich should not cause you to deviate from the truth and incline to him; nor should the poverty of the poor incite you to try to better his condition by twisting the truth in his favour. You should bear witness for the sake of Allãh and then leave Him to look at the rich and the poor. He is nearer to them and more Merciful to to their condition. It is a reflection of His Mercy that He has obliged you to follow the truth compulsorily and has enjoined you to maintain the justice; when the justice is maintained and the truth becomes manifest, then the humanity will enjoy felicity and it will strengthen the rich and improve the condition of the poor.

A rich or poor may benefit in one or two cases from an evidence which is twisted or hidden, but in the long run it makes the truth feable and the justice dead. It gives life to oppression and strengthen to falsehood and injustice; and this is the incurable disease which destroys the humanity.

QUR'ÃN: therefore do not folow (your) low desires, lest you deviate: There is a danger that you will deviate from truth and justice by following your low desire and by not giving the evidence for the sake of Allãh. The words, "lest you deviate", describe the reason of this order. It may also be translated as, do not follow your low desires to deviate from truth.

QUR'ÃN: and if you swerve or turn aside, then surely Allãh is aware of what you do: Swerving with evidence means twisting it, and turning aside means not giving evidence and hiding it.

Some people have recited this sentence "wa in talū" (وَاِنْ تَلْوٗ); in that case, the meaning will be, if you are given responsibility of giving evidence and you fulfil it or turn aside; in both cases, surely Allãh is aware of what you do and He will give you its recompense.

T R A D I T I O N S

Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) has said, "A believer has seven rights on another believer. The most obligatory of them is that the man should tell truth, even if it goes against his own self or against his parents, he should not deviate from truth for their sake." Then the Imãm (a.s.) recited: therefore do not follow (your) low desires, lest you deviate, and if you swerve or turn aside, from the truth. (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: This tradition generalises the meaning of evidence to include general truthfulness. aṭ-Ṭabrisī says: It is said that the last phrase means: If you change the evidence or hide it; and he has said that it is narrated from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.).

C O M M E N T A R Y

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! believe in Allãh and His Messenger and the Book which He revealed to His Messenger and the Book which He revealed before : The believers have been ordered to believe again. The second belief is related to the objects detailed, that is, believing in Allãh and His Messenger and the Book; and they have been threatened if they did not believe in each of these realities. In short, the believers are told to spread their belief to include the details of these realities as they are the matters of belief which are interrelated and one leads to another. Allãh, there is none to be worshed except Him. His are the beautiful names and lofty adjectives. His Knowledge and Power was the reason that He created the creatures and guided them to their true destination and felicity; and then He will revive them for the day of recompense. This could not be effected without sending the messengers, to bring good news and warn, and sending down the Books which would decide among them in what they had differed, and to explain to the people the realities of genesis and resurrection, as well as the fundamentals of sharī'ah and laws.

Belief in any of these realities cannot be complete unless one believes in all of them without exception. To reject some of them and adhere to some others is disbelief or hypocrisy – depending on whether the partial rejection was shown to others or kept secret. It is an aspect of hypocrisy that the believer takes a path which would lead him to reject some of these realities, e.g., if he separates from the society of the believers and goes nearer to unbelievers' society and befriends them, and confirms them in some of their accusations which they direct against the belief and the believers; or the objections or mockery which they lay down against the truth. That is why Allãh has described in the next verses the hypocrites' condition and threatened them with painful chastisement.

The meaning which has been given above is clear from the verse. It is more appropriate than what some other exegetes have written that the words of Allãh, "O you who believe! believe", means: O you who believe apparently by acknowledging the truth of Allãh and His Messenger, believe in your heart also in order that your appearance conforms with your inner self. The same is the case of another one's exegesis that the order to believe again means remain steadfast in your belief. Likewise, our exegesis is more relevant than what some others have said that the verses were addressed to the believers among the People of the Book, that is, O you who believe from among the People of the Book! believe in Allāh and His Messenger, Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), and the Book which He has revealed on His Messenger, i.e., Qur'ān. These themes may be correct in themselves but the context of the speech rejects them and the last explanation is the worst.

QUR'ĀN: and whoever disbelieves in Allāh and His angels and His Books and His Messengers and the last day, he indeed strays off into a remote error : The preceding part of the verse (O you who believe! believe . . .) was a call to the believers to combine all the mentioned realities in belief, showing that the parts of this total are interrelated and none of them can be separated from the others. Now, those parts of the belief are mentioned again, but here, the conjuctive, 'and', is used in the meaning of 'or'. The meaning: Whoever disbelieves in Allāh or His angels or His Book or His Messengers or the last day – whoever disbelieves in any of these essential parts of belief, he indeed strays off into a remote error.

The conjuctive, 'and', doesn't mean that all these ingredients taken together will form one object of faith. In other words, it does not mean that when one disbelieves in all these realities taken together then he will stray off into a remote error. Moreover, the Qur'ānic verses in several places declare that whoever disbelieves in any one of these, will be a disbeliever.

QUR'ĀN: Surely (as for) those who believe then disbelieve, again believe and again disbelieve, then increase in disbelief, Allāh will not forgive them nor guide them in the (right) path : If we look at this verse alone, separate from the preceding and the following verses, it will show how Allāh will give recompense to the apostates who repeatedly renounce the faith. They believe then disbelieve, then again believe, then disbelieve and then increase in their disbelief. Allāh threatens if their condition remains like that – that He will never forgive them nor guide them in the right path. He should not hope to receive Divine Mercy at all because he is not firm in true belief and treats the Divine commandment like a plaything. Whoever is in such a condition, his profession of belief is merely a show which will never be accepted. If they had seriously believed, then they would have been covered with Divine forgiveness and guidance. When one truly repents by believing in Allãh, Allãh never rejects His repentance and faith as He has promised His servants. We have explained this subject under the verse: Repentance with Allãh is only for those who do evil in ignorance . . . (4:17), in volume four[20] of this book. The verse declares that normally and naturally such people are totally deprived of the Divine Mercy. But there can be exceptions if someone truly believes and remains steadfast in the true faith – in rare cases. Allãh says: How shall Allãh guide a people who disbelieve after their believing, and they have borne witness that the Messenger was true, and clear arguments had come to them? And Allãh does not guide the unjust people . . . Except those who repent after that and amend, then surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful. Surely those who disbelieve after believing, then increase in unbelief, their repentance shall never be accepted, and these are they that have gone astray (3:86-90).

As you see, the verses have made exception of those who disbelieve after believing and says that Allãh will not forgive them nor guide them to the right path. Then He again declares non-acceptance of the repentance of those who increase in their disbelief. Such people disbelieve after believing and after bearing witness that the Messenger was true, and clear arguements had come to them and yet they became apostates. This apostacy is based on obstinacy and stubborness, and increase in this disbelief proves that this obstinacy and insolence has taken deep roots in their hearts; and oppression and arrogance has taken their souls in their clutch. Now, returning to Allãh and repentance is normally not expected from such a person.

This meaning is understood if we take the verse alone, separately. But all these verses together are apparently revealed in a single context and are interrelated.

Accordingly, the words, "Surely as those who believe then disbelieve . . . ", give the reason for the preceding sentence: whoever disbelieve in Allãh and His angels and His books and His Messengers and the last day, he indeed strays off into a remote error. Thus, both verses will have one application, that is, he who disbelieves in Allãh and the angels, the Divine Books, the messengers and the last day is the one who believes then disbelieves, then again believes, again disbelieves, and then increases in disbelief. Also he will be among the hypocrites about whom Allāh declares in the next verse onwards: Announce to the hypocrites that they shall have a painful chastisement .

Keeping it in view, the explanations of the Divine words: "Surely (as for) those who believe then disbelieve . . . ", will change according to the explanations given for the first verse: O you who believe! believe in Allāh and His Messenger . . . , as we have mentioned earlier.

If the first verse is taken to mean that you should believe in Allāh and His Messenger in your heart as you have believed in them in appearance, then the belief, then disbelief, then again belief, then disbelief will show the situation of the hypocrites, as their condition and behaviour keeps changing continuously; when they meet the believers they say one thing and on meeting disbelievers, they speak its opposite.

If the first verse means that you should be steadfast on the belief which you have acquired, then the belief, then disbelief and so on will mean apostasy after apostasy.

If it is said that the verse calls the People of the Book to believe in Allāh and His Messenger, then the belief, then kufr, and so on will refer to their believing in Mūsā (Moses), then disbelieving in him by worshipping the calf, then believing in ‘Uzayr (Ezra) or in Jesus, then disbelieving in him, then increasing in disbelief by rejecting Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and what he had brought from Allāh.

And if the first verse means to spread your overall belief to cover the detailed realities, as we have said, then the words, "Surely (as for) those who believe, then disbelieve . . .", will show its reason which will perfectly fit the condition of the hypocrites who are discussed soon after that; one of whose characteristics is described in these words: Those who take the unbelievers for guardians rather than believers. Obviously, he who remains in close contact with unbelievers separated from the believers' society, cannot avoid visiting their gatherings and being intimate to them, joining their conversations and confirming some of their talks which Allāh is not pleased with; because they ascribe to the true religion and the leaders of the religion calumnies and vilifications, making a mockery of them. Such a man when meets the believers and joins in any of their religious functions shows himself as a believer; and when he meets unbelievers and confirms some of their false assertions, becomes an unbeliever. At one time he is a believer, and at another, he is an unbeliever. He continues in this manner until when this characteristic takes firm roots, he increases in disbelief. And Allāh knows better.

His everchanging condition and instability of mind destroy his chance of repentance; because even if at times he feels remorse on his misdeeds, he doesn't remain firm in that remorse too. Of couse, if he repents and remains steadfast in his repentance in a way that the changing situations cannot shake it and desires cannot bend it, then his repentance will be acceptable. And it is for this reason that Allãh has put some tough conditions for acceptance of repentancefrom such a hypocrite in order that there remains no room for any change or deviation: Except those who repent and amend and hold fast to Allãh and are sincere in their religion to Allãh . . .

QUR'ÃN: Announce to the hypocrites that they shall have a painful chastisement. Those who take the unbelievers for guardians rather than believers : It is a threat to the hypocrites; Allãh describes them as having the unbelievers as guardians rather than believers. This condition is a bit general and is not restricted to the hypocrites who in their hearts had never believed and were only making a show of belief; because a group of true believers also were afflicted with this malady. They enjoyed friendship of unbelievers, or were cut off from the believers' society. Even in the days of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) some believers had secret contacts with unbelievers and were on intimate terms with them.

It suports to a certain extent the view that the hypocrites mentioned in this verse were actually a group of the believers who had taken unbelievers as their friends and guardians in preference to the believers. It is further supported by the apparent meaning of the next verse: And indeed He has revealed to you in the Book that when you hear Allãh's communications disbelieved in and mocked at, do not sit with them until they enter into some other discourse; surely then you would be like them. This verse, in fact, is a threat to the hypocrites but is addressed to the believers. Moreover, this view is strengthened by the description of their condition in their hypocrisy where Allãh says: . . . and do not remember Allãh save a little; as this sentence confirms that they used to remember Allãh although very little. This could not be said about the hypocrites who had not believed in their hearts at all.

QUR'ÃN: Do they seek honour from them? Then surely all honour is for Allãh: It is an interrogative in the sense of negative, and the reply, then surely all honour is for Allãh", confirms the negative sense. The honour emanates from kingdom and kingdom belongs to Allãh only: Say: "O Allãh! Master of the Kingdom! Thou givest the kingdom to whomsoever Thou pleasest and takest away the kingdom from whomsoever Thou pleasest, and Thou exaltest whom Thou pleasest and abasest whom Thou pleasest" (3:26).

QUR'ÃN: And indeed He has revealed to you in the Book that when you hear Allãh's communications disbelieved in and mocked at, do not sit with them until they enter into some other discourse; surely then you would be like them; . . . : It points to what was revealed in the chapter of "The Cattle": And when you see those who enter into false discourses about Our communications withdraw from them until they enter into some other discourse, and if the Satan causes you to forget, then do not sit after recollection with the unjust people (6:68). The chapter of "The Cattle" was revealed in Mecca while "The Women" was revealed in Medina. The verse 6:68 uses second person singular pronouns. It proves that some Qur'ãnic speeches were addressed directly to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) but they were meant for the whole ummah. The sentence, "Surely you would be like them", gives the reason of this prohibition: We have forbidden you because if you would sit with them in this situation you would become like them and "Surely Allãh will gather together the unbelievers and the hypocrites all in hell".

QUR'ÃN: Those who wait for (some misfortune to befall) you; then if you have a victory from Allãh, they say: "Were we not with you?" And if there is a chance for the unbelievers, they say: "Did we not acquire the mastery over you and defend you from the believerş" : at-Tarabbuṣ (اَلتَّرَبُّص = waiting); al-istiḥwãdh (اَلِاسْتِحْواذ = mastery, over-coming). This describes another characteristic of these hypocrites: they have preserved the contact with both parties ⇦ the believers and the unbelievers. They seek to profit from both groups and try to take advantage from whoever is in a better position. If the believers are victorious, they say: "Were we not with you?" Therefore, we are entitled to have a share in whatever you have gathered as booty, etc. If the unbelievers get some chance, they say: "Did we not acquire the mastery over you and defend you from the believerş" i.e., we stopped you from believing in what the Muslims do believe. Therefore, we are entitled to a part of whatever you have got; we have done a favour to you as we provided you with this chance.

It is said: The believers' triumph has been called victory because that is what Allãh has promised them; and the unbelievers' success is described as a chance to show its insignificance; because whatever the interim success, in the end, Allãh has promised the believers that they will be victorious and that Allãh is their guardian. Probably it is for this reason that the victory has been ascribed to Allãh but not the chance.

QUR'ÃN: So Allãh shall judge between you on the Day of Resurrection; and Allãh will by no means give the unbelievers a way against the believers : The verse is addressed to the believers although the judgement will cover the hypocrites and the unbelievers as well. The sentence, "and Allãh will by no means give the unbelievers a way against the believers", means that the judgement on that day will be in favour of the believers and against the unbelievers; and this reality will never change. This deprives the unbelievers of any hope because on the last day the believers will be triumphant over the unbelievers.

Possibly the declaration, that the unbelievers will not be given a way against the believers, covers both worlds – this and the hereafter – because the believers will always be victorious as long as they adhere to the demands of their faith. Allãh says: And be not infirm, and be not grieving, and you shall have the upper hand if you are believers (3:139).

QUR'ÃN: Surely the hypocrites strive to deceive Allãh while He is deceiving them: al-Mukhãda'ah (اَلْمُخَادَعَة) denotes continuous or intensified deception, because in Arabic, when some letters are added in a root word the meaning also increases. The words, "while He is deceiving them", describes the condition, that is, they are trying to deceive Allãh while He is deceiving them. In short, these people, with their hypocritical deed – pretension of faith, remaining near the believers and attending their gatherings – want to deceive Allãh, i.e., the Prophet and the believers; and their intention is to seek benefits from them through their unreal belief and deeds. They do not understand that it is Allãh Who is deceiving them by leaving them free to commit these deeds, without putting any hinderance against them; it is their requital because of their impure intentions and wicked deeds. So, when they try to deceive Allãh it is actually Allãh who is deceiving them exactly through the showy deeds and bad faith.

QUR'ĀN: and when they stand up for prayer, they stand up sluggishly: they do it only to be seen of men and do not remember Allāh save a little : It is another characteristic of the hypocrites. When they stand up to pray, they do so sluggishly and for showing the people. The prayer is the best act of worship through which Allāh is remembered. If their hearts had been inclined to their Lord with true belief, they would not have felt sluggish and dispirited; they would have prayed with full attention and true remembrance of Allāh; they would not have done it merely to be seen by people, rather they would have remembered Allāh very often as happens when the heart is inclined to someone.

QUR'ĀN: Wavering between that (and this), (belonging) neither to these nor to those; . . . : aṭ-Ṭabrisī has explained in Majma'u 'l-bayān that this word denotes setting in pendulous motion, as when a thing is suspended in air and is moved to and fro. A thing is called mudhabdhab when it moves between two extremes without having any attachment to either. This is exactly the characteristic of hypocrites. They move between belief and disbelief, they belong exclusively neither to the believers like the true Muslims nor to the disbelievers like open infidels.

The sentence, "and whomsoever Allāh causes to err, you shall not find a way for him", gives the reason of the preceding discription of pendulous motion. The reason why they move to and fro, without adhering to any side, is that Allāh has made them go astray from the path and now they cannot find the true path.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! do not take the unbelievers for friends rather than the believers; . . . and you shall not find a helper for them: as-Sulṭān (اَلسُّلطان = proof); ad-darak and ad-dark (اَلدَّرْكُ ، اَلدَّرَك): ar-Rāghib has said: "ad-Dark is synonymous with ad-darj (اَلدَّرَج = stair-case), but ad-darj is used to describe ascending steps while ad-dark is used for descending. That is why we see that the ranks of the Garden are called ad-darajāt (اَلدَّرَجَات = ranks) and the stages of the Fire; ad-darakāt (اَلدَّرَكَات = stages); also because there is an idea of descending down in the hell, it is called al-hāwiyah (اَلْهَاوِيَة = infernal depth) [which is derived from hawā = to fall down]."

The verse, as you see, forbids the believers to establish friendship with unbelievers in preference to the believers' friendship; and the next verse gives its reason by a severe threat which is addressed to the hypocrites. The reason is that Allãh counts such friendship as hypocrisy, and warns the believers from indulging in it.

The context shows that these two verses give the sum total of the preceding speech. This makes us almost certain that the previous verses had exposed the condition of those believers whose faith was weak and hearts diseased; and therefore the verses called them hypocrites. Or at least such believers are joined with the hypocrites in those verses. Then it admonishes the believers that they should not go near that line, otherwise they would make themselves liable to displeasure of Allãh. They should not give Allãh any proof against themselves; otherwise He will leave them, to go astray and put them in deception, leaving them oscillating in this life. Then He will join them with unbelievers in the hell and put them in the lowest stage of the Fire; there will be no connection between them and anyone who could help them or intercede for them.

These two verses clearly show two things:-

First: Leaving someone to go astray, deceiving him and any such display of Divine displeasure emanates from clear proof which the people's deeds provide against them. These humiliations and degradations are decreed as recompense of their actions. The Divine Majesty is too high to initiate any evil or misfortune for them without there being a reason for it from their side. Therefore, the sentence, "do you desire that you should give to Allãh a manifest proof against yourselveș", has the same connotation as the words: He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26).

Second: In the hell, people are divided in various stages which differ in lowliness and ignominy. Naturally, their chastisement goes increasing according to the lowliness of their grade which Allãh has named descending stages. [The lower the stage, the harsher the torture.]

QUR'ÃN: Except those who repent and amend and hold fast to Allãh and are sincere in their religion to Allãh; . . . : This is an exception from the threat given to the hypocrites in the preceding verse: Surely the hypocrites are in the lowest stage of the Fire . . . It follows that these people have separated from the hypocrites and joined the believers. That is why the exception is followed by these words, "these are with the believers"; and then the reward of all the believers has been mentioned together, "and Allãh will grant the believers a mighty reward."

This group, excepted from the hypocrites, has been described with several difficult characteristics without which the hypocrisy cannot be uprooted. It begins with repentance, that is, returning to Allāh; this returning and repentance will be of no value unless they rectify all that has gone bad in their thoughts and deeds. Even this rectification will not avail them anything until they adhere to Allāh; in other words, until they follow the Divine Book and the sunnah of the Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.); because there is no path leading to Allāh except that which He has laid down Himself, all other paths are those of Satan. This adherence too will not benefit them unless they are sincere in their religion to Allāh, because polytheism is such a sin which can never be forgiven. When they have repented and amended every defect in their character, have held fast to Allāh and are sincere in their religion to Allāh, then they will be true believers without any taint of polytheism. Then they will be protected from hypocrisy and will be guided aright. Allāh says: Those who believe and mix not their faith with inequity, those are they for whom is security and they are (the ones) guided aright (6:82).

The context shows that the word, 'believers', refers to pure believers who are sincere in their faith. They have been introduced by the attributes, "those who repent and amend and hold fast to Allāh and are sincere in their religion to Allāh". These virtues cover all the details which Allāh has counted in His Book as the believers' characteristics and attributes. For example, see the following verses:-

> Indeed successful are the believers, those who in their prayers are humble and those who keep aloof from what is vain (23:1-3).
>
> And the servants of the Beneficient (Allāh) are they who walk on the earth humbly; and when address them the ignorants, say they: "Salām (Peace)". And those who pass the night in prostrating unto their Lord and standing (25:63-64).

This is what the Qur'ān means when it uses the word, 'believer', without any condition and without any association which would give it another shade of meaning.

Allāh has said,"These are with the believers", rather than saying, "these are among the believers". The reason is that as soon as these qualifications are found in them they are attached to the believers; but they would not be a part of the believers until these characteristics firmly take roots in their hearts.

QUR'ĀN: Why should Allāh chastise you if you are grateful and believe? And Allāh is the Appreciator, Knowing.: Apparently, this verse too, like the preceding speech, is addressed to the believers. They have been addressed in these words as if they were devoid of belief, as speakers use this style in such talks.

The verse indicates that Allãh has no need to chastise them.

Had they not invited the punishment by discarding gratitude and faith, there was nothing from the side of Allãh to inflict them with chastisement. Allãh gets no benefit from their punishment nor does He get any harm by their existence, so that He should be inclined to punish them. The meaning, therefore, is: There is no reason why you should be punished if you express your gratitude for the favours Allãh has bestowed on you by giving Him His due rights and if you truly believe in Him; and Allãh appreciates virtues of him who thanks Him and believes in Him; and He is All-knowing and puts everything in its proper place.

This verse shows that the chastisement which covers some people emanates from their side, not from Allãh's side. Likewise, all the things which invite punishment, like going astray, polytheism and sins and errors, do not originate from Allãh; they are done by the people themselves. If any of these things had originated from Allãh, then the resulting punishment also would have been from Allãh, because the effect is related to its cause.

T R A D I T I O N S

Zurãrah, Ḥumrãn and Muḥammad ibn Muslim have narrated from Abū Ja'far and Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) about the words of Allãh: Surely as for those who believe, then disbelieve, again believe and again disbelieve, then increase in disbelief, that they said, "It was revealed about 'Abdullãh ibn Abī Sarḥ, whom 'Uthmãn had sent to Egypt as Governor. Then his disbelief increased until not an iota of belief remained in him." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)[21]

Abū Baṣīr has said: "I heard him (Abū 'Abdillãh, a.s.) saying about this same verse: 'Whoever believes that intoxicant is unlawful and then drinks it, and whoever believes that fornication is unlawful and then does it and whoever believes that zakāt is wājib (obligatory) and does not pay it (are included in this verse)." (ibid.)

The author says: This ḥadīth generalizes the verse to cover all stages of disbelief, one of which is neglecting the obligatory com-mandments and committing forbidden things. It somewhat supports what we have written in the Commentary.

Muḥammad ibn al-Fuḍayl narrates from Abu 'l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍā (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: And indeed we have revealed to you in the Book that when you hear Allāh's communications disbelieved in or mocked at, . . . surely then you would be like them, that he said, "When you hear a man denying the truth, refuting it and disparaging the people of truth, then stand up from near him and do not sit with him." (ibid.)

The author says: There are other traditions too of the same meaning.

Abu 'ṣ-Ṣalt al-Harawī narrates from ar-Riḍā (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: and Allāh will by no means give the unbelievers a way against the believers, that he said: "Allāh says that He will by no means give the unbelievers a proof against the believers. Allāh has given us the news about the unbelievers who killed their prophets without any right, yet in spite of their killing them, Allāh had not given them any proof against his prophets." (ibid.)

as-Suyūṭī writes: "Ibn Jarīr has narrated from ʻAlī [a.s.] about the words of Allāh: and Allāh will by no means give the unbelievers a way against the believers, that he said, 'In the hereafter.'" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: It has been explained that the context apparently points to the hereafter; but if the sentence is taken separately, on its own, it may be generalised to cover the proof in this worl.

aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chain of narrators from al-Ḥasan ibn Faḍḍāl that he said, "I asked ʻAlī ibn Mūsā ar-Riḍā (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: Surely the hypocrites strive to deceive Allāh, while He is deceiving them.

"The Imām (a.s.) said, 'Allāh does not deceive; rather He gives them recompense of their deception.'" (`Uyūnu 'l-akhbār)

Masʻadah ibn Ziyād narrates through Jaʻfar ibn Muḥammad (a.s.) from his father (a.s.) that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was asked, "In what lies the salvation tomorrow?" He (s.a.w.a.) said, "Salvation is that you should not deceive Allãh, lest He deceives you; because whoever deceives Allãh, He will deceive him and will take off the īmãn (faith) from him; and (the man) deceives his own self, had he but known it." Again, it was said to him (s.a.w.a.), "How does one deceive Allãḥ" He said, "He performs what Allãh has ordered him to, but his aim is (to please) someone other than Allãh. Therefore, be on guard against dissimulation, because it is associating someone with Allãh. Surely, a dissimulator will be called on the Day of Resurrection with four names: O kãfir, O debauchee, O treacherous, O profligate! your deeds are forfeited, your recompense is nullified; there is no share for you today; you seek your recompense from him you were doing for." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī) al-Kulaynī narrates through his chain of narrators from Abu 'l-Maʻzã al-Khaṣṣãf that he said, The Commander of the Believers (a.s.) said, "Whoever remembers Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, in secret, He remembers Him most often. Verily, the hypocrites used to remember Allãh openly but did not remeber Him in secret; therefore, Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, said: they do it only to be seen of men and do not remember Allãh save a little". (al-Kãfī)

The author says: This is another fine meaning for scantiness of remembrance of Allãh.

Ibnu 'l-Mundhir has narrated from ʻAlī [a.s.] that he said, "No deed is small with piety, and how can that be small which is accepted." (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This too is a fine meaning and in reality it goes back to what has been described in the preceding tradition.

Muslim, Abū Dãwūd and al-Bayhaqī (in his Sunan) have narrated from Anas that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'That is the prayer of a hypocrite; he remains sitting and looking at the sun until when it reaches between the two horns of Satan, he stands up and pecks (on the earth) four times and does not remember Allãh in it except a little.'" (ibid.)

The author says: This is another meaning of paucity of remembrance because such a worshipper merely turns towards Allãh by standing for prayer and does not get time to remember Allãh while it was possible for him to submerge himself in His remembrance with presence (of heart) and tranquility.

The sun reaching between the two horns of Satan is a metaphor which denotes its nearness from the western horizon. It is as though the day and the night are two horns of satan with which he rams human beings.

'Abd Ibn Ḥamīd, al-Bukhārī (in his Tārīkh), Muslim, Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir have narrated from Ibn 'Umar that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'The likeness of a hypocrite is that of a wandering goat between two flocks, once it goes to this and once to that; it doesn't know which to follow.'" (ibid.)

'Abdu 'r-Razzãq, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥãtim and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Ibn 'Abbãs, that he said, "Wherever the word sulṭãn occurs in the Qur'ãn, it means 'proof." (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah, al-Marwazī (in Zawãidu 'z-zuhd) and Abu 'sh-Shaykh ibn Ḥibbãn have narrated from Makḥūl that he said, "I have been told that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said, 'No servant remains sincere to Allãh for forty mornings but the springs of wisdom appears fro his heart on his tongue.'" (ibid.)

The author says: This tradition is a famous one and has been narrated in the same words or with the same meaning through other chains of narrators.

al-Ḥakīm at-Tirmidhī has narrated in Nawãdiru 'l-uṣūl from Zayd ibn Arqam that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'Whoever sincerely says, Lã ilãha illa 'llãh, will enter the Garden.' It was said to him, 'O Messenger of Allãh, what is its sincerity? He said, 'That it prevents him from unlawful things.'" (ibid.)

The author says: This tradition's meaning is narrated through numerous chains of narrators in the collections of aḥãdīth (traditions) of the both sects from the Prophet and the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt, may Allãh's mercy and blessings be on them. And, God willing, we shall quote most of its narrated words in some appropriate place.

Many traditions have been written under these verses showing diverse and different reasons of their revelation; we have not quoted them here because apparently they are based on the flow of the Qur'ãn, which the people have used to fit the verses on some likely events. And Allãh knows better.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Allãh does not love open utterance of evil in speech except (by) one to whom injustice has been done; . . . : [al-Jahr (اَلْجَهْرُ = loudly speaking; translated here as 'open utterance')]. ar-Rãghib has said under the root j-h-r [جهر]: "It is used for excessive manifestation of a thing before the sense of sight or hearing. As for the sight, it is said: 'I saw him openly'; Allãh, the Sublime, says: 'O Mūsã! We will not believe in you until we see Allãh manifestly' (2:55); They said: 'Show us Allãh manifestly' (4:153) . . . As for hearing, Allãh says: Alike (to Him) among you is he who conceals (his) words and he who speaks openly" (13:10).

as-Sū' (اَلسُّوْء = evil); evil speech – every talk which hurts the feeling of the person about who it is said; for example, cursing him and abusing him and accusing him of some bad characteristics, no matter whether those defects are really found in him or not. Allāh does not love that these things should be loudly announced and spoken. It is known that Allāh is free from love and hate, which is found in human beings and many animals; however, as our commandments and prohibitions naturally emanate from love and hate, Allāh metaphorically uses the words, love and hate, to describe His pleasure and displeasure, His commandment and prohibition.

Therefore, the words, "Allāh does not love open utterance of evil in speech", metaphorically show legislation covering both prohibition and dislike.

The phrase, "except (by) one to whom injustice has been done", is isolated exception. It means that it is alright for the one who is oppressed and to whom injustice has been done, to loudly speak evil about the opressor regarding the injustice done to him. This context shows that he is allowed to utter evil publicly to describe the injustice done to him and to expose the bad character of the oppressor which led him to that injustice. However, there is no indication here that he can speak loudly about other things which are not found in the oppressor or which have no connection with this praticular oppression.

The exegetes have differed in explanation of "evil in speech"; some say that it means cursing; others say that it is a description of his oppression and injustice, etc.; the fact is that all these things are included in this phrase which is unrestricted. Therefore, there is no reason why it should be restricted to certain types of evil talk.

The words, "and Allāh is Hearing, Knowing", emphasize the prohibition understood from "Allāh does not love open utterance of evil in speech". In other words, it is not allowed for the one to whom injustice has not been done to speak loudly evil words about someone because Allāh is the Hearing Who hears every word, and Knowing Who knows what one is doing.

QUR'ĀN: If you do good openly or do it in secret or pardon an evil, then surely Allāh is Pardoning, Powerful : The verse has some relation with the preceding one because it implies manifestation of good words showing gratitude for a favour which someone has done to you, and also shows merit of forgiveness of an evil, so that you should not utter evil words against your oppressor.

Doing good openly means manifesting it clearly whether it is manifested in deed – for example, showing that one is spending on some deserving person; likewise, other good deeds; as this showing arouses in other people the desire to do good and strengthens the religion – or in words, like openly thanking the benefactor and mentioning him with good attributes, as it would incite other well to do persons to follow the suit.

Keeping the good work secret is also commendable, because it keeps one away from dissimulation and nearer to sincerity, as Allãh has said: If you give alms openly, it is well, and if you hide it and give it to poor, it is better for you; and this will remove from you some of your sins (2:271).

Pardoning an avil is to cover it in words – that he does not describe his oppressor for his oppression, does not disgrace him before the people and does not speak openly against him – and in deed, that he should not confront him with similar mistreatment for retribution, even when sharī'ah allows him to do so. Allãh has said: whoever then acts aggressively against you, inflict the like aggression on him as he has inflicted on you; and fear Allãh (2:194).

If you pardon an evil, you will acquire an attribute from the Divine attributes of perfection – He pardons His servants although He has power to punish them. Doing good deed openly or in secret, that is, doing favour to the needy in all conditions is also among the Divine attributes because He is Allãh.

aṭ-Ṭabrisī has said: "Allãh does not like abusing while seeking someone's aid except the one to whom injustice has been done; he is allowed to seek help against the oppressor in the matters in which seeking help is allowed by religion." He says that it is narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.). (Majma'u 'l-bayãn)

Abu 'l-Jãrūd narrates from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he said: "Open utterance of evil in speech means describing a man with the defects which are found in him." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

Another ḥadīth explains this verse in this way: If a man came to you and he spoke ascribing to you such merit, praise and good deeds which you do not have, then do not accept it from him and refute him; because he has done injustice to you. (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

al-Faḍl ibn Abī Qurrah narrates from Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) about the words of Allãh: Allãh does not love open utterance of evil in speech except (by) one to whom injustice has been done, that he said, "Whoever invited some people for feast and did not serve them properly, he is among those who do injustice; and there is no blame on them in whatever they say about him." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

The author says: It has been narrated in Majmaʻu 'l-bayãn from Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) as a mursal ḥadīth; also it has been narrated through Sunnī chains from Mujãhid. However, these traditions clearly show that the verse is general and not restricted, as we have shown earlier.

COMMENTARY

Now, the talk turns to the People of the Book describing the reality of their disbelief and explaining some of their injustices, sins and scandalous talks.

QUR'ĀN: Surely those who disbelieve in Allāh and His messengers . . . We have prepared for the unbelievers a disgraceful chastisement : These are the People of the Book, the Jews and the Christians; the Jews believe in Mūsā and 'Īsā and Muḥammad while the Christians believe in Mūsā and 'Īsā and disbelieve in Muḥammad – Allāh's mercy be on all of them. These people think that they believe in Allāh and in some of His messengers and disbelieve in only a few of them; but Allāh has clearly stated that they are disbelievers in Allāh and all His messengers. Therefore, it was necessary to explain the all-encompassing sentence, "Surely those who disbelieve in Allāh and His messengers". This explanation is given in the next phrase which is given as explicative apposition, "and desire to differentiate between Allāh and His messengers, and say: "We believe in some and disbelieve in others". This phrase is self-explanatory. They are disbelievers in Allāh and His Messengers because when they say: "We believe in some and disbelieve in others", they actually want to diffentiate between Allāh and His messengers; when they disbelieve in some of His messengers although he has been sent by Allāh, they are rejecting the Divine choice; thus rejection of any messenger is rejection of Allāh's Divinity.

Again it is explained with another explanatory conjuctive, "and desire to take a way between (this and) that". They want to chart out a way between two opposites: believing in Allāh and all His messengers and disbelieving in Allāh and all His messengers; and that middle way is believing in some and rejecting some others. However, the only way to Allāh is to believe in Him and all His messengers together. A messenger in his capacity of messengership has no authority over his ownself or on his mission; everthing is done under Divine guidance. To believe in him is to believe in Allāh and to reject him is to reject Allāh.

Disbeliving in some and believing in others together with Allāh is an attempt to differentiate between Allāh and His messengers. In this way, they want to make the messenger indifendent, unrelated to Allāh. According to the, belief in the prophet has no connection with the belief in Allāh and rejection of a prophet is unconnected with disbelief in Allãh; the messenger is accordingly marginalised and removed from his central position. How can one be called a messenger if believing or disbelieving in him is unrelated to belief or disbelief in Allãh.

Now, it is clear without any doubt that believing in such a messenger is tantamount to ascribing someone to Allãh, the great, the High. That is why Allãh, after describing their attempt to believe in some and disbelieve in others, in order to differentiate between Allãh and His messengers and to find a via media, says that, "These it is that are truly unbelievers", and then threatens them saying, "and We have prepared for the unbelievers a disgraceful chastisement".

QUR'ÃN: And those who believe in Allãh and His messengers and do not differentiate between any of them; they (are those whom) He will grant them their recompense; and Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful : After exposing the disbelief of those who differentiate between Allãh and His messengers, ans stating that they were disbelievers in Allãh and all His messengers, now Allãh describes those who stand opposite to them, that is, those who believe in Allãh and all His messengers without any differentiation. This completes the division of the people in two groups. We find in the second and third verses that the pronouns describing Allãh have been changed from first person plural to third person singular; first it was said: and We have prepared for the unbelievers a disgraceful chastisement, and now it says, "they (are those whom) He will grant them their recompense". Probably, ascribing award of punishment to first person shows that it would surely happen; this certainty is not so clear in third person pronoun; and the same reason justifies the change of pronoun in the second verse. The verse is addressed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and contains good tidings. The Prophet knows that Allãh would surely fulfil His promise and this recompense is certain to be awarded.

COMMENTARY

The verses describe the demand of the People of the Book that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) should bring down to them a book from heaven, because they were not satisfied by the piecemeal revelation of the Qur'ãn through Gabriel, and then replies to it.

QUR'ÃN: The People of the Book ask you to bring down to them a book from heaven; . . . : "The People of the Book" refers to the Jews and the Christians, as is known from the Qur'ãnic style in such places. It means that the demand had come from both groups and not only the Jews.

Of course, the injustice and the crimes enumerated in these verses were exclusively committed by the Jews; for example, the demand to see Allãh, the worship of the calf, breaking the covenant when the mountain was raised over their heads and when they were ordered to do sajdah (prostration) and prohibited to cross the limits of the sabbath and things like that. But both groups had grown from the same root, that is, the tribe of Isrã'īl to whom Mūsã and 'Īsã (a.s.) were sent (although the mission of 'Īsã [a.s.] spread after his being raised to the heaven to the non-Israilites like Rome, Arabia, Ethiopia and Egypt, etc.) and the injustice done to 'Īsã by his people was not less than the injustice done by the Jews to Mūsã (a.s.).

As the two groups had a common root and the injustice described was done by the Jews only when the time came to describe their punishment, Allãh mentioned only the Jews as He says: Wherefore for the inequity of those who are Jews, We did forbid them those good things which had been made lawful for them. And it was because of this common root that the list of the Messengers described later includes 'Īsã (a.s.) too like Mūsã (a.s.); if the talk were reserved to the Jews only, this could not be justified. Also, it is for this reason that after these verses it has been said: O People of the Book! do not exceed the limits in your religion, and do not speak (lies) against Allãh, but (speak) the truth; the Messiah, 'Īsã son of Maryam is only a Messenger of Allãh.

In short, the demand had come from the People of the Book together and the speech is addressed to them both, because they share the national trait, that is, despotism, speaking lies, recklessness and disregard of agreements and covenants. The talk covers both in common characteristics but when any group deserves some special comment, it is mentioned separately.

They had asked the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) to bring down to them a book from heaven. Obviously, they had not asked it before the Qur'ãn was revealed and recited before them. This event had taken place in Medina and they had heard the Qur'ãn as much as was revealed at Mecca and the parts which were revealed at Medina upto that time. Yet, they were not satisfied that it was a sufficient proof of his Prohethood; they were not prepared to count it as a Divine Book, although the Qur'ãn had been sent armed with the challenge and the claim of its miraculousness, as we see in the chapters of "The Night Journey", "Yūnus", "Hūd" and "The Cow", all of which were revealed before this chapter of the "Women".

Clearly, their asking for bringing down a book from the heaven (when they were witnessing the Qur'ãnic revelation), was merely a foolhardy demand which could not come except from a person who stubbornly refuses to submit to the truth and does not follow the reality. Such a person talks irrationally and raves without thinking, as his desires overpower him; he doesn't stand on any firm grond nor does he feel constrained by any limit. This arrogance was not unsimilar to that which the Quraysh had adopted as soon as the Qur'ãnic revelations began and its mission became known; as Allãh quotes them as saying: Why is not a sign sent to him from His Lord? (10:20), or you should ascend into heaven, and we will not believe in your ascending until you bring down to us a book which we may read (17:93).

It was in this background that Allãh has replied to their demand.

First: These are a people gone far in their ignorance and straying. They do not desist from any injustice, however great it might be; from disbelief and rejection of truth even when clear proofs have come to them; nor from breaking the covenants however sacred they might be; nor do they avoid falsehood, wrong accusation or any type of injustice. A man of such characteristics does not deserve that his demand be granted or his proposal accepted.

Second: The Book which Allãh has sent down, that is, the Qur'ãn, contains in itself the witness of Allãh and His angels. Moreover, it offers challege after challenge in its noble verses.

Continuing the reply, Allãh says: so indeed they had demanded of Mūsã a greater thing than that, that is, greater than what they are asking you, to bring down to them a book from heaven: for they said: "Show us Allãh manifestly", that is, show Him to us clearly so that we see Him with our eyes; this was the peak of ignorance, delirium and transgression; so the lightening seized them on account of their injustice. The story is mentioned in the chapter of "The Cow" (vrs. 55-56) and that of "The Elevated Places" (vr. 155).

Then Allãh says: Then they took the calf (for a god) even after clear signs had come to them, they indulged in this idol-worship when its falsity was clearly shown to them and it was explained to them that Allãh is far from the taint of corporal traits and transience; and this was the most henious ignorance: but We pardoned this; and We gave to Mūsã a clear authority. Mūsã (a.s.) had ordered them in this connection to repent to Allãh by killing each other; they started doing it but Allãh pardoned them before the killings had taken toll of them all; and this is what pardon means in this verse. He gave Mūsã (a.s.) clear authority inasmuch as his orders were implemented on them and on as-Sãmirī and his calf. This story is mentioned in the chapter of "The Cow" (vr. 54).

Then Allãh says: And We lifted the mountain over them at their covenant. It was the covenant which Allãh had taken from them and then raised the mountain over them. The story has been described twice in the chapter of "The Cow" (vrs. 63 & 93). Further, Allãh says: and We said to them: "Enter the door prostrating"; and We said to them: "Do not exceed the limits of the Sabbath"; and We took from them a firm covenant. The two stories are mentioned in the chapter of "The Cow" (vrs. 58-65) and the chapter of "The Elevated Places" (vrs. 161-163). Probably, the covenant mentioned here is related to these two stories as well as others, because the Qur'ãn repeatedly mentions making the covenant with them, as Allãh says: And when We made a covenant with the Children of Israel: "You shall not worship (any) but Allãh; . . . " (2:83); and when We made a covenant with you: "You shall not shed your blood and you shall not turn your people out of your cities"; then you gave a promise while you witnessed (ibid.: 84).

QUR'ÃN: Therefore, for their breaking their covenant and their disbelif in the communications of Allãh . . . : Fa (فَ = therefore). This particle shows that the coming statement has resulted from the preceding ones. "For their breaking their covenant" refers to their crimes mentioned after a few verses. These verses aim at describing the humiliating recompense which Allãh has reserved for them in this world and the hereafter. They also describe some of their evil characteristics not mentioned before.

The words of Allãh, "Therefore for their breaking their covenant", refers together to their breaking the covenant, some of which have been mentioned in the Qur'ãn and some have not. "And their disbelief in the communications of Allãh", refers to their various types of disbelief which they committed during the life of Mūsã (a.s.) and after him. The Qur'ãn has described several instances of it including the two mentioned in the beginning of the verses, that is: So indeed they had demanded of Mūsã a greater thing than that, for they said: "Show us Allãh manifestly", and: they took a calf (for a god) even after clear signs had come to them. These two instances of their disbelief were described before other things in the beginning, but have been put here after the description of their breaking the covenant; because the context is different. Beginning of the verses mentions their demand to bring down a book from heaven and it was more relevant to follow it with their asking something greater than that and their worshipping the calf. But the verse under discussion describes their recompense for their evil deeds after their accepting the call to the truth; and in this context beginning the speech with description of their breaking their covenant was more appropriate.

The phrase: and their killing the prophets unjustly, points to Zakariyyã, Yaḥyã and other prophets whom the Qur'ãn has mentioned without naming. Then Allãh says: and their saying: "Our hearts are covered" : Ghulf (غُلف) is plural of aghlaf (اَغْلف = under cover) which prevents it from listening to the prophetic call and accepting the truth. They uttered this sentence in order to reject the call and at the same time putting the responsibility of that rejection on Allãh. In a way they claimed that their hearts were put under cover by Allãh, or that they could not hear any call except that of Mūsã, and all this was beyond their choice and authority. That is why Allãh has refuted their claim by saying: Nay! Allãh has set a seal upon them owing to their disbelief, so they shall not believe except a little. Thus, it is explained that the refusal of their hearts to listen to the true call is connected to the Divine creation, but not in the sense which they were claiming that they had no hand in it. Rather, Allãh has done it to them because of their disbelief and denial of truth, and consequently these people will not believe except a few of them. We have described in detail about this exception; they were afflicted with this Divine retribution as a society and nation. The whole group taken together is under that punishment and their hearts have been sealed and it is impossible for that society to believe in the Prophet, although a few of them may enter into the fold of Islam.

QUR'ÃN: And for their disbelief and for their having uttered against Maryam a griveous calumny : It refers to their calumny against Maryam (a.s.) that 'Īsã (a.s.) was a product of fornication. It is disbelief and false accusation all together; and 'Īsã (a.s.) had talked to them soon after his birth and said: "Surely I am a servant of Allãh; He has given me the Book and made me a prophet." (19:30).

QUR'ÃN: And for their saying: "Surely we have killed the Messiah, 'Īsã son of Maryam, the Messenger of Allãh;" and they did not kill him nor did they crucify him, but it appeared to them so (like'Īsã): It was described in the stories of 'Īsã (a.s.) in ch.3 that they had different versions concerning his killing: whether it was by crucifixion or some other means. Allãh first mentions their claim of killing the Messiah, then refutes their claim joining the killing and crucifxion together; probably this mode has been adopted for total refutation, in order to remove all possible doubts; crucifixion is a special method of torture but it does not necessarily lead to killing and when killing is mentioned, crucification doesn't come into mind. [Therefore, refuting killing and crucifixion together refutes the idea of 'Īsã's death altogether.]

If only the killing were refuted, it was possible to say that they had not killed him in normal way, that he could have been killed by crucifixion. That is why Allãh added after "they did not kill him" the words, "nor did they crucify him" to make the meaning utmost clear. Then He says explicitly that 'Īsã (a.s.) did not die on their hands, neither by crucifixion nor in any other way; rather it appeared to them so. They caught another person in place of the Messiah and killed him or crucified him. This could have happened easily in those circumstances; in such a rioteous and barbaric mobs often the actual target slips away and some other person is held and beaten up. He was arrested by the Roman soldiers who had no full prior knowledge of his features and conditions; it was possible for them to catch someone else in his place. Moreover, there are traditions saying that Allãh had put his likeness on another personwho was caught and killed in his place.

Some research scholars of history have written that the historical stories recorded about 'Īsã (a.s.) and the events connected with his call as well as the stories of his contemporaries among the rulers and preachers fit completely on two persons, both named the Messiah, and the time gap between them is of more than 500 years. The earlier one was the true Messiah but he was not killed and the later one was the false Messiah who was crucified. According to that scholar it is doubtful whether the present Christian calendar is correct. In that case, what the Qur'ãn mentions as 'appearance' would refer to the similarity of the Messiah, `Īsã son of Maryam, the Messenger of Allãh, with the crucified Messiah.[22]

And most surely those who differ therein, that is, differ about ‘Īsã or about his killing: are only in doubt about it, that is, they are ignorant of his affairs, they have no knowledge respecting it; but only follow a conjecture, that is, they surmise according to what they have been told by others without firm knowledge: and certainly they killed him not, it may also be translated as: 'they did not kill him, I give you the confirmed news'.

Someone has said that the pronoun 'him' in "they did not kill him" refers to knowledge in the preceding sentence, that is, they did not kill the knowledge certainly; according to the dictionary killing of knowledge means purifying it from doubt and suspicion. Some others have said that the pronoun refers to conjecture, that is, they did not verify their conjecture. These meanings are very strange and the Qur’ãnic words do not tolerate them.[23]

QUR’ÃN: Nay! Allãh raised him up to Himself; and Allãh is Mighty, Wise : Allãh has narrated this story in the chapter of "The Family of ‘Imrãn" where He says: And when Allãh said: "O ‘Īsã! I am going to take you away completely and cause you to ascend unto Me" (3:55). So, this verse mentions first his being taken away and then his being raised.

The context of the verse refutes their claim that they had killed and crucified ‘Īsã (a.s.). Rather he was protected from murder and crucifixion. Also, it is clear that the one about whom the claims of murder and crucifixion were made (i.e., ‘Īsã, [a.s.] with his body) was the one whom Allãh raised to Him and saved him from their conspiracy. In short, ‘Īsã (a.s.) was raised up with his body and soul together. It was not that he had died and then his soul was raised to Allãh, because the context of the verse doesn't agree with such a hypothesis; the adverb, 'rather', would be meaningless if it were to show that his soul was raised up after death, because such raising up could happen even after his murder or natural death.

This raising up was a sort of rescue with which Allãh saved him from their hands. [This verse by itself does not make it clear] whether

---

[22] Such hypothesis is not worthy of attention and should not be included in a serious book like ours. (tr.)

[23] Such far-fetched meanings serve only to create confusion in the minds of the readers. (tr.)

he had died at that time a natural death or by some means other than murder and crucifixion or was alive and Allãh had given him perpetual life in a way we do not know.It was not impossible for All`ah to give death to ‘Īsã (a.s.) and then raise him and protect him; or He could preserve his life in some extra-natural way.[24] This phenomenon is not different from other events described in the Qur’ãn regarding ‘Īsã's miracles concerning his birth and his life among his people as well as the miracles of Ibrãhīm, Mūsã, Ṣãliḥ, and others. All that is in the same category; the Book of Allãh confirms those happenings so clearly that they cannot be ignored. Of course, some people had tried to reinterprete those miracles thinking that such supernatural events would nullify the general system of the cause and effect; in the first volume of this book, we have discussed in detail the phenomenon of miracle and supernatural events.[25]

However, the next verse proves or points that ‘Īsã (a.s.) is alive and has not died yet.

QUR’ÃN: And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death; and on the Day of Resurrection, he (‘Īsã) shall be a witness against them : The third person singular pronouns in "believe in him" and "he shall be" refer to ‘Īsã (a.s.). As for the pronoun in "before his death" there are various interpretations:

Some people have said: The pronoun refers to 'one' in "one of the People of the Book", meaning: each and every one among the People of the Book will believe in ‘Īsã (a.s.) before that one dies. It will become clear to him just before his death that ‘Īsã was the Messenger of Allãh and His servant; even though that faith at that time will not benefit him at all, and ‘Īsã will be a witness over them all on the Day of Judgement. It makes no difference whether they believed in him in a way that was beneficial to them or at a time when it was of no avail like believing at the time of death.

If we say that the pronoun "before his death" refers to ‘Īsã (a.s.), it would support what has been narrated in some traditions that ‘Īsã is

---

[24] This statement does not agree with the above explanation that the same one -‘Īsã with his body and soul- who was claimed to have been killed and crucified was the one who was raised up. There was no need, after that clear and categorical declaration, to insert here these speculative possibilities and confuse the readers. (tr.)

[25] al-Mīzãn (Eng.), vol.1, pp.106-127 (tr.)

alive, has not died and that he will come down before the Day of Resurrection and then the People of the Book, the Jews and the Christians, will believe in him. But this interpretation particularizes, without any reason, the generality of the phrase, "and there is not one of the People of the Book". But according to this explanatio, the verse would mean that only those People of the Book would believe in ʻĪsã who would be present when he would come down from the heavens, while all others who came and went after his being raised and before his coming down would not believe in him. This restricts without any reason the general meaning of the verse.

However, some have opted for this explanation and said that the pronoun refers to ʻĪsã (a.s.) and points to their belief in him at the time of his coming down from heaven in the last days. This view relies on a tradition as we have mentioned above.

But the verse with its two parts clearly shows that ʻĪsã (a.s.) will be a witness on all of them on the Day of Resurrection as will all of them believe in him before death. And Allãh has quoted the speech of ʻĪsã regarding this evidence in a particular way: And I was a witness over them so long as I was among them; when You did take me up You were the watcher over them and You are witness over all things (5:117). In this verse, ʻĪsã limits his evidence for the period when he was alive among them before his being taken away, and the verse under discussion says that he would be a witness over all tose who could believe in him; now if all would believe in him it means that he would not die but after all of them. This brings us to the second interpretation, that is, he is alive until now and he will return to them again so that they could believe in him. Utmost that can be said is that the one who will not be present when he will return to them second time will believe in him at the time of his death and the one who will be present at that time will have to believe in him whether willingly or under compulsion.

This verse coming after the Divine words: and they did not kill him nor did they crucify him, but it appeared to them so (like ʻĪsã); . . . Rather Allãh raised him up to Himself, and Allãh is Mighty, Wise, indicates that ʻĪsã has not died and is still alive; because there seems no useful purpose in saying that all of them would believe in him under compulsion. This supports the view that their believing in ʻĪsã before death refers to their believing in him before ʻĪsã's death.

However, there are other verses which apparently go somehow against it. For example: And when Allãh said: O ʻĪsã! I am going to take you away completely and cause you to ascend unto Me and purify you of those who disbelieve, and make those who follow you above those who disbelieve to the Day of Resurrection (3:55). It shows that some disbelievers in ʻĪsã will continue upto the Day of Resurrection. Also, the verse: . . . and their saying: "Our hearts are covered"; Nay! Allãh has set a seal upon them owing to their disbelieve, so they shall not believe except a little", shows that it is an affliction written against them, and their society, as a Jewish society, will not believe upto the Day of Resurrection. Also, the verse: And I was a witness over them so long as I was among them; when You did take me up You were the watcher over them (5:117), shows that they will be continuing after ʻĪsã (a.s.) was taken away completely.

However, the fact is that these three verses do not go against the idea of ʻĪsã (a.s.) being alive. The verse: . . . and make those who follow you above those who disbelieve to the Day of Resurrection, doesn't say that they would continue upto the Day of Resurrection with their identity as the People of the Book. Likewise, the Divine words: Nay! Allãh has set a seal upon them owing to their disbelief, so they shall not believe except a little, only says that the true belief will not be accepted by all of them together and if at sometime they believed, that belief would cover only a few of them. Moreover, if the verse, "And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death", shows that they would believe in him before his death, it only mentions the belief, per se; it does not say that it would be an acceptable belief.

Likewise, the verse: When You did take me up You were the watcher over them, refers to the people, not to the Christians or the People of the Book, because the verse begins with these words: And when Allãh will say: "O ʻĪsã son of Maryam! did you say to the people, take me and my mother two gods beside Allãḥ" (5:116). Apart from that, ʻĪsã (a.s.), as one of the ulu 'l-ʻazm Messengers, was sent to all the people, and when he will give evidence over their deeds it would cover the Israelites as well as others, whether they believed in him or continued as unbelievers.

In short, the verses, seen in their context and in conjuction with other related verses, show that ʻĪsã (a.s.) did not die; he was not killed nor crucified nor did he die a natural death as we have mentioned earlier and we have written on this subject under the verse: O ʻĪsã! I am going to take you away completely . . . (3:55) in the third volume of this book.[26]

[26] al-Mīzãn (Eng.), vol.6, pp.33-39. (tr.)

A very strange explanation has been given by az-Zamakhsharī in Tafsīru 'l-kashshãf. He says: "This verse could possibly be interpreted in this way that there is none among all the People of the Book but he will believe in ‘Īsã (a.s); Allãh will give them life in their graves at the time of coming down of ‘Īsã (a.s.) and will inform them of his coming down and why he has come; so they will believe in him when their believing will give them no benefit. Is it not the belief of ar-raj‘ah (اَلرَّجْعَة = partial return)?"

There are some other unsound explanations written for this verse:

1. az-Zajjãj appears to think that the pronoun, "before his death" refers to the individual man of the Book. In other words, all of them unitedly say that we believe in that ‘Īsã (a.s.) who will appear in later days. It is a riduculous interpretation because the verses describe their claim of killing and crucifying ‘Īsã (a.s.) and refutes that claim. It does not deal directly with their disbelief in ‘Īsã (a.s.) and it has no connection with their accepting that the Messiah will appear in the later days to revive and restore the honour of the Israeli nation. Moreover, if that were the intended meaning, there was no need to say "before his death" because the meaning would have been clear without this phrase, and the same would be the case with the sentence. And on the day of Resurrection he (‘Īsã) shall be a witness over them, because there would be no need for such a statement at all.

2. Some exegetes have said that the verse means: and there is no one of the Book but he must certainly believe in Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) before the death of that man of the Book.

It is just like the previous explanation in absurdity, because there was no mention of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) in the preceding verses, so that the pronoun could refer to him; nor is this interpretation relevant to the theme of the verses. So, it is a claim without any proof. Of course, this meaning has been given in some traditions as we will read in the coming traditions but that is on the principle of the Qur'ãn as we shall describe; and such applications have been given very often in traditions as is known to everyone who looks minutely in such traditions.

QUR'ÃN: Wherefore for the inequity of those who are Jews, We did forbid them those good things which had been made lawful for them, . . . : "Wherefore" shows that the coming statement is a result of what has been described so far. "Inequity" has been used as a common noun to show the greatness of their injustice or to cover it in vagueness (becuae no important purpose depends on indentifying their inequities). This one word refers to some of their transgressions and inequities mentioned earlier. It doesn't refer to all the inequities mentioned above but only to some of them. Allāh had forbidden some of the good things to them because of that inequity, and it was forbidden in the sharī'ah of Mūsā which was revealed in the Torah; while some of the inequities were committed by them long after Mūsā, for example, slandering Maryam (a.s.), etc. That is why we have said that the word, 'inequity', refers to some of their great transgressions because of which some good things were forbidden to them after they had been made lawful.

The verse goes on to say: and for their hindering many from Allāh's way. it refers to their repeated deviation from the way of Allāh: And for their taking interest, though indeed they were forbidden it, and their devouring the property of people wrongfully.

QUR'ĀN: And We have prepared for the unbelievers from among them a painful chastisement : It is in conjuction with: We did forbid them. Because of their inequities, they had attracted two punishments from Allāh; one in this world which affected all of them and that was the forbidding of some previously legalised good things; the other concerns the life hereafter which is reserved for the unbelievers among them and that is a painful chastisement.

QUR'ĀN: But the firmly rooted in knowledge among them and the believers believe in what has been revealed to you and what was revealed before you, and those who keep up prayers and those who give the zakāt and the believers in Allāh and the Last Day, these it is whom We will give a Mighty reward : It is a sort of exception and emendation separating some persons from the People of the Book. "The firmly rooted in knowledge" and "the believers" are the subject and "believe" is predicate; "among them" is connected with "the firmly rooted in knowledge" and "among" shows partialness.

Apparently, the word "the believers" too has a connection with "among them". thus the meaning will be: but the firmly rooted in knowledge and the true believers from among the People of the Book believe in what has been revealed to you and what was revealed before you. This meaning gets support from the next verse which says: Surely We have revealed to you as We revealed to Nūḥ . . . Apparently, the verse wants to say that they have believed in you because they have realised that your prophethood and the revelation which We have sent to you is similar to the revelation which was brought to them by the previous prophets of Allãh, Nūḥ and the prophets after him, and the prophets from the progeny of Ibrãhīm and progeny of Ya‘qūb and the others whose stories we have not told you and there is no difference between these revelations.

You will appreciate that this meaning is more appropriate for the believers among the People of the Book than for the believers from the Arabs about whom Allãh has said: That you may warn a people whose fathers were not warned, so they are heedless (36:6).

"And those who keep up prayers" is in conjuction with "the firmly rooted in knowledge", but unlike the "firmly rooted" it is in accusative case to emphasize their praise. Likewise, "those who give the zakãt" is in conjuction with the same. "The believers in Allãh and the Last Day" is the subject and "these it is whom We will give a mighty reward" is its predicate. In the Qur’ãn of Ibn Mas‘ūd, "those who keep up prayers" was in nominative case and according to that, all the four adjectival phrases would be the subject, and "these it is whom We will give a mighty reward" its predicate.

aṭ-Ṭabrisī has said in Majma‘u 'l-bayãn : "The grammarians have differed as to why 'those who keep up prayers' has been revealed in accusative case. Sībawayh and the scholars of Baṣrah have said that it is meant so to describe their praise." [Then after mentioning some other interpretations, he says:] "There is a narration of ‘Urwah from ‘Ā’ishah that he asked her about the Divine words, 'those who keep up prayers', and, the Sabeans [5:69], and, these two are certainly two sorcerers [20:63], and she said, 'O my nephew! this is the work of the scribes; they made mistakes in writing'. And there is a narration from some of them [‘Uthmãn] that, 'there are some [ungrammatical] words in the Book of Allãh and the Arabs will soon correct it by their tongues.' And some of them has said that the phrase: 'those who keep up prayers' was in the nominative case in the Qur’ãn of Ibn Mas‘ūd. But such reports are not worthy of attention; the companions could not teach the people wrong recitals because they were the leaders and had learnt the words of the Qur’ãn from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.)."

The phrase, "but the firmly rooted in knowledge", is the exception from the People of the Book. As we have explained earlier, their demand from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he should bring down to them a book from heaven meant that what the prphet had brought to them – the Book and the Wisdom – which confirmed the Divine communications revealed to the Prophets and Messengers before him, was not enough to attract them to the truth and prove its veracity, while in reality the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had not brought to them but what the prophets before him had brought to their people and he lived among them and with them exactly as they had lived among and with their people. Allāh says: Say: "I am not first of the Messengers . . ." (46:9); And We did not send before you any but men to whom We sent revelation, so ask the followers of the Reminder if you do not know. And We did not make them bodies not eating the food, and they were not to abide (for ever) . . . certainly We have revealed to you a Book in which is your good remembrance; what! do you not then understand? (21:7-10).

Thus, Allāh describes about those People of the Book that they do not have a disposition to follow the truth nor they are firm in their views; they have no determination nor any opinion. There were many clear signs which they neglacted and many calls to the truth from which they hindered the people. Of course, those among them who are firmly rooted in knowledge (because of their firmness in their knowledge and the calrity of the truth before their eyes), and likewise, those who are true believers among them (because they are disposed to follow the truth), these two groups of people believe in what has been revealed to you and what was revealed before you, as they have found out that what has been revealed to you is similar to what was revealed to all the prophets before you – Nūḥ and other prophets who came after him.

It appears from the above that:

First: The reason why those People of the Book who followed the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) have been given the adjectives "firmly rooted in knowledge", and "the believers". The previous verses have adversely commented on the People of the Book that they are not firmly rooted in what they have known, are not firm on any truth even if it was entrusted to them with very firm covenants, and they do not believe on the communications of Allāh and hinder people from them even when clear proofs have come to them. In this backdrop, these people whom Allāh has excepted are firmly rooted in knowledge and true believers.

Second: The reason why the previously revealed Books have been mentioned with the Qur'ān in the phrase, "believe in what has been revealed to you and what has been revealed before you". The purpose is to show that there is no difference between the two revelations.

Third: The Divine words in the coming verse: Surely We have revealed to you as We have revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him", describe the reason of the belief of these believers.

QUR'ÃN: Surely We have revealed to you as We have revealed to Nūḥ and the Prophets after him, . . . : As we have said just now, it gives the reason for their belief. The meaning: They have believed in what has been revealed to you because We have not given you any new thing, new claim or new aspect which was not found with the previous prophets. The whole affair runs on one system without any difference. We have revealed to you as We have revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him. Nūḥ was the first prophet to come with the Book and a sharī'ah. It is the same as We revealed to Ibrãhīm and later to his progeny. These People of the Book know them and understand how they were sent and how they called their people to the Right Path; some were given a Book as Dãwūd was given Zabūr [Psalms] which was a prophetic revelation. Mūsã was addressed directly and that was another type of prophetic revelation; and there were others like Ismã'īl, Isḥãq and Ya'qūb who were sent without any Book and they too received prophetic revelations.

Whatever their peculiarities, all of them were messengers giving good news of Divine reward and warning against Divine punishment. Allãh had sent them to complete His proof against the people, as they were to explain what was beneficial for them in this life and the hereafter and what was harmful, in order that the people should not have any proof against Allãh after coming of the messengers.

QUR'ÃN: the tribes, . . . : It was explained under the verse: and Ya'qūb and the tribes (3:84) that the word refers to the prophets from the progeny of Ya'qūb.

QUR'ÃN: and We gave to Dãwūd Zabūr . . . : It is said that the word az-Zabūr means 'the written'; they say Zabarahu (زَبَرَهُ = he wrote it), thus az-Zabūr is synonymous with al-mazbūr (اَلْمَزْبُوْرْ = the written).

QUR'ÃN: (We sent) messengers as the givers of good news and as warners, . . . : As translated, the word "messengers" is the object and "givers of good news and warners" are its adjectives. It may also be translated as: The messengers, the givers of good news and the warners; in which case all three words will be circumstancial words.

In ch.2 vr.213 (in vol.2)[27], we have extensively discussed the meaning of sending of the messengers and completion of proof by Allāh against the people, and that the reason alone is not sufficient to guide the people on the right path unless the prophets are sent with Divine Laws.

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh is Mighty, Wise : When unlimited power and unlimited wisdom is reserved for Allāh, then it is impossible for anyone to prevail over Him in argument. Rather, the conclusive proofs are with Him. Allāh says: Say: "Then Allāh's is the conclusive argument" (6:149).

QUR'ĀN: But Allāh bears witness by what He has revealed to you that He has revealed it with His Knowledge; and the angels bear witness (also); and sufficient is Allāh for a witness : It is sort of isolated exception from the rejection of their demand that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) should bring down to them a Book from the heaven. What Allāh has described in refutation of their demand beginning with: So indeed they had demanded of Mūsā a greater thing . . . , means that their demand has been rejected. The reason for the rejection is that whatever has been brought by the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) through the Divine Revelation is certainly not different from the revelations brought by all other prophets. Whoever claims that he believes in what was brought by those prophets is duty – bound to believe in what has been brought by this prophet – without any difference. Now, Allāh adds that He bears witness by what He has revealed to His Prophet and the angels bear witness too and Allāh is sufficient for a witness. The item witnessed is that "He has revealed it with His knowledge". Merely coming down from the heavens was not sufficient to prove the claim because it could have been done through satanic agencies. The Satan could have polluted the affairs of Divine guidance by opening in front a wrong path in place of the right one; or he could have mixed some falsity in the Divine revelation to confuse the minds. Allāh has pointed to such pollution by refuting it in these words: The Knower of the unseen! so He does not reveal His secrets to any, except to him whom He chooses as a messenger; for surely He makes a guard to march before him and after him, so that He may know that they have truly delivered the messages of their Lord, and He encompasses what is with them, and He records the number of all things (72:26-28).

[27] al-Mīzān, (Eng.), vol.3, pp.167-227 (tr.)

Also, Allãh says: . . . and most surely the Satans inspire their friends . . . (6:121). In short, giving witness for coming down of, or sending down the Book, still leaves the claim somewhat in ambiguity; but the words, "with His Knowledge", make the meaning crystal clear, and show that Allãh has revealed it to His Messenger, and He knew what He was revealing; He encompasses him and protects him from deception of the Satan.

This witness is for revelation and revelation was through the angels, as is clear from the words of Allãh: Say: "Whoever is the enemy of Gabriel: for surely he revealed it to your heart by Allãh's command . . . " (2:97); and He has said describing this honoured angel: Most surely it is the Word of an honoured Messenger, the possessor of strength, an honourable place with the Lord of the Dominion, One (to be) obeyed, and faithful in trust (81:19-21). The adjective, "one (to be) obeyed", shows that there are other angels under his command and it is they who are mentioned in ch.80, vrs.11-16: Nay! Surely it is an admonishment. So let him who pleases mind it; in honourable books, exalted, purified in the hands of (Our) ambassadors, noble, virtuous. In short, as the angels were the means of bringing the revelation to the Prophet, so they too are witnesses like Allãh and Allãh is sufficient as a witness.

To see how Allãh has borne witness for the Qur'ãn, we should look into the verses which have thrown challenges to the adversaries. For example: Say: "If men and jinn should combine together to bring the like of this Qur'ãn, they could not bring the like of it, though some of them were aiders of others" (17:88); Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ãn? And if it were from any other than Allãh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82); Say: "Then bring a chapter like this and invite whom you can besides Allãh, if you are truthful." (10:38).

QUR'ÃN: Surely (as for) those who disbelieve and hinder (men) from Allãh's way they indeed have strayed off into a remote error : The preceding verses have described the convincing argument for the messengership of His Messenger showing that his Book was revealed from Allãh; also that it is the same sort of revelation that was sent to the prophets before him, and that it is accompanied by the witness of Allãh and His angels, and enough is He for a witness. Now, this verse establishes the error of those who disbelieve in Him and hinder others even if they are from the People of the Book.

The speech started with the topic of revelationof the Book from Allāh. Now, the word, 'Book', has been changed to Allāh's way (hinder men from Allāh's way). This simple change has beautifully abbreviated a lengthy premises. It is as though it says: Surely, as for those who disbelieve and hinder men from this Book and from the revelation it contains, they are the disbelievers who hinder people from Allāh's way, and those who disbelieve and hinder men from Allāh's way . . .

QUR'ĀN: Surely (as for) those who disbelieve and act unjustly, Allāh will not forgive them nor guide them to a path, except the path of hell, to abide in it forever, and this easy to Allāh : It re-emphasizes the reality mentioned in the preceding verse. Accordingly, injustice would point to their hindering men from the way of Allāh as is clear in this context. Also, possibly this verse gives the reason of their straying into a remote error. The meaning is clear.

T R A D I T I O N S

It is narrated in Tafsīru 'l-burhān under the Divine words: and for their having uttered against Maryam a grivious calumny, from Ibn Bābawayh through his chain from ʻAlqamah that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a ḥadīth : "Did not they ascribe to Maryam bint ʻImrān that she was pregnanted by a carpenter named Yūsuf?"

al-Qummī writes under the words of Allāh: And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death. "Narrated to me my father, from al-Qāsim ibn Muḥammad, from Sulaymān ibn Dāwūd al-Minqarī, from Abū Ḥamzah, from Shahr ibn Ḥawshab that he said, 'al-Ḥajjāj said to me, "O Shahr! one verse of the Book of Allāh has fatigued me." I said, "O Amīr! which verse is iṭ" He said, "The verse: And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death. By Allāh! certainly I sentence a Jew or a Christian and he is beheaded. And I stare at him but I don't see him moving his lips until he dies." I said, "May Allāh ameliorates the Amīr! This verse doesn't mean what you have interpretated." He said, "How is iṭ" I said, "Surely ʻĪsā will come down to this world before the Day of Resurrection. Then no follower of any religion, Jew or non-Jew, will remain but he would believe in him before his death and he will pray behind al-Mahdī." He said, "Woe unto thee! From where did you get it, and whence have you brough iṭ" I said, "Narrated it to me Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī ibn al-Ḥusayn ibn ʻAlī ibn Abī Ṭãlib (a.s.)." He said, "By Allãh! you have brought it from a pristine spring."'" (at-Tafsīr)

as-Suyūṭī writes: Ibnu ’l-Mundhir has narrated from Shahr ibn Ḥawshab that he said, "al-Ḥajjãj said to me, 'O Shahr! There is a verse in the Book of Allãh that whenever I read it, something happens against it in my mind. Allãh has said: And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death; and prisoners are brought before me and I kill them but I do no hear them saying anything.' I said to him, 'This has not been explained to you in a correct way. When a Christian dies, the angels hit from the front and from behind and say: "O wicked! The Messiah about whom you believed that he was god or son of god or one of the three persons is (in fact) servant of Allãh, His Spirit and His Word." So, he believes when his belief would not benefit him at all. And when a Jew dies, the angels hit him from the front and from behind and say: "O wicked! The Messiah whom you thought that you had killed him is (in fact) the servant of Allãh and His Spirit." So, he believes in ʻĪsã when that belief would not benefit him at all. At the time of coming down of ʻĪsã, the living People of the Book will believe in him as their dead ones had believed.' He said, 'From where have you taken iṭ' I said, 'From Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī.' He said, 'Surely you have taken it from its mine.'" Then Shahr said, "By Allãh! No one had narrated it to me except Umm Salamah; but I liked to irritate him." (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has also narrated it in abbreviated form from ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibnu ’l-Munthir, from Shahr ibn Ḥawshab, from Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī ibn Abī Ṭãlib (and that is Ibnu 'l-Ḥanafiyyah). Apparently, Shahr ibn Ḥawshab had narrated from Muḥammad ibn ʻAlī but the later narrators differed in identification whether it was Ibnu 'l-Ḥanafiyyah or al-Bãqir (a.s.). However, as you see the tradition supports the explanation we gave earlier for this verse.

as-Suyūṭṭī says: Aḥmad, al-Bukhãrī, Muslim and al-Bayhaqī (in al-Asmã’ wa 'ṣ-ṣifãt) have narrated that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said, "How will your condition be when the Son of Maryam will descend among you and your Imãm will be from among you?" (ibid.)

Ibn Marduwayh has narrated from Abū Hurayrah that he said: The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has said, "It is not far that will descend among you the son of Maryam, a just ruler; he will kill Dajjãl and the pig, and will break the cross, and will remove the jizyah and will take over the property and there will be one sajdah for Allãh, the Lord of the worlds. Read if you want: And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death, before the death of ‘Īsã son of Maryam." (Abū Hurayrah repeated this phrase three times) (ibid.)

The author says: There are nearly mutawãtir traditions describing descension of ‘Īsã (a.s.) at the time of the appearance of al-Mahdī (a.s.) from the Sunnī chains of narrators and likewise, from the Shī‘ī chains from the Prophet and the Imãms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.).

al-Ḥãrith ibn Mughīrah narrates from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) about the words of Allãh: And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death; and on the Day of Resurrection, he (‘Īsã) shall be a witness over them that he said, "It means the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyãshī)

The author says: Its apparent meaning goes against the apparent context of the verses which deal with the affairs of ‘Īsã (a.s.). Yet, it is possible to justify it on the principle of the flow of the Qur’ãn. Then the meaning will be as follows: When the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was sent and he brought a Book and a sharī‘ah which abrogated the sharī‘ah of `Isã (a.s.), then it was incumbent on all the People of the Book to believe in him, and the belief in Muḥammad included the belief in ‘Īsã and other preceding prophets. Now, if a man of the Book comes to realize at the time of his death after the advent of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) that ‘Īsã (a.s.) was true messenger then that realization will come together with the realization of the veracity of Muḥammad's messengership. In this way, a man of the Book would only be counted as believing in ‘Īsã (a.s.) if he believed in Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) in the first place and in ‘Īsã (a.s.) as a secondary matter. It is Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), after the advent of Islam, in whom every man of the Book should believe in reality and it is he who will be a witness over them on the Day of Resurrection although, ‘Īsã (a.s.)'s position is similar to this and there is no contradiction in both beliefs; and the following tradition somewhat shows the same meaning.

Ibn Sinãn narrates from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) concerning the words of Allãh: And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death; and on the Day of Resurrection, he (‘Īsã) shall be a witness over them, that he said, "The belief of the People of the Book will be for Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.)." (ibid.)

Jãbir narrates from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said concerning the same verse, "There is no one from all the religions but, when dying, he certainly sees the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and the Commander of the Believers (a.s.), be he from the ancient ones or the later (people)." (ibid.)

The author says: Obviously, the tradition is based on the flow of the Qur'ãn. Apart from that, the tradition does not say clearly that what the Imãm (a.s.) had mentioned was as an exegesis of the verse; there is a possibility that it was a separate matter which the Imãm described when speaking on this verse. We may find such examples in the traditions.

al-Mufaḍḍal ibn 'Umar said, "I asked Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) about the words of Allãh: And there is not one of the People of the Book but he must certainly believe in him before his death. The Imãm (a.s.) said, 'This verse was revealed especially about us. No one from the progeny of Fãṭimah dies and departs from this world until he acknowledges the Imãm and his Imãmate; as the sons of Ya'qūb acknowledged (the superiority of) Yūsuf when they said: "By Allãh! Allãh has certainly chosen you over us." [12:91].'" (ibid.)

The author says: The tradition is a solitary one and it is mursal. There are other traditions of the same meaning which have been narrated under the words of Allãh: Then We made inheritors of the Book those whom We chose from among Our servants; and of them is he who causes himself to suffer a loss, and of them is he who follows the middle course, and of them is he who is the foremost in goodness by Allãh's permission: This is that which is the greatest excellence (35:32); and we shall write there on this topic in detail, God willing.

Zurãrah and Ḥumrãn have narrated from Abū Ja'far and Abū 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that they said: "Surely We have revealed to you as We have revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him. Thus every revelation was gathered for him (Muḥammad, s.a.w.a.)." (ibid.)

The author says: Apparently, it means that the revelation sent to the Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was not unfamiliar to them which would have caused deviation from the path and difference in the prophetic call. It doesn't mean that every revelation sent to every prophet with all its peculiarities was sent to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), because such a notion has no meaning. Nor does it mean that the revelation sent to him is so comprehensive that all previous *sharī'ah*s are included in it, because the topic of the verse is unrelated to this them. The following tradition supports the meaning given by us.

al-Kulaynī narrates through his chains from Muḥammad ibn Sãlim that Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said, "Allãh said to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.): Surely We have revealed to you as We revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him; and every prophet was ordered (to follow) the way and (the good) custom." (al-Kãfī)

Abū Ḥamzah ath-Thumālī narrates from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said, "And there were between Adam and Nūḥ prophets unknown and manifest and for this reason, they were not mentioned in the Qur'ãn, they were not named as the manifest prophets have been named and this is the meaning of the words of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: And messengers We have mentioned unto you, and Allãh spoke to Mūsã; directly discoursing [4:164]. It means that I have not named the hidden prophets as I have named the manifest ones." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: This tradition has been narrated in al-Kãfī from 'Alī ibn Ibrãhīm, from his father, from al-Ḥasan ibn Maḥbūb, from Muḥammad ibn Fuḍayl, from Abū Ḥamzah, from Abū Ja'far (a.s.); and that tradition says: "There were among the prophets who remained concealed and that is why they were not mentioned in the Qur'ãn, they were not named as were named the manifest prophets; and this is the word of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: And messengers We have (already) mentioned to you before and messengers We have not mentioned to you." It means that I have not named the hidden prophets as I have named the manifest ones. In any case, the tradition means to say that Allãh did not mention the stories or the names of those prophets who had remained unknown, while He has mentioned the stories of some of the well-known prophets and named some of them. The words "It means that I have not named the hidden prophets . . . " could possibly be from the narrators.

Abū Ḥamzah ath-Thumālī says, "I heard Abū Ja'far (a.s.) saying: 'But Allãh bears witness by what He has revealed to you about 'Alī, that He has revealed it with His knowledge; and the angels bear witness (also); and sufficient is Allãh for a witness.'" (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: al-Qummī has narrated this theme in his at-Tafsīr through his chain of narrators from Abū Baṣīr, from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.). It is based on the flow of the Qur’ãn and applies the verse on a proper example; because there are in the Qur’ãn verses which were revealed concerning the wilãyah of ‘Alī (a.s.). It doesn’t want to say that there was alteration in the Qur’ãn; nor can it be taken to be a particular recital of this verse by the Imãm (a.s.).

Likewise, it has been narrated in al-Kãfī and at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyãshī from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) and in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī from Abū ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) that they recited: "Surely (as for) those who disbelieve and do injustice to the progeny of Muḥammad (usurping) their right, Allãh is not going to forgive them; (4:168)." Also it has been narrated in Majma‘u 'l-bayãn from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said about the words of Allãh: "Surely, the Messenger (Muḥammad) has come to you with truth, that is, with the wilãyah of him whose wilãyah Allãh has ordered. All these traditions are to be interpreted like the previous one.

C O M M E N T A R Y

In previous section Allãh had rebutted their demand to His Messenger (s.a.w.a.) that he should bring to them a book from the heaven; and clearly stated that the Messenger has come with truth from his Lord, and the Book which he has brought from Him was a convincing proof in which there was no doubt. Consequently, it was perfectly right to call in this section all the people to believe in the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and the Book brought by him.

It was also described that all His messengers and prophets, including ʻĪsã (a.s.), were sent on one pattern, with similar framework and comparable religion; and that was the pattern of revelation from Allãh. It was but natural that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) should call the Christians (being the People of the Book and revelation) not to exceed the limit in their religion; rather they should join hands with all other monotheist believers by believing about ʻĪsã (a.s.) what they and others do believe about other prophets: that they were the servants of Allãh and messengers to His creation.

Allãh has begun this section of His speech by calling all the people to believe in His Messenger (s.a.w.a.) because the previous section had clearly described the truth of his prophethood when He has said: Surely We have revealed to you as We revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him . . .

Then He calls them not to exceed the limit concerning ʻĪsã (a.s.) because ʻĪsã's status has been described in the above verses.

Then He calls them to follow His Book, that is the Honoured Qur'ãn, because it was described clearly in the last part of the previous section: But Allãh bears witness by what He has revealed to you that He has revealed it with His knowledge . . .

QUR'ÃN: O people! Surely the Messenger has come to you with the truth from your Lord, therefore believe, (it shall be) good for you : It is addressed to all the people, be they the People of the Book, or others, and it branches out from the previous speech addressed to the People of the Book. Now, the talk is addressed to the whole mankind because the Prophet's messengership was all-encompassing and the belief in the Messenger was incumbent for all.

The phrase, khayran lakum (خَيْرًا لَّكُمْ = translated here as: [it shall be] good for you) is grammatically the circumstantial clause of the verb 'believe'. It is a concomitant condition and would literally means: believe as it is inseparable virtue of belief that it is good for you.

QUR'ÃN: and if you disbelieve, then surely whatever is in the heavens and the earth is Allãh's; and Allãh is Knowing, Wise : If you disbelieve, that disbelief will not increase anything to you nor decrease anything from Allãh. Everything that is in the heavens and the earth belongs to Allãh. It is impossible for anyone to take away anything from Allãh because it exclusively belongs to Him. All that is in the heavens and the earth is by nature a property of Allãh who has no partner or colleague. To say that a thing exists, is exactly the same as saying that it belongs to Allãh. How can a thing be removed from Allãh's Ownership as long as it existș

This verse is a comprehensive and all-encompassing speech; the deeper you contemplate it, the finer the points come before your eyes; and a comprehensive and wonderous vists appears before you. When you will look at the comprehensive Ownership of Allãh which covers the things and their effects, you will find out wonderful connotations of belief and disbelief, obedience and disobedience. It will do you good to ponder on it more and more.

QUR'ÃN: O People of the Book! do not exceed the limits in your religion and do not speak about Allãh except the truth; . . . : Apparently, it is addressed to the Christians because it describes the affairs of the Messiah (a.s.). They have been addressed with the words "People of the Book" which is a common adjective covering Jews and Christians both. But it was preferred because their being among the People of Book demands that they should not exceed the limit of what Allãh has revealed and explained in His Books, and one of the things described therein is that they should not speak about Allãh except the truth.

Also, it could be an address to both the Jews and the Christians because the Jews too were not different from the Christians in their exceeding in religion and speaking about Allãh other than truth , as Allãh has said: And the Jews say: "`Uzayr is the son of Allãh!" (9:30). Also, He says: They have taken their scholars and their monks for Lords besides Allãh (9:31); Say: "O People of the Book! come to a word, common between us and you . . . and (that) some of us shall not take others for Lords besides Allãh (3:64).

In view of this interpretation, the words: the Messiah, 'Īsã son of Maryam is only a Messsenger of Allãh . . . narrows the talk after its generality, by addressing a particular group of the audience regarding its particular straying. However, this view does not correspond with the context: The words, "the Messiah, ‘Īsã son of Maryam is only a Messenger of Allãh . . . ", give apparently the reason for the preceding clause, "do not exceed the limits in your religion". [As the two sentences are connected together, it follows that the verse is addressed to the Christians only.] The title, "the Messiah", has been further explained with the words, "‘Īsã son of Maryam"; this explicit mention of his and his mother's names prevents the word, Messiah, to be explained or applied to some other person. Also, it proves that he was a human being, created, like any human being born of his mother. and His Word which He conveyed to Maryam: it explains the meaning of the 'word'; he was the word 'Be', which was conveyed to Maryam. His creation had not taken place through normal causes like marriage and father. Allãh says: Allãh creates what He pleases; when He has decreed a matter, He only says to it: "B" and it is (3:47). In fact, everything is the word of Allãh; however, other things come into being through the agency of normal cause, while ‘Īsã (a.s.) was born without some of the normal causes. That is why he was called "the Word". and a spirit from Him: The spirit is from the command. Allãh says: Say: "The soul is from the command of my Lord . . . " (17:85); as ‘Īsã (a.s.) was the creative word, "Be" and it is a command, therefore, he was called "the spirit". We have discussed this verse in detail in the third volume of this book.[28]

QUR’ÃN: believe therefore in Allãh and His messengers, and say not, Three. Desist, it is better for you; Allãh is only one God : It is based on the beginning clauses and springs from the words: the Messiah, ‘Īsã son of Maryam is only a Messenger of Allãh. In this situation, you are obligated to believe in the prescribed way, that is, belief in Allãh and His Lordship and His messengers (including ‘Īsã [a.s.]) and their prophethood. "and say not, Three." Desist from the belief in trinity. This desistance or this belief in Allãh and His messengers and rejection of trinity is good for you. "Three" refers to the three persons of trinity, Father, Son and Holy Ghost. We have discussed it in detail in the third chapter, "The Family of ‘Imrãn".

QUR’ÃN: far be it from His glory that He should have a son; whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His; . . . :

[28] al-Mīzãn, (Eng.), vol.6, p.12. (tr.)

Subḥãna (سُبْحَانَ = translated here as "far be it from His glory"). Grammatically, it is a cognate accusative for emphasis, with its verb, usabbiḥu (اُسَبِّحُ = I glorify) omitted but understood; "that He should have a son" is attached to that accusative case. The meaning is: I glorify Him to the utmost degree that He should have a son. This is a paranthetical clause for acknowledging the glory of Allãh. "Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His". It could be circumstantial clause or an independent sentence. Anyhow, it gives the proof why Allãh has no son. A son resembles the father in the origin of his person and existence and development of his body. When all that is in the heavens and the earth belongs to Allãh in its person and effects, and when He manages everything alone, then nothing in the universe can resemble Him. Consequently, nothing can be called "His offspring".

The connotation is that no existing thing can be called Allãh's son; as such, the words, "whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth", are an extended metaphor to show that everything other than Allãh belongs to Him. (The heavens and the earth themselves are included in this argument while they are not in the heavens or in the earth.

This verse contains imperative and prohibitive orders and gives a comprehesive guidance to their good in this world and the hereafter. That is why the speech ends with the words: and Allãh is sufficient for a Protector. He is your guardian, manages your affairs, guides you to what is good for you and calls you to the straight path.

QUR'ÃN: The Messiah does by no means disdain that he should be a servant of Allãh, nor do the angels who are near to Him : It is another argument for refutation of divinity of Messiah (a.s.), no matter whether he is supposed to be son of God or one of the three persons of God. The Messiah is a servant of Allãh and he by no means disdains worshipping Allãh; even the Christians do not deny it as the Gospels found with them explicitly say that he was worshipping Allãh; and it is unimaginable that a son who is similar to his father in origin and make-up would worship him; nor that he would worship his own self; nor for one of the three persons of trinity to worship the other two when he is equal in rank to them. We have already explained it while describing the affairs of ʻĪsã (a.s.) in the third chapter, "The Family of ʻImrãn".

The words, "nor do the angels who are near (to Him)", extend the talk to the angels because the argument exactly applies to them too, as the polytheists of Arabia used to say that they were the daughters of Allāh. The sentence is a digression from the main topic.

The verse refers to ʻĪsā (a.s.) as the Messiah and describes the angels as the near ones; and in this way alludes to the reason why they would not disdain Allāh's worship. How can ʻĪsā disdain the worship of Allāh when he is the Messiah; anointed and blessed; or the angels when they are near to Allāḥ Had there been any possibility of their disdaining Allāh's worship, Allāh would not have blessed ʻĪsā nor brought the angels nearer. By the way, Allāh has depicted Messiah too as the one near to Allāh, as He says: . . . worthy of regard in this world and the hereafter and of those who are made near (to Allāh), (3:45).

QUR'ĀN: and whoever disdains His worship and is proud, He will gather them all together to Himself. . . . : It points to the condition of the Messiah and the angels, and gives the reason why they wouldn't disdain His worship. How can they do so when they know that those who disdain His worship and are proud – be they human beings, jinn or angels – will be gathered all together to Him and will be requitted according to their deedṣ The Messiah and the angels believe in Him and fear Him and know these realities.

We have said that the words, "and whoever disdains His worship and is proud" show that the Messiah and the near angels are fully aware that the disdainers shall be gathered to Him all together. This idea is depicted by the word, "and is proud". Mere disdaining, if it is not the result of pride, does not attract Divine wrath, as happens in those who are ignorant or weak; but if the Messiah and the angels were to disdain His worship it would only be a result of pride because they know the status of their Lord. The meaning of the verse would be that they are well aware that "whoever disdains His worship and is proud . . ."

The words, "will gather them all together" encompass good servants as well as bad ones. This paves the way for the categorization coming in the next verse: Then as for those who believe and do good, He will pay them fully their rewards and give them more out of His grace; and as for those who disdain and are proud, He will chastise them with a painful chastisement.

QUR'ĀN: And they shall not find for themselves besides Allāh a guardian or a helper : The negation of guardian or helper stands face to face with their belief in Divinity of Messiah and the angels.

QUR'ÃN: O people! Surely there has come to you manifest proof from your Lord and We have sent to you clear light : ar-Rãghib has said: "al-Burhãn (اَلبُرْهَان = exposition of argument). It is on the paradigm of fu'lãn [فُعْلَان] like ar-rujḥãn [اَلرُّجْحَان]. Some people say that it is a verbal noun of baraha, yabrahu [بَرَهَ، يَبْرَهُ = it became white])." In any case, it is a verbal noun. Sometimes, it is used in the meaning of active participle, e.g., when it is used for the argument and proof itself.

The light refers to the Qur'ãn as the word "sent down to you" shows. Possibly, the "manifest proof" also means the same. Thus, the two sentences do strengthen each other.

Another possibility: The light may mean the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). This idea is strengthened when we see that the verse comes in the wake of the verses showing the truthfulness of the Prophet in his prophethood and the revelation of the Qur'ãn from Allãh; and then realize that the verse has branched from the previous verses. Also, the words of Allãh in the coming verse: and hold fast by Him, support this view, as we have explained in the chapter of "The Family of 'Imrãn" vr.101 (And whoever holds fast to Allãh, he indeed is guided to the straight path) that holding fast to Allãh means accepting His Book and following His Messenger.

QUR'ÃN: Then as for those who believe in Allãh and hold fast by Him, He will cause them to enter into His mercy and grace and guide them to Himself on a straight path : It describes the reward of those who follow the proof of their Lord and the light which has descended from Him. The verse is drawn from the preceding verse which describes the reward of those who believe and do good: Then as for those who believe and do good, He will pay them fully their rewards and give them more out of His grace; . . . (3:57). Perhaps, that is why this verse does not mention the recompense of those who shrink from following the proof and the light. As the same punishment as mentioned in the previous verse applies in this case too, there was no need to repeat it again; this verse has shown that the reward of the followers here is the same as that given to the followers in the preceding verse; and there are only two groups: the followers and the transgressors.

Accordingly, the clause in this verse, "He will cause them to enter into His mercy", goes parallel to: He will pay them fully their rewards, and it is the garden. And the word 'grace' in this verse is parallel to the clause in that verse: and give them more out of His grace. The ending clause, "and guide them to Himself on a straight path" gives the result of holding fast to Allāh (mentioned in this verse) as Allāh says: And whoever holds fast to Allāh, he indeed is guided to the straight path (3:101).

COMMENTARY

The verse explains the prescribed shares of consanguine or agnate relatives – other than the parents and the children as the explanatory traditions make clear. The shares of relatives – other than the parents and the children – described in the beginning of the chapter, were related to the uterine relatives as the prophetic traditions had explained. It may also be understood from the fact that the shares prescribed here are greater than those described in the beginning of the chapter. It is inferred from the verses that the males' share is greater than that of females.

QUR'ĀN: They ask you for a decisionof the law. Say: "Allāh gives you a decision concerning the person who has neither parents nor offspring; if a man dies (and) he has no child : In previous verses of this chapter, we have given the meaning of al-istiftā' (اَلاِسْتِفْتَاءُ = seeking decision), al-iftā' (اَلاِفْتَاءُ = giving decision) and al-kalālah (اَلْكَلَاله = a relative other than the parents and children).

"he has no child": It encompasses male and female children as is understood when the word, child, is used without any restriction. aṭ-Ṭabrisī has said in Majma'u 'l-bayān : "It means he has neither child nor parent; according to concensus, parent is omitted but understood in this verse." Moreover, if either parent were present, the verse would not have neglected prescribing his/her share. Therefore, it is understood that they are not present.

QUR'ĀN: and he has a sister, she shall have half of what he leaves and he shall be her heir if she has no child; . . . : It describes the share of the sister from her brother and share of the brother from his sister. It also implies the share of the sister from her sister and share of the brother from his brother; if there were difference in the shares of the latter two, the verse would have mentioned it clearly. "he shall be her heir", it means that if there is a brother in place of the sister, he will take the whole inheritance. but if there be two (sisters), they shall have two-thirds of what he leaves; and if there are brothers (and sisters), men and women, then the male shall have the like of the portion of two females, that is, the share of two sisters. The share of the brothers and sisters will remain the same whether the deceased was male or female.

The verse has explicitly explained the shares of one sister, one brother, two sisters and a mixed group of brothers and sisters. Other prescribed shares may be understood from the above. For example: two brothers will inherit the whole property dividing it half and half; it is known from the share of one brother who takes the whole property; likewise, if there is a brother and a sister, they will be governed by the clause, "and if there are brothers (and sisters), men and women, then the male shall have the like of the portions of two females". Moreover, the traditions have clearly explained it.

The above shares will apply when there are only agnate or only consanguine relatives. However, if both types of relatives gather together, for example: a consanguine sister with an agnate sister, the agnate will get nothing, as we have discussed it under the verses in the beginning of the chapter.

QUR'ÃN: Allãh makes clear to you, lest you err; . . . : The literal translationof the end clause will be: that you err; but it implies "lest you err"; such usage is found in every language. 'Amr ibn Kulthūm has said, "We made haste in your entertainment that you abuse us", that is, lest you abuse us.

T R A D I T I O N S

Jãbir ibn 'Abdillãh al-Anṣãrī said, "I was sick and I had nine – or seven – sisters. The Prophet came to me and blowed at my face and I became conscious. Then I said, 'O Messenger of Allãh! should not I bequeath two-third to my sisterṣ' He said, 'Good." I said, 'A part of iṭ' He said, 'Good.' Then he went out and left me. Again he returned to me and said, 'O Jãbir! I do not see you dying from this illness of yours and surely Allãh has sent down regarding the share of your sisters and has prescribed for them two-third.'" They said, "Jãbir used to say, 'This verse was revealed for me.'" (Majma'u 'l-bayãn)

The author says: A tradition is narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr which is near to this in meaning.

Ibn Abī Shaybah, al-Bukhãrī, Muslim, at-Tirmidhī, an-Nasã'ī, Ibn Ḍarīs, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and al-Bayhaqī (in his ad-Dalãil) have narrated from al-Barã' that he said, "The last complete sūrah to be revealed is 'Barã'ah' [or 'at-Tawbah', ch.9] and the last verse to be revealed is the end of the chapter, 'The Women': They ask you for a decision of the law, Say: 'Allãh gives you a decision concerning the person who has neither parents nor offspring . . .'" . (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: The same book narrates various traditions that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and the companions used to call it 'the verse of the summer'. aṭ-Ṭabrisī says in Majma'u 'l-bayãn : "It was because Allãh had revealed two verses about al-kalãlah; one in the winter; and it is the one which is placed in the beginning of this chapter and the other in the summer, and it is this verse."

Abu 'sh-Shaykh has narrated in al-Farãiḍ from al-Barã' that he said, "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was asked (the meaning of) al-kalãlah. He said, '(Relatives) other than the child and parent.'" (ibid.)

al-Qummī says, "Narrated to me my father from Ibn Abī ʻUmayr from Ibn Udhaynah from Bukayr from Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) that he said, 'When a man dies and he has a sister, she will get half of what he has left in inheritance by virtue of this verse (as will take a daughter if she is alone) and the remaining half will be returned to her by virtue of kinship when the deceased doesn't have any heir nearer than her. If there is a brother in place ofthe sister, he will take the whole inheritance by authority of the words of Allãh: and he shall be her heir if she has no child. If there are two sisters, they will take two-third by virtue of this verse and the remaining one-third will be theirs by kinship. If there are brothers and sisters (men and women) the males shall have the lie of the portion of two females. All this is when the deceased has no child or parent or wife.'" (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: al-`Ayyãshī has narrated in his Tafsīr the last part of this tradition in several aḥãdīth from Abū Jaʻfar and Abū ʻAbdillãh (a.s.).

There is a tradition narrated from Bukayr that he said, "A man came to Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) and asked him about a woman who (died and) left a husband and uterine brothers and an agnate sister. He said, 'The husband will have a half, three [out of six] portions and the uterine brothers one-third, two portions, and agnate sister one portion.' The man said, 'O Abū Jaʻfar! the computation of Zayd and Ibn Masʻūd and the system of inheritance of the general Muslims and the *qãḍī*s is different from it. They say the consanguine sister will take three portions from six and the six portions will change to eight.' Abū Jaʻfar said, 'Why do they say thiṣ' He said, 'Because Allãh has said: he has no child and he has a sister, she shall have half of what he leaves.' Then Abū Jaʻfar (a.s.) said, 'Then why did you reduce (the share of) the brother if you are arguing through Allãh's commandmenṭ Because Allãh has prescribed for her the half and He has prescribed for the brother the whole, and the whole is bigger than the half. He [Allãh] has said: she shall have half, as He has said about the brother: he shall be her heir, that is, the whole estate: if she has no child; so sometimes in your computations you do not give anything to him whom Allãh has given the whole and you give her whom Allãh has prescribed the half, the whole estate!'" (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshī)

ʻAbdu 'r-Razzãq, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, al-Ḥãkim and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Ibn ʻAbbãs that he was asked about a man who died leaving his daughter and a consanguine sister. He said, "The daughter will have the half and the sister gets nothing and the residue is for his agnates (paternal relations)." He was told, "Verily ʻUmar had prescribed the (remaining) half for the sister." Ibn ʻAbbãs said, "Are you more knoledgeable or Allãḥ Allãh says: If a man dies (and) he has no child and he has a sister, she shall have half of what he leaves, but you people say she will have a half even if he has a child!" (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: There are other traditions on the above themes.

GENERAL COMMENT

If we meditate on the beginning and end of this chapter and ponder on the general verses which have been revealed in it and look at the admonitions and the stories which it contains, we will find that the general theme of the chapter is to call the people to fulfil the covenants and to uphold the valid agreements whatever they might be. It warns against breach of agreement and cautions those who take the covenants lightly. It shows that Allãh has made it His habit to deal with mercy and lighten the burden of those who guard themselves against evil and belief, and then again guard themselves against evil and do good work. On the contrary, He deals harshly with those who commit outrage, exceed the limit and overstep the bounds by throwing away the collar of obedience and going out of the boundary of covenants which have been made in the religion.

That is why you will see that the chapter contains many laws concerning legal punishment and retribution; there are stories of the dinner table, of questioning of the Messiah and of the incident of the two sons of Adam; it also points to a lot of injustices of the Israelites and how they broke the covenants which were taken from them; also there are many verses in which Allãh describes His Grace on the people in various matters like perfecting the religion, completing His favour, making the good things lawful to man and legislating the ways of purification without putting the people into any difficulty and hardship.

This was in confirmity with the time when the chapter was revealed. All reporters agree that it was the last detailed chapter which was revealed to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) nearing the end of his life. It has come in both sects' traditions that it is the abrogating chapter, not the abrogated; and it was proper in this background to emphasize the admonition to fulfil and safeguard the agreements which Allãh has taken from His servants, and to remain firm on it.

C O M M E N T A R Y

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! fulfil the covenants : al-'Uqūd (اَلْعُقُودْ) is plural of al-'aqd (اَلْعَقْدْ), and it means to tie two things together in such a way that it becomes very difficult to separate one from the other. For example, tying a rope or thread with a similar rope or thread. Obviously, both adhere to each other and remain tied. First, this word was used for such phenomenon which could be perceived by the senses; then it was used metaphorically for abstract things like the offer and acceptance in trade or employment, etc. It covers all the covenants and agreements. All these things are called 'al-'aqd' because the effect of the 'tying' is present there, that is, adherence to each other.

al-'Aqd, that is covenant, is used for all the religious covenants which Allãh has taken from His servants, like monotheism and all the fundamental cognition and perception, the acts of worship and the laws which were laid down anew or were allowed to continue from previous times, including the proposal and acceptance in trade, etc. The verse contains the word al-'uqūd which is plural of al-'aqd having al (ال) which signifies comprehensiveness; therefore, this word in this verse encompasses all which could be called 'aqd (عَقْد = tie, covenant).

The above explanation shows the weakness of what various exegetes have written in its interpretation. Some have said that the covenants refers to those agreements or contracts which people make one with another, like trade deal, marriage and promise or which man binds himself with like oath.

Likewise, some others have said that it refers to those agreements which the people of the time of ignorance had contracted with one another that they will help and support each other against those who would proceed against them with evil intention or transgress against them. It means the pact or treaty which was common in those days.

Similarly, some others have said that it refers to the covenants taken from the People of the Book that they would follow what was written in the Torah and the Gospel. All these interpretations are without any support from the wording of the verse. Moreover, as we have said that a plural joined with 'al' and the common usage of the word al-'aqd for every type of covenant, renders all such expalantions inappropriate. Therefore, the word should be taken in its comprehensive and general meaning.

A DISCOURSE ON THE MEANING OF AL-'AQD

The Qur'ãn manifestly orders man to honour the covenants as is clear from the Divine words, "fulfil the covenants". Apparently, the order is general and covers all affairs which could be called a covenant, fulfilling which is necessary. al-'Aqd is every deed or word which is analogous to the literal tying – a sort of connecting one thing with another in such a way that they become inseparable; the tie of trade deal which attaches the merchandise to the buyer giving it into his ownership with full authority to do with it whatever he likes, and the seller after that deal loses the right of ownership and management of the merchandise; or like the 'aqd of marriage which binds the woman with the man giving him the right to establish sexual relations with her and the woman has no right to allow another man to touch her for this purpose; or like an agreement in which one man binds himself to do for the other party the work agreed upon and he has no right to dishonour that agreement.

The Qur'ãn has emphatically exhorted the people to fulfil the covenant and agreement (with all its meanings and applications), and has put utmost emphasis on it. It has condemned those who break the agreements and threatened them very severely; it has praised those who fulfil their covenants when they make it; there are a lot of verses of this connotation, which need not be quoted here.

The said verses have referred to the covenants without defining them in so many words; it shows that the meaning of covenant was understood by the people with their natural wisdom. It is so, because covenant and its fulfilment are the things which man cannot do without in his life; this essentiality of fulfilment of covenant effects individuals and societies both. If we ponder upon human beings' social life, we will find that all the privileges which we enjoy and all the rights which we take for granted are based on general social covenant and the resulting agreements which spring from it. All the duties towards the society which we feel ourselves bound to fulfil and all the rights which we think we have over the society are based on a practical covenant (even if we have not put it into words). If a man were to break an agreement which he had made with his own free will – merely because now he has power or authority or strength to break it – the first victim would be the social justice, while this justice is the first principle on which man relies for freeing himself from exploitation and servitude.

That is why Allãh has highly emphasized the importance of fulfilling the covenant. He says: And fulfil the promise; verily promise shall be questioned about (17:34). This verse covers individual agreements a man makes with another person (like most of the verses which praise fulfilling the agreement and condemn its breach) as well as collective agreements like the ones made between two nations or two people; rather fulfilling inter-communal agreements is more important in the eyes of religion than the individual ones, because it has more effect in completing the justice; and the disadvantages of their breach will be more pronounced.

We find that the Divine Book forbids very clearly breaking a covenant even in such a place and in such circumstances where it would have been very easy to break it. Allāh says: (This is a) renouncement by Allāh and His Messenger towards those of the idolators with whom you made an agreement. So move about in the land for four months and know that you cannot weaken Allāh and that Allāh will bring disgrace to the unbelievers. An announcement from Allāh and His Messenger to the people on the day of the great pilgrimage that Allāh and His Messenger are free from all responsibilities towards the idolators; therefore if you repent, it will be better for you, and if you turn back, then know that you will not weaken Allāh; and announce painful punishment to those who disbelieve. Except those of the idolaters with whom you made an agreement, then they have not fauled you in anthing and and have not backed up any one against you, so fulfil their agreement to the end of their term; surely Allāh loves those who are careful (of their duty). So when the sacred months have passed away, then slay the idolaters wherever you find them (9:1-5). The verses, as the context shows, were revealed after the conquest of Mecca when Allāh had humiliated the idolaters, destroyed their power and crushed their valour. These verses obliged the Muslims to cleanse the land which they had conquered from the impurity of polytheism, and encouraged them to spill the blood of the polytheists without any restriction or condition, except if they come into the fold of Islam. In spite of that, the same verses make exception for those polytheists with whom the Muslims had a valid agreement of non-aggression; the verses do not allow the Muslims to attack them even when they have weakened and lost their power, even when they have no way of defending or protecting themselves. All this was done to uphold the sanctity of the agreement and out of regard for piety.

Of course, if somebody breaks a covenant after its confirmation, he shall be requitted exactly as he had done. Allāh says: How can there be an agreement for the idolaters with Allāh and with His Messenger; except those with whom you made an agreement at the Sacred Mosque? So long as they are true to you, be true to them; surely Allāh loves those who are careful (of their duty) . . . They do not pay regard to ties of relationship nor those of covenant in the case of a believer; and these are they who go beyond the limits. But if they repent and keep up prayer and pay zakãt they are your brethren in faith; and We make the communications clear for a people who know. And if they break their oaths after their agreement and revile your religion, then fight the leaders of unbelief – surely their oaths are nothing – so that they may desist (9:7-12). Also He says: . . . whoever then acts aggressively against you, inflict the like aggression on him as he has inflicted on you; and fear Allãh . . . (2:194); again He says: . . . and let not hatred of a people – because they hindered you from the Sacred Mosque – incite you to exceed the limits. And help one another in righteousness and piety, and do not help one another in sin and aggression; and fear Allãh . . . (5:2).

In short, Islam believes in sanctity of covenant and obliges man to fulfil it without reservation; it makes no difference whether the said man benefits from that covenant or is harmed by it once the pact has been made. After all, consideration of the social justice is more compulsory and obligatory than the consideration of a private or personal benefit. Of course, if one of the parties breaks his agreement, then the other party can break it to the same extent and act aggressively against him to the same degree. This principle liberates the society from servitude and exploitation; after all the main purpose of religionis to erase the arrogance of the powerful.

By my life! this is one of the lofty teachings brought by Islam for the gudiance of the people, that they should pay attention to the human nature and preserve the social justice on which the human society is based; and that they should remove the injustice of subjugation and exploitation. The Mighty Book has made it clear and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) proceeded on the same path throughout his noble life. The discourse is related to the Qur'ãn, otherwise, we would have written for you some of his stories. If you want to know in detail, you should study his biographies.

Compare how Islam had preserved the sanctity of covenant with the behaviour of civilized and less civilized nations nowadays – especially what we see and hear everyday concerning the dealings of the powerful nations with the weaker ones in their agreements and pacts, and how they fulfilthe agreements so long as it is beneficial to them or supports their national interests and break them unhesitatingly when it goes against their interest, offering for it lame excuses – then you will see the difference between the two systems and realize who pays regard to the truth and serves the reality.

That is more appropriate for the religion and this suits these people's selfish behaviour. We find two types of logic here: one says that the truth and reality must be preserved with all possible means as only in this way the society will prosper; and the other says that the national interest must be protected by any possible means even if it crushes the truth and reality. The first is the logic of religion; and the second, the logic of all other societies, be they barbaric or civilized, be they dictatorial, democratic or communist, etc.

You must have understood from the above that Islam in its determination concerning agreement and pact is not restricted to the legal agreements only; its decree encompasses all those things on which an edifice is built be it explicit or implicit; Islam admonishes the Muslims to pay full attention to it. There are some other points concerning this theme which you will come across as you read on, God willing.

QUR'ĀN: The cattle quadrupeds are made lawful to you except that which is recited to you : al-Iḥlāl (اَلْاِحْلَالُ = to make lawful); al-bahīmah (اَلْبَهِيْمَةُ = quadruped from terrestrial and marine animals), as has been explained in Majma'u 'l-bayān. Accordingly, the genitive construction, relating quadruped to the cattle, relates the species to its classes, as we say human species, animal genus. Some have said that al-bahīmah is the foetus of the cattle. In any case, the sentence; "the cattle quadrupeds are made lawful for you", means that eating the meat of eight pairs[29] is made lawful to you. The words, "except that which is recited to you", point to the law described later: Forbidden to you is that which dies of itself . . .

QUR'ĀN: not violating the prohibition against game when you are under pilgrimage restrictions; . . .: It is a circumstantial clause related to the second person pronoun in the word, "are made lawful for you", and it indicates that even this lawful category will become unlawful if it was hunted in the condition of iḥrām; for example, if one hunts wild deer, cow or zebra in that condition. Some people have said that the said circumstantial clause is related to the word 'fulfil'; others have said that it is related to the second person pronoun in the words: except that which is recited to you. aṣ-Ṣayd (اَلصَّيْدُ = to hunt) is a verbal noun used here in the meaning of passive participle, that is, hunted game; al-ḥurum (اَلْحُرُم) is plural of al-ḥarām (اَلْحَرَام) giving here the meaning of active participle, that is, he who puts himself under restriction of pilgrimage.

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! do not violate the signs appointed by Allãh nor the sacred month, nor the offering, nor the symbolic garlands, nor those going to the Sacred House seeking the grace and pleasure from their Lord : The believers are addressed again in this verse to indicate importance of maintaining the respect of the things sanctified by Allãh. It was explained earlier that al-iḥlãl means to make lawful; as this idea is closely connected to indifference towards respect or honour of the thing made lawful, therefore, it is metaphorically used here in the sense of violating. Its specific meaning will be decided in the contexts of the second construct of the genetive; the signs and symbols appointed by Allãh are violated if one does not pay respect to them or neglects them, a sacred month is violated if one begins fighting in it, and so on.

ash-Sha'ãir (اَلشَّعَائِر) is plural of ash-sha'īrah (اَلشَّعِيْرَة = sign). Probably here it refers to the guide posts of ḥajj and its rites. The sacred months are those lunar months in which fighting has been prohibited by Allãh; they are al-Muḥarram, Rajab, Dhi 'l-qi'dah and Dhi 'l-ḥijjah. al-Hady (اَلْهَدْى) refers to goat, sheep, cow and camels that are taken to the pilgrimage. al-Qalãid (اَلْقَلاَئِد) is plural of al-qalãdah (اَلْقَلاَدَة); it refers to the garland of shoes, etc. which is put in the neck of a sacrificial animal to show that it is meant for sacrifice, in order that nobody should appropriate it. al-Ãmmīn (اَلاٰمِّيْن) is plural of al-ãmm (اَلاٰمّ) which is the active participle of amm (اَمَّ = he headed to); here it refers to those who are on their way to the pilgrimage of the Sacred House "Seeking the grace" is the circumstantial clause to "those going"; al-faḍl (اَلْفَضْل = grace) refers to property or material profit. The same is the connotation of the Divine words: So they returned with favour from Allãh and (His) grace; no evil touched them (3:174); there are other verses too of the same meaning; also it may mean the reward of hereafter; or it may have a meaning encompassing the both senses. The exegetes have given several other meanings of the words used here like ash-sha'ãir and al-qalãid; what we have mentioned is more appropriate in the context, and no purpose will be served by mentioning other interpretations.

QUR'ÃN: And when you are free from (the restrictions of) the pilgrimage, then (you may) hunt : When an imperative comes after prohibition, it only indicates that now the thing or action is allowed and the prohibition is lifted. al-Ḥall and al-iḥlãl (اَلْحَلُّ ، اَلْاِحْلَالُ) give the same meaning, that is, becoming free from the restrictions of iḥrãm.

QUR'ÃN: and let not the hatred of a people – because they hindered you from the Sacred Mosque – incite you to exceed the limits : Jarama (جَرَمَ) means 'he carried it', 'he bore it'; that is why disobedience and sin is called al-jarīmah (اَلْجَرِيْمَة) because the culprit bears its responsibility; this word is also used for monetary fine because it is borne by the culprit. ar-Rãghib says that its real meaning is 'to cut'. ash-Shan'ãn (اَلشَّنْأَن = hatred, enmity); an ṣaddūkum (اَنْ صَدُّوْكُمْ = because they prevented you); it is an explicative apposition or appositional substitute for 'hatred'; the meaning: and let not hatred of a people they hindered you from the Sacred Mosque – incite you to exceed the limits when you have vanquished them.

QUR'ÃN: And help one another in righteousness and piety, and do not help one another in sin and aggression; and fear Allãh; . . . : The meaning is clear. This is the foundation of Islamic culture and ethics. Allãh has explained righteousness in His Book as belief and doing good in the acts of worship and in mutual dealings, as we have explained under the Divine words: . . . but righteousness is the one who believes in Allãh and the Last Day . . . (2:177). at-Taqwã (اَلتَّقْوي = to be on one's guard regarding orders and prohibitions of Allãh). To cooperate with one another in righteousness and piety means to join together in true faith and good deeds on the basis of the fear of Allãh; it is the collective good and piety. Its opposite is cooperating with one another in sin and aggression; sin is the evil action which brings regression in a blissful life; aggression is usurping peoples' genuine rights, giving rise to a feeling of insecurity for their lives, honour or property. We have explained this topic under the Divine words: O you who believe! be patient and help each other in patience and remain lined up; and fear (the wrath of) Allãh, that you may be successful, (3:200), in the fourth volume of this book[30].

Then Allãh has emphasized the prohibition of joining together in sin and aggression by saying: and fear Allãh; surely Allãh is severe in punishment. Actually, it is an emphasis over emphasis.

[30] al-Mīzãn, (Eng.), vol.7, pp.143-202. (tr.)

QUR'ÃN: Forbidden to you is that which dies of itself, and blood, and flesh of swine, and that on which any other name than that of Allãh has been invoked: These four were prohibited in the revelations sent long before this chapter. See , for example, in the chapters of "The Cattle" and "The Bee", both of which were revealed in Mecca and in the chapter of "The Cow" which was the first detailed chapter revealed in Medina. Allãh has said: Say: "I do not find, in that which has been revealed to me, anything forbidden for an eater to eat of except that it be what has died of itself, or blood poured forth, or flesh of swine – for that surely is unclean – or that which is a transgression, other than (the name of) Allãh having been invoked on it; but whoever is forced (to it), not revolting nor exceeding the limit, then surely your Lord is Forgiving, Merciful" (6:145); and He has said: He has only forbidden to you what dies of itself, and blood, and flesh of swine, and that over which any other (name) than (that of) Allãh has been invoked; but whoever is forced (to it), not revolting, nor exceeding the limit, no sin shall be upon him; surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful (2:173).

As you see, all these verses forbid the four things mentioned in the beginning of this verse and the exception too is similar to this verse where it says: but whoever is compelled by hunger, not inclining wilfully to sin, then surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful. So, this verse's only purpose is to emphasize the previously and repeatedly revealed prohibition of the four items. In fact, this prohibition and especially of the first three items, (that which dies of itself, blood and flesh of swine) was promulgated long before the revelation of the chapters of "The Cattle" and "The Bee" (of Meccan period) because the verse of the chapter of "The Cattle" explains the reason of prohibition that "it is unclean"; it shows that eating unclean things was forbidden; and Allãh says in the ch.74: And uncleanness do shun [vr.5]. This chapter was revealed in the early Meccan period. [It was the second chapter revealed.]

And the strangled (animal) and that beaten to death, and that killed by a fall and that killed by being smitten with the horn, and that which wild beasts have eaten.: Actually it is not a new legislation, because all these come under "that which dies of itself", (as may be understood from the exception, except what you slaughter); yet they have been mentioned separately to describe various types of dead animals.

Likewise, the words of Allãh, and that is sacrificed on stones set up (for idols) and that you divide by arrows; that is a transgression, forbid these two items for the first time in this chapter, but Allãh has given the reason of their prohibition (or that of the second item) that it is a transgression, and He had before that prohibited transgression in the verse of the chapter of "The Cattle". Also, the following words: not inclining wilfully to sin, show that the things mentioned here have been forbidden because they are sins; and many verses revealed before it say that sin is prohibited. For example, the verse 173 of the chapter "The Cow", says: but whoever is forced (to it), not revolting, nor exceeding the limit, no sin shall be upon him. Also, He says: And abandon open and secret sin (6:120); Say: "My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed,and sin . . ." (7:33)

Now, it is clear that the verse with this list of forbidden items has not promulgated any new order which was not given in previously revealed verses of the Meccan or early Medinite period which had listed the forbidden meats.

QUR'ÃN: and the strangled (animal) and that beaten to death, and that killed by a fall and that killed by being smitten with the horn, and that which wild beasts have eaten, except what you slaughter : al-Munkhaniqah (اَلْمُنْخَنِقَة) is the cattle which dies as a result of strangulation. It makes no difference whether it was accidental or intentional; also, the instrument of strangulation has no effect on this ruling; may be a rope was tied around its neck and becoming tight, it clocked breathing or its neck was pressed between two rods; this and similar methods were common in the days of ignorance. al-Mawqūdhah (اَلْمَوْقُوْذَةُ) is an animal which is beaten until it dies. al-Mutaraddiya (اَلْمُتَرَدِّيَةُ) is an animal which falls from a high place like a mountaintop or well, and so on. an-Naṭīḥah (اَلنَّطِيْحَةُ) is an animal which dies as a result of being gored with horns or tusks of another animal. "and that which wild beasts have eaten", that is, a beast of prey has eaten some of its flesh resulting in its death. A beast of prey indicates carnivorous animals like lion, wolf, tiger, etc.

"except what you slaughter", this exception applies to all the five groups mentioned before that. If any of these animals shows some signs of life like breathing or twitching of its tail, etc., and it is at once slaughtered according to the rules of the sharī'ah (i.e., its four jugular veins are cut), then it is allowed to be eaten. As mentioned just now, the exception covers all five groups and not only the last one. The five groups are included in the term al-maytah (اَلْمَيْتَةُ = that which dies by itself). Animals killed by a fall or gored by another animal with horns are forbidden when they die as a result of that fall or those wounds. It may be understood from the exception "except what you slaughter". Obviously, they will not be eaten when they are alive; but when the soul goes out then they can be eaten. Now, either they were slaughtered according to sharī'ah or not; and Allãh has excepted the slaughter. Therefore, they will only be unlawful when they die as the result of the fall or the said wound without being slaughtered. If a goat, for example, falls into a well and is taken out alive and uninjured and then after a short or long time it dies by itself or is slaughtered then it will not be called an animal that was killed by a fall. The context shows that only such animals are forbidden which are killed ordie because of the causes mentioned in the verse.

These groups of dead animals have been singled out here to remove any possible misunderstanding that probably they were not included in the word, al-maytah because they are not common types. Therefore, Allãh mentioned these rare types with their names in order that there should be no confusion and the prohibitionremains clear.

QUR'ÃN: and what is sacrificied on stones set up (for idols): ar-Rãghib says in Mufradãtu 'l-Qur'ãn : "an-Naṣb (اَلنَّصْبُ) of a thing means setting it down in a projecting position like setting a spear or stone; an-naṣīb (اَلنَّصِيْبُ) a stone which is set on something in a projecting manner. Its plural is an-naṣãib (اَلنَّصَآئبُ) and an-nuṣub (اَلنُّصُبُ)." [This latter is used in this verse.] The Arabs had various stones which they worshipped and on which they slaughtered sacrifices. Allãh says: . . . as if they were hastening unto a signpost (70:43); and He has said, "and what is sacrificed on stones set up (for idols)"; also its plural comes as al-anṣãb (اَلْأَنْصَابُ). Allãh says: . . . (dedication of) stones (i.e., idols) and (divination by) arrows . . . (5:90). an-Nuṣb and an-naṣb (اَلنَّصْبُ ، اَلنُّصْبُ) = trouble, exertion.

The verse forbids eating the flesh of an animal slaughtered on stone; in this way, it prohibits adoption of the customs of the days of ignorance. They had set up around the Ka'bah stones which they venerated and over which they offered sacrifices. It was a custom of idolatory.

QUR'ÃN: and that you divide by arrows; . . . : al-Azlãm (اَلْأَزْلَامُ = arrows without head). The division by arrows was done in this way: A camel or another animal was taken and its shares divided; then, the arrows were used to identify the one who would get a share and the one who would not have any; also, the number of shares a man would get was decided by the same arrows. It was a clear gambling and we have given the details under the verse: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance . . . (2:219) in vol.2 of this book[31].

ar-Rãghib says: "al-Qism (اَلْقِسْمُ = setting apart the shares). It is said: I divided such and such thing in parts; division of inheritance or war-booty means dividing them to the rightful persons. Allãh says: . . . for each gate there shall be a separate party of them (15:44); And inform them that the water is shared between them (54:28). Istaqsamtuhu (إِسْتَقْسَمْتُهُ = I asked him to divide); also, sometimes it is used in the meaning of division itself, as Allãh says: and that you divide by arrows."

COMMENT: To say that istaqsamah is used here for division is correct in practical application, but the literal meaning still remains the same, that is, to want to divide through arrows, which were used as tools of this game; using the tools is in itself a demand for getting the intended result. Therefore, using the arrow is in itself asking for the division. However, the verse, as the context shows, forbids using the arrows for the camels, etc. to get an apportioned share of the meat.

Some people have said that this phrase forbids using the arrows for divination to find out the good or bad of a course of action and to distinguish a beneficial deed from the harmful one, as for example, when someone wants to go on a journey or to marry or to begin a new work, etc., and uses the arrows to find out whether it is beneficial for him or not. They said that it was a well established custom among the Arabs in the days of ignorance; it was a sort of forcastingwith omens and its details will come in the coming traditions.

COMMENT: The context does not allow the use of this phrase for this meaning. The verse describes and counts the prohibited items of food and has pointed to this in the beginning when it said: The cattle quardrupeds are made lawful for you except that which is recited to you; then it goes on giving the list of ten forbidden food items: that which dies of itself, blood, flesh of swine, an animal on which any other name than that of Allãh is invoked, the strangled one, the one beaten to death, or killed by fall, or as a result of being smitten with the horn, or that which wild beasts have eaten and what is sacrificed on stones set up for idols; then it mentions al-istiqsãm bi 'l-azlãm (اَلْاِسْتِقْسَامُ بِالْاَزْلَامِ) which can be used in two meanings: i) Dividing meat by gambling, and ii) Divination of goodor evil in the future. How can any one think, after this clear context and the repeated associations, that this phrase in this verse does not denote dividing the meat through arrows Can anyone who knows the styles of speech entertain any doubt about its meaning?

Let us look at another similar example, al-'umrah (اَلْعُمْرَةُ) is a verbal noun which denotes construction, and it has another meaning, that is, pilgrimage of the Sacred House. If this word is used in realtion to a house, both meanings can be applied; but when it comes to the Divine words: And complete the ḥajj (pilgrimage) and 'umrah for Allãh (2:196), then only the second meaning can be applied. There are many such example.

The indicative in, that is a transgression, may be pointing to the whole list, or to the last two items described after the words, except what you slaughter (because the exception has separated the two groups), or to the last item. Probably, the middle view is the best of all.

QUR'ÃN: This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion, so fear them not, and fear Me : The positioning of this speech in midst of this verse and then its connotation are all amazing. If you ponder on the beginning of this verse, that is: Forbidden to you is that which dies of itself, and blood . . . that is a transgression and then join to it the end part, but whoever is compelled by hunger, not inclining wilfully to sin, then surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful, you will see that it is a complete sentence and does not depend for completion of its meaning and explanationof its theme to this part of the verse at all. If you take out these sentences, then the remaining part will perfectly correspond with previously revealed verses in the chapters, "The Cattle", "The Bee" and "The Cow", which give the list of the forbidden food items. The verse in the chapter of "The Cow" says: He has only forbidden to you what dies of itself, and blood, and flesh of swine, and that over which any other (name) than (that of) Allãh has been invoked; but whoever is forced (to it), not revolting, nor exceeding the limit, no sin shall be upon him; surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful (2:173). Similar wordings are found in the chapters of "The Cattle" and "The Bee".

It is clear that the Divine words, "This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion, . . .", is a paranthetical speech placed in the midst of this verse, yet the main verse does not depend on it for its exposition or explanation. We may say that this speech was actually revealed in the middle of this verse separating the preceding part from the following one; or that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) himself ordered the sribes to put this speech in this place even though it had no connotation with this verse, and was not even revealed at the same time; or that the compilers put it in this place at the time of compilation although both the parts were revealed at totally different times. None of these probabilities can affect the view we have just mentioned that it is a paranthetical speech.

This view is strengthened by the fact that most, if not all the traditions describing the reason of its revelation – and there are a lot of such traditions – particularly talk about the words of Allãh, "This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion . . .", without hinting even once to the beginning of the verse, that is: Forbidden to you is that which dies of itself . . . This proves that the Divine words, "This day have those who disbelieve . . .", were independently revealed and have no connection with the preceding or the following verses. Thus, the present positioning of this speech in the middle of the verse will have to be attributed either to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) or to the compilers of the Qur'ãn after him.

A tradition in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr somewhat supports this view. It is narrated from ʻAbd ibn Ḥamīd from ash-Shaʻbī that he said, "The verse: This day I have perfected for you your religion . . . , was revealed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) while he was in ʻArafãt; and when any verses much pleased him, he used to put them in the beginning of the chapter." He also said, "And Jibrīl used to teach him how to do it."

The two sentences, that is: This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion . . . , and: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . , have identical themes and no one can have any doubt that the meaning of both are connected with each other. There is very close connection between the despairing of the disbelievers from the Muslims' religion and the perfection of the Muslims' religion; both connotations are joined together in a single theme, both sentences are interconnected and their sides are combined with one another. Add to it the singularity of context in these two sentences.

Further support of this view can be found in the convention of the ancient and modern exegetes – right from the companions of the Prophet and their followers to our contemporaries in these days. All of them take the two sentences jointly as if one completes the other. This unanimous way of explanation shows that all of them believed that these two sentences were revealed together and both of them jointly describe one meaning.

It appears from the above that this paranthetical verse: This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion . . . , and: chosen for you Islam as a religion, is a single speech and its parts are interconnected and the whole speech leads to a single theme which is reflected in the two sentences jointly. It makes not difference whether we say that this speech is connected with the preceding and following sentences or not. The two sentences will remain as one speech; they can never be treated as two talks having two separate aims. Also, it is clear that the word "this day" repeated in both sentences refers to a single day when the disbelievers were despaired and the religion was perfected.

To which day does the adverb, "this day", refer in these two sentenceș

1. Does it refer to the time when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was commanded to call the people to Islam? Does it mean that Allãh sent to you the Islam, perfected the religion for you, and completed His favours on you and made the disbelievers despaired of your religion?

COMMENT: It cannot be. The context shows that the Muslims already had a religion which the disbelievers were eager to change or destroy altogether, while the Muslims were afraid of them cncerning their religion, but Allãh deprived the disbelievers of their nefarious goal and made Muslims secure and safe; that religion was imperfect and Allãh made it perfect on that day and completed His favours on them. But the Muslims had no religion of their own before the advent of Islam, so, where was the question of the disbelievers having some hope of destroying that religion or of Allãh perfecting it and completing His favours on them? Moreover, if that interpretation is taken seriously, then the sentence: This day have I perfected for you your religion . . . , should have preceded the sentences: This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion . . . Only in this way, could literary perfection be achieved.

2. Or does "this day" refer to the era after the conquest of Mecca? Because on that day, Allãh had nullified the intriques of the Qurayshite polytheists and destroyed their power; their religion was uprooted and their idols shattered; in this way, they had lost all hope of standing on their feet to prevent the spread of Islam and to fight against it.

COMMENT: This too cannot be. The verse announces that on the day under discussion the religion was perfected and the Divine favours completed; but the religion was yet incomplete in the year 8 AH when Mecca was conquered; there were many obligatory laws promulgated and many permissions and prohibitions laid down between the conquest of Mecca and the death of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

Apart from that, "those who disbelieve" covers all the idolaters of Arabia and not all of them and despaired of the Muslims' religion. There were many covenants still valid which obligated the Muslims and many disbelieving tribes not to stand against each other; they still performed the ḥajj of jāhiliyyah according to the custom of the idolaters; their women still performed ḥajj completely naked. This had continued until the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) sent ʻAlī (a.s.) with the verses of the chapter of the "Repentance" and thus the remnants of the customs of the days of Ignorance were erased.

3. Or does "this day" refer to the period after the revelation of the chapter of "Repentance" [end of the year 9 AH]' Because Islam had spread to almost all areas of the Arabian Peninsula; the customs of the Days of Ignorance were wiped out and the signs of polytheism obliterated. Now, the Muslims did not encounter any polytheist during the ḥajj rituals and their life was free from the shadow of disbelief; Allāh had given them peace and order (while before that they were scared and afraid), they worshipped Allāh and ascribed none to Him.

COMMENT: This too cannot be. Although the idolaters of Arabia had despaired of the Muslims' religion after the revelation of the chapter of "Repentance" when the customs of the jāhiliyyah were wiped out and polytheism had gone out of the Peninsula, yet the religion was not completed at that time. A lot of rules and regulations were revealed after that, including this chapter of "The Table" which, all agree, was revealed during the last days of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and this chapter contains a lot of laws about lawful and unlawful things, penal code and retribution.

It is now clear that the adverb "this day" cannot be taken to mean a long period which might be apparently relevant to the connotation of this verse, for example, the era of the advent of Islam, or the time after the conquest of Mecca or after the revelation of the verses of "Repentance". The only alternative is to say that "this day" refers to the particular day when this verse was revealed. Does it mean the day when Mecca was conquered or the day when the chapter of "Repentance" was revealed? The objections which we have raised against the second and the third possibilities above are enough to refute these suggestions altogether.

Or does it mean the day of ninth Dhi 'l-ḥijjah of the last pilgrimage [10 AH] as claimed by many exegetes and shown in some traditionṣ If so, then we will have to decide how the unbelievers had despaired of the Muslims' religion on that day. Does it mean that the polytheists of Quraysh had lost all hope of overpowering the Muslims' religion? But this had happened on the day Mecca was conquered in the year 8AH not on 9th Dhi 'l-ḥijjah 10 AH. Or does it refer to the despairing of the polytheists of the whole Arabia? But this had already happened at the time of the revelation of the chapter of "Repentance" in the year 9 AH. Or does it relate to the despairing of all the disbelievers – the Jews, the Christians, the fire-worshippers and otherṣ (And this all-inclusive meaning is more in keeping with the unrestricted phrase "those who disbelieve"). But those people had not yet despaired of overcoming the Muslims because Islam had not acquired any foothold or power beyond the Arabian peninsula on the day of ʻArafãt in the year 10 AH.

Looking from another angle, we should again ponder on this day (9th Dhi 'l-ḥijjah 10 AH): What importance it had which could be in keeping with the Divine words: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you.

1. It may probably be said that it means perfecting the rituals of ḥajj in the presence of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) himself there, as he practically taught them the manãsik of ḥajj and gave verbal explanations.

COMMENT: Merely teaching the manãsik of ḥajj cannot be called perfection of religion by any stretch of imagination. First of all, he had ordered them to do ḥajju 't-tamattu' and not many years had passed that it was discontinued[32]. Secondly, many important pillars of religion had been established long before that, like prayer, fast, ḥajj, zakãt, jihãd, etc. How can teaching an obligatory ritual of the religion be called perfection of that obligatory thing? And how can teaching

[32] The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) had himself performed ḥajju 'l-qiran, then came the order of ḥajju 't-tamattu`, which the Prophet ordered all Muslims to do. But `Umar was highly critical of this order and during his caliphate announced that "two *mut`ah*s were prevalent in the days of the Prophet; I declare them unlawful and shall punish those who would do them: the mut`ah of women and the ḥajju 't-tamattu` ". However, this prohibition was later ignored by the Muslims (tr.)

one obligatory part of religion be called perfection of the whole religion?

Moreover, this view cuts the connection between the first sentence (This day have those who disbelieve . . .) with the second one (This day have I perfected for you your religion . . .). And what is the revelance of despairing of the disbelievers to teaching the people ḥajju 't-tamattu' ?

2. It may be said that the perfection of the religion points to the revelation of all pending lawful and unlawful things "this day" in the chapter of "The Table"; after that there came no new ḥalāl or ḥarām. And with perfection of religion the disbelievers were overwhelmigly despaired and its signs appeared on their faces.

COMMENT: First, we have to decide who were the disbelievers described by the phrase "those who disbelieve". If it refers to the disbelievers of Arabia, then Islam had already engulfed them and there was nobody who did not publicly declare to be Muslim. So, who were the despairing disbelieverṣ

And if it is taken to refer to the non-Arab disbelievers who lived around Arabia, then we have described earlier that they had not despaired on that day of overpowering the Muslims.

Then the claim that the door of legislation was closed on the day of 'Arafāt is nonsense. There are a lot of traditions which mention revelations of rules and regulations after that day. See, for example, the verse of the summer[33] and the verses of interest. It has been narrated from 'Umar that he said inter alia in a sermon: "Among the last verses of the Qur'ān to be revealed is the verse of interest; the Messenger of Allāh died without explaining it to us. Therefore, leave whatever you feel doubtful about and go to that about which you have no doubt." Also, al-Bukhārī has narrated in his Ṣaḥīḥ from Ibn 'Abbās that he said, "The last verse revealed to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was the verse of interest." There are many similar traditions.

Nobody should try to say that these traditions are weak; therefore, the verse should have precedence over them; because the verse doesn't explicitly say which day it talks about. The day of 'Arafāt is just a possibility and for the definite identification of the day, first all other possibilities have to be discarded; and these traditions offer at least opposing views.

[33] It is the verse of al-kalālah at the end of the chapter of the "Women". (Author's note)

3. Somebody may say that the perfection of the religion points to the fact that the Sacred House had exclusively come into their hands and the polytheists were banished from it, the Muslims performed their ḥajj and there was no polytheist to mingle with them.

COMMENT: We have already said that this had happened one year before the day of ‘Arafãt. Then, why should it be restricted with the adverb "this day" in the verse: This day have I perfected fro you your religion . . . Even if we accept that this exclusive hold on the Ka‘bah was the completion of the Divine favour, it cannot be said that it was the perfection of the religion. Why should the exclusive possession of the Ka‘bah be called perfecting the religion, when religion is nothing except a collection of the beliefs and regulationṣ Religion could only be perfected if some more parts or chapters were added to it. That the environment became condusive for the implementation of the rules of religion and the snags and the hurdles were removed from practising it is not called perfecting the religion.

Moreover, the difficulty concerning the despair of the disbelievers remains in its place.

4. A writer has tried to combine the above hypotheses which we are giving here in short before commenting on it. He says that perfecting the religion means that Allãh has described these forbidden items of food in detail in order that the Muslims may follow it without being afraid of the disbelievers, because the disbelievers have despaired of the Muslims' religion and Allãh has given strength and power to the Muslims and made them victorious over the infidels.

Why did Allãh mention only the four forbidden things (that which dies of itself, blood, flesh of swine and that on which any other name than that of Allãh has been invoked) in the early days of Islam in some chapters of the Meccan period? And why did He delay giving the details of what comes within its circle which Islam does not like the Muslims to use until Mecca was conquered? It was done to promulgate the prohibition of these filthy things gradually and to show their intense undesirability. It was the same policy which was used in prohibition of liquor step, so that the Arabs should not have an aversion to Islam and should not find it intolerable; and would continue hoping that their poverty-ridden folks (who constituted the majority of the early converts to Islam) would return to their original infidelity.

This detailed description of the forbidden things was revealed after Islam gained strength and Allãh gave the Muslims wealth and power. This was after the polytheists had lost the hope that the Muslims would ever turn away from Islam, they had realized that they could not defeat the Muslims nor could they make them renounce their religion under duress. Now, the believers were in a position where they were not afraid of the disbelievers about their religion or their lives and had no need to deal with them politely.

Thus the adverb "this day" means the day of ʻArafāt in the year of the Last Pilgrimage. It was the day when this verse was revealed which describes whatever laws had remained undisclosed uptil now; through these laws Islam nullified the remnants of the abasements, evils and superstitions of the days of ignorance. This verse brought the good news to the Muslims that they have gained the upper hand over the polytheists, who were now despaired of the Muslims' religion; now the Muslims did not have any need to deal with them in soft manners or any fear of their reprisals.

Thus, Allāh informs them in this verse that the disbelievers themselves are despaired of their religion; and now that Allāh has changed their weakness to power, their apprehension to tranquility and their poverty to riches, the Muslims should not be afraid of anyone other than Allāh and should refrain and abstain from using the things forbidden in detail in this verse because in this lies the perfection of their religion.

COMMENT: This writer wanted to gather together several of the previously mentioned hypotheses in order to dispel the objections levelled against one possibility with the help of another possibility. But he became embroiled in all the perils together and in the process he corrupted the words and meaning of the verse completely.

He failed to realize that if the disbelievers' despair refer to that despair which had resulted from the victory and power of Islam, then it had happened on the day Mecca was conquered or, let us say, when the verses of the chapter of "Repentance" were pronounced. Therefore, it would not be correct to announce on the day of ʻArafāt in the year 10 AH: This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion, because they had despaired of it one or two years before. Had it been the case, the verse should have said: Those who disbelieve have already despaired of your religion (as this writer had himself used the same wording while giving his explanation). Or alternatively, it could be said: They are despaired.

Also, he seems oblivious of the fact that if this supposed gradual prohibition of various food items (for which he has mentioned the analogy of prohibition of the intoxicant) means that some food items were prohibited after some others, then you have seen that this verse does not mention any other prohibited items than the previously revealed verses of prohibition had done, that is, the verses of the chapters of "The Cow", "The Cattle" and "The Bee"; keeping in view that the strangled animals, etc., are merely the details of the dead animals.

And if he means that the previous descriptions were general and this verse gives the details, and it was done because there was a possibility of people refusing to follow the rules, then it is out of place; what was explicitly mentioned in the previous chapters, that is, "the dead animal, blood, flesh of swine and that on which any other name than that of Allãh has been invoked", were more commonly used in the society, and people should have revolted against that rule more readily than against the rule against strangled animal and that beaten to death, etc., because these situations occur very rarely. If there was any danger of opposition then the first mentioned four things should not have been prohibited so explicitly; and when they were prohibited without any fear, why should there be any hesitation in relatively unimportant examples.

Moreover, even we accept his interpretation, it could not be called perfection of religion. How can legislation of some rules be named 'religion'? And how can its promulgation and explanation be called perfection of religion? Even if we accept it, it would be perfection of a small part of religion and completion of some of the favours, rather than the whole religion and all the favours; while Allãh says: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you; here, the perfection and completion are all-encompassing without any restriction.

Moreover, Allãh had legislated a lot of rules and laws during all the preceding years. What was the speciality of this rule on this day that its legislation or explanation should be called perfection of religion and completion of grace?

Or does the perfection of religion mean that Allãh perfected it by closing the door of legislation after revealing this verse which gives the details of forbidden food items? Then what will be said about those rules which were revealed after revelation of this chapter and before the death of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.)? Rather, what will be said about all the rules which were revealed in this very chapter of "The Table" after this verse? Think over it.

Until now, we have left untouched the last clause: and chosen for you Islam as a religion, which means: This day I have chosen for you Islam as a religion. If the speech ends at describing the favours of Allāh on the Muslims by detailing the forbidden food on the day of ʻArafāt in the year 10 AH, then what will be the revelance of this clause? What special thing happened on that day that Allāh chose Islam as their religion? There was nothing most of the objections levelled against the preceding interpretations apply to this too; and there is no need to repeat them here.

Or does "This day" point to any particular day between the day of ʻArafāt and the arrival of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) at Medina when the disbelievers were despaired and the religion was perfected? But again the objections described earlier against other interpretations would be levelled against this, with the same details.

Up to here, we have discussed this verse looking at what has been or could be said about it regarding its interpretation. Now, we shall look at it in the way that is more consistent with the special style of this book.

This day have those who disbelieve despaired or your religion, so fear them not, and fear Me : Despair and disappointment is opposite of hope; and the religion was sent down gradually. In this backdrop, this sentence indicates that disbelievers in the early days of Islam had some hope regarding the Muslims' religion, expecting it to somehow die with the passage of time. This idea of theirs posed a great threat against Islam from time to time and such a situation nessecitated for the believers to be always on guard and live in fear. In this background, the words, "so fear them not" reassure the believers that Allāh would protect them from the danger which was facing them and which had caused them such a fear. Allāh says: A party of the People of the Book desire that they should lead you astray (3:69); also He says: Many of the People of the Book wish that they could turn you back into unbelievers after your faith, out of envy on their part, (even) after the truth has become manifest to them. But pardon and forgive (them) until Allāh should bring about His command. Surely Allāh has power over all things (2:109). The disbelievers were not waiting for something to happen to the Muslims except because of their religion, and they were not angry with them and their hearts were not burning against them but for one reason: The religion of Islam posed a challenge to their supremacy and was ruining their dominance. It puts hinderance against their indulging in the pleasures they were inclined to, and to which they were accustomed all their lives; it was putting a stop to their unrestricted debauchery and wanton behaviour.

What they hated was the religion, not the followers of the religion. Of course, they disliked the Muslims, but it was because of their accptance of the Divine religion. The reason why they wanted to annihilate the Muslims and destroy their society was their intention to put out the Light of Allãh; they wanted to restrengthen the pillars of polytheism which had been shaking because of the impact of Islam; They hoped against hope that they would one day turn the believers into disbelievers, as has been described in the Divine words: that they could turn you back into unbelievers; and He has said: They desire to put out the light of Allãh with their mouths, but Allãh will perfect His light, though the unbelievers may be averse. He it is who sent His Messenger with the guidance and the religion of truth, so that He may make it triumph over the religions, though the polytheists may be averse (61:8-9); Therefore call upon Allãh, being sincere to Him in relgion though averse be the unbelievers (40:14).

In short, their only plan was to cut this blessed tree from its root and demolish this lofty structure from its foundation; they tried to ensure the believers in various ways, spreading hypocrisy in their midst and creating doubts in their hearts in order to corrupting their religion.

In the beginning, they tried to weaken the determination of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and enfeeble his resolve for religious da'wah (propaganda) by offering him worldly riches and honour; as the Divine words point to it: And the chief persons of them break forth, saying: "Go and steadily adhere to your gods; this is most surely a thing sought after" (38:6). Alternatively, they tried flattery and friendly intercourse, as may be seen in the following verses: They wish that you shouldbe pliant so they (too) would be pliant (52:9); And had it not been that We had already firmly established you, you would have been near to incline to them a little (17:74); Say: "O unbelievers! I do not worship that which you worship. Nor do you worship Him Whom I worship." (109:1-3), as is understood from the traditions giving the reasons of their revelation.

The last thing, which they hoped would bring downfall to Islam, and toll the death bell of the da'wah, was the idea that Islam would certainly die with the death of its Prophet (s.a.w.a.), as he did not have a male offspring. In their eyes, the Prophet wanted to establish a kingdom in the guise of prophethood, and begin his reign in the name of Divine call and Messengership. When he died or was killed, his traces would be erased, his memory would die and his religion would be forgotten. After all, this is what generally and habitually happens with kings and despotic rulers; no matter how great a power they acquire, how much arrogance they show, their memory dies with their death, and their laws and codes which had kept the people in their bondage are buried with them in their graves. The chapter of "Abundance" refers to this ultimate hope of theirs when it says: Surely your enemy is the one who shall be without posterity (108:3), as is clear from the reason of its revelation[34].

These and similar expectations had kept their hope alive, and they believed that one day they would extinguish the light of the religion. They were under erroneous impression that this pure Divine call was merely a fiction whose falsity will become obvious in the coming days; and the passage of time will erase its tracks and finish it. But gradually, the Islam overcome all its adversaries – the false religions and their believers; the fame of Islam spread far and wide, and the religion acquired strength and power to defeat its enemies; these developments rooted out their hopes, they became despaired as they knewthat they could not spoil the determination of the Prophet, nor could they diminish his zeal; and they had found earlier that he could not be bought by wealth or honour.

Islam's strength and power engulfed them with despair and pessimism; all the endeavours for defeating the Prophet had proved furtile; yet one hope was still alive: The hope that he did not have any male offspring who could succeed him in his mission, to keep the religious da'wah alive as he was doing; so they hoped that his religion would die with him. It was self-evident that a religion, however perfect it may be in its sharī'ah and ideology, could not protect itself in the absence of a protector. Clearly, any established tradition and any religion with all its followers could not maintain its purity and freshness by itself, no matter how much its fame had spread in the world and how many people had entered into its fold. It needed

[34] It is interesting to note that even the polytheists of Arabia knew that the continuity of the religion of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) depended on his having a male offspring. They never thought that the Prophet's companions could keep his religion alive, nor did Allãh console the Prophet in this chapter that he should not worry, as there were his companions who would strengthen and develop his religion after him. Instead, Allãh gave him the good news that he would be given abundant offsprings to continue his mission. But the Muslims did not reaize this fact. (tr.) someone who could protect it from deterioration and pollution. Also, it was clear that a religion could not be obliterated or annihilated by force or coercion, threats or mischief; or torture and things like that. I could die only with the death of its protectors and those who were apointed to manage its affairs.

All this shows that the total despair of unbelievers could take place only if Allãh was to appoint someone who would stand in the place of the Prophet for protection of religion and management of its affairs, in order that he could properly lead the Muslim ummah on the right path. This was sure to bring in its wake the disappointment and despair of the disbelievers concerning the Muslims' religion. Then the enemies would realize that the religion has already developed and reached the stage where it is not dependent on the person of the Prophet alone; rather it is placed under the care of a group who are true successors of the Prophet. This would be the perfection of the religion as it would discard the transient nature and acquire continuity and eternity; and this would be the completion of the Divine favour. Let us look at the Divine words: Many of the People of the Book wish that they could turn you back into unbelievers after your faith, out of envy on their part, (even) after the truth has become manifest to them. But pardon and forgive (them) until Allãh should bring about His command. Surely Allãh has power over all things (2:109). Very probably, the words: until Allãh should bring about His command, point to this very theme.

This explanation supports what has been narrated in the traditions that the verse was revealed on the day of Ghadīr Khumm, the 18th day of Dhi 'l-ḥijjah, the year 10 AH, regarding the successorship of ʻAlī (a.s.). In this way, the two sentences will be very clearly connected with each other, and none of the objections mentioned earlier could be levelled against this explanation.

Now, that you have understood the meaning of desparation in this verse, you will appreciate that "this day" in the Divine Speech, "This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion", is an adverb of time related to the verb "have despaired". The adverb has been placed at the begining of the sentence in order to show this day's importance and grandeur; as it was on this day that the religion passed the stage of personal guardianship of the Prophet and entered into the stage of collective guardianship of the Imãms; in this way, it rose from transiency to permanence and eternity.

On going ahead, we shall find a similar construction in the verse: This day (all) the good things are allowed to you . . . (5:5). But the verse under discussion cannot be compared with this verse, because the contexts of the two verses are totally different. The verse: This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion, is a sort of expostulation against the unbelievers, while the verse: This day (all) the god things are allowed to you, begins a new subject. Also, the connotations are different. The former is a creative decree which contains good news on one side and warning on the other, while the latter is a legislative decree and describes the Divine grace and favour to the Muslims. This day have those who disbelieve despaired of your religion, shows the grandeur of the day because it brought a very highly beneficial good to the Muslims, that is, desparation of the unbelievers regarding the Muslims' religion. "those who disbelieve" refers to all the disbelievers, be they idolworshippers, Jews, Christians or others, because the clause is unrestricted, as we had described earlier.

The prohibition in the Divine words: so fear them not, and fear Me, is advisory, not obligatory. The connotation is that now that those who until now had posed as a danger to you have despaired, you have no reason to fear them; a man does not spend his energies for something when he has lost all hopes of attaining it; so now you are safe from their side and you should not fear them concerning your religion; therefore, "fear them not, and fear Me".

The words, "fear Me" in this context show that the Muslims should now fear Allãh in the matter concerning which they until thenwere afraid of the disbelievers, because now they cannot deprive you of your religion. It is clear that this is a sort of warning to the Muslims; and that is why we have not taken this verse as a statement of favour. This explanation gets strengthened if we remember that the fear of Allãh is obligatory in any case. It is not that it is wãjib in this state but not in that; or with this condition and not with that; therefore, there was no reason to add "and fear Me" after the clause, "fear them not" if it does not indicate a very special fear in a particular situation.

These sentences should not be compared with the Divine words: . . . so do not fear them, and fear Me if you are believers (3:175); because the order to fear Allãh in this verse is made conditional to believing; the order is obligatory and the connotation is that the believers are forbidden to fear the disbelievers regarding their safety; rather, they are obliged to fear Allãh alone. The verse, therefore, forbids them to do what was not proper for them, that is, their fearing the disbelievers concerning their ownselves; it makes no difference here whether they are told to fear Allãh or not. That is why the order to fear Allãh has been made conditional to their being the believers, and this condition also expounds the reason of this order.

But the Divine words in the verse under the discussion, "so fear them not and fear Me", are not like that. The believers' fear in this verse was the fear concerning their religion; and such a fear was not disliked by Allãh, because in reality it meant the pursuit of the Divine pleasure. When Allãh forbids this fear, it is because the reason causing that fear was no more. They feared the disbelievers because the disbelievers had not despaired of their religion yet; but now that the situation has changed, they no more needed to fear them. Thus, the prohibition here is advisory; and consequently, the order to fear Allãh also is in advisory capacity. The connotation, in short, is that it is necessary that you should be cautious and fearful in the matters of religion; but the cause of fear until now had come from disbelievers and you were afraid of them because till today they had hoped to divert you from your religion; but today they have despaired, and now the cause of fear emanates from Allãh. Therefore, you should be afraid of Him alone. Ponder on it.

The verse because of the words, "so fear them not, and fear Me", gives a hint of a warning and threat, because it orders the believers to have a special fear. It is not the general fear which is wãjib for the believers in all conditions and at all times. Let us think on the speciality of this fear and find out why it has been made obligatory.

There is no doubt that the two sentences of this verse, that is: This day have those who disbelieve . . . ; and, This day have I perfected for you your religion, are inter-related and express the same theme, as we have explained before. The religion which Allãh had perfected this day and the bounty which He has completed this day (in reality both are the same thing) was the thing regarding which the disbelievers had entertained all those hopes and because of which the believers were afraid of them; now Allãh made the disbelievers despaired of that religion, perfected it and completed it and then forbade the believers to fear the disbelievers in this respect; now when He orders them to fear His Ownself, it must refer to the same type of fear, that is, about the religion; they should remain on guard lest Allãh takes away the religion from their hands and remove this gifted favour from them.
