In the Name of Allãh,
The All-compassionate, The All-merciful

Praise belongs to Allãh, the Lord of all being;
the All-compassionate, the All-merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement;
Thee only we serve, and to Thee alone we pray for succour;
Guide us in the straight path;
the path of those whom Thou hast blessed,
not of those against whom Thou art wrathful,
nor of those who are astray.

* * * * *

O ' Allãh! send your blessings to the head of your messengers and the last of your prophets, Muhammad and his pure and cleansed progeny.
Also send your blessings to all your prophets and envoys.

العلاّمة السّيّد محمّد حسين الطباطبائيّ

و قد امتاز العلاّمة الطّباطبائيّ بأنّه تلمّذ على قريبه السّيّد (الميرزا) على (اغا) ابن (الميرزا) حسين القاضي الطّباطبائيّ (١٢٨٥/١٨٦٩-١٣٦٦/١٩٤٧) العارف والعالم الأخلاقيّ الشّهير الّذي كوّن مدرسة عرفانيّة و أخلاقيّة لازالت تعيش حيّة ولها منتمون و مرشدون.

رجع العلاّمة الطّباطبائيّ إلى تبريز في ١٣٥٣ / ١٩٣٤، وعاش فيها عالما و مدرّسا خاصة للفلسفة العالية - ولكن في نطاق محدود - إلى أن هاجر في ١٣٦٤/١٩٤٥ إلى قم، أهمّ حاضرة علميّة للشّيعة الإماميّة في ايران، ومنذ أن استقرّ بها تولّى التّدريس العالي و خاصة الفلسفة العالية وعاش فيها إلى ان توفّاه الله

اشتهر العلاّمة الطباطبائيّ رحمه الله بالعديد من آثاره، و أهمّها تفسيره الكبير (الميزان في تفسير القرآن) والذي يصحّ أن يعدّ الدّعامة الأساسيّة للتّقدير العلميّ الّذي ناله السّيّد الطّباطبائيّ في العالم الإسلاميّ، و من آثاره الشّهيرة (أصول فلسفه و روش رئاليسم) (أسس الفلسفة، والمنهج الواقعي) الّذي تناول فيه الفلسفة الإسلاميّة وشتّى الفلسفات المعاصرة المعارضة لها خاصّة الفلسفة الماركسية بالدّراسة المقارنة، والّذي امتاز ايضا بالهوامش والشّروح المفصّلة الّتي كتبها تلميذه المغفور له مطهّري. و(شيعه در اسلام) (التشيّع في الإسلام)، وكان في الأصل مناقشات حول التّشيّع والشّيعة دارت بينه و بين (البروفسور كينيث مورجان Prof. Kenneth Morgan) من جامعة (Colgate) في صيف ١٣٤٨/١٩٦٣، ثمّ جمعت و صدر نصّها الفارسي، ثمّ ترجمتها الإنجليزيّة.

* * *

كان من لطف الله سبحانه بنا أن ألهمنا - منذ سنوات - القيام بنشر تفسير للقرآن الكريم باللّغة الإنجليزيّة، يسمو بالقارئ بهذه اللغة إلى المستوى الرّفيع لفهم كتاب الله الحكيم و آياته الخالدة، في الحدود المتيسّرة عمليّا، بما يقرّب معانيه السّامية و أهدافه الإلهيّة إلى الفكر الإنسانيّ، ويشرح الظّروف والملابسات الّتي صاحبت نزول آياته و سوره، ويستعرض النّقاط التي لابدّ من الانتباه اليها في فهم معانيه و استيعاب أغراضه، ولا يغفل السّنّة الكريمة والاستعانة بها في تفسير الكتاب العزيز، و يتناسب - من جهة أخرى - مع الذّهنيّة المعاصرة للقارئ المسلم و غير المسلم، والمسائل الّتي تثار في ذهنه، والمشاكل الّتي تتطلّب الحلّ النّظريّ لها، بالحدّ الّذى يرتبط بالقرآن الكريم و تفسيره.

وقد وضعنا قائمتين: (الأولى) بأسماء المؤلّفين الوارد ذكرهم في مجموع أجزاء الكتاب. (والثّانية) بأسماء الكتب الّتي هي بحاجة الى تعريف أكثر. وقد ألحقنا هاتين القائمتين بهذا الجزء (الجزء الأوّل) من التّرجمة الإنجليزيّة فحسب ولكنّا وضعنا جدولين آخرين يجدهما القارئ ملحقين بكلّ جزء من أجزاء التّرجمة.

ومن الله نسأل وإليه نبتهل أن يجعل عملنا خالصا لوجهه الكريم، وأن يوفّقنا لإتمام ما بدأنا، وأن يسدّدنا في خطوتنا هذه وخطواتنا المقبلة، إنّه نعم المولى ونعم النّصير.

The late Islamic scholar, thinker and philosopher, al-`Allãmah as-Sayyid Muhammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī (al-`Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī) came from the celebrated Ṭabāṭabā'ī family of Tabriz. For the last three centuries, this family has produced generation after generation of renowned religious scholars in Azarbayjan (Iran). They are descendants of the second Imãm, al-Ḥasan ibn `Ali (peace be on both of them). The clan is also referred to with the title, al-Qadi.

al- `Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī was the son of as-Sayyid Muhammad ibn as-Sayyid Muhammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī. al-`Allãmah was born in Tabriz on 30/12/1321 A.H. (17/3/1904 C.F.). His father died in 1330 (1912). The orphaned child grew up in Tabriz, and after completing the religious education there, in circa 1341 (1923) he went to an-Najaf al-Ashraf (Iraq), the most important centre of the highest Shi'ah religious learning.

In an-Najaf al-Ashraf, he began his higher studies with such illustrious scholars as ash-Shaykh (al-Mirza) Muhammad Ḥusayn (son of Shaykhu 'l-Islam al-Mirza `Abdu 'r-Raḥim) Na'ini al-Gharawi (1277/1860-1 — 1355/1936) and ash-Shaykh Muhammad Ḥusayn (son of al-Hajj Muhammad Ḥasan, Mu'inu 't-Tujjar) Isfahani (1296/1878 — 1361/1942).

These two, together with ash-Shaykh Diya'u 'd-Din (son of Mawla Muhammad) `Iraqi (1278/1861-2 — 1361/1942), are held in the highest regard in the Shi'ah world. They were amongxxii the most prominent scholars not only in the fields of the Shi'ite jurisprudence and the fundamentals of jurisprudence, but in all Islamic subjects. The opinions they expounded and the theories they established have been followed by all those who came after them. Each of them founded his own school of thought. They trained thousands of Shi `ah scholars and jurists; and all the marãji`u 't- taqlīd[1] of the Shi'ite world, to this day, are their students. The Isfahan was a philosopher, unsurpassed in his time, a man of literature and a good poet of Arabic and Persian; he was a genius whose achievements made others to look upon him as their ideal. The Na'ini has carved for himself a niche in the history because of his bold opinions and decrees in the political and social life of the Muslim ummah.

a1-`Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabã'ī was much influenced by these two teachers, (and especially by the Isfahan) in the development of his thoughts and knowledge. A third influence was of as-Sayyid Abu '1-Qasim Ja'far (son of as-Sayyid Muhammad al-Musawi) Khwansari (1313/1895-6 — 1380/1961), known as "the mathematician." al-`Allãmah at-Ṭabāṭabã'ī was proud of learning the mathematics from him. Also, he wrote a book on some topics of higher mathematics, applying therein some special theories of his teacher. The book is mentioned in adh-Dhari `ah, vol. ii, pp. 232 — 233.

He learned philosophy and metaphysics from as-Sayyid Ḥusayn (s/o as-Sayyid Riḍa s/o as-Sayyid Musa) al-Ḥusayni (1293/1876 — 1358/1939) of al-Badkubi[22] a well-known teacher of philosophy and related subjects in those days.

[1] 1. مَراجِعُ التَّقْليد= The highest authorities of the Islamic fiqh (الفِـقْه = jurisprudence; rules of sharī'ah) whose rulings are followed by others.

2. Now called Baku, capital of Soviet Ãzarbayjan.

In ethical and spiritual field, he received his training from his relatives, as-Sayyid (al-Mirza) `Ali Agha (s/o al-Mirza Ḥusayn al-Qāḍi) Ṭabāṭabā'ī (1285/1869 — 1366/1947), a well-known divine who established a school of spiritual and ethical training which is flourishing to this day.

All those influences combined in al-`Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī to create in him a well-balanced academic and spiritual personality. A well-respected authority on religious subjects of jurisprudence and its fundamentals; a philosopher of independent views and various new theories; an inspired model of ethical and spiritual perfection, who not only taught morality but lived it — this was al-`Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī. Yet it will be correct to say that his scholarship was overshadowed by his fame and prestige as a philosopher and a spiritual man.

al-`Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī returned to Tabriz in 1353 (1934) where he was welcomed as a religious scholar. There he spent his time teaching higher philosophy to willing disciples — but it was a small place for his talents. In 1364 (1945) he migrated to Qum, the most important centre of religious education in Iran. In Qum, he remained engaged in imparting knowledge of ethics, philosophy and exegesis of the Qur'ān to the students who had already attained to a high level of erudition. There he remained till his death on Sunday, 18/1/1402 (15/11/1981). May Allāh bestow His mercy on him. Amen.

Many religious leaders of the present generation were and are among his students and disciples, the most famous being the late Murtaḍa Muṭahhari (1338/1920 — 1399/1979).

al-`Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī's fame rests on his various academic works — the most important being his great exegesis of the Qur'ān, al-Mīzān fi tafsīri 'l-Qur'ān. It may correctly be said to be the foundation stone of the academic prestige which al-`Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā'ī was accorded in the Muslim world.

Among his other works is Usul-e falsafah wa rawesh-e realism (The Fundamentals of philosophy and the Doctrine of Realism). This book is a comparative study of Islamic philosophy and various modern anti-Islamic schools of thoughts, especially the Marxism. His disciple, late Murtada Mutahhari, wrote footnotes and explanations to this work, thus making it easily comprehensible to the average man.

A third book Shi'ah dar Islam (Shi'ah in Islam), was first published in Persian; later it was published in English also, with the title, Shi'ite Islam. This book is based on al-`Allãmah's discussions with Professor Kenneth Morgan of Colgate University, held in the summer of 1384 (1963) about Shi'ah and Shi'ism.

However, it is the tafsīr*, al-Mīzãn* (published in Arabic in 20 volumes) which presents the true picture of the author's academic taste and his way of thinking. Before starting this work, the author made a detailed plan to explain the Qur'ãn with the help of the Qur'ãn itself; and he faithfully fulfilled this pledge upto the end of the book. He has outlined this scheme in his Preface, in volume one.

It was a grace of Allãh that He inspired us a few years ago to prepare and publish a tafsīr of the Qur'ãn in English. We wanted it to be a tafsīr that would help the reader to understand the divine Book and its verses, as much as practically possible — a tafsīr that would bring its sublime meanings and divine themes nearer to the human mind; would explain the context in which the verses and chapters were revealed, would cover the points that are necessary for understanding its meaning and fully comprehending its import — all this without ignoring the traditions of the Prophet and his Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) in arriving at the final conclusion. On the other hand, we wanted it to be in sympathy with the mentality of the present day's readers, Muslim as well as non-Muslim, looking at the problems that boggle their minds and the questions that demand responsible and knowledgeable answers — to the extent it is related to the Qur'ãn and its explanation.

After much deliberation, we found that tafsīr*, al-Mīzãn,* satisfies our both requirements to a great extent.

So, seeking the help of Allãh, we decided to get it translated in the English language. Even before embarking on this work, we were fully aware that it was a gigantic task; we understood that the responsibility would be heavy and the efforts to bring this scheme to completion herculean; the expenses would be huge and the difficulties himalayan. We knew all of it, and our only weapon was, and is, our reliance on Allãh. We sought His help to make our dream come true; and to help us reach the end goal and prepare and publish the complete set.

A few years ago, we entered into an agreement with someone to translate the first volume; but he did not fulfil his promise, although we gave him all the time and facilities — and even more — that were needed for it.

At last we requested al-`Allãmah ar-Raḍawi to take this important responsibility on his shoulders, and we are thankful to Allãh that al-`Allãmah ar-Raḍawi fulfilled his promise.

We have written in short about al-`Allãmah as-Sayyid Sa'īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawi (s/o as-Sayyid Abu 'l-Ḥasan [1309/1891 --1394/1974]) in the preface of his book, The Family Life of Islam, in which we, inter alia, wrote: as-Sayyid ar-Raḍawi is one of the most sincere preachers of Islam and an active scholar, both when he was in Tanzania in the Bilãl Muslim Mission (an Islamic organization active in Tanzania), and also now that he has returned to his own country of India. In the way of spreading Islam he has rendered enormous services and has been most active.

al-`Allãmah ar-Raḍawi has written scores of books and booklets in English, Urdu and Swahili, many of which have been published; and we have given in the above-mentioned preface some titles which have been published by us. Some of his books have been translated and published by us in French, Italian, Japanese, Thai, Indonesian, Hausa and some other languages.

Here we must express our thanks to him for the efforts he has made and the difficulties he has overcome in rendering al-Mīzãn into English. The original Arabic book is replete with academic terms of all disciplines, Islamic as well as non-Islamic, and with philosophical discussions related mostly to metaphysics. The learned translator has discharged his trust faithfully and conveyed the original idea into English truthfully. What you find in your hands is the true rendering of what al-`Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabãṭabã'ī wrote in Arabic. The translator has written some footnotes where he thought it necessary — without altering the original text in any way.

We left the entire responsibility of the translation in the hands of the translator, relying on his erudition and knowledge of Arabic language, philosophy and Islamic subjects and his long experience in rendering purely Islamic esoteric ideas into a western language like English. Now he is personally responsible for the English translation, just as al-`Allãmah aṭ-Ṭabãṭabã'ī (may Allãh have His mercy on him!) was personally responsible for the explanations of the Qur'ãnic verses, and the general discussions he wrote in his tafsīr, al-Mizãn.

We have prepared two lists for this book:

1. Names of the authors referred to in the twenty volumes of al-Mīzãn.

2. Names of the books which need a somewhat detailed introduction.

These two lists have been added in the first volume of the English translation only; two other lists will be printed with every volume.

We pray to Allãh and beseech Him to make our deed purely for His pleasure, to help us complete the work we have started, and to guide us aright in every step we put forward on this road. Surely, He is the best Guardian and the best Helper.

PREFACE

PREFACE

All praise is for Allãh Who sent down the Qur'ãn to His servant so that he may be a warner to the worlds; and blessings be on him whom He sent as a witness, and a bearer of good news and a warner, and as one inviting to Allãh by His permission, and as a light-giving torch; and on his progeny from whom Allãh kept away the uncleanliness and whom He purified a thorough purifying.

* * * * *

at-Tafsīr (التَّفسير = exegesis), that is, explaining the meanings of the Qur'ãnic verse, clarifying its import and finding out its significance, is one of the earliest academic activities in Islam. The interpretation of the Qur'ãn began with its revelation, as is clear from the words of Allãh: Even as We have sent among you an Apostle from among you who recites to you Our communications and purifies you and teaches you the Book and the wisdom and teaches you that which you did not know (2:151).

The first exegetes were a few companions of the Prophet, like Ibn `Abbãs, `Abdullãh ibn `Umar, Ubayy (ibn Ka'b)) and others. (We use the word, 'companion', for other than `Ali — a.s.[3]; because he and the Imãms from his progeny have an unequalled distinction — an unparalleled status, which we shall explain somewhere else. Exegesis in those days was confined to the explanation of literary aspects of the verse, the background of its revelation and, occasionally interpretation of one verse with the help of the other. If the verse was about a historical event or contained the realities of genesis or resurrection etc., then sometimes a few traditions of the Prophet were narrated to make its meaning clear.

The same was the style of the disciples of the companions, like Mujahid, Qatãdah, Ibn Abi Laylã, ash-Sha'bi, as-Suddī and others, who lived in the first two centuries of hijrah. They relied even more on traditions, including the ones forged and interpolated by the Jews and others. They quoted those traditions to explain the verses which contained the stories of the previous nations, or which described the realities of genesis, for example, creation of the heavens and the earth, beginning of the rivers and mountains, the "Iram" (the city of the tribe of 'Ãd), of Shaddãd the so-called "mistakes" of the prophets, the alterations of the books and things like that. Some such matters could be found even in the exegesis ascribed to the companions.

During the reign of the caliphs, when the neighbouring countries were conquered, the Muslims came in contact with the vanquished people and were involved in religious discussions with the scholars of various other religions and sects. This gave rise to the theological discourses, known in Islam as `Ilmu 'l-kalãm (عِلْمُ الكَلام). Also, the Greek philosophy was translated into Arabic. The process began towards the end of the first century of hijrah (Umayyad's period) and continued well into the third century ('Abbãsid's reign). This created a taste for intellectual and philosophical arguments in the Muslim intelligentsia.

At the same time, at-taṣawwuf (التَّصَوُّف) = Sufism, mysticism) raised its head in the society; and people were attracted to-wards it as it held out a promise of revealing to them the realities of religion through severe self-discipline and ascetical rigours — instead of entangling them into verbal polemics and intellectual arguments.

And there emerged a group, who called themselves people of tradition, who thought that salvation depended on believing in the apparent meanings of the Qur'ãn and the tradition, with-out any academic research. The utmost they allowed was looking into literary value of the words.

Thus, before the second century had proceeded very far, the Muslim society had broadly split in four groups: The theologians, the philosophers, the Sufis and the people of tradition. There was an intellectual chaos in the ummah and the Muslims, generally speaking, had lost their bearing. The only thing to which all were committed was the word, "There is no god except Allãh, and Muhammad (s.a.w.a.)[4] is the Messenger of Allãh". They differed with each other in everything else. There was dispute on the meanings of the names and attributes of Allãh, as well as about His actions; there was conflict about the reality of the heavens and the earth and what is in and on them; there were controversies about the decree of Allãh and the divine measure; opinions differed whether man is a helpless tool in divine hands, or is a free agent; there were wranglings about various aspects of reward and punishment; arguments were kicked like ball, from one side to the other concerning the realities of death, al-barzakh (البَرزَخ= intervening period between death and the Day of Resurrection); resurrection, paradise and hell. In short, not a single subject, having any relevance to religion, was left without a discord of one type or the other. And this divergence, not unexpectedly, showed itself in exegesis of the Qur'ãn. Every group wanted to support his views and opinions from the Qur'ãn; and the exegesis had to serve this purpose.

The people of tradition explained the Qur'ãn with the traditions ascribed to the companions and their disciples. They went ahead so long as there was a tradition to lead them on, and stopped when they could not find any such tradition (provided the meaning was not self-.evident). They thought it to be the only safe method, as Allãh says: . . . and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge say: "We believe in it, it is all from our Lord..." (3:7).

But they were mistaken. Allãh has not said in His Book that rational proof had no validity. How could He say so when the authenticity of the Book itself depended on rational proof. On the other hand, He has never said that the words of the companions or their disciples had any value as religious proof. How could He say so when there were such glaring discrepancies in their opinions? In short, Allãh has not called us to the sophistry which accepting and following contradictory opinions and views would entail. He has called us, instead, to meditate on the Qur'ãnic verses in order to remove any apparent discrepancy in them. Allãh has revealed the Qur'ãn as a guidance, and has made it a light and an explanation of everything. Why should a light seek brightness from others' light? Why should a guidance be led by others' guidance? Why should "an explanation of everything" be explained by others' words?

The theologians' lot was worse all the more. They were divided into myriads of sects; and each group clung to the verse that seemed to support its belief and tried to explain away what was apparently against it.

The seed of sectarian differences was sown in academic theories or, more often than not, in blind following and national or tribal prejudice; but it is not the place to describe it even briefly. However, such exegesis should be called adaptation, rather than explanation. There are two ways of explaining a verse — One may say: "What does the Qur'ãn say?" Or one may say: “How can this verse be explained, so as to fit on my belief?” The difference between the two approaches is quite clear. The former forgets every pre-conceived idea and goes where the Qur’ãn leads him to. The latter has already decided what to believe and cuts the Qur’ãnic verses to fit on that body; such an exegesis is no exegesis at all.

The philosophers too suffered from the same syndrome. They tried to fit the verses on the principles of Greek philosophy (that was divided into four branches: Mathematics, natural science, divinity and practical subjects including civics). If a verse was clearly against those principles it was explained away. In this way the verses describing metaphysical subjects, those explaining the genesis and creation of the heavens and the earth, those concerned with life after death and those about resurrection, paradise and hell were distorted to conform with the said philosophy. That philosophy was admittedly only a set of conjectures — unencumbered with any test or proof; but the Muslim philosophers felt no remorse in treating its views on the system of skies, orbits, natural elements and other related subjects as the absolute truth with which the exegesis of the Qur’ãn had to conform.

The Sufis kept their eyes fixed on esoteric aspects of creation; they were too occupied with their inner world to look at the outer one. Their tunnel-like vision prevented them from looking at the things in their true perspective. Their love of esoteric made them look for inner interpretations of the verses; without any regard to their manifest and clear meanings. It encouraged the people to base their explanations on poetic expressions and to use anything to prove anything. The condition became so bad that the verses were explained on the-basis of the numerical values of their words; letters were divided into bright and dark ones and the explanations were based on that division. Building castle in the air, wasn't it? Obviously, the Qur’ãn was not revealed to guide the Sufis only; nor had it ad-dressed itself to only those who knew the numerical values of the letters (with all its ramifications); nor were its realities based on astrological calculations.

Of course, there are traditions narrated from the Prophet and the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) saying for example: "Verily the Qur'ãn has an exterior and an interior, and its interior has an interior upto seven (or according to a version, seventy) interiors . . ." But the Prophet and the Imãms gave importance to its exterior as much as to its interior; they were as much concerned with its revelation as they were with its interpretation. We shall explain in the beginning of the third chapter, "The Family of `Imrãn", that "interpretation" is not a meaning against the manifest meaning of the verse. Such an interpretation should more correctly be called "misinterpretation". This meaning of the word, "interpretation", came in vogue in the Muslim circles long after the revelation of the Qur'ãn and the spread of Islam. What the Qur'ãn means by the word, "interpretation", is some-thing other than the meaning and the significance.

In recent times, a new method of exegesis has become fashionable. Some people, supposedly Muslims, who were deeply influenced by the natural sciences (which are based on observations and tests) and the social ones (that rely on induction), followed the materialists of Europe or the pragmatists. Under the influence of those anti-Islamic theories, they declared that the religion's realities cannot go against scientific knowledge; one should not believe except that which is perceived by any one of the five senses; nothing exists except the matter and its properties. What the religion claims to exist, but which the sciences reject — like The Throne, The Chair, The Tablet and The Pen — should be interpreted in a way that conforms with the science; as for those things which the science is silent about, like the resurrection etc., they should be brought within the purview of the laws of matter; the pillars upon which the divine religious laws are based — like revelation, angel, Satan, prophet-hood, apostleship, imãmah (Imãmate) etc. — are spiritual things, and the spirit is a development of the matter, or let us say, a property of the matter; legislation of those laws is manifestation of a special social genius, who ordains them after healthy and fruitful contemplations, in order to establish a good and progressive society.

They have further said: One cannot have confidence in the traditions, because many are spurious; only those traditions may be relied upon which are in conformity with the Book. As for the Book itself, one should not explain it in the light of the old philosophy and theories, because they were not based on observations and tests — they were just a sort of mental exercise which has been totally discredited now by the modern science. The best, rather the only, way is to explain the Qur'ãn with the help of other Qur'ãnic verses — except where the science has asserted something which is relevant to it.

This, in short, is what they have written, or what necessarily follows from their total reliance on tests and observations. We are not concerned here with the question whether their scientific principles and philosophic dicta can be accepted as the foundation of the Qur'ãn's exegesis. But it should be pointed out here that the objection which they have levelled against the ancient exegetes — that theirs was only an adaptation and not the explanation — is equally true about their own method; they too say that the Qur'ãn and its realities must be made to conform with the scientific theories. If not so, then why do they insist that the academic theories should be treated as true foundations of exegesis from which no deviation could be allowed?

This method improves nothing on the discredited method of the ancients.

If you look at all the above-mentioned ways of exegesis, you will find that all of them suffer from a most serious defect: They impose the results of academic or philosophic arguments on the Qur'ãnic meanings; they make the Qur'ãn conform with an extraneous idea. In this way, explanation turns into adaptation, realities of the Qur'ãn are explained away as allegories and its manifest meanings are sacrificed for so-called "interpretations".

As we mentioned in the beginning, the Qur'ãn introduces it-self as the guidance for the worlds (3:96); the manifest light (4:174), and the explanation of every thing (16:89). But these people, contrary to those Qur'ãnic declarations, make it to be guided by extraneous factors, to be illuminated by some outside theories, and to be explained by something other than itself! What is that "something else"? What authority has it got? And if there is any difference in various explanations of a verse — and indeed there are most serious differences — which mediator should the Qur'ãn refer to?

What is the root-cause of the differences in the Qur'ãn's explanations? It could not happen because of any difference in the meaning of a word, phrase or sentence. The Qur'ãn has been sent down in plain Arabic; and no Arab (or Arabic-knowing non-Arab) can experience any difficulty in understanding it.

Also, there is not a single verse (out of more than six thousand) which is enigmatic, obscure or abstruse in its import; nor is there a single sentence that keeps the mind wandering in search of its meaning. After all, the Qur'ãn is admittedly the most eloquent speech, and it is one of the essential ingredients of eloquence that the talk should be free from obscurity and abstruseness.

Even those verses that are counted among the "ambiguous" ones, have no ambiguity in their meanings; whatever the ambiguity, it is in identification of the particular thing or individual from among the group to which that meaning refers. This statement needs some elaborations:

In this life we are surrounded by matter; even our senses and faculties are closely related to it. This familiarity with matter and material things has influenced our mode of thinking. When we hear a word or a sentence, our mind races to its material meaning. When we hear, for example, the words, life, knowledge, power, hearing, sight, speech, will, pleasure, anger, creation and order, we at once think of the material manifestations of their meanings. Likewise, when we hear the words, heaven, earth, tablet, pen, throne, chair, angel and his wings, and Satan and his tribe and army, the first things that come into our minds are their material manifestations.

Likewise, when we hear the sentences, "Allãh created the universe", "Allãh did this", "Allãh knew it", "Allãh intended it" or "intends it", we look at these actions in frame of "time", because we are used to connect every verb with a tense.

In the same way, when we hear the verses: . . . and with Us is more yet (50:35), . . . We would have made it from before Ourselves (21:17), . . . and that which is with Allãh is best .. . (62:11) , . . . and to Him you shall be brought back (2:28, etc.), we attach with the divine presence the concept of "place", because in our minds the two ideas are inseparable.

Also, on reading the verses: And when We intend to destroy a town (17:16), And We intend to bestow a favour… (28:5), and Allãh intends ease for you (2:185), we think that the "intention" has the same meaning in every sentence, as is the case with our own intention and will.

In this way, we jump to the familiar (which most often is material) meaning of every word. And it is but natural. Man has made words to fulfil his social need of mutual intercourse; and society in its turn was established to fulfil the man's material needs. Not unexpectedly, the words became symbols of the things which men were connected with and which helped them in their material progress.

But we should not forget that the material things are constantly changing and developing with the development of expertise. Man gave the name, lamp, to a certain receptacle in which he put a wick and a little fat that fed the lighted wick which illuminated the place in darkness. That apparatus kept changing until now it has become the electric bulb of various types; and except the name "lamp" not a single component of the original lamp can be found in it.

Likewise, there is no resemblance in the balance of old times and the modern scales — especially if we compare the old apparatus with the modern equipment for weighing and measuring heat, electric-current's flow and blood-pressure.

And the armaments of old days and the ones invented within our own times have nothing in common, except the name.

The named things have changed so much that not a single component of the original can be found in them; yet the name has not changed. It shows that the basic element that allows the use of a name for a thing is not the shape of that thing, but its purpose and benefit.

Man, imprisoned as he is within his habitat and habit, often fails to see this reality. That is why al-Ḥashawiyyah and those who believe that God has a body interpret the Qur'ãnic verses and phrases within the fame-work of the matter and the nature. But in fact they are stuck with their habit and usage, and not to the exterior of the Qur'ãn and the traditions. Even in the literal meanings of the Qur'ãn we find ample evidence that relying on the habit and usage in explanation of the divine speech would cause confusion and anomaly. For example, Allãh says: nothing is like a likeness of Him (42:11); Visions comprehended Him not, and He comprehends (all) visions; and He is the Knower of subtleties, the Aware (6:73); glory be to Him above what they ascribe (to Him) (23:91; 37:159). These verses manifestly show that what we are accustomed to cannot be ascribed to Allãh.

It was this reality that convinced many people that they should not explain the Qur'ãnic words by identifying them with their usual and common meanings. Going a step further, they sought the help of logical and philosophical arguments to avoid wrong deductions. This gave a foot-hold to academic reasoning in explaining the Qur'ãn and identifying the individual person or thing meant by a word. Such discussions can be of two kinds:

i) The exegete takes a problem emanating from a Qur'ãnic statement, looks at it from academic and philosophical point of view, weighs the pros and cons and with the help of the philosophy, science and logic decides what the true answer should be. Thereafter, he takes the verse and fits it anyhow on that answer which, he thinks, is right.

The Muslim philosophers and theologians usually followed this method; but, as mentioned earlier, the Qur'ãn does not approve of it.

ii) The exegete explains the verse with the help of other relevant verses, meditating on them together — and meditation has been forcefully urged upon by the Qur'ãn itself — and identifies the individual person or thing by its particulars and attributes mentioned in the verse.

No doubt this is the only correct method of exegesis.

Allãh has said: and We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything (16:89). Is it possible for such a book not to explain its own self? Also He has described the Qur'ãn in these words: a guidance for mankind and clear evidence of guidance and discrimination (between wrong) (2:185); and He has also said: and We have sent down to you a manifest light (4:174). The Qur'ãn is, accordingly, a guidance, an evidence, a discrimination between right and wrong and a manifest light for the people to guide them aright and help them in all their needs. Is it imaginable that it would not guide them aright in its own matter, while it is their most important need? Again Allãh says:

And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them onto Our ways (29:69). Which striving is greater than the endeavour to understand His Book? And which way is more straight than the Qur'ãn?

Verses of this meaning are very numerous, and we shall discuss them in detail in the beginning of the third chapter, The Family of `Imrãn.

Allãh taught the Qur'ãn to His Prophet and appointed him as the teacher of the Book: The Faithful Spirit has descended with it upon your heart that you may be of the warners, in plain Arabic language (26:193-4); and We have revealed to you the Reminder that you may make clear to men what has been revealed to them, and that haply they may reflect (16: 44); . . . an Apostle . . . who recites to them His communications and purifies them, and teaches them the Book and the Wisdom (62:2).

And the Prophet appointed his progeny to carry on this work after him. It is clear from his unanimously accepted tradition:

I am leaving behind among you two precious things; as long as you hold fast to them you will never go astray after me: The Book of Allãh and my progeny, my family members; and these two shall never separate from each other until they reach me (on) the reservoir.

And Allãh has confirmed, in the following two verses, this decl- aration of the Prophet that his progeny had the real knowledge of the Book: Allãh only desires to keep away the uncleanliness from you, O people of the House! and to purify you a (thorough) purifying (33:33); Most surely it is an honoured Qur'ãn, in a Book that is hidden; None do touch it save the purified ones (56:77—79).

And the Prophet and the Imãms from his progeny always used this second method for explaining the Qur'ãn, as may be seen in the traditions that have been narrated from them on exegesis, some of which will be quoted in this book in appropriate places. One cannot find a single instance in their traditions where they might have taken help of an academic theory or philosophical postulate for explaining a verse.

The Prophet has said in a sermon: "Therefore, when mischiefs come to confuse you like the segments of darkened night, then hold fast to the Qur'ãn; as it is the intercessor whose inter-cession shall be granted; and a credible advocate; and whoever keeps it before him, it will lead him to the Garden; and whoever keeps it behind, it will drive him to the Fire; and it is the guide that guides to the best path; and it is a book in which there is explanation, particularization and recapitulation; and it is a decisive (world), and not a joke; and there is for it a manifest (meaning) and an esoteric (one); thus its apparent (meaning) is firm, and its esoteric (one) is knowledge; its exterior is elegant and its interior deep; it has (many) boundaries, and its boundaries have (many) boundaries; its wonders shall not cease, and its (unexpected marvels shall not be old. There are in it the lamps of guidance and the beacon of wisdom, and guide to knowledge for him who knows the attributes. Therefore, one should extend his sight; and should let his eyes reach the attribute; so that one who is in perdition may get deliverance, and one who is entangled may get free; because meditation is the life of the heart of the one who sees, as the one having a light (easily) walks in darkness; therefore, you must seek good deliverance and (that) with little waiting.

`Ali (a.s.) said, inter alia, speaking about the Qur'ãn in a sermon: "Its one part speaks with the other, and one portion testifies about the other."

This is the straight path and the right way which was used by the true teachers of the Qur'ãn and its guides, may Allãh's blessings be on them all !

We shall write, under various headings, what Allãh has helped us to understand from the honoured verses, by the above-mentioned method. We have not based the explanations on any philosophical theory, academic idea or mystical revelation.

We have not put into it any outside matter except a fine literary point on which depends the understanding of Arabic eloquence, or a self-evident or practical premises which can be understood by one and all.

From the discussions, written according to the above- mentioned method, the following subjects have become crystal-clear:

1. The matters concerning the names of Allãh, and His attributes, like His Life, Knowledge, Power, Hearing, Sight and Oneness etc. As for the Person of Allãh, you will find that the Qur'ãn believes that He needs no description.

2. The matters concerning the divine actions, like creation, order, will, wish, guidance, leading astray, decree, – measure, compulsion, delegation (of Power), pleasure, displeasure and other similar actions.

3. The matters concerned with the intermediary links between Allãh and man, like the Curtain, the Tablet, the Pen, the Throne, the Chair, the Inhabited House, the Heavens, the Earth, the Angels, the Satans, and the Jinns etc.

4. The details about man before he came to this world.

5. The matters related to man in this life, like the history of mankind, knowledge of his self, the foundation of society, the prophethood and the apostleship, the revelation, the inspiration, the book and the religion and law. The high status of the prophets, shining through their stories, come under this heading.

6. The knowledge about man after he departs from this world, that is, al-Barzakh.

7. The matters about human character. Under this heading come the various stages through which the friends of Allãh pass in their spiritual journey, like submission, faith, benevolence, humility, purity of intention and other virtues.

(We have not gone into details of the verses of the law, as more appropriately it is a subject for the books of jurisprudence.)

As a direct result of this method, we have never felt any need to interpret a verse against its apparent meaning. As we have said earlier, this type of interpretation is in fact misinterpretation. As for that "interpretation" which the Qur'ãn has mentioned in various verses, it is not a type of "meaning"; it is something else.

At the end of the commentaries, we have written some traditions of the Prophet and the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.), narrated by the Sunni and Shi'ah narrators. But we have not included the opinions of the companions and their disciples, because, first, there is too much confusion and contradiction in them; and second, they are not vested with any authority in Islam.

On going through those traditions of the Prophet and the Imãms (peace be on them all!), you will notice that this "new" method of exegesis (adopted in this book) is in reality the oldest and the original method which was used by the Teachers of the Qur'ãn (peace of Allãh be on them all!).

Also, we have written separately various topics — philosophical, academic, historical, social and ethical — when there was a need for it. In all such discussions, we have confined our talk to the basic premises, without going in too much detail.

We pray to Allãh, High is He, to guide us and keep our talk to the point; He is the Best Helper and the Best Guide.

Dependent on Allãh,

Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabāʾi.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful: People often take the name of one of their great and powerful personalities at the time of doing or beginning a work. By this association, it is believed, the work would achieve success, greatness and blessings; or that it would be a memorial to keep the named one's memory alive for ever. This is also observed in naming a child, a project, a house or an association — they give it the name of a deeply loved or highly respected person, so that his name would continue in this form; for example, a man names his son after his father, in order to perpetuate the father's memory.

This verse runs on the same line. Allãh began His speech with His Own name — Great is His name — so that the ideas taught in this chapter be stamped by, and associated with it. Also, it teaches a lesson to mankind, showing them the perfect manner of starting all their talks and actions; it guides them to put the stamp of the divine name on all their activities; doing every work for the sake of Allãh, associating it with His good names and attributes. In this way that action would neither be rendered null and void, nor remain incomplete; it has been started in the name of Allãh, and negation and annihilation cannot reach that sacred name.

Allãh has declared variously in the Qur'ãn that what is not for His Person must perish, is in vain; He will proceed to the deeds not done for His sake and shall render them as scattered floating dust; He shall forfeit what they have done and shall nullify their deeds; and that nothing shall remain except His honoured Person.

Therefore, what is done for the sake of Allãh and performed in His name, shall continue and will not perish. Everything, every work and every affair shall have its share of eternity — as much as it is related to Allãh. It is this reality that has been hinted at in the universally accepted tradition of the Prophet: "Every important affair, not begun with the name of Allãh, shall remain incomplete . . ." The word al-abtar (الأبْتَر = translated here as "incomplete") means a thing whose end is cut off, an animal whose tail is severed.

The preposition "bi" (بـ = in, with), in the phrase "In the name of Allãh", is related to an implied verb, "I begin". This verse, at this particular place, begins the speech which is a single action; this singleness comes from the singleness of its meaning; that is, the meaning intended to be conveyed, the aim and purpose of the speech.

Allãh has mentioned the purpose for which His speech — the whole Qur'ãn — has been revealed: . . . indeed, there has come to you a light and a clear Book from Allãh; with it Allãh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of safety . . . (5:15—16). There are other verses which show that the aim with which the Book — the speech of Allãh — has been sent down is the guidance of the people.

Therefore, the full import of the sentence would be as follows: The guidance, total guidance is begun with the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful; He is Allãh, Whom the servants return to; He is Beneficent, Who has opened the way of His All-encompassing mercy for believers and disbelievers alike, the mercy which provides them with all that is necessary and good for their existence and life; He is Merciful, Who has reserved His special mercy for the believers, the mercy which ensures their happiness in the life hereafter and their nearness to their Lord. Allãh has said: . . . and My mercy encompasses all things; so I will ordain it (specially) for those who guard (against evil) and pay zakãt, and those who believe in our signs (7:156). This explanation has been written, putting this verse in the framework of the whole Qur'ãn, of which it is the first sentence.

Again, Allãh has repeatedly mentioned "chapter" in His speech. For example: Say: "Then bring a chapter like this..." (10:38); Say: "Then bring ten chapters like it, forged . . ." (11:13); And whenever a chapter is revealed . . . (9:86); (This is) a chapter which We have revealed . . . (24:1). It shows that Allãh Himself has divided His speech in various parts, each part being called a chapter. It naturally means that every chapter is a single unit in structure and in fullness of meaning; and that that unity is not found between various verses of a chapter or between one chapter and the other. It necessarily follows that the theme of every chapter is different from the other; every chapter is revealed with a certain aim in view, and when that aim is achieved the chapter comes to its end.

Therefore, the verse, “In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful” coming at the beginning of every chapter, refers to the particular theme of that chapter.

Accordingly, this verse, at the beginning of this chapter of “The Opening", refers also to the theme of this chapter. It appears from its semantic flow that its purpose is to praise Allãh and to pledge the believer's servitude (declaring that he worships only Allãh and seeks help from Him only) and then to pray for divine guidance. This speech has been uttered by Allãh, on be-half of His servant, so that the servant may learn how, by repeating these words, he may show his gratitude to, and servitude before, Allãh.

This pledging of servitude is the important work which the servant of Allãh intends to do; and which he begins in the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful. In this context, this verse would mean: In Thy name, I pledge my servitude to Thee.

In this first verse of this chapter, therefore, the preposition, “in", is related to the implied verb, “I begin"; and the aim is to perfect the sincere servitude by addressing the pledge to Allãh Himself. Some people have said that the implied verb is “I seek help” (by); although this view is not objectionable, but “I begin” is more appropriate — the chapter explicitly seeks divine help, “and Thee do we beseech for help"; therefore, it is not necessary in the beginning.

“al-Ism” (الاِسْمُ = name) is the word that points to the named thing or person. It is derived from as-simah (السِّمَة = sign, identifying mark) or as-sumuww (السُّمُوّ = height, eminence). In any case, it is the word by which an individual thing or person is spoken of or spoken to. Naturally, it is other than, and separate from, the named thing.

The following is a sample of the academic exercises so much loved by the ancients:

There is a name that means “the person himself seen in the light of an attribute"; such a name is not separate from the named person; it is the person himself. The word al-ʻÃlim (العالِم = The Knower), one of the divine names, points to the Person of Allãh as seen in the light of His attribute of Knowledge. At the same time, it refers to Allãh Who cannot be known except by one or the other of His attributes. Let us explain this matter in another way: "Name" points to the named person; likewise the personal traits and characteristics point to the holder of those traits and characteristics — in this way, we may say that the personal traits are the "names" of the person concerned. "Name", accordingly, can be of two kinds: in words, and in substance. The direct name is of the second type, ,that is, the personal trait that points to its own subjects — for example, the "Knowledge" that points to Allãh, the holder of the knowledge. And the word "the Knower" is in reality an indirect name — it points to the direct name, that is, the attribute of knowledge, which in its turn directly points to its holder, that is, Allãh. "Knowledge" is, thus, the name of Allãh, and "the Knower" is "the name of the name".

The above was the result of the academic analysis (or should we say, mental luxury!) mentioned earlier; but such things should not be imposed on language and literature. "Name", according to the "plain Arabic language", means what we have written earlier. There was a lot of controversy going on among the theologians of the early centuries of Islam: whether the name was separate from the named person or not. Such unnecessary polemics is out of place at present times; it is self-evident that "name" and "named" are two things, and not one. We should not waste time and energy in quoting the ancients' arguments and counter-arguments, and in judging who was right.

"Allãh" (اللّٰه = the divine name) was originally al-Ilãh (الاله); the "I" (اِ) in the middle was omitted because of frequent use. al-Ilãh is derived from alaha (اَلَهَ = he worshipped) or from aliha or waliha (اَلِهَ or وَلِهَ = he was bewildered). It is on paradigm of al-fi`ãl ( اَلفِعالُ ) in meaning of al-maf`ũl (اَلمَفعُول = object-noun); for example, al-kitãb (اَلكِتابُ)means al-maktũb (اَلمَكْتوبُ = the written); likewise al-Ilãh means al-Ma'lũh (اَلمَألُوهُ) is, the One who is worshipped, or the One about whom minds are bewildered.

Quite clearly, it has become the proper name of God. It was commonly used in this meaning in Arabic long before the Qur'ãn was revealed. The fact that even pre-Islamic Arabs used this name for God, may be inferred from the following verses:

And if you should ask them who created them, they would certainly say: "Allãh". . . (43:87).

. . . and they say: "This for Allãh" — so they assert — "and this is for our associates". . . (6:136).

Other divine names may be used as adjectives for this name; for example, "the Beneficent and the Merciful Allãh"; also, this name is used as subject of the verbs derived from other divine names; for example, "Allãh knew", "Allãh had mercy", "Allãh gave sustenance" etc. But the word, "Allãh", is never used as adjective to any other name, nor is the verb derived from it used to describe other names. It is a clear proof that it is the proper name of God.

The divine existence, inasmuch as Allãh is the God of everything, presupposes that He should have all the attributes of perfection; and, as a result, this name points to all perfect attributes. That is why it is said that the name, "Allãh", means "the Person Who is the Essential Being, and Who encompasses all the attributes of perfection". But the fact is that it is the proper name of God and no other meaning (except that related to worship or bewilderment) has been taken into consideration here.

"ar-Raḥmãn ar-Raḥīm" (اَلرَّحْمنُ الرَّحيمُ = The Beneficent, the Merciful) are two adjectives derived from ar-raḥmah (اَلرَّحْمَةُ = mercy).

When you see someone suffering from a deficiency which he cannot remove by himself, the reaction which you experience and which tells you to provide him with what he needs in order to make up his deficiency, is called mercy. Ultimately, mercy means giving and bestowing to fulfil other's need. It is this latter meaning in which this attribute is used for Allãh.

"ar-Raḥmãn" (اَلرَّحْمنُ) is on a paradigm which is used for magnification and exaggeration. "ar-Raḥīm" (اَلرَّحِيْمُ) is a paradigm of as-Sifãtu 'l-mushabbahah (اَلصِّفَةُ الْمُشَبِّهَةُ = perpetual adjective, inseparable attribute). Therefore, "ar-Rahmãn" (translated here as "the Beneficent") relates to that all-encompassing mercy that is bestowed upon the believers and the unbelievers alike. It is used in the Qur'ãn, mostly in this meaning. Allãh says: The Beneficent (God) is firm in power (20:5); Say: "As for him who remains in error, the Beneficent (God) will surely prolong his length of days. . . (19:75). "ar-Raḥīm" (translated here as "the Merciful"), on the other hand, is more appropriate for that mercy which shall remain for ever, the perpetual inexhaustible mercy that shall be bestowed on the believers in the life hereafter. Allãh says: . . . and He is Merciful to the believers (33:43); surely to them (i.e., the believers) He is Compassionate, Merciful (9:117). That is why it is said that the mercy of "ar-Rahmãn" is common for the believers and the unbelievers, and that of "ar-Raḥīm" is reserved for the believers.

QUR'ÃN: All praise is due to Allãh: It has been said that "alḥamd" (اَلحَمْدُ) is to praise someone for a good acquired by his own intention, "al-madḥ" (اَلمَدحُ = also translated as praise) is more general — it is used to praise even that good which someone is given without his will and power. If you praise someone for his benevolence, you may use either word — al-ḥamd or al-madḥ but if you want to praise a pearl for its lustre, you may use the verb al-madḥ, but not al-ḥamd because the pearl has not acquired that lustre by its own will and power.

"al" (الْـ = translated here as "all") in "al-ḥamd" denotes either species or praise, or each and every praise. The end-result is the same in either case; that is why it has been translated here as "all".

Allãh says: That is Allãh, your Lord, the Creator of every thing (40:62). Whatever there is, is created by Allãh. Again He says: . . . Who made good everything that He has created (32: 7). Everything is good because it has been created by Allãh and is attributed to Him. In other words, a thing becomes good because it is created by Allãh; and everything created by Him is good. Every creature is good and beautiful because Allãh has made it so; and every good and beautiful thing is created by Allãh, attributed to Him. Allãh says: He is Allãh, the One, the Subduer (of all) (39:4); And the faces are humbled before the Living, the Self-subsistent God . . . (20:111). In other words, He has created the creatures by His own knowledge, power and will, and not because He was compelled by someone else to do so. Therefore, everything is His own good work, done by His own will.

The above discourse was about Allãh's action. Coming to His names, He has said: Allãh is He besides Whom there is no god; His are the very best names (20:8); And Allãh's are the best names; therefore call on Him thereby, and leave alone those who violate the sanctity of His names (7:180). It is clear that Allãh is good in His names and good in His actions; and that every good and beauty emanates from Him.

Therefore, Allãh is praised for His good names as He is praised for His good actions. Every praise, uttered by any speaker for any good deed is in reality addressed to Allãh only; because every good (which is the object of praise) emanates from Him only. In short, to Him belongs the species of the praise and all and every praise.

The verse: "Thee do we worship", shows that the whole chapter is revealed on behalf of man. Allãh teaches him in this chapter how to praise his Lord and how to show his allegiance to, and humility towards, Him. And the phrase, "All praise is due to Allãh", further strengthens this inference, as will be seen in the next paragraph.

The praise means to attribute, to ascribe; and Allãh has declared that He is above all that His servants ascribe to Him. He has said: Hallowed be Allãh (for freedom) from what they ascribe, except the servants of Allãh, freed (from sins) (37:159 -160). This declaration is general and unconditional; and it is further proved by the fact that not a single verse in the Qur'ãn ascribes the action of "praise" to anyone except Allãh and some of the prophets (who were doubtlessly freed from sins). Allãh addresses Nab (Noah — a.s.) in these words: . . . Say: "All praise is due to Allãh who delivered us from the unjust people" (23:28). And He quotes Ibrahīm (Abraham — a.s.) as saying: "Praise be to Allãh, Who gave me in old age Isma `il and Isḥãq . . ." (14:39) . Also, He told His Prophet, Muhammad (s.a.w.a.), in several places, And say: "Praise be to Allãh . . ." (27:93). Further, he says about Dãwũd and Sulaymãn (peace be on both of them): . . . and they both said: "Praise be to Allãh . . ." (27:15). Another exception is of the people of the Paradise — and they also are freed from spite and rancour as well as from vain and sinful words: . . . and the last of their cry shall be. "Praise be to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds" (10:10).

As for other creatures, the Qur'ãn never says that they "praise" Allãh — they always "glorify Allãh with His praise". Allãh says: . . . and the angels declare His glory with the praise of their Lord . . . (42:5); and the thunder declares His glory with His praise . . . (13:13); and there is not a single thing but glorifies Him with His praise . . . (17:44). In all these verses "praise" is preceded by glorifying; rather "glorifying" is the main verb and "with praise" is only a clause, attached to it. None except Allãh may comprehend the beauty and perfection of His work, nor can anyone else understand the beauty and perfection of His names and attributes. Allãh says: . . they do not comprehend Him in knowledge . . . (20:110). In this background, if they were to praise Him it would mean that they had comprehended Him in their knowledge; in other words, Allãh would be surrounded by their limited understanding, confined within the boundary of their comprehension. Therefore, they were careful enough to first declare His glory from all the limits of their comprehension, before starting His praise. Allãh says: . . . surely Allãh knows and you do not know (16:74).

So far as His purified servants are concerned, He treats their utterance of praise as though He Himself has said it, because they are free from sins and defects.

From the above discourse, it becomes crystal-clear what the good manner of servitude demands: The servant should praise his Lord in exactly the same words the Lord Himself has chosen for Himself; no deviation from it would be tolerable, as the Prophet has said in an universally accepted tradition; "I do not enumerate Thy praise; Thou art as Thou Thyself hast praised Thyself . . ."

Therefore, the divine word, "All praise is due to Allãh", is a sort of a training to the servant — a training without which he could not know how to declare the praise of Allãh.

QUR'ÃN: the Lord of the worlds, the Beneficent, the Merciful, the Master of the Day of Judgement: "ar-Rabb" (اَلرَّبُ) is the Master Who manages the affairs of His servant. The word, thus, connotes the idea of ownership. Ownership (in our social structure) is a special relationship of one thing with another — a relationship that allows the owner to do with the owned thing as he wishes. When we say, "This thing belongs to us", it shows that it has a special relationship with us that allows us to do with it as we wish;

had it not been for this relationship, we would not have had this authority over it. In this social context, it is an idea which the society has laid down but which has no existence out-side imagination. This idea is derived from another real and positive concept, which too is called “ownership": Our limbs and faculties, like the sight, the hearing, the hands and the feet, belong to us — they exist because of our own existence, they have no independent existence, they depend on us for their existence and continuity, and we use them as we like. This is the real ownership.

The ownership that may be attributed to Allãh is the real one, and not that which is based on subjective outlook. Obviously the real ownership cannot be disjoined from management of the affairs of the owned thing. The owned thing depends on the owner in its existence, as well as in all affairs related to its existence. Allãh is “ar-Rabb” the Lord of everything because the Lord is the owner who manages the affairs of, and looks after, the owned thing — and only Allãh has this attribute.

"al-ʻÃlamīn” (اَلْعَالَمِيْنَ) is the plural of al-ʻãlam (اَلْعَالَمُ = the world) which literally means, “what one is known with". This paradigm is used for “instrument ", like al -qãlab (اَلْقَالَبُ = the mold, the form), al-khãtam (اَلْخَاتَمُ = the seal, , the instrument of sealing), and aṭ-ṭãbaʻ (اَلطَّابِعُ = the stamp, the impress). The word al-ʻãlam is used for the universe — the whole creation taken together. Also it is used for each genes or species taken separately, for example, the inorganic world, the vegetable world, the animal world, the human world. It is also used for a class of a species, like the Arab world, the African world etc. This last meaning is more appropriate in the context of these verses: The verses that enumerate the good names of Allãh until they come to “the Master of the Day of Judgement". The judgement is reserved for mankind alone or together with the jinn. Therefore, the “worlds” should refer to the worlds of the human beings and the jinn, that is, their various groups. The word al-`ãlamin (the worlds) has been used in this sense in other Qur'ãnic verses too. Allãh says: . . . and has chosen you above the women of the worlds (3:42); . . . so that he may be a warner to the worlds (25:1); What! do you commit an indecency which any one in the worlds has not done before you (7:80).

"The Master of the Day of Judgement": We have explained above the meaning of ownership, that is, mastership. The word "al-mãlik" (اَلْمالِكُ) is derived from al-milk (اَلْمِلْكُ = possession, to possess). Some reciters have read this word as "al –malik" (اَلْمَلِكُ = the sovereign, the king); it is derived from al-mulk (اَلْمُلْكُ = country; kingdom). The king is the one who has the authority to manage his nation's affairs; nevertheless he does not own the nation or the country. In other words, he holds the authority for management and administration.

The reciters have given the reasons for their preference of either recitation. But the fact remains that Allãh is the Master as well as the King, and both words are equally correct, so far as the divine authority is concerned. Looking at it from linguistic point of view, the word, "King" is generally used in context of time and period. It is said, "the King of that time"; but they do not say "the master of that time", as it would be stretching the meaning too far. In this verse, Allãh has used this word in reference to a certain "day"; therefore, linguistically, it would be more proper to say, "the King of the Day of Judgement". Moreover, Allãh has used the word, "Kingdom" in context of the same day in other verse: To whom belongs the kingdom of this day? To Allãh, the One, the Subduer (of all) (40:16).

ar-Rich (a.s.) said in explanation of the divine words: In the name of Allãh: *"*It means: `I mark my soul with one of the marks of Allãh', and it is (His) worship." He was asked: "What is the `mark'?" He said; "The brand." (`Uyunu 'l-akhbdr and Ma 'ant ʾl-akhbdr)

The author says: This meaning emanates from the explanation given earlier that the preposition, "in", herein connotes beginning. As the servant marks his worship with the name of Allãh, he brands his soul — real doer of the worship — with one of the divine marks.

It is narrated in at-Tahdhīb from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.), and in `Uyunu 'l-akhbãr and at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyãshi from ar-Riḍã (a.s.) that this verse "is nearer to the Greatest name of Allãh than the iris of the eye is from its white".

The author says: This tradition will be explained when we shall talk about the Greatest name.

Amīru 'l-mu'minīn (a.s.) said that (this verse) is from the chapter of The Opening; and verily the Apostle of Allãh used to recite it and count it as one of its verses, and he used to say, "The Opening of the Book is 'the seven oft-repeated' (verses)". (`Uyunu 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: This matter has also been narrated by the Sunni narrators. ad-Dãr-quṭnī narrates from Abu Hurayrah that he said: "The Apostle of Allãh said: When you recite (the chapter of) The Praise (i.e., The Opening), you shall recite, In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful, because it is the source of the Book and (is) the seven oft-repeated (verses), and, In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful is one of its verses. aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "What have they done? May Allãh destroy them! They proceeded to the greatest verse of the Book of Allãh, and thought that it would be an innovation (unlawful act)

if they recited it loudly!" (al-Khiṣãl)

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said: "They stole the most exalted verse of the Book of Allãh, (that is) In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful. It should be recited at the start of every big or small work, so that it may be blessed.

The author says: There are numerous traditons of this meaning coming from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.). All of them prove that the verse (In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful) is a part of every chapter, except the ninth ("Repentance"); and the Sunni traditions also prove it:

Anas (ibn Mãlik) said that the Apostle of Allãh said: "Just now a chapter has been sent down to me." Then he began reciting, "In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful." (aṣ-Ṣahīh, Muslim).

Abu Dãwũd narrates from Ibn `Abbãs (and they say that its chain is "correct") that he said: "Verily, the Apostle of Allãh did not know the separation of a chapter (and in another narrative it is 'end of a chapter') until came down to him: In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful."

The author says: This matter has been narrated by Shi `ite narrators also from al-Bãqir (a.s.).

It is reported in al-Kãfī, at-Tawḥīd, Ma`ãni 'l-akhbãr and at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyãshi that aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a tradition: "And Allãh is God of everything, ar-Raḥmãn (the Beneficent) for all His creations, ar-Raḥīm (the Merciful) especially for the believers."

as -Sadiq (as.) has said: "ar-Raḥmãn (the Beneficent) is a special name with a general attribute; and ar-Raḥīm (the Merciful) is a general name with a special attribute."

The author says: The preceding commentary may explain why the mercy of "the Beneficent" is general for the believer and the unbeliever alike, and why that of "the Merciful" is reserved for the believer only. The description given in this tradition that “the Beneficent is a special name with a general attribute, and the Merciful is a general name with a special attribute", perhaps this refers to the fact that the mercy of the Beneficent is limited to this world and is common or the whole creation; and that of the Merciful is common to this world and the here-after but is reserved for the believer. In other words, the mercy of the Beneficent is reserved for the creative blessings that are bestowed on believers and unbelievers alike; and that of the Merciful is common to the creative and legislative blessings (the latter opening the way to happiness and felicity) and is reserved for believers, because only the bounties bestowed upon them will last for ever, and the (good) end is for guarding (against evil) and for piety.

It is narrated in Kashfu 'l-ghummah that aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: “A mule of my father was lost. He said: ‘If Allãh brought it back to me, I would thank Him with praises He would be pleased with.’ Shortly afterwards, it was brought before him with its saddle and rein (intact). When he sat on it and arrayed his clothes, he raised his head towards heaven and said: ‘Praise be to Allãh.’ He said nothing more. Then he said: `I did not omit, nor did I leave out, anything; I have declared that all praises are for Allãh, Powerful and Great is He!; because there is no praise but it is included in this (formula).”

It is narrated in `Uyunu 'l-akhbãr that Ali (a.s.) was asked about its explanation. He said: “Verily, Allãh has explained to His servants broadly some of His bounties on them, as they can-not know all His bounties in detail — they are beyond enumeration and description. Therefore, He said: Say: ‘All praise is for Allãh on what He has bestowed upon us.’ ”

The author says: The Imãm points to the fact mentioned earlier that the praise, in this verse, is from the servant, and that Allãh has revealed it to teach him the manners of servitude and worship.

FROM PHILOSOPHICAL POINT OF VIEW

Reason tells us that an effect, as well as all its characteristics and affairs, depend on its cause; whatever perfection it may be having, is a shadow of the cause. If beauty or goodness has any existence, then its perfect and independent entity is for Allãh only, as He is the Cause of all causes. The praise and thank is ad-dressed, in reality, to the cause which creates the perfection and excellence referred to. As every perfection is caused by Allãh, every praise and thank, in reality, is addressed to Allãh. There-fore, all praise is for, and due to Allãh.

QUR'ÃN: Thee do we worship and Thee do we beseech for help: "al- 'Abd" (اَلْعَبْدُ) means slave, a human being who is owned. In its abstract sense, it is applied to other intellectual beings also, as the words of Allãh show: There is no one in the heavens and the earth but will come to the Beneficent God as ("`abdan" عَبْداً) a slave (19:93). In modern usage, it is commonly translated as 'servant'.

"al-`Ibãdah" ( اَلْعِبَادَةُ = to serve, to worship, to obey) is derived from this word. Its inflexion and meaning changes according to the context. al-Jawharī has written in his dictionary, aṣ-Ṣiḥãh, that "the basis of al- `ubũdiyyah (اَلْعُبُودِيَّةُ = bondage, servitude) is "al -khuḍu' (اَلْخُضُوعُ) submission." But this explanation is not of the word; it only shows a concomitant quality of its meaning; because al-khuḍũ' is used with the preposition "li" (لِـ), and al- `ibãdah is used without any preposition.[5] [5] This argument seems inconclusive. If two words are synonymous, it is not necessary for them to have the same preposition. al -Mawlã (اَلْمَوْلٰى) and al-awlã (اَلاَوْلٰى) have the same meaning — guardian, master; but the former is used without a preposition while the latter is followed by the preposition "b i" (بِـ = for, with, etc.).

When a servant of Allãh worships Him, he stands before the Lord as a slave stands before his master. That is why worship is diametrically opposed to arrogance and pride — but it is not so opposed to polytheism; after all, a slave may be jointly owned by two or more masters. Allãh says: Verily those who are arrogant to My worship shall soon enter Hell, disgraced (40:60). Also He says: . . . and he should not join anyone in the worship of his Lord (18:110). It should be noted here that polytheism — joining someone in the worship of Allãh — is a possibility, and that is why it has been made subject of this prohibition; none forbids an impossible thing. But arrogance does not exist with worship, and that is why the expression, "arrogant to my worship ", has been used in the first verse.

Servitude is effective in those affairs which are owned or controlled by the master; and not in other matters related to the slave, like his being son of his father, or having a height of so many centimetres — there is no submission or servitude in such things. But the mastership of Allãh is not limited; His mastership is not shared by anyone else, nor is the servitude of the creatures divided between Allãh and someone else. A master has only limited authority over his servants — he may employ them to perform certain duties, but he cannot kill them or punish them unjustly. But Allãh has total and all-encompassing authority over His servants; He does whatsoever He wills with them and about them. His ownership is unconditional and unlimited; and the servitude of His creatures is likewise unconditional and unlimited. This "ownership" is true and exclusive on both sides: The Lord has the exclusive ownership, and the slave has the exclusive servitude. The construction of the sentence, "Thee do we worship", points to this exclusiveness — the object, "Thee", has been placed before the verb, and worship is mentioned without any condition.

and subsists because of, and with, its owner. In this sense, it should not divert an onlooker's attention from its owner. You look at a house belonging to Zayd; if you are looking at it merely as a house, you may possibly lose sight of Zayd; but if you look at it from the angle that it is a property of Zayd, you cannot wean your thoughts from him.

The only true attribute of the universe is that it is created and owned by Allãh. Nothing in the creation can hide the divine presence, nor should looking at these things make one forgetful of Allãh. He is ever present, as He has said: Is it not sufficient as regards your Lord that he is a witness over all things? Now surely they are in doubt as to the meeting of their Lord; now surely He encompasses all things (41:53-54). The true worship, therefore, is that in which the worshipped and the worshipper both are present. Allãh should be worshipped as the One who is present before the worshipper — and that is why the third person of the preceding verses has been changed to the second person in this verse, "Thee do we worship". The worshipper should be present before his Lord, not only with his body but also with his soul; otherwise, the worship would be a body without soul, a form without life. Nor should he divide his attention between his Lord and someone (or something) else — neither openly, (as the idol-worshippers do) — nor secretly (like the one whose mind is on something else while worshipping Allãh, or the one who worships Allãh because he wants to enter the Garden or to save himself from the hell). All these diversions are various facets of poly-theism, and Allãh has forbidden it in His Book: . . . therefore, worship Allãh, being sincere to Him in religion (39:2). Now, surely, sincere religion is for Allãh (alone), and (as for) those who take guardians besides Him, (saying): We do not worship them save that they may make us nearer to Allãh, surely Allãh will judge between them in that in which they differ (39:3).

Worship shall be a true worship when it is done with pure intention, and this purity has been named as the presence of the worshipper. This will happen only when the attention of the worshipper is not fixed on anyone other than Allãh (otherwise, it would be polytheism); and when his aim of worship is not any other hope or fear like that of the paradise or the hell (otherwise, the worship would not be purely for Allãh). Moreover, he should not be concerned with his own self, as it would tantamount to egotism and arrogance, completely opposite of submission and servitude. Probably the plural pronoun — "we" worship — points to this fact; it negates the individuality of the worshipper as he includes himself in a multitude of people; it removes egotism, creates humility, and effaces the tendency of self-importance.

The declaration of one's servitude with the words, "Thee do we worship", is free from all defects, so far as its meaning and purity are concerned. Yet, as the servant describes the worship as his own act, it could create an impression that he thought to be independent in existence, power and will, while in fact he is only a slave and slave owns nothing. The second sentence, "and Thee do we beseech for help", removes this possible misunderstanding. It means: "We ascribe the worship to ourselves and make this claim only with Thy help; we are never independent of Thee. In other words, the complete verse, "Thee do we worship and Thee do we beseech for help", gives a single meaning, and that is "worship with purity of intention". Probably, that is why both sentences have the same style; otherwise, it could be said, 'Thee do we worship; help us and guide us . . .' The style has been changed in the next verse, "guide us . . ." and its reason will be explained later.

The above-given explanation makes it clear why the pronouns in this verse have been changed from the third to the second person; why the restrictive device of putting the object ("Thee") before the verb has been chosen; why the worship, in "do we worship", is used without any condition; why wor-shipper includes others with him in this declaration of allegiance and worship; why the second sentence is needed after the first; and why both have the same construction and style.

The scholars have written other fine points about this verse; the reader is advised to refer to their books for this purpose; Allãh is the creditor whose debt can never be repaid.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Guide us to the straight path . . . nor of those gone astray: The meaning of "al-hidãyah" (اَلْهِدايَةُ = guidance, to guide) may easily be understood, if we consider first the significance of the "path" . "aṣ-Ṣirãṭ" (اَلصِّرَاطُ = path) is synonymous with aṭ-ṭarīq (اَلطَّرِيْقُ) and as-sabīl (اَلسَّبِيْلُ). In these verses, Allãh has commended the path that it is straight and that it is the path taken by those upon whom Allãh has bestowed His bounties and favours. It is this path guidance to which has been asked for. And it is the ultimate goal of the worship: The servant prays to his Lord that his worship, clean from all impurities, be performed in this path.

Allãh has mentioned in His Book that He has laid down a path for man, nay, for all the creation, a path upon which they are proceeding. He says: O man! surely thou art striving to thy Lord, a hard striving, until thou art to meet Him (84:6); . . . and to Him is the ultimate resort (64:3); . . . now surely to Allãh do all affairs eventually come (42:53). There are many such verses, showing that all are proceeding on a prescribed road and that their destination is Allãh.

So far as the way is concerned, Allãh has said that there are two ways, not one: Did I not enjoin on you, O children of Adam! that you should not worship the Satan? Surely he is your open enemy. And that you should worship Me; this is the straight path (30:60-61). So, there is a straight path, and also there is another path. Again He has said: . . . then verily I am near; I answer the prayer of the suppliant when he calls on Me, so they should answer My call and believe in Me, that they may walk in the right way (2:186); Call upon Me, I will answer you. Verily, those who are arrogant to My worship shall soon enter hell, disgraced (40:60). Obviously, Allãh is near to His servants, and the nearer path to Him is that of worship and prayer. Compare it with description of those who do not believe in Him: . . . these shall be called to from a far-off place (41:44). Obviously, the station of unbelievers is far-off place.

There are thus two ways to Allãh, a near one — the way of the believers — and a distant one, that of the others. It is the first difference between the ways.

Second difference: Surely (as for) those who reject Our signs and turn away from them haughtily, the doors of heaven shall not be opened for them (7:40). What is the function of a door? To let authorized people pass through it and bar the entry to unauthorized ones. The verse shows that there is a passage from the lower level to the upper heights. On the other hand, Allãh says: . . . and to whomsoever My wrath descends he shall perish indeed (20:81). The word translated here as “shall perish” literally means “shall fall down". Therefore, these is another passage coming for the upper heights to the lower level. Also He says: . . . and whoever adopts unbelief instead of faith, he indeed has gone astray from (i.e., has lost) the right way (2:108). Allãh uses the term "polytheism" for "going astray".[6] Accordingly, people are divided into three categories: First, those who proceed to the upper heights — those who believe in the signs of Allãh and are not arrogant to His worship. Second, those who fall down to the lower levels — they are those upon whom the wrath of Allãh has descended. Third, those who have gone astray from the right path; they are lost, wandering hither and thither. The last verse under discussion points to these three categories: "the path of those upon whom Thou hast bestowed favours, not of those inflicted by Thy wrath, nor of those gone astray."

Obviously, "the straight path" is separate from the last two paths. It is the path of the believers who are not arrogant. At the same time, the following verse shows that the straight path itself may be divided in various "traffic lanes", ways or branches: . . . Allãh will exalt those of you who believe, and those who are given knowledge, in high degrees . . . (58:11). This statement needs some elaboration:

Every straying is polytheism and vice versa, as may be inferred from the words of Allãh: . . . and whoever adopts unbelief instead of faith, he indeed has gone astray from the right way (2:108). The same is the theme of the verse: Did not I en-join on you, O children of Adam! that you should not worship the Satan? Surely he is your open enemy. And that you should worship Me; this is the straight path. And certainly he has led astray a great multitude from among you (36:60-62). Likewise, the Qur'ãn counts polytheism as injustice and vice versa, as may be seen in the words which the Satan shall utter after the judgement will be delivered against him and his followers: . . . surely I disbelieved in your associating me with

Allãh, before; surely it is the unjust that shall have the painful punishment (14:22). Then it counts injustice as straying: Those who believe and do not mix up their faith with injustice, those are they who shall have the security and they are those who shall be guided aright (6:82). It should be noted that they shall be guided aright and shall have security against straying or its resulting punishment only if they do not mix their faith with injustice and inequity.

It is clear from looking at these verses together that going stray, polytheism and inequity all have the same effect; all three are adjunct to each other. That is why it is said that each of them is indentifiable by the other two. For all practical purposes the three are one and the same, although they may be different in their literal meaning.

The straight path, then, is different from that of those who have gone astray; it is a path which is far away from polytheism and injustice. There can be no straying in this path — neither in hidden ideas and beliefs (for example, the disbelief or the thoughts disapproved by Allãh); nor in open actions or omissions (like committing a sin or omitting a good deed). It is the true mono-theism in belief and in deeds. And what is there after the truth but error? The above-mentioned verse 6: 82, fits on it completely. That verse guarantees security in the way and promises perfect guidance. The promise is inferred from the fact that the original word translated as "guided aright" is noun-agent, and the grammarians say that such a noun is really made for future. This is one feature of the straight path.

Allãh has identified those bestowed with divine favours, in the verse: And whoever obeys Allãh and the Apostle, these are with those upon whom Allãh has bestowed favours from among the prophets and the truthful and the martyrs and the righteous ones; and excellent are these as companions (4:69). The belief and the obedience have been explained shortly before it in these words: But no! by your Lord! they do not believe (in reality) until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then they do not find any straitness in their selves as to what you have decided, and submit with total submission. And if We had prescribed for them: Kill yourselves or go forth from your homes, they would not have done it except a few of them; and if they had done what they were admonished, it would have certainly been better for them and most efficacious in strengthening (them) (4:65 - 66). Those who truly believe are really strong in their servitude and submission, in words and in deeds; in appearance and in secret. Yet such perfect believers shall be placed in a rank behind those upon whom Allãh has bestowed favours; that is why Allãh has said, "these are with those . . ." and not, among those'. They shall be with them, but not of them. It is further strengthened by the last sentence, "and excellent are these as companions". Companions are other than the self.

There is another, somewhat similar, verse in fifty-seventh chapter: and (as for) those who believe in Allãh and His apostles, these it is that are the truthful and the martyrs with their Lord; they shall have their reward and their light . . . (57:19). The believers, thus, shall be included in the ranks of the martyrs and the truthful — in the life hereafter. The fact that it will happen in the next world is inferred from the words, "with their Lord", and "they shall have their reward".

Those bestowed with divine- favours who are the people of the straight path — with whose relationship the straight path is identified — have greater prestige and higher rank than these believers who have cleansed their beliefs and actions from straying, polytheism and injustice. Pondering on these verses together, one feels sure that this group of the believers (with this quality) still continues; it has not come to its end. Had this group completed its term, it would have been counted among (and not, "with") those bestowed with favours; these believers would have gone up and instead of being with those bestowed with favours, would have become part of them. They probably are among those who have been given knowledge from Allãh, as He says: Allãh will exalt those of you who believe, and those who are given know-ledge, in high degrees (58:11).

The people of the straight path are bestowed with excellent bounties that are more precious than that of the complete faith and perfect belief. This is the second feature of the straight path.

Allãh repeatedly mentions aṣ-ṣirãt (path) and as-sabīl (way) in the Qur'ãn; but He has never attributed to Himself except one straight path; although He attributes several ways to Himself. And (as for) those who strive hard for Us. We will most certainly guide them onto Our ways (29:69).

Likewise, He has never ascribed "the straight path" to any of his servants, the only exception being this verse under discussion which ascribes it to those who are bestowed with divine favours; but He frequently attributes "the way" to one or the other of His chosen servants: Say: "This is my way; I invite you unto Allãh; with clear sight (are) I and he who follows me" (12:108); . . . and follow the way of him who turns to Me (31:15); . . . the way of the believers. . . (4:115). It is an indication that "the way" is other than "the straight path". There may be various and different ways taken by various chosen servants proceeding on the way of worship and submission; but "the straight path" is only one, as Allãh points to it in these words: Indeed, there has come to you a light and a clear Book from Allãh; with it Allãh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of safety and brings them out of utter darkness into light by His permission and guides them to the straight path (5:15-16). See, how the verse refers to "the ways" (in plural), and to "the straight path" (in singular). Now, there may be two explanations for it. Either "the straight path" is the same thing as "the ways", or "the ways" on going further join together and then merge into the straight path.

There is another difference between the straight path and the way. Allãh says: And most of them do not believe in Allãh without associating others (with Him) (12:106). Note how the believers are said to associate others with Allãh. It shows that some sort of polytheism (that is, straying) may co-exist with belief (and the belief is a "way"); in other words the way may co-exist with polytheism. But the straight path cannot do so because it is not the path of those who have gone astray.

Each of these ways has some excellence or some deficiency — but not so the straight path. Each way is a part of the straight path, but is distinguished from the other ways. It may be inferred from the above-mentioned verses as well as from others. For example, Allãh says: And that you worship Me; this is the straight path (36:61); Say: "Surely, (as for) me, my Lord has guided me to the straight path; (to) a most right religion, the faith of Ibrãḥīm the upright one" (6:161). The worship and the religion are common to all the ways, and they are *also "*the straight path". The relation of the straight path to the ways of Allãh is that of the soul to the body. The body, during the life, undergoes countless changes, varies from day to day — from infancy to childhood; from adolescence to youth, from middle to old age and to senility. But the soul remains the same, and is always one with body at every stage. Sometimes, the body is inflicted with undesirable effects, which the soul would never accept, if left to itself. But the soul — the creation of Allãh, upon which He created the man — never deteriorates. Yet, in all these states, the body remains one with the soul. Likewise, the ways of Allãh are one with the straight path; but sometimes a way — the way of the believers, of the followers of the Prophet of those who turn towards Allãh or any other way — suffers from some kind of deterioration, although the straight path is immune from all defects and imperfections. You have seen how one of the ways, the belief, sometimes combines with polytheism and straying, but the straight path does not do so. In short, the ways are of various grades — near or distant; safe or unsafe; clean or unclean — but all are in the straight path, or, let us say, are one with the straight path.

Allãh has mentioned this fact, in a parable of truth and falsehood, in these words: He sends down water from the heaven, then the valleys flow according to their measure, and the torrent bears along the swelling foam; and from what they melt in the fire for the sake of (making) ornaments or apparatus arises a scum like it; thus does Allãh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it remains in the earth; thus does Allãh set forth parables (13:17). It clearly shows that the hearts and mind differ in their abilities and capacities to receive the divine knowledge and spiritual perfection, although all partake of the same divine sustenance. (Its full explanation will be written in the ch. 13).

This was, however, the third feature of the straight path.

From the above analysis it may be seen that the straight path is a sort of controller of all the ways leading to Allãh. We may say that a way leading to Allãh leads a man to Him as long as it remains one with the straight path; but the straight path leads to Allãh unconditionally, without any if or but. That is why Allãh has named it "aṣ-ṣirsãṭu 'l-mustaqīm" (اَلصِّرَاطُ اَلْمُسْتَقِيْمُ = the straight path). aṣ-Ṣirãṭ means a clear path, and is derived from "saraṭttu sarṭan" (سَرَطْتُّ سَرْطاً = I swallowed it completely); in other words, this clear path swallows its walkers without letting them go out. "al-Mustaqīm" (اَلْمُسْتَقِيْمُ = straight) literally means the one who stands on his legs, and has full control of himself as well as of the things attached to him. In other words, it is a thing which is not subjected to change or variation. Thus "aṣ-ṣirãṭu 'l-mustaqīm" = the straight path is the path which never fails to guide and to lead the walker to his destination.

Allãh says: Then as for those who believe in Allãh and hold fast unto Him, soon will He admit them to Mercy from Him and (His) Grace, and guide them unto Himself (by) the straight path (4:175). Obviously this guidance does not fail; it always succeeds. Also He has said: Therefore (for) whomsoever Allãh intends that He would guide him aright, He expands his breast for Islam, and (for) whomsoever He intends that He should leave him to err, He makes his breast strait and narrow as though he were ascending into the sky; thus does Allãh lay uncleanliness on those who do not believe. And this is the path of your Lord, (a) straight (path) (6:125-126). That is, this is Allãh's path that never changes, nor does it fail to reach its destination. Again He says: He said: "This is a straight path with Me; surely as regards My servants, thou hast no authority over them except those who follow thee of the deviators" (15:41-42). The verse declares that this is His settled course which never varies. In this way, it conveys the same idea which is contained in the verse: For you shall not find any alteration in the course of Allãh; and you shall not find any change in the course of Allãh (35:43).

The above-mentioned discourse has made the following points clear:

First: There are various ways to Allãh, each differing with others in perfection, easiness and smoothness. It all depends on its nearness or remoteness from the basic reality, from the straight path, like the way of submission, of faith, of worship, of purity of intention or of humility before Allãh. Some of the ways leading to the opposite direction are disbelief, polytheism, infidelity, exceeding the bounds, committing sins etc. Allãh has said: And for all are grades according to what they did, and so that He may pay them back fully their deeds and they shall not be dealt with unjustly (46:19).

The same is the case with the spiritual knowledge which the human mind receives from Allãh. They vary according to mental and spiritual capacity of the receivers, and are tinted by colours of visions of the beholders. This fact is shown in the Qur'ãnic parable mentioned earlier: He sends down water from the heaven, then the valleys flow according to their measure . . . (13:17).

Second: The straight path controls all the ways. Likewise, the people of the straight path (who have been firmly established in it by Allãh) do enjoy complete authority to guide the other servants of Allãh. Allãh says: . . . and excellent are these ascompanions (4:69); Verily, your only Master is Allãh and His Apostle and those who believe, those who keep up prayer and pay zakãt while they are bowing down (5:55). The last mentioned verse was revealed about `Ali, the Leader of the faithful (a.s.), as al-mutawãtir traditions say; and he (peace be on him) was the first to open this door in Islam. More details of it will be given in the fifth chapter.

Third: The import of the guidance to the way depends on the meaning of the way itself. al-Hidãyah (اَلْهِدايَةُ) means to guide, to lead; it accepts two objects, either without any preposition (as in the language of Ḥijãz) or with ilã (اِلـٰى = to) before the second object (as in the language of other tribes). This detail has been given in aṣ-Ṣiḥãḥ of al-Jawharī, and obviously it is correct.

Before going further, a mistaken notion should be removed. Some people think that the meaning of guidance changes, depending on whether its second object is preceded by the preposition 'ila' or not. If there is no such preposition, then according to them, guidance means "to convey to the destination"; if it is preceded by then it denotes "to show the path". In evidence, they offer the following verses: Surely you cannot guide whom you love, but Allãh guides whom He pleases (28:56). This verse, in which the verbs, "cannot guide" and "guides", have been used without preposition, says that the Prophet could not guide whom he pleased. But it is known that he, throughout his life, guided the people, that is, showed them the path of Allãh. There-fore, what has been negated must be the other meaning. What the verse, then, says is this: you cannot convey to the spiritual goal whom you please; but it is Allãh who conveys to that destination whom He pleases. This difference in meaning is more clearly seen in the verses: And We would certainly have guided them in the right path (4:68). The verb (in the Arabic text) has been used without any preposition and it refers to the divine guidance — that is, conveyance to destination. And Allãh addresses the Prophet in these words: and most surely you guide to the right path (42:52). Here the verb is followed by ilã and the sentence attributes to the Prophet the task of guidance, in the meaning of showing the way. According to their reasoning the three verses put together show that when guidance is used in the meaning of "conveying to destination", its second object accepts no preposition; when it is used for "showing the path", the said object is preceded by ilã.

But this notion is not supported by the Qur'ãn. Allãh quotes the believer of the people of Pharaoh as saying: "O my people! follow me, I will guide you to the right course" (40:38). Here the Arabic text has no preposition and yet it does not mean conveying to destination, it only denotes showing the way.

What has been mentioned in the verse 28:56 (Surely you cannot guide whom you love, but Allãh guides whom He pleases) is the reality or perfection of guidance. The verse shows that the Prophet could not bestow on his people the perfect guidance, the reality of guidance, as it was a task that Allãh has reserved for Himself.

In short, the meaning of guidance does not depend on preposition ilã coming or not coming before the second object. In both cases the meaning is the same.

al-Hidãyah means to guide, to show the destination by showing the way, or, let us say, to convey to the destination.

Guidance, in reality, is reserved for Allãh, and He guides His servants by creating such causes that point the destination to them and lead them to their spiritual goal. Allãh says: Therefore (for) whomsoever Allãh intends that He would guide him aright, He expands his breast for Islam (6:125); . . . then their skins and their hearts become pliant to the remembrance of Allãh; this is Allãh's guidance, He guides with it whom He pleases (39:23). The verb "become pliant" is followed by the preposition "to", giving the verb a shade of meaning of inclination and repose. Guidance, thus, means that Allãh creates in the heart an aptitude by which it initiates, accepts, inclines towards and becomes serene in the remembrance of Allãh.

It has been mentioned earlier that there are many ways leading to Allãh. Consequently, guidance for one way would differ from those of the others. Each way has a special guidance of its own. This variation has been hinted at in the verse: And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them unto Our ways; and Allãh is most surely with the doers of good (29:69). A man strives "in the way of Allãh"; and another strives "for Allãh". There is a great difference between the two. The first tries to keep the way safe and free from all dangers and blockades; the second's attention is fixed on Allãh only. It is this man who is praised in this verse — he strives hard for Allãh; thereupon Allãh helps him and guides him on the way most suited to his ability and power; and thereafter keeps guiding him from one way to another until He exclusively attaches him to Himself.

Fourth: The straight path is preserved in the ways of Allãh — the ways that are of various grades and levels. Allãh guides man to it; and the man is thus guided aright. As mentioned above, Allãh may keep guiding a man from one way to the other which is of a higher grade, and then to a third one still higher. The prayer in this verse, "Guide us to the straight path" (revealed on behalf of those whom Allãh has already guided to His worship) points to this very fact. If we keep this point in view, there would be no room for an objection like the following: The one who utters this prayer is already guided aright — how can he pray afresh for guidance? It would be an attempt to re-obtain a thing which is already in hand, and it is just impossible. Also, the worshipper is already on the straight path — how can he pray to be guided again to the same path? Isn't it an impossibility?

But the explanation given by us clears away the mist of such objections.

Another objection: Our Law is the most perfect and most comprehensive of all the laws sent by Allãh since the dawn of humanity. Why should we ask from Allãh to guide us to the path of those of the previous people upon whom He had bestowed favours?

Reply: Admittedly, the Law brought by Muhammad (s. a. w.a.) is more perfect than any other one. But it does not necessarily mean that all those who follow this Law are more perfect than all those who followed the previous laws. An average follower of the Law of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) cannot surpass Nũh or Ibrãḥīm (a.s.), although their laws were sent long before the Islamic Law. It is one thing to accept and follow a law; it is quite another to get spiritual perfection by total submission — by perfectly moulding oneself in that law's pattern. A believer of previous nations who attained a high spiritual level, who became a mirror of divine attributes, is most certainly better than, and superior to, a follower of this law who did not reach that state — even though the latter would be following the most perfect and comprehensive law, that is, the Law of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.). Therefore, it is quite in order for a believer of lower grade (although he may follow a perfect law) to pray to Allãh to help him reach the level of a believer of higher grade (although he might have followed a less perfect law).

An exegete has replied to the above-mentioned objection

in a way that is not free from defects. He has said: The religion of Allãh is one, and that is Islam. The fundamental truths — the belief in One God, the Prophethood and the Day of Judgement and all that results from this belief — are the same in all the laws and revelations sent by Allãh. The Law of Islam has an added distinction, in that it covers all aspects of human life and is, thus, the most comprehensive one. It looks more properly after public welfare. Moreover, its foundation is laid on reasoning — in all its forms: The logic, the admonition and the goodly argumentation. All divine religions are, thus, the same and the fundamental truths are common to all. The previous people have preceded us in this path. Therefore, Allãh has ordered us to look into their affairs, to take lessons from them and to follow them to spiritual perfection.

The author says: The principle upon which this reply is based is against the principles that guide us in exegesis of the Qur'ãn. The reply assumes that the realities of fundamental truths are on the same level in all the religions; that there is no difference in their grades; that the spiritual perfections and religious virtues are of the same quality everywhere. According to this view, the highest ranking prophet is equal to the lowest type of believer in his existence and natural perfection — so far as his creation is concerned. The difference, if any, is based on the subjective outlook of sharī`ah, not on any matter of creation. In their opinion, this case is similar to that of a king vis-à-vis his subjects — they are not different in their human existence, the difference is in their subjective and assumed positions only which are laid down by people and which do not have any in-dependent existence.

This thinking, in its turn, is based on the theory of material-ism, which teaches that nothing exists but matter; metaphysical "things" have no existence at all (or, at least, we are not in a position to know that they exist). The only exception is God, and we believe in His existence because of logical evidence.

Those who accepted this view did so because, coming under the influence of natural sciences, they put all their confidence in their five senses. Or because they thought that "commonsense" was enough for explaining the divine words, and therefore, neglected to meditate on the Qur'ãn.

God willing, we shall throw more light on this subject at some other place.

Fifth: The people of the straight path are higher in rank than others, and their path is superior to the others' ways. It is because of their knowledge, and not because of their virtuous deeds. They have that knowledge of divine attributes which is hidden from others. (We have explained earlier that perfection of virtuous deeds is found in some of the inferior ways also. Therefore, deeds cannot be the criterion by which the people of the straight path are given excellence over the rest.) The question arises as to what is that knowledge and how it is acquired. We shall deal with these questions when we shall explain the verse 13:17 (He sends down water from the heaven, then the valleys flow according to their measure).

The following verses too point to this fact: Allãh will exalt those of you who believe, and those who are given knowledge in higher degrees (58:11); To Him do ascend the good words; and the good deed lifts them up (35:10). What ascends to Allãh is the good words, that is, true belief and knowledge; good deeds lift up the good words and help them in their ascension, without themselves going up. We shall fully discuss this verse when we shall reach it.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the meaning of worship:

"Worship is of three kinds: some people worship Allãh, because they fear Him — so it is the worship of slaves; and a group worships Allãh, Blessed and High is He, to seek reward — so it is the worship of hirelings; and a group worships Allãh, Mighty and Great is He, because of (His) love — and this is the worship of noble persons, and it is the most excellent worship." (al-Kãfi)

Verily, some people worshipped Allãh being desirous (of His reward) — so this is the worship of traders; and some people worshipped Allãh fearing (His punishment) — so it is the worship of slaves, and a group worshipped Allãh in gratitude (to Him) — so this is the worship of noble men. (Nahju 'l-balãghah)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Verily people worship Allãh in three ways: One group worships Him in desire of His reward, and it is the worship of covetous ones, and it is greed; and others worship Him in dread of the Fire, and it is the worship of slaves, and it is fear; but I worship Him in His love — Mighty and Great is He — and this is the worship of noble ones. (It is) because Allãh has said: and they shall be secure from terror on that days (27:89); and He has said, Say: `If you love Allãh, then follow me, Allãh will love you . . .' (3:31). Therefore, whosoever is loved by Allãh, he shall be among the secure ones; and it is a hidden position, cannot touch it save the purified ones." (al-'ilal, al-Majãlis and al-Khiṣãl)

The author says: The meaning of these traditions may be understood from the preceding commentary. The Imãms (of Ahlu 'l-bayt) have variously attributed the worship of the noble ones sometimes to gratitude and sometimes to love, because in final analysis both are one and the same. Gratitude and thank means putting the received bounty in its proper place. It is the thank of worship that it should be addressed to Allãh, as only He, Himself, deserves to be worshipped. Allãh is worshipped because He is Allãh, that is, because He alone holds all attributes of beauty and glory. He, of all things, is Beautiful; He alone is loved for Himself. What is love? It is inclination and attraction towards beauty. We say: He is worshipped because He is He; We may express the same idea if we say: He is worshipped because He is beautiful and beloved. Again, the same theme may be explained by saying that He is worshipped because He is the Bestower of favours and is thanked through worship. All three expressions carry the same import.

It has been narrated through Sunni chains that aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) explained the verse, "Thee do we worship . . ." in these words: "We do not ask from Thee other than Thee, and we do not worship Thee by substitute and replacement, as do those who are ignorant of Thee, removed from Thee."

The author says: This tradition points to what has been explained in the commentary that worship demands presence (of heart) and purity (of intention) which does not allow diversion to any substitute, to anything else.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said inter alia in a tradition: "And whosoever thinks that he worships (Allãh) by (His) attributes without being conscious of Him, he refers (his worship) to an absent one; and whosoever thinks that he worships the attribute and the person (having that attribute) he nullifies monotheism, because the attribute is other than the person; and whosoever thinks that he ascribes the person to the attribute, he belittles the Great One, `and they do not assign to Allãh His proper prestige . . .' " (Tuhafu 'l- `uqul) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) explained the verse: Guide us to the straight path, in these words: "Guide us to adhere to the path that leads to Thy love, and conveys to Thy Garden, (the path that) prevents us from following our desires (lest we be ruined) and from adhering to our opinions (lest we be destroyed). (Ma`ani 'l-akhbãr)

The same book quotes Ali (a.s.) as saying about this verse: “Continue for us Thy help with which we obeyed Thee in our past days, so that we continue to obey Thee in our coming days also.”

The author says: The two traditions point to two aspects of the reply of the previously mentioned objection — that the prayer for guidance, addressed by a person already guided aright, is trying to obtain a thing in hand, and that it was asking for impossible. The first tradition looks at the difference in the grades of guidance, and the second looks at oneness of guidance in its reality.

Again Ma`ãni 'l-akhbãr quotes Ali (a.s.) as saying: “The straight path, in this world, is that which stops short of excesses and rises above shortcomings, and remains straight; and, in the next world, it is the path of the believers (leading them) to the Garden."

The same book quotes the same Imãm, explaining the verse: The path of those. . ., as follows: “Say: Guide us to the path of those upon whom Thou hast bestowed favours by strengthening them for Thy religion and Thy obedience — not (of those whom Thou favoured) with wealth and health because such things are sometimes given even to the disbelievers or to the sinful.” (Then he said:) “And those (bestowed with divine favour) are those about whom Allãh says: And whoever obeys Allãh and the Apostle, these are with those upon whom Allãh has bestowed favours from among the prophets and the truthful and the martyrs and the righteous ones, and excellent are these as companions (4:69).

ar-Riḍã (as.) narrates through his forefathers from Amīr al-mu'minīn (a.s.) that he said: “I heard the Apostle of Allãh saying: `Allãh, Mighty and Great is He, has said: “I have divided the Opening of the Book between Myself and My servant; so, its half is for Me and the (other) half is for My servant. And My servant shall get what he asks for." When the servant says: In the name of Allãh, the Beneficent, the Merciful, Allãh, Great is His Glory, says: "My servant has started with My name, and it is incumbent upon Me that I should complete his works for him and bless him in his affairs." And when he says: All praise is due to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds, Allãh, Great is His Glory, says: "My servant has praised Me, and he knows that the bounties that are with him are from Me, and that the misfortunates that have been averted from him were so averted by My grace; (O My angels!) I appoint you as My witnesses that I shall add for him the favours of the next world to those of this world, and will avert from him the calamities of the next world as I have averted from him the calamities of this world." And when he says, The Beneficent, the Merciful, Allãh, Great is His Glory, says: "My servant bore witness for Me that I am the Beneficent, the Merciful; I make you My witness that I will most surely augment his share in My mercy, and I will most certainly increase his portion in My bounties." And when he says, The Master of the Day of Judgement, Allãh, the High, says: "I make you My witness that, as he has acknowledged that I am the Master of the Day of Judgement, I will most certainly make his reckoning easier (for him) on the Day of Reckoning, and I will most certainly accept his good deeds, and look over his sins." And when he says: Thee do we worship, Allãh, Mighty and Great is He, says: "My servant is telling truth, He worships Me only. Be My witness that I will most surely give him for his worship a reward that will be the (object of) envy to all who opposed him when he worshipped Me." And when he says, and Thee do we beseech for help, Allãh, the High, says: "From Me has My servant sought help, and in Me has he taken refuge. Be My witness that I will most certainly help him in his affairs, and will aid him in his difficulties, and will take his hand in his calamities." And when he says, Guide us to the right path . . Allãh, Mighty and Great is He, says: "This (part) is for My servant, and My servant shall have what he asks for; and I have answered (the prayer of) My servant, and have given him what he hopes for and have protected him from what he is afraid of.”’”('Uyũnu 'l-akhbãr).

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadũq has narrated in ‘Ilalu 'sh-sharã'i‘, an almost similar tradition from ar-Riḍa (a.s.). The tradition explains the chapter of The Opening in the frame of the daily prayer. It further confirms the previously mentioned fact that this divine revelation has been sent, as though on behalf of the servants of Allãh, to teach them the manners of servitude; to show them how to praise their Lord and how to declare their allegiance to Him. It is a chapter made especially for the purpose of worship; and no other chapter comes near to it in this respect. For example:-

1. The entire chapter is a divine speech, revealed on behalf of His servant, so that he may recite it when he stands to worship his Lord.
2. It is divided in two parts: one for Allãh and the other for the servant.
3. It contains, in spite of its brevity, all the Qur’ãnic wisdom. The Qur’ãn is a vast treasure of fundamental truths, moral values and the most comprehensive sharī`ah which consists of the rules of worship and mutual dealings, as well as the penal and civil codes. Further it is a valuable mine of divine promises and threats, stories of_ previous peoples as well as parables and moral lessons. But, in spite of this wide scope, all its teachings may be returned to four fundamental truths: the Oneness of God, the prophet-hood, the resurrection (with all its details) and the guidance of mankind to its bliss in this world as well as in the next. Needless to reiterate that this chapter contains all these basic realities in these very short, and at the same time very eloquent, sentence.

It will not be out of place to compare the beauty, glory and spirituality of this chapter, used in the Muslims' prayers, with the Lord's prayer, used by the Christians in their prayer:

Our Father which art in heaven Hallowed be thy name.

Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.

Give us this day our daily bread.

And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.

And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil:

For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen. (Matthews 6:9 - 1 3)

Ponder deeply on the teachings contained in these sentences, supposed to be of divine revelation, and see what manners of servitude does this prayer teach. First it tells them that their Father (i.e. God, in their terminology) is in heaven. Then it prays about the Father that His name be hallowed, His kingdom come and His will be done in earth as it is in heaven. The question is: Who will fulfil these wishes which look more like political slogans than spiritual invocation. Then it makes them ask for their daily bread, and for His forgiveness in lieu of their forgiveness — that He should waive His rights as they have waived theirs. But what right do they possess except that which they have been given by God Himself? Then they beseech Him not to lead them into temptation but to deliver them from evil. This is asking for impossible, because this world is the place appointed for our test and trial, so that we may acquire spiritual perfection. Would not salvation lose its meaning, if there was no test and trial?

And yet some orientalists have temerity to write: “Islam does not have any superiority over other religions, so far as spiritual knowledge is concerned, because all divine religions invite the men to the belief in one God, and ask them to purify them-selves by good character and virtuous deeds. The religions excel one another only in deep -rootedness of their social fruits.”

OTHER TRADITIONS

It is narrated in Man lã yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh and at-Tafsīr of al - `Ayyãshī that aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "The straight path is Amīru 'l-mu'minīn (a.s.)."

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "(The straight path) is the path to the knowledge of Allãh. And there are two paths, one in this world and the other in the next. As for the path in this world, it is the Imãm whose obedience is obligatory; whosoever knows him in this world and follows his guidance, he shall proceed on the path which is the bridge over the hell in the next world; and whosoever does not know him in this world, his foot shall slip (over that bridge) in the next world, and he shall fall down into the fire of the hell." (Ma'ãni 'l-akhbãr)

The same book quotes as-Sajjãd (a.s.) as saying: "There is no curtain between Allãh and His proof, nor is there any screen for Allãh against His proof. We are the gates of Allãh, and we are the straight path, and we are the (treasure) chest of His Knowledge, and we are the interpreters of His revelation, and we are the pillars of His Oneness, and we are the place of His secret."

Ibn Shahrãshũb has quoted from at-Tafsīr of Wakī' ibn al-Jarrãh from ath-Thawri from as-Suddī from Asbãṭ and Mujãhid from Ibn `Abbãs that he said about the verse: Guide us to the straight path: "Say O group of the servants (of Allãh): Lead us to the love of Muhammad (s. a. w. a.) and his family-members."

The author says: There are other traditions of the same meaning. Such traditions are based on the "flow" of the Qur'ãn, that is, application of the Qur'ãn wherever it is applicable. It should be noted that the term, "flow" — and it will often be used in this book — has been taken from the

al-Fuḍayl ibn Yasãr said: "I asked Abu Ja'far (a.s.) about the tradition, 'There is no verse in the Qur'ãn but it has an exterior and an interior, and there is no word in it but it has a boundary, and every boundary has a watching place.' (I asked him) what was the meaning of exterior and interior. The Imãm said: 'Its exterior is its revelation and its interior is its interpretation; some of it has already passed (i.e. happened) and some of it has not come about yet; it runs along (or flows) as run the sun and the moon; when a thing of it comes (to its appointed place and time) it happens . . . (at-Tafsīr, of al-'Ayyãshi)

This theme is found in other traditions too. It is the convention of the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) that they apply a Qur'ãnic verse to all things it may be applied to. And this convention was correct and reasonable, because the Qur'ãn was revealed as a "guidance to the worlds"; it guides the mankind to correct belief, correct ethics and correct action. The matter of belief that it has explained is eternal truth; it is not limited to a certain time or certain place. The virtue or vice and the rules laid down for them are not confined to one person or one period — they are general and applicable to all relevant persons and times. The traditions explaining the background of revelation of a certain verse — when, why and about whom or what was it revealed — do not affect its general import. The rule is not restricted to that particular person or event; otherwise, it would cease to be valid in other similar conditions, and would die with the death of that person. The Qur'ãnic declaration is general. If it praises some persons, or condemns some others, it is because of the presence of good or evil characteristics in them. And wherever those good or evil characteristics are found, even in later generations, the verse will in all truth be applied to them. The Qur'ãn itself proves it, as Allãh says: With it (i.e., the Qur'ãn) Allãh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of safety . . . (5:16); . . . and most surely it is a Mighty Book, falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor from behind it (41:41-42); Surely We have revealed the Reminder and We will most surely be its guardian (15:9).

There are numerous traditions, perhaps reaching to hundreds, which apply various verses of the Qur'ãn to the Imãms or to their enemies. They are called the traditions of "flow". But now that the general principle has been explained, we shall not include those traditions in this book — except where it becomes necessary for the explanation of a verse or for some reasoning or discussion.

GENERAL COMMENT

This chapter was revealed piecemeal; therefore, it does not have a single theme. However a major part of it shows a general objective: It emphasizes that a man cannot be a true servant of Allãh unless he believes in all that was revealed to the apostles of Allãh without making any difference between revelation and revelation, or between apostle and apostle; accordingly, it admonishes and condemns the disbelievers, the hypocrites and the people of the book because they differed about the religion of Allãh and differentiated between His apostles; thereafter it ordains various important laws, like change of the direction to which the Muslims were to turn for their prayers, regulations of hall, inheritance and fasting and so on.

QUR'ÃN: Alif lãm mīm: God willing, we shall describe in the 42nd chapter some things related to the "letter-symbols" that come at the beginning of some chapters. Also, the meaning of the guidance of the Qur'ãn and of its being a book will be explained later on.

QUR'ÃN: This Book, there is no doubt in it, (is) a guidance to those who guard (against evil), those who believe in the unseen: Those who guard against evil, or in other words, the pious ones, are the very people who believe. Piety, or guarding oneself against evil, is not a special virtue of any particular group of the believers. It is not like doing good, being humble before God or purity of intention, which are counted as various grades of the faith. Piety, on the other hand, is a comprehensive virtue that runs through all the ranks of the true faith. It is for this reason that Allãh has not reserved this adjective for any particular group of the believers.

The characteristics of piety, enumerated in these four verses, are five: Believing in the unseen, keeping up prayers, spending benevolently out of what Allãh has given, believing in what Allãh has revealed to His apostles, and being sure of the hereafter. The pious ones acquire these spiritual qualities by a guidance from Allãh, as Allãh tells us in the next verse: "These are on a guidance from their Lord ". They became pious and guarded themselves against evil because Allãh had guided them to it. When they got that quality, the Qur'ãn became a guidance for them: "This Book . . . (is) a guidance to those who guard against evil".

It clearly shows that there are two guidances, one before they became pious, the other after it. The first guidance made them pious; and thereupon Allãh raised their status by the guidance of His Book.

The contrast is thus made clear between the pious ones on one hand and the disbelievers and the hypocrites (who are admonished in the next fifteen verses) on the other. The later two groups are surrounded by two strayings and two blindnesses. Their first straying causes their unbelief and hypocrisy, and the second one (which comes after their unbelief and hypocrisy) confirms their first error and strengthens it. Look at what Allãh says about the disbelievers: Allãh has set a seal upon their hearts and upon their hearing; and there is a covering over their eyes (2:7). Sealing their hearts has been ascribed to Allãh, but the covering over their eyes was put by the disbelievers themselves. Likewise, Allãh says about the hypocrites: There is a disease in their hearts, so Allãh added to their disease (2:10). The first disease is attributed to the hypocrites themselves, and the second one to Allãh. The same reality has been explained in many verses. For example: He causes many to err by it and many He leads aright by it! But He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26); . . . but when they turned aside, Allãh made their hearts turn aside (61:5).

In short, the pious ones are surrounded by two guidances, as the disbelievers and hypocrites fall between two errors.

The second guidance is by the Qur'ãn; therefore, the first one must have been before the Qur'ãn. They must have been guided by a healthy and unimpaired psychology. If a man's nature is faultless and flawless, it cannot fail to see that it is dependent on some thing above it. Also, it realizes that every other thing, which it may perceive, imagine or understand, depends likewise on a thing outside the chain of dependent and needy things. Thus, it comes to believe that there must be a Being, unseen and unperceptible through the senses, who is the beginning and end of every other thing. It also sees that the said Essential Being does not neglect even the smallest detail when it comes to creative perfection of His creatures. This makes him realize that the said Creator cannot leave the man to wander aimlessly hither and thither in his life; that He must have provided for him a guidance to lead him aright in his actions and morals. By this healthy reasoning, the man acquires the belief in One God, in the institution of prophethood and in the Day of Resurrection. In this way, his faith in the fundamentals of religion becomes complete. That faith leads him to show his servitude before his Lord, and to use all that is in his power — wealth, prestige, knowledge, power, and any other excellence — to keep this faith alive and to convey it to others. Thus we come to the prayer and benevolent spending. The five virtues enumerated in these verses are such that a healthy nature unfailingly leads the man to them. Once a man reaches this stage, Allãh bestows on him His another grace, that is, the guidance by the Qur'ãn.

The above-mentioned five qualities — correct belief and correct deeds — fall between two guidances, a preceding one and a following one.

This second guidance is based on the first one. This fact has been described in the following verses:

> Allãh confirms those who believe with the sure word in this world's life and in the hereafter (14:27).
> O you who believe! fear Allãh and believe in His apostle. He will give you two portions of His mercy, and make for you a light with which you will walk . . . (57:28). O you who believe! if you help Allãh, He will help you and make firm your feet (47:7).

And Allãh does not guide the unjust people (61:7).

. . . and Allãh does not guide the transgressing people (61:5).

The same is the case with error and straying of the disbelievers and hypocrites, as will be seen later on.

The above verses give an indication that man has another life, hidden behind this one. It is by that life that he lives in this world as well as after death and at resurrection. Allãh says: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth . . .(6:122). We shall explain it, God willing, later on.

"Those who believe in the unseen": "al-Imãn" (اَلايْمانُ = faith, to believe) is consolidation of belief in heart. It is derived from al-amn (اَلامْنُ = safety, to feel safe). The believer, by his belief and faith, gains safety from doubts. (Needless to say that doubt is like a poison to the faith.)

It has already been explained that faith has many grades. Sometimes one is certain of the object of faith; and this certainty has its effects; at other times the certainty increases and includes some concomitants of the said object; and at times it increases to include all the related matters of the object of faith. Naturally, the belief, thus, is of various grades, and so are the believers. "al-Ghayb" (اَلْغَيْبُ = the unseen) is opposite of "the perceived". It is used for Allãh, and His great signs, including the revelation, which is referred to in the clause, "And who believe in that which has been sent down to thee and that which was sent down before thee". Also, it includes the hereafter. But in these verses, the beliefs in the revelation and in the hereafter have been separately mentioned. Therefore, "the unseen" must have been used for Allãh only. In this way the belief in the three fundamentals of religion

The Qur'ãn emphasizes that man should not confine his knowledge and belief to only the perception; it exhorts him to follow healthy reasoning and rational understanding.

QUR'ÃN: and they are sure of the hereafter: Instead of only believing in the hereafter, they are sure of it. There is an indication here that one cannot be pious, cannot guard himself against evil, until he is really certain of the hereafter — a certainty that does not let him forget it even for a short time. A man believes in a matter, yet sometimes forgets some of its demands and then commits somethings contrary. But if he believes in, and is sure of, the day when he shall have to give account of all that he has done — big or small — he will not do anything against the divine law, will not commit any sin. Allãh says:. . . and do not follow desire, lest it should lead you astray from the path of Allãh; (as for) those who go astray from the path of Allãh, for them surely is a severe punishment because they forgot the day of reckoning (38:26). Clearly it is because of forgetting the Day of Reckoning that man goes astray. It follows that if one remembers it and is sure of it, he will surely guard himself against evil, will become pious.

QUR'ÃN: These are on guidance from their Lord and these it is that shall be the successful ones: Guidance is always from Allãh, it is not ascribed to anyone else except in a metaphorical way.

Allãh describes His guidance in these words: Therefore (for) whomsoever Allãh intends that He would guide him aright, He expands his breast for Islam . . . (6:125). If one's breast is expanded, he will be free from every tightness and niggardliness. And Allãh says that: . . . whoever is preserved from the niggardliness of his soul, these it is that are the successful ones (59:9). Therefore, He says in this verse about those who are on His guidance that "they shall be the successful ones".

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh: Those who believe in the unseen: "Those who believe in the rising of al-Qã'im (اَلْقَآئِمُ = one who stands, i.e., al-Mahdi, the twelfth Imãm — a.s.) that it is truth." (Ma`ani 'l -akhbãr)

The author says: This explanation is given in other traditions also; and it is based on the "flow" of the Qur'ãn.

According to at-Tafsīr of al-`Ayyãshi, aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh: and spend (benevolently) out of what We have given them, that it means: the knowledge We have given them.

In Mã'ãni 'l-akhbãr, the same Imãm has explained it in these words: "And they spread the knowledge We have given them and they recite what We have taught them of the Qur'ãn.

The author says: Both traditions explain the "spending" in a wider sense that includes spending the wealth as well as using other bounties of Allãh in His cause; the explanation given by us earlier is based on this exegesis.

A PHILOSOPHICAL DISCUSSION

Should we rely on rational concepts, in addition to the things perceptible through the senses? It is a subject of great controversy among the western scholars of the later days. All Muslim philosophers as well as most of the western ones of ancient times believed that we can rely on the rational as well as the sensual perceptions. They were rather of the opinion that an academic premises does not look at a tangible and sensual factor as such. But most of the modern scholars, especially the scientists, hold that nothing can be relied upon except what one perceives through the five senses. Their proof is as follows:

> Pure rational proofs often go wrong. There is no test or experiment, perceptible through the senses, to verify those rational proofs or their premises.
> Sensual perceptions are free from this defect; when we perceive a thing through a sense, we verify it through repeated tests and experiments; this testing continues till we are sure of the characteristics or properties of the object of test. Therefore, sensual perception is free from doubt, while rational proof is not.

But this argument has many flaws:-

First: All the above-mentioned premises are rational; they cannot be perceived by any of the five senses. In other words, these scholars are using rational premises, to prove that rational premises cannot be relied upon! What a paradox! If they succeed in proving their view-point through these premises, their very success would prove them wrong.

Second: Sensual perception is not less prone to error and mistake than rational proof. A cursory glance at the books dealing with the optics and other such subjects is enough to show how many errors are made by sight, hearing and other senses. If rational proof is unreliable because of its possible mistakes, sensual perception also should be discarded for the same reason.

Third: No doubt, there should be a way to distinguish the right perception from the wrong. But it is not the "repeated testing", per se, that creates that distinction in our mind. Rather, it becomes one of the premises of a rational proof which in turn provides that distinction. When we discover a property of an object, and the property remains the same through repeated tests, a rational proof, on the following lines, is offered by our thinking power.

If this property were not this thing's own property, it would not be found in it so unfailingly;

But it is always found in it without fail;

Therefore, it is its own property.

It is now obvious that sensual perception too depends on rational premises to finalize its findings.

Fourth: Let us admit that practically every sensual perception is supported by test. But is that test verified by another test? If yes, then the same question will arise about this later one. Obviously, it cannot go on ad infinitum; there must come at the end a test whose verification depends not on a visible test but on the above-mentioned rational proof. It means that one cannot rely on sensual perception without relying on ration-al concepts.

Fifth: The five senses cannot perceive absolute and major issues; they know only the particular and minor things. Knowledge depends on absolute issues, which cannot be tested in a laboratory nor can they be grasped by the five senses. A professor of anatomy operates upon, or dissects, a number of living or dead human bodies — it does not matter how large or small that number is. He finds that each of the bodies — which he has opened — has a heart, a liver and the like. And after looking at those particular cases, he feels bold enough to teach an absolute proposition that all men have a heart and a liver. The question is: Has he seen in-side "a11" the human beings? If only that much can be relied upon which is perceived by the five senses, how can any absolute proposition of any branchof science be accepted as true?

The fact is that sensual perception and rational concept both have their place in the field of knowledge; both are complementary to each other. By rationality and understanding, we mean that faculty which is the source of the above examples of absolute principles. Everyone knows that man has such a faculty. How can a faculty created by Allãh (or as they say, by nature) be always in wrong? How can it always fail in the function en-trusted to it by the Creator? The Creator never entrusts any work to an agent until He creates a connecting link between them.

So far as mistakes in rational and sensual faculties are concerned, the reader should look for it in related subjects like logic etc.

ANOTHER PHILOSOPHICAL DISCUSSION

Man in his early childhood perceives the objects around him; he knows them without knowing that he knows, that is, without being aware that he has, or is using, a faculty called knowledge or cognition. This continues until a time comes when he finds himself doubting or presuming a thing. Then he realizes that before that he was using "knowledge" in his life affairs. He also gradually comes to understand that his perception or concepts are sometimes wrong, that error cannot be in the materials that he perceives — because those material things are facts and facts cannot be non-facts, that is, cannot be wrong. Therefore, the error must be in his perception. When there is no error in perception, it is knowledge — a perception that leaves no room for opposite ideas.

By these stages, he becomes aware of the basic principle that positive and negative are mutually exclusive and totally exhaustive; they are contradictories, they cannot both be present nor can both be absent. This fundamental truth is the foundation-stone of every self-evident or theoretical proposition. (Even if one doubts this statement, he intuitively knows that this "doubt" cannot be present with its negative, with its "non-doubt".)

practical function. Even when he feels doubtful about a matter, he identifies that doubt by knowing that it is a doubt. The same applies when he does not know, or only presumes, or merely imagines a thing, he identifies it by the knowledge that it is ignorance, presumption or imagination.

But in ancient Greece, there arose a group, the Sophists, who denied existence of knowledge. They showed doubt in every thing, even in their own selves, even in that doubt. The Sceptics of later days are almost their successors. They deny knowledge of every thing outside their own selves and their own minds. Their "arguments" run as follows:

First: The most potent knowledge (that comes through the five senses) is often wrong and in error. Then how can one be sure of the knowledge obtained through other sources? How can we rely, in this background, on any knowledge or proposition outside our own selves?

Second: When we wish to comprehend any outside object, what we get is merely its knowledge; we do not grasp the object itself. Then, how can it be possible to grasp any object?

Reply to the First Argument: First: This argument negates and annihilates itself. If no proposition can be relied upon, how can one rely on the propositions and premises used in this argument? Second: To say that a source of knowledge is "often" wrong, is to admit that it is also correct many times. Then how can it be rejected totally? Third: We have never said that our knowledge is always correct. The Sophists and the Sceptics affirm that no knowledge is correct. To refute this universal negative proposition, a particular affirmative proposition is sufficient. That is, we have only to prove that some knowledge is correct; and we have done so in the second reply.

Reply to the Second Argument: The issue in dispute is knowledge, which means to unveil an object. The Sceptics admit that when they try to comprehend an object, they get its know-ledge. Their only complaint is that they do not grasp the objectitself. But nobody has ever claimed that knowledge means grasping the object itself; our only claim is that knowledge unveils some of the realities of its object, that is, of the thing so known.

Moreover, the Sceptic refutes his own views practically in every movement and at every moment. He claims that he does not know anything outside his own self, outside his own mind. But when he is hungry or thirsty, he moves to the food or water; when he sees a wall falling down, he runs away from it. But he does not try to get food when he just thinks about hunger, and does not run away when he just thinks about a falling wall. It means that he does not act on the pictures in his mind — which he claims are the real things, and acts on that feeling or perception which comes to him from outside — which, according to him, does not have any reality and should not be relied upon!

There is another objection against existence of knowledge. They deny existence of established knowledge; and have laid the foundation of today's natural sciences on this rejection. Their reasoning is as follows:

Every single atom in this world is in constant movement; every single thing is continuously moving towards perfection or deterioration. In other words, what a thing was at a given instant, is not the same in the next. Understanding and perception is a function of brain. Therefore, it is a material property of a material compound. Naturally, this process too is governed by the laws of change and development. It means that all functions of brain, including knowledge, are constantly changing and developing. It is, therefore, wrong to say that there is any such thing as established knowledge. Whatever knowledge there is has only relative permanence — some propositions last longer than others: And it is this impermanent conception that is called knowledge.

Reply: This argument is based on the presumption that knowledge is not non-material and abstract; that it is a physical thing. But this supposition is neither self-evident nor proved.

Knowledge is certainly non-material and abstract. It is not a physical and material thing, because the attributes and properties of matter are not found in it:—

1. All material things are divisible; knowledge, per se, is not divisible.

2. Material things depend on space and time; knowledge, per se, is independent of space and time. An event happens in a certain place and time, but we may comprehend it in any place and at any time without any adverse effect on its comprehension.

3. Material things are admittedly governed by the law of general movement and constant change. But knowledge, per se, does not change. Knowledge, as knowledge, is incompatible with change, as one may understand after a little meditation.

4. Suppose that knowledge, per se, is subject to constant change like matter and material things. Then one thing or event could not be comprehended with the same details, in exactly the same way, at two different times. Nor could a past event be remembered correctly later on. Because, as the materialists have said, "what a (material) thing was at a given instant is not the same in the next".

These comparisons show that knowledge, as knowledge, is not a material or physical thing. It must be told here that we are not talking about the physical actions and reactions which an organ of a sense or the brain has to undergo in the process of acquiring knowledge. That action and reaction is a process, or a tool, of knowledge, it is not the knowledge itself.

For more detailed discussion of this subject one should study the philosophical works.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Surely those who disbelieve . . . will not believe: They were the people who obstinately clung to rejection of faith and in whose hearts disbelief had established deep roots. This may be inferred from the fact that warning them and not warning them was all alike to them; they would not move from their obduracy. Probably it refers to the disbelievers of Quraysh, who were the bitterest enemies of Islam and who did try their utmost to extinguish the light of faith; they persisted stubbornly in their enmity until Allãh destroyed them in Badr and other battles. The sentence, "alike is it to them whether you warn them or do not warn them, they will not believe", strengthens this interpretation; because it could not be applied to all the disbelievers of the world — otherwise the door of guidance would be closed. Also, this same sentence has come in Chapter of Yã Sīn (36:10) which is a Meccan chapter. Then it appears in this chapter that is the first chapter revealed at Medina. (It was revealed before the battle of Badr.) Therefore, more probably this verse also refers to the same Meccan group. In other places too the same explanation may be given to the word, "those who disbelieve", unless there is a reason to the contrary.

Likewise, wherever the word, "those who believe", has been used in the Qur'ãn it refers to the first and early Muslims — unless there is any reason to believe otherwise. This style of address was reserved for them as a protocol of honour.

QUR'ÃN: Allãh has set a seal . . . great punishment: Allãh has ascribed the sealing to His own action, but the covering over their eyes is attributed to their own selves. It shows that they had put a curtain on their souls against the light of truth — it was their own choice. Then, after their sins and disbelief, Allãh put another curtain or seal over their souls. Their disbelief and misdeeds thus fall between two curtains — the first from themselves, the second from Allãh.

Its further explanation will be given under 2:26; Surely Allãh is not ashamed to set forth any parable — that of a gnat or any thing above that . . .

Disbelief, like belief, has various degrees and ranks; and its effects also vary, like those of belief.

az-Zubayrī says that he said to aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.): "Tell me how many ways of al-kufr (الكُفْر = disbelief, infidelity, to cover) are there according to the Book of Allãh? Mighty and Great is

He ! He (the Imãm) said: `Disbelief, according to the Book of Allãh, is of five types. There is the disbelief of denial (and denial is of two kinds), and the disbelief by neglecting what Allãh has ordered, and the disbelief of disavowal, and the ingratitude. As for the disbelief of denial,it is denial of the Lord-ship; it is the talk of those who say: "there is no Lord (i.e. Creator), nor any Garden nor Fire". It is the word of two groups of disbelievers who are called atheists. And they are those who say: "nothing destroys us but time" (45:24). It is a religion invented by them as it seemed good to them, but they have no proof to support their view. That is why Allãh has said (about them): And they have no knowledge of that; they only conjecture (ibid.), that it is in reality as they say. And He also said: Surely those who disbelieve, alike is it to them whether you warn them or do not warn them, they will not believe.' " (al-Kãfī)

And as for the second kind, it is the denial after knowing; it means that the denier denies (the existence of God), but he knows (very well) that He is the truth, and he is convinced of it (in his heart). And Allãh has said (about such people): And they denied them unjustly and proudly while their soul had been convinced of them (27:14); . . . and aforetime they used to pray for victory against those who disbelieved, but when there came to them that which they did recognize (i.e. the Prophet) they disbelieved in him; so Allãh's curse is on the unbelievers (2:89).

So this is the explanation of the two kinds of denial.

And the third way of disbelief is ingratitude to the bounties (of Allãh); and it is as Allãh says quoting (the Prophet) Sulaymãn: "This is of the grace of my Lord that He may try me whether I am grateful or ungrateful; and whoever is grateful, he is grateful only for his own self, and whoever is ungrateful, then surely my Lord is Self-sufficient, Honoured" (27:40); If you are grateful, I would certainly give you more, and if you are ungrateful, My chastisement is truly severe (14:7). Therefore remember Me, I will remember you, and be thankful to Me, and do not be ungrateful to Me (2:152). (In all these verses Allãh has used the word al-kufr = disbelief, to denote ungratefulness, and in-gratitude.)

And the fourth way of disbelief is leaving out or neglecting what Allãh has ordered to do. It is as Allãh says: And when We made a covenant with you: You shall not shed your blood and you shall not turn your people out of your cities; then you gave a promise while you witnessed. Yet you it is who slay your people and turn a party from among you out of their homes, backing each other up against them unlawfully and exceeding the limits; and if they should come to you as captives, you would ransom them — while their very turning out was unlawful for you. Do you then believe in a part of the book and disbelieve in the other? (2:84 -85). In this verse Allãh has charged them with disbelief because they did not follow the commandment of Allãh; (it should be noted that) Allãh has (in this very verse) linked them to belief, yet He did not accept it from them and it did not benefit them before Allãh. So Allãh (further) said: What then is the reward of such among you as do this but disgrace in the life of this world, and on the day of resurrection they shall be sent back to the most grievous chastisement, and Allãh is not at all heedless of what you do (ibid.)

And the fifth way of disbelief is disavowal. It is as Allãh says, quoting Ibrãḥīm (a.s.) ". . . we renounce you, and enmity and hatred have appeared between us and you for ever until you believe in Allãh alone" (60:4), that is, we disavow and repudiate you. And He says, describing Iblīs and his disowning his friends from mankind on the Day of Resurrection: ". . . surely I disbelieved in your associating me (with Allãh) before" (14:22). And also He says: And he said: "You have only taken for yourselves idols besides Allãh by way of friendship between you in the world's life, then on the resurrection day some of you shall deny others, and some of you shall curse others . . . (29:25), that is, some of you shall dissociate from others.

The author says: This tradition confirms what we have previously mentioned that disbelief has many grades and ranks.

COMMENTARY

These thirteen verses are about the hypocrites. We shall discuss this subject in detail in Chapter 63 (The Hypocrites) and in some other places.

QUR'ÃN: They desire to deceive: "al-Khad`ah" (اَلْخَدْعَةُ) is deceit, duplicity.

QUR'ÃN: When they are alone with their Saṭans: "ash-Shayṭãn" (اَلشَّيْطانُ) means evil, wicked; that is why the Iblis is called the Satan.

QUR'ÃN: Their parable is like the parable of one who kindled a fire . . . they will not return: The hypocrites are like a man who is surrounded by a blinding darkness in which he cannot distinguish good from bad, beneficial from harmful; to remove it he kindles a fire, and in its light is able to see to some distance around it; then as soon as it has illumined all around, Allãh, extinguishes it by wind, rain or some other thing like it and he is left as he was before — in utter darkness. And now he is pressed between two darknesses — that of the night and that of bewilderment and nullity of his endeavour. This parable fits exactly on hypocrites. A hypocrite declares himself to be a Muslim, and through it gains some benefits, as he is treated as a Muslim in matters of marriage and inheritance etc. But as soon as death approaches — the time when the real and complete benefits of Islam should have appeared — Allãh takes away the light, nullifies his deeds and leaves him in utter darkness in which he cannot see_ at all. Thus he falls between two darkness — his original one and the one he added with his dark deeds.

QUR'ÃN: Or like an abundant rain . . . Allãh has power over all things: "aṣ-Ṣayyib" (اَلصَّيِّبُ = abundant rain); "al-barq" (اَلْبَرقُ = lightning; flesh of lightning); "al-ra'd" (اَلرَّعدُ = thunder that is heard after lightning); "aṣ-ṣã'iqah" (اَلصَّاعِقَة = thunderbolt, to strike with lightning).

This is another example for the hypocrites. A man is caught in a rainpour; darkness surrounds him, he is unable to see around and loses his bearings. The rain tells him to run away; to find a shelter somewhere, but darkness prevents him from it; frightening thunder and lightning-bolts have overwhelmed him, yet when lightning appears he tries to take its advantage by walking ahead in its light — but it appears only for a fleeting moment and then disappears; whenever it shines he walks ahead and when darkness I engulfs him again he stops.

A hypocrite is exactly in the same position. He does not like Islam, but has to profess to be a Muslim. His words do not reach his heart; what he says is different from what he believes in his heart. Because of this discrepancy his path is not illuminated as it should have been. The result is that he gropes about aimlessly and stumbles every now and then; he walks a little and then stops. Thus Allãh punishes him with disgrace; and had He wished so, He would have taken away his sight and hearing, thereby disgracing him on the very first day.

QUR'ÃN: O men! worship your Lord . . . may guard (against evil): The preceding nineteen verses have described the positions of the three groups category-wise: The pious ones who are on the guidance from their Lord; the disbelievers whose hearts and ears have been sealed and who have their eyes covered; and the hypocrites in whose hearts there is disease so Allãh added to their disease and they are deaf, dumb and blind.

In this background, Allãh calls the men to be His good servants, to worship Him and to join, not the disbelievers and the hypocrites, but the pious ones, those who guard themselves against evil. This context shows that the clause, "so that you may guard (against evil)", is governed by the verb "worship" — you should worship Allãh to join those who guard against evil, who are pious. It may also be governed by the verb, "created" — Allãh created you in order that you may guard yourselves against evil.

QUR'ÃN: Who made the earth a bed . . . do not set up equals to Allãh while you know: "al-Andãd" (الأنداد) is plural of an- nidd (اَلنِّدُّ = alike, equal, peer). The phrase, "while you know", is unconditional, and grammatically it is circumstantial phrase of "do not set up"; these two factors lend extra-ordinary force to the prohibition of setting up equals to Allãh. The sentence shows that a man who has even a little knowledge should not ascribe any equal or partner to Allãh; he should know that it is Allãh Who has created him and those before him and arranged and managed this system in the creation for their sustenance and survival.

QUR'ÃN: And if you are in doubt . . . then produce a chapter like it . . .: It is a challenge which human beings and jinn can never meet. This challenge has been offered to demonstrate the miracle of the Qur'ãn, to show that it is a Book sent down by Allãh, there is no doubt in it; that it has been revealed as an ever-lasting miracle that will remain alive till the end of the world. This challenge has repeatedly been given in the Qur'ãn:

Say: "If men and jinn should combine together to bring the like of this Qur'ãn, they could not bring the like of it, even though some of them were aiders of the others" (17:88).

Or, do they say: "He has forged it?" Say: "Then bring ten chapters like it forged and call upon whom you can besides Allãh, if you are truthful" (11:13)

This context shows that the pronoun "it" in "like it" refers to "that which We have revealed to Our servant", that is, the Qur'ãn. It is a challenge to them to bring a like of the Qur'ãn in its inimitable style and meaning.

The word "min mithlihi" (مِنْ مِثْلِهِ = translated here as "like it") may also be rendered as "from like him". In that case it will be a challenge to bring a like of the Qur'ãn written by someone like the Holy Prophet. This Qur'ãn has been brought by a person who was never taught by any teacher, who had not learnt these valuable and marvellous truths from any human being, nor had he taken this most eloquent style from any mortal. If the disbelievers thought that such a man can write such a Book, then let them bring its like from some such illiterate man. In this light, the verse would have the same import as the following one:

Say: "If Allãh had desired (otherwise) I would not have recited it to you, nor would He have taught it to you; indeed I have lived a lifetime among you before it; do you not then understand?" (10:16)

Both explanations have been given in some traditions. Obviously, this and the other challenging verses dare the antagonists to bring, if they can, like of even the shortest chapter of the Qur'ãn — say, the Chapter of al-Kawthar or al-'Aṣr.

A strange exegesis has been written by someone that "like it" means like this Chapter, The Cow, in which this verse occurs. This explanation is totally devoid of good literary taste. Those who disbelieved in the Qur'ãn, rejected the whole Book as being forged against Allãh. What purpose could be served by challenging them to bring a Chapter like that of The Cow? Such a challenge would, in final analysis, mean this: If you are in doubt the short Chapter of al-Kawthar or al-Ikhlãṣ, then bring a like of the largest Chapter of The Cow. Absurd, isn't it !

MIRACLE AND ITS QUIDDITY

The claim of the Qur'ãn that it is a miraculous sign, and the challenge to the doubters offered by this verse, contains in reality two claims: First, that miracles, super-natural events, do occur; second, that the Qur'ãn is one of such miracles. If the second claim is proved, the first will automatically be proved. That is why the Qur'ãn has challenged the men to bring its like, as it would prove both aspects of the claim.

How does a miracle happen? After all, it is against the deep-rooted system of the cause-and-effect which is never negated. The Qur'ãn explains this subject in the following two stages:

First: The miracle is a reality; the Qur'ãn is one of the miracles, which in itself proves the existence of miracles in general; it offers a challenge to its adversaries, and in this way proves its truth.

Second: What is the reality of miracle? How can a thing happen in this world of nature against the universal law of the cause-and-effect?

THE MIRACLE OF THE QUR'ÃN

Undoubtedly, the Qur'ãn has offered a continuing challenge, by which it proves itself to be a miracle. This challenge has been given in many verses of Meccan as well as Medinite period. All of them show that this Book is a divine miracle, a super-natural sign. The verse under discussion, "And if you are in doubt as to that which We have revealed to Our servant, then produce a chapter like it . . .", is one of those challenges: Produce a chapter like one of the Qur'ãn from someone like the Prophet. It should be noted that it does not purport to prove the prophethood of Muhammad (s. a. w. a.) directly; it does not say, 'if you are in doubt as to the prophethood of Our servant'; instead it says, `if you are in doubt as to that which We have revealed to Our servant'. Likewise, all the challenges given in the Qur'ãn aim to prove that this Book is a super-natural sign from Allãh. And when this fact is established, the prophethood of the Prophet will automatically be proved.

The verses of challenge vary in their scope and generality. The most general is the verse: Say: "If men and jinn should combine together to bring the like of this Qur'ãn, they could not bring the like of it, even though some of them were aiders of the others" (17:88). The verse is of Meccan period, and it is easy to see that it contains an all-encompassing challenge.

This challenge is not confined to its unsurpassed eloquence and purest style. Otherwise, the challenge would not cover non-Arabs; it could be addressed to only those who spoke pure Arabic before it was debased by foreign influence — in other words, only to the Arabs of the days of paganism or to those whose life-span bridged the time of paganism and that of Islam. But the verse challenges not only the whole mankind but confronts the jinn also.

As for other special qualities of the Qur'ãn (like the exposition of spiritual realities, the high morals, the most comprehensive and the fairest legal code, the information of the things unseen as well as other subjects which the man had not even thought of when the Qur'ãn was revealed), they are of such a nature that only a selected group — and not the whole mankind — may appreciate them. But the challenge is general and covers elites and common men and jinn. It is clear in this light that it is not confined to any one quality; it defies them to bring a like of this Book in all its qualities together.

The Qur'ãn is a miracle: For a man of eloquence, in its spellbinding sublimity and style; for a sage, in its sagacity; for a scholar, in its knowledge; for a sociologist, in its social system; for a legislator, in its legislation; for a politician, in its politics; for a ruler, in its rule of justice; and for the whole world, in such things which none of them can grasp like the information of the unseen, prophecies of future events, freedom from discrepancy in its laws, knowledge and expression.

The Qur'ãn claims to be a comprehensive miracle, covering all its aspects. It is a miracle for every individual man and jinn — an average person or a select one, learned or ignorant, man or woman, of a very high rank of excellence or of a lower level — in short, anyone who has enough intelligence to understand the Qur'ãnic speech. Man, by nature, comprehends a virtue and understands its various grades. Every person should look into an excellence which he or someone else has got; then he should compare that excellence or virtue with what the Qur'ãn contains of the same; and then he should decide — in all honestly and justice — whether it is in human power to bring a like of the Qur'ãn. Is it possible for a man to bring such divine knowledge, so well-reasoned, as the Qur'ãn has done? Is it within human power to build such character, based on foundation of reality, which may honestly be compared with the Qur'ãnic teaching in purity and excellence? Can human beings legislate perfect laws covering all human activities without blundering into discrepancies, with the spirit of monotheism and the word of piety permeating every order and its every implication, with purity and cleanliness feeding its root and shoots? Can such astonishing comprehensiveness and all-inclusiveness come from an untaught man? A man who was born and brought up among a people whose only share in human virtues was a life sustained with raids, plunders and wars; they buried their daughters alive, and killed their children for fear of poverty; they boasted of their fathers and married their mothers; debauchery was their pride; they condemned knowledge and showed off their ignorance; in spite of their haughtiness and chauvinism, they were preyed upon by every hunter and were easy targets for anyone whowished to conquer them — one day they were under the Yemenite rule, the next day were ruled over Or the Ethiopians; some day Byzantine emperors lorded over them, the other day it was Persia's turn to humiliate them. This is the picture, in miniature, of the Arabs before Islam. And in such environment, the Qur'ãn was brought by the Prophet of Islam.

Again, suppose a man brings a book, claiming that it is a guidance for the worlds. Will he dare to include in it the news and information of the unseen — both past and future — not in one or two places but spread over a lot of topics — in stories, in prophecies, and about the events that are to happen in future? And what will be your judgement if not a single detail proves wrong?

Once again, man is a part of this natural world; this world is constantly changing and developing from perfection to perfection. Is it possible for a man to talk about each and every affair of human life; to give the world knowledge, laws, wisdom, admonition, parables, stories — concerning every matter, big or small — without committing any discrepancy, without showing any trace of gradual development? And especially so, if his talks are not delivered all at one time, are delivered piecemeal in a long period of twenty-three years? And even more so when some topics are repeated again and again, when there are shoots sprouting from a previously planted root? Undoubtedly, it is not possible, because no man can remain unchanged in his knowledge and outlook throughout his life.

When a man ponders over these facts about the Qur'ãn — containing the above-mentioned distinctions besides many more — he can entertain no doubt whatsoever about its divine origin; he will feel sure that it is beyond human power, over and above the natural and material causes. If someone is not in a position to understand this clear fact, he should follow the dictate of his nature — in other words, he should ask those who are knowledge-able about this subject.

Question: Why did not the Qur'ãn confine its challenge to the elite only? What is the use of including general public in this call? After all, a common man is easily_ influenced by such claims and it takes him no time to accept pretensions of every pretender. Don't you see that it was this group that surrendered to al-Bãb, al -Bahã', Mirzã Ghulãm Aḥmad Qãdiyãni and al-Musaylamah, even though what those deceivers brought as their proof was more like a senseless jabber and raving delirium than a sensible talk?

Reply: It was the only way to keep the miracle all-inclusive; the only possible method for discerning the perfection and excellence in a quality that has various ranks and grades. People have different grades of understanding;

likewise, the virtues differ in their perfection. Those who have high level of understanding and correct perception will easily appreciate the high quality of an excellent work. Those who have a lower understanding should refer to the former for their judgement. It is the dictate of nature and demand of human psyche.

A miracle that can be universal and comprehensive, that can be addressed to every individual, in every place and at all times, that can be conveyed to all and can remain alive to the last day of the world, must necessarily be a set of divine know-ledge and spiritual realities. All other miracles were either material objects or a tangible event that were governed by the laws of nature inasmuch as they were confined to a certain time and space. They were seen by only a limited number of people; even supposing, for the sake of argument, that it was observed by all people of that particular place, it could not be witnessed by people of other localities; and suppose that an impossible happened, that is, it was seen by the whole world, it could not continue eternally for the future generations to observe.

It was for this reason that Allãh chose this academic and spiritual miracle, that is, the Qur'ãn, for the Prophet of Islam, so that it may continue its challenge to the whole mankind — in all places and in all generations. And thus the miracle continues in its generality, defying every person, in every area and every era.

FIRST SPECIFIC CHALLENGE: THE KNOWLEDGE IT CONTAINS

Now we come to its specific challenges. It has offered particular challenge concerning the knowledge it imparts and cognition it contains. Allãh says: . . . and We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything (16:89); . . . nor anything green nor dry but (it is all) in a clear book

(6:59). There are many other verses of the same theme. Look at the fundamental teachings given in the text of the Qur'ãn; then see its details for which it has referred the people to the Prophet — as Allãh says: . . . and whatever the Apostle gives you, take it, and from what-ever he forbids you, keep back . . . (59:7); . . . that you may judge between people by means of that which Allãh has taught you (4:105). Then you will know that Islam has put its attention to all big and small topics relevant to divine knowledge, moral virtues and religious laws — covering worship, mutual dealings, social regulations, penal code, and, in short, everything that affects life and character. All this is based on the foundation of human nature and monotheism. Analyse the details and you will find monotheism as their basis; combine the basis with relevant principles and you will get the details.

Then it has declared that all this knowledge will remain valid to the end of the world; will continue to guide mankind and will always be relevant to human needs and environment. Allãh says: . . . and most surely it is a Mighty Book: Falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor from behind it; a revelation from the Wise, the Praised One (41:41—42). Surely We have revealed the Reminder and We will most surely be its guardian (15:9). In other words, it is a Book which is beyond the reach of the law of change and development; it will never be disturbed by abrogation.

A question may be asked here: The sociologists are of the opinion that the laws and regulations controlling the society must change according to the changes occurring in the structure of society. As the time passes and civilization marches ahead, it becomes necessary to change the laws to cope with the changed situation. Then how can the shari `ah of Islam continue without any change or abrogation all these centuries? We shall explain this matter, God willing, under the verse: Mankind was but one people . . . (2:213). Here it is enough to point out that the Qur'ãn has built its laws on the foundation of monotheism and excellent ethics that spring from healthy human nature; it declares that legislation must grow up from the seed of creation and existence. The scholars of sociology, on the other hand, have fixed their eyes on changes of society, totally ignoring the spiritual side of monotheism and morality. As a result, their word concentrates on material development of the society — and society is not a living organism, it does not have a soul; and the word of Allãh is the highest.

SECOND SPECIFIC CHALLENGE: THE RECIPIENT OF THE REVELATION

Another aspect of this challenge is the personality of the untaught Prophet who brought this Qur'ãn as a miracle in its words and in its meanings. He had not learnt from any teacher, was not trained by any instructor. This challenge is contained in the following words of Allãh: Say: "If Allãh had desired (otherwise) I would not have recited it to you, nor would He have taught it to you; indeed I have lived a lifetime among you before it; do you not then understand?" (10:16). The Prophet lived among them as one of them. In all those years, he had not risen above them in scholarship, nor was he renowned for any knowledge. He did not deliver any lecture, nor did he compose a single line of poetry, upto his fortieth year — that is to say, for about two-thirds of his total life-span; he did not get any distinction in literature or scholarship all these years. Then, all of a sudden, he brought what he said was the revelation from God, before which giants of literature felt like pigmies, and eloquent speakers became tongue-tied. He published that revelation to the furthest limits of the world, but no one dared to bring its like in all these centuries.

The outmost that his adversaries could say was that he must have learnt those stories from Christian monks during his trade-journeys to Syria. But he had gone to Syria only twice:

First, in his early childhood, with his uncle, Abu Tãlib and then, at the age of twenty-five, with Maysarah, the slave of Khadījah. In both these journeys he was never alone day or night, and no-body ever reported any such meeting with any supposed teacher. Even if we accept for the sake of argument that such training session did take place, many questions will arise from it: Who taught him this divine knowledge of monotheism? Where did he get these wise rules and these realities? And lastly, who gave him this unsurpassed elocution which has kept the silver-tongued elocutionists dumbfounded all these years?

Another suggestion was that he learned these sublime truths from a blacksmith, of Roman origin, who made and sold swords. Allãh replied to this allegation in this verse: And certainly We know that they say: "Only a mortal teaches him". The tongue of him whom they are inclined to blame for it is barbarous, and this is clear Arabic language (16:103).

A third accusation was that he gained this knowledge from Salmãn, the Persian, who allegedly knew all about various religions and sects. But Salmãn met the Prophet in Medina and thereafter accepted Islam, while the major portion of the Qur'ãn was revealed at Mecca, and that part contained all the principles, know-ledge and stories that were later repeated at Medina — we may say that Meccan revelation had more of these thing, than the verses revealed at Medina. The question is: What knowledge did Salmãn add after his conversion to Islam? Nothing.

Moreover, read the Old and the New Testaments, and compare the stories of the previous prophets and their people written in them with those revealed in the Qur'ãn. You will see that the latter's history and stories are different from the former's. The Bible attributes such sins and evils to the prophets of Allãh which one would be loath to ascribe to an average man of good character. But the Qur'ãn absolves them from such blames. Then you will find in the Bible many topics that have no bearing on, and relevance to, the spiritual knowledge or moral excellence. The Qur'ãn never talks except about that which is truly beneficial to people in their spiritual upliftment and character-building.

THIRD SPECIFIC CHALLENGE: ITS PROPHECIES AND INFORMATION OF UNSEEN

The Qur'ãn's third specific challenge is concerning its prophecies and the information it gives of the unseen. Such verses may be divided in four categories:

1. The information about previous prophets and their nations: Allãh says about some of these stories: These are of the tidings of the unseen which We revealed to you; you did not know them — (neither) you nor your people — before this . . . (11:49); and He says after the story of Yũsuf: This is of the tidings of the unseen (which) We revealed to you, and you were not with them when they resolved upon their affair, and they were devising plans (12:102); also, about the story of Maryam: This is of the tidings of the unseen which We reveal to you; and you were not with them when they cast their pens (to decide) which of them should have Maryam in his charge, and you were not with them when they contended one with another (3:44); and about `Isã: Such is 'Isã, son of Maryam; (this is) the saying of truth about which they dispute (19:34). There are many verses of the same import.

Prophecies of future events: For example: The Romans would avenge their defeat: The Romans are vanquished, in a near land; and they, after being vanquished, shall overcome, within a few years (30:2-4); the Prophet would return to Mecca after his hijrah: Most surely He Who has made the Qur'ãn binding on you will bring you back to the destination (28:85); the vision of the Prophet would certainly come true: Certainly Allãh had shown to His Apostle the vision with truth: You shall most certainly enter the Sacred Mosque, if Allãh pleases, in security, (some) having their heads shaved and (others) having their hair-cut, you shall not fear (48:27); the behaviour, in future, of a group of Muslims: Those who are left behind will say when you set forth for the gaining of acquisition: Allow us (that) we may follow you. They desire to change the words of Allãh (48:15); nobody would be able to harm the Prophet: . . . and Allãh will protect you form the men (5:70); the Qur'ãn will remain under the protection of Allãh: Surely We have revealed the Reminder and We will most surely be its guardian (15:9). We may include in this category other numerous verses giving good tidings to the believers and threatening the disbelievers and pagans of Mecca of various retributions.

In this category come the prophecies of the signs and disturbances appearing soon before the Day of Judgement. For example: And it is forbidden to a town which We destroyed that they shall not return, until when Gog and Magog are let loose and they shall hasten forth from every elevated place. And the true promise shall draw nigh, then lo! the eyes of those who disbelieved shall be fixedly open: O woe to us! surely we were in heedlessness as to this; nay, we were unjust ones (21:95-97). Allãh has promised to those of you who believe and do good that He will most certainly make them successors in the earth as He made successors those before them . . . (24:55). Say: "He has the power that He should send on you a chastisement from above you or from beneath your feet, or that He should throw you into confusion, (making you) of different parties; and make some of you taste the fighting of to others. . . ." (6:65).

3. The verses based on such scientific realities which were unknown, and even unthought-of, when the Qur'ãn was revealed, and which have just now been discovered after long researches: And We send the winds fertilizing (15:22); And the earth — We have spread it forth and put in it anchors (i.e. mountains) and caused to grow in it of everything, weighed (15:19); Have We not made the earth a resting place, and the mountains as pegs (therein)? (78:6-7).

The verses that allude to many great events and disorders that were to happen in the Islamic community, or the world in general, after the lifetime of the Prophet. For example: O you who believe! whoever of you turns back from his religion, then soon Allãh will bring a people that He shall love them and they shall love Him, humbled before the believers, mighty against the unbelievers, they shall strive hard in Allãh's way and shall not fear the censure of any censurer; this is Allãh's grace, He gives it to whom He pleases (5:54); And every nation had an apostle; so when their apostle came, the matter was decided between them with justice and they shall not be dealt with unjustly. And they say: "When will this threat come about, if you are truthful?" Say; "I do not control for myself any harm, or any benefit, except what Allãh pleases; every nation has a term; when their term comes, they shall not then remain behind for an hour, nor can they go before (their time)". Say: "Tell me if His punishment overtakes you by night or by day! what then is there of it that the guilty would hasten on?" (10:47-50); Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion in natural devotion (to the truth), the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; . . . and be not of the polytheists, of those who divided their religion and became sects; every sect rejoicing in what they had with them (30:30 -32). There are many verses that come into this category, and we shall describe some of them when explaining the seventeenth chapter (The Night-journey). It should be noted here that this category is one of the specialities of this book of ours.

FOURTH SPECIFIC CHALLENGE: NO DISCREPANCIES IN THE QUR'ÃN

It is one of the challenges of the Qur'ãn that there is no discrepancy in it. Allãh says: Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ãn? And if it were from any other than Allãh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82).

This is a material world, governed by the law of change and development. Every item in this world changes day after day from weakness to strength, from deficiency to perfection — in its own self as well as in all its concomitants and attachments. Man is no exception to this rule. He also undergoes constant change and development in his existence as well as in effects of his actions and reactions. And this law applies also to what he gets through his perception and intellect. Every man finds that his to-day is a bit more perfect than his yesterday. Every passing hour makes him realizewhat mistakes he had committed in the past hour, what erroneous views he had held a few hours back. It is a fact that no sane person can deny.

In this background, look at the Qur'ãn. Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) brought this book piece by piece, one small chapter or a few verses at a time. It continued for twenty-three years in different places, various conditions and divergent situations: In Mecca and Medina, by day and by night, during journeys and at home, in thick of battle and in time of peace, during hard up days and in easy times, when Muslims suffered defeat and when they were victorious, in safety and in danger. It contained all types of subjects — it unveiled spiritual knowledge, taught excellent ethics and ordained laws for every conceivable aspect of life. In spite of all these factors, there is not a whiff of discrepancy in its matter or meaning — it is an oft-repeated book whose parts resemble one with the other. There is not a least difference, contradiction or contrariety in the realities it has explained, in the principles it has laid down. One verse explains the rest, one sentence clarifies the others, as Ali (a.s.) said: "Its one part speaks with the other, and one portion testifies about the others."

No doubt, if such a book would have been from other than Allãh, there would have been a lot of ups and downs in its style; the speech would have bounced between elegance and clumsiness; the themes would have ranged from correct to erroneous. In short, the book would have been uneven, unbalanced and full of discrepancies.

Question: This is a claim without any proof. Non-

Muslim scholars have written many books showing that the Qur'ãn suffers from many discrepancies and mistakes — in construction of sentences (which fall short of the standard of eloquence) as well as in themes and meanings (which contain errors in its views and teachings). The replies given by the Muslims are just piteous attempts to explain away those contradictions and shortcomings. Those are defects that a correct and good speech should not have had in the first place.

Reply: The so-called discrepancies and defects have not been discovered by our adversaries; they have been mentioned (together with their replies) by Muslims in their books of exegesis and other subjects related to the Qur'ãn (not excepting this book of ours); the Muslim authors have used this method to show that what looks at the first glance an unusual style or expression is in fact a gem of highest eloquence. The non-Muslim writers have just picked out those supposed defects and discrepancies and collected them in their books, ignoring the replies that showed the real beauty of those expressions. If eye of love is blind, the eye of enmity is not any brighter.

Question: Well, how can you explain away the difficulty that arises out of abrogation? Many Qur'ãnic verses have been abrogated, as the Qur'ãn itself says: Whatever signs We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, We bring one better than it or like it (2:106); And when We change (one) communication for (an-other) communication, and Allãh knows best what He reveals . . . (16:101). Abrogation is at least a change of opinion, an inconsistency of thought, if not an outright contradiction in speech.

Reply: Abrogation is neither a contradiction in speech nor a change of opinion or thought. A rule is abrogated when the society, the environment, changes in such a way that the under-lying wisdom of that rule remains no longer valid. The difference, if any, is not in the opinion; it is rather in the subject matter. A clear evidence of it may be seen in the abrogated verses themselves — they invariably always contained some phrases or clauses to show that the given order was a temporary one, that it would soon be abrogated. For example: And as for those who are guilty of lewdness from among your women, call to witness against them four (witnesses) from among you; then if they bear witness confine them to the houses until death takes them away or Allãh makes some way for them (4:15). Note the last sentence and the hint it gives. Another example: Many of the people of the Book wish that they could turn you back into unbelievers after your faith . . . But pardon and forgive (them) until Allãh should bring about His command (2:109). Here too the concluding phrase shows that the rule ordained was not for ever.

FIFTH SPECIFIC CHALLENGE: ITS ELOQUENCE

The Qur'ãn has also challenged its adversaries to bring its like in its eloquence. Allãh says: Or, do they say: "He has forged it?" Say: "Then bring ten chapters like it forged and call upon whom you can besides Allãh, if you are truthful." But if they do not answer you, then know that it is revealed by Allãh's knowledge and that there is no god but He; will you then submit? (11:13 -14) These verses were revealed at Mecca. Again Allãh says: Or, do they say: "He has forged it?" Say: "Then bring a chapter like this and call whom you can besides Allãh, if you are truthful." Nay, they have rejected that of which they have no comprehensive knowledge, and its final interpretation has not yet come to them (10:38-39). These are Meccan verses too. All these verses challenge the doubters and disbelievers to bring the like of ten or even one chapter of the Qur'ãn in its style and eloquence, as eloquence was the most accomplished art of the Arabs of those days. Undoubtedly, they had reached the highest peak of eloquence. No preceding, contemporary or following nation ever reached even near them in their mastery of literature. Their expression was elegant, their style enchanting; their words perfectly fitted their themes and meanings; their talks were always in harmony with the occasions; their words were plain and their sentences beautiful; and their speech had an easy flow and inimitable grace. It was a way of which they were the pioneers and the only walkers. The Qur'ãn challenged such a nation in every possible way, so as to excite their rage, rouse their fury and fire them with determination to meet the challenge. It should not be forgotten that they were extremely proud of their art of eloquence and -never acknowledged the least elocutionary skill to anyone else. In spite of that arrogance of theirs, the Prophet dared them to bring just one chapter like the Qur'ãn. It is a challenge that even now is ringing in the ears of disbelievers, defying them to forge, if they can, just one chapter like it. But the Arabs' only answer was to avoid it; the more forcefully they were challenged, the more evident their helplessness was. Ultimately, they used to hide themselves to avoid hearing its sound. Allãh says: Now surely they fold up their breasts that they may conceal from Him; now surely, when they put their garments as a covering, He knows what they conceal and what they make known (11:5).

Even after fourteen centuries, no one has been able to bring its like. Those who tried it put themselves to shame and made themselves targets of ridicule. History has preserved some samples of those pathetic attempts. Musaylamah (who posed as a prophet) wrote these words in reply to the Qur'ãn ch. 105 (The Elephant): "The elephant, what is the elephant! And what will make you understand what the elephant is? It has an unwholesome tail, and a long trunk." In another "verse", which he recited before al-Sajãḥ (who also claimed to be a prophetess), he said: ". . . then we penetrate it into you women a hard penetration, and take it out from you forcefully . . ." Look at this rigmarole and decide its worth. A Christian in latter days wrote this "chapter" in reply to the Chapter of The Opening: "All praise is due to the Beneficent, the Lord of the beings, the king, the Subduer. For Thee is the worship, and from Thee is the help. Guide us to the path of faith."

All attempts to meet this challenge suffered the same fate.

Two Questions:

First: It is unreasonable to say that a speech can reach a level where it would become a miracle, a super-natural work. Language has been made by human ingenuity. How can a product of nature be above the reach of nature? A maker is more powerful than the thing he makes; a cause always encompasses its effect. It is the man who invented the words to meet his social needs, to convey to others' minds what one thinks or feels. The relationship of a word with its meaning is created by man. It is a subjective quality given to the word by man. This quality cannot reach beyond the ability of the maker himself. In other words, it is impossible for a speech to rise above the human ability.

Second: Let us accept for the time being that a particular composition of a speech may reach super-natural level, may be-come a miracle. Every intended theme may be clothed in varioussentences, each differing from the others in grades of perfection; and out of those numerous sentences one would reach a standard which would be beyond human ability and power — and that composition would be a miracle. It means that for every intended meaning there would be one miraculous sentence; and other structures would be below that standard. But we see that the Qur'ãn, more often than not, repeats many themes — and especially the stories — using different compositions and dissimilar styles. Whichever sentence-structure and style is accepted as a miracle, the other ones would fall short of that standard.

Reply: Before replying to these objections one matter should be clarified here.

It were such questions which led some Muslim scholars to believe in the theory of aṣ-ṣarf (الصَّرْفُ = to turn away):

They believed like other Muslims that it was impossible for men to bring a like of the whole Qur'ãn; or its ten chapters, or even one chapter. But, according to them, this inability of men was not based on the fact that the Qur'ãnic speech in itself was beyond the human power. The real reason was that Allãh, by His predominant will and decree, has turned away and dissuaded would-be adversaries from bringing its like. Allãh has done so to preserve and protect the sanctity of the prophethood.

This theory was totally wrong. This explanation is not in conformity with the clear import of the challenging verses. Allãh says for example: Or, do they say: "He has forged it?" Say: "Then bring ten chapters like it forged and call upon whom you can besides Allãh, if you are truthful." But if they do not answer you, then know that it is revealed by Allãh's knowledge and that there is no god but He; will you then submit? (11:13-14). Ponder on the sentences, "then know that it is revealed by Allãh's knowledge". The challenge was meant to prove that the Qur'ãn was a revelation; that it was not a speech forged by the Apostle; and that it was revealed by Allãh's knowledge and not by the Satãns. The same theme is found in the following verses:

Or, do they say: "He has forged it." Nay! they do not believe. Then let them bring a talk like it if they are truthful. (52:33-34). And the Satãns have not come down with it; and it behoves them not, and they have not the power to do (it). Most surely they are far removed from the hearing (of it) (26:210-212). On the other hand, this theory of "turning away" implies that the reality of the Qur'ãn's miracle was not in its being a revelation from Allãh; the miracle was that Allãh pre-vented the people from bringing a like of it. Again look at the verse: Or, do they say: "He has forged it?" Say: "Then bring a chapter like this and call whom you can besides Allãh, if you are truthful." Nay, they have rejected that of which they have no comprehensive knowledge, and its final interpretation has not yet come to them . . . (10:38 -39). This verse clearly says that what made them helpless before the Qur'ãn, what made it impossible for them to bring a like of even one of its chapters, was the fact that it has a final interpretation whose knowledge is reserved for Allãh — a knowledge which they lacked. It is this inherent quality of the Qur'ãn which vanquished the adversaries. It was not that they had ability to bring its like but Allãh pre-vented them from doing so. Then, there is the verse: Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ãn? And if it were from any other than Allãh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82). It shows that the miracle is in the inherent quality of the Qur'ãn that it was free from discrepancy in its words and meanings — because it is a quality which is not within the power of any creature — not that there was some discrepancy in this Book, but Allãh prevented people from finding it out.

All these Qur'ãnic declarations prove that the theory of aṣ-ṣarf has no leg to stand, and one should not take it seriously.

Now we come to the objections mentioned earlier:

It is a fallacious argument that as the language is a product of human ingenuity, it can never reach a level which would be beyond the grasp or ability of human beings; language, being a product, cannot be more powerful than its producer. The fallacy lies in the fact that what has been invented by man is simple words for particular meanings. But this congruity of the words with their meanings does not teach the man how to arrange those words, how to plan, draft and deliver a talk in the best possible way — in a way that the talk reflects the beauty of the meaning as it is in the mind,and the meaning in its turn becomes a mirror of the reality, remains in complete agreement with the fact. It requires a dexterity in the art of eloquence, an adroitness in elocution; also it depends on sharp intelligence and comprehensive knowledge so that the speaker may be fully cognizant of all aspects of the subject matter. It is this skill and knowledge that differs from man to man, and creates difference between talk and talk in their respective perfection and beauty.

So, there are three aspects of a human talk; Knowledge of language — a man may be having the most comprehensive know-ledge of the words of a language, without being able to speak it; elocutionary skill — a man may be the most accomplished orator, without being cognizant of material and spiritual realities; Know-ledge of realities — a man may be the most learned scientist or theologian without having the ability to express his views and meanings intelligibly. These three factors may be found separately (as mentioned above) and may also combine together in some people. And on them depend the beauty and the eloquence of a speech.

The fist factor — single words for their meanings — has been invented by social instinct of man. But the remaining two depend on intellectual refinement and delicate discernment.

Human perception, intelligence and discernment is limited and restricted. We cannot comprehend all the details of an event, all concomitants of a fact. As a result, we cannot be sure of being right at any time. Furthermore, we are gradually moving from deficiency to perfection, and so is our perception and discernment. Look at any spellbinding orator or enchanting poet; compare his earlier work with his latest and you will see the difference.
In this background, let us look at human speech — any human speech. First, we cannot be sure that it is free from errors of fact and judgement, because, as mentioned above, no speaker can have comprehensive knowledge of all the details and concomitants of an event. Second, it will not be on the same level with speaker's former or later speech. Not only that: Even in the same speech the beginning will surely be on a level different from that of the end, although we, probably, will not be able to discern it because of the minuteness of difference.

Now, when we find a decisive speech, based on comprehensive knowledge, and free from all types of discrepancy, we will have to admit that it is not the work of a mortal man. This reality has been described in the following verses: Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ãn? And if it were from any other than Allãh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82); (I swear) by the heaven endued with rotation, and by the earth splitting (with plants etc.), most surely it is a decisive word, and it is not a jest (86:11-14). Note the adjectives used for the heaven and the earth — they point to the constant changes occur-ring therein, because the oath is about a Book which is free from change and difference, inasmuch as it is based on an unchangeable and lasting reality, that is, its "interpretation". (It is a Qur'ãnic terminology that will be explained in ch. 3.) Also, Allãh says: Nay! it is a glorious Qur'ãn, in a guarded tablet (85: 21—22); (I swear) by the Book that makes manifest (the truth); surely We have made it an Arabic Qur'ãn so that you may under-stand. And surely it is in the original of the Book with Us, truly elevated, full of wisdom (43:2 - 4); But nay! (I swear) by the falling of stars; and most certainly it is a great oath if you only knew; most surely it is an honoured Qur'ãn, in a book that is hidden; none do touch it save the purified ones. A revelation by the Lord of the worlds (56:75 - 80).These and other similar verses show that the Qur'ãn is based on established realities that do not change, that are never altered. And, therefore, the Qur'ãn itself is safe from change, alteration and discrepancy.

To come back to the main objection: Accepted that language has been made by men. But it does not mean that there cannot be found a piece of literature that is beyond the reach of the very men who made the language. Otherwise, we would have to say that a sword-maker must be the bravest of all the swordsmen, the inventor of chess or lute must be the most accomplished chess-master or lutanist!

The perfect eloquence demands that, first, the word should be in complete harmony with the intended meaning, and, second, the conveyed meaning must be in accordance with the establishedfact. How the words fit the meanings? The structural sequence of the words and their parts should perfectly agree with the natural order of the intended meaning and its parts — bringing the man-made language and sentences in total agreement with the nature. (See for details Dalã'ilu 'l-i'jãz of ash-Shaykh `Abdu 'l-Qãhir al-Jurjãni.) As for the meaning, it must be correct and true, based on a real fact existing outside our imagination — and that fact should be of permanent value, unchangeable and unalterable. The first quality (the agreement of the word with meaning) depends on this basic quality of the meaning. A very eloquent sweet-sounding jocular speech cannot stand before a serious talk; nor can an eloquent, serious speech — if it is based on wrong premises — be equal to a talk that reflects true facts and comprehensive wisdom.

A speech attains the highest standard of eloquence when its words are sweet, its style free-flowing, its meaning fitting the occasion and its conveyed proposition based on true facts.

Such a talk, based as it is on reality, can never differ with other realities, can never disagree with other truths. Truth and reality is a non-divisible entity. Truth cannot refute another truth; reality cannot oppose another reality. Lie, on the other hand, may be in opposition to another lie as it surely is against the truth. Ponder on the verse: . . . and what is there after the truth but error (10:32). Note that truth is singular, there is no division in it. Again Allãh says: . . . and follow not (other) ways, for they will scatter you away from His ways . . . (6:153). Lie has many ways, it is not only disunited but also disuniting.

Obviously, there can be no difference whatsoever between one truth and the other; instead, there shall be total union and unison between them — one truth will lead to the other, one reality will guide to the other; thus, one part of the Qur'ãn confirms the others, one sentence testifies for the others.

It is a wonderful quality of the Qur'ãn. Take any verse; it is clear in its meaning; add to it another relevant verse equally clear; and you will find them together pointing to a new reality that was not shown by either verse separately: then put them side by side with a third relevant verse, and you will gain fresh insight into new sublime realities. It is a unique quality of the Qur'ãn, and you will see many examples of this special characteristic in this book. Unfortunately the exegetes had so far neglected this method. Had they followed this way since the early days, they would have discovered by now so much of its hidden treasures.

This lengthy discourse was necessary to show that the two objections laid down against the Qur'ãnic miracle of eloquence were baseless. Miraculous eloquence is not based on words alone. Therefore, it is out of place to say that as it is man who had made the language, how can any speech be above the reach of the man himself? Also, there is no room for the question that as only one out of many possible compositions can be the highest, how is it possible to express one idea in different ways, and then to claim that all were of miraculous standard? Our foregoing explanation has made it clear that the miracle of eloquence depends on meaning — on its agreement with sublime unchangeable reality and on its conformity with the words.

THE REALITY OF MIRACLE: ACCORDING TO THE QUR'ÃN

The Qur'ãn repeatedly asserts the occurrence of miracle — an unusual preternatural phenomenon, which shows the authority of metaphysical forces over the physical and material world. Miracle is not something against self-evident rational truth.

Some people have tried to explain away the verses that describe various miracles; their aim was to make the Qur'ãn fit the principles of modern physical sciences. But such attempts are unacceptable, as they are a forced burden on the language and the Qur'ãn.

We are going to explain, under various headings, what the Qur'ãn teaches us about the meaning and reality of miracle.

1. The Qur'ãn Confirms the General Rule of the Cause-and-Effect

The Qur'ãn says that in this natural world every thing, every effect, has a cause; that there is a system of cause-and-effectpermeating through this world. It is a self-evident reality; and on this truth depend the scientific and academic researches and discussions. Man by nature believes that there must be a cause for every natural phenomenon. Likewise, academic researches try to find out relevant causes for all such happenings. What is a cause? It is such a thing, or a combination of things, that when-ever it occurs, another thing — its effect — unfailingly comes into being. We try to find out by experiments the causes of various things. For example, experience has taught us that if there is any bum, it must have been caused by fire, movement, friction or some such cause. A cause must be unfailable, comprehensive and universal. In other words, whenever and wherever the cause is found, its effect must be found.

This matter is clearly confirmed by the Qur'ãn. It takes this principle for granted when it talks about life, death, sustenance and other heavenly or earthly phenomena — although it ultimately ascribes all the effects, and their causes too, to Allãh.

The Qur'ãn, therefore, confirms the general system of the cause-and-effect; whenever a cause is found (with all its necessary conditions) its effect must come into being, and whenever we see an effect, it surely and unfailingly proves the existence of its cause.

2. The Qur'ãn Affirms Miracles (Super-Natural Events)

The Qur'ãn, nevertheless, narrates many an event that goes against the normal, natural system of the cause-and-effect. It ascribes many super-natural miracles to various prophets, like Nũḥ, Hũd, Ṣãliḥ, Ibrãhīm, Lũṭ, Dãwũd, Sulaymãn, Mũsã, `Isã and Muḥammad (peace of Allãh be on them all!). It should not be forgotten here that those events, although abnormal and uncustomary, were not inherently impossible; they were not like an assertion that 'A positive proposition and its opposite are affirmed together and are negated together'; or like a statement that 'A thing can be separated from its own self'; or that 'One is not a half of two'. We instinctively know that such propositions are impossible, they cannot be.

But the miracles shown by the prophets were not of this category; otherwise, the minds of untold billions of religionists, since the dawn of humanity, would not have accepted them and believed in them. No man accepts an inherently impossible statement, nor does any sane person ascribe such a thing to another.

Moreover, the effects that are called miracle are not unknown to the nature. The natural world is continuously engaged in bestowing on the matter one form after the other, turning one event into another, giving life to the dead, and death to the living, transforming the misfortune into fortune and the comfort into discomfort. All this is happening daily in the world of nature; the only difference between a natural event and a miraculous one is in the speed and steps required to reach the goal. A natural cause brings about its effect, in special conditions, at a particular time and space, step by step in a long series of changes. The matter present in a walking-stick may one day appear in a running serpent; a disintegrating skeleton may one day become a living man — but in its natural course it will take a very long time, under certain conditions of time and space, with numerous consecutive causes which would constantly change that particular matter from one form to the other, taking it from one step to the next and then to the third and so on, until it appears in the required shape and form. In normal way, it cannot happen without its proper causes, without its necessary conditions; nor can it be brought into being by will-power of a human being. But when it comes to a miracle, it happens just by the will of the prophet, without any material cause and without any lapse of time.

Of course, it is very difficult for a simple mind — as it is for a scientific brain — to understand such super-natural events; man is, after all, accustomed to the natural-causality. On the other hand, no scientist can outright reject occurrence of super-natural phenomena even in this atomic age. Every day someone or the other demonstrates his skill bringing some super-natural events about; people see it, radios and televisions broadcast it, news-papers and magazines publish it; and nobody says that it could not have happened as it was against the laws of nature.

Such phenomena have led many modem scholars to the theory that man, like everything else, is surrounded by unknown magnetic or electric currents; man may, through rigorous training, get control over the surrounding currents, and use them to affect other material things in abnormal and unusual ways, bringing those astonishing feats about.

If this theory is proved correct and all-inclusive, it will supersede all present theories that explain various happenings and effects in terms of motion and power; it will replace all previous causes with one all-pervasive natural cause: the magnetic currents.

This is their theory. They are right in their belief that every natural phenomenon must have a natural cause if the causal relationship between them is intact.

The Qur'ãn has not identified by name any all-pervasive natural cause that would explain all natural and super-natural events, as it is not within the main purposes of this divine book. But it affirms that every natural phenomenon has a natural cause — by permission of Allãh. In other words, every phenomenon is totally dependent on Allãh, Who has appointed for it a certain procedure, a natural cause through which it gets its existence — the existence that is given by Allãh. Allãh says: and whoever fears Allãh He will make for him an outlet, and give him sustenance from whence he thinks not; and whoever trusts in Allãh, He is sufficient for him; surely Allãh attains His purpose; Allãh indeed has made a measure for every thing (65:2- 3). Its first sentence unreservedly declares that whoever fears Allãh and has trust in Him, Allãh is sufficient for him, and He will surely manage his affairs and make him succeed, even if in the normal way it may seem impossible, even if the material causes go against him. It is supported by the following verses: And when My servants ask you concerning Me, then verily I am very near; I answer the prayer of the suppliant when he calls on Me (2:186); Call upon Me, I will answer you (40:60); Is not Allãh sufficient for His servant? (39:36).

The next sentence, "surely Allãh attains His purpose", explains the reason of the first declaration. The same theme is found in the verse: . . . and Allãh is predominant over His affair, but most people do not know (12:21). This sentence too is all-inclusive and without any condition. Allãh has His own way to let a thing happen, if He so wills — even if the normal ways are closed, even if usual paths to it are cut off.

This may possibly happen in two ways: First, Allãh may bring that thing into being simply by His will, without resorting to any material or natural cause. Second, there may be an alternative natural cause, unknown to us, which Allãh may have appointed for that phenomenon; it may be hidden from our eyes but the Maker and Creator, Who has prescribed it, knows it and uses it to attain His purpose. This second possibility seems more appropriate in view of the last sentence, "Allãh indeed has made a measure for every thing." This sentence shows that every effect, whether it is in accordance with the normal causality or not, has a measure appointed by Allãh, is related to other beings, has a connection with other things; Allãh may bring that effect into existence through any other related thing, even if the normal cause is absent. What should not be forgotten is the basic fact that it is Allãh Who has bestowed causality on a cause; this relation of cause and effect is not independent of Allãh.

Allãh has created causal relation between various things. He can attain His purpose through any way He wishes. No doubt, there is the system of cause-and-effect in the world; but this chain is in the hands of Allãh, He may use it in any way He wills. There is a real causal relation between a thing and the things that have preceded it; but that reality is not as we know it — that is why no academic or scientific theory is capable of explaining all phenomena of the world; it is really as Allãh knows, makes and manages it.

This basic principle has been referred to in the verses of "decree" or "measure": And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure (15:21). Surely We have created every thing according to a measure (54:49); . . . and Who created every thing, then ordain for it a measure (25:2) . Who created then made complete, and Who made (things) according to a measure then guided (them to theirgoal) (87:2-3). Look also at the following verses: No misfortune befalls on the earth nor in your own souls, but it is in a book before We bring it into existence (57:22). No affliction comes about but by Allãh's permission; and whoever believes in Allãh, He guides aright his heart; and Allãh is Cognizant of all things (64:11).

These verses (and especially the first) show that the things take their particular identity in accordance with a measure appointed for it by Allãh; that measure gives it its individuality and defines it; and that measure and definition precedes the thing and then accompanies it. A thing can be properly delineated only if it is seen in its perspective, clearly defining its relation to all other things. The other related things serve as a mould that gives this item its peculiar shape and particular form. Every material effect is connected with all things which precede or accompany it. All such things together serve as the cause of this effect; and this one in its turn becomes a part of the cause of other effects that come later.

Also, it may be proved from the following two verses: That is Allãh, your Lord, the Creator of every thing. . . (40:62); . . . there is no living creature but He holds it by its forelock; surely my Lord is on the straight path (11:56). Add to them the fact that the Qur'ãn confirms the general system of causality — and you will find the complete picture displayed before your eyes.

1. The first verse says that every thing is created by Allãh, and the second one states that creation is on a single pattern; there is no deviation in it as that would cause chaos and disturbance.

2. The Qur'ãn confirms the general system of causality for all material things.

3. It follows that every material thing and effect is invariably always created by a cause — a cause that precedes it and brings it into being. It makes no difference whether it is a normal and usual cause, or a supernatural one. There must always be a cause.

Many usual causes which sometimes fail to bring about the expected effects are not the real causes. The real causes are those which never fail to create the expected effects. An example may be given of various diseases and their causes; influenza was previously thought to be caused by cold; but cold did not always create it, now it has been discovered that it is caused by a virus. The same is true about many supernatural feats.

3. Whatever is Caused by Natural Causes is Really Caused by Allãh

The Qur'ãn, while affirming the causal relation between a cause and its effect, ascribes every effect to Allãh. The inference is that these normal and usual causes are not independent in creating their effects; the real cause, in the true sense of this word, is only Allãh. Allãh says: surely His is the creation and the command (7:54); Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allãh's (2:284); His is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth (57:5); Say: "All is from Allãh" (4:78). There are numerous such verses showing that everything belongs exclusively to Allãh; He may deal with it in any way He likes; no one else can handle it at all except by permission of Allãh; He allows whomsoever He wishes to manage, influence and effect it to a certain extent. But this divine permission, establishing the relation of causality, does not make that cause independent of Allãh; it is just a permission given by the real owner to use his property. The man having this permission cannot transgress the limits imposed by the owner. Allãh says: Say: *"*O Allãh, Master of kingdom! Thou givest the kingdom to whomsoever Thou pleasest and takest away the kingdom from whomsoever Thou pleasest (3:26); Our Lord is He Who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (to its goal) (2:50); . . . whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His; who is he that can intercede with Him but by His permission? (2:255); . . . and He is firmly established on 'Arsh, regulating the affair; there is no intercessor except after His permission (10:3).

The causes do have the causality because Allãh has given it to them. They have got it, but are not independent of Allãh. It is this factor that has been described in above verses as "inter-cession" and "permission". Permission means that there was an impediment which, but for this permission would have hindered the now-authorized agent from interfering in this affair.

In short, every cause has been given the power to create the relevant effect; but the real authority is yet in the hands of Allãh.

4. The Souls of the Prophets do have Influence Over the Super-Natural Events

Allãh says: . . . and it was not meet for an apostle that he should bring a sign except with Allãh's permission; but when the command of Allãh came, judgement was given with truth, and those who treated (it) as a lie were lost (40:78).

The verse shows that it was the apostle who brought the sign — by permission of Allãh. The souls of the prophets were given a special power to cause the miracle; and that causal power, like all other causes, created its effect with permission of Allãh.

Again Allãh says: And they followed what the Satans chant (of sorcery) against the kingdom of Sulaymãn; and not that Sulaymãn disbelieved, but (it was) the Satans that disbelieved, they taught men sorcery and what was sent down to the two angels at Babylon, Hãrũt and Mãrũt Yet these two taught no one until they had said, "Surely we are only a trial, therefore do not be a disbeliever". Even then men learned from these two that by which they might cause a separation between a man and his wife; and they cannot hurt with it any one except with Allãh's permission (2:102).

This verse proves two things: magic has some reality; and it, not unlike miracle, is caused by a psychical factor of the magician, by permission of Allãh.

Take a miracle, a magic, a mysterious wonder of a saint, or a spell bringing skill acquired through rigorous practice — all these extra-ordinary or super-natural deeds emanate from their agents' psychical factors — or will-power — as the above-mentioned verses have shown. But Allãh has made it clear that the psychical cause found in His apostles, prophets and believers is predominant, has the mastery, over all other causes, in all imaginable conditions; it can never be overpowered. Allãh says: And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the apostles: Most surely they shall be the assisted ones, and most surely Our host alone shall be the victorious ones (37:171-173). Allãh has written down: I will most certainly prevail, I and My apostle . . . (58:21). Most surely We help Our apostles and those who believe, in this world's life and on the day when the witnesses shall stand (40:51). As you see, these verses do not put any condition or restriction on the promised victory; the apostles and the believers shall be victorious over their adversaries in all conditions and situations.

It may be inferred from it that this divine source is something metaphysical, preternatural. Material things are, in their nature, measured and limited; they get the worst of it if they are faced by another thing which is superior in power. But this preternatural spiritual source, which is assisted by the will of Allãh, is never defeated by any factor; whenever it is faced by any material adversary, it is given by Allãh a far more superior power to achieve victory with flying colours.

5. Whatever is Caused by Psychical Power Depends on a Command from Allãh

Read again the last sentence of the verse 40:78, mentioned at the beginning of the preceding chapter: "but when the command of Allãh came, judgement was given with truth, and those who treated (it) as a lie were lost". You will see that the super-natural event caused by the psychical power of the agent depends on a command from Allãh — in addition to His permission. That command may coincide with the said permission, or may be one with it. The command of Allãh is His creation, described by the word 'Be' in the verse: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it, "Be", and it is (36:82). Also Allãh says: Surely this is a reminder, so whoever wishes takes to his Lord a way. And you do not wish except that Allãh wishes; surely Allãh is Knowing, Wise (76:29 -30). It is naught but a reminder for the worlds, for him among you who wishes to go straight. And you do not wish except that Allãh wishes, the Lord of the worlds (81:27-29). These verses show that the affairs which are within the sphere of the man's will,and under his control and authority, are still dependent on the divine will for their existence. What these verses say is this: The intentional actions of a man are done by his will; but that will itself depends on the will of Allãh.

The verses do not say that whatever is wished by man is wished by Allãh. Had it been the case, no human wish would have remained unfulfilled — because it would have become the will of Allãh! Also, many verses refute this idea; And if We had wished We would certainly have given to every soul its guidance . . . (32:13). And if your Lord had wished surely all those who are in the earth would have believed (10:99).

Our will depends on the divine will; our action depends on our will, and also they depend — indirectly, through our will — on the will of Allãh. And both our will and action depend on the command of Allãh — on His word, "Be".

Things, affairs and events may be either natural or super-natural; and the super-natural may be either on the side of good, like miracle, or on that of evil, like magic and sooth saying. But all of them come into being through natural causes, and at the same time they depend on the will of Allãh. In other words, they cannot come into being unless the natural cause coincides, or becomes one, with the permission and command of Allãh. All things are equal in this respect; but when a prophet brings about a miracle, or a good servant of Allãh prays to Him for a thing, an additional factor, that is, the decisive command of Allãh, is added thereto; and the desired effect or event unfailingly comes into being. Allãh says: Allãh has written down: I will most certainly prevail, I and My apostles (58:21); I answer the prayer of the suppliant when he calls on Me. . . (2:186). See also other such verses quoted in the preceding chapter.

6. The Qur'ãn Attributes the Miracle to an Invincible Cause

The preceding chapters have made it clear that miracle, like other natural and super-natural things, needs a natural cause; and that all causes depend on some metaphysical causes. All these events and effects may, thus, be divided into four categories:

First: The normal events: They come into being by normal apparent causes which are accompanied by real causes — in most cases those real causes are material ones; and those causes depend on the divine will and. command.

Second: The extra-ordinary events of evil nature, like sorcery and sooth saying: They are caused by natural but unusual and abnormal causes, which are accompanied by the real causes; and those causes depend on the divine permission and will.

Third: The extra-ordinary events of good nature, like a prayer answered by Allãh: They are caused by the natural and real cause, with permission and will of Allãh — but such events do not contain any element of challenge, that is, they do not purport to prove the truth of any call or claim.

Fourth: The miracles: The extra-ordinary, super-natural events of good character, which are brought about as a challenge, to prove the truth of the call or claim. They too are caused by the natural and real causes with permission and will of Allãh.

The third and fourth categories have an extra quality in them: Their cause is fortified by an invincible factor; it can never be overpowered, as it is always accompanied by the decisive command of Allãh.

Question: It is strange to say that miracle is caused by a natural cause. Suppose, we discover the real natural cause of a miracle; will it not then be possible for us to create that miracle? If yes, then miraculousness would be a relative matter; any action would be a miracle in the eyes of those who are unaware of its cause, but quite an ordinary thing for those who know. In the same way, an event that was believed to be a miracle in dark ages would not be so impressive in this age of science and knowledge. If scientific research found out the real natural causes of the miracles, there would be no miracle at all — and no miracle could be used to prove the truth of the prophet's claim. What all this leads to is this: A miracle is not a proof except against him who is ignorant of its natural cause; therefore, it cannot be put asan evidence of the truth of the prophet's claim.

Reply: Miraculousness of a miracle does not depend on unknown ability of its cause; nor is it a miracle because it emanates from an extraordinary or mysterious cause. It is a miracle because it is brought about by such an extraordinary cause which is invincible, which cannot be overcome, cannot be defeated. Let us look at the case of a seriously sick person, who, all of a sudden, is cured by the prayers of a believer. It is called a miraculous event, because it emanates from an invincible cause. We know that patient could be cured by medical treatment, and it would have been a normal process; but this cause, that is, the medical treatment, could be foiled by other more powerful factors; and that is why it is not called a

7. The Qur'ān Counts Miracle as a Proof of the Truth of the Claim of Prophethood

Question: What is the connection between miracle and veracity of the claim of prophethood? Reason fails to see any binding relation between the two. But the Qur'ān time and again asserts this concomitancy, as may be seen in the stories of various prophets, for example, Hūd, Ṣāliḥ, Mūsā, 'Isā and Muḥammad (peace of Allāh be on all of them!). The Qur'ān narrates that no sooner did they announce their claim than they were asked by their people to bring some miracle to prove the truth of their claim; and they responded to it by showing the miracle.

Not only that. Some of them were given their miracle even before their nations had asked them for it. Allāh told Mūsā (a.s.) at the start of his mission: Go you and your brother with My signs and be not remiss in remembering Me (20:42). And He says about `Isā (a.s.): And (will make him) an apostle to the children of Israel: "That I have come to you with a sign from your Lord, that I create for you out of dust like the form of a bird, then I breathe into it and it becomes a bird with Allāh's permission and I heal the blind and the leper, and bring the dead to life with Allāh's permission and I inform you of what you eat and what you store in your house; most surely there is a sign in this for you, if you are believers" (3:49).

The same is the position of the Qur'ān which was given to the Prophet right at the start of his mission. The reason does not see any connection whatsoever between the truth of the message of an apostle or a prophet on one hand and his ability to show a super-natural sign on the other.

Moreover, the beauty of the principles expounded by the apostles and the prophets, strengthened as it is by irrefutable proofs, dispenses with the need of any miracle — for an intelligent and knowledgeable person. That is why it is said that miracles are needed for convincing the simple-minded people, because they cannot understand a learned discourse; but knowledgeable persons do not need them.

Reply: The prophets had not brought the miracles to prove any principle of religion, like belief in Oneness of God and the Day of Resurrection etc. — the truth of which could be realized by intellect and reason. They always proved such things with reasoning and logical arguments. For example, Allãh says regarding the existence of the Creator: Their apostles said: "Is there doubt about Allãh, the Master of the heavens and the earth?"(14:10); and He says about resurrection: And We did not create the heaven and the earth and what is between them in vain; that is the opinion of those who disbelieve; then woe to those who disbelieve on account of the fire. Shall We treat those who believe an and do good like the mischief-makers in the earth? Or shall We make those who guard (against evil) like the wicked? (38:27-28).

Why were, then, the apostles asked to show miracle, and why did they bring it about? It was to prove that they were in fact sent by Allãh; it was meant to authenticate their claim.

The prophets claimed that they were sent by Allãh, that He had revealed His message to them — either directly or through an angel. It was an assertion of a super-natural event; a claim of a reality beyond the physical senses and mental cognization of their people; a fact above the level of man's perception. If that claim was right, it would be a special metaphysical disposition reserved for the prophets only. The difficulty was that the prophets were like any other human being in their humanity and in its characteristics. How could they be favoured for this especial relationship with the world beyond nature?

The disbelievers, therefore, resorted to two methods to disprove the prophets' claim:

First Method: They tried to refute it through such "arguments" as the following:

a) They said: "You are nothing but human being like us; you wish to turn us away from what our fathers used to worship" (14:10). The apostles were like all other men; and other men do not receive such divine revelation as was claimed by the apostles. If they could be given revelation from God, why could not others get it as well? Were not all of them alike in their humanity?

The apostles replied to it in these words: Their apostles said to them: "We are nothing but human beings like yourselves, but Allãh bestows (His) favours on whom He pleases of His servants . . ." (14:11). They accepted that they were like all men in their humanity, but showed that apostleship was a very especial favour of Allãh, and He bestows it on whom He pleases. It is not difficult to see that being alike does not preclude some of them from being reserved for some especial favours. Of course, if Allãh had pleased, He could have bestowed it on anyone among them, but He chose for this favour whom He pleased. The same was the thrust of their protest against the Prophet: "Has the reminder been revealed to him from among us?" (38:8)

b) Of the same nature, but with added sarcasm, were the following remarks of the polytheists of Mecca: And they say: "Why was not this Qur'ãn revealed to a man of importance in the two towns?" (43:31) And they say: "What sort of apostle is this that he eats food and goes about in the marts; why has not an angel been sent down to him so that he be a warner with him? Or a treasure be thrown down to him, or be for him a garden from which he may eat!" (25:7-8)

What they wanted to say was this: If the Apostle (of Islam) really has been chosen by God to receive divine revelation, then he must be someone above all the mortals. Then why does he require food to eat, and why is he obliged to go about in the markets to earn his livelihood? If he is truly a representative of God, he should have been accompanied by an angel to assist him in his work, or he should have been given a treasure to save him the trouble of earning his livelihood in the markets, or a garden should have been bestowed on him, so that he would not need a food like ours.

Allãh answered them in these words: See how they coin comparisons for thee! So they have gone astray, therefore they shall not be able to find a way . . . And We did not send before thee any messengers but they most surely ate food and went about in the markets; and We have made some of you a trial for others; will you bear patiently? And your Lord is Ever-seeing (25:9,20). And in reply to their demand for sending down an angel, it was said in another chapter: And if We had made him angel, We would certainly have made him a man, and We would certainly have made confused to them what they make confused (6:9).

c) Going further, they raised their demands even higher: And those who do not hope for Our meeting, say: "Why have not angels been sent down upon us, or (why) do we not see our Lord?" Now certainly they are too proud of themselves and have revolted a great revolt (25:21). According to their thinking, there was no difference between them and the Prophet; all were human beings. Then why should he be reserved for this office of apostleship? They too should be visited by angels; or, even better, they should see the Lord. Allãh replied to them: On the day when they shall see the angels, there shall be no joy on that day for the guilty, and they shall say: "It is a forbidden thing totally prohibited" (25:22). It means that if they persist in their disbelief, they shall not see the angels except at the time of death, and then they shall not find any joy in it. The same thing has been mentioned in another verse: And they say: *"*O you to whom the Reminder has been revealed! you are most surely insane. Why do you not bring to us the angels if you are of the truthful ones?" We do not send the angels but with truth, and then they would not be respited (15:6-8).

d) This last verse shows us one more twist of their "arguments". The Prophet, according to their thinking, was truthful in his claim of revelation, but he was insane; whatever news he brought was a product of his unstable mind and was, therefore, not correct. The same "argument" was put against Nũḥ (a.s.), as the Qur'ãn says: . . . and they called (Nũḥ) mad, and he was driven away (54:9).

These were the variations of their "arguments" against the claims of the Prophet, the arguments which were based on similarity of the prophets and their people in their humanity.

Second Method: It was to reject outright the claim of the prophets, and demand from them proof of their veracity, asking them to bring some signs to show that they were in fact representatives of Allãh and recipients of His revelation.

The apostles and the prophets claimed a distinction which was intangible and unknowable to their people. They claimed that they were given apostleship and/or prophethood; that they were spoken to by Allãh — either directly or through angels. Now, such a claim could not be verified by any test or experiment. It could be objected against in two ways: (i) There was no proof that such a claim was true; (ii) there was proof that it was not true. Revelation, divine speech, (and the resulting shari`ah and religious discipline) could not be experienced by anyone other than the claimant; the normal system of cause and effect was against it. If such a claim were true, it would mean that the Prophet was in direct contact with the world beyond nature; he was tuned to the divine power — the power that can change the course of nature, can make the effect appear without their usual causes. In that case, he should be able to produce some another tangible super-natural effect; after all one super-natural event is like any other super-natural event so far as the divine authority is concerned. If Allãh spoke to the Prophet — a super-natural effect — He should show on his hands some other tangible super-natural effects in order to prove the truth of his former claim, that is, the claim that he receives revelation from God. If God wanted to guide the people aright by means of a super-natural thing, that is, revelation, then let Him prove the truth of His Prophet by means of another super-natural, that is, miracle.

That was why the people asked for miracles whenever a prophet was sent to them. They wanted miracles to verify his claim of prophethood, and not to ensure the truth of his teachings. Suppose a man is sent by a ruler to his subjects with his commands and laws. He reaches his destination and they ask him for his credentials. Will they be satisfied if, at this juncture, he starts explaining the wisdom underlying each rule and regulation? Certainly not. They will say: All that you have said, just shows that these rules are based on wisdom and meant for our good; but it does not prove in any way that they are from our ruler, nor that you are his deputy authorized to manage our affairs on his behalf. We shall believe in your claim only when you show us a credential to this effect, for example, an appointment letter duly signed by the ruler and having his official seal. It is as the polytheists had said to the Prophet: ". . . until you bring down to us a book which we may read" (17:93).

From the above explanation, two things become abundantly clear:

First: Miracle has an inseparable .connection with the truth of the claim of prophethood. Learned and ignorant, elite and common, all men need miracle in order to be able to accept the truth of a prophet's claim.

Second: What the prophet receives and perceives of the revelation is entirely different from those things which we feel by senses or comprehend by intellect. In plain words, revelation is not a function of mind; it is a reality totally separate from "right thinking". This fact is brilliantly clear from the Book of Allãh; and no one, having an iota of common sense, can entertain any doubt about it.

But in recent times some "scholars" have closed their eyes from this reality, and tried to reinterpret the spiritual facts and divine knowledge in the light of the natural sciences. They have, accordingly, based their explanations on materialistic theory. They believe that human perception and comprehension is a characteristic of matter, emanating from the brain. They are of the opinion that all real merits and perfections — whether of an individual or of a group — are developments of matter only. Based on these premises, they have explained prophethood and all related spiritual factors on the following materialistic lines:

Prophethood is a sort of a sharp mental power, an intellectual genius. The genius who is called prophet, looks at the social conditions of his nation; analyses what they have inherited of the beliefs, ideas, customs and superstitions; and then changes them to conform with the needs of his time and place, in the most suitable manner. In that light, he frames for them the basic social principles and ordains practical rules and regulations — in order to raise their standard of life, to elevate their morality and ethics, to make them better members of society. Basing on this hypothesis, they have declared that:

1) Prophet is an intellectual genius, who calls his people to the good of their social life.

2) Revelation is the good thought which comes into his mind.

3) Divine book is the collection of those good thoughts and ideas, inasmuch as they are free from personal desires and selfish motives.

4) Angels who, the prophet says, come to him, are only the natural material forces which keep the world going. Or, they are psychological traits which lead the man to his perfection.

The Holy Ghost is a higher development of those material forces, which rains those pure ideas on the prophet's mind.

Satan is a retrogression of the same material forces, which poisons the minds with evil thoughts and incites the people to anti-social deeds.

In the same vein they have explained away all the realities which the prophets have told us about — like the Tablet, the Pen, the Throne, the Chair, the Book, the Reckoning, the Garden, and the Fire.

5) Religions are products of times; they change with the times.

6) The miracles, attributed to the prophets, are nothing more than myths and fictions; which were forged in the interest of religion, to strengthen the belief of common people; or to enhance the prestige of religious leaders in the eyes of their followers.

This in short is their explanation. But prophethood, in this meaning, should rather be called a political device than a divine reality. It is not possible here to throw light on its various facets. What the readers, however, should not overlook is that this interpretation has no resemblance whatsoever to what has been de-scribed in the Books of Allãh and the traditions of the prophets. What led these "scholars" to such interpretations was their total submission to materialistic theories; that was why they rejected every metaphysical reality, and tried to bring it down to the level of lifeless matter.

Such peoples are academic descendants of an earlier group: Many early theologians interpreted every religious reality — the Throne, the Chair, the Tablet, the Pen, the Angels etc. — in material terms, adding, at the same time, that those things existed beyond the grasp of our senses. Needless to say that that interpretation was not based on any actual experiment or sensual perception. Now that the area of physical sciences has expanded so much, and every thing is being analysed, tested and experimented on, this later generation was obliged to reject the idea of physical existence of those religious realities, because, as mentioned above, their existence could not be proved by any test or experiment. Therefore, they had to invent other meanings for those realities, well within the area of sensual perception. They thought that they were serving the cause of religion in this way — because their interpretation would bring those realities within the sensual and physical recognition, and thus save them from being totally rejected by modern scholars.

Both groups have strayed from the right path. The ancient theologians correctly understood the meanings of these words, without resorting to any allegorical interpretation. But they erred when they thought that those were material things although beyond the purview of sensual perception, not subjected to the laws of matter.

The modern scholars took the wrong way from the very start; they gave these words wrong meanings in their eagerness to makethem conform with material realities; in their attempt to pull these sublime truths down to the level of physical experience.

The correct way is to explain these words according to the dictates of the language and the usage; then shall come the stage of identifying what, how and where, for example, the Pen is. This should be done with the help of other relevant verses. After the Pen is identified, it may be compared with current scientific ideas to check whether it goes against them. If that examination reveals that the identified entity was beyond the domain of matter, then it should not be proved, or disproved, by the principles of physical sciences. The science is concerned with material and physical things. What authority has it got to judge metaphysical or spiritual things? Can we allow a linguist to prove, or disprove, a proposition of astronomy by the rules of grammar? If not, then why should the rules of physical sciences be applied to prove, disprove or interpret metaphysical realities?

QUR'ÃN: But if you do (it) not — and never shall you do (it) — then be on guard against the fire of which men and stones are the fuel; it is prepared for the unbelievers. And convey good news to those who believe and do good deeds, that for them are gardens in which rivers flow; whenever they shall be given a portion of the fruit thereof, they shall say: "This is what was given to us before;" and they shall be given the like of it, and they shall have pure mates in them; and in them they shall abide.

The chapter began with description of three groups: the pious ones, the disbelievers and the hypocrites. But then all of them were joined together by the words, "O men!", calling them to worship Allãh. In this context, they could be divided in two groups only: those who answered this call (i.e. the believers) and those who did not answer it (i.e. the disbelievers). The hypocrites do not come into this picture, probably because in their appearance they are with the first group, while in reality they are included in the second. Perhaps, that is why the previous designation of the first group (those who guard against evil) has been changed here for "those who believe".

"al-Waqũd" (اَلوَقُودُ) is fuel. The verse says that man himself is the fuel of the hell. He is his own fuel, to keep the fire burning, and to get himself burned in that fire. Allãh says: then in the fire shall they be burned (40:72). It is the fire kindled by Allãh, which rises above the hearts (104:6-7). Man shall be burned in a fire that will be kindled and fuelled by his own self.

The next verse, 2:25, runs parallel to it and we find the same principle at work here also: "whenever they shall be given a portion of the fruit thereof, they shall say: `This is what was given to us before;' and they shall be given the like of it". It indicates that man shall get there only what he has himself pre-pared here. The Prophet has said: "As you live so you will die, and as you die so you will be raised." But the people of the paradise have a pleasant distinction vis-à-vis the people of the fire, because they shall be given ever-increasing rewards by their Lord: They have therein what they wish and with Us is more yet (50:35).

" . . . of which men and stones are the fuel": The stones referred to here are the idols which the disbelievers worshipped. Allãh says: Surely you and what you worship besides Allãh are the firewood of hell . . . (21:98).

" . . . they shall have pure mates in them": The adjective "pure", inasmuch as it qualifies the "mates", refers to purity from all such things as may create aversion and unpleasantness – whether in their bodies or in their behaviour. In other words, the mates given to the believers in paradise will be free from every disagreeable characteristic or trait.

aṣ-Ṣadũq narrates that aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) was asked about this verse and he said: "The pure mates are the ones who shall be free from menstruation and other excrements."

The Author says: Some other traditions have expanded the meaning to include cleanliness from all defective traits, all characteristics causing aversion.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Surely Allãh is not ashamed . . .: Gnat or mosquito is one of the smallest animals perceptible by naked eyes. These two verses run parallel to verses 19- 2 1 of ch. 13: Is then he who knows that what has been sent down to you from your Lord is the truth like unto him who is blind? Only those possessed of understanding shall bear in mind, those who fulfil the promise of Allãh and do not break the covenant, and those who join that which Allãh has bidden to be joined, and fear Allãh and fear the evil reckoning.

The verse clearly shows that there is a straying, a blindness, which afflicts the man as a result of his evil deeds; it is different from that initial straying and blindness which the man opts for by his own free will. Look at the sentence, "but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors". They transgressed first, and it was only then that Allãh made them go astray.

Guidance and misguidance are two comprehensive words; they encompass every felicity and infelicity that comes from Allãh to His good and wicked servants respectively. As Allãh describes in the Qur'ãn, He makes His good servants live a happy life, strengthens them with the spirit of faith, bring them out of the darkness into the light, and gives them a light by which they walk among the people; He has taken them under His protection and guardianship, and there is no fear for them, nor shall they grieve; He is with them, answers them when they call on Him, and remembers them when they remember Him; and the angels come down to them with good news of eternal peace.

Diametrically opposed to it is the condition of evil-doers. Allãh causes them to err, takes them out of the light into the darkness, sets a seal upon their hearts and hearings, and a covering over their eyes; He alters their faces turning them on their backs; places chains on their necks and these reach up to their chins, so they have their heads raised aloft, and makes a barrier before them and a barrier behind them, then He covers them over so that they cannot see; He appoints for them the Satans to become their associates, and they turn them away from the right path while they think that they are guided aright; those Satans make their misdeeds to seem good to them and they are their guardians; Allãh leads them on by steps from whence they perceive not; and yet He respites them, but His plan is firm; He makes a plan for them and leaves them alone in their rebellion, blindly wandering on.

These are some examples of the conditions of the two groups. On deeper consideration, it appears that man, in this world, lives two lives: there is this life which may be seen and perceived by all, and there is another life hidden behind this one; that hidden life is either good or bad — depending on his faith and deeds. Man will become aware of that hidden life when the veil of secrecy will be removed after death. Then he will see himself in his true form.

Further, it appears from the Qur'ãnic verses that man has had a spiritual life before the life of this world; and he shall have another life after this one. In other words, man has been given three lives — this life in this world is the second one, there was one preceding it and there will be another following. The condition of the third life shall be determined by that of this second life — which, in its turn, is governed by the first one.

Many exegetes have explained away the verses about the first life; they say that it is only a literary style, which presents imaginary pictures as real facts. And as for the verses concerning the life hereafter, they too are misrepresented as allegories and metaphors. But both types of verses are too clear in this meaning to allow such misinterpretations.

We shall explain the verses about the first life under ch. 7. As for the life hereafter, many verses show that the same good or bad deeds which man commits in this life, shall be returned to him, as their own reward or punishment, on the day of requital. Allãh has mentioned this fact in many verses: . . . and do not make excuses today; you shall be recompensed only what you did (66:7) ; then every soul shall be paid back in full what it has earned, and they shall not be dealt with unjustly. (2: 281) ; then be on guard against the fire of which men and stones are fuel (2:24) ; Then let him summon his council, We too would summon the tormentors (of the hell) (96 :17 -18) ; On the day that every soul shall find present what it has done of good and what it has done of evil . . . (3:30) ; . . . they eat nothing but fire into their bellies . . . (2:174);. . . surely they only swallow fire into their bellies . . . (4:10). There are many verses of the same import.

Then there is the verse 50:22, which by itself is enough to convince one of this principle: Certainly you were heedless of it, but now We have removed from you your veil, so your sight today is sharp. The words, "you were heedless of it", indicate that there was something present in this world, to which the guilty one has not paid any attention; "removed from you your veil" means that, but for that veil, he could have seen that reality even in this worldly life. What the man would see on the Day of Resurrection was present even in this earthly life; otherwise, it would not be logical to say that previously you were inattentive to it, or that it was hidden from your eyes, but now that the cover has been removed, you may see it clearly.

There is no allegory or metaphor in these verses. Try to explain in plain Arabic the principle which we have mentioned just now. You will not find a more explicit way than the one used in these verses. Then, how can they be explained away as allegories?

The divine talk here points at two realities:

First: Recompense: What a man will get in hereafter — reward or punishment, paradise or hell — shall be in recompense of the good or evil he would have done in this life.

Second: Embodiment of the deeds: Many verses indicate that the good or evil deeds themselves turn into their own pleasant or unpleasant recompense. (Or, that the recompense is an inseparable concomitant of the deeds themselves.) It is hidden from our eyes in this life, but we shall see it clearly on the day of reckoning.

These realities are not really two. But we had to explain it in this way to bring it nearer to the minds. The Qur'ãn too says that it uses similitude to make people understand.

QUR'ÃN: but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors: "al –Fisq" (الفِسقُ = transgression, sinfulness). It is the Qur'ãn that, first of all, used this word in its now prevalent meaning. It is derived from fasaqati 't-tamrah (فَسَقَتِ التَّمرَةُ = the date broke out of its outer rind). That is why it has been further explained by the words, "who break the covenant of Allãh after its confirmation" — a thing must be whole before it is broken. Also the transgressors are described at the end of the verse as the losers — one must be owning a thing before he can lose it. Allãh further says: Surely the losers are they who have lost themselves and their people on the resurrection day (42:45). All these expressions show how appropriate the adjective, "al-fãsiqīn" (اَلـفَـاسِقِـيْـنَ = the transgressors) is in this context.

You should never think that the adjectives used by Allãh in His book for His good servants (like "those who are near to Allãh", "the sincere ones", "the humble ones", "the good ones", "the purified ones" etc.) or for the evil ones (like "the unjust", "the transgressors", "the losers", "those who go astray", etc.) are cheap epithets, or that they are used as literary embellishment. Each adjective has its own significance; each points to a particular stage in man's spiritual journey. Each has its own characteristics, and gives rise to its especial effects and consequences. On physical level, every age has its own characteristics and powers, which cannot be found before or after that age; likewise, on spiritual plane, every attribute has its own special effects.

AN ESSAY ON COMPULSION AND DELEGATION

The sentence, "but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors", explains how Allãh manages the actions of His servants. Does He compel them to act in a pre-determined way? Or, has He delegated to them all powers in this respect? It is better to solve this knotty problem here and now, by the guidance of the Qur'ãn.

Allãh says: Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allãh's (2;284); His is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth (57:5) ; to Him belongs the kingdom, and to Him is due (all) praise (64:1). These and other similar verses prove that to Allãh belongs the whole universe; His ownership is unconditional and unlimited. A man owns a thing, let us say, a donkey; he may use it and take its advantage to a certain extent- only. For ex-ample, he may ride it or use it as a beast of burden; but he can-not starve it to death, nor can he bum it alive. Why? Because his ownership is not absolute; society would condemn him if he were to commit such atrocities. His ownership allows him certain advantages only; and not every possible use.

But when we say that Allãh is the Owner of the worlds, we mean absolute, real and unrestricted ownership. There is no owner except Allãh; the things own, or control, for themselves neither any harm nor any profit, neither life, death no resurrection. It is only Allãh who owns and controls every affair of every creature; He may do with them whatever He pleases; no one can ask Him why; He cannot be blamed or questioned for anything He does, because He is the absolute Owner. He has, of course, allowed some of His creatures to use some other things to a certain limits; but both the user and the used are His property; and the user cannot exceed the authorized limit. Allãh, as the absolute Owner, cannot be questioned about His dispositions; but others have to give account of how they exercised their authority. Allãh says: who is he that can intercede with Him but by His permission? (2: 255) ; there is no intercessor except after His permission (10:3) ; . . . that if Allãh please He would certainly guide all the people? (13 :31) ; And if Allãh please He would certainly make you a single nation, but He causes to err whom He pleases and guides whom He pleases . . . (16:93) ; And you do not please except that Allãh please (76:30) ; He cannot be questioned concerning what He does and they shall be questioned (21:23). Allãh disposes and manages His property in any way He pleases; no one can use any other thing except with His permission, because He is the real Owner and Sustainer of every thing.

Now we come to the rules and laws which Allãh ordains for His creatures. He uses the same method which has been adopted by the human society — ordaining what is good and praising and rewarding its doers; forbidding what is bad and condemning and punishing its doers. For example, He says: If you give alms openly, it is well (2:271), . . . evil is a bad name after faith (49:11). Obviously, the laws ordained by Allãh look at the good of man, and aim at perfecting the human society. Allãh says: . . . answer (the call of) Allãh and His Apostle when he calls you to that which gives you life (8:24) ; that is better for you, if you know (61:11); Surely Allãh enjoins the doing of justice and the doing of good (to others) and the giving to kindred, and He forbids indecency and evil and rebellion (16:90); Surely Allãh does not enjoin indecency (7:28). There are many such verses; and they show that the principles which the laws are based upon are always the same — be it a divine commandment or a human legislation. What is good in itself and ensures the good of the society is allowed, enjoined and prescribed; and what is evil in itself and endangers the social structure is forbidden; man is praised and rewarded for doing the former, and blamed and punished for doing the later. Some of those principles are as follows:-

People do whatever they do because of its underlying wisdom and good. Legislation of laws is no exception to this rule; the laws too are made because of their underlying good and benefit. They reward the law-abiding citizens and chastise, if they so wish, the law-breakers. The said recompense must be correlated to the action done — in its quantity and quality. Also, it is accepted that the enjoinment and prohibition can be addressed to him only who is not under any duress or compulsion who has got freedom of will and choice. The above-mentioned recompense too is related to such actions only which emanate from free will and choice. Of course, if someone, by his own action, puts himself in a tight corner, in a difficult position where he has to transgress a law, he may be justly punished for that transgression, and his plea of helplessness will not be heeded at all.

Allãh uses these same principles in His dealing with His creatures. He does not compel the man to obey or to disobey the divine commands. Had there been any compulsion, rewarding the obedient ones with the paradise and punishing the disobedient ones with the hell would have been absolutely wrong: the reward would have been an unprincipled venture, and the punishment an unmitigated oppression and injustice — and all of it is evil according to reason. Moreover, it would mean favouring one against the other without any justification, without any cause — and this too is a demerit according to reason. Furthermore, it would provide the aggrieved party with a valid argument against Allãh; but Allãh says: . . . so that people should not have an argument against Allãh after the (coming of) apostles (4:165); . . . that he who would perish might perish by clear proof, and he who would live might live by clear proof (8:42).

The above discourse makes the following points clear :

First: Divine laws are not based on compulsion. These rules have been made for the good of man in this life and the hereafter. And they have been prescribed for him because he has freedom of will, he may obey the rule if he so wishes, and may disobey if he so chooses. He will be fully recompensed for what-ever good or bad he does by his free will.

Second: There are things and actions which are not in conformity with the divine sanctity, yet the Qur'ãn attributes them to Allãh, like misleading, deceiving, scheming against some-one, leaving him wandering on in his rebellion, letting the Satan overpower the man and become his associate. All these actions are related to various kinds of misleading and misguidance. But Allãh is above all defects and demerits, and, therefore, these words when attributed to Him, should convey a meaning in keeping with His sacred name. Initial misleading, even in the sense of making inattentive and forgetful, cannot be ascribed to Allãh. What the above-mentioned expressions actually mean is this: When someone by his own free will, opts to go astray, chooses the wrong path and commits sins, then Allãh leaves him in that straying, and, thus, increases his error — it is done as a punishment of his wrong choice. Allãh says: He causes many to err by it and many He leads aright, by it, but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26). . . . when they turned aside, Allãh made their hearts turn aside (61:5). Thus does Allãh cause him to err who is extravagant, a doubter (40:34).

Third: The divine decree does not cover the actions of the man inasmuch as they are attributed to him — they are done by the doer, although not created by him. We shall further explain it later.

Fourth: Now that it has been seen that the divine law is not based on compulsion, it should be clearly understood that it is not based on delegation of power either. How can a "master" issue an authoritative command if he has delegated all his powers to the servant. In other words, this theory of delegation negates the comprehensive ownership of Allãh vis-à-vis many of His possessions.

TRADITIONS

A great number of traditions (narrated from the Imams of Ahlu 'l-bayt — a.s.) says: "There is neither compulsion nor delegation (of power), but (there is) a position between these two (extremes)."

It is reported in `Uyunu 'l-akhbãr, through several chains: When the Leader of the faithful, `Ali ibn Abi Ṭãlib (a.s.) returned from Ṣiffīn, an old man (who has participated in that battle) stood up and said : "O Leader of the faithful ! Tell us about this journey of ours, was it by Allãh's decree and measure?" The Leader of the faithful said: "Yes, O Shaykh! By Allãh you did not ascend any elevation, nor did you descend to any valley but by a decree of Allãh and by His measure." The old man, there-upon said : "I leave to Allãh all my troubles (of this journey), O Leader of the faithful!" (`Ali — a.s.) replied: "Have patience, O Shaykh! Perhaps you take it to mean a firm decree and a compulsory measure! If it were so, then there would be no justification of reward or punishment, no sense of command, prohibition or admonition, no meaning of promise or threat; there would not be any blame on an evil-doer nor any praise for a good-doer. Nay, the good-doer would have been rather more deserving of blame than the evil-doer, and the evil-doer rather more worthy of grace than the good-doer. (Beware!) this is the belief of the idol-worshippers and the enemies of the Beneficent God (who are) the Qadariyyah of this ummah and its Majũs. O Shaykh! Verily Allãh ordained (the sharī'ah) giving freedom of will (to men) and prohibited (evil) to keep us on guard; and He gave plentiful (reward) on meagre (deeds); and He was not disobeyed by being overpowered, nor was He obeyed by compulsion; and He did not create the heavens and the earth and what is between them in vain; that is the opinion of those who disbelieve on account of the fire."

The author says: The topics of the speech of Allãh and His decree and measure were among the earliest about which the Muslims differed among themselves. This second dispute may be described as follows:

The eternal divine will govern every thing in the universe. These things are transient in their quiddity; but when they do exist, they do so because the will of Allãh decreed their existence — and in this way their existence becomes essential — otherwise, the divine decree would be meaningless. Conversely, when a thing does not exist, it is because Allãh did not decree its existence — and in this way its existence becomes impossible — otherwise, the divine will would be meaningless. In short, whatever exists, exists because Allãh has decreed its existence, -thus turning it into an essential being. This principle applies everywhere. But the difficulty arises when it comes to such a human action that issues from our own will and choice. We know that we can do it if we so desire, and can ignore it if we so wish. Their doing and not doing is equally possible to us. The balance is tipped in favour of either side by our own will and choice. Our actions are based on our choice, and our will brings them into existence. The difficulty that arises at this point is this: We have earlier seen that nothing comes into being without the will and decree of Allãh, which turns the thing into an essential being — if so, then how can any action of ours be termed as "possible" one? It must exist because the divine will has decreed it ! Moreover, how can our will affect it in any way when it is governed by the will of Allãh? Also, in this background, it cannot be said that man had power to do a certain work before he did it. And, because he did not have that power, Allãh could not give him any order or command for or against that work. Going a step further, if Allãh gave him an order and he did not comply, it would mean that Allãh Himself had not wanted that thing to happen; so it was impossible for it to happen. Then the question would arise: How could Allãh order him to perform an impossible task? Conversely, if someone complied with that order, it was because Allãh Himself wanted it to happen. Then why should the man be rewarded without any valid reason? By the same reasoning, a sinner should not be punished, as it would be against justice, a naked oppression. One may go on enumerating the difficulties arising out of this subject. A large number of Muslims felt obliged to admit, and believe in, all these absurdities. They said that:

Man does not have power to do a work before the time comes to do it. The reason has nothing to do with the merit or demerit of any action. Whatever Allãh does becomes good; and whatever He forbids becomes evil.

Accordingly, Allãh may choose an action without any justification; He may give reward without any cause; He may ordain laws beyond the capacity of the doer or agent; He may inflict punishment on a disobedient servant even though the said disobedience and transgression was not of his doing .

It appears that the old man, who had asked the question, thought that the belief in the divine will and decree meant that there was no merit or demerit in any action and that man had no right of any reward (or punishment). Naturally he was disappointed when he heard that the journey was by the decree of Allãh; that is why he said: "I leave to Allãh all my troubles." What he meant was this: My journey to Ṣiffīn and back and my fighting in the way of Allãh had no benefit for me as it was governed and done by the will of Allãh; my share in all this venture was only the trouble and the inconvenience which I underwent. Therefore, I shall leave it to Allãh to balance my account, as it was He Who put me through all these troubles. The Imam (Ali) replied to him by saying, "If it were so, there would be no justification of reward or punishment . . ." The Imam pointed to the rational principle on which the legislation is based. And at the end he reasoned that Allãh did not create the heavens and the earth and what is between them in vain. If Allãh could will the man's actions in a way as to deprive him of his freedom of will and choice, it would mean that He could do things without any purpose and aim; then He could create the whole creation aimlessly and in vain. This in its turn would render the principle of resurrection and reward and punishment invalid too.

It is narrated in at-Tawhīd and `Uyunu 'l-akhbãr that ar-Riḍã (a.s.) was asked about compulsion and delegation, and he said: "Should I not teach you in this regard a principle by which you shall never differ (among yourselves), and no one will argue with you on this subject but that you shall defeat him (by it)?" We said: "(Teach it to us) if you so please." Thereupon he said: "Verily Allãh is not obeyed through compulsion, nor is He disobeyed by overpowering; and He did not leave the servants remiss in His kingdom; He (still) owns what He has given into their possession, and has power on what He has put into their power. Now, if the servants decided to obey Him, He would not prevent them from it, nor would he put any obstruction to it; and if they decided to disobey Him, then if He pleased to bar their way to it He would do so, and if He did not hinder it and they committed it, then it was not He Who led them into that (sin)." Then the Imam said : "Whoever would accurately delineate the boundaries of this speech would surely overcome his adversary."

The author says: Why did "al-Mujabbirah" (اَلْمُجَبِّرَةُ = the believers in compulsion) say what they said? It was because they pondered on the divine decree and measure, and it led them to the conclusion that when Allãh decrees a thing it must happen inescapably. Their deliberation of this subject was correct, and so was the conclusion arrived at. Where they fell in error was in correlating that conclusion with reality; they did not understand the difference between a reality and an idea based on subjective approach; they forgot the distinction between essentiality and possibility.

It is correct to say, on the basis of the divine decree and measure, that nothing happens in this world unless it turns an essential being; it is because every thing and every affair comes into being when it is decreed by Allãh, according to the measure prescribed by Him; and then it cannot fail to happen, otherwise the decree of Allãh would fail. At the same time, it should be kept in mind that a transient or possible thing becomes essential because of its sufficient cause. When looked at in conjunction with its sufficient cause, it would be called "essential"; but separated from that cause, it would remain as it was before — a transient or possible thing. Let us look at an action of man which he does by his free will and choice. When we look at it in relation to all things that are necessary to bring it into being — knowledge, will, proper tools and organs, the material, formal, efficient and final causes, and all the conditions of time and space — it will become an essential being; and it is in this context that it becomes subject of the eternal divine will. In other words, it becomes an essential being when all aspects of its sufficient cause are complete. But, looked in relation to each of those aspects separately, it remains only a transient and possible thing. If it is seen vis-à-vis its efficient cause only, that is, in relation to the doer only, it will retain its characteristics of transience and possibility — it will not become an essential being.

It is now clear to see at which point the believers in "compulsion" have deviated from the right path. They thought that, inasmuch as the human action was subject to the divine will and decree, man had no power on it; he was not a free agent; he was rather a helpless tool in divine hands. But they did not take into consideration the fact that the divine will takes it into hand only when all aspects of its sufficient cause are complete, and not before that. The divine will decrees that a certain action be done by Zayd — not unconditionally, but on the condition that it is done by Zayd's free will, at a certain time and a certain place. Therefore, its relation to the divine will itself demands that it should be an action of a free agent, done by his own free will and choice.

Doubtlessly, that action will be called an "essential" one if seen in relation to the divine will; but at the same time and by virtue of the same divine will, it will be a possible and transient action when related to the doer, that is, the man. In other words, there are two wills — the human and the divine; they do not run parallel to each other; the divine will comes after and above the human will — they are in a vertical, and not a horizontal position to each other. Therefore, there is no competition or collision between the two wills. It was a short-sightedness on part of the believers in compulsion to negate the human will in order to establish the divine one.

The Mu`tazilites said that human actions are done by man's free will. But they went to the other extreme, and fell in an error no less objectionable than that of al-Mujabbirah. They too said that if human action was subjected to the divine will man would not have any freedom of will and choice. And then they took a position diametrically opposed to that of al-Mujabbirah, and came to the conclusion that the divine will had no relation whatsoever to the human action. Thus they had to accept another creator — the man himself — for human actions. In this way, they accepted dualism without knowing what they were doing. Going further they fell into traps more harmful than the belief of al-Mujabbirah. As the Imam has said: "The poor al-Qadariyyah, they wanted to emphasize the justice of Allãh, so they removed Him from His power and authority . . ."

A master, showing kindness to one of his slaves, married him to a slave-girl of his; he bestowed on him a property, gave him a well-furnished house and provided him with all the necessities of life. Then there came some people there, looked at his property, and began arguing among themselves. Someone said: "Even though the master has given this property to his slave and has made him its owner, the slave has no right in, or authority over, this property at all. Does any slave own any thing? The slave together with all his belongings belongs to the master."

Another said : "No. You are wrong. The master has bestowed on this slave the right of property. Now the slave is its absolute owner, and the master has lost all his rights, and authority over this property. We may say that he has abdicated in favour of his slave."

The former was the opinion of al-Mujabbirah; the later that of the Mu`tazilites.

But both were wrong. The correct view would have been to say: The master has got his status of mastership; the slave his position of servitude and bondage. The master has made the slave owner of his (i.e., master's) property. The property belongs to the master at the same time that it belongs to the slave. There are two ownerships — one over the other. This is what the Imams of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) have taught us to believe, and what the reason supports.

`Abãyah ibn Rib'i al-Asadi asked Ali, the Leader of the faithful, the meaning of "capability". The Leader of the faithful asked a counter question: "Do you have that capability without God or with God?" When `Abayah remained silent, he told him, "Tell me, O `Abayah!" He said: "What should I say? O Leader of the faithful!" He said : "You should say that you have got that capability by (grace of) Allãh, to Whom it belongs and not to you. If He made you its owner, it would be of His bounties, and if He took it away from you, it would be a trial from Him; and He is the Owner of what He gave into your possession, and has power over what He put under your power . . ." (al-Iḥtijãj) al-Mufīd reports in his Sharḥu 'l-'aqã'id: It has been narrated from Abu 'l-Ḥasan, the third, (a.s.) that he was asked whether the actions of the servants were created by Allãh. He (a.s.) said : "If He were their creator, He would not have disowned their liability. And He (Allãh) has said: Verily, Allãh is free from liability to the idolaters . . . (9:3). It does not mean that Allãh was not responsible for the creation of the idolaters; what Allãh has disowned any responsibility of, is their idol-worship and their evils."

The author says: There are two aspects of a deed — its actual existence, and its relation to its doer. It is only when an action is seen in relation to its doer that it is called obedience or disobedience, good or bad, virtue or sin. So far as actual existence is concerned, there is no difference between marriage and fornication. What distinguishes one from the other is the command of Allãh — marriage conforms with the divine law, and fornication goes against that law. Someone is killed without any reason; another is killed by a lawful authority in reprisal of a murder. A teacher punishes an orphan in order to guide him aright; an oppressor hits at the same orphan unjustly. In all these examples, the actual movements of the actions are identical. But one group is called sin because it does not conform with the divine law or goes against the common weal of the society.

Allãh says: Allãh is the Creator of everything. . . (39:62). Every action is a "thing" inasmuch as it exists. And the Imam has said: "Whatsoever may be called a thing is created, except Allãh . . ." Also, Allãh says: Who made good everything that He has created . . . (32:7). It may be inferred that everything is good because it is created. Creation and goodness are inseparable factors. But at the same time, we see that Allãh has named some actions as evil. For example, He says: Whoever brings a good deed, he shall have ten like it, and whoever brings an evil deed, he shall not be recompensed but only with the like of it . . . (6:160). These are obviously the actions done by man; not the factor of recompense which cannot apply to divine actions. Such a deed is called sin. It is evil because it lacks some thing; because it is a nullification of a spiritual virtue or social good. In other words, a sin is sin because it is a negation , a non-being; otherwise it would have been good.

Now, let us look at the following verses of the Qur'ãn:

No misfortune befalls on the earth nor in your own souls, but it is in a book before We bring it into existence . . . (57:22); No affliction comes about but by Allãh's permission; and whoever believes in Allãh, He guides aright his heart . . . (64:11); And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults) (42:30); Whatever benefit comes to you, it is from Allãh, and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself (4 :79) ; . . . and if a benefit comes to them, they say: "This is from Allãh:" and if a misfortune befalls them they say: "This is from you." Say: "All is from Allãh;" but what is the matter with these people that well-nigh they do not understand what is told (them)? (4:78). On pondering upon these verses, it becomes clear that these misfortunes are relative evils. A man is bestowed with the bounties of Allãh, like security and peace; health and wealth, and so on; then he loses one or more of these bounties. This misfortune, in relation to that man, is evil because it has nullified some existing things, that is, the bounties which he had previously enjoyed. Thus, every misfortune is created by Allãh, and at that stage it is not an evil. But it is an evil when seen in relation to the man who loses an existing bounty because of it.

Likewise, every sin is a negative factor, and as such, it is not to be attributed to Allãh at all; though it may be attributed to Him from another angle, inasmuch as it happens by permission of Allãh.

al-Bazanṭi said: I told ar-Riḍã (a.s.) that some of our fellows believe in compulsion and some of them advocate the (belief of) capability. Thereupon he told me: "Write down (as I say): Allãh, Blessed and High is He, has said: `O son of Adam! By My will you have become such that you wish for yourself what you wish; and by My power you discharged the duties imposed by Me (on you); and by My bounty, you got power to disobey Me; I made you hearing, seeing (and) powerful. Whatever benefit comes to you, it is from Allãh; and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself. And it is as it is because I have more right on your good deeds than you have yourself; and you are more liable to your sins than Me. And it is because I cannot be questioned concerning what I do and they shall be questioned. Thus, I have arranged for you everything that you want . . .' " (Qurbu 'l-asnãd)

This, or nearly the same, tradition is narrated through other chains, of the Sunnis as well as of the Shi'ahs. In short, the deeds that cannot be attributed to Allãh, are the sins per se. It further explains the sentence of the preceding tradition: "If he were their creator, He would not have disowned their liability . . . What Allãh has disowned any responsibility of, is their idol-worship and their evils . . ." Abu Ja'far and Abu `Abdillãh (a.s.) said: "Certainly, Allãh is too Merciful to His creatures to compel them to sin and then to punish them for it. And Allãh is too powerful for anyone to think that He would will a thing and it would not happen!" (The narrator) said: "Then they (a.s.) were asked: 'Is there a third position between the (positions of) compulsion and (independent) capability?' They said: 'Yes, broader than (the space) between the heaven and the earth.' " (at-Tawḥīd)

to the servants. He said: ‘Allãh is too honourable to delegate (the authority) to them.’ I said: ‘Then has He compelled the servants in their deeds?’ He said: ‘Allãh is too just to compel a servant on a deed and then to punish him for it.’ ” (ibid.)

In the same book Mihzam is reported as saying: “Abũ `Abdillãh (a.s.) said: ‘Tell me what is that concerning which our followers (whom you have left behind) have differed among themselves.’ I said: ‘About the compulsion and the delegation?’ He said: ‘Then ask me about it.’ I asked: ‘Has Allãh compelled the servants to (commit) sins?’ He replied: ‘Allãh is too over-powering to do it to them.’ I asked: ‘Then has He delegated (the authority) to them?’ He replied: ‘Allãh has too much power over them to do so.’ I asked : ‘Then what is it (i.e., the correct position)? May Allãh make your affairs right for you!’ ” (The narrator says:) “The Imam turned his hand twice or thrice, then said: ‘If I were to answer you concerning it, you would not believe.’ ”

The author says: “Allãh is too overpowering to do it to them”: Compulsion means that a force majeure subdues the subject in such a way that his power of action is nullified. “Too overpowering” (or, more overpowering than that) is the predominant will of Allãh — He has willed that the action would emanate from the doer by his free will and choice, and this is what is actually happening in the world. The divine will has given the man freedom of will; neither the divine will negates the human will, nor the human will collides with the divine will.

It is reported in at-Tawḥīd that as-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: “The Apostle of Allãh said: ‘Whoever thinks that Allãh enjoins the evil and indecency, he tells a lie against Allãh; and whoever believes that the good and bad (do happen) without the will of Allãh, he removes Allãh from His authority.’ ”

It is reported that al-Ḥajjaj ibn Yũsuf wrote to al-Ḥasan al-Baṣri, `Amr ibn `Ubayd, Wãṣil ibn ‘Aṭa’ and ‘Ãmir ash-

Sha‘bī, asking them to describe what they had got (and what has reached them) in respect of (divine) decree and measure. al-Ḥasan al-Baṣri wrote to him: “The best thing that has reached me is that which I heard the Leader of the faithful, `Ali ibn Abi Ṭãlib (a.s.) saying: ‘Do you think that He Who has forbidden you has (also) acted cunningly against you? Rather, your lower and higher (parts) have cunningly deceived you, and Allãh is free from its liability.’ “And `Amr ibn `Ubayd wrote to him: “The best thing I have heard about the decree and measure is the saying of the Leader of the faithful, `Ali ibn Abi Ṭãlib (a.s.): ‘If perfidy were in reality decreed, the perfidious man, if punished, would have been op-pressed.’ ” And Wasil ibn `Ata' wrote to him: “The best I have heard about the decree and measure is the saying of the Leader of the faithful, `Ali ibn Abi Ṭãlib (a.s.): `Do you think that He would guide you to the path and (then) obstruct you (from moving on)?’ ” And ash-Sha'bi wrote to him: “The best thing I have heard concerning the decree and measure is the word of the Leader of the faithful, `Ali ibn Abi Ṭãlib (a.s.): ‘Whatever you have to seek Allãh's pardon for it, it is from you; and what-ever you thank Allãh for it, it is from Him.’ ” When their letters reached al-Ḥajjãj and he studied them, he said: “Certainly they have taken it from a clear spring.” (aṭ-Ṭarã'if)

It is narrated in the same book that someone asked Ja‘far ibn Muhammad as-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) about the decree and measure, and he replied: “Whatever you may blame the servant (of Allãh) for it, it is from him; and whatever you cannot blame the servant (of Allãh) for it, it is the work of Allãh. Allãh will say to the servant: ‘Why did you disobey? Why did you transgress? Why did you drink liquor? Why did you fornicate?’ This is, therefore, the work of the servant. But He will not say to him: ‘Why were you sick? Why were you of short stature? Why did you become white? Why were you black?’(He will not ask it) because it is the work of Allãh.”

Ali (as.) was asked about monotheism and justice (of Allãh), and he said: "Monotheism is that you should not imagine Him; and justice is that you should not accuse Him." (Nahju 'l-balãghah)

The author says: There are numerous traditions on this subject; but those quoted above throw light on all the aspects of the topic.

The above-mentioned traditions show various special methods of argument regarding the subject matter.

a) Some of them argue on the basis of legislation itself — order and prohibition; punishment and reward etc. — that man has freedom of will, without any compulsion or delegation of power. See, for example, the speech of the Leader of the faithful, 'Ali (a.s.), replying to the old man. It is similar to the argument we have inferred from the words of Allãh.

b) Others bring in evidence the verses of the Qur'ãn which cannot be reconciled with the theory of compulsion or delegation of power. For example: And Allãh's is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth (3:189); and your Lord is not in the least unjust to the servants (41:46). Also, there is the verse, Say: "Surely Allãh does not enjoin indecency" (7:28).

Poser : A deed may be described as unjust or indecent if it is seen in relation to us. But when it is attributed to Allãh it is not called unjust or indecent. Therefore, even if all "our" deeds were actually done by Allãh, it would be perfectly right to say that He is not unjust and does not enjoin indecency.

Reply: The sentence seen in the context leaves no room for such misconceptions. The complete verse is as follows: And when they commit an indecency they say: "We found our fathers doing this and Allãh has enjoined it on us." Say: "Surely Allãh does not enjoin indecency. Do you say against Allãh what you do not know?" Look at the sentence, "and Allãh has enjoined it on us." The pronoun "it" clearly refers to the indecency committed by them; and it is the same deed which is referred to in the sentence, "Surely Allãh does not enjoin indecency." Allãh does not enjoin what is termed as indecency in context of human activities; it does not matter whether in other framework it is called indecency or not.

c) A third type of reasoning is based on the divine attributes. Allãh has given Himself many good names, and has described Himself with many sublime attributes, which cannot be squared with compulsion or delegation of power. Allãh is the Subduer, the Omnipotent, the Benevolent and the Merciful. These attributes can only be believed in if one believes that everything depends on Allãh in its existence, and that its defects and shortcomings can-not be attributed to Him at all. (Refer to the traditions quoted from at-Tawḥīd.)

d) Yet others refer to seeking the pardon of Allãh as well as to the blame which society directs at the wrong-doer. If sin were not from the man himself, there would have been no meaning in asking for divine pardon. If all our actions were done by Allãh why should be we blamed for only some of them and not for the others?

e) Lastly, there are the traditions which explain the words, like causing to err, sealing the hearts and misleading, when they are attributed to Allãh:

ar-Riḍã (a.s.) said explaining the words of Allãh, and He (Allãh) left them in utter darkness — they do not see: *"Allãh is not described as leaving something as His creatures do. But when He knew that they would not return from disbelief and error, He held back His help and grace from them and let them alone with their choice." (`Uyũnu 'l-akhbãr*)

The same book narrates from the same Imam in explanation of the words of Allãh, Allãh has set a seal upon their hearts: *"*It is setting a seal on the hearts of the disbelievers as a punishment of their disbelief, as Allãh has said: . . . nay! Allãh has set a seal upon them owing to their disbelief, so they shall not believe except a few (4:155)."

as-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said concerning the words of Allãh, Surely Allãh is not ashamed to set forth any parable. . .: "This divine word answers those who think that Allãh makes (His) servants go astray and then punishes them for that straying . . ." (Majma`u 'l-bayãn)

The author says: Its meaning may be understood from previous explanations.

A PHILOSOPHICAL DISCUSSION

Every species is related to a particular type of action and reaction. In fact it is these special characteristics which identify the species as such. We looked at various kinds of actions and reactions emanating from various groups. Our reason told us that there should be an efficient cause, an agent, to bring each kind of these actions and reactions into being. Therefore, we put every group in a separate category, identifying it as a species. When we compared human characteristics, for example, with those of an animal, and delineated them clearly, we decided that they were two different species, with different characteristics.

When the actions are seen in relation to their subjects, that is, the species, they are primarily divided into two categories:

First: The actions emanating from the nature — where the knowledge of their emanation has no effect at all on their existence. For example, the growth and nutrition of the vegetables; the movement of the bodies; our own health or illness. These things are known to us, present in our own bodies; but our knowing or not knowing them has no effect whatsoever on their coming into being; they totally depend upon their doer — that is, nature.

Second: The actions issuing forth from the doer with his knowledge — where the said knowledge has a bearing on their being, like the intentional actions of the man and even of some animals. The doer does such an action after knowing and identifying it; and it is the knowledge and perception that gives him that insight. The knowledge makes him realize what would constitute his perfection, and helps him in deciding whether a particular action would lead to that desired perfection. The knowledge distinguishes the means of perfection from other things; and this distinction helps the doer in choosing a particular course of action. And the action comes into being.

The activities based upon ingrained aptitude (like issuing forth of the required voices, when a man speaks), as well as those emanating from natural disposition, or from the dictates of nature (like breathing) and, likewise, those springing from overwhelming grief or fear etc., do not require contemplation or meditation by the doer. Why? Because there is not more than one form of knowledge here, and the doer does not have to delay his activity awaiting a final decision. Therefore, he does it immediately. But in other cases, where the doer has before his eyes two or more possible forms of knowledge to choose from, he has to spend at least a few moments in contemplation and deliberation. For example, Zayd is hungry, and he gets a bread. Its one aspect is that it may satiate his hunger; but there may be other aspects too — it may be another man's property, it may be poisoned, it may have become dirty and so on. Zayd has to reflect whether the bread is legally, morally and hygienically fit for consumption. When he reaches a conclusion, the actions follows without any delay.

The first type of activities is called involuntary, like natural reactions; the second type is called voluntary, or intentional, like walking or talking.

The intentional actions, emanating from man's knowledge and will, are again divided into two categories:

First: When the man decides to do — or, not to do — a certain work, he may do so entirely on his own, without being influenced by any other fellow. In the example given above, Zayd may decide, on his own, not to eat the bread because it was someone else's property; or he may eat it in spite of that snag. This is called a deed done by man's free will.

Second: When the man opts for a certain course of action under the influence of someone else. A tyrant may force a help-less person to act according to that tyrant's instruction under duress. The poor fellow in this condition commits sins and crimes against his own will. This is called a deed done under compulsion.

Right? But let us look at this second category more closely. We have said that this kind of deed results from the compeller's compulsion; he does not allow any freedom to the doer, who has to take the only way left open by the oppressor. But even then, it is the doer himself who decides to proceed on that way. It is true that the major factor leading to this decision was the tyrant's compulsion; but it is equally true that the decision was taken by the doer himself, even though it was taken to save himself from the tyrant's oppression. In short, even the deeds done under compulsion are done by the will of the doer. It follows that the division of intentional actions into these two categories is not real, not based on actual facts. The intentional action is the one which emanates from a knowledge and a will that tips the balance in its favour. This reality is found in the deed done under compulsion as well as in the one done by free will. It makes no difference that it was some other man's force or fear that tipped the balance in one case and the doer's own thinking that did so in the other. A man sitting near a wall looks up to find that it was about to fall; overcome by fear he sprints away from that place. And we say that he did so by his own free will. Suppose, a tyrant threatens to bull-doze the wall over him if he did not move away. Overcome by fear, he sprints away from there. And we say that it was done under compulsion. But the fundamentals in both cases are the same. The man is overcome by fear and decides to move away. So, why should we put them in two different categories.

Objection: There is enough difference between the two actions to warrant their assignment to two different categories. The deed done by free will is based on its underlying wisdom (in the eyes of the doer); the doer deserves praise or blame, and gets reward or punishment, for it. All these factors are simply absent in the case of a deed done under compulsion.

Reply: It is true. But these factors are based on subjective approach of the society. They do not have any existence outside the imagination. By talking on these subjective approaches we have crossed the limits of philosophy. Philosophy deals with the things that exist in reality, as well as with those things' natural characteristics. What all this leads to is the conclusion that the discussion whether man is free in his actions is beyond the scope of philosophy.

We may yet bring it back on the track of philosophy from another direction:

A transient (possible) thing has equal relation with existence and non-existence. It, therefore, needs a sufficient cause to tip the balance in favour of existence, so that it may come into being.

The transient thing, when related to its sufficient cause, becomes an essential being — it becomes impossible for it not to exist. That is why it is said that a transient does not come into being unless it becomes an essential being.

A transient, by its definition, must have a sufficient cause for its existence. A transient existing without its sufficient cause is a contradiction in terms. And that cause gives it the essentiality, so long as it exists.

Now look at the universe at a glance. You will find a chain made up of innumerable links, all of which would be essential beings. In other words, not a single existing thing could be called a transient, so long as it exists.

But this "essential-ness" comes to it only when it is looked at in relation to its sufficient cause.

The sufficient cause may be a single thing or a compound of various causes — the material, the formal, the efficient and the final causes, plus the necessary conditions of time and space as well as other preliminaries. An effect when related to its sufficient cause must invariably exist — because the said cause would make it essential. But when seen with only a part of that cause, or if related to any outside factor, it would not be essential; it would remain a transient as before.

If a transient, on being related to only a part of its sufficient cause (e.g., to its efficient cause only) become essential and come into being, its sufficient cause would be superfluous; and it would be a contradiction in term.

It shows that in this natural world two systems are found simultaneously: one of essentiality and the other of transiency. The system of essentiality covers the sufficient causes and their effects — there is no transiency in any part of this world, neither in any person nor in any action. The stystem of transiency permeates the matter and its potentialities when related to only a part of the sufficient cause. Take any human action; if it is related to its sufficient cause — man (the efficient cause), knowledge and will (the final), matter (the material) and its shape (the formal) plus all conditions of time and space including removal of every hindrance — it would become essential. But if it is seen in relation to only its efficient cause, that is, man, it would remain transient.

Finally, it should be pointed out that the transient things need a cause for their existence because of their transiency. And this need would not end until the chain of cause and effect finally reaches a cause Who is the Essential Being. This observation leads to the following two conclusions:

First: The need of an effect for its cause does not end on its being related to its transient cause. The need continues until it reaches the Final Cause, the Essential Being.

Second: This need emanates from its transient nature. It needs a cause to bring it into existence with all its characteristics and traits, including its relationship with its various causes, fulfilling all the conditions of its existence.

Now we may ponder upon the question of compulsion and delegation of power, keeping in view the above-mentioned premises:

First: No delegation of power: Man, like all other things and their actions, depends on the will of Allãh, for his existence. In the same way, man's action depends on the will of Allãh in its existence. Therefore, the Mu‘tazilites' view — that human actions have no relation at all to the divine will — is completely baseless. There was no reason at all for them to deny the decree and measure of Allãh in respect of the man's actions.

Second: No compulsion: This relation to the will of Allãh, inasmuch as it is concerned with existence, keeps all the characteristics of the created thing in view. Every effect emanates from its cause — with all its characteristics which have any bearing on its existence. A man's creation is attributed to Allãh, keeping in view all its intermediary causes and condition — the father, the mother, the time, the place, the features, the quantity, the quality and a lot of other concomitants. Likewise, the action of man is attributed to Allãh, keeping in view all its characteristics and conditions. When a man's action is attributed to Allãh and His will, it does not cease to be the man's action; it is still caused by the said man's will. The will of Allãh decrees that the action be done by the man emanating from the man's own free will and choice. Therefore, it would be a contradiction in term to say that the action was no longer done by man's free will because it was related to the divine will. Allãh Himself has decreed it to be a work of the man by his free will; how can it be said that the divine will lost its effectiveness and the action happened without the man's free will? It is now clear that the view of al-Mujabbirah — that the human action's relation to the divine will nullifies its relation to the human will — is absolutely devoid of truth.

The above discourse shows that the said action has a relation to the human will and a relation to the divine will; neither relation nullifies the other, because each is connected with the other vertically, not horizontally.

Third: The human action, when related to its sufficient cause, becomes essential. But seen in relation to only a part of the sufficient cause, it remains transient. For example, when the action is related to only its sufficient cause, that is, man, it does not become essential, but remains transient as before.

Therefore, what a group of modern materialist philosophers have said — that the whole system of nature is permeated by compulsion, and there is no free will at all in the universe — is totally wrong. As we have said, all effects in relation to their sufficient causes are essential, but, when related to only a part of the said causes, are transient. And it is the foundation on which man's life is based. A man teaches and trains his child and then hopes that his efforts would bear fruit. If there was no freedom in the world, if everything was essential and had to happen anyhow, then all this teaching and training would be of no earthly use; there would remain no place for hope in human life.

GENERAL COMMENT

The talk reverts again to the initial topic. The beginning of the chapter dealt with three categories of mankind; then all were addressed together (verses 21-27) with the words, "O men", Now these verses describe the same subject with a grater detail. The twelve verses, starting from here, depict the reality of man; show the potentialities of perfection which Allãh has endowed him with; delineate the vast scope of his inner being; describe the various stages — death and life, and again death and life; then the return to Allãh — through which he passes in his journey, explaining that the final destination is Allãh. In this context, the verses describe some basic bounties of Allãh upon him — creative as well as legislative. He created for him all that is. in the earth and made the heaven subservient to him. He made him His deputy on the earth, ordered the angels to prostrate before him, put the first man into the Garden, opened for him the door of repentance and enhanced his prestige by guiding him to His worship. In this background, the opening words, "How do you deny Allãh", serve to emphasize the grace and bounty of Allãh on man.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: How do you deny Allãh . . . you shall be brought back to Him: The verse is somewhat (though not exactly) similar to the verse 40:11: They shall say: "Our Lord! twice didst Thou give us death, and twice hast Thou give us life, so we do confess our faults; is there then a way to get out? This (later) is one of the verses that prove an al-barzakh (آلـبَـرزَخُ = intervening period or life) between this world and the next. It says that Allãh gives death twice. First is the death that transfers us from this world. But when and where shall we be given the second death? Giving of death presupposes a preceding life. It means that man shall be given a life in the period intervening between this first death and the Day of Resurrection. This argument is solid, and it has been offered in some traditions too.

Question: Both verses have exactly the same connotation. Both mention two deaths and two lives. According to the verse 2:28, the stage before the life of this world has been called the first death. Then comes the first life in this world, followed by the second death transferring the man to the next world, and lastly will come the second life on the Day of Resurrection. The second verse (40:11) too should be interpreted in the same way, because both have the same import. It means that after the death of this world, there is no life before the Day of Resurrection.

Reply: It is wrong to say that the two verses have the same connotation. The verse 2:28 mentions one death, one causing to die and two givings of life; while the verse 40:11 is talking about two givings of death and two givings of life.

There is a world of difference between "death" and "causing to die". "Causing to die" shows a preceding life; while "death" can be used just for absence of life — even when there was no life before it.

The verse 40:11 refers to the death after this life, then the life of the intervening period, then the death after that, and finally to the life on the Day of Resurrection. The verse 2:28 on the other hand, refers first to the lifeless state ("death", and not "causing to die") before coming to this world, then goes on mentioning this life, then death and then the life of the intervening period. There will be some delay before man is returned to his Lord. The conjunctive used "thumma" (ثُـمَّ = then) denotes some delay. Its use here supports this explanation because after the life of the intervening period there shall come again a death and only then the man shall be returned to Allãh.

QUR'ÃN : and you were dead and He gave you life: It shows the reality of man and his existence. He is a being, ever-changing, ever proceeding on his path of perfection, step by step, stage by stage. Before coming into this world, he was dead, then he was made alive by Allãh and came here; again he will be caused to die and then be made alive again. Allãh says: . . . and He began the creation of man from dust. Then He made his progeny of an extract, of water held in light estimation. Then He made him complete and breathed into him of His spirit . . . (32:7-9); . . . then We did grow it into another creation; so blessed be Allãh, the best of the creators (23:14); And they say: "What! when we have become lost in the earth, shall we then indeed be in a new generation?" Nay! they are disbelievers in the meeting of their Lord. Say: "The angel of death who is given charge of you shall cause you to die, then to your Lord you shall be brought back" (32:10-11) ; From it We created you and into it We shall send you back from it will We raise you a second time (20:55). The verses will be explained when we shall come to them; they have been quoted here only to show that man is a part of the earth, he was created from it, gradually developed until he grew into "another creation"; this "another creation" proceeds on the path of his perfection; then the angel of death completely removes this "man" from the body; and he returns to Allãh. This is the path which the man has to take to.

The divine decree has planned the universe in such a way that every thing is related to every thing else; there is a constant action and reaction between it and the rest of the creation. Man too influences, and is in turn influenced by, all that exists in the earth and in the heavens — the elements and their characteristics, the animal world, the vegetable world, the minerals, the water, the air and, in short, every creation of nature. The fact is that the scope of man's activities is much greater, and his circle far bigger than anything else's. He has been given thinking and reasoning powers, and, as a result of this unique gift of Allãh, he influences the other creatures, manages them, arranges and re-arranges them, manipulates them, destroys them, amends them and perfects them, on a scale unheard of outside his circle. Every creature is under his domain. Sometimes he imitates nature by creating synthetic items for his needs; at other times he sets some forces of nature against the others. In short, he obtains, by all possible means, whatever he wants from whatever he wants. Passage of time has further strengthened his hands; now he has deeper insight in the working of nature, and manipulates the system even more effectively. That is so that Allãh may establish the reality by His words, and so that the truth of His speech may be seen even more clearly: And He has made subservient to you whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is in the earth, all, from Himself (45:13). The verse following the verse under discussion, that is, 2:29, states the same fact: He it is Who created for you all that is in the earth, and He directed Himself to the heavens, so He made them complete seven heavens. The context — description of the bounties of Allãh bestowed on man — shows that it was for the benefit of man that Allãh directed Himself to the heavens and made them complete seven. (Ponder on the point!)

This is the path taken by the man in his journey of existence; and this is the imprint of his activities on the universe; it shows where he began from and what is his final destination.

Man's life in this world originates from nature, as the Qur'ãn confirms. But the same book declares also that this very life emanates from Allãh: . . . and indeed I created you before, when you were nothing (19:9); Surely He it is Who originates and returns (85:13). Man is a creature that is brought up in the caressing fold of creation, gets his nourishment from the breast of production, and is connected on this level with life-less nature. But, on the level of origination, he is related to the command of Allãh, to His authority: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it, "Be", and it is (36:82); Our word for a thing when We intend it, is only that We say to it, "Be", and it is (16:40).

This much about genesis. As for the return journey, the path divides in two: the path of happiness, and that of unhappiness.

The path of happiness is the shortest route, leading the man to the sublime spiritual heights. It keeps raising his status and enhancing his rank until it takes him to the divine nearness. The path of unhappiness, on the other hand, is a long route that keeps demeaning and debasing him rendering him lowest of the low, until he reaches the divine presence. And Allãh encompasses them on every side (85:20) . This subject has been fully explained under the verse, Guide us to the straight path (1:6).

This was a short description of man's path. Details about his life in this world, and before and after it, will be given in their proper place. The verse under discussion is not concerned with those details; it makes only a passing reference to it as it has some bearing on guidance and misguidance, happiness and unhappiness.

He made them complete seven heavens: We shall write about the heavens in Chapter 32 (as-Sajdah), God willing.

COMMENTARY

The verses tell us why the man has been sent to this world, what is the significance of his appointment as the vicegerent of Allãh in this earth, what are the characteristics and special features of this vicegerency. Unlike other Qur'ãnic stories, it has been told in one place only, that is, in these verses.

QUR'ÃN: And when your Lord said: We shall explain in vol. IV, what the "speech" or "saying" means when it is attributed to Allãh, to angels and to the Satan.

QUR'ÃN: they said: "Wilt thou place in it such as shall make mischief in it . . . and extol Thy holiness?": The angels heard the announcement, "I am going to make in the earth a vicegerent", and at once arrived at the conclusion that the would be vicegerent would make mischief in the earth and shed blood. Apparently they understood the ultimate behaviour of the said vicegerent from the words, "in the earth". A vicegerent appointed in the earth would certainly be created from material components; he would necessarily be bestowed with two basic traits of desire and anger; the earth is a place of unceasing struggle and constant confrontation; its resources are limited, its opportunities finite; but the proposed vicegerent's desire would be unlimited, infinite. The condition of the earth and earthly things was hardly reassuring. Its creatures were subjected to ever-continuing deterioration and disintegration; its good was always turning into bad; it was a place where an individual could not live without a group having similar characteristics and traits. Keeping all this in view, the angels at once understood that what Allãh intended to create was not only an individual, but a species. The members of that species would have to live together, cooperating with one another; that is to say, they would have to establish a society, a social order. And with a venture like this, they were bound to cause mischief and to shed blood.

On the other hand, they knew that vicegerency — setting one thing in place of another — was unthinkable unless the vicegerent were a true copy of his predecessor in all the characteristics, traits and intrinsic abilities. The proposed earthly creature was to be made vicegerent of Allãh in the earth. Allãh has got for Himself the best names, the sublime attributes; His mercy and power are beyond the comprehension of His creatures; He, in His person, is untouched by any defect; and, in his actions, is free from all kinds of evil and disorder. How could an earthly vicegerent, with all his defects and deficiencies, represent the majesty and splendour of Allãh in the earth? Well, could a lowly creature of earth be a mirror of divine beauty and sublimity?

This was their question — and it was no more than a question. It was not a protest, not an objection; they actually wanted to know the truth. They later asserted their belief that Allãh was the Knowing, the Wise. They believed that what Allãh intended to do was based on knowledge and wisdom; and their question was put in order to learn the underlying wisdom of the decision of Allãh. What their question — or, pleading — amounted to was as follows:

Allãh intends to appoint a vicegerent in the earth, in order that the said vicegerent should represent Allãh by celebrating His praise and glorifying His holiness through his worthy presence. But his earthly nature would not let him do so; it would irresistibly pull him towards mischief and wickedness. So far as the main purpose of this vicegerency — celebrating Allãh's praise and glorifying His holiness — is concerned, we are already doing it. Therefore, we are Allãh's de facto vicegerents; and if Allãh wishes, He may bestow upon us this designation. What is the need, then, of a new creation to act as vicegerent of Allãh in the earth?

For the reply, Allãh used a sentence, "Surely I know what you do not know", and an action, "And He taught Adam the names, all of them".

The context shows that :

First: The vicegerent was to get the vicegerency of Allãh; he was not to become a successor of any earthly creature that had preceded him. If Allãh had wanted the man to take the place of that previous creature, the reply, "And He taught Adam the names, all of them", would be quite irrelevant.

Assuming that man was given vicegerency of Allãh, this prestige would not be restricted to the person of Adam only, his descendants too would be vicegerents of Allãh in the earth. Adam was taught the names; in other words, this knowledge was ingrained in human being in such a manner that, since that first day, it has been constantly bearing newer, fresher and better fruits; whenever man gets a chance, he discovers new avenues of knowledge; and thus he always finds himself imbued with previously unknown potentialities that more often than not turn into real achievements. It is a never ending process; it is a wonder that will not cease, and ever-fresh insight that will never fail to astonish.

That this assumption is correct, and the whole mankind is vicegerent of Allãh, is evident by the following verses: And remember (O people of 'Ãd!) when He made you successors of Nũḥ's people . . . (7:69); Then We made you successors in the land after them . . . (10:14); . . . and He makes you successors in the earth (27:62). The word translated here as "successor" is the same that has been translated as "vicegerent" in the verse under discussion.

Second: Allãh did not say that the vicegerent-designate would not cause mischief and bloodshed; nor did He reject the plea of the angels that they celebrated His praise and extolled His glory. By this silence, He confirmed that the angels were right on both counts. But then He made manifest one thing which the angels were not aware of. He showed them that there was a matter which they could not shoulder the responsibility of, while this proposed vicegerent could do so. Man was entrusted with a divine secret which the angels, in their nature, were unable to know or understand. And that divine gift would more than compensate the ensuing mischief and bloodshed.

Allãh told them, first, that surely He knew what they did not know. Then He referred to the same reply by telling them: "Did I not say that I surely know the unseen (secrets) of the heavens and the earth?" Looking at the intervening sentences it may easily be understood that the "unseen (secrets)" refer to "the names". It does not refer to Adam's knowledge of those names. The angels were unaware of even the existence of these "names"; it was not that they knew about the names but were not sure whether Adam knew them or not. Had the angels been doubtful only about Adam's knowledge of the names, it would have been enough to tell Adam to inform the angels of the names in order that they would have known that Adam knew. Instead, Allãh first asked them to tell Him "the names of those". The angels had claimed the vicegerency of Allãh for themselves, and had hinted that Adam was not fit for it; but the essential qualification for the vicegerency was the knowledge of the names; therefore, Allãh asked both candidates about the names; the angels did not know them, and Adam knew; it proved that he had the qualification while they lacked it. The question (about this knowledge) addressed to the angels ends with the clause, "if you are right"; it means that they had claimed a position, essential qualification of which was this knowledge.

QUR'ÃN: And He taught Adam the names, all of them, then presented them to the angels: The Arabic pronoun, "them", used in "then presented them", is made for rational beings, those who have life, sense and understanding. Obviously, the names (or, the named ones) were some living and sensible being who were hidden behind the curtain of the "unseen". It follows that the knowledge given to Adam of their names was something totally different from what we understand from the knowledge of names. Merely knowing the names (in the sense known to us) has no distinction; otherwise, the angels too would have become equal to Adam in this respect as soon as they heard those names from Adam. Also, there would have been no distinction for Adam in such a knowledge. The angels could rightly complain to Allãh that He taught those names to Adam, but kept them (i.e. the angels) in dark; had He taught them too, they would have been equal to, if not better than, Adam! Understandably, such favouritism could not have silenced the angels. Surely, it was something deeper then merely knowing all the names.

It would not have been a convincing argument for Allãh to teach Adam a dictionary and then put it as an evidence against the angels — the honoured servants who do not precede Him in speech and who act according to His commandment only — telling them to inform Him of the words which they had not been taught, and which the mankind was to invent in future. Moreover, the only purpose of language is to convey the feelings and ideas to the hearer; but the angels do not need any language for this purpose; they convey and receive the ideas directly without the medium of words; their stage is far higher than that of human beings in this respect.

However, it is clear that the knowledge of the names which the angels got after hearing them from Adam was not the same as Adam had got by teaching of Allãh — the inferior knowledge of the names they could grasp, but not the superior one which qualified Adam for vicegerency of Allãh.

Adam deserved the vicegerency because he was given the knowledge of the names, and not because he informed the angels of those names. That is why they declared, "Glory be to Thee! we have no knowledge but that which Thou hast taught us". They accepted that they did not possess that knowledge.

The above discourse leads us to believe that Adam was taught the names of the named ones in such a way that he clearly knew their reality and recognized their substantial existence; it was not merely knowing the semantic value of a noun. The named ones were substantial realities, the actual beings that were, at the same time, hidden behind the curtain of the unseen (secrets) of the heavens and the earth. This especial knowledge could be learnt only by an earthly human being, but was quite incomprehensible by a heavenly angel. And this knowledge had an intrinsic bearing upon vicegerency.

"al-Asmã' " (اَلأَسْمَاءُ = the names) , in the sentences, "And He taught Adam the names", is a plural with the definite article "al" (اَلْ = the) prefixed to it. Grammatically, it denotes generality, comprehensiveness; and it is followed by the emphatic, "all of them". Clearly, Adam was taught all the names of every named thing, without any restriction or limitation. As described earlier, the pronoun, "them", in the clause, "then presented them to the angels", shows that every name, that is, the named one, was a living being having knowledge and intellect; and at the same time, he was in the curtain of the unseen — the unseen of the heavens and the earth.

"The unseen of the heavens and the earth": It is a genitive case. Somewhere else this phrase may mean the unseen parts of the heavens and the earth. But in this verse, where Allãh intends to demonstrate His perfect and comprehensive power, and to show the deficiency and incapability of the angels, it must mean a secret which is unseen to all the worlds, to all the heavens and the earth; an unseen beyond the sphere of the universe.

If you look at all the particulars of this verse — that "the names" denotes generality, that the named ones were alive and had knowledge, and that they were unseen to the heavens and the earth — you will agree that it perfectly fits on the theme of the verse 15:21, And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it and We do not send it down but in a known measure. Whatever is called a thing — whatever is "named" a thing — Allãh has its vast treasures, ever-lasting, never-ending, unmeasured by any measure, unlimited by any limit. Measure and limit come to it when it is created and sent down. The vastness of these treasures is not of the same kind as the multiplicity of number, because a number, no matter how large, is by definition measured, limited and quantified. The said treasure are vast in their ranks and grades. (We shall further explain it in Chapter 15.)

The named ones who were presented before the angels were sublime beings, who were well-protected by Allãh, hidden in curtains of the unseen. He sent them down to the universe with their blessings and benefactions, and created all that is in the heavens and in the earth from their light and splendour. Although they had numerous identities, they were not different in their number or in their persons; whatever difference there was, it was in their ranks and grades.

QUR'ÃN : and I know what you manifest and what you were hiding: The sentence stands face to face with the mention of the unseen (secrets) of the heavens and the earth. Probably it refers to those things which are the parts of the heavens and the earth; and in this way both sentences together cover all unseen things — those which are beyond the sphere of the heavens and the earth together with those which are within that sphere.

Instead of saying "and what you hide", Allãh said, "and what you were hiding". This changed style shows that there was something hidden especially in respect of Adam and his appointment as vicegerent. Probably it was the incident described in the next verse: ". . . (the angels) prostrated except Iblīs. He refused and he showed arrogance, and he was one of the unbelievers". It shows that Iblīs was an unbeliever before then, and that his refusal to prostrate had sprung from that disbelief, which he had kept hidden upto that moment. Obviously, the prostration of the angels and the refusal of Iblīs had happened after Allãh had told them, "Surely I know what you do not know", but before He said to them, " . . . I know what you manifest and what you were hiding" (i.e. the unbelief kept secret by Iblīs) . It also explains the reason why the former sentence was changed to, "I surely know the unseen (secrets) of the heavens and the earth".

as-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "The angels could not know what they said (Wilt Thou place in it such as shall make mischief in it and shed blood) , if they had not (earlier) seen someone who had made mischief in it and shed blood." (at-Tafsīr, al-ʻAyyãshi)

The author says: This tradition may be pointing to an earlier creature that inhabited the earth before the mankind, as some other traditions say. It is not against what we have said that they understood it from the very words of Allãh: Verily, I am going to make in the earth a vicegerent; rather the tradition and our explanation are complementary. The tradition, without putting it in the framework of our explanation, would show that the angels too, like Iblīs, had committed the folly of unauthorized analogy — a very objectionable practice.

Zurarah said: "I visited Abu Ja'far (a.s.) and he asked (me): 'What do you have of Shi'ah traditions?' I said: 'I do have a large number of it; and I was thinking of kindling a fire to burn them in it.' He said: 'Hide it (somewhere), you will (naturally) forget what you are not familiar with.' " (Zurarah said) : "Then, I thought about the mankind (and asked him about them). He said: 'How did the angels get their knowledge when they said, Wilt Thou place in it such as shall make mischief in it and shed blood?' " Zurarah further reports that whenever Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.) mentioned this tradition, he said: "It is a shattering blow against al-Qadariyyah (i.e. those who say that man is completely independent of Allãh in his actions)." Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.) further said: "Adam (a.s.) had, in the heaven, a friend from among the angels. When Adam got down from the heaven to the earth, the angel felt lonely; he complained (of it) to Allãh and sought His permission. Allãh allowed him and he came down to him (Adam); he found him (Adam) sitting in a desolate region. When Adam saw him, he put his hand on his head and cried aloud." Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.) said: "They narrate that (it was such a loud cry that) all the creatures heard it. The angel told him: 'O Adam ! I do not see but that you have disobeyed your Lord and put on yourself a burden beyond your strength. Do you know what Allãh had told us about you, and (what) we had said in His reply?' (Adam) said: 'No.' (The angel) said: 'Allãh told us, "I am going to make in the earth a vicegerent". We said: "Wilt Thou place in it such as shall make mischief in it and shed blood?" Thus, He created you to place you in the earth. Could it be right for you to stay in the heaven?' " Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.) said: "Allãh in this way consoled Adam for three days." (ibid.)

The author says: The tradition shows that the Garden of Adam was in the heaven. Other traditions on this subject will be given later.

In the same book, Abu 'l-‘Abbãs is quoted as saying that he asked Abu ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) about the words of Allãh, And He taught Adam the names, all of them, (and enquired) as to what Allãh had taught him. (The Imam) said: “The earths, the mountains, the canyons and the valleys.” Then he looked at the rug which he sat upon and said: “And this rug is among the things which He taught him.”

It is reported in the same book that al-Fuḍayl ibn al-‘Abbãs asked Abu ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) what were the names which Allãh taught Adam. He replied: “The names of the valleys and the vegetables and the trees and the mountains of the earth."

The same book narrates from Dãwũd ibn Sarḥãn al-‘Aṭṭãr that he said : “I was with Abu Abdillãh (a.s.); he called for the table - spread and we took our meals. Then he called for the wash-bowl and hand-towel. I said to him: ‘May I be your ransom! The words of Allãh: And He taught Adam the names, all of them — was (this) wash-bowl and hand-towel among them?’ He (a.s.) said: ‘The mountain-passes and the valleys.’ Saying this he pointed by his hand this and that way.” as-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: “Verily, Allãh taught Adam the names of His proofs, all of them; then He presented them — and they were the spirits — to the angels, and said: ‘Tell Me the names of these if you are right in your claims that you have more right, than Adam, to the vicegerency in the earth because of your glorifying and extolling (Me).’ They said: ‘Glory be to Thee! we have no knowledge but that which Thou hast taught us; surely Thou, Thou (alone), art the Knowing, the Wise.’ Allãh, Blessed and High is He! said: ‘O Adam! inform them of their names.’ When he informed them of their names, they knew of their (i.e. those spirits) high rank before Allãh, Great is His name! They realized that they (i.e. those spirits) were more deserving to be the vicegerents of Allãh in His earth, and (to be) His proofs over His creatures. Then

Allãh removed them (the spirits) from their sight, and subjugated them with their (i.e. those spirits) obedience and love; and told them, 'Did I not say to you that I surely know the unseen (secrets) of the heavens and the earth and (that) I know what you manifest and what you were hiding?' " (Ma'ãni''l-akhbãr)

The author says: The meaning of this tradition may be understood from the commentary given earlier; and it may also be realized that there was no contradiction between this tradition and the preceding ones. It was explained earlier that the verse 15:21 (And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it . . .) that every thing originally exists in the treasures of the unseen; the things that are with us came into being on descending from there. The name given to a thing in this existence is in fact the name of that which is hidden in the treasures of the unseen. You may say that Allãh taught Adam every thing that was in His treasures of the unseen — unseen that was hidden from the heavens and the earth. The same idea may be conveyed in these words: Allãh taught Adam the names of all things — the things that were unseen secrets hidden from the heavens and the earth. The sum total of both statements is the same.

It is not out of place here to point to the traditions of aṭṭīnah (اَلطِّيْنَةُ = the substance, of which a thing is made). Such a tradition, narrated in Biḥãru 'l-anwãr, is as follows:
Jãbir ibn `Abdillãh said: "I said to the Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.): 'What was the first thing which Allãh created?' He said : 'The light of your prophet, O Jãbir! Allãh created it, then created from it every good; then He caused it to stand before Him in the station of "nearness", so long as Allãh wished. Then He divided it into parts; and He created the Throne from one part, and the Chair from another part, and the bearers of the Throne and the occupiers of the Chair from yet another part; and He placed the fourth part in the station of love, as long as Allãh wished. Then He divided it into parts; and He created the Pen from one part, and the Tablet from another part, and the Garden from yet an-other part; and He placed the fourth part in the station of fear, as long as Allãh wished. Then He divided it into portions, and He created the angels from one portion, and the sun from another portion, and the moon from yet another portion, and He placed the fourth portion in the station of hope, as long as Allãh wished. Then He divided it into portions, and He created the understanding from one portion, and the knowledge and forbearance from another portion, and the (divine) protection and help from yet other portion, and He placed the fourth portion in the station of modesty as long as Allãh wished. Then He looked at it with awe-inspiring eye, and that Light started perspiring, and one hundred and twenty-four thousand drops dropped from it; and Allãh created from each drop the soul of a prophet and apostle. Then the souls of the prophets began breathing, and Allãh created from their breasts the souls of (His) friends and the martyrs and the good ones.' "

The author says: There are numerous traditions of the same type; and on deep pondering they support what we have written earlier; some of them will be discussed later on. You should not reject such traditions outright, thinking that they were forged by the Ṣũfīs. The wonders of the creation are unfathomable; the scientists and the philosophers have spent, and are spending, their lives in discovering some of its secrets; but every solved enigma brings in its wake a lot of fresh previously unthought-of enigmas. Do not forget that this is the unfathomability of this physical world — the smallest in range, the narrowest in scope, the lowest in rank. How can we pass judgement about other worlds beyond this one — the worlds of light, spaciousness and abundance?

GENERAL COMMENT

It has been explained earlier that the preceding words, "and what you were hiding", show that there was a hidden thing that had, meanwhile, come into open. The last sentence of this verse too leads to the same conclusion. Instead of saying, "He refused and he showed arrogance, and he disbelieved", it says, ". . . he was one of the unbelievers". It was not that he became an unbeliever at that moment; he was an unbeliever long since, but had kept it a secret, and this event brought it into open. Also, it was mentioned that the event of the prostration of the angels must have happened between the divine words, "Surely I know what you do not know", and the words, ". . . I know what you manifest and what you were hiding". It may be asked: Why then has Allãh put this verse after those words? Probably it has been done just to create a link between the stories of creation of Adam and his being placed in the Paradise. The twelve verses (28 - 39) were revealed to describe how and when man was made vicegerent of Allãh, how was he sent down to the earth, and what is to happen to him in this life — the happenings that will have a bearing on his lasting happiness or unhappiness. For this theme, the event of prostration has not much importance — except as a connecting link. That is why it has been mentioned here only briefly without going into details. Perhaps, it is because of the same reason that the Qur'ãn has changed the pronouns referring to Allãh from the third person (your Lord said) to the first (And when We said).

The angels had not hidden anything from Allãh; it was Iblīs who had done so. Then why did Allãh ascribe this deed to all of them (you were hiding)? Allãh in this talk used the same method which even the human beings have adopted for their own speeches; we ascribe the work of an individual to the whole group, if the doer is not properly identified or if he tries to remain anonymous. Also, there may be another explanation for it. Apparently the first announcement, "I am going to make in the earth a vicegerent", had shown that the said vicegerent would have authority over the angels too. It may be inferred from the command obliging them to prostrate before Adam. Probably on hearing that first announcement some disturbing thought had come into their minds, as it had never occurred to them that any earthly creature could be given authority over everything including themselves. Some traditions too point to it. In this context the words, "what you were hiding", could easily be addressed to the angels.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN : "Prostrate before Adam": Apparently it shows that prostration, per se, may be done before other than Allãh, if it is done in conformity with Allãh's command, as a mark of respect to that person. A similar case is found in the story of Yũsuf (a.s.): And he raised his parents upon the throne and they (all) fell down in prostration before him, and he said:

"O my father! this is the interpretation of my vision of old; my Lord has indeed made it to be true" (12:100).
This topic needs some clarification:

It was explained in the chapter of The Opening what the worship means. The worshipper places himself in the position of servitude and performs what manifests this status, what clearly shows that he accepts the mastership of his master. Those acts must be such as to show the master's mastership or the servant's servitude; for example, prostrating before the master, bowing down to him, standing before him when he sits, walking behind him when he walks etc. The more apt an action is to show this status, the more reserved it becomes to the rites of the divine worship. Prostration is the most significant symbol of the master's status and the servant's low rank, because the man in this act falls down and puts his forehead on the ground. For this reason, it has the strongest connection with the divine worship.

However, prostration is not the same thing as worship. They have two different meanings, and worship is not a quidditative substance of prostration. A quidditative characteristic can never be separated from any being. But prostration may be done with-out any thought of reverence or worship — for example, just to make fun of someone. Keeping this in view, it may safely be said that although the connection of prostration with divine worship is the strongest, that worship is not its quiddity. There-fore, prostration, per se, cannot be exclusively reserved for Allãh. If there is any impediment or obstruction, it should emanate from the sharī'ah or the reason. What the sharī'ah and the reason forbid is ascribing the prerogatives of the lordship to anyone other than Allãh. But they do not forbid honouring someone or according him respect when it is done without elevating him to godhead.

The discourse given above was from purely academic point of view. But the religious good taste, conditioned as it is by rituals of worship, has strictly reserved the prostration for divine worship; it should not be done for anyone other than Allãh; in Islam, one is forbidden to prostrate before others even as a mark of respect.

Apart from prostration, there is no proof — either from the Qur'ãn and tradition or from reason and logic — against according respect and showing reverence to others than Allãh, especially when it is done as a part of the love of Allãh; examples may be given of revering and loving the good servants of Allãh and paying respects to the graves of the friends of Allãh or to the things attributed to them. There is no reason whatsoever why such actions should be prohibited. (We shall deal with this subject in a more appropriate place, God willing.)

TRADITIONS

Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.) said: "When Allãh created Adam and ordered the angels to prostrate before him, it came into the angels' mind : 'We never thought that Allãh had created any creature more honourable than us; we are His neighbours, and we are the nearest of His creation to Him.' Thereupon Allãh said: 'Did I not say to you that I know what you manifest and what you were hiding?' — (it was) a reference to what they had mentioned concerning the affairs of the jinn, and had concealed what was in their own minds. So, the angels, who had said what they had said, took refuge with the Throne." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshi)

Another tradition of the same theme is narrated in the same book from 'Ali ibn al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), the last part of which runs as follows: "When the angels realized that they had fallen into error, they took refuge with the Throne; and it was a group of the angels — and they were those who were around the Throne; it was not all the angels (who had thought so). . . So, they have taken refuge with the Throne till the Day of Resurrection."

The author says: The theme of the two traditions may be inferred from the talk of the angels: "We celebrate Thy praise and extol Thy holiness"; and "Glory be to Thee! we have no knowledge but that which Thou hast taught us; surely Thou, Thou (alone), art the Knowing, the Wise."
It will be explained later that the Throne means the divine knowledge, as the traditions narrated from the Imams of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) say. (Therefore, the angels' taking refuge with the Throne would refer to their confession that they knew only that which Allãh had taught them, and that only Allãh was the Knowing, the Wise.)

According to some traditions, the word "the unbelievers", (in the clause, "and he was one of the unbelievers") refers to the species, jinn, to which Iblīs belonged, and which was created before man. Allãh says: And certainly We created man of clay that gives forth sound, of black mud fashioned into shape. And the jinn We created before of intensely hot fire (15:26-27).

According to the above-mentioned traditions, the attribution of hiding to the angels (what you were hiding) needs no explanation; the clause means exactly what it says; the angels had actually hidden in their hearts the idea of their supremacy.

A third group of traditions says that the said clause refers to Iblīs and his hidden thought that he would not make obeisance to Adam and would not prostrate before him if asked to do so.

There is no contradiction between these various explanations, because all the meanings may be inferred from the Qur'ãnic verses. They are all true and based on fact. Various traditions throw light on various facets of the same fact.

Abũ Baṣīr said: "I said to Abu `Abdillãh (a.s.): 'Did the angels prostrate and put their foreheads on the earth?' He said: 'Yes, as an honour (bestowed on him) by Allãh.' " (Qiṣaṣu 'l-anbiyã', ar-Rãwandi)

The Imam said: "Verily the prostration of the angels before Adam was in obedience to Allãh and for their love of Adam." (Tuḥafu 'l- `uqũl)

Mũsa ibn J'far (peace be on them both) narrates through his forefathers that a Jew asked Amīru ' l -mu'minīn Ali (a.s.) about the miracles of the Prophet in comparison with the miracles of (other) prophets (in course of which) he said: "This is Adam before whom Allãh ordered His angels to prostrate." "Did He do any thing like it for Muhammad?" (a.s.) said: "It was so. But Allãh ordered His angels to prostrate before Adam; yet their prostration was not a prostration of worship; (it was not) that they had worshipped Adam against Allãh, Mighty and Great is He! It was rather as an acknowledgement of Adam's superiority and a mercy of Allãh towards him. And Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) was given what was better than that. Verily Allãh, Great and High is He! blessed him in His omnipotence, and the angels, all of them, prayed for him, and the believers were obliged to pray for him. So this is the increase, O Jew!" (al-Iḥtijãj)

Allãh created Adam, and he remained for forty years in (that) shape (i.e. a statue without life). And Iblīs, the cursed, used to pass by him and say: "Why have you been created?" al-`Alīm (i.e. al-Kãḍim-a.s.) said: "Then Iblīs said: 'If Allãh ordered me to prostrate before this, I would certainly disobey Him.' . . . Then Allãh said to the angels, 'Prostrate before Adam'; all of them prostrated; but Iblīs showed the envy that was in his heart and he refused to prostrate." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi)

Biḥãru 'l-anwãr narrates, quoting from Qiṣaṣu 'l-anbiyã', as-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) that he said: "Iblīs was ordered to prostrate before Adam, and he said: 'O my Lord ! By Thy honour! If Thou excusest me from prostrating before Adam, I would certainly worship Thee a worship no one would ever have worshipped Thee in a like manner.' Allãh, Great is His glory! said: 'I like to be worshipped according to My own pleasure.' "

The Imam also said: "Verily Iblīs cried aloud four times: First, on the day he was cursed, and the day he was dropped down to the earth, and the day Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) was sent (as prophet) after a (long) interval of the apostles, and when the source of the Book was sent down. And he snorted (in satisfaction) twice: when Adam ate from the tree and when he (Adam) was sent down from the Garden."

And he said about the words of Allãh: so their nakedness appeared unto them (20:121): "Their nakedness was not seen before, then it was uncovered."

Also he said : "The tree from which Adam was forbidden (to eat) was the spikenard."

The author says: The traditions — and there are many — support what we have written about prostration.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: And We said: *"*O Adam! dwell you and your wife . . . ": Although the story of the angels' prostration before Adam has been repeated several times in the Qur'ãn, that of his placement in the Garden has been given in three places only:

First: The verses given above, from Chapter 2 (the Cow).

Second: In Chapter 7 (the Elevated Places): And (We said): "O Adam! dwell you and your wife in the Garden; so eat from where you desire, but do not go near this tree, for then you will be of the unjust" (19) . But the Satan whispered an evil suggestion to them that he might make manifest to them what was hidden from them of their nakedness, and he said: "Your Lord has not forbidden you from this tree except that you may not both become two angels or that you may (not) become of the immortals" (20). And he swore to them both: "Most surely I am a sincere adviser to you" (21). Then he caused them to fall by deceit; so when they tasted of the tree, their nakedness became manifest to them, and they both began to cover themselves with the leaves of the Garden; and their Lord called out to them: "Did I not forbid you both from that tree and say to you that the Satan is your open enemy?" (22). They said: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to ourselves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers" (23). He said: "Get down, some of you being the enemies of others, and there is for you in the earth an abode and a provision for a time" (24). He (also) said: "Therein shall you live, and therein shall you die, and from it shall you be raised" (25).

Third : In Chapter 20 (Ṭã-Hã): And certainly We had covenanted unto Adam before, but he forgot; and We did not find in him any determination (115). And when We said to the angels: "Prostrate before Adam", they did prostrate, but Iblīs (did it not) ; he refused (116). *So We said. "*O Adam! surely this is an enemy to you and to your wife; therefore let him not drive you both forth from the Garden so that you should be put to toil (117); Surely it is (ordained) for you that you shall not be hungry therein nor bare of clothing (118) ; and that you shall not be thirsty therein nor shall you feel the heat of the sun" (119). But the Satan whispered an evil suggestion to him; he said: *"*O Adam! shall I guide you to the tree of immortality and a kingdom which decays not?" (120). Then they both ate of it, so their nakedness appeared unto them, and they both began to cover themselves with leaves of the Garden, and Adam disobeyed his Lord, so he got astray (121). Then his Lord chose him, so He turned to him and guided (him) (122). He said: "Get down you two therefrom, all (of you), one of you (is) enemy to another. So if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy (123). And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life, and We will raise him, on the Day of Resurrection, blind" (124). He shall say: "My Lord! why hast Thou raised me blind, and I was a seeing one indeed?" (125) He will say: "Even so: Our signs came to you, but you forgot them; even thus shall you be forsaken this day" (126). And thus do We recompense him who is extravagant and does not believe in the signs of his Lord; and certainly the chastisement of the hereafter is severer and more lasting" (127).

The context, and particularly the opening words of the story, "Verily I am going to make in the earth a vicegerent", clearly show that it was for the earth that Adam was created; it was the original plan that he should live and die in the earth. Allãh had temporarily placed the couple in the Garden to test them in order that their nakedness might be uncovered to them. Also the context in all three places shows that the order to the angels to prostrate before Adam, and then to Adam to stay in the Garden is a single, continuous, story. It all shows that Adam (a.s.) was created specifically for the earth, and the way to send him down was through the Garden as mentioned in the Qur'ãn: It was shown that he was superior to the angels and, therefore, more qualified for the vicegerency of Allãh; then they were told to prostrate before him, in acknowledgement of his superiority; then he was placed in the Garden but forbidden to go near a particular tree; so that on eating from it they should become aware of their nakedness and then be sent down to the earth. It means that the last link in this chain was their becoming aware of their private parts — it was this factor which irrevocably showed that they were fit for this earth, ready for this life. "as-Saw'ah",(اَلسَّوْأَةُ , literally means shame, disgrace, private part of the of the body. In this story it has been used in the last meaning, as may be seen from the words, "and they both began to cover them-selves with leaves of the Garden". That is why we have translated it as "nakedness".) However, their awareness of their pudenda proved that in addition to their spiritual qualities, they had also animal instincts and desires ingrained in them. It naturally made them dependent on nutrition and growth. Iblīs wanted them to become aware of their nakedness. Adam and his wife were given earthly, human existence and were at once placed in the Garden without any delay; they were not given time to perceive and understand their nakedness or its concomitants; they had not yet comprehended the life of this earth and its necessities. When they were sent to the Garden their connection with the spiritual world, including the angels, was strong; their link with it was not weakened. It should be noted that Allãh has said, "what was hidden from them"; He has not said, "what had been hidden from them"; it may be inferred from the expression used that their nakedness could not remain hidden for ever in this life; it was hidden for only a short period when they were placed in the Garden. The uncovering of their nakedness with all its concomitants was a predetermined fact and it depended upon their eating from that tree. That is why Allãh had told them: "therefore let him not drive you both forth from the Garden so that you should be put to toil"; thereafter, the Satan "drove them out of what they were in".

It should not be overlooked that even when Allãh pardoned them after their repentance, He did not return them to the Garden — they were sent down to the earth to live therein. If their eating of the tree, the uncovering of their private parts and the life of this world- were not a confirmed divine plan, an irrevocable pre-determined decree, they would have been returned to their place in the Garden as soon as they were forgiven their mistake. In short, it was the divine plan that they should spend sometime in the Garden to get them prepared for the life in this world; and their removal from the Garden, according to the causal relation decreed by Allãh, depended on their eating from the tree and becoming aware of their nakedness, and it happened because they listened to the whispering of the Satan.

Allãh says: "And certainly We had covenanted unto Adam before, but he forgot". Which covenant does this verse allude to? Does it refer to the admonition, "and do not approach (you two) this tree, for then you (two) will be of the unjust"? Or to the warning, "surely this (i.e., the Satan) is an enemy to you and to your wife"? Or does it refer to the general covenant made with all human beings in general and with the prophets in particular?

The first possibility is out of question altogether. Allãh says: "But the Satan whispered an evil suggestion to them . . .

and he said: 'Your Lord has not forbidden you from this tree except that you may not become two angels or that you may (not) become of the immortals . . .' " Obviously, when Adam and his wife committed the error and tasted of the tree they were aware of the prohibition — even the evil suggestion of the Satan had begun with a reference to it. And Allãh says in this verse that "We had covenanted unto Adam before, but he forgot; and We did not find in him any determination." It, therefore, could not refer to that prohibition, because Adam had not forgotten it at all.

The second suggestion — that the covenant might refer to the warning against the Satan — is not so wide of mark; still it is not supported by apparent meaning of the verses. The said warning was given to both Adam and his wife, while this verse refers to a covenant made especially with Adam.

It leaves us with the last alternative that the covenant means the general covenant which was made with the whole mankind and more particularly with the prophets. This verse (about the covenant with Adam and his forgetting it) occurs at the beginning of the story in the chapter of Ṭã-Hã; and the story concludes with the words, "So if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy. And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life, and We will raise him, on the Day of Resurrection, blind. He shall say: 'My Lord! why halt Thou raised me blind, and I was a seeing one indeed?' He will say: 'Even so: Our signs came to you, but you forgot them; even thus shall you be forsaken (literally: forgotten) today.' "

These concluding verses perfectly fit that opening one. To turn away from the remembrance of Allãh is not different from forgetting the covenant of Allãh. Add to it the use of the same verb (you forgot them) in the next verse. All these references are perfectly compatible with the covenant made with the souls of the human beings about the Mastership of Allãh and their own servitude. That covenant obliged the man that he should never forget that Allãh is his Lord, the Ruler and Master of his affairs; nor should he lose sight of the fact that he is a wholly owned slave of Allãh; that he has no authority whatsoever over his benefit or harm; nor does he has any control over his life, death or resurrection; in short he owns neither his person, his characteristics nor his actions.

The error that stands opposite to this remembrance is forgetfulness — man forgets his Lord and His All-encompassing Mastership; he becomes engrossed in his own self, getting bogged down more and more in the mire of this world's attractions.

Look at this world's life, with all its diversity; and see how it spreads its tentacles in all directions. Note how it is shared by the believer and the unbeliever both. And then find out how the two groups respond to its joy and sorrow. How different is their respective attitude towards this life's success and failure, happiness and unhappiness, content and discontent, relief and suffering. These factors affect the two groups — the believers and the unbelievers — in entirely different ways. The believer has the know-ledge of Allãh and the unbeliever lacks this knowledge. And it causes all the differences in their respective behaviour. Every man looks at this world; a world that is submerged in all types of misfortunes and disasters: a life followed by death, a health ruined by disease, a prosperity eaten away by poverty, a comfort destroyed by discomfort, a gain nullified by loss — this is, in a nut-shell, the life of this world. The believer knows that everything and every affair belongs to Allãh; nothing is independent of God, the Lord. Every thing and every affair emanates from Him; and all that originates from Him is good and beautiful; nothing but beauty and splendour, goodness and excellence, can come from Him. And because all things and all affairs issue forth from his Lord and Master, he thinks that all is elegant and fine; he dislikes nothing and fears nothing; everything in his eyes is likeable, except that which his Master tells him to dislike. He subjugates his likes and dislikes to those of his Master. In short, all his attention is fixed to the pleasure of his Master. He knows that everything is the sole property of God; none else has any share in anything . That being the case, why should he worry how the Master manages His own property? He does not think that he is competent to meddle in the affairs of his Lord. This submission to Allãh creates a perfect tranquillity, a truly happy life, untarnished by unhappiness; a light without darkness, a joy without sorrow, a benefit without harm, and a riches without want. It all happens because he believes in Allãh and in His mastership.

On the other hand is the unbeliever who does not know Allãh. By cutting himself off from the one and only Master, he has to bow his head before every creature. He believes that every-thing is independent in its actions — that it has a power of its own to benefit or to harm, to do good or evil. Consequently, he remains in constant fear of everything; he is ever apprehensive of every real or imagined danger. He is always grieving for want has befallen him, longing for the opportunities he has missed. He feels nostalgia for the prestige or wealth that is gone; breaks his heart for the children, relatives or friends who have left him. He is inextricably trapped by the attractions of the world; he relies on them and has trust in them; and when any thing goes wrong, he sinks into despair. Then as soon as he makes a virtue of necessity and is resigned to that misfortunate, a new calamity overwhelms him. In this way, he is always driven from pillar to post, with a heavy heart and a gloomy countenance; “thus does Allãh lay uncleanliness on those who do not believe”.

It can be seen, in the light of the above discourse, that forgetting the covenant and unhappiness of this world's life, both are interrelated — the later springs from the former. This fact becomes clearer if we compare the wordings of the verse 20: 123 -124 with those used in the verse under discussion. The former says: So if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy. And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life, and We will raise him, on the Day of Resurrection, blind. And the same idea has been expressed in this verse in the following words: . . . then whoever follows My guidance, no fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve.

It may be inferred from these verses that the forbidden tree was of such a nature that if one ate from it he would certainly be entangled in the troubles and misfortunes of this life — he would spend his life in this world, heedless of his own place, forgetting his Lord. Probably Adam (a. s.) wanted to combine the fruit of that tree with the covenant that he had entered into with his Lord. But he could not succeed; the fruit had its effect, he forgot the covenant and fell into the troubles and toils of this world. Then he was saved when he repented before Allãh and Allãh turned to him with mercy.

QUR'ÃN: and eat (you two) from it (freely) a plenteous (food): "ar-Raghad" (اَلـرَّغَـدُ) literally means happiness, well-being, good life and affluence. arghada 'l-qawmu mawãshiyahum (اَرْغَـدَ الـقَـومُ مَـوَاشِيَـهُمْ) means, "the people left their cattle to graze wherever it liked. "Qawmun raghad" (قَـوْمٌ رَغَـدٌ) and "nisã'un raghad" (نِـسَـاءٌ رَغَـدٌ) means people (or women) having a life of plenty and opulence.

QUR'ÃN: and do not approach (you two) this tree; The context shows that actual prohibition was of eating from it; but they were told not even to approach it; the prohibition was couched in these terms for emphasis. What was really forbidden is seen from the verse: so when they tasted of the tree, their nakedness became manifest to them (7:22), and . . . they both ate of it, so their nakedness appeared unto them (20:121).

QUR'ÃN: for then you (two) will be of the unjust : "aḍ- Ḍālimīn" (اَلـظّـالِـمِـيْنَ) is the nomen agentis of aḍ-Ḍulm (اَلـظُّـلْـمُ = injustice, to do wrong). It is not from aḍ-Ḍulmah (الـظُّـلْـمَـةُ = darkness), as has been suggested by someone. Adam and his wife acknowledged their wrong-doing, and the Qur'ãn quotes them as saying: "Our Lord! we have been unjust to ourselves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers" (7:23).

This clause has been changed in Chapter 20 to "so that you should be put to toil"; and the toil has further been explained in these words: Surely it is (ordained) for you that you shall not be hungry therein (i.e. in the Garden) nor bare of clothing; and that you shall not be thirsty therein nor shall you feel the heat of the sun (20:118-119). Clearly, the injustice and wrong-doing, mentioned in the verse 2:25, was to bring in its wake the toil of this world — hunger, thirst, nakedness and other discomforts. The injustice or wrong that they had done was against their own selves; it was neither a sin (as this term is used in the shari'ah) nor an injustice against Allãh. It shows that the prohibition was in the nature of an advice pointing out to them what was good for their own comfort; it did not have the force of an ordained law. Adam and his wife did wrong to themselves, because their disregard to that divine advice caused their removal from the Garden.

When a man commits a sin (i.e. an offence, from the sharī'ah point of view), he is given a punishment. Then if he repents and his repentance is accepted, the punishment is completely waived off, and he is returned to his previous position as though he had not committed the sin at all. If Adam and his wife were guilty of such a sin, they should have been returned to their place in the Garden soon after their repentance was accepted. But it was not done. It clearly shows that the prohibition did not have the force of an ordained law; it was only an advice. Even so, neglecting it had its natural effect on both of them and they had to come out of the Garden. But this removal from the Garden was not a punishment for any sin or crime; it was the natural consequence of the wrong they had done against their own selves. (We shall write again on this subject, God willing.)

QUR'ÃN : But the Satan made them both slip from it: The Satan could have misled them by creating evil thoughts in their hearts, in the same way as he misleads other human beings. But many verses, in the three narratives quoted at the beginning of this commentary, show that the Satan had appeared before Adam and his wife, and had talked to them face to face:

So We said: "O Adam! surely this is an enemy to you and to your wife" (20:117). Allãh had pointed out the Satan to Adam, not by any verbal description but by showing to him the person of the said enemy. (Note the demonstrative pronoun, "this is".)

(The Satan) said: "O Adam! shall I guide you to the tree of immortality . . ." (20:120). The speaker, that is, the Satan, must have talked to Adam face to face.

And he (i.e. the Satan) swore to them both: "Most surely I am a sincere adviser to you" (7:21). Obviously, he was visible to Adam and his wife and swore during his talk with them.

. . . and their Lord called out to them: "Did I not forbid you both from that tree and say to you that the Satan is your open enemy?" (7:22) It indicates that the Satan was visible to Adam and his wife. If the Satan had misled them by creating evil thoughts into their minds without appearing before them, they could have said to Allãh that they were not aware that that thought was put into their minds by the Satan; that they mistook it to be their own thought because the Satan had not appeared before them.

They used to see and recognize the Satan. Likewise, other prophets — all of them covered by Allãh's protection — used to see and recognize him if and when he came to them. Many traditions mention such encounters in the stories of Nũh, Ibrãhim, Mũsã, `Isã, Yaḥyã, Ayyũb, Ismãīl and Muḥammad (may Allãh bless him and his progeny as well as the prophets). The above-quoted verses as well as the verse 7:20 (and he said: "Your Lord has not forbidden from this tree except that . . .") also show that the Satan had visited then near that tree in the Garden. He entered the Garden, talked to them and put evil suggestion before them. He was able to do so because the Garden was not the Garden of eternal abode. The Qur'ãn also says that Adam, his wife and the Satan all were removed from the Garden together. (Of course, Allãh had said to the Satan: "Then get down from this, for it does not befit you to behave proudly therein" [7:13]. But the pronouns "this" and "therein" may refer to the angels or to the heaven. It may mean: Get down from the company of the angels; or, get down from the heaven as it is a place of honour.)

QUR'ÃN: and We said: "Get down, some of you being the enemies of others . . .": The second person pronouns, used in this verse, are plural, which denote at least three persons. Clearly, it was addressed to Adam, his wife and the Satan. The Satan was turned out of the heaven and/or the company of the angels before (as described above). This verse combines in itself that previous order too; and manifests the firm decree of Allãh establishing enmity between Iblīs on one side and Adam and his wife and their descendants on the other. It also promulgates another decree that they shall live in the earth, die therein, and be raised again from it.

It may safely be said that the whole human race (Adam together with his descendants) is covered by the last mentioned decree: Therein shall you live, and therein shall you die, and from it shall you be raised (7:25). This verse comes at the end of the story (in Chapter 7) which begins with the following words: And certainly We created you, then We fashioned you, then We said to the angels: "Prostrate before Adam" . . . (7:11). In both verses plural pronouns have been used; and it is an indication that the creation and the decree to live and die in the earth includes more than two, that is, other human beings too besides Adam and his wife.

The story of Adam may have been used by Allãh to represent the rise, fall and rise again of the whole mankind. Adam was the first representatives of humanity, and his life was a symbol, a miniature, of the human beings life-span in this world.

The angels were told to prostrate before Adam, because he was the vicegerent of Allãh in the earth. It has been mentioned earlier that this vicegerency was bestowed on the whole mankind. The angels prostrated before Adam, as he was the symbol of humanity, the representative of his race.

Adam and his wife were placed in the Garden and then were sent down from there because they had eaten of the for-bidden tree. Every man may see his own face in this mirror. His soul, before coming to this world, enjoyed the sublime and lofty existence; his abode was spiritually near to his Lord — a place of joy and happiness, of splendour and light; in the company of purified companions and spiritual friends, near to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds. Then he opted for this transient life, and was at once entangled in the troubles and toils of this world; leaving that purified existence, he was attracted to this tedious and odious life.

Adam at once repented and prayed for the mercy of Allãh. In the same way, man may return to Allãh and consequently to the eternal abode of honour and bliss. But if he took the wrong turning, did not try to return to Allãh, and, in short, followed his base desires, he would change the bounty of Allãh into disbelief and ungratefulness, would direct himself to the place of disgrace — to the hell; and how evil that resting place is!

QUR'ÃN: Then Adam received (some) words from his Lord. so He returned to him mercifully: "at-Talaqqī" (اَلـتَّـلَقّـي = to receive) signifies "to learn". It was this learning of the words that paved the way for the repentance of Adam.

"at-Tawbah" (اَلـتَّـوْبَـةُ) literally means to return; generally it is used for repentance, because when a man repents, he returns to his Lord. This verb is at times ascribed to Allãh (as in this verse), and signifies that Allãh returns or restores the servant to His grace and mercy. In other words, He accepts the plea of the servant and forgives his sins. At other times it is attributed to the servant; then it signifies the servant's return to Allãh, that is, his repentance from his sins.

at-Tawbah (repentance) of man is flanked on both sides by two tawbahs (mercies) of Allãh. Man can never do without the mercy of Allãh. He needs mercy and help of Allãh to turn away from sins; only then he may return to Allãh, may repent from his sins; then again the mercy of Allãh comes forward, and his repentance is accepted. Therefore, an accepted repentance of man issues forth from the mercy of Allãh, and also ends on His mercy. The verse 9:118 clearly mentions this fact: then He returned to them (mercifully) so that they might return (i.e. might repent).

What were the words which Adam received from his Lord? Some people think that it refers to their invocation reported in Chapter 7: They said: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to our-selves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers" (7:23). But this view is not supported by the sequence of the events. Adam and his wife had addressed that invocation before they were told to get down from the Garden (7:24); and it was after getting that order that he "received some words" from Allãh, as is clear from the verse 2: 36-37. Therefore, "some words" cannot refer to that previously uttered invocation.

There may, however, be another explanation: When Allãh announced to the angels that He was going to make a vicegerent in the earth, they said: "Wilt Thou place in it such as shall make mischief in it and shed blood, while we celebrate Thy praise and extol Thy holiness?" Allãh did not say that their accusation against the would be vicegerent was wrong; His only answer was that He taught Adam all the names. There must have been some-thing deep, meaningful and relevant in this teaching of the names; otherwise, the angels could not be satisfied, their objection could not be answered. The names taught to Adam must have contained some such thing that would come to the rescue of man if he sinned, would save him from disgrace if he erred. Probably, the words received at the time of repentance were related to the names taught to him in the beginning.

It cannot be denied that Adam (a.s.) did wrong to himself by placing himself in this world — a crossroads of happiness and unhappiness; had he been ensnared by it he would have perished; but he chose to return to his original place of spiritual bliss and was saved; he had to undergo, in this process, untold miseries and unbearable hardships. In any case, he put himself in so much trouble that he became "unjust" to himself. The question arises as to why Allãh selected this hard way to send him from the Garden to the earth. The fact, however, remains that in this process he attained to such heights of eternal bliss and spiritual perfection as would have been impossible to reach without coming down to the earth — and that too with a stigma of mistake.

The events leading to his removal from the Garden and, later, to the acceptance of his repentance showed to him his true reality — how humble, dependent, deficient and servile he was; and at the same time he came to realize that every difficulty of this world leads to manifold ease in the next life; every unpleasantness here results in enhanced pleasantness there; every trouble in the obedience to Allãh brings in its wake the pleasure of Allãh and His unlimited reward; the process continues until the servant reaches the sublime presence of his Lord. Adam knew, through his own experience, taste of many of the beautiful attributes of Allãh: His forgiveness, turning mercifully to the servants, covering their mistakes, bestowing mercy on them, putting them in the shadow of His compassion and grace — these are some of the divine attributes which He has especially reserved for the sinners. Adam could not know and understand them without passing through the stages which Allãh had decreed for him.

This, however, was his repentance; it made ordination of a shari`ah essential. It was necessary for Adam and his descendants to know which path they should take so as to reach their destination, the abode of bliss and happiness. His repentance brought him to the stage where promulgation of religion and ordination of the shari`ah was inevitable.

That is why Allãh frequently mentions the repentance before the belief: Stand fast then (in the right path) as you are commanded, as also he who has turned (to Allãh) with you . . . (11:112); And most surely I am most forgiving to him who repents and believes and does good. . . (20:82). There are many such verses in the Qur'ãn.

QUR'ÃN: We said: "Get down you therefore all together; and if there comes to you a guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, no fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve. And (as to) those who disbelieve in, and belie, Our signs, they are the inmates of the fire, in it they shall abide".

This is the essence of religion ordained, for the first time, for Adam (a.s.) and his descendants. Allãh has condensed the whole religion in these two sentences; nothing has been added, nor can be added to it upto the Day of Resurrection.

Ponder on this story and particularly the narrative of Chapter 20. You will see that Allãh had issued two decrees in respect of Adam and his descendants. When he ate from the tree, it was decreed that he should get down to the earth and spend his life therein — a life of trouble and toil. And when he repented, it was ordained that he and his descendants should be honoured with divine guidance. The first decree initiated the earthly life for him; the second, issued after his repentance, bestowed dignity and grace to that life, by providing it with divine guidance. From then on, man's life is composed of two lives: A material, earthly life and a spiritual, heavenly one. It may be inferred from repetition of the order to "get down" in this narrative: "Get down, some of you being the enemies of others; and there is for you in the earth an abode and a provision for a time" (2:36). "Get down you therefrom all together; and if there comes to you a guidance from Me. . ." (2:38).

Repentance of Adam (2:37) occurred between these two orders. The sequence shows that Adam had repented before their departing from the Garden, although he had slipped from his earlier position of honour.-It may also be. inferred from the change in the styles of the following verses: Allãh said to Adam, when placing him in the Garden, "do not go near this tree" (7:19) ; but when they ate from it, their Lord called out to them: "Did I not forbid you both from that tree. . ." (7:22). Note the demonstrative pronoun, "this" (for a nearer object) in the former speech, and "that" (for a farther one) in the latter. Also contrast the verb, "said" (showing proximity) of the former with "called out" (showing distance) of the latter. All this together supports the above-given explanation that at the time of the second order Adam was still in the Garden but not in his earlier honoured place.

"Get down, some of you being the enemies of others; and there is for you in the earth an abode and a provision for a time" (2:36;7:24). "Therein shall you live, and therein shall you die, and from it shall you be raised" (7:25). The verses indicate that the life on the earth was very different from that in the Garden. This life is firmly connected with the earth, full of difficulties and hardships. Man, in this life, is created from the earth, then after death is returned into it, and will, on the Day of Resurrection, be raised from it. This life is different from that of the Garden. It follows that Adam had lived a heavenly — and not earthly — life in the Garden.

This observation gives us a certainty that the Garden of Adam was in the heaven, although it was not the Garden of eternal abode from which one is never turned out.

What is meant by "the heaven"? We shall, God willing explain it somewhere else.

Now, we come to the mistake of Adam. The explanation given under various verses throws sufficient light on this subject. But the importance of the topic justifies its recapitulation in a systematic way:

The verses obviously say that he had committed a mistake and disobeyed the divine command: ". . . for then you (two) will be of the unjust"; "and Adam disobeyed his Lord, so he got astray"; and they too acknowledged their error: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to ourselves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers." But on meditating on the verses, and particularly on the admonition not to eat of the tree, we come to a definite conclusion that the said prohibition was not in the nature of an authoritative command; it was rather like an advice to guide Adam to his good and comfort. The following proof irresistibly lead us to this conclusion:

First: Allãh said in this, as well as in Chapter 7, that eating of the tree would be an injustice, a wrong-doing (for then you two will be of the unjust). The same result has been described as "toil" (so that you should be put to toil); and the "toil" has been explained in the terms of worldly needs and troubles, because it was ordained "for you that you shall not be hungry therein (i.e., as long as you remained in the Garden) nor bare of clothing; and that you shall not be thirsty therein nor shall you feel the heat of the sun". It seems clear that it was to protect them from these worldly troubles and toils that they were told not to go near that tree. The prohibition, therefore, was not more than an advice; certainly it was not an authoritative command. Going against an advice does not entail a sin, does not involve rebellion against the adviser. The injustice, mentioned in this story, therefore, means their doing wrong against their own selves, putting themselves in this world's hardship and toil; but it cannot mean the sin committed by a servant against his master.

Second: When a servant repents, that is, returns to Allãh, his Lord, and the Lord accepts that repentance, all the effects of the sin are erased, as though he had not committed any sin at all. If the prohibition against eating from the tree had the force of an authoritative command, an ordained law, Adam and his wife should have been returned to their place in the Garden as soon as their repentance was accepted. But they were not. It decisively proves that the prohibition was of advisory nature like telling someone not to put his hand in a fire; if he does not listen to the advice, his hand would certainly burn, and the subsequent apology would not unburn it, even if the apology was accepted. Likewise, Adam and his wife disregarded the advice, and as a result of eating from the tree, had to go out of the Garden and live in the earth a life of trial and hardship. Their repentance could not take them back to the Garden as their coming to the earth was the natural and inevitable result of that action.

The prohibition, in short, was no a law ordained by the Master — like the announcement that a man who neglects to pray would enter the Fire; or the one who disobeys the rules of the sharī`ah would be punished. If it were like such a command, the repentance would have rubbed out the effect of disobedience and they would have been sent back to the Garden straight away.

Third: We said: "Get down you therefrom all together; and if there comes to you a guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, no fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve. And (as to) those who disbelieve in, and belie, Our signs, they are the inmates of the fire, in it they shall abide." These verses have put in a nutshell all the detailed laws, rules, and regulations sent by Allãh for the mankind, through His angels, books and apostles. And it was the first sharī`ah which Allãh ordained for the world, the world of Adam and his descendants. It was ordained after the second order to "get down" — and the order to "get down" was not a legislative, but a creative, command, resulting from his eating of the tree.

It means that at the time when Adam partook of the tree, no sharī`ah was ordained yet, and no law was promulgated. Therefore, whatever Adam did was not a transgression against any law of the sharī'ah, nor was there any sin or crime involved in acting against that advice.

Question: The order to the angels and Iblīs co prostrate before Adam was an authoritative command, and it was given before the order to Adam not to go near that tree. Therefore, it is difficult to believe that at that time there was no obligatory law.

Reply: We are talking about Adam and his descendants, and not about the angels and Iblīs. It is irrelevant whether the angels and Iblīs were given a compulsory order before Adam was placed in the Garden.

Question: If the prohibition were of an advisory nature, Allãh would not have described its disregard in the terms of "injustice", "disobedience", and "going astray".

Reply: We have already explained that the "injustice" done by Adam and his wife was against their own selves; it was not a sin against Allãh.

"al-'Iṣyãn" (اَلـعِصْيـانُ = disobedience) literary means to resist, or to yield with difficulty. The Arab say; I broke it and it was broken; I broke it fa-'aṣã (فَعَصى =) but it resisted, or

"al-Ghawãyah" (اَلـغَـوَ ايـَةُ = to go astray) literally means inability of a man to look after his interests; not managing one's affairs properly. This word by itself does not indicate committing a sin or crime. It is the context that determines its value. Its emphasis changes depending on whether the neglected order was an advice or an authoritative command.

Question: Then why did they repent? Why did they say, "and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers?"

Reply: at-Tawbah (repentance) means to turn to. And the word can be used in various meanings, depending on context.

A servant rebels against his master, and thereafter returns to him and asks for his forgiveness; the master, if he so wishes, pardons him, and gives him his previous rank and position.

A doctor tells a patient not to eat certain fruits, lest his illness be prolonged or the disease be complicated. The patient yielded to my pressure with difficulty. Not heeding an order is called al-`iṣyãn, because one does not yield to that enjoinment or prohibition. This resistance may occur against an advice as much as against 'a compulsory order. The word in itself does not imply sinning; it all depends on the nature of the order that was disregarded.

Of course, nowadays we, the Muslims, use this word as synonymous to sinning. And now it has become a terminology of the sharī`ah (or of the Muslims), used for disobedience to an authoritative command. But this later transformance cannot effect its original or literal meaning for which it was used in the Qur'ãn.

disregards the prohibition and, as a result, puts his life in danger. Now he feels embarrassed and repents before the doctor, asking for his forgiveness, begging him to prescribe for him a medicine to enable him to regain his health and vigour. The doctor may tell him that now it will be necessary for him to undergo a long and difficult treatment, adding that if he persevered in the prescribed regimen his health would be much better than before.

The significance of the other words used in the narrative, like forgiveness, mercy and loss, may likewise change with the context.

TRADITIONS

al-Qummī (Ali) narrates, in his at-Tafsīr, from his father (Ibrāhīm ibn Hāshim) who narrates, from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) (omitting the chain of intervening narrators, although it was fully described by his Shaykh). He said: "as-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked about the Garden of Adam whether it was a garden of this world or one of the hereafter's. He (a.s.) said: 'It was a garden of this world, wherein the sun and the moon rose. Had it been a Garden of the hereafter, he would have not come out of it.' He (a.s.) further said: 'Allāh placed him in the Garden and allowed him its freedom with exception of the tree. (It was done) because here was a creature of Allāh who could not survive without (some) enjoinment and prohibition, nor (could it continue) without food, cloth, shelter and marriage; nor could he know, without divine help, what was beneficial to him from what was harmful.' Then came to him Iblīs and told him: "If you (two) ate from this tree, which Allāh has forbidden you, you (two) would become two angels and would abide in the Garden for ever; and if you (two) did not eat from it, Allāh would turn you out from the Garden;" and he swore to them that he was a sincere adviser to them; as Allãh quotes his words: Your Lord has not forbidden you from this tree except that you may not both become two angels or that you may (not) become of the immortals. And he swore to them both: "Most surely I am a sincere adviser to you." Adam believed in his words, and they (i.e. Adam and his wife) ate from the tree; and they became as Allãh says: their nakedness became manifest to them; what Allãh had clothed them with of the (attires of the) Garden dropped away from them, and they both began to cover themselves with the leaves of the Garden; and their Lord called out to them: Did I not forbid you both from that tree and say to you that the Satan is your open enemy? They said, as Allãh quotes them: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to ourselves;and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers." Thereupon Allãh said to them: "Get down, some of you being the enemies of others; and there is for you in the earth an abode and a provision for a time." ' " He (the Imam) said: "that (time) is the Day of Resurrection". He further said: "Then Adam descended on the (hill of) aṣ-Ṣafã — and it got this name because Ṣaf`īyu 'llãh (صَفِـيُّ اللهِ = the sincere friend of Allãh, i.e. Adam) came down on it; and Ḥawwã' (Eve) descended on the (hill of) al-Marwah — and it was named al-Marwah because al-mar 'ah (اَلْـمَـرءَ ةُ = the woman) descended on it. The Adam remained in prostration for forty days, weeping for the Garden. So Jibrīl (Gabriel) came to him and said: 'Did Allãh not create you with His hand, and (did He not) breath into you from His spirit, and (did He not) made His angels prostrate before you?' He said: 'Certainly.' (Then Jibrīl said:) 'and He ordered you not to eat from the tree and you disobeyed Him?'

Adam said: 'Iblīs swore to me falsely.' "

The author says: There are other traditions too from Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) to the effect that the Garden of Adam was of this world; although some of them are from the same Ibrãhīm ibn Hãshim.

The phrase, "a garden of this world", has been used in contrast to the Garden of everlasting abode. It indicates a state between this world and the hereafter. Adam's garden was not the Garden of everlasting abode, but neither was it a garden like that of ours al-Barzakh (اَلبَرزَخُ) is the state, place and time between one's death and the Day of Resurrection. The said Garden may be called a Garden of al-Barzakh, and it may well have been situated in this world. The sentences, "Adam descended on the (hill of) aṣ-Ṣafã", and "Ḥawwã' descended on the (hill of) al-Marwah", indicate that, before it, they were somewhereabove this world. The interpretation of "a time" with the "Day of Resurrection" is also revealing. Man remains in al-Barzakh after his death, and at the same time he remains in the earth. Many Qur'ãnic verses use these expressions interchangeably.
For example: He will say: "How many years did you tarry in the earth?" They will say: "We tarried a day or part of a day", but ask those who keep account. He will say: "You did tarry but a little — had you but known (it)" (23:112-114). And at the time when the Hour shall come, the guilty shall swear (that) they did not tarry but an hour; thus they used to utter lies. And those who are given knowledge and faith will say: "Certainly you tarried according to the decree of Allãh till the Day of Resurrection, but you did not know" (30:55 - 56).

Apart from that, many traditions of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) show that the Garden of Adam was in the heaven, and that he and his wife descended from the heaven. For the one who is familiar with the language of traditions, it is not difficult to believe that the said Garden was in the heaven and that they had descended from the heaven to the earth, even if they were created in the earth itself and live therein all along. These expressions are not any different from those which say that the Garden is in the heaven, and yet say that the grave is an orchard from the orchards of the Garden or a pit from the pits of the Fire. Many similar expressions are found in the traditions. Any lingering doubt will be removed when we shall write about the heaven, God willing.

There is no mention in the correct and reliable traditions as to how Iblīs found his way to Adam and his wife, or as to what means he adopted for this purpose. Some traditions mention the serpent and peacock as the two helpers of Iblīs in his endeavour to mislead Adam and his wife; but they are extremely unreliable. Obviously, such traditions were interpolated under the influence of Judaism. This story has been taken from the Jews, and to make this point clear, we are quoting it from the Bible (King James version). The story is given in the book of Genesis:

"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul. And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; And the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth towards the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates. And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him. And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field; but for Adam there was not found an help meet for him. And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; And the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man. And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh. And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed. Now the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field which the Lord God has made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden: But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die: For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil. And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat. And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons. And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden. And the Lord God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked; and I hid myself. And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat? And the man said, The woman whom thou gayest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. And the Lord God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. And the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of the life; And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee. And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; Thorns also and thistles shall it,bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.

And Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living. Unto Adam also and to his wife did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them. And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever: Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken. So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life." (Genesis, ch. 2: vs. 7 to ch. 3: vs. 24)

Compare the narrative of the Qur'ãn with that of the Bible, then ponder on various traditions narrated in the Shi'ah or Sunni books; you will come to know many revealing differences. But we are not going into it because it is beyond the scope of this book.

Question: How could Iblīs enter the Garden and mislead Adam therein? The question arises because:

i) the Garden is a place of cleanliness and purity, wherein there shall be nothing vain nor any sin (52:23) ;

ii) The garden is in the heaven, and Iblīs was already turned out therefrom when he refused to prostrate before Adam. Then get out of it, for surely you are driven away (15:34). Then get down from this, for it does not befit you to behave proudly therein (7:13).

Reply: (i) The Qur'ãn disallows vain and sinful acts in the Garden of eternal abode (in which the believers shall be placed after resurrection) and the Garden of al-Barzakh wherein they are placed after death. But it is silent about the Garden of Adam, in which he was placed together with his wife before man was sent to this world and given any authoritative law. Rather, it may be said that it shows not only possibility of disobedience therein, but also its occurrence. Proof: This very disobedience of Adam and his wife.

Moreover, vanity and sin are relative terms; and they do not occur until man comes into this world, and is given some authoritative laws to follow.

ii) The argument may be replied as follows:

a. It cannot be definitely said that the clauses, "get down of it" and "get down from this" were meant to turn Iblīs out of the heaven, because "the heaven" has not been mentioned in preceding sentences. The order, therefore, could mean, 'get out of the ranks of the angels', or 'get down from the honour and dignity given to thee'.

b. May be, the order to get down or to get out meant only that he could not live or stay in the heaven with the angels. If so, then it was not a prohibition against occasionally going or ascending thereto. This interpretation is supported by the verses which describe the Satans' occasional goings upto the heaven to eavesdrop the conversations of the angels.[1] Also,

c. it has been narrated that before the time of 'Isã (a.s.) , the Satans were going up to the seventh heaven; when he was born they were barred from the fourth heaven and above; then after the birth of the Prophet they were barred from all the heavens.

d. There is no mention in the Book of Allãh that Iblīs had entered the Garden. Therefore, the question does not arise at all. It has, of course, been narrated in the traditions; but they are not al-mutawãtir; and possibly the narrators have described the story in their own words, and not exactly as the Imam said. Utmost that may be put as evidence that Iblīs had entered the Garden is the verse: and he (i.e. the Satan) said. "Your Lord has not forbidden you from this tree except that you may not become two angels . . ." (7:19), as he had used the pronoun, "this", ("this tree") which denotes nearness. But if it is taken to mean nearness in place, it would give the same meaning in Allãh's command, . . . do not go near this tree (7:18). Surely it, cannot be said that the pronoun

1. For example: And We have guarded it (i.e. the heaven) against every accursed Satan, but he who steals a hearing; so there follows him a visible flame (15:17-18).

indicates that Allãh was in that place near the tree [1]

`Abdu's-Salãm al-Harawi [2] said: "I said to ar-Riḍã (a.s.):

'O son of the Messenger of Allãh! tell me about the tree from which Adam and Ḥawwã' ate, what was it? Because people do have different views about it; some have narrated that it was a wheat-plant, and others have reported that it was the tree of envy.' He said: 'All this is true.' I said: 'Then what do these explanations, with their differences, mean?' He said: 'O son of aṣ-Ṣalt! verily the tree of the Garden bears (fruits of) many kinds; and it was a wheat-plant and (yet) it bore grapes; and it was not like a tree of this world. And when Allãh raised the status of Adam by making the angels prostrate before him and by placing him in the Garden, he said: "Has Allãh created any man superior than me?" And Allãh knew what had came into his mind; so He called out to him: "Raise your head, O Adam! and look at the pillar of the Throne." So, he looked at the pillar of the Throne and found written on it: "There is no god except Allãh; Muhammad is the Messenger of Allãh; ibn Abi Ṭãlib is the Leader of the faithful, and his wife, Fãṭimah is the Chief of the women of the worlds, and al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn are the Chiefs of the youths of the people of the Garden." Adam said:

1. The first and third replies seem strange, to say the least. The author himself has said (while commenting on the phrase, " . . . the Satan made them both slip from it") that the order to "get down" or to "get out" may mean, "Get down from the company of the angels; or, get down from the heaven". But here he rejects the second alternative altogether! The third reply is based on القِياسُ مَعَ الفَارِق an unacceptable analogy — that which overlooks the important differences between the two sides. If the Satan is governed by time and space how does it imply that Allãh too should be governed by them? Moreover, in the same commentary the author has proved on the strength of this same verse that "the Satan had visited them near that tree in the Garden. He entered the Garden . . . (and) Adam, his wife and the Satan all were removed from the Garden together." This leaves us with the second reply, which is doubtlessly without any flaw and is supported by the Qur'ãn. (tr.)

2. That is, Abu 'ṣ-Ṣalt Abdu 's-Salãm ibn Ṣãliḥ al-Harawī.

"O my Lord! who are they?" He, Mighty and Great is He said: "O Adam! they are (from) your off-springs; and they are better than you and all My creation; and if it were not (for) them, I would have not created you, nor the Garden, nor the fire, nor the heaven, nor the earth. So be careful not to look at them with envious eyes; otherwise, I will turn you out of My nearness." But he looked at them with envious eyes and entertained the hope of (attaining to) their rank. So, the Satan got the better of him, until he ate from the forbidden tree; and got the better of Ḥawwã', and she looked at Fãṭimah with envious eyes until she too, like Adam, ate from the tree. Thereupon, Allãh turned them out of His Garden, and got them down from His nearness to the earth.' " (`Uyũnu 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: This matter has been described in many traditions, some more detailed than this; others, more concise. In this tradition, the Imãm has confirmed that the tree was the wheat-plant, and also that it was the tree of envy. The former implies that the tree was not worthy of attention of the people of the Garden; the later indicates that it was too lofty to come within the grasp of Adam and his wife (as a tradition says that it was the tree of the knowledge of Muhammad and his progeny).

Apparently, the two interpretations are totally different from each other, and the tradition seems a problematic one. But if you ponder on the covenant referred to earlier, you will see that both meanings are complementary, and not mutually exclusive. Adam (a.s.) wanted to combine the pleasures of the Garden — a place of nearness to Allãh, where it was necessary to always keep the covenant before one's eyes, and not to let one's attention divert to anyone or anything else — with the forbidden tree — which would bring all the world's troubles in its wake; but he failed in his endeavour, was sent down to the earth because he had been heedless of the said covenant and of its demands. It was reserved for the Prophet to combine these two seemingly apposite factors; it was he who, for the first time, harmonized this world with the next, synchronized the matter with the spirit, and brought into being a whole man.

However, Allãh again guided Adam aright, chose him for His vicegerency, and as a result of his repentance, raised him above the worldly desires and made him remember again the forgotten covenant.

"But he looked at them with envious eyes and entertained the hope of (attaining to) their rank": The second clause explains the first; Adam wanted that he too should attain to that status; it was not that he was envious (i.e., had any ill will) against them. Envy is a vice, while aspiring to raise one's status is not.

Now let us look at the following two traditions:

1. ath-Thumãli narrates from Abũ Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: "Allãh made a covenant with Adam that he should not go near the tree. But when the time came when, according to the knowledge of Allãh, he was to eat of it, he forgot (the covenant) and ate from it. And that is (the meaning of) the words of Allãh: And certainly We had covenanted unto Adam before, but he forgot; and We did not find in him any determination." (Kamãlu 'd-dīn)

2. al-'Ayyãshī narrated in his at-Tafsīr from one of the two (i.e., the fifth or the sixth) Imãms, that he was asked as to why Allãh punished Adam for his forgetfulness. He said: "He had not forgotten; and how could he forget when he had remembered it (very well) and (even) Iblīs had told him: Your Lord has not forbidden you from this tree except that you may not both become two angels or that you may (not) become of the immortals."

The way to harmonize these seemingly conflicting traditions is clear if one applies to them the foregoing explanation.

Abu 's-Ṣalt al-Harawi said: "al-Ma'mũn gathered for `Ali ibn Mũsã ar-Riḍã (a.s.) people of various sects from among the Muslims, the Jews, the Christians, the Magians, the Sabaeans and all other religions. Nobody stood (for religious discussion with the Imãm) but that he was forced to accept his (Imãm's) arguments and was put to silence. Then stood before him Ali ibn Muhammad ibn al-Jahm and said to him: 'Do you believe in sinlessness of the prophets? O son of the Messenger of Allãh!' He said: 'Yes.' He (`Ali ibn Muhammad ibn al-Jahm) said: 'Then what would you do with the words of Allãh: and Adam disobeyed his Lord, so he got astray? . . .' Then said our master, ar-Riḍã (a.s.):

'Woe unto you! O Ali! Have fear of Allãh (in your heart) and do not ascribe indecencies to the prophets of Allãh, and do not interpret by your own opinion the Book of Allãh (Mighty and Great is He!) Verily Allãh (Mighty and Great is He!) says: . . . but none knows its interpretation except Allãh and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge (3:7). As for the words of Allãh, and Adam disobeyed his Lord, so he got astray, (the fact is that) Allãh (Mighty and Great is He!) had created Adam (to be) His proof in His earth and (to be) His vicegerent in His towns; He had not created him for the Garden; and the disobedience was (done) by Adam in the Garden, and not in the earth; (and it came to pass) so that the measures of the decree of Allãh (Mighty and Great is He) might be fulfilled. So when he was sent down to the earth and was made (Allãh's) proof and vicegerent, he was protected (i.e. became sinless), as Allãh says: Surely Allãh chose Adam and Nũḥ and the descendants of Ibrãhīm and the descendants of Imrãn above all the worlds.' " (3:33) (al-Amãlī, aṣ-Ṣadũq)

The author says: The sentence, "and the disobedience was . . . in the Garden", points to what we have already mentioned that there was no religious law ordained in the Garden; and that Adam (a.s.) even before his creation, was destined to live in the earth; and, therefore, the disobedience was of an advice, and not of an ordained law. In this context, there appears no reason why anyone should try (as someone has done) to explain away this tradition in a round-about way.

'Ali ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Jahm said: "I was present in the court of al-Ma'mũn; and Ali ibn Mũsã was there with him. And al-Ma'mũn said to him: 'O son of the Messenger of Allãh! Is it not your belief that the prophets are sinless?' He said: 'Yes.' (al-Ma'mũn) said: 'Then what is the meaning of the words of Allãh, the High: and Adam disobeyed his Lord, so he got astray?' (The Imãm) said: 'Verily Allãh said to Adam: dwell you and your wife in the Garden and eat (you both) freely wherever you (two) wish and do not approach (you two) this tree, (pointing to a tree) for then you (two) will be of the unjust. Allãh did not say to him:

Do not eat from this tree nor from another tree of its kind. And they did not eat from it; they ate from another (similar) tree because the Satan whispered evil suggestion to them and said: "Your Lord has not forbidden you from this (i.e. the other similar) tree; He has only forbidden you from approaching that one; and He has not forbidden you from that three except that you may not both become two angels or that you may not become of the immortals." And he swore to them both: "Most surely I am a sincere adviser to you." And Adam and Ḥawwã' had not seen before that anyone swearing falsely in the name of Allãh; thus he caused them to fall by deceit and they ate from that (tree) because they believed in his oath in the name of Allãh. And it all happened before Adam was made a prophet, and it was not a big sin leading one to the fire; it was only a forgiven minor (sin) that is permissible to the prophets before they begin receiving revelation. But when Allãh chose him and made him prophet he became sinless, not committing any minor or major sin. Allãh (Mighty and Great is He!) has said: Surely Allãh chose Adam and Nũḥ and the descendants of Ibrãhīm and the descendants of 'Imrãn above all the worlds . . .' " (`Uyunu

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadũq (may Allãh have mercy on him!) after narrating the tradition in full, has commented as follows:

"Strange that `Ali ibn Muhammad ibn al-Jahm, in spite of his open hostility towards, and enmity and hatred of, Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.), should narrate this tradition."

This comment only looks at the belief of the sinlessness of the prophets which this tradition purportedly proves; but aṣ-Ṣadũq (may Allãh have mercy on him!) did not look deep into its implications. The reported reply is not in accord with the well-known belief of the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt, that all the prophets were fully protected from all major and minor sins before as well as after getting the prophethood.

Moreover, the reply presumes that the verse does not mean what it apparently says. According to this tradition, the verse, "Your Lord has not forbidden you from this tree except that you may not both become two angels . . .", should be read as follows: "Your Lord has not forbidden you from this (i.e. the other similar) tree; He has only forbidden you from approaching that one; and He has not forbidden you from that tree except that you may not both become two angels . . ." Such deletions are against the norms of eloquence. The quoted speech of the Satan clearly shows that he was instigating them to eat from the very tree that was forbidden, holding out to them the hope of becoming angels or immortals: "Your Lord has not forbidden you from this tree except that you may not both become two angels or that you may (not) become of the immortals." "O Adam! shall I guide you to the tree of immortality and a kingdom which decays not?" The narrator, that is, `Ali ibn Muhammad ibn al-Jahm, had himself been given the correct and complete answer in the court of al-Ma'mũn, as the preceding tradition shows; therefore, there is something wrong in this narration of his, although some parts may be somehow interpreted correctly.

aṣ-Ṣadũq has narrated (through his chain) from al-Bãqir (a.s.), through his forefathers, from 'Ali (a.s.) that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: "Adam and Ḥawwã' stayed in the Garden, (till they were sent out of it) for seven hours according to the (counting of the) days of the world, until Allãh sent them down on the same day."

`Abdullah ibn Sinãn said: "Abu `Abdillãh (a.s.) was asked — and I was present there: 'How long did Adam and his wife stay in the Garden until their mistake removed them from it?' He said: 'Verily Allãh breathed His spirit into Adam after the mid-day on Friday; then created his wife from his lowest rib; then He made His angels prostrate before him and placed him in His Garden the same day. And by God! he did not stay therein but six hours of the same day until he disobeyed Allãh. Thereupon, Allãh removed them both from it after the sunset, and they were put into the courtyard of the Garden till the morning; then their nakedness became manifest to them; and their Lord called out to them: "Did I not forbid you both from that tree?" Adam felt ashamed and bowed (his head) and said: "Our Lord ! We have been unjust to ourselves and we confess our sins; therefore, forgive us (our sins)." Allãh said to them: "Get down you both from My heavens to the earth; because no sinner shall remain in My nearness — neither in My Garden nor in My heavens." ' " (at-Tafsīr, al-`Ayyãshī)

The author says: The tradition gives a new detail, that Adam and Ḥawwã' were removed first from the Garden to its courtyard and then from the courtyard to the earth. There are some indications in the Qur'ãn to support this information:

First: They were twice told to "get down" (vide vs. 2:36 and 2:38). It was a creative, and not a legislative, order, and a creative order takes effect the instant it is given.

If the first order told them to get down to the earth, there was no question of their not getting down to the earth at once; and, therefore, the second order would be superfluous. But in the light of this tradition the two commands would be perfectly in order.

Second: As mentioned in the commentary, this idea may be inferred from the changed verbs and pronouns of the verses. Allãh describes in these words his talk with Adam when he was being placed in the Garden: And We said: "O Adam! dwell you and your wife in the Garden . . . and do not approach (you two) this tree ..." But after they had eaten from the tree, their Lord called out to them: "Did I not forbid you both from that tree?" The verb, "We said" of the former has been changed to "called out to them" in the latter; as the demonstrative pronoun, "this tree" (showing nearness) was replaced by "that tree" (showing distance). These changes show that Adam had been removed, by the time of the second address, from his original place of nearness in the Garden to a distant place — which the tradition describes as the courtyard. But this tradition says that Ḥawwã' was created from the lowest rib of Adam; it is a Biblical story which has been totally rejected by the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt, (as will be seen from the traditions which will be quoted under the verses of the creation of Adam). This tradition, therefore, is unacceptable unless this expression is taken to mean that Ḥawwã' was created from the clay left over from the creation of Adam and which was lying near his lowest rib.

Whether he stayed in the Garden for six hours (as this tradition says) or seven (as the former says) is not very important, because such things are mere approximation.

It is reported from the fifth or the sixth Imãm (peace be on them both) that he said about the verse, then Adam received (some) words from his Lord, that (the words were as follows): "There is no god except Thee; Glory be to Thee, O Allãh! and praise! I have committed evil and been unjust to myself; therefore, forgive me (my sin) and Thou art the best of the forgivers. There is no god except Thee; Glory be to Thee, O

Allãh! and praise! I have done wrong and been unjust to myself; therefore, have mercy on me, and Thou art the best of the forgivers. There is no god except Thee; Glory to Thee, O Allãh! and praise! I have committed evil and been unjust to myself; therefore, have mercy on me, and Thou art the best of those who have mercy. There is no god except Thee; Glory be to Thee, O Allãh! and praise! I have done wrong and been unjust to myself; therefore, forgive me (my sin) and turn to me (with mercy); surely Thou, Thou alone, art oft-returning (with mercy), the Merciful." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: This theme has been narrated also by aṣ-Ṣadũq, al-`Ayyãshi, al-Qummi and others; nearly the same thing has been narrated through the Sunni chains; and it may possibly be inferred from the apparent meaning, of the verses.

al-Kulayni has written in al-Kãfī: "And another tradition says in respect of this verse: (Adam) had asked from (Allãh) by the right of Muhammad and Ali and Fãṭimah and al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn."

The author says: This explanation too has been narrated by aṣ-Ṣadũq, al-`Ayyãshi, al-Qummi and others. A nearly similar tradition has been narrated through the Sunni chains. It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthur that the Prophet said: "When Adam committed the sin that he committed, he raised his head towards the heaven and said: 'I beseech Thee, by the right of Muhammad, to forgive me.' Allãh revealed to him (i.e., asked him through revelation): 'And who is Muhammad?' He said: 'Blessed is Thy name! When Thou created me, I raised my head towards Thy Throne and saw written therein: There is no god except Allãh; Muhammad is the Messenger of Allãh. Thus I knew that no one could be more honoured in Thy presence than him whose name Thou hadst placed with Thy name.' Thereupon, Allãh revealed to him: 'O Adam! Verily he is the last of the prophets, from thy descendants; and if it were not for him, I would have not created thee.' "

The author says: Although these traditions seem not to be in accord with the apparent meaning of the verse, on deeper consideration this explanation does not look so far-fetched. The sentence, "Then Adam received (some) words,-from his Lord", shows that he was taught those words by the Lord, and that he had got that knowledge before his repentance. Also, it is known that Allãh had taught him all the names. Allãh told the angels that He was going to make in the earth a vicegerent; they said: "Wilt Thou place in it such as shall make mischief in it and shed blood, while we celebrate Thy praise and extol Thy holiness? He said: "Surely I know what you do not know". And He taught Adam the names, all of them. There must have been something in those names to wipe out every injustice, to erase every sin and to cure every spiritual and moral disease; otherwise, the objection of the angels could not be answered — Allãh did not say a single word to refute the angels' assertion; all He did was to teach Adam all the names. It means that those names could cure all the ills of humanity; the angels understood it and surrendered to the know-ledge and wisdom of Allãh. We have earlier explained that those names were sublime creations, hidden from the heavens and the earth; they were intermediaries to convey the grace and bounties of Allãh to His creation; and no creature would be able to attain to its perfection without their assistance. At this stage, we may refer to some traditions which say that Adam saw the figures of Muhammad and his Ahlu 'l-bayt, and also their light at the time he was taught the names; and the ones which mention that he saw them when Allãh took out his offspring from his back; and the others which describe his seeing them in the Garden.

However, Allãh has not identified those words, and has used it as a common noun, "(some) words"; nevertheless, the Qur'ãn has clearly used the expression, "word", for an individual being, as for example, in the verse 3:45: . . . Allãh gives you good news of a word from Him whose name is the Messiah, 'Isã son of Maryam . . .

Some exegetes have written that the "words", mentioned in this verse, refer to the plea of Adam and his wife reported in Chapter 7: They said: "Our Lord! We have been unjust to our-selves, and if Thou forgive us not, and have (not) mercy on us, we shall certainly be of the losers."

But the sequence of events does not support this view. The repentance of Adam, according to the narrative of Chapter 2, had occurred after his coming to the earth. The verse (2:37) describing the repentance comes after the verse (2:36) that mentions his descent to the earth.[1] But they had uttered that plea while they were still in the Garden, before coming down to the earth. The plea is given in verse 7:23; and the order to "get down" comes after that in verse 7:24. Apparently, this plea was in response to their admonition by Allãh: "Did I not forbid you both from that tree . . .?"; they wanted to declare their servitude and to surrender themselves to Allãh; acknowledging that all the authority was in the hands of Allãh and He might do what He pleased; He was their Lord, and they had put themselves in danger of loss by being unjust to themselves.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Verily, Mũsã asked his Lord to let him meet Adam; and he was joined with him (i.e., Adam). Mũsã said to him: 'O father! Did Allãh not create you with His hand, and breathe into you of His spirit; and make the angels prostrate before you, and order you not to eat of the tree? Then why did you disobey Him?' (Adam) said: 'O Mũsã! How long before my creation did you find my mistake (mentioned) in the Torah?' He said: 'Thirty thousand years before.' (Adam) said: 'That is it.' " aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Thus refuted Adam the argument of Mũsã." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi)

The author says: aṣ-Ṣuyũṭi has narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthũr approximately similar traditions, through various chains, from the Prophet.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said: "By God, Allãh had surely created Adam for the world, and He gave him place in the Garden, in order that he might disobey Him and thus He might return him to that for which He had created him." ('Ilalu 'sh-sharã'i')

The author says: A tradition of the same theme, narrated by al-`Ayyãshi from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.), concerning an angel friend of Adam, has been quoted earlier.

A Syrian asked 'Ali (a.s.) as to which valley in the earth was the most honoured. He (a.s.) said: "The valley called Sarandib wherein Adam descended from the heaven." (al-Iḥtijãj)

The author says: In contrast to it, there are numerous traditions showing that he had descended at Mecca (and some of them have been quoted above). May be, he first came down to Sarandib and then got down to Mecca.

It has been reported by aṭ-Ṭabarãnī, Abu 'sh-Shaykh (in his al- 'Aẓamah) and Ibn Marduwayh, from Abu Dharr, that he said: "I said: 'O Messenger of Allãh! What do you say, was Adam a prophet?' He said: 'Yes. He was a prophet (and) an

It is not in accord with the author's earlier assertion that the verse 2:36 describes Adam's removal from the earlier-held place of honour to the courtyard of the Garden; after which he learned "some words" from Allãh and repented (2:37); and it was later that he was sent down from the courtyard to the Garden (2:38). GENERAL COMMENT

Now begins the rebuking of the Jews that continues for more than a hundred verses. Allãh reminds them of the bounties bestowed, of the honours given; contrasting it with their ingratitude and disobedience; showing how at every juncture they paid the favours of Allãh with disregard of their covenant, open rebellion against divine commands and even with polytheism. The series reminds them of twelve events of their history — like rescuing them from Pharaoh and his people by parting the river, drowning of Pharaoh and his army, the appointed rendezvous at the mount Sinã'i, the Jews' starting calf-worship in Mũsã's absence, and M a a s order to them to kill themselves, their demand from M ũ s ã to show their Lord to them face to face, their death by lightning and then their arising from dead etc. — all of which shows how they were chosen to receive the especial favours of Allãh. But their ingratitude runs parallel to it. They repeatedly broke the covenants made with Allãh, committed capital sins, heinous crimes and shameful deeds; more despicable was their spiritual poverty and moral bankruptcy — in open defiance to their book and total disregard to the reason. It was all because their hearts were hardened, their souls lost and their endeavours worthless.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: . . . and be faithful to (your) covenant with Me: "al-'Ahd" (اَلـعَـهْـدُ = covenant) literally means guarding and maintenance. By association it has come to mean covenant, oath, testament, will, encounter, house, etc.

QUR'ÃN: . . . and of Me,. . . should you be afraid: , "ar-Rahbah" (اَلرَّهْبَـةُ = fear) is opposite of ar-Raghbah (اَلرَّغْبَـةُ = desire).

QUR'ÃN : . . . and be not the first to deny it: That is, first among the people of the book, or first among your own people. This firstness is not all-inclusive, because the disbelievers of Mecca had rejected the Message before the Jews.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN : And seek assistance through patience and prayer: Man seeks assistance in such affairs and tasks as he cannot manage alone, and in hardships and difficulties which he cannot overcome himself. In reality there is no helper except Allāh. Man can, therefore, manage all his affairs and overcome all his difficulties by courage and steadfastness (i.e. by patience) and by looking towards Allāh (i.e. by prayer). These two factors are the best way to get assistance: patience makes even the great misfortunes look trivial, and putting all his confidence in Allāh awakens the spirit of faith; and thus man comes to realize that the cause which he is relying upon can never fail to produce the desired effect.

QUR'ÃN: and most surely it is a hard thing except for the humble ones: The pronoun "it" refers to the "prayer". It is difficult to relate it to "seeking the assistance", because it will then cover patience too, and the word "the humble ones" will not look appropriate — humbleness does not fit very much with patience. The word used here for humbleness is "khushũ'" (اَلْخُشُوْعُ); "khuḍũ'" (اَلْخُضُوْعُ) too has the same meaning but with one difference: while the latter shows itself in the limbs of the body, the former refers to the inner feeling.

QUR'ÃN: who know that they shall meet their Lord . . .:The word used in this verse for "knowing" is "yaḍunnũn" (يَضُنُّونَ) it literally means "they think". But the context, that is, the belief in the hereafter, demands a firm conviction that would leave no room for any doubt or supposition. Allãh says: and they are sure of the hereafter (2:4). Or, may be, Allãh, by using this word, makes us realize that even an elementary idea of the hereafter is sufficient to create in a man humility and humbleness before his Lord. Many a knowledge comes to man in stages: (1) first he becomes aware of an idea; (2) then he has some doubts about its correctness; (3) then he becomes inclined to accept it; (4) then gradually the possibility of his accepting the opposite view vanishes completely and he becomes firmly convinced of the truth of that idea — and this firm conviction is called knowledge. If such a knowledge is concerned with some frightening affair, then his worry and disquiet will begin as soon as he reaches the third stage when he is only inclined to accept it — is only "thinking" that probably it may be true. This Qur'ãnic expression, in other words, says that man, for showing humbleness before Allãh, needs only to be aware of the idea that there is a Lord Whom he may return to after his death. In this context only a strong supposition should be enough to make him desist from disobeying his Lord; it would not be necessary, for this purpose, to reach the stage of firm knowledge. From this point of view, the verse looks almost similar to the verse: . . . therefore, whoever hopes to meet his Lord, he should do good deeds, and not join any one in the worship of his Lord (18:110).

The above discourse is based on the assumption that the words, "they shall meet their Lord . . ." refer to the Day of Resurrection. But if they are interpreted in another way (as we shall describe in Chapter 7), there should be no difficulty at all in its explanation.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Whenever `Ali (a.s.) faced a difficulty, he used to stand up for the prayer and then recite this verse: and seek assistance through patience and prayer." (al-Kãfī)

The same Imãm said about this verse: "The patience means fasting." Also he said: "When a man is confronted by a hard misfortune, he should fast. Surely Allãh says: and seek assistance through patience, that is, fast." (ibid.)

The author says: al-`Ayyãshi too has narrated the theme of these two traditions in his at-Tafsīr. Interpretation of "patience" as fast is based on the "flow" of the Qur'ãn.

Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) said about this verse: "The patience means fast; when a man is visited by a hardship or misfortune, he should fast; surely Allãh says: And seek assistance through patience and prayer; and most surely it is a hard thing except for the humble ones. And the humble one is he who shows humility in his prayer, turning all his attention to it; and it means the Messenger of Allãh (s. a. w. a.) and the Leader of the faithful (a.s.)." (al-`Ayyãshi)

The author says: The Imãm has inferred from this verse the desirability of fasting and praying when one is facing any hardship or turmoil; and likewise, the desirability of seeking the divine help through the medium of the Prophet and `Ali (a.s.) at that time. In this way, the tradition interprets the fast and the prayer as the Prophet and `Ali (a.s.) .

`Ali (a.s.) said about the verse, who know that they shall meet their Lord . . Allãh says that they are sure that they would be resurrected. And the supposition az-zann (الضَّنُ) here means certainty. (ibid.)

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadũq also has narrated this tradition.

al Bãqir (a.s.) said that this verse was revealed about All, `Uthman ibn Maz`un, `Ammar ibn Yasir and (some of) their friends. (al-Mandqib, Ibn Shahrashub)

O Children of Israel! call to mind My favour which I bestowed on you and that I made you excel the nation (47). And be on your guard against the day when one soul shall not avail another in the least; neither shall intercession on its behalf be accepted, nor shall any compensation be taken from it, nor shall they be helped (48).

QUR'ÃN: And be on your guard against the day when one soul shall not avail another in the least: The temporal power and authority, with all its various systems and varying conditions, is based on a necessity of life — the only justification of this institution is that it fulfils this need in the framework of the prevailing factors of the society. It some times exchanges a commodity for another, gives up a benefit for another, substitutes an order with another — without any hard and fast criterion to regulate such dispensations. The same phenomenon is observed in their judiciary. Logically, a crime must be recompensed with punishment. Yet some times the judge, because of some extraneous reasons, decides not to punish the criminal. Some times the criminal rouses in the judge an overwhelming feeling of pity by his passionate appeal for mercy. Or he wins him over by bribe which induces him to deliver an unjust judgement. Or an influential man intercedes with the judge on behalf of the said criminal and the judge cannot ignore that intercession. Or, the said criminal becomes a state witness leading to the conviction of even greater criminals, and is himself, thus, released without any punishment. Or his tribe or colleagues get him freed from the clutches of the authorities. Whatever the cause may be, it is a well-established custom in the worldly governments and human societies to let the wrong-doers go free at times.

The ancient tribes and the idol-worshippers believed that the life hereafter was an extension of this one; that the customs of this world were valid for that one too, and that the next world was permeated by the same actions and reactions which prevailed in this one. Thus they offered sacrifices and offerings to their deities seeking forgiveness for their sins or assistance in their needs; the offerings were supposed to intercede on their behalf. Some times a sin was expiated or help was sought by offering even a human sacrifice. They carried this idea of continuation of the life so far as to bury with a man all types of necessities of life, not forgetting his ornaments and arms, in order that he might use them on his onward journey; some times even his concubines and soldiers were buried alive with him to keep him company. You may see a lot of such finds in archaeological museums around the world. Some such ideas have persisted even among the Muslims — with all their diverse cultures and languages, albeit in modified forms.

The Qur'ãn has rejected all such superstitious beliefs and baseless ideas in no uncertain terms:

. . . and the command on that day shall be entirely Allãh's (82:19).

. . . and they see the chastisement and their ties are cut asunder (2:166).

And certainly you have come to Us alone as We created you at first, and you have left behind your backs the things which We gave you, and We do not see with you your intercessors about whom you asserted that they were (Allãh's) associates in respect to you; certainly the ties between you are now cut off and what you asserted is gone from you (6:94).

There shall every soul become acquainted with what is sent before, and they shall be brought back to Allãh, their true Master and what they did fabricate shall escape from them (10:30).

There are many similar verses; and they show that the life hereafter is cut off from the natural causes which govern this life, and is quite separate from material connections. Once this principle is understood all the above-mentioned myths would automatically be cleared away. But the Qur'ãn is not content with this general declaration; it refutes each and every myth and superstition described above:

> And be on your guard against the day when one soul shall not avail another in the least; neither shall intercession on its behalf be accepted, nor shall any compensation be taken from it, nor shall they be helped (12:48).
> . . . before the day comes in which there is no bargaining, neither any friendship nor intercession (2:254).
>
> The day on which a friend shall not avail (his) friend aught . . . (44:41).
>
> . . . there shall be no saviour for you from Allãh . . . (40:33).
> What is the matter with you that you do not help each other? Nay! on this day they are submissive (37:25-26).

And they worship beside Allãh what can neither harm them nor profit them, and they say: "These are our intercessors with Allãh." Say: "Do you (presume to) inform Allãh of what He knows not in the heavens and the earth?" Glory be to Him, and supremely exalted is He above what they set up with Him. (10: 18) .

. . . the unjust shall not have any friend nor any intercessors who should be obeyed (40:18).

So we have no intercessors, nor a true-friend (26:100-101).

There are many other verses of the same theme, all rejecting the intercession on the Day of Resurrection.

On the other hand, the Qur'ãn does not totally reject the intercession; rather it confirms it to a certain extent. For example, it says:

Allãh is He Who created the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six periods and He is firmly established on the throne; you have not besides Him any guardian or any intercessors; will you not then mind? (32:4)

. . . there is no guardian for them, nor any intercessor besides Him (6:51) .

Say: "Allãh's is the intercession altogether" (39:44).

. . . whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His; who is he that can intercede with Him but by His permission? He knows what is before them and what is behind them (2:255).

Surely your Lord is Allãh, Who created the heavens and the earth in six periods; and He is firmly established on the throne, regulating the affair; there is no intercessor except after His permission (10:3).

And they say; "The Beneficent God had taken to Himself a son." Glory be to Him! Nay! they are honoured servants; they do not precede Him in speech and (only) according to His commandment do they act. He knows what is before them and what is behind them, and they do not intercede except for whom He approves, and for fear of Him they tremble (21:26-28).

And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth, and they know (him) (43:86).

They shall have no authority for intercession, save he who has made a covenant with the Beneficent God (19:87). On that day shall no intercession avail except of him whom the Beneficent God allows and whose word He is pleased with. He knows what is before them and what is behind them, while they do not comprehend Him in knowledge (20:109-110)

And intercession will not avail aught with Him save of him whom He permits (34:23).

And how many an angel is there in the heavens whose inter-cession does not avail at all except after Allãh has given permission to whom He pleases and chooses (53:26) .

Some of these verses (like the first three) say that intercession is reserved for Allãh, while the rest declare that others too may intercede with Allãh's permission. In any case, all of them confirm the intercession per se. How are these verses related to the preceding ones which totally reject intercession? It is exactly the same relation that exists between the verses that say that the knowledge of unseen is reserved to Allãh and those which declare that others too may have that knowledge with the permission of Allãh. As Allãh says:

Say: "No one in the heaven and the earth knows the unseen but Allãh" (27:65).

And with Him are the keys of the unseen, does not know it any except He (6:59).

The Knower of the unseen! so He does not reveal His secrets to any, except to him whom He chooses of an apostle (72:27).

The same is the case with various verses on the subjects of creating, sustaining, giving death, causity, command, authority and similar things. Some verses reserve them for Allãh, while some say that others too may do these things. It is a well-known style of the Qur'ãn: first it rejects the idea that anyone other than Allãh has any virtue or perfection; thereafter it confirms the same virtue or perfection for others depending on the permission and pleasure of Allãh. When read together, the verses show that nobody has any virtue by his own power and right; whatever excellence there may be, he has got it because Allãh has given it to him. Allãh puts much emphasis to this fact; He attaches the proviso of His will even for those things which are firmly decreed by Him. For example: So as to those who are unhappy, they shall be in the fire; for them shall be sighing and groaning in it; abiding therein so long as the heavens and the earth endure, except as your Lord please; surely your Lord is the (mighty) doer of what He intends. And as to those who are made happy, they shall be in the garden, abiding in it as long as the heavens and the earth endure, except as your Lord please; a gift which shall never be cut off (11:106-108). Note that abiding for ever is made de-pendent on the pleasure of Allãh, even in case of the garden, although it is a gift which shall never be cut off. It emphasizes the fact that even when Allãh firmly decrees a thing, it does not pass out of His control or authority; surely your Lord is (mighty) doer of what He intends (11:107). When Allãh gives a thing, it does not go out of His total possession. When He denies some thing to someone, it is not done to protect Himself against any need or poverty!

In short, the verses that reject intercession — albeit talking about the Day of Resurrection — do so in the context of inter-cession independent of Allãh's authority; while the ones proving it, prove it basically for Allãh and then, depending on His pleasure, for others.

Thus the intercession is proved for other than Allãh with His permission.

Now we should see what is the meaning of intercession? Who may intercede? On behalf of whom? And when? How is it related to the divine forgiveness?

1. WHAT IS THE MEANING OF INTERCESSION?

"ash-Shafã'ah" (اَلشَّفَاعَةُ = intercession) is derived from "ash-shaf' "(اَلشَّفْعُ) which means "even" as opposed to odd — the interceder adds his own recommendation to the plea of the petitioner; in this way the number of pleaders becomes even, and the weak plea of the petitioner is strengthened by the prestige of the intercessor. We are accustomed in our social and communal life to seek others' intercession and help for fulfilling our needs. We resort to it to get an advantage or to ward off a disadvantage. Here we are not talking about an advantage or a disadvantage, a benefit or a harm that is caused by natural causes, like hunger and thirst, heat or cold, illness or health; because in such cases we get what we want through its natural remedies, like eating and drinking, wearing clothes, getting treatment and so on. What we are talking here about is the benefit and harm, punishment and reward resulting from the social laws made by civil authorities. Rising from the very relationship of mastership-and-servitude — and for that matter, between every ruler and ruled — there are some commandments, orders and prohibitions; one who follows and obeys them is praised and rewarded, and the one who disobeys is condemned and punished; that reward or punishment may be either material or spiritual. When a master orders his servant to do or not to do a thing, and the servant obeys him he gets its reward; and if he disobeys he is punished. Whenever a rule is made, the punishment for its infringement is laid down too. This is the foundation which all the authorities are built upon.

When a man wants to get a material or spiritual benefit but is not suitably qualified for it; or when he desires to ward off a harm which is coming to him because of his disobedience, but has no shield to protect himself, then comes the time for intercession.

In other words, when he wants to get a reward without doing his task, or to save himself from punishment without per-forming his duty, then he looks for someone to intercede on his behalf. But intercession is effective only if the person for whom one intercedes is otherwise qualified to get the reward and has already established a relationship with the authority. If an ignorant person desires appointment to a prestigious academic post, no intercession can do him any good; nor can it avail in case of a rebellious traitor who shows no remorse for his misdeeds and does not submit to the lawful authorities. It clearly shows that intercession works as a supplement to the cause; it is not an independent cause.

The effect of an intercessor's words depends on one or the other factor which may have some influence upon the concerned authority; in other words, intercession must have a solid ground to stand upon. The intercessor endeavours to find a way to the heart of the authority concerned, in order that the said authority may give the reward to, or waive the punishment of, the person who is the subject of intercession. An intercessor does not ask the master to nullify his mastership or to release the servant from his servitude; nor does he plead with him to refrain from laying down rules and regulations for his servants or to abrogate his commandments (either generally or especially in that one case), in order to save the wrong-doer from the due consequences; nor does he ask him to discard the canon of reward and punishment, (either generally or in that particular case). In short, intercession can interfere with neither the institution of mastership and servantship nor the master's authority to lay down the rules; nor can it effect the system of reward and punishment. These three factors are beyond the jurisdiction of intercession.

What an intercessor does is this: He accepts the inviolability of the above-mentioned three aspects. Then he looks at one or more of the following factors and builds his intercession on that basis:

a. He appeals to such attributes of the master as give rise to forgiveness, e.g., his nobility, magnanimity and generosity.

b. He draws attention to such characteristics of the servant as justify mercy and pardon, e.g., his wretchedness, poverty, low status and misery.

c. He puts at stake his own prestige and honour in the eyes of the master.

Thus, the import of intercession is like this: I cannot and do not say that you should forget your mastership over your servant or abrogate your commandment or nullify the system of reward and punishment. What I ask of you is to forgive this defaulting servant of yours because you are magnanimous and generous, and because no harm would come to you if you forgive his sins; and/or because your servant is a wretched creature of low status and steeped in misery; and it is befitting of a master like you to ignore the faults of a slave like him; and/or because you have bestowed on me a high prestige, and I implore you to forgive and pardon him in honour of my intercession.

The intercessor, in this way, bestows precedence on the factors of forgiveness and pardon over those of legislation and recompense. He removes the case from the latter's jurisdiction putting it under former's influence. As a result of this shift, the consequences of legislation (reward and punishment) do not remain applicable. The effect of intercession is, therefore, based on shifting the case from the jurisdiction of reward and punishment to that of pardon and forgiveness; it is not a confrontation between one cause (divine legislation) and the other (intercession).

By now it should have been clear that intercession too is one of the causes; it is the intermediate cause that connects a distant cause to its desired effect.

Allãh is the ultimate Cause. This causality shows itself in two ways:

First: In creation: Every cause begins from Him and ends up to Him; He is the first and the final Cause. He is the real Creator and Originator. All other causes are mere channels to carry His boundless mercy and limitless bounty to His creatures.

Second: In legislation: He, in His mercy, established a con-tact with His creatures; He laid down the religion, sent down His commandments, and prescribed suitable reward and appropriate punishment for His obedient and disobedient servants; He sent prophets and apostles to bring us good tidings and to warn us of the consequences of transgression. The prophets and apostles conveyed to us His message in the best possible way. Thus His proof over us was complete: and the word of your Lord has been accomplished with truth and justice, there is none to change His words. . . (6:115).

Both aspects of causality of Allãh may be, and in fact are, related to intercession.

1. Intercession in creation: Quite obviously the intermediary causes of creation are the conduits that bring the divine mercy, life, sustenance and other bounties to the creatures; and as such they are intercessors between the Creator and the created. Some Qur'ãnic verses too are based on this very theme: whatever, is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His; who is he that can intercede with Him but by His permission (2:255); Surely your Lord is Allãh, who created the heavens and the earth in six periods, and He is firmly established on throne, regulating the affair; there is no intercessor except after His permission (10:3).

Intercession in the sphere of creation is only the intermediation of causes between the Creator and the created thing and effect, in bringing it into being and regulating its affairs.

2. Intercession in legislation: Intercession, as analysed earlier, is effective in this sphere too. It is in this context that Allãh says: On that day shall no intercession avail except of him whom the Beneficent God allows and whose word He is pleased with (20:109); And intercession will not avail aught with Him save of him whom He permits (34:23); And how many an angel is there in the heavens whose intercession does not avail at all except after Allãh has given permission to whom He pleases and chooses (53:26); . . . and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves. . . (21:28); And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (him) (43:86). These verses clearly affirm intercessory role for various servants of Allãh — both men and angels — with divine permission and pleasure. It means that Allãh has given them some power and authority in this matter, and to Him belongs all the kingdom and all the affairs. Those intercessors may appeal to Allãh's mercy, forgiveness and other relevant attributes to cover and protect a servant who other-wise would have deserved punishment because of his sins and transgressions. That intercession would transfer his case from the general law of recompense to the special domain of grace and mercy. (It has already been explained that the effect of inter-cession is based on shifting a case from the former's to the latter's jurisdiction; it is not a confrontation between one law and the other.) Allãh clearly says: . . . so these are they of whom Allãh changes the evil deeds to good ones (25:70). Allãh has the power to change one type of deed into other, in the same way as He may render an act null and void. He says: And We will proceed to what they have done of deeds, so We shall render them as scattered floating dust (25:23); . . . so He rendered their deeds null (47:9); If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins (4:31); Surely Allãh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases (4:48). The last quoted verse is certainly about the cases other than true belief and repentance, because with belief and repentance even polytheism is forgiven, like any other sin. Also Allãh may nurture a small deed to make it greater than the original: These shall be granted their reward twice (28:54); Whoever brings a good deed, he shall have ten like it (6:160). Likewise, He may treat a non-existent deed as existing: And (as for) those who believe and their offspring follow them in faith, We will unite with them their off-spring and We will not diminish to them aught of their work; every man is responsible for what he has done (52:21).

To make a long story short, Allãh does what He please, and decrees as He wills. Of course, He does so pursuant to His servants' interest, and in accordance with an intermediary cause — and intercession of the intercessors (e.g., the prophets, the friends of Allãh and those who are nearer to Him) is one of those causes, and certainly no rashness or injustice is entailed therein.

It should have been clear by now that intercession, in its true sense, belongs to Allãh only; all His attributes are intermediaries between Him and His creatures and are the channels through which His grace, mercy and decrees pass to the creatures; He is the real and all-encompassing intercessor: Say: "Allãh's is the intercession altogether" (39:44); . . . you have not besides Him any guardian or any intercessor (32:4); . . . there is no guardian for them nor any intercessor besides Him (6:51). The intercessors, other than Allãh, get that right by His permission, by His authority.

In short, intercession with Him is a confirmed reality — in cases where it does not go against the divine glory and honour.

2. THE OBJECTIONS AGAINST INTERCESSION

Intercession, as explained above, is a confirmed reality — not in every case but in approved ones. The Qur'ãn and the traditions do not prove more than this. A little meditation on the meaning of intercession is enough to lead to this conclusion. Intercession is mediation in causality and effectiveness. Obviously causality cannot be limitless and unconditional. No cause can be a cause of every effect, nor can an effect be governed by every cause — otherwise it would render the system of cause and effect null and void. Those who do not believe in intercession have fallen in this very trap — they thought that we affirm the intercession in its totality without any condition or limit. All their objections emanates from this very misunderstanding:

First Objection: Allãh has threatened to punish the wrong-doer; now supposedly He waives the punishment on the Day of Judgement. The question is whether this waiver is justice or in-justice. If it is justice, then the original promise of punishment would be injustice, quite unworthy of divine majesty; and if it is injustice, then the intercession of the prophets, for example, would be a plea for injustice, and it is a folly that should not be attributed to the prophets.

Reply — First: What will they say about those orders that are given only to test the loyalty of a servant and are changed at the last moment, like the order to Ibrãhīm to kill Ismã'īl? Surely its waiver too like the original order was based on justice. Such orders are given only to test the hidden quality of the servant concerned. Likewise, it may be said that salvation is written for all the believers. The laws of the shari`ah were ordained — with punishments prescribed for transgressors — in order that the disbelievers should perish because of their disbelief. As for the obedient believers their rank would be enhanced by their good deeds. And as for the disobedient believers, they would be rescued by intercession: that intercession might be effective either totally or partially; in later case, they would have to suffer some of the punishments in al-Barzakh or on the Day of Judgement itself and then they would get deliverance.

Thus the original law with the prescribed punishment for the defaulters is nothing but justice, and, the subsequent waiver of that punishment too is nothing but justice.

Second: The waiver of the prescribed punishment as a result of intercession could be compared with the previous order — in being based on justice or injustice — only if that waiver were a contradiction of the previous order. But we have explained that it is not so. Intercession is not a contradiction of, or confrontation between one cause (divine legislation) and the other (intercession); it is in fact shifting his case from one jurisdiction (reward and punishment) to the other (mercy and forgiveness).

Second Objection: It is the established practice of Allãh, that His actions are always safe from contradiction and conflict. Whatever He decrees and orders, without any exception, runs on an established pattern. And this is the foundation which the system of cause and effect has been built upon. Allãh says: This is a straight path with Me, Surely, as regards My servants, thou hast no authority over them except those who follow thee of the deviators. And surely Hell is the promised place of them all (15:41- 43); And (know) that this is My path, the straight one, therefore, follow it, and follow not (other) ways, for they will scatter you away from His way (6:153); For you shall not find any alteration in the course of Allãh; and you shall not find any change in the course of Allãh (35:43). And intercession, if effective, would certainly create conflict and contradiction in the actions of Allãh: If intercession caused waiver of punishment from all the sinners, of all their sins, then it would defeat the very purpose of the shari`ah and would turn the whole system into a joke. And if only some of the sinners, or only some of their sins were forgiven, then there would occur contradiction in divine actions and change and alteration in Allãh's established course. Certainly, all the sinners are transgressors and every sin is disobedience of divine command. Therefore, forgiving only some of them or only some of their sins, because of intercession, would be impossible.

Intercession is used in this life of ours, where people are influenced by their desires or social connections. It cannot work in the affairs of the shari`ah nor can it influence the divine judgement in any way.

Reply: No one doubts that the path of Allãh is straight and His course without any change or conflict. But it should not be forgotten that this one and unchanged course is based on all His relevant attributes, not on only one or two of them.
Allãh is the One Who bestows on every creature diverse things like life, death, sustenance, bounty and so on. These are the decrees that are contradictory or unrelated to each other; they do not have the same connection with the issuing authority i.e. God. Otherwise the relationship of cause and effect would become null and void. For example, Allãh does not restore a sick man to health by virtue of His death-giving power; rather He does so because He is Merciful, Benevolent, Giver of health and Bestower of bounties. Likewise, He does not destroy an arrogant tyrant by His mercy and beneficence, but because He is the Avenger, the Omnipotent and the Subduer. The Qur'ãn is the best witness of this fact: Whenever it ascribes an event or affair to Him, it invariably always mentions the appropriate attribute by which that affair or event was decreed and managed.

You may say that every affair and every thing is decreed by Allãh because of its underlying benefit and good. And He does whatever He does by His all relevant attributes, and not by only one or some of them. There is always action and reaction between benefits and good of various courses of a certain affair; and Allãh issues His decree as a result of His knowledge that encompasses all those aspects; His vision is not limited to one or two sides only. Had there been one fixed cause or attribute, there would have been no change or difference between a believer and a non-believer, between a pious person and a debauchee; but there are numerous causes and attributes, and their sum-total often has effects quite different from the effect of its individual parts.

Therefore, intercession, and the consequent waiver of punishment — based on sum-total of numerous causes like mercy, pardon, judgement, and giving everyone his due right — does not entail any change in the established course, nor any deviation from the right path.

Third Objection: Intercession, according to common under-standing, prevails upon the authority to do against his original will. In other words, the original will is abrogated and changed because of the intercessor. A just judge would never accept an intercession unless his knowledge is changed, e.g., his original judgement was wrong, and then he was made to realize that justice demanded a course opposite to his original plan. An unjust judge would accept intercession of his friends knowing fully well that the course suggested was wrong; but he values his personal relations more than the demands of justice and equity. Obviously, both these alternatives are impossible so far as Allãh is concerned; His will is related to His knowledge, and His knowledge is eternal and unchangeable.

Reply: Intercession has nothing to do with change of will or knowledge. What actually changes is the thing willed about or known. Allãh knows that a certain man will pass through various stages in his life; for a time his condition will be excellent — and Allãh wills about him a certain will; and He knows that later his condition will change — and He wills about him another will; and every day He is in a (new) state (of glory). And He has said: Allãh effaces what He pleases and establishes (likewise), and with Him is the basis of the Book (13:39); Nay, both His hands are spread out, He expends as He pleases (6:64). The same happens with our knowledge and will. We know that soon night will come and we will not be able to see in darkness, but a few hours later the sun will rise dispelling the darkness. When night comes our will is directed to light a lamp, and later when the morning comes the will is directed to extinguish that lamp. In this case, there was no change at all in our knowledge and will; what changed was the objects of that knowledge and will. And consequently they ceased to be governed by that knowledge and that will. After all, not every knowledge is related to every known object, nor every will is connected to every purpose.

What is impossible for Allãh is disagreement of His knowledge with the thing known, or of His will with its object — while that thing or object remains unchanged. In other words, it is impossible for Him to be mistaken in His knowledge or for His will to be ineffective. We see an apparition far away and take it to be a man; on coming nearer we find that it was a horse. In this case, our "knowledge" did not agree with its object; it was a mistake.

Likewise, we intend to do a certain work, then we realize that it would be wrong to do so; here our "will" was cancelled and became ineffective. But in these cases the objects of our knowledge and will had not changed. Such "disagreement" is certainly impossible for Allãh. But as we have seen, intercession and the subsequent waiver of punishment does not come into this category.

Fourth Objection: Had Allãh promised intercession, or had His prophets brought this message to their nations, the people would have been emboldened to disobey the commandments of Allãh, and to transgress the limits of the sharī`ah. It would have defeated the whole purpose behind the institutions of prophet-hood and religion. If we are to avoid this inherent difficulty, we shall have to interpret the relevant Qur'ãnic verses and traditions in a way that does not collide with this basic concept.

Reply — First: What will they say about the verses showing that Allãh's mercy and forgiveness is all-encompassing? For example: Surely Allãh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases (4:48). This verse, as explained earlier, covers the cases other than repentance, as the exception of polytheism shows — because in cases of repentance even polytheism may be forgiven.

Second: The promise or message of intercession could incite people to disregard the rules of the shari`ah, if it were accompanied by one of the following factors:

1. If it had pin-pointed either the sinner — by name or description — who was to be forgiven through intercession; or the particular sin that was to be wiped off — unconditionally, definitely and without any ambiguity.

2. Or, if intercession were effective against all types of punishment and at all times.

Read the following sentences to understand what the above conditions mean:

"All men, or a named group of men, will never be held responsible for any sins they commit; nor will they ever be punished for their transgressions."

"A particularly named sin will never be punished for."

Obviously, such declarations would defeat the basic purpose of the sharī`ah.

But Allãh has kept both things vague. He has never said what sins or which sinners might benefit from intercession, nor has He said whether all or only some of the punishment would be waived; nor has He made it clear whether or not the intercession would be effective in every condition and at all times. As all these things have been kept vague, no one could be sure of getting the benefit of intercession. In view of this uncertainty, he cannot feel bold to trespass the limits of Allãh. On the other hand the possibility of intercession would save him from losing the hope of divine mercy, will keep him away from despair and despondency, from pessimism and hopelessness. Then there is the verse: If you avoid great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins . . . (4:31). It clearly says that Allãh will forgive small sins and waive the punishment, provided the servant shuns great sins. If Allãh can say, "If you avoid great-sins, I shall forgive the small ones", He can as easily say, "If you keep your belief pure until you come to Me with unpolluted faith, I shall accept the intercession of intercessors on your behalf." The important thing is to keep the faith strong; the sins weaken the faith, harden the heart and lead to polytheism. Allãh has said: But none feels secure from Allãh's plan except the people who shall perish (7:99); Nay! rather what they used to do has become like rust upon their hearts (83:14); Then evil was the end of those who did evil, because they rejected the signs of Allãh . . . (30:10) .

The hope of divine mercy (generated by the belief of intercession), in many cases, leads to repentance, piety and good deeds — and often the servant reaches a stage where intercession is not needed after all. It is in fact the most important benefit of this belief.

Likewise, if it were mentioned who would benefit from intercession or which sins were likely to be interceded about, but it was declared that it would nevertheless entail some types of punishment upto a certain period, the man could not feel bold to commit sins.

And the fact is that the Qur'ãn has nowhere pin-pointed the sin or the sinner likely to benefit from intercession. On the contrary, it speaks only of reverting the punishment from some people. And no objection can be levelled against such a vague expression.

Fifth Objection: Utmost that reason may prove is the possibility, and not the actuality, of intercession — in fact, it does not prove even that much. So far as the Qur'ãn is concerned, it does not show that intercession will actually take place. Some verses refute the idea of intercession altogether, e.g., . . . the day comes in which there is no bargaining, neither any friendship nor intercession (2:254). Other verses say that intercession shall be of no avail, e.g., So the intercession of intercessors shall not avail them (74:48). Still others, after refuting the actuality of intercession, add the proviso like, but by His permission (2:255), except after His permission (10:3), except for him whom He approves (21:28). This style (a negative followed by exception of divine permission or approval) is used in the Qur'ãn invariably always to emphasize the negative statement; for example, it says: We will make you recite so you shall not forget, except what Allãh pleases (87:6-7); Abiding therein so long as the heavens and the earth endure, except as your Lord pleases (11:107). Obviously, there is no definite declaration in the Qur'ãn proving the actuality of intercession. As for the traditions, those giving its details are not reliable; and the reliable ones do not say more than the Qur'ãn does.

Reply: As for the verses refuting the intercession we have already explained that what they reject is the intercession without the permission of Allãh. The verse 74:48, which says that "the intercession of intercessors shall not avail them", is not a proof against intercession; on the contrary it proves its actuality. The verse is in the Chapter, "The Clothed One" and speaks about "them", i.e., a particular group of wrong-doers mentioned in verses 41 to 47; it is they who shall not benefit from the inter-cession of intercessors; it does not speak about all the sinners. Moreover, it uses the phrase, "the intercession of intercessors". There is a difference between saying, "Intercession shall not avail them", and saying, "Intercession of intercessors shall not avail them". When an infinitive verb or verbal noun is used in genitive or possessive case, it proves its actual existence, as ash-Shaykh `Abdu '1-Qãhir has clearly written in Dalãilu 'l-i`jãz. Therefore, the expression, "intercession of intercessors" proves that some intercession shall definitely take place on that day, although that particular group shall not be able to benefit from it. Also, the plural, "intercessors" points to the presence of a group of intercessors.

Look for example at the phrases: she was of those who remained behind (7:83); and he was one of the unbelievers (2:34); so he is of those who go astray (7:175); My covenant does not include the unjust ones (2:124). The plurals in all these phrases would have been irrelevant if they did not mean existence of more than two persons having the attributes mentioned. Like-wise, the verse: So the intercession of intercessors shall not avail them, instead of refuting the intercession, clearly proves the existence of intercessors and, therefore, intercession. As for the verses that contain the exceptions, "but by His permission", "except after His permission", they clearly prove the actuality of intercession, especially as the infinitive verb "permission" is used in genitive case (His permission). No one having a taste of Arabic literature can entertain any doubt about it.

It is childish to say that the two phrases, "but by His permission" and "except for him whom He approves" mean the same thing, i.e., the divine will. Moreover, the Qur'ãn has used various phrases of exception in various places, e.g., "but by His permission", "except after His permission", "except for him whom He approves" and "but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (him)". Even if we accept that the divine permission and divine approval mean the same thing, i.e., divine will, can it be said that the last-mentioned phrase (but he who bears witness of the truth . . .) too implies the same? Such interpretation implies such inexactness and laxity in talk as even an ordinary Arab would not like attributed to him, let alone an eloquent one. Can we accuse the most eloquent divine speech, i.e., the Qur'ãn, of such inarticulateness?

As for the traditions, we shall show later that they too follow the line adopted by the Qur'ãn.

Sixth Objection: The verses do not say clearly that on the Day of Judgement, the punishment would be averted from the wrong-doers, after the sin has been proved and the sentence pronounced. The intercession attributed to the prophets means that they were the intermediaries between the Lord and His servant, they received revelation from their Lord and conveyed it to the people and guided them to the right path, leading them to spiritual and ethical perfection. In this sense, they are the intercessors for the believers in this world as well as in the hereafter.

Reply: No doubt, it is one of the aspects of intercession; but intercession is not limited to this much. The prophets called their people to the true faith and repentance, and this is the inter-cession mentioned by the objector. Now let us look again at the verse: Surely Allãh does not forgive that any thing should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases (4:48). As described earlier, this verse covers the cases other than the true faith and repentance. (True faith and repentance would wipe out the polytheism too.) The exception of polytheism shows that here the talk is about other things — and intercession, in the meaning explained by us, is one of those cases.

Seventh Objection: Reason does not prove that intercession really exists; and the Qur'ãnic verses on this subject are ambiguous — in one place they prove it, at others refute it; sometimes they add some proviso, at the other they speak unconditionally. Therefore, the ethics of religion demands that we should believe in all of them and leave their meaning to Allãh.

Reply: The ambiguous verses, when referred to the decisive ones, become decisive themselves. It is an easy process which is not beyond our ability and power. We shall explain this subject when writing about the verse: of it there are some verses decisive, they are the basis of the Book, and others are ambiguous . . . (3:7).

3. WHO WILL BENEFIT FROM INTERCESSION?

As explained earlier, it was not in the best interest of religious guidance to pin-point who should benefit from intercession on the Day of Judgement. But vague hints and ambiguous statements can do no harm, and the Qur'ãn has used them to give us a general idea. Allãh says: Every soul is held in pledge for what it has earned, except the people of the right hand, in gardens; they shall ask each other about the guilty: "What has brought you into hell?" They shall say: "We were not of those who prayed; and we used not to feed the poor; and we used to enter (into vain discourse) with those who entered (into vain discourse); and we used to call the Day of Judgement a lie, till death overtook us." So the intercession of intercessors shall not avail them (74:38-48). The verses declare that every soul shall remain mortgaged on the Day of Judgement for the sins it has earned, held responsible for the wrongs done in this life. The only exception is of the people of the right hand — they shall be released from that pledge, and shall settle in the gardens. They shall see the wrong-doers who shall be held captive of their sins, and herded into hell; they shall ask them for the reason of their entering into hell, and the guilty shall reply by enumerating four sins as the cause of their disgrace and punishment. And because of those sins, they shall lose the benefit of the intercession of intercessors.

It implies that the people of the right hand would be free from those sins which deprive a man of the benefit of intercession. Allãh shall release them from the fetters of sins and wrongs; and this release shall be as a result of the intercession of intercessors.

The verses are a part of the Chapter 74, (The Clothed One); it was revealed at Mecca at the beginning of the Call, as its con-tents amply prove. At that time the prayer and zakãt as known to us were not promulgated. In this context the prayer, mentioned in the verse, "We were not of those who prayed", could only mean turning one's face towards Allãh with humility and submission; likewise, the verse, "and we used not to feed the poor," could only refer to general spending on the poor in the way of Allãh. al-Khawḍ (الخَوْضُ = translated here as entering into vain discourse) literally means to wade into water, to plunge or rush into something. The verse, "we used to enter (into vain discourse). . .", implies entanglement in the vain things of this life, which distract a man from remembrance of the hereafter; it may also mean vilification of the verses which remind one of the Day of Reckoning.

Those wrong-doers, therefore, shall be guilty of four sins: (1) Not turning their faces towards Allãh with humility and sub-mission; (2) not spending in the way of Allãh; (3) vilification of divine revelations; and (4) calling the Day of Judgement a lie. These four evils destroy the foundation of religion. Religion demands following the purified guides, setting one's face towards Allãh, turning away from the worldly distractions, setting one's eyes on the Day of Judgement. If a man succeeds in it, he will be free from the third and the fourth sins, i.e., vilification of divine revelation and calling the Day of Judgement a lie. When, in this way, his fundamental belief is secured, he shall feel the urge to turn towards Allãh and to help fellow human beings. These two factors are represented in these verses by prayer and spending in the way of Allãh. Faith and deed all would thus combine to build the structure of religion. Other elements, like belief in Oneness of God and the prophethood, would naturally follow.

The people of the right hand are the ones who shall benefit from the intercession; and they are the ones whose religion and faith Allãh is pleased with. They may come on the Day of Judgement with perfect deeds — and in that case there will be no need for any intercession; or they may come burdened with some sins — and it is they who shall benefit from the intercession. Therefore, the intercession shall be for those people of the right hand who may have committed some sins.

Allãh says: If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins (4:31). Therefore, anybody coming on the Day of Judgement with an unexpiated sin shall certainly be guilty of a great sin — had it been a small one it would have been expiated long ago. We have to conclude from this verse that the intercession shall be for those people of the right hand who shall be guilty of great sins.

The Prophet has said: "Verily my intercession is for those of my ummah who shall have committed great sins; as for the good-doers, there shall be no difficulty for them . . ."

The designation, "the people of the right hand", is the opposite of "the people of the left hand". These Qur'ãnic terms are based on the fact that man, on the Day of Judgement, shall be given his book of deeds either in his right hand or in the left. Allãh says: (Remember) the day when We will call every people with their Imãm; then whoever is given his book in his right hand, these shall read their book; and they shall not be dealt with a whit unjustly. And whoever is blind in this, he shall (also) be blind in the hereafter; and more erring from the way (17:71-72). We shall describe, when writing about this verse, that getting the book in the right hand is synonymous with following the rightful Imãm; likewise getting the book in the left hand means following a misguiding leader or Imãm. Allãh says about Pharaoh: He shall lead his people on the resurrection day, and bring them down to the-fire (11:98). It means that not only the required four qualities but even the nomenclature, "the people of the right hand", is based on the fact that they followed an approved religion, that Allãh was pleased with them.

Allãh says in another place: and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves (21:28). This approval is general and without any condition or qualification. It is not like the one mentioned in verse: . . . except of him whom the Beneficent God allows and whose word He is pleased with (20:109), where approval or pleasure is related to a servant's word. In the verse under discussion the pleasure or approval is related to them, not to their deed; in other words, "whom He approves" means 'whose religion he approves'. Accordingly this verse too has the same import as the previous ones.

Again Allãh says: The day on which We will gather the pious ones to the Beneficent God as the guests of honour, and We will drive the guilty to hell like (thirsty) herd (to the watering place). They shall own not any intercession, save he who has made a covenant with the Beneficent God (19:85-87). The one who has made a covenant with Allãh shall be given possession of intercession. It should not be forgotten that not every guilty servant is an unbeliever. Allãh says: Whoever comes to his Lord (being) guilty, for him is surely hell; he shall not die therein nor shall he live; and whoever comes to Him a believer (and) he has done good deeds indeed, these it is who shall have the high ranks (20:74-75). According to these verses, anyone who is not a good-doing believer is guilty, no matter whether he is an unbeliever or a wrong-doing believer. The latter group, i.e., those who have true belief but have also committed sins, is the one that has made a covenant with God. Allãh says: Did I not enjoin you (make a covenant with you), O children of Adam! that you should not worship the Satan? Surely he is your open enemy, and that you should worship Me; this is the straight path (36:60 -61). The phrase, "and that you should worship Me", is a covenant in the meaning of order, enjoinment; and the sentence, "this is the straight path", is also a covenant by implication because the straight path leads to felicity and safety. However, such believers shall enter the hell because of sins they had committed, then they shall be rescued by intercession. It is to this covenant that the verse 2:80 alludes: (The Jews) say: "Fire shall not touch us but for a few days." Say: "Have you received a promise (covenant) from Allãh?" These verses too, therefore, lead us to the same conclusion, namely, the group that shall benefit from intercession on the Day of Judgement is that of the believers who would have committed great sins; it is they whose religion and belief Allãh is pleased with and has approved.

4. WHO ARE THE INTERCESSORS?

It has been described that intercession takes place in two spheres: in creation and in legislation. So far as the intercession in creation is concerned, all intermediary causes are intercessors because they are placed between the Creator and the created.

As for the intercessors in the sphere of legislation and judgement, they may be divided into two categories: (1) intercessors in this life, and (2) those in the hereafter.

Intercessors in this life: All the things that bring a man nearer to Allãh and make him eligible for divine forgiveness. The following come into this category:

a. Repentance: Allãh says: Say: "O my servants! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allãh; surely Allãh forgives the faults altogether; surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. And return to your Lord . . . " (39:53-54). It covers all the sins, even polytheism; if one repents from it and believes in One God, one's previous poly-theism is wiped out and forgiven.

b. True faith: Allãh says: O you who believe! fear Allãh and believe in His Apostle: He will give you two portions of His mercy, and make for you a light with which you will walk, and forgive you . . . (57:28).

c. Good deed: Allãh has promised those who believe and do good deeds (that there is) for them pardon and great recompense (5:9); O you who believe! fear Allãh and seek an approach (medium) to Him . . . (5:35). There are many verses of this theme.

d. The Qur'ãn: Indeed has come to you from Allãh a light and a manifest Book whereby Allãh guides him who follows His pleasure, into the ways of peace, and takes them out from darkness towards the light by His will and guides them to the straight path (5:16).

e. Any thing related to a good deed, like the mosques, holy places and auspicious days.

f. The prophets and the apostles, as they seek forgiveness for their people. Allãh says: and had they, when they were unjust to themselves, come to you and asked forgiveness of Allãh, and the Apostle had (also) asked forgiveness for them, they would have found Allãh oft-returning (to mercy) , Merciful (4:64) .

g. The angels, as they too ask forgiveness for the believers. Allãh says: Those who bear the throne and those around it celebrate the praise of their Lord and believe in Him and ask forgiveness for those who believe (40:7); . . . and the angels celebrate the praise of their Lord and ask forgiveness for those on earth . . . (42:5).

h. The believers themselves, as they seek pardon for their believer brothers and for themselves. Allãh quotes them as saying: and pardon us, and forgive us, and have mercy on us, Thou art our Guardian . . . (2:286).

Intercessors in the hereafter: We use the term, intercessor, in the meaning explained in the beginning. The following come into this category:

a. The prophets and the apostles: Allãh says: And they say: "The Beneficent God has taken to Himself a son." Glory be to Him. Nay! they are honoured servants; they do not precede Him in speech and (only) according to His commandment do they act. He knows what is before them and what is behind them, and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves . . . (21:26-28). Those who were called 'son' of God, are in fact His honoured servants and they do intercede for him whom He approves. Among them is 'Īsã, son of Maryam, and he was a prophet. It means that the prophets do intercede for approved persons.

Again Allãh says: And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for (or, do not own) intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (him) (43:86).

b. The angels: The preceding two verses prove that the angels too may intercede, because they too were called daughters of Allãh. Moreover, Allãh says: And how many an angel is there in the heavens whose intercession does not avail at all except after Allãh has given permission to whom He pleases and chooses (53:26); On that day shall no intercession avail except of him whom the Beneficent God allows and whose word He is pleased with. He knows what is before them and what is behind them . . . (20:109 - 110).

The witnesses: Allãh says: And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for (or, do not own) intercession, but he who bears witness of truth and they know (him) (43:86). This verse shows that those -who bear witness of the truth do own (or, have authority for) intercession. The witness mentioned here does not mean the one killed in the battlefield. It refers to the witness for the deeds, as was described in the Chapter of the Opening, and will be further explained under the verse: And thus we have made you a medium (i.e. just) nation that you may be witnesses over the people and (that) the Apostle may be a witness over you . . . (2:143).

d. The believers: They shall be joined to the witnesses on the Day of Judgement; it follows that they too may intercede like the witnesses. Allãh says: And (as for) those who believe in Allãh and His apostles, these it is that are the truthful and the witnesses with their Lord . . . (57:19).

5. INTERCESSION: ABOUT WHAT?

The intercession in creation is related to every cause in this world of the cause and effect.

As for the intercession in matters of legislation and judgement, some of them wipe out every sin and its punishment, right from polytheism to the smallest one. For example, repentance done, and true faith acquired, before the Day of Resurrection. Some wipe out effects of some particular sins, like some specified good deeds. As for the issue under discussion, i.e., the intercession of the prophets and other believers on the Day of Judgement, we have already explained that it shall avail those believers who might have committed big sins, but whose faith Allãh is pleased with.

6. WHEN WILL INTERCESSION BE EFFECTED?

We are talking here too about the intercession on the Day of Judgement to waive off the punishment of sins. We have earlier quoted the verses of the Chapter 42 (The Clothed One): Every soul is held in pledge for what it has earned, except the people of the right hand, in gardens they shall ask each other about the guilty (74:38-41). As explained earlier, the verses clearly say who would benefit from the intercession, and who wont. They also imply that the intercession will get the wrongdoing believers released from fetters of their sins, and protect them from abiding for ever in the hell.

But there is nothing to show that intercession might avail against the turmoils of the Day of Resurrection. Rather, the verse proves that it will be effective only for rescuing the guilty believers from the hell, or preventing them from entering into it.

It may be inferred from the verses that this talk will take place after the people of the garden have settled in the gardens, and the people of the hell in the hell; and that the intercessors shall then intercede for a group of the guilty ones and rescue them from the hell. The phrase, "in gardens", implies it, as does the question, "What has brought you into hell?" Both phrases imply a more or less permanent abode. Likewise, the comment, "so the intercession . . . avails them not", denotes something occurring in present time i.e. after both groups have settled in their abodes.

As for al-Barzakh (البَرْزَخُ = the period between death and the Day of Resurrection) and presence of the Prophet and the Imãms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) at the time of death and at the questioning in the grave and the help given by them to the believer to overcome those difficulties (as will be described under the verse: And there shall not be any one of the people of the book but he must certainly believe in him before his death (4:159), these things have nothing to do with intercession. It is rather exercising the authority given to them by Allãh over the creation. Allãh says: . . . and on the most elevated places there shall be men who know all by their marks, and they shall call out to the dwellers of the garden: "Peace be on you; they shall not have yet entered it, though they hope". . And the dwellers of the most elevated places shall call out to men whom they will recognize by their marks, saying: "Of no avail were to you your amassings and your behaving haughtily. Are these they about whom you swore that Allãh will not bestow mercy on them?" "Enter the garden; you shall have no fear nor shall you grieve" (7:46-49). It gives a glimpse of The authority or rule vested in them by the permission of Allãh. If we look at the verse 17:71 from this angle, it too throws light on this aspect: (Remember) the day when We will call every people with their Imãm; then whoever is given his book in his right hand . . . The intermediary position of the Imãm in calling every people and giving them their books is a sort of authority and rule vested in him by Allãh.

To make a long story short, intercession shall happen at the very last stage on the Day of Judgement; it shall bring the divine forgiveness to the guilty believers, prevent them from entering into hell and take those out who would have entered into it; it shall be by extension of mercy and/or manifestation of benevolence and magnanimity.

TRADITIONS

al-Ḥusayn ibn Khãlid narrates from ar-Riḍã (a.s.), who narrated through his forefathers from the Leader of the faithful (a.s.) that he said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Whoever does not believe in my reservoir, may Allãh not bring him to my reservoir, and whoever does not believe in my inter-cession, may Allãh not extend to him my intercession.' Then he (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Verily, my intercession is for those of my ummah who shall have committed great sins; as for the good-doers, there shall be no difficulty for them.' " al-Ḥusayn ibn Khalid said: "I asked ar-Riḍã (a.s.): 'O son of the Messenger of Allãh! what is then the meaning of the words of Allãh, Mighty and Great is He: and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves?' He (a.s.) said: 'They do not intercede except for him whose religion Allãh is pleased with.' " (al-Amãli, as-Ṣadũq)

The author says: The tradition of the Prophet, "Verily my intercession is . . .", has been narrated by both sects with numerous chains; and we have shown earlier that it is based on the theme of Qur'ãnic verses.

Sumã'ah ibn Mihrãn narrates from Abũ Ibrãhīm (a.s.) that he said about the words of Allãh: may be your Lord will raise you to a praised position: "The people, on the Day of Resurrection, will remain standing for forty years; and the sun will be ordered so that it will ride over their heads and they will be bridled by sweat — and the earth will be told not to accept any of their sweat. So, they shall approach Adam to intercede for them, and he will direct them to Nũh, and Nũḥ will direct them to Ibrãhīm, and Ibrãhīm will direct them to Mũsã, and Mũsã will direct them to `Isã, and `Isã will direct them saying: 'You should seek help of Muhammad, the last prophet.' Thereupon, Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) will say: 'I'll do it;' and will proceed until, arriving at the door of the garden, he will knock at it. It will be asked, 'Who is it?' (while Allãh knows better!), and he will say: 'Muhammad.' Then it will be said: 'Open for him.' When the door will be opened he will turn to his Lord, falling in sajdah. He will not raise his head until he is told: 'Speak up and ask, you shall be given; and intercede, your intercession shall be granted.' He will raise his head and turning to his Lord will fall (again) in sajdah. Then he will be promised as before; then he will raise his head. (Thereupon, he shall intercede) until he will intercede even for him who would have been burnt in the fire. Therefore, on the Day of Resurrection, no one among all the nations will be more eminent than Muhammad (s.a.w.a.); and it is (the meaning of) the words of Allãh: May be your Lord will raise you to a praised position." (al-`Ayyãshi)

The author says: This meaning is narrated by both sects in great number, in detail as well as in short, with numerous chains; and it proves that the "praised position" means the position of intercession. This tradition is not in conflict with intercession of other prophets, because probably their intercession will be an off-shoot of our Prophet's, and it will begin on his hand.

`Ubayd ibn Zurarah said: "Abũ `Abdillãh (a.s.) was asked whether a believer would have the right of intercession. He said: 'Yes.' Then someone said: 'Will even a believer need the intercession of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) on that day?' He said: 'Yes. The believers too will come with wrongs and sins; and there will be none but he shall need the intercession of Muhammad on that day.'" (`Ubayd) said: "And someone asked him about the words of the Messenger of Allãh: 'I am the Chief of the children of Adam, and I say this without boasting.' He said: 'Yes.' (Then) he said: 'He will hold the chain-link of the door of the garden and open it; then he will fall in sajdah, and Allãh will tell him:

`Raise your head, do intercede, your intercession shall be granted; ask, you shall be given.' So he will raise his head and again will fall in sajdah; then Allãh will (again) say to him: 'Raise your head, do intercede, your intercession shall be granted, and ask, you shall be given.' Thereupon he will raise his head and intercede — and his intercession will be accepted; and he will ask and be given." (ibid.)

Muhammad ibn al-Qãsim narrates through his chains from Bishr ibn Shurayh al-Baṣri that he said: "I said to Muhammad ibn Ali (a.s.): 'Which verse in the Book of Allãh is the most hope-inspiring?' He said: 'And what do your people say (about it)?' I said: 'They say, (it is the verse,) Say: "O my servants! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allãh." 'He said: 'But we, the people of the house, do not say so.' I said: 'Then what do you say about it?' He said: 'We say (it is the verse,) And soon will your Lord give you so that you shall be well pleased. (It means) the intercession, by Allãh the intercession, by Allãh the intercession.' " (at-Tafsīr, Furãt ibn Ibrãhīm)

The author says: The words of Allãh, may be your Lord will raise you to a praised position, refers to the Prophet's glorious position of intercession, as the numerous traditions of the Prophet himself prove. Moreover, the wording of the verse too supports it: "will raise you" shows that it is a position which he will attain in future, i.e. on the Day of Judgement; "praised" is general and unconditional, and implies that he shall be praised by all men, past and present. al-Ḥamd (الحَمْدُ) means to praise someone for a good done to you intentionally. This definition shows that the Prophet will do something by his own will and power which will benefit all of them and in return everyone will praise him. That is why the Imãm said in the tradition of ‘Ubayd ibn Zurarah, “and there will be no one but he shall need the intercession of Muhammad on that day.”

We shall later explain it further.

Now about the declaration that the verse, “and soon will your Lord give you so that you shall be well pleased,” is the most hope-inspiring one in the Qur'ãn — especially when compared to the verse, Say: “O my servants! who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not despair of the mercy of Allãh; surely Allãh forgives the faults altogether; surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. And return to your Lord and submit to Him before there comes to you the punishment . . . and follow the best that has been revealed to you . . .” (39:53 -55). al-Qunut (القُنُوطُ = to lose hope, to despair) has been mentioned several times in the Qur'ãn. Allãh quotes Ibrãhīm (a. s.) as saying: And who despairs of the mercy of his Lord but the erring ones (15:56). Also He quotes Ya`qũb (a.s.): surely none despairs of Allãh's mercy except the unbelieving ones (12:87). But the con-text in both places shows it as referring to losing hope of divine mercy in matters of creation. As for the verse under discussion the context shows that it admonishes against losing hope of divine mercy in matters of legislation and judgement; look for instance at the words, who have acted extravagantly against their own souls. They clearly say that one who has committed sins should not despair of the mercy of Allãh. Also Allãh has promised forgiveness for the faults altogether without any exception. But this promise is followed by admonition to repent (turn to your Lord) and submit to Allãh and follow the divine commandments. The text on the whole demonstrates that a man who might have committed sins need not despair of the mercy of Allãh as long as he is in a position to turn to Allãh, to submit to Him, and to follow His commandments. In short, this mercy is conditional. And there is a vast difference between this conditional mercy and the all-encompassing, unconditional mercy and unrestricted granting and pleasing which Allãh has promised His Apostle, who himself was a mercy for all the mankind. It is that promise which will make the Apostle of Allãh (s. a. w. a.) well pleased: and soon will your Lord give you, so that you shall be well pleased.

This last-mentioned verse occurs in a context where Allãh mentions His grace and bounties to the Prophet; it is a unique promise never made to anyone else. The phrase, "will give you," is unconditional and unrestricted. A promise, somewhat similar, has been made to a group of the people of the garden: they shall have what they please with their Lord (42:22); They have therein what they wish and with Us is more yet (50:35). These verses show that those people shall be given more than they wish for — and man by nature desires all that he can think of happiness, good and felicity. It means that they shall be given more than they can think of, as Allãh says: So no soul knows what is hidden for them of the joy of the eyes (32:17). Now this is what Allãh has promised those who believe and do good; and even this is beyond human imagination. Surely, what He shall give to His Prophet as His special grace must be far greater than this.

This much about the grace of Allãh. Now let us reflect upon "you shall be well pleased". Obviously this pleasure has no relation whatsoever to the pleasure a man should have for whatever Allãh gives Him and decrees for him. Allãh is the Master and the servant has nothing of his own except the inherent need and poverty. He must always be happy and grateful for whatever his Master gives him, no matter whether it is more or less, big or small; he must always be pleased with whatever Allãh decrees for him, whether it looks comforting or distressing. This is what is expected of every good believer; surely the Prophet knows this ideal better, and acts upon it more perfectly, than anyone else; in short, he likes for himself only that which Allãh wills for him. Therefore, it would have been superfluous and irrelevant to say that he would be pleased after he was given something. It follows that this promised pleasure refers to something else. It refers to that happiness or satisfaction which a needy person experiences when his need is fully met. A similar promise was given to some of His virtuous servants: (As for) those who believe and do good, surely they are the best of men. Their reward with their Lord is gardens of perpetuity beneath which rivers flow, abiding therein for ever; Allãh is well pleased with them and they are well pleased with Him; that is for him who fears his Lord (98:7-8). Its context shows that this too is to show some special divine favour for them, and hence it must be a very exclusive and comprehensive pleasure. At this juncture, it should be mentioned that Allãh has praised His Apostle in these words: to the believers (he is) compassionate, merciful (9:128).

Keeping all these things in view, ponder on this question:

Can the Prophet be pleased to enjoy the bounties of the garden, or can he be happy with the pleasures of the paradise, when some believers are imprisoned inside the hell? Remember that they are the people who believed in Allãh as the One God, in the Prophet as the true prophet, and in what he brought with him as the true revelation; but they were overcome by their indiscretion and Satan twisted them between his fingers as a toy, and so they committed errors and sins — without any thought of revolting against God, of any arrogance before Him. Even we, when we remember what mistakes we committed in past, what chances of spiritual perfection we missed before, we start blaming ourselves for all the shortcomings; then if we see some inexperienced youth indulging in youthful frolics, we are reluctant to condemn them; we feel compassion for them. But this mercy of ours is a manifestation of the imperfect compassion put in our nature by the Creator. How can we understand the mercy of the Lord of the worlds, in a place where the magnanimity of the compassionate, merciful Prophet and the mercy of the Most Merciful of all have to decide about the indiscretions of a power-less human being? Especially so when he had undergone all the torments of al-barzakh in proportion to his misdeeds?

al-Qummi narrates a tradition in his at-Tafsīr, under the verse: And intercession will not avail aught with Him save of him whom He permits (34:23), that Abu '1-`Abbas al-Mukabbar said: "A servant of a wife of `Ali ibn al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), named Abu Ay-man, came (to the fifth Imãm — a.s.) and said: 'O Abũ Ja'far! You mislead the people, saying, intercession of Muhammad, intercession of Muhammad.' (Hearing this) Abu Ja'far became so angry that his face took a glowering expression; then he said: 'Woe unto you! O Abũ Ayman! Are you deluded by chastity of your stomach and genitals? Why, when you will see the terrors of the resurrection, you shall certainly be in need of intercession of Muhammad. Fie on you! Would he intercede except for him who would have been sentenced to the fire?' (Then) he said: `There is no one from the early people to the later ones but he will need the intercession of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) on the Day of Resurrection.' Then again Abũ Ja'far said: 'Certainly the Messenger of Allãh has (authority of) intercession for his ummah, and we have (authority of) intercession for our Shl'ahs, and our Shi'ahs have (authority of) intercession for their families.' Then he said: 'And surely a believer shall intercede for (very large number of) people like the (tribes of) Rabi'ah and Mudar. And surely a believer shall intercede for his servant, saying: "O my Lord! I owe this to him, he was protecting me from heat and cold." '

The author says: This tradition refers to a general intercession ("There is no one from the early people to the later ones but he will need the intercession of Muhammad . . .") and a particular one ("Fie on you! Would he intercede except for him who would have been sentenced to the fire?"). We find similar idea in al-'Ayyãshi's tradition from 'Ubayd ibn Zurarah mentioned earlier. There are other traditions of the same theme narrated by both sects. It is supported also by the verse: And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (him) (43:86). This verse shows that the prerequisite of inter-cession is the witnessing of the truth. The witnesses are the intercessors, the owners of the intercession. And we shall describe under verse 2:143 (And thus We have made you a medium [just] nation that you may be witnesses over the people and [that] the Apostle may be a witness over you), that the prophets are the witnesses and that Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) is the witness over them; so he (s.a.w.a.) is the witness over the witnesses, and thus he is the intercessor for the intercessors; and without the testimony of the witnesses the foundation of the Day of Judgement would crumble.

The (fifth) Imãm said about the verse, And intercession will not avail aught with Him save him whom He permits: "No prophet or apostle may intercede until Allãh permits him, except the Apostle of Allãh, because Allãh has alread given him permission before the Day of Resurrection; and intercession is (allowed) to him and to the Imãms from his progeny, and after that to the prophets." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi)

`Ali (a.s.) said: "The Apostle of Allãh (s. a. w. a.) said: 'Three (groups) shall intercede with Allãh and their intercession will be accepted: The prophets, then the (religious) scholars, then the martyrs.' " (al-Khiṣãl)

The author says: ash-Shuhadã' (الشُّهَدَاء) in the Qur'ãnic terminology means witnesses of the deeds; but in the traditions of the Imãms it is generally used for the martyrs who are killed in the way of Allãh. And apparently it is in this meaning that the word has been used in this traditions.

The Imãm said: "We have the (authority of) intercession; and the people who love us have the (authority of) intercession." (ibid.)

The author says: Numerous traditions prove that the Lady of paradise, Fãṭimah (a.s.) has the power and authority of inter-cession, as do his descendants other than the Imãms. Likewise, a lot of traditions bestow similar authority on the believers — even to their miscarried foetus. There is a well-known tradition that the Prophet said: "Marry (and) procreate; for I shall boast of you (i.e. your number) against other nations on the Day of Resurrection — even of miscarried foetus; he shall stand at the door of the garden in a restive mood; he shall be told to enter, but he will say: 'No, until my parents enter it …' "

Abũ Abdillãh narrates, through his father and grandfather, from `Ali (a.s.) that he said: "The garden has eight gates: one for the entry of prophets and the truthful ones, the other for the martyrs and the good ones; and five gates are for the entry of our Shi'ahs and lovers — I shall be standing on the as-Sirat (الصِّرٰاط = the path; the bridge over the hell) praying and saying: 'My Lord! save my Shi `ahs and my lovers and my helpers and those who followed me in the (life of the) world.' Then all of a sudden there will come a voice from inside the throne: 'Your prayer is granted and your intercession for your Shi'ahs accepted. And every Shi'ah of mine and everyone who loves me, helps me and fights my enemies by (his) deed or word, shall intercede for seventy thousand of his neighbours and relatives — and (there is) a gate from which shall enter all the Muslims who witness that there is no god except Allãh and in whose heart there is not an iota of enmity towards us, the people of the house." (ibid.)

Ḥafṣ al-Mu'adhdhin narrates that Abũ `Abdillãh (a. s.) wrote, inter alia, in a letter to his companions: "And know that none of the creatures of Allãh shall avail you against Him., neither an angel who is near to Him, nor an apostle prophet nor any one below them. Whoever likes intercession of intercessors to avail him, should ask Allãh to be pleased with him." (al-Kãfī) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Jabir told Abũ Ja'far (a.s.): 'May I be your ransom, O son of the Apostle of Allãh! Narrate to me a tradition about your grandmother, Fãṭimah.' (Then the tradition continues, mentioning the intercession of Fãṭimah on the Day of Resurrection, until it says:) Abũ Ja'far (a.s.) said: 'Then, by God, no one among the people will remain (unsaved) except a doubting one or an unbeliever or a hypocrite. When they shall be (put) into (various) ranks of the hell, they shall cry out — as Allãh has said — So we have no intercessors, nor a true friend: But if we could but once return, we would be of the believers (26:100-102): Then Abũ Ja'far (a.s.) said: 'But oh! how preposterious! They shall be denied what they asked for; and if they were sent back they would certainly return to what they were forbidden, and most certainly they are liars (6:28) .' " (at-Tafsīr, Furãt ibn Ibrãhīm)

The author says: The Imãm has proved by the sentence, "So we have no intercessors", that intercession will take place on the Day of Judgement. In this light, it is amusing to see our adversaries trying to use it as an argument against intercession! Just as we said about the verse, So the intercession of intercessors avails them not (74:48), this verse too shows that intercession will surely take place on that day. If the Qur'ãn wanted to negate the inter-cession altogether, it would have used the singular form (. . . no intercessor nor a true friend). But it has used the plural, "So we have no intercessors"; and it proves that there shall be a group interceding on behalf of some people, but it will not be of any avail to those particular speakers. Moreover, the following sentence, "But if we could but once return, we would be of the believers," shows a desire within the frame of grief. Obviously such a desire is related to that thing loss of which has caused the grief. Therefore, what this sentence implies is this: Would that we could return to the previous life; then we would be of the believers, so that the intercession of intercessors would avail us too, as it has benefited the believers. The verse, therefore, is a good proof for intercession.

al-Kazim (a.s.) narrated from his father, through his fore-fathers, from the Prophet that he said: "My intercession is for those of my ummah who would have committed big sins; as for the doers of good, there shall be no difficulty for them." He was asked: "O son of the Messenger of Allãh! How can the inter-cession be for those who would have committed big sins, while Allãh says, and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves (21:28); and a committer of big sins cannot be approved?" He (a.s.) said: "No believer commits a sin but he regrets it and feels ashamed. And the Prophet has said: 'Enough is regret as a repentance.' And also he (s.a.w.a.) has said: 'Whoever is pleased by a good deed and displeased by a bad deed, he is a believer.' Therefore, if there is someone who does not feel remorse for a sin he has committed, he is not a believer, and intercession will not avail him, and he will be an unjust one. And Allãh says: the unjust shall not have any true friend nor any intercessor who should be obeyed (40:18)." It was said to him: "O son of the Messenger of Allãh! How is it that he who is not sorry of a sin he has committed, he does not remain a believer?" He said: "Anyone who commits a big sin, knowing that he must be punished for it, will certainly feel remorse for what he has done. And as soon as he is sorry, he is repentant, eligible for intercession. But if he is not sorry, then he is persisting in it, and a persistent (sinner) is not forgiven, because he does not believe in the punishment of what he has done; had he believed in that punishment, he would have been sorry. And the Prophet has said: 'No big sin abides with apologizing, and no small sin remains (small) with persistence.' And as for the words of Allãh, and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves, it means that they do not intercede except for him whose religion He approves. Religion is an acknowledgement that good and bad deeds have to be recompensed. If one's religion were approved, one would feel remorse for the sins one would have committed, because he would know what their result would be on the (day of) resurrection." (at-Tawhid)

The author says: The words of the Imãm, "and he will be an unjust one": It gives the definition of "unjust" as applicable on the Day of Resurrection. It alludes to the Qur'anic verse, Then a crier will cry out among them that the curse of Allãh is on the unjust, who hinder (people) from Allãh's way and seek to make it crooked and they are disbelievers in the hereafter (7:44-45). Accordingly, unjust is he who does not believe in the Day of Judgement; naturally, such a man would not be sorry if he neglected to do what he was ordered to do, or if he indulged in sins and crimes. May be, he outright rejects basic truths and teachings of religion; or may be he just does not care, is not worried of punishment of sins on the Day of Reckoning. In later case, his verbal acknowledgement of the Day of Judgement would be but a joke and mockery.

". . . as soon as he is sorry, he is repentant, eligible for intercession": The adjective, repentant, is not used here in its well-known terminological sense — repentance (in the terminological sense) is by itself the best intercessor and saviour. What the Imãm meant here is this: If he feels remorse for the sin committed, he returns to Allãh, his religion is thus approved by Him, and therefore he becomes eligible for intercession.

"And the Prophet has said: 'No big sin abides with apologizing . . .' ": The Imãm narrated this tradition to prove that persistence in a sin (even a small one) changes it from its original smallness to a far greater transgression — it shows one's disbelief in the Day of Judgement and injustice towards the signs of Allãh. And such a thing is not forgiven. A sin is forgiven if the sinner sincerely repents, or if intercession avails him — and this depends on his religion being approved; and both repentance and approved religion are absent in case of persistence.

A similar theme is found in a tradition quoted in `Ilalul 'shsharãi` from Abũ Ishãq al-Laythi that he said: "I said to Abũ Ja'far Muhammad ibn `Ali al-Bãqir (a.s.): 'O son of the Messenger of Allãh! Tell me about a believer, possessing religious understanding when he reaches (a high point in) knowledge and becomes perfect, does he commit fornication?' He said: 'By God! No.' I said: 'Then does he indulge in sodomy?' He said: 'By God! No.' I said: 'Then does he steal?' He said: 'No.' I said: 'Then does he drink intoxicant?' He said: 'No.' I said: 'Then does he commit any of the big sins or indulge in any of these indecencies?' He said: 'No.' I said: 'Then does he commit a sin?' He said: 'Yes, and he is a believer, sinner, submissive.' I said; 'What does sub-missive mean?' He said: 'The submissive (servant) does not persist in it, does not keep doing it . ."

ar-Riḍã (a.s.) narrated through his forefathers that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: "When the resurrection comes, Allãh, Great and Mighty is He, will manifest Himself to His believing servant, and will remind him of his sins one by one; then Allãh will forgive him; Allãh will not let (even) a near angel or an apostle prophet know of his (sins), and will cover it lest anyone becomes aware of it. Then He will say to his bad deeds: 'Be good deeds.' "(al-Khiṣãl)

Abũ Dharr said: "The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'A man will be brought on the Day of Resurrection; and it will be said: "Show him his small sins; and keep back from him his big sins." Then it will be said to him: "You did so and so on such and such a day." And he will go on confessing, while apprehensive of his big sins. Then it will be said: "Give him a good deed in place of every bad deed." Then he will say: "I had done some sins which I do not see (mentioned) here." ' " Abũ Dharr said: "And I saw the Messenger of Allãh laughing until his teeth were shown." (Muslim)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "When the Day of Resurrection comes, Allãh, Glorified and Sublime is He, shall spread His mercy until even Iblīs will hope for His mercy." (al-Amãli, as-Ṣadũq)

The author says: The last three traditions are of general nature. The traditions about intercession of the Prophet, emanating from the Imãms of Ahlu 'l-bayt as well as from the Sunni sources have successively been narrated by so many narrators as to leave no room for any doubt about their authenticity. Altogether they prove that intercession will take place, and that it will avail the believers who might have committed sins; it will prevent them from entering into hell, or will rescue them from it if already sent therein. It is however certain that the sinning believers shall not be allowed to abide for ever in the hell. And we have earlier explained that the Qur'ãn too does not say more than this.

A PHILOSOPHICAL CONTEMPLATION

According to Abu 'Ali Ibn Sīnã, intellectual reasoning cannot give us details concerning the resurrection and judgement (as given in the Qur'ãn and sunnah), as it lacks the premises necessary to lead to a conclusion. Nevertheless, it may contemplate the future of man after the soul leaves the body and lives in the form of (Platonic) ideas — how it proceeds on the path of happiness or unhappiness reaching the ultimate station.

Whatever man does in beginning leaves an imprint on his psyche — either of happiness or unhappiness. By "happiness" we mean what is good for him as a man; on the other hand, "unhappiness" denotes what is bad for him as a man. If the action is repeatedly performed the imprint becomes deeper and deeper until it becomes a deep-rooted characteristic, until it reshapes the psyche in its own mould.

If the mould is good, the resulting shape as well as the actions emanating from it are good and agreeable to the man "as a man", and man is "happy". If on the contrary the mould is bad, the resulting shape and actions become ugly and disagreeable to the man "as a man"; and although the deformed psyche seemingly enjoys those actions, in reality it remains unhappy "as a man". Here we are talking about a man who is happy in his psyche and good in his deed vis-a-vis a man who is unhappy in his psyche and evil in his deeds.

It is the former that is the subject of our discussion here. A man may be good and happy in his person, because he has got correct belief of eternal truth; but his psyche has been polluted by the sins and transgressions committed as a result of weakness of flesh and error of judgement and choice. Consequently, psyche becomes "unhappy". But this pollution and unhappiness is a matter of constraint that has been forced on his inherently happy psyche; and we know from intellectual reasoning that constraint does not continue for ever. That soul will most certainly get rid of that unhappiness, pollution and rust in the fire of chastisement in al-Barzakh or on the Day of Judgement — it depends on its own strength and stage of inner perfection.

The opposite is true for the later group. Whatever the effects of good deeds, they are no more than cosmetics; it is a forced appearance not agreeable to its inner-self; and sooner or later it is bound to disappear.

There remains a fifth category: The soul which could not turn its potentials into achievements — good or bad — in this life. They will remain in suspense, waiting for the divine judgement.

This much could be discerned from intellectual reasoning, concerning the reward and punishment, the inseparable results of the deeds.

Reasons also prove that existence has various grades of perfection — ideally perfect or less so, stronger or weaker. Consequently, the souls have various ranks in relation to the Creator — nearer to, or further from him. They are therefore one above the other, the highest being the nearest to the First Cause. They are the most perfect and ideal souls, like those of the prophets (may peace of Allãh be on them!). They may become the mediums through which the unnatural pollution and rust may be removed from the weaker souls which are further below. It is this role which we call intercession.

A SOCIAL DISCOURSE

Some people say:

"Human society cannot continue without some laid rules, nor without an authority to look after its affairs. When all members maintain discipline and obey the rules, social justice is maintained and strengthened. This system is based on temporal benefits which the society cannot do without, as well as on spiritual and ethical ideals, like truth, sincerity, keeping one's word etc. which the development and good of the society depend upon. For these rules and regulations to have any force and effect, it was necessary for them to be accompanied by punishment laid down for the transgressors. Only in this way the system could be protected against the wilful transgression of some and indifference and negligence of others. That is why when a government (no matter which ideology it follows) is strong and capable enough to make people obey its edicts, the country marches forward, and society proceeds on the path of development. On the contrary when it is weak, the country is overcome by lawlessness and disorder, and plagued by troubles and turmoils.

"In view of the above, it is essential for the good of society to make people believe that they could not escape the consequences if they transgressed the law. Nothing should be said or done to raise a hope in them that they could avoid the punishment by some means, like intercession, bribe or deception.

"The biggest objection against Christianity is aimed at its belief of atonement: That Christ was crucified in order to atone for the sins of his followers. Now the Christians rely on that atonement to get salvation in the next world, without caring what they do in this life. Religion, in this way, destroys the very foundation of society, retards civilization and pulls it backwards. Data show that lie and injustice is found in ardent followers of religion to a far greater extent than in those who do not follow any religion. Its only reason is that the former are confident that their sins would certainly be wiped off through intercession."

This is in short what some "scholars" hold against the belief of intercession: That it weakens the foundation of civilization and social justice. But neither Islam proves intercession, in the meaning they have given it, nor the intercession which Islam speaks of gives the result they have claimed. Before writing against intercession, as taught by Islam, they should learn what Islam teaches, how it applies its laws to the society, what type of intercession it promises and how, when and to what extent it is to be applied and effected:

First: What the Qur'ãn confirms of the intercession is this: The believers shall not abide in the hell, on the Day of Resurrection, provided they come to their Lord with approved belief and true faith. Thus, it is a conditional promise. Then it has emphasized that the faith remains in grave danger from sins, especially the big ones, and more particularly if one persists in them. Such a believer would be tottering on the brink of eternal damnation. When a believer remembers that promise, his hope of deliverance soars high; when he needs this warning, he is over-come by dread of perdition. His soul remains hovering between hope and fear; he worships his Lord both with love and awe. Thus, he spends his life in a moderate way, on the middle course. He experiences neither discouragement of pessimism, nor the rashness of over-optimism.

Second: Islam has made comprehensive laws for temporal and spiritual upliftment of the society; these laws cover all aspects of life of an individual and a group. It has prescribed suitable punishments for those who violate any of those rules — from monetary compensation to chastisement to firmly fixed punishment — until a stage comes when the offender is deprived of his rights as a member of society and is condemned to eternal shame, or even death. All this system has been entrusted into the hands of divinely appointed ulu 'l-amr (أولُو الامْر = people vested with authority). Then each Muslim has been made responsible for all other Muslims, as he is obliged to enjoin his compatriots to do good and desist from evil. To cap it all, the Muslim nation is obliged to call others to the right path, and the way to affect this call is to give them good news of eternal reward if they do good and to warn them of eternal perdition if they indulge in evil.

It is this knowledge of this and the next world which is the foundation of Islam's character-building. The Prophet promulgated this system; and experiment has proved its effectiveness and potency. Its power to mould the society into divine image was proved during the time of the Prophet and continued to do so until Umayyids came into power. They made the shari`ah a toy to play with; put the Islam's penal code in cold storage and behaved as though they were above all law, as if nothing could hinder them in their pursuit of pleasure. The result of that exercise is before our eyes today. The standard of "freedom" has been raised; western civilization is making inroads in our society. In Islamic countries, Islam exists in name only.

It is this manifest weakening of religion and this retrogressive movement of the Muslims which has caused their fall from heights of justice and virtue, and made them slip down the plane of morality and ethics. It is their debauchery and their wallowing in their base desires and sensualities that has made them bold to transgress every limit, to violate every rule, so much so that even the atheists look down at their debauchery, dishonesty and immorality.

This is the real and only cause of the deterioration of Muslim society. The objector is completely off the mark when he attributes this state of affairs to those sublime religious realities whose only aim, and only effect, was and is the man's felicity and happiness in this world as well as in the hereafter.

The data, mentioned in his argument, are irrelevant here. They have looked at a Muslim society which has got no guardian and no authority to enforce Islamic laws within its jurisdiction, and at an atheist society which has a strong authority to enforce its laws and to keep the people within the limits, with help of education and training of its own choice. Therefore, this comparison is quite clearly unjustified.

turned to you (mercifully), for surely He is the Oft-returning (with mercy), the Merciful" (54). And when you said: "O Mũsã we will not believe in you until we see Allãh manifestly," so the punishment overtook you while you looked on (55); then We raised you up after your death that you may give thanks (56). And We made the clouds to give shade over you and We sent to you manna and quails: Eat of good things that We have given you; and they did not do Us any harm, but they did harm their own selves (57). And when We said: "Enter this city, then eat from it a plenteous (food) wherever you wish, and enter the gate making obeisance, and say, forgiveness, We will forgive you your wrongs and give more to those who do good (to others) (58). But those who were unjust changed it for a saying other than that which had been spoken to them, so We sent upon those who were unjust a pestilence from heaven, be-cause they transgressed (59). And when Mũsã prayed for drink for his people, We said: "Strike the rock with your staff "So there gushed from it twelve springs; each tribe knew its drinking place: "Eat and drink of the provisions of Allãh and do not act corruptly in the land, making mischief" (60). And when you said: "O Mũsã we cannot bear with one food, therefore pray to your Lord on our behalf to bring forth for us out of what the earth grows, of its herbs and its cucumbers and its garlic and its lentils and its onions. He said: "Will you exchange that which is better for that which is worse? Enter a city, so you will have what you ask for." And abasement and humiliation were brought down upon them and they returned with Allãh's wrath; this was so because they disbelieved in the signs of Allãh and killed the prophets unjustly; this was so because they disobeyed and exceeded the limits (61).

QUR'ÃN: and sparing your women: They left your women alive in order that they (i.e. the women) might serve them. "al-Istiḥyã' "(اَلاِستِحيَاءُ) means to wish someone to remain alive. The word may also mean: They behaved indecently with the women until they (i.e. the women) lost their modesty.

"Yasũmũnakum" (يَسومُونَكُمْ) translated here as "they subjected you to", literally means, they imposed upon you.

QUR'ÃN: And when We parted the sea for you: al-Farq (الفَرقُ) is opposite of al-jam' (اَلجَمْعُ); the words mean to separate and to gather, respectively. The same is the case of al-faṣl (اَلفَصْلُ) vis-a-vis "al-waṣl" (اَلوَصْلُ). To separate the sea means to part its water. "Bikum" (بِكُمْ), translated here as "for you", may also mean, "soon on your entering the sea" .

QUR'ÃN: And when We appointed (a time of) forty days with Mũsã: The same event has been described in Chapter 7 in these words: And We appointed with Mũsã a time of thirty nights and completed them with ten (more), so the appointed time of his Lord was complete, forty nights (7:142)

This verse mentions the total duration of the two promises together, as a tradition says.

QUR'ÃN: therefore turn to your Creator (penitently): al-Bãri' (اَلبَارِئُ) is one of the beautiful names of Allãh, as Allãh says: He is Allãh, the Creator, the Maker, the Fashioner; His are the most beautiful names . . . (59:24). This name has been used three times in the Qur'ãn: twice in the verse under discussion and once in Chapter 59, quoted just above. Perhaps Allãh used this name here because it was most suitable in the context of the event described. While it is nearer in meaning to al-Khãliq (اَلْخَالِقُ = the Creator) and al-Mũjid ( المُوْجِدُ = the Inventor), it is derived from bara'a, yabra'u, bar'an (بَرَءَ يَبْرَءُ بَرْءً = he separated, he separates, to separate). Allãh thus separates His creation from in-existence, or He separates man from the earth. This name in this context conveys the following idea: No doubt it is very hard to repent by killing your own people. But Allãh, Who now orders you to destroy yourselves by killing, is the same God who had created you. He was pleased to create you when it was good for you; and now He has decreed that you should kill your own people, and this order too is good for you. How can He decide anything for you except that which is good, and He is your Maker and Creator. The phrase, "your Creator", points to a special relation which they have with Him, and it emphasizes the fact that the given command is not for revenge; it is based on divine love, in order to purify them.

QUR'ÃN: that is best for you with your Creator: This and the preceding verses (that enumerate their transgressions and sins) are addressed to the whole Jewish nation, although the sins were committed by only some groups of them and not by all. Obviously it is because they were very much united as a nation; if one did a thing, others were pleased with it. It was because of this feeling of their national unity that one group's action is attributed to the whole nation. Otherwise, not all the Israelites had killed the prophets, nor had all of them indulged in the calf-worship, or committed other sins mentioned herein. It proves that the order, "kill your people", actually meant, kill some of your people, i.e., the calf-worshippers. It may also be inferred from the words, "you have surely been unjust to yourselves by taking the calf for worship", and the words, "that is best for you with your Creator" (which apparently is the final part of the speech of Mũsã).

The words, "so He turned to you (mercifully)", prove that their repentance was accepted. Tradition says that their repentance was accepted and sin forgiven when only a few of them had been killed. This forgiveness before the order was fully complied with shows that the command was given as a trial. The case is somewhat similar to the dream of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) and his being told to sacrifice Ismã'īl; before he could reach the ultimate stage, he was told, O Ibrãhīm! You have indeed made the vision come true (37:104-105). Likewise, Mũsã (a.s.) told his people "turn to your Creator (penitently) and kill your people, that is best for you with your Creator", and Allãh confirmed the order, yet He took the killing of some as equal to the execution of all, and informed them that their repentance was accepted, "so He turned to you (mercifully)".

QUR'ÃN : a pestilence from heaven: "ar-Rijz" (اَلرِجْزُ = punishment) .

QUR'ÃN : do not act corruptly: "Lã ta'thaw" (لاتَعْثَوْا) is derived from al-'ayth and al-'athy (اَلعَيْثُ ، اَلعَثْيُ); it means the biggest chaos and mischief.

QUR'ÃN: and its cucumbers and its garlic: "al-Khiyãr" (اَلخِيارُ) is cucumber; "al-fũm" (الفُومُ) is garlic or wheat.

QUR'ÃN : and they returned with Allãh's wrath: "Bã'ũ" (بَاءُوْا = they returned).

QUR'ÃN: this was so because they disbelieved: It gives the reason of preceding statement; and the next sentence, "this was so because they disobeyed and exceeded the limits" is the reason of that reason. Their disobedience and perennial excesses caused them to reject the signs of Allãh and kill the prophets. Allãh says in another verse: Then evil was the end of those who did evil, because they rejected the signs of Allãh and used to mock them (30:10). How was the disbelief caused by disobedience? One of the coming traditions explains it.

TRADITIONS

Abũ Ja'far (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh: and when We appointed (a time of) forty nights with Mũsã: "It was thirty nights in the (divine) knowledge and measure, then something else happened (to show that it was not the final decree) and Allãh added ten more; and in this way the appointed time of his Lord, the first and the last, was completed forty days." (al-`Ayyãshi)

The author says: This tradition supports what we have mentioned earlier that the forty was the total of the two appointed times.

`Ali (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh: and when Mũsã said to his people: "O my people! you have surely been unjust to yourselves. . . ": "They asked Mũsã: 'How should we repent?' He said: 'Some of you should kill the others.' Thereupon, they took the knives and everyone started killing (the others), even his brother, father and son, without caring, by God! whom he killed. (It continued) till seventy thousand of them were killed. Then Allãh revealed to Mũsã: 'Tell them to stay their hands;' and he who was killed was forgiven and he who remained, his repentance was accepted." (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

The Imãm said: "Mũsã (a.s.) went to the appointed place and time, and then came back to his people; and they had started worshipping the calf; then he told them: 'O my people! you have surely been unjust to yourselves by taking the calf (for worship), therefore turn to your Creator (penitently) and kill your people, that is best for you with your Creator.' They asked him: 'How should we kill our people?' Mũsã said to them: 'Tomorrow everyone of you should come to Baytu 'l-Maqdis[1] with a knife or a piece of iron or a sword; when I ascend the pulpit of the Children of Israel you should all keep your faces hidden, so that nobody should recognize the other at his side; then you should kill each other.' Thus seventy thousand of those who had worshipped the calf assembled in Baytu 'l-Maqdis. When Mũsã finished praying with them and ascended the pulpit, they started killing each other. (This continued) until Jibrīl came down and said: 'Now tell them, O Mũsã! to stop killing (each other), because Allãh has accepted their repentance.' And (by that time) ten thousand of them had been killed. And Allãh revealed: that is best for you with your Creator; so He turned to you (mercifully), for surely His is Oft-returning (with mercy), the Merciful. "(at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: According to this tradition, the sentence, "that is best for you with your Creator", was said by Mũsã (a.s.) and was also used in the divine speech. In this way, Allãh con-firmed the word of Mũsã (a.s.), and made it clear that what had actually happened — the execution of ten thousand calf-worshippers — was all that was intended from the very beginning; and that the order of Mũsã was carried out in full, and not partially. According to what appears from the wording of Mũsã (a.s.), it was best for them if all of them were killed; but only some of them got killed, not all. By repeating the same words, Allãh made it clear that what Mũsã (a.s.) had meant from the words, "the best for you", was not the execution of all.

1. Mũsã was called to the Mount Sinã' and given Torah while the Israelites were still in the wilderness. And it was at that time that the events in question took place. They had not entered Palestine at that time and Baytu 'l-Maqdis was not built yet. Therefore, the word "Baytu 'l-Maqdis" used in this tradition must mean the tent which Mũsã erected for divine worship.

The same at-Tafsīr says about the words of Allãh: and We made the clouds to give shade over you: "When Mũsã crossed the sea with the Israelites, they landed at a desert. They said: 'O Mũsã ! you have really destroyed and killed us, by bringing us from an inhabited land to a desert where there is , either any shadow or tree nor even water.' At daytime a cloud appeared over them to protect them from the sun; and at night, manna came down to them, settling on leaves, trees and stones, and they ate it; and at dinner time roasted birds fell on their dinner-spread, and when they finished eating and drinking, the birds (became alive and) flew away. And Mũsã had a stone which he used to place in the midst of the station (of the caravan) , striking it with his walking-stick and, lo! twelve springs quashed from it, as Allãh described, every spring going to the station of a particular tribe — and they were twelve tribes." (ibid.)

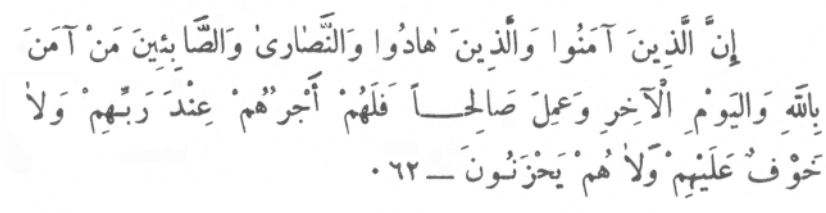
Abu '1-Ḥasan al-Hãdī (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh: and they did not do Us any harm but they did harm their own selves: "Surely Allãh is too powerful and too unassailable to be harmed or to ascribe any harm to Himself. But He has joined us to Himself and took any injustice done to us as an injustice done to Him, and treated our love as His love; then He revealed it in a (verse of the) Qur'ãn to His Prophet, and said: and they did not do Us any harm, but they did harm their own selves. The narrator says: "I said, 'This is the revelation?' He said, 'Yes.' " (al-Kãfī)

The author says: Nearly the same thing has been narrated from al-Bãqir (a.s.).



. . too unassailable to be harmed": It is the explanation of the Qur'ãnic expression, "they did not do Us any harm"; the next sentence, "or to ascribe any harm to Himself", rejects also the opposite proposition. Allãh can neither be harmed nor does He do any injustice Himself. Why did the narrator ask the question, "This is the revelation?" Obviously, for a negative sentence to be plausible there should be a real or hypothetic possibility of a positive connection between the subject and its predicate. We do not say, "This wall does not see". Why? Because wall has no possible connection with seeing. Now, Allãh can have no possible connection at all with injustice or oppression. Therefore, the sentence, "they did not do Us any harm", would seem a superfluous and implausible assertion, because there was no need for saying that Allãh could not be harmed nor did He harm anyone — unless it was meant to convey some fine point to the listeners. And that point is this: Great persons often speak on behalf of their servants and dependants; likewise, Allãh in this verse is speaking on behalf of Muhammad and his progeny (peace be on them all), joining them to Himself in this declaration.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) recited the verse: this was so because they disbelieved in the signs of Allãh and killed the prophets unjustly; this was so because they disobeyed and exceeded the limits, and then said: "By God, they did not hit them with their hands, nor did they kill them with their swords; but they heard their talks and announced it (to their enemies); so the prophets were caught on that charge and killed; this was the killing, the exceeding the limit and the disobedience." (al-'Ayyãshi)

The author says: A similar tradition from the same Imãm is found in al-Kãfī. Apparently, the Imãm inferred it from the words, "this was so because they disobeyed . . ." Needless to say that murder, and especially of the prophets, and rejection of the signs of Allãh cannot be termed as mere disobedience. It should be the other way round. But if we take the disobedience to mean disclosing the secrets then it would be perfectly right to say that they killed the prophets, because they (disobeyed them and) did not keep their secrets and thus delivered them into the hands of their enemies who killed them.

إِنَّ الَّذِينَ آمَنُوا وَالَّذِينَ هَادُوا وَالنَّصَارَىٰ وَالصَّابِئِينَ مَنْ آمَنَ

Surely those who believe, and those who are Jews, and the Christians, and the Sabaeans, whoever believes in Allãh and the Last Day and does good, they shall have their reward from their Lord, and there is no fear for them, nor shall they grieve (62).

* * * * *

The verse first mentions the believers, and then says, "who-ever believes in Allãh . . ." The context shows that the latter phrase refers to the real belief, the true [man, and that the word, "those who believe", (mentioned at first) refers to those who call themselves believers. The verse says that Allãh gives no importance to names, like the believers, the Jews, the Christians or the Sabaeans. One cannot get a reward from Allãh, nor can he be saved from punishment, merely by giving oneself good titles, as they, for example, claim that: no one will enter the Garden except he who was a Jew or a Christian (2:111). The only criterion, the only standard, of honour and happiness is the real belief in Allãh and the Day of Resurrection, accompanied by good deeds. It should be noted that Allãh did not say, 'who-ever of them believes'; otherwise it would have accorded some recognition to these titles, and would have implied that there was, after all, some benefit in acquiring these names.

This theme has been repeatedly expounded in the Qur'ãn. The honour and felicity depend entirely on true and sincere servitude; no name, no adjective, can do any good unless it is backed by correct belief and good deeds. This rule is applicable to all human beings, right from the prophets to the lowest rank. Look how Allãh praises His prophets with all beautiful and excellent attributes, and then says: and if they had set up others (with Him) certainly what they did would have become ineffectual for them (6:88). Also, He describes the high status and great prestige of the Holy Prophet and his companions, and then ends it with these words: Allãh has promised those among them who believe and do good, forgiveness and a great reward (48:29). Ponder on the significance of the phrase "among them".

Then we find that Allãh had given a man some of His signs but he went astray: and if We had pleased, We would certainly have exalted him thereby, but he clung to the earth and followed his low desire . . . (7:176).

There are many verses clearly showing that the honour and respect with Allãh depends on reality, not on appearance.

TRADITIONS

Salmãn al-Fãrisi said: "I asked the Prophet (s. a. w. a.) about the people of that religion which I followed (prior to Islam), and I described their (way of) prayer and worship. Then it was revealed: Surely those who believe, and those who are Jews. . . " (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

The author says: Various other traditions with different chains of narrators, say that this verse was revealed about the people of Salmãn.

Ibn Faḍḍãl said: "I asked ar-Riḍã (a.s.) why "an-Naṣãrã" (النَّصَارى = the Christians) were given that name. He said: 'Because they were from a village called an-Nãṣirah (النّاصِرَةُ = Nazarath) in Syria.[1] Maryam and 'Isã settled there after they returned from Egypt.'" (Ma'ãni 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: We shall comment on this tradition when writing on the stories of 'Isã (a.s.) in Chapter 3 (The House of `Imrãn), God willing.

The same tradition says that "al- Yahũd" (اليَهُودُ = the Jews) got this name because they are descended from Yahũda, son of Ya`qũb. (ibid.)

The Imãm said: "The Sabaeans are a people, neither Zoroastrian nor Jews, neither Christians nor Muslims; they worship the stars and planets. (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi)

The author says: It is idol-worship of a special type; they worshipped only the idols of the stars, while others worshipped whatever idol caught their fancy.

A HISTORICAL DISCUSSION

Abu Rayḥãn al-Bīrũnī writes in his book al- Ãthãru 'l-bãqiyah:

1. In those days, all the land now divided into Syria, Jordan, Lebnon and Palestine, was called Syria or Greater Syria.

"The earliest known among them (i.e., the claimants of prophethood was Yudhasaf.[1] He appeared in India at the end of the first year of the reign of Tahmũrth; and he brought the Persian script. He called to the Sabaean religion, and a great many people followed him. The Bishdadian kings and some of the Kayanis who resided in Balkh held the sun, the moon, the stars and the planets together with other elements in high esteem and believed that these luminaries were very sacred. It continued until Zoroaster appeared at the end of the thirtieth year of Peshtasav's reign. The ramnants of those Sabaeans are now in Ḥarrãn, from which they have got their new name, Ḥarrãniyyah. Also it is said that this nomenclature refers to Hãrãn, son of Tãrukh (Terah) and brother of Ibrãhīm (a.s.), as he allegedly was one of their religious leaders and its staunchest follower.

"Ibn Sancala, the Christian, has written a book against Sabaeans. In that book he has attributed many ridiculous things to this Hãrãn. For example, he describes the Sabaeans' belief about Ibrãhīm (a.s.) in these words: 'Ibrãhīm (a.s.) was removed from their community because a white spot had appeared on his foreskin, and the Sabaeans believed that a person having a white spot was unclean, and avoided mixing with such person. To remove that defect, Ibrãhīm cut his foreskin, i.e. circumcised himself. Then he entered one of the temples; and lo! an idol called out to him: "O Ibrãhīm! you went away from us with one deflect and came back with two; get out and do not ever come back to us." Ibrãhīm was enraged;

1- It is now almost certain that Yudhasaf is a corruption of Budhastav, the title of Gautama Buddha, the founder of Bhuddhism.

he smashed the idols; and went out. After some time, he felt remorse for what he had done, and decided to sacrifice his son on the altar of Jupiter, as it was their custom to kill their children to please the deities. When Jupiter was convinced of the sincerity of his repentance, it sent a lamb to him to slaughter in place of his son.'

" 'Abdu 'l-Masīḥ ibn Isḥãq al-Kindi wrote a book in reply of a book by `Abdullah ibn Ismail al-Hãshimi. In that book `Abdu 'l-Masīḥ writes about the Sabaeans:

" 'It is generally believed that they indulge in human sacrifice, although nowadays they cannot do so openly. But so far as our own information goes, they are monotheists who believe that God is free from every defect and evil, they describe God in negative, not positive, terms; for example, they say: Allãh cannot be defined or seen, He is not unjust or oppressive. According to them, the beautiful divine names may be used for God, but only in an allegorical sense, because no divine attribute can truly describe the reality.

They believe that the management of all affairs is done and controlled by the sky and the heavenly bodies; the sky and those bodies are living things having the characteristics of speech, hearing and sight. They revere the light and the luminaries. One of their legacies is the dome above the niche in the Umayyad mosque of Damascus; it was their prayer house, and at that time even the Greeks and the Romans followed the same religion. Then it came under Jewish control and they turned it into a synagogue. Later, the Christians took it over and converted it into a church. Then came the Muslims, and they changed it into a mosque. The Sabaeans had their numerous places of worships, and their idols were named after various names of the sun, and shaped with fixed patterns, as has been described by Abu Ma'shar al-Balkhi in his book, The Houses of Worship. For example, there was the temple of Ba'labak which housed the idol of the sun; of Qirãn, which was related to the moon and built in the moon's shape, like a shawl worn over head and shoulders. And there is a village nearby, Salamsīn by name; it is a corruption of its original name, صَنَمْ سِيْن (Sanam Sīn = the idol of the moon). Likewise, another village is called Tara`ũz, that is, the gate of venus. They do also claim that the Ka'bah and its idols belonged to them, and that the Meccan idol-worshippers were of the Sabaean religion. According to them the idols, Lãt and `Uzza, represented Saturn and Venus. They have many prophets in their hierarchy, most of them being the Greek philosophers, for example, Hermes of Egypt, Agadhimun, Walles, Pythagoras and Babaswar (maternal grandfather of Plato) and many others like them. Some of them do not eat fish — lest it be spume; nor poultry, because it is always hot. Also, they do not use garlic, because it creates headache and burns the blood and semen (which is the source of continuity of the human race); and they avoid beans, because it dulls the intelligence and also because it had first sprouted in a human skull. They observe three compulsory prayers: at sunrise (eight rak`at); at noon (five rak`at); and at the third hour of the night.

" 'They prostrate three times in each rak'ah. Also, they observe two optional prayers — at the second and ninth hours of the day.

" 'They pray with ṭahãrah and wuḍũ'; they take bath after janãbah; but they do not circumcise their children because they have not been told to do so. Most of their laws concerning marital and penal codes are like the sharī'ah A of Islam; while the rules about touching a dead body are similar to Torah's. They offer sacrifices to the stars, their idols and the temples; the sacrificial animals are killed by the priests and witch-doctors, who read in it the future of the man who offers the sacrifice and answer to his questions.

" 'Hermes is sometimes called Idrīs, who is mentioned in Torah as Akhnũkh. Some of them say that Yũdhasaf was Hermes.

" 'Some others have said that the present-day Ḥarrãniyyah are not the real Sabaeans; rather these are mentioned in the books as heathens and idolaters. The Sabaeans were those Israelites who stayed behind at Babylon when their majority returned to Jerusalem in the reigns of Cyrus and Artaxerxes. They were favourably disposed to Zoroastrian beliefs, as well as to the religion of Nebuchadnezzar. What resulted from this exercise was a mixture of Judaism and Zoroastrianism — like the Samaritans of Syria. Most of them are found in Wasit and the rural areas of Iraq around Ja'far and Jamidah; they trace their genealogy to Enosh, son of Seth. They criticize and oppose the Harraniyyah and their religion. With exception of a few things, there is no similarity between the two religions: The Sabaeans face towards the North Pole in their prayers, while the Harraniyyah face towards the South Pole.

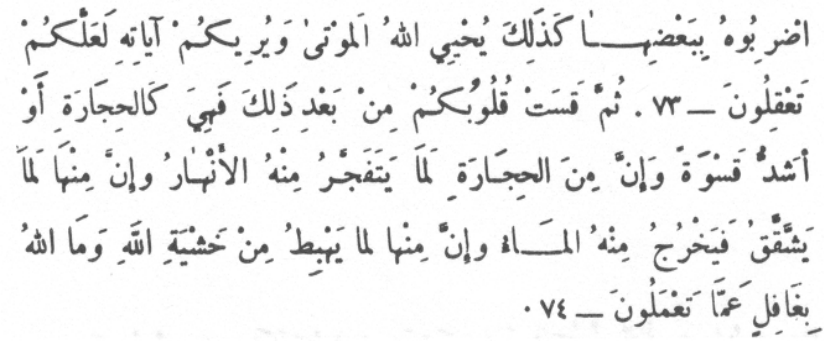
" 'Some people of the book have said that Methuselah had a son (other than Lamech), named Sabi, whom the Sabaeans have descended from. The people, before the shari`ah spread and before Yudhasaf appeared on the scene, followed Samanian beliefs; they lived in the eastern part of the world and worshipped idols. Their remnants are found in India, China and Taghazghaz, and the people of Khurasãn call them Shamnãn. Their relics, places of worship and idols are seen in eastern Khurasãn adjoining India. They believe in eternity of the universe and transmigration of soul. According to them, the sky is falling down in an endless vacuum, and that is why it is moving round and round.'



"According to some writers, a group of them rejects the theory of eternity of the universe and says that it came into being one million year ago."

The author says: All the above description has been taken from the book of al-Bīrũnī. The opinion, attributed to some writers, that Sabaeans' religion was a mixture of Judaism and Zoroastrianism flavoured with some elements of Ḥarrãniyyah's beliefs, seems better suited in this context; after all, the verse obviously enumerates the groups which followed a divinely-inspired religion.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: And lifted the mountain over you: "aṭ-Ṭũr" (الطُّوْرُ) is mountain; that is why has been substituted by "al-jabal" (اَلجَبَلُ = mountain) in verse: And when We wrested away the mountain over them as if it were a covering overhead (7:171). "an-Natq" (اَلنَّتْقُ = to wrest away; to pull out). The verse at first mentions taking of a promise; and ends with the command to take hold of what they were given and to bear in mind what was in it; in between it refers to the lifting of the mountain over them, without saying why it was lifted. But the context clearly shows that it was done to frighten them without putting them under compulsion, in order that they might obey what they were told — if Allãh had wished to compel them, there was no need to take any promise before.

Objection: If we were to take the sentence, "and lifted the mountain over you", in its literal meaning, it would be a miraculous sign that would have forced the Israelites to obey the given command under duress and coercion; but Allãh says: There is no compulsion in the religion (2:256); . . . will you then force men till they become believers? (10:99).

Reply: The objection is baseless. The sentence shows only that they were threatened and frightened. Just lifting the mountain over their head was not enough to coerce and force them to believe and obey. Otherwise, most of the miracles shown by Mũsã (a.s.) could be termed as "compulsion"! The said questioner has tried to explain away this sentence in this way: "The Israelites were at the foot of the mountain; it was shaken violently and during that convulsion its summit loomed over them, until they thought that it was going to fall over them. It is this natural phenomenon that has been described as pulling out the mountain and lifting it over them."

Such misinterpretations emanate from rejection of the principle of "miracle" altogether. We have already written in detail on this subject. If we were to explain away the verses of miracle in this way, no speech would remain safe from distortion; and no sentence could be taken to mean what it says; as a result, all the norms of eloquence and literature would lose their value.

QUR'ÃN: so that you may guard (against evil): "La'alla" (لَعَلَّ) is a particle meaning "perhaps", "may be"; it denotes hope — the speaker may be hoping for something, or the person spoken who gives rise to the hope, or the situation justifies the hope although the speaker or the listener does not feel optimistic himself. In any case, it implies some uncertainty about the final outcome. When this particle is used in a divine speech, it indicates hopefulness either with reference to the listener or in context of the situation; but it can never refer to the speaker, that is, Allãh, because He can never be uncertain of any result. It has clearly been explained by ar-Rãghib in his al-Mufradãt. There-fore, whenever this word is used in the Qur'ãn, it is translated as "so that . . .", "in order that . . ."

QUR'ÃN: Be apes despised: "Khãsi'īn" (خَاسِئِيْنَ = despised, humiliated).

QUR'ÃN: So We made them an example: "an-Nakã"(اَلنَّكَالُ) means exemplary punishment meted out to one in order that others may desist from such transgression.

QUR'ÃN: And when Mũsã said to his people: "Surely Allãh commands you that you should sacrifice a cow . . . ": This is the story of the cow of the Israelites, and it is these verses which have given this chapter its name, the Cow.

The Qur'ãn has used a dramatic style for this story. It opens with the middle of the story (verses 67 to 71), followed by its beginning (verse 72) and ending with its conclusion (verse 73). Another thing to note is the changes of the pronouns — up to verse 66, the Israelites were directly addressed in second person; but verses 67 to 71 are addressed to the Prophet mentioning the Israelites in third person; then it reverts again to the original second person (verses 72 -73).

However, let us follow the narrative in the light of the Qur'ãn. Allãh addresses the Prophet referring to the Israelites in third person: "And when Mũsã said to his people: 'Surely Allãh commands you that you should sacrifice a cow'; they said . . . " Obviously the order given to sacrifice a cow with subsequent description of its various characteristics and qualities, contained in these five verses (67-71), is like a parenthetic statement which clarifies the meaning of the next two verses (72-73), addressed to the Israelites: "And when you killed a man, then you disagreed with respect to that, and Allãh was to bring forth that which you were going to hide. So We said: 'Strike the (dead body) with part of the (sacrificed cow),' thus Allãh brings the dead to life, and He shows you His signs that you may understand."

The five verses (67-71) also show how ill-mannered the Israelites were; how offensive their behaviour was towards their prophet. See how off-handedly they accused their prophet of speaking idle words, how arrogantly they made demand after demand of the Lord to make His command clear and plain, as though there was any ambiguity in the divine command or the prophetic utterance. Add to it their insulting mode of referring to God: Mũsã had told them, " Surely Allãh commands you . . ."; but they repeatedly used the words, "Call on your Lord for our sake . . .", as though He was not their Lord. Then again they went on repeating the demand to be told "what she is", "what her colour is"; and when all was explained to them, they arrogantly claimed, "surely to us the cows are all alike". It should be noted that they did not say that that particular cow seemed indistinct to them; they instead claimed that all the cows were alike in their eyes — implying that the cows per se were the same, and if a certain individual cow had some special quality, this much description was not enough for identification purpose; they did not realize that it was not the cow, but the divine will, which produced the desired result. They were given a simple command to sacrifice "a cow", that is, any cow; they should have acted on that general unrestricted command, but they went on asking for more and more particulars; this was in itself a height of arrogance.

Then, look at their rudeness in asking their prophet, "Do you ridicule us?" It cast an aspersion on the prophet that he was, God forbid, an ignorant person who talked aimlessly. That is why he vehemently defended himself saying, "I seek the protection of Allãh from being one of the ignorants". Even then, they had the temerity to say at the end of the story, "Now you have brought the truth", implying that the previous explanations were not "the truth", that the preceding divine speech and prophetic messages were, God forbid, untruths!

This story is not mentioned in the current Torah. There-fore, it was better not to address it to the Israelites. This may be another reason of changing the mode of address — the story was initially addressed to the Prophet, and after establishing the base, the pronouns were again changed to the original second person directly addressing the Israelites. Nevertheless, the Torah contains an order that implies that some such events must have taken place:

"If one be found slain in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess it, lying in the field, and it be not known who hath slain him: Then thy elders and thy judges shall come forth, and they shall measure unto the cities which are round about him that is slain: And it shall be, that the city which is next unto the slain man, even the elders of that city shall take an heifer, which hath not been wrought with, and which hath not drawn the yoke: And the elders of that city shall bring down the heifer unto a rough valley, which is neither eared nor sown, and shall strike off the heifer's neck there in the valley: And the priests the sons of Levi shall come near; for them the Lord the God hath chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of the Lord; and by their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried: And all the elders of that city, that are next unto the slain man, shall wash their hands over the heifer that is beheaded in the valley: And they shall answer and say: Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it. Be merciful, O

Lord, unto thy people Israel, whom thou hast redeemed, and lay not innocent blood unto thy people of Israel's charge. And the blood shall be forgiven them." (Deut., 21:1-8)

It must now be clear that the story as given here is not intended as a simple narrative. The main theme is taken up in verse 72 (And when you killed a man . . .), but before that, a part of the story is narrated to the Prophet in some detail in verses 67-71 for obvious reasons.

Let us now recapitulate what has been explained above, The verses 67-71 (And when Mũsã said to his people: "Surely Allãh commands you . . .), addressed to the Prophet, is a prologue to the forthcoming episode (verses 72-73), although the listeners do not know it yet. As the audience does not know why the Israelites were told to sacrifice a cow, its curiosity is aroused and the suspense continues until the relation between the sacrifice of the cow and detection of the murderer is revealed. It was this apparent irrelevance of the former to the latter that prompted the Israelities to accuse Mũsã (a.s.) of ridiculing them, of joking with them. This accusation showed that they were completely devoid of discipline, were very arrogant and disobedient. They were not inclined to obey any command without knowing its why and wherefore. They were not ready to believe in that which they could not see — belief in the unseen was against their grain. They were the people who had said to Mũsã (a.s.):

"O Mũsã! we will not believe in you until we see Allãh manifestly" (2:55).

Their trouble was that they wanted total independence in every affair, no matter whether it was within their domain or not. They erroneously thought that the unseen could be brought down to the level of the seen. Consequently, they wanted to adopt a deity which they could see by their naked eyes: They said: "O Mũsã! make for us a god as they have (their) gods." He said: "Surely you are a people acting ignorantly" (7:138).

No wonder that they did not understand the sublime status of their prophet Mũsã (a.s.) and thought that he, like themselves, followed his own desires and joked with, and ridiculed, the people. They accused him of joking and acting like ignorant ones. And Mũsã (a.s.) had to refute this charge: "I seek the protection of Allãh from being one of the ignorants". Why did Mũsã (a.s.) seek the protection of Allãh? Why did not he say straight away that he was not an ignorant person? It was because Mũsã (a.s.) preferred to rely on the divine protection which cannot fail, rather than on his own virtues.

The Israelites believed that one should not accept anything without proof. This principle is correct, of course. But they were mistaken in believing that man must know the reason of every order in full detail; that a command of general nature was not enough. That is why they went on asking for more and more detail about the cow they were told to slaughter. They thought that the cow, by its nature, could not bring a dead body to life; if somewhere there was a particular cow possessing this unheard of quality, it should be pin-pointed with accurate and detailed description. It was this trend of thought which prompted them to say: "Call on your Lord for our sake to make it plain to us what she is". They unnecessarily put themselves into a corner; and Allãh, on this uncalled for demand, gave them a few particulars; "Mũsã said: 'He says, Surely she is a cow neither advanced in age (i.e. not passed the calf-bearing age) nor too young (i.e. not virgin, nor one that has not given birth to a calf yet) of middle age between that (and this)." "al-'Awãn " (الْعَوَانُ) means a female in middle of child-bearing age. Then their Lord took mercy on them and admonished them not to indulge in too much questioning, and to be content with that which they were told: "do therefore what you are commanded". But they did not listen to the divine advice and said: " 'Call on your Lord for our sake to make it plain to us what her colour is.' Mũsã said: 'He says, Surely she is a yellow cow, her colour is intensely yellow, giving delight to the beholders.' " This much explanation should have been enough for them, as by then the cow's age and colour had been described to them. But no, it was not enough for the Israelites who unhesitatingly repeated their first question, shamelessly accusing Mũsã — and God too — of not giving them clear description as yet: "They said: 'Call on your Lord for our sake to make it plain to us what she is, for surely to us the cows are all alike, and if Allãh please we shall surely be guided aright.' "So, Allãh further particularized her nature and characteristics, saying: "Surely she is a cow not made submissive that she should plough land, nor does she irrigate the tilth"; and then He put a further restriction about her colour, "sound, without a blemish in her." Now that they were given all the details and could not think of any more questions, they said: "Now you have brought the truth." The sentence shows that they had to accept the command because they could not think of any more excuses to avoid it — but even then they put the blame of their previous disobedience on Mũsã — and by implication on Allãh: that they had not complied with the order before because Mũsã (a.s.) and Allãh had not explained it correctly. All this is implied in the last clause, "so they sacrificed her, though they had not the mind to do (it)."

QUR'ÃN: And when you killed a man. . . .: It is the beginning of the main story. "at-Taḍaru' " (التَّدَارُءُ = translated here as disagreed") is derived form ad-dar' (اَلدَّرْءُ = repulse) and literally means to push one another. A man was killed and every group was disowning its responsibility, putting the blame on others. But Allãh was to disclose what they wanted to hide.

QUR'ÃN: So We said: "Strike the (dead body) with part of the (sacrificed cow)": The Arabic text contains two pronouns — the first (masculine) refers to the dead body and the second (feminine) to the cow. The translation omits the pronouns replacing them with the nouns they stand for.

Someone has denied the actuality of this story, suggesting that the verses simply describe the promulgation of a law (as given in the Deut., 21:1-8, quoted above). According to him, raising someone from the dead (mentioned in these verses) merely means finding out the identity of the killer — as Allãh says: And there is life for you in (the law of) retaliation (2:179). In short, he claims that there was no miracle involved, nor was there any dead body brought back to life. But the context of the story leaves no room for such misinterpretation — especially if we look at the words, "So We said: 'Strike the (dead body) with part of the (sacrificed cow)', thus Allãh brings the dead to life."

QUR'ÃN: Then your hearts hardened after that, so that they were like rocks, rather worse in hardness: "al-Qaswah" (القَسْوَةُ = sternness) in heart is like "hardness" in rock. "Aw" (اَوْ = or) is used here in the meaning of bal (بَلْ = rather). The next sentences show why their hearts were worse than rocks in hardness: "and surely there are some rocks from which streams burst forth". The sentence offers a contrast between rocks and water. Rocks are used as examples of hardness, while water is proverbialy used to denote softness. Even then, there are some rocks — with all their hardness — from which streams of water — with all its softness — burst forth; "and surely there are some of them which split asunder so water issues out of them". The hard rocks send forth the soft waters; but the Israelites' hearts were so hard as never to allow any truth to issue out of them.

QUR'ÃN: and surely there are some of them which fall down for fear of Allãh: We see how the rocks and stones fall down — big rocks on the summits of mountains crack up, and then an ordinary earthquake is enough to dislodge them causing an avalanche. Also, the cracks fill up with ice and snow during winter, then the warmth of spring melts the ice sending the streams down the valleys. This phenomenon is related to its natural causes, yet Allãh says that the rocks fall down from fear of Allãh. Why? Because all the natural causes ultimately return to the First Cause, that is, Allãh. Rocks, when they fall down because of the natural causes, are in fact obeying the divine decree which put them under the influence of those secondary causes. It may, therefore, be said that they understand the command of their Lord — an under-standing that is created nature. They obey the decree of Allãh inasmuch as they are thus moulded by Him. Allãh says: and there is not a single thing but glorifies Him with His praise, but you do not understand their glorification (17:44); all are obedient to Him (2:116). Fear too is based on perception, as are the glorifying and the obeying. It may therefore be said that the rocks fall down for fear of Allãh. This sentence is of the same genre as the following ones: And the thunder declares His glory with His praise, and the angels too for awe of Him (13:13); And whoever is in the heavens and the earth makes obe'Isãnce to Allãh only, willingly and unwillingly, and their shadows too at morn and eve (13:15). Here the sound of thunder has been counted as the declaration of divine glory and the shadow is said to prostrate for Allãh. There are many verses of the same style and all are based on the same analysis as mentioned above.

However, the sentence, "and surely there are some of them which fall down for fear of Allãh", further shows how the Jews' hearts were worse than rocks in hardness: The rocks are afraid of Allãh and do fall down for His fear, but there is no fear of Allãh in the Jews' hearts, they are not afraid of divine wrath.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) was asked about the words of Allãh: Take hold of what We have given you with firmness, whether it meant the strength of the bodies or the firm resolution of the heart. He (a.s.) said: "Both together" (al-Mahasin).

The author says: This tradition has also been narrated by al-‘Ayyãshi in his at-Tafsīr.

al-Ḥalabī narrates in explanation of the words of Allãh; and bear in mind what is in it, that he said: “Bear in mind what is in it and also bear in mind the chastisement that is laid down for its negligence.” (al-‘Ayyãshi)

The author says: It has been inferred from the position of this clause — it follows the threat implied in lifting the mountain over them.

Abũ Hurayrah said that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: “If the children of Israel had not said: and if Allãh please we shall surely be guided aright, they would have never been given (respite). And had they (in the beginning) taken any cow and slaughtered her, it would have been enough for them; but they went on pressing (for more and more particulars), so Allãh made it harder (and harder) for them.” (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

Ibn Faḍḍãl said: “I heard Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) saying: ‘Surely Allãh ordered the children of Israel to slaughter a cow — and what they needed was its tail. (But they asked for more and more details) so Allãh made it harder (and harder) for them.’ “(at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi) al-Bazanṭi said: “I heard ar-Riḍã (a.s.) saying: ‘A man from the children of Israel killed one of his relatives, then he took the body and put it in the path (leading) to the best of the Israelities' clans. Thereafter he came demanding (the revenge of) his blood. Mũsã (a.s.) was informed that such and such a clan had killed such and such a man, and he was asked to tell them who the killer was. Mũsã said: “Bring me a cow.” They said: “Do you ridicule us?” He said: “I seek the protection of Allãh from being one of the ignorants.” And had they taken any cow, it would have been enough for them, but they pressed (for more particulars); therefore Allãh made it harder for them. They said: "Call on your Lord for our sake to make it plain to us what she is". Mũsã said: "He says, Surely she is a cow neither advanced in age nor too young, of middle age between that (and this)". Even then, if they had taken any cow (fitting this description) it would have been enough. But they pressed for more, so Allãh made it harder for them. They said: "Call on your Lord for our sake to make it plain to us what her colour is" Mũsã said: "He says, Surely she is a yellow cow; her colour is intensely yellow, giving delight to the beholders". Even then if they had taken any such cow, it would have been enough for them. But they persisted (in asking for more details) and Allãh made it even harder for them. They said: "Call on your Lord for our sake to make it plain to us what she is, for surely to us the cows are all alike, and if Allãh please we shall surely be guided aright". He said: "He says, Surely she is a cow not made submissive that she should plough the land, nor does she irrigate the filth, sound, without a blemish in her." They said: "Now you have brought the truth". They began their search and found such a cow with an Israelite youth. He said: "I shall not sell it but for a hide full of gold." Thereupon they came to Mũsã and informed him. He told them to buy it. So they bought and brought it. And Mũsã ordered it to be slaughtered. Then he ordered them to strike the dead body with its tail. As soon as they did so, the murdered man rose from the dead, and said: "O messenger of Allãh! Surely it is my cousin who had killed me, and not the man against whom he has lodged his claim." In this way, they knew who the killer was. Thereafter, a companion of the messenger of Allãh, Mũsã, said to him: "There is a story behind this cow". He asked: "And what is it?" He said: "(That) Israelite youth was very devoted to his father. And he purchased some goods, and came to his father (who was asleep) and keys were under his head. And he did not like to awaken his father, and cancelled the deal.

When his father woke up, he told him about it. The father said to him: 'Well done! Take this cow; it is a recompense for what you have lost.' "The messenger of Allãh, Mũsã, said to him: "Look at the faithfulness and good deed, where does it take its people to?" ' "

The author says: The traditions perfectly fit the description which we inferred from the verses.

A PHILOSOPHICAL DISCOURSE ABOUT MAKING THE DEAD BODIES ALIVE AND ABOUT METAMORPHOSIS

This chapter describes several miraculous signs in the stories of the Israelites and the others — for example, parting the sea and drowning the followers of Pharaoh (And when We parted the sea for you, so We saved you and drowned the followers of Pharaoh . . .); giving death to the Israelites by thunder-bolt and then raising them again from dead (And when you said: "O Mũsã! we will not believe in you . . ."); making the clouds to give shade over them and sending for them manna and quails (And We made the clouds to give shade over you . . .); making the streams to gush out from the rock (And when Mũsã prayed for drink . . .); lifting the mountain over them (. . . and lifted the mountains over you . . .); transforming some of them into apes (. . . so We said to them: "Be apes. . . ") and bringing a dead body back to life by hitting it with a part of a slaughtered cow (So We said: "Strike the [dead body] with part of the [sacrificed cow . . .]"). Among the non-Israelites, there are many stories of dead men and/ or animals brought back to life — for example, a large group that had fled their homes for fear of death (Did you not see those who went forth from their homes . . .); a chosen servant of Allãh who passed by a ruined town (Or like him who passed by a town and it had fallen down upon its roofs . . .) and the birds which were raised from dead through the agency of Ibrãhīm (And when Ibrãhīm said: "My Lord! show me how Thou givest life to the dead . . .). Altogether, there are twelve miracles, most of them occurring among the Israelites. The Qur'ãn has narrated them; and we have already shown that miracles do occur, and super-natural events do take place. We have also shown that such happenings are not in conflict with the system of the cause and effect. It was clearly proved that it is not justified to interpret the verses of miracle in such a way as to deny their apparent meanings. Of course, the miracle is not related to an inherently impossible proposition, like dividing three in two equal wholes, or birth of a child that would be his own father. But if something is possible in itself and the Qur'ãn says that it did happen, one should not try to explain it away as an allegory or a metaphor.

However, some miracles, like raising someone from dead and transformation, that is, metamorphosis, require a somewhat detailed study because they are sometimes criticized from philosophical point of view.

Objection: It is an accepted fact that if an existent thing, a being, having a potentiality of perfection, converts it into actuality, then it is impossible for it to retrace its steps and turn that actuality back into the same potentiality. Likewise, a more perfect being does not change, in its forward march, to a less perfect one.

When a man dies, his soul is released from the fetters of matter; he becomes an immaterial "idea" or a spiritual being. Both these stages are above the matter; the existence in these planes is much more stronger than that in the material sphere.

Therefore, it is impossible for a soul — once death has separated it from the body — to re-establish its connection with that material body. Otherwise, it would mean that a thing, having converted its potentiality into actuality, again retrogressed to the same potentiality — and as we have explained above it is not possible.

Also, man is on a higher level of existence than that of the animals. Therefore, it would be impossible for a man to change, by metamorphosis, into an animal.

Reply: Accepted that once a potentiality is turned into reality it cannot be regressed to the self-same potentiality. But raising someone from dead in this world, as well as metamorphosis, is outside the domain of this law.

Perception and reason show that a vegetable substance, when consumed by an animal, proceeds to its ultimate perfection, that is, animality, and takes the animal form. This form in itself is an incorporeal and immaterial thing. Having reached this stage, the vegetable has turned its potentiality into actuality. Now it cannot turn back to vegetable kingdom.

The animality is the fountain-head of the animal's conscious actions and perceptions. When it performs a deed an impression is outlined on its psyche. When it indulges in the same activity over and over again, that impression gets deeper and deeper until it becomes an ineradicable trait. This new trait may become the building block of an animal species with pronounced characteristics; for example, the fox with its cunning, the pig with its lascivious lust, the panther with its predatory stalking. If, on the other hand, it fails to acquire any characteristics, the psyche remains at its original level of simple animality. It is like the case of a vegetable which fails to reach the threshold of animality and remains at the original level of vegetable-kingdom.

Likewise, an animal, becoming a part of a human being, progresses forward on the path of humanity. A human being has the capacity of perceiving his self in absolute incorporeal terms. When it thus changes its potentiality to this actuality, it is impossible for it to go back to the self-same potentiality. The humanity too, by repeatedly doing a certain type of deed, acquires especial traits and characteristics — and it creates various kinds of human beings with their particular properties in the same way as happens in animal kingdom.

Now, let us suppose that a dead man was returned to life in this world, and his soul re-established its relation to the matter, that is, the body. Obviously, it would not affect the incorporeality of the soul — it was incorporeal in the first life, remained so after that connection was severed, and would remain in this second life too. Body is the tool by which the soul carries on its material and intellectual activities, just as an artisan makes articles with the help of his tools and equipments. When the man died, the soul lost that tool; when he was revived the soul regained the possession and control of that tool. Now, it may use that tool to acquire new talents, to attain to a higher level of perfection than before. It cannot, by any stretch of imagination, be said to be a retrogression or a retreat from perfection to imperfection, nor is it a change from reality to potentiality.

Objection: The scenario given above entails perpetual compulsion, which is obviously a false and void proposition. An incorporeal and immaterial soul, separated by death from the body, does not have any more potentials of acquiring further perfection through re-establishment of its relation to the body. Remember that only a negligible number of people are claimed to have risen from the dead. And the multitude of human beings remain unrevived. If it were in their nature to acquire new perfections through re-establishing their link with their bodies and - yet they were denied that opportunity, they would be perpetually deprived of what their nature demanded. And this perpetual deprivation is nothing but perpetual compulsion.

Reply: There is no compulsion involved here at all. The soul has already progressed from its potentiality to the actuality. It reached a certain level and died. Now, at present it does not have any more potentiality. It will continue to possess the actuality it has already acquired. Let us suppose that there is a man who did some good and some bad deeds, and then died. Had he remained alive he could have added to his deeds and acquired a somewhat different spiritual form, either lovelier or uglier than before. Likewise, if he is returned to life, he may acquire better or worse traits than before. But if he is not revived, then he already owns his actuality, and will accordingly be re-warded or punished in al-Barzakh, until he acquires a spiritual form according to his earned qualities. Even then, if he is returned to this world, he would get new potentiality for spiritual perfection, and may acquire another spiritual form by using the material tool, for example, his body. But, if he is not returned, there is neither any potentiality nor any question of compulsion, perpetual or otherwise.

We should not forget that mere deprivation of a possible perfection is not a compulsion. Otherwise, every happening in this world could be called a perpetual compulsion. Every event, every development here affects each and every thing of the universe, directly or indirectly. There is a never-ending struggle and conflict going on in the universe; and it affects the whole system — including the ability of a man to fully attain to his perfection. That effect may be beneficial or harmful. But nobody claims that because he was prevented, by the circumstances beyond his control, from obtaining a possible benefit, he was under perpetual compulsion.

If a talent for a certain perfection is ingrained in someone's nature and then he is prevented from achieving it, either by some factors in his own nature or some external forces bent on nullifying that talent, then only it may be called a perpetual compulsion — because in this case, putting that talent or potentiality in that species be a vain thing, an aimless venture.

Now we come to metamorphosis. If a man's figure is trans-formed to that of a pig or an ape, it is just an external change. He is still a man in the form of an animal; not that his humanity was erased and replaced by the nature of pig or ape. We have already described that when one repeatedly carries on an activity, its impression is etched on one's psyche. When a man repeatedly indulges in debauchery, his psyche turns into that of a pig; and it is not impossible for that figure to appear in his facial features in this world too — as it would certainly appear in the next world. Such a man is still a man, albeit a transformed one; not that he has lost his humanity.

By the way, we sometimes read, in the newspapers and magazines, reports of academic conferences in Europe and America that tend to prove that it is possible to revive a man after his death, and that a man's facial figures may change to something else. Of course, we do not base over belief on such news and reports; nevertheless, we expect our adversaries not to forget today what they had read yesterday.

Poser: Then there is no difficulty in believing in transmigration of the souls.

Reply: There is a world of difference between metamorphosis and transmigration of the souls. In metamorphosis the same body changes its figure to look like something else; while the believers in transmigration of the souls say that a soul, after attaining its perfection and leaving the body, establishes a new connection with a new body. Obviously, it is an impossible proposition. A question may be asked whether or not the new body was already connected to a soul of its own. If it already belonged to another soul, it would entail domination of one body by two souls, which is impossible — two persons cannot have one body, nor can one body be governed by two personalities. If, on the other hand, the body did not have a soul already, it would mean that an accomplished and developed soul was burdened by an unaccomplished and undeveloped body. It would certainly be a regression from actuality to potentiality — just like returning a wise old man to his infancy! And this too is impossible.

Also, it should be apparent from what we have explained that it is certainly impossible for a human soul, after leaving its human body, to be incarnated in a vegetable or animal body. In short, the belief in transmigration of the souls entails impossibility after impossibility.

AN ACADEMIC AND ETHICAL DISCOURSE ON UNQUESTIONING ADOPTION OF CONCEPTS AND RULINGS

The nation, most frequently described in the Qur'ãn, is that of the Israelites; and the prophet most numerously referred to therein is their prophet, Mũsã (a. s.) , son of ‘Imrãn. His name has been mentioned in one hundred and thirty six places, twice as many as the second most numerously mentioned name, that is, of Ibrãhīm (a.s.), who has been named sixty-nine times only — as some people have calculated.[1]

It is not difficult to understand the reason for these frequent references. Islam, the true religion, is based on the belief of monotheism; its present foundation was laid by Ibrãhīm (a.s.); and Allãh completed and perfected it for His Prophet, Muhammad (s.a.w.a.), as He says: . . . the faith of your father Ibrãhīm; He named you Muslims before and in this . . . (22:78). And the Israelites were the most disputatious and most quarrelsome of all the nations; they were the most obstinate and most abstruse of all when there was a question of submitting to the truth. And the heathens of Arabia, whom the Prophet of Islam had to contend with, were of the same mould, so much so that Allãh said to His Prophet: Surely those who disbelieve alike is to them whether you warn them or do not warn them, they will not believe (2:6) .

Every vice, every depravity found in the Israelites could be found in them; they, in their hard-heartedness and impertinence were the mirror-image of the Israelites.

Ponder over the stories of the Israelites, as narrated in the Qur'ãn; look at the picture of their characters and morals as it emerges from those narratives. You will find a nation deeply submerged in sensualism and materialism. They did not believe in what was beyond the reach of their external senses; for them spiritual happiness was a word without meaning; their only ambition was the pursuit of sensual pleasure; their eyes could not focus on intellectual progress or spiritual perfection, so their only aim in life was the material development. And to this day, they have not changed a whit. It was this tendency which made their mind and will totally subservient to the matter and the material phenomena. They did not understand except that which they could see, hear, touch, taste or smell; they did not strive but for some tangible and material goals. Their servitude to the sensual phenomena prevented them from accepting any thing outside the domain of the five senses — even if it was truth; their thraldom to matter encouraged them to accept every thing told by their materially advanced big bosses — even if it was false. It created a clear contrariety and inconsistency in their words and deeds. They condemned every adoption of others' concepts, ridiculing it as blind following, if that concept was unperceivable by the external senses — no matter how correct it was. And at the same time, they appreciated every adoption of others' concepts, label-ling it as the pleasure of life, if it conformed with their material base desires — no matter how wrong that concept was. This trait became deeply rooted in their psyche during their long sojourn in Egypt, where the Egyptians humiliated them, enslaved them and castigated them; they subjected them to severe torment, killed their sons sparing their daughters, and in this was a great trial for them from their Lord.

However, it was this deep-rooted trait which made them heedless to what their prophets and divine scholars told them about what was good for them in this life as well as in the hereafter. (Remember their disputations with Mũsã and others!) And these very people were ever ready to accept and follow what their big bosses called them to, for gratification of their worldly desires.

Today the truth and reality has been afflicted by this very tragedy. The modern civilization, presented to the humanity by the western world, is likewise based on sensual perception and material outlook. It is not prepared to accept any proof for something which is not perceivable by the external senses; and does not ask for any proof of validity, if a thing gives material and sensual pleasure. This has resulted in weakening of the hold of human instincts, and in disappearance of deep knowledge and high morals from our society. This trait has exposed the edifice of humanity to ruin, and is confronting the society with chaos and disorder. And you will surely see its real face in a not too distant future.

Actually, not every proof is asked for, nor every unquestioning adoption of others' ideas and concepts is objectionable. Man proceeds on the road of perfection through his intentional activities. His actions emanate from his will, and the will springs from thought and notion. Thinking, therefore, is the foundation of his perfection. Man depends on practical or intellectual cognition to which his perfection is directly or indirectly related. This cognition creates in his mind the need for individual or collective actions; this knowledge leads to intention and will which produces the desired activity.

Man, by his instinct, tries to find out the cause of every event, happening inside or outside his self. He does not do any action without knowing its reason; he does not accept any theory without ascertaining its proof. It is his unfailing trait; he always looks for the cause of the events and actions; it is his nature and the nature never deviates from its set course.

But this trait puts an unbearable burden on him. No individual can accomplish all the academic and practical processes required for his material and spiritual well-being. It is this burden which led the man to establish a society and cooperate with other human beings. Various people were given responsibilites to per-form various tasks, in order that the society, taken as a whole, might collectively accomplish all tasks, and fulfil all the needs of all its members put together.

Human needs are expanding by leaps and bounds; various branches of knowledge — sciences, technologies, arts etc. — are growing larger and larger, to such an extent that every subject has grown into hundreds of subjects — each requiring its own specialists. Look for example, at medical science. In old days it was a branch of physics; now it has branched out into hundreds of independent subjects, and no single physician or surgeon may gain expertise in more than one or two of them.

This vast multitude of special fields has instinctively led man to limit his inquiry for cause, and his search for proof, to only those branches of knowledge in which he has gained some expertise; and accept and follow the verdicts of other specialists in other fields. A sane person invariably always relies on the experts in the fields of their expertise. The confidence in their expertise creates a certainty that what has been said or done is correct; and this serves as the proof demanded by human nature.

The nature dictates that man should try his best to find out the detailed proof of the rightness of his idea and action in the fields of his speciality; and as a corollary it directs that he should unquestioningly accept the concepts and verdicts of others in other fields. In short, an ignorant man should follow the decree of a learned one. It is impossible for one man to be an expert in all the branches of knowledge, or independent in all the activities necessary for his life and well-being. Therefore, it is impossible for any man to be free from blindly following a lot of experts in numerous avenues of life. Anyone claiming contrary to this, is a fool.

Of course, it is a shame if a man remains content with un-questioning following, even where he can form an independentopinion based on detailed knowlege; as it is a shame if he forms independent opinion without acquiring necessary knowledge. Both trends are undesirable, both are ruinous to a healthy civilization, both are dangerous to the society.

It is the prerogative of Allãh that His decrees and orders be followed without any questioning, without any if or but; because He is the First and Final cause, an no other cause or reason is needed when He has spoken.

COMMENTARY

The context shows that the unbelievers, and especially those of Medina, thought that the Jews were the likeliest people to help and support the Apostle of Allãh at his advent. The pagan tribes of Aws and Khazraj lived with the Jews of Medina, and they knew that the latter followed a divine religion and a revealed book. Thus it was not too much to expect them to believe in the latest in the series of divine religions and books.

This was the basis of their hope that the Jews would accept the Apostle of Allãh as the true prophet, and would strengthen the cause of religion, and actively participate in the propagation of truth. But no sooner did the Prophet migrate to Medina than the Jews showed their latent hostility. The hope was shattered and the expectation turned to disappointment. That is why Allãh addresses the believers, saying: "Do you then hope that they would believe in you?" Concealment of truth and alteration of divine words was their deep-rooted life-pattern. Why wonder if they go back on what they used to say before the advent of Islãm?

QUR'ÃN: Do you then hope. . . and they know this: The speech is now addressed to the Prophet and the believers, referring to the Jews in third person. This same style was used in the preceding story of the Cow, because the Jews had omitted the event from the Torah. These verses continue that mode of address because it exposes their habit of altering and manipulating the divine book.

QUR'ÃN: And when they meet those who believe. . . and what they proclaim: The two conditional clauses, "when they meet those who believe" and "when they are alone one with another" are not in opposition to each other — as were the clauses in the verse: And when they meet those who believe, they say: "We believe"; and when they are alone with their Satans, they say: "Surely we are with you, we were only mocking (2:14). Here the two clauses simply describe two instances of the Jews' transgressions and ignorance:

First: They indulge in hypocrisy, showing that they have accepted Islãm, and trying in this way to protect themselves from trouble, ridicule and even death.

Second: They want to deceive Allãh, forgetting that He is the Knower of the seen and the unseen, Aware of what they conceal and what they proclaim.

We may infer from the verses that the Jewish laity in Medina sometimes talked openly with the believers, telling them of some of the foretellings about the Prophet or giving them some information that proved the truth of Islãm and its Prophet.

But their leaders used to admonish them for it, telling them that it was a thing revealed to them, it should not be disclosed to the believers, lest they argued with the Jews before the Lord — as though if the believers did not argue with them before God, He would not know of it! Such thinking implies that Allãh knew only the apparent, not the hidden and concealed things or thoughts. Allãh refuted this foolish idea and said: "What! Do they not know that Allãh knows what they conceal and what they proclaim?" It is our, and not God's, knowledge which is limited to the seen and does not comprehend the unseen, because our perception depends on the senses which in their turn depend on body organs — equipped with nervous instruments, surrounded by space and time, influenced by a hundred other material causes.

This talk also throws light on the materialistic outlook of the Israelites. They were so steeped in that belief that they applied the human limitations to God too. They thought that God was present and active inside the matter and prevailed over it. But that presence and that control and management were based on the same principles as a material cause brings out and controls a material effect. Such a belief was not a speciality of the Jews; it was and is held even by those followers of Islãm who believe in fundamentality of matter. For these people, God's life, know-ledge, power, choice, will, decree, order and management have the same meanings as do their own life, knowledge etc. It is a disease for which there is no cure. And the signs and warnings can avail nothing to a people who do not understand. Such views have made Islãm a laughing-stock in the eyes of those who have no access to the true faith and correct Islãmic knowledge. Those detractors say: The Muslims ascribe to their Prophet the saying, "Allãh created Adam in His likeness"; and these followers of the Prophet have created a god in the likeness of Adam. One group of the Muslims ascribes to its Lord all the qualities of the matter. Another group does not understand anything of God's beautiful attributes; consequently it reduces all divine attributes to negatives. It says that the names and adjectives, which are used for both God and His creatures, have quite different meanings in both cases. When we say, "God is Existent, Knowing, Powerful and Alive", the words denote some divine qualities totally incomprehensible to us, completely different from the meanings they have when they are applied to a human being. Therefore, it is necessary to reduce these words to their negatives. What the above sentence, for example, means is this: "God is not non-existent, not unaware, not powerless and not lifeless." Such explanation implies that they believe in that which they do not understand, worship that which they are uncertain about and invite others to believe in that which neither they nor anyone else knows anything about.

The word of truth is enough to dispel such falsehoods. The people have been admonished by the true religion to hold fast to the essence of reality and steer clear between the above-mentioned two extremes. They should know that Allãh is not like His creatures, nor is He a set of negative propositions. The true religion directs common people to believe that Allãh is a thing, unlike other things; that He has knowledge, unlike our knowledge; power, unlike our power; and will, not produced by contemplation; that He talks, not with a mouth; and hears, not with ears. As for the people of higher understanding, they must ponder on His signs and acquire deep knowledge of His religion. He has said: Say: "Are those who know and those who do not know alike?"

Only those possessed of understanding shall bear in mind (39:9). The people of higher understanding are not equal to a common man in their knowledge of truth and religion; likewise, the two are not alike in their respective responsibilities. This, therefore, is the teaching of religion for both groups respectively; it is there for them to follow, would they do so?

QUR'ÃN: And there are among them illiterates who know not the Book but only lies and they do but conjecture; "al-Ummiyy" (الأمّيُّ = one who does not read or write) is related to "al-umm" (الأمُّ = mother) . It is as though the excessive love of the mother prevented her from entrusting her child to a teacher to teach and train him; consequently he could learn only from his mother. "al-Amaniyy" (الأمَانِيُّ) is plural of "al-umniyyah" (الأمْنِيَّـةُ = lie). The verse says that some of the Jews were literates who didread and write the book — but making alterations in it; and the rest were illiterates who knew nothing of the book except the lies of the former group.

QUR'ÃN: Woe, then, to those who write the book with their hands. . . : "al-Wayl" (الوَيْلُ = woe, disaster, severe punishment, adversity, affliction) ; "al-ishtira' " (الاشتِرَاءُ = to sell) .

QUR'ÃN: therefore, woe to them for what their hands have written . . .: The pronouns may refer either to all Jews or only to the interpolators among them. If the former view is taken then the woe and condemnation would cover the illiterates too.

QUR'ÃN: Yea! whoever earns evil and his sins beset him on every side . . . : "al-Khaṭī'ah" (الخَطِيئَـةُ = translated here as "sins") actually refers to the psychical condition resulting from evil-doing. That is why the verse speaks first of his evil-doing and then of the effects of the sins besetting him on every side. When he is beset by his sins on every side, there should remain no opening for the guidance to reach him; he, therefore, will go to Hell and abide there forever.

Had there been an iota of faith in his heart, or some good traits like justice in his character, it would have been possible for the rays of guidance to penetrate to him. The overwhelming besetting of sins on every side, therefore, is possible in case of polytheism, as Allãh says: Surely Allãh does not forgive that anything should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases (4:48) ; and also in case of disbelief and denial of the divine signs, Allãh says: And (as to) those who disbelieve in and belie Our signs, they are the inmates of the Fire, in it they shall abide (2:39). In short, the earning of evil and being beset by sins on all sides is a broad expression covering all that would make one to abide in the Hell forever.

The two verses under discussion are almost similar to the verse: Surely those who believe, and those who are Jews, and the Christians, and the Sabaeans, whoever believes in Allãh and the Last Day and does good, they shall have their reward . . . (2:62).

Both show that the basis of salvation and eternal happiness is the true belief and good deeds. The only difference between the two sets of the verses is that the verse 2:62 shows that mere taking to oneself nomenclatures like the Muslim, the Jew etc. is of no use; while the verses under discussion show that mere claiming of salvation is of no worth at all.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, And when they meet those who believe . . .: "Some of the Jews (who were not inimical to the Muslims and were not a party to the Jewish conspiracy against them), on meeting the Muslims, used to narrate what the Torah contained of the description of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) ; so their elders forbade them to do so and said: 'Do not in-form them of what the Torah contains of the attributes of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.), lest they argue with you by that before your Lord.' Thereupon, this verse was revealed." (Majma`u 'l- bayãn)

It is narrated from the fifth or the sixth Imãm that he said about the words of Allãh, Yea! whoever earns evil. . .: "If they deny the wilãyah (اَلوِلايَةُ = friendship, overlordship) of the Leader of the faithful, then they are the inmates of the Fire, in it they shall abide." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: ash-Shaykh aṭ-Ṭũsī has narrated in his al-Amãlī a tradition of nearly the same theme. The two traditions are based on the principle of the "flow" of the Qur'ãn and fit the verse on one of its best example. Allãh has counted the love of, and submission to, the Prophet's family-members as a good deed, as He says: Say: "I do not ask of you any recompense for it except the love for (my) near relatives; and whoever earns good, We give him more of good therein (42:23). Also, the tradition may be taken as another explanation of the verse, as we shall describe in the Chapter 6 (The Table) that "the good" means complying with the demands of the belief of monotheism. If so, then the tradition particularly mentions `Ali (a.s.) because he was the first of this ummah to open this door.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: And when We made a covenant with the Children of Israel: "You shall not worship (any) but Allãh. . . .": To begin with, the verse refers to the Children of Israel in third person, and then ends by addressing them in second person, "Then you turned back . . ." The first sentence mentions making a covenant with them — which must naturally be in words — then describes that covenant; this in its turn begins with a declarative sentence, "You shall not worship (any) but Allãh", and ends up with some imperative ones, "and speak to men good words . . ." When the stories of the Israelites began, they were addressed in second person, because the verses contained a lot of admonition and reprimand; it continued to the story of the Cow when, because of demands of eloquence, it was changed to third person. Consequently, this verse too began with third person, but when time came to quote the verbal covenant, the style reverted to the second person.

"You shall not worship (any) but Allãh": It is a prohibition in the form of an information. This style shows the utmost importance attached to the ban by the speaker — it is as though the speaker has no doubt whatsoever that the order shall be complied with, and that, in this case, the servants will not dare to go near idolatory.

The same style is continued in the next clause, "and (you shall do) good to (your) parents, and to the near of kin and to the orphans and the needy."

The change over to second person, although resorted to for the purpose of quoting the covenant, has put the speech back to the original style and has linked the last clauses of the covenant to the fresh admonitory ones: "and keep up prayer and pay the zakãt. Then you turned back . . ."

QUR'ÃN: and (you shall do) good to (your) parents . . .: As translated here, it is a declarative sentence with the sense of imperative. It may also be translated as an imperative sentence: "and (do) good . . ." The verse gives, in descending order of importance, the list of those whom one should do good to. The parents are the root of man's existence, and nearest of all to him. Then come the near of kin. Going outside the circle of relatives, the orphans are most deserving of kindness and beneficence, because in their small age they are deprived of their father — their guardian, protector and bread-earner. Other needy persons come after them.

"and to the orphans" : "al –Yatīm" (اليَتِيمُ = orphan) is he whose father has died. The word is not used for him who has lost his mother. Also, it is said that a human child is called "orphan" if his father dies, but in animals, the adjective is used for one whose mother dies.

"and the needy": "al –Masãkīn" (اَلمَسَاكِيْنُ) is plural of al-miskīn (المِسْكِيْنُ = needy, impoverished, destitue, lowly).

"and speak to men good (words)": "Ḥusnan" (حُسْنًا = beauty, excellence) is an infinitive verb, used for adjective (beautiful, excellent, good) to give emphasis. Some reciters have recited it ḥasanan (حَسَنًا = beautiful, excellent, good). However, the sentence enjoins them to speak nicely to the people; it is an in-direct way of ordering them to maintain good social relations to behave with people nicely, gently and good-manneredly — no matter whether the opposite party is a believer or an unbeliever. It cannot be said to be abrogated by the verse of fighting, because the two verses are not contradictory to each other; the place and time of social contact is other than the place and time of fighting. For example, using hard words when admonishing a child to correct his behaviour is not contrary to maintaining good social relation.

QUR'ÃN: "You shall not shed your blood . . .": This too is a prohibitory order, in the form of an information — the same style which was used in, "You shall not worship (any) but Allãh". "as-Safk" (السَّفْكُ = to shed blood).

QUR'ÃN: backing each other up against them: "at-Taẓãhur" (التَّظـاهُرُ = to help each other). Aẓ-ẓahīr (الظَّهِيْر = helper); it is derived from Aẓ-ẓahr (الظَّهْرُ = back) as though the helper strengthens the back of the helped one.

QUR'ÃN: while their very turning away was unlawful for you: Its literal translation will be, 'while it was unlawful for you their very turning out.' The pronoun "it" is not related here to any previously mentioned noun etc., it is a pronoun used to begin a sentence. In the verse, Say: "He, Allãh is one" (112:1), the pronoun "He" has the same grammatical significance.

QUR'ÃN: Do you believe in a part of the Book . . .: Why should you follow the rule of paying ransom for them and disobey the prohibition of turning them out? Are not both rules in the same book? Do you believe in a part of the Book and disbelieve in the other?

QUR'ÃN: And We sent apostles after him one after another: "at-Taqfiyah"(التَّقْفِيَـةُ = to send someone after someone else).

QUR'ÃN: and We gave 'Īsã son of Maryam, clear evidence: This subject will be dealt with in Chapter 3, (The Family of `Imrãn) .

QUR'ÃN: And they say: "Our hearts are covered": al-Ghulf (الغُلْـفُ) is plural of al -aghlaf (الاَغْلَـفُ). It is derived from ghilãf (غِلافُ = cover). They say: Our hearts are protected under various covers and veils — your call cannot reach our hearts. The sentence has the same import as the verse: And they say: "Our hearts are under coverings from that to which you call us (41: 5) .

TRADITIONS

Abũ Ja'far (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, and speak to men good (words) : "Speak to men the best of that which you would like to be said about yourself." (al-Kãfī) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about this verse: "Speak to men, and do not speak but good until you know what it is."

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said: "Speak to men the best of that which you would like to be said about yourself; for certainly Allãh, Mighty and Great is He, dislikes an Abũser, curser, speaker of evil against the believers, indecent, shameless (and) begger, and He loves the modest, mild-tempered, chaste (and) moderate." (Ma'ãni 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: A tradition, similar to the first one, has been narrated in al-Kãfi from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) with another chain of narrators; and similarly in al-`Ayyãshi.

Another tradition, like the second one has been written from the same Imãm in al-Kãfī; and one like the third is narrated from al-Bãqir (a.s.) in al-`Ayyãshi. Apparently these meanings of the "good word" have been inferred from general usage.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Verily Allãh sent Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) with five swords: So (there is) a sword against a dhimmi (ذِمِّـيّ = free non-Muslim subject of an Islãmic country). Allãh said: and speak to men good (words) ; it was revealed about the dhimmīs, then it was abrogated by another verse, Fight those who do not believe in Allãh . . . (9:29) (al-`Ayyãshi)

The author says: In this tradition the Imãm has taken the "speech" to mean behaviour. We say: Do not speak to him but good; what we mean is: Do not deal with him but in a good and decent manner. This meaning will apply only if we take the word, "abrogated" in its terminological sense. But it may also be taken in its literal sense (as we shall explain under the verse: Whatever signs We abrogate or cause to be forgotten . . . 2:106); and in that case this verse will not be in conflict with that of the fighting. It should be pointed out that such uses of words in their literal meanings (as against their terminological ones) are not infrequent in the traditions of the Imãms.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: And when there came to them a Book: The context shows that "a Book" refers to the Qur'ãn.

QUR'ÃN: and aforetime they used to pray for victory against those who disbelieved: It appears that whenever the pagans of Arabia clashed with the Jews, the latter prayed for victory by the right of the Prophet, and by his prophethood and emigration; and that this was their usual custom before the advent of the Prophet, so much so that even the pagans knew it of them. It all is implied in the word, "they used to".

QUR'ÃN: but when there came to them that which they did recognize: They knew that Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) was the awaited Prophet, because all the attributes and particulars mentioned in their books fitted on him perfectly. And yet they denied his truth.

QUR'ÃN: Evil is that for which they sold their souls. . .: "Baghyan" (بَغياً = out of envy) is in accusative case, explaining the reason why they disbelieved in Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) even after recognizing him. What they did was "out of envy", "that Allãh should send down of His grace on whomsoever of His servants He pleases" was the object of their envy. "so they re-turned with wrath upon wrath", that is, they returned doubly enraged. It may also mean that they invited double wrath of Allãh upon themselves — the first because they disbelieved in Torah and the second because they disbelieved in the Qur'ãn.

The verse says that they were partisans of the Prophet long before he was born; they prayed to Allãh for victory by his name and his Book. When the Prophet was sent and the Qur'ãn was revealed, they very well recognized that he was the Prophet in whose name they used to pray for victory, and whose coming they awaited. But they were overwhelmed by envy and arrogance. No sooner did the Prophet begin his call then they denied his truth, and forgot all that they used to tell about the awaited prophet. It was not surprising as they had earlier disbelieved in Torah too. Thus they committed disbelief after disbelief, and invited the wrath of Allãh upon themselves, not once but twice.

QUR'ÃN: and they deny what is besides that: That is, they claim that they do not believe in any book other than Torah; but the fact is that they do not believe even in Torah.

QUR'ÃN: Say: "Why then did you kill Allãh's prophets. . .": The conjunctive, "then", serves to relate this question to their claim, "We believe in that which was revealed to us". If this claim of yours is correct then why did you kill the prophets of Allãh? And why did you disbelieve in Mũsã by taking the calf for a god? And why did you say, "We hear and disobey", when We took a promise from you and lifted the mountain over you?

QUR'ÃN: and they were made to imbibe (the love of) the calf into their hearts: "al-Ishrãb" (اَلاِشْرَابُ = to make to imbibe, to make to drink). Instead of saying 'the love of the calf', the verse says, "to imbibe the calf", for emphasis, as though they had drunk the calf itself into their hearts. The sentence thus contains two metaphors — "the calf" for the love of the calf, and imbibing into hearts for loving.

QUR'ÃN : Say: "Evil is that which your belief bids you . . .": It is a derisive expression ridiculing them for their killings of the prophets, their disbelief in Mũsã and their arrogance in committing sin after sin and then claiming that they were the true believers. The verse tauntingly asks them: Is this what your belief bids you?

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) explained the verse, and when there came to them a Book from Allãh verifying that which they have . . ., in this way: "The Jews found in their books that Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) , the Messenger of Allãh, would migrate and settle between `Ayr and Uḥud. So, they went out looking for that place. They passed by a mountain called Ḥadãd[1] ; and they said: 'Ḥadãd and Uḥud are the same'. So they dispersed nearby; some of them settled at Taymã', and some others at Fadak and yet others at Khaybar. Those at Tayma' once desired (to see) some of their brethren (at another place). A Bedouin from (the tribe of) Qays passed by them and they hired (his camels).

He told them: 'I shall take you from between 'Ayr and Uḥud.' They told him: 'When you pass between the two, tell us.' When they reached the land of Medina, he said: 'That is 'Ayr and this is Uḥud.' They descended from his camels and said to him: 'We have now found (the place of) our desire; now we do not need your camels, you may go wherever you wish.' Then they wrote to their brethren at Fadak and Khaybar: 'We have found the place, come therefore to us.' They wrote in reply: 'Now we have settled in this place, and have acquired properties; and we are so near to you. Therefore, when it will happen (i.e., when the Prophet will come to Medina), we shall rush to you.' Those Jews acquired properties in the land of Medina. When their wealth increased, its news came to the ears of Tubba'[2] and he attacked them. They fortified themselves and he laid siege to them. (And they used to take pity on the weekly soldiers of Tubba' and throw dates and barley to them at night. This came

But we could not find such a name in geographical dictionaries. Perhaps it is a corruption of Ḥadãd which is a mountain over-looking Taymã'; (see Mu`jamu 'l-buldãn, vol. 2, p. 229; al-Qãmũs, vol. 1, p. 287 and Tãju 'arũs, vol. 2, p. 333) or it may be another reading of Ḥadãd. to the notice of Tubba‘ and he softened towards them.)[2] He assured them of their safety and they came down to him. He told them: ‘I do like this place of yours and I am inclined to settle down here.’ They said: ‘It is not for you. It is the migration place of a prophet; and no one may settle down here until that happens.’ Thereupon he said: ‘Then I am leaving among you some of the members of my clan, so that when it happens they shall help and assist him.’ Thus he left behind the two tribes you see today, the Aws and the Khazraj. When these two (tribes) increased in number, they used to grab the properties of the Jews. At that time, the Jews used to warn them: ‘Oh! when Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) is sent (by Allãh) we shall certainly turn you out from our town and properties.' But when Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) was sent as Prophet, it was the Helpers (the Aws and the Khazraj) who believed in him and the very Jews denied him! This is the meaning of the words of Allãh, and aforetime they used to pray for victory against those who disbelieved . . .” (al-`Ayyãshi)

Ibn Isḥãq, Ibn Jarir, Ibn al-Mundhir, Ibn Abi Ḥãtam and Abũ Na'īm (in his Dalã'ilu 'n-nubuwwah) have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbãs that he said: “The Jews used to pray for victory against the Aws and the Khazraj by the right of the Messenger of Allãh, before he was sent as prophet. However, when Allãh raised him from the Arabs, the same Jews disbelieved in him and denied what they used to say about him. Mu`ãdh ibn Jabal, Bishr ibn abi ’l-Barã' and Dãwũd ibn Salamah told them: ‘O Jews! Fear Allãh and accept Islãm; because it was you who used to pray for victory against us by the right of Muhammad, while we were polytheists, and you used to tell us that he would (soon) be sent, describing to us his attributes.' Salãm ibn Mushkim, one of the tribe of Banu an-Naḍīr, said to them: 'He has not brought to us anything we know; and he is not the prophet we were telling you about.' Then Allãh sent down (the verse): And when there came to them a Book from Allãh . . .' " (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

Abũ Nu'aym has narrated in his Dala'ilu 'n-Nubuwwah from the chains of 'Aṭã' and aḍ-Ḍaḥḥãk, from Ibn 'Abbãs that he said: "The Jews of Banu Qurayzah and Banu an-Naḍir, before Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) was sent as prophet, used to pray to Allãh for victory, invoking Him against the disbelievers and saying: 'O Allãh! We seek Thy help, by the right of the untaught prophet, to let us triumph over them.' And they were given victory. But when there came to them that which they did recognize (i.e., Muhammad — s.a.w.a.), and actually they had no doubt whatsoever about him, they disbelieved in, and denied him. (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

The author says: Similar traditions have been narrated by various other chains also.

A commentator, after pointing to the last mentioned traditions and others like them, says: "These traditions — weak as their narrators are and incompatible as they are with the narrated traditions — are anomalous in their meaning too, because theymaintain that the prayer for victory was made 'by the person of the Prophet' or, as some traditions say, 'by the right of the Prophet'; and such a prayer is against the sharī`ah; and no one has any right on Allãh. How could prayer be offered with the help of such a non-existent right?

Reply: This objection results from not understanding the meaning of "right" and oath. Oath is used to join and bind a proposition, order, request or exclamation to an honourable and sublime thing — if that proposition etc. is wrong, the honour and sublimity of the thing bound to it, is tarnished and damaged. When you say, "By my life, Zayd is standing", you have bound the honour of your life to the truth of your statement; if that statement be wrong, your life would loose its honour. When you say, "By my life, I shall do this work", or "I entreat you, by my life, to do this work", you have, in the same way, put the honour of your life at stake for that work; if you did not do it, or if the second party did not heed to your entreaty, your life would loose its honour, its dignity. Two things emerge from this explanation:

First: Oath is the strongest method of emphasizing a talk, as the scholars of literature have confirmed.

Second: The thing by which one swears, must be more honourable and more important than the proposition etc. which it is related to; because a proposition cannot be emphasized with the help of a less important thing. Allãh has sworn, in His Book, by His own name and attributes. For example, So, by your Lord, We would most certainly question them all (15:92). Also, He quotes others swearing by His name and attributes: By Allãh, our Lord . . . (6:23) ; Then by Thy Might I will surely make them live an evil life (38:82). But He has also sworn by His Prophet, His angels and His books, as well as by His creatures like the heaven, the earth, the sun, the moon, the stars, the night, the day, the mountains, the rivers, the towns, the man, the tree, the fig and the olive. It could not be possible unless these things had a real dignity of their own bestowed on them by Allãh; every such thing must have an attribute reflecting one of the divine attributes, or an activity related to the divine sublimity — and every dignity and honour emanates from Him.

Now, what objection can be raised against a suppliant, if he prays to Allãh for something entreating Him by one of the above-mentioned things — considering the fact that Allãh Himself has sworn by those things and has given them a sublimity and dignity? Why an exception should be made in case of the Apostle of Allãh only? Is it not an affront to the Prophet to remove him from this common way of showing respect? By my life, Muhammad, the Apostle of Allãh (s. a. w. a.) is not less honourable in the eyes of Allãh than an Iraqi fig or a Syrian olive! These people forget that Allãh Himself has sworn by His Prophet : By your life! they were blindly wandering on in their intoxication (15 :72).

Now we should have a look at the "right". Right, as opposed to wrong, means a factual thing, existing outside imagination, like the earth and the man; in short, every real and substantial thing, as opposed to illusory and imaginary ones. Monetary and other social rights come within this category because they are firmly established by the society.

The Qur'ãn has nullified all the rights claimed by man, except that which is laid down and confirmed by Allãh — in creation as well as in legislation. Right in the legislative and social spheres is that which Allãh Himself has established, like the monetary rights, the rights of the brothers and the rights of the parents etc.

It is necessary to mention here that no one can lay down a right against Allãh, no one can make it incumbent upon Allãh to do or give something. But it is possible for Allãh to make it incumbent upon Himself to do something, or to give someone something, all in the sphere of legislation. Then that "someone" shall have a right on Allãh which Allãh Himself has established. For example, Allãh says: even so (now) it is a right on Us (that) We deliver the believers (10:103) ; And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the apostles: Most surely they shall be assisted ones, and most surely Our host alone shall be the victorious ones (37:171-173)

The assistance, promised here, is general and unconditional,not restricted by any proviso. Getting deliverance is the right of the believers on Allãh, and getting assistance is, in the same way, the right of the apostles. By establishing this right on Himself for the apostles, Allãh has enhanced their dignity and honour. And there is nothing to prevent a suppliant from entreating Allãh to help and deliver him from his difficulties, by the right of His apostle or apostles. Allãh Himself has laid down that right and He Himself swears by every honourable thing, showing us that such oaths and adjurations are in fact liked by Him.

In short, there is no hitch in entreating Allãh by His Apostle or by the right of His Apostle. The same applies to entreating Him by His friends, or by the right of His friends. He has established a right for them on Himself that He will surely assist them in the path of happiness, with every related assistance.

The claim that "no one has any right on Allãh" is just a nonsense. Of course, no one can lay down a right for himself on Allãh; no one can make it incumbent on Allãh to do some thing. But a suppliant does not pray to Allãh by a right forced on Allãh by someone else; he pleads to Him by a right which He Himself has established pledging His Own word; and His Promise is never broken.

In the Name of Allãh,
The All-compassionate, The All-merciful

Praise belongs to Allãh, the Lord of all being;
the All-compassionate, the All-merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement;
Thee only we serve, and to Thee alone we pray for succour;
Guide us in the straight path;
the path of those whom Thou hast blessed,
not of those against whom Thou art wrathful,
nor of those who are astray.

* * * * *

O ' Allãh! send your blessings to the head of your messengers and the last of your prophets, Muhammad and his pure and cleansed progeny.
Also send your blessings to all your prophets and envoys.

بِسْمِ اللّٰهِ الرَّحْمٰنِ الرَّحِيمِ

اَلْحَمْدُ لِلّٰهِ رَبِّ الْعَالَمِينَ الرَّحْمٰنِ الرَّحِيمِ

مَالِكِ يَوْمِ الدِّينِ اِيَّاكَ نَعْبُدُ وَاِيَّاكَ نَسْتَعِينُ

اِهْدِنَا الصِّرَاطَ الْمُسْتَقِيمَ صِرَاطَ الَّذِينَ

اَنْعَمْتَ عَلَيْهِمْ غَيْرِ الْمَغْضُوبِ عَلَيْهِمْ

وَلَا الضَّالِّينَ

اَللّٰهُمَّ صَلِّ عَلٰى

سَيِّدِ رُسُلِكَ وَخَاتَمِ اَنْبِيَائِكَ

مُحَمَّدٍ وَاٰلِهِ الطَّيِّبِينَ الطَّاهِرِينَ

وَصَلِّ عَلٰى جَمِيعِ الْاَنْبِيَاءِ وَالْمُرْسَلِينَ

FOREWORD

1. al-'Allamah as-Sayyid Muhammad Ḥusayn at-Tabataba'i (1321/1904 – 1402/1981) – may Allãh have mercy upon him – was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the English translation of al-Mīzãn.

2. al-'Allamah at-Tabataba'i is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al Mizan fi Tafsīri 'l-Qur an which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the 'Allamah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur'ãn in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzãn because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur'ãn and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-tistadh al-'Allamah as-Sayyid Said Akhtar ar-Radawi to undertake this task because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzãn and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-'Allamah at-Tabataba'i was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzãn and its discussions.

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the second volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān. This volume corresponds with the second half of the first volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allãh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendixes included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of the English translation of al-Mizãn: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

* * * * *

We implore upon Allãh to effect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work which we have started. May Allãh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Say: "If the future abode . . . ": The Jews claimed, "Fire shall not touch us but for a few days" (2:80). When they were told to believe in what Allãh had revealed, they declared: "We believe in that which was revealed to us" (2:91). All this implied that only they would be saved on the Day of Resurrection to the exclusion of all the others; that their deliverance and happiness in the next world would be unmarred by any unpleasant experience as the Fire shall not touch them but for a few days – equal in number to the day they worshipped the calf. To remove that self-delusion and conceit, Allãh put a challenge to them, to show them their true face, to make them realize that their claims were without any substance. He (Allãh) told His Apostle to say to them: "If the future abode . . . is for you . . ." The "future abode" points to the felicity and happiness of that abode; the owner of a house arranges and manages it in the best possible way, and decorates it according to his taste and liking. "with Allãh", that is, firmly established with Allãh, by His order and His permission; the phrase has the same import here as in the verse: Surely the religion with Allãh is Islãm (3:19). "purely", that is, unmixed with punishment or humiliation – utmost that you think possible is a punishment of just a few days. "to the exclusion of the people", because you presume that all religions, except your own, are false. If you really think so, "then invoke death if you are truthful".

This challenge is similar to the one given in verse: Say: "O you who are Jews, if you think that you are the friends of Allãh to the exclusion of other people, then invoke death if you are truthful" (62:6). The argument is very clear about which nobody can have any doubt whatsoever. Any man (nay! even an animal having a limited perception and sensitivity), if given total freedom to choose between comfort and discomfort, will at once opt for the comfort, without any hesitation, without any contemplation. Put before him a life polluted with trouble and turmoil and another clean and pure, and tell him to take hold of any one; naturally, and without any doubt, he will grab at the pure one. If for any reason he is prevented from the life of his choice, he will always dream of it, and will remain looking for any opportunity to lay his hands upon it.

If the Jews are truthful in their claim that the other world's pure happiness belongs to them to the exclusion of others, then they must yearn for it with their hearts, words and deeds.

"And they will never invoke it on account of what their hands have sent before", for example, the killings of the prophets, the disbelief in Mũsã (a.s.) and breaking of the covenants, "and Allãh knows the unjust ones".

QUR'ÃN: on account of what their hands have sent before: It is a metaphorical reference to the "deeds". Most of the external deeds are done by hands; then the finished product is sent to the one who wants it or may benefit from it.

The sentence has two allegorical allusions: it counts every deed as having been done by hands; and it ascribes the action of "sending" to the hands while in fact it is the man who sends his deeds before.

Actions of a man, and especially those done regularly, are a clear mirror of his unconscious and sub-conscious personality. Evil deeds expose the evil nature of the doer – and such a nature does not like meeting its Lord or staying in the abode of His friends.

QUR'ÃN: And you will most certainly find them the greediest of men for life: It is an explanation of the divine word, "And they will never invoke it . . ." They do not yearn for death because they are greediest of all men for the life of this world. It is this greed and avid craving to remain in this world which prevents them from looking forward to the next abode. The word, "life", is used in this verse as a common noun – it is to show how insignificant and trifling this life is; Allãh has said: And this life of the world is nothing but a sport and a play, and as for the next abode, that most surely is life – did they but know (29:64).

QUR'ÃN: and (greedier) that even those who are polytheists: Apparently the conjunctive, "and", joins this clause to the word, "men", that is, you will find them greedier than even the polytheists for life.

QUR'ÃN: and his being granted a long life will in no way remove him further off from the chastisement: The verse's literal translation: and it is not a remover of him from the chastisement his being granted a long life. "mã" (ما = not, no, particle of negation); the pronoun "it" is that of sha'n and qiṣṣah (ضَميرُ الشّأن و القصّة) "his being granted a long life" is the subject preceded by the predicate, that is, "is not a remover of him . . ."

The sentence may also be syntactically analysed in another way: the pronoun, "it", may refer to the love each of them had of being granted a life of a thousand years. It would accordingly mean that that love of theirs would not ward off the Divine Chastisement from them; in this case, the clause, "his being granted a long life" will be a description of that love.

* Sha'n (ضَميرُ الشّأن) is a personal pronoun (third person, masculine) which is used to begin a sentence. That of feminine gender is called the pronoun of qiṣṣah (ضَمير القصّة). The nearest thing to it in the English grammer is the indefinite demonstrative pronoun. (tr.)

Anyhow, what the verse says is this: They shall never invoke the death, and I swear that you will most certainly find them the greediest of men for this base and insignificant life which prevents them from the happy and good life of the next abode; you will find them greedier than even the polytheists for this life, although the latter do not believe in the Resurrection and the Day of Judgment, and consequently their love for this life should be unparalleled; every one of them loves that he should be granted the longest life, but even the longest life cannot remove him further off from the Divine Chastisement, because life, no matter how long it is, is limited and has to come to an end.

QUR'ÃN: every one of them loves that he should be granted a life of a thousand years: that is, the longest life. "a thousand" is used to denote numerousness. In Arabic, it is the highest denomination which is described by a single word. Higher denominations are shown by repetition and combination, for example, ten thousand, a hundred thousand, a thousand thousand (i.e., a million).

QUR'ÃN: And Allãh sees what you do: "al-Baṣīr" (البَصيرُ) is one of the beautiful names of Allãh; it signifies that although He does not have a body or an eye, He is fully cognizant of all things which we perceive with our eyes. It shows a facet of the name, al-'Alīm (العَلْيمُ = the Knowing).

QUR'ÃN: Say: "Whoever is the enemy of Gabriel – for surely he revealed it to your heart by Allãh's Command: Apparently the verse was revealed as a reply to something the Jews had said – they arrogantly refused to believe in what was revealed to the Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), on the pretext that they were enemies of Gabriel who had the charge of bringing the revelation to Muhammad (s.a.w.a.). Allãh replied to them in two verses – concerning the Qur'ãn and Gabriel both. Also the traditions giving the background of the verses confirm it. The verses contain four replies to their arrogance in denial of the Qur'ãn.

First: Gabriel has revealed the Qur'ãn to your heart by Allãh's Command, not by his own wish. Therefore, even if they feel enmity towards Gabriel, it should not prevent them from believing in a revelation sent down by Allãh's Command.

Second: The Qur'ãn verifies the Divine Book which was revealed before it and which they have in their hands. How can they believe in a book and deny another which verifies it?

Third: The Qur'ãn is a guidance for those who believe in it.

Fourth: It is also a good news for the believers. How can a sane person turn his face away from guidance and good news, even if it is brought to him by a supposed enemy of his?

So far as their professed enmity towards Gabriel was concerned, they were replied as follows:

Gabriel is one of the angels of Allãh; he has no authority except to follow and obey the Divine Command – just like Michael and other angels. They are honoured servants of Allãh; they do not disobey His command, and they do as they are told. Likewise, the apostles of Allãh have no authority except by Allãh and from Allãh. To have enmity towards them, to harbour hatred for them is enmity and hatred towards Allãh Himself. Therefore, whoever is the enemy of Allãh and His angels and His apostles and Gabriel and Michael, so surely Allãh is his enemy.

All these replies are clearly given in these two verses.

QUR'ÃN: for surely he revealed it to your heart by Allãh's Command: Apparently, it should have been "to my heart"; instead, it says, "to your heart". The pronoun has been changed from the first to the second person to draw attention to an important factor: So far as the revelation of the Qur'ãn is concerned, neither Gabriel has any choice or authority of his own in bringing it down (he is subject to the Divine command, which he faith-fully carries out) nor the Apostle of Allãh (s. a.w. a.) has any choice or authority of his own in receiving it and conveying it to his ummah; his heart is the receptacle of revelation, on which he has no control at all and which he is bound to convey to his people.

The Jews have been mentioned in these verses sometimes in the second person, and sometimes in the third. Their admonition and condemnation has continued for a long time; and the Speaker wants to show that they do not deserve the honour of being addressed by Him. That is why He frequently changes the styles, again and again going from the second to the third person pronouns. The audience gets the impression that the Speaker does not like to speak to them – because of their heedlessness and depravity, but at the same time does not like to leave them as they are without pronouncing His judgment against them.

QUR'ÃN: the enemy of the unbelievers: Instead of saying, "their enemy", the verse uses the word, "enemy of the unbelievers"; it serves to show also the reason of that enmity. Allãh is their enemy, because they are unbelievers, and Allãh is the enemy of the unbelievers.

QUR'ÃN: and none disbelieve in them except the transgressors: It explains the cause of their disbelief; they disbelieve because they are transgressors. Or, may be the definite article "the", in "the transgressors" refers to the group mentioned in the beginning of the chapter: but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors, who break the covenant of Allãh after its confirmation . . . (2:26-27)

As for Gabriel and how he brought the revelation to the heart of the Apostle of Allãh (s. a.w. a.) , we shall explain it, God willing, in another place; the same applies to Michael and other angels.

TRADITIONS

Ibn ''Abbãs explained the reason of the revelation of the verse, Say: "Whoever is the enemy of Gabriel. . .", in these words: "When the Prophet came to Medina, Ibn Suriya and some Jews of Fadak asked him (some questions). They said: 'O Muhammad! How do you sleep? Because we have been told about the sleep of the Prophet who would come in the last days?'

He said: 'My eyes sleep while my heart is awake.' They said: 'You are right, O Muhammad! Now tell us about the child whether it is from the man or from the woman?' He said: 'As for the bones, the nerves and the veins, they are from the man; and as for the flesh, the blood, the nails and the hairs, they are from the woman.' They said: 'You are right, O Muhammad! Then why is it that sometimes the child resembles his paternal uncles, without having a least likeness of his maternal uncles? And sometimes he resembles his maternal uncles without having any likeness at all to his paternal uncles?' He replied: 'He resembles to that parent's (side) whose fluid dominates the other's.' They said: 'You spoke the truth, O Muhammad! Now, tell us about your Lord, what is He?' Then Allãh revealed (the Chapter 112) : Say: "He, Allãh is One . . ." Then Ibn Suriya said: 'One (more) thing; if you tell (us) about it, I shall believe in you and follow you. Which angel is it that brings to you that which Allãh reveals to you?' He said: 'Gabriel.' (Ibn Suriya) said: 'He is our enemy; he brings the (order of) fighting, hard-ship and war. And Michael brings comfort and happiness. Had it been Michael who came to you (with revelation) we would have believed in you.' "

The author says: Very many traditions (nearly mutawãtir in number) have been narrated by both Sunni and Shi'ah narrators, that (when) the Apostle of Allãh (s. a.w. a.) (slept) his eyes used to sleep but his heart kept awake. Sleep did not make him unaware of himself; when asleep, he was well aware that he was asleep; when he dreamt he knew that he was dreaming. Not too often, this happens to some other good persons too when their souls are clean and they keep in touch with the Divine sublimity. When the soul rises to that level, it can never be oblivious of the various changes occurring to itself in its worldly life, nor can it forget its relation to its Lord. At this stage, it may look at the world and its life taking the whole spectrum at one glance, as a man looks at a tree and perceives it all at once. In this detached manner, it observes that all human beings are asleep – not only those who are manifestly asleep, but those too who are thought to be awake.

Almost all men have taken shelter under sensual perception; have bound themselves to the fetters of materialism. They are in fact asleep, even when they think they are awake. ‘Ali (a.s.) has said: “The people are asleep; when they die they will wake up . . .”

This topic will be further explained in other place; other sentences of this tradition too will be explained later

What! whenever they make a covenant, a party of them cast it aside? Nay, most of them do not believe (100). And when there came to them an Apostle from Allãh verifying that which they have, a party of those who were given the Book threw the Book of Allãh behind their backs as if they knew nothing (101).

* * * * *

QUR'ÃN: cast it aside: "an-Nabdh" (النَبْذ) to throw away, to renounce).

QUR'ÃN: And when there came to them an Apostle from Allãh . . . : The word, "an Apostle", definitely means the Apostle of Allãh, Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) ; it does not refer to any other apostle who might have come "verifying that which they have", because "when there came" does not mean "whenever there came"; in other words, it does not signify a recurring incidence, but an event that happened once only.

The verse points to the Jews' adverse attitude towards the truth: they were so steeped in falsehood that they concealed the foretellings of the Torah about the Prophet of Islam, and refused to believe in the Qur'ãn which verified that which they hod in their hands.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: And they followed what the satans chanted . . . The exegetes have disputed among themselves about each and every aspect of this verse; so much so that the resulting picture of the differences is almost unparalleled in the whole Qur'ãn. A list of the differences is given below:

"they followed ": Does the pronoun, "they", refer to the Jews of the Sulaymãn's time, or to those at the time of the Prophet, or to all?

"chanted": The Arabic word is "tatlu" (تَتْلُوْا) which may be translated as "chanted", "recited", "told a lie about", "faked" or "followed and acted according to". In which sense the word is used here? Every meaning has some supporters.

"satans": Does it refer to the satans of jinn? Or to those among the human beings? Or to both?

"about": The Arabic participle is " 'alã "(عَلٰى = against, on, about, upon). Does the phrase mean, about the kingdom of Sulaymãn? Or, during the reign of Sulaymãn? Or, against his kingdom? Or, on his reign?

"the satans disbelieved" : Some say, they disbelieved because they published the sorcery among the people. Others say, they disbelieved because they ascribed the sorcery to Sulaymãn. Still others say, the disbelief, as mentioned here, actually means sorcery.

"they taught men sorcery": It means they instructed them as a teacher instructs his students. No! it means that they buried the chants under Sulaymãn's chair, and then directed the men to it who brought it out and learnt it.

"and what was sent down": The word translated here as "what" is "mã" (مَا) which is a relative pronoun ("what"); also, it is a particle of negation ("not"). "And" is mostly used as a conjunctive; but not infrequently, it is also used to begin a new sentence. A group says that "mã" means "what", and the conjunctive joins it to "what the satans chanted" (the Jews followed what was sent down). Another party is of the opinion that the conjunctive joins it to "sorcery" (the satans taught them sorcery and that which was sent down). A third group thinks that "mã" means "not", and the word "and" begins a new sentence (And sorcery was not sent down to the two angels, contrary to what the Jews claimed).

"sent down": Was it sent down from the heavens? Or from the highlands?

"the two angels": They were the angels from the heaven. No! They were two good men, or men who feigned to be good. No! It is not "al-malakayn" (المَلَكَيْن = two angels) ; it is "al-malikayn" (المَلِكَيْن = two kings).

"Babylon": It is the famous ancient city of Iraq. No! It is a city in Damawand (Iran); Wrong! It is the land between Naṣibayn (Turkey) and Ra'sul 'Ayn.

"these two taught no one": Teaching is used in its common meaning of instruction. No! It means, these two apprised no one.

"do not be a disbeliever" : By learning sorcery? Or, by practising it? Or, by both?

"the men learned from these two": The "two" refers to the two angels. No! It means, they learned from the two subjects, sorcery and disbelief. Wrong! They learned the practice of sorcery, in place of the advice given by the angels.

"that by which they might cause a separation between a man and his wife": Some exegetes say that they caused love or hate between the couple with the help of their sorcery. Others think that they misled one of the spouses to disbelief and polytheism, and the apostasy caused the separation mentioned here. A third group say that they created hatred and enmity between the couple with their calumny and slander.

This, in short, gives a glimpse of the differences of opinions concerning the explanations of the words and clauses of the verse. There are still more differences about the event referred to – whether it narrates an actual happening or is just a parable; and so on and so forth. Compute the differences mentioned above and you will get nearly one million and two hundred sixty thou-sand possible explanations ($4 \times 3^{9} \times 2^{4}$)!!

It seems an astounding quality of the Qur'ãn, that a verse that is subjected to so many divergent interpretations, still maintains its highest standard of eloquence; that in spite of all these vagaries of the exegetes, its meaning is not disjointed, nor its beauty marred.

A similar treatment has been meted out to the verse: Is he then who has with him clear proof from his Lord, and a witness from him recites it and before it (is) the Book of Musã, a guide and a mercy (11:17).

However, it appears from the context that this verse deals with a hitherto unmentioned affair of the Jews, that is, their wide-spread use of sorcery. They based this practice on one or two stories, which were very popular among them.

The Jews were addicted to making alterations and interpolations in, and omissions from, their Divine books, let alone the historical narrations. They used to change their books and records fitting them to the prevalent moods of their times. A story narrated by them was not to be relied upon. But this Qur'ãnic admonition is based on their own belief, because it was they who used to narrate these stories.

The verse proves that the practice of sorcery was prevalent among the Jews, and that they ascribed it to Sulaymãn (a.s.). They presumed that Sulaymãn (a.s.) got the kingdom and subjugated the jinn, the human beings, the animals and the birds – all with the help of sorcery; and all the supernatural miraculous events related to him depended on witchcraft. And they claimed that some of the enchantments in their hands had come down to them from him. The remaining portion was attributed to the two angels at Babylon, named Hãrũt and Marũt.

The Qur'ãn refutes the stories, saying that the prophet

Sulaymãn (a.s.) never indulged in witchcraft and sorcery. How could he, when sorcery was nothing but disbelief in Allãh? Sulaymãn (a.s.) could not be an unbeliever as he was a sinless, innocent prophet. All this is clearly seen from the words of Allãh: "and Sulaymãn was not an unbeliever, but the satans disbelieved, they taught men sorcery"; "and certainly they knew that he who bought it should have no share (of good) in the hereafter". Sulaymãn's position was too distinguished, his rank too high, and his name too sacred to be associated with disbelief and sorcery. He was the prophet whose outstanding position has been eulogized in several places in the chapters of Meccan period, long before this Chapter of the Cow was revealed. See, for example, the chapters of the Cattle (6th), the Prophets (21st), the Ant (27th) and Sad (38th). You shall find therein that Sulaymãn (a.s.) was an excellent servant of Allãh, a prophet and an apostle; Allãh gave him the knowledge and the wisdom; and granted him a kingdom which was not fit for any one after him. Obviously, Sulaymãn could not indulge in sorcery; it was just a mythical story invented by the satans, which they dictated to their human friends; and it was the satans who disbelieved because they misguided the men by teaching them sorcery.

As for the story of the two angels at Babylon, the Qur'ãnic stand is as follows:

The two angels, Hãrũt and Maria, were certainly given some sorcery as a means of test and trial for the human beings – and no objection could be raised against that; after all, Allãh has taught the human nature the ways of evil too in order that He may test them with it. Likewise, sorcery was sent down to the two angels; but they did not teach it to anyone until they had said to him: Surely we are only a trial, therefore do not become a disbeliever by using it for wrongful purposes; you must use it only to nullify the effect of witchcraft, to expose the viles of the sorcerers and things like that. But the men learned from them that by which they might destroy the domestic peace and turn the love between husband and wife – the best of the things ingrained in human nature – into hatred, causing a separation between them. Also they learned what harmed them and did not benefit them.

The verse therefore may be explained as follows:

And they (i.e., the Jews coming after the reign of Sulaymãn – every generation passing on the legacy to the later one) followed what the satans from among the jinn faked and lied about the kingdom of Sulaymãn. "Tatlũ" (تَتْلُوْا = translated here as recited or chanted) actually has the connotation of "lied about " or "faked about", because it is followed by the preposition " 'alã "(عَلٰى = on) which has changed its semantic value. Why do we say that the satans were from the jinn? The following two verses read together provide the answer to this question: And of the satans there were those who dived for him and did other work beside that, and We kept guard over them (21:82); and when he fell down, the jinn came to know plainly that if they had known the unseen, they would not have tarried in abasing torment (34:14). The first verse shows that the satans were reduced to subjection by Sulaymãn (a.s.) who kept them away from mischief by assigning to them very heavy task; and the second verse refers to the same slavish group as the jinn.

QUR'ÃN: and Sulaymãn was not an unbeliever: "and" is used here in the meaning of "while". Sulaymãn did not indulge in sorcery; therefore, it was not he who disbelieved; rather it was the satans who disbelieved, because they misled the people by teaching them sorcery.

QUR'ÃN: and what was sent down: The Jews followed that which was sent down – through inspiration – to the two angels at Babylon, Hãrũt and Mãrũt. Yet these two did not teach any one any thing of the sorcery, without warning him not to practice it. They admonished every one who wanted to learn sorcery: Surely we are only a trial for you. What we teach you is but a means of test for you. Beware! Don't become an unbeliever by practising sorcery.

QUR'ÃN: Even then men learned from these two: that is, from the two angels, Hãrũt and Maria. "that by which they might cause a separation", that is, the sorcery which caused separation "between a man and his wife".

QUR'ÃN: and they cannot hurt with it any one except with Allãh's permission: It is a parenthetic sentence, to remove a possible misunderstanding: One could assume, on hearing that the sorcerers caused separation between a husband and his wife, that the sorcerers were powerful enough to disturb the divinely ordained arrangement of the world; that they could undo the Divine Decree and change the system created by Allãh. This sentence clears the air and emphasizes the fact that sorcery draws its strength from the Divine Decree; it cannot affect any thing but with the permission of Allãh. Therefore, the sorcerers act within the framework of the system designed by Allãh.

This sentence was placed where it is because only the preceding sentence (that by which they might cause a separation . . .) mentions the effect of sorcery. Therefore, it was explained that whatever effect it had was based on the permission of Allãh. The following clause (and they learned what harmed them and did not profit them) is not concerned with this aspect of sorcery, and the above-mentioned clarifying parenthetic sentence, if placed after it, would have looked out of place.

QUR'ÃN: and certainly they knew that he who bought it should have no share (of good) in the hereafter: They knew it because their reason and intellect told them that the sorcery was the most wicked source of disorder in the society. Also, they were made aware of it by Mũsã (a.s.) when he had said: and the magician shall not be successful wheresoever he may come from (20:69).

QUR'ÃN: and vile was the price for which they sold their souls; had they but known (this): They knew that sorcery was bad for them and ruinous for their future abode; yet it was as though they did not know it – because they did not act according to their knowledge. If a knowledge fails to lead the knower to the straight path, then it is not knowledge; it is ignorance. Allãh says: Have you then seen him who takes his low desire for his god, and Allãh has made him err in spite of (his) knowledge . . . (45:23). Therefore, it was completely in order to wish for them know-ledge and guidance, even if they had had the knowledge before.

QUR'ÃN: And if they had believed and guarded themselves . . . .: If they had followed the dictates of belief and piety, instead of following the satans' yarns and practising sorcery which is nothing short of disbelief, they would have got its reward from Allãh. This verse indicates that the disbelief emanating from sorcery is a disbelief within the sphere of action, like that which results from withholding zakãt; it is not a disbelief within the sphere of faith. Had the sorcery been a disbelief within the sphere of faith, Allãh would have only said, "And if they believed", without adding "and guarded themselves (against evil)". The Jews had believed, no doubt; but they did not guard themselves against evil and did not desist from the things forbidden by Allãh; therefore, Allãh did not attach any importance, any value, to their belief, and they were called the disbelievers.

QUR'ÃN : reward from Allãh would certainly have been better; had they but known (this): that is, better than the rewards and profits they seek through sorcery and amass through disbelief.

TRADITIONS

al Bãqir (a.s.) said, inter alia, explaining the words of Allãh, And they followed what the satans chanted (of sorcery) against the kingdom of Sulaymãn . . .: "When Sulaymãn died, Iblīs invented sorcery and wrote it in a book; then folding it, wrote on its back: 'This is the valuable treasure of knowledge which Asif ibn Barkhiya produced for the king Sulaymãn ibn Dãwũd. Whoever wanted such and such thing, should do so and so.' Then he buried it under his throne. Thereafter, he unearthed it for the Jews and recited it (before them). The disbelievers said: 'Sulaymãn had not gained supremacy over us but because of this.' And the believers said: 'Nay! He was a servant of Allãh and His prophet.' Thus Allãh, Great is His remembrance! said: And they followed what the satans chanted (of sorcery) against the kingdom of Sulaymãn." (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyãshi, al-Qummi)

The author says: This tradition says that it was the Satan, that is, Iblīs, who invented sorcery and wrote and recited it. There is no discrepancy between this statement and the verse under discussion which ascribes these things to the satans from among the jinn. Even their deeds are ultimately attributed to the Iblīs, because he is the source of all evil; it is he who instigates his friends to wickedness and evil. Such usage is common in the traditions.

It appears from this tradition that the verb, "tatlu" in this verse is derived from "at tilãwah" (التِّلاوَةُ = to recite, to chant). It not in conflict with the interpretation given by us in the commentary that it gives the meaning of "lied about" or "faked about"; because, as we said there, this connotation emerges from the preposition, " 'alã " which has changed its semantic value. The sentence, therefore, may be interpreted as follows: The satans chanted the sorcery, reciting it, and faking it, lying about the kingdom of Sulaymãn.

Etymologically, talã, yatlũ, tilãwatan (تَلا ، يَتلوا ، تِلاوَةً) returns to waliya, yali, wilãyatan (وَلِي ، يَلِي ، ولايَةً) which has the semantic value of being near to, governing and following; one owns a thing gradually, one part following the other – reciting is called at-tilawah simply because in recitation one word follows the other.

A fuller discourse of this subject will be given under the verse: Verily, your guardian is only Allãh and His Apostle and those who believe, those who establish prayer and pay zakãt while they bow down (5:58).

ar-Riḍã (a.s.) said, inter alia, in his discussion with al-Ma'mũn: "And as for Hãrũt and Marũt, they were two angels; they taught sorcery to the people in order that they could protect themselves from the enchantments of the sorcerers, and could nullify their devices. And they did not teach any one any (enchantment) until they had said to him: 'Surely we are only a trial, therefore do not be a disbeliever.' But a group became disbelievers by practising what they were warned against; and they caused a separation between a man and his wife with their practice (of sorcery). Allãh has said: and they cannot hurt with it any one except with Allãh's permission." ('Uyunu 'l-akhbãr)

ON SOME SPURIOUS TRADITIONS

Ibn Jarir has narrated from Ibn ''Abbãs that he said: "Whenever Sulaymãn wanted to enter the toilet or to attend to some of his affairs, he gave his ring to al-Jaradah, his wife. When Allãh decided to test Sulaymãn in the way He tested him, one day Sulaymãn gave his ring (as usual) to al-Jarãdah. Then Satan came to her in the likeness of Sulaymãn and said: 'Give me my ring.' So he took it and put it on. As soon as he did so, the satans (from the jinn and the human beings) came under his control. Then came Sulaymãn and said to her: 'Give me my ring.' She said: 'You are a liar; you are not Sulaymãn.' So Sulaymãn knew that it was a trial to test him. The satans got a free hand, and wrote, in those very days, some books containing enchantments and disbelief, and buried them under the chair of Sulaymãn. Thereafter they unearthed them and recited them before the people. And they said: 'It was because of these books that Sulaymãn dominated over the people.' Thus the people avoided Sulaymãn and accused him of disbelief. (It continued) until Allãh sent Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) and revealed to him: and Sulaymãn was not an unbeliever, but the satans disbelieved." (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

The author says: This story is found in other traditions too. It is a long story forming a part of a multitude purporting to show the supposed sins and mistakes of the prophets.

Said ibn Jarir and al-Khaṭīb (in his at-Tãrīkh) have quoted Nãfi' as saying: "I went on a journey with Ibn 'Umar. When the night was coming to its end, he said: 'O Nãfi'! Look at the red star*, has it risen?' Twice or thrice I said: 'No.' Then I said: 'It has risen.' He said: 'No welcome to it!' I said: 'Praise the Lord! (It is but) a star, subjugated, obedient (and) submissive!' He said: 'I have not told you except that which I heard the Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) saying. He said: "The angels (once) said: 'O Lord! How doest Thou bear with the mistakes and sins of the children of Ãdam?' (Allãh) said: 'I have put them to trial and given them some dispensation.' They said: 'If we were in their place, we would not have disobeyed Thee.' He said: 'Then select (for trial) two angels from among yourselves.' They spared no effort in the selection and (finally) selected Hãrũt and Mãrũt. They came down (to the earth) ; and Allãh created in them the lust." (At this juncture, Nãfi' said: 'And what is lust?' He said: 'Sexual urge.') "Then there came a woman, az-Zuhrah (i.e., Venus) by name, and both felt attracted towards her, each concealing his feeling from his companion. Then one of them asked the other: 'Do you feel in your heart what I do in mine?' The other said: 'Yes!' Thereupon, they asked her for themselves. She said: 'I will not give you power (over myself) until you teach me the name by which you ascend to, and descend from, the heaven.' They refused to do so. Then they asked her again; and again she refused. At last they did (teach her the name). When she flew (to the heaven), Allãh effaced her into a star and cut her wings. Then the (two angels) sought pardon from Allãh; and He gave them an option, saying: 'If it is your wish, I shall let you return to the position you held before, and then you shall be punished on the Day of Resurrection. Or, if you wish, I shall chastise you in this world, and when the Day of Resurrection comes you shall be reinstated to your previously held position.' So one of them said to the other: 'The punishment of this world will come to an end and will be short-lived.'

* The red star refers to the Mars, but as will be seen later, Ibn 'Umar is supposed to talk about the Venus. Obviously, the man who forged this "tradition" did not know the difference between the Mars and the Venus. (tr.)

Therefore, they opted for this world's chastisement against the punishment of the next world. And Allãh revealed to them to go to Babylon. They went there and the earth swallowed them up; they are hanging upside-down between the heaven and the earth, undergoing punishment up to the Day of Resurrection." ' " (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

The author says: Something like this has been narrated in some Shī'ah books too from al-Bãqir (a.s.). aṣ-Ṣuyũṭī, the Sunni traditionalist, has narrated more than twenty traditions of the same theme about Hãrũt, Mãrũt and the Venus; some of those traditions have been confirmed as having "correct" chains of narrators; and the chains end on various companions, like Ibn ''Abbãs, Ibn Mas'ũd, 'Ali, Abud-Dardã', 'Umar, 'Ã'ishah and Ibn 'Umar.

These are fictitious stories, which collectively ascribe to the angels of Allãh the worst type of polytheism and the most heinous sins, that is, idol-worship, murder, fornication and liquor-drinking. Could the angels indulge in such sins, when they are known to be the honoured servants of Allãh who are purified from all sins and mistakes? And they accuse the planet Venus to be a woman of loose character, who was transformed into a luminary body – have you ever heard of such a punishment!! – while it is known to be a heavenly body, free from any defect in its creation or any flaw in its system; a planet by which Allãh swears in the Qur'ãn: But nay! I swear by the stars that run their course (and) hide themselves . . . (81:15-16). Moreover, the astronomy has today unveiled its reality, and found out in detail the elements it is made of, as well as their quantity and combination – in short all matters related to it.

This story, like that given earlier (about Sulaymãn and his ring), is in complete agreement with the legends popular among the Jews. They remind one of the Greek mythology related to the stars and the planets.

A discerning reader will agree that these traditions, like those slandering and defaming the prophets and apostles, are but a few samples of the intrigues and machinations of the Jews.

Their prevalence in the Muslims' books of traditions is a living proof of the hold they held on the Muslims' minds in the early days of Islam. The Jews toyed with the Muslim traditions in any way they liked; and the Muslim traditionalists were their willing partners in these interpolations.

But Allãh has kept His Book under His Own protection. The enemies of truth cannot play with it. Whenever one of their satans tries to steal a hearing he is chased away by a visible flame. Allãh has said: Surely We have revealed the Reminder and We will most certainly be its guardian (15:9) ; and most surely it is a Mighty Book: Falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor from behind it; a revelation from the Wise, the Praised One (41:41- 42) ; And We reveal of the Qur'ãn that which is a healing and mercy to the believers, and it adds only to the perdition of the unjust (17:82). The promise given in these verses is unconditional. Every interpolation, every alteration is repulsed by the Qur'ãn. The Book of Allãh unmasks the true face of the interpolators, adding to their perdition. Also, the Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) has said: "Whatever is in conformity with the Book of Allãh, take it; and whatever is against it, leave it." The ummah has been given this frame of reference; it is this yardstick with which all the traditions attributed to the Prophet and his Ahlu 'l-bayt are to be measured. The Qur'ãn removes every falsehood and exposes every deception. Allãh says: Nay! We cast the truth against falsehood, so that it breaks its head, and lo! it vanishes (21:18) ; and Allãh desired to manifest the truth of what was true by His words . . . that He may manifest the truth of what was true and show the falsehood of what was false, even though the guilty ones disliked (8:7-8). Allãh confirms the truth and erases the falsehood by showing the true faces of both.

Some people, and especially those with materialistic out-look, who are overawed by the western civilization, have used the above-mentioned historical fact as a pretext to throw away all the traditions attributed to the Prophet. They looked at some traditionalists and al-Haruriyyah and found that they accepted every tradition – without any scrutiny whatsoever. They reacted to it by going to the other extreme and rejecting every tradition – without any scrutiny whatsoever.

It needs not much intelligence to realize that the total acceptance of the traditions is as bad as its total rejection. Its unconditional acceptance nullifies the standard laid down for the purpose of differentiating between the truth and the falsehood; and encourages one to ascribe lies to the Prophet. Likewise, its indiscriminate rejection casts aside the said standard and leads one to the rejection of the Book of Allãh itself – the Mighty Book that falsehood does not come to it from before it nor from behind it. Allãh has said in this Book: and whatever the Apostle gives you, take it; and from whatever he forbids you, keep back (59:7); And We did not send any apostle but that he should be obeyed by Allãh's permission (4:64). If the sayings of the Prophet had no authority, or if his words – reported to his contemporaries who were absent from his gathering or to the generations coming after his time – had no validity then nothing of the religion could survive at all.

Man by his instinct relies and accepts the reports brought by others – he cannot survive without it. As for the alterations and interpolations, it is not a disease peculiar to the traditions of the Prophet. The society depends on the reported news and information; and the motives to tell lies, to make changes and alterations to suit one's purpose, to twist the words and to quote them out of context, are much more stronger in the case of the worldly affairs. So, what do we do? Do we reject all reports and information? No! We scrutinize every report with the help of some well-established and relevant standard; what passes the test, is accepted as truth; and that which fails is thrown aside as falsehood; and if no clear result emerges from the test, if we are unable to decide whether the report was true or not, we reserve our judgment – as our nature tells us to do in such cases.

The above procedure is applied regarding the subjects we have some expertise about. As for a subject outside our specialty, the common practice is to refer it to the specialists in that field and accept their judgment.

This is, in short, the dictate of human nature for the smooth running of the society. The self same system is adhered to in religion for distinguishing truth from falsehood. The litmus-paper of this test is the Book of Allãh – if a tradition conforms to it, its truth is confirmed; if it clearly goes against it, its false-hood is known; and if no definite stand may be taken because of some ambiguities, then the judgment is reserved. This system has been explained in the mutawãtir traditions of the Prophet and the Imãms (of the Ahlu 'l-bayt – a.s.). It applies to all the traditions that are not concerned with jurisprudence; as for those dealing with the law and jurisprudence, they are governed by the Principles of Jurisprudence.

A PHILOSOPHICAL DISCOURSE ON SORCERY AND WITCHCRAFT

It is a common knowledge that many unusual events do take place which are outside the frame of the established natural system. It is difficult to find someone who has not seen, or heard about, some abnormal or seemingly supernatural events. But we find after scrutiny that most of them are not enigmatic and mysterious at all; rather they arise from normal and natural causes. Often they result from practice and training, for example, eating poison, lifting heavy load, walking or dancing on tight-rope etc. Some are based on natural causes that are not known to the general public, for example, a man walks into flaming fire without coming to any harm, (he applies some chemicals like talc to his body) ; or sends a sheet of blank paper and the addressee understands the message it contains. (He writes with an invisible ink which becomes visible if heated by fire or treated with some chemicals.) A third set depends on the sleight of hand like jugglery. All these seemingly abnormal feats actually emanate from the normal causes, although the causes remain hidden from a common man's eyes; they may even be beyond his ability.

Yet there are other strange happenings that cannot be attributed to any normal physical cause. For example, giving information of the unseen, and particularly foretelling the future events; the charms for love and hate, the spells harmfully or beneficially affecting man's virility; hypnotism; mesmerism; spiritualism; telekinesis and so on. It is known that such events do take place from time to time; we have seen some demonstrations ourselves; and similar reports were brought to us by reliable sources. Today there are many people in India, Iran and the western countries, who demonstrate such extraordinary feats – and their authenticity is beyond doubt.

It appears from close investigation of their methods and regimen that these feats spring from the will-power of the doer, and from his unshakable confidence in effectiveness of his work. The will-power emanates from the confidence, which in its turn arises from the knowledge. Sometimes the will acts independently and sometimes it needs some help: for example, writing a certain charm with a certain ink in a certain place at a certain time (for the amulets of love or hate) ; or fixing a mirror before a certain child (in the seances of spiritualism) ; or chanting a certain incantation a certain number of times, and so on and so forth. When the conditions are fulfilled the will is strengthened to bring the desired effect into being. When the knowledge becomes one with the knower, it influences his senses to such an extent that he sees the end product, that is, the desired effect, with his eyes. You may verify this statement yourself. Just tell yourself that a certain person is present before you and that you are looking at him; then put your imagination to work to bring his form before your eyes; this should be raised to such a high level of certainty that you become oblivious of all contrary thoughts and ideas. And then you will actually see him standing before you – as you had imagined. Many is a doctor who, acting on this principle, restored to health his incurable patients – simply by creating in them the confidence that they would soon get their health back.

Taking this principle a step further, if someone's will-power is extraordinarily strong, it might create an impression on other's psyche too – as it had created on his own self in the foregoing example. That impression might, or might not, depend on fulfillment of some conditions, as indicated earlier.

From the above discourse, we may deduce the following three principles:

First: The appearance of such extraordinary events depends on the firm "knowledge" and strong conviction of the doer. But it is irrelevant whether that "knowledge" is true to the fact or not. That explains why the conjurations of the priests of the sun-god and the moon-goddess etc. seemed to work – although they believed that the heavenly bodies had souls, which they claimed to bring under their control by their magic. Probably the same applies to the angels and satans whose names are "discovered" and invoked by many practitioners of the magic art. The same is true for spiritualism and its séance and spirit communication – and the spiritualists' belief that the spirits attend their sittings. Utmost that may be claimed regarding those sessions, is that the spirit appears in their imagination or, let us say, before their senses – and this "perception" emanates from their firm belief in their art. But it can never be said that the spirit actually presents itself at those sittings – otherwise all the participants in the sitting should have perceived its presence, because everyone of them has the same senses as the medium has.

By accepting this principle, we may solve many problems related to the séance and spirit communication. For example:

1 – Sometimes the spirit of a living man is called to present itself at a séance, and supposedly it comes there. But at that very moment, that man is busy attending to his affairs, and he never feels his spirit leaving him even for an instant. The question is: As a man has only one spirit, how was it possible that his spirit presented itself to that séance without his being aware of it?

2 – The spirit is an immaterial essence which has no relation whatsoever with space and time. How can it present itself at a certain place at a certain time?

3 - Why is it that often a single spirit appears before different mediums in different forms?

4 – Why is it that sometimes when the spirits are called to a séance, they tell lies and give wrong answers? And why do the various spirits sometimes contradict each other?

All these problems will be solved if the principle is accepted that it is not any spirit that presents itself to the séance; it is only the firm belief and conviction of the spiritualist and his medium that is at work, making the medium see, hear and feel the spirit. It is all a play of his imagination and will; and nothing more.

Second: Some of the people, holding the strong and effective will-power, rely on their own power and their own being, in bringing about the desired effect, the intended super-natural events. Such events are bound to be limited in strength, confined in their scope – in their own imagination as well as in reality.

On the other side, there are some persons, like the prophets and the friends of Allãh who, in spite of their most effective will-power, totally rely on their Lord. They truly worship Him and have full trust in Him. They do not wish any thing but from their Lord, and by His permission. Theirs is a pure and clear will, untainted by any personal feeling of their own. It does not depend except on Allãh. This is a Divine Will – not limited in any way, nor restricted in any manner.

The super-natural events that are brought into being by the first group may be of many kinds: If they are based on enquiry of, or help from, a jinn or a spirit etc., then it is called "al-kihãnah" (اَلكِهَانَةُ) = divination, sooth-saying, fortune-telling); and if it comes about by means of a charm, amulet, telesm or other such instruments or portions, then it is called magic.

The super-natural events shown by the prophets and friends of Allãh are also of many kinds: If it is produced as a challenge, in order to prove the truth of the claim of prophethood, then it is called miracle; and if it is not offered as a challenge, then it is named "al-karãmah (اَلكَرَامَةُ) which literally means nobility, mark of honour; and in Islamic terminology is used for a miraculous event shown without a challenge; and if it happens as a result of the prayer to Allãh, then it is called, "answer to the prayer."

Third: As the whole thing depends on the will-power of the doer, its strength varies according to the strength (or weakness) of the will. That is why some of them may nullify the others, as, for example, the miracle annihilates the sorcery.

Also, a weak agent fails to impose his will on a stronger psyche, as is often seen at the sessions of mesmerism, hypnotism and seances.

We shall further explain this subject somewhere else.

AN ACADEMIC DESCRIPTION OF VARIOUS KINDS OF MAGIC

There are many fields of study dealing with various awe-striking feats and extraordinary deeds; and it is very difficult to classify them so as not to leave any thing out. However, we give here a list of the more commonly used branches of this art:

a) as-Sīmiyã': It deals with the ways of combining the will-power with particular physical and material forces for manipulating the natural order and, thus, producing extraordinary effects. Under this head comes the manipulation of thought, also known as the eye-enchantment.

It is the most deserving candidate for the title of magic.

b) al-Līmiyã': It teaches how one may establish a connection between his psyche and the higher and stronger spirits, in order that one may bring them under one's control, for example, the spirits of the stars, or the jinn, etc.

It is also called the knowledge of subjugation of the spirits.

c) al-Hīmiyã': It explains how the powers of the higher spiritual world may be combined with the base elements of this world to produce awe-inspiring effects. It is also called talisman. The stars and their configuration have some relation to the material happenings of this world, in the same way as the elements and compounds and their physical qualities affect those phenomena. Supposedly if the heavenly forms, pertaining to a certain event, for example, A's life or B's death, could be combined with the relevant material forms, the desired effect would take place without fail.

d) ar-Rīmiyã': It trains one how to control and manipulate the qualities of various things, to produce seemingly super-natural effects. It is also called "ash-Sha'badhah" (اَلشَّعْبَذَةُ) = sleight of hand, jugglery, magic).

These four fields of knowledge, together with the fifth, called "al-Kīmiyã'" (اَلكِيمياءُ) = alchemy, the forerunner of chemistry, primarily the attempt to transmute base metals into gold or silver) formed what the ancients called the five secrets, mysterious branches of knowledge.

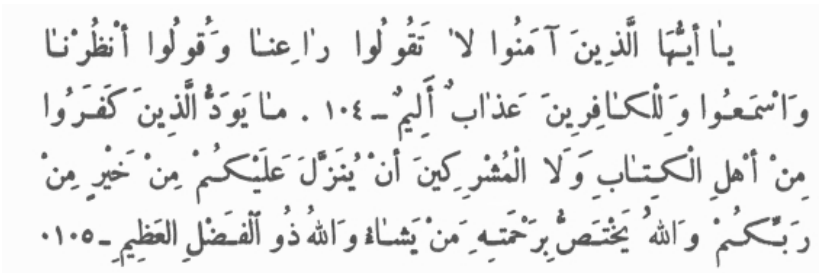
ash-Shaykh al-Bahã'ī has said: "The best book written on these subjects was the one I saw in Harãt, 'Kulãh-e sar' (the head's cap) by name. Its name was an acronym, made of the first letters of the five subjects, that is, al-Kīmiya', al Līmiya', al-Hīmiyã', as-Sīmiyã' and ar-Rīmiyã'".

The- standard books of these subjects are the epitome of the books of Minds, Rasã'il, al-Khusraw Shãhī, adh-Dhakhīrah, al-Iskandariyyah, as-Sirru 'l-maktũm (by ar-Rãzī), at-Taskhirat (by as-Sakkaki) and A'mãlu 'l-kawakib as-Sab'ah (by al-Ḥakīm Ṭamṭam al-Hindī).

Supplementary to the above are the following subjects:

e) The knowledge of numbers (numerology): It shows the relation of numbers and letters with the desired effect. The relevant letters or numbers are filled in a magic square or triangle etc. in a particular sequence.

f) al-Khafiyah: (اَلخَافِيَةُ) = the hidden knowledge): It breaks down the name of the desired effect or other relevant names, and finds out the names of the angels or the satans managing the said effect; and then composes the invocations made of those names.



The books written by ash-Shaykh Abul-'Abbãs al-Bũni and as-Sayyid Ḥusayn al-Akhlãṭi are the standard works of the above two subjects.

Then there are various modern arts covering this field, which have gained wide currency nowadays; for example, mesmerism, hypnotism and spirit communication. As described earlier, these are based on the impression created on the imagination by the will-power. There are numerous well-known books and magazines dealing with these subjects.

We have given all this detail here, so that it may be ascertained which of them could be classified as magic or sorcery

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe!: It is the first place in the Qur'ān where the believers have been addressed in this way, "O you who believe!" This mode of address has been used in some eighty-five places in the Qur'ān.*

---

* Eighty-eight, to be exact. Vide al-Mu'jam al-Mufahras, (by Muhammad Fu'ād 'Abdul '1-Bāqī). (tr.)

Addressing the believers as "O you who believe!", or describing them as "those who believe", is a special distinction accorded to this ummah. Otherwise, the previous nations are variously described as "the people" (e.g., "the People of Nũḥ, and, "the People of Hũd"; 'He said: 'O my people! have you considered if I have a clear proof from my Lord . . . ' " [11: 88]); and "the dwellers" (e.g., "the dwellers of Madyan", "the dwellers of the Rass"); and "the children" (e.g., "the Children of Israel", ''O Children of Israel !''). The epithet, "those who believe", is, therefore, a mark of honour awarded to the believers of this ummah.

It appears from deep meditation of the Qur'ãn that the import of the words, "those who believe", is somewhat different from that of the words, "the believers". (For an example of the latter, see the verse: and turn to Allãh all of you, O believers! [24:31]) .

Allãh says in the Qur'ãn: Those who bear the throne and those around it celebrate the praise of their Lord and believe in Him and ask forgiveness for those who believe: "Our Lord! Thou embracest all things in mercy and knowledge, therefore grant forgiveness to those who turn (to Thee) and follow Thy way, and save them from the punishment of the hell. Our Lord! and make them enter the gardens of perpetuity which Thou hast promised to them and those who do good of their fathers and their wives and their offsprings, surely Thou are the Mighty, the Wise" (40:7-8).

It shows that the angels and the bearers of the throne ask forgiveness for "those who believe" ; then the same group has been referred to as "those who turn (to Thee) and follow Thy way". ("turn" actually means, return.) The prayer continues to "make them (i.e., those who believe) enter the garden" and then joins to them the doers of good from among "their fathers and their wives and their offspring." If the epithet, "those who believe", were to include all those who believed in the Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) irrespective of the quality of their belief, then it would have covered their fathers, wives and children as well (who do good) ; and there would have been no need to mention them separately; all would have equally benefited from the prayer for those who believe.

Also, have a look at the verse: And (as for) those who believe and their offspring follow them in faith, We will unite with them their offspring and We will not diminish to them aught of their work; every man is responsible for what he has wrought (52:21): If the offspring who followed them in faith, were included in the epithet, "those who believe", there would be no sense in saying that the offspring would be united with them. Even if we were to say that the verse refers to the generation after generation of the believers, that every succeeding generation will be united to the preceding one (provided both believed in the Apostle of Allãh – s.a.w.a.), the meaning would not seem very proper in the context. If that were the import of the verse, then why this "uniting"? Also, what purpose would be served by the sentence, "and We will not diminish to them aught of their work"? Such an interpretation may prove correct for one generation only, that is, the last one before the Day of Resurrection – that they would be united with the preceding generation. But nobody has suggested this meaning as it goes clearly against the context. What such an interpretation would boil down to is as follows:

All the believers are united, one of them being from another; all of them are of one rank; none has any excellence over the others; nor has an earlier believer any superiority over the later ones; their main qualification is the true belief, and all of them are equal in it. Such a meaning would not fit the wording of the verse which clearly shows that the preceding believers have a sort of superiority over their offspring, who would be raised to the rank of their progenitor as a token of honour to the latter.

The phrase, "and their offspring follow them in faith", proves that the preceding word, "those who believe" refers to a particular group of the believers – the foremost and the first of the Emigrants and the Helpers who followed the Apostle in the hour of straitness. The epithet, those who believe, is a title of honour bestowed on that distinguished group.

Other two verses too point to this fact:

(It is) for the poor who fled . . . and those who made their abode in the city and in the faith before them . . . and those who came after them say: "Our Lord! forgive us and those of our brethren who had precedence of us in faith, and do not create any spite in our hearts towards those who believe; our Lord! surely Thou art Kind, Merciful" (59:8-10). This verse uses two phrases, "who had precedence of us in faith", and "those who believe". If the import of both were the same, a pronoun would have looked better in place of the second phrase. By not using a pronoun, Allãh has made it clear that each phrase has its own significance.

Muhammad is the Apostle of Allãh; and those with him are severe against the unbelievers, compassionate among themselves, you will see them bowing down, prostrating themselves, seeking grace from Allãh and pleasure; . . . Allãh has promised those among them who believe and do good, forgiveness and a great reward (48:29).

All this shows that the phrase, "those who believe", is a title of honour, reserved for the first and foremost of the believers. Most probably, the opposite phrase, "those who disbelieve", has the contrasting significance, and refers to the polytheists of Mecca and others who were the first and foremost of those who disbelieved in the Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). For example, Surely those who disbelieve alike is to them whether you warn them or do not warn them, they will not believe. (2:6)

Objection: This interpretation means that when the Qur'ãn says, " O you who believe! ", it addresses a special group that was present in the Prophet's time, to the exclusion of all other believers. But all the Muslims agree that such verses are general in their import and that what is said therein applies to all the believers, whether they were present in the Prophet's days or not; and that this mode of address includes all the believers – in reality, not metaphorically.

Reply: Yes! It is a title of honour, reserved for a selected few. But it does not mean that what is said in those verses is in any way restricted to those few. Whatever order or prohibition is given in such verses is general and applies to all the believers. The matter of legislation – whether a given order is general or exclusive – is quite different from that of a speech – whether it is addressed to all the believers or to a few of them. Also, it makes no difference whether a verse ordaining a law is addressed to the believers (O you who believe!) or to the Prophet in person (O Prophet!; O Apostle!), or is revealed without any address at all. The ordained law in all these cases is applicable to all the Muslims, and covers all the believers; although the verse may be addressed to the Prophet or to those who believe as a mark of respect to him or them.

Nevertheless, one should not indiscriminately interpret the phrase, "O you who believe!" and "those who believe", as referring to the first and foremost believers of the Prophet's time; rather one should look at the context, before deciding the true connotation of these phrases in a given verse. For example, look at the verse: Surely (as for) those who believe then disbelieve, again believe and disbelieve, then increase in disbelief, Allãh will not forgive them nor guide them in the (right) path (4:137); and the verse which quotes Nũḥ (a. s.) as saying: and I am not going to drive away those who believe; surely they shall meet their Lord (11:129). Obviously, the phrase, those who believe, used in the above verses cannot refer to the above-mentioned group.

QUR'ÃN : do not say, "Have regard for us", and say, "Wait for us"; and listen: That is, use the phrase, Wait for us, instead of saying, Have regard for us. And if you failed to comply with this command, it would be tantamount to disbelief, and for the disbelievers there is a painful chastisement. It is a very strong admonition against saying, "rã'inã" (راعِنا) = Have regard for us). This phrase has also been mentioned in another verse, which gives an indication of its connotation: Of those who are Jews (there are those who) alter words from their places and say: "We have heard and we disobey"; and: "Hear, may you not be made to hear!" and "rã'inã", distorting (the word) with their tongues and taunting about religion (4:46). Obviously, the Jews used the phrase, "Rã'inã" for something similar to the phrase, "Hear, may you not be made to hear!" And that is why such a mode of addressing the Prophet was prohibited. This explanation agrees with what the tradition says: When the Prophet talked with the Muslims, they used to tell him: "Rã'inã (have regard for us) O Apostle of Allãh!" – that is, wait for us, so that we may properly understand what you are saying.* But this word carried a connotation of abuse in the Jews' language. The Jews seized upon this opportunity, addressing the Prophet with this phrase, pretending to show respect to him while their intention was nothing short of abuse. And in their usage it meant, "Hear, may you not be made to hear". Thereupon, Allãh revealed: Of those who are Jews (there are those who) alter words from their places and say: "We have heard and we disobey"; and: "Hear, may you not be made to hear!" and: "rã'inã ", distorting (the word) with their tongues and taunting about religion; and if they had said (instead): "We have heard and we obey", and "hearken", and "onẓurnã" (wait for us), it would have been better for them and more upright (4:46). The believers too were told not to use this phrase and say instead, "onẓurna "; the Qur'ãn guided them: "do not say, 'Have regard for us', and say, 'Wait for us' ".

QUR'ÃN: *and for the unbelievers there is a painful chastisement: that is, for those who disobey this rule. It is one of the occasions when disobedience of a law of religion has been termed as disbelief.

QUR'ÃN: Those who disbelieve from among the People of the Book . . .: Obviously, the phrase, "the People of the Book", refers here exclusively to the Jews, because the preceding verses

* It is more or less equivalent to the English idiom "I beg your pardon". But with a slight change of accent it may come to mean, stupid or cattle tenderer. (tr.) too dealt with them. If so, then the phrase would serve as a pointer to the cause why they did not like that any good should be sent down to the believers from their Lord. The Jews were given a Book before and they were not happy when the Qur'ãn was sent down to the Muslims, as it deprived them of their distinction as being the People of the Book. They showed avarice about a thing they did not own; they wanted to stand against Allãh when He bestowed His mercy and grace on His servants; "and Allãh chooses especially whom He pleases for His mercy; and Allãh is the Lord of mighty grace".

On the other hand the phrase, as used in this verse, may include all the People of the Book – the Jews and the Christians both. If so, then the verse would serve to widen the scope of the admonition; it would be a generalization after exclusiveness. Both groups shared many characteristics – and especially their enmity to Islam. Some verses coming afterwards strengthen this interpretation. For example: And they say: "None shall enter the garden except he who is a Jew or a Christian" (2:111) ; And the Jews say, "The Christians do not follow anything (good)", and the Christians say, "The Jews do not follow any-thing (good)" . . . (2:113)

TRADITIONS

Abu Nu'aym has narrated in Ḥilyatu 'l-awliyã' from Ibn 'Abbãs that he said: "The Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Allãh has not revealed any verse (beginning) with, " O you who believe!" but that 'Ali is its head and leader.' " (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

The author says: This tradition supports what we shall be quoting in various places that a certain verse was revealed about 'Ali (a.s.) or Ahlu 'l-bayt; for example: You are the best of the nations raised for (the benefit of) men (3:110); . . . that you may be witnesses over the people . . . (2:143);. . . and be with the true ones (9:119).

COMMENTARY

The verses deal with the subject of abrogation. The word, abrogation, when used as a term of Islamic fiqh, means as follows: To show that the time of an order has come to its end; that it is no more valid, is no longer in force. This definition is based on the above verse; and is one of the manifestations of its connotations.

QUR'A-N : Whatever signs We abrogate . . .: "an-Naskh"( ) النَّسْخُ is removal, to remove, to annul. The Arabs say: Nasakhati 'sh-shamsu 'z-zilla (نَسَخَتِ الشَّمْسُ الظِّلَّ) = the sun removed the shadow). Allãh says: And We did not send before you any apostle or prophet, but when he desired, the Satan made a suggestion respecting his desire; but Allãh annuls that which the Satan casts, then does Allãh establish His signs; and Allãh is Knowing, Wise (22:52). Also, they say: Nasakhtu 'l-kitãb (نَسَخْتُ الكِتابَ) = I copied the book) ; it is as though the writing was removed and its place changed. That is why another verse uses the word "at-tabdīl" (التَّبْديلُ) = to change) in place of abrogation: And when We change (one) sign for (another) sign, and Allãh knows best what He reveals, they say: "You are a forger". Nay, most of them do not know (16:101).

Abrogation, however, does not entail obliteration of a verse, turning it into a non-being. Its only effect is the cancellation of the order which the verse had promulgated. It should be noted that the Qur'ãnic verse has been described as a "sign", that is, a mark that points to another thing – a verse is a sign pointing to a Divine Command. The second verse, "Do you not know that Allãh's is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth . . .", gives the reason as to why Allãh abrogates some Qur'anic verses. All these factors indicate that abrogation removes a verse as far as its quality as a sign, as a symbol, is concerned. When abrogated, the verse remains in existence as before, but loses its quality as a sign – no longer does it point to an order, as the order is now cancelled. The next phrase, "or cause to be forgotten", clearly supports the foregoing explanation. "al-Insã' "(اَلإِنْسَاءُ) is to make one forget, to erase out of memory, to eradicate from knowledge. By putting the two phrases side by side, the Qur'ãn makes it clear that abrogation entails erasure of a verse's effect, while "al-insã'" causes eradication of the verse itself from the memory.

Symbolism – the quality of being a sign of something – varies with various signs having various aspects and directions. The Qur'ãnic verses are the signs of Allãh because the jinn and the men are jointly and severally unable to bring its like; the rules ordained by Allãh are His signs inasmuch as they create piety in man and bring him nearer to his Lord; every created thing is His sign, because it, by its existence, proves the existence of its Creator, and by the qualities of its being, leads to His attributes and names; the prophets and the friends of Allãh are His signs inasmuch as they, with their words and deeds, call the humanity to Allãh, and so on and so forth. Consequently, a sign may be great or small, strong or weak; that is why Allãh says: Certainly he saw of the greatest signs of his Lord (53:18).

Also, a sign may contain only one aspect of symbolism, and another may comprise of various such aspects. The former, when abrogated, is obliterated in its entirety, is completely destroyed. But in the case of the latter, it is possible to abrogate only one aspect of its symbolism, leaving the other ones intact; for example, a Qur'ãnic verse could be abrogated as far as its law was concerned, and yet continue as a Divine Sign because of its eloquence and miraculous qualities.

This generalized meaning of abrogation has been inferred from the reasoning given in the second verse: "Do you not know that Allãh's is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth . . ." There are only two objections possible against the factuality of abrogation; or, as the reports say, these were the two arguments advanced by the Jews against it.

First: A sign given by Allãh contains an actual benefit which cannot be obtained from any other thing. If that sign is abrogated, its inherent benefit would be lost; nothing could take its place to preserve that benefit. Allãh is not like His creatures, nor is His knowledge like theirs. His knowledge does not change with the changes in external factors. It is not that one day He knew one thing and issued an order according to that knowledge; then next day the knowledge changed and He became aware of another factor which He did not know before, and therefore He had to cancel the previous order, replacing it with a fresh one. Such inconsistency is not worthy of Divine Sublimity. Of course, it is all right for us mortals, because we cannot comprehend all the aspects of an affair; and as a result of this incomplete knowledge, our decisions are frequently changed and amended. But we should not compare Divine Knowledge without limited and defective perception.

Here it is necessary to point out that such an objection arises from a notion that the power of Allãh is neither comprehensive and all-encompassing nor unrestricted and unconditional.

Second: Accepted that the Divine Power is all-encompassing and limitless. But once a thing is created it goes beyond the sphere of that power, and cannot be changed. Even in our case, we have power to do or not to do a certain work – so long as we have not done it ; but once we have done it, it becomes an essential being, and goes beyond the limits of our power.

This argument is based on the rejection of the all-encompassing ownership of Allãh; it presupposes that once Allãh has managed a certain affair in a certain way, He cannot change that arrangement in another way. This Jewish belief is portrayed in the verse: And the Jews say: "The hand of Allãh is tied up" (5:64).

Allãh replies to the first objection with the question: "Do you not know that Allãh has power over all things?" He certainly has power over all things. Therefore, He may replace a sign with an equally good or even a better sign. The second objection is dealt with by the next question: "Do you not know that Allãh's is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth, and that besides Allãh you have no guardian or helper?" Allãh is the Owner of the heavens and the earth; He can do whatever He likes with His property. No one besides Him owns any thing; otherwise, that owner could interfere in the management of Allãh or put restriction on His authority and control. None else owns any thing – neither in his own rights nor even when Allãh gives to him a partial ownership. When we transfer the ownership of a property to another person, the transferee gets all the rights which we had in that property, and our rights are rendered null and void. But when Allãh gives a property into someone's possession, Allãh's ownership of the property is not disturbed in any way – it does not come to an end, is not even diminished. He continues to be the real Owner and Controller of the property which He has given to others. His is the unrestricted ownership and unconditional management.

If we look at what He has put under our ownership – with-out our having any independent authority over it – then He is our Guardian. And if we look at the apparent independence enjoyed by us, with His grace – although it is a poverty in the shape of plenty, a dependence disguised as independence – then too we cannot manage our affairs without His help; and He is our Helper.

The above explanation is based on the sequence and style of the two verses. First, there is the exclusivity of the declaration: "Allãh's is the kingdom . . ." Then there is the sequence: "Do you not know that Allãh has power over all things? Do you not know that Allãh's is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth . . .?" The two sentences have not been joined with any conjunctive, a sure indication that each is independent of the other, and that the first sentence deals with one objection and the second with another. The last sentence, "and that besides Allãh you have no guardian or helper", gives a finishing touch to the above replies: Even if you are oblivious of Allãh's all-encompassing power and ownership, and are looking at this nominal ownership of yours, you will know that it is not a permanent or independent ownership; you cannot manage it independently; you need a guardian to look after your interests – and Allãh is that guardian. He can and does manage your affairs and your property as He likes.

On the other hand, if your eyes are so fixed on this possession as to make you forget your dependence; if you think that you are the independent and absolute owner of your property, even then you will have to admit that you cannot manage your own affairs, cannot obtain the results you want, without the help and assistance of a super power. And Allãh is your real Helper; it is He who manages your affairs and your property for you. From whatever angle you look at this matter, Allãh's power over all things and His ownership of every thing remain unchallenged and undisputed.

"and that besides Allãh you have no guardian or helper": Apparently it should have been 'besides Him.' Then why did the Qur'ãn use the noun instead of the pronoun? It was to indicate that the foregoing sentences contain the complete replies, and this sentence is not their integral part; rather it is an independent declaration to stengthen those replies.

This discourse leads us to the following conclusions:

First: Abrogation is not a thing confined to only the religious laws; it holds its place in the sphere of creation too.

Second: Abrogation cannot take place without two sides: (i) The abrogated thing or verse, (ii) the abrogative, that is, the thing or verse that abrogates.

Third: The abrogative contains all the benefits and the perfection that was found in the abrogated thing.

Fourth: Although the abrogative differs from the abrogated in its form, both have one thing in common – the perfection and the benefit. When a prophet dies and another is sent in his place – and both of them are the signs of Allãh, one abrogating the other – it takes place in total conformity with the natural system. Life, death, sustenance and other such things often replace each other, the succeeding factors abrogating the preceding ones. It all depends on the varying needs of the society's welfare, on ever-changing level of the man's perfection. Like-wise, when a religious law is replaced by another, the abrogating one has the same power as the abrogated one had, to lead to the spiritual and temporal well-being of the individual and the society; each perfectly suitable for the time it was, or is, in force; each more beneficial in the context of its time. For example, the order to "forgive" in the beginning of the call when the Muslims had neither the manpower nor the armaments, and the command to "fight" when Islam had gained some strength, when the Muslims had gathered enough force and the disbelievers and the polytheists were frightened of them. However, seldom is an abrogated verse devoid of some phrase showing that it was a transitory order which would be abrogated in due course. For example: The verse: But pardon and forgive (them) until Allãh should bring about His command (2:109), which was abrogated by the verse of fighting; and: . . . confine them until death takes them away or Allãh makes some way for them (4:15), which was abrogated by the verse of flogging. The phrases, "until Allãh should bring about His command", and, "or Allãh makes some way for them", give clear indication that the order given therein was temporary and transitory which would soon be abrogated.

Fifth: The relation between the abrogative and the abrogated is quite different from that which is found between a general statement and a particular, between an unconditional clause and a conditional, or between an unspecified proposition and a specified.

What removes the apparent contradiction between the abrogative and the abrogated, is the society's and the individual's good and well-being which is found in both of them. But the apparent contradiction between a general statement and a particular, between an unconditional clause and a conditional, or between an unspecified proposition and a specified, emanates from the strong (or weak) manifestation of the intended meaning. The true intention of the speaker is reflected much more strongly and clearly in a particularized statement, a conditional clause and a specified proposition; and that strength and clarity removes the above-mentioned apparent contradiction – by explaining the general in the light of the particular, the unconditional with the help of the conditional and the unspecified in the frame of the specified. These things are the subject of the Principles of Jurisprudence. The same applies to the decisive and the ambiguous verses, as we shall explain under the verse: . . . of it there- are some verses decisive, they, are the basis of the Book, and others are ambiguous . . . (3:7)

QUR'ÃN: or cause to be forgotten: "Nunsihã" (نُنْسِهَا) is derived from "al-insã' " (to cause to be forgotten; to erase from memory or knowledge), as we have described earlier. It is a general and unconditional statement. It is not restricted to the Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.); nay, it does not include him at all. Allãh had said about him: We will make you recite so you shall not forget, except what Allãh pleases (87:6 -7). It is a Meccan verse, while the verse of abrogation is of Medina period. Obviously the Apostle could not forget anything after the promise of Allãh, "so you shall not forget".

Question: This claim is untenable because the promise has the proviso, "except what Allãh pleases". It means that the Apostle (s.a.w.a.) could forget what Allãh was pleased to make him forget.

Reply: Such exceptional clauses serve only to emphasize the power of Allãh; they do not necessarily mean that the thing mentioned in that clause would actually take place. Look for example at the verse: . . . they shall be in the garden, abiding in it as long as the heavens and the earth endure, except as your Lord pleases . . . (11:108). It just shows that Allãh does have power to change the arrangement made; but all the Muslims agree that the people of the paradise will never be taken out of it. The same is the import of the exceptional clause, "except what Allãh pleases", in this verse.

Moreover, if the said clause were to prove that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) could actually forget the things taught by Allãh, depending on the pleasure of Allãh, there would be no sense in putting him under obligation by promising him, "you shall not forget". Any human being who remembers any thing, or forgets it, does so by the pleasure of Allãh. The same is true about the animals who remember and forget by His pleasure and decree. And the Prophet too, before this promised grace of Allãh, remembered by the pleasure of Allãh, and forgot by the pleasure of Allãh. What new grace was added here if the promise meant only a quality which the Prophet had already had? If that promise were to make any sense, it would have to mean that the Prophet could never forget anything, although Allãh had full power to make him forget.

Some people have recited the word as "nansa'ahã" (نَنْسَأهَا) , derived from "an-nas' " (اَلنَّسْأ) = to delay). According to this recitation, the meaning would be as follows: Whatever signs We abrogate by nullifying it, or put it off by delaying its appearance, We bring one better than it or like it, and the Divine management in advancing something or putting it off, does not diminish its perfection or benefit.

The fact that the Divine Management always brings out a thing's perfection and benefit, is inferred from the clause, "We bring one better than it or like it". The goodness emanates from the perfection of a thing or benefit of a laid down rule.

The abrogated thing or rule was surely good; and the abrogating thing or rule too is at least as good, if not better. So, every Divine Management is the ideal of goodness, perfection and benefit.

TRADITIONS

Innumerable traditions have been narrated by both sects, from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), his companions, and the Imãms of his Ahlu 'l-bayt, that there are abrogated and abrogating verses in the Qur'ãn.

The Commander of the faithful ('Ali - a.s.) said, after enumerating various abrogated and abrogating verses: "And the word of Allãh: And I did not create the jinn and the human beings except that they should worship Me (51:56) was abrogated by His word: and they shall continue to differ, except those on whom your Lord has mercy; and for this did He create them (11:118 - 119), that is, for the mercy did He create them." (at-Tafsīr, an-Nu'mãni)

The author says: In this tradition the Imãm has used the word, abrogation, in a wider sense than its terminological meaning. The latter verse mentions a reality which restricts the reality described by the former. The first verse affirms the Divine Worship as the purpose of creation. While doing a work, Allãh keeps a purpose in view; and He cannot be defeated in His purpose. On the other hand, he has decreed that they should choose their own path, and consequently some of them progress on the right path, while others go astray. Those who by their own choice choose the path of guidance are covered by the mercy of Allãh, and it is for this mercy that He has created them. In this way, the second verse affirms another purpose for the creation: The mercy which accompanies the worship and guidance. This goal is reached by only a selected few, while the first verse had affirmed a goal for all the jinn and the men, and that is the Divine Worship. Some people are created for some others, and those others for yet others; this chain continues till it reaches the group which sincerely worships Allãh. Looking from this point of view, it is easy to understand why all the jinn and men have been said to be created for the worship. We plant a garden and nurse the trees for their fruits. The real purpose is the fruits, but the trees and their branches and leaves are planted, protected and looked after because they are the means to get the fruits. And it will be quite right to say that the garden's purpose was its fruits.

In the same way, the second verse "abrogates" the generality of the first verse, focusing its sight on the true worshippers who are the recipients of the mercy of Allãh.

The same book narrates from the same Imãm that he said: "And the word of Allãh: And there is not one of you but shall come down to it; this is a decided decree of your Lord (19:71), was abrogated by His word: Surely (as for) those whom the good has already gone forth from Us, they shall be kept far off from it; they will not hear its faintest sound, and they shall abide in that which their souls long for. The great fearful event shall not grieve them (21:101-103)."

The author says: It must be noted that the relation between these two verses is not that found between a general declaration and a particular one. The first verse says that it is a decided and unavoidable decree of Allãh; and such a decree cannot be rendered null and void, it cannot be cancelled. What the "abrogation" mentioned in this tradition means will be explained, God willing, in the exegesis of the verse 21:101, mentioned above.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said: "Among the (various types of) abrogation is "al-badã'"* (اَلبَدآءُ) contained in the word of Allãh:

* al Badã' (اَلبَدآءُ) is a terminology of Shi'ite theology. It means that Allãh makes known His plan to His chosen servants only to that extent which is beneficial to the mankind or which is necessary to make a test meaningful. When the time comes when the angel, Prophet or Imãm concerned thinks that the plan of work is coming to its end, a new development extends the plan or brings it to an unexpected end. The saving of the People of Yũnus and the intended sacrifice of Ismã'īl are among its examples. (tr.)

Allãh effaces what He pleases and establishes (likewise), and with Him is the basis of the Book (13:39); and (demonstrated in) the saving of the People of Yũnus." (al 'Ayyãshī)

The author says: Its reason is clear.

Some traditions of the Imãms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) count the death of an Imãm and his being succeeded by another Imãm as an example of the abrogation.

The author says: We have already explained this matter. The number of the traditions containing this theme reaches to nearly mutawãtir.

'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Abu Dãwũd (in his an-Nãsikh wa 'l-mansũkh) and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from Qatãdah that he said: "(During the lifetime of the Prophet) a verse used to abrogate (another) verse; and the Prophet of Allãh used to recite a verse, and a chapter, and as much as Allãh wished of a chapter, then it was raised (i.e. erased) and Allãh caused His Prophet to forget it. So, Allãh said narrating it to His Prophet: Whatever signs We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, We bring one better than it; He says: There is (some) ease in it, some allowance in it, some order in it, (and) some prohibition in it." (ad-Durru '1-manthũr)

The author says: The same book quotes numerous traditions on the theme of "causing to be forgotten"; but all of them have to be discarded because they go against the teaching of the Book of Allãh, as we have explained in the meaning of this word.

Or, do you wish to put questions to your Apostle, as Musã was questioned before? And whoever adopts unbelief instead of faith, he indeed has lost the right way (108). Many of the People of the Book wish that they could turn you back into unbelievers after your faith, out of envy on their part, (even) after the truth has become manifest to them. But pardon and forgive (them) until Allãh should bring about His command. Surely Allãh has power over all things (109). And keep up prayer and pay the zakãt, and whatever good you send before for yourselves you shall find it with Allãh; surely Allãh sees what you do (110). And they say: "None shall enter the garden except he who is a Jew or a Christian ". These are their vain desires. Say: "Bring your proof if you are truthful" (111). Yes! whoever submits his self entirely to Allãh and he is the doer of good, he has his reward with his Lord, and there is no fear for them nor shall they grieve (112). And the Jews say: "The Christians do not follow anything (good) ", and the Christians say: "The Jews do not follow anything (good) ", while they recite the Book. Even thus say those who have no knowledge, like to what they say; so Allãh shall judge between them on the Day of Resurrection in what they differ (113). And who is more unjust than he who prevents (men from) the mosques of Allãh, that His name shall not be remembered in them, and strives to ruin them? (As for) those, it was not for them that they should have entered them except in fear; they shall meet with disgrace in this world, and they shall have great chastisement in the hereafter (114). And Allãh's is the East and the West; therefore, whither you turn, thither is Allãh's face; surely Allãh is Ample-giving, Knowing (115).

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Or, do you wish to put questions to your Apostle . . . : It appears from this sentence that some of the Muslims – although believing in the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) – had put some questions to him not unlike the questions put to Mũsã (a.s.) by the Jews. That is why they have been placed here in line with the Jews for admonition.

The tradition too supports this interpretation.

QUR'ÃN : the right way: that is, the straight path.

QUR'ÃN : Many of the People of the Book wish . . .: Reportedly it refers to Ḥuyayy ibn al-Akhṭab and other Jews who were with him.

QUR'ÃN: But pardon and forgive (them): According to the exegetes this order was abrogated by the verse of fighting.

QUR'ÃN: until Allãh should bring about His command: As indicated above, this clause alludes to a command that was to be revealed in not too distant a time about the Jews. The case is similar to the verse: (As for) those, it was not for them that they should have entered them except in fear (2:115), when read together with the verse: the idolaters are nothing but unclean, so they shall not approach the Sacred Mosque after this (very) year . . . (9 :29). The clause, "except in fear", had hinted to the intended ban that was promulgated later.

We shall explain the meaning of "al-amr" (الأمْرُ) = command) under the verse: And they ask you about the soul. Say: "The soul is from the command of My Lord" (17:85).

QUR'ÃN: And they say: "None shall enter the garden except he who is a Jew or a Christian": The verse explicitly joins the Christians with the Jews; from now on the sins and crimes of both will be enumerated together.

QUR'ÃN: Yes! whoever submits his self entirely to Allãh and he is the doer of good, he has his reward with his Lord: It reiterates for the third time the basic principle that the spiritual felicity does not depend on name or nomenclature, that no one can get honour with Allãh except by true faith in, and total surrender to, Him. The first declaration was in the verse: Surely those who believe and those who are Jews, and the Christians, and the Sabaens, whoever believes in Allãh and the Last Day and does good, they shall have their reward . . . (2:62); the second one was in the verse: Yea! whoever earns evil. . . And (as for) those who believe and do good deeds, these are the dwellers of the garden . . . (2:81-82); the third is this verse under discussion.

A comparison of this verse with the previous two shows that the true belief entails submitting one's self entirely to Allãh; and "al- iḥsãn" (اَلإِحْسَانُ) = to do good) is synonymous to the good deeds.

QUR'ÃN: while they recite the Book: that is, while they follow the Book revealed to them. They should not say such things because they have the Book with them and it clearly shows them where the truth is.

This explanation is supported by the next sentence, "Even thus say those who have no knowledge, like to what they say". The word, "those who have no knowledge", refers to the unbelievers (other than the People of the Book) and the polytheists of Arabia. They used to say, "The Muslims do not follow anything good", or "The People of the Book do not follow anything good".

QUR'ÃN: And who is more unjust than he who prevents. . Apparently it refers to the unbelievers and polytheists of Mecca. These two verses were revealed not long after the Apostle of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) emigrated to Medina.

QUR'ÃN: it was not for them that they should have entered them except in fear: The verb, "was", shows that the sentence describes a past event. It perfectly fits the pagans of Mecca and their misdeeds. The traditions say that "he who prevents" refers to the unbelievers of Mecca, it was they who prevented the Muslims from praying in the Sacred Mosque (Masjidu 'l-Ḥarãm) and in other mosques within the precinct of the Ka'bah.

QUR'ÃN: And Allãh's is the East and the West: The east and the west – any direction, whatsoever – really belong to Allãh. His is the true mastership that cannot be altered or transferred; it is not like the possession known to us in our society's framework. Allãh's ownership permeates the possessed thing itself as well as its benefits and effects, unlike our ownership that covers only the benefits and effects, and not the thing itself.

A property, possession, per se, cannot stand except with its owner. Therefore, the east and the west, nay, all the directions whatsoever, exist because of Allãh – the Owner. Allãh preserves and manages the directions, and encompasses them. Anyone turning to any of the directions, turns in reality to Allãh.

The east and the west are relative terms. They cover al-most all the directions, except the two imaginary points of the true north and the true south. That is why Allãh left the clause, "whither you turn", unconditional, and did not say, 'whither you turn of these two directions'. To whatever direction one turns one's face, it is bound to be either east or west. The sentence, "And Allãh's is the East and the West", therefore, implies that all the directions belong to Allãh.

The east and the west were selected for special mention because man fixes the directions with the help of rising and setting of the sun and other heavenly bodies.

QUR'ÃN: therefore, whither you turn, thither is Allãh's face: It puts the cause in place of the effect. What the sentence implies is as follows: To whichever direction you turn, it is allowed to you, because Allãh's face is in that directions too.

The concluding clause, "surely Allãh is Ample-giving, Knowing", supports this interpretation.

"al-Wãsi'" (الواسعُ) = translated here as "ample-giving") literally means extensive, abounding, far-reaching. It implies that Allãh's ownership is extensive and all-pervading and every direction belongs to Him. He is All-knowing too; therefore, He knows what your aim and intention is, no matter whichever direction you turn your face to. He is not like human beings or other creatures – if we want to see some physical object, we have to turn to a particular direction in order to bring it into focus. But Allãh is not confined to a particular direction; turn to any direction, you are turning to Allãh, and Allãh knows it.

The verse gives a latitude about the qiblah, as far as its directions is concerned, but not apropos its location as may be inferred from the clause, "And Allãh's is the East and the West", inasmuch as it mentions the directions only.

TRADITIONS

Muhammad ibn al-Ḥusayn said: "It was written to al-'Abdu 'ṣ-Ṣãliḥ: 'A man prays in a cloudy day in an open space and he does not know the (direction of) qiblah, he prays; and when he has finished his prayer, the sun appears and (he finds that) he had prayed against qiblah. Should he regard his prayer (as valid) or should he repeat it?' He wrote: 'He should repeat it if the time (of prayer) is not over. Does he not know that Allãh says – and His word is true: therefore, whither you turn, thither is Allãh's face?'" (at-Tahdhīb)

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said about the word of Allãh: And Allãh's is the East and the West . . .: "Allãh has revealed this verse especially for the voluntary prayer; therefore, whither you turn, thither is Allãh's face; surely Allãh is Ample-giving, Knowing. And the Apostle of Allãh prayed on his camel by making gestures (for the actions of the prayer) wherever it turned to, when he proceeded to Khaybar, and also when he returned from Mecca – and the Ka'bah was behind his back." (al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: al-'Ayyãshī has narrated another tradition of nearly the same meaning through Zurarah from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.); and so have done al-Qummi and ash-Shaykh from Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) and aṣ-Ṣadũq from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.).

If you study the traditions of the Imãms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt, related to the exegesis of the Qur'ãnic verses – the general and the particular; the unconditional and the conditional – you will see that often they infer one rule from the general verse, and another rule from the same when read together with the particular one. For example, the general verse implies a voluntary rule; but read with the particular one it promulgates an obligatory law. The same applies to the cases of disliked and forbidden things. And so on.

The above is a key factor in understanding the traditions narrated from the Imãms; and on it depends the knowledge of a multitude of their traditions.

You may infer from it two important principles of the Qur'ãnic knowledge:

First: Every Qur'ãnic clause or sentence, taken alone, describes an established reality or rule; when it is joined to another revealed qualifying clause, it indicates another reality or rule; add to it another qualification or condition and you get a third set of confirmed reality or law; and so on. For example, look at the verse: Say: "Allãh; then leave them sporting in their vain discourses" (6:91). It indicates four separate meanings depending on the word we stop at: First, "Say: Allãh"; second, "Say: Allãh; then leave them"; third, "Say: Allãh; then leave them in their vain discourses"; fourth, "Say: Allãh, then leave them sporting in their vain discourses". Many such examples may be found in the Qur'ãn.

Second: If two stories or two themes are joined in one sentence or clause, both of them must be having a common base.

These two esoteric principles of exegesis open the way to many Qur'ãnic secrets – and Allãh is the true Guide.

And they say: "Allãh has taken to himself a son". Glory be to Him; rather, whatever is in the heavens and the earth is His; all are obedient to Him (116). The Originator of the heavens and the earth; and when He decrees an affair, He only says to it, "Be", and it is (117).

* * * * *

QUR'ÃN : And they say: 'Allãh has taken to himself a son ": Obviously the pronoun "they" refers to the Jews and the Christians; the former said that 'Uzayr was the son of God; the latter claimed the same thing for Jesus Christ. The verse takes the admonition of the People of the Book a step further.

The People of the Book initially used the phrase, son of God, for their prophets etc. as a mark of respect for them – in the same way as they used the words, sons of God and His chosen people, for themselves. Gradually, the metaphorical sense gave way to the real one, and 'Uzayr and Jesus Christ were believed to be the sons of God in the real sense of the word.

Allãh refuted their claim in these two verses. They contain two proofs against them.

The first proof is given in the words: "whatever is in the heavens and the earth is His; all are obedient to Him." How does one beget a son? A physical being removes some of his parts from himself and develops and nurtures it into another member of the species, similar to himself. Now, nothing can be similar to Allãh; He is far above such things; whatever is in the heavens and in the earth belongs to Him, is His property; every thing is made existent by Him, is managed by Him; it is by nature obedient to Him, subservient to Him. Things being as they are how can any thing be similar to Allãh? Does God belong to a species? How can He beget someone of the same "species"?

The second proof is given in the second verse: "The Originator of the heavens and the earth; and when He decrees an affair, He only says to it, 'Be', and it is." "al-Badī' " (اَلبَدِيْعُ) = translated here as the Originator) is used for the one who invents and originates a thing without any previous model, without any existing blue-print. Only Allãh is the Originator in the true sense of the word. He originates every thing; no creature of His resembles any fellow creature. His creation is not like others' production inasmuch as He does not make any thing by imitation; He does not create gradually, nor with the help of the secondary causes; when He decides an affair, He only says to it, "Be", and it is – without any need of any previous model or gradual development. How can such an Originator be said to take to himself a son? After all, begetting a son entails gradual development.

These are the two incontestable proofs which expose the fallacy of the belief that God has begotten a son. The verses also prove the following two facts:

First: The command to obey Allãh and to worship Him is all-pervading; it is binding to all that is in the heavens and in the earth.

Second: The actions of Allãh are not gradual. It follows that every thing that comes into being gradually, must have another non-gradual existence which emanates from the Divine Command. Allãh says: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it, 'Be", and it is (36:82).

And Our command is but one, as the twinkling of an eye (54:50). A detailed discussion of this Qur'ãnic reality will be given, God willing, under the verse 36:82, quoted just above.

QUR'ÃN: Glory be to Him: "subḥãn" (سُبْحَانَ) is an infinitive verb, synonymous to "at-tasbīḥ" (اَلتَّسْبِيْحُ) = glorification of God). It is always used as a first member of genitive construction – the second member always being the name, 'Allãh' (or a pronoun referring to Him). Grammatically it is in accusative case pointing to a deleted verb. Originally it was, sabbaḥtuhu tasbīḥan (سَبَّحْتُهُ تَسْبِيْحاً = I glorified Him as He should be glorified) ;
but the verb was deleted and the infinitive verb was joined to the pronoun 'Him' in genitive construction, to stand in place of the verb.

By using this phrase here, Allãh has taught the believers the manner of declaring His glory whenever something unworthy of His sacred name is ascribed to Him.

QUR'ÃN: all are obedient to Him: "al-Qunũt" (اَلقُنُوْتُ = to worship; self-abasement).

QUR'ÃN : The Originator of the heavens . . .: Originating implies that the thing so created is not like any other thing.

QUR'ÃN : and it is: The sentence branches out from the word, "Be". The preceding clause is not a conditional one; that is why this verb is not in apocopate form, that is, its last vowel has not been cut off.

TRADITIONS

Sudayr aṣ-Ṣayrafi said: "I heard Ḥumrãn ibn A'yan asking Abu Ja'far (a.s.) about the word of Allãh: The Originator of the heavens and the earth. Abu Ja'far (a.s.) said: 'Verily Allãh, Mighty and Great is He!, originated all things by His (Own) Knowledge, without there being any previous model. So, He originated the heavens and the earth, and there were no heavens or earth before them. Do you not listen to His word, and His throne was on the water?' " (al-Kãfī; Baṣã'iru 'd-darajãt)

The author says: The tradition points to yet another fine point. It shows that "the water", mentioned in this verse, is something different from the water known to us. The Imãm has quoted this verse to prove that Allãh's creation is based on originality. And the Divine authority and power, before the creation of these heavens and this earth, was firm on the water. Obviously, the water mentioned here was not the water of this earth, or like this earthly water.

We shall explain it further under the verse: and His throne was on the water (12:7).

AN ACADEMIC AND PHILOSOPHICAL DISCOURSE ON THE ORIGINALITY OF THE CREATION

The experience as well as the philosophical argument proves that any two things are different from each other in their respective particulars even if they are united in their common and general characteristics. Even if the two are so alike as to make it difficult for the senses to discern any dissimilarity between them, when seen or tested with the help of scientific instruments clear differences come before the eyes. It means that every creation is unique and original; no two things are made of one model.

Now we should look at this matter from the philosophical point of view. Let us take any two things sand see why they are distinct from each other. If the basis of distinction is not a thing within their own selves, then it must be an outside factor. In that case, their selves must be absolute and indivisible entities. But an absolute and indivisible entity cannot be duplicated nor repeated. In other words, the two distinct entities would become one and the same. And it is a contradiction in terms. Therefore, we have to admit that every being is different in its own self from all other beings. It follows that every thing is unique; and does not have any similarity or likeness to any other thing. And it is Allãh who has given every thing its uniqueness, distinction and originality, as He is the Originator of the heavens and of the earth.

وَقَالَ الَّذِينَ لاَ يَعْلَمُونَ لَوْلاَ يُكَلِّمُنَا اللهُ أَوْ تَأْتِينَا آيَةٌ
كَذَلِكَ قَالَ الَّذِينَ مِنْ قَبْلِهِمْ مِثْلَ قَوْلِهِمْ تَشَابَهَتْ قُلُوبُهُمْ قَدْ
بَيَّنَّا الآيَاتِ لِقَوْمٍ يُوقِنُونَ ـ ١١٨ . إِنَّا أَرْسَلْنَاكَ بِالْحَقِّ بَشِيراً
وَنَذِيراً وَلاَ تُسْئَلُ عَنْ أَصْحَابِ الْجَحِيمِ ـ ١١٩ .

And those who have no knowledge say: "Why does not Allãh speak to us or a sign come to us?" Even thus said those before them, the like of what they say; their hearts are all alike. Indeed We have made the signs clear for a people who are sure (118). Surely, We have sent you with the truth as a bearer of good news and as a warner, and you shall not be questioned as to the companions of the flaming fire (119).

* * * * *

QUR'ÃN: And those who have no knowledge say: It refers to the polytheists and the unbelievers other than the People of the Book. It is set in contrast with the verse 113: And the Jews say, "The Christians do not follow anything (good)", and the Christians say, "The Jews do not follow anything (good), while they recite the Book. Even thus say those who have no knowledge, like to what they say. In this verse, the People of the Book were joined to the polytheists and unbelievers of Arabia; and the verse under discussion joins those polytheists and unbelievers to the People of the Book: "And those who have no knowledge say: ' Why does not Allãh speak to us or a sign come to us?' Even thus said those before them (i.e., the People of the Book, including the Jews) the like of what they say", because the Jews had disputed with their prophet, Mũsã (a.s.) and demanded from him the like of what these pagans say.

The People of the Book and the pagans of Arabia are alike in their way of thinking; the former say the like of what the latter say, and vice versa: their hearts are all alike.

QUR'ÃN: Indeed We have made the signs clear for a people who are sure: It is the rebuttal of the demand of those who have no knowledge. The signs they are demanding have already come to them, already been made clear to them. But they cannot benefit from them because only those who are sure of those signs may get their benefit. As for these people who have no knowledge, their hearts are submerged into ignorance, sick with the disease of prejudice and envy. That is why they have lost the ability to benefit from the signs sent by Allãh.

The above explanation makes it clear why they have been described as "those who have no knowledge".

After exposing the falsity of their demand, Allãh directs His speech to the Apostle, declaring in clear terms that he has surely been sent by Allãh "with the truth as a bearer of good news and as a warner". The verse was meant to bring comfort to the Prophet's heart and to make him realize that these adversaries were the people of the Fire, and they would not come to the path of guidance.

QUR'ÃN: and you shall not be questioned as the companions of the flaming fire: Its import is similar to that of the verse: Surely those who disbelieve alike is to them whether you warn them or do not warn them, they will not believe (2:6).

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: And the Jews will not be pleased with you, nor the Christians . . .: The Speaker turns again to the two groups, after a cursory glance at the others. These two verses give the sum and substance of the foregoing talk. After all those admonitions and reprimands of the Jews and the Christians, Allãh turns to His Apostle and says: They will never be pleased with you until you follow their religion which they have invented according to their desires, composed of their own opinions. Then He orders him to confute their views and tell them: "Surely Allãh's guidance, that is the (true) guidance". Why should a man follow the other for guidance? And the only guidance is the guidance of Allãh; that is the truth which must be followed. There is no guidance in any thing else; and certainly not in your religion. And what is that religion? Just an amalgam of your desires glorified as religion.

"Allãh's guidance" stands for the Qur'ãn – revealed by Allãh and, therefore, attributed to Him. The sentence, "Surely Allãh's guidance is the (true) guidance", restricts the guidance to that of Allãh. Conversely, it means' that their religion is devoid of guidance; in other words, it is just a set of their desires.

It follows that what the Prophet has got is knowledge, and what they hold in their hands is ignorance. Therefore, Allãh says to the Prophet: "And if you follow their desires after the knowledge that has come to you, you shall have no guardian from Allãh, nor any helper."

One cannot help admiring this verse: How logical, solid and well-grounded is the argument it offers; how many fine points of eloquence it holds, in spite of its brevity; how lovely is the language and how clear is the style!!

QUR'ÃN : Those to whom We have given the Book . . .: The restriction of the clause, "These (it is who) believe in it", gives rise to the belief that this verse is a reply to an unspoken question. The preceding words, "And the Jews will not be pleased with you, nor the Christians . . .", gave an indication that there was no hope of their believing in the Prophet. If so, then how any of them could be expected to believe? Was it not in vain to invite them to Islam? This verse clears the air, and says: Those to whom We have given the Book (i.e., the Torah or the Injīl) and who read it as it aught to be read, these it is who truly believe in their Book and as such they shall believe in you.* Or that, they believe in a revealed book; and therefore shall believe in any other book revealed by Allãh. Or that, these it is who shall believe in the Qur'ãn.

(According to some of the above interpretations, the pro-noun, 'it', in the phrase, "believe in it", would stand for more than one noun by turns.)

The phrase, "Those to whom We have given the Book", refers to a group of the Jews and the Christians, who did not follow their desires, who wanted to follow the truth. "the Book" refers to the Torah and the Inji1.

Another possible explanation: "the Book" might be referring to the Qur'ãn, and, "Those to whom We have given the Book", to the believers. In that case the meaning would be as follows: Those to whom We have given the Qur'ãn and who read it as it should be read, these it is who believe in the Qur'ãn, and not the Jews and the Christians who follow their desires.

The restriction, in this case, would give a converted pro-position.

QUR'ÃN: O Children of Israel!. . . nor shall they be helped: These two verses are almost similar to the verses 47 and 48. Here the present talk with the Children of Israel comes to its end. The Qur'ãn, by repeating the prologue in the epilogue neatly ties the two ends together.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said, explaining the word of Allãh, Those to whom We have given the Book read it as it aught to be read: "They recite its verses slowly, and understand it, and act according to its orders, and hope for its promise, and are afraid of its threat, and take lesson from its stories, and obey its commandments, and desist from what it prohibits. By God, it does not mean memorizing its verses, and studying its letters, and reciting its chapters, and learning its one-tenths and one-fifths. They remembered its words and neglected its boundaries. And what it means is meditating on its verses and acting according to its orders. Allãh, the High, has said: (It is) a Book We have sent down to you abounding in good, so that they may ponder over its verses" (38 :29). (Irshãdu 'l-qulũb, ad-Daylami)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the word of Allãh, read it as it aught to be read, that : "(It is) stopping at (the description of) the Garden and the Fire." (al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: What the Imãm means is the meditation on the Qur'ãn.

The same Imãm said about the verse, Those to whom We have given the Book . . ., that: "They are the Imãms." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: This explanation is based on the principle of the "flow of the Qur'ãn", and gives the best example of those to whom Allãh has given the Book.

* * * * *

COMMENTARY

Beginning with this verse, the Qur'ãn throws light on some aspects of the life of Ibrãhīm (a.s.); these verses prepare the minds for the ones promulgating the change of al-qiblah (اَلقِبْلَة = direction of prayer) as well as the rules of the ḥajj. These stories also explain the reality of the pure Islamic religion – with its different grades and levels – looking at its fundamental beliefs, moral teachings and some rules of the sharī'ah; among other things they show how Allãh bestowed on him al-Imãmah (اَلإمـَامَة = leadership) of the people, how he built the Ka'bah, and how he prayed to Allãh to send an Apostle among them.

QUR'ÃN: And (remember) when his Lord tried Ibrãhīm with certain words, then he fulfilled them: It refers to the occasion when Ibrãhīm (a.s.) was given the Imãmah. It had happened during the end period of his life; it was the time when he had become very old, after Ismã'īl and Isḥãq both had been born, and he had brought Ismã'īl and his mother to reside in Mecca, as some other exegetes also have taken note of this fact. This timing is clearly pointed at by his words, "And of my offspring? ", when Allãh told him: "I am going to make you an Imãm for men." Obviously he did not know, nor did he even expect, that he would get any offspring, until the angels brought to him the good tidings of Ismã'īl and Isḥãq. Even when the angels told him that he was to get children, he responded to those tidings in such words as could apparently be construed to have sprung from despair and pessimism. Allãh says: And inform them of the guests of Ibrãhīm: When they entered upon him, they said: "Peace" He said: "Surely we are afraid of you."; They said: "Be not afraid, surely we give you the good news of a boy, possessing knowledge. "He said:" Do you give me good news (of a son) when old age has come upon me? – of what then do you give me good news!" They said: "We give you good news with truth; therefore, be not of the despairing" (15:51-55). The same was the reaction of his wife when she was given that good news, as Allãh says: And his wife was standing (by), so she laughed; then We gave her the good news of Isḥãq, and after Isḥãq, of (a son's son) Ya'qũb. She said: "O woe to me! Shall I bear a son when I am an (extremely) old (woman) and this my husband an (extremely) old (man)? Most surely this is an amazing thing." They said: "Do you wonder at the decree of Allãh? The mercy of Allãh and His blessings be on you, O people of the house, surely He is Praised, Glorious" (11:71-73).

As you see, the talks of both Ibrãhīm and his wife show that by that time they had lost all hope of getting any child. That is why the angels replied to them in those words to give them hope and make them happy. Clearly neither he nor his wife knew before that time that they would be given any off-spring. But on this occasion, we see that as soon as Allãh told him, "I am going to make you an Imãm for men", he pleaded, "And of my offspring?" This prayer brings before our eyes the image of a man who is sure of having an offspring. How can a man, and particularly one like Ibrãhīm, the friend of Allãh (who very well knew the nuances of the language), speak before his Lord about a thing he knew nothing about? If he had uttered these words before getting any children, it would have been necessary for him to add some proviso, like "if Thou givest me any offspring". This event, therefore, must have taken place in the end period of Ibrãhīm's life some time after he had been given the good news.

Moreover, the words, "And (remember) when his Lord tried Ibrãhīm with certain words, then he fulfilled them. He said: 'Surely I am going to make you an Imãm for men' ", show that his Imãmah was bestowed to him after Allãh had tried him with certain trials. These consisted of various sufferings and tests which Ibrãhīm (a.s.) underwent in his life. And according to the Qur'ãn, the clearest and hardest of all was the trial of the sacrifice of Ismã'īl. Allãh says: And when he reached (the age of) working with him, he said: " O my son! surely I am seeing in dream that I am sacrificing you; consider then what you see." He said: " O my father! do what you are commanded; if Allãh please, you will surely find me of the patient ones." So when they both submitted and he threw him down upon his forehead, and We called out to him (saying) : " O Ibrãhīm! You have indeed proved the vision true; surely thus We reward the doers of good. Most surely this is a manifest trial" (37:102-106). This manifest trial had taken place in the extreme old age of Ibrãhīm, because even the birth of Ismã'īl had taken place when Ibrãhīm had become very old, as Allãh quotes him as saying: "Praise be to Allãh, Who gave me in old age Ismã'īl and Isḥãq; most surely my Lord is the Hearer of prayer" (14:39). And the imãmah was given to him after these trials.

Now we come back to the verse under discussion:

"And (remember) when his Lord tried Ibrãhīm" : "al-Ibtilã'" (اَلإبْتِلاَءُ) and "al-balã'" (البَلاَءُ) both have the same meaning: to try, to put to test. You give someone an order, or put him in a difficult situation, in order to find out his inner strength, his spiritual sublimity; thus you bring out his hidden qualities like obedience, bravery, generosity, chastity, knowledge, faithfulness (or their opposite traits) ; it is only then that you may say, "I have tested him", "I have put him to trial". One cannot be tested except through action; it is the action which brings out the hidden qualities of a man, and not the word; words may lie but not the actions. Allãh says: Surely We have tried them as We tried the owners of the garden. . . (68:17); . . . Surely Allãh will try you with a stream . . . (2:249).

Now Allãh says that He tried Ibrãhīm with certain words. This sentence looks at the "words" inasmuch as they are related to actions – they are the vehicles to carry the commands of the speaker to the listerner. For example, Allãh says: . . . and speak to men good (words). . . (2:83), that is, behave with them properly.

"With certain words, then he fulfilled them": "al-Kalimãt" (اَلكَلِماتُ) is plural of al-kalimah (اَلكَلِمَةُ = word). Of course, the word, "word", has sometimes been used in the Qur'ãn for a substance, a corporeal being (instead of a talk or speech) as Allãh says: . . . a Word from Him whose name is the Messiah, 'Isã son of Maryam. . . (3:45). But this usage is based on the fact that 'Isã, like Ãdam, was created by a word from Allãh as the Qur'ãn says: Surely the likeness of 'Īsã is with Allãh as the likeness of Ãdam; He created him from dust, then said to him: "Be", and he was (3:59).

Otherwise, whenever the Qur'ãn attributes the "word" to Allãh, it means speech and saying. For example:

and there is none to change the words of Allãh (6:34).

there is no changing the words of Allãh (10:64).

and Allãh desired to manifest the truth of what was true by His words (8:7).

Surely those against whom the word of your Lord has proved true will not believe (10:96).

But the word of punishment proved true against the unbelievers (39:71).

And thus did the word of your Lord prove true against those who disbelieved that they are the inmates of the Fire (40:6).

and had not a word gone forth from your Lord till an appointed time, certainly affair would have been decided between them (42:14).

and the word of Allãh, that is the highest (9:41).

He said: "The truth then (it) is and the truth do I speak" (38:84).

Our word for a thing when We intend it, is only that We say to it: "Be", and it is (16:40).

These and similar verses use "word" in the meaning of "talk" because the talk conveys to the hearer the proposition which the speaker intends to communicate, or the command which he wants him to obey. It is for this reason that sometimes the Qur'ãn describes the "word" as being complete ! It is as though a "word" emanating from the speaker remains incomplete until it is implemented, and then it becomes complete, is proved true. Allãh says: And the word of your Lord has been accomplished (completed) truly and justly; there is none to change His words (6:115) ; and the good word of your Lord was fulfilled (completed) in the Children of Israel (7:137).

The above explanation does not go against the fact that Allãh's word is Allãh's action. His word and His action are not two different things, they are one and the same. Realities and facts have their own rules, and literary demands and semantic values are governed by other rules. Whatever realities Allãh wishes to disclose to one of His prophets or other servants, and whatever command He wants to impose on someone, it is His talk and speech, inasmuch as it fulfils the same purpose which a talk or speech does – it conveys information, and proposition as well as His order and prohibition. Not frequently, the word, "word", is used for ideas, intentions and actions if they have the same import as "word" has. We say: "I will surely do this because I have already said so, and have given my word." In fact, you have never before uttered a single word about it; all that your "given word" actually means is that you do have a firm intention to do it, without any wavering will, without listening to any intercessor. The Arab poet, 'Antarah, said:

"And (it was) my word (to my soul) whenever it was in turmoil or excitement: Be at ease; you will either earn the accolade or will go to (final) rest." Obviously, he had not talked with his soul or spirit; what he means by "word" is that he had made up his mind to fight bravely, and to face the enemy without retreating from his stand; because if he was victorious, his people would sing his praise, and if he was killed, he would get the rest and tranquility.

In this light it is easy to see that the phrase, "when his Lord tried Ibrãhīm with certain words", refers to the difficult situations he had to face, and the Divine covenants he had entered into, for example, his conflict with his people regarding the stars and the idols, his test by fire and emigration, his supreme trial of sacrificing his son, and other such things. Allãh has not specified which tests those "certain words" refer to, because this information had nothing to do with the theme of the verse. But one thing is certain: As it was only after the fulfillment of those words that Allãh said to him, "Surely I am going to make you an Imãm for men", the words must have been such as to prove his capability for the status of the Imãmah.

This much about the "words". Now comes the next phrase: "then he fulfilled them". If the pronoun "he" refers to Ibrãhīm (a.s.), then it would mean that he fulfilled the task which was expected of him, he obediently did what he was told to do. If on the other hand the pronoun refers to the Lord (as it obviously does) then it would mean that his Lord helped him to do what was expected of him.

Somebody has said that the phrase, "certain words", refers to the Divine Speech, "Surely I am going to make you an Imãm for men. . . My covenant will not include the unjust." But it is an explanation which does not carry any weight, because nowhere in the Qur'ãn the word "words" has been used for "sentences".

QUR'ÃN: "Surely I am going to make you an Imãm for men": That is, I am going to make you a leader for men; they will adhere to you and follow in your footsteps, in words and deeds. al-Imãm (اَلإِمـَام = leader) is the one whom the people follow. That is why many exegetes have said that al-Imãmah (اَلإِمـَامَةُ = leadership) in this verse means prophethood, because a prophet is followed and obeyed by his ummah in their religion; Allãh has said: And We did not send any apostle but that he should be obeyed by Allãh's permission (4:64). But this interpretation has no leg to stand upon. Because:-

First: The word Imãman (اِمَاماً = Imãm, leader) is the second accusative of the causative jã'iluka (جَاعِلُكَ = literally, maker of you; translated here as "going to make you"), which is a nomen agentis; and a nomen agentis is never used in place of a past tense; if used in place of a verb it always gives the meaning of present or future tense. When Allãh used these words in His talk with Ibrãhīm (a.s.), He in effect gave him a promise to make him an Imãm in future – in other words, to give him a status which he did not have at that time. And Ibrãhīm (a.s.) was already a prophet: Remember that this talk itself was a revelation sent to him in his capacity as a prophet. He was a prophet long before he was given the status of the Imãmah. There-fore, the Imãmah in this verse cannot mean prophethood. (This reply is given by another exegete.)

Second: We have described earlier that Ibrãhīm (a.s.) was given the Imãmah in his later days after setting the good news that he would be given offspring, Isḥãq and Ismã'īl; and the angels had given him that news while they were on their way to destroy the ummah of Lilt; and Ibrãhīm at that time was a prophet and an apostle. He was a prophet and apostle before he got the Imãmah; therefore, his Imãmah was different from his prophethood and apostleship.

Why are such interpretations offered by exegetes from time to time? The reason lies in the banality – because of repeated use during all these centuries – which has degraded the sublime meanings of the Qur'ãnic words in people's minds.

The word, Imãmah, has been debased in similar way. Some people say that it means prophethood, precedence, being in authority; others interpret it as al-khilãfah (اَلخِلافَة = successorship), al-wiṣãyah (اَلوصَايَة = regency) or headship in spiritual and temporal affairs. But all this is wrong. "Prophethood" means receiving news from Allãh; "messengership" means conveying that message to people; "authority" implies that others have to follow one's example and obey one's orders. Now this authority is a concomitant of prophethood and messengership; khilãfah and wiṣãyah both mean successorship to a prophet; likewise, headship in spiritual and temporal affairs is a sort of the above-mentioned authority; and all of it is different from the correct meaning of the Imãmah. The imãmah implies that a man has an intrinsic quality because of which people should follow him faithfully, making their words and deeds to conform with his words and deeds; but none of the above-mentioned interpretations brings out this meaning. Ibrã-hīm (a.s.) was already a prophet whose obedience was obligatory for all men. What would be the sense in telling him that Allãh was going to make him a prophet for men? Or, to make his obedience compulsory in all that he said and did? Or, a head of his ummah to order or forbid in matters of religion? Or, a successor? Or, a khalīfah in the earth to decide between the people by the order of Allãh?

The difference between the Imãmah and all the above-mentioned words is not only verbal; it is the realities behind those words that differ from one another. When a man is given prophethood, it becomes obligatory for the people to obey him. Therefore, it would be wrong to say to that prophet, "I am going to make your obedience compulsory for men although I have already made it compulsory". Nor will it be correct to convey the same idea in other words, because the same problem will arise again. When Allãh gives someone some status, he does not get merely a new title or name; bounties of Allãh are not empty words; there are real things behind those words. Therefore, the imãmah has its own reality, different from other words' realities.

We find in the Qur'ãn that whenever it mentions Imãmah it puts guidance side by side – it looks as though Allãh was using the latter to explain the former. Allãh says in the story of Ibrãhīm: And We gave him Isḥãq and Ya'qub as a further gift; and We made (them) all righteous ones; and We made them Imãms, to guide (people) by Our command. . . (21:72 - 73); and He says in another place: And We made of them Imãms to guide by Our command as they were patient, and they were certain of Our signs (32:24). Here the imãmah is explained, or rather defined, in terms of guidance, and then further qualified with the proviso, "by Our command". Clearly, the Imãmah does not mean any type of guidance; it is a guidance which emanates from the command of Allãh. And the reality of that command is described in these words: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it: "Be", and it is. Therefore glory be to Him in Whose hand is the kingdom of every thing. . . (36:82-83); And Our command is but one, as the twinkling of an eye (54:50). We shall explain, when writing about these verses, that the Divine Command (which the former verse also calls "the Kingdom") is the sublime side of the creation, with which they face towards Allãh; it is pure, free from fetters of time and space, and untouched by change and variation. It is also the real meaning of the word "Be", because the Divine Command "Be", is nothing other than the actual existence of the thing concerned. This "command" is in contrast to al-khalq (اَلخَلْقُ = creation) which is the other side of the things – it is subject to changes and variations; it grows by and by and deteriorates in the same way; it works within the framework of time and space. (We shall fully explain this theme in its proper place, Allãh willing.)

To sum it up, Imãm is a leader who guides by a Divine Command which is closely associated with him. The Imãmah, in its esoteric sense, is al-wilãyah = (اَلولايَـةُ guardianship, authority) over the people in their actions and activities; and its guidance entails conveying them to the final destination by the command of Allãh. It is different from that guidance which only shows the way – and which is usually done by the prophets and messengers of Allãh as well as by other believers who guide the people towards Allãh with sincere exhortation and good advice. This second type of guidance is mentioned in the following verses:

> And We did not send any apostle but with the language of his people, so that he might explain to them clearly; then Allãh makes whom He pleases err and He guides whom He pleases. . . (14:4).
> And he who believed (i.e., the believer from the family of Pharaoh) said: "O my people! follow me, I will guide you to the right course" (40:38).

> Why should not then a company from every party from among them go forth that they may acquire (proper) understanding in religion, and that they may warn their people when they come back to them, so that they may be cautious? (9:122)
> (We shall further explain it later on.)

Then Allãh describes the reason why He gave them the Imãmah, in these words, as they were patient, and they were certain of Our signs. (See 32:24, quoted above.) The criteria, therefore, are patience and absolute certainty. They were steadfast and patient in the cause of Allãh. Patience, in this verse, is unconditional; therefore it means remaining patient and steadfast in all matters and all conditions with which Allãh may choose to test the submission and servitude of a servant. And they possessed highest degree of certainty. Going through the stories of Ibrãhīm (a.s.), we find the following words of Allãh in the Qur'ãn: And thus did We show Ibrãhīm the kingdom of the heavens and the earth and so that he might be of those who are sure (6:75). The verse clearly indicates that showing of the kingdom to Ibrãhīm was the prelude to the bestowal of absolute certainty on him. It proves that certainty is an inseparable concomitant of looking at the kingdom. This is also the theme of the following verses:

> Nay! if you had known with a knowledge of certainty, you should most certainly have seen the hell (102:5 – 6). Nay! rather, what they used to do has become (like) rust upon their hearts. Nay! most surely they shall on that day be shut out away from their Lord. . . . Nay! most surely the record of the righteous shall be in the 'Illiyyīn. And what will make you know what 'illiyyīn is? It is a written book; see it those who are near (to Allãh) (83:14 – 15; 18–21).

These verses prove that the "near ones" are those who are not shut out away from their Lord; on their hearts there are no rust or coverings of sin, ignorance and doubt; they are the ones who have absolute certainty about Allãh, and they see the 'illiyyīn as they see the hell.

In short, it is essential for an Imãm to be a man of absolute certainty, who sees the world of the "kingdom" of Allãh which is based on the "words" of Allãh. And we have explained earlier that the kingdom is the command of Allãh, which, in its turn, is the esoteric side of the universe.

Now let us have a fresh look at the verse 21:73 (and 32:24) quoted earlier. "And We made them Imãms, to guide (people) by Our command:" it very clearly proves that whatever is the subject of guidance (i.e., the hearts and the deeds), the Imãm has its inner reality; he is constantly in touch with its another side – the side of the command, which is never hidden from him. It is known that the hearts and the deeds, like any other thing, have two sides, one of the "command" and the other of the "creation"; therefore, the reality of the deeds of the men – both good and bad – is always within the vision of the Imãm, always under his observation; and he has authority over both ways – the one of happiness and bliss and the other of unhappiness and distress. Also, Allãh has said: (Remember) the day when We will call every people with their Imãm (17:71). (We shall explain when writing about this verse that the "Imãm" here means the true leader, and not the scroll of deeds, as some people think.) There-fore, the Imãm is the one who shall lead the people to Allãh on the day when hidden things shall be tried, as he leads them to Him in the manifest and esoteric lives of this world. The last quoted verse also shows that there cannot be a single period, a single moment, without an Imãm, because Allãh says, "every people". (The detailed proof of this statement will be given under that verse.)

The Imãmah is such an exalted and sublime position that it cannot be given except to one who is extremely virtuous by his own self. If someone's soul is polluted, even in a minute degree, by any injustice or sin, then he needs someone else to guide him back to the right way. And Allãh has said: Is he then who guides to the truth more worthy to be followed, or he who himself does not go right unless he is guided? (10:35). Here Allãh puts two groups opposite to each other: one is that which guides to the truth; and the other, that which does not go right unless guided by someone else, in other words, the one which needs a helping hand to be guided aright. This contrast means that the one who guides to the truth, is rightly guided by himself; conversely, the one rightly guided by another person cannot guide to the truth.

It follows from the above discourse that:-

First: The Imãm must be al-ma'ṣũm (اَلمَعْصُوْم = sinless; protected from error and sin). Otherwise, he would not be rightly guided by himself, as explained above. Also, the following verse proves their al-'iṣmah (اَلعِصْمَة = sinlessness): And We made them Imãms to guide (people) by Our command, and We revealed to them the doing of good (deeds) and the establishing of prayer and the giving of zakãt, and Us (alone) did they worship (21:73). According to this verse, all the deeds of the Imãm are good, he is guided to them, not by any other person, but on his own by Divine help. The phrase translated above as "the doing of good (deeds)" is fi 'la 'l-khayrãt (فِعْلَ الخَيْرَاتِ = to do good deeds) ; it is al-maṣdar (اَلمَصْدَر = roughly translated as infinitive verb), used as the first construct of a genitive construction; and such a maṣdar proves that the action has surely taken place. Let us explain it in another way: If Allãh would have said, 'We revealed to them: Do good deeds', it would not have shown that they actually obeyed the command and did good; but when He says, We revealed to them the doing of good, it means that whatever they did was good and it was by Divine inspiration and heavenly help.

Second: Conversely, whoever is not ma'ṣũm, can never be an Imãm, a guide to the truth.

Now, it is clear that the adjective, "the unjust", (in the Divine declaration, "My covenant will not include the unjust") covers everyone who might have done any injustice, for example, polytheism, idol-worship or any other sin, in any period of his life, even if he may have repented and been good afterwards.

One of our teachers (may Allãh have mercy on him!) was asked as to how this verse could prove that the Imãm must be ma'ṣũm. He replied:

Logically, we may divide mankind into four groups: (1) One who remains unjust throughout his life; (2) One who was never unjust in any period of his life; (3) One who was unjust in the beginning, but became just later on; and (4) One who was just in the beginning, but became unjust afterwards, Ibrãhīm was too sublime in position to ask for the Imãmah for the first or the fourth group. This leaves two groups (the second and the third) which could be included in his prayer. And Allãh rejected one of them – the one who was unjust in the beginning but became just later on. Now, there remains only one group who could be given the Imãmah – the one who was never unjust in any period of his life; that is, who was *ma'ṣũm.

To sum it up, the verse shows that:

First: Imãmah is a Divinely-made status.

Second: The Imãm must be ma'ṣũm, by Divine 'iṣmah; in other words, he must be protected by Allãh from sins and errors.

Third: The earth cannot remain without a rightful Imãm, as long as there is a man on it.

Fourth: It is essential for an Imãm to be supported by the Divine help.

Fifth: The deeds of the people are not hidden from the Imãm.

Sixth: The Imãm must have knowledge of all that is needed by the people for their good in this world and the next.

Seventh: It is impossible for any other person to surpass the Imãm in any virtue.

These seven are among the basic factors of the Imãmah, and this verse, read with other relevant verses, leads us to them, and Allãh is our Guide.

Objection: As the Imãmah means to guide by the command of Allãh, and as that guiding to the truth is concomitant with the Imãm's being rightly guided by Allãh (as has been inferred from the verse: Is he then who guides to truth more worthy to be followed . . .), then all the prophets should certainly be called Imãms. Obviously, prophethood of a prophet comes into being only when he is rightly guided by Allãh through revelation; a prophet is not guided by any other person through teaching or advice etc. Therefore, bestowal of prophethood would be synonymous with that of the Imãmah. And the objection you had put against the interpretation of the Imãmah with prophethood would be turned in toto against your explanation.

Reply: What we have inferred from the foregoing description is that if one guides to Allãh by His command, he must be guided aright not by any other person but by Allãh Himself. But the Qur'ãnic verses have not shown that its contrary proposition is also true, that is, it has not been proved that whoever is rightly guided by Allãh should also be a guide to Allãh. Therefore, it is not necessary that every prophet should be called an Imãm. In one place, Allãh declares about various prophets that they were rightly guided by Him, and yet does not join it with the statement that they guided their people to the truth. He says: And We gave to him (i.e., Ibrãhīm) Isḥãq and Ya'qũb; each did We guide, and Nũḥ did We guide before, and of his descendants, Dãwũd and Sulaymãn and Ayyũb and Yusuf and Harun; and thus do We reward those who do good; and Zakariyya and Yahya and 'Isã and Ryas; every one was of the righteous (ones) and Ismã'īl and Ilyasa ' and Yũnus and Lut; and every one We did exalt over the worlds; and from among their fathers and their descendants and their brethren; and We chose them and guided them to the straight path. This is Allãh's guidance, He guides thereby whom He pleases of His servants; and if they had set up others (with Him), certainly what they did would have become ineffectual for them. These are they to whom We gave the book and the wisdom and the prophethood; therefore if these disbelieve in it, We have (already) entrusted with it a people who are not disbelievers in it. These are they whom Allãh guided, therefore follow their guidance. Say: "I do not ask you for any reward for it; it is but a reminder to the worlds" (6:86 - 90). *

* This reply does not seem to meet the objection. The verse clearly says that these prophets were guided by Allãh. Also, it is accepted that all the prophets, including (cont. next page)

The context of the above verses shows that this Divine Guidance is an unalterable firm decree; it will continue in this ummah even after the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), and will remain confined within the progeny of Ibrãhīm (a.s.), as the verses 43:26 – 28 prove: And when Ibrãhīm said to his father and his people: "Surely, I am clear of what you worship; (I worship) but (only) Him Who created me, for surely He will guide me." And He made it a word to continue in his posterity, so that they may return (to God). When Ibrãhīm (a.s.) declared to his people that he was clear of what they worshipped and that he worshipped only Him Who had created him, he had already achieved that guidance which contemplation and logical reasoning can produce. Then he told them of his expectation that Allãh would surely guide him. This subsequent guidance was obviously different from the earlier one; it was a guidance by the command of Allãh. Thereafter, Allãh says that He made this Divine Guidance "a word to continue" in Ibrãhīm's posterity. This is one of those verses in which "word" has been used not for speech but for a substance – it refers to the guidance as "a word". The same is the interpretation of "word of piety" in the verse: and made them keep the word of piety, and well were they entitled to it and worthy of it (48:26).

The above explanation makes it clear that the Imãmah after Ibrãhīm (a.s.), is confined to his descendants. The sentences, "(Ibrãhīm) said: 'And of my offspring?' He said: 'My covenant will not include unjust'", point to this fact. Obviously, Ibrãhīm (a.s.) had asked for the imãmah not for all but only for some of his descendants, and he was told that it would not be given to the unjust of his descendants. Needless to say that not all of his descendants were unjust; therefore, this reply disqualifies only one group and not all. In other words, it grants the request for a selected group of his offspring and further sanctifies it as a covenant, and on those mentioned in this verse, guided their people aright, and that they did so by the command of Allãh. Thus, all the characteristics of the Imãmah were found in every prophet who called his people to the right path. (tr.)

that basis it says that the covenant of Allãh will not include the unjust ones.

QUR'ÃN: "My covenant will not include the unjust": This expression shows how far removed are the unjust from the circle of the Divine Covenant;* therefore, it is an example of isti'ãrah bi 'l-kinãyah.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Verily Allãh (to Whom belong Might and Majesty) accepted Ibrãhīm as a servant before making him a prophet; and verily Allãh made him a prophet before appointing him as a messenger; and verily Allãh appointed him as a messenger before taking him as a friend; and verily Allãh took him as a friend before making him an Imãm. When He combined for him all (the above-mentioned) things, He said, 'Surely I am going to make you an Imãm for men.'" The Imãm further said: "It was because of the greatness of it (i.e., Imãmah) in the eyes of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) that he said: 'And of my offspring?' He said: 'My covenant will not include the unjust.'" The Imãm explained: "A fool will not be Imãm of a pious." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: The same meaning has been narrated from the same Imãm through another chain of narrators, and from al-Bãqir (a.s.) through yet other chain; and al-Mufid has narrated it from as- Sadiq (a.s.).

* Its literal translation: My covenant will not reach the unjust. Note that Allãh did not say: The unjust will not reach My covenant, because it would have implied that it was within the power of man – albeit a just one – to reach the status of the Imãmah. The present sentences does not leave room for any such misunderstanding; it clearly shows that getting the imãmah is not within human jurisdiction, it is exclusively in the hand of Allãh and He gives to whom He pleases. (tr.)

The Imãm has said that Allãh accepted Ibrãhīm as a servant before making him a prophet. This theme is inferred from the Qur'ãnic verse: And certainly We gave to Ibrãhīm his rectitude before, and We knew him fully well. When he said to his father and his people: "What are these images to which you (as devotees) cleave?" They said: "We found our fathers worshipping them." He said: "Certainly you have been (both) you and your fathers, in manifest error." They said: "Have you brought to us the truth, or are you one of the triflers?" He said: "Nay! your Lord is the Lord of the heavens and the earth, Who brought them into existence, and I am of those who bear witness to this" (21:51 – 56). This story shows how Allãh took Ibrãhīm (a.s.) as a servant in the beginning of his spiritual journey.

It is one thing that someone is a slave or servant of Allãh, and a quite different thing that he is taken or accepted by Allãh as His slave. Being a slave of Allãh is a concomitant of existence and creation; anyone who is created and has perceiving faculties is inescapably a slave of Allãh; this servitude does not depend on Divine acceptance. Man, for example, owes his existence to his Lord, is created and made by Him; he may behave in his personal life according to this servitude's dictates by surrendering himself to his Lord the Almighty, or he may act rebelliously, but his submission or rebellion does not alter the fact that he is a born slave of Allãh. Allãh says in the Qur'ãn: There is no one in the heavens and the earth but will come to the Beneficent Allãh as a servant (19:93).

But if he does not act as a slave should do, if he behaves in the earth with arrogance and rebellion, then he does not deserve to be called a slave or servant of Allãh, because he does not fulfill the conditions of servitude. A servant surrenders himself to his Lord, and leaves all his affairs in his Master's hands. Therefore, only he deserves to be called a servant of Allãh who is His slave in his person as well as in his action – only such a man can truly be called a slave of Allãh. Allãh says: And the servants of the Beneficent God are they who walk on the earth in humbleness. . . (25:63). Accordingly, when Allãh accepts a man as His servant, He takes masterly interest in that servant's affairs; in other words, Allãh becomes his waliyy and guardian, and takes all his affairs in His Own hands. Such a servitude is the key to al-wilãyah (اَلولايَـةُ = guardianship). The verse 7:196 points to this reality: "Surely my guardian is Allãh, Who revealed the Book, and He takes in hand (the affairs of) the good." The adjective "good", refers to those who are worthy of Divine guardianship and friendship. Allãh has referred to the Prophet in several places in the Qur'ãn as His servant, for example, . . . Who revealed the Book to His servant. . . (18:1); . . . Who sends down clear signs upon His servant. . . (57 : 9) ; . . . when the servant of Allãh stood up calling upon Him . . . (72:19). In short, to say that Allãh accepted someone as His servant, is another way of saying that Allãh took him under His wilãyah and guardianship.

The Imãm said: ". . . and verily Allãh made him a prophet before appointing him as a messenger". The difference between a prophet and a messenger, as shown by the traditions narrated from the Imãms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt, is as follows:

A prophet sees in his dream what Allãh intends to reveal to him; and a messenger sees the angel and talks to him.

The same gradual progress is seen in the history of Ibrãhīm (a.s.). Allãh says: And mention Ibrãhīm in the Book; surely he was a truthful (man), a prophet, when he said to his father: "O my father! why do you worship what neither hears nor sees, nor does it avail you in the least" (19:41 – 42). The verse shows that he was a prophet when he said this to his father. It was a confirmation of what he had told his people as soon as he arrived among them: "Surely I am clear of what you worship; (I worship) but (only) Him Who created me, for surely He will guide me" (43:26 – 27). Then we read the verse 11:69 which says: And certainly Our messengers (i.e., angels) came to Ibrãhīm with good news. They said: "Peace." "Peace," said he. This event, in which Ibrãhīm saw the angels and talked to them, had taken place in his old age long after he had left his father and his nation.

The Imãm said: "And verily Allãh appointed him as a messenger before taking him as a friend." It is inferred from the words of Allãh: And who is better in religion than he who . . . follows the faith of Ibrãhīm, the upright one? And Allãh took Ibrãhīm as a friend (4:125). Apparently it shows that Allãh took him as a friend because of the same upright faith and religion which he had promulgated by the command of his Lord; the theme of this verse is to describe the distinction and excellence of that upright religion which so much raised the status of Ibrãhīm that he was taken as a friend of Allãh.

al-Khalīl (اَلخَلِيْلُ) is more exclusive than aṣ-Ṣadīq (اَلصَّدِيْقُ), although both are generally translated as "friend". When a friend is sincere and truthful (aṣ-Ṣãdiq) in his dealings with the other friend, he is called aṣ-Ṣãdiq; thereafter, if he turns away from all else, confining his needs and requirements to that friend only, he is called al-khalīl, because al-khullah (اَلخُلَّةُ) means need and requirement.

The meaning of the Imãm's sentence, "and verily Allãh took him as a friend before making him an Imãm," may be understood from the foregoing commentary.

The words of the Imãm: "A fool will not be Imãm of a pious," point to the verse 2:130 – 131: And who forsakes the religion of Ibrãhīm but he who makes himself a fool, and most certainly We chose him in this world, and in the hereafter he is most surely among the righteous. When his Lord said to him, Submit (yourself), he said: "I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds." In this verse Allãh says that whoever turns away from the religion of Ibrãhīm – in other words, whoever is unjust – is a fool; then he contrasts this foolishness with Divine selection – a selection which has been explained in the next sentences as "Islam" or submission to God. (Ponder on the clause, When his Lord said to him, Submit yourself). Then we see that al-Islãm (اَلإِسْلامُ = submission) and at-taqwã (اَلتَّقْوى) = piety, fear of Allãh) have been made one, or applicable to one meaning, in the verse: O you who believe! fear Allãh as is due to Him, and do not die but as Muslims (3:102). (Think deeply on it.)

al-Mufīd has narrated from Durust and Hishãm from the Imãms (of the Ahlu 'l-bayt): "Ibrãhīm was a prophet, and he was not an Imãm until Allãh, Blessed and High is He, said (to him): "Surely I am going to make you an Imãm for men." (Ibrãhīm) said: "And of my offspirng?" Then Allãh, Blessed and High is He, said: "My covenant will not include the unjust." Whoever had (ever) worshipped an idol or a sculpture or an image, cannot be an Imãm."

The author says: Its meaning is clear from the above explanations.

It is narrated in al-Amãli of aṭ-Ṭũsī (with complete chain of narrators) and in al-Manãqib of Ibn al-Maghãzili (as a marfũ' tradition) from Ibn Mas'ũd from the Prophet that he said (explaining the words of Allãh to Ibrãhīm in this verse) : "Whoever prostrated before an idol, leaving me, I will not make him an Imãm." Then the Prophet said: "And that prayer was fulfilled in me and my brother Ali; neither of us ever prostrated before any idol."

Wakī' and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from 'Ali ibn Abi Ṭãlib (a.s.) that the Prophet said (in explanation of the words of Allãh, My covenant will not include the unjust): "There is no obedience except in good." (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

'Abd ibn Ḥamīd narrated from 'Imrãn ibn Ḥusayn that he said: "I heard the Prophet saying: 'There is no obedience of a creature in disobedience of Allãh (i.e., a man should not be obeyed if he tells you to disobey Allãh).'" (ibid.)

al-'Ayyãshī has narrated in his Tafsīr, through several chains, from Safwan the camel-driver, that he said: "We were at Mecca; and the talk gradually reached the words of Allãh, And (remember) when his Lord tried Ibrãhīm with certain words, then he fulfilled them." (The Imãm) said: "That is, he completed them with Muhammad and 'Ali and the Imãms from the descendants of 'Ali, as Allãh says: Offspring, one from the other" (3:34).

The authour says: This tradition takes the "word" in the meaning of the Imãmah; a similar explanation is given to "word" in the verses: . . . for surely He will guide me. And He made it a word to continue in his posterity . . . (43 : 27 – 28). According to this tradition, the verse would mean as follows: And remember when his Lord tried Ibrãhīm with certain words, that is, his own imãmah, and that of Isḥãq and his progeny; then He completed it with the imãmah of Muhammad and of the Imãms from his family members, who were from the progeny of Ismã'īl; then Allãh made it known to Ibrãhīm telling him: "Surely lam going to make you an Imãm for men." Ibrãhīm said: "And of my offspirng?" Allãh said: "My covenant will not include the unjust."

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: And (remember) when We made the House a rendezvous for men and a (place of) security: It refers to the legislation of the ḥajj and the sanctuary offered by the House. "al-Mathãbah" (اَلمَثَابَـةُ = rendezvous; a place to which one returns) is derived from thãba, yathũbu (ثَـابَ ، يَثُـوبُ = he returned, he will return).

QUR'ÃN: and take (for yourselves) a place of prayer on the standing-place of Ibrãhīm: The conjunctive "and" joins this order with the preceding sentence turning that also into order.

In that case the complete sentence would have the following connotation: And when We told the people, return to, and do the ḥajj of the House and take (for yourself) a place of prayer. . . Other alternative, suggested by some exegetes, is to imply a deleted word "We said". Accordingly, the meaning would be: and We said, take (for yourselves) a place of prayer .. .

al-Muṣallã (اَلمُصَلّى) is deverbal noun of place, derived from aṣ-ṣalãh ((اَلصَّلوةُ) = to pray, to invoke) ; the sentence means: take (for yourselves) a place of prayer and invocation at the place where Ibrãhīm (a.s.) had stood.

Apparently, the preceding sentence is a sort of introduction, pointing to the reason why prayer in that place was prescribed; that is why this sentence does not put emphasis on "prayer" – in other words, it does not say, and pray in the standing-place of Ibrãhīm; it literally says, and take on the standing-place of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) a place of prayer.

QUR'ÃN: And We enjoined Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl (saying): "Purify (you two) My House . . .": al-'Ahd (اَلعَهْدُ = to enjoin, to obligate). The order to purify the House may mean to keep it exclusively reserved for the worship by those who go around it making circuits, those who abide in it for devotion, and those who pray in it. In this sense, it would be an isti'ãrah bi 'l-kinãya, and would imply: keep My House exclusively reserved for My worship. Alternatively, the order may be to keep it clean; to be on guard lest it is dirtied by careless people.

ar-Rukka' (اَلرُّكَّعُ) and as-sujũd (اَلسُّجُودُ) are plurals of ar-raki' (اَلرَّاكِعُ) = one who bows down) and as-sãjid (اَلسَّاجِدُ) = one who prostrates, one who does sajdah) respectively, the phrase refers to those who pray.

QUR'ÃN: And (remember) when Ibrãhīm said: "My Lord! make it a secure town . . . ": In this way Ibrãhīm (a. s.) called on his Lord to bestow security and safety as well as sustenance on the residents of Mecca; and the prayer was granted. Far be it from Allãh to quote in His speech an unaccepted prayer without hinting at its rejection; if He were to do so, His talk would amount to a vain ridicule – far beneath the sublime dignity of His truthful speech. He says: . . . and the truth do I speak (38:83); Most surely it is a decisive word, and it is no a jest (86 :13 – 14).

The Qur'ãn has quoted numerous prayers which this great prophet had pleaded before his Lord for; for example, his prayer for himself in the beginning of his life; his prayer at the time of his emigration to Syria; his invocation to keep his good name alive; his prayer for himself, for his progeny and parents, and for the believing men and women; his invocation, after building the House, for the residents of Mecca; his prayer and pleading for a Prophet to be sent from among his progeny. His prayers and the favours he asked from Allãh are a canvas which graphically shows his hopes and expectations, creates before our eyes a clear picture of his endeavours and efforts in the way of Allãh, and provides a glimpse of his sublime spiritual virtues. In short, these prayers show his status before Allãh and his nearness to Him. One may write a detailed history of his life, basing it on his stories and the laudatory phrases used for him in the Qur'ãn; and we shall write something on these lines in Chapter 6 (The Cattle).

QUR'ÃN : such of them as believe: Ibrãhīm (a. s.) asked his Lord to give the residents of Mecca security and provide them with fruits. At the same time he realized that not all of the residents would be believers, that some of them would be unbelievers; also he understood that his prayer for their sustenance was general – it covered the believers as well as the unbelievers; and he was aware that he had already declared himself to be separate from the unbelievers and their idols (as Allãh says about him: but when it became clear to him that he, that is, his father, was an enemy of Allãh, he declared himself to be clear of him [9:114] . Here Allãh bears witness that Ibrãhīm [a.s.] had declared his separation from every enemy of Allãh, not expecting even his father). In this background, as soon as he realized that his prayer included both the believers and the unbelievers, he added the proviso, "such of them as believe. . .", although he was well aware that, according to the social structure of this world, sustenance could not be given only to the believing group, to the exclusion of the unbelievers; yet he qualified his prayer. Even so, Allãh knows better how He should decide about His creatures and what He should decree concerning them. Therefore, Ibrãhīm's prayer was granted for the believers, and was extended to cover the unbelievers also. The reply given to Ibrãhīm (a.s.) implies that Allãh would give them sustenance according to the system He has created in this world; in other words, believers and unbelievers both would be given their livelihood, because restricting it to the believers would entail unnecessarily breaking the usual and established system.

Ibrãhīm (a.s.) could have said: and provide the believers of this town with fruits; but he did not, because what he wanted to ask was an attraction, a dignity, for the town which would be centred around the Sacred House of Allãh. That House was built in a valley devoid of every agricultural produce; and if it were not provided with fruits and food-stuff, nobody would settle in it, and the place would remain uninhabited.

QUR'ÃN: "And whoever disbelieves, I will grant him enjoyment for a short while : The word translated, "I will grant him enjoyment", has been read umti'uhũ (أُمْتِعُهُ) and umatti'uhũ (أُمَتِّعُهُ) from the verbal noun's paradigms al-if'ãl (اَلإِفْعَالُ) and at-taf-'īl(اَلتَّفْعِيلُ) respectively. Meaning of both readings is the same.

QUR'ÃN: then I will drive him to the chastisement . . . ": It further shows the great dignity of the House and is meant to give even more pleasure to Ibrãhīm (a.s.). The import of the verse is as follows: I have granted your prayer (to increase this House's honour by giving sustenance to its believing residents) and have decided to include even the unbelievers in that livelihood; but the unbelievers should not be deluded by that; they should not think that the sustenance comes to them because they have got any honour in the eyes of Allãh; it is actually in honour of this town, because I have accepted your prayer and given you more than you had asked. As for the unbeliever, I will surely drive him to the chastisement of the Fire and it is an evil destination.

QUR'ÃN: And (remember) when Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl were raising the foundations of the House: al-Qawã'id (اَلقَوَاعِدُ) is plural of al-ga'idah (اَلقَاعِدَةُ) which literally means that part of building which "sits" in the earth' ; hence it has been translated as foundation, upon which the rest of the building is raised. "Raising the foundations" is an allegorical expression, it counts the walls (which were raised upon foundations) as a part of the foundation; another allegorical aspect is to ascribe the rise to the foundations alone without mentioning the walls, although it were the walls which were raised. The words "of the House", point to the intended allegory.

QUR'ÃN: "Our. Lord! accept from us; surely Thou art the Hearing, the Knowing : The prayer comes direct from Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl, without any introductory clause like "They said" or "They prayed"; such a clause is not even implied here. When we read the words, "when Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl were raising the foundations of the House", the scene is flashed before our eyes; it is as though we see them busy building the walls, and then we dramatically hear their voices and their prayer directly from them – there is no need of any intermediary to report to us what they said or did. Such dramatic presentation is often used in the Qur'ãn, and it is among its most beautiful styles – and all its styles are beautiful. It presents the story in the most effective way, bringing it within the purview of our senses. It is a style which surpasses all manners of narration and reporting.

Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl did not mention the thing or action which they prayed to Allãh to accept, that is, they did not say, accept from us this construction' of Thy House. It shows their humbleness and humility before their Lord; they thought that it was a very insignificant work on their part and was not worthy of their Lord. This omission of the object has given the following connotation to their prayer: Our Lord! accept from us this in-significant deed, although it is not worthy of Thy name; surely Thou art hearing our prayers, knowing our intentions.

QUR'ÃN: Our Lord! And make us both submissive to thee and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting to Thee. The words translated here as submissive and submitting are muslim (مُسْلِم) and its feminine muslimah (مُسْلِمَة), respectively. Obviously, the definition of Islam, with which we are familiar, and which comes to our minds as soon as we hear the word, Islam, is just the elementary grade of servitude; it distinguishes a professed convert from the one who openly rejects the faith. This elementary Islam means professing the matters of faith and doing necessary deeds, no matter whether it is done with true belief or hypo-critically. Now, Ibrãhīm (a.s.) was a prophet, a messenger and one of the five ulu 'l-'azm apostles, who gave us the upright faith. It is unthinkable that such a great prophet had not attained, at the time when he was praying, this most elementary grade of Islam. Likewise, his son, Ismã'īl (a.s.), was a messenger of Allãh and had been offered as sacrifice in His way. Can it be said that they had got that much Islam but were unaware of it? Or that, although they were aware of having attained to that Islam but wanted to continue on it? Just look at the context of the prayer: Those who prayed were so near to Allãh; they were praying while building His Sacred House; they knew whom they were praying to, and who He was and how great His splendour is. Could they, in that position, ask for such a trivial grade from the Lord Almighty? Moreover, this grade of Islam is among those things which are within the power of man himself; and that is why man can be ordered to accept it; as Allãh says: When his Lord said to him: "Be a Muslim", he said: "I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds" (2:131). Obviously, such a quality or action cannot be attributed to Allãh; likewise, it is meaningless to ask from Allãh to do a work which has been placed within the power of the man himself. (Of course, it may be done if there is some special condition which makes Divine interference justifiable.)

Therefore, the Islam they had asked for was not that Islam whose definition we are familiar with. Islam has many grades, as may be see in the verse quoted above: When his Lord said to him (i.e., Ibrãhīm) : "Be a Muslim", he said: "I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds" (2:131). Ibrãhīm (a.s.) was ordered to be a Muslim at a time when he was already a Muslim. Clearly, the Islam which he was told to attain was other than the Islam he had already attained. There are many such examples in the Qur'ãn.

This sublime grade of Islam – which we shall explain in detail later on – means total servitude, unconditional surrender of all a servant has got to his Master. No doubt it is within a man's power to prepare the conditions facilitating its attainment. Yet, when we look at an average man and the usual condition of his heart and mind, such a high standard seems beyond his power to attain. In other words, it is not possible for him – in the conditions surrounding him – to get to that sublime Islam. From this point of view, that Islam is not different from other positions of al-wilãyah (الولايَةُ = friendship of Allãh) and its lofty stages, or from other grades of perfection – all of them are beyond the reach of an average man, because he cannot fulfil their necessary conditions. In this sense, it is possible to count that Islam as a Divine gift which is beyond a man's power to attain by himself. Consequently, it is perfectly right for a man to pray to Allãh to bestow on him that sublime quality and make him a Muslim of that high rank.

Moreover, there is another deeper connotations: It is only actions which are attributed to man and emanate from his free will and power; as for his attributes and deep-rooted traits (which are etched on his psyche by repeated actions), they are in fact beyond his power. Therefore, they may be – or let us say, should be – attributed to Allãh, especially if they are good and virtuous attributes which should better be attributed to Allãh rather than to man. This observation is based on the style used in the Qur'ãn. For example:

"My Lord! make me keep up prayer, and from my off-spring (too) " (14:40) ;

" . . . and join me with the good ones" (26:83) ;

"My Lord! grant me that I should be grateful for Thy bounty which Thou has bestowed on me and on my parents, and that I should do good such as Thou art pleased with, and make me enter, by Thy mercy, into Thy servants, the good ones" (27:19);

"Our Lord! and make us both submissive to Thee and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting to Thee (2:128).

It is now clear that the Islam which Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl had asked for was something different from the Islam to which the verse 49:14 refers: The dwellers of the desert say: "We believe." Say: "You do not believe but say: 'We submit (we accept Islam)'; and faith has not yet entered into your hearts."

The Islam they prayed for was of a high rank and sublime grade which we shall explain later on.

QUR'ÃN: and show us our ways of devotion and turn to us (mercifully), surely Thou art the Oft-returning (with mercy), the Merciful: This also points to the sublime meaning of Islam, just referred to al-manãsik (اَلمَناسِكُ = translated here as ways of devotion) is plural of al-mansak (اَلمَنسَكُ) which means "worship" or "act of worship", as Allãh says: And to every nation We appointed (acts of) worship. . . (22:34). It is a maṣdar used as the first construct of a genitive case. We have explained earlier that a maṣdar used in this way proves the existence of that work or action. Therefore, the phrase, "our ways of devotion", refers to those acts of worship which they were doing or had already done; it does not refer to any action which they intended to do in future. In this context, the phrase "show us" does not mean "teach us" or "help us to do"; rather it means "strengthen us by showing us the realities of our acts of worship", as we pointed out earlier while writing the verse: and We revealed to them the doing of good (deeds) and the establishing of prayer and the giving of zakãt (21:73). And later on we shall explain that the revelation mentioned in this verse means to strengthen the doer of that deed; it does not mean teaching them their responsibilities and obligations. Probably, it is to this reality that the verses 38: 45 – 46 refer: And remember Our servants, Ibrãhīm and Isḥãq and Ya'qũb, men of strength and insight. Surely We purified them by a pure quality, the remembering of the (final) abode.

The above explanation makes it clear that this prayer was for an Islam and an insight into worship completely different from ordinary meanings of these terms. The same is the case with their prayer, tub 'alaynã (تُبْ عَلَيْنا = usually translated as, forgive us) ;

Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl both were prophets, protected by Allãh from every error and sin; they could not make any mistake or error; they did not need Allãh's forgiveness and pardon as we do when we commit sins, (that is why we have translated it in literal way: turn to us mercifully).

Question: It is all right to interpret Islam, showing the ways of devotion and forgiveness in the way you have done maintaining the dignity of Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl (peace be on them both). But it is not necessary to apply the same meanings when these words are used for their offspring. Ibrãhīm (a.s.) did not include his offspring with himself and Ismã'īl, except in the prayer for Islam, and that also in a separate sentence. They did not say: Make us and a group of our offspring submissive to Thee; instead they prayed for themselves, and after that separately pleaded for their offspring, saying, "and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting to Thee". There should be no difficulty in believing that what they had in mind was Islam in its general meaning covering all its ranks and grades – even the most elementary one. Even this elementary grade of Islam gives good results and is instrumental in creating good environment in the society. It would not be wrong if Ibrãhīm (a.s.) asked his Lord for this Islam; even the Prophet invited people to just that type of Islam – if they testified that there was none to be worshipped except Allãh and Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) was His Messenger, they were accepted as Muslims, their lives were protected, marriage with them was allowed and they became entitled to inherit from their Muslim relatives. Therefore, it should be perfectly right to say that the two sentences refer to two separate ranks of Islam: "Our Lord! and make us both submissive to Thee", would mean the highest rank of Islam in conformity with the prestige of Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl; "and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting to Thee", would refer to the elementary grade of Islam befitting a nation which included hypocrites and people of weak faith as well as those with firm belief – and all are called Muslims.

Reply: Position of legislation for the guidance of people is totally different from the position of praying to Allãh, and each has its own rules; what is valid on one plane is not necessarily good on the other. The Prophet prescribed a minimum standard for his ummah, that is, to utter the two testimonies of the Oneness of Allãh, and his own prophethood; it was done with a view to widen the circle of Islam and to protect the healthy religious system – that manifest Islam protected the essence of Islam as a shell protects the kernel.

But the plane of invocation and prayer to Allãh is much higher than that. At this level, appearances loose their value; it is the reality that matters here; the objective here is actuality and truth, and the desire is for nearness to Allãh. At this level, the prophets are not influenced by appearance. It was not because of any worldly love of his offspring that Ibrãhīm (a.s.) prayed for his progeny. Had it been so, he would have prayed first of all for his father and would not have declared his separation from him as soon as he came to know that he was an enemy of Allãh. Also, if he would have been concerned with appearances, he would not have prayed in the following words: And disgrace me not on the day when they are raised, the day on which neither property will avail, nor sons, except him who comes to Allãh with a heart submissive (26:87 – 89) ; nor would have he said: And make for me a truthful tongue among the posterity (26:84), instead he would have said, make for me a remembering tongue among the posterity.

Keeping all this in view, it is easy to understand that when he asked from his Lord to raise a Muslim group from among his offspring, he did not mean the elementary rank of Islam; he wanted for them the reality of Islam. The Qur'ãnic words, "a group submitting to Thee", support this interpretation. If he wanted only the appearance of Islam and not its essence, it was enough to say, "a group submitting", there was no need to add, "to Thee". (Ponder on this point.)

QUR'ÃN: Our Lord! and raise up in them an Apostle from among themselves . . . : He was praying for the Prophet; and the Prophet used to say: "I am the prayer of Ibrãhīm".

al-Kattānī said: "I asked Abu Abdillāh (a.s.) about a man who forgot to pray two rak'ahs near the standing-place of Ibrāhīm, in aṭ-ṭawāf (اَلطَّوَافُ = circuit, circumambulation) of the ḥajj and 'umrah. He (a.s.) said: 'If he is still in the town (Mecca), he should pray the two rak'ahs near the standing-place of Ibrāhim, because verily Allāh says: and take (for yourselves) a place of prayer on the standing-place of Ibrāhīm; and if he has departed (from it) then I will not order him to return.' " (al-Kāfi)

The author says: Almost similar traditions have been narrated by ash-Shaykh in at-Tahdhīb and by al-'Ayyāshī in his at-Tafsīr with several asnād (i.e., chains of narrators). Particulars of this rule (i.e., prayer should be offered near or behind the standing-place – as is narrated in some traditions that: "No-one should pray the two rak'ahs of aṭ-ṭawāf except behind the standing-place . . .") are inferred from the word min (مِنْ = from; here translated as on) used in the order, and take. . . a place of prayer on (or, from) the standing-place.. .

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said explaining the words of Allāh: Purify (you two) My House . . .: "Keep the polytheists away from it." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi) aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: " Verily Allāh, Mighty and Great is He! says in His Book: 'Purify (you two) My House for those who make circuit and those who abide (in it for devotion) and those who bow down (and) those who prostrate themselves.' Therefore, it is proper for a servant not to enter Mecca except that he is clean, (and) has washed away his sweat and dirt and has purified himself."

The author says: This meaning has been narrated in other traditions also. The idea, that if the place of arrival is clean then the one who arrives should make himself clean, may be inferred from other verses too. See, for example, the verse: and the good things are for good ones and the good ones are for good things (24:26).

Ibn ‘‘Abbãs said: “When Ibrãhīm brought Ismã‘īl and Hãjar, he settled them at Mecca; and a time passed; and the people of (the tribe of) Jurhum came to settle there and Ismã‘īl married a woman from that tribe; and Hãjar died; and Ibrãhīm asked permission of Sãrah (to visit Ismã‘īl) ; so she allowed him but imposed a condition on him that he would not come down (from his riding animal). Thus Ibrãhīm arrived (at Mecca) and Hãjar had died, so he went to the house of Ismã‘īl; and he asked his wife: ‘Where is your husband?’ She told him: ‘He is not here, he has gone hunting.’ And Ismã‘īl used to go outside al-Ḥaram (اَلحَرَم = the boundary) to hunt and then return. Ibrãhīm said to her: ‘Do you have anything to entertain a guest?’ She said: ‘I have nothing and there is nobody with me.’ Then Ibrãhīm said to her: ‘When your husband comes, tell him (my) salãm and tell him to change the threshold of his door.’ And Ibrãhīm went away. Then Ismã‘īl came and felt the scent of his father. So he asked his wife: ‘Had anyone come to you?’ She said: ‘An old man had come to me with such and such features (describing him scornfully).’ (Ismã‘īl) said: ‘Then what did he say to you?’ She said: ‘He said to me to give you (his) salãm and to tell you to change the threshold of your door.’ So, Ismã‘īl divorced her and married another (woman). Thereafter, Ibrãhīm remained (at his place) as long as Allãh wished him to remain (there). Then he asked permission of Sãrah to visit Ismã‘īl; and she allowed him, but (again) imposed the (same) condition that he should not come down (from his riding animal). Then Ibrãhīm came until he reached the door of Ismã‘īl. And he asked his wife: ‘Where is your husband?’ She said: ‘He has gone for hunting and, Allãh willing, he will come back just now; you come down, may Allãh have mercy upon you!’ He asked her: ‘Do you have anyting to entertain a guest?’ She said: ‘Yes.’ Then she brought milk and meat. (Ibrãhīm) thereupon prayed and blessed her. Had she brought on that day bread, wheat, barley or date, (Mecca) would have become the most plentiful of all the world in wheat, barley or date. Then she said to him: ‘(Please) come down so that I may wash your head.’ But he did not come down. So she brought (the stone which thereafter was known as) the standing-place (of Ibrãhīm) and put it on his (right) side, and he put his foot on it, and his footmark was impressed on it; (in this way) she washed the right side of his head; then she shifted the stone to his left side and washed the left side of his head, and (again) his footmark was imprinted on it. Thereupon (Ibrãhīm) said to her: 'When your husband comes, give him (my) salãm and tell him that the threshold of his door is now in order.' When Ismã'īl (a.s.) came back, he felt the scent of his father, and asked his wife: 'Had anyone come to you?' She replied: 'Yes, a venerable (old) man, of loveliest features and most pleasant fragrance; he said to me this and this and I told him this and this; and I washed his head and this is the imprint of his feet on (his) standing-place.' (Hearing this), Ismã'īl said to her: 'That was Ibrãhīm.'' "(Majma'u 'l-bayãn) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Verily, Ibrãhīm settled in a valley of Syria. When he got his son Ismã'īl from Hãjar, Sãrah was extremely grieved because she hereself had no child. And she used to hurt Ibrãhīm and make him unhappy with respect to Hãjar. So Ibrãhīm complained to Allãh about it, and Allãh sent a revelation to him: 'The likeness of woman is like the curved rib; if you leave it (as it is), you will benefit from it, but if you (try to) make it straight, you will break it.' Thereafter, (Allãh) ordered him to remove Ismã'īl and his mother (from that place). He said: 'O Lord! to which place?' (Allãh) said: 'To My holy place, and My sanctuary, and the part of the earth which I created first (of all the earth); and it is Mecca.' Then Allãh sent Jibrīl down to him with al-Burãq;* and (Jibrīl) made Hãjar, Ismã'īl and Ibrãhīm ride on it. And whenever Ibrãhīm passed a good place with trees, cultivation and date-palms, he used to say: 'O Jibrīl! here? here?' And Jibrīl used to reply: 'No, go on, go on.' (It continued) until they reached Mecca and (Jibrīl) made them alight in the place where the House is.

And Ibrãhīm had given Sãrah a promise that he would not come down until he came back to her. When they alighted in that place, there was a tree there; Hãjar spread on that tree a sheet she had with her, and thus they found a shade under it. When Ibrãhīm arranged their affairs and settled them there, he wished to leave them to return to Sãrah. Hãjar said to him: 'O Ibrãhīm! Are you leaving us in a place where there is neither human being to keep company nor water nor cultivation?' Ibrãhīm said: 'Allãh, Who has ordered me to settle you in this place, will suffice you.' Then he took leave of them. When he reached Kada' (a mountain in Dhu Ṭuwã), Ibrãhīm turned around and said: "O our Lord! surely I have settled a part of my offspring in a valley uncultivable near Thy Sacred House, our Lord!, that they may establish prayer; therefore make the hearts of some people yearn towards them and provide them with fruits, haply they may be grateful" (14:37). Then he went away, and Hãjar remained (there). When the sun rose high, Ismã'īl became thirsty; Hãjar stood at the running-place*, and she ascended the Ṣafã, and mirage glittered before her in the valley and she thought that it was water; so she descended to the valley and ran (to it). When she reached Marwah, she could not see Ismã'īl, therefore, she returned until she reached Ṣafã and again she looked (around, with the same effect) ; until she did likewise seven times. When she was on Marwah, in the seventh round, she looked at Ismã'īl and lo! water had appeared from under his feet. She returned and gathered sand around the water – the water was flowing and she "reined" (Arabic: زَمَّتْ = zammat) it with (the sand) which she put around it, and that is why it was called zamzam. And the (tribe of) Jurhum had come down at Dhu 'l-majaz and Arafat. When water appeared at Mecca, the birds and wild animals gathered around it; the Jurhum saw this gathering of the birds and animals at that place and followed them until they found a woman and a child settled there – they were sitting in the shade of the tree and the water had appeared for them.

They said to Hãjar: 'Who are you? And what is the matter with you and this child?' She said: 'I am the mother of the son of Ibrãhīm, the friend of Allãh, and this is his son; Allãh has ordered him to settle us here.' They asked her: 'Would you allow us to remain near you?' She told them: 'Until Ibrãhīm comes.' When Ibrãhīm came to visit them the third day, Hãjar said: 'O friend of Allãh! there are some people of Jurhum here; they request you to allow them to settle near us; so will you allow them?' Ibrãhīm said: 'Yes.' Then Hãjar allowed them and they settled near them, and erected their tents. In this way Hãjar and Ismã'īl got on friendly terms with them. When Ibrãhīm came to see them the second time, he looked at the large number of people around them, and he was extremely happy. When Ismã'īl grew up – and each one of the Jurhum had presented one or two goats to Ismã'īl – so Hãjar and Ismã'īl supported themselves with them. When Ismã'īl came of age, Allãh ordered Ibrãhīm to build the House . . . When Allãh ordered Ibrãhīm to build the House, he did not know where to build it; so Allãh sent Jibrīl and he drew a line at the site of the House . . . So, Ibrãhīm built the House and shifted Ismã'īl from Dhũ Ṭuwã. And he raised (the House) nine hands in height. Then (Jibrīl) led him to the place of the (Black) Stone, and Ibrãhīm took it out and fixed it in the place where it is at present. When he built it, he made two doors for it, one in the east and the other in the west; and the door that was in the west is (now) called al-Mustajãr. Then he put on it tree (-trunks) and al-adhkhar (اَلأَذْخَرْ = a sweet smelling grass) (as roof). And Hãjar put on the door a sheet she had with her and under which they used to sit. When he built and completed it, Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl performed their ḥajj. Jibrīl came to them on the day of at-tarwiyah, that is, 8th Dhu 'l-ḥijjah, and said: 'O Ibrãhīm! stand up and quench your thirst from water' (because there was no water in Minã or 'Arafãt) ; that is why it was named the day of at-tarwiyah (اَلتَّرويَةُ = to quench thirst). Then (Jibrīl) took him out to Mina and he stayed there in the night, and Jibrīl did with Ibrãhīm what he had done with Ãdam. Thus, when Ibrãhīm completed the construction of the House, he said: 'My Lord! make it a secure town and provide its people with fruits, such of them as believe in Allãh . . .' " The Imãm explained the fruits as the fruits of the hearts, that is, make people love them, so that they may befriend them and return to them (year after year). (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi)

The author says: This is the gist of this story, and it covers many of the traditions narrated about this subject. Some other traditions say that there had happened many miraculous things in the history of the House. For example, some traditions say that the House in the very beginning was a dome of light; it had descended on Ãdam and settled in the place where in later days Ibrãhīm built the Ka'bah; and that dome remained in the place till the deluge of Nũḥ; when the earth was submerged in water, Allãh took that dome up; and its site was not submerged, that is why the Ka'bah is called the Ancient House.

Other traditions say that Allãh sent the foundation of the House down from the Garden.

Yet others say that the Black Stone came down from the Garden – and it was whiter than snow – then it turned black when it was touched by the unbelievers.

Also it is narrated from al-Bãqir or aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) that he said: "Verily Allãh ordered Ibrãhīm to build the Ka'bah and to raise its walls and to show the people their ways of devotion (i.e., ḥajj). Thereupon, Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl built the House, every day (the height of) a knee until it reached the place of the Black Stone." And al-Bãqir (a.s.) said: "Then the (mountain) Abu Qubays called to him: 'I have something in trust for you;' and it gave him the (Black) Stone, and he put it in its place." (al-Kãfī) ath-Thawrī says: "I asked Abu Ja'far (a.s.) about the Stone. He said: 'Three stones came down from the Garden: the Black Stone which was put in place by Ibrãhīm, and the Standing-place of Ibrãhīm, and the stone of the Israelites.' " (al-'Ayyãshī)

And a tradition says that the Black Stone was an angel.

The author says: There are very many such traditions narrated by both the Shī'ah and the Sunni narrators; and although these traditions are ãḥãd and do not reach, in words or meanings, the standard required for a mutawãtir narration, still they are not unique in the field of religious descriptions, nor is there any reason to discard them altogether.

As for the narration that the dome was sent down to Ãdam or that Ibrãhīm rode al-Buraq for his journey to Mecca and other such miraculous happenings which have a super-natural character, there is no reason to say that they were impossible. Moreover, Allãh had given His prophets many such miracles and super-natural signs, and the Qur'ãn mentions many such events.

So far as the coming down of the foundations of the House, the Black Stone and the Standing Stone (which is said to be fixed in the structure now known as the Standing-place of Ibrãhīm) and other such things are concerned, there are many such examples found in the Qur'ãn and ḥadīth. Many vegetables and fruits etc. are said to be from the Garden, or from the Fire and its out-burst. Of the same genre are the traditions of "substance" saying that the substance of the good people is from the Garden and that of the evil ones is from the Fire; or that they are from al-'illiyyīn (اَلعِلِّيِينُ = lofty place; the Book of the deeds of the virtuous) and as-sijjīn (اَلسِّجِينُ = prison; the Book of the deeds of the evil ones), respecttively. Of similar nature are the traditions to the effect that the Garden of al-barzakh (the period between death and the Day of Judgment) is in some specified place on this earth, and the Fire of al-barzakh in some other place in it; and that the grave is either a section of the Garden's or a pit of the Fire's. There are many such informations which one is sure to come upon while studying the traditions. And, as we said earlier, they are so huge in number that the whole lot cannot be discarded, nor is it possible to question its authenticity. They are parts of the Divine realities expounded by the Qur'ãn and followed by the traditions. The fact is that all the things seen in this material world have been sent down by Allãh; whatsoever is good and lovely, or is a means to or a receptacle of good, has come down from the Garden and will return to it; and whatsoever is bad and evil, or is a means to or a receptacle of evil, has come down from the Fire and will return to it. Allãh says: And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure (15:21). It shows that everything exists with Allãh, and it is an existence without any limit or measure; when it is sent down – a gradual descent – then it becomes subject to limits and measures. This verse describes the descent of all things in general. But there are also in the Qur'ãn specific examples of this descent. Allãh says: . . . and He has sent down for you eight of the cattle in pairs. . . (39:6); . . . and We have sent down the iron . . . (57:25) ; And in the heaven is your sustenance, and what you are promised (51:22). We shall further explain the meanings of these verses in their proper places, Allãh willing. They however prove that every thing descends to this world from Allãh. Other verses show that they are also to return to him, as He says: And that to your Lord is the end goal (53:42); Surely to your Lord is the return (96:8); . . . to Him is the eventual coming (40:3) ; . . . now surely to Allãh do all affairs eventually come (42:53). There are many verses in the Qur'ãn of the same connotation.

Also, Allãh has made it clear that every thing – and all things presently are in middle of their journey – follows a course demanded by its origin, and that origin has some effect on its success and failure, its good and evil, as the Qur'ãn says: Say: "Every one acts according to his own manner . . ." (17:84) ; And every one has a direction to which he should turn . . . (2:148). We shall explain all these verses in their places; here they have been quoted just to complete the picture, and make the subject of our discussion clearer. What these verses prove is this: There is reason to believe that the traditions which say about a material thing that it came down from the Garden or from the Fire (when that thing has some connection with the next life's happiness or unhappiness) are on the whole correct, because they are, generally speaking, in conformity with the Qur'ãnic principles – although it does not mean that each and every such tradition is correct or trustworthy. Ponder on this point.

Someone has said: "The Divine words: And (remember) when Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl were raising the foundations of the House . . ., manifestly show that the two prophets built this House for the worship of Allãh in that country of the idol-worshippers. But the story-tellers and those exegetes who followed them have embroidered what Allãh had said. They have added a lot of fanciful details, as, for example, that the House was from the very beginning and Ãdam did its ḥajj; that it was taken to the heaven during Null's flood; that the Black Stone was one of the stones of the Garden. Their main purpose was to present the religion in an attractive garment, adorning it with fascinating narratives. Such myths may impress the masses; but the people who have knowledge and wisdom know that spiritual excellence depends on Divine bestowal – it is Allãh Who makes one thing to excel the others. The Ka'bah has excellence because it is the House of Allãh, that is, attributed to Him; the Black Stone is excellent because people have been ordered to kiss it – in this respect it represents the hand of Allãh. It has no bearing on its excellence whether originally it was a ruby or a pearl or some other rock; nor do such tales add to its real glory. In reality it makes no difference in the eyes of Allãh whether a stone is black or white. The Ka'bah has got its distinction and honour because Allãh has called it His House, and has appointed it as the centre for various acts of worship which cannot be performed in any other place – its glory does not lie in the fact that its stones are more valuable than other stones, or that its site is the most attractive of all, or that it was sent down from the lofty heavens. Likewise, the excellence of the prophets is not based on any distinctive feature of their bodies nor on the quality of their apparel. They got excellence because Allãh chose them especially, and selected them for His prophethood which is a spiritual thing; otherwise many people in the world were far superior to them in their adornments and enjoyed greater worldly bounties."

He continues to say: "These traditions are untrustworthy because they contradict each other and some are self-contradictory; they are unauthentic because their chains of narrators are not correct; they are unacceptable because they go against the apparent meaning of the Qur'ãn."

He further says: "These traditions are Israelite myths, propagated among the Muslims by unbelieving Jews to make Islam look ridiculous, in order to keep the People of the Book away from it."

The author says: There is a grain of truth in some things he has said: But he has gone far beyond the limit in disputation, and consequently has lost his bearings and arrived at a hypothesis much more atrocious and repugnant, Let us have a critical look at his arguments:

Objection: "These traditions are untrustworthy and unacceptable because they contradict each other and are against the Qur'ãn."

Reply: The fact that some of them contradict the others could be a matter of worry if we were to accept them one by one as separate independent units. But when we accept the whole in their collective capacity (i.e., when we say that the whole lot should not be discarded because, taken all together, they do not tell us anything that is against reason or against the Qur'ãn or accepted traditions), then it is of no importance if there some minor discrepancies between individual traditions. But one point must be made clear here: What we have said just now, concerns the traditions narrated from the infallible sources like the Prophet and his sinless family members. So far as other exegetes among the Companions and their disciples are concerned, they, in this respect, are just like any other people; for us it makes no difference whether their talk is free from contradiction or riddled with it.

In short, there is no justification to discard a tradition, or a group of traditions, unless it goes against the Qur'ãn or other authentic traditions, or the marks of forgery and lie are stamped on it. (However, when it comes to the basic religious knowledge and fundamental beliefs, the only thing accepted as proof is the Book of Allãh and the authentic traditions of the Prophet and his sinless progeny; nothing else counts in this area.)

It is now clear that there are some things which must be accepted, that is, the Qur'ãn and the authentic traditions; and there are others which must be rejected, that is, all that goes against the Qur'ãn and the authentic traditions. Then there is a third group: the traditions concerning which there is neither any proof compelling us to reject it, nor forcing us to accept it. These are the traditions which are neither impossible in reason nor unacceptable according to the Qur'ãn and authentic traditions – and there is no reason why they should be discarded altogether.

Objection: These traditions are unauthentic according to their chains of narrators.

Reply: The above given explanation also dispels this doubt, because weakness of the chains of narrators does not oblige us to reject the whole group, unless it is against the reason, the Qur'ãn or the authentic traditions.

Objection: They are against the words of Allãh; And (remember) when Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl were raising the foundation of the House.. .

Reply: I wish I knew how this verse proves that the Black Stone was not from the Garden! Or, that the dome did not come down to that place in Ãdam's time (and there was, therefore, no question of its being taken up at the time of the flood)! The only thing the verse says is that this construction, made of stone and mud, was built by Ibrãhīm. What has this got to do – either for or against – the traditions mentioned earlier. The only difficulty with those traditions is that the objector does not like them. And this dislike is based, not on the principles of religion, but on his biased views. He does not believe that the prophets had any spiritual realities within them; he does not think that the exoteric side of religion is based on its esoteric aspect; he unconsciously is so much over-awed by today's natural sciences that he tries to find a material cause not only for material happenings but even for spiritual things – if they have even a slight connection with matter. For him, the matter rules over all happenings, not excepting the sociological principles.

This man should have pondered on this point: The natural sciences deal with the matter; its properties and its various compounds; they look at the relationship of a natural effect with its cause. Likewise, the various sociological disciplines study the social relationships among various event taking place in society.

But the natural and sociological sciences have no concern at all with the realities which are beyond the sphere of matter, outside its field of action; they have no jurisdiction even over immaterial connections existing between a material thing and an event taking place in the visible world. The natural sciences and disciplines have no authority or right to confirm or reject these immaterial realities. It is within the jurisdiction of natural science to say that construction of a house depends on things like mud, stone and mason; it may explain how black stones may take the shape of a room. Likewise, sociological disciplines may describe the factors which led to the building of the Ka'bah – it may explain a part of Ibrãhīm's biography, Hãjar's life, Ismã'īl's story, history of Tahamah, arrival of the tribe of Jurhum and things like that. But these sciences and disciplines have no right to discuss what was the relation between a certain stone on one hand and the Garden or the Fire on the other; nor have these branches of knowledge any right to express any affirmative or negative opinion about such narratives.

And you have seen that the Qur'ãn clearly says that even material and physical things have been sent down from the treasure which is with Allãh, and that they would ultimately return to Him – either to the Garden or to the Fire. Also, the Qur'ãn says that the deeds and actions – which are but physical movements and positions – ascend to Allãh acid arrive at His presence: To Him do ascend the good words, and the good deed lifts them up (35 :10) ; again it says: to Him reaches the piety on your part (22:37), and piety is but action or a characteristic acquired through repeated actions. It is essential for a student of religion to meditate on these verses and to understand that the religious realities do not have any relationship with material or sociological matters per se; they depend on the facts which are beyond the reach of material disciplines.

Objection: The excellence of the prophets, and the things attributed to them like the Ka'bah or the Black Stone, is not based on a material quality; it is a spiritual excellence bestowed by the Divine Grace.

Reply: What he says is right. But he should understand what is the real meaning of what he says. What is that spiritual reality which creates excellence? Is it a mentally posited abstract idea created by social needs, like the designations and offices found in every nation, for example, presidency, leadership of the party, the high price of gold and silver, respect of the parents, sanctity of the laws of the land? All these are subjective and imaginative abstract forms which the societies have laid down to meet their own needs; but they have no existence outside the imagination, beyond subjective consideration. Such honours and distinctions cannot be found outside the social life which created them to fulfil its needs; and Allãh is too sublime for such needs to reach His presence. Therefore, such social distinctions have no relevance to an excellence given by Allãh to any of His creatures.

If the objector thinks that the excellence of the prophets is just like the above-mentioned imaginary and unreal honours, then why should a house or a stone be denied a similar excellence? And if he believes that an excellence given by Allãh is the real one, as is found in light vis-à-vis darkness, in knowledge vis-à-vis ignorance, and in wisdom vis-à-vis idiocy, then of course it would be a real and actual excellence. In that case, the quiddity of the existence of a prophet would be different from the quiddity of other human beings – even if our senses are unable to grasp it. And such real excellence and distinction is in keeping with the sublimity and sanctity of the Divine actions and wisdom. Allãh says: And We did not create the heavens and the earth and what is between them in sport. We did not create them both but with the truth, but most of them do not know (44:38 – 39). Such a distinction is real, spiritual, metaphysical and beyond the reach of physical nature. And if such real excellence may be given to the prophets, why can it not be bestowed on some other things, like the Ka'bah and the Black Stone etc.? And, may be, it is this real immaterial excellence which has been described in such words that the people could easily understand.

Would that I knew what would such people do about those Qur'ãnic verses which say that the people of the Garden will be given cups, ornaments and dresses of gold and silver. These two metals have no inherent excellence except that their price remains high because of their scarcity. If so, then why should they be used for exalting the people of the Garden? What wealth will they represent in the Garden? After all, the economics of this world will not be valid there!

These and other such Divine words and exoteric expressions are the curtains which hide the esoteric realities; they are the veils covering Divine secrets. And if such expressions are accept-able for the realities of the next world, they can as easily be used for some facts of this one.

az-Zubayri says: "I said to Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.): 'Tell me about the ummah of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.), who are they?' He said: 'The ummah of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) are the Children of Hãshim in particular.' I said: 'And what is the proof that the ummah of Muhammad are his family members you have mentioned, to the exclusion of the others?' He said: '(It is) the words of Allãh: And (remember) when Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl were raising the foundations of the House: "Our Lord! accept from us; surely Thou art the Hearing, the Knowing. Our Lord! and make us both submissive to Thee and (raise) from our offspring a group (ummah) submitting to Thee, and show us our ways of devotion and turn to us (mercifully), surely Thou art the Oft-returning (with mercy), the Merciful." When Allãh answered the prayer of Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl and did (promise to) raise from their offspring a submissive ummah and raised up in them an Apostle from among themselves, that is, from among that ummah itself, to recite to them His communications, and to teach them the Book and the wisdom, Ibrãhīm beseeched Allãh for another bounty; and asked for that ummah purity from polytheism and idol-worship in order that the affair of that Apostle might remain firm and strong among them and they might not need to follow anyone other than themselves. That is why Ibrãhīm said: "and save me and my sons from worshipping idols: My Lord! Surely they have led many men astray; then whoever follows me, he is surely of me, and whoever disobeys me, Thou surely art Forgiving, Merciful" (14:35 – 36). It proves that the Imãms, and the submissive ummah in which Muhammad (s. a. w. a.) was raised, cannot be except from the offspring of Ibrãhīm (a.s.), because he had said: "save me and my sons from worshipping idols" ' ". (al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: The argument of the Imãm is absolutely clear. Ibrãhīm (a. s.) had asked this submissive ummah to be from his offspring in particular; and the next sentence, "Our Lord! and raise up in them an Apostle from among themselves. . .", show that the same submissive group is the ummah of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) – and the word, ummah, as used here, does not refer to the people whom Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) was sent to; nor to those who answered his call and believed in his prophethood, because that ummah is not confined to the offspring of Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl; the word in the present context refers to a particular submissive ummah from the offspring of Ibrãhīm (a.s.). There-after, Ibrãhīm (a.s.) prayed to his Lord to protect him and his sons from idol-worship, to keep them away from polytheism and error – and this Divine protection is 'iṣmah (infallibility; sinlessness). Also we know that there were a lot of people among the offspring of Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl – the Arabs of the Muḍar, or particularly the Quraysh – who had gone astray and worshipped idols. It proves that when Ibrãhīm (a.s.) prayed for his "sons" to be protected from idol-worship, he did not mean all his sons; he was praying only for his infallible offspring, that is, the Prophet and his purified progeny. These, then, are the ummah of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) in the prayer of Ibrãhīm (a.s.). Probably, it was for this fine distinction that Ibrãhīm (a.s.) changed the word, "offspring", to "sons"; this view is strengthened by the phrases following this prayer, "then whoever follows me, he is surely of me, and whoever disobeys me, Thou surely art Forgiving, Merciful". Note the opening word, "then", which shows that what follows is based on what has preceded; thereafter, he confirms that those who would follow him would be from him, a part of him; but then he stops and does not say anything about the opposite group, as though he does not recognize them, they are strangers to him. (Think it over.)

The Imãm said that Ibrãhīm (a.s.) "asked for that ummah purity from polytheism and idol-worship". Actually, he had asked protection only from worshipping the idols; but then he mentioned why he had asked for that protection: surely the idols have led many men astray. In this way, the original prayer for protection from idol-worship became an all-encompassing prayer for protection from all types of straying and error, ranging from idol-worship to small sins – because every sin is a sort of polytheism, as we have already explained under the verse: The path of those upon whom Thou hast bestowed favours . . . (1:7).

The Imãm said: "It proves that the Imãms, and the submissive ummah in which Muhammad (s. a. w. a.) was raised, cannot be except from _ the offspring of Ibrãhīm (a.s.)." That is the Imãms are the submissive ummah, and they are from the offspring of Ibrãhīm (a.s.), as explained above.

Objection: You say that the word, ummah, in this verse refers to a small group of the Muslims, and not to the whole nation; you use the same interpretation in some other verses, for example, You are the best nation raised up for (the benefit of) men . . . (3:110). But this obliges us to interpret the word in a metaphorical way – without any justifiable reason. Moreover, the Qur'ãn addresses itself to the whole ummah who believed in the Prophet; it is a self-evident fact which does not need any proof.

Reply: It was long after the revelation of the Qur'ãn and the spread of Islam that the phrase, ummah of Muhammad, was popularly used for "all those who believe in his prophethood". It is a later usage.

The original meaning of this word is "people", "nation", "group", as Allãh says: and blessing on you and the people (umam = plural of ummah) from among those who are with you; and there shall be people (umam). . . (11:48). This word is sometimes used even for one person; Surely Ibrãhīm was a

"people" (devoutly) obedient to Allãh (16:120). Therefore, it is the context or the intention of the speaker which decides how big or small a circle this word describes in a sentence. Now the words, Our Lord! and make us both submissive to Thee and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting to Thee, were spoken in prayer, and as explained earlier, they could refer to only a selected group out of the multitude who believe in the Prophet. Likewise, the verse, You are the best nation raised up for (the benefit of) men, was revealed to show the favour of Allãh on the people thus addressed; its import is to increase their prestige and enhance their dignity. Surely, these words could be addressed to the whole ummah who call themselves Muslims. How could it apply to the Pharaohs and Dajjals of this ummah who did not leave any vestige of the religion without destroying, and who did not come across any religious virtue without crushing it? (We shall explain it in detail when writing on this verse.) In short, this verse is like the talk of Allãh with the Children of Israel: and that I made you excel the nations (2:47) ; we should not forget that a man like Qãrũn was one of them, and surely this talk does not include him. Likewise, the complaint of the Prophet, "O my Lord! surely my people treated this Qur'ãn as a forsaken thing" (25: 30), cannot cover all his ummah – there are among them the lovers of the Qur'ãn, the men whom neither merchandise nor selling diverts from the remembrance of Allãh. On the other hand, there is the verse 2:134, which is addressed to the whole ummah, and covers all those who believed in the Prophet and even those to whom he was sent: This is a people that have passed away; they shall have what they earned and you shall have what you earn, and you shall not be called upon to answer for what they did.

AN ACADEMIC DISCOURSE

Ponder on the story of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) ; study his life; see how he took his son and wife to the land where now Mecca stands, and settled them there; how their lives progressed until finally the "sacrifice" of Ismã'īl took place and, in the last moment, he was ransomed by Allãh; read how they together built the Ka'bah. You will find that it is a complete cycle of devotional journey. It shows how a servant proceeds from his "self" to his Lord, from a far away station to the centre of "Divine Nearness"; how the journey is accomplished avoiding the vanities of this world, shunning its protection, keeping away from its desires – prestige, wealth, women and children – freeing oneself from the intrigues of satans, not letting them pollute the purity of intention, and turning with total surrender and progressing with complete devotion to the Lord, the Great, the High.

These apparently unrelated events are in fact of an unbroken series. They are historical narratives, but they describe the stages of the spiritual journey of a servant from self to the Lord. They teach us the discipline of that journey, instruct us in the rules and manners of seeking nearness to Allãh, of reaching His presence. The more you meditate on his story, the deeper will be your spiritual understanding – you will come to know the demands of Divine love and sincere devotion.

Allãh ordered His friend, Ibrãhīm, to promulgate the ḥajj for the people, and He says: And proclaim among men the ḥajj; they will come to you on foot and on every lean camel, coming from every remote path. . . (22:27). We do not know the details of the laws of the ḥajj as promulgated by Ibrãhīm (a.s.). But we know that the ḥajj continued as an event of great religious importance even among the Arabs of the days of ignorance. Then Allãh sent the Prophet and he gave us the rules of the ḥajj as we know them. One thing is certain: He did not go against the rules laid down by Ibrãhīm (a.s.) ; what he did was to complete and perfect them. This fact may be inferred from the words of Allãh: Say: "Surely, (as for) me, my Lord has guided me to the straight path; (to) a most right religion, the faith of Ibrãhīm, the upright one" . . . (6:161); He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nũḥ and that which We have revealed unto you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrãhīm and Mũsã and 'Isã . . . (42:13).

In any case, all the devotional acts of the ḥajj – the iḥrãm, staying at 'Arafãt, staying overnight at Mash'ar, sacrificing an animal, throwing pebbles at the pillars, running between the Ṣafã and the Marwah, going around Ka'bah, praying near the Standing-place – all these acts commemorate the events that had happened to Ibrãhīm, and represent the stands taken by him and his family; and how admirable stands they were – the pure and sublime Divine stands to which they were led by Divine mercy and urged on by the humility of servitude.

The prescribed acts of worship – on their promulgator be the best of salams! – are the symbols of the stands of the perfect ones, the prophets, vis-à-vis their Lord; every act of worship is a photo which shows to us a stage in their spiritual journey to the station of nearness to Allãh, as Allãh says: Certainly (there) is for you in the Messenger of Allãh an excellent example. . . (33: 21). This is a basic reality. And there is much evidence pointing to this theme in the traditions which have come down to us regarding the philosophy of various acts of worship and the esoteric aspects of their legislation and prescription, as any diligent scholar may find out.

QUR'ÃN: And who turns away from the religion of Ibrãhīm but he who makes himself a fool: "ar-Raghbah" (اَلرَّغْبَةُ) followed by the preposition 'an (عَنْ = away from; off) means "to turn away", "to dislike"; when followed by fī (فِيْ = in), it denotes "to incline towards", "to desire". The verb, safiha (سَفِهَ = made a fool; became a fool) is used both as transitive and intransitive. Some exegetes have taken this word here as a transitive verb – according to them, the word nafsahu (نَفْسَهُ = himself; his self) is its object; others have taken the verb in the intransitive sense and in that case nafsahu will be at-tamyīz (اَلتَّمْيِيْزُ = a specification), not an object. In any case, the meaning will remain the same: Whoever turns away from the religion of Ibrãhīm is a fool; he does not recognize what is beneficial to him from that which is harmful. From this verse we may infer what we have been told in the ḥadīth: "Surely wisdom is that by which the Beneficient (God) is worshipped."

QUR'ÃN: and most certainly We chose him in this world: "al-Iṣṭifã' " (اَلإصْطِفاءُ) means to choose, to separate best parts of a thing from other parts (if they were mixed together). Looking at the positions of al-wilãyah (اَلولايَةُ = love of Allãh), this choosing, this selection fits the sincerity of servitude. A person so chosen behaves in all his affairs as a sincere slave and servant, totally surrendering himself to his Lord. In other words, religion is embodied in all his affairs. After all, what is religion if not total servitude to Allãh in all matters whether of this world or of the hereafter, accepting gladly whatever the Lord decides for His servant in any given situation, as He says: Surely the religion with Allãh is Islam (3:19). Clearly it shows that the position of "selection" is not different from that of "Islam", that is, surrender. As a further proof, look at the next verse: "When his Lord said to him, Submit (yourself) he said: 'I submit my-self to the Lord of the worlds' ". Obviously, the adverb "when" is related to the preceding verb "We chose him". It means that Ibrãhīm was chosen when his Lord said to him to submit and he responded by submitting himself to Allãh, the Lord of the worlds. In other words, the verse 131 (When his Lord said to him, Submit, he said. "I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds",) is like an explanation of the words, "most surely We chose him".

In these verses pronouns have been changed from the first person to the third, and again from the second to the third. After saying, "We chose him", it would have been more usual to say: "When We said to him"; but Allãh says, "When his Lord said to him, Submit (yourself)"; then in reply, Ibrãhīm (a.s.) should have said: "I submit myself to Thee"; instead he said: "I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds". The reason is a follows:

"When his Lord said to him": It points to the fact that the talk was a secret between Ibrãhīm and his Lord, at a level where there was no one else to listen to that confidential conversation. Had Allãh said, "When We said to him", it would have implied that the hearers of this verse were present at that sublime station and could be addressed to by Allãh – after all, the audience has a direct relationship with the speaker. Therefore, Allãh referred to Himself in the third person, cutting the connection between Himself and the hearers of the verse, showing that at the level where He spoke with Ibrãhīm, no one else was present; the conversation between Allãh and Ibrãhīm was a confidential matter veiled in secrecy. In short, it was a talk between two close friends which others were excluded from.

"I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds". As mentioned above, the preceding phrase shows that Allãh bestowed His grace exclusively on Ibrãhīm and enhanced his rank by this friendly confidential conversation. But Ibrãhīm knew how to speak in Divine presence; he was a servant of Allãh; he should not forget the dictates of humility; it was a sign of his excellence, of his humbleness, that he did not start talking with Allãh in a friendly way, did not consider himself as worthy of that exclusive proximity, of that sublime friendship. He continued to see in himself a humble and powerless servant who is sustained by his Master's grace. That is why he submitted to the Lord to Whom all the worlds surrender, and said: "I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds".

"al-Islãm" (اَلإِسْلاَمُ), "at-taslīm" (اَلتَّسْلِيمُ) and "al-istislãm (اَلإِسْتِسْلاَمُ), all are from the same root s-l-m (س-ل-م) and have the same meaning, that is, to submit, to surrender. These verbs are used when a man or a thing submits to another thing, in such a way that the first never disobeys the second, never goes against it. Allãh says: Yes! whoever submits himself entirely to Allãh.. . (2:112); Surely I have turned my face, being upright, wholly to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth. . . (6:79). It is with the face that one turns towards someone. So far as Allãh is concerned, the whole being, the whole existence, of the thing turns to Him. When a man surrenders to Allãh, he obeys and accepts whatever comes to him from Allãh – the creative matters like the measure and the decree, as well as the legislative ones like order and prohibition.

As men differ in degrees of their submission to Divine Decrees or legislations, so does their Islam.

The first stage of Islam is to accept and obey the exoteric commandments, orders and prohibitions, by reciting ash-shahãda-tayn (اَلشَّهَادَتَيْن) = the two testimonies, that is, testifying to the Oneness of God and Messengership of Muhammad, (s.a.w.a.), no matter whether the belief has entered into the heart or not. Allãh says: The dwellers of the desert say: "We believe". Say: "You do not believe but say, 'We submit'; and faith has not yet entered into your hearts". . . (49:14)

This Islam is followed by the first stage of al-īmãn (اَلإِيْمَانُ) = faith, belief); and that is the sincere belief in the above-menioned shahãdatayn; such a believer faithfully obeys most of the rules of the sharī'ah.

This first stage of al-īmãn is followed by the second stage of Islam. It is the sincere acceptance of all true beliefs in detail, with its necessary concomitant, that is, good deeds – although occasional slips are not impossible. Allãh says praising the pious ones: Those who believed in Our signs and were submissive (43: 69). Also, He says: O you who believe! enter into submission one and all (2:208). These verses show that there is an Islam which comes after al-īmãn; obviously this Islam is other than the previously mentioned one.

This Islam is followed by the second stage of al-īmãn; and it is the believing, with full details and reasoning, in the realities of the religion. Allãh says: The believers are only those who believe in Allãh and His Messenger then they doubt not and struggle hard with their wealth and their lives in the way of Allãh; they are the truthful ones (49:15). Again, He says: O you who believe! shall I lead you to a merchandise which may deliver you from a painful chastisement? You shall believe in Allãh and His Messenger, and struggle hard in Allãh's way with your properties and your lives (61:10-11). This verse directs the believers to believe; obviously the second Īmãn is other than the first one.

This second stage of al-īmãn paves the way for the third stage of Islam. When the soul is sufficiently imbued with the above-mentioned īmãn, and acquires its characteristics, then man's all animalistic and beastly faculties are subdued to the sublime powers of his intellect and spirituality. He keeps all his desires – pulling him to the material attractions and transient trinkets of this world – under firm control. Thereupon, he reaches a stage where he worships Allãh as though he was seeing Him – and if he was not seeing Allãh, then Allãh was seeing him. There is nothing in his hidden life and inner-self, that is not submissive to Allãh's orders and prohibitions; he is never annoyed with any decree or measure of Allãh. Allãh says: But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then do not find any straitness in their selves as to what you have decided, and submit with total submission (4:65).

This Islam is followed by the third stage of al-īmãn. Allãh says: Successful indeed are the believers, who are humble in their prayers and who keep aloof from what is vain.. . (23:1–3). It is this stage that the words of Allãh refer to: "When his Lord said to him, Submit (yourself), he said: 'I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds.' "

Sometimes the second and the third stages are counted as one. The sublime virtues, for example, being pleased with Divine Decree, submitting to the commands of Allãh, forbearance and patience for the love of Allãh, self-denial, piety, and love and hate for the sake of Allãh are concomitants of this stage of al-īmãn.

The fourth stage of Islam follows the third stage of al-īmãn. In the above-mentioned stage of al-īmãn the condition of a man vis-à-vis his Lord is like that of a slave with his master when a slave faithfully follows the dictates of his bondage – when he totally surrenders to the will of his master and accepts his likes and dislikes. Obviously there is no comparison between the ownership and authority a master has over his slave and the ownership and authority the Lord of the worlds has over His creatures. His is the real possession, the real ownership; nothing else has any independent existence – neither in person or characteristics nor in actions.

Sometimes, when a man reaches the third stage of surrender and submission, the Divine Grace takes him under its wing; he is shown the reality, and sees with his heart's eyes that the Kingdom belongs to Allãh, nothing else owns anything at all – except when Allãh bestows it to someone; there is no Lord other than He.

This realization, this unveiling of reality, is a Divine Gift, a bestowal by Allãh, to whom He pleases; a man cannot reach this sublime stage by his own will or effort. Probably it is to this Islam that the prayer of Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl refers: Our Lord! and make us both submissive to Thee and (raise) from our offspring a group submissive to Thee, and show us our ways of devotion . . . (2:128). Compare this to the verse: "When his Lord said to him, Submit (yourself), he said: 'I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds' ". Obviously the latter is a legislative, not a creative, order. Ibrãhīm was Muslim by his own will and choice, responding to the Divine Invitation, obeying the orders of Allãh. It was an order he received in his early life. Now the former verse shows him, in the twilight of his life, praying with his son, Ismã'īl, for Islam and for being shown their ways of devotion. Undoubtedly, he was asking for something which was not in his hand; or was praying to be kept firm on something which was not in his power. In short, the Islam, which Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl prayed for, was of this fourth and sublime stage.

This Islam is followed by the fourth stage of al-īmãn. It happens when the above-mentioned conditions permeates the believer's whole being, and submerges all his conditions and actions. Allãh says: Now surely the friends of Allãh – they have no fear nor do they grieve; those who believed and were pious (10:62 -63). The believers mentioned here must be having the certainty that nothing is independent of Allãh, and no "cause" has any causative power except by His permission. It is this certainty which insulates them from grief when a tragedy strikes them, and protects them from fear if a danger looms ahead. It is only because of this factor that they have been praised in these terms.

This īmãn comes after the above-mentioned Divine Gift of Islam. Ponder on this point.

QUR'ÃN: and in the hereafter he is most surely among the good ones: "aṣ-Ṣalãḥ" (اَلصَّلاحُ) literally means: capability, ability. In the Divine Speech, this word and its derivatives, have been used sometimes for the man himself, and, at other times, for his actions and deeds. Allãh says: . . . he should do good deeds.. . (18:110); also, He says: And marry those among you who are single and those who are good (i.e., fit) among your male slaves and your female slaves. . . (24:32)

No clear explanation is found in the Book of Allãh as to what constitutes goodness of deeds. But the Book attributes to it some effects, which may be helpful in understanding its meaning. For example:-

1. A good deed is good for the pleasure of Allãh: And those who are patient, seeking the pleasure of their Lord. . . (13:22); and you do not spend but to seek Allãh's pleasure . . . (2:272)
2. It is good for the reward of Allãh: Allãh's reward is better for him who believes and does good. . . (28:80)

3. It lifts up the good words which ascend to Allãh: To Him do ascend the good words; and the good deed lifts them up . . . (35:10)

These descriptions show that, so far as actions are concerned, a "good deed" means an action that is fit to receive honour from God, is capable of lifting the good words to Allãh. Allãh says: . . . but to Him reaches the piety on your part . . . (22:37); All do We aid – these as well as those – out of the bounty of your Lord; and the bounty of your Lord is not confined (17:20).

As for the persons, the following verses show what constitutes their goodness: And whoever obeys Allãh and the Messenger, these are with those upon whom Allãh has bestowed favours from among the prophets and the truthful and the martyrs and the good ones; and excellent are these as companions! (4:69); And We caused them to enter into Our mercy; surely they were of the good ones (21:86). Again Allãh quotes Sulaymãn (a.s.) as saying: . . . and make me enter, by Thy mercy, into Thy servants, the good ones (27:19). Also, He says: And (as for) Lũṭ, We gave him wisdom and knowledge. . . and We took him into Our mercy; surely he was of the good ones (21:74 – 75). The mercy referred to in these verses is not the general Divine Mercy which encompasses everything; nor does it mean that mercy which is ordained for the pious believers, as Allãh says: . . . and My mercy encompasses all things; so I will ordain it (especially) for those who are pious. . . (7:156). The great personalities mentioned in the verses earlier referred to were "the good ones", and they were a selected group from among the pious believers; they were "fit" for the exclusive mercy mentioned in those verses. We know that some of the mercies of Allãh are reserved for some especial groups to the exclusion of others. Allãh says: and Allãh chooses especially whom He pleases for His mercy (2:105).

Also, this expression does not refer to the general honour of al-wilãyah in other words, it does not say that Allãh man-aged or manages their affairs for them. Of course, the good ones had that honour too; certainly they were among the honoured al-awliyã' (الأوْلياءُ = friends of Allãh), as we have explained in the exegesis of the verse 1:5 (Guide us to the straight path); but this wilãyah is an attribute which is also shared by the prophets, the truthful ones and the martyrs. If they had only this honour to their credit they could not be counted as a separate group distinguished from the other three.

So, what is the distinctive feature of the "goodness"? The answer is that Allãh takes a "good one" into His especial mercy and grants him comprehensive protection from chastisement. These two effects are mentioned in the Qur'ãn: Then as to those who believed and did good, their Lord will make them enter into His mercy (i.e., into the Garden) (45:30) ; They shall call therein (i.e., in the Garden) every fruit in security (44:55).

Now ponder on the following verses: And We took him into Our mercy (21:75) ; and We made (them) all good ones (21:72). Note how Allãh attributes these actions to Himself, not to the people concerned. Also look at the fact that according to the Divine declarations, reward is always given in lieu of actions and efforts. Keeping all this in view, you will realize that the "personal goodness" is a especial honour which cannot be earned as a reward of good deeds or by one's own will. Probably, it is to this reality that the verse refers: They have therein what they wish and with Us is more yet (50:35): Possibly, the first clause (They have therein what they wish) refers to the reward of their deeds; and the second one (and with Us is more yet) concerns what they shall be given not in lieu of action, but purely by Divine Mercy. We shall elaborate it, Allãh willing, in the exegesis of this verse.

Now look at the life of Ibrãhīm (a.s.). He was a prophet, a messenger of God, one of the ulu 'l azm prophets and an Imãm; many of the prophets and messengers coming after him were his followers; and he was of the good ones, as the words of Allãh clearly say: and We made (them) all good ones (21:72). This verse also shows that he was made, in this very world, one of the good ones. Consider also the fact that many prophets of lesser rank were made, in this very world, among the good ones. Then why does he pray to Allãh to join him to the good ones?

It is clear from this prayer that there was a group of the "good ones" who had gone ahead of him, and now he was praying to Allãh to join him to them. Allãh granted him his prayer "in the hereafter", as is mentioned in the Qur'ãn in three places – one of which is the verse under discussion: and most certainly We chose him in this world, and in the hereafter he is most surely among the good ones (2:130). Other two verses are: . . . and We gave him his reward in this world, and in the hereafter he is most surely among the good ones (29:27). And We gave him good in this world, and in the hereafter he will most surely be among the good (16:122).

If you ponder on the foregoing details, you will know that "goodness" has many ranks, one above the other. Therefore you should not be astonished if you are told that Ibrãhīm (a.s.) had asked to be joined to Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) and his purified progeny (a.s.), and that Allãh granted him his prayer in the here-after, not in this world. Ibrãhīm (a.s.) had prayed to Allãh to join him with the good ones, while Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) unambiguously claims this honour for himself: Surely my guardian is Allãh, Who revealed the Book, and He takes in hand (the affairs of) the good ones (7:196). It is obvious that Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) claims the wilãyah for himself. In other words, the Prophet, according to his claim mentioned in the verse, had already got the "goodness"; and Ibrãhīm (a.s.) was praying to be joined to a group of "good ones" who had already been given that rank, and that group was Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) and his progeny.

QUR'ÃN: And the same did Ibrãhīm enjoin on his sons: that is, the same religion.

QUR'ÃN: . . . therefore die not unless you are Muslims: Death is something beyond one's control; and "at-taklīf" (اَلتَّكْلِيْفُ = commandments of the sharī'ah) covers only those things which are under one's control. Then why did Ibrãhīm and Ya'qũb (peace be on them!) tell their progeny not to die unless they were Muslims? The fact is that this admonition concerned a matter which was fully under their power. The real meaning is like this:

Beware lest the death comes to you and you are not Muslims; always remain Muslims; keep on Islam, so that whenever death comes to you, you are Muslims.

The verse gives a hint that the religion means Islam, as Allãh says: Surely the religion with Allãh is Islam (3:19).

QUR'ÃN: "We will worship your God and the God of your fathers, Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl and Isḥãq": The verse uses the word "father" for the grandfather, the uncle and the father – and it has been used without any reason of "at-taghlib" (اَلتَّغْلِيْبُ) that is, all groups are equal in number; there were not more "fathers" than the grandfather and the uncle to justify the use of this word for the whole group. It proves that the word "father" may correctly be used for uncle, as we shall show, Allãh willing, that Ibrãhīm (a.s.) addressed his uncle Ãzar, as "father".

QUR'ÃN: "one God only": This sums up the preceding detailed description, "your God and the God of your fathers . . ."; it serves to remove any possible misunderstanding that his God was other than the God of his fathers – as the idol-worshippers thought that there were many gods. '

QUR'ÃN: "and to Him do we submit"; It refers to the subject of their talk, that is, worship. They made it clear that their worship of Allãh would be totally in accordance with the dictates of Islam. The reply shows that the religion of Ibrãhīm was Islam. Accordingly, the religion which was inherited by his offspring, for example, Isḥãq, Ya'qũb and Ismã'īl, and which continued in the Children of Israel and Ismã'īl, was Islam, and nothing else. It was this religion which Ibrãhīm (a.s.) brought from his Lord; and nobody had any right to turn away from it or to call to any other religion.

TRADITIONS

Samã'ah narrates from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) that he said: "The position of īmãn (faith) vis-à-vis Islam is like that of the Sacred

Ka‘bah vis-à-vis the Sanctuary; sometimes one may be in the Sanctuary without being in the Ka‘bah, but he cannot be in the Ka‘bah without being in the Sanctuary." (al-Kãfī)

Also he narrates from the same Imãm that he said: "Islam is to bear witness that there is no god except Allãh, and to accept the truth of the Messenger of Allãh; it is by this that the bloods are spared (i.e., lives are protected) and marriages and inheritance are validated; and the multitude of people are on its apparent (meaning); and the īmãn (i.e., faith and belief) is the guidance, and (it is) that characteristic of Islam which is firmly placed in the hearts." (ibid.)

The author says: There are other traditions of the same meaning; and they explain the above-mentioned first stage of the Islam and īmãn.

al-Barqi has narrated from ‘Ali (a.s.) that he said: "Islam is submission and submission is conviction." (ibid.)

Kahil said that aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "If a people worshipped Allãh – the One, there is no partner to Him – and established prayer, and paid the zakãt and did the ḥajj of the House, and kept the fast of the month of Ramadan, and then said about-something done by Allãh or done by the Messenger of Allãh, 'Why did he not do it in another way?', or (even if) they felt (like) it in their hearts, they would become polytheists because of it . . ." (ibid.)

The author says: The foregoing two traditions refer to the third stages of the Islam and īmãn.

ad-Daylami narrates in his al-Irshãd – and he gives two sanads for this ḥadīth which is one of the traditions of Ascension – that Allãh said: "O Ahmad! Do you know which way of living is happier and which life more durable?" (The Messenger of Allãh) said: "No, O Allãh!" (He) said: "As for the happy way of living, it is that in which the (living) person is not tired of remembering Me, and does not forget My bounties, and does not ignore My rights (on him); he seeks My pleasure day and night.

And as for the ever-lasting life, it is (realized) when (the person) works for his (spiritual) benefit until the world looses its significance for him, and looks small in his eyes; and the hereafter becomes great for him; and he gives preference to My pleasure over his own desire, and seeks My pleasures, and thinks the right of My bounty (as) great (on him) ; and keeps in mind what I have done for him (i.e., for his benefit); and watches Me day and night whenever he is tempted to commit any wrong or sin; and keeps his heart clean from all that I dislike; and hates Satan and his whisperings, and does not let Satan establish a hold over, or a passage to, his heart. When he acts (like) this, then I put (My) love into his heart until I make his heart, as well as his leisure and engagement, and his thought and speech, a part of (My) favours which I have bestowed on those of My creatures who love Me; and I open his heart's eye and ear, so that he hears with his heart, and looks with his heart to My Majesty and Greatness; and I make the world straitened for him; and make him hate it with all its pleasures; and I caution him of the world and all that it contains, as a shepherd protects his sheep from dangerous pasture lands. When it happens, then he flees from people, and transfers from the house of termination to the abode of eternity, and from the house of Satan to the seat of the Beneficent (God), O Aḥmad ! and I adorn him with dignity and majesty. So, this is the good way of living and the eternal life; and it is the station of those who are pleased (with Me). So, whoever acts for My pleasure, I give him three characteristics: I teach him gratitude which is not polluted by ignorance, and remembrance that is not adulterated with forgetfulness, and love – so that he does not prefer the love of creatures to My love. Then when he loves Me, I love him, and I open the eye of his heart to My Majesty, and do not keep My (very) special creatures hidden from him. And I converse with him secretly in the dark of night and the light of day, until he ceases talking with the creatures and sitting with them; and I make him hear My talk and the speech of My angels; and I make My secret known to him – which I have kept hidden from (all) My creation. And I dress him in modesty, until all the creation is awed of him. And he walks on the earth (and all his sins are) forgiven. And I make his heart hearing and seeing ; and do not hide from him anything of the Garden or the Fire; and I make known to him what terror and affliction are going to happen to the people on the Day of Resurrection, and the things I will question the rich and the poor, as well as the learned and the ignorant, about. And I will make him sleep (in peace) in his grave, and I will send Munkar and Nakīr to him for questioning him; and he will not see the sorrow of death, nor the fright of the prelude (of the next world). Then I will erect his weighing scale for him, and will unroll his book (of deeds), then I will put his books in his right hand, and he shall read it unfolded; then I will not keep any interpreter between Me and him. So these are the attributes of the lovers. O Ahmad ! make your concern one concern, and make your tongue one tongue, and make your body (i.e., your person) alive that is never oblivious (of Me). Whoever is oblivious of Me, I do not care in which valley he perishes." (Biḥãru 'l-anwãr)

al-Majlisī quotes the following tradition from al-Kãfī, Ma'ãni 'l-akhbãr and an Nawãdir of ar-Rãwandi, with various chains of narrators, from aṣ-Ṣãdiq and al-Kãẓim (a.s.) – and the text given here is from al-Kãfī – that the Imãm said: "The Messenger of Allãh met Ḥãrithah ibn Mãlik ibn an-Nu'mãn al-Anṣãrī, and said to him: 'How are you? O Ḥãrithah ibn Mãlik an-Nu'mãnī!' He said: 'A believer in reality, O Messenger of Allãh!' The Messenger of Allãh then said to him: 'There is a reality for everything ; so what is the reality of your word?' He said: 'O Messenger of Allãh! I turned myself away from the world, so I kept my night awake (in worship) and my days thirsty (in fast) ; and (it is) as though I am looking at the throne of my Lord which has been set up for (taking) the (people's) account; and as though I see the people of the Garden visiting one another in the Garden, and as if I hear the howling of the people of the Fire in the Fire.' Thereupon, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'A servant that Allãh has enlightened his heart. You have seen, so be firm.'" (ibid.)

The author says: The two traditions describe the fourth stage of the Islam and īmãn mentioned above. There are many traditions explaining particulars of these two; and, Allãh willing, we shall quote some of them in various places of this book; and they are supported by the Qur'ãnic verses.

Also it should be kept in mind that for each stage of the Islam and īmãn, there is an opposite stage of al-kufr (اَلكُفْرُ = disbelief) and ash-shirk (اَلشِّرْكُ = polytheism). And it is known that the higher and subtler the meaning of the Islam and īmãn, the more difficult it is to protect oneself from its opposite kufr or shirk.

Obviously, a lower stage of the Islam or īmãn does not exclude the possibility of a subtler kufr or shirk.

These two principles should be kept in mind. It follows that the verses of the Qur'ãn have some esoteric meanings which are applied to the situations which its exoteric meanings cannot be applied to. Please keep this hint in mind until we explain to you its details.

al-Qummi writes about the words of Allãh, and with Us is more, that the Imãm said: "Looking towards the mercy of Allãh." (at-Tafsīr)

The Prophet said: "Allãh says: 'I have prepared for My good servants that which no eye has ever seen, nor any ear ever heard, nor has it ever passed from the heart of any man.' " (Majma'u 'l-bayãn)

The author says: The meaning of the two traditions may easily be understood from what we have written about the meaning of "good ones"; and Allãh is the Guide.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, Or, were you witnesses when death approached Ya'qũb . . .: "It is applied to al-Qa'im (اَلقَـآئِمُ = the one who stands – i.e., with sword to establish the way of Allãh). (al 'Ayyãshī)

The author says: The author of aṣ-Ṣãfī writes: "Perhaps the Imãm meant that it was about the Qã'im from the progeny of Muhammad, because every Qa'im of them asks his children the same question at the time of his death, and they reply him as the children of Ya'qũb had replied."

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: And they say: "Be Jews and Christians, you will be rightly guided": The preceding verses made it clear that the true religion followed by the children of Ibrãhīm – Ismã'īl and Isḥãq as well as Ya'qũb and his descendants – was the same Islam which was the religion of Ibrãhīm, the upright one. It means that the differences and divisions, the schisms and sects, which the proponents of Judaism and Christianity call to, have actually originated from their own desires; they are just a few toys manufactured by them. They are in great disputations, schisms and disagreements, they are divided into numerous sects and religious groups, they have dyed the religion of Allãh – the religion of Unity, the religion of Oneness – with colours of their bias and prejudice, their desires and ambitions. But the religion is not divided; it is one, in the same way as God, Who is to be worshipped, is One; it is the religion of Ibrãhīm; the Muslims should firmly keep hold of this original religion, discarding the differences and dissensions of the People of the Book aside.

Although the life in this world looks like a constant phenomenon, in reality it is continuously changing. The same applies to all the natural world. Even the rites, customs and manners of various nations and groups are not immune from this propensity to change. More often than not, it causes changes and deviations even in religious matters. Sometimes extraneous things are inserted in religion; at other times, an essential part is declared anathema; worldly goals and ideals replace the Divine and religious goals and aims. What a tragedy is it for religion! When it happens, the religion is dyed in national or tribal colour, and starts calling to a goal other than the original one; it focuses its sight on innovations, forgetting its original purpose. In a short while, the evil (i.e., the innovation) becomes virtue. People support and defend it, because it agrees with their desires and cravings. And the virtue is treated as evil; it has no protector or defender to stand for it. Ultimately, the things deteriorate to unbelievable extent, as we are seeing with our own eyes today.

However, the sentence: "And they say : 'Be Jews or Christians' ", stands for the sentences, "The Jews say: 'Be Jews, you will be guided aright' ; and the Christians say: 'Be Christians, you will be rightly guided.' " They make such divergent claims because of their divergences and differences.

QUR'ÃN: Say: "Nay! (we follow) the religion of Ibrãhīm, the upright one, and he was not of the polytheists": It is the reply of their claims. The Prophet should tell them: Nay! we follow the religion of Ibrãhīm, the upright one; because it is the one religion which was followed by all your prophets – Ibrãhīm and all those who came after him. Ibrãhīm, who brought this religion, was not a polytheist. Had there been so many divisions in his religion – the divisions which were attached to it by the innovators – he would have become a polytheist: That which is not a part of Allãh's religion cannot invite towards Allãh, it will surely call to something other than Allãh – and this is what polytheism means. The religion of Ibrãhīm is the religion of unity; it does not contain anything that is not from Allãh.

QUR'ÃN: Say: "We believe in Allãh and (in) that which has been revealed to us, and (in) that which was revealed to Ibrãhīm . . .": After mentioning the claim of the Jews and the Christians, Allãh describes the truth – and He always tells the truth. The truth consists of the testimony of belief in One God and belief in all that was brought by the prophets – without making any distinction between them. This is what is called the Islam. Belief in Allãh was the fundamental part of that which was revealed to the prophets; yet it has been mentioned here separately. The reason is that the belief in the Creator is a natural instinct, it does not depend on prophetic proofs and arguments.

After that fundamental belief, Allãh mentions "that which has been revealed to us", that is, the Qur'ãn or the knowledge contained in it. Then He mentions "that which was revealed to Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl and Isḥãq and Ya'qũb". Thereafter is described "that which was given to Mũsã and 'Isã"; these two have been especially mentioned because the speech is addressed to the Jews and the Christians who call only to these two prophets, respectively. Finally the testimony includes "that which was given to the prophets". This sentence covers all the prophets and thus paves the way for the next declaration: "we do not make any distinction between any of them".

Note the variation in style: That which is with us and that which was with Ibrãhīm, Ismã'īl, Isḥãq and Ya'qũb, is listed as "revealed" to us and them, respectively; while that which was with Musa, 'Isã and other prophets is referred to as "given" to them.

Probably the reason is this: The basic idea may be conveyed by the word, "giving", as Allãh says after mentioning Ibrãhīm and other prophets who came before or after him: These are they to whom We gave the book and the wisdom and the prophethood (6:89). But this word does not clearly and necessarily mean "revelation"; for example, Allãh says: And certainly We gave wisdom to Luqmãn (31:12) ; And certainly We gave the book and the wisdom and the prophecy to the Children of Israel. . . (45 :16). Now both the Jews and the Christians counted Ibrãhīm, Ismã'īl, Isḥãq, Ya'qũb and the tribes as following their religions respectively – the Jews claimed that those prophets were Jews; the Christians claimed that they were Christians. They believed that the true religion was the Judaism or the Christianity that was given to Mũsã or 'Isã respectively. In this background, if Allãh had said, 'that which was given to Ibrãhīm. . ., it would not have clearly shown that those prophets themselves had brought a religion, which was revealed to them by Allãh; the Jews or the Christians could have claimed that what was given to them was the same thing which was given to Mũsã or 'Isã – peace be on them all – and that their names have been mentioned, like that of the Children of Israel, just because they followed the self-same religion! It was to remove this possible misunderstanding that Ibrãhīm and those named prophets (peace be on them all) were separately mentioned and it was clearly said that they had got that religion by Divine revelation. As for the prophets who came before Ibrãhīm (a.s.), the Jews and the Christians did not lay claim on their religion, and there was no chance of any misunderstanding; therefore, their religion was referred to as "given" to them.

QUR'ÃN: and the tribes: 'al-Asbãṭ" (اَلأسْباطُ) of the Israelites has the same meaning as "al-qabã'il" (اَلقَبَائِلُ) of the Ismã'īlites, and that is, the tribes. Ṣibṭ, like qabīlah, refers to the descendants of one forefathers. There were twelve tribes in the Israelites, each one descended from one of the twelve children of Ya'qũb; thus each became a distinct group in itself.

If the word "tribes" refers to the whole groups, then it is used metaphorically, because the prophets who received the revelation were from those tribes. On the other hand, it may refer to the individuals, that is, the prophets themselves. In any case, it does not include the brothers of Yusuf (a.s.) because they were not prophets.

A similar verse is found in the Chapter of 'The Women' : and We revealed to Ibrãhīm and Ismã'īl and Isḥãq and Ya'qũb and the tribes, and 'Īsã and Ayyũb and Yũnus and Hãrũn and Sulaymãn . . . (4:163).

QUR'ÃN: If then they believe in like of what you believe in, they are indeed on the right course: What Allãh actually means is this: If they believe in what you believe in, then they are on the right course. But He has added here the word "like" (If then they believe in like of what you believe in . . .), to cut the root of disputation and argumentation. Had they been invited to believe hi what the Muslims believed in, they could have replied – as they used to say – No, we believe in that which has been revealed to us and we reject what is besides that. Therefore, this verse teaches the Muslims a different way of expressions: We believe in that which contains nothing but pristine truth; therefore, you too should believe in that which contains only pristine truth like it. Addressed in this way, they will not find any loop-hole, nor will they be able to resort to their obstinate wrangles. And then they will realize that what they have had is not the unadulterated truth.

QUR'ÃN: in great dissension: "ash-Shiqãq" (اَلشِّقَاقُ) means hypocricy, disputation, dissension.

QUR'ÃN: so Allãh will suffice you against them: It was a promise to the Messenger of Allãh to help him against them; and Allãh fulfilled this promise. And the same favour shall be completed for the Muslim nation when Allãh wills.

This verse is a parenthetic statement between the preceding and the following verses.

QUR'ÃN: the dyeing of Allãh, and who is better than Allãh in dyeing?: "aṣ-Ṣibghah" (اَلصِّبْغَة) means a kind of dyeing. The verse means: The above-mentioned belief is a Divine colour in which Allãh has dyed us; and it is the best of the colours – it is not a dye of the Judaism nor of the Christianity, which emanate from dissensions in religion, when people fail to keep on the right track.

QUR'ÃN: and Him do we worship: Grammatically the sentence describes the condition; it gives the reason of the preceding phrase: "the dyeing of Allãh . . ."

QUR'ÃN: Say: "Do you dispute with us about Allãh?": It is a rebuke to the People of the Book regarding their disputation with the Muslims. The next sentences show how and why their argumentations were wrong and in vain: "and He is our Lord and your Lord; and for us are our deeds and for you are your deeds; and we are sincere to Him". When the followers dispute with each other concerning their leader, the dispute may emanate from one or more of the three causes:

First: They follow different leaders; and each wants to show the superiority of his leader over the other's, for example, a dispute between an idol-worshipper and a Muslim.

Second: They follow the same leader, but each claims a close relationship with the leader, denying a like privilege to the other.

Third: One party wants to show that the other party, because of his unbecoming behaviour and immoral character, has lost the right to be counted among the followers of the leader; his claim of being a follower of the leader is an insult to the latter.

Now, why should the Muslims and the People of the Book dispute with each other? The first reason does not apply, because both worship the same God. The same goes for the second reason, because one group's deeds do not clash with those of the other – "for us are our deeds and for you are your deeds". Coming to the third cause, the Muslims are sincere in their devotion to Allãh. So why should the People of the Book dispute with them, when they have got no reason at all.

In this way, Allãh first rebuked them for their disputation with the Muslims, and then dismisses all three causes of disputation one by one.

QUR'ÃN: "Or, do you say that Ibrãhīm . . . were Jews or Christians?": Both groups say that Ibrãhīm and the other prophets named in the verse were from them; implying that they were Jews or Christians. Or, they clearly claimed that they were Jews or Christians, as may be understood from the words of Allãh: O People of the Book! why do you dispute about Ibrãhīm, when the Torah and the Injil were not revealed till after him? Do you not then understand? (3:65)

QUR'ÃN: Say: 'Are you better knowing or Allãh?": Because Allãh has informed us and you in the Book that Mũsã and 'Isã and their books came after Ibrãhīm and the prophets mentioned in this verse.

QUR'ÃN: "And who is more unjust than he who conceals a testimony that he has from Allãh?": That is, he who conceals a testimony, a fact known to him, that Allãh has informed in His Books that the sharī'ah of Judaism and Christianity were sent after Ibrãhīm and the other named prophets. The "testimony", thus, refers to a fact known to one.

The verse may alternatively refer to him who conceals the testimony of Allãh that Ibrãhīm and those prophets had passed away long before the Torah and the Injil were revealed. In this case, the "testimony" would refer to giving evidence, to bearing witness.

But the first meaning is more appropriate in the context of this verse.

QUR'ÃN: This is a people that has passed away. . .: It will do you no good to dispute about other people as to which group they belonged to; nor will silence on this matter do you any harm. You must spend your time in those things which you will be asked about tomorrow.

This verse has been repeated here because the Jews and the Christians talked (and they still do) too much on this subject – which would be of no avail to them on the Day of Judgment; especially when they knew very well that Ibrãhīm had passed away long before Judaism and Christianity came into being.

In other contexts, discussion about the prophets and messengers is a very beneficial thing ; the Qur'ãn exhorts us to look into, and learn about, their teachings and their spiritual virtues; and it is with this aim that it repeatedly narrates their stories and orders us to meditate on them.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the verse: Say: Nay! (we follow) the religion of Ibrãhīm. . .: "Verily, the upright religion is the Islam." (al- 'Ayyãshī)

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said: "The upright religion (of Ibrãhīm, a.s.) did not leave anything (unguided), so much so that it includes the trimming of the moustache, and cutting of nails, and circumcision." (ibid.)

"Allãh revealed the upright (religion) to Ibrãhīm, and it is cleanliness; and it is (made up of) ten (things), five (of them) in the head and (the other) five in the (rest of the) body. As for those which are in the head, they are: Trimming of the moustache, and letting the beard grow, and dressing the hair, and brushing the teeth, and (using) the tooth-pick; and as for those which are in the (rest of the) body, they are: removing the hair from the body, and circumcision, and cutting the nails, and the bath of al - janabah (a:. = the ritual uncleanliness resulting from sexual intercourse or ejaculation), and cleansing (the body) with water. And this is the pure upright (religion) which Ibrãhīm (a.s.) brought; it was never abrogated, nor will it ever be abrogated until the Day of Resurrection." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi)

The author says: Dressing the hair means to trim it and grow it. There are a lot of traditions of the same or similar meaning, narrated by both sects in their books.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh: Say: We believe in Allãh. . .: "Allãh has meant Ali, and Fãṭimah, and al-Ḥasan, and al-Ḥusayn, in this verse; and after them it has continued in the Imãms . . ." (al-Kãfī; al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: This theme may be inferred from the words, and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting to Thee (2:128), which were used in the invocation of Ibrãhīm (a.s.). There is no contradiction between this tradition and the fact that the verse is addressed to all the Muslims and obliges all of them to believe in the things mentioned therein; because the circle of such verses may be widened or shortened in different contexts, according to various stages of application – as we have explained with reference to various stages of the Islam and īmãn.

al-Qummi narrates in his at-Tafsīr from al-Bãqir or aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.), and aṣ-Ṣadũq narrates in Ma'ãni 'l-akhbãr from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) that he said explaining the words of Allãh, the dyeing of Allãh . . .: "The dyeing is the Islam."

The author says: It is clear from the context of the verses.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "(Allãh) dyed the believers with alwilãyah (الولايَةُ = love and obedience of the Prophet and his Ahlu 'l-bayt) in (i.e., at the time of) al-mīthãq (المِيْثاقُ = the covenant taken from the souls)." (al-Kãfī; Ma'ãni 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: It refers to the esoteric meaning of this verse, as we shall explain later on; we shall then also explain the meaning of al-wilãyah and al-mithaq, Allãh willing.

The fools among the people will say: "What has turned them from their qiblah which they had?" Say: "The East and the West belong only to Allãh; He guides him whom He likes to a straight path" (142). And thus We have made you a medium nation so that you may be witnesses for the people and the Messenger may be a witness for you. And We had not made the qiblah which you had but that We might know him who follows the Messenger from him who turns back upon his heels; and though this was surely hard except for those whom Allãh has guided aright; and Allãh was not going to make your faith to be fruitless; most surely Allãh is Affectionate, Merciful to the people (143). Indeed We see the turning of thy face to heaven, so We shall surely turn thee to a qiblah which thou shalt be pleased with; turn then thy face towards the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you are, turn your faces towards it; and those who have been given the Book most surely know that it is the truth from their Lord; and Allãh is not at all heedless of what they do (144). And even if you bring to those who have been given the Book every sign they would not follow your qiblah, nor can you be a follower of their qiblah, neither are they the followers of each other's qiblah; and if you follow their desires after the knowledge that has come to you, then you shall most surely be among the unjust (145). Those whom We have given the Book recognize him as they recognize their sons; and a party of them most surely conceal the truth while they know (it) (146). The truth is from your Lord, therefore you should not be of the doubters (147). And every one has a direction to which he would turn; therefore, hasten to (do) good works; wherever you are, Allãh will bring you all together; surely Allãh has power over all things (148). And from whatsoever place you come forth, turn your face towards the Sacred Mosque; and surely it is the very truth from your Lord, and Allãh is not at all heedless of what you do (149). And from whatsoever place you come forth, turn your face towards the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you are turn your faces towards it, so that people shall have no argument against you, except such of them as are unjust; so do not fear them, and fear Me; and so that I may complete My favour on you and that you may walk on the right course (150). Even as We have sent among you a Messenger from among you who recites to you Our communications and purifies you and teaches you the Book and the wisdom and teaches you that which you did not know (151).

Ponder on these verses and you will find them well-connected with each other, a common context joining them together like a strand running through the beads. These verses together talk about the appointment of the Ka'bah as the qiblah (the direction of prayer etc.) for the Muslims. Therefore, no attention should be paid to those who say that there was a change of sequence in the arrangement of these verses, or that some of them have abrogated the others. Although they narrate some traditions to this effect, but they do not deserve any comment because all of them go against the clear meaning of these verses.

QUR'ÃN: The fools among the people will say: "What has turned them from their qiblah which they had?": It is the second introductory sentence for the soon-to-be-promulgated order to make the Ka'bah as the qiblah of the Muslims. Also, it teaches the reply of the objection which the "fools among the people", that is, the Jews and the pagans of Mecca, were expected to raise: The Jews because of their partisanship of their own qiblah, Baytu '1-Maqdis; and the pagan Arabs because they were always on the look out for any new thing which they could object to.

Allãh prepared the minds for change of qiblah, first by revealing the story of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) and various honours be-stowed on him by Allãh, as well as the honour accorded to his son, Ismã'īl; their prayers for the Ka'bah and Mecca, as well as for the Prophet and the Muslim group; their construction of the House and the order they received to cleanse it for the worship of Allãh.

It is recognized that the change of qiblah from Baytu '1-Maqdis to the Ka'bah was an event of greatest religious significance, one of the most important commandments given to the Muslims after the hijrah of the Prophet to Medina, when the roots of Islam were firmly taking place and its knowledge and realities were being spread. Understandably, the Jews were not going to remain silent in face of this legislation: According to their thinking this change negated one of their greatest religious prides, that is, qiblah; hitherto the Muslims were following them in their qiblah, and the Jews could claim a precedence over the Muslims in this religious symbol. Moreover, this new legislation was a manifest advancement in the Muslims' religion – it made all of them to face a single point in their worship and other religious rites. It saved them from looking towards divergent directions – physically; and from difference of opinions – spiritually. Facing towards the Ka'bah had rather more influence and deeper impression on the souls of the Muslims than the rules of cleanliness and invocation etc.; and their enemies, and particularly the Jews, understood it, and they resented it. Their stories, as narrated in the Qur'ãn, prove that they were a nation which did not give any credence to anything in this world which was beyond the reach of the five senses. As spiritual things were not of any importance in their eyes, they used to accept the spiritual rules without any protest – they did not consider it worth arguing about. But whenever they were given a Divine Commandment which had any connection with the physical world, which had a material form – like war, emigration, sajdah, polite speech etc. – they stood up against it, and opposed it very vehemently.

In short, Allãh informed His Messenger what the enemies of Islam were going to say against the change of qiblah, and taught him how they should be replied, how their arguments should be refuted.

Their objection: The first qiblah was prescribed by Allãh for the previous prophets. Why was it changed to another House which had no such distinction? Was this change affected by the order of Allãh? How could Allãh contravene His Own previously ordained rule, or abrogate His Own law? (We have mentioned under the verse of "Abrogation" that the Jews do not believe in abrogation.) Or, was it done without any order from Allãh? If so, then the Muslims have deviated from the right path and have left guidance for misguidance. (This objection has not been mentioned in so many words in the Qur'ãn, but the suggested reply points to it.)

Reply: When Allãh prescribes a house like the Ka'bah as qiblah, it is not based on any specialty of that house or stone; there is no unalterable and inseparable quality in that building which could demand that honour as a right. Being chosen as a qiblah is not an inviolable and natural characteristic of any building. Every article, every building and every direction is equally capable of being selected for this purpose; and none has any especial claim for it. Everything belongs to Allãh, He issues orders about it, whatever He likes, in any way He likes, and whenever He likes.

Whatever He decrees, it is for the guidance of the people, for their individual and collective good and perfection. He does not order but for guidance, and He does not guide except to the way which leads directly to their perfection and well-being.

QUR'ÃN: The fools among the people will say: It means the Jews and the polytheists of Arabia; and that is why they have been referred to as "the people". They have been called "fools" because their mentality was not right, and their ideas about the Divine Law were unsound. And that is what foolishness is: crookedness of mind and unsoundness of opinion.

QUR'ÃN: What has turned them . . .. When the verb, "at-tawliyah" (اَلتَّوْلِيَةُ) is joined to its object (without preposition), it means, to turn your face towards that thing, to keep it facing you; as Allãh says: "so We shall surely turn thee to a qiblah which thou shalt like". When it is followed by the preposition 'an (عَنْ), it gives the opposite meaning, that is, to turn away from, to turn one's face from. The verse means: What has turned them away, or turned their faces, from the qiblah which they were using hitherto, that is, Baytu 'l-Maqdis towards which the Prophet and the Muslims used to pray during his stay at Mecca and for a few months after his emigration to Medina.

QUR'ÃN: from their qiblah: The qiblah is attributed to the Muslims, although the Jews were using it centuries before the Prophet. Obviously, their turning from their own qiblah looks more surprising, and gives more room for objection.

And it was for the same reason that the opening phrase says: "What has turned them", instead of saying, "What has turned the Prophet and the Muslims." It would not have looked objectionable in the least if they had said: "What has turned the Prophet and the Muslims from the qiblah of the Jews?"

QUR'ÃN: Say: "The East and the West belong only to Allãh": Only these two directions were mentioned, because it is through them that all other cardinal and compound directions are fixed, like the North, the South and all the intermediate directions between any two cardinal ones. The East and the West are relative directions which are fixed by the rising and setting of the sun and the stars; they cover all places of the earth (except two imaginary points of the true North and South Poles). Perhaps, it was for this reason that only these two were chosen to represent all the directions.

QUR'ĀN: He guides him whom He likes to a straight path: The word "ṣirāt" (صِرَاطٌ = path) is mentioned here without a definite article "al" (اَلْ), since it is a common noun, and does not specify a defmite path, because nations differ in their paths due to their differences in ability to attain perfection and happiness.

QUR'ĀN: And thus We have made you a medium nation that you may be witnesses for the people and the Messenger may be a witness for you: Apparently it means as follows: As We are going to change very soon the qiblah for you in order that We may guide you to a right path, in the same way We have made you an intermediary nation.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PRESCRIPTION OF QIBLAH AND UMMAH BEINGWITNESSES FOR THE PEOPLE AND THE MESSENGER BEING WITNESS FOR THE UMMAH

Someone has explained it in the following way: And like this wonderful making, We have made you a medium nation. Such an explanation deserves no comment.

Another explanation given by another exegete is as follows:– They were made a "medium nation" to "be witnesses for the people". What does it mean? "Medium" is a thing in the centre, neither to this side nor to that. This "ummah" has the same position vis-à-vis "the people" – that is, the People of the Book and the polytheists. The polythesists and the dualist emphasize the physical aspects of life. Their whole attention is fixed to this worldly life; their plans are centred on its trinkets and comforts. They do not believe in the Resurrection or the hereafter; spiritual perfection and esoteric virtues are not so important to them. On the other extreme are some groups, like the Christians, who put utmost emphasis on the spiritual aspects to the detriment of the physical ones. They teach monasticism and rejection of the world. They seem heedless to the fact that the Creator has made the physical perfection a means by which man may reach the goal for which he has been created. In short the latter – the "people of spirit" – nullified their goal by nullifying the means; and the former – the "people of body" – nullified their goal by focusing their whole attention to the means as though it was the goal in itself. Allãh has made this ummah a "medium", by giving them a religion which leads them to the straight and upright path, in the middle – inclined neither to this side nor to that. It strengthens both sides – the body as well as the soul – according to what each of them needs and deserves; it is a religion which encourages and invites man to combine the virtue of both. Man is, after all, a combination of body and soul; he is neither body alone nor spirit alone. If his life is to be a happy one, he must unite physical perfections with the spiritual one.

This ummah then is the medium and well-balanced one; it is a criterion to judge and weigh both sides of extremes. It is, therefore, the witness for all the people who have deviated from the middle way going to this side or that. And the Prophet – the most perfect and the ideal example of this ummah – is the witness for this ummah. The Prophet is the criterion to judge the condition of this ummah's individuals; and the ummah, in its turn, is the criterion to judge the condition of other people; it is the point to which the two extremes are expected to return.

COMMENT : What this exegete has said is true in itself, but it does not explain the wordings of this verse. The ummah, by virtue of its position in the middle, may be called a criterion to judge the extremes, as well as a point to which the people of the two extremes should return. But it does not make it a "witness" for the two extremes, nor it gives the ummah ability to observe the said extremes. Apparently, there is no correlation between being a medium (in the above-mentioned sense) and being a witness. Also, there is no reason why the Messenger of Allãh should be made a witness for them; there is no correlation between the two witnessings. But the verse clearly says that the Messenger of Allãh shall be a witness for the ummah, because the ummah shall be a witness for the people, and it shall acquire that status because it is a medium ummah.

Moreover, the witnessing, referred to in this verse, is one of the Qur'ãnic realities, which has been mentioned repeatedly in the Divine Speech; and looking at various contexts where it has been referred to, we find that its connotation differs completely from the above-quoted meaning. Allãh says: How will it be, then, when We bring from every people a witness and bring you as a witness for these? (4:41) ; And on the day when We will raise up a witness out of every nation, then shall no permission be given to those who disbelieve, nor shall they be made to solicit favour (16:84); . . . and the Book shall be laid down and the prophets and the witnesses shall be brought up . . . (39:69). Note that witnessing in these verses is unconditional, and the obvious meaning is that they shall be witnesses for the deeds of their nations, and will also testify that the messengers of Allãh did convey the Divine Message to those nations, as is made clear in the verse: Most certainly then We will question those to whom (the messengers) were sent, and most certainly We will question the messengers (7:6). No doubt they will give the evidence in the hereafter; but they must have seen the events in this life, as may be inferred by the words of 'Isã (a.s.) quoted in the Qur'ãn: . . . and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them, but when Thou didst take me (away) completely, Thou were the watcher over them, and Thou art witness of all things (5:117);. . . and on the Day of Resurrection he (i.e., 'Isã) shall be a witness against them (4:159).

Obviously, our normal senses, with all their powers, cannot perceive except the exterior forms of deeds and actions, and that also of a thing which is present, which is within the reach. They cannot perceive a non-existent or a non-present item. And it is completely beyond their power to know, comprehend or identify the realities of those actions and deeds; nor can they observe the immaterial ideas like belief or disbelief, and success or failure. In short, no man can witness a thing which is hidden from the five senses, nor can he observe the esoteric ideas and characteristics that are locked into another person's heart. But it is these hidden realities which will be taken account of, and looked into, on the Day of Resurrection, as Allãh says: . . . but He will call you to account for what your hearts have earned (2:225). Obviously, these things cannot be seen even by those who are present, let alone those who are absent. It can be done only by a man whose affairs are managed directly by Allãh, and whom Allãh makes to "see" the hidden realities. This fact may be inferred from the words of Allãh: And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth (i.e., of the reality) and they know (43:86). Surely, 'Isã (a.s.) is included in this exception, because, Allãh has testified that he is one of those who shall bear witness (as is seen from the above-mentioned two verses). Thus, he is one of those who had "seen" the realities and known the hidden factors of the deeds of their ummah.

In short, the witnessing mentioned in the verse under discussion does not mean that this ummah follows a religion which combines physical perfection with spiritual sublimity. Certainly, this explanation has nothing to do with the meaning of "witness" nor does it fit the apparent meaning of the above-quoted verses.

Actually, they have been called "witnesses" of the people, because they see and observe in this world the realities of the people's actions – felicity and infelicity, rejection and acceptance, submission and arrogance. And they shall give evidence for or against those people on the Day of Judgment, the day when Allãh will make every thing to testify for or against a man, not excepting his own limbs and organs; the day when the Messenger will say: "O my Lord! surely my people treated this Qur'ãn as a forsaken thing (25:30).

Also, it is known that the whole ummah could not attain to this position; it is a special status given to only the pure friends of Allãh. Even those who are only slightly below them in the ranks of felicity, and other just and pious believers are not included in this verse – let alone the rubble of the nation, or the Nimrods and Pharaohs of the ummah. You will see in the Commentary of the verse 4:49 (And whoever obeys Allāh and the Messenger, these are with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favours from among the prophets and the truthful and the martyrs and the good ones; and excellent are these as companions,), that the least that can be said about the martyrs – the witnesses of the deeds – is that they are under the guardian-ship of Allāh, enjoying His favours, and proceeding on the straight path. Also, it has been described in short in the explanation of the verse: The path of those upon whom Thou hast bestowed favours . . . (1:7).

When Allāh told this ummah that it was made witness for the people, the meaning was that the "witnesses" would be from among this ummah. In this respect, it is not different from those verses which tell the Children of Israel that they were made to excel over the worlds. Such verses show that there were among the Children of Israel such personalities who were given that distinction; not that every individual of them was superior to the worlds. A distinction enjoyed by a group is attributed to the whole nation, because the group is a part of the nation. Likewise, this ummah has been said to be "witnesses over the people", because there are, in this ummah, people who shall be witnesses of the people, and the Messenger shall be witness of them.

Objection: Allāh says in the Qur'ān: And (as for) those who believe in Allāh and His messengers, these it is that are the truthful and the witnesses near their Lord (57:19). It shows that all the believers, in general, are "the witnesses".

Reply: The phrase "near their Lord" proves that Allāh will include them among the witnesses on the Day of Resurrection, a rank which they had not got in this life. It is like the verse which says: And (as for) those who believe and their offspring follow them in faith, We will unite with them their offspring . . . (52:21). Apart from that, this verse is general and shows that all the believers from all the nations will be witnesses near Allāh; it does not speak about this ummah especially; therefore, it is of no use to the objector.

Objection: If the ummah has been made a "medium" in this meaning, it does not necessarily follow that the ummah, or a certain group among the ummah, should be witnesses of the people's deeds, nor that the Messenger of Allãh should be witness of those witnesses. Therefore, the problem which had arisen in the previous explanation, remains unanswered even by your exegesis.

Reply: The verse says that those people were made witnesses because they were made a medium nation. It means that this "mediumship" is something which brings the "evidence" and "witnesses" in its wake. And Allãh says: O you who believe! bow down and prostrate yourselves and worship your Lord, and do good that you may succeed. And strive hard in (the way of) Allãh, (such) a striving as is due to Him; He has chosen you and has not laid upon you any hardship in religion; the faith of your father, Ibrãhīm; he named you Muslims before and in this, so that the Messenger may be a witness for you, and you may be witnesses for the people; therefore, establish prayer and pay zakãt and hold fast to Allãh; He is your Guardian; how excellent the Guardian and how excellent the Helper! (22:77 - 78). Note that the distinction that the Messenger should be a witness for them and they should be witnesses for the people, is based on two things: First, that they were chosen by Allãh; and, second, that Allãh had not laid upon them any hardship in religion. Then the religion is defined as the faith of your father, Ibrãhīm, who had named you Muslims before. He had used this name for you when he prayed to Allãh on your behalf, in these words: and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting (Muslims) to Thee. Allãh granted his prayer and made you Muslims, you have surrendered to His order and command; you neither disobey Him nor behave arrogantly before Him; that is why you feel no hardship in the religion, no rule looks difficult for you to follow. You have, therefore, been chosen by Him, and guided on the straight path, submitting to your Lord in all affairs. We have made you like this, in order that the Messenger may be a witness for you and you may be witnesses of the people. Accordingly, you shall be a medium between the Messenger and the people; you shall be connected to the Messenger on one side and to the people on the other. In this way, the wish of Ibrãhīm has been fulfilled about you and the Messenger, as he had prayed: Our Lord! and raise up in them an Apostle from among themselves who shall recite to them Thy communications and teach them the Book and the wisdom, and purify them (2:129). You are that Muslim ummah; the Messenger has transmitted the knowledge of the Book and wisdom to your hearts; and you have been purified by him. Purification has cleansed your hearts from impurities and freed it for My worship and obedience (and as mentioned earlier, it is what Islam means). Therefore, you are the Muslims, sincere in your worship. Of course, the Messenger has precedence over you, because it is he who has guided and trained you. He has precedence over the whole ummah, and you are the medium group – joined to the Messenger on one side, and to the people on the other.

There are many associations at the beginning and the end of the verse which point to this meaning; one may understand them on meditation; and we shall further explain it in a proper place, Allãh willing.

However, the foregoing explanation shows that :

First: The fact that they have been made a medium ummah has a direct bearing on the two objectives. In other words, the facts that "you may be witnesses for the people", and that "the Messenger may be a witness for you", both are the direct result of their being "a medium nation".

Second: They have been called a medium ummah because they are placed between the Messenger and the people – not because they are a medium between two extremes, or between the "people of spirit" and the "people of body".

Third: The verse in its connotation has connection with the verses of the prayer of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) ; and this witnessing is a privilege of the said Muslim ummah.

One thing more: It appears from the Qur'ãn that witnessing about the deeds is not exclusively reserved for the human witnesses. Everything which has any connection with a deed – angels, time and place, religion and Book, limbs and organs, senses and hearts, for example – will testify about it.

It may be inferred from the above that the same place and limbs etc. which we have in this life will be present on the Day of Judgment. Also, it appears that all the above-mentioned things have a sort of a life and perception with which they can perceive the particulars of deeds – those particulars are imprinted on them. It is not necessary that every life should be like our own; there is no reason why life should be of only one type. It cannot be said that because time or space does not have a life like ours, therefore, it has no life.

This topic has been mentioned here just to complete the picture. Details about each point will be given in more suitable places.

QUR'ÃN: And We had not made the qiblah which you had but that We might know him who follows the Messenger from him who turns back upon his heels: The words: "We might know", may be explained in two ways:

First: It may mean, 'My Messenger might know'. Great people generally use this style to speak on behalf of themselves and their subordinates. For example, a ruler says: 'We killed him', or, 'We imprisoned him', although it is his employees, not him-self who kill or imprison.

Second: It may refer to that knowledge of Allãh which accompanies the creation or existence of a thing, and not to that knowledge which Allãh has of everything before that thing comes into being. "Turning back upon one's heels" is an allegorical expression, which denotes evasion or dissension. When a man, who is standing, turns from one direction to another, he turns on his heels. It is like the words of Allãh: And whoever shall turn his back to them on that day . . . (8:16).

Obviously, this verse aims to remove any possible misgivings which the believers would have had because of the change of qiblah: Why qiblah was changed? Why the previous qiblah was abrogated? What will happen to the prayers which they had prayed facing Baytu 'l-Maqdis?

Also, it is clear that "the qiblah which you had" refers to Baytu 'l-Maqdis, and not to the Ka'bah (as someone has said). If his explanation is accepted, it would imply that both Baytu '1-Maqdis and Ka'bah were prescribed as qiblah twice, not once. But there is nothing to support this suggestion.

However, it was but natural that the believers should feel some uneasiness because of this change.

First of all, as Allãh had already decided that He would ultimately make the Ka'bah as the qiblah of the Muslims, then why did He make Baytu'l-Maqdis as their qiblah for so many years in the beginning?

The verse says that all these rules and legislations are made for the benefit of the people themselves. The laws of religion aim at training the people and perfecting them; separating the believers from others; distinguishing the obedient from the disobedient, the submissive from the arrogants. And it was for the same reason that the previous qiblah was prescribed for you. It was done in order that "We might know him who follows the Messenger", that is, We might distinguish him who follows the Messenger "from him who turns back upon his heels". In usual way, the sentence should have said, "who follows thee", but the Qur'ãn has used the noun "the Messenger" instead of pronoun, it is to remind us that his status of Messengership has a direct bearing on this separation between obedient and disobedient ones.

"We had not made the qiblah which you had": That is, We had not made Baytu 'l-Maqdis as qiblah for you but for the reasons described.

Their second worry could be about the prayers which they had prayed facing Baytu '1-Maqdis. What would be its legal status, as it was prayed towards a building that was no longer valid?

Allãh says that Baytu '1-Maqdis was a valid qiblah as long as it was not abrogated. When Allãh abrogates a rule, it looses its validity from the time of its abrogation, not from the original legislation; and it is a result of Allãh's affection and mercy to the believers.

The above misgiving and its reply is inferred from the words: "and Allãh was not going to make your faith to be fruitless; most surely Allãh is Affectionate, Merciful to the people." "ar-Ra'fah" (اَلرَّأفَـةْ) and "ar-rnḥmah" (اَلرَّحْمَـةْ) both basically denote mercy and compassion; but the former usually has the connotation of pity for an afflicted one, while the latter is general.

Q U R ' Ã N : Indeed We see the turning of thy face to heaven, so We shall surely turn thee to a qiblah which thou shalt be pleased with: The verse shows that the Messenger of Allãh, before the revelation of the verse of qiblah – that is, this very verse – used to turn his face to heaven, as he waited – or hoped – that Allãh would send some commandment regarding qiblah. He did so because he wished that Allãh would honour him with a qiblah especially prescribed for him. It does not mean that he was not pleased with Baytu'l-Maqdis as his qiblah – for be it from the Messenger to do so! Allãh says: "We shall surely turn thee to a qiblah which thou shalt be pleased with." To be pleased with a thing does not necessarily mean to be displeased with its alternative.

The traditions, describing the occasion of revelation of this verse, say that the Jews reviled the Muslims and boasted against them, all because the Muslims prayed towards Baytu 'l-Maqdis – the Jews' qiblah. It made the Messenger of Allãh sad; so he came out in the dark of the night looking towards heaven waiting for a revelation from Allãh, hoping that it would cheer him up. Then this verse was revealed.

Now, suppose he would have received revelation to continue praying towards the previous qiblah, that is, Baytu 'l-Maqdis, it would have been his proof against the Jews that, he followed the qiblah by the order of Allãh and not in imitation of the Jews. The fact is that there never was, nor there ever is, anything to be ashamed of, if the Prophet and the Muslims prayed facing Baytu 'l-Maqdis, because the servant has no choice but to accept and obey the order of the Master. But the verse promulgated a new qiblah. It removed the cause of the Jews' revile and boast, in addition to defining the new qiblah. In this way, it was doubly welcomed – it was a proof against the Jews as well as a source of pleasure for the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.).

QUR'ÃN: turn then thy face towards the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you are, turn your face towards it. "ash-Shaṭr" (اَلشَّطْرُ) translated here as "towards", literally means "part of". "Part of the Sacred Mosque" refers to the Ka'bah. Allãh used this expression, instead of saying, towards the Ka'bah, or, towards the Sacred House, to keep the new rule parallel to the previous one. They used to pray to a part of the Remote Mosque, that is, its well-known Rock; so it was changed to a part of the Sacred Mosque, that is, the Ka'bah. It is quite apart from the fact that the addition of the word, "part of" to "the Mosque" and its qualification with the adjective "Sacred" gives many details of this legislation which would have been lost if this phrase were changed to "the Ka'bah" or "the Sacred House".

Allãh begins this verse by giving the order personally to His Messenger (turn then thy face towards the Sacred Mosque), and ends it by including all the Muslims in it (and wherever you are, turn your face towards it). It supports the traditions that the qiblah was changed when the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) was praying and the Muslims were praying behind him. There-fore, he was personally told to turn towards the Ka'bah during that prayer; then the verse went on describing a general order which covered him and all the Muslims, for every time and in every place.

QUR'ÃN: and those who have been given the Book most surely know that it is the truth from their Lord: Their Book contains the prophecies showing the truth of the prophethood of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.), or that this True Prophet would pray facing to-wards the Sacred Mosque. In any case, the verse shows that the Jews' Book had some verses which confirmed – explicitly or implicitly – the truth of this legislation; and Allãh is not at all heedless of what they do; He knows how they hide the truth and conceal the knowledge which they had been given.

QUR'ÃN: And even if you bring to those who have been given the Book every sign they would not follow your qiblah: The verse rebukes them for their obstinacy and stubbornness. Their refusal is not because truth is hidden from them. No, they know very well that it is the truth – they have no doubt about it. Yet they create mischief and invent objection after objection, because they hate the religion and reject the truth. No proof would satisfy them; no sign would make them change their attitude. Even if you bring to them every sign they would not follow your qiblah, because they are obstinate and refuse to accept the truth; nor can you be a follower of their qiblah, because you have a clear proof from your Lord. This Qur'ãnic sentence may also be interpreted as a prohibition given in the form of a proposition. Neither are they the followers of each other's qiblah. The Jews face towards Baytu 'l-Maqdis wherever they may be; and the Christians face towards the East wherever they may be. Neither the former would follow the qiblah, of the latter, nor the latter would accept the qiblah of the former – because all of them follow their own desires.

QUR'ÃN: and if you follow their desires after the knowledge that has come to you, then you shall most surely be among the unjust: The admonition (in singular pronoun) is addressed to the Prophet, but it is really meant for his ummah. It also indicates that the Jews, in their recalcitrance, follow their desire and have become unjust.

QUR'ÃN: Those whom We have given the Book recognize him as they recognize their sons: The pronoun "him" refers to the Messenger of Allãh, not to "the Book"; the simile, "as they recognize their sons", fits recognition of a man, not of a book. Nobody says: He recognizes this book as he recognizes his son. Moreover, the subject of the speech is the Messenger of Allãh and the revelation he received regarding the qiblah, it has nothing to do with the Book which was given to the People of the Book. The verse says: The People of the Book recognize the Messenger of Allãh by the prophecies which their Book contains, as they recognize their sons, and a party of them most surely conceal the truth while they know (it).

The previous verses were addressed to the Prophet (in second person singular pronouns) ; then in this verse he has been mentioned in third person, and the talk is addressed to the believers; then the next verse again reverts to the previous style and is addressed to the Prophet. The style was changed here to show that the truth of the Prophet was clear and well-known to the People of the Book. This change reminds one of a speaker who is talking before a group, one of whom surpasses all in virtues and excellence. The speaker, therefore, addresses him especially (in recognition of his excellence), although the talk is meant for the whole group. Then for some reason, he wants to describe the virtues and excellence of that person; now he turns towards the audience and treats him as absent, mentioning him by pronouns of third person. When that topic is finished, he again assumes the previous style of addressing him directly.

QUR'ÃN: The truth is from your Lord, therefore you should not be of the doubters: It emphasizes the preceding statement and strongly interdicts doubting. The talk in singular pronouns is addressed to the Prophet but is actually intended for the ummah.

QUR'ÃN: And every one has a direction to which he would turn; therefore, hasten to (do) good work: 'al-Wijhah" (اَلوجْهَـةُ) on paradigm of, as well as synonymous to, al-qiblah (اَلقِبْلَـةُ), has the same meaning 'that to which one faces'. The verse sums up the foregoing statements and draws their attention to another more important reality. Every nation has its own qiblah, pre-scribed for them according to their own needs and atmosphere. Being qiblah is not an inherent and inseparable characteristic of any place or direction; it is not a natural or personal feature of a thing which could not be changed. It is therefore not good for you to waste your time and energy in disputation and argumentation about it. You should rather hasten to do good work and try to excel others in virtuous deeds; Allãh is surely going to gather you on a day about which there is no doubt; and wherever you are, Allãh will bring you all together; surely Allãh has power over all things.

This verse is applicable to the subject of qiblah, as it comes between the verses dealing with that subject. Also, it may be applied to the creative affairs as it points to the Divine Measure and Decree and to the related legislation. We shall explain this topic, Allãh willing, in another place.

QUR'ÃN: And from whatsoever place you come forth, turn your face towards the Sacred Mosque: According to some exegetes it means: And from any place you come forth and at any place you come down, turn your face to the Sacred Mosque. Others say that it means: And from whatever town you come out.

The phrase, "from whatsoever place you come forth", literally means as follows: 'from whatsoever place thou halt come forth'. Possibly it may refer to Mecca from which the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had to come out, as Allãh says: . . . the town of thine which has driven thee out . . . (47:13).

However, the, verse says that the law to face the Ka'bah is a firm order which you have to observe in Mecca as well as in other towns and places. Then Allãh emphasizes it in these words: and surely it is the very truth from your Lord, and Allãh is not at all heedless of what you do.

QUR'ÃN: And from whatsoever place you come forth, turn your face towards the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you are turn your faces towards it: The first sentence is repeated here word by word, to show that this law is to be followed in every condition. For example, one says: Fear Allãh when you stand up; fear Allãh when you sit down; fear Allãh when you speak; fear Allãh when you are silent. The speaker wants to emphasize that you should fear Allãh in all conditions and in every situation. This point would be lost if the above sentence were reconstructed in the following way: Fear Allãh when you stand up, when you sit down, when you speak, and when you are silent. The meaning is as follows: Face towards the Sacred Mosque of Mecca whence you had to come out, and wherever you happen to be in the world, turn your faces towards it.

QUR'ÃN: so that people shall have no argument against you, except such of them as are unjust; so do not fear them, and fear Me; and so that I may complete My favour on you and that you may walk on the right course: These sentences describe the following three benefits of this commandment, and at the same time put the utmost emphasis on obeying this law:

First: The Jews knew from their books that the promised Prophet would face towards the Ka'bah, turning away from Baytu 'l-Maqdis, as Allãh has pointed to this fact in a foregoing verse, and those who have been given the Book most surely know that it is the truth from their Lord (2:144). If the qiblah were not changed, the Jews could have used it as a proof against the Muslims that the Prophet was not the one whose advent was foretold in _ the previous books. But now the promulgation of this order has not left them any room for disputation – except those of them who are unjust. This exception gives the following meaning: Of course, those of them who are unjust – because they follow their desire – will never be satisfied; they will continue arguing against it; "so do not fear them", because they are unjust and they follow their desires – and Allãh does not guide aright the unjust people – "and fear Me".

Second: Obedience of this rule will lead the Muslims to the completion of Divine favour on them, by perfecting their religion. We shall explain the meaning of the "completion of favour", when we write the verse: This day have I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you and chosen for you Islam as a religion (5:4).

Third: There is the hope that through this rule the Muslims will be guided to the straight path. We have explained the meaning of guidance under the verse: Guide us to the straight path (1:5).

An exegete has written: "The verse of qiblah contains the words, 'and so that I may complete My favour on you and that you may walk on the right course'. Similar words have been used in the 'Chapter of Victory', while mentioning the victory of Mecca: Surely We have given to you a clear victory, so that Allãh may forgive you your (i.e., your ummah their) past faults and those to follow and complete His favour to you and keep you on a straight path (48:1-2). This almost identical expression shows that the verse of qiblah too alludes to the victory of Mecca."

According to that exegete, "the Ka'bah in the beginning of Islam was occupied by the idols, which were put there by the polytheists – the power in those days was in the hands of the pagans. Islam was weak, it had no authority or power. There-fore, Allãh told the Prophet to face towards Baytu 'l-Maqdis, the qiblah of the Jews, who were nearer than the polytheists, to Islam. Then the Prophet emigrated to Medina, and Islam began to gain strength. The time was coming nearer when Mecca would be conquered and the House of Allãh cleansed of the idols' pollution. Allãh therefore ordered the Prophet to change the direction of qiblah. It was a great bounty favour which Allãh has reserved for the Muslims. And Allãh gave a promise, included in this verse of qiblah, that He would complete His favour on them and guide them to the right course. It was implied in these words that the Ka'bah would soon be cleansed of the idols and images; the Muslims would be exclusively connected to the Ka'bah as it would remain exclusively under their care. This verse actually gave the good tidings of the conquest of Mecca. Thereafter, when Mecca was conquered, Allãh reminded them of that promise by using almost similar words in its description: ". . . and complete His favours to you and keep you on a straight path."

COMMENT: This explanation, although apparently well-founded, is in fact not based on deep reflection; because the words of the Qur'ãn do not support it. How do we know that the verse of qiblah contains a promise to complete the favour? The answer is: Because of li (لِـ a preposition used here for the final cause; so that, in order that) in li-utimma (لأُتِمَّ = so that I may complete. . .). And the verse in Chapter 48 (Victory), which, according to him, was revealed in fulfilment of that promise, also begins with the same proposition: so that Allãh may forgive you your (i.e., your ummah their) past faults and those to follow and complete His favour to you and keep you on a straight path (48:2). Clearly, both verses contain the same promise to complete the favour in future; neither gives the good news of its fulfilment yet. Moreover, the verse of qiblah gives this promise to all the Muslims while that of the Victory uses singular pronouns and is addressed to the Prophet personally. Clearly they have been revealed in different contexts.

If there is any verse showing the fulfilment of the promise given in both these verses, then it can only be the verse: This day I perfected for you your religion and completed My favour on you and chosen for you Islam as a religion (5:3). We shall explain the meaning of an-ni'mah (اَلنِّعْمَةُ = favour, bounty, blessing) in the explanation of this verse, and there we shall describe what was the favour and bounty that was completed on that day, and by which Allãh has put the Muslims under His obligation for ever.

There are two other verses which, like the above-mentioned two, contain the promise of completion of favour; but He wishes to purify you and that He may complete His favour on you so that you may be grateful (5:6); even thus does He complete His favour upon you, that haply you may submit (16:81). We shall write under these verses somethings related to this topic.

QUR'ÃN: Even as We have sent among you a Messenger from among you who recites to you Our communications and purifies you and teaches you the Book and the wisdom and teaches you that which you did not know: The verse begins with the word kamã (كَمَا= like, as, even as), which is obviously a compound of ka (كَ = like, as) and mã (مَا) which changes the verb into maṣdar. The connotation, therefore, is as follows: 'We have be-stowed Our favours on you by appointing the Ka'bah as your qiblah. It is the House that Ibrãhīm built, and he prayed to Us for its good and blessings. We have done this in the same way as We have favoured you by sending to you a Messenger from among you who recites to you Our communications and teaches you the Book and the wisdom and purifies you. We did so in answer to the pleading of Ibrãhīm, when he and his son, Ismã'īl, prayed to Us: Our Lord! and raise up in them a Messenger from among themselves, who shall recite to them Thy communications and teach them the Book and wisdom and purify them.' This verse, in short, says that it was Allãh's favour on this ummah that he sent the Prophet among them, as it was a favour to appoint the Ka'bah as their qiblah.

Who are the people referred to by the second person pronouns in "among you a Messenger from among you"? The application may be restricted or extended, depending on the level of explanation whether it is interpreted esoterically, literally or legislatively. Esoterically, it is addressed especially to the earlier mentioned: Submissive group (2:128), that is, those who were given authority over religion and followers of religion; literally all the Muslims from the progeny of Ismã'īl (i.e., the Arabs of Mudar tribe) are included; legislatively, it covers all the Muslims, Arabs and non-Arabs alike.

QUR'ÃN : recites to you Our communications: "al-Ãyãt" (اَلآيَاتُ = verses, signs – translated here as communications) obviously refers to the verses of the Qur'ãn, because it is the words (not the meanings) that are recited; 'at-tazkiyah" (اَلتَّزْكِيَةُ = to purify) is to remove dirt, filth and blemish. The Prophet cleansed them thoroughly – from wrong beliefs like polytheism and rejection of true faith, from vile and base character like pride and avarice, and from evil and immoral actions and things like murder, fornication and intoxicants.

QUR'ÃN: and teaches you the Book and the wisdom and teaches you that which you did not know: It encompasses all primary and secondary aspects of religious knowledge.

These verses have variously changed the pronouns used for Allãh, using third and first persons, singular and plural; and for others, using first, second and third persons. The reason of every such change may be understood by a little meditation.

al-Qummi narrates in his at-Tafsīr that aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, The fools among the people will say . . . : "The qiblah was changed to the Ka'bah after the Prophet prayed towards Baytu 'l-Maqdis for thirteen years in Mecca; and (also) after his emigration to Medina he prayed towards Baytu ‘l-Maqdis for seven months.” (He said:) “Then Allãh turned him towards Mecca. And it was because the Jews used to revile the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), saying that he was their follower (as) he prayed to their qiblah. The Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) became very sad because of it; and he came out in the middle of the night looking to the horizons of the heaven, waiting for an order in this regard from Allãh. When it was day and the time of the noon prayer arrived, (the Prophet, s.a.w.a.) was in the mosque of Banu Salim. And he had (already) prayed two rak‘ahs of ẓuhr, when Jibrīl came down; and he held the Prophet’s upper arms and turned him towards the Ka‘bah. And he brought down to him (the revelation): Indeed We see the turning of thy face to heaven, so We shall surely turn thee to a qiblah which thou shalt like; turn then thy face towards the Sacred Mosque. Thus, the Prophet had prayed two rak‘ahs towards Baytu ‘l-Maqdis, and (prayed the remaining) two rak‘ahs towards the Ka‘bah. Then the Jews and the fools said: ʿWhat has turned them from their qiblah which they had?’ ” (Majma‘u ’l-bayãn)

The author says: There are numerous traditions of similar meaning narrated by the Sunni and Shi‘ah narrators, which are recorded in the books of traditions. The reports differ about the time when the qiblah was changed. Most of them say that it happened in the month of Rajab in the second year of hijrah – the seventeenth month after the emigration; and this timing looks more correct. Allãh willing, we shall describe some other related topics in a separate discourse.

There are traditions from Sunni narrators, which explain the witnessing of this ummah concerning the people and the witnessing of the Prophet for them, in these terms: “The nations will deny, on the Day of Judgment, that the prophets had conveyed any message to them. Then Allãh will ask the prophets to bring their proof that they had really conveyed the message – and Allãh knows it better. So, the ummah of Muhammad (s. a. w. a.) will be brought in and they will testify (for the prophets).

Then the (other) nations will say: 'How do you know?' They will say: 'We knew it from the information which Allãh revealed in His Book on the tongue of His truthful Prophet.' Then Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) will be brought there and he will be asked about the condition of his ummah. So he will testify for their purity, justice and probity. And this is the meaning of the words of Allãh: How will it be, then, when We bring from every people a witness and bring you as a witness for these? (4:41)

The author says: This theme is supported by other traditions narrated by aṣ-Ṣuyũṭī in ad-Durru 'l-manthũr and others. But how is it that the Prophet would testify about his ummah that they were pure and just? It can be accepted only if it is taken to mean that he will testify for a selected group, not for the whole ummah. Otherwise, such traditions have to be rejected, as is self-evident from the Qur'ãn and the sunnah. How can the Prophet sanction or approve all those oppressions, cruelties, tyrannies and massacres perpetrated by this ummah, and whose like was never seen in any of the previous nations? How can he testify that all those Pharaohs and ṭãghũts of this ummah were pure, just and upright? What is this tradition, if not a calumny against this up-right religion? A joke with the realities of this illustrious faith? Moreover, it is based on the wrong idea that a hearsay testimony is acceptable!

The correct meaning of the verse may be seen in a tradition narrated from al-Bãqir (a.s.) that he said: "Only the Imãms and the Messengers will be witnesses for the people. And as for the (general) ummah, it is unthinkable that Allãh would call them as witnesses – and there are among them those whose testimony is not accepted for a bundle of vegetable." (al-Manãqib)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the verse, that you may be witnesses. . .: "(It is) then (wrong) if you think that Allãh in this verse means all the monotheists, the people of qiblah (i.e., the Muslims). Do you think that a person whose evidence is not acceptable in this world about a aṣ-ṣã' (الصَّاع = a weight about 3 kilogram) of date, Allãh will call him as a witness on the Day of Judgment

The author says: We have described it under that verse with the help of the Qur'ãn itself.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) narrates from his father, from the Prophet, that he said: "It is among the (bounties) which Allãh gave to my ummah and (by which) He made them excel all other nations, that He gave them three attributes which (previously) were not given but to a prophet . . . And when He sent a prophet, made him a witness for his nation; and surely Allãh, Blessed and High is He, has made my ummah a witness for the creatures, as He says: so that the Messenger may be a witness for you, and you may be witnesses for the people (22:78). (Qurbu 'l-asnãd)

The author says: This ḥadīth is not in conflict with the above explanation, because the word ummah refers to that submissive ummah in which the prayer of Ibrãhīm (a.s.) was accepted.

Amiru '1-mu'minin (a.s.) says, inter alia, in a ḥadīth describing the Day of Judgment: "They will gather in a place where every one will be required to speak; (but) no one shall speak: except he whom the Beneficent Allãh permits and who speaks the right thing (78:38). Then the Messenger shall be asked to stand (and speak); and that is (the meaning of) His word to Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) : How will it be, then, when We bring from every people a witness and bring you as a witness for these? (4:41). And he is the witness of the witnesses, and the witnesses are the Messengers." (al-'Ayyãshī)

Abu Basir, narrating from the fifth or the sixth Imãm, says: "I said to him: 'Did (Allãh) order him (i.e., the Prophet, s.a.w. a.) to pray towards Baytu 'l-Maqdis?' He said: 'Yes. Don't you see that Allãh, Blessed and High is He!, says: And We had not made the qiblah which you had but that We might distinguish him who follows the Messenger from him who turns back upon his heels . . .' " (at-Tahdhīb)

The author says: This ḥadīth shows that the words: which you had, are related to: the qiblah, and that the whole phrase refers to Baytu 'l-Maqdis; and it was the qiblah which the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had. As we have mentioned earlier, this explanation is in conformity with the context. Also, it supports what has been narrated in a ḥadīth from al-'Askarī (a.s.):

"The Meccans were attached to the Ka'bah. Therefore Allãh wished to distinguish the followers of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.), from his opponents, by following the qiblah which he disliked. And because the people of Medina were inclined towards Baytu 'l-Maqdis, He ordered them to go against it and to turn towards the Ka'bah, in order that He may show who follows Muhammad (s.a.w.a.) (even) in that which is not to his liking; such a man, then, believes in his truth and agrees with him . . . "

It also shows the incorrectness of the interpretation, to which we had made a passing reference in the Commentary, and which runs as follows: The phrase, which you had, is the second object of the verb, We had not made. Accordingly, the verse means: And We did not make the qiblah, that is, the Ka'bah, which you had before Baytu 'l-Maqdis. In support of this interpretation, they quote the words, but that We might distinguish him who follows the Messenger from him who turns back upon his heels. The absurdity of this interpretation and of this argument is self-evident.

az-Zubayri, narrating from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) says: "I asked him: 'Will you not tell me about the faith, whether it is word with deed or (only) word without deed?' He said: 'The faith is deed, all of it; and (utterance of) the word is one of those deeds; (it is) obligatory from Allãh, described in His Book; its light is clear, its proof well-established; the Book bears witness for it and calls to it. And when Allãh turned his Prophet towards the Ka'bah, away from Baytu ‘l-Maqdis, the Muslims said to the Prophet : “What do you see (about) our prayers which we used to pray towards Baytu ‘l-Maqdis? What shall be our position about these? And what shall be the position of those of us who have passed away and they were praying towards Baytu ‘1-Maqdis?” Then Allãh revealed (the verse) : and Allãh was not going to make your faith to be fruitless; most surely Allãh is Affectionate, Merciful to the people. Thus Allãh named the prayer as “faith”. Whoever therefore fears Allãh, guarding his limbs (from sins), fulfilling (obligation of) each of these limbs which Allãh has laid down for it, he shall meet Allãh with perfect faith, (and he shall be) from the people of the Garden. And whoever acted falsely about any of these (limbs), or transgressed what Allãh had ordered about it, he shall meet Allãh (as one) having an in-complete faith.’ “ (al-‘Ayyãshī)

The author says: It has been narrated also by al-Kulayni. Although it says that the verse, and Allãh was not going to make your faith fruitless . . ., was revealed after the qiblah was changed, yet it does not go against the explanation given in the Commentary.

“The Prophet prayed towards Baytu ‘l-Maqdis for thirteen years in Mecca, and nineteen months in Medina.* Then the Jews reviled him, saying: ‘You are a follower of our qiblah.’ He was very much saddened because of it. Then one night he came out turning his face towards the horizons of the heaven. When it was morning, he prayed the dawn (prayer). Then when he had prayed two rak‘ahs of ẓuhr, Jibrīl came and told him (the message of Allãh): Indeed We see the turning of thy face to heaven, so We shall surely turn thee to a qiblah which thou shalt like. . .; then he took hold of the Prophet and turned him towards the Ka‘bah, and those who were (praying) behind him turned their faces (likewise), until the men stood in place of the women, and the women in place of the men. Thus, the early part of his prayer was towards Baytu ʿl-Maqdis, and the latter part towards the Kaʻbah. Then the news reached another mosque in Medina, and its people had already prayed two rakʻahs of ʻaṣr (to Baytu ʻl-Maqdis), and they turned towards the (new) qiblah. So the early part of their prayer was to Baytu ʿl-Maqdis and the latter part towards the Kaʻbah; so that mosque was named the Mosque of the Two Qiblahs." (al-Faqīh)

The author says: al-Qummi has narrated a similar ḥadīth, with one variation that the Prophet was in the mosque of Banũ. Sãlim.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said explaining the words of Allãh, turn then thy face towards the Sacred Mosque: "Face towards the qiblah, and do not turn away from the qiblah; otherwise your prayer will be void. For, Allãh says to His Prophet concerning the obligatory prayer, turn then your face towards the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you are, turn your face towards it." (al-ʻAyyãshī)

The author says: There are numerous *al-mustafīḍah traditions which say that this verse was revealed about the obligatory prayer.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the verse: Those whom We have given the Book recognize him as they recognize their sons: "This verse was revealed about the Jews and the Christians. Allãh, Blessed and High is He! says: Those whom We have given the Book recognize him, that is, recognize the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.), as they recognize their sons. For, surely Allãh, Mighty and Great is He!, had revealed to them, in the Torah and the Injīl and Zabũr, the attributes of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.), and the attributes of his companions, as well as (the story of) his emigration. And this is (the meaning of) the words of Allãh: Muhammad is the Messenger of Allãh; and those with him are severe against the unbelievers, compassionate among themselves; you will see them

* al-Mustafīḍah (اَلْمُسْتَفِيضَةُ) = A tradition narrated by a great many narrators, but to a degree less than that required for mutawãtir. (tr.)

bowing down, prostrating themselves, seeking grace from Allãh and pleasure; their marks are in their faces because of the effect of prostration; that is their description in the Torah and their description in the Injīl . . . (48:29). And this was the description of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and of his companions in the Torah. Thereafter, when Allãh raised him up, the People of the Book recognized him. (But they rejected him) as Allãh, Great is His Majesty!, says: but when there came to them that which they did recognize, they disbelieved in him (2:89). (al-Qummi)

The author says: A similar ḥadīth has been narrated in al-Kãfī from ‘Ali (a.s.).

Many Shiite traditions say that the words of Allãh, wherever you are, Allãh will bring you all together, has been revealed about the companions of al-Qã’im (a.s.). Some of those traditions say that it is applied to them according to the principle of the “flow of the Qur’ãn”.

A tradition, narrated by the Sunni narrators says that ‘Ali (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, so that I may complete My favour on you: Completion of favour is the death in the state of Islam (i.e., to die as a Muslim).”

Another Sunni ḥadīth says that the completion of favour is entering into the Garden.

AN ACADEMIC AND HISTORICAL DISCOURSE ON WAYS OF FINDING THE DIRECTION OF QIBLAH

The Muslims have to face towards the qiblah in prayer – and it is an act of worship which each of them has to perform several times a day – and at the time of slaughtering an animal as well as at some other times. It compelled the Muslims to find out the direction of the qiblah wherever they might be.

In the beginning it was based on guess and rough estimates. Then the overwhelming need prompted the Muslim geographers and mathematicians to devise more accurate methods to find its direction. They based their reckoning on the longitude and latitude of a place – they calculated the degree of inclination between its location and that of Mecca with the help of trigonometry and astronomy. They fixed the direction of qiblah in every town with the help of the well-known Indian Circle which fixed the meridian of a place and showed the degree of its inclination from the qiblah.

Then they started using the compass. Its hands pointed to the North and the South; and if the degree of inclination to Mecca was known beforehand, it was easy to fix the direction of the qiblah. It gradually replaced the Indian Circle, being a lot quicker and easier to use.

But both these endeavours of theirs – may Allãh reward them for these – were not free from defect and miscalculation.

First: The Indian Circle: The latter geographers found out that the early scholars were not very accurate in their calculation of the longitude – and this had led to confusion in calculation of the degree of inclination, and consequently in the fixing of the qiblah's direction. The early scholars were more accurate in finding the latitude of a place, than its longitude. They used to fix the latitude of a place by measuring the altitude of the North Pole there. But fixing a longitude depended on measuring the distance between two places, and it was done by noting the time when a certain celestial event, like a solar or lunar eclipse, occurred in one place, and then calculating as to how much time had elapsed before it appeared in the other place. Obviously, neither the old instruments were dependable enough, nor the means of communications fast enough, to give this calculation the desired accuracy.

With advancement of scientific apparatus and development of new means of communication, the need was felt to find a more accurate way of fixing the qiblah. The well-known scholar, Shaykh (Ḥaydar Quli) Sardãr Kãbulī – Allãh's mercy be on him!

looked into this matter, and calculated the inclination of various places with the help of the modern sciences. He wrote on this subject his book Tuḥfatu 'l-ajillah fī ma'rifati 'l-qiblah. It is a fine work, in which he explains scientifically, how to find out the direction of qiblah for a place; also he has given charts fixing the qiblah of various towns.

Allãh helped him in his endeavour - may He reward him for it - in such a fine way that his calculations showed a clear miracle of the Prophet.

When the early Muslim scholars calculated the position of Medina, they found that it was situated at 25°n lat. 75° 20′ long. The trouble was that al-miḥrãb (اَلمِحْرَابُ = niche) of the Mosque of the Prophet (based on the original direction) was not exactly to the direction which the newly calculated position was indicating. The religious scholars were always arguing on this subject, and they invented some reasons to justify that "deviation", although none was based on reality. But Sardãr Kãbuli - may Allãh have mercy on him! - showed clearly that Medina is situated on 24°57′ lat. 39°59′ long.; and that the inclination towards Mecca is 0°45′. And the niche of the Prophet's Mosque has exactly the same inclination. By this calculation, one more miracle of the Prophet came to light; it was the direction to which he turned his face while he was praying, and about which he later said that Jibrīl took hold of his hand and turned him towards the Ka'bah. Truth was what Allãh and His Messenger said.

After him, came the great mathematician, 'Abdu 'r-Razzãq al-Baghã'irī - Allãh's mercy be on him - and he calculated the direction of the qiblah of most of the towns of the world, and published it in his book; his charts fix the qiblah of more than 1,500 towns. In this way, the favour of Allãh was completed about the direction of the qiblah.

Second: The Compass: It has been established that the Earth's magnetic Poles are not identical with its geographical Poles. First of all, the magnetic Poles have been changing from time to time. Second, the magnetic North Pole is at a distance of about one thousand miles from the geographical North Pole. Obviously, the compass does not show the exact direction of the qiblah; in some places the deviation may reach a degree that cannot be allowed.

Now, the leading mathematician, Ḥusayn 'Ali Razm Ãrã, undertook these days (i.e., the 1332nd year of the solar hijri calendar) to solve this problem. He calculated the difference between the magnetic and geographical Poles at various places, and determined the degrees of inclination of the qiblah from the magnetic Pole in respect of about one thousand towns. Then he invented his compass which fixes the qiblah of those places very accurately.

This compass is now in general use in the Muslim world. May Allãh reward him for his endeavours.

A SOCIOLOGICAL ESSAY ON THE MEANING OF QIBLAH AND ITS BENEFITS

Let us look at the social structure of humanity. Ponder on society per se, and you will admit that it was the human nature which brought it into being and developed it with its many-sided aspects. It did so because of the inspiration it received from Allãh – the divinely-gifted instinct which made a man realize that he depends on collective efforts of other men for his survival and development. That is why human beings rely on society and keep their activities within the bounds of the social laws.

Then he acquired knowledge – mental images – related to his surrounding matter, and about his own needs and activities. What creates a relation – positive or negative – between a man and his activities is the knowledge of their various properties; like the knowledge that something is good or bad, this should be done, that should be avoided. In fact, all the fundamental concepts of sociology come under this category. It covers leader-ship and subordination, ownership and jurisdiction, collective and individual affairs, and in short, all the common rules and values as well as the national or tribal traditions and customs. Even the last mentioned rites which change from nation to nation, from region to region and from era to era, have been produced by the human nature which worked according to the divinely-bestowed instinct.

All these exoteric aspects of society are symbols of esoteric ideas and ideals; human nature sees in them fulfilment of its inner craving, and thus moves towards it in appropriate way – by taking it, discarding it, doing it, leaving it or perfecting it.

Now, Allãh is free from matter and its concomitants; He can never be perceived by any physical sense. How can people turn towards Him, especially if they want their inner devotion manifested in their actions – because actions are confined within material limits. It can only be done by representing the esoteric ideas with manifest actions. Various feelings and emotions are represented with various appropriate physical postures: Man prostrates to show his self-abasement; and bows down to glorify the Creator. Circumambulation around the Ka'bah represents self-sacrifice. Standing in prayer portrays the Creator's greatness, and wuḍũ' and ritual bath are intended to make one spiritually clean, to prepare oneself for Divine Presence.

Undoubtedly, complete attention towards God during the prayer is the soul of the worship. Without total undiverted attention worship has no life, no vitality. And the attention depends on such representations for its existence, continuation and perfection.

The worshippers of idols, celestial bodies or other material things (like trees, animals and/or human beings) stand face to face with their deities and idols, turning towards them with their bodies maintaining close proximity with them.* Islam came to verify the previous religions brought by the prophets; it is the most comprehensive and complete Divine Religion. It has appointed the Ka'bah as the qiblah – the direction to which people should turn during prayer (and no one is excused from prayer in any condition) wherever they may be in the world. They are further obliged (or encouraged) to turn towards it in certain conditions, and forbidden to face it or keep it behind

* But that method, invented by human mind, was rejected by Divine religions brought by the prophets of God, because instead of fixing the attention to God, it actually diverted the attention towards those idols etc., making them into partners of God in worship. Yet, the original aim – a physical manifestation of undiverted attention towards God – was good and in conformity with demands of the human nature, provided it could be achieved without any risk of falling into polytheism. (tr.)

their backs in some other conditions. Thus, a Muslim is obliged to keep his attention to the House of Allãh. He is not to forget his Lord in private or in public, in his working hours or in sleep, while standing up or sitting down in prayer, or in other actions – not even in his meanest condition.*

The above discourse looked at the benefits which an individual derives from the qiblah. If we ponder on this rule from sociological point of view, then its effects are even more import-ant and far-reaching. It has united all the Muslims – of diverse places and different times – fixing their attention to one point. The qiblah, therefore, portrays that they are one in their belief, connected to each other in their social structure, and brothers in Islam. If such a fine spirit permeates the material and ideological lives of the individuals and groups, the society shall reach its highest point of perfection; and the most comprehensive and all-encompassing unity shall manifest itself in the Muslim society. Allãh has especially bestowed this favour on His Muslim servants. By this favour He has protected their religious unity – even now when they have fallen apart in so many groups, have been divided into so many sects and are following so many diverse ideologies.

We are thankful to Allãh for His favours.

* It is unlawful to face towards the qiblah, or to keep the qiblah on backside, while urinating or relieving the bowels. Therefore, a Muslim has to remember the direction of qiblah even at that time. (tr.)

COMMENTARY

Allãh first mentioned His favour on the Muslims that He sent to them a Prophet from among them – a favour that cannot be measured in any way. Then he pointed to another great favour in that He guided them to the straight path and led them to the highest perfection. Then came the third favour of giving them a qiblah of their own – through that rule, their religion began its journey to perfection, their worship was unified and their religious and social virtues were enhanced. Reminding them of these three-fold favours, He calls them to remember Him and to be thankful to Him. They should remember Him with their devotion and obedience, so that He remembers them with His favour. He will increase for them His bounty and grace, if they are thankful to Him, and if they are not ungrateful for His favours. He had already said to them: and remember your Lord when you forget and say: 'May be my Lord will guide me to a nearer course to the right than this" (18:24) ; If you are grateful, I would certainly give you more; and if you are ungrateful, My chastisement is truly severe (14:7). These two verses were revealed before the verse of the qiblah in this chapter.

"adh-Dhikr" (اَلذِّكْرُ = remembrance) is sometimes used as opposite of "al-ghaflah" (اَلغَفْلَة = inattention and heedlessness). Allãh says: and do not follow him whose heart We have made inattentive to Our remembrance (18:28). Inattention is "not knowing that one knows – although the original knowledge is present in memory". "Remembrance", as its opposite, means "knowing that one knows".

The word "remembrance" at other times is used as opposite to "an-nisyãn" (اَلنِّسْيَانُ = forgetfulness). Forgetfulness is "cessation of knowledge from mind"; and as its opposite, remembrance means "presence of knowledge in mind". It is to this meaning that the words of Allãh refer in the verse: and remember your Lord when you forget . . . (18:24). This remembrance, like its opposite "forgetfulness", is a concept which has its own special effects and exclusive characteristics. Sometimes when those effects and characteristics are found, we say that one remembers, although there is no actual remembrance; or that one has forgotten, although there is no actual forgetfulness. For example, if you do not come to the aid of your friend – when you know that he needs your help – then people say that: "You have forgotten him", although in fact you remember him very well.

The word "remembrance" is also used in the same way. Apparently, the use of this word for "verbal remembrance" (e.g., reciting or repeating the names of Allãh) comes in this category, because you cannot express something in words unless you remember it in mind. Allãh says: Say; "I will recite to you an account (a remembrance) of him" (18:83). There are many other examples like it. But if verbal remembrance is counted as a real meaning of the word 'remembrance' then it will be one of its (lower) degrees.

However, remembrance is of many degrees. Allãh says: now surely by Allãh's remembrance are the hearts set at rest (13:28); And remember your Lord within yourself humbly and fearing and in a voice not loud in the morning and the evening, and be not of the heedless ones (7:205) ; then remember Allãh as you remember your fathers, rather a more intense remembrance (2:200). Now, it is the thought or feeling which becomes intense, not the words. Also, we have quoted the above verse: and remember your Lord when you forget and say: "May be my Lord will guide me to a nearer course to the right than this" (18:24). The last sentence, beginning with Say: "May be . . .", tells the servant to hope for a rank higher than his present one. Its connotation will be as follows: If you slip down to a lower rank, that is, if you forget what you knew before, then remember your Lord and then you may hope for a higher rank that is nearer to the right course than the present one. It shows that the remembrance of the heart, per se, is of many degrees. It also proves the validity of the saying, "Remembrance is the presence of an idea in the mind"; because even "presence" has various degrees and ranks.

Remember Me: In this sentence, the object "Me" refers to Allãh. As we explained above, remembrance is the knowledge of knowledge; and knowledge is defined as "attainment of the form and idea of a thing in the mind of the Knower". Knowledge confines the thing so known and encompasses it within the knower's mind. Obviously, Allãh cannot be known, or remembered (i.e., known to be known) in any way like this. He is beyond the description of describers. He Himself says: Hollowed be Allãh, from what they describe, except the servants of Allãh, freed (from sins) (37:159–160); they do not comprehend Him in knowledge (20:110). (We shall write later on, Allãh willing, somethings related to these two verses.) In view of this established fact, if we were to say that the words, "Remember Me", have been used here in their real, and not metaphorical sense, then we will have to say that man has, or can have, a know-ledge whose definition would be quite different from the one known to us.

TRADITIONS

Numerous traditions, on the virtue of remembrance of Allãh, have been narrated by the Shi'ah and Sunni narrators. For example, it has been narrated through various chains of narrators that: "Remembrance of Allãh is good in all conditions."

It has been narrated that the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) came up to his companions, and said: "Feast you in the meadows of the Garden." They said: "O Messenger of Allãh! And what are the meadows of the Garden?" He said: "The gatherings of remembrance; go there in the mornings and in the evenings and remember (Allãh). And whoever likes to know (what is) his position near Allãh, he should see what is the position of Allãh near him (i.e., in his heart) ; because surely Allãh gives a servant the same position which the servant gives to Allãh, vis-à-vis, his own self. And know that your best deeds (near your King) and the purest and the highest of them in ranks, and the best of all that the sun shines on, is the remembrance of Allãh, the High, because Allãh, the High, has said concerning His Own Self: 'I am the companion of him who remembers Me'; and He, the High One, has said: 'Therefore remember Me; I will remember you with My bounty; you remember Me with obedience and worship, I will remember you with bounties, and beneficence, and comfort, and (My) pleasure.' " ('Uddatu' d-dã'ī)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said : "Surely Allãh, the Blessed, the High, says: 'Whoever is too preoccupied with My remembrance to be able to ask Me (for his needs), I give him the best of what I give to him who asks Me.' " (al-Maḥãsin; ad-Da'awãt, ar-Rãwandi) al-Ḥusayn al-Bazzãz said: "Abu Abdillãh (a.s.) told me: 'Should I not tell you the most difficult (thing) which Allãh has made obligatory for His creatures?' I said: 'Yes, certainly.' He said: 'To do justice to the people (even) against yourself, and your beneficence to your brother, and remembrance of Allãh in every place. Why, (by remembrance) I do not mean (recitation of): "Glory be to Allãh, and praise be to Allãh, and there is no god except Allãh, and Allãh is Great" – although this is from that (i.e., it is one aspect of remembrance) ; but remembrance of Allãh in every place (means that you should remember Him) when you rush to His obedience or to His disobedience." (Ma 'ãni 'l-akhbãr)

The author says: This theme has been narrated through numerous chains from the Prophet and his Ahlu 'l-bayt (peace be on them all); and there is, in some of them, the following addition: "And it is the words of Allãh: Surely those who fear

(Allãh), when a visitation from the Satan afflicts them they become mindful (they remember), then lo! they see." (7:201)

The Prophet said: "Allãh says: 'When I know that the predominant trait of My servant is to be engrossed in Me, I transfer his desire to My invocation and My secret conversation. When My servant becomes like this (i.e., when he attains this position), then if he wants to (i.e., if he is about to) forget, I come between him and his forgetfulness (i.e., I protect him from it). They are truly My friends; they are truly the heroes; it is they that when I want to destroy the people of the earth in chastisement, I remove it (the chastisement) from them because of those heroes.' " ('Uddatu 'd-dã'ī) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Allãh, the High, has said: 'O son of Ãdam! Remember Me in your mind, I will remember you in My Self; O Son of Ãdam! Remember Me in seclusion, I will remember you in seclusion; remember Me in a gathering, I will remember you in a gathering better than your gathering.' " And he said: "No servant remembers Allãh in an assembly of the people but Allãh remembers him in the assembly of the angels". (al-Maḥasin)

The author says: Both groups, that is, the Shī'ah and the Sunnis, have narrated this theme with numerous asnãd.

aṣ-Ṣuyũṭī writes in ad-Durru 'l-manthũr: "aṭ-Ṭabarãnī, Ibn Marduwayh and al-Bayhaqi (in his Shu'abu 'l-imãn) have narrated from Ibn Mas'ũd that he said: 'The Messenger of Allãh said: "Whoever is given four (things) is (also) given (other) four (things). And its explanation is (found) in the Book of Allãh. Whoever is given remembrance, Allãh remembers him, because Allãh says, 'Remember Me, I will remember you'; and whoever is given ad-du'ã' (اَلدُّعَاءُ = invocation) is given response (i.e., its acceptance), because Allãh says; 'Call on Me, I will answer you'; and whoever is given thankfulness, is given increase, because Allãh says, 'If you are grateful, I will certainly give you more'; and whoever is given to ask forgiveness, is given pardon, because Allãh says, 'Ask forgiveness of your Lord, surely He is the most Forgiving.' " ' "

It is written in the same book: "Sa'īd ibn Manṣūr, Ibnu '1-Mundhir and al-Bayhaqī (in his Shu'abu '1-īmān) narrate from Khālid ibn Abi 'Imrān that he said that the Messenger of Allāh said: 'Whoever obeys Allāh, he indeed has remembered Allāh, even if his prayer and his fast and his recitation of the Qur'ān are small in quantity. And whoever disobeys Allāh, he indeed has forgotten Allāh, even if his prayer and his fast and his recitation of the Qur'ān are abundant.' "

The author says: This tradition indicates that man commits sin only when he forgets Allāh and becomes inattentive to Him. Had he remembered what was the reality behind his sin and what effect it would produce, he would not have gone near it. If someone disobeys Allāh – and does not care even if he is reminded of Him – and gives no importance to his Lord and Creator, then he is a transgressor (who) does not know the dignity and the sublime majesty of his Lord, nor does he understand how Allāh encompasses every thing. This theme is also found in another tradition, which has been narrated in ad-Durru '1-manthūr from Abū Hind ad-Dārī who said that the Prophet said: "Allāh says: 'Remember Me by obeying Me, I will remember you with My forgiveness. And whoever remembers Me – and he is obedient – then it is My duty to remember him with My forgiveness. And whoever remembers Me – and he is disobedient – then it is a right on Me to remember him with hate . . .' " The last sentence of this ḥadīth has used the word, remembrance (at the time of disobedience), in its opposite meaning; the verse under discussion and other traditions used the word 'forgetfulness' to convey that same idea.

We shall give some more details of this subject in some other place.

GENERAL COMMENT

A single theme joins the five verses like a pearl-string; the sentences form a sequence and the topic is developed harmoniously; the beginning leads to the end, and the points to the beginning. It shows that they were revealed together, not separately. The context indicates that they must have been revealed shortly before the law of al-jihãd (اَلجِهَادُ = war in the way of Allãh) was promulgated and the Muslims were ordered to fight in the cause of religion.

The verses prepare the believers for some trials which they will have to undergo, some misfortunes which will befall them. Not the usual type of trial and hardship, but some extraordinary misfortunes which will afflict the whole community and will continue, recurring every now and then. Man, like any other creature in this world, always faces some hardships and troubles which disturb and disrupt the pattern of his personal life. Death, sickness, fear, hunger, grief, poverty and deprivation are but a few examples of such personal misfortunes. It is the course which Allãh has laid down for His servants. This world is a place of struggle and competition; the life is a chain of never ending changes and transformations. And you shall not find any alteration in the course of Allãh; and you shall not find any change in the course of Allãh (35:43).

Although personal afflictions and misfortunes are hard to bear for the man so affected, yet they are not as crushing, bewildering and frightening as those which affect the whole community. When an individual is afflicted by a misfortune, he seeks help of others, complementing his own wisdom, determination and steadiness with those of his relatives, friends and compatriots. But when a misfortune or hardship afflicts the whole community, it stuns them all; it numbs their minds, and clouds their vision; it looks as if the whole society has lost its collective wisdom. It disrupts not only the individual, but even the collective life. Fear terrorizes, panic overwhelms, and minds boggle down; courage deserts and dread reigns supreme. A collective misfortune is, in short, much more harder to bear and much more bitter in taste. And it is these that the verse point to.

But not every collective affliction, like epidemic or femine. What the verses describe is in all-encompassing affliction which shall be brought about as a consequence of the believers' faith itself. They have accepted the belief of monotheism; they have answered the call of the truth. The whole world and especially their own kith and kin are united against them. The enemies are trying, with all the forces at their command, to extinguish the light of Allãh, to erase the word of justice, to nullify the call of truth. The conflict has reached a stage where both parties realize that fighting is the only way out. Both parties have exhausted all other resources they had. The unbelievers first had tried to achieve their goal by arguments and mischief mongering, by whispering campaigns and unsettling rumours. But all was in vain. All their endeavours failed to give them any satisfaction – they did not harm the Muslims in the way they wanted. Now, from their point of view, nothing was left but to wage war against the Muslims and to annihilate them. Only then, the path of truth could be blocked and the bright light of Islam extinguished.

As from the believers' point of view, only the fighting could now help there in their endeavour to propagate the creed of monotheism, to spread the true religion and just rule, to cut at the root of falsehood. The past experience has proved that truth gains strength only when falsehood is removed – and now it cannot be removed except by force.

In short, the verses indicate that the great trial is near at hand – it mentions martyrdom in the way of Allãh, and praises it laudably, saying that it is not a death, it is life – and what a life indeed! Accordingly death in the way of Allãh is a distinction which is desirable – not a thing to dislike or fear.

The verses encourage the believers to fight for Islam. They are told that there is coming to them a trial, a hardship. Only if they bear it patiently, they shall reach the high ranks of spiritual perfection, receiving the blessings and mercy of Allãh, and being guided aright by Divine Guidance. Also, it tells them how they may get help in bearing those burdens – they should seek assistance through patience and prayer. Patience will protect them from fear and anguish, and will save their plans from disruption. As for prayer, it will turn their attention to their Lord, and will help them in putting all their affairs in the hands of the Almighty Allãh, because all power belongs to Him.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: O you who believe! seek assistance through patience and prayer; surely Allãh is with the patient ones: We have explained briefly about patience and prayer, under the verse: And seek assistance through patience and prayer; and most surely it is a hard thing except for the humble ones (2:45). Patience is one of the most important characteristics, which the Qur'ãn praises very highly. It repeatedly tells the believers to be patient – there are about seventy verses on this theme. It praises it in such laud-able ways as: . . and bear patiently that which befalls you; surely it is of the acts which require determination (31:17) ; And none are made to receive it but those who are patient, and none are made to receive it but those who have a mighty good fortune (41: 35) ; only the patient will be paid back their reward in full without measure (39:10).

Likewise, prayer is one of the greatest acts of worship and devotion which the Qur'ãn always exhorts the believers to do. It has been praised in these words: surely prayer keeps (one) away from indecency and evil (29:45). Wherever Allãh exhorts the people to some good deeds, prayer is always placed at the head of the list.

Then Allãh praises patience that Allãh is with those who have got this virtue: In this respect this verse differs from the verse 2:45 which had focused attention on prayer; and most surely it is a hard thing except for the humble ones. But this verse singles out the patience, because here the talk is about facing the difficulties and fighting against the enemies; and in this context patience acquires a greater importance. Surely Allãh is with the patient ones. It is a special proximity unlike the company mentioned in the verse: and He is with you wherever you are (13 :4). This latter verse says that Allãh controls your affairs and His knowledge encompasses you; while the verse under discussion means that Allãh helps and aids the patient ones. Patience, therefore, is the key to get relief from distress.

QUR'ÃN: And do not speak of those who are slain in Allah's way as dead; nay, (they are) alive, but you do not perceive: Some exegetes have said that when the verse says that the martyrs are alive, it actually means that their good names will continue for ever and their heroism will always be remembered with gratitude. Their argument is as follows:

"The verse is addressed to the Muslims, who already believe in Allãh, His Messenger and the Day of Judgment; they are also sure of the life hereafter. They have accepted the call of truth, and have already heard a lot of verses which speak of the Resurrection. They know that a man's life does not end with death. How could they speak of the martyrs as dead? Moreover, this verse affirms only about the martyrs that they are alive; and describes it as their especial excellence vis-à-vis other believers and the unbelievers. But we know that life after death is not confined to one group, it is a general phenomenon, which covers the whole mankind. Therefore, the life mentioned here must be something special, which is reserved for those who are slain in the way of Allãh – and that is their eternal name and ever-lasting fame."

But this interpretation is unacceptable, because of the following reasons:

First: The life which they have mentioned is not real life; it is an imaginary thing, which has no relation with reality. Such unreal and imaginary things do not deserve to be included in Divine Speech. Allãh calls to reality, to truth; and says: and what is there after the truth but error? (10:32). Of course, Ibrãhīm (a.s.) had prayed to Allãh: And make for me a truthful tongue among the posterity (26:84). But what he meant by "a truthful tongue" was continuation of his true mission after him; he did not mean only that his good name be remembered and his praise be sung by coming generations.

Of course, such imaginary exegesis, such false interpretation is more in line with materialists' thinking. They believe that soul is a material thing, life is a development of matter; once a man dies the life comes to an end, there is nothing to continue after death; as such, there is no life hereafter. But applying that idea to sociology, they encountered a great difficulty:

The fact is that man by nature believes in continuation of life after death, his instinct tells him that there is happiness and unhappiness in the other world where he goes after death; and if he wants to enjoy happiness there, he will have to sacrifice many comforts of this life. This is specially true about great affairs and ideals which cannot be established except when their supporters and adherents are willing to die for them, to sacrifice their lives for the cause. They have to die so that others may live.

Now, the dilemma of the atheists and materialists was this: If death is the end of life, if man, after his death, is lost for ever, then why should he sacrifice his life so that others may live? Why should he deprive himself of the comforts and enjoyments which he can easily get through injustice and tyranny? Just to let others live in peace? What has he got to gain by his sacrifice? Nothing. No sensible man gives something if he is not getting something in return. Human nature rejects the concept of giving without receiving, of leaving something without getting something in exchange. It rejects the idea of dying to enable others to live, the notion of denying oneself the enjoyment of this short life so that others may enjoy it.

When the materialists realized the trouble they were in, they tried to make up this shortcoming by inventing these imaginary gains which had no existence except in their own minds. They said: A man, emancipated from fetters of superstitions and myths, must sacrifice his life for his country and for other noble goals; this sacrifice will make him immortal because his good name and widespread fame will remain alive for ever. Likewise, he should deny himself some enjoyments of life so that others may benefit from those things. In this way, society and civilization will remain on right track and the social justice will reign supreme. And that man, because of his sacrifice, will get a noble and sublime life. Would that I knew who will enjoy that noble life when the man himself is dead, when his physical body has perished, and with it have gone all traces of life including perceptions and feelings? Who will then feel and enjoy that "noble life"? Isn't it just a delirious raving?

Second: The last phrase of the verse, " but you do not perceive," does not agree with that explanation. If that was the meaning of "life", Allãh should have said: nay, they are alive because their good name will remain for ever, and people will always sing their praises generation after generation. Obviously, such description would have proved much more satisfying and encouraging, and would have cheered them up to a greater degree than the phrase, "but you do not perceive".

Third: A similar verse – which in a way also explains it – describes the promised life in such a way as not to allow that interpretation: And reckon not those who are killed in Allãh's way as dead; nay, they are alive (and) are provided sustenance from their Lord; Rejoicing in what Allãh has given them out of His grace, and they rejoice for the sake of those who, (being left) behind them have not yet joined them, that they shall have no fear, nor shall they grieve. They rejoice on account of favour from Allãh and (His) grace, and that Allãh will not waste the reward of the believers (3:169-171). Clearly, it is a description of a real, not imaginary, life.

Fourth: It is not difficult to accept that some Muslims, in the middle of the Prophet's era, were unaware of the life after death. What was very clearly mentioned in the Qur'ãn was the Resurrection on the Day of Judgment. But so far as the life of al-barzakh (اَلبَرْزَخُ = the period between death and the Day of Judgment) is concerned, it has been described in the Qur'ãn, but not so clearly as not to leave any room for ambiguity. That is why not all the Muslims are agreed on this subject – even today some of them do not accept it. (These are those who believe that soul is not immaterial; that man perishes on death; and Allãh will raise him again for judging him on the Day of Judgment.) This verse, therefore, could have been revealed to affirm that the martyrs were alive in al-barzakh. May be, there were some believers who were not aware of it, even if others knew it.

In short, the verse speaks of a real, not imaginary, life. Allãh, in several places, has counted the life of an unbeliever after his death as a destruction and perdition. For example: . . . and (they) made their people to alight into the abode of perdition (14:28). So, it is the life of bliss that is true life, and it is only the believers who will live that life, as Allãh says: and as for the next abode, that most surely is the life – did they but know (29:64). They did not know it because their senses could perceive only the material aspects of this world's life. As they did not perceive what was beyond their limited perception, they could not differentiate between extinction and life after death. They thought that there was nothing after death but extinction. That delusion, that conjecture was common to believers and unbelievers alike. That is why Allãh said: "nay, (they are) alive, but you do not perceive," that is, by your senses. The same is the import of the last phrase in the verse: that most surely is the life – did they but know (29:64), that is, with certainty, as He says in the verse: Nay! if you had known with a knowledge of certainty, you should most certainly have seen the hell (102:5–6).

The meaning of the verse, then, is as follows – and Allãh knows better! And do not say about those who are slain in the way of Allãh that they are dead. You should not think that they have become extinct, have perished. Of course, you generally think that death is extinction; in your language death is used as opposite of life; and this delusion is supported by your senses. But it is not correct. The martyrs are not dead, in that they are not extinct; they are alive although you do not perceive that life by your senses, by your perceptions.

This talk was addressed to the believers, although majority of them – if not all – knew that man's life continues after his death. It was done to draw their attention to a fact known to them. The aim was to cheer them up by reminding them of this reality, in order that they should not grieve, should not be perturbed, should not loose their hearts, when death faces them or their dear ones in the way of Allãh. The only thing that the relatives would be afflicted with, in such cases, is separation from their martyr for a few days, as long as they themselves are alive in this world. And this temporary separation is not a big problem – especially if compared to the pleasure of Allãh, and to the bounties bestowed on the martyr, like the pleasant life and everlasting grace. And the pleasure of Allãh is the greatest bounty and bliss. In this respect, the verse is not unlike the previously explained one where Allãh tells His Prophet: The truth is from your Lord, therefore you should not be of the doubters (2:147). We know that the Prophet was the first and foremost of those who were sure of the Divine signs and communications. Yet he was told not to be of the doubters. This mode is generally used to show that the subject is so clear, so well-known and so well established that there is no room for any conflicting thought to come into mind.

THE LIFE OF AL-BARZAKH

This verse clearly proves that man remains alive in al-barzakh (اَلبَرْزَخُ = the period between one's death and the Day of Resurrection). The same is the import of the other verse on this subject: And reckon not those who are killed in Allãh's way as dead; nay, they are alive (and) are provided sustenance from their Lord (3:169). Many other verses prove this reality and we shall mention some of them at the end of this essay.

A very strange interpretation has been given to this verse by some people. They say that it was revealed about the martyrs of Badr, and therefore it is reserved exclusively for those martyrs; it cannot be applied to others who are slain in the way of Allãh.

A scholar has made an interesting comment on this explanation. Writing about the preceding verse, "seek assistance through patience and prayer," he prays to Allãh to give him patience and forbearance to suffer such interpretations!

Would that I knew what do they mean by that explanation. On one hand, they say that man perishes after death or murder; when his body disintegrates, he becomes extinct. If so, then how could the martyrs of Badr remain alive after being slain? Was it as a miracle? Was it because Allãh had given them a distinction and excellence, which was denied to all the prophets, messengers and friends of Allãh, not expecting even the Holy Prophet of Islam? If there is no life after death, then keeping them alive after their martyrdom is not a miracle – it is an impossibility.

And a miracle does not cover an impossible thing. If it is asserted that such a self-evident preposition was negated for those martyrs, then no confidence can be put in any self-evident truth – let alone other principles.

Or, do they mean that people's perceptions were mistaken about the condition of those martyrs? The martyrs were alive, were getting sustenance from their Lord, were eating, drinking and enjoying all the comforts of life – far away from the range of people's perceptions. And what the people had seen and perceived with their senses – that the martyrs were killed, their bodies mutilated, their senses gone, and their physique disintegrated – was just a delusion, and nothing of this sort had happened in reality. If this is what they mean, if people's senses could be so deluded – perceiving correctly in one case and wrongly in another, without any differentiating cause – then no trust can be put in any of the senses at all. Then, may be, we will perceive a non-existent as existing and an existing thing as non-existent. How can a sensible person speak like that? It is nothing but sophistry.

However, that explanation somewhat follows the line adopted by a large group of the scholars of traditions. The latter believe that the things mentioned in the Qur'ãn and traditions, which are beyond our perception – like angels and souls of believers and other such things – are material and physical. They are ethereal bodies which may enter and penetrate dense and solid bodies, appearing thus in the form of man, for example, doing all that humans do; they possess powers and properties like ours, except that they are not governed by physical laws: they do not suffer any change or alteration, nor any composition or disintegration; they are not subject to natural life and death. When Allãh wants them to appear, they manifest themselves to our senses; and when He does not want so, or wants them not to appear, they do not appear. It depends entirely on a special will of Allãh; there is nothing in their senses, or in their "bodies", to tip the scale on this side or that.

Such an idea is based on rejection of the system of cause-and-effect in the world. If such assertions were true, then all the intellectual realities, all the academic principles, will be null and void – not to speak of the fundamentals of religion. Even those "sublime ethereal bodies" (which are supposedly beyond the reach of cause-and-effect) will be negated.

The above description, however, proves that the verse speaks about the life of al-barzakh; it is also called the world of the grave, the period between one's death and the Day of Resurrection; it is the world where the dead person is rewarded or punished until the Day of Resurrection.

Some other verses speaking about al-barzakh are as follows:

1. There are the three verses already quoted: And reckon not those who are killed in Allãh's way as dead; nay, they are alive (and) are provided sustenance from their Lord; Rejoicing in what Allãh has given them out of His grace, and they rejoice for the sake of those who, (being left) behind them, have not yet joined them, that they shall have no fear, nor shall they grieve. They rejoice on account of favour from Allãh and (His) grace, and that Allãh will not waste the reward of the believers (3:169 – 171). We have already shown how these verses, being similar to the one under discussion, prove the life of al-barzakh. Those who think that these verses were revealed exclusively for the martyrs of Badr, should ponder on the wordings of these three, because they indicate that not only the martyrs but also other believers enjoy the life after death, and rejoice by favour and grace of Allãh bestowed on them.

2. Until when death overtakes one of them, he says: "Send me back, my Lord, send me back: Haply I may do good in that which I have left." By no means! it is a (mere) word that he speaks; and before them is al-barzakh until the day they are reaised (23:99 – 100). It very clearly shows that there is an intermediate life between this world's and the one which they will live after the Resurrection. Further explanation will be given when we shall write about this verse, Allãh willing.

3. And those who do not hope for Our meeting, say: "Why have not angels been sent down upon us, or (why) do we not see our Lord?" Now certainly they are too proud of themselves and have revolted a great revolt. On the day when they shall see the angels; (clearly it refers to the time when they will see the angels for the first time, that is, the time of death – as is described in many other verses;) there shall be no joy on that day for the guilty, and they shall say: "It is a forbidden thing totally prohibited; And We shall proceed to what they have done of deeds, so We shall render them as scattered floating dust. The dwellers of the garden shall on that day be in a better abiding place and a better resting place. And on the day when the heaven shall burst asunder with the clouds; (now it speaks about the Day of Resurrection;) and the angels shall be sent down a sending. The kingdom on that day shall rightly belong to the Beneficent God, and a hard day shall it be for the unbelievers (25:21–26). It very clearly proves the life of al-barzakh. Further details will be given in its proper place, Allãh willing.

4. They shall say: "Our Lord! twice didst Thou give us death, and twice hast Thou given us life, so we do confess our faults; is there then a way to get out?" (40:11). They will say it on the Day of Resurrection. It means that by that time there would be two deaths and two lives. It can be explained only if we accept the life and death of al-barzakh. Otherwise, there shall be only one death between this life and that of the Day of Resurrection. We have explained it to some extent under the verse: How do you deny Allãh and you were dead and He gave you life? Again He will cause you to die and again bring you to life; then you shall be brought back to Him (2:28).

5. . . . and the most evil punishment overtook Pharaoh's people: The Fire, they are brought before it (every) morning and evening; and on the day when the hour shall come to pass: Make Pharaoh's people enter the severest chastisement (40:46). It is known that the Day of Resurrection shall have no morning or evening. Clearly, the day when the hour shall come to pass, that is, the Day of Resurrection is other than the day of al-barzakh which has the mornings and evenings.

There are many other verses which indicate, or from which we may infer, this reality. For example: By Allãh, most certainly We sent (messengers) to nations before, but the Satan made their deeds fair-seeming to them, so he is their guardian today, and they shall have a painful punishment (16 :63).

THE IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL

The verse under discussion, as well as those quoted above, points to another more comprehensive reality and that is the immateriality of the soul. The soul is something other than matter and body; it is beyond the jurisdiction of the rules governing matter and body, or those affecting various material compounds and mixtures. Yet, it has a special relationship with the body – keeping it alive, managing its multifarious functions and activities and enabling it to perceive and feel. Ponder on the earlier quoted verses and you will see this reality. The verses imply that man, per se, is not the body; he does not die when the body dies, he does not perish when the body perishes. The body disintegrates, its parts are scattered, but the "man" continues. Even after the death of his body, he continues to live, either in eternal bliss and everlasting felicity and grace, or in never ending misery and painful chastisement. That bliss or misery is based on his traits, trends, characteristics and actions, which he had acquired and done in this world's life – not in his bodily accomplishments or social achievements.

These themes are understood from the above-mentioned verses. Obviously, these traits are totally different from those of the body, and are diametrically opposed to worldly and material characteristics. Thus, the human soul is different from his body.

Also, the verse 39:42 points to this fact: Allãh takes completely the souls at the time of their death, and those that die not during their sleep; then He withholds those on whom He has passed the decree of death and sends the other back till an appointed term. "at-Tawaffiyy" (اَلتَّوَفِّيّ) and "al-iṣṭīfã' (اَلإصْطِفَاءُ) both have the same meaning – to take and realize one's right fully and completely. The words used here in reference to the soul – "takes", "withholds" and "sends back" – clearly prove that the soul is something different from the body.

Another verse: And they say: "What! when we have become lost in the earth, shall we then indeed be in a new creation?"

Nay! they are disbelievers in the meeting of their Lord. Say: "The angel of death who is given charge of you shall take you completely, then to your Lord you shall be brought back" (32:10 – 11). In this verse, Allãh mentions one of the misgivings of those who do not believe in the Resurrection; and then tells His Messenger how to clear their doubt. They said: When we die, our body disintegrates, our limbs and organs are destroyed, nothing remains of our original form, and all our parts are scattered here and there in the earth. No one can then perceive us nor can anyone feel us. How is it possible for us, after such a total destruction, to be created a second time? This doubt is based on a feeling of improbability. Allãh shows the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) how to remove that misgiving: Say: "The angel of death. . . be brought back." There is an angel who has been given charge of you; he shall take you completely; he will not let you be lost, as you shall be under his protection, his control; what is lost in the earth is your body, not your soul or person (the reality which is referred to by the word "you"), because the angel of death shall take "you" completely.

One more verse: Allãh says, mentioning the creation of man: Then He made him complete and breathed into him of His spirit . . . (32:9). Read it in conjunction with the verse: And they ask you about the soul. Say: "The soul is from the command of my Lord" (17:85). The soul, therefore, is from the command of Allãh, and that command has been explained and defined in these words: His command, when He intends anything is only that He says to it: "Be", and it is. Therefore, glory be to Him in Whose hand is the kingdom of everything.. . (36:82 – 83). The soul is from the kingdom and it is the word, "Be". In another place, the command is further explained in these words: And Our command is but one, as the twinkling of an eye (54:50). The phrase, as the twinkling of an eye, shows that the command, that is, the word "Be", is an instantaneous, not a gradual, being. It comes into being at once, and is not bound with the chain of time and space.

It is thus evident that the command including the soul – is different from body, is something immaterial. We know that the material things come into being gradually and are fettered with time and space. Obviously, the human soul is not a material thing and is different from the body, although it has a special relationship with the body.

There are some verses which show the nature of that relationship. Allãh says: From it (the earth) We created you . . . (20:55) ; He created man from dry clay like earthen vessels . . . (55 :14) ; . . . and He began the creation of man from dust, then He made his progeny from an extract of water held in light estimation (32:7 – 8); And certainly We created man of an extract of clay, then We made him a small life-germ in a firm resting place, then We made the life-germ a clot, then We made the clot a lump of flesh, then We made (in) the lump of flesh bones, then We clothed the bones with flesh, then We caused it to grow into another creation; so blessed be Allãh, the best of creators (23:12 – 14).

The verses show that man, in the beginning was but a material body, changing into various forms; then Allãh made that body into another creation – a creation that has got perception and feeling; now he perceives and wills, thinks and acts according to his thoughts and ideas; he manages and manipulates the things around him as he likes. These activities and authority are beyond the power of body and matter. Obviously, neither of these activities emanate from body and matter nor does their doer.

We may say that the soul has the same relation to the body – from which it emanates – as a fruit has to its tree, or a lamp flame has to its oil. But these similes are a bit far-fetched. How-ever, these illustrations serve to show the nature of the relation between the soul and the body – how it is attached to the body in the beginning and how that connection is severed on death.

In short, the soul, in the beginning, is the body itself, then it grows into another creation, and lastly it becomes completely independent and separate from the body on death. These facts are understood from the above-mentioned Qur'ãnic verses; there are many other verses which allude to and imply this reality, and one may find them on reading the Qur'ãn with open eyes. And Allãh is the Guide.

QUR'ÃN: And We will most certainly try you with somewhat of fear and hunger and loss of property and lives and fruits: Allãh told them to seek assistance through patience and prayer and forbade them to say about those who are slain in His way that they are dead because those martyrs were in fact alive. Now, He explains why He has informed them of these realities. It is because the believers were soon to be tried and tested by fighting in the way of Allãh. It was by al-jihãd that they would reach the pinnacle of their virtues; their noble lives would not be worth living except with al-jihãd. The upright religion could not gain strength but with fighting. And while engaged in fighting, their efforts would not be crowned with success unless they were helped by those two helpers, that is, patience and prayer, and were further strengthened by a third factor, that is, the belief that their martyr is neither dead nor lost, and that their endeavours with their wealth and souls is neither forfeited nor fruitless. If they kill their enemy, they will remain alive while their enemy is destroyed; in this way they would be safe from the rule of injustice and false-hood which the enemy wanted to impose on them. And if they are killed in this endeavour, again they will remain alive for ever and equally safe from that unjust and wrong rule. In either case, they shall enjoy one of the two most excellent things.

Generally, the afflictions consist of fear, hunger and loss of properties and lives. As for the loss of fruits, apparently it means loss of children. When fighting occurs, its most telling result is not the loss of fruits but that of progeny, as the men and especially the youths are killed.

Some exegetes have said that the word "fruits" refers to the dates, and the "property" to other possessions, for example, camels, goats and sheep.

QUR'ÃN: and give good news to the patient ones who, when a misfortunate befalls them, say: "Surely we are Allãh's and to Him we shall surely return". Those are they on whom are blessings and mercy from their Lord, and those are the followers of the right course: The patient ones are again mentioned in these verses so that Allãh may give them good news to begin with, and then may teach them the way of good patience, and thirdly, may explain to them why patience is essential – it is because Allãh owns the man – and fourthly, may declare what is its overall recompense, that is, blessing, mercy and being guided aright.

Allãh first told His Prophet to give them good news; but did not disclose what was that good news about. This was to show the greatness of the subject matter – it is from Allãh, therefore, it must be about something specially good, great and beautiful. Moreover, it is something which Allãh Himself has guaranteed.

Thereafter, He said that the patient ones are those who say these words when misfortune befalls them. "al-Muṣībah" (اَلمُصِيْبَةُ = translated here as misfortune) is any happening that occurs to a man; but it is always used for a distressing happening. "Who . . . say: 'Surely we are Allãh's . . .' ": The word "say" as used here does not mean mere utterance of the sentence with-out keeping its meaning in mind. Even understanding its meaning is not sufficient, unless one penetrates to the depth of its reality. And that is that man is owned by Allãh – in real ownership – and that he is surely to return to Allãh, his Master. If this feeling takes deep root in his heart, the man will observe the highest degree of patience; sorrow, fear and anguish will be totally eradicated, and the rust of heedlessness will be removed from the heart. How?

Man and all his faculties, actions and other concomitants of existence, are there because of Allãh. He is his Creator and Originator. Man exists because of Allãh, and is dependent on Him in all his affairs and conditions. He does not have any existence or continuity independent of Allãh. The Master has the right to manage His slave's affairs in any way He likes; the slave has no authority whatsoever in his own affairs, because he has no independence at all. Allãh owns him; He is the real Owner of man's existence, faculties and actions.

Then Allãh allowed man to ascribe his "self" to himself as a property is ascribed to its owner. That is why it is said that "man has existence". In the same way, He permitted him to ascribe his faculties and actions to himself. Accordingly, it is said that "man has faculties like hearing and sight", or "he does some actions like: walking, speaking, eating and hearing". Without the Divine permission neither man nor anything else could "own" any such ascription or attribution, because nothing exists without the Divine permission, or independent of Allãh's will.

Allãh has also informed us that ultimately all things will revert to their original status – the state before Allãh allowed them to be attributed to one or the other creature – and then no ownership will remain there except that of Allãh, as He says: To whom belongs the kingdom this day? To Allãh, the One, the Subduer (of all) (40:16). It shows that man – together with all that "belongs" to him or is with him – is to return to Allãh.

In short, there is a "real" ownership; it is reserved for Allãh, nobody – be he a man or something else – shares it with Him. And there is an "apparent" ownership, for example, man "owns" his own "self" as well as his children and properties etc. But the real ownership is of Allãh, and man owns them in form and appearance only – and that also because Allãh has allowed such attribution. Thus, when man rememebers the reality of Divine ownership, and then looks at his own "self", he knows that he is wholly and totally owned by Allãh. Then, he realizes that his "apparent" ownership – of his "self" as well as of his children and properties, etc. – will soon cease to exist, will become null and void; it will return to his Lord. Then, he will understand that ultimately he owns nothing, either in reality or in appearance. In this back-ground, there is no reason why he should grieve if he is afflicted with some misfortune. One may be affected only by something which one owns – feeling happiness when it is found or sorrow if it is lost. But when he believes that he owns nothing, he shall not be affected by finding it or losing it. How can he be afflicted by any loss when he believes that Allãh is the real Owner of every-thing, and He may manage His property in any way He likes?

THE ETHICS

The ethics entail betterment of morals and psychic traits – both in theory and practice. Man acquires the good morals and removes the evil traits by repeatedly doing good – and relevant – deeds, and their continuous observance. Repeated and continuous performance of an action etches its particular knowledge on the psyche. Gradually, a picture is engraved on the mind which becomes impossible – or extremely difficult – to erase. Habits become second nature. For example, if a man wants to remove the trait of cowardice and acquire that of bravery, he should repeatedly plunge himself into difficulties and dangers. When-ever he would rush into a perilous and hazardous situation and finds himself coming out unscathed, he would acquire the taste of boldness and courage; and would understand the ignominy of flight, of taking to one's heels. Every such bold step would leave its mark on his psyche and ultimately bravery and courage would become an integral part of his character. Man has no power to acquire such traits by his own will; yet it may be counted as within his power inasmuch as its preliminary steps – those repeatedly performed deeds – emanate from his will and power.

There are two universally recognized systems to acquire high moral standards and noble manners.

First System: Many people base their moral science on good worldly foundations, that is, the knowledge, ideas and ideals which are thought praiseworthy and laudable in the society. They acquire a good trait because it is commendable in the eyes of the people. Chastity, contentedness with what is in one's hand and not looking at what others have – all these virtues create respect and honour in the people's eyes, and one's standing is enhanced in public. Avarice results in poverty and privation. Greed destroys one's prestige. Knowledge attracts people and bestows respect and dignity in the eyes of elite; it opens the eyes of the knowledgeable person, and protects him from unpleasant things. Ignorance, on the other hand, is blindness. Knowledge protects you while riches need your protection. Bravery makes you stead-fast and saves you from fickleness; this in its turn makes people sing your praise – no matter whether you win or lose. Cowardness and rashness both cause opposite effect. Justice gives peace of mind, and keep man alive even after his death inasmuch as his good name continues and his love pulsates in people's hearts generation after generation.

This is the well-known basis on which the moral science is founded. Ancients like Greek philosophers followed this very system.

The Qur'ãn does not endorse this system, because it depends on the like and the dislike of the public. It looks at what is good in the eyes of the people and what is bad – and accepts the former and rejects the latter. Even in a few verses where the Qur'ãn appears to use this method, it really refers to the next world's reward or punishment. Ponder, for example, on the following verses:-

. . . and wherever you are, turn your faces towards it, so that people shall have no argument against you . . . (2:150). Here Allãh exhorts the Muslims to remain steadfast and firm, and for its reason, He says: "so that people shall have no argument against you".

. . . and do not quarrel, for then you will be weak in hearts and your power will depart, and be patient . . . (8:46). Allãh tells the believers to be patient, as impatience and quarrelling among themselves would weaken their hearts, dilute their power and embolden their enemy.

And whoever is patient and forgiving, that most surely is an act of great resolution (42:43). Here Allãh invites the believers to patience and forgiveness and explains its reason in terms of determination and resolution.

Second System: The second system is to keep in sight the other worldly goals. Allãh has used it in many verses of the Qur'ãn:

> Surely Allãh has bought of the believers their persons and their properties for this, that they shall have the garden. . . (9:111)
>
> . . . only the patient ones will be paid back their reward in full without measure. (39:10)
>
> . . . surely it is the unjust that shall have a painful punishment. (14:22)
>
> Allãh is the Guardian of those who believe; He brings them out of the darkness into the light; and (as to) those who disbelieve, their guardians are the rebels, they take them out of the light into the darkness. . . (2:257)

There are many verses, on different subjects, which imply the same theme.

We may add here another set of the verses. For example, No misfortune befalls on the earth nor in your own souls, but it is in a book before We bring it into existence; surely that is easy to Allãh (57:22). This verse exhorts man not to feel any sorrow (or joy) on whatever misfortune (or good thing) comes to him; what has come to him, could not be averted, and what-ever has been lost could not be obtained, because all happenings occur by a firm Divine Decree which is unavoidable. Sorrow and joy both seem, in this background, meaningless – a believer should not indulge in these vain practices because he believes in Allãh and knows that all affairs are in His hands. Allãh says: No affliction comes about but by Allãh's permission; and whoever believes in Allãh, He guides aright his heart (64:11). Such verses, like the earlier quoted ones, create high morals by pointing to the sublime goals of the next world. These other worldly goals are real, not imaginary, perfections. These verses reform the human character by fixing man's attention to the real already existing causes like the Divine measure and decree, adoptation of the Divine characteristics and remembrance of the good names of Allãh and His sublime attributes.

Question: Belief in causality of such things as the Divine measure and decree negates the rules governing this life in which we have been given freedom of will and power. This, in its turn, nullifies the noble morals and disturbs the system of this physical world. If man may rely, in acquiring such good traits as patience and steadfastness, and in refraining from sorrow and joy, on the fact that all things to happen are already firmly decreed and written in the "preserved tablet", then the same argument may be used if one does not endeavour to earn one's livelihood, to acquire good characteristics, or to refrain from bad habits. He will sit idle not caring to do any work, and not striving to defend the truth and right. His only reply to all exhortations will be that whatever was happening was already written and decreed. In this way he will neglect acquiring noble characteristics and discarding evil traits. It will be a negation of every perfection.

Reply: What we have written on the subject of "Decree", is sufficient to clear this misunderstanding. We have explained there that man's actions are integral parts of the causes of the events and effects. Effects cannot happen without their causes. It would be a manifest error to say: Satiation of hunger is either decreed to happen or decreed not to happen; and in either case, it is useless to eat. We know that satiation of hunger cannot occur unless one takes one's food – and eating is an action with-in one's power, and is a part of the causes of satiation. It is foolishness to expect an effect to appear when one has neglected or negated all or part of its causes.

It is wrong for a man to neglect and negate the principles of "free will and power", which is the king-pin of this worldly life, and to which are attributed its felicity and infelicity. It is a part of the causes of the events which happen to a man through his actions (or through the conditions and traits resulting from his actions). He cannot say that his will and power are not a part of the causes of events happening to him, or that they have no effect on those happenings. In the same way, it is wrong to claim that his power is the complete, or the only, cause of the events and that nothing else has any influence on those events. One should not forget that there are countless things happening in the world which have influence on one's circumstances, conditions and the related events, and that the Divine Will is the foremost among them. If one were to forget this reality, one would be entrapped in many evil traits, like: conceit, pride, miserliness, joy, sorrow and grief, etc.

The ignorant man says: "I did this; I left that." Thus, he falls victim of conceit, shows arrogance to others or does not spend his money on necessary things. He is heedless to the fact that there are thousands and thousands of other causes – apart from his imperfect "power" – absence of any one of which would nullify the effects of his "power". He says: "Had I done this, I would have avoided this loss; had I done so, I would have gained that."

He does not realize that prevention of loss or death depends on thousands and thousands of causes, and even if one of them is absent, the dreaded loss or death is bound to occur, man's own power notwithstanding. Moreover, man's power itself depends on numerous causes which are beyond his power. In short, man's power is not by his power.

The above explanation is a Qur'ãnic reality, and, as mentioned earlier, it is derived from the Divine teachings. When you know this fact and ponder on the relevant verses, you will see that the Qur'ãn attributes only some of the good characteristics to the firm decree and the preserved tablet, while it does not attribute other traits to the above-mentioned Divine Decree. There are some actions, conditions and traits which, if attributed to the Divine Decree and Measure, would nullify the principle of free will; and accordingly the Qur'ãn never attributes them to the Divine Decree; rather, it refutes it with full force. For example :

> And when they commit an indecency they say: "We found our fathers doing this, and Allãh has enjoined it on us." Say: "Surely, Allãh does not enjoin indecency; do you say against Allãh what you do not know?" (7:28)

On the other hand there are some actions, etc. which, if not attributed to the Divine Decree, would imply that man had complete freedom, that his will and power were the sufficient cause of his actions, etc. and were independent of every outside cause. The Qur'ãn, therefore, pointedly ascribes them to the Divine Decree, and thus guides the man to the straight path – a path which does not confuse the walker. In this way, the Qur'ãn removes from him the base characteristics which would have resulted from that wrong ideas. For example, it attributes the happenings to the Divine Decree, in order that man should not ignorantly feel joy for what he gets or sorrow for what he loses. Allãh says: and give them of the wealth of Allãh which He has given you (24:33) ; note that Allãh exhorts man to be generous, by reminding him that his wealth has come to him from Allãh. Also, He says: . . . and spend (benevolently) out of what We have given them (2:3) ; the verse calls him to spend by attributing the wealth to the sustenance given by Allãh. Again, He says: Then may be you kill yourself with grief, sorrowing after them, if they do not believe in this announcement. Surely, We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment for it, so that We may try them (as to) which of them is best in deed (18:6-7). In these verses Allãh tells His Prophet not to grieve because of the unbelievers' disbelief, reminding him that their disbelief does not mean that they have overpowered Allãh; the fact is that what-ever is on the earth has been made and put there by Allãh for the purpose of test and trial.

This system of ethics is the one used by the prophets, and a lot of its examples may be found in the Holy Qur'ãn and other Divine Books.

There is a third system, which is found exclusively in the Qur'ãn; it is neither seen in the Divine Books which have been transmitted to us, nor in the teachings of the previous prophets (peace of Allãh be on them!); nor is it seen in the knowledge which has come to us from divine scholars. In this system, man is trained in character and knowledge, and the knowledge is used in a way that does not leave room for base and low traits. In other words, this system removes the vile characteristics, not by repulsing them, but by eliminating all motives other than Allãh.

Let us explain it in this way: What is the motive of a work done for other than Allãh? It may be honour and might of the 'other than Allãh', which the doer of that work longs for. Or his power which he is afraid of. But Allãh says: Surely might is wholly Allãh's (10:65) ; that the power is wholly Allãh's (2:165). And when one is imbued with this true knowledge, there will remain no question of doing any deed for letting others see, or hear about it; nor will there be any reason why he should fear, or look forward to, or rely on anyone other than Allãh. Once these two realities are firmly known to a man, his psyche will be cleansed from evils of theory and practice. It will rather be adorned by the positive traits, that is, good character and Divine characteristics; for example, fear of and reliance on Allãh, strength, self-respect, self-sufficiency and other such virtues.

The Qur'ãn has repeatedly said that the kingdom belongs to Allãh, that the kingdom of the heavens and the earth is His, that to Him belongs all that is in the heavens and the earth, as we have explained several times. Evidently, this kingdom does not leave any independence to anything, nor does it allow the creatures any freedom from want – except through Allãh. Look at anything ; you will see that Allãh is the Owner of its person and of all its concomitants. When a man believes in that owner-ship and this belief becomes firmly-rooted in his heart, he does not admit that anything has got any independence at all – in its person, characteristics or activities. Such a man cannot look except at the face of Allãh, nor can he bow down before, hope for, or have fear of, anything other than Allãh. He will not enjoy or be pleased with any other thing, nor will he rely on, or surrender to, anyone but Allãh. In short, he will not desire or wish for anything except Allãh – the Eternal One Who will remain when everything will perish; he will surely turn away from all the false-hood, that is, from everything other than Allãh; he will not attach any importance to his own existence nor will he care for himself in face of the Absolute Truth, that is, the eternal existence of his Creator – Great is His Glory.

The same is the import of the following verses:

Allãh is He besides Whom there is no god; His are the very best names (20:8) ;

That is Allãh, your Lord, there is no god but He; the Creator of all things (6:102) ;

. . . Who made good everything that He has created (32:7);

And the faces shall be humbled before the Living, the Self-subsistent God (20:111) ;

. . . all are obedient to Him (2:116) ;

And your Lord has commanded that you shall not worship (any) but Him (17:23);

. . . is it not sufficient as regards your Lord that He is a witness over all things? (41:53) ;

. . . now surely He encompasses all things (41:54) ;

And that to your Lord is the end goal (53:42).

And the same is the import of the verses under discussion, that is, “and give good news to the patient ones, who when a misfortune befalls them, say: 'Surely we are Allãh's and to Him we shall return.' Those are they on whom are blessings and mercy from their Lord, and those are the followers of the right course."

These and similar other verses contain a unique Divine Knowledge, and produce some real and especial results. Their system is not like any other which a moralist might employ, nor even like that used by previous prophets in their teachings. According to the moralists, virtue and evil are based on the public's likes and dislikes; and the prophets based their teachings on the general religious beliefs concerning the rules of the sharī'ah and their recompense. But this third system is based on pure and perfect monotheism and it has been used exclusively by Islam – the best of blessings be on its Prophet and his progeny !

A western orientalist has expressed a really strange and astonishing idea in his History where he discusses the Islamic civilization. A gist of his observation is as follows:

"A scholar should concern himself only with various aspects of civilization which were developed by Islam among its followers, and the excellence and superiority which were its legacy to the Muslims in the form of a developed society and high culture. As for the religious precepts which Islam teaches, they are merely the moral teachings which are common to all religions and which were popularized by all the prophets."

COMMENT: The explanation given by us shows how unfounded his opinion is and how confused his views are. The result emerges from its premises; the effects of training emanate from the knowledge acquired by the trainee. As mentioned earlier, there are three types of the teachers of ethics: one invites to a reality of a low grade, another to an average perfection and the third to the pristine reality and highest perfection. Can it be said that the results of all three will be the same? In other words, the scholars of ethics call the people to the sociological truth; the prophets call mankind to the actual truth and real perfection by which it may get the eternal bliss in the life hereafter; but the Islam invites the people to the Absolute Reality, that is, Allãh Himself, and teaches them ethical values by reminding them that Allãh is One, and there is no partner in His divinity; this belief produces in man the purest servitude. Now you see how dissimilar are the systems employed by the three groups, and how different are the results.

This Islamic system created an admirable social structure, and produced a multitude of good servants, divine scholars and Allãh's friends – men and women alike. And this single factor is sufficient to ensure the distinguished position of Islam.

Moreover, this stystem sometimes differ from the other two in its result also. It is based on the love a servant has for his Lord; it teaches him to give preference to his Lord's wishes over his own. We know that love and enthralment sometimes lure the lover to do things which are not approved by social wisdom (which is the basis of the social ethics), nor are they commended by common sense on which is founded the general religious commandments. Reason has its own rules and love its own. We shall further explain it in some other place, Allãh willing.

QUR'ÃN: Those are they on whom are blessings and mercy from their Lord, and those are the followers of the right course. It appears from meditation on these words that blessings is to a certain extent different from mercy – look how "blessings" has been used in plural and "mercy" in singular. Allãh says: He it is Who sends His blessings on you, and (so do) His angels, that He may bring you forth out of utter darkness into the light; and He is Merciful to the believers (33:43). The context shows that the sentence, "and He is Merciful to the believers", gives the reason of the preceding phrases, "He it is Who sends His blessings on you." The meaning therefore, is as follows: Allãh sends His blessings on you; and it is as it should be, because He is Merciful to the believers, and you are believers; therefore, He sends His blessings on you, to show His mercy to you.

The position of blessing vis-à-vis mercy is like that of a premise in relation to its result, or of a glance in comparison to seeing, or of throwing into fire vis-à-vis burning. It is in conformity with the explanation, given by some writers of as-salah (اَلصَّلٰوةُ = the blessing), that it really means turning towards, inclination.

Blessing from Allãh means that He turns towards the servant with mercy; when attributed to angels it connotes their turning towards a man and becoming a medium to convey Allãh's mercy to him; and when ascribed to man, it means turning to the Lord calling Him with humility. However, it does not mean that blessing itself is not mercy or an example of mercy. Pondering on the usage of "mercy" in the Qur'ãn, we find that it is the comprehensive gift of Allãh, the All-encompassing Divine Bounty. Allãh says: and My mercy encompasses all things (7:156) ; also, He says: And your Lord is the self-sufficient one, the Lord of mercy; if He pleases, He may take you off, and make whom He pleases successors after you, even as He raised you up from the seed of another people (6:133). He may take you off because He is Self-sufficient, He does not need you; and He may make others succeed you, as He had raised you up, because He is Merciful. Even then both aspects are attributed to His mercy, and at the same time they may be attributed to His Self-sufficiency. Every creation – be it from matter or without matter – is a mercy, and also a gift and bounty emanating from His Self-sufficiency.

Allãh says: and the bounty of your Lord is not confined (17:20). And one of His bounties is as-salãh (the blessing) ; this too is a mercy, but of a especial type. Probably this is the reason why in the verse under discussion, "blessings" has been used in plural and "mercy" in singular.

QUR'ÃN: and they are the followers of the right course. It looks like the result of the preceding clause, "Those are they on whom are blessings and mercy from their Lord". That is why Allãh did not say, 'on whom are blessing and mercy from their Lord and guidance'; instead He described it in a separate sentence. Also, He did not say, 'and they are al-mahdiyyũn (اَلمَهْدِيّـُونَ = the rightly guided ones)'; instead their acceptance of guidance has been denoted with the word al-muhtadũn (اَلمُهْتَـدُونَ = followers of the right course), because "following" describes the next stage, coming after and resulting from "guidance". Evidently, the mercy of Allãh consisted of guiding them to Himself; the blessings were like the preliminaries of that guidance, and their following that right course was the result of that guidance. Thus, the blessings, the mercy and the following of the right course, all are different from one another, although looking from another angle all three were but Divine Mercy.

Allãh gives good news to these believers of His bestowal of honours to them. To clearly understand the whole sequence, look at the following example: You see in the way a friend of yours who wants to come to your house to be your guest, and is making enquiries as to how to reach your home. You meet him with smiling face, take him to the proper path, walking with him, not leaving him alone lest he loses the way; this continues until you bring him to your house; while on the way, you tend to his needs and look after his meals and transport, and protect him from every hardship and trouble. All these things taken together are called "hospitality" accorded to him; and every care taken of him is a particular care and hospitality; for example, showing him the way is separate from hospitality and care – and even then it is a hospitality. Each of the above acts is a care, and each is a guidance and each is a particular hospitality – and all together come under one word, "hospitality". Applying this example to this verse, the one comprehensive hospitality is like the mercy, and every attention paid to the friend is like the blessings and his being your guest in your house is like the "following the right course".

Many syntactical devices of this sentence point to the prestige and rank of those believers: First, it is a nominal clause; second, it begins with a demonstrative pronoun used for distant objects; third, that pronoun has been reinforced with a separate personal pronoun; and fourth, the predicate begins with the definite article.

TRADITIONS

About al-Barzakh and the Soul's Life after Death:

Suwayd ibn Ghaflah narrates from the Commander of the faithfuls ('Ali, a.s.) that he said: "Surely, when the son of Ãdam comes to (his) last day of this world and the first of the next, his property, his children and his actions are portrayed before him. So he turns to his property and says: 'By God! I was covetous of you (and) avaricious; so what have you (now) got for me?' (The property) says: 'Take your shroud from me'. Then he turns to his children and says: 'By God! Surely I was your loving (father), and I was your protector; now what have you got for me?' They say: 'We shall convey you to your pit (i.e., grave) and bury you in it.' Then he turns to his deeds and says: 'By God! I was indifferent to you, and you were distasteful to me; (now) what is with you (for me)?' So it says: 'I am your companion in your grave as well as on the Day of your gathering – until I am presented with you before your Lord.' Then (after his death), if he is a friend of Allãh, there comes to him (a visitor), the most sweet-scented of all people, of the most beautiful appearance and (wearing) the most adorned apparel, and says to him: 'Rejoice with refreshment from Allãh, and flowers and the garden of bounties; you arrived a good arrival' (i.e., welcome to you). Thereupon, he says: 'Who are you?' (The visitor) says: 'I am your good deed. Proceed from the world to the garden.' And he recognizes the one who washes his body, and earnestly appeals to his carrier (the bier-bearer) to hasten him (to the grave). Then when he enters his grave, two angels come to him – and they are the examiners of the grave – with elegantly-dressed hairs, writing on the earth with their teeth; their voices are like roaring thunder and their eyes like streaking lightening. They ask him: 'Who is your Lord? And who is your prophet? And what is your religion?' And he says: 'Allãh is my Lord; and Muhammad is my prophet; and Islam is my religion.' So they say: 'May Allãh confirm you in what you like and are pleased with!' And this is (the meaning of) the word of Allãh: Allãh confirms those who believe with the sure word in this world's life and in the hereafter . . . (14:27). Then they make his grave spacious for him as far as his eye can see, and open for him a gate to the garden, and say to him: 'Sleep happily the sleep of a fine-looking youth.' And it is the word of Allãh: The dwellers of the garden shall on that day be in a better abiding place and a better resting place. (25:24)

"And if he is an enemy of his Lord, then comes to him a (visitor), the ugliest of the creatures of Allãh in attires and the foulest-smelling. And he tells him: 'Welcome to the entertainment of boiling water and roasting in Hell.' And he (the dead person) recognizes the one who washes his body, and earnestly appeals to his carrier (the bier-bearer) to hold him back. And when he is buried in his grave, the examiners of the grave come to him and remove his shroud from him. Then they ask him: 'Who is your Lord? And what is your religion? And who is your prophet? And he says: 'I do not know.' So they say to him: 'You did not know, nor were you on the right path.' Then they hit him with an iron-rod, a hitting which frightens every creature of Allãh – except the jinn and the men. Thereafter they open for him a door to the Hell and tell him: 'Sleep in the worst condition.' So he is squeezed in a narrow space like a shaft in an arrow-head, until his brain comes out from between his nails and flesh; and Allãh sets on him the serpents of the earth and its scorpions and insects which go on biting him until Allãh will raise him from his grave – and he will long for the advent of the Hour, because of the trouble in which he finds himself." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummi)

Abu Bakr al-Ḥaḍrami narrates from Abu Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: "No one shall be questioned in the grave except he who shall be of pure belief or of total disbelief." I told him: "And (what about) the rest of the men?" He said: "They will be kept in oblivion." (Muntakhab Basã'iri 'd-darajãt)

Ibn Ẓubyãn says: "I was with Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.), and he said: 'What do the people say about the souls of the believers after they die?' I said: 'They say (that the souls are placed) in the craws of green birds.' He said: 'Glory be to Allãh! The believer is far more honourable near Allãh than this! When it happens (i.e., when the believer dies) there come to him the Messenger of Allãh and Ali and Fãṭimah and Ḥasan and Ḥusayn (peace be on them), and with them (come) the angels of the Mighty and Glorious Allãh (who are near to him). So, if Allãh lets his tongue speak the witness of His Oneness and the prophethood of the Prophet and the al-walayah (اَلوِلاَيَة = love, obedience) of the Ahlu 'l-bayt, then the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and 'Ali and Fãṭimah and Ḥasan and Ḥusayn (peace be on them) and with them the near angels become his witnesses for it. And if his tongue is tied, Allãh confers on His Prophet the knowledge of what is in his (i.e., that believer's) heart of that (belief) ; so he (i.e., the Prophet) becomes his witness; and then bear testimony of Ali, Fãṭimah, Ḥasan and Ḥusayn – because of the testimony of the Prophet – on their group be the best peace from Allãh! and (so do) those angels who are present with them. When Allãh takes him to Himself, He sends that soul to the garden, in a shape similar to his (worldly) shape. They eat (there) and drink. When a new-corner comes to them, he recognizes them by that shape which they had in the world." (al-Amãlī, ash-Shaykh aṭ-Ṭũsī)

Ḥammãd ibn 'Uthmãn narrates from Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.) that he described the souls of the believers and said: "They meet each other." I said: "They meet each other?" He said: "Yes! They ask each other and recognize each other, so that if you see one you will say, '(He is) so-and-so'." (al-Maḥãsin)

Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.) said: "Verily, the believer visits his family and he sees what he likes; and what he dislikes is hidden from him. And verily the unbeliever visits his family and he sees what he dislikes; and what he likes is hidden from him." And he said: "There are some of them who visit (their families) every Friday; and there are others who visit according to their deeds." (al-Kãfī) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "Verily, the souls are, with the characteristic features of (their) bodies, in a tree of the garden; they know each other and enquire about each other. When a (new) soul comes to (those) souls, they say: 'Let it be, because it is coming from a great terrifying (experience).' Thereafter, they ask him: 'What has happened to so-and-so? What has so-and-so done?' If the soul tells them, 'I have left him alive', they hope for his (future arrival); and if it tells them, 'He had died', they say: 'He fell down (to Hell) ; he perished.' " (al-Kãfī)

The author says: There are numerous traditions on the subject of al-barzakh. We have quoted above some comprehensive ones. There is a huge lot of nearly mutawãtir traditions describing the above-mentioned meanings. These traditions prove that the life of al-barzakh is an immaterial one.

A PHILOSOPHICAL DISCUSSION ON IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL

Is the soul immaterial? The word "soul" in this discussion means that thing which every man refers to when he says "I". Its "immateriality" refers to the fact that it is not a material thing, it is neither divisible nor governed by time or space.

No doubt, I conceive in myself a concept which I refer to as "I"; and it is equally certain that every man has similar conception about himself. It is a conception which we are never oblivious of – as long As we are alive and conscious. It is not a limb of ours; nor is it a part of our body which we perceive by one of our senses or even through reason. In short, it is not like our external limbs which we feel with our senses of sight or touch, etc., nor is it like our internal organs which we know by senses or experiment. Sometimes we become oblivious of one or another of those limbs or organs – or even of the whole body. But we are never oblivious of the "I". It proves that the " I " is other than the body and its parts.

One thing more. Body and its limbs and parts as well as the faculties and characteristics found in it, are all material. One of the characteristics of matter is gradual change, dissolution and divisibility. If soul were body or a part thereof, it would have been material and subject to change and division – but it is not so. If a man looks at this vision of his "self " and then compares it with that which he used to look at since the beginning of his gnosis of the "self ", he will find that it is the same vision, the same notion, without the least change or plurality. It is unlike his body or its parts and characteristics which all undergo continuous change, in substance and form as well as in their conditions and positions. Also, he will realize that it is a notion, simple, indivisible and non-compound, unlike the body or its parts and characteristics. And matter and every material thing is a compound and divisible. Obviously, the soul is not body, nor is it a part of the body; it is neither a development of the body nor one of its characteristics. Coming to matter again, it makes no difference whether we perceived it with a sense of ours or by reasoning, or did not perceive it at all – it is matter and material in any case. And matter is subject to change and divisibility. But we have seen that the vision which we call "soul" is not subject to any of the above characteristics of matter. Therefore, soul is neither matter nor material.

Also, this vision of "I" is a notion, simple and one; there is no plurality of parts therein, nor is there any extraneous item mixed with it; it is an absolute one. Every man finds it in him-self that he is he and not someone else. Therefore, this vision is a concept subsistent by itself, and distinct; it is beyond the definition of matter and is not subject to its characteristics and properties. It is a al-jawhar (اَلجَوْهَرُ = lit. "jewel"; technically, a thing that exists in reality and which is the bearer of the accidents), separate from matter; it has a connection with the body which makes it identifiable with the body – and it is the connection of management.

The above discourse proves our claims in this respect.

All the materialists and a group of Muslim theologians as well as the Zãhiristic traditionalists do not accept the immateriality of the soul. But what they have written in support of their view stretches the credulity too far.

Let us have a look at the arguments of the materialists.

They say: 1. The science has nowadays advanced to a previously-undreamt-of extent in its in-depth and minute researches of natural phenomena. It has found and pin-pointed a natural and material cause for every characteristic of the body. It has not found any psychological effect which could not be explained according to the material laws. This being the case, why should we believe in the existence of an immaterial soul?

2. The nervous system continuously conveys the perceptions to its centre (i.e., brain) with extreme rapidity. The vision thus perceived is a unified series, having a single position. The pictures formed in mind are substituted with such rapidity that one frame is not distinguishable from another; that is, mind does not realize that the preceding frame has gone and been replaced by another. It is this composite "one", this illusory "unit", which we see and call our soul, and which we refer to as "I". It is true that it is other than all our limbs and organs; but it does not necessarily mean that it is other than body and its characteristics. The fact is that it is a composite series which appears to be one, because of continuous and rapid substitutions – and we are never oblivious of it, because such an oblivion would result in nullity of the nervous system – in other words, death.

Also, it is true that my vision of my "I" is constant. But it is not because there is a thing which is constant and unchanged. In fact, it is only an illusion resulting from a series of constantly and rapidly changing visions. Suppose there is a water-tank with an inlet and an outlet of the same diameter; water comes in from one side and goes out from the other, with exactly the same speed – and the tank seems always full. Our sense perceives the water as one, constant and unchanged unit, but in reality it is neither the same water nor is it constant and unchanged. Even if there is a reflection in the water, of a man, tree or some other object, it will look as unchanged, steady and constant, but actually it is not so – it is not one, it is gradually changing with the gradual change of the water. The same is the case of the apparent oneness, constancy and unchangeability which we see in our soul, self or "I".

3. The soul, for whose immateriality arguments have been offered, based on the inner vision, is in fact a composite of natural faculties and characteristics. It is the sum-total of nervous perceptions, which in their turn emanate from mutual action and reaction between external matter and nervous system. It is a composite unity, not the real one.

COMMENT: 1. It is true that the science, based on senses and experiments, with all its minute, delicate and in-depth researches, has not come across a "soul". Also, it is correct that it has not found any phenomenon which irresistibly led one to the soul as its cause. But these two premises do not prove that there is not an immaterial soul – after all, we have written earlier the proofs of its existence. The natural sciences, which discuss the laws of nature and the properties of matter, are by definition limited to the researches concerning matter only, which is its subject. The apparatus and chemicals, etc. which sciences use to conduct and complete their tests and experiments, may throw light on matter and material affairs only. But by the same token these, sciences and their apparatus, etc. cannot pass any judgment – for or against – on metaphysical and immaterial concept and beings. Utmost that a natural science can say is that it did not find a soul. But "not finding" is not "non-existence". The natural sciences, by their definition, are not expected to find within their subject (i.e., within matter and its properties and characteristics) something beyond the limit of matter and physical nature.

In fact, their above-mentioned assertion emanates from a gross misunderstanding. They think that those who believed in the existence of soul, did so because they look at some biological functions of their limbs which they could not explain within the framework of their incomplete knowledge, and so they said that there was something immaterial, that is, the soul, that was the source of those functions. But now the science has developed by leaps and bounds and has pin-pointed the natural causes of all such functions. Therefore, there is no need now to believe in the putative soul. (It is the same trend of thought which they have followed while denying the existence of the Creator.)

Obviously, it is a wrong assumption. Those who believe in the existence of soul, do not do so because of that supposed difficulty; they do not ascribe some bodily function (of known causes) to the body, and some others (of unknown causes) to the soul. Rather, they ascribe all bodily functions to the body – directly – and to the soul – indirectly, through the body. They ascribe to the soul only one function which cannot be ascribed to the body in any way – man's gnosis of self and his vision of his person or "I".

2. They have said that the reality seen by man as one is, in fact, a series of nervous perceptions coming to the central nervous system one after another with extreme rapidity but their oneness is only composite. But this assertion is quite irrelevant, and it has nothing to do with the vision of the self. We have argued on the strength of the vision of the self; they are talking about arrival of the sensual visions from the peripheral sense-organs to the central nervous system, and its results. Well, let us suppose, as they say, that actually there are many things, that is, perceptions which have no real oneness; and those perceptions are all material, there is nothing behind them except their own reality; and that the vision which is 'one soul' is in fact the sum-total of these numerous perceptions. If so, then where did this "one" come from – the one which is our only vision, whose "other" has never been perceived by us? Where did this perceived oneness come from?

The talk about "composite oneness" is more like a jest than a serious proposition. A "composite one" is in reality a collection of numerous things without any oneness at all. Its oneness is imaginary, as we may say one house or one line, which is not one in fact. What they say amounts to this: The perceptions and sensations which are pluralistic and manifold in themselves are one perceptions in itself.

It means that these perceptions are numerous in reality, having no oneness at all, and at the same time they are actually only one perception; there is nothing beyond these sensual perceptions to perceive them as one perception – unlike a sense or imagination which consecutively and collectively receives manifold sensory or imaginary perceptions, and perceives them as one. They claim that those manifold perceptions are in themselves one perception – there is no other faculty beyond them which treats this collective vision as a composite one. Also, it is not possible to say that that perceiving is done by a part of brain which perceives the pluralistic picture as "one" – because it will not remove our objection: The perception of that part of brain is itself a part of those consecutively and rapidly-perceived picture, and our objection covers that perception too. That part of brain does not possess a separate perception-power which would deal with these perceptions – as an external sense deals with the external matters and acquires through them sensory pictures. (Ponder on this point.)

Exactly the same arguments (as we have offered above against "oneness" of the sensual perceptions) apply with equal force against firmness and indivisibility of this vision which is always changing and divisible by its very nature.

Apart from that, the premises – that these manifold, consequently (and with extreme rapidity) perceived pictures are perceived by mental vision as one – is wrong in itself. What is brain or its faculties? What is perception and the perceived picture? All these things are material – and matter and material are in their quiddity manifold, changeable and divisible. But the gnosis of "self" is not subject to these material defects. Is it not strange that even then they claim that there is nothing beyond matter and material?

3. They have said that the senses or the perceiving faculties become confused and consequently perceive manifold, divisible and changing things as one indivisible and unchanging thing. But this assertion is manifestly wrong. Error or confusion is a relative – and not an absolute – effect which occurs when one thing is compared with another. For example, we perceive the celestial bodies as small bright dots. Of course, this perception is wrong as we know from academic proofs and our other perceptions. But this error is found out when we compare our sensory perception with the reality of these perceived luminous bodies. As far as that sensory perception itself is concerned, it is a reality – we are actually perceiving small bright dots. And to that extent there is no question of any error or confusion.

The subject under discussion is not different from the above-given example. When our senses and faculties look at numerous divisible and changing things and perceive them as one indivisible and unchanging thing, their confusion and error is found out only when that picture is compared with the real thing existing outside. But so far as the perceived picture found in that faculty or sense is concerned, it is undoubtedly one, unchanging and in-divisible – and such a thing cannot be material because it lacks the properties of matter and material.

In short, the above discourse shows that the argument offered by materialists on the basis of senses and experiment, only proves that they could not find the soul. The fallacy is that they have proved 'not finding' and think that it proves 'non-existence'. Also, the picture painted by them to illustrate the vision of self or soul – the vision that is a single, simple and unchangeable reality – is irrelevant and wrong; that picture is in accord neither with established principles of materialism nor with the actual fact.

Now, we should have a look at the definition of soul or psyche as given by the psychologists. According to them, it is the unified condition resulting from the actions and reactions of various psychological activities – like perception, will, pleasure, love, etc. – which give rise to that unified condition. We have no-thing to say about this definition, because scholars of every branch of knowledge have right to postulate a subject for their scholarly pursuit and deliberation. And so have the psychologists.

Our concern is about the existence (or inexistence) of the soul in reality, quite independent of the assumptions of the thinkers. And it is a question within the domain of philosophy, not psychology.

There are some scholars of theology who believe that the soul is not immortal. They say: It has been established by the disciplines related to human life, like anatomy and physiology, that man's spiritual and biological characteristics emanate from live cells; those cells are the foundations of human and animal lives. Spirit or soul, therefore, is a characteristics and especial effect of those countless cells – each of which contains a life of its own. What the man calls his soul – and to which he refers as "I" – is a composite entity made up of countless souls. We know that these life conditions and spiritual characteristics cease to exist when the life-giving germs and cells die. In this back-ground, there is no question of a single immaterial soul or spirit which is supposed to continue even after the body dies. True that the principles of materialism, established after scientific researches, are yet unable to unravel the mysteries of life. There-fore, we may say that the physical causes are unable to create the soul, and accordingly, it may have been brought into being by a metaphysical being. The attempt to prove the immateriality of the soul by purely rationalistic argument is unacceptable in the world of modern knowledge, which does not rely on anything other than the senses and experiments.

The author says: On meditation you will see that all the objections written against the materialists' arguments apply with equal force to this argument too. The following two objections are over and above that:

First: If the scientific research is uptil now unable to unravel the mysteries of soul and realities of life, it does not necessarily mean that it cannot do so even in future; nor that these spiritual characteristics are in fact not based on material causes – although we may not know it. Therefore, the theologians' argument is nothing but a fallacy by which they have equalized inexistence of knowledge with knowledge of inexistence.

Second: They seem to ascribe some worldly affairs – that is, the physical phenomena – to matter, and some others – that is, spiritual affairs – to a metaphysical cause, that is, the Creator. But it implies that there are two creators in the world. It is a proposition which is neither acceptable to the materialists nor the theists. And all the arguments of monotheism rebut such assumption.

There are some other objections against immateriality of soul, described in books of philosophy and theology; all of them show that the writers concerned have not pondered on the proof given by us, nor have they understood its main theme. That is why we have refrained from quoting and commenting on them here. Anyone desirous to know them should look into the books concerned. And Allãh is the Guide.

A DISCOURSE ON ETHICS

Ethics is the science which looks into human traits, related to man's vegetable, animal and human characteristics, and differentiates the good traits from the bad ones, in order that man may complete his practical happiness by acquiring the good traits; and thus emanate from him such actions as attract to him general praise from the human society.

Ethics shows that human morality finally belongs to three comprehensive faculties of man. These faculties lead the psyche to acquire practical knowledge, from which emanate all actions of the human species. These are the desire, anger and rational faculty. Human actions are divided into three categories: Either they are intended to gain some benefit, for example: eating, drinking and wearing clothes, etc. They issue forth from the faculty of desire; or they are aimed at protecting, or repulsing harmful effects from, one's person, honour or property, etc. These actions emanate from the faculty of anger. Or they are related to mental conception and proposition, for example, arranging syllogism, preparation of argument, etc. Such mental activities are caused by rational faculty. Man's personality is composed of these three faculties, and they, by joining together, emerge as a composite unit and become the source of all human activities and actions. In this way, man attains his felicity and happiness, which is the final cause of this composition.

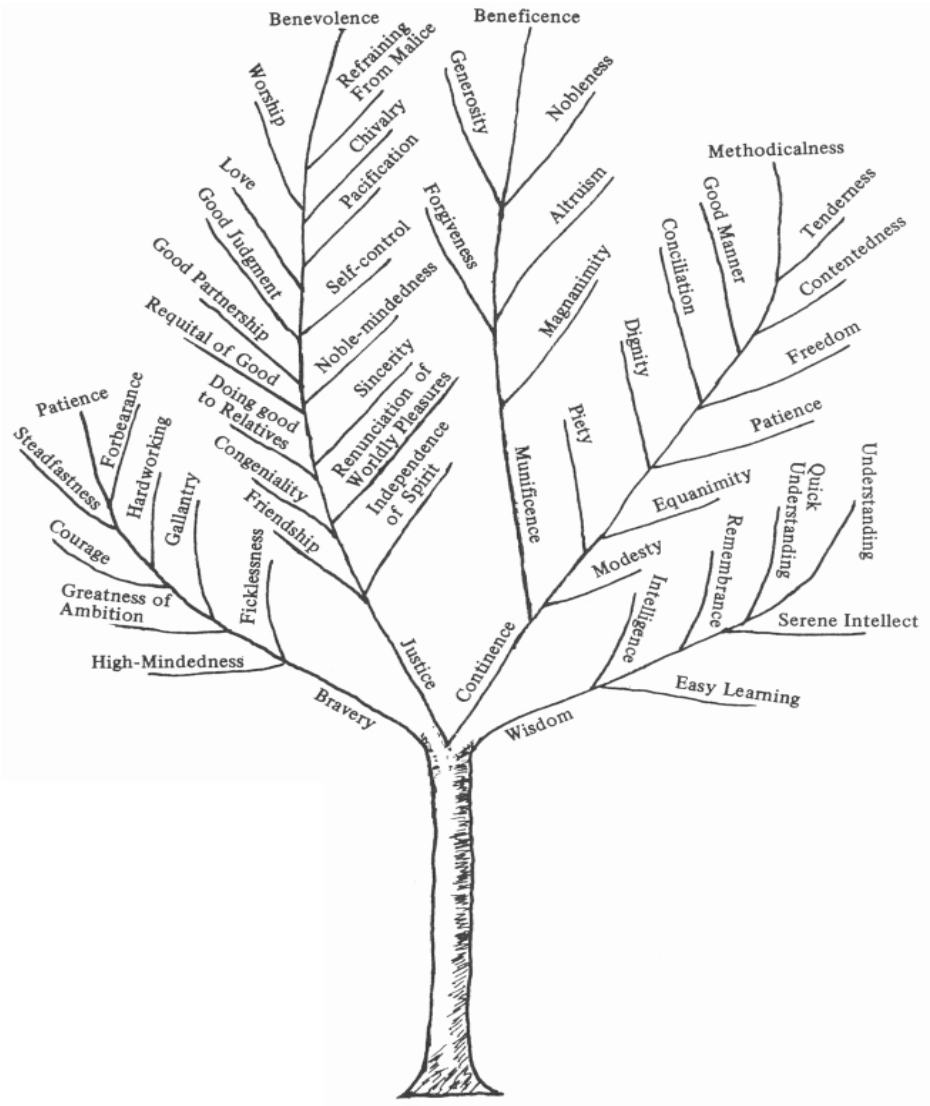
It is therefore necessary for man not to let any of these three faculties deviate from the middle path to either the right or the left, not to allow any of these to exceed the limit or to be deficient – as it would disturb the ratio of that particular ingredient, which would result in changing the entire nature of the composite unit, that is, man himself. This would negate the reason for which the man was created, that is, the felicity of the whole species.

The middle course for any of the faculties is to use it as it should be – both in quantity and quality. The middle course for the faculty of desire is called continence, and its two sides of excess and deficiency are greed and undue quiescence, respectively. The middle course for the faculty of anger is bravery, and the two sides are rashness and cowardice. The middle course of the faculty of rationality is called wisdom, and the two sides are deception and dull-mindedness.

When the three good characteristics – continence, bravery and wisdom – combine in a man, a fourth characteristic is born, just as a new quality emerges when different ingredients of a medicine or mixture are blended together. And that quality is called justice. Justice gives each faculty its due right and puts it in its proper place.

Its two undesirable sides are inflicting injustice and surrendering to it.

These four – continence, bravery, wisdom and justice – are the roots of all virtuous characteristics, of good morality. Each of them has numerous branches which issue forth from it and belong to it. They have the same relationship with the above-mentioned roots as a species has with its genus. Examples of these branches are generosity and magnanimity, contentedness and gratitude, patience and gallantry, courage and modesty, sense of honour and sincerity, nobility and humility, and so on. These are the branches of virtuous characteristics, which are given in detail in the books of the Ethics. The following is a 'family-tree' showing its roots and branches, (see p. 231).



And the Ethics defines each of them and distinguishes the middle course from its two sides of excess and deficiency; then it explains why a virtue is virtue, then shows how it can be acquired, until it becomes a firm trait, that is, by firm belief that it is good and virtuous trait and by repeatedly practising it until it becomes a firmly-rooted characteristic of the soul.

For example: We say to a coward: Cowardice is born when the psyche is gripped by fear; and fear emanates from something which may happen or may not happen – in future; and such a thing, whose existence and inexistence both are equally possible, cannot be tipped to either side without a cause; a man of reason should not indulge in such fantasies; therefore, a man should not allow himself to be gripped by fear.

When a man teaches himself this theoretical aspect, and then repeatedly enters into dangerous situations and resolutely proceeds towards alarming perils, he soon gets rid of the bad trait of fear. The same is the case with all the virtues and evils.

The above description is based on the first system, as was explained in the commentary. That system tries to reform the character and to create a balance, a moderation, in moral traits, in order that the man may be praised and his virtues lauded by the society.

Somewhat similar is the approach of the second system

NOTE: since the author has described the branches of virtuous characteristics in the text in tree form, and in the explanatory figure (of the original work) he has also chosen the tree form representation, we therefore have duplicated the explanatory figure in the same manner (pub.) brought by the prophets and the divine legislators. The only difference is in the aims and objects of the two systems. While the first system aims at acquiring a perfect trait because it is approved by the society and attracts praise from the people, the second one aims at achieving by it the genuine happiness for the man, that is, perfection of belief in Allãh and His signs, and the felicity of the next world, which is the real happiness and perfection. Yet, both systems are similar in that, the ultimate goal of both is the perfection of man in his character and morals.

As for the third system (which was explained earlier), it differs from the above two, in that it aims at seeking the pleasure of Allãh, not at achieving human perfection. Consequently, its goals sometimes differ from that of the earlier two systems. It is quite possible that what appears as the middle way from this point of view, may not look so from the other two angles. When the faith of a servant proceeds on this path of perfection, when it goes on from strength to strength, his soul is attracted towards meditation about his Lord; he keeps the beautiful Divine Names before his vision, and constantly looks at His lovely attributes which are free from every defect and deficiency; his soul is relentlessly attracted to Allãh going higher and higher in his meditation, until there comes a stage where he worships Allãh as though he (man) were looking at Allãh, and Allãh were looking towards him. At this stage he feels the Divine Presence in his attraction, meditation and love. The love increases from strength to strength, because man by nature loves beauty. Allãh has said: and those who believe are stronger in (their) love for Allãh (2 :165). Such a man begins following the Messenger of Allãh in all his doings, in every situation, because love of a thing results in the love of its signs, and the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) is the wonderful sign of Allãh. (In fact, the whole universe is a sign and token of Allãh.) This love becomes stronger and stronger until a time comes when the servant cuts himself from every thing, in devotion of Allãh; he loves nothing except his Lord, he bows before none other than Allãh. Whenever such a man looks at a thing which has some beauty and attraction, he finds in it a sample – although imperfect – of the Divine Beauty. He knows that it is but a reflection of the inexhaustible perfection, the unending beauty and incomprehensible splendour of Allãh. Allãh's is the beauty, grace, perfection and magnificence; every beauty and perfection found in other things, in reality belongs to Him, because every thing is a sign of Allãh – it is its only reality, it is nothing more than that; it has no other disposition; it is but a reflection showing the image of the original. This man is, and remains, overwhelmed by love; and he does not look at anything but only because it is a sign of his Lord. In short, all strings connecting his heart to other things are snipped off, leaving it attached only to the love of Allãh. Whatever he loves, it is only for the sake of Allãh and in the cause of Allãh.

At this stage, the mode of his perceptions and actions undergoes a drastic change. When he looks at a thing, he sees Allãh before it and with it, every thing loses its independence and identity in his eyes. What he sees and perceives is different from what other people see and perceive; the people look at things from be-hind a curtain, while he sees them in their true form. This shows the difference in perception, and similar is the case of actions. As he does not love anything except Allãh, he does not want any-thing except for Allãh, seeking His Sublime Majesty. He neither seeks nor intends, neither hopes no fears, neither chooses nor abandons, becomes neither despaired nor depressed, is neither pleased nor displeased – except for Allãh and in the cause of Allãh. Thus, his aims and goals differ totally from those of other people; his motive is diametrically opposed to that of his fellow beings. Previously, he acquired a virtue because it was a human perfection, and discarded an evil because it was a defect. But now his only interest is in seeking the Sublime Majesty of Allãh; he does not care about any perfection or defect, nor is he attracted to any worldly praise or cherished remembrance; he rises above this world as well as the next; he takes into consideration neither the Paradise nor the Hell – he discards every thing and rises above them. Now, his destination is his Lord; his provision, his humility of servitude; and his guide, his love. As a poet has said:

Love narrated to me the traditions of amour,
Through its chain of narrators, from neighbourhood of a distinguished personality,

And narrated to me the breath of fresh breeze,
From the branching trees, from the valley of euphorbia from the heights of Najd,
From the tear, from my sour eye, from passion,
From sorrow, from my wounded heart, from ecstasy of love,
That my ardor and love have sworn together,
To my destruction till I am laid down in my grave.

This discourse, although short and concise, explains our theme (if you study it carefully). It shows that in this third system of the Ethics the question of human perfection or defect becomes irrelevant; and the aim is changed from human perfection to the Sublime Majesty of Allãh. As a result, the outlook is changed from those of the other two systems; and it may happen sometimes that what is counted as a virtue in other systems becomes evil in this one, and vice versa.

Now, we should turn our attention to one remaining topic. There is another theory of Ethics which differs from the above-mentioned three systems; and probably it may be counted as a separate system. They say: Ethics and morality changes in its roots and shoots with the changes occurring in the society, because virtue and vice change with the changing society, they are not based on any permanent, unalterable, firm foundation. Allegedly it emanates from the theory of evolution of matter.

They say: Human society has come into being because of various needs and requirements of life, which man wants to fulfil through the agency of society. He tries to keep the society alive which, he thinks, preserves his own existence. The nature is governed by the law of evolution and gradual perfection. Consequently, society too undergoes constant changes and proceeds to a more perfect and more developed goal. If an action conforms with the aim of society – that is, perfection – it is called virtue; otherwise, it is vice. Therefore, virtue and vice cannot remain unchanged, they are not static or permanent. There is nothing like absolute virtue or absolute vice; they are relative ideas, which change with the changing societies, according to regions and times. As the virtue and vice – being relative factors – under-go changes, so do the ethical and moral values. In other words, Ethics is not absolute; its views on good and bad characteristics are liable to change with circumstances.

From the above, we may infer that Ethics follows the nation-al or social aspirations – the aspirations which are a means of achieving the social perfection (which is the goal of the society) ; and virtue and vice are governed by it. Whatever promotes development, whatever helps the society in reaching its goal and achieving its aspiration, is good and virtue; and whatever hinders from that goal, whatever keeps the society backward, is evil and vice. Accordingly, lie, false allegation, indecency, hard-heartedness, robbery and shamelessness may become good and virtuous, if they promote the aspiration of the society. And truth, chastity and mercy may become bad and evil – if they hinder it from achieving its goal.

This is a gist of this strange theory which has been adopted by the materialist communists. This theory is not a new one, contrary to their claims. In ancient Greece, the Cynics reportedly had the same idea. Likewise, Mazdakites (the followers of Mazdak, who lived in Iran during the reign of Kisra and was the first to call to communism) were practising it; and even today some primitive tribes in Africa and elsewhere follow this tenet.

However, it is a false theory, and the proof offered in its support is wrong both in its foundation and structure. Before exposing its falsehood, a few points should be made clear:

1. Every being – that which has external existence – has an inseparable personality of its own. Consequently, one being cannot be another being. For example, existence of Zayd has a personality and a sort of unity which prevents it from becoming the personality of ‘Amr. Zayd is one person and ‘Amr is another; they are two persons, two human beings, not one. It is a premise whose truth cannot be doubted. (There is a totally different proposition which says: “The physical universe is a being having one individual reality.” This proposition should not be confused with the above-mentioned premise.)

2. It follows that the external existence is one and the same with personality. But mental ideas are different from external beings and their existence is not their personality. Reason admits that an idea – whatever it may be – may be applied to more than one individual, for example, the idea of man, or that of a tall man, or that of the man standing before us.

The logicians divide idea into general and particular. Also, they divide the particular into two categories of relative and real. But these divisions are done when an idea is seen vis-à-vis another idea, when it is put at the side of the other; or when it is seen in relation to external existence.

This property of the ideas – their applicability to more than one individual – is also sometimes called "generality"; its opposite being "individuality" or "unity".

3. An external physical being is governed by the law of change and general movement. Therefore, it has an expanse and that expanse is divisible into boundaries and pieces, each piece being different from other preceding or following ones. Yet, it is connected with them in its existence. Otherwise, without that connection, it could not be said to be changing or evolving. (If a thing is removed completely and is replaced by an entirely new thing, it cannot be said that the first evolved and changed into the second. If one thing is to change into another, there must be a common factor joining them together.)

4. It follows that that movement is a single thing having its own identity and personality. It looks numerous when it is seen in relation to the boundaries of a thing (as mentioned above). That relation distinguishes one piece from the others. But as for the movement itself, it is a single uninterrupted flow. This characteristic of the movement – this constant flow – is also called a "generality" in contrast to the relations it has with each boundary; we say "general movement", meaning a movement free of its relations with the boundaries and pieces.

This "generality" is a thing existing in reality, unlike the "generality of the ideas" mentioned in (2) above, which is mental attribute of idea – an imaginary attribute of an imaginary being.

5. Undoubtedly, man is a physical being; humanity has many members, as well as its own laws and characteristics. What is created by nature is one individual, singly and separately. It does not create the collection of people which we call human society. Of course, the nature was aware that man needs somethings to perfect his existence which he could not obtain on his own. There-fore, the nature equipped him with organs, faculties and powers which would be useful in his endeavours to make up his deficiencies within the framework of society. Obviously, the single man is the goal of creation, primarily and principally, while society is a secondary goal, just a by-product.

6. The human nature demands a society and proceeds towards it, (if we can use the words of demand, causality and movement – in their real sense – about the society!). What is the real relation between man and this society? An individual man is a single and personal being (in the sense we have described above). At the same time, he is constantly on move, changing, evolving, proceeding to his perfection. That is why every piece of his changing being is different from other pieces. Yet his is a nature, flowing, "general", preserved in all the stages of the changes; in short, his nature is a single personality. This nature found in this individual man is preserved by the means of procreation, by branching out of one individual into other individuals. It is this factor which is called "nature of the species". It is preserved through the individuals, even if they are changed, even if they undergo creation and destruction (in the same way as was explained about the individual's nature). Individual's nature exists and proceeds towards personal perfection. Likewise, nature of species exists and proceeds towards the perfection of the species.

There is no doubt that this endeavour for perfection of species exists in the natural system. That is what we mean when we say, for example, that the human species proceeds towards perfection; or that today's man is a more perfect being than the primitive man. The same demand for perfection of species is in the minds of those scientists who speak about the evolution of species. Had there not been a nature of species, existing in reality, preserved in the individuals .(or in species), such talks would not have had any value – it would have been just a metaphorical speech.

As with the individuals, so with the society. There is an individual, or let us say particular, society, which is found amongst the people of a nation, of a time or of a region. Also, there is a general society found in the human species, continuing with its continuation, evolving with its evolution (if it be correct that society, like a social man, is an externally existing condition of an externally existing nature!).

7. Society moves and evolves with the movements and changes of man. This society is a single entity from the initial stage of the movement to wherever it proceeds to, with a general existence. This "one" (which changes because of its relation with each and every boundary) becomes divided into numerous pieces. And every "piece" is a part of the society, that is, a "man". The parts or members of the society rely in their being on the persons of mankind. In the same way the general civilization – in the sense described above – depends on the general human nature. The law governing a unit is a unit of the law; and the law governing a "general" is the general rule. ("General rule" does not mean an abstract rule, because we are not talking about "general ideas".) Undoubtedly an individual man, being a single entity, is governed by a rule, which continues with his continuation. Yet that rule undergoes partial changes, following the changes occurring in the man himself. For example, there is the rule that the physical man takes food, acts by his will, has feelings and imagination, thinks and perceives. These rules exist and continue as long as the man himself exists. Of course, minor changes may occur in those general rules consequent to the changes occurring in the man.

The same principle applies to the humanity in general, the general mankind, which exists with the existence of its individuals.

8. As establishment of society is a law of human nature and one of its characteristics, so the general society is a characteristic of the general human species. (By general society we mean the society, per se, the society established by human nature and which is continuing uninterruptedly from the day man came into being to this time.) This general society exists and continues with the humanity. And the laws of society which it has brought into being will remain intact as long as the general society exists. Of course, some minor changes may occur in it but the main principles will remain unchanged, like the mankind itself, which continues although its individual members go on changing.

Now it is clear that there are some ethical principles which are unchangeable and are valid for ever – like general virtue and vice – as the general society is firm, constant and unalterable from the beginning. Society cannot turn into non-society (i.e., individuality) – although a particular civilization may give way to another particular civilization. Likewise, general virtue (and vice) cannot turn into non-virtue (or non-vice) – although a particular virtue may evolve into some other particular virtue.

9. An individual man needs – for his existence and continuation – some perfections and benefits which he must achieve and acquire for his own self. That is why nature has equipped him with organs and faculties to help him in this compulsory quest, for example, alimentary canal for food intake and digestion, and sexual organs for reproduction and continuation of the species. It is obligatory for man to use these systems for the purpose they have been created for. He should not completely ignore them by leaving them unused, because it would be against the dictate of nature. Likewise, he should not over-indulge in these activities, he should not eat or cohabit more than necessary; for example, he should not go on eating until he becomes sick, or dies, or becomes unable to use his other faculties. He must keep to the middle course in achieving all his requirements, perfections and benefits. This middle course is called continence; and its two undesirable sides are greed and undue quiescence.

Likewise, we see that every individual, in his existence and continuation, is faced with many such things which are harmful to him and which he is obliged to resist, and repulse from him-self. And this "obligation" is proved by the fact that nature has equipped him with the organs and powers to defend himself with. Therefore, it is obligatory for him to defend himself and resist the harmful things – keeping himself on the middle course. He should not neglect and crush these powers nor should he overuse them. This middle course is called bravery, and the other two sides are rashness and cowardice.

The same is the case with wisdom and its two sides, deception and dull-mindedness; as well as with justice and its two sides, injustice and surrender to injustice.

These are, thus, the four faculties and virtues which are demanded by the nature of an individual man – the nature which is equipped with its necessary tools: continence, bravery, wisdom and justice. And all of them are good and virtues. Good is that which is in conformity with the ultimate goal of a thing and promotes its perfection and felicity; and, as explained above, all the four are in conformity with the felicity of the individual. And their eight opposites are bad and evil.

When an individual, by his nature and in himself, has this attribute, then he would be having it also within the framework of the society. Society, being a product of nature, cannot negate nature's rules; otherwise, it would be a contradiction in terms. After all, what is society if not the co-operation of the individuals to facilitate the perfection of their natures and achievement of their aspirations.

10. Human species in framework of the "general" society has the same characteristics as an individual has in his particular society, as mentioned above. Human species in its civilization tries to achieve its perfection by repulsing what is harmful and acquiring what is beneficial to it; by learning as much as is good for it and practising justice – that is, giving everyone his due right, without indulging into injustice and without surrendering to injustice. And all these four characteristics are virtues. The civilization, per se, decrees that they are absolute virtues and their opposites are absolute vices.

The above discourse clearly shows that in the constant and perpetual human society, there are absolute virtues and absolute vices – society cannot "be" without them. It also shows that the four fundamental ethical values are absolutely good and virtuous and their opposites absolutely bad and evils; as has been decreed by the social nature of humanity. And the case of their branches is not different from that of the roots.

They too are absolute and unchanging – although there may occur some differences sometimes in their applications, as we shall mention afterwards.

Now it is clear that what they have said concerning relativity in morality is not correct : –

They said: "Absolute virtue and vice do not exist. What exists is the relative virtue and relative vice; and it is a changing thing which varies with regions, times and societies."

Reply: It is a fallacy, because they have confused the "generality of idea" with "generality (i.e., continuation) of existence". It is true that absolute good and vice – in the meaning of general ideas – do not have external (i.e., real) existence. But here we are not concerned with them. What we are concerned with are absolute virtue and vice – in the meaning of lasting social factors which continue as long as the society exists, by decree of nature. The aim of the society is the happiness of the species. And it is impossible to think that all happenings and possible events and actions would always be good for the society. Surely some would conform with its needs and some would not. Accordingly there would always be good and evil in the society. How can we suppose existence of a society – of any type – in which the members do not believe that every one should be given his due right, or that it is necessary to gain benefit to its proper limit, or that they must protect and defend the cause of the society as and when needed, or that the knowledge – by which man differentiates what is beneficial from what is harmful – is a good attribute? These four beliefs are the above-mentioned justice, continence, bravery and wisdom. As was said, every society, of any description whatsoever, decrees that these four characteristics are good and virtuous. Moreover, how can we think of a society that does not ordain that one must refrain from indecencies? And that feeling is modesty, a branch of continence. Or a society that does not exhort one to be enraged when rights are usurped or the sanctity of sacred things violated? And it is the earnest sense of honour which is a branch of bravery. Or that one should be happy with his due social rights? And it is contentedness. Or that one should preserve one's social status without snubbing other people, without putting them out of countenance by one's arrogance? And it is modesty and humility. We may go on enumerating in the same way each and every branch of the ethics and morality.

They say: "The views often differ from society to society on what virtue is. One thing is considered as virtue in one society, while another society treats it as vice."

Reply: Of course, there are some minor examples of this phenomenon. But it is not because one society believed in acquiring good traits while the other dismissed it as unnecessary. Whatever the difference, it only occurs because one society believes that trait to be good, while the other thinks it is evil. So the difference is not about the principle, it is only in its application.

For example: The societies ruled by autocratic rulers used to believe that the sovereign had total authority over his subjects, and absolute power to do whatever he wished and order whatever he liked. But that belief was not based on any negative attitude towards justice. It actually emanated from their belief that that absolute power was the due right of the ruler; they thought that what the ruler was doing was not injustice, he was only exercising his due authority and taking his just right.

Likewise, some societies thought that it was a shame if their kings studied to acquire knowledge, as is reported about French kings of the medieval ages. But it was not because they looked down at the virtue of knowledge; it was only because they thought that acquiring knowledge of politics and studying the ways of managing various government departments would conflict with the king's rightful royal activities and engagements.

In the same way, some societies do not acknowledge any excellence in chastity of women (i.e., not establishing sexual relation with any man other than their husbands), and their modesty. Nor do they believe that their men should feel enraged if their women indulged in licentiousness. The same is the case with some other virtues like contentedness and humbleness etc.

But it is only because those societies do not think that these things fall under continence, modesty, self-respect, contentedness and humbleness. It is not that they do not accept these main virtues as virtues. After all, they praise a judge or a ruler if he practices continence in his rule and judgment. They appreciate it if one is ashamed of breaking a law; they laud a man who, overcome by national zeal, defends the nation's independence, the cause of civilization, or the sanctity of other sacred values. They praise a man who remains content with what the law has allotted to him; and applaud the loyalty and obedience shown by the public to their leaders and rulers.

They say: "Whether a characteristic is good depends on its conformity with the goals of social aspirations." Then they come to the conclusion that the said characteristic's excellence depends on its conformity with the society's goals. But it is a clear fallacy. Society is an institution which comes into being when its members enforce, and act upon, all the laws decreed by nature. This society is bound to take them to their happiness and felicity (provided there is no disturbance in its arrangement and flow) ; and the society is bound to have some rules and regulations like virtue and vice, good and evil. On the other hand "society's aspiration" is just a set of some imaginary ideas, invented for creating a society on prescribed lines by imposing it on its members. In other words, society and society's aspirations are two completely different things: Society is an established fact, society's aspiration is only a potential which is yet to come into being; the former is an actual fact while the latter is only a plan yet to be implemented. How could one be equated with the other? The virtue and vice are brought into being by the general society on the demands of the human nature; how could such an actual fact be brought under the domain of some aspirations – the aspirations which are nothing but some imaginary notions?

Question: The general civilization, brought into being by nature, has no authority of its own; whatever authority there is, it belongs to its goals and aspirations – especially if it is a theory conforming to the happiness of the society's individuals.

Reply: The preceding discussion about virtue and vice and good and evil, shall be repeated in this case again – until the talk stops at a permanent, perpetual and unchanging decree of nature.

Apart from that, there is another difficulty. Let us suppose that virtue and vice as well as all the rules of civilization depend on the goals and aspirations of the society. And it is those aspirations on which the arguments of these people are based. But it is possible – nay a fact – that there may be different conflicting goals and aspirations within one society, or between different societies. Which aspiration would then prevail? Which one the people should give preference to? Which would be acceptable to the general society? The fact is that in this situation there will only be one criterion, and that is the power and domination; in other words, might is right. How can it be believed that the human nature led the human beings to a social structure whose parts are in conflict with one another? Can the society be governed by a rule which would negate the society itself? Is it not an ignominious contradiction in the rule of nature and the demands of its existence?

A FEW TRADITIONS ON SOME RELATED TOPICS

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said: "A man came to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) and said: 'I am keen (and) enthusiastic for jihãd.' (The Messenger of Allãh) said: 'Then do jihad in the way of Allãh, because if you are killed, you shall remain alive near Allãh and sustained, if you die (before that), then your reward is indeed with Allãh . . .'

The author says: The Prophet's words, "and if you die . . .", point to the word of Allãh: and whoever goes forth from his house emigrating to Allãh and His Messenger, and then death overtakes him, his reward is indeed with Allãh. . . (4:100). It also shows that proceeding to jihad is emigration to Allãh and His Messenger.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the prophet Ismã'īl, whom Allãh has named "Truthful in promise": "He was named 'Truthful in promise' because he had promised a man (to wait for him) in a place. So he remained waiting for that man for one year. There-fore, Allãh named him 'True of promise'. Then that man came to him after that (long) time and Ismã'īl said to him, 'I have been waiting for you . . .' " (al-Kãfī)

The author says: It is a thing which average wisdom would probably say was a deviation from middle course, while Allãh has counted it as an excellent virtue of the said prophet, increasing thereby his prestige and raising his status, as He has said: And mention Ismã'īl in the Book, surely he was truthful in (his) promise, and he was a messenger, a prophet. And he enjoined on his family prayer and alms-giving, and was one in whom his Lord was well pleased (19:54-5). The fact is that the criterion by which this action was judged is different from the one used by common wisdom. The average wisdom, the common sense, looks at the things according to its own views, and Allãh looks after His friends by His Own help and support; and the word of Allãh is the High. Many similar events have been narrated about the Prophet, the Imãms and other friends of Allãh.

Question: How can rules of the sharī'ah go against the dictates of reason, in situations where reason may have a say?

Reply: True that reason may judge the virtue or vice of an action wherever it is possible for it to do so. But that thing or action should first come within its jurisdiction before it can pronounce its judgment on it. And we have explained earlier that such actions (as described in the above tradition) are governed by the third system, and that system takes such actions out of the jurisdiction of human intellect and reason – reason does not have any say against or about them. It is the way of the Divine Knowledge. Apparently the prophet Ismã'īl (a.s.) had given that man unconditional promise by saying, 'I shall wait for you here until you come back to me.' Therefore, he stuck to that unconditional wording, to save himself from breaking the promise, and to fulfil what Allãh had put in his mind and made his tongue utter. Of the same import is an event related about the Prophet that he was near the Sacred Mosque when one of his companions told him that he would come back to him, and the Prophet promised to wait for him until he would return. That man went away and did not return, and the Prophet remained there three days waiting for him in the same place which he had promised. That man passed by that place after three days and found the Prophet sitting there waiting for him and he himself had forgotten the promise.

as-Sayyid ar-Raḍi has narrated from the Leader of the faithfuls (‘Ali - a.s.) that he heard someone saying: “Surely we are Allãh’s and to Him shall we surely return.” Thereupon, he (‘Ali - a.s.) said: “O man! Verily our word, Surely we are Allãh’s, is acknowledgment by us that we belong to Him, and, to Him shall we surely return, is acknowledgment by us that we are to die.” (al-Khaṣã’iṣ)

The author says: Its meaning is clear in the light of the earlier given explanation. The tradition has been narrated in detail in al-Kãfī.

Isḥãq ibn ‘Ammãr and ‘Abdullãh ibn Sinãn have narrated from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) that he said: “The Messenger of Allãh (s.a. w.a.) has said: ‘Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, has said: “I have given the world as loan to My servants. Then whoever gives Me a loan from it, I give him ten times to seven-hundred times in lieu of one. And whoever does not give Me a loan and I take something from him by force, then I give him three things that if I gave one of them to My angels they would be pleased of Me.” ’ ” Then Abu ‘Abdillãh said: “(It is) the words of Allãh: Who, when a misfortune befalls them, say: ‘Surely we are Allãh’s and to Him we shall surely return.’ Those are they on whom are blessings and mercy from their Lord, and those are the followers of the right course.” Then Abu ‘Abdillãh (a.s.) said: “It is for the man from whom Allãh takes something forcibly.” (al-Kãfī)

The author says: This tradition is narrated by other chains, all having nearly the same theme.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "aṣ-Ṣalãh (اَلصَّلٰوةُ) from Allãh is mercy, and from the angels is purification, and from the people is prayer." (Maʿãniʾl-akhbãr)

The author says: There are other traditions of the same meaning.

At first glance, there appears to be a conflict between this and the preceding tradition. This tradition explains aṣ-ṣalãh as mercy, while the preceding one counts aṣ-ṣalãh as other than mercy; and this view is further strengthened by the wording of the verse itself which mentions aṣ-ṣalãh and mercy separately, "blessings and mercy from Allãh". But in fact there is no contradiction as we have explained in detail in the Commentary.

* * * * *

The Ṣafã and the Marwah are two places in Mecca between which a pilgrim has to perform as-sa‘y (اَلسَّعْيُ = the ceremony of walking quickly seven times between the Ṣafã and the Marwah, during the ḥajj and the ‘umrah; literally to move quickly, to run). These are two hills, the distance between them reportedly being 760½ arm. aṣ-Ṣafã (الصَّفَا = hard smooth rock) ; al-Marwah (اَلمَرْوَةُ = hard stone). ash-Sha‘ã’ir (اَلشَّعَائِرُ) is the plural of ash-sha‘īrah (اَلشَّعِيرَةُ = sign) ; from it is derived the word al-mash‘ar (المَشْعَرُ = the ḥajj station, east of Mecca) ; also they say, ash‘ara ’l-hady (أَشْعَرَ الهَدْيَ = he marked or branded the sacrifical animal). Al-Ḥajj (الحَجُّ) literally means repeated intention; in Islamic terminology it refers to the special rites collectively known as Pilgrimage of Mecca. al-I‘timãr (اَلإِعْتِمَارُ) means to visit; it is derived from al- ‘imarah (العِمَارَةُ = building) because buildings thrive by visits; in Islamic language it refers to the so-called "lesser pilgrimage" to the Ka'bah, which unlike the ḥajj, need not be performed at a particular time and whose performance involves fewer ceremonies. al-Junãḥ (اَلجُنَاحُ) is deviation from truth and justice; it is used for sin and misdemeanour; thus, negation of sin or blame implies permission. at-Taṭawwuf (اَلتَّطَوُّفُ) is derived from aṭ-ṭawf (اَلطَّوْفُ) , that is, to make the rounds; it denotes a round trip, that is, a journey or walk that ends at its starting point; it need not necessarily be a circumambulation around something (although circumambulation is more obvious application of the word) ; it is the former meaning in which it has been used in this verse – it refers to as-sa'y, that is, walking between the Ṣafã and the Marwah seven times consecutively.

at-Taṭawwu' (اَلتَّطَوُّعُ) is derived from aṭ-ṭaw' (اَلطَّوْعُ = to do a walk willingly and gladly). Some people differentiate between at-taṭawwu' and al-iṭã'ah (اَلإِطَاعَةُ) and say that the former, unlike the latter, is exclusively used for voluntarily done good deeds. If correct, this assertion might be based on the view that the obligatory deeds – because of their obligatoriness – are probably not done willingly, unlike the voluntary and recommended actions which are done willingly by one's own accord. But it is a far-fetched interpretation. In fact, aṭ-ṭaw' (اَلطَّوْعُ) is opposite of al-kurh (اَلكُرْهُ = dislike), and is not irreconcilable with obligatory deeds. Allãh says: . . . so He said to it (i.e., the heaven) and to the earth: "Come both, willingly or unwillingly" (41:11) . The characteristic meaning of the paradigm at-tafa''ul (اَلتَّفَعُّلُ) is to take to oneself, for example, tamayyaza (تَمَيَّزَ = he took on distin-guishing), ta'allama (تَعَلَّمَ = he took on learning) ; in the same way taṭawwa'a (تَطَوَّعَ) means, he took on doing good willingly. In short, at-taṭawwu' is not reserved, from the linguistic point of view, for voluntary, non-obligatory good deed – unless credit is given to the usage of the common people.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Surely the Ṣafã and the Marwah are among the signs of Allãh . . . to go round them both: The two hills are marked by the signs of Allãh; they lead accordingly to Him and remind one of Him. They have been especially counted "among the signs of Allãh" to the exclusion of other things; it shows that the word, "the signs" has not been used here in the sense in which every created thing is a sign of the Creator. They are the Divine Signs because Allãh has made them so, by appointing them as the places of His worship; thus they remind one of Allãh, the Creator. They are the signs for which Allãh has prescribed especial rites of worship.

Then comes the next sentence: "so whoever makes a pilgrimage to the House or performs 'umrah thereof, there is no blame on him to go round them both. The word "so" in the beginning shows that it is an offshoot of the preceding sentence. Its import is to show that walking quickly between these two hills is a part of the Islamic sharī'ah – it does not imply that the said walking is voluntary or non-obligatory. If Allãh had wanted to declare its voluntariness, it would have been more appropriate to praise and extol as-sa'y, rather than saying that there was no blame in it. The gist of the meaning is that – because the Ṣafã and the Marwah were among the places of the worship of Allãh – it would do you no harm to worship Him therein. And it is the language of legislation. If Allãh had wanted to show only its desirability, He would have said that, because the two hills were among the signs of Allãh, He likes you to go round them.

Frequently, when the Qur'ãn wants to ordain an obligatory law, it uses such expressions which by themselves do not show obligatoriness. For example, Allãh says regarding jihãd; that is better for you (61:11); regarding fast: and that you fast is better for you (2:184), and regarding shortening of prayer: And when you journey in the earth, there is no blame on you if you shorten the prayer (4:101).

QUR'ÃN: and whoever on his own accord does good, then surely Allãh is Grateful, All-knowing: The conjunctive "and" may be joining this sentence to any of the three phrases in the preceding one:-

1. It may connect it with "so whoever makes a pilgrimage . . . ". In that case it would show a more general reason for the legislation of the walking between the two hills, after giving the particular reason, that is, "Surely the Ṣafã and the Marwah are among the signs of Allãh." According to this interpretation, "doing good on one's own accord" would mean "obedience" in general term, and not a voluntary deed.

2. It may be starting a new sentence, joining it to the words in the beginning of the verse. In that case, "doing good on one's own accord" would refer to the "going round the two hills". Thus it would show only the desirability of as-sa'y (walking quickly seven times between Ṣafã and the Marwah).

3. Alternatively, the phrase "doing good on one's own according" may be referring to the ḥajj and the 'umrah, and the phrase would show the desirability of these two rites of worship.

ash-Shãkir (اَلشَّاكِرُ = Grateful) and al-'Alīm (اَلعَلِيْمُ = All-knowing) are two of the beautiful names of Allãh. ash-Shukr (اَلشُّكْرُ = gratefulness, thankfulness). When a beneficiary returns the benevolence of the benefactor by announcing it in words and/ or deeds, it is called gratefulness.

Someone gives you a property, and in return you praise him mentioning his benevolence, or use that property in a way he likes – and thus you show your gratefulness to him.

Now, Allãh is the Beneficent; His beneficence is eternal and all beneficence begins from Him; none can oblige Him in any way so that He would be grateful to that person. Yet, He, in His benevolence, looks at His creatures' good deeds as though the creatures have been beneficent to Him by doing those deeds (although, in reality the case is diametrically different; the creatures' good deeds are actually His benefaction to them). And thus he repays those good deeds with gratefulness and benevolence, which in fact is a double benevolence. Allãh says: Is the reward of goodness aught but goodness? (55:60); Surely this is a reward for you, and your striving shall be recompensed (76:22). Thus, the name "Grateful" is used for Allãh in its real, not allegorical sense.

TRADITIONS

One of our companions has narrated this tradition from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.). He says: "I asked him about walking between the Ṣafã and the Marwah whether it was obligatory or voluntary. He said: 'Obligatory.' I said: 'Does not Allãh say: so whoever makes a pilgrimage to the House or performs 'umrah thereof, there is no blame on him to go round them both?' He said: 'It was in the 'umrah of Qaḍã';* that is, the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) had stipulated with them (i.e., the pagans of Mecca) that they would remove the idols (for the period of 'umrah) ; and one of his companions was engaged otherwise until the idols were returned (to their places): (The Imãm) said : 'Then Allãh revealed: Surely the Ṣafã and the Marwah are among the signs of Allãh; so whoever makes a pilgrimage to the House or performs 'umrah thereof, there is no blame on him to go round them both, i.e., even when there were idols on them.' " (al-'Ayyãshī)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) says describing the ḥajj of the Prophet : "After circumambulating around the House and praying its two rak'ahs, (the Prophet) recited: Surely the Ṣafã and the Marwah are among the signs of Allãh. (Then he said:) 'So I shall begin with that which Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, has begun with (i.e., from the Ṣafã).' And verily the Muslims used to think that walking between the Said and the Marwah was something invented by the polytheists; so Allãh revealed: Surely the Safã and the Marwah are among the signs of Allãh; so whoever makes a pilgrimage or performs 'umrah thereof, there is no blame on him to go round

---

1. In the 7th year of hijrah. (tr.)

them both." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: Obviously, there is no contradiction between the two traditions regarding the reason of the revelation of the verse. The words of the Prophet, "I shall begin with that which Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, has begun with", show the basis of legislation. We have narrated, in the story of Hãjar and her running seven times between the Ṣafã and the Marwah, that the ritual of as-sa'y started from that.

'Ãmir ash-Sha'bī said: "There was an idol, called Asãf, on the Ṣafã, and another, called Nã'ilah, on the Marwah. The people of (the days of) ignorance, after circumambulating the House, used to walk between the two (hills) and touch and wipe the two idols. When the Messenger of Allãh (peace be on him) arrived at Mecca, they (i.e., the Muslims) said: 'O Messenger of Allãh! (As for) the Ṣafã and the Marwah, surely the walking around them was done because of the two idols, and walking around them is not among the signs (of Allãh).' Then Allãh revealed: Surely the Safã and the Marwah. . . Thus, He (especially) mentioned the Ṣafã because of the idol that was on it, and affirmed the Marwah because of the idol that rose from it." (ad-Durru '1-manthũr)

The author says: Both sects have narrated numerous traditions having the above-mentioned themes. Their implication is that the verse was revealed in the year when the Muslims performed the ḥajj, while the Chapter of the Cow is the first one revealed at Medina. It may therefore be inferred that the verses are unconnected with the preceding verses (of the qiblah) which were revealed, as described earlier, in the second year of hijrah; nor are they related to the verses in the beginning of the chapter which were revealed in the first year of hijrah. It shows that the verses were revealed in various contexts, not in one.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Surely those who conceal the clear proofs and the guidance that We revealed: Obviously "the guidance" means that knowledge and sharī'ah which the Divine Religion contains, and which lead the followers to the eternal bliss; and "the clear proofs" means the verses, signs and the arguments which are the clear evidence, proofs and attestations for the truth – the truth that is guidance. "The clear proofs", as used in the Divine Speech, is a special description for the revealed verses. Therefore, concealing the clear proofs may mean hiding the verses themselves from the people; or concealing their true meaning through misinterpretation and misapplication – as the leaders of the Jews did with the verses prophesying the advent of the Prophet. What the people did not know, they concealed; and what they knew, they misinterpreted and diverted it from the Prophet.

QUR'ÃN: after We made it clear for men: It shows that they concealed the truth after Allãh made it clear for all the mankind, not only for the Jews. It is not feasible, in the prevalent world system, to explain a thing to each and every person individually – not only in revelation but in every general announcement. As a general rule, only a few persons are informed of the matter directly, and it is through them that the rest of the people get the information; he who is present conveys the message to the absent persons; the learned one explains it to the ignorant. The knowledgeable man is counted as one of the links to convey the message, like the tongue and speech. When a learned man, bound by the pledge taken from him, explains the message to others, he makes the truth clear to the people. If he hides his knowledge, he keeps the truth concealed from the people, after it was made clear to them. And, as Allãh has said, it is the only thing which has made people differ in matters of religion, and has diverted them from the path of guidance to that of misguidance. Otherwise, religion conforms with nature; human nature agrees with it and discerning mind surrenders to it when it is properly explained. Allãh says: Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion in natural devotion (to the truth) ; the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; there is no alteration (by anyone else) in the creation of Allãh; that is the right (established) religion, but most people do not know (30:30). So, the religion is natural; nature can never resist it, if it appears before it with some clarity, either because of the purity of the recipient's heart, as is the case of the prophets, or because it is explained properly – the latter method invariable always depends on the former.

That is why the above-quoted verse combines the two premises: the naturalness of religion and lack of its knowledge. It says: the nature made by Allãh in which He has made men; and then says: but most people do not know.

Again Allãh says: Mankind was but one people, so Allãh sent the prophets as bearers of good news and as warners, and He sent down with them the book with truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed. And none differed about it but the very people who were given it, after clear signs had come to them, revolting among themselves.. . (2:213). It shows that difference about the contents of the book emanates from the revolt of the scholars who already have its knowledge. Religious differences and deviations from the right path are caused by the revolt of the religious scholars as they conceal the revealed truth, misinterpret it and alter it; and because of their injustice. That is how "injustice" will be defined on the Day of Resurrection. Allãh says: Then a crier will cry out among them that the curse of Allãh is on the unjust, who hinder (people) from Allãh's way and seek to make it crooked .. . (7:44 - 5) . There are many verses of the same theme.

Clearly, the verse under discussion (Surely those who conceal the clear proofs . . .) is based on the above-quoted verse: Mankind was but one people, so Allãh sent the prophets as bearers of good news and as warners, and He sent down with them the book with truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they differed. And none differed about it but the very people who were given it, after clear signs had come to them, revolting among themselves. . . (2:213).

And it points to the recompense of that revolt in the next sentence, "these it is whom Allãh does curse . . ."

QUR'ÃN: these it is whom Allãh does curse, and those who curse do curse them (too). It describes the punishment of those who revolt against truth and hide the Book and the guidance which Allãh has sent down. The punishment is the curse by Allãh and the curse by those who curse. The word "curse" has been repeated because the curse of Allãh is different from the curse of those who curse. The curse by Allãh is removal from mercy and bliss, and that by those who curse is praying to Allãh to remove the cursed one from that mercy and bliss.

There is no restriction at all on the curse of Allãh or the curse of those who curse, nor is there any limitation on "those who curse". This generality shows that every curse by anyone who curses is actually directed to those revolters and concealers of the Divine Proof and Guidance. And reason supports this view: The aim of the curse is to remove the cursed one from happiness and bliss; and there is no real happiness and bliss except the religious one. As this real religious bliss is fully explained by Allãh and accepted by nature, no one can be deprived of it except the one who rejects and denies it. This deprivation is confined to him who knows it and then knowingly rejects it. It does not affect him who did not know the said religious bliss and to whom it was not clarified. Allãh has taken pledge from learned people to spread their knowledge and to publish whatever Divine proofs and guidance they had received. If they conceal it and hold it back, then in effect they have rejected it. Therefore, "these it is whom Allãh does curse, and those who curse do curse them (too)". This explanation is further supported by the following verse: "Surely those who disbelieve and die while they are disbelievers, these it is on whom is the curse of Allãh and the angels and men all." Apparently, the particle inna (إنَّ = surely) coming at the beginning of the verse gives the reason, or intensifies the theme, of the verse under discussion, by repeating its meaning in other words, "Surely those who disbelieve and die while they are disbelievers . . ."

QUR'ÃN : Except those who repent . . . the Merciful: It is the exception from the preceding verse. It qualifies their repentance with amending and making manifest the truth. They must make their previous behaviour known; they must announce their repentance.

In other words, they must announce to the people what they were concealing of the truth, and also make it known that previously they had concealed it. Otherwise, it will be as though they have not repented yet – because they are still hiding the fact of their previous concealment of the truth.

QUR'ÃN: Surely those who disbelieve and die while they are disbelievers, these it is on whom is the curse of Allãh and the angels and men all. It alludes to their persistence in disbelief and their obstinate and stubborn refusal to accept the truth. (If a man does not accept the true religion, not because of obstinacy and arrogance, but because it was not made clear to him, then in reality he is not a disbeliever, he is al-mustaḍ'af (المُسْتَضْعَفُ = weak; according to Islamic terminology, a man who does not have true faith, but is not inimical to it] ; his judgment is in the hand of Allãh.) This theme is supported by the fact that most of the verses describing the disbelief qualify it with "belying". Look especially at the verses of the descent of Ãdam, containing the first law legislated for the mankind: We said: "Get down you therefrom all together; and if there comes to you a guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, no fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve. And (as to) those who disbelieve in and belie Our signs, they are the inmates of fire, in it they shall abide." (2:39-40)

Likewise, in this verse the words, "Those who disbelieve and die while they are disbelievers," refer to those who obstinately belie the signs and guidance of Allãh – those who conceal what Allãh has revealed. And Allãh describes their recompense in these words: "these it is on whom is the curse of Allãh and the angels and men all". It is a Divine Decree that every curse by anyone from among the angels or men, without any exception, shall be attached to them only. In this respect they are like the Satan, when Allãh told him: And surely on you is curse until the Day of Judgment (15:35). Thus, Allãh made him the target of every curse from whatever source it may emanate. Likewise, these learned persons who conceal their knowledge are partners of Satan in this general and unrestricted curse. See how hard is the tone of this verse, and how formidable its theme! We shall write something related to it, Allāh willing, under the verse: That Allāh may separate the impure from the pure, and put the impure, some of it upon the other, and pile it up together, then cast it into the hell; these it is that are the losers. (8:37).

QUR'ĀN: Abiding in it (i.e., in the curse), their chastisement shall not be lightened nor shall they be given respite. The word "curse", has been changed here to "chastisement"; it shows that the curse shall be converted into their chastisement on that Day.

In these verses, the references to Allāh have been changed several times from the first person to the third and vice versa. The verse begins with the first person pronouns: "We revealed", "We made it clear"; then the style changes, mentioning Allāh by name, "Allāh does curse". The change was affected because the theme demands show of intense displeasure, and the greater the name of the displeased person, the more severe the effect of the displeasure – and none is greater than Allāh. Therefore, the action of the curse was attributed to Him by name, to give it the most vehement force. Then the reference was again changed to the first person pronouns, "I turn (mercifully) ; and I am the Oft-returning (to mercy) . . ." It was done to show the highest mercy and benevolence of Allāh – every adjective is discarded, all attributes are set aside and "I Myself return to them mercifully". You will appreciate the difference if you read this sentence thus: These it is to whom Allāh turns mercifully; or thus: These it is to whom their Lord turns mercifully. Obviously, these sentences do not show that high degree of mercy that reflects from this sentence, "these it is to whom I turn (mercifully)". The next verse again discards the pronoun for the Divine Name, "these it is on whom is the curse of Allāh"; and the reason is the same as was explained for the change in the first verse.

TRADITIONS

One of our companions has narrated from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.). He says: "I said to him: 'Tell me about the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the High: Surely those who conceal. . .'. He said: 'We are meant by it – and to Allãh is the resort for help. When (Imãmah) comes to one of us (i.e., the Imãms), he has no authority (or, choice) but to make it clear for the men who will be (Imãm) after him.' " (al- 'Ayyãshī) al-Bãqir (a.s.) said about this verse: "(Allãh) means us by it, and to Allãh is the resort for help."

Muhammad ibn Muslim said: "(The Imãm) said: 'These are the People of the Book.' "

The author says: All these traditions are based on the principle of the flow of the Qur'ãn and its application. Otherwise, the verse is general.

Some traditions quote 'Ali (a.s.) as saying: "Its interpretation is the learned people when they are depraved."

The Prophet said about this verse: "Whoever is asked about knowledge which he has got, and he conceals it, he shall be reined on the Day of Resurrection with a bridle of fire; and it is (the import of) His words, these it is whom Allãh does curse and those who curse do curse them (too)." (Majma'u 'l-bayãn)

The author says: These two traditions confirm what we have written in the Commentary.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said explaining the words of Allãh, and those who curse do curse them (too) : "We are those (who curse) ; and they say that it means the vermins of the earth." (al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: The explanation given by the Imãm reminds one of the import of the verse: . . . and the witnesses shall say: "These are they who lied against their Lord." Now surely the curse of Allãh is on the unjust (11:18). The Imãms are the witnesses, allowed by Allãh to speak on the Day of Judgment, who speak the right thing. The Imãm also mentioned some people's explanation that those who curse refers to the vermins of the earth. This interpretation is attributed to the exegetes like Mujãhid, 'Ikrimah and others; and some traditions ascribe it to the Prophet.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: about the verse, Surely those who conceal the clear proofs and the guidance, (that it means the proofs and guidance) "regarding 'Ali." (ibid.)

COMMENTARY

These verses are connected together in one context, with a single theme. They remind the audience about the belief of monotheism offering proofs to support it, and describe polytheism and its ultimate result.

QUR'ÃN: And your God is one God: We have explained the meaning of al-ilãh (الاٰلـهُ = god) in the Commentary of the first verse of the first chapter, the Opening. Oneness is a self-evident idea, which needs no explanation. A thing is called one in view of one of its attributes, for example, one man, one scholar or one poet. These words show that the related attribute is indivisible, and not subject to plurality. For example, the manhood of one man, Zayd, is not shared between him and someone else. It is in contrast with manhood of two men – Zayd and 'Amr, for example – which is shared by the two, and is therefore numerous. Thus Zayd, in context of his attribute of manhood, is one and indivisible and not subject to plurality. But when he is looked at in this very context combined with his other attributes – like his knowledge, power, life, etc. – then he is not one; he is a multiple in reality.

Allãh is One, in view of His attribute, like His divinity, which is not shared by anyone else. He is one in His divinity as well as in His knowledge, power and life. He has knowledge, unlike other knowledges, and power and life unlike others' powers and lives. Also, He is one because His attributes are not multiple, they are not separate from one another except in their verbal meanings; His knowledge, His power and His life, all is one thing, all is His very person; none of them is separate from the other. Allãh knows by His power, and has power by His life, and is alive by His know-ledge. He is not like other things where attributes are multiple and numerous not only in meanings but in reality also.

Sometimes a thing possesses the characteristic of oneness in its personality, that is, by its very nature and essence, it cannot accept multiplication or division in its self; it cannot be divided into various parts or into its person and name etc. This oneness is called oneness of person, and it is referred to with the word al-aḥad (اَلأَحَدُ = one) ; this word is never used except as a first construct of a genitive construction or in a negative, prohibitive or similar sentences, in the meaning of no one, any one, etc. For example, we say: No one came to me. This sentence negates the personality itself, irrespective of its oneness or plurality, because this oneness is related to its nature and essence, and not to its attribute. This connotation will be lost if we were to say, one man did not come to me. This sentence does not imply that two or more men did not come; it is because "oneness" in this sentence is an attribute of the corner, not of his person.

The reader should keep in mind this short explanation until we write about it in detail. Allãh willing, under the verse: Say: "He, Allãh, is One." (112:1)

The words, "And your God is one God," imply that divinity, godhead, is exclusively reserved for Allãh, and that His oneness in divinity is such as becomes His sublime status.

The word al-wãḥid (اَلوَاحِدُ = the one), as understood by the audience of the Qur'ãn, gives the idea of oneness, of a general type

That meaning may be applied to various kinds of oneness. But only a few of those connotations may be applied for Allãh. The word "one", may show oneness of number, of species, or of genes, etc. And the people were bound to take it in the meaning best suited to their beliefs and ideas. That is why the Qur'ãn did not say: And Allãh is one God. Because this sentence does not establish monotheism; even the polytheists say that He is one God, in the same way as each of their deities is one god.

Nor would have the sentence, And your God is one, established monotheism. Because it could be imagined that He is one in the species – of divinity. People say, when they enumerate the species of animals: Horse is one; mule is one – although horse and mule are manifold in number.

That is why the Qur'ãn said: "And your God is one God." "One God" (in contrast to two or more gods) is made predicate of "Your God". In this form the sentence clearly establishes the belief of monotheism, by restricting the godhead to one of the gods in which they believed.

QUR'ÃN: there is no god but He: It further emphasizes the clear declaration of the preceding sentence about monotheism and negates every possible misinterpretation or superstition. The negative particle "lã" (لَا = no) is used here to negate the genes; ilãh (إِلٰهَ = god) denotes here real and actual God. The sentence has an implied predicate "existent", and the meaning will be as follows: There is no real and actual god existing "but He". The pronoun "He", used in place of the proper name, Allãh, is in nominative, not subjunctive case. Therefore, the word "but" is not used here as particle of exception; rather it is an adjective in the sense of "other than". The complete sentence, thus, means: There is no real god, other than Allãh, existing.

The sentence therefore aims at repudiation of gods, other than Allãh – the deities which had no real existence outside the imagination of their worshippers. It does not aim at refuting other deities and proving the existence of Allãh, as many scholars have thought. Our explanation is supported by the fact that the sentence needs only a negative mode, and not a negative followed by affirmative. Only repudiation of other imaginary deities is enough to confirm the Oneness of Allãh in His godhead. Moreover, the Qur'ãn treats the existence of Allãh as a self-evident truth which needs no proof or argument. The Qur'ãn only cares to affirm and prove His attributes; for example, it only proves that Allãh is One; that He is the Creator, the Knower, the Powerful and so on.

Question: You say that the sentence has an implied predicate existent (or some other word of the same meaning). If so, then it would only negate the actual existence of other deities – but not the "possibility" of their existence.

Reply: 1. It is meaningless to suppose that there could be a "possible" or transient being (having equal relation with existence and non-existence), which would be the ultimate cause of all the existing things and their affairs.

2. We could change the predicate to "true" or "actual"; then the meaning would be: There is no god in reality other than He.

QUR'ÃN: the Beneficent, the Merciful: We have explained its meaning in the exegesis of the first verse of the first Chapter, the Opening. With these two names, the meaning of Allãh's Lordship becomes complete. From Him emanates every general bounty – pursuant to His Beneficence – and every special favour, in the way of guidance and the next world's bliss – pursuant to His Mercy.

QUR'ÃN: Most surely in the creation of the heavens and the earth . . . : As mentioned in the beginning, the verse aims at proving what the preceding verse has established: "And your God is one God: there is no god but He; He is the Beneficent, the Merciful." The verse under discussion may be analyzed as follows: There is a god for each of these phenomena; there is only one God for all of them; and that one God is your God too; He is the Beneficent who bestows general bounties; and the Merciful, who leads to the ultimate happiness – the blessings of the next world.

These are the established facts; and in the creation of the heavens and the earth, and the alternation of the night and the day, and all the phenomena mentioned in this verse, there are signs to prove these facts for a people who understand.

The verse offers arguments to prove that there is a god, and He is one – the God of this magnificent universe is One, and He Himself is the God of man. It is not the import of this verse to prove the existence of the God of man, or His oneness. Otherwise, all the phenomena mentioned in it would have all together constituted only one sign – by showing that the management of all is inter-related and forms a single system. If so, then the preceding verse should have been restyled in this way: And your God is one, there is no god but He.

The proofs in short run are as follows:

First Proof: These heavens, the canopy high above us with all these awe-inspiring luminous stars, constellations and galaxies shining therein; this earth, our shelter and refuge, with all its wonderful natural systems; all these regular changes and alternations occurring in this world – the alternation of the day and the night, the running ships and boats, the pouring rains, the changing winds, the suspended clouds – all these things need by their very nature, a Creator. There is, therefore, a Creator God for all of them.

Second Proof: Look at these heavenly bodies, varying in mass from the minutest to the largest. There is one so small that the scientists have found its volume to be equal to: 0.000000000 0000000000000033 cubic cm.; while there are others so huge as to be equal to millions of our earth – which in itself has a diameter of about 9,000 miles. They have found the distance between some celestial bodies to be 3,000,000 light years. A light year is approximately 365 x 24 x 60 x 60 x 300,000 kilometres.[1]

1. A light year is equal to 5,880,000 million miles. With tremendous advance in astronomy, it is now more usual to reckon distances in the parsec, which is equal to 3.258 light years, or 19,150,000 million miles. (tr.)

Ponder on these figures which boggle the mind and stupefy the brain. Then decide, as you wish to decide, about this unique and wonderful system. Keep in mind that each of these untold billions of the suns and planets act on, and react to,. the others, no matter where and how distant they are from each other. This goes on by the law of gravity, which permeates the whole universe, and through light and heat. In this way, the established system continues without any impediment. And it is an all-pervasive never stopping system, run according to an established law. Even the theory of relativity (which says that the directions of movements in the physical world are subject to deviations) affirms that that deviation itself is governed by another inviolable law.

This movement, this general rotation, appears in every part of the universe in a uniform way; look for example at the movement of the sun with its planets and satellites. Now look nearer at hand at our own earth, with its own moon and various systems (the day and the night, the winds, the clouds and the rains). Reduce your circle of vision once more, to ponder on earthly matters and creatures – minerals, vegetables, animals and various other things. Find out about countless species one after another; then go on reducing the circle until you come to the elements, then to the atoms; then the particles of the atoms; finally you shall come to what is today the last stage of the scientific discovery, that is, the electron and the proton. Even there you will find a miniature solar system at work; a nucleus around which these smallest particles revolve, exactly like the movement of the planets around their suns, and the endless journey of the suns (with their families) towards an unknown destination.

Stop at any stage in this scientific journey and you will find an amazing system – a system whose wonders will never cease and whose marvels will never stop. There is no exception in its flow, not even one; nor is there any question of chance in its intricately-woven design, not even a rare one. Man cannot reach its shore, nor does he fully comprehend all the signs on this path.

Proceed from the smallest to the largest heavenly body. You will find it a single universe with one and unified system and inter-related arrangement. Look through the most powerful far-reaching telescope and use the most advanced observatory, you will find the same law governing all celestial bodies.

Now, reverse your journey, until you reach again to the smallest unit. Break it down to its parts, reaching to molecule. You will find in it a miniature universe, with the same design and the same inter-related arrangement – although the two vastly differ in their natures and identities.

In short, the universe is one, and its arrangement and management inter-related; all its parts – no matter how diverse and multiple they may be – are managed under a single system; and the faces are humbled before the Living, the Self-subsistent God (20:111). Therefore, the God of the universe, is one; He alone created and He alone manages it.

Third Proof: Man is an earthly creature. He lives on the earth and after his death returns to it. His existence and life needs nothing more than the above-mentioned system that governs the whole universe – a unified and inter-related system. The heavenly bodies with the light and heat they generate, the earth with its alternated days and nights, the winds, the clouds and the rains, the beneficial goods it produces and which are transported from region to region – these are the things man requires for his physical needs, for his existence and continuation of life. And Allãh en-compasses them on every side (85:20). It proves that the God who created the universe and manages its affairs is the same God who also created man and manages his affairs. God of the universe is the God of man.

Again, it is God who bestows on every thing what it needs for happiness of this world and for bliss of the next (if he is qualified for the bliss of the next life) – because the next world is the ultimate destination of this abode. How can anyone man-age the end of any affair other than he who manages the affair itself? This is the proof given by the two names, The Beneficent, the Merciful.

And in this way is perfected the rational argument offered by this verse for the preceding one. This view is strengthened by the fact that this verse begins with the particle inna (إنَّ = surely) which is also used for offering arguments. And Allãh knows better.

In short, the words, "Most surely in the creation of the heavens and the earth", point to the heavens with all their luminary bodies, and the earth with all the wonderful creations and astounding products it contains; the forms which give each species its name, the matter which constitutes its body; their transformation from one form to the other, their recurring additions and subtractions, their joining together and breaking apart. As Allãh says: Do they not see that We come into the land curtailing it of its sides? (13:41); Do not those who disbelieve see that the heavens and the earth were closed up, so We have opened them: and We have made of water every thing living. . . ? (21:30)

QUR'ÃN: and the alternation of the night and the day: It refers to the changes in durations of the nights and the days which are caused by a combination of two factors: First is the daily rotation of the earth on its axis. This always keeps a little more than half of the earth's sphere facing towards the sun, which sends light and heat to the earth's surface – and that is called the day. The opposite side of the sphere is dark, throwing a conical shade in the space – and it is the night. The day and the night are continuously rotating on the face of the earth.

The second factor is the revolution of the earth on its orbit around the sun. The earth's axis does not form a right angle with the orbit ; it has a tilt (of 23½° [tr.]) ; and because of that tilt the earth's north-south position vis-à-vis the sun changes at different times of the year; when the northern hemisphere is inclined to the sun, it is summer in the north and winter in the south; when the southern hemisphere is inclined to the sun, the north experiences winter and the south, summer. Also, it is because of this tilt that the equator and the North and the South Poles always have days and nights of equal length: The two Poles have only one day and one night in a year – each night and each day being six months long. When it is day on the North Pole, the South Pole has its night, and vice versa. As for the equator, it has about 365 days and 365 nights in a solar year – all of equal length. As for the other regions, the days and the nights differ – in number as well as in length, depending on their distance from the equator and the two Poles. Full description of this phenomenon may be found in the sciences concerned.

It is because of this difference that the sun's life-giving light and heat reach various regions of the earth with varying intensity. This in its turn creates diversity in various factors governing the earth and its environment. And man profits from that diversity in numerous ways.

QUR'ÃN: And the ships that run in the sea with that which profits men: al-Fulk (الْفُلْكُ) is boat, ship; it is used for singular and plural both. al-Fulk and al-fulkah (الْفُلْكَةُ) have the same meaning; as at-tamr and at-tamrah (اَلتَّمْرُ، التَّمْرَةُ = date) are synonymous. "that which profits men", refers to various types of cargoes and food items which are transported by ship from coast to coast, from region to region.

The verse counts the ships (which are made by man) side by side with those things and natural phenomena which are beyond human power, like the heavens, the earth and the alternation of the day and the night. It shows that ultimately the ships too, like those natural phenomena, are the handiwork of Allãh. On deep consideration, when we ascribe a work to a man, it has no more significance than ascribing it to a natural cause. Of course, man has a free will and power. But he is not a sufficient or total cause; nor does that freedom make him independent of Allãh. He is as much in need of Allãh's will and permission as any other natural cause. A natural cause acts on, and reacts with, a matter and through a process of combination and break up gives it a form – let us say, turns it into a rock. A man cuts, breaks up and joins some matters giving them a form – let us say, turn them into a boat. Is there any difference between the two makers? Both ultimately draw their strength and ability from Divine creation and invention; nothing is independent of Allãh either in its person or in its activities.

Boat too, like all physical creations, depends on Allãh in its existence, as well as in management of its affairs. Allãh has pointed to this fact in the verse, where Ibrãhīm (a.s.) is quoted as telling his people about the idols which they worshipped as god: And Allãh has created you and what you make (37:96). Admittedly, an idol is but a thing made by man, and Ibrãhīm (a.s.) ascribes its making to Allãh. The same applies to the boats and ships. Also, Allãh says: And His are the ships reared aloft in the sea like mountains (55:24). According to this verse, the ships belong to Allãh. Again, He says: and He has made the ships subservient to you, that they might run their course in the sea by His command . . . (14:32). This verse declares that also the ships' affairs is in Allãh's hands.

CAN MAN-MADE THINGS BE ATTRIBUTED TO ALLAH

How heedless are those who think that the things made and manufactured by man are exclusively his creation and can-not be attributed to Allãh at all – just because they are made by man's will and choice !

First, in this group are the materialists who do not believe in a Creator. They say: The theists believed in a Creator because they found in the nature many things and happenings whose material cause they did not know. As they knew that nothing could happen without a cause, they had to admit that there was a cause for such things and happenings, which was not known to them yet. In this way they came to believe that there was, for those things of unknown cause, a cause whose reality was hidden from them and which was beyond the natural world – and that cause was God. According to the materialists, the belief in the existence of a Creator was a hypothesis which emanated from the ignorance of the primitive man: that man was surrounded by so many phenomena of unknown causes; for example, atmospheric changes and many happenings on the earth. Likewise, there were many psychological factors (whose natural causes are unknown to the science even today). And this resulted in the belief in a supernatural Creator.

They say: Now the sciences have succeeded in unravelling many mysteries of natural phenomena, and in identifying their natural causes. Thus, one of the two pillars of the above-mentioned hypothesis has been pulled down – that is, the need of some natural phenomena for a super-natural cause. Now remains the other pillar – that is, the need of some psychological factors for an immaterial cause. The recent advances in the field of the organic chemistry, give us hope that man will soon understand the mysteries of the soul; then he will be able to manufacture the life-giving cells and germs. This will enable him to create any living being and bring about any psychological effect. Then the second pillar of this hypothesis will go down – and there will remain no basis for believing in a super-natural Creator. Man will create whatever he wishes of spiritual and psychological effects, as he is making today whatever he likes of the physical and material things – although just yesterday he was insisting that there was a hypothetical super-natural cause for these things. Now we know why he held that belief – it was just because he did not know the real cause of these phenomena.

COMMENTS: First: If these fat-heads were to wake up from their conceit, they would see that the theists from the very beginning of their belief in a Creator (and there never was a beginning for it) affirmed that creative cause for the whole universe – those things having known physical causes as well as those having unknown causes. According to them this whole lot, in its entirety, needs a cause, separate from the universe. Clearly what the materialists reject is not what the theists believe in.

The theists – and the history and the research has not been able to pin-point a starting point for the belief in the Creator, in the history of humanity – have believed in the existence of one or more creators for the whole universe, although the Qur'ãn has shown that the religion of monotheism appeared before poly-theism; and the orientalist, Max Muller, the pioneer in the studies of Sanskrit, also has thrown light upon it. Obviously, the theists, even the primitive man among them, used to see and recognize physical causes of many physical phenomena. Yet, they affirmed that there was a God for the whole universe (not excluding those phenomena of known causes). Evidently, when they believed in the existence of the Creator, basing their argument on the all-pervasive system of cause-and-effect, it was not to solve the problem of some phenomena of which they could not find a cause. After all, they did not say that some parts of the universe needed a Creator, while others (having some known causes) did not need that. What they believed was this: The universe is made up of a series of natural causes and effects. This whole universe, taken as a composite unit, needs and requires a Cause, above all other causes; all actions and reactions, all causes and effects, interacting amongst its countless components, rely and depend on that Cause of the causes. The belief in that Supreme Cause does not negate the general law of causality which permeates all components of the universe. In the same way, the existence of material causes for the material effects does not make this whole chain of the causes and effects independent of the Supreme Cause, who is out of this universe and separate from it. (When we say 'out of this universe', we do not mean that the Supreme Cause is placed on the summit of the pyramid of the causes and effects. We mean that the Supreme Cause encompasses the whole universe with all its causes and effects, from every possible side.)

The materialists have fallen in an amusing contradiction. They believe that there is a general all-pervasive compulsion in all happenings in the world – including human actions. According to them, every action, every happening, is a compulsory, inescapable effect of various causes. And at the same time they say that if a man created another man, it would not finally end at the Cause of the universe – if there is such a cause.

This fine and deep theme is always present in the subconscious mind of common people (even if a simple man is unable to express it in so many words). That is why they say that the whole universe – together with all its causes and effects – is the creation of a Creator God.

Second: When the theist philosophers furnish the rational proofs to prove the existence of the Creator, they do so after establishing that there is an all-pervasive system of causality in the world. Then they proceed to prove that all these "possible", transient causes must end at an essential, self-existent cause.

This method has been used by them for thousands of years, from the earliest age of philosophy to this day. There was never any doubt in their minds that the effects – including the natural transient causes – need an essential Cause. In other words, when they attribute the effects to an essential cause, it is not done because they do not know some thing's natural cause.

Third: The Qur'ãn proves the oneness of the Creator. It does so by showing that all components of the universe are governed by the general law of causality; it accepts the attribution of each happening to its particular cause, and confirms what normal wisdom says about it. It ascribes natural phenomena to their natural causes, and attributes to man the actions done by his own free will. There is no need to quote here numerous verses based on this theme. And then it ascribes all these things and happenings – without any exception – to Allãh. For example, Allãh is the Creator of every thing (39:62) ; That is Allãh, your Lord, the Creator of every thing; there is no god but He (40:62); His is the creation and command (7:54); His is what is in the heaven and what is in the earth and what is between them two and what is beneath the ground (20:6). Whatever may be called a "thing", it is created by Allãh, and may be attributed to Him in a way befitting His Majesty. There are other verses which attribute an action to its doer and at the same time ascribe it to Allãh. For example, And Allãh has created you and what you make (37:96). The verse attributes the actions of men to them and then attributes their creation and that of their actions to Allãh. Also, it says: and you did not smite when you smote (the enemy), but it was Allãh Who smote (8:17). This verse admits that the act of throwing arrow was done by the Messenger of Allãh, and then negates it, ascribing it to Allãh Himself. There are other verses of the same connotation.

There are some other verses which combine the two attributions in a general way. For example, . . . and Who created every thing, then ordained for it a measure (25:2); Surely We have created every thing according to a measure . . . And every thing small and great is written down (54:49 – 53) ; Allãh indeed has made a measure for every thing (65:3) ; And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure (15:21). Making or appointing a measure for every thing means that Allãh has confined it within the limits of the material causes and the boundaries of time and space.

In short, it can never be doubted that the Qur'ãn proves the existence of the One and Only God basing its arguments on the system of causality found in all the components of the universe; and then it attributes the whole universe to Allãh, Who created and made all of it. It is not that we ascribe some things to Allãh and some others to their material causes – as the materialists allege.

Why could not the materialists understand this clear fact? They were misled by the Church in the medieval ages, whose pseudo-philosophers tackled this and similar problems in the manner quoted by the materialists; writers of other religions too rely on similar arguments. The fact is that their discourses were distorted, and their arguments lacked precision. They wanted to explain their true claim (which, their reason told them in general terms, was correct). They tried to go into details of that general idea. But their weak understanding and unripe reasoning led them away from the right method; consequently, they generalized their claim and misdirected their argument. It were they who attributed every thing or effect of unknown cause directly to Allãh, and said that voluntary actions did not need any outside cause, and that consequently man's voluntary actions did not belong to Allãh; man was independent of Allãh in such actions. We have written on this topic in detail under the verse: but He does not cause to err by it (any) except the transgressors (2:26); here something more has been added to complete the discourse.

Another group is that of some Muslim traditionalists and theologians (and some others) whose vision does not penetrate to the inner core of a subject. They did not understand how could the voluntary actions of man be attributed to Allãh in a manner that would conform with His Sublime Majesty. Consequently, they thought that man-made things could not be said to have been made by Allãh, and especially those things which were made exclusively for sins, for example, liquor, and instruments of music and gambling etc. Allãh says: . . . intoxicants and games of chance and (sacrificing to) stones set up and (dividing by) arrows are only an abomination of Satan's handiwork . . . (5:90). And evidently what Allãh counts as handiwork of Satan should not be ascribed to Allãh Himself.

COMMENT : The discourse written earlier is enough to show the invalidity of this erroneous surmise – both from the Qur'ãn and traditions and the rational point of view. The fact is that man's voluntary actions may be attributed to Allãh in a befitting manner, and likewise man-made things, being the result of those actions, may be attributed to Allãh.

Moreover, "the stones", mentioned in the verse 5:90 above, refers to the idols and images which are set for worship, and the verse 37:96 (And Allãh has created you and what you make) says that those idols too are creation of Allãh. Obviously, an idol may be looked at from different perspectives. From one point of view it may be ascribed to Allãh, for example, looking at the nature of its existence, disregarding the fact of its being used for sin of polytheism. What is an idol? It is just a stone or metal with a particular shape; and as such there is no reason why it should not be attributed to the Creator of all things. Of course, from another angle it is a thing that is worshipped besides Allãh; and from this perspective it cannot be attributed to Allãh; it should rather be ascribed to the Satan or man. The same principle may be applied for other man-made things.

It clearly shows that man-made things may be attributed to Allãh just like any other natural phenomenon, without any difference. Of course, it all depends on the degree of existence the said things enjoy. (Think on it.)

QUR'ÃN: and the water that Allãh sends down from the cloud, then gives you life with it to the earth after its death and spreads in it all (kinds of) animals: What is rain? There are various elements mixed in the water of rivers and other water sources. Then it turns into steam, going up and carrying heat. The steam continues to ascend until it reaches extremely cold strata of the atmosphere. Then the steam changes into water coming down as rain. Some times the steam is frozen into snow or hail. In what-ever form, it comes down to us, which drinks it in and becomes alive again. Also, the earth stores a major part of the rain, etc., above or below its surface, and that water comes out and flows as streams and rivers, etc., on the face of earth. Water is the source of life for every living thing. The rain coming down from the clouds is a phenomenon of life, which takes place according to a well regulated and intricately laid down system – without any break down or exception. The genesis of vegetables and animals – of all types – depends on water.

The rain – being inter-woven with so many phenomena of the universe, horizontally and vertically – becomes an inseparable part of the universe. It needs a Creator to create it, a cause to bring it into existence. In other words, there is a God for it. And man's genesis and life depend on the rain and water. Therefore, the same God who has created water and the intricate system of rain, is the God who has created man. The God of rain is the God of man.

QUR'ÃN: and the changing of the wind: It refers to the changes in directions of the wind, because of various natural factors, the most important of them being the sun's rays. The sun raises the temperature of the air, making it lighter and less dense. This lighter air is unable to carry the load of the surrounding air which is cooler and heavier. Therefore, the heavier air glides down, forcibly displacing the lighter one. The lighter air travels in a direction opposite to that of the heavier one. And the resulting current is called wind. The wind helps in pollination of trees, shrubs and flowers, removes atmospheric pollutions, carries rain clouds from one place to another, besides rendering many other services. Blowing of wind is a most important factor in the genesis and life of vegetable, animal and man.

Wind, by itself, proves that there is a Creator God; by its inter-woven relation with other terrestrial and extra terrestrial phenomena, proves that there is only one Creator for the whole universe; and by being a very important factor for the genesis and life of man, proves that the God of man and the God of the universe is one and the same.

QUR'ÃN: and the clouds made subservient between the heaven and the earth: as-Saḥãb (اَلسَّحَابُ) is condensed watery vapour floating in air at some distance; it is the source of rain. As long as the steam remains on or near the earth, it is called aḍ-ḍabãb (اَلضَّبَابُ = fog; mist) ; when it leaves the earth and floats in the air at a distance, it is called as-saḥãb, al-ghaym (اَلغَيْمُ) and alghamãm (اَلغَمَامُ), etc., all having the same meaning: cloud. at-Taskhīr (اَلتَّسْخِيْرُ = to subjugate a thing, to make it subservient in its activities). The cloud is made subservient, in its flow and rain, to the winds and atmospheric temperature and other relevant factors, by the permission of Allãh.

The cloud is a sign of Allãh in the same way as other things mentioned with it.

The alternation of the day and the night, the rain coming down from the clouds, the blowing of wind and the subservient clouds are the main natural phenomena, which together make up the system of creation in the terrestrial world, like the vegetable, the animal and the man. This verse may therefore be taken to be a detail of the general statement contained in the verse: . . . and He blessed therein and made therein its foods, in four periods: alike for the seekers (41:10).

QUR'ÃN: there are signs for a people who understand. al-'Aql (اَلعَقْلُ) is maṣdar of 'aqala, ya'qilu (عَقَلَ، يَعْقِلُ = he understood, he understands). It denotes perfect comprehension and understanding. al-'Aql is that by which man differentiates between good and bad, distinguishes fact from fiction, and discerns truth and falsehood. It is the self same man who perceives; it is not one of his faculties and characteristics which are like branches of the soul, for example, the memory, and the eye-sight, etc.

QUR'ÃN: And there are some among men who take for themselves equals (i.e., objects of worship) besides Allãh:an-Nidd (اَلنِّدُّ) is on the paradigm of al-mithl (اَلمِثْلُ) and has the same meaning: equal, alike, etc. In some other verses Allãh has used a slightly different phrase; for example, therefore do not set up equals to Allãh (2:22) ; and they set up equals with Allãh (14:30). The style has been changed here to "besides Allãh" because it is preceded by the exclusive statement: "And your God is one God! there is no god but He; . . ." Thus anyone taking any object of worship besides Allãh would violate that exclusiveness without any justification; he would take as god something which, he is well aware, is not god; he would do so just in pursuit of his base desire, and in complete disregard to the decree of his reason. That is why Allãh has used the word "equals" as common noun, to show their degradation: "And there are some among men who take for themselves equals besides Allãh."

QUR'ÃN: Whom they love as the love for Allãh, and those who believe are stronger in (their) love for Allãh: The word used is yuḥibbũnahum (يُحِبُّونَهُمْ = they love them); the objective pronoun used here is reserved for rational beings. It means that the word "equals" does not refer to idols only, it includes also the angels and those men who were worshipped besides Allãh. Rather, it covers all those who were obeyed by people without any authority from Allãh. This interpretation gets support from the verse following it: When those who were followed shall renounce those who followed (them) (2:166). Also, Allãh says: . . . and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allãh (3:64); They have taken their doctors of law and their monks for lords besides Allãh (9:31).

The verse shows that love may be attributed to Allãh in reality, contrary to the claims of those who say that love, being a branch of the faculty of desire, is related in reality to the body and the matters concerning the body only; and cannot be attributed as such to Allãh. According to them, love of God means obedience to Him, doing what He commands us to do and refraining from what He forbids; thus love may be attributed to Allãh only in a metaphorical sense, as Allãh says: Say: "If you love Allãh, then follow me, Allãh will love you and forgive you your sins" (3:31).

But the verse under discussion goes against their claim. The phrase "stronger in (their) love for Allãh", shows that love of Allãh may vary in intensity; it is stronger in the believers than in those who take others as equals to Allãh. On the other hand, if love is taken to mean obedience, the meaning would be: "and those who believe are more obedient to Allãh". Obviously, there could be no question here of any comparative degree of obedience, because the obedience of others is no obedience at all in the eyes of Allãh. Therefore, "love" here has been used in its real, not metaphorical, sense.

It is supported also by the verse which says: Say: "If your fathers and your sons and your brethren and your mates and your kinsfolk and property which you have acquired, and the trade slackness of which you fear and dwellings which you like, are dearer to you than Allãh and His Messenger and striving in His way . . . " (9:24). The word translated here as 'dearer' is aḥabb(اَحَبُّ = more loved). Evidently the love ascribed to Allãh, and that ascribed to His Messenger, and the love attributed to the fathers, the sons, and the property, etc., is all of the same quiddity, all of it has the same reality. Otherwise, the phrase 'dearer to you' could not be used. The comparative degree signifies that both sides – the preferred one and the preferred against – share in the basic quality, although they differ in its degree, one being stronger, the other weaker.

The verse condemns those who take others as equals to Allãh, saying: "whom they love as the love for Allãh" ; then it praises the believers, saying that they, "are stronger in (their) love for Allãh." This comparison between the two groups apparently shows that the former has been condemned because they have divided their love between Allãh and those whom they have taken as equals to Allãh. There was possibility of a misunderstanding that if they had loved Allãh more, they would not have been blamed. But the next sentences leave no room for such erroneous surmises. "O that those who are unjust could see when they see the chastisement that the power is wholly Allãh's . . . When those who were followed shall renounce those who followed (them), and they see the chastisement and their ties are cut asunder . . . Thus will Allãh show them their deeds to be intense regret to them . . ." These verses make it clear that they have been condemned not because of the love, per se, but because of its concomitant, that is, following. They followed false deities thinking that those deities had power which would help the followers to fulfil their desires or to ward off some undesirable situation. Thus, they discarded the truth either wholly or in some aspects – and the one who follows Allãh in some aspects only, is not a follower at all. Thus, there is no room for the above-mentioned misunderstanding. It is now clear that man should not take any partner for Allãh in this love, otherwise, it will be polytheism. However, when the love for Allãh becomes stronger, the lover does not follow anyone other than Allãh; he exclusively obeys the commands of Allãh. That is why the believers have been praised that they "are stronger in (their) love for Allãh".

Now we know that the love has been praised and condemned because of its concomitant, that is, following and obedience. If a man loves someone other than Allãh in obedience to the commands of Allãh, when that someone calls to the obedience of Allãh only, then such a love cannot be censured at all. As Allãh says: Say: "If your fathers and your sons . . . are dearer to you than Allãh and His Messenger . . ." (9:24). This verse assigns to the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) a love as it assigns it to Allãh Himself; it is so because love of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) is one with the love of Allãh. Why? Because the effect of this love, that is, following of the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) is exactly the obedience of Allãh. Allãh Himself calls to the obedience of His Messenger, as He says: And We did not send any messenger but that he should be obeyed by Allãh's permission (4:64) ; Say: "If you love Allãh, then follow me, Allãh will love you" (3:31). In the same category comes the love of any one whose obedience leads to the obedience of Allãh, for example, a religious scholar who guides people by his knowledge, a sign that points to Allãh, the Qur'ãn which brings the reciter nearer to Allãh, and things like that. All these are loved because of the love of Allãh, and by following them one obeys Allãh and comes nearer to Him.

In short, whoever loves any one besides Allãh, thinking that he has a power, and follows him in order to fulfil some of his needs, or obeys him in a matter which Allãh has not allowed, then he has indeed taken other objects of worship besides Allãh, and surely Allãh will show them their deeds to be intense regret to them. On the other hand, the believers are those who love nothing except Allãh, do not seek power except from Allãh, and do not follow except that which is from the commands and prohibitions of Allãh. They are those who are sincere to Allãh in religion.

Also, it is clear that the love of those whose love is Allãh's love, and whose obedience Allãh's obedience (like the Prophet and his progeny; the divine scholars, the Book of Allãh and the traditions of His Prophet; in short, every thing that leads one to Allãh's remembrance in a sincere way) is diametrically opposed to polytheism. Indeed, one proceeds nearer to Allãh by loving and following the above-mentioned personalities and things. To honour and respect them is a part of piety, and love and fear of Allãh. As Allãh says: and whoever respects the signs of Allãh, this surely is (the outcome) of the piety of hearts (22:32). ash-Sha'ã'ir (الشَّعَآئِرُ) means the signs that lead or point to some-thing; the phrase, 'the signs of Allãh' is general, not restricted to any particular thing like the Ṣafã and the Marwah, etc. It means that one must respect every sign of Allãh, every divinely approved symbol which reminds one of Allãh; because it is an outcome of piety, a reflection of the love and fear of Allãh. And this principle applies to all the signs which lead one to piety.

Of course, it is clear as day that one should not think that those signs and symbols are in any way independent of Allãh, or that they control for themselves or for others any harm or profit, or that they have any independent authority over their own or others' life, death or resurrection. Evidently, if one had such a belief, then these things would not remain signs of Allãh, they would become equals of Allãh – and it would be ash-shirk (الشِّرْكُ = ascribing partners to Allãh) ; may He protect you from such polytheism.

QUR'ÃN: O that those who are unjust could see, when they see the chastisement, that the power is wholly Allãh's and that Allãh is severe in chastisement: Apparently, "when they see the chastisement" is the object of the verb, "could see"; and "that the power is wholly Allãh's and that Allãh is severe in chastisement" are the explanatory phrases describing "the chastisement" (in the phrase "when they see the chastisement"). Wa-law (وَلَوْ = would that; O that; if only; I wish) is an optative particle, used to express wish. The verse therefore means: Would that those who are unjust could see in this world the day when they would see the chastisement; then they would see that the power belongs wholly to Allãh, and that they had committed the greatest blunder when they ascribed some of that power to their false deities, and that Allãh is severe in chastisement and in punishing those who are guilty of this unforgiveable sin. As the next verses show, the chastisement would contain of their seeing their blunder in taking other objects of worship besides Allãh, and in their wrong assumption that those objects had any power, and then seeing the punishment of their polytheism and misdeed. The next two verses support this interpretation: "When those who were followed shall renounce those who followed (them)." The followers will not get any hoped-for benefit from their leaders; "and they see the chastisement and their ties are cut asunder". Nothing shall have any power or effect besides Allãh. "And those who followed shall say: 'O were there for us a return:' " they shall ardently wish to return to this world. "then we would renounce" these objects of worship whom we took as equals to Allãh, and whom we followed, in this world, "as they have renounced us" in the next world. "Thus will Allãh show" those who were unjust and took others as equals to Allãh, "their deeds" (i.e., their love and obedience to those leaders whom they took as equals to Allãh) "to be intense regret to them, and they shall not come forth from the fire".

QUR'ÃN: and they shall not come forth from the fire: It is a proof against those who say that the chastisement of the fire shall one day come to an end.

TRADITIONS

Shurayḥ ibn Hãni said: "A Bedouin went on the day of the Camel to the Leader of the faithful (‘Ali, a.s.) and said: ‘O Leader of the faithful! Do you say that Allãh is one?’ " (Shurayḥ) said: "Then the people bore down on him and said: ‘O Arab! Don’t you see how preoccupied the Leader of the faithful is?’ But the Leader of the faithful said: ‘Let him be. Because what (this) Bedouin wants (i.e., gnosis of Allãh) is the very thing which we want from these people (i.e., the enemies): Then he (Ali, a.s.) said: ‘O Arab! The sentence, "Allãh is one", may be interpreted in four ways, two of them are not permissible for Allãh and two are allowed. The two meanings which are not permissible for Allãh are: (1) The saying of a sayer "one", when he uses it as a number: It is not permissible, because that which has no second (i.e., is unique) does not come within the domain of number. Do you not see that (Allãh) has declared him an unbeliever who said that God was the third of the three? (2) And the saying of a sayer that "He is one of the people", in the same sense as a species is one of (its) genes. This (also) is not allowed because it likens Allãh (to other things), and our Lord is too great for, and far above of, this (likening). And as for the two meanings which are applicable to Him, they are: (1) The saying of a sayer, "He is one, there is nothing like unto Him"; such (indeed) is our Lord. (2) And the saying of a sayer that, He, the Mighty, the Great, is unique in significance, that is, He is not divisible – neither in existence, nor in thought or imagination; such (indeed) is our Lord.’ " (al-Khiṣãl; at-Tawḥīd; Ma‘ãni ‘l-akhbãr)

The author says: The two meanings confirmed by him (‘Ali, a.s.) conform with what we have written in the explanation of the verse: And your God is one God. . .

The lectures narrated from ‘Ali (a.s.), ar-Riḍã (a.s.) and other Imãms of the Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.) repeatedly say that ‘He is one not by number’. It refers to His pristine person which does not accept counting.

There is in a prayer of aṣ-Ṣaḥīfah as-Sajjãdiyyah, the sentence, "Thine is the oneness of number". It is interpreted as to refer to "ownership", that is, 'Thou art the owner of the oneness of number'; it does not meant that 'Thou art one in number', because reason as well as the Qur'ãn and the traditions firmly prove that His existence is Unique and pure, it is not duplicable nor can it be repeated – according to His person and reality.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said in a tradition, inter alia, about the words of Allãh, And there are some among men who take for them-selves equals besides Allãh . . .: "O Jãbir! They are, by Allãh!, the leaders of the unjust ones and their followers" (al-Kãfī; al-Ikhtiṣãṣ; al-'Ayyãshī). In the last-named book the wording is: "O Jãbir! By Allãh! They are the leaders of the injustice and their followers."

The author says: Its meaning is clear in the light of the explanation given above. Why did the Imãm refer to them as "the leaders of injustice"? It is because Allãh has said: O that those who are unjust could see. . . Thus, the followers who took for themselves equals besides Allãh were "unjust"; therefore, their leaders must be "the leaders of the unjust ones" and "the leaders of injustice".

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, Thus will Allãh show them their deeds to be intense regret to them: "He is a man who leaves (untouched) his wealth and because of avarice does not spend it in the obedience of Allãh; then he dies and leaves it to someone who uses it in the obedience of Allãh, or in His dis-obedience. If he (the heir) used it in the obedience of Allãh, (the legator) shall see it in the "balance" of another man, and he shall look at it in intense regret, as the wealth had (originally) belonged to him. And if he (the heir) used it in disobedience of Allãh, then it was he (the legator) who strengthened him with that wealth so that he used it in the disobedience of Allãh." (al-Kãfī) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.). It has used the word, equals, in a wider sense; and as we have explained earlier, this expanded meaning is with-out any doubt, quite in place.

The author says: This meaning has been narrated by al-'Ayyãshī, aṣ-Ṣadũq, al-Mufid and at-Tabrasi, from al-Bãqir and

A PHILOSOPHICAL DISCOURSE ON LOVE

Love is one of our emotional feelings; we apply it for the love of food, love of women, love of wealth, love of honour and love of knowledge. We have no doubt that we have these five loves. Also, there is no doubt that when we use the word, love, in the above contexts, we intend the same meaning everywhere; and not only the word, but the meaning also is the same in all the five phrases. At the same time, we know that these contexts are different. The question is: Is this a difference of categories, or of some other type?

Let us look at the love of food. We love an edible thing, like a fruit, because it is related to the activity of our faculty of nutrition. If there were no such faculty, if there were not that nourishment which perfects our body, we would not have loved that fruit, and there would have been no such love. Therefore, the love exists, in reality, between the faculty of nutrition and its activity, on one side, and the satisfaction which that faculty gets from that activity, on the other side. When we say, "satisfaction", we do not mean the satisfying taste which one feels when eating – because the sense of taste is a functionary of the faculty of nutrition, and not the faculty itself. We actually mean that particular pleasure which the faculty gets from its activity.

Likewise, if we look at the love of women, we find that that love is related in reality and primarily to cohabitation, and only secondarily to the women, as its concomitant – in the same way as the love of food was related to a particular food just secondarily and only as a concomitant. Cohabitation is the effect of a faculty given to animals, in the same way as eating food is the effect of a faculty given to them. Evidently, these two loves belong to the same root, that is, a subsistent relationship between these two faculties and their activities – in other words their active perfection.

At this stage, it might possibly be thought that love was an attachment exclusively reserved for the above two faculties, that it was not found in other contexts. But experiment (through various effects) removes this misunderstanding. This attachment, known as love, has an effect on the lover. The lover moves towards the object of his/its love, and yearns for the loved action if he/it is separated from it, and does not like to leave it, after he/it has found it. This particular effect of love is found in all our powers of conception and their actions. All our powers and faculties like eye-sight, hearing, memory and imagination – in short all our internal and external senses – have this very effect, this very attribute, no matter whether they are acting or reacting. Each of these faculties loves its activity and is attracted to it. And it is only because its activity is its perfection, makes up its deficiency, and fulfils its natural need. In this way, we know the significance of the love of wealth, love of power and love of knowledge. Man seeks his perfection through his wealth, honour and knowledge.

It may be inferred from it that love is a special emotional attachment, a particular conscious attraction between man and his perfection. Detailed researches have shown that it is found in animals too. And it is because the lover acts upon, and reacts to, his loved activity; then that love extends to the things related to that activity, as the love of eating was extended to that of fruit. This principle would apply also to other things besides animals, provided they could consciously seek or bestow perfection.

From another point of view, as love is a subsistent relationship between the lover and the loved, there exists a positive connection between them. Now, if an effect (which has the relation of love with its cause) is a conscious being and has got sense and feeling, it would find that love within its soul – if it has a soul and independent existence.

The above discourse leads us to the following conclusions:–

First: Love is a subsistent relationship, a special attraction between perfecting cause (or things like that) and perfection-seeking effect (or things like that). That is why we love our actions, because through them we seek perfection. And as its extension, we love the things related to our activities; for example, food which we take, mate with whom we cohabit, wealth which we use, honour from which we gain benefit, a benefactor who bestows something on us, a teacher who teaches us, a leader who guides us, a helper who helps us, a student who learns from us, a servant who serves us, a follower who obeys and follows us. All these are various manifestations of love, some of them are physical, some imaginary and some others intellectual.

Second: Love has different degrees of strength and weakness, because it is a subsistent attraction, an existing attachment – and there are such degrees even in existence itself. Obviously, the attachment between a sufficient cause and its effect cannot be like the one existing between an insufficient cause and its effect. Also, the perfection (because of which the attachment of love comes into being) is itself of various categories, some of it essential, some others inessential, some of it material (like nourishment), others immaterial (like knowledge). It shows the invalidity of the theory which says that love is exclusively reserved for material things. (Some of them said that love was basically related to food only, and other loves issued forth from it; some others gave that central place to the love of sexual intercourse; according to them all other loves branched out from it.)

Third: Allãh deserves to be loved – from whatever angle you look at it. Allãh is Self-subsistent, exists by Himself; His perfection is limitless while all other perfections are but limited. A limited thing attaches itself to the limitless one in existence. This attachment, this love, is a part of existence, a part of personality; it can never diminish or go away. Moreover, Allãh has created us, and bestows on us countless and limitless favours; that is why we love Him, as every bestower of bounties is loved for his favours.

Fourth: As mentioned in the beginning, love is subsistent and existing relationship. Such relations are not separate from the very existence of their subjects. It follows that every thing loves its own person. Also, it was mentioned that by its extension, we love the things related to the loved – therefore, every thing loves the effects of its own existence. It is clear from the above that Allãh loves His creation because of His love of His Own Self; and He loves His creation because they are recipients of His favours; and He loves His creation because they accept His guidance.

Fifth: We said earlier that sense, consciousness and knowledge are concomitants of love. But it is necessary in practice only, Otherwise, the subsistent attachment – which is the reality of love – does not depend, per se, on these factors. It appears from this that even the natural powers and faculties – which have no sense or feeling – love their own actions and effects.

Sixth: It follows that love is a reality which permeates all the existing things.

ANOTHER PHILOSOPHICAL DISCOURSE ON PERPETUITY OF PUNISHMENT

The question arises: Will the chastisement of the Hell come to its end at some time, or will it continue endlessly? Both theories have their adherents and both groups support their views with intellectual reasoning and apparent meanings of the Qur'ãn and traditions.

As for the Qur'ãn, it unambiguously declares that many groups shall abide for ever – endlessly and perpetually – in the Hell. As Allãh says: and they shall not come forth from the fire (2:167).

And nearly mutawãtir traditions narrated from the Imãms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) clearly say the same thing. Of course, there are some traditions emanating from other sources which support the view that the chastisement will end. But these traditions must be rejected outright because they are against the clear declarations of the Qur'ãn.

Now, we come to intellectual reasons. As we said under the verse: And be on your guard against the day when one soul shall not avail another . . . (2:48), it is not possible to explain the details concerning the Resurrection and the Judgment with the help of intellectual deductions, because our reason lacks the premises necessary to lead to a conclusion. The only way is to believe in what the Truthful Prophet (s.a.w.a.) has brought to us through Divine Revelation – because his truth has been proved without any doubt.

As for the spiritual bliss and chastisement, they happen to the immaterial soul as it acquires good or bad characteristics and traits and is thus wrapped in beautiful or ugly conditions. We have mentioned there* that these conditions and characteristics appear to the psyche in their respective good or ugly shapes, and the psyche enjoys the beautiful and good shapes, if it is itself good; and is tormented by what is bad and ugly, whether it is itself good or bad.

If these resulting shapes are not deeply imprinted on the psyche, and are not agreeable to its person, they are bound to disappear sooner or later, because their appearance is a matter of constraint; and we know that constraint does not continue for ever. Suppose there is a true believer who has committed some sins. This man is good and happy in his person, but his psyche has been polluted by, and wrapped in, ugly unhappy shapes. Obviously this ugly shape, not being deeply imprinted will certainly get removed.

But if these ugly shapes have been deeply imprinted on the psyche, then it reshapes the psyche in its own mould. The soul acquires a new shape and becomes almost a new species. Suppose there is a "niggard man"; now niggardliness gives a new form to his humanity, in the same way as "rationality" gives a new form to "animality ", and "rational animal" (i.e., man) becomes a new species under the genes, "animal". Likewise "niggard man" becomes a new species under the genes "man". This species has an eternal existence of its own. The man, before the characteristics of niggardliness were firmly ingrained in his psyche, did practise niggardliness under constraint and felt unhappy. But now he does it, by permission of Allãh, naturally without any constraint. And as it is done by this new species without constraint, it is eternal, endless and perpetual – contrary to the former condition when it was done under constraint and could therefore be got rid of. This man gets punished because of the concomitants of his characteristics and traits. We may compare his case with that of a man suffering from chronic melancholia or hallucination. His mind perceives frightening nightmares and he is always tortured by it – although it is he himself who produces these fantasies without any extraneous constraint or compulsion. The pictures appearing in his mind are not agreeable to his sick psyche, and he is tortured by it, although it is he himself who has created them. Yet, as we know, he suffers because of it. What is punishment? It is that from which man runs away (if not inflicted by it yet) and longs to extricate himself (if already suffering from it). And this definition applies to the ugly shapes and frightening conditions which an "unhappy" man suffers in his next abode. It proves that the chastisement of the next world is perpetual and never-ending – for a man whose unhappiness has become an integral part of his personality.

Many objections have been raised against perpetuity of chastisement, all of them clearly without a leg to stand upon:

First Objection: Allãh's mercy is limitless, all-encompassing. How can He, in His mercy, create someone whose destination would be a perpetual chastisement which no one could bear?

Second Objection: Punishment is punishment when it is not agreeable to the nature of the convicted person. In other words when it is a compulsion, a constraint. And perpetual constraint is unthinkable. Therefore, it is wrong to say that there would be perpetual punishment.

Third Objection: The man had committed sins which were not perpetual; they came to their end after a short or long duration. How can he be requited with a perpetual never-ending punishment?

Fourth Objection: Even the evil-doers serve the system of creation no less than the good-doers. If they were not there, the virtue of good people could not come about. This being the case, why should they be thrown into perpetual punishment?

Fifth Objection: It is a revenge to punish someone who disobeys the commandments of Allãh. As a rule revenge is taken because the unjust and disobedient person makes the wronged party suffer some loss; and that party, if powerful enough, avenges itself to make up that loss. But this rule cannot apply to Allãh, because He is Self-sufficient and nobody can inflict any harm or loss upon Him. In this background, how can He punish anyone – and especially with a perpetual punishment?

There are other similar objections against the perpetuity of punishment. If you ponder on what we have written earlier explaining the meaning of the perpetuity of punishment, you will realize that these objections are completely wide of mark :

General Reply: Perpetual punishment is the effect of the form of infelicity and unhappiness when it becomes an inseparable characteristic of the "unhappy" man. It happens after the man acquires full capability for it – through relevant conditions of the psyche – and exercises his free choice by choosing evil, instead of good. That capability creates in the psyche the shape commensurate with it. We do not ask why a man does human actions, once the matter has acquired the human form – because the human form itself is sufficient cause of human activities. Likewise, we cannot ask why the effects of the inseparable unhappiness and infelicity (including perpetual punishment) are appearing, after the psyche has acquired the form of inseparable unhappiness and infelicity. Because it is its inseparable characteristic and effect. This general reply sufficiently refutes all the objections. Now let us look at each objection separately:-

Reply to the First Objection: When we say "mercy of Allãh" we do not refer to any softness of heart, mildness of temper or other such psychological effects, because such mercy presupposes material existence, and Allãh is far above such insinuations. Divine Mercy means bestowing on the recipient all things which he is fully qualified for. A fully qualified person longs for the things he is qualified for; and his qualification itself becomes a constant demand for it as if it had a tongue of its own. And Allãh gives him what he thus demands and asks for. His Mercy is of two kinds: general and particular. The general mercy gives whatever a person is qualified for in the framework of existence. The particular mercy bestows whatever a person is qualified for in the highway that leads towards monotheism and bliss of Allãh's Nearness. When Allãh gives the form of inseparable "unhappiness" to a person who is fully qualified for it, it is not against the general mercy; it is rather a part of that mercy. And perpetual punishment is a compulsory result of that form. As for the particular mercy, it does not cover the person who is not proceeding on the highway of guidance. Now let us look at the claim that perpetual punishment is against the Divine Mercy. If by "mercy" they refer to the general mercy, then surely it is not against it – it is rather a part of the general mercy. And if they mean the particular mercy, then the claim is untenable, because this case is out of the jurisdiction of the particular mercy.

Moreover, this objection, if sustainable, could also be laid against intermittent punishment. Nay, it would invalidate punishments of this world too.

Reply to the Second Objection: First we should decide why a thing is disagreeable to the nature. A thing or condition may be disagreeable to a man because there is no common factor between the man and that thing or condition. This indeed is a constraint, and it happens because of compulsion by an extraneous agent; and goes away as soon as that constraint is removed.

There is, on the other hand, an action or condition which emanates from the very nature of the man, when that nature is thoroughly polluted, when it is moulded in ugly mould and acquires a shape other than the original one. Man, in that existence, demands terrifying punishment; his transformed psyche, by its very nature, longs for chastisement – although at the same time he does not like it. We have earlier given the example of the man suffering from melancholia: Doubtlessly, the terrifying pictures emanating from his mind are "agreeable" to his psyche, because they are the products of that distorted psyche itself, and such effects are surely agreeable to the related psyche or nature. But at the same time they are indeed torture and punishment, because the definition of "punishment" applies thereto. In short, the eternal punishment is disagreeable from the viewpoint of sensitivity, and at the same time it is agreeable because it emanates from the psyche itself.

Reply to the Third Objection: The punishment is not the result of the sin and disobedience which were limited and came to an end. It is the effect of the perpetual ugly shape to which the man's psyche was moulded as a result of those limited and counted sins. There is no question here of a limited cause bringing about an unlimited effect – which, of course, is impossible. As an example, look at the man himself; there were a lot of limited causes which ultimately moulded the matter into human form; now he acts and reacts as a human being, because of that human form. And that humanity continues for ever, even after his death. We cannot ask about this man, as to how did a set of limited causes bring into being those unlimited and unending effects – because their efficient cause exists with them for ever. Likewise, it cannot be asked how can a set of limited sins bring about perpetual limitless chastisement.

Reply to the Fourth Objection: Service and worship, like mercy, is of two kinds: general and particular. General service is to submit to the Source of existence, that is, God, in the affairs and conditions of existence. Particular service is to submit to God and obey Him, in the path that leads to monotheism. Each type of service and obedience has a reward of its own, a mercy most suitable to it. Obviously, the general service in the system of creation is rewarded by general mercy – and as explained earlier, eternal bliss and eternal chastisement both are parts of that mercy. And the particular service is rewarded by the particular mercy, that is, bounties of the Paradise.

Moreover, if this objection is recognized as valid, then it would also negate the limited chastisement of the Hell and even punishments of this world too.

Reply to the Fifth Objection: As you have seen, the perpetual chastisement is ascribed to the shape of unhappiness acquired by man; and to Allãh in the sense in which every existing thing is attributed to Him. That punishment is not attributed to Him in the meaning of revenge and satisfaction of the feeling of rage and anger, because such thing is impossible for Allãh.

Of course, one of the names used for Allãh is "the Avenger". But it is used in the sense that Allãh requites severely His servant when he (the servant) transgresses the limits of servitude and crosses the boundary of obedience going into that of revolt and disobedience. "Revenge" in this meaning is not impossible for Allãh; and the perpetual punishment may be called "revenge" in this sense, without any difficulty.

Moreover, this objection, if tenable, may be laid against terminable punishment also; and even against the worldly punishments.

A QUR'ÃNIC NOTE ON THE ABOVE SUBJECT

It should be noted here that this method of argument, which we have used against the above-mentioned objections, has been used also in the Qur'ãn and traditions. Allãh says: Whoever desires this present life, We hasten to him therein what We please for whomsoever We desire, then We assign to him the hell; he shall enter it despised, driven away. And whoever desires the hereafter and strives for it as he ought to strive and he is a believer; (as for) these, their striving shall be thanked. All do we aid – these as well as those – out of the bounty of your Lord, and the bounty of your Lord is not confined (17:18-20). As you see, the verses count both chastisement and good recompense as parts of the bounty and mercy of Allãh; and it is made clear that whatever happens, it is related to the will, desire and striving of the servant himself. It is this very method that we have used in explaining the main topic and replying to the objections. There are many other verses of this connotation; and we shall write on them in their proper places, Allãh willing.

QUR'ÃN: O men! eat the lawful (and) good things out of what is in the earth . . . what you do not know: al-Ḥalãl (اَلحَلاَلُ = lawful) is opposite of al-ḥarãm (اَلحَرَامُ = forbidden) ; al-hill (اَلحِلُّ) is used as opposite of al-ḥurmah (اَلحُرْمَةُ = prohibition), al-ḥaram (اَلحَرَمُ = sanctuary) ; while al-ḥall (اَلحَلُّ = to untie) is opposite of al-'aqd (العَقْدُ = to tie). All these usages of al-ḥill allude to freedom of a thing in its action and effect. aṭ-Ṭayyib (الطَّيِّبُ = good) is opposite of al-khabīth (الخَبِيْثُ = bad, evil), and basically means "agreeable"; a good speech is that which is agreeable to the hearing; a good perfume is agreeable to the sense of smelling; a good place or house is agreeable to the people residing therein. al-Khuṭuwãt (الخُطُوَاتُ) is plural of al-khuṭwah (الخُطْوَةُ = step, pace, stride). Some reciters have read it as al-khaṭawãt (الخَطَوَاتُ) which is plural of al-khaṭwah (الخَطْوَةُ = one step). The phrase, "the footsteps of the Satan" refers to things leading to the Satanic aim, as footsteps lead to the walker's aim and destination. The Satan's aim is to mislead with polytheism; therefore, his footsteps are the things which lead to polytheism, and take the walker away from Allãh.

al-Amr (الأَمْرُ = to enjoin); the enjoiner imposes his own will on the enjoined, so that the latter does what the former wants. The Satan enjoins and orders by devilish insinuations and temptations encouraging man to do what the Satan wants. as-Sũ' (اَلسُّوءُ = evil) refers to the thing or action which is repugnant and repulsive to society. When it exceeds that limit, it becomes al-faḥshã' (الفَحْشَآءُ = indecency) ; it is a maṣdar like as-sarrã' (السَّرَّآءُ = prosperity; happiness) and aḍ-Ḍarrã' (الضَّرَّآءُ = adversity; distress).

Allãh has addressed these verses to all the men in general, because the order promulgated therein concerns all. As for the polytheists, they followed some self-imposed taboo, and falsely ascribed its promulgation to Allãh. It is reported, for example, that the tribes of Thaqīf, Khuzã'ah, Banu 'Ãmir ibn Ṣa'ṣa'ah and Banu Madlaj had forbidden themselves certain things of tilth and cattle, as well as some categories of camels, forging a lie against Allãh. Similar baseless taboos are found in other countries and societies too.

Coming to the believers, there was a possibility that even after accepting Islam, some myths and superstitions might continue in their society, because of hereditary influence and national tradition. As a matter of fact, every new spiritual or temporal system concentrates in the beginning on eradicating and destroying the roots of the old system. After it is done, and if by that time it is left with some vitality and vigour – by good training and learning – then it starts mopping up operation by obliterating and erasing the remnants of that old system. Otherwise, the residue of that system is mixed with the new one, and the resulting mixture becomes a hybrid – neither this nor that.

Allãh ordered the people to eat from what is in the earth. To eat is to swallow after chewing. Sometimes the word "eating" is allegorically used for general usufruct of a property, for unrestricted right of its disposal, because eating is the basic activity of man, the main pillar of his life. For example, Allãh says: .. . do not swallow up your property among yourselves by wrongful means, except that it be trading by your mutual consent . . . (4:29). The verse under discussion may easily be interpreted in this wider sense, because it is general, not restricted. It would therefore mean: Eat, make use of, and enjoy the usufruct of the bounties of Allãh that are in the earth, and which the earth has prepared and kept in store for you by permission of Allãh; and it should be in a lawful and proper way. But you should see that there is no snag or hindrance in eating or using it, either from your own nature or from the nature of the earth. For example, there are some things which by their nature cannot be eaten; there are others which man by his nature does not want to eat; and lastly there are things which are eatable and useable, but your own nature rejects them and does not want to touch them at all, for example, a food that was obtained by unlawful means.

Thus, the words of Allãh, "eat the lawful (and) good things out of what is in the earth", promulgate general permission of eating all the lawful and good things of the earth, without any condition, without any restriction. But the next sentence, "and do not follow the footsteps of the Satan", shows that there are some things (related to this lawful and good eating) which are called "the footsteps of the Satan". They are of two categories: either refraining from some food as a result of following the Satan, or eating it for the same reason. Thereafter, Allãh mentions a general principle applicable to all that is done for following the Satan, that it is evil and indecency, as well as speaking against Allãh what one does not know. Desisting from a food is not allowed except when Allãh is pleased with such abstaining; likewise one should not audaciously use any thing without the permission of Allãh. Eating out of what is in the earth is not lawful and good unless Allãh permits and allows it. And He has allowed it in this and similar verses. Also, one should ascertain that a particular thing is not forbidden or prohibited by Allãh, as He says after a few verses: He has only forbidden you what dies of itself, and blood, and flesh of swine . . . (2:173).

The meaning of the verse then would be as follows, and Allãh knows better: Eat out of what is in the earth, from the bounties of Allãh which He has created for you, as He has made them lawful and good for you; and do not leave some of them abstaining from them, because that would be evil and indecency, and you would be guilty of speaking against Allãh what you do not know; it would be tantamount to making your own law against the law of Allãh; and you would thus be following the footsteps of the Satan.

The verse thus shows that:

First: Man has been given a general permission for unrestricted use of all that is in the earth – except the things excluded from this general rule by other proofs. Allãh may forbid a thing as easily as He permits it.

Second: One who abstains, without any reasonable proof, from that which Allãh has made lawful, in fact promulgates his own law – which he is forbidden to do.

Third: Following the footsteps of the Satan means worshipping Allãh in a way Allãh has not allowed, by a method He has not approved. Allãh has not forbidden any walking except that in which man puts his foot in the footsteps of the Satan, making his walk conform with that of the Satan; thus he would be following the Satan's footsteps.

It may be inferred from above that, although the reason given of this prohibition (He only enjoins you evil and indecency . . .) demands that man should neither proceed to do any thing without knowledge, nor refrain from any thing without knowledge; but this is not what this verse is meant for; because it is not following the footsteps of the Satan, though it is following the Satan.

QUR'ÃN : He only enjoins you evil and indecency, and that you may speak against Allãh what you do not know: Evil and indecency are attributes of action, vis-à-vis, speech. It shows that what the Satan enjoins is confined to the action that is evil and indecency, and the word that is spoken without knowledge.

QUR'ÃN: And when it is said to them, "Follow what Allãh has revealed," they say: "Nay! we follow what we found our fathers upon": al-Ilfã' (اَلإِلْفَآءُ = to find). The verse supports what we have inferred from the preceding verse, regarding the footsteps of the Satan.

QUR'ÃN: What! and though their fathers had no sense at all, nor did they follow the right way: It is rebuttal of their saying; it shows that they speak without knowledge and without ascertaining the truth; and it is a thing which reason rejects. They say, "We follow what we found our fathers upon." It is an unconditional declaration – they intend to follow their fathers in all conditions, without looking at their qualifications and credentials. They are determined to follow their fathers even if they had no sense, even if they had gone astray. They claimed that whatever their fathers did was correct. But such claim, such declaration, is just a talk without knowing; it leads one to say what no sensible person would ever say – if his attention was drawn to its absurdity. There would be no blame on them if they followed their fathers only in those things which they (the fathers) had knowledge of, and concerning which they followed the right way; if they followed them in such things knowing well that their fathers had their knowledge and had been on right way, it would not be counted as following without knowledge.

It shows that the phrase, "What! and though their fathers had no sense at all, nor did they follow the right way," is not intended as an exaggeration, although one may think that negation of all sense and knowledge from their fathers – who certainly knew many things concerning their life and livelihood – was intended as an exaggeration. But it is not so. Actually, the verse exposes the absurdity of their unconditional declaration by pointing out a situation in which no one would allow the following.

QUR'ÃN: And the parable of those who disbelieve is as the parable of one who calls out to that which hears no more than a call and cry: al-Mathal (اَلمَثَلُ = proverb; parable, adage); also it is used for attribute and comparison, as Allãh says: See how they coin comparisons for thee. So they have gone astray, therefore they shall not be able to find a way (25:9). an-Na'īq (اَلنَّـعِيقُ = admonishing cry of a shepherd to his sheep); an-nidã' (اَلنِّدَآءُ = to call) is maṣdar of nãdã, yunãdī, munãdãtan (نَـادى ، يُنَادِي، مُنَادَاةً = he called, he calls, to call) ; it is more particular than ad-du'ã' (اَلدُّعآءُ = to call), because an-nidã' is reserved for calling in a loud voice, while ad-du'ã' is general. The meaning of the verse is as follows, and Allãh knows better: And O Prophet! your parable, when you call the unbelievers to the truth, is like a man who calls out to the animals while the animals do not understand what he says, except that they hear a call and cry, and stop in their tracks as soon as they hear it without understanding any thing spoken. The unbelievers are, therefore, deaf, they do not hear any talk which would benefit them; dumb, not speaking any sensible word; blind, not seeing any worthwhile thing. Thus they do not understand any thing, because their windows of understanding are closed shut.

It appears that there is a sort of reversal in this parable. Although it begins as a parable of those who disbelieve, it changes to describe the shepherd, the caller to guidance; it is in fact the likeness of the Prophet not of those who were being called by him to the right path. But as the three adjectives deducted from it (deaf, dumb [and] blind, so they do not understand,) were attributes of the disbelievers – not of him who was calling them to the truth – it was highly appropriate to ascribe the parable to the disbelievers, and not to the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.). Thus, there appears to be a reversal in the parable.

TRADITIONS

ʻAbdu ʾr-Raḥmãn says: "I asked Abu ʻAbdillãh about a man who vowed to slaughter his child. He said: 'That is from the footsteps of the Satan.' " (at-Tahdhīb)

Manṣũr ibn Ḥãzim said: "Abu Abdillãh (a.s.) said to me: 'Have not you heard about Ṭãriq? Verily, Ṭãriq was a cattle-dealer in Medina. He came to Abu Jaʻfar and said: " O Abu Jaʻfar! I have taken an oath by divorce (of my wives), emancipation (of my slaves) and vow." Thereupon, (Abu Jaʻfar, a.s.) said to Him: " O Ṭãriq! verily this is from the footsteps of the Satan." ' "

Abu Jaʻfar (a.s.) said: "Every oath taken in the name of other than Allãh, is from the footsteps of the Satan." (al-ʻAyyãshī)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "When a man takes oath for not doing a thing – while what he has sworn against, its doing is better than its leaving – then he should do that which is better; and there is no penalty on him; surely it (i.e., such oath) is only from the footsteps of the Satan." (al-Kãfī)

The author says: The traditions, as you see, interpret the footsteps of the Satan as the deeds supposed to bring one nearer to Allãh, while in fact they are not so, because the sharīʻah does not recognize them – as we have explained above. Of course, as for the divorce, etc. (mentioned in the second tradition), there is an additional reason for the invalidity of such oaths; and that is making it conditional on some contingency in future; and it is against the principle of immediate and unconditional effecting of such transactions. (It is a topic of jurisprudence.) Oath in the name of other than Allãh refers to an oath which has no validity in the sharīʻah, and to swearing by what Allãh has not sworn by and to which He has given no excellence.

al-Bãqir (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, And the parable of those who disbelieve is as the parable of one who calls out. . .: "That is, their likeness when you call them to the faith is like the caller who calls out to the cattle which understands nothing other than hearing a voice."

A MORAL AND SOCIOLOGICAL DISCOURSE ON BLIND IMITATION

Opinions and beliefs are of two kinds, which we shall call theoretical and practical knowledges. The theoretical knowledge is the one not directly related to action, for example, theorems of geometry, propositions of physics and issues of metaphysics. Practical knowledge, on the other hand, is directly related to action, for example, the moral teachings concerned with what to do and what not to do. The only way to acquire the theoretical knowledge is through rational proofs or the senses. The only way to get the practical knowledge is to follow that which leads to man's felicity, and to refrain from that which leads to infelicity or hinders the felicity. Apart from that, it is merely a superstition to believe in what is not known to be the truth and fact (in theoretical knowledge) and what is not known to be good or evil (in practical knowledge).

Man, when left to his pristine nature, does not accept superstitious ideas based on blindness and ignorance. His opinions are based on the demands of nature which wants him to find out the causes of the things, and exhorts him to strive for real perfection.

But sometimes his sentiments and feelings aroused by imagination – and especially the fear and the hope – make him to believe in myths and superstitions. What happens is this: Imagination creates some images in his mind which produce fear or hope. That feeling of fear or hope then preserves that image and does not let the psyche forget it. Let us say, a man finds himself in a valley; he is alone and the moonless night is pitch-dark; he cannot see his own hands. He has no light to illuminate his surroundings, no companion to share his thoughts with. Then his imagination takes hold of him. Every formless figure appears to him as a fearful ugly ghost intent on putting him to death. Then he sees the ghouls moving, coming and going ascending to the skies and descending to the earth. The imagination keeps producing these figures and he remains awake, frightened out of his wits. Later on, he describes that horrifying experience to someone, graphically describing the devilish antics of those ghosts and ghouls, and the hearer stands aghast, his eye askance. In this way the 'belief' in these things spreads – while in fact it is just an imaginary "thing" having no reality at all.

Sometimes this superstition reawakens the instinct of self-defence in man, and he devises some rites to ward off the harmful effects of this imaginary "being"; and exhorts others to do like-wise, so that they too would be safe. Thus, a superstitious rite takes root in the society and grows.

Man, from the earliest days of his existence, has remained in the tight grip of myths and superstitions; and the situation is not different even today. And it is not confined to the eastern nations – as many people think. It is prevalent among westerners in equal, if not greater, degree.

The elite group, that is, the scholars, have been trying, since time immemorial, to eradicate the rites and ceremonials arising from deep-rooted superstitions which have kept the common people enthralled. They try to awaken the public to the reality – but to no avail. It is because man has never been able to free himself from following the others in theoretical views and real knowledge on one side, and sentiments and feelings on the other. We can see that the treatment has not been successful, and the situation goes from bad to worse.

The most astonishing is the myth prevalent today among the scientists and sociologists. They say that the foundation of modern science is laid on the senses and experiment; it rejects every thing that is not perceivable through the senses and which cannot be experimented upon. Also, according to them, the civilization is based on the urge of perfection; it seeks perfection in every possible direction, as much as it can.

But strangely enough, this view itself is a myth which they are following. The natural sciences look only at the factors and faculties of the nature. In other words, these material sciences search only for the hitherto unknown peculiarities of the matter. So far as the things beyond matter are concerned, these material sciences have no way to reject or refute them – as they are beyond their scope, outside their jurisdiction. As such it is a clear superstition and myth to reject metaphysical and immaterial things – just because the material sciences (which admittedly cannot see beyond matter) have not been able to see those things which are admittedly beyond the reach of matter.

Likewise, it is another myth to base the civilization on the above-mentioned urge of perfection of the society. This perfection of society, this felicity of civilization, often demands sacrifices from its members. It becomes necessary for some people to offer their individual happiness on the altar of the society; they lose their all, including the lives, in defence of their country or their cause; an individual is thus deprived of his happiness and his life in order that the society may be saved. Obviously, no man will voluntarily accept these personal privations unless he believes in this pursuit of society's perfection, and unless he looks at that sacrifice itself as a personal perfection. But that sacrifice is not a perfection for himself – it is a nullity, a deprivation. Of course, it may be a perfection – if we accept it as such – for the society, per se, not for himself. But man had invented society as an instrument for his own benefit; he had not bargained that the role would be reversed and he would be used as a tool for the society's benefit.

It is to overcome this basic difficulty that the societies have invented some myths. They say to their members that man by sacrificing himself in the way of the society earns eternity because his good name is always remembered with reverence and affection – and man should strive for that eternal life. But evidently it is nothing but a story, a myth. Where is this supposed life once the man is dead? There is nothing for him except death and oblivion. But the society says, it is life – merely a name without any substance !

Also, they say: It is necessary for man to obey the laws even if they are tough and irksome to him. He should patiently bear the loss of some of his happiness, some of the things he earnestly desires, in order that the society may prosper, the civilization may attain its perfection. In this way, that partial deprivation will lead to his own perfection – through the perfection of the society. He is thus made to believe that the perfection of the society is his own perfection. But it is merely a myth.

The perfection of the society may be the man's perfection, when both perfections go hand in hand, when both are one and the same. Otherwise, not. Why should a man look at society's perfection as his own perfection, and to good remembrance as his lasting glory; and especially so if he can easily attain to his aims and goals – even if through injustice and oppression – and when his strength and power surpasses that of his competitors? The same question may be asked in respect of a powerful nation, vis-à-vis, the others. And it is not just a theoretical question. We see every day how the powerful nations go on exploiting the weaker ones. These super powers tread on the prone bodies of the weaker peoples, crush their dignity and self-respect, expropriate their natural resources, and put the whole populace under their yoke. (Once it was called imperialism and colonialism, now it is neo-colonialism. Result in both cases is the same:) weaker people are subjugated and enslaved. (They say they are there to help these people in their difficulties – and in this process they rob them of their freedom and dignity.) They cure a disease by putting the patient to death.

What is the guidance given by the Qur'ãn in this respect? In theoretical field, it tells man to follow the commandments of Allãh and not to speak without knowledge. In practical affairs, it directs him to seek only what is pleasing to Allãh: if it tallies with his own desires, then he shall get happiness of both worlds; if it does not agree with it, if he has to sacrifice his own wish for the pleasure of Allãh, then he shall get great reward from Allãh; and what is with Allãh is better and everlasting.

Also, the materialist say: Belief in religion is a blind following which the science does not allow. Such belief is a remnant of the superstitions of the second of the four periods through which mankind has passed. There was first the period of mythology, followed by that of religion. Then came the era of philosophy which was replaced by that of science. Presently, we are living in this era, and it follows the knowledge and rejects myths and superstitions.

COMMENT: This in itself is a myth. These people talk without knowledge.

They have said: "Belief in religion is a blind following." The fact is otherwise. Religion is a composite entity; it consists of the gnosis of the beginning and final destination of man, the laws regulating the rites of worship and social dealings (which are based on revelations brought by the prophets whose truth was definitely proved by rational proofs), and some information given by the same truthful prophets. Evidently, when one follows the religion he follows the knowledge, because the truth of the prophet concerned was fully established by proofs.

We have written something on the topic of "following", under the verse: Surely Allãh commands you that you should sacrifice a cow (2:67).

There is another amusing aspect of this objection. This disparaging condemnation comes from those who have got nothing in their hands except blind imitation and who uncritically follow their desire, without ascertaining its value. This aping encompasses their whole being, right from their principles of life to the social customs – be it food or drink, dress or residence, marriage or other social relations. Of course, they have given a new name to this imitation: They say, they have adopted the ways of the developed nations. Thus the blind following remains firmly-rooted in society, but the name is discarded; the bottle is the same, the label has been changed. The result: "Do as the Romans do" becomes a scientific adage, a sign of social advancement; and: do not follow desire, lest it should lead you astray . . . (38:26) is treated as a blind religious following, a superstitious view !!

They have divided the progress of human species into four stages. But what we definitely know concerning the history of philosophy and religions refutes this division. It is wrong to say that philosophy came after religion. Ibrãhīm (a.s.) brought his religion long after the rise of philosophy in India, Egypt and Chaldea; and the religion of ‘Isã (a.s.) came after the Greek philosophy. Likewise, the religion of Muhammad (s.a.w.a.), that is, Islam, was promulgated after the philosophy of Greece and Alexandria. In short, philosophy reached its zenith long before the rise of religion. We have also mentioned earlier that the religion of monotheism was the first and earliest of all religions and systems.

The Qur’ãn divides the path of human progress in a different way. There were two periods only: First, the period of simplicity when all were of one nation, and then the period when materialism and revolt took its hold. We shall describe it in detail under the verse: Mankind was but one nation; so Allãh sent the prophets . . . (2:213).

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN : O you who believe! eat of the good things that We have provided you with: The preceding verses were addressed to the "men" in general; now a selected group among them (i.e., the believers) is especially spoken to. Thus, this talk issues forth from the preceding one. It seems as though Allãh is turning away from an intractable and self-opinioned group that was impervious to reason, and looks towards those who would listen to, and accept the call of, the Speaker, because they believe in Him. The difference in the two speeches springs from the change of the audience. The believers were expected to accept what was said to them. Therefore, they were told to "eat from the good things that We have provided you with". The expression is more loving than the previous impersonal phrase addressed to the general public: "eat the lawful (and) good things out of what is in the earth". The loving expression of the verse under discussion paves the way for the direction that they should be thankful to Allãh alone, because they are monotheists, they do not worship anyone other than Allãh. It was for this very reason that Allãh said, "that We have provided you with", and did not say, 'what you have been provided with', or "what is in the earth". The Qur'ãnic expression (in active voice) shows that Allãh is known to them and near them, is affectionate and compassionate to them.

The Arabic phrase translated as "the good things that We have provided you with", would be literally translated as 'the good things of what We have provided you with' – in genitive case. Apparently the adjective (the good things) is the first construct, related to the second construct (what We have provided you with);

and means in effect, 'eat from Our sustenance that is all good'. This meaning is appropriate in this context which is meant to show Allãh's kindness and compassion for the believers. The phrase is not meant to restrict the second construct with the first one. In other words, it does not mean, 'eat from the good provisions, not from the bad ones': because such meaning would be quite irrelevant in this setting in which Allãh wishes to remove prohibition, telling them not to abstain from any provision given by Allãh – as, such behaviour would be a self-imposed unauthorized legislation, would be a talk without knowledge.

QUR'ÃN: and give thanks to Allãh if Him it is that you worship: Apparently it should have been 'give thanks to Us', but the Qur'ãn says, "give thanks to Allãh". This expression is more appropriate for the theme of monotheism which the verse leads to. And for the same reason the next phrase, "if Him it is that you worship", was preferred to a shorter, 'if you worship Him'. The present expression restricts and confines the worship to Allãh alone.

QUR'ÃN: He has only forbidden you what dies of itself, and blood, and flesh of swine, and that over which any other (name) than (that of) Allãh has been invoked: Invoking any name other than Allãh's, means slaughtering for any thing other than Allãh, for example, sacrificing for idols.

QUR'ÃN: But whoever is forced (to it), not revolting, nor exceeding the limit: That is, when he is not unjust, nor does he exceed the limit; is driven to it because of emergency. The meaning is therefore as follows: Whoever is forced to eat some of these forbidden things, because of some emergency, while he does not like at all to go against the law of Allãh, nor does he exceed the limit, there shall be no blame on him. But if he was trapped into that emergency because of his own revolting behaviour or because he had exceeded the limit and was then driven to that necessity, then he is not allowed to eat from these things. The sentence, "surely Allãh is Forgiving, Merciful," shows that the above permission is just a concession given by Allãh to the believers; otherwise, the basis of prohibition is present even in this case.

QUR'ÃN : Surely those who conceal what Allãh has revealed of the Book: It is an allusion to the People of the Book. There were many good and lawful things – in the rites of worship and other matters – which their elders and leaders had arbitrarily forbidden them – while they had got the Book and that Book contained no sanction against those good things. These people did not conceal what they did but only because they wanted to protect their high position and prestige in the community, and because they did not like to stem the flow of gifts, riches and properties which their power supposedly entitled them to.

This verse unambiguously proves that a man's deeds are embodied and assume the form of a body; and it is the deeds that finally emerge as their own results. In this verse, Allãh first says that their action of taking a small price for the Divine Revelation is one and the same with their eating the fire into their bellies. Then the description of their concealing and price taking is changed to that of buying error for the guidance; then this gives way to bartering chastisement for forgiveness. Then it ends on the words, "Oh! how (bold) they are to endure fire". Thus, their misdeed itself is transformed into the fire, although what they had done was to conceal the revelation and to continue on that behaviour.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, but whoever is forced (to it), not revolting, nor exceeding the limit: ʿal-Bãghī (اَلبَاغِيْ = revolting) is one who desires hunting[1], and al-ʿãdī (اَلعَادِيْ = exceeding the limit) is thief. They are not allowed to eat dead (animal) even if they are faced with emergency. It is forbidden to them. This (concession) does not cover them as it does (other) Muslims. And they are not allowed to shorten the prayer (in such journeys)." (al-Kãfī) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "al-Bãghī is unjust and al-'ãdī is usurper." (al-'Ayyãshī)

1. Another meaning of al-bãghī is "desirous"; the explanation in the tradition is based on this meaning. (tr.)

Ḥammãd narrates from the same Imãm that he said: "al-Bãghī is one who revolts against the Imãm, and al-'ãdī is thief."

Abu Ja'far and Abu 'Abdillãh (a.s.) have said: "Not revolting against the Imãm of the Muslims, nor transgressing the path of the righteous ones with disobedience." (Majma'ul-bayãn)

The author says: All these are various applications of these words; and they support the meaning we have given earlier.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allãh, Oh! how (bold) they are to endure fire:" (It means,) how bold they are to commit the deeds which, they know, will take them to the fire." (al-Kãfī)

'Ali ibn Ibrãhīm narrates from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) about this sentence: "How daring they are to (risk) the fire." (Majma'u1-bayãn) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "How active they are in the deeds of the people of the fire."

The author says: These traditions are in fact similar in their meanings: The first tradition explains boldness for fire with boldness in perpetrating the causes of the fire; the second one gives its meaning as daring to enter the fire; the third one interprets it as boldness to commit sins that would lead to the fire – and it is almost the same with the meaning of the first tradition.

COMMENTARY

It is said that when the qiblah was changed from Baytu ‘1-Maqdis to the Ka‘bah, there ensued a long drawn out controversy and conflict in the public. It was then that this verse was revealed.

QUR'ÃN: It is not righteousness that you turn your faces towards the East and the West: al-Birr (اَلبِرُّ = righteousness); al-barr (اَلبَرُّ = righteous), it is a perpetual adjective. Qibal (قِبَلَ = towards, in the direction of), al-qiblah (اَلقِبْلَـةُ = a certain direction) is derived from it. Dhul-qurbã(ذو القُرْبى = relative); al-yatãmã (اَليَتَامى) is plural of al- yatīm (اَليَتِيْمُ = orphan; he who has lost his father) ; al-masãkīn (اَلمَسَاكِيْنُ) is plural of al-miskīn (اَلمِسْكِيْنُ = miserably poor, one who suffers a worse condition than al-faqīr (اَلفَـقِيْرُ = poor). Ibnu s-sabil (اِبْنُ السَّبِيْلِ = one stranded in journey) ; ar-riqãb (اَلرِّقَـابُ) is plural of ar-raqabah (اَلرَّقَـبَةُ = neck; it refers to slave). al-Ba'sã' (اَلبَأسَـآءُ) is a maṣdar like al-bu's (اَلبُؤْسُ), both having the same meaning: hardship, poverty. aḍ-Ḍarrã' (الضَّرَّآءُ) too is a maṣdar like aḍ-ḍarr (الضَّرُّ) and both mean affliction with injury or loss, for example, when a man is afflicted with a disease, injury, or loss of property or child. al-Ba's (اَلبأسُ = intensity of war).

QUR'ÃN: but righteousness is the one who believes in Allãh: Instead of defining righteousness, the verse turns to describing the righteous ones; thus it introduces the people in the light of their attributes. In this way, it points to the fact that abstract ideals and abstruse ideas have no value in Islam unless they appear in concrete shape in the character of a man. It is a well-known style of the Qur'ãn that it explains and defines a condition and a rank by introducing the people having that rank and condition; it is never satisfied with mere theoretical explanations of good and bad, virtue and vice.

The words, "the one who believes in Allãh and the last day . . .," define the righteous ones, and explain their real state. The verse introduces them with all three aspects of belief, deeds and morals, in three stages. the first stage begins with the words, "the one who believes in Allãh;" the second is the sentence, "these are they who are true;" and the third is, "and these are they who are the pious."

Allãh begins the first stage, saying: "the one who believes in Allãh and the last day and the angels and the Book and the prophets". It is a comprehensive description of all the true gnosis which Allãh wants His servants to believe in. The belief referred to in this verse is the perfect belief which can never fail to produce its effect. When a believer attains to this stage of faith, his heart is never assailed by any doubt or confusion; he does not take a dim view of whatever befalls him, nor is he offended if afflicted with a misfortune. Likewise, his morals and actions are safe from adverse influences. This interpretation is further supported by the phrase, "these are they who are true". Truth, in this verse, is general and unconditional; it is not restricted to any condition of man's heart or any activity of his limbs. It means, they are real believers, true in their belief; as Allãh says: But no! by your Lord! they do not believe until they make you a judge of that which has become a matter of disagreement among them, and then do not find any straitness in their hearts as to what you have decided and submit with total submission (4:65). Thus, their condition fits the fourth stage of the belief, described under the verse: When his Lord said to him, Submit (yourself), he said: "I submit myself to the Lord of the worlds" (2:131).

After description of belief, Allãh mentions some of their deeds: "and gives away wealth out of love for Him to the near of kin and the orphans and the needy and the wayfarer and the beggars and for (the emancipation of) the captives, and keeps up prayer and pays the zakãt". Here their prayer is mentioned, and it concerns the Divine Worship. Allãh says: . . . surely prayer keeps (one) away from indecency and evil . . . (29:45); also, He says: . . . and keep up prayer for My remembrance (20:14). It is followed by mention of zakãt; and it is a financial obligation promulgated for economic good of the society. And before it all, the verse refers to their giving away wealth to various groups; this habit of theirs spreads the good and enlarges the circle of non-obligatory munificence, in order that the need of the poor may be fulfilled and their condition improved.

Lastly, the verse cites some of their excellent moral characteristics: "and the performers of their promise when they make a promise, and the patient in distress and affliction and in time of conflict". al-'Ahd (العَهْدُ = to promise; to commit oneself to something). The verse mentions "their promise" unconditionally. Yet, it does not cover the belief and the resulting obligation of following the laws of the sharī'ah (as some people have said). Why? Because on going further we find the proviso, "when they make a promise" ; and clearly acceptance of true faith and submission to its concomitants is an unconditional obligation; and is obligatory on all the people at all the times. It does not depend on one's commitment. However, the "promise", by its generality, covers every commitment made by man. For example, when he says: I'll surely do it; or, I'll never do it. It includes every deal made in business transactions, every word spoken in social and family circles.

Patience is steadfastness in face of hardship, be it a series of benumbing misfortunes or a fight against formidable adversaries.

These two excellent virtues – fulfilment of promise and patience – do not cover all the necessary virtues; but when they are found somewhere, the other virtues invariably always follow suit. One of these two virtues (patience in hardships) has a passive quality, while the other (fulfilling the promise) has an active role. By mentioning them, Allãh in effect says that when they say something they surely proceed to do it, and do not withdraw from it even if they have to face difficulties.

The second stage of introduction is contained in the phrase, "these are they who are true". Truth is a comprehensive virtue, encompassing all attributes of knowledge and action. Truth is an inseparable concomitant of all basic virtues – continence, bravery, wisdom and justice – and of their branches., Man's life is made up of his belief, words and actions. When he is true, all the three aspects conform with each other. He does not do except what he says, and does not say except that which he believes.

Man by instinct accepts the right and truth; and even if he pretends otherwise, he submits to it in his heart. When he believes in the right truthfully, his word conforms with his belief, and his action with his word. It is then that he reaches the perfection in all three aspects of belief, morality and deeds. His faith becomes pure, his character virtuous and his deeds good.

Allãh says: O You who believe! fear Allãh and be with the true ones (9:119). The restrictive style, "these are they who are true", puts emphasis on the description of the righteous. It means – and Allãh knows better – that if you want to find the true ones, then these are the righteous.

The third and final stage of their introduction is the phrase, "and these are they who are the pious": This restrictive style looks at the level of perfection. Piety cannot be complete and perfect, unless righteousness and truth have attained their completion and perfection.

The attributes ascribed here to the righteous are the same which Allãh has described in other places. Allãh says: Surely the righteous shall drink of a cup the admixture of which is camphor. A fountain from which the servants of Allãh shall drink; they shall make it to flow a (goodly) flowing forth. They fulfil vows and fear a day the evil of which shall be spreading far and wide. And they give food out of love for Him to the poor and the orphan and the captive. We only feed you for Allãh's sake; we desire from you neither reward nor thanks; surely we fear from our Lord a stern, distressful day. Therefore Allãh will guard them from the evil of that day and cause them to meet with radiance and happiness; and reward them, because they were patient, with garden and silk (76:5–12). These verses, about some righteous personalities, describe their attributes of belief in Allãh and the last day, their spending for the sake of Allãh, their fulfilling the vows and their patience. Again, Allãh says: Nay! Most surely the record of the righteous shall be in the 'Illiyyīn. And what will make you know what the 'Illiyyīn is? It is a written book; see it those who are near (to Allãh). Most surely the righteous shall be in bliss, on thrones, they shall gaze. You will recognize in their faces the radiance of bliss. They are made to quaff of a pure drink that is sealed. The sealing of it is (with) musk; and for that let the aspirers aspire. And the admixture of it is a water of Tasnīm, a fountain from which drink they who are drawn nearer (to Allãh) (83:18 -28).

If you meditate on these verses in conjunction with those quoted above, you will see the reality of their attributes and their final destination. These verses praise the righteous that they are servants of Allãh, and are drawn near to Him. Now, Allãh describes His servants in these words: Surely as regards My servants, thou hast no authority over them (15:42) ; and He says about those drawn near to Him: And the foremost are the foremost; these are they who are drawn near (to Allãh), in the gardens of bliss (56:10-12).

It is now clear that the righteous are the foremost in this world in reaching nearer to Allãh, as they are foremost in the next world in attaining to the bounties of the garden.

If you continue looking at the condition of the righteous in the light of these verses you will unearth many hidden nuggets of spiritual reality.

The above discourse shows that the righteous are in the highest, that is, the fourth, stage of belief, as we have explained earlier. Allãh says: Those who believe and do not mix their faith with iniquity, those are they who have the security and they are those who go aright (6:82).

QUR'ÃN : and the patient in distress: The word "patient" in the Arabic text is in accusative case while the other attributes are in indicative. This change has been effected to point out its excellence, to show its importance.

Also, it has been said that when a speech becomes a bit lengthy, several adjectives following each other, then the Arabs break the monotony by interposing negatives between the positives, or by exchanging accusative and indicative cases.

TRADITIONS

The Prophet said: "Whosoever acted in accordance with this verse, he surely perfected (his) faith."

The author says: Its reason is clear from the explanation written above. az-Zajjãj and al-Farrã' are reported to have said: "This verse is reserved for the sinless prophets, because nobody, except the prophets, can perform these things as they should be."

But this comment shows that they had not pondered on it properly. They seem confused regarding spiritual ranks. The verses of the Chapter of the Man (76:5–12) quoted above, were revealed about the family members of the Messenger of Allãh (s.a.w.a.) ; Allãh in those verses has named them "the righteous", although they were not prophets.

Of course, the rank of the righteous is very high, and their position is of very great importance. Allãh praises the men of understanding saying that they: remember Allãh standing and sitting and lying on their sides and reflect on the creation of the heavens and the earth: Then He quotes their prayer, which shows that their highest aspiration was that their Lord should join them to the righteous: and make us die with the righteous (3:190-3).

al-Ḥakīm at-Tirmidhī narrates from Abũ ʻÃmir ash-Shaʻbī that he said: "I said: 'O Messenger of Allãh! What is the completion of righteousness?' He said: 'That you should do in private what you do in public.' " (ad-Durru 'l-manthũr)

Abu Jaʻfar and Abu ʻAbdillãh (a.s.) said: "The near of kin are the relatives of the Prophet." (Majma 'u 'l-bayãn)

The author says: It is an application of this verse, keeping in view the verses of near relatives (42:23).

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "al-Faqīr (poor) is he who does not ask from the people; and al-miskīn is of more straitened circumstances than the "poor"; and al-bã's (اَلبـآئِسُ) is the most wretched of all." (al-kãfī)

Abũ Jaʻfar (a.s.) said: "The wayfarer is the one stranded in the way." (Majma 'u 'l-bayãn) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) was asked about an al-mukãtib (اَلمُكـَاتِبُ)[1] who, after making a partial payment was unable to pay (the balance

1. In Islam a slave was allowed to enter into an agreement with his master. This agreement, called al-mukãtabah, entitled him to gain his freedom on payment of stipulated amount. Such a slave was called al-mukãtib. (tr.)

The same Imãm said about the words of Allãh, and the patient in distress and affliction: "In hunger, and thirst and fear." And he (a.s.) said about the word, and in time of conflict: "In the fighting." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! retaliation is prescribed for you in the matter of the slain; the free for the free . . .: The verse is ad-dressed to the believers. It means that the law promulgated herein applies to the Muslims only. As regards the non-Muslims – whether under protection of an Islamic State or not – the verse is silent about them.

Some people think that this verse has abrogated the verse 5:45 (life is for life); because it does not allow killing of a free person for a slave, or of a man for a woman. But actually there is no room for this supposition. The position of this verse vis-à-vis the verse 5:45 is like that of an explanation vis-à-vis its text.

al-Qiṣãṣ (القِصَاص = retaliation) is the maṣdar of qãṣṣa yuqãṣṣu (قَآصَّ يُقَاصُّ = he followed, he follows) ; an Arab says: qaṣṣa atharahu (قَصَّ أثَـرَهُ = he followed someone's tracks). Another derivative is al-qṣṣãṣ (القَصَّاصُ = story-teller) – it is as though he follows the tracks of the past generations. Retaliation is called al-qiṣãṣ because it follows the footsteps of the offender, giving him a punishment similar to that which he had inflicted upon his victim.

QUR'ÃN: but if any remission is made to any one by his (aggrieved) brother: Its literal translation is: then whoever is remitted any thing by his brother. "whoever" refers to the murderer; the heir/s of the murdered person may waive his/their right of retaliation. Therefore, "any thing" refers to that right; it is used here as a common noun, in order that the rule may cover all possibilities, whether there was a full remission or partial. Let us say, for example, that there are many heirs and only some of them waive their right; then there shall be no retaliation; instead the blood-money will be imposed. The heir of the murdered person who has the right of retaliation) has extraordinarily been described here as the "brother" of the murderer; this expression has been used to awaken the feeling of love and kindness in the heart of the aggrieved party, and gives a hint to him that remission and forgiveness is highly preferable in the eyes of Allãh.

QUR'ÃN: then (the demand for the bloodwit) should be made according to the usage, and payment should be made to him in a good manner: Its literal translation is: then following according to usage, and payment to him in a good manner. Both phrase are subjects with their predicates implied. Thus literally it would mean: then it is obligatory on the aggrieved "brother" to follow that remission with demand for the blood-money according to usage; and it is obligatory on the murderer to pay it to the aggrieved brother, that is, heir of the slain, in a good manner without any annoying delay.

QUR'ÃN: this is an alleviation from your Lord and a mercy: The permission to commute the retaliation into blood-money is an alleviation from your Lord, and therefore, once effected, it cannot be changed. The heir of the slain person cannot revert to retaliation after granting remission. If he transgresses the limit and retaliates after remission, then he shall have a painful chastisement.

QUR'ÃN: And there is life for you in the retaliation, O men of understanding, that you guard yourselves (against evil) : This verse points to the philosophy of this legislation. It aims at removing a possible misunderstanding that – because Allãh has allowed remission and blood-money, and also because remission expands the circle of mercy and affection – remission is more in conformity with public weal and social good. The verse shows that, although remission is an alleviation based on mercy, common good and society's peace depend on the retaliation. The only guarantee of life is the law of retaliation, and not remission, blood-money, or any other thing. Man has to accept this fact, if he has understanding. "that you may guard yourselves" that is, from murder. It gives the basic of the law of retaliation.

The scholars have said that the verse, "and there is life for you in the retaliation," is one of the most eloquent in its clarity, and the most refined in rhetorics, in addition to its having many other fine literary points, like brevity – it has so few words and such a small number of total letters – fluency of style and clarity of composition. It combines the force of argument with beauty of meaning, the fineness of proof with clarity of result.

Before this verse was revealed, the Arabs were fond of some adages and maxims (on the subject of murder and retaliation), of whose rhetorics and fluency they were very proud. For example:

'To kill some is to keep alive all', and 'To increase killing is to decrease killing'. And the most remarkable in their eyes was the sentence: 'Killing stamps out killing.' But when this verse was revealed all were forgotten. Some of its distinguishing points are as follows: The verse has fewer letters, and is easy to pronounce. "the retaliation" with definite article is a proper noun, while "life" is common noun – it shows that the resulting good is greater and more widespread than the retaliation. It explains the result in clear words and describes the real philosophy of the law, that is, the life. It unambiguously shows by what means the desired result can be obtained: Obviously, it is the retaliation that leads to life, and not the killing. (After all, many killings are done unjustly, and they do not lead to life, they are negation of life.) The word, "retaliation," covers also other punishments besides killing, that is, the reprisal in the matter of injury, etc. – and such retributions too lead to the society's life. The word conveys another extra meaning, as it shows that the retribution has resulted from unjust killing. (Compare it with their maxim, "Killing stamps out killing", which does not give any idea that "killing" refers to any punishment.) Then there is an exhortation in this sentence, as it points to a life reserved for the people, which they are oblivious of; it behoove them to take hold of it as it really belongs to them; it is as if someone tells you: There is a property belonging to you with so-and-so, or in such and such a place. Lastly, the opening word of the verse, that is, "for you" makes it clear to the men of understanding that the law-giver only desires to protect their interest, and no benefit is ever to accrue to him.

These are a few of the fine points found in this verse. The scholars have mentioned some more points, which may be seen in the books of rhetorics. The fact is, the more deeply you look at this verse, the more dazzled you shall be by its brilliance and radiance; and the word of Allãh is the highest.

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about the word of Allãh, the free for the free: "A free man shall not be killed for the slave; but he shall be beaten a severe beating and be fined the blood-money of the slave. And if a man kills a woman, and the heirs of the slain (woman) want to kill him, they shall pay half of his blood-money to the man's heirs." (al-'Ayyãshī) al-Ḥalabī narrates from aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.). He says: "I asked him about the word of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: but he who forgoes it, it shall be an expiation for him (5:45) ; he (the Imãm) said: 'His sins shall be expiated, as much as he forgives.' And I asked him about the word of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: but if any remission is made to anyone by his (aggrieved) brother, then (the demand for the bloodwit) should be made according to usage, and payment should be made to him in a good manner. He said: 'He who has got the right (i.e. the aggrieved party) should not put his brother (i.e. the murderer) in difficulty, when he has made settlement with him concerning the blood-money; and he who has got the duty (of paying the blood-money) should not delay in its payment when he has ability to do so; and he should pay it to him in a good manner.' And I asked him about the word of Allãh, the Mighty, the Great: so whoever exceeds the limit, he shall have a painful chastisement. He said: 'It refers to a man who accepts blood-money or forgives, or makes compromise, then exceeds the limit (and kills the murderer) ; so he shall be killed as Allãh, the Mighty, the Great, has said.' " (al-Kãfī)

The author says: There are many traditions of the same meanings.

AN ACADEMIC ESSAY ON RETALIATION

Before the advent of Islam, and until this verse was revealed, the Arabs believed in requiting a murder with killing. But the retaliation had no defined limit. It all depended on the strength or weakness of the aggrieved party. Sometimes they killed a man for a man, and a woman for a woman – thus keeping a balance between the crime and its punishment. At other times they killed ten persons for one, a free man for a slave, a chief for and ordinary man. Many times a tribe destroyed another just in retaliation of one man.

The Jews believed in retribution, as we see in chs. 21 and 22 of Genesis, and ch. 35 of Numbers. The Qur'ãn quotes it in these words: And We prescribed to them in it that life is for life, and eye for eye, and nose for nose, and ear for ear and tooth for tooth, and (that there is) reprisal in wounds (5:45).

The Christians reportedly recognize only remission and payment of blood-money in the matter of murder.

All societies and nations, with all their differences, believed in, and practised, retaliation by killing, in one way or the other; although they did not have any fixed code for it even upto the recent centuries.

Islam opted for a middle course between confirmation of retaliation and its negation. It prescribed retaliation but did not make it obligatory – it allowed remission and payment of blood-money. Then it laid the foundation of justice by prescribing equality between the murderer and the murdered, telling us that: the free for the free, and the slave for the slave, and the female for the female.

Objections have been laid against the law of retaliation in general, and the capital punishment, that is, retaliation by killing, in particular. The brunt of the argument is that nowadays the advanced nations do not recognize – or do not enforce – the law of capital punishment. Their objections may be summarized as follows:

1. Human nature disapproves the idea of a life for a life, when a man looks at this matter from the point of view of mercy and service to humanity.

2. The killing (i.e. the crime) had caused loss of one person; now the second killing (i.e. its punishment) would be a further loss, a loss upon loss.

3. Capital punishment is based on hard-heartedness and desire of revenge. These are not good traits; they should be eradicated from society through general training. Even a murderer should be punished through corrective measures; and it can easily be done through prison and hard labour, not capital punishment.

4. A criminal becomes criminal only because of psychological sickness. He should be put into mental hospital for treatment.

5. Civil laws and penal codes follow the trends of society. As the society changes, so do the laws and codes. There is no reason why the law of capital punishment should continue to plague the civilization – even the advanced nations – for ever and ever. Society should make use of its manpower to the maximum possible extent. A criminal may be given a punishment, which would be as effective as killing – without putting him to death. He may be imprisoned for life, or for a long period. It would satisfy both demands – that of the society and that of the heirs of the slain.

These are the main objections against the law of retaliation with killing. The Qur'ãn has replied to all this criticism with one sentence : . . . whoever slays a soul, unless it be for man-slaughter or for mischief in the land, it is as though he slew all men (5:32), as the following explanation shows:

The laws, observed by members of a society, are laid down by men and based on a subjective approach – with a view to serve the interest of the society. But the general and basic cause (which brings them into being) is the human nature which has real existence, and which demands that its deficiencies be made up and its needs fulfilled. This nature, this real being, has nothing to do with the number of the men, nor is it related to the composite unit, that is, the society. Because society is a handiwork of human nature, while we are talking about the man himself, about his nature itself. This nature, this real being, makes no distinction between a single man and a thousand; all are human beings; and as far as the existence is concerned, one man and the whole humanity have got equal weight, equal value.

This really existing nature has equipped itself with powers and instruments to ward off harmful and destructive influences from itself, because it loves existence, and repels all things which could deprive it of life. It defends its existence, by all possible means. It does not stop at any thing, and is ready and willing to kill and destroy the attacker who endangers its existence. Nature tells man to kill whosoever wants to kill him (if he cannot be repelled by any other means). And no one denies justifiability of such killing.

Look at these advanced and "civilized" nations. They have no hesitation in waging war in defense of their freedom, independence and national interest. What will they do if someone wanted to kill all their nationals? They think that supremacy of law is sacrosanct. They defend the rule of law, they try to preserve order in the society, by all possible means – even if it entailed killing some offenders. They protect their national interest – even by war, if nothing else works. They justify war for this reason in high-sounding phrases – the war which shakes the world to pieces and destroys the tilth and the generations. There is a never-ending race for armaments: A country sacrifices its progress to arm itself with some sophisticated military hardware; and then its adversaries try to acquire even more advanced arms. Ask them, "Why this mad race?" They will say, it is essential for their defense, for the safety of their society and civilization.

Now, society and civilization is only a handiwork of the nature. How is it that the nature allows massacres, mass destructions and wholesale killings just to save a handiwork of its, and does not allow it for its own protection and safety? How is it that it allows to kill someone who intends to kill but has not killed yet, but forbids killing the man who intended to kill and killed?

The nature has decreed that every action should have a reaction; so he who has done an atom's weight of good shall see it; and he who has done an atom's weight of evil shall see it. Now what type of nature is this which breaks its own law, violates its own decree, when it comes to giving death penalty to someone who has killed an innocent person?

Moreover, Islam does not accord any value, any weight to man, unless he is on the religion of monotheism. One man believing in the one and the only God is equal in the eyes of Islam to the whole human race. Therefore, whoever slays a believer, it is as though he slew all men – because he committed a sacrilege against the dignity of that believer. Likewise, whoever slays any person, it is as though he slew all men – looking at the reality of his existence. But so far as the civilized nations are concerned, religion has no value in their eyes. If they had accorded as much value (if not more) to religion as they give to civilization, they would have defended the religion to the same extent at least.

Furthermore, Islam has brought the sharī'ah which is meant for the whole world – not for a particular country or a selected group only. Let us say that what the advanced nations have legislated is good for their society. But they have opted for this course after they have made sure that the general training of their people has been effective; that their governments are faithfully discharging their duties; that according to crime statistics, these well-trained nations are now totally averse to murder and violence; that as a result of this aversion, no one indulges in crimes of violence – except in extremely rare cases. And because it hap-pens so rarely, these nations have decided to punish murder in some ways other than death. Islam does not say that such training should not be given, or that if given it would not be effective. When that stage is reached, capital punishment may give way to remission – with the law of retaliation keeping its basic position unaltered. The relevant sentence in this verse points to this fact: but if any remission is made to any one by his (aggrieved) brother, then (the demand for the bloodwit) should be made according to usage, and payment should be made to him in a good manner. Clearly, the language used is that of moral training; and when a nation advances to a level where all take pride in forgiveness and remission, then they would not deviate from the path of remission to that of revenge.

But what about other nations? We know their moral status is not so high. We see the condition of these societies, and the extent of the moral decay of their people. In these places, the criminals are not afraid of prison or hard labour; they are immune to sermons and exhortations; they do not understand such abstract ideas as human rights, nor do they give any importance to them. And the facilities which they are provided with in prisons are far much better and much more comfortable than the wretched life they are accustomed to at home. The result? They do not care about social disgrace or penal sentence; they are afraid of neither prison nor hard labour; beatings and floggings are just occupational hazards to them. That is why crime rates are going higher and higher in almost every country.

Suppose there is there an ideal society we have mentioned earlier; still the overwhelming majority of nations come into this second less ideal category. Therefore, the general and basic law could only be the retaliation with possibility of remission. After that, if the ethical standard of a nation improved and if it advanced gracefully on the path of moral perfection (and Islam spares no effort for moral upliftment of its people), it would automatically opt for remission. If on the other hand, it continued its downward slide, and remained ungrateful to Allãh's favours, then the law of retaliation would prevail – with possibility of remission even then.

Now, let us have a look at their objections:

The talk about mercy and kindness to human beings is all very good. But not every kindness is good, nor is every mercy a virtue. Showing mercy to a hardened criminal who has no regard for others' life and honour, is a loathsome offence against good law-abiding people. Indiscriminate application of mercy would disrupt the social system, destroy the humanity and nullify the virtues.

The same applies to their criticism concerning hard-heartedness and revenge. Avenging an oppressed from the oppressor – in pursuit of justice and truth – is not objectionable in any way; nor is the love of justice a thing to disparage. Moreover, death penalty has not been legislated for revenge only; it serves also to train general public in good character and to shut the door of mischief in the society.

The assertion that the crime of murder is a psychological disease which should be treated in mental hospitals, has provided an excuse – and what a good excuse it is! – to the criminals. It has contributed a lot in the growth of murder, indecency and other crimes of violence in the society. Why should a criminal refrain from making murder his hobby, when he knows that his urge of violence is but a psychological disease, and that it is an acceptable plea which would oblige the government to treat him with kindness and benevolence, arranging for his medication in hospitals?

Now, we come to the view that society should utilize all available manpower, and as such should use the criminals in compulsory labour and other such work, by imprisoning them and cutting their access to the society. If these people really believe in what they say, if there is any truth in this sermon, then why do they forget it in those cases in which their legal system provides for capital punishment? We should not forget that there is in every civilized country provision for capital punishment for specified crimes. They give death penalty in those cases because they think those crimes to be extremely heinous and atrocious. But we have already explained that, in the eyes of nature, life of one man is as precious as that of the whole human race put together.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ÃN: Bequest is prescribed for you when death approaches one of you, if he leaves behind wealth: The language is that of an obligatory rule, because al-kitãbah (اَلكِتَـابَةُ = to write; translated here as "prescribed") is used in the Qur'ãn always for definitely obligatory laws. It is further strengthened by the word "a duty" coming at the end of the verse, because duty too is used, like writing and prescription, for compulsory orders. But the word "a duty" is qualified by "upon those who guard (against evil)"; this somewhat weakens the sense of obligatoriness; it would have been more appropriate, in case of obligatoriness, to say, 'a duty upon the believers'. In any case, it is said that the verse was later abrogated by the verse of inheritance. If so, then it would only be its "obligatoriness" which was abrogated, not its being liked, recommended. Perhaps, the phrase qualifying "a duty" was used for this very purpose.

al-Khayr (اَلخَيْرُ) is wealth; it probably denotes considerable wealth, not an insignificant amount. al-Ma'rũf (اَلمَعْرُوْفُ = known; common usage of good deed and favour).

QUR'ÃN: Whoever then alters it after he has heard it, the sin of it then is only upon those who alter it: The pronoun in "the sin of it" refers to the alteration; all the rest refer to the bequest according to usage; bequest is a maṣdar and is used both as masculine and feminine. (That is why the pronouns used in the verse are of masculine gender.) "upon those who alter it": Allãh did not say 'upon them', because the wording used clearly indicates the nature of sin, that is, alteration of a will; also it paves the way for the next verse.

QUR'ÃN: But he who fears an inclination (to a wrong course) or an act of disobedience on the part of the testator, and effects an agreement between the parties, there is no blame on him: al-Janaf (اَلجَنَفُ = inclination; deviation) ; it is said that it indicates outward inclination of the feet, and al-ḥanaf (اَلحَنَفُ) shows their inward inclination. In any case, it is used here to denote an inclination towards sin and disobedience, as it is followed by "or an act of disobedience". The verse branches out from the preceding one. Its meaning is as follows (and Allãh knows better) : The sin of alteration is only upon those who alter the bequest (which was made according to usage). Of course, if someone fears that the bequest of the testator is, or shall be, an act of disobedience or inclined towards a wrong course, and then effects an agreement between the parties, free from error and sin, then there is no blame on him; because he has not changed a bequest made according to usage; rather he has altered only the wrong and sin found in it.

TRADITIONS

Muḥammad ibn Muslim says that he asked aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) whether a bequest was allowed in favour of an heir. The Imãm said: "Yes". Then he recited this verse, "Bequest is prescribed . . . if he leave behind wealth, for parents and near relatives . . ." (al-'Ayyãshī). This tradition is also narrated, with a slight change in wording, in al-Kãfī and at-Tahdhīb.

as- Sadiq (a.s.) narrates through his father from 'Ali (a.s.) that he said: "He who did not bequesth at the time of his death for those of his near relatives who were not his heirs, surely ended his deeds with disobedience." (al-'Ayyãshī)

aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said about this verse: "(It is) a right which Allãh has given in the properties of men to the Master of this affair (i.e. to the Imãm)." The narrator says: "I said: 'Is there a prescribed limit for it?' He said: 'Yes'. I said: 'How much?' He said: 'Its lower limit is one-sixth; and the higher, one-third.' " (al-'Ayyãshī)

The author says: This theme has been narrated also by aṣ-Ṣadũq in his al-Faqīh from the same Imãm. It is a fine inference from this verse read in conjunction with the verse: The Prophet has a greater claim on the believers than they have on themselves, and his wives are their mothers; and the possessors of relationship have the better claim in the ordinance of Allãh to inheritance, one with respect to another, than (other) believers, and (than) those who have fled (their homes), except that you do some good to your awliyã'; this is written in the Book (33:6). This verse abrogated the system prevalent in early days of Islam by which a "muhajir brother" inherited from his "ansar brother" ; and initiated inheritance between the relatives; then it made an exception (from this rule of inheritance by relationship), and that was about doing some good to your awliyã'[1]. Now Allãh has made the Prophet al-waliyy and his pure progeny al-awliyã' of the believers. And this exception of doing good to the awliyã' brings it within the jurisdiction of the verse under discussion: Bequest . . . for parents and near relative. And the Imãms are also the "near relatives" (of the Prophet). Understand it.

The Fifth or the Sixth Imãm said about the verse, Bequest is prescribed for you . . .: "It is abrogated. The verses of inheritance abrogated it." (al- 'Ayyãshī)

The author says: This tradition may be reconciled with the preceding ones if we say that it was only its obligatoriness which was abrogated; thus the order will continue as al-mustaḥabb (المُسْتَحَبّ = liked, recommended) even after that.

Abũ Ja'far (a.s.) said about the verse, But he who fears an inclination (to a wrong course) or an act of disobedience . . . : "al-Janaf is inclination to the side of error without knowing that it is allowed (or not)." (Majma'ul-bayãn) aṣ-Ṣãdiq (a.s.) said: "When a man has made his will, then it is not allowed to the executor to alter the bequest made; he should enforce it as (the testator) has bequeathed; except when (the testator) has made his will against the command of Allãh, and done injustice (to an heir). Then it is allowed to the executor to bring the will to the truth (i.e. the right course). Let us say, there is a man who has got some heirs; and he bequeaths all (his) property to some of the heirs, depriving the others. In such cases, it is allowed to the executor to bring the will to the right (course). And this is (the meaning of) the word of Allãh, an inclination (to a wrong course) or an act of disobedience. And al-Janaf is inclination to some of his heirs, leaving the others aside; and

1. al-Awliyã' (اَلأَوْلِيَاءُ) is plural of al-waliyy (الوَلِيُّ), which has several meanings, important among them being: friend, guardian, relative, a person close to Allãh, and master. In the explanation given in the text, it has been taken to mean master and guardian. (tr.)

al-ithm (الإِثْمُ = sin; act of disobedience) is that he directs to build fire-temples, and to take intoxicant. Then the executor is allowed not to do any such thing." (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: The explanation of al-janaf given in this tradition, makes clear the meaning of the word of Allãh: and effects an agreement between the parties. The words refer to effecting reconciliation and settlement between the heirs, when there is conflict and quarrel among them because the testator was inclined to wrong course, and favoured one heir at the cost of the others.

Muhammad ibn Sũqah said: "I asked Abu Ja'far (a.s.) about the word of Allãh: Whoever then alters it after he has heard it, the sin of it then is only upon those who alter it. He said: 'It has been abrogated by the next verse; But he who fears an inclination (to a wrong course) or an act of disobedience on the part of the testator, and effects an agreement between the parties, there is no blame on him.' He said: 'It means that if the executor fears that the testator is inclined to a wrong course concerning his children in the bequest he has entrusted the executor with, in a way Allãh is not pleased with, (and which is) against the truth, then there is no blame on him, (i.e. on the executor of the will) if he changes it to the truth, and to the way of right that Allãh is pleased with.' " (al-Kãfī)

The author says: This tradition explains one verse with the help of another. Therefore, the word, "abrogated", is not used here in its terminological meaning. And we have earlier mentioned that the word, "abrogation", is sometimes used in the speech of Ahlu 'I-bayt, in a meaning different from the language of the Principles of Jurisprudence.

In the Name of Allāh,
The All-compassionate, The All-merciful

Praise belongs to Allāh, the Lord of all being;
the All-compassionate, the All-merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement;
Thee only we serve, and to Thee alone we pray for succour:
Guide us in the straight path;
the path of those whom Thou hast blessed,
not of those against whom Thou art wrathful,
nor of those who are astray.

* * * * *

O' Allāh! send your blessings to the head of your messengers and the last of your prophets, Muḥammad and his pure and cleansed progeny.
Also send your blessings to all your prophets and envoys.

F O R E W O R D

1. al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī (1321/1904 — 1402/1981) — may Allāh have mercy upon him was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān which will be published, by the help of Allāh, in the near future.

2. al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzān fī tafsīri ’l-Qur’ān which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allāmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzān because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustādh al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and its discussions.

4. We have proceeded to publish the translation of the second volume of the Arabic al-Mīzān earlier as it was ready for printing, whereas the first volume is not ready yet for the reasons which we do not wish to state here. So we saw no reason in delaying its printing. We have included two appendixes: one for the authors cited in all the volumes of al-Mīzān, and the other for the books cited therein. These two appendixes have been attached to the first volume of the English translation. Apart from this, the reader will find two appendixes in all the volumes of the translation of al-Mīzān.

* * * *

We implore upon Allāh to effect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work which we have started. May Allāh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

GENERAL COMMENT

The sequence of the three verses shows that they were revealed together; for a counted number of days (in the beginning of the second verse) is an adverbial phrase which qualifies the word, fasting, in the first verse; and the month of Ramaḍān in the beginning of the 3rd verse is a predicate, whose subject is a deleted but understood pronoun denoting the words counted number of days (which appear in the 2nd verse). Thus it would mean, the counted number of days is the month of Ramaḍān. Alternatively, it may be a subject of a deleted but implied predicate, and would mean the month of Ramaḍān is that in which fasting is prescribed for you. As a third possibility, it may be an alternative of the fasting mentioned in the first verse. Whatever be the grammatical position, it is the explanation and description of the counted number of days in which fasting has been prescribed. Therefore, all three verses are a well arranged statement with a single aim, i.e., promulgation of the ordinance of fast in the month of Ramaḍān.

Obviously, the first sentences have been revealed to prepare minds for the final ones. The first two verses are like a preparatory statement, with which a speaker tries to keep the audience calm and quiet, and this ensures that they do not become restless on hearing the tough commandment which he is to announce shortly. All the sentences in these two verses gently lead the hearer's mind to the ordinance of the fast of Ramaḍān. They mention such things as remove gloom and anxiety, cheer the soul and imperceptibly assuage the mood of unruliness and disobedience. They point to various concessions and indulgences which have been incorporated in the commandment. And all this is in addition to the goods of this world and the next which may be earned by following the law. It is for this reason that the sentence 0 you who believe! Fasting has been prescribed for you is followed by the phrase as it was prescribed for those before you — hinting that you should not think it as a heavy burden nor should you feel gloomy, for it is not a new command for which you have been singled out; it was ordained for previous peoples also.

It further encourages them by pointing out: by following this command you may get what you aim at by your faith — and that is piety (taqwā, التّقوى) which is the best thing for those who believe in Allāh and the Day of Judgement — and you are believers. This is the import of the phrase so that you may guard yourselves (tattaqūn ,تتقون , from the same root as taqwā).

Moreover, this worthy action, which inspires the hope of piety in you (as it did in your predecessors) does not involve all your time, nor even most of it. It is only for a counted number of days. The word days (ayyāman , ايّاما) is a common noun, and it shows insignificance. Its adjective, ‘‘counted’’, hints that the number is very easy (as we see in the words of Allāh in the Qur’ān, 12:20, And they sold him for a small price, some counted pieces of silver).

Allāh, now points to further concessions: Look how We have been lenient on the man who has a genuine difficulty in keeping the fast, as well as on the person who is hard pressed to do so. Such a man should redeem it by a substitute which is neither difficult nor heavy, and that is feeding a poor person. But whoso among you be sick or on a journey, then (he shall fast) that number of other days; and those who are with difficulty able to do so, on them is a redemption by feeding a poor man. You must appreciate that this act brings much good to you; and that Allāh has made it as easy for you as possible. It is in your interest that you should perform it willingly and eagerly without reluctance, sluggishness or annoyance; because if one performs a good deed on his own accord, it is better for him than if he does it under coercion. This point is made clear in the words: And whoso on his own accord performs good, it is better for him, and that you fast is better for you if you know.

In this way, the first two verses prepare minds for the third verse, So whosoever of you witnesses the month, he shall fast therein ….

In the light of this explanation, it is clear that the sentence in the first verse, Fasting has been prescribed for you, is the report of the fact of prescription; it is not the initial promulgation [like the verses, 0 Ye who believe! retaliation is prescribed for you in the matter of the slain ...(2:178) and Bequest is prescribed for you, when death approaches one of you if he leaves behind wealth, for parents and near relatives … (2:180)] There is a difference between retaliation in the matter of the slain and bequeathing to parents and near relatives on the one hand, and the fast on the other. Retaliation for the slain is a matter which is dear to the hearts of the heirs of the slain; and it conforms with the natural rage which is inflamed in them when they see the murderer alive and safe without any worry for the crime he had committed. Likewise, tender love for one's relatives is in itself enough to encourage one to make one's will in favour of one's parents and relatives, and especially so at the time of death and permanent separation. These two commandments, i.e., retaliation and bequest are in conformity with natural feelings, and, as such, they do not require preparatory statements or preambles before their promulgation. But the case of the fast is different. Here the man is denied his choicest desires and most coveted acquirements, i.e., food, drink and sex. It is a heavy burden which should, by nature, be disliked by him. When such an order is directed to the general public it needs some preparatory and introductory statement so that they may accept this hardship willingly and eagerly. There fore, the prescription in the verses of retaliation for the slain and bequest for parents and relatives is the original promulgation (without need of any preamble); but the words: Fasting has been prescribed for you is just a report of the commandment and has been used as the preamble of the actual command which comes later: so whosoever of you witnesses the month, he shall fast therein ... .

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: O ye who believe. This mode of address reminds them of a virtue (faith, belief) which encourages them to accept what ever order is given to them by their Lord, even if it is against their desires and habits.

The verse of retaliation also begins with this very phrase because the Christians, unlike other people, did not believe in retaliation. Therefore, it was necessary to point out that retaliation is allowed to the faithful, even if others do not believe in it.

Qur'ān: Fasting has been written (i.e. prescribed) for you, as it was written (i.e. prescribed) for those before you:

''Kitābah'' (الكتابة) means to write. Metaphorically it is used for prescription, enjoinment and irrevocable decision, as Allāh says, Allāh has written down: I will most certainly prevail, I and My apostles (58:21); and We write down what they have sent before and their footprints (36:12); and We wrote on them in it, a soul for a soul (5:45).

''Siyām'' and ''ṣawm'' (الصّيام and الصّوم) are infinite verbs meaning to abstain from an action, like abstaining from eating, drinking, sexual intercourse, talking, walking, etc. Also it is said that it means abstaining from desirable and coveted things. Later in religion, it was mostly used for abstaining from some specified things from dawn-break upto sunset with intention (niyyah, النّيّة)

Those before you means the nations that came before the advent of Islam: the followers of the previous prophets, like the followers of Mūsā and ʻĪsā etc. It is the meaning understood from this phrase wherever it occurs in the Qur'ān.

The comparison as it was prescribed for those before you is not general; it does not cover all the peoples, nor all the details of the Islamic fast. In other words, it does not mean that the fast was prescribed for the followers of all previous prophets, nor that the fast ordained for them was like the Islamic fast in all the details, like period, rules and other particulars. The comparison is only in the principles of fasting and abstaining from some things without any regard to the particulars.

Those before you indicates followers of the previous religions without specifying who they were. The words as it was written (prescribed), show that they were followers of revealed religions; and that the fast was ordained for them. but the present Old and New Testaments do not say that fasting was compulsory and obligatory; rather they extol and praise it. Still, the Jews and the Christians do fast on various days in the year, in various ways, like abstaining from meat, or milk, or food and drink. There are stories in the Qur'ān of the fasts of Zakariyyā and Maryam in which they abstained from talking.

Fasting was also observed in traditional (unrevealed) religions, as is reported from ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome. The Hindus observe fasts even now. Apparently, it is human nature itself that leads one to believe that the fast is an act of worship which brings one nearer to the Creator.

Sometimes it is said that those before you means the Jews and the Christians; or that it refers to only the previous prophets (and not their followers). The basis of these assertions are some traditions which are not free from weakness.

Qur'ān: So that you may guard yourselves (against evil) (or, so that you may become pious).

Idol-worshippers fasted to please their deities, or, on committing a sin, to extinguish their deities' anger, or to get their prayers granted. This turns the fast into a trade or barter; the man performs what is needed by the deity and the deity in its turn grants the prayers of the man; the worshipper pleases the deity so that the deity may do what will please the worshipper.

But Allāh is All-holiness. No want, need, emotion or grievance can be attributed to Him even in imagination. In short, He is free from every shortcoming. So, all the good effects of the worship (whatever the act of worship and whatever the good results) return to the worshipper himself, not to the Lord. The same is the case of sins. Allāh has said: If you do good, you do good for your own souls, and if you do evil it is for them (only) (17:7). It is this principle which the Qur'ān teaches by always connecting the effects of good and evil actions with man: man, who is all needs and wants, as Allāh says 0 man! You are the ones who stand in need of Allāh, and Allāh is He who is the Self-sufficient (35:15); and refers to the fact specifically in connection with fasting in the words, so that you may become pious (may guard your selves against evil).

There is no doubt that one may achieve piety through fasting. Everyone naturally feels that for union with the sublime world of holiness and for rising to the height of perfection and spirituality man should first of all restrain himself from gratifying material desires. He should keep away from satisfying the body's lust and inclinations, and purge his soul from the love of worldly affairs. In short, he should guard himself against all such things which may carry him away from his Lord. This is piety (taqwā , التّقوى) which is achieved through abstinence from lust and desires.

Even more beneficial and more effective for the common man is the abstinence from common lawful desires like food, drink and sex. This trains him to keep away from unlawful things; and creates in him the will to guard himself against sin and evil, and to come nearer to Allāh. Obviously, when he accepts the words of Allāh by abstaining from lawful desires, and heeds to and obeys His commandment, he will be more needful and obedient to His words in connection with sins and unlawful things.

Qur'ān: Counted number of days (ayyāman ma'dūdātin, ایّامامعدودات): ''ayyāman'' has the vowel of (fatḥah, ـً , الفتحه) because an adverb of time, in (fī, فی) is understood before it. It is connected with the word fast (ṣiyām, الصّیام). It has already been explained that bringing the word ''days'' as a common noun and attaching to it the adjective, ''counted'', implies that the order given is not very difficult or bothersome. This in turn encourages the man to obedience. Also it has been maintained that the words the month of Ramaḍān …. are the explanation of ''days''. So, the meaning of counted number of days is the month of Ramaḍān.

Some commentators have said that the words, counted number of days, mean three days in every month and the fast of the day of 'Āshūrā' (10th day of Muharram). Some others have said that it is the 13th, 14th and 15th days of every month plus the fast of 'Āshūrā' According to them, the Messenger of Allāh and the Muslims used to fast on these days, then Allāh revealed the verses the month of Ramaḍān in which was sent down the Qur'ān ... and this verse abrogated the previous system and made the fast of Ramaḍān obligatory. These commentators rely on many traditions of the Sunnīs — traditions which contradict each other.

There are many things which prove the falsity of these assertions:

First: Fasting is a common act of worship involving the whole ummah. Had there been a system, at any time, of fasting for three days in a month, it would have been recorded in history, and there would not have been any difference about its ordination and then abrogation. But it is not so.

Moreover, saying that the fast of the day of 'Āshūrā' was obligatory (or even desirable), like the fast of the three days of every month, is the innovation of the Umayyids (May Allāh curse them). They wiped out the progeny of the Messenger of Allāh and his family-members on the day of 'Āshūrā'; they killed their men-folk, imprisoned their women and children and looted their belongings in the battle of Karbalā'; and then they regarded it as a blessed auspicious day. They took that day as an 'īd (festival), started its fast to obtain its supposed blessings, and then invented for it many virtues and excellences. They forged many traditions showing that it was an Islamic festival. They went even further and said that it was a common festival which had been observed even by the pagans of Arabia, as well as by the Jews and the Christians since the advent of Mūsā and 'Īsā.

But all these assertions are baseless. This day has no national importance like the Nowrūz of the Persians, nor did there occur any victory or important event on that day to make it an Islamic festival (like the Day of the first revelation or the Birrthday of the Prophet) nor has it any religious aspect which could make it a purely religious festival like ‘Īdu ’1-fiṭr and ‘Īdu ’1-aḍḥā. So how could it be given importance without any reason?

Second: The context makes it impossible to say that the 3rd verse, i.e. the month of Ramaḍān ... , was revealed alone, to abrogate the first two verses. As mentioned earlier, it is the predicate of a deleted but understood subject, or the subject of a deleted but implied predicate. Thus it is a clarification of the words, counted number of days, and all three verses are one inter-related speech with a single aim, i.e. the promulgation of the obligatory fast of the month of Ramaḍān.

Those commentators claim that the phrase, month of Ramaḍān, is the subject and words, in which was sent down the Qur’ān, are its predicate. If we accept this claim then this third verse would become an independent sentence, capable of being revealed alone. But then it could not abrogate the previous two verses, because there would be no contradiction between this verse and the previous ones; and no verse can abrogate another when there is no contradiction between them.

Even weaker than this is another view, which appears in some writings. It says that the second verse, for a counted number of days, abrogated the first verse, *Fasting has been prescribed for you…*They claim that fasting was prescribed for the Christians, but they went on changing its number after ‘Isā (a.s.) until finally it was settled as fifty days. Allāh then ordained it for the Muslims by the first verse, and people fasted accordingly in the beginning of Islam, until the second verse counted number of days was revealed and the new system was introduced abrogating the first order. This view is clearly weaker and more false than the previous ones and all the objections mentioned therein apply here also. Clearly the second verse is complementary to and a continuation of the first verse. The traditions upon which these people have based their views are obviously against the clear meaning and context of the Qur’ān.

Qur’ān: But whoso among you be sick or on a journey then (he shall fast) that number of other days: ‘‘f... ’’ (ف , then, but, so, and, etc.)

here is for derivation. It means that the sentence is an off-shoot of Fasting has been prescribed on you and for a counted number of days. The fast is written down and obligatory and the number is a part of that obligation. The basic obligation (fast) cannot be neglected and the same is the case of the prescribed number. Even if for any reason like sickness or journey the obligation of fasting during the counted number of days (i.e. month of Ramaḍān) is waived, the obligation of fasting an equal number of days after that month will still be enforced, in order to make up for the lost days of Ramaḍān. It is this principle which has been mentioned in the 3rd verse and so that you may complete the (prescribed) number. Here we find another significance of the phrase, counted number of days; it implies that the order given is not very difficult, and also it shows that the number is an integral part of the said obligation.

''Sickness'' is the opposite of ''health''. Safar (journey, السّفر) is derived from a root-word which means to uncover. It is as though the traveller is uncovered by going out of his house which is his refuge and shelter.

Allāh used the words, on a journey, and did not say a traveler ; it shows that for the purpose of this rule one must be on a journey presently. Past travel or a travel which is yet to start (i.e. to commence later) would not make one entitled to this concession.

Most of the Sunnī scholars say that this sentence shows only that a sick person or a traveler is allowed, but not compelled, leave the fast. According to them, a sick person or a traveler has the choice of fasting or not fasting. But, as has been explained earlier, the meaning of then that number of other days is that he is (not only allowed but is) 'compelled' not to fast during the originally prescribed days; he must fast that number of ''other days''. This is narrated from the Imams of the Ahlu 'l-bayt. Also, it is the ruling of a group of the companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) like 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān ibn 'Awf, 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, 'Abdullāh ibn 'Umar, Abū Hurayrah and 'Urwah ibn az-Zubayr. The Sunnī scholars say that this sentence means: but whoso among you be sick or on a journey (and did not fast) then (he shall fast) that number of other days; thus they suppose that there is a deleted but implied verb in this sentence. But this supposition is incorrect because:

First: such a supposition is against the apparent meaning. A deletion can be accepted only when the context demands it; and the context of this sentence does not need any such thing.

Second: even if we accept this implied verb, it will not mean that a sick person or a traveler has only an option to break his fast. In these verses Allāh is promulgating a law and in this context the hypothetical, implied words, and did not fast will mean that during sickness or journey, breaking one's fast is not a sin, rather it is lawful. The word 'lawful' is a general one, meaning all or any of its three kinds: obligatory, recommended and allowed. There is no reason to suppose that in this context it would mean only ''allowed'' (to the exclusion of the other two meanings). Rather there is a reason against such a supposition, because the Wise Law-Giver when promulgating a law cannot leave one of its important and obligatory aspects.

Qur'ān: and those who are with difficulty able to do so on them is a redemption, by feeding a poor man: 'spending one's active strength in a work' (iṭāqah, الاطاقة ) is the meaning explained by some scholars. It necessarily means that the work would be done with difficulty and by overstraining oneself. Fidyah (الفدية) means a substitute. Here it is a material substitute, i.e., food for a poor man. The word implies a food which satiates a hungry poor man; and it should be the normal food of the man.

The rule of the substitute also is obligatory, like the rule of repaying a fast afterward for the sick or the traveller. It is shown by the words, 'on those' ('ala'l-ladhīna, على الذين), which is obviously for obligation and not merely for option or choice.

Some people have said that this sentence gave the people an option and then it was abrogated. According to them, Allāh had given all those who were able to fast an option to keep the fast or to redeem it by feeding every day a poor man, because in the beginning people were not accustomed to fast. Then it was abrogated by the sentence, So whosoever of you witnesses the month, he shall fast therein. Some of those writers said that this verse abrogated the option so far as able persons were concerned. But the rule regarding those who were unable to fast (like extremely old persons, pregnant women and women who are suckling a baby) remained unabrogated and they could give the substitute.

By God, such an explanation is nothing but playing with the Qur'ān and cutting and chopping up the verses into shreds and fragments. If you study these 3 verses, you will see that it is all a well-connected speech, delivered with one aim, all in one context only. its sentences are connected with each other, having a sweetness and flow of their own. But if you cut it into pieces and accept these people's interpretation then everything will fall out of context and some phrases will contradict others; the latter sentences will clash with the former ones. According to their explanation, first it says 'Fasting is prescribed for you', then it says that 'those who are able to fast have an option to fast or to redeem it by a substitute'; then it goes on to say that 'fasting is obligatory for all of you when you witness the month'; then it abrogates the rule of redemption for able persons and keeps it unchanged for unable ones (while the fact remains that even before the supposed abrogation that verse was not concerned at all with those who were unable. They want us to believe that the single word meaning 'those who are with difficulty able to do so (yuṭīqūnahu, يطيقونه) referred, before the abrogation, to those who were able to fast; and now after abrogation the same word means 'those who are unable to fast'! In short, according to these commentators, those who are with difficulty able to do so in the middle of the verse would abrogate fasting is prescribed for you which is in the beginning of the verse, because both would be contradictory to each other; but the question would arise why that abrogation was made conditional on ability without any apparent reason. Then again the sentence, So whosoever of you witnesses the month he shall fast therein, at the end of the verse, would abrogate those who are with difficulty able which is in the middle. Still the question would arise as to how it abrogated that rule for only those who were able to fast and not for those who were unable to do so, when the verse is unconditional and comprehensive and covers able and unable persons alike. Interestingly enough, the supposedly abrogated verse in itself did not cover those who were unable. This is its most obviously absurdity.

Add to it their assertion that the words, the month of Ramaḍān ..., abrogated the words, counted number of days, which in their turn abrogated the words, Fast has been prescribed for you; and then ponder with this background upon the meaning of the verses and you will be astonished! Nothing of the verses would remain intact; all would have been abrogated!!

Qur'ān: and whosoever on his own accord performs good it is better for him.

'To do work willingly and gladly' (taṭawwu', التّطوع) is of the form tafa'ul (التّفعّل ) from ṭawu' (الطّوع) which is the opposite of 'to dislike' (kurh, الكره). The meaning of acceptance is implied in the form tafa'ul (التّفعّل); therefore, the meaning of taṭawwu' (التّطوّع) is 'the present doing of work willingly and gladly without reluctance or annoyance, whether that work is obligatory or not'. The use of this word especially for non-obligatory good work was established among the Muslims long after the revelation of the Qur'ān, and this later usage is based on the view that it is only non-obligatory good work which is done willingly without compulsion, while there is a shade of compulsion in obligatory work: because there is no choice, it has to be done. Anyhow, the word taṭawwu' (التّطوع) in its root or form, was not used only for non-obligatory good work.

The preposition for derivation is here represented by ''f ...'' (ف ; and, so, etc.), and the sentence is an off-shoot of the previous sentences. Thus its meaning is: Fasting is prescribed for you, keeping in view your good and betterment, with the additional advantage that it brings you in line with previous peoples, and it has been made easy for you; therefore you should perform it willingly, to do it thus rather than doing it reluctantly.

It appears from the above that the words of Allāh: whoso performs good willingly have metaphorically put the 'cause' in the place of 'effect'. It says that to perform good willingly is better for him, instead of saying that to fast willingly is better. It is like the verse, Indeed We know, it certainly grieves thee that which they say, but verily it is not thee that they belie, but it the signs of Allāh which the wrong-doers deny (6:33), which means ''so endure it and do not be grieved because they do not deny ,thee...''

Sometimes it is said that the sentence, whoso willingly performs good it is better for him, is connected with the preceding sentence, i.e. those who are with difficulty able to do so, on them is a redemption by feeding a poor man. According to this interpretation it means that whoso performs non-obligatory good work by giving redemption twice — feeds one poor man twice or two poor man once - it is better for him.

But there are three defects in this interpretation:

First: As mentioned earlier, there is no evidence to show that the word meaning 'to do a work willingly'(taṭawwu', التّطوّع) is reserved for non-obligatory good work.

Second: In this interpretation ''f …'' (ف) would be without any real significance. It has been mentioned above that the sentence is an off-shoot of the previous sentence. But what is the connection between the rule of redemption and giving non-obligatory food on one's own accord?

Third: This interpretation confuses adding something on one's own accord with performing good willingly. But obviously these are two separate things.

Qur'ān: and that you fast is better for you if you know: This sentence is complementary to the preceding one; and the meaning is: Perform willingly the fast which is prescribed for you because willingly doing a good deed is in itself another good work, and the fast is good for you, therefore, to fast willingly is good twice.

Sometimes it is said that the sentence, and that you fast is better for you, is addressed to those who are excused from fasting and not to the other believers who are obliged to fast and for whom the fast is compulsory. They say that its apparent meaning is that fasting is better for you, but there would be no objection if you do not fast. Obviously this meaning can fit the non-obligatory fast only, and not the obligatory one. The implication is that those who have the option not to fast (like a sick person or a traveller) are exhorted to fast and it is recommended to them to keep the fast rather than to break it.

There are five objections to this interpretation:

First: There is no evidence to support this view.

Second: The two sentences differ in syntax. The pronoun in whoso among you be sick ... is in the 3rd person, and those in and that you fast ... are in the 2nd person.

Third: The first sentence does not give any option to the sick man or the traveller. On the contrary, the words, then (he shall fast) that number of other days, obviously specify fasting on other days, as explained earlier.

Fourth: Even if we accept, for the sake of argument, that the first sentence gives an option to the sick person and the traveller, that option is not between fasting and not fasting; it is between fasting in Ramaḍān and fasting on other days. And as both options are of a fast in different periods, merely the words, that you fast is better for you, cannot prove (in the absence of a clear context) any preference for fasting in Ramaḍān over fasting on other days.

Fifth: Allāh in this sentence is not promulgating any law, so that it may be argued that the description of the preference of fasting shows that in this particular case it is not obligatory. Rather, according to the context of this verse, its aim is to emphasise that the law given by Allāh cannot be devoid of benefit, good and advantage for you. Other examples of this style may be seen in many verses, like, therefore turn to your Creator and kill your selves; that is better for you (2:54); then hasten to the remembrance of Allāh and leave off trading; that is better for you, if you know (62:9); you shall believe in Allāh and His Apostles, and struggle hard in Allāh's way with your properties and your lives; that is better for you if you know. (61:11). And there are many such verses which show that this style of speech in the Qur'ān does not give an option to the believer, it only shows that a given order is for their own advantage and benefit.

Qur'ān: the month of Ramaḍān in which was sent down the Qur'ān, a guidance ...: The month of Ramaḍān is the ninth month of the lunar Arabic calendar, between the months of Sha'bān and Shawwāl. No other month has been mentioned by name in the Qur'ān. The word meaning 'to come down' is nuzūl (النّزول). Its transitive forms meaning 'to bring down' are inzāl (الانزال) and tanzīl (التنزيل);the difference between them is that inzāl (الانزال) implies bringing down all at once, while tanzīl (التّنزيل) implies bringing down gradually.

The Qur'ān (القرآن) is the name of the book sent down to His Prophet Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), because it is recited and read. [It is derived from the root form qara'a (قرأ) meaning to read or recite.] Allāh has said: Surely We made it an Arabic Qur'ān that you may understand (43:3). This name is used for the whole book as well as for its parts.

The verse proves that the Qur'ān was sent down in the month of Ramaḍān. But Allāh has also said, And the Qur'ān which We revealed in portions so that you may read it to the people by slow degrees, and

We sent it down sending it (in portions) (17:106). And this verse clearly shows that it was revealed gradually during the entire period of the Call, which was about twenty-three years. Also accepted history proves it. This has apparently given room to the objection that there was a complete conflict between these two verses.

Some people have replied that the Qur'ān was sent down all at once to the lowest heaven in the month of Ramaḍān, then was revealed to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) in portions, gradually, over about twenty-three years — the total period of the Call. This reply is based on some traditions, some of which will be quoted during the discussion of traditions.

Others have objected to this reply. They say that the words a guidance for mankind, and clear evidence of guidance and distinction which come immediately after these words do not support this interpretation; it is difficult to understand how the Qur'ān guided the people and was a source of discrimination between truth and falsehood during the time when it was in the heaven for years and years. This objection has been answered in this way: The Qur'ān is a guidance and a discrimination; it means that it had the potential and ability to guide those who needed its guidance and to discriminate between the truth and falsehood if there was any confusion. It could remain. with that hidden potential for a while until the time came for that potential to become a fact. There are countless examples in civil laws and state constitutions where many articles remain on paper until the occasion arises for their enforcement and they are then acted upon.

But we must admit that there is a great difference between constitutions and civil laws on one hand, and addresses and lectures on the other. Lectures or talks cannot be delivered a single moment before their time and occasion, and there are in the Qur'ān numerous verses of this type. For example: Allāh surely heard the plea of her who pleads with you about her husband and complains to Allāh, and Allāh knows the contentions of both of you … (58:1); And when they see merchandise or sport, they break up for it and leave you standing ... (62:11); Of the believers are men who are true to the covenant which they made with Allāh: so of them is he who accomplished his vow, and of them is he who yet waits, and they have not changed in the least (33:23). Moreover, the Qur'ān contains verses which have been abrogated and other that abrogated them, and there is no sense in combining both of them in revelation sent all together.

Another interpretation is that the declaration that the Qur'ān was sent down in the month of Ramaḍān means that its first verses were revealed at that time.

It is difficult to accept this interpretation either. It is well known that the Prophet (s.a.w.) was sent with the Qur'ān, and the beginning of his Call was on the 27th Rajab, and there is between this date and Ramaḍān a gap of more than thirty days. How could the prophethood remain without the revelation of the Qur'ān for such a long period? Look at the 96th chapter which was the first chapter revealed (Read in the name of your Lord ...) Its context shows that it was revealed at the beginning of the Call. Likewise, the contents of the 74th chapter show that this also was revealed at the beginning.

Anyhow, the words, the month of Ramaḍān in which was sent down the Qur'ān, obviously do not mean that only the first verses were revealed at that time; and there is no such indication in the context. Therefore, such explanation would be without any proof or evidence. Also there are some more verses which have similar meaning. For example: By the Book that makes manifest (the truth), Surely We sent it down on a blessed night; Surely We are ever-warning (44:2-3) ; and Surely We sent it down on the Night of Destiny (97:1). Neither the apparent meanings of these verses nor their contexts support the view that sending down of the Qur'ān means the beginning of its revelation or the revealing its first verses.

Deep consideration of the verses of the Book shows something quite different from all the above interpretations. The verses which say that the Qur'ān was sent down in the month of Ramaḍān, have used the verbal form of inzāl (الانزال) which indicates sending down all at once. (Qur'ān 2:185; 44:23; 97:1). This ''all at once'' can mean either of two things:

1) To consider the complete book as one collection and look at it as a collective noun, as Allāh says in 10:24 Like the water which we sent down from the sky. Now, the rain comes down gradually, but it is looked upon as one whole collection and that is why the verbal form inzāl (الانزال), and not tanzīl (التنزيل), has been used. The same is the meaning of the verse (this is) a book We have sent down to you abounding in good, so that they may ponder over its verses ... (38:29) in which the whole book has been taken as one collection and the verbal form *inzā*l (الانزال) has been used.

2) To accept that the reality of the Book is something different from the words written on paper, etc. Its common meaning gives the picture of a thing which can be divided and sectionalized and which can be a subject of expansion and graduality, but the reality of the Book is a single, non-gradual thing which was sent down all at once, and not in pieces.

This second meaning is apparent in many verses of the Qur'ān. See for example the verses, (This is) a book whose verses were confirmed, then they were divided (made clear) from One Wise All-aware. (11:1) ''Strengthened'' or ''confirmed'' (uḥkimat, احكمت) is the opposite of ''divided'', ''made clear'' (fuṣṣilat, فصّلت). The literal meaning of tafṣīl (التّفصيل) is to divide intoparts and sections; that is why it implies explanation and clarification. Therefore, confirmed (uḥkimat, احكمت) would mean that in that state it was indivisible and indistinguishable in its parts, because it was a single unit without any part of section. The sequence of the words in this verse shows that this division which we find in the Qur'ān came to it later; before that, it was some thing confirmed, undivided and one.

More clear are the verses, And certainly, We have brought them a Book which We have 'sectionalized' (i.e. explained) with knowledge, a guidance and a mercy for the people who believe. Do they wait for aught but its final interpretation? On the day when its final interpretation comes about, those who neglected it before will say: Indeed the Apostles of our Lord had brought the truth ... (7:52-53). Also the verses, And this Qur'ān is not such as could be forged by those besides Allāh, but it is a verification of that which is before it and a 'sectionalization' (explained) of the Book, there is no doubt in it, for the Lord of the worlds ... Nay, they rejected that of which they have not comprehensive knowledge, and its final interpretation has not yet come to them ... (10:37-38). These verses, and especially the last one, clearly show that the division into parts is a thing which came later unto the Book. Therefore, the reality of the Book is one thing and the division which it was subjected to is another. The unbelievers rejected the division (explanation) of the Book because they neglected (forgot) something to which that explanation led and which has been referred to here as the ‘‘final interpretation’’, and which will appear before them on the Day of Judgement and, at that time, they will inevitably know it, but then their regret will not benefit them, and it is too late to repent. These verses also imply that the real Book is the final interpretation of the Book.

Even far more clear are the verses, By the Book which makes manifest (the truth), surely We made it an Arabic Qur'ān that you may understand, and surely it is in the Source of the Book with Us truly elevated, full of Wisdom. (43:2-4)

It is apparent that there is a Book which makes manifest the truth, which was later made into an Arabic Qur'ān (Recited thing); and it was clothed in recited words and Arabic language so that people might understand; but in reality it is in the Source of the Book with Allāh, elevated, so that minds do not reach it, full of wisdom without any division. This verse contains the definition of the Manifest Book and that it is the foundation of the Qur'ān revealed later in plain Arabic.

In the same way Allāh says in 56:75—80 But nay! I swear by the falling of stars - and most surely it is a great oath if you only know — Most surely it is an honoured Qur'ān in a Hidden Book, none touches it save the purified ones; A sending down (revelation) from the Lord of the worlds. These verses clearly show that the Qur'ān has its own place, in the Hidden Book, where none touches it save the purified servants of Allāh, and it was only later that it was sent down. But before being sent down it was in a Book which is hidden from others. It is that Hidden Book which was referred to as the Source of the Book in 43:2-4. The verse 85:21-22 calls that Source the Guarded Tablet: Nay! It is a Glorious Qur'ān in a Guarded Tablet. This tablet is called Guarded because it is preserved and protected from changes; but we know that in the Qur'ān which was sent down gradually there are verses abrogating other verses; gradual completion itself is a sort of change. So this Qur'ān cannot be called the Guarded Tablet. In short, the Manifest Book is the foundation of this Qur'ān and this Qur'ān is like a clothing to that Reality.

Now we know that the relation of this Qur'ān, when it was gradually revealed, to the Manifest Book — which we call the Reality of the Book — is that of a dress to its wearer, and of a metaphor to its real meaning, and of a proverb to its actual aim. It is because of this relationship that the word Qur'ān is sometimes used for the Real Book itself, as in the divine words, Nay! It is a Glorious Qur'ān in a Guarded Tablet, and in other similar verses. Therefore, we may correctly interpret the 'sending down of the Qur'ān', in the three verses, where it is said that it was revealed in the month of Ramaḍān (2:185), on a blessed night (44:3), on the Night of Destiny (97:1), as the revelation of the Source of the Book, i.e., the Manifest Book to the heart of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) all at once. And the sectionalized Qur'ān was revealed to his heart gradually during the entire period of his prophetic Call.

This can be better appreciated when we study some other verses. Allāh says, and do not make haste with the Qur'ān before its revelation is made complete to you… (20:114) Also He says: Do not move your tongue with it to make haste with it; surely on Us is the collecting of it and the reciting of it. Therefore, when We have recited it, then follow its recitation; again on Us is the explaining of it. (75:16-19) These verses prove without any shadow of doubt that the Messenger of Allāh had prior knowledge of what was being revealed to him. That is why he was asked not to make haste in reciting before its revelation was completed. (This matter will be further explained, God willing, in its proper place)

In short, after pondering on the verses of the Qur'ān one can not but accept that:

This Qur'ān which was gradually revealed to the Prophet is based on a sublime Reality which the minds of common people cannot comprehend and the hands of defiled imaginations (defiled with lust, greed and materialism) cannot touch. That sublime Reality was revealed to the Prophet all at once in the month of Ramaḍān. And in this way Allāh taught him the real goal and meaning of the Book. (This subject will be explained under the verse 3:7.)

This is what a deep consideration of the verses of the Qur'ān leads one to believe. Of course, the traditionalists, and most of the theologians as well as the materialists (who do not accept the reality of metaphysics, the things beyond the matter) have no way but to interpret these and the like verses (e.g. the verses which say that the Qur'ān is a guidance, mercy, light, spirit, setting-place of the stars, manifest book, in a guarded tablet, sent down from Allāh, in purified pages etc. etc.) as metaphorical and figurative expressions. Thus they have turned the Qur'ān into poetic prose!!

A writer has discussed the meaning of the revelation of the Qur'ān in the month of Ramaḍān. What follows is the gist of his writing; our comment will follow thereafter: ''There is no doubt that the beginning of the Call of the Prophet coincided with the revelation of the first revealed verses of the Qur'ān, and with his being asked by Allāh to announce the truth and warn the people. Also, there is no doubt that this happened in the night, as Allāh says, Surely We sent it down on a blessed night (44:3). Again, there is no doubt that it was in a night of the month of Ramaḍān as Allāh says, the month of Ramaḍān, in which was sent down the Qur'ān. (2:185)

''The whole Qur'ān was not revealed on that night ; but as the chapter of The Opening was revealed in it, and this chapter covers all the features and knowledge of the Qur'ān, it was as though the whole Qur'ān was revealed therein. (Moreover, the name ''Qur'ān'' is used for parts of the Book as well as for the complete book. Further, it is used in Qur'ānic terminology for all divine books like the Torah, the Injīl, the Zabūr etc.)

''The first revelation was Read in the name of Thy Lord ... (96:1), which was sent down on the 25th night of Ramaḍān. It was revealed when the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was proceeding to the house of Khadījah in the middle of the valley, looking at Jibrīl, who revealed to him the divine words, Read in the name of Thy Lord Who created ... When the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) received the revelation, it came into his mind to ask Jibrīl how to remember the name of his Lord. So, Jibrīl appeared before him and taught him the chapter of the Opening, In the name of Allāh, the Beneficent, the Merciful, All praise belongs to Allāh, the Lord of the worlds ... Then he taught him the method of prayer and disappeared. Then the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) regained consciousness, and did not find any trace of what he had witnessed except a fatigue which had overcome him because Jibrīl had pressed him hard at the time of revelation. Now, the Prophet continued on his way but he did not realize that he was sent by Allāh as His Messenger to mankind, commissioned to guide them unto the right path. When he entered the house, he slept the whole night because of weariness. In the morning, the angel returned and brought the revelation of God, 0 thou shrouded

(in thy mantle!) Arise, and warn ... (74:1-2)''

Then he goes on to say:

''This is the meaning of revealing the Qur'ān in the month of Ramaḍān, and the coincidence of his Call with the Night of Destiny. As for the assertion of some Shī'ite books that the start of the Call was on the 27th day of Rajab, these traditions (which are only found in some Shī'ite books which were not written before the beginning of the 4th century of Hijrah) are against the Qur'ān, as you know.''

Then he says:

''And there are other traditions which support these (Shī'ite) traditions and say that the meaning of the revelation of the Qur'ān in the month of Ramaḍān is that it was sent down, before the beginning of the Call of the Prophet, from the Guarded Tablet to the Inhabited House, and there Jibrīl dictated it to the angels so that it might be sent down to the Prophet after the beginning of his Call. But these mythological ideas which have been interpolated into the traditions are rejected, first, because they are against the Qur'ān, and second, because the guarded tablet mentioned in the Qur'ān means the physical world, and the inhabited house means the earth because mankind lives therein.''

This was the gist of his writing; and, by my life, I do not know which sentence in this balderdash can be amended to con form with fact and reality. The damage is too extensive to be repaired.

First: It is a strange fabrication which he has uttered about the beginning of the prophethood and the revelation of the Qur'ān for the first time. Where did he find that Read in the name of Thy Lord ... was revealed to the Prophet when he was on his way; and that the chapter of the Opening was revealed to him then and there; and at the same time he was taught the prayer, and that thereafter he entered his house and slept weary and tired, and then in the morning the chapter of al-Muddaththir (the Shrouded) was revealed asking him to announce his prophethood and warn the people? All of this is just his imagination which has no basis at all; neither any clear verse nor any tradition of any standing supports it. It is just a mythological story which conforms with neither the Qur'ān nor the traditions, as you will see.

Second: He claims that it is accepted that the beginning of the prophethood and the revelation of the Qur'ān as well as the command to announce his prophethood, all happened at one and the same time. Then he explains it by saying that the prophethood started with the revelation of the Qur'ān; and the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was a prophet without being an apostle (Messenger of Allāh) for one night, then in the morning he was given Messengership when the 74th chapter (The Shrouded) was revealed. But the writer cannot show any evidence to support himself either from the Qur'ān or from the traditions; and what he claims to be ''accepted'' is not accepted at all.

As for the traditions, what he has criticised the Shī'ite collections for (that they were written long after the incident) equally discredits all other collections of traditions and no trust can be had in any of them, because not a single book of the traditions, whether of the Sunnīs or the Shī'ahs, was written before the expiry of the second century of Hijrah or even later. This much about the traditions. The position of history — which, by the way, does not give the above details — is worse than the traditions. And the criticism of interpolation which he has levelled against the traditions must be directed against history also.

So far as the Qur'ān is concerned, it does not support any of his assertions. On the other hand, it plainly contradicted what he has said and refutes what he has fabricated. The 96th chapter (Read in the name of Thy Lord ...) is the first one revealed, as has been described by the traditions and is proved by the meaning of the first five verses; and nobody has said that this chapter was revealed piecemeal, (at least there is a likelihood that the whole chapter was revealed all together). Now, this chapter clearly shows that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to pray in the presence of the Meccans, some of whom forbade him to do so and talked about him their gatherings. (We do not know the method of the prayer which the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) performed in the beginning of his Call to be nearer to Allāh, except that this chapter mentions prostration.) Look at these verses of this chapter: Did you see him who forbids a Servant (of Allāh) when he prays? Have you considered if he (the Servant) were on the Guidance or enjoined guarding (against evil)? Have you considered if he (the unbeliever) gives the lie (to the truth) and turns (his) back? Did he not know that Allāh does see? Nay! If he desist not, We will certainly smite his forehead; a lying sinful forehead. Then let him summon his council; We too will summon the tormentors of Hell. Nay! Obey him not, and prostrate and draw nigh (to Allāh) (95:9—19). These verses show that there was someone who used to forbid a worshipper to pray, and used to mention this matter in his council and did not desist from his deed; and obviously the one who used to pray was the Prophet himself (s.a.w.a.), especially as Allāh directly addresses him in the last verse, Obey him not, and prostrate and draw nigh (to Allāh). This chapter, therefore, proves that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) used to pray even before the revelation of the first chapter of the Qur'ān, and was a Guidance, and enjoined piety and guarding against evil. In other words, his work at that time consisted of prophethood and was not just a warning. In short, even before the Qur'ān was revealed, and the chapter of the Opening sent down to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), and even before he was told to start his Call, he was a prophet and used to pray.

So far as the chapter of the Opening is concerned, it was revealed some time after the beginning of the Call. Had there been any truth in the assertion of the above writer that it was revealed just after the 94th chapter because ''it came into the Prophet's mind to ask Jibrīl how to remember Allāh'', it would have begun with the word say (qul, قل): Say, in the name of Allāh ... or Say, all praise belongs to Allāh ... ; and would have ended at the words, Master of the Day of Judgement, because the last three verses have no relation with that supposed question, and it is not the style of the Qur'ān to indulge in unnecessary talk. Of course, a verse in the 15th chapter (al-Hijr) says "And certainly We have given you seven oft-repeated (verses) and the great Qur'ān." (15-87) This chapter is of Meccan period as its subject matter shows. Seven oft-repeated verses means the chapter of the Opening, and it has been mentioned here side by side with the Qur'ān, which shows its greatness and excellence. Yet it was not counted as the Qur'ān, but only as seven of its oft-repeated verses, and only one of its parts. For further proof see 39:23 where the Qur'ān has been given the adjective, ''oft-repeated'': Allāh has revealed the best discourse, a Book conforming in its various parts, oft-repeated ... Thus, the Qur'ān is ''oft-repeated'' and the chapter of the Opening is only seven of its verses.

The 15th chapter mentions the 1st chapter (the Opening). It proves that the 1st chapter was revealed before the 15th. And the 15th chapter contains the verses; Therefore, declare openly what you are bidden and turn aside from the polytheists. Surely, We will suffice you against the scoffers. (15:94—95) These verses show that the Messenger of Allāh had refrained from openly warning for a time and then was told to start it again by the words, declare openly.

Now let us look at the 74th chapter (the Shrouded) and its 2nd verse, Arise, and warn. If this chapter was revealed all together, then this verse has the same implication as the verse declare openly what you are bidden (15:94) because this chapter contains the following verses: Leave Me and him whom I created alone and gaven him vast riches ... Then he turned back and was big with pride and, then he said, this is naught but an enchantment narrated .... (74:11-25) This subject matter is similar to 15:94which says and turn aside from the polytheists. And if it was revealed piecemeal, then the context says that at least the verses in its beginning were revealed in the early days of the Call, after the Prophet had refrained from an open warning for some time.

Thirdly: He asserts that those traditions are forged and mythological which say that the Qur'ān was sent down on the Night of Destiny from the Preserved Tablet to the Inhabited House all together before the beginning of the prophethoot and then its verses were revealed in segments to the Messenger of Allāh. He says that they are against the Book of Allāh and their meaning is not correct. He claims that the Preserved Tablet means the Natural World and the Inhabited House means the Earth. Well, all the above claims are incorrect and a complete lie:

First, because no clear verse of the Qur'ān goes against these traditions as has been explained earlier.

Second, because nowhere in these traditions has it been said that the Qur'ān was sent down to the Inhabited House before the beginning of the prophethood. This clause has been added by the said writer without any basis.

Third: His assertion that the Preserved Tablet means the natural world (i.e. the universe) is a very ugly interpretation; nay, rather it is a laughing-stock. Can he explain what is the basis of naming this universe — in the word of Allāh — as 'the Preserved Tablet'? Is this because this universe is free from change and alteration? But it is a world of movement, always in a state of fluidity, always changing its quality. Or is it because this universe is safe from physical deterioration? But the facts belie such a claim. Or is it because undeserving persons cannot have any knowledge of it (as Allāh says in 56:77-79*, Most surely it is an* honoured Qur'ān, in a book that is protected; none shall touch it save the purified ones)? But the knowledge of the universe is not restricted to any one group.

In short, that writer did not produce any interpretation, concerning the revelation of Qur'ān in the month of Ramaḍān, which could be in accord with the words of the verse. His interpretation boils down to this: The words, in it was sent down the Qur'ān, mean ''it is as though in it was sent down the Qur'ān.'' And the words, Surely We revealed it in the Night of Destiny. mean ''It is as though We revealed it in the Night of Destiny.'' Any such interpretation cannot be tolerated by language, usage and context.

Further, that writer says that the whole Qur'ān was revealed to the Messenger of Allāh in the Night of Destiny because he was given in that night the chapter of the Opening which contains all the important knowledge of the Qur'ān. Well why cannot others say that the revelation of the Qur'ān all at one time means that all its knowledge was sent down to the heart of the Messenger of Allāh in that night? There is nothing to contradict this interpretation.

There are many other fabrications and lies in that writing but this is not the place to go into a detailed refutation of it.

Qur'ān: a guidance for the people and clear evidence of guidance and discrimination (between right and wrong): ''People'' generally refers to the lowest category of mankind whose intelligence is not high. This word is generally used in the Qur'ān with this very implication. For example, but most people do not know (30:30); And these examples, We set them forth for the people and none understand them but the learned. (29:43) This word generally refers to the people who just follow what others say; they cannot understand abstract ideas even with the help of evidence and proof; they cannot discriminate between right and wrong through any argument; they need someone to explain ideals and a guide to lead them to the right path. And the Qur'ān is a guidance for these people; and what an ideal guidance it is!! Then comes the special group which is perfect both in knowledge and deeds, ready to receive the light of divine guidance, and may be relied upon to discriminate between right and wrong. For such people, the Qur'ān is the clear evidence and proof of guidance and discrimination. It leads them to the guidance and chooses right for them and shows them how to discriminate between good and evil, right and wrong. Allāh says: Whereby Allāh guides him, who follows His pleasure, into the ways of peace and takes them out from darkness towards the light by His will and guides them unto the path that is straight. (5:16)

From the above discourse one may understand why Allāh has used here two words ‘‘guidance’’ and ‘‘clear evidence of guidance’’. The relation between the two is that of general and particular. The Qur’ān is guidance for one group and clear evidence of guidance for another.

Qur’ān: so whosoever of you witnesses the month, he shall fast therein.

Shahādah (witnessing, الشّهادة) means ‘presence’ by which one acquires knowledge. Witnessing the month means arrival of the month and the knowledge of its arrival.

Some people say that witnessing of the month means sighting of the new moon, and not on journey. But there is no evidence to support. this interpretation. Of course, sometimes the context implies such a meaning; but there is no such context in this verse.

Qur’ān: and whosoever is sick or on a journey (he shall fast) the same number of other days: This sentence has been repeated here. But this repetition is not for emphasis. It was explained earlier that the first two verses did not promulgate any law; rather they paved the way for such promulgation and prepared the minds to accept and follow the law which was to be shortly announced. It is in this third verse in which that law has been promulgated. As the aim of the first sentences is different from this one, there is, in fact, no repetition.

Qur’ān: Allāh desires ease for you and He desires not hardship for you; and so that you may complete the (prescribed) number: It is the explanation of the above mentioned exception. A sick person or a traveller has to break his fast because Allāh desires ease for you, and he shall fast the same number in other days so that you may complete the prescribed number.

So that ‘‘L…’’ (ل ; so that) in ‘so that you may complete the number’’ (litukmilu ’l-‘iddah ,. لتكملوا العدّة)gives the meaning of cause, and it is governed by the verb ‘‘desires’’. Therefore, its meaning will be: We ordered you to break the fast (under certain conditions) and repay it in other days to lighten your burden and to complete the prescribed number.

Qur'ān: and that you glorify Allāh for his guiding you, and so that you may be thankful to Him: Apparently, these two sentences, the first of which begins with 'so that' (L ... ,ل) for a 'cause', give the reason of the fast, and not of the exception and exemption. The words the month of Ramaḍān are followed by the description of the revelation of the Qur'ān in this month. And it indicates that there is a connection between the promulgation of the fast of the month of Ramadān and the revelation of the Qur'ān in it as a guidance for the people and a clear evidence of guidance and discrimination between right and wrong. Therefore, the ''so that'' (L... ,ل) points out that keeping the fast is meant to glorify Allāh because He revealed the Qur'ān for them and announced His Lordship and the people's servitude. Also it is a thanks to Him since He guided them unto the truth and gave them a Book which discriminates for them between right and wrong.

There is a difference between thanking Allāh by fasting and glorifying Him through it. A fast can be said to be a thanks to Allāh only when it contains the real spirit of the fast. What is the real spirit of the fast? To be sincere towards Allāh by purifying oneself from material involvement and abstaining from the greatest desires of the heart.

But glorifying Him does not depend on that real spirit. The form of the fast and mere abstaining from those things which break the fast (whether it is done with sincere intention or not) shows the glory of Allāh and His greatness, as the man is following His command with such self-denial.

Keeping in view this difference, Allāh has differentiated between glorifying and thanking: Thanking has been prescribed with ''لعلّ''(la'alla) which literally means 'perhaps' and is used to indicate hope, while glorifying has begun with ''so that'' (L, ل) which indicates cause. And thus we find and that you glorify Allāh...and so that you may be thankful to Him. It is the same style which is used at the end of the first of these verses so that you may guard yourselves...

TRADITIONS

al-Ḥadīth al-Qudsī: Allāh said, ''The fast is for Me and I shall give its reward.'' (or, '' I shall be its reward'')

Explanation: This ḥadīth has been narrated by both groups (i.e. Sunnī and Shī'ah) with slight variations. Why has the fast been declared to be for Allāh? Because it is the only act of worship which consists of a negative aspect only, for example, not eating, not drinking, etc., while all other acts of worship, like prayer and pilgrimage etc., consist of positive actions or are made up of positive and negative aspects. The positive actions cannot be absolutely pure in showing the worshipper's spirit of servitude or the Lordship of Almighty Allāh. It cannot be free of materialistic imperfections and limitations, and sometimes it may be done to please someone other than Allāh (as in the case of hypocrisy and showiness). But the fast is an act of worship in which one has just to abstain from lust and desire and restrain oneself from worldly matters. This negative aspect is a thing which nobody can know except Allāh. It is a dealing entirely between the servant and his Lord, and therefore this worship is purely for Allāh; others can have no share in it.

''I shall give its reward'' can also be translated ''I shall be its reward''. If the former, then it means that Allāh Himself will give its reward directly and will not make anyone a link between Himself and His servant. The servant worshipped Him in a way that nobody knew but Allāh, so he will be given its reward in a way that nobody will know it but Allāh.

It is like the ḥadīth about alms: ''Verily alms, Allāh takes it Himself without making anyone a link in it. Allāh said, Do they not know that Allāh ... takes the alms. (9:105)

If the second translation is correct, then it indicates that the reward of the one who fasts is nearer to Allāh.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The Messenger of Allāh, in the early days of his prophethood, used to fast continuously so that people would think that he would not leave a single day's fast, and then to leave the fast continuously so that they would say he would not fast again. Then he changed this regime and began fasting on alternate days, and this was the fast of Dāwūd. Then he changed it and started fasting three bright days (i.e., 13th, 14th and 15th of the lunar month when the moonlight is the brightest.) Then again he divided the three days — one day each in every ten days, the first and last Thursdays and the Wednesday in the middle. And he continued with this regime till he left this world.'' [al-Kāfī]

And there is a ḥadīth from ‘Anbasah al-‘Ābid that when the Messenger of Allāh died it was his custom to fast in Sha‘bān and Ramaḍān and three days in every month.

The author says: There are numerous traditions about it from Ahlu ’l-bayt ; and this is the sunnah fast which the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to keep in addition to the fast of Ramaḍān.

There is a ḥadīth in Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī under the words of Allāh, O ye who believe! Fasting has been prescribed for you, from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that ‘‘It is for the believers only’’.

Jamīl asked aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh O ye who believe! Fighting has been prescribed for you, and O ye who believe! Fasting has been prescribed on you. The Imām replied: ‘‘All such verses cover (even) those who have gone astray as well as the hypocrites, and (in short) everyone who accepted the declared Call (i.e. Islam).’’

Ḥafṣ said: ‘‘I heard Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) say: ‘Verily the month of Ramadān, Allāh did not prescribe its fast for any of the people before us.’ I asked: ‘Then (what is the meaning of) the word of Allāh: 0 ye who believe! Fasting has been prescribed for you as it was prescribed for those before you?’ (The Imām) said: ‘Verily Allāh prescribed the month of Ramaḍān for the prophets, not for their peoples. Thus Allāh honoured this ummah and prescribed its fast for the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) as well as for this ummah.’’ [Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l faqīh]

The author says: This ḥadīth is weak because there is Ismā‘īl ibn Muḥammad in its chain of narrators. The same thing is narrated from al-‘Ālim i.e. al-Kāẓim (a.s.), and probably both traditions are one and the same. In any case, this is a solitary tradition (khabaru ’l-wāḥid, الخبر الواحد — a tradition which is not narrated by a great enough number of narrators as to create a certainty of its truth). The obvious meaning of the verses does not support the view that ‘‘as it was prescribed for those before you’’ refers to the prophets only. Had it been the case (and we know that this sentence has been revealed to encourage the believers to fast, to prepare them for it and to exhort them), then it would have served the purpose better if the word, ‘prophets’, had been clearly mentioned, as it would have been more effective. And Allāh knows better.

There is a tradition from a man who asked aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) whether the Qur’ān and furqān are two things or one. (The Imām) said: ‘‘Qur’ān is the complete Book and Furqān is the obligatory law.’’ [al-Kāfī]

A ḥadīth from the same Imām (a.s.) says: ''Furqān is every clear verse of the Book.'' [Jawāmi 'u 'l- jāmi ']

The same Imām (a.s.) said: ''Furqān is every clear law in the Qur'ān and the Book is the complete Qur'ān which vouches for the previous prohets.'' [at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī and al-Qummī]

The author says: This interpretation is supported by the literal meaning of the word.

It has been said in some traditions that Ramaḍān is one of the names of Allāh ; therefore, one should not say 'Ramaḍān came' or 'Ramaḍān went away'; but should say 'the month of Ramaḍān …' But it is a solitary tradition and is unusual. This saying has been reported also from Qatādah from among the commentators of the Qur'ān. But the traditions which count the names of Allāh do not mention Ramaḍān as one of His names. And the use of the word Ramaḍān without the word ''month'' as well as its dual form ''Ramaḍānān''(two Ramaḍāns) is very common in the traditions narrated from the Prophet and the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) This usage is very common; and it cannot be said that a particular narrator might have omitted the word 'month' by mistake.

aṣ-Ṣabāḥ ibn Nubātah said: ''I told Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) that Ibn Abī Ya'fūr told me to ask you some questions. The Imām said: 'And what are those?' I said: 'He asks you, if the month of Ramaḍān enters and one is in his house, is he allowed to go on a journey?' The Imām said: 'Verily Allāh says so whosoever of you witnesses the month, he shall fast therein. Therefore, anyone who is in his house when the month of Ramaḍān enters is not allowed to travel except for ḥajj or 'umrah or in search of such goods which are in danger of being lost.' '' [al-'Ayyāshī]

The author says: It is a fine inference of a non-obligatory law based on the generality of the words.

'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn (a.s.) said: ''And as regards the fast of a journey and sickness, the Sunnīs ('āmmah, العامّة) have conflicting views: a group says, he shall fast; others say, he shall not fast ; still others opine, he will fast if he so wishes, and shall leave it if so desires. But we say, he shall leave the fast in both conditions. And if he fasted while on journey or during illness then on him is its repayment, i.e. he must fast the same number on other days, because Allāh says, But whoso among you be sick or on a journey, then (he shall fast) the sane number of other days.'' [al-Kāfī]

The author says: al-'Ayyāshī also has narrated this tradition.

And there is in the same Tafsīr (under the word of Allāh, so whosoever of you witnesses the month ...) a tradition of al-Bāqir (a.s.) in which the Imām said: How clear is this verse for him who understands — He who is present in Ramaḍān shall fast, and he who is on a journey during it shall break the fast.

The author says: There are numerous traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt that it is incumbent on the sick and the traveller to break the fast; and the same is their madhhab. Also, you have seen that the verse of the Qur'ān clearly proves the same.

Abū Baṣīr said: ' 'I asked him (the Imām — a.s.) about the words of Allāh and those who are hardly able to do so, on them is a redemption by feeding a poor man. The Imām said: 'The aged man who is not able (to fast) and the sick.' '' [al-'Ayyāshī]

Imām al-Baqīr (a.s.) is reported to have said about that verse: ''The aged man, and the one who has a sickness in which he is always thirsty.'' [ibid.]

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) is reported to have said in explanation of that verse: ''The woman who is afraid for her child and the aged man.'' [ibid.]

The author says: There are numerous traditions from the Imāms to this effect. And the ''sick'' mentioned in the tradition of Abū Basīr (mentioned above) means that sick person whose illness continues the whole year till the next Ramaḍān comes ; such a sick person will not be required to fast the same number of other days.

Sa'īd said that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''Verily, there is takbīr (Allāhu akbar) on the day of 'Idu 'l-fiṭr. I said: 'There is no takbīr except in 'Idu 'l-Aḍḥā.' The Imām said: 'There is takbīr on that day ; but it is sunnah in prayers of sunset, nightfall, dawn, noon and afternoon and in the two rak'ats of 'īd.' '' [al-'Ayyāshī]

Sa'īd an-Naqqāsh said: ''Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) told me, 'There is takbīr on the eve of 'Īdu 'l-fiṭr but it is sunnah. I asked him; 'And when it is?'He said: 'In the prayer of sunset, nightfall on the eve of 'Idu 'l -fiṭr and in the prayers of dawn and 'īd. Then it is discontinued.' I asked him: 'How should I say it?' He said: 'You say

الله اكبر لا اله الّا الله و الله اكبر الله اكبر على ما هدانا

(Allāhu akbar Allāhu akbar lāillāha illa'llāhu wa'llāhu a kbar Allāhu akbaru 'alā mā hadānā) — and it is the meaning of the words of Allāh, so that you shall complete the number (i.e. prayer) and that you glorify Allāh for His guiding you. And the glorifying (takbīr, التكبير) is that you say: الله اكبر لا اله الا الله و الله اكبر و لله الحمد (Allāhu akbar, lā illāha illa'llāh u wa'llāhu akbar wa lillāhi 'l-ḥamd).' And he said: 'In a tradition the last takbir is four times.''' [al-Kāfī]

The author says: The first tradition includes prayers of noon and afternoon in glorifying (takbīr, التّكبير) and the last oneomits them. This difference may be an indication of the difference in the degrees of sunnah. And the word of the Imām, ''i.e. prayer'', perhaps indicate that the words of Allāh, so that you shall complete the number, meand 'complete the number of the days of fast with the prayer of 'īd and glorify Allāh with prayers for His guiding you'. This meaning is not against the meaning which we described earlier because it is an inference of a non-obligatory rule from a sentence containing an obligatory law. It is like the tradition quoted earlier in which the Imām inferred from the verse, so whosoever of you witnesses the month he shall fast therein the undesirability of travel when one is in his abode on the first night.

The tradition has two different methods of takbīr. This difference supports the opinion of some writers that glorifying in ''that you glorify Allāh'' includes praising also, and that is why it is followed in this verse by the preposition on ('alā, على) which is the preposition generally used after praise (al-ḥamd, , الحمد)

Ibn Abī 'Umayr said that he asked aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.): ''May I be your ransom! Is it correct what we are told, that the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) fasted for twenty-nine days much more than he fasted for thirty days? He (the Imām) said: 'Allāh did nto create a single letter of this talk. The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) did not fast but thirty days, because Allāh says: You shall complete the number. Was the Messenger of Allāh shortening it?' '' [al-'Ayyāshī]

The author says: This question is for repudiation. The tradition shows what we have already mentioned that completing herer means completing the month of Ramaḍān.

One of our companions narrates about the words of Allāh, so that you glorify Allāh for His guiding you, that glorifying means 'extolling'and guidance means 'friendship of the Imāms' (wilāyah , الولاية). [al Maḥāsin]

The author says: The interpretation of guidance as friendship of the Imām is like explaining an idea by giving a clear example. Also, it may be treated as its inner meaning. It is as has been mentioned in some traditions that in the verse: Allāh desires ease for you and He desires not hardship for you, 'ease' means friendship (of the Imāms) and 'hardship' means their enmity and friendship with enemies of Allāh.

Ḥafṣ ibn al-Ghiyāth asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about the words of Allāh the month of Ramaḍān in which was sent down the Qur'ān, when (the fact is that) the Qur'ān was sent down twenty years from its beginning to its end. Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) said: ''The Qur'ān came all together in the month of Ramaḍān down to the 'Inhabited House'; then it came down (in segments) in a period of twenty years.'' Then the Imām said: ''The Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said: 'The book of Ibrāhīm came down in the first night of the month of Ramaḍān, and the Torah was sent down on the sixth of the month of Ramaḍān, and the Zabūr was sent down on the eighteenth of the month of Ramaḍān and the Qur'ān was sent down on the twenty-third of the month of Ramaḍān.' '' [al-Kāfī]

The author says: The tradition of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) narrated by the Imām (a.s.) has been narrated by as-Suyūṭī in ad-Durru 'l-man thūr, with several chains from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) through Wāthilah ibn al-Asqa'.

Ya'qūb said ; '' I heard a man asking Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about the Night of Destiny, whether it occurred (once only) or it comes every year. Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) said: 'If the Night of Destiny were taken away the Qur'ān would be taken away.' '' [al-Kāfī and Man lā yaḥḍurruhu 'l faqīh]

Ibn 'Abbās said: ''The month of Ramaḍān and the Blessed Night and the Night of Destiny ; because verily the Night of Destiny is the Blessed Night and it is in Ramaḍān. The Qur'ān came down all together from reminder (dhikr , الذكر) to the Inhabited House and it is the falling place of the stars in the lowest heaven where the Qur'ān came down. Later it descended on Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) piecemeal, about order, prohibition, and in battles.' '' [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

The author says: This matter has also been narrated by others, like Sa'īd ibn Jubayr. And it appears from this talk of Ibn 'Abbās that he inferred it from the Qur'ānic verses ; for example the words of Allāh: and the wise reminder (3:58), And (I swear by) the Book written in an outstretched fine parchment and the inhabited house and the elevated canopy (52:2—5); But nay! I swear by the falling of stars, and most certainly it is a great oath if you only know, most surely it is an honoured Qur'ān in a Book that is hidden ; none shall touch it save the purified ones (56:75—79) ; and We adorned the lowest heaven with lamps (stars) and (made it) to guard (41:12) And all His words are clear except what He said about the place of falling, that it is the lowest heaven and is the place of the Qur'ān. The meaning of this assertion is obscure and the verses of the 56th chapter do not clearly show it. Of course ; it is narrated from Ahlu 'l-bayt that the Inhabited House is in heaven, and we shall explain it, God willing, in its proper place.

What should clearly be understood is that traditions are like the Qur'ān, because there are, in traditions also, some clear ones and others ambiguous. One very commonly finds in their talks which are based on hints and symbols, and especially so in the explanation of such facts as the Tablet, the Pen, the Curtain, the Heaven, the Inhabited House, the Swollen Sea etc. Therefore, it is obligatory for a research scholar to strive his utmost to find out if there is any hint or context to determine the true meaning of a given text.

وَإِذَا سَأَلَكَ عِبَادِي عَنِّي فَإِنِّي قَرِيبٌ أُجِيبُ دَعْوَةَ الدَّاعِ إِذَا دَعَانِ
فَلْيَسْتَجِيبُوا لِي وَلْيُؤْمِنُوا بِي لَعَلَّهُمْ يَرْشُدُونَ - ١٨٦ .

And when My servants ask you concerning Me, then verily I am near, I answer the prayer of the supplicant when he calls on Me, so they should answer My call and believe in Me, so that they may walk in the right way. (2:186)

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: And when My servants ask. you concerning Me, then verily I am near, I answer the prayer of the supplicant when he calls on Me. This is the best expression of the subject matter in the most elegant and beautiful style. The whole verse is based on the first person singular pronoun which shows the great importance which the speaker, i.e. Allāh attaches to this subject ; then come the words My servants and not ''people'' or such other words ; and this enhances its importance even more ; the reply (then verily I am near) starts dramatically just after the question without any preamble like: ''then say that I am near''; and the reply has been emphasized with ''verily'' (inna انّ) ; and the nearness of the speaker is described with the adjective near and not with any verb like ''I come near him'', thus it shows that He is already near and will always remain near ; then it mentions answering the prayer with the verb the muḍāri' (المضارع = aorist tense) which combines both the present and the future tenses; and indicates that He answers at present and will continue to answer the prayers of the supplicant ; then the answer (I answer the prayer of the supplicant) is conditioned with when he calls on Me, but in reality it is not a condition separate from the main [n]ause, both are one and the same thing, and it serves to emphasize that the prayer of the supplicant is answered without any condition or stipulation (as we see also in the verse: call on Me, I will answer you 40:60). These seven points show how much importance has been attached to the answering of prayers. In addition, this verse — short as it is — repeats the first person singular pronoun seven times ; it is the only verse with this characteristic in the whole of Qur'ān.

''Du'ā'' and ''da'wah'' (call, الدعآء and الدّعوة) mean to turn the attention of the called one to the caller. Asking (su 'āl, السّوال) means to gain a benefit or advantage from the one whose attention is drawn towards the asker and before whom his (asker's) need is put. Therefore, asking (su'āl, السّوال) is the final aim of calling (du'ā', الدعآء). This meaning covers all types of asking, for example, asking for the removal of ignorance, asking with the meaning of reckoning, asking in the sense of seeking beneficence.

Literally, ''bondage'' ('ubūdiyyah, العبودية), as explained earlier, is the status of being owned. It is not used for any other owned thing except human beings. Therefore, ''servant'' ('abd, العبد) is used only for a human being or another intelligent being (like an angel).

The ownership of Allāh is as different from the ownership of others as is the truth from pretence or the reality from metaphor. Allāh owns His servants ; His ownership is total and comprehensive. They have no authority, independent from Allāh, over their own selves or over matters or things which are subordinate to them ; for example, their attributes and actions and all things which are related to them, like wives, children, property, honour etc. Everything which they own and is related to them in any way — as we say, his self, his body, his ears, his eyes, his actions, his impression (and these are a sort of natural and real possessions), or as we say, his spouse, his wealth, his honour, his right — (and these are a sort of supposed or assumed possession) — is in his possession only because Allāh allowed the establishment of that relation of ownership between man and his possession, whatever it may be. It is Allāh, glorified be His name, who gave their selves and their persons to them — and if He did not wish so, it could not be attributed to them and they would have remained without any self or person — in other words, non-existent. It is He who gave them hearing and sight and hearts ; and it is He who created everything, then fixed for it a measure.

Therefore, Allāh intervenes between a thing and its self, between it and between all its associates like child, spouse, friend, property, honour and rights. It means that He is the nearest of all to His creatures. In other words, He is the Near One in the true sense of this word. He has said: And We are nearer to him than you, but you see (Us) not (56:85); and We are nearer to him than his life vein (50:16) ; and know that Allāh intervenes between man and his heart (8:24). 'Heart' here means the rational soul or spirit.

In short, Allāh's ownership of His creatures is real ownership, and as they are His servants He is near to them in its true sense, which means nearest of all things. This ownership gives Him authority to make use of them as He wishes, without any hindrance or obstruction. Also it gives Him authority to answer any prayer which is put before Him by any of His creatures, and to fulfil his need by accepting his supplication, because the ownership is all encompassing, and His Power and pervasiveness cover all possible situations. It is not as though He has authority in one eventuality and not in the other, as the Jews say that when God created things and decreed their destinies, His work was finished and now His hands are folded up, He can not take any new decision ; there is no abrogation (of previous laws), no change and no answering of prayer because every affair is already finished. Nor is it, as a group of this ummah said, that Allāh has no power about the actions of His creatures. They are called Qadariyyah and were named the Magians of this ummah by the Messenger of Allāh. Sunnīs and Shī'ahs both have reported that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''Qadariyyah are the Magians of this ummah''.

The truth is that real ownership in its totality is by Allāh only and nobody owns any thing but when He makes him its owner and allows him to possess it. Therefore, whatever Allāh wills and gives in possession and allows its coming into being, comes into being. And whatever He does not will, and does not give in possession and does not allow, does not come into being, even if one strives his utmost to bring it into being. Allāh has said: 0 people! You are they who are needy unto Allāh, and Allāh is He who is the Self-sufficient, the Most Praised One. (35:15)

It is, thus, clear that this verse not only mentions a fact, i.e., answering prayer, but gives its reasons also: Because the supplicants are servants of Allāh, He is near to them ; and because He is near to them, He answers their prayers without any reservation. And the unconditional answering of prayer means that there is no condition imposed on prayer also ; whatever prayer is addressed to Him, He shall answer it. Of course, it seems that His promise 'I answer the prayer of the supplicant' depends on the condition, when he calls Me. But this condition is not something different from the main clause ; and such a mode of expression indicates that the main clause is free from metaphor and analogy ; that its meaning is what appears from the words. For example, when we say, ‘‘Listen to the sincere advisor when he sincerely advises you’’, or ‘‘Respect the scholar if he be a scholar’’, it means that we want him to be sure that the advisor is really sincere or the scholar is really a scholar so that listening to him or respecting him becomes necessary. In the same way, the condition when he calls on me shows that the promise of answering the prayer shall apply when the supplicant is a supplicant in reality ; when he wants that thing according to his natural and deep ingrained knowledge and when his heart is really in what his tongue is asking for. The reality of prayer and supplication is what the heart decries and the tongue of nature asks for, not this tongue of flesh which moves as it is moved without caring whether the word spoken is a truth or a lie, a reality or a metaphor, a serious talk or a joke. It is because of this that Allāh has even mentioned such prayers in which the tongue is not used at all. He said: And He gave you of all that you asked Him ; and if you count Allāh's bounties, you will not be able to compute them ; Verily, man is very unjust very ungrateful (14:34). Mankind prays to Him and beseeches Him for bounties which they cannot count, but this asking is not done by the tongue of the mouth, it is done by the tongue of their neediness, the tongue of nature and existence. Also He said: All those in the heavens and the earth do beseech Him ; every day He is in a (new) splendor (55:29). This verse more clearly proves what we have just said.

Therefore, the natural prayer addressed to Allāh shall always be answered. If a prayer is not answered then it lacks both or one of the two things mentioned in the verse: the prayer of the supplicant when he calls on Me. It may happen in following ways:

First: There may be no prayer at all, it may only be a misunderstanding of the supplicant. For example, a man prays for an impossible thing (but he does not know that it is impossible), or for a thing which, if he knew the fact, would not have wanted at all. Let us say that someone was sick and died but his friend is unaware of his death and prays for his recovery, while now the prayer should be for bringing him back to life. If he had been really sure that a dead body could be resurrected and had asked for its resurrection (as the prophets did) his life would have been returned to him ; but he does not have such firm conviction and therefore the prayer is not answered. Or, let us say, he asks for a thing which, had he known it really, he would not have wanted. Therefore, it is not granted.

Second: There is indeed a prayer, but it is not addressed exclusively to Allāh. For example, a man beseeches Allāh for his needs, but his heart is looking towards its apparent causes or to some imaginary beings whom he thinks have power to fulfil his needs. In this case, his prayer is not addressed exclusively to Allāh. In other words, he did not beseech Allāh at all; because Allāh, Who answers the prayers, is the One who has no partner in His affairs. He is not the one who works in partnership with apparent causes and imaginary beings.

So these are the two groups of supplicants whose hearts were not sincere in their prayers even if their tongues were.

This is the gist of the subject of prayer according to the verse of the Qur'ān. The meaning of all verses on this subject may be understood from this explanation. See, for example, the following verses:

> Say, my Lord would not care for you, were it not for your prayer; but you have indeed rejected (the truth), so soon you shall be in the grip (25:77).
>
> Say, think you that if the chastisement of Allāh comes to you or the Hour comes to you, will you call upon other than Allāh, if you are truthful[Nay! Him you will call upon, so He clears away that for which you pray, if He pleases, and you will forget what you set up (with Him) (6:40-41).
> Say, who is it that delivers you from the (dread of the) darkness of the land and the sea (when) you pray to him (openly) humiliating yourselves and secretly: ''If He delivers us from this, certainly we shall be of the grateful ones''. Say, Allāh delivers you from them and from every distress, yet again you associate (others) with Him (6:63-64).

These verses prove that man has been created with a natural prayer and inborn request, which is silently addressed to his Lord. But when he spends his life in ease and prosperity, his soul becomes blinded by apparent causes and he treats them as partners to his Lord ; thus he becomes confused and thinks that he does not ask his Lord for anything and does not beseech Him, while the fact is that he does not beseech anyone other than Allāh, because this prayer (to Allāh) is ingrained into his nature, and there is no change in the creation of Allāh. Later comes the hardship and the apparent causes become divorced from the expected effects, and those whom he treated as partners of Allāh or intercessors before Him disappear completely ; then he realizes that there is no one to fulfil his needs and to answer his prayers except Allāh. Thus, he returns to his natural monotheism and forgets every other cause and turns his face towards the Beneficent Lord ; and the Lord clears away his hardship and fulfils his wants and places him under the shade of opulence. But as soon as he regains his prosperity and happiness he goes back to the previous polytheism and forgetfulness.

And your Lord said: Call upon Me, I will answer you. Verily, those who are arrogant to My worship shall soon enter Hell, disgraced (40:60).

This verse invites mankind to beseech Allāh, and promises the answering, and goes even further by naming the prayer as worship in the clause, arrogant to My worship which means ‘‘to my prayer’’. Rather, it equates the worship with prayer: it threatens with Hell those who do not pray, and such a threat can only be justified when one neglects worship completely, not on neglecting only one kind of it. Therefore, the prayer is not just an important type of worship ; it is the foundation of worship itself.

From the above, one may appreciate the meaning of other verses on this subject:

Therefore, call upon Allāh, being sincere to Him in religion, though averse be the disbelievers (40:14).

And call on Him fearing and hoping ; surely, the mercy of Allāh is near to those who do good (7:56).

... surely they used to ... call unto Us with love and reverence, and were humble before Us (21:90).

Call upon your Lord humbly and secretly ; surely He loves nots those who exceed the limit (7:55).

When called he (Zakariyyā) unto his Lord in low voice. He said: My Lord! Surely my bones are weakened and my head flares with hoariness, and, my Lord! Never have I been unsuccessful in my prayer to Thee (19:3-4).

And He answers those who believe and do good deeds, and increases unto them of His grace (42:26).

There are other relevant verses, and all of these contain the pillars of prayer and explain the manner of the supplication. And the most important of all is to keep the prayer exclusively for Allāh ; it will come true when the feeling of the heart conforms with the words spoken by the tongue ; when one abandons reliance on all apparent reasons other than Allāh and depends exclusively upon Allāh. Also among them are: fear of Allāh ; hope in His answering ;His love and reverence ; humility and humbleness ;as well as perseverance in prayer ; remembrance of Allāh ; good deeds; true faith ; presence of heart at that time ; and similar things.

Qur'ān: So they should answer My call and believe in Me.

This sentence branches out from the previous one. Allāh is near to His servants ; nothings comes between Him and their prayer ; He cares for them and for the things they ask for ; that is why He invites them to call upon Him and He is of such high attributes. Therefore, they should accept this invitation of their Lord and should advance towards Him, and have faith in Him about this attribute, having firm belief that He is near and He answers their call ; so that they may be guided rightly in praying unto Him.

TRADITIONS

The Sunnīs and Shī'ahs both have narrated from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that ''Prayer is the armament of the believer.''

It is narrated in al-Ḥadīth al-qudsī: ''O Mūsā! Ask from Me all that you need, even fodder for your goat and salt for your dough.'' ['Uddatu'd-dā'ī]

The Prophet said: ''Calling (upon Allāh) is better than reciting the Qur'ān, because Allāh (Powerful and Great is He!) said, 'Say, My Lord would not care for you were it not for your prayer.''' [Makārimu 'l-akhlāq]

The same ḥadīth has been narrated from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.).

Muḥammad ibn 'Ajlān narrates from Muḥammad ibn 'Ubaydullāh ibn 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn from his cousin, aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) from his forefathers from the Prophet that he said: ''Allāh informed one of his prophets in a revelation: 'By My Power and Dignity! Verily I shall change into despair the hope of everyone who hoped from other than Me, and I shall dress him with the clothing of disgrace before people, and I shall remove him from My relief and bounty. Does my servant put his hope in other than Me in hardships, while hardships are in My hand ; And does he expect anything from other than Me, while I am the Self-sufficient, the Munificent? In My hand are the keys of the doors, while they are closed ; and My door is open for the one who calls on Me . ..' '' ['Uddatu 'd-dā'ī

The Prophet said: ''Allāh said ; 'No creature seeks refuge in another creature, leaving Me, but that I cut off all the means in the heavens and the earth for him. Then if he asks from Me, I do not give him ; and if he calls on Me, I do not answer him. And no creature seeks refuge in Me, leaving My creatures, but that I make the heaven and the earth responsible for his sustenance ; then if he calls on Me, I answer him and, if he seeks pardon from Me, I forgive!''' [ibid.]

The author says: The aim of the above two traditions is to emphasize that the invocation must be purely for Allāh. It was not meant to negate the positive causes which Allāh has created as instrumental links between the things and their needs. But these instruments are not independent causes. The Independent Cause is only Allāh. And man does have an inner feeling of this fact: he feels by his nature that there is a Perfect Cause who fulfils his needs and who can never fail in bringing about the desired effect. On the other hand, he knows that all the apparent causes which are expected to produce an effect, some times fail to do so. Thus he knows that the First Cause, who is the Source and Origin of everything and upon whom every need relies and depends for its fulfilment, is other than these apparent causes. Once he realises it, he will never entirely rely on these causes, forgetting the Real Cause. Man may appreciate this fact after just a little thinking.

Now, if he prays for something and that need is fulfilled, it will prove that he asked his Lord for it, and that the prayer, which emanated from his inner feeling and knowledge, reached through the apparent causes to His Lord and was granted by Him. On the contrary, if he prays to some apparent causes for it, then it does not originate from natural inner feeling and knowledge ; it is just an imaginary need, based not on inner feeling but on some imaginary reasons. It is one of the situations where appearance goes against reality, because he thinks that he is praying, while his inner self knows nothing about that prayer.

Another example: Many is the time that a man likes a thing and makes all efforts to get it ; but when he gets it, he finds that it is harmful to another thing which is far more important and far more dear than that thing. Then he leaves that which he had strived for and keeps that which is more important. Likewise, sometimes he dislikes a thing, but once it comes to him he finds it far more beneficial and far better than the alternative which he previously preferred. A child is sick ; when he is given a bitter medicine, he refuses to take it and starts crying. But at the same time he wants to regain his health. Now the position is this: his natural inner feeling prays for health and, therefore, for the medicine ; but his words and deeds reject the same medicine. Likewise, man, in his life, has a discipline based on natural understanding and inner feeling ; and he also has a system based on his imagination only. The natural discipline makes no mistake, it never leads astray ; while the imaginary discipline often goes wrong. It is clear from the example of the sick child that sometimes man asks for some thing urged by his imagination but in reality that very prayer is the prayer for its opposite.

This discourse will help the readers in understanding the meaning of the traditions, and it is also the implication of the words of ‘Alī (a.s.) which come later, ‘‘Verily, the granting (of Prayer) is according to the measure of the intention ...’’

The Prophet said: ‘‘Call upon Allāh and you can be confident for the answering.’’ [‘Uddatu ’d-dā ‘ī]

‘‘I am near the opinion (i.e. expectation) of My servant about Me ; so, he should not have any opinion about Me (i.e. should not expect from Me) except good.’’ [al-Ḥadīth al-qudsī]

The author says: It is because if one prays and at the same time is pessimistic or doubtful about its outcome, then it shows that the prayer is just a formality, the supplicant has no real intention of asking for it (see the previous explanation). And the traditions forbid asking for a thing which one is sure will not come about.

The Prophet said: ‘‘Resort to Allāh in your needs ; and seek refuge in Him in your misfortunes ; and humiliate yourselves before Him and beseech Him, because, verily, supplication is the essence of worship. And no believer calls upon Allāh but He answers him: either it is speeded up to him in this world, or is kept in reserve for him for the next one, or his sins are forgiven in proportion to his supplication, provided he does not pray for a sinful thing.'' ['Uddatu'd-dā'ī]

'Alī (a.s.) wrote in his will for his son, al-Ḥusayn (a.s.): ''Then He placed the keys of His treasures in your hands in the sense that He allowed you to ask Him. Therefore, whenever you wish, you may get the doors of His bounties opened with prayer, and get the heavy rains of His Mercy to fall upon you. Delay in acceptance of the prayer should not disappoint you, because the granting (of prayer) is according to the measure of (your) intention. And sometimes, the answering of your prayer is delayed so that it brings a greater reward to the asker and a better granting to the expectant. Sometimes you ask for a thing and it is not given to you, but a better thing is given to you, immediately or later ; or a thing is diverted from you for some greater good for you, because often you ask for a thing which would have destroyed your religion had it been given to you. Therefore, your prayer should be for things whose beauty should last for you and whose evil should remain away from you. As for wealth, it will not last for you, nor will you last for it.'' [Nahju 'l-balāghah]

The author says: ''The granting (of prayer) is according to the measure of (your) intention.'' 'Alī (a.s.) means that the answer is given according to the call. The supplicant is granted whatever he asks for from Allāh with the firm conviction of his conscience and with his heart, and not what is asked for in words. As explained earlier, the words sometimes do not completely conform with the real requirement demanded by the nature. This sentence, therefore, shows in the most lucid and comprehensive way, the relationship between prayer and its answer. 'Alī (a.s.) has, in this writing, explained many cases in which it appears that the prayer was not granted, e.g. where there is delay in answering the call, or a material bounty is asked for but it is changed to some thing which is far better for him either in this world or in the next, or it is diverted to some thing more beneficial for the asker. The supplicant had, for example, asked for a pleasant bounty ; and if he were given it without delay it would not have been really appreciated and valued, and, therefore, its granting was delayed. In short, when he asked for a ''pleasant'' bounty, he implicitly asked for a delay in granting of the prayer. Likewise, a believer who seriously pays attention to his religion, prays for some thing which would be harmful to his religion, although he does not know it and thinks that it would bring him happiness. But his happiness is in his religion and in the next world. Therefore, his prayer is in fact for the next world, not for this one, and, accordingly, it is granted for the next world, not for this one.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ‘‘A servant does not extend his hand towards Allāh, but that Allāh is ashamed to return it empty. He puts in it from His bounty and mercy whatever He wishes. So, when one of you calls (upon Allāh), he should not return his hand until he wipes it on his head and face.’’ [‘Uddatu ’d-dā ‘ī] In another ḥadīth it is ‘‘on his face and chest’’.

The author says: There are in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr eight similar traditions narrated by a number of the companions, like Salmān, Jābir, ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Umar, Anas ibn Mālik and Ibn Abī Mughīth from the Prophet ; and all of them mention raising of the hands in the prayer. Therefore, it is meaningless to reject raising of hands in the prayer as someone has done saying that ‘‘it is suggestive of the belief that Allāh has a body, because the raising of the hands towards the sky is an indication that He is there - Holy and Sanctified is He from it.’’

But this statement is wrong. All acts of worship performed by the body are in reality the heartfelt sense of gratitude and inner attention which is reduced to the level of symbolic appearance ; and the spiritual realities are demonstrated in the moulds of the body, as one may see in the ṣalāt, the fast, the ḥajj, etc., and their parts. and conditions. Had it not been so, there would not have been any justification for worship by the body. And invocation is such a form of worship. It is the attention of the heart and the inner supplication demonstrated by the symbol of the begging of a wretched pauper coming near a powerful and wealthy person, raising and extending his hands towards him and asking his needs from him, humiliating himself before him and imploring him to grant him his requirements. ash-Shaykh has reported in al Majālis wa ’l-akhbār, with his sanad (chain of narrators) from Imām Muḥammad al-Bāqir (a.s.) and Zayd from their father, Imām ‘Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn from his father al-Ḥusayn (a.s.) from the Prophet that ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to raise his hands when he prayed and beseeched (Allāh) as a pauper begs for food.’’ The same ḥadīth is written in ‘Uddatu ’d-dā‘ī without sanad.

‘Alī (a.s.) heard a man saying ‘‘O Allāh! I seek refuge in Thee from temptation.'' 'Alī(a.s.) said: '' I see, you are seeking refuge against your wealth and children. Allāh says: Verily your wealth and your children are temptations (8:28). You should rather say: O Allāh! I seek refuge in Thee from misleading temptations.'' [Biḥāru 'l-anwār]

The author says: It is another way of determining the meaning of a word. And there are many such examples in traditions. The fact is that the true meaning of every word is that for which it has been used by Allāh in His talk. And some examples of this are the traditions which explain the meaning of 'part', 'many'etc.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''Verily, Allāh does not answer the memorised prayer by a forgetful heart.'' ['Uddatu 'd-dā'ī]

'Alī (a.s.) said: ''Allāh does not accept the prayer of an inattentive heart.'' [ibid.]

The author says: There are other traditions with this meaning ; and the reason is that there is in reality no prayer and supplication with forgetfulness and inattention.

There is in the Torah: Allāh says to His servant, ''Verily, when you pray against one of my servants because he was unjust to you, then at the same time there may be another of my servants praying against you too because you were unjust to him. Now, if you so wish, I shall grant your prayer and also his prayer against you ; and if you so wish, I shall postpone the cases of both of you for the Day of Resurrection.'' [ar-Rāwandī, ad-Da'wāt]

The author says: If someone prays for something then it means that he is pleased with it and this pleasure naturally extends to all those things which are similar to it in all respects. He prays for punishment of his oppressor ; he prays against him because of his oppression and injustice. It means that he is pleased with the punishment of the unjust. Now, if he himself oppressed another person then the same prayer against his oppressor shall become a prayer against himself. If he is pleased that he himself should be punished (and he shall never be pleased with it), then he will be given the same punishment which he wanted for his oppressor. And if he is not pleased with it, then there is in reality no prayer at all. Allāh said : And man prays for evil as he aught to pray for good, and man is ever hasty (17:11).

The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said to Abū Dharr: ''O Abū Dharr! Should I not teach you some words by which Allāh will benefit you? I (Abū Dharr) said: 'Surely! O Messenger of Allāh.' He said: 'Guard (the commands of) Allāh, (and) Allāh will guard you. Keep (the rememberance of) Allāh, (and) you will find Him before you. Make the acquaintance of Allāh in opulence, He will know you in hardship. And when you ask, ask from Allāh ; and when you seek help, seek help from Allāh, because whatever is to happen upto the Day of Resurrection has already been written, and if all the creatures together strived to benefit you with what Allāh did not write for you, they would not be able to do so.' '' ['Uddatu'd-dā'ī]

The author says: His words, ''Make the acquaintance of Allāh in opulence, He will know you in hardship'', mean ''Call upon Allāh in opulence and do not forget Him, so that He will answer your call in hardship and will not forget you.'' Anybody who forgets his Lord in opulence is as if he believes that the apparent causes are the total and real cause of his opulence. Then comes the hardship and he starts calling on his Lord. His action indicates that he believes in the Lordship of Allāh only when he is afflicted with hardship. But Allāh is not so. He is the Lord in every condition and every situation. Therefore, if he calls on a lord whose lordship is limited to the time of hardship only, he does not call on the True Lord.

This meaning has been explained in some traditions in a different language. aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''One who goes on calling (on his Lord) in advance, his call will be answered when there comes down an affliction (on him), and it will be said,'(it is) a known voice', and it will not be screened out of the heavens. And the one who does not call (on his Lord) in advance, his call is not answered when an affliction comes, and the angels say, 'It is a voice which we do not know…' ''[Makārimu'l-akhlāq]

And it is understood from the word of Allāh, They forget Allāh, so He forgets them (9:68). There is another tradition that du'ā' (prayer) is not rejected if one cuts oneself (from all apparent causes and turns exclusively towards Allāh). There is no contradiction between this tradition and those mentioned before, because affliction and hardship is something different from exclusively turning towards Allāh.

His words: and when you ask, ask from Allāh, and when you seek help, seek help from Allāh. It teaches one to adhere only to Allāh in reality while asking and seeking help ; because so far as these nominal causes, which we find in this world are concerned, their relation with their effects is confined within the limit set for it by Allāh. They are not independent in producing the effect as it appears to un-informed eyes ; they are only a means to produce that effect ; the incumbent on the man to turn towards Allāh in all his needs, without relying on nominal causes and means, although Allāh has decreed not to produce an effect if its cause is missing. In short, the above sentence tells one not to rely on nominal causes and not to forget that it is Allāh who has made it a cause of that effect. It does not mean that one should neglect the causes and means and ask for one's needs without striving for its cause ; it would be rather asking for the impossible. One should realise that even the heart where the prayer originates, the tongue which utters the words of the prayer and the hands, etc., which are used in praying are but some of the causes and means. So, how can one escape from the apparent causes?

Let us look at the example of man himself. Whatever he does, is done with his limbs and organs: he gives with his hands, sees with his eyes and hears with his ears. Now, if one asked his Lord to fulfil his needs neglecting its causes and means, it would be as if he asked someone to give him something without using his hand, or to look at him without using his eyes or to listen to his pleas without using his ears.

On the other hand, if one relies on the nominal causes without remembering Allāh, it would be as though one thinks that it is the man's hand which gives, his eyes which see and his ears which hear, and forgets that the real doer of these actions is man himself. Such a person is stupid and a simpleton.

The above explanation does not mean that the Power of Allāh is limited, or that His Authority is conditional. No, His Power and Authority are All-encompassing and without limit. In the same way the limitations are meant to apply to the deeds not to doers. Obviously, it is man who has the power to give, see and hear, though he gives with his hand, sees with his eyes and hears with his ears. Likewise, Allāh is All-powerful, but the specification depends on intermediate causes. Zayd is a creation of Allāh, and he was born through the union of his parents in a certain place on a certain day when certain conditions were fulfilled and certain obstacles removed. Now, if even one of these causes be missing and one of these conditions be not fulfilled, there would be no Zayd. Thus the existence of Zayd depends on the fulfilment of all these causes and means ; but what depends is the creature, i.e., Zayd, not the Creator. (Think on this point.)

His words: Whatever is to happen upto the Day of Resurrection has already been written. It is based on the sentence, And when you ask, ask from Allāh, and gives its reason. It means that all events are written and decreed by Allāh ; no cause has any real influence on them ; therefore, you should not ask from anyone other than Allāh, and should not seek any one's help other than that of Allāh. As for Allāh, His authority is everlasting ; His Power is Eternal ; His Will is effective ; and every day He is in a new Splendour. It is for this reason that this sentence is followed by the words: and if all the creatures together strived to benefit you with what Allāh did not write for you, they would not be able to do so.

Among the traditions of du'ā' is the near mutawātir ḥadīth: ''Verily, du'ā' (prayer) is a part of destiny.''

The author says: This is the reply to the objection of the Jews and others on du'ā'. They say: The need asked for is either already measured and decreed (to happen) or not. If it is already decreed, then it would happen in any case and the prayer would be superfluous. If it is not decreed, then it can never happen and the prayer would be meaningless. In either case, the prayer will have no effect at all.

The reply: Even when an event is already decreed, it does not mean that it is independent of its causes, and one of the means of its coming into existence is du'ā'. If one beseeches Allāh for his need, one of the conditions of its existence is fulfilled ; and the effect follows the cause. This is the meaning of the tradition, ''Verily, du'ā' (prayer) is a part of destiny.''

And there are other traditions with the same meaning. There is a ḥadīth from the Prophet: ''Nothing turns away the decree (fate) except prayer (du'ā').'' [Biḥāru 'l-anwār]. And there is another one from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.): ''Prayer (du'ā') turns away the decree even after it is confirmed.'' [ibid.] Another one from Abu'l-Ḥasan Mūsā al-Kāẓim (as.): ''On you is du'ā', because du'ā' and asking from Allāh turns the calamity away even when it is measured and decreed and nothing remains except its enforcement ; then if Allāh is called upon and asked, He removes that calamity entirely.'' [ibid]

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''Verily, the prayer (du'ā') turns away the confirmed decree even after its confirmation. Therefore, pray often (and repeatedly), because it is the key to every mercy and the fulfilment of every need. And what is with Allāh is not obtained except through prayer ; because verily, no door is knocked repeatedly but it is hoped that it will be opened to the knocker.'' [ibid.]

The author says: This ḥadīth exhorts one to pray often and repeatedly ; and this is one of the important elements of prayer, as repeated remembrance of a need creates purity of intention.

Ismā'īl ibn Hammām narrates from Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.): ''One secret prayer of a servant is equal to seventy open prayers.''

The author says: This teaches one to keep one's prayer (du'ā') secret and confidential because it helps in keeping the prayer pure.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The prayer is kept screened (i.e. is not granted) until he (the beseecher) prays for the blessings of Allāh upon Muḥammad and his progeny.'' [Makārimu 'l-akhlāq]

Also, aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''Whoever advances (the names of) forty believers (in his prayers) then prays (for himself), his call will be answered.'' [ibid.]

One of the companions of aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said to him: ''There are two verses in the Book of Allāh (the application) for which I am seeking without finding it.'' The Imām asked: ''And what are those?'' The companion says: ''I said, '(there is the verse): Call upon Me, I shall answer ... but we call upon Him and do not get any answer.' The Imām said: 'Well, do you think Allāh has broken His promise?' I said: 'No!' He said: 'Then what?' I said: 'I do not know.' He said: 'But I will tell you. Whoever obeys Allāh in His commandments, and then calls upon Him in the proper way, He will answer him.' I said: 'And what is the proper way of prayer (du'ā')?' He said: 'You shall begin with the praise of Allāh and shall glorify Him and remember His bounties upon you and thank Him ; then you shall pray for His blessings upon Muḥammad and his progeny ; then you shall remember your sins and confess them ; then you shall seek (His) pardon for them. So this is the proper way of prayer (du'ā').' Then the Imām asked: 'And what is the second verse?' I said: 'and whatever thing you spend, He returns it (34:39), and I find that I spend but He does not return it.' He said: 'Well, do you think Allāh has broken His promise?' I said: 'No!' He said: 'Then what?' I said: 'I do not know.' He said: 'If any of you earn his wealth lawfully and spend it in its proper place, he will not spend a single dirham but that Allāh shall return it to him!' '' [ibid.]

The author says: The reason of the manners of prayer (du'ā') mentioned in these traditions is clear, because these things bring the servant (of Allāh) nearer to the reality of prayer and request.

Ibn 'Umar reported that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''Verily, when Allāh wishes to answer (the call of) a servant, He allows him to call (upon Him).'' [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

Also, Ibn 'Umar narrates from him (the Holy Prophet):''Whenever the door of prayer (du'ā') is opened for anyone among you, the doors of Mercy are opened for him.'' Another tradition says: ''When the (door of) prayer is opened for anyone among you, the doors of the Garden (Paradise) are opened for him.'' [ibid.]

The author says: The same thing has been narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt also: ''Whoever is given du'ā', is given (its) answer.'' Its meaning is clear.

Also there is a tradition from Ma'ādh ibn Jabal from the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.): ''Had you known Allāh, as He should be known, verily the mountains would have been moved by your prayer.'' [ibid.]

The author says: If a man does not know the dignity of the Creator and the power of His Lordship, and if he relies upon the causes, then he believes that these causes have real influence upon the result, and that events cannot happen without their normal and apparent causes. Sometimes he does not believe that these causes have any real effect upon the outcome, still he thinks that they are essential in order to bring a thing into existence. For example, we see that movement and walking brings one nearer to one's destination. And even when we do not believe that movement has any real effect on the nearness, we go on believing that movement is a means, though it is Allāh who is the real cause, of that nearness, and in this way we go on believing that the middle causes are essential, at least as a means, if not as the real cause. Thus, we think that if there is no movement, we cannot come near our destination. In short, we believe that the effect cannot be separate from its causes, even if these causes are just apparent means and not the real cause.

But such a belief is below the dignity of Allāh ; it does not conform with divine authority which is total and perfect. It is this belief which creates the idea that effects cannot come into being without their normal causes, e.g. a body cannot be without a weight and gravity ; movement is necessary for bringing two things nearer ; eating and drinking is essential for satisfying the hunger and thirst, etc. etc. We have already mentioned in the discussion of miracles that the system of cause and effect is an inescapable fact ; but it does not mean that the 'cause' is confined to the normal causes only. Reason as well as the Qur'ān and the traditions prove that while everything depends upon a cause, that cause is not confined within the limits of normal ones. The Creator may create causes for it, quite different from the normal ones. So, while it is true that the effect depends upon a cause, it is not true that it depends upon a particular cause.

Of course, the things which are, according to reason, impossible, cannot come into being.

In short, when you properly know Allāh, you will believe that the prayer for what is not impossible by reason, even if normally it does not happen, will be answered. A major portion of the miracles of the prophets was basically the answer to their calls.

There is in the at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī under the words of Allāh: So they should answer My call and believe in Me, a ḥadīth from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.): ''They should know that I have power to give them whatever they ask from Me.''

And there is another ḥadīth in Majma'u 'l-bayān from the same Imām that he said: ''and believe in Me means that they should have firm belief that I have power to give them what they ask for ; so that they may walk in the right way means so that they may reach the Truth."

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: It is made lawful to you on the night of the fast to go in unto your wives.

Iḥlāl (الاحلال) means to allow ; its root is ḥall (to open, الحلّ) which is opposite of 'aqd (to tie, العقد)

Rafath (الرّفث) literally means to say clearly such words which are generally unmentionable, which are normally only hinted at; such words are usually uttered during sexual intercourse. Now, this ''uttering unmentionable words'' has been used as metaphor of the sexual intercourse; and this is the nobility of the exalted Qur'ān. And all words used for this meaning in the Qur'ān are of the same type; none were made for copulation, all are used as a metaphor, like mubāshirah (to be in contact with each other, المباشرة), dukhūl (to enter, الدّخول), mass or lams (to touch, المسّ or اللمس),ityān (to come to, الاتيان),qurb (to be near, القرب), etc. The same is the case of the words, waṭ' (to press down, الوطء) and jimā' (to come together, الجماع) which are used in Islamic books other than the Qur'ān, although some of these words have been so much used for this meaning that now they are no longer metaphoric. The words, farj (an opening, الفرج) and ghā'it (the depth, الغائط), which are now commonly used for ''vulva'' and ''excrement'' respectively, are the other examples of this type.

It is said that the preposition ilā (to, الى) coming here after rafath (الرّفث) gives the meaning of entering into.

Qur'ān: they are an apparel for you and you are an apparel for them.

Libās (اللباس) means what a man uses to cover his body. The two sentences are used figuratively, because each spouse restrains the other from unchastity, and protects society from debauchery. Thus each one is like an apparel for the other with which he/she covers his/her shame and protects his/her privacy.

It is a very fine metaphor, and its literary value has been increased by putting it after the sentence, It is made lawful to you ... to go in unto your wives. A man hides his private parts from others with his dress, but there is no hiding from the dress itself. Likewise, each spouse protects the other one from having sexual relations with others; but there is no restriction on them against such relations with each other.

Qur'ān: Allāh knew that you were acting unfaithfully to yourselves, so He has turned to you (mercifully) and forgiven you.

Ikhtiyān (الاختيان) and khiyānah (الخيانة) are synonymous ; and it is said that they convey the meaning of defect, decrease. You were acting unfaithfully conveys the meaning of continuity ; and it shows that this unfaithfulness commonly continued among the Muslims after the command of the fast had been promulgated; and they were sinning against Allāh secretly by being unfaithful to their own souls. Had not this unfaithfulness been a sin, there would have been no need to mention turning to them mercifully and forgiving; and although these two words do not say openly that a sin had already been committed, still their most obvious meaning shows a preceding sin, especially when both are mentioned together.

Accordingly, the verse proves that before its revelation, sexual intercourse in the nights of the fast was forbidden; and that it was this verse which made it lawful and abrogated its prohibition, as has been stated by a group of the commentators of the Qur'ān. As a further proof, look at the words, It is made lawful to you. You were acting unfaithfully, so He has turned to you (mercifully) and forgiven you and Wherefore, now be in contact with them. Had there been no previous prohibition, such words would have been out of context; instead there would have come the words like ''there is no blame on you that you be in contact with them''.

Some people say: ''This verse does not abrogate any rule, because the verse of fasting mentioned earlier did not prohibit intercourse or food or drink in the night. Apparently, according to some Sunnī traditions, when the fast was prescribed and the words were revealed, Fast has been prescribed for you as it was prescribed for those before you refers to the fast per se, and not meant total conformity in all the details of fast. It is said that the Christians used to eat, drink and go to their women during the early period of the night, then abstained from it. So the Muslims adopted the same system. But it proved difficult. Many youths could not restrain themselves from secret sexual intercourse, but they thought that they were committing a sin and acting unfaithfully to themselves. Likewise, aged persons found it a heavy burden to abstain from eating and drinking once they began their sleep. Sometimes someone could not keep his eyes open before eating and drinking and then thought that food and drink was unlawful for him. It was to remove this misunderstanding that this verse was revealed; it made it clear that sexual intercourse, food and drink was not unlawful for them during the night of Ramaḍān. This verse also made it clear that the comparison in "as it was prescribed for those before you" Refers to the fast per se, and not to its details. The words It is made lawful to you do not necessarily mean that this was unlawful before that; it simply declares legality of this action. See, for example, the words: The game of the sea is made lawful to you (5:96); as it is known that the game of the sea was not unlawful to the pilgrims before the revelation of this verse. Likewise, the words Allāh knew that you were acting unfaithfully to yourselves means that they were doing wrong according to their own view only. That is why Allāh said ‘‘unfaithfully to yourselves’’. Had He said ‘‘unfaithfully to Allāh’’, it would have conveyed the meaning of prohibition, as, for example, in the verse: Be you not unfaithful to Allāh and the Apostle (8:27). Also the word ikhtiyān (الاختيان) may be taken to mean ‘‘curtail’’ or ‘‘decrease’’ and the sentence may be translated as ‘‘Allāh knew that you were curtailing your desires’’. The words He has turned to you (mercifully) and has forgiven you do not clearly convey the idea that sexual intercourse was a sin before that.

But this argument is not conclusive, because it goes against the clear meaning of the verse. We have already said that the words like It is made lawful to you; you were acting unfaithfully to yourselves, He has turned towards you (mercifully) and forgiven you do not say openly that a sin had already been committed; still, this is their most obvious implication. Add to it the words now be in contact with them which would be inappropriate if there were no previous prohibition, as I have explained earlier.

The argument, that ‘‘this verse does not abrogate any rule because the verse of fasting did not prohibit sexual intercourse in the night’’, is not valid because that verse did not prohibit it clearly for the day time also. It is known that the Messenger of Allāh had explained the rules of fasting before this verse was revealed. Perhaps the prohibition of sexual relations during the night was one of those rules; and the verse abrogated it. So this verse cancels not another verse, but a tradition of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

Someone may object: The words they are an apparel for you and you are an apparel for them have been used as the reason for this permission. Now, the husband and wife were like apparel to each other when, supposedly, copulation at night was forbidden and they remained like the apparel when that prohibition was supposedly lifted. So where, in these words, is the reason for the supposed abrogation if they are equally true in both conditions — before abrogation and after abrogation? We know that the reason given for a rule of the sharī‘ah is mostly its benefit, and not necessarily its real causes. And as a benefit, it need not be fully comprehensive. Still, in a supposedly abrogating verse at least it should not be common to both conditions.

But deep consideration of the verse does not sustain this objection. It is not acceptable that this sentence is the reason of this permission. The permission in this verse is limited to the night of the fast, while the simile of apparel is as much true during the day as in the night. So, it cannot be the reason of that permission.

The fact is that the three clauses in this verse coming one after the other, and all taken together, give us the reason for this abrogation. They are *on the night of the fast, they are an apparel for you ... ,*and you were acting unfaithfully to yourselves.

As the spouses are like apparel to each other they should be allowed to establish sexual relations together without any restriction. Then came the commandment of the fast, without demanded self-denial and abstention from desires, like food, drink and sexual relations. But the servants of Allāh found it difficult to abstain for a full month from copulation, and this unfaithfulness was common and continued. Therefore, Allāh in His mercy eased the conditions and lightened their burden by allowing it during the night.

In this way, the general implication of the sentence of apparel is made subordinate to the fast; and thus is limited to the night time only (when there is no fast).

In short, the sentence of apparel is not a reason for this permission; rather it is the reason or benefit of copulation per se. The main aim of the whole verse is to explain why copulation was allowed in the night of fast. And the sentence beginning with they are an apparel and ending on forgiven you taken together show this reason, not any single sentence alone. And this reason is not found in the rule which was followed before this permission.

Qur'ān: Wherefore, now be in contact with them and seek what Allāh has written for you. This is an order preceded by prohibition; thus it means permission. The verse begins with the words, It is made lawful to you. The meaning, therefore, is,' from now on you are allowed to establish sexual relations with them''. Ibtighā' (الابتغاء) means 'to seek', 'to desire'. Seek what Allāh has written for you means seeking the children which Allāh has written to give to the mankind. Allāh created in human being the desire to copulate and made it the means of that gift (of children) and to some extent put them under the pressure of that desire. When a couple engages in that action, they are in reality seeking what Allāh has written for them, even if at that time their only aim is to satisfy their sexual desire or lust. It is like taking food and drink. Allāh had written that their lives, growth and health depend on food and drink, and that remains the goal of nature even when they, at that particular time, do not look further than satisfying their hunger and thirst or to pamper their gustatory pleasure. This is the compulsion put on them by Allāh in all such matters.

It has been said: What Allāh has written for you means ''what Allāh has allowed to you''; and the implication is that they should take advantage of this permission. Allāh likes His servants to take advantage of His permission as He likes them to obey His compulsory commandments.

But his view is not acceptable, because we have not seen a single instance in the Qur'ān where ''writing'' is used for 'permission'.

Qur'ān: and eat and drink until the white thread becomes distinct unto you from the black thread (of night) at dawn-break. There are two dawns: the first is called the 'false' dawn because it vanishes in a short time. It is also called the 'tail of the wolf ' because it looks as if a tail is raised. This false dawn is a beam of light like a vertical column; it appears at the end of the night on the eastern horizon when the sun reaches an angle of 18 degrees below the horizon. Then it gives way to a horizontal line of light which looks as if a white thread has been stretched on the horizon. This is the second dawn. It is called 'true' dawn because it truthfully announces the arrival of day-time and is connected with sunrise.

Obviously, the white thread in this verse means the ''true dawn''; and ''at'' (min, من) in ''at dawn-break'' (mina 'l-fajri, من الفجر) is explanatory so as to clarify this phrase. This sentence is metaphorical and it likens the streak of light, stretched across the horizon, to a white thread and the darkness of night adjoining that light to a black thread.

This shows that the limit of the given permission is exactly the beginning of the true dawn; because soon after, when the sun comes nearer to the horizon, both threads disappear. There remains neither the white thread nor the black.

Qur'ān: Then complete the fast until night : As the start of the fast was from the dawn-break, there was no need to say, 'keep the fast during day-time'. Instead its other limit is now mentioned in these words.

Complete the fast shows that the fast of one day is one unit, a single act of worship which is not made up of a various parts. There is a difference between completion (tamām, التّمام) and perfection (kamāl, الكمال). Completion (tamām, التّمام), the word used in this verse, means that a. single thing (which is not made of such parts which may have separate functions) finally comes into being. Perfection (kamāl, الكمال) means that a single thing (which has various parts and every part has a separate function) finally comes into being. Allāh says: This day I perfected (akmaltu, اكملت) for you your religion and completed (atmamtu , اتممت) My favour on you (5:4). The religion is a collection of various things like prayer, fast, ḥajj etc. and all these have a separate effect; therefore, the religion was ‘‘perfected’’. But the favour of Allāh is one thing without any parts (as I will explain under that verse); therefore, it was *‘‘completed’’.*

Qur’ān: And associate not with them while you are confined in the mosques: ‘ukūf (العكوف) and i‘tikāf (الاعتكاف)both mean ‘‘to keep close to’’. When used with the name of a place, they mean to remain continuously in that place.

I‘tikāf (الاعتكاف) is an act of worship. When in i‘tikāf (الاعتكاف), one must remain inside a mosque, not going out without a genuine reason (e.g. to relieve oneself); and fasting is an essential part of this act of worship.

As the Muslims were given permission to have sexual relations with their wives in the night of fast, there was a possibility that they might think that that permission extended to the nights of i‘tikāf also, when they were inside a mosque. This sentence removed the chance of any such misunderstanding.

Qur’ān: These are the limits (prescribed by) Allāh; therefore, draw not near them.

Ḥadd (limit, الحدّ) literally means ‘‘to keep from’’, ‘‘torestrict’’. All its uses carry this meaning; for example, ḥaddu ’s-sayf (edge of sword , حدّ السّيف), ḥaddu ’d-dār (boundary of the house, حدّ الدار), ḥaddu ’l fujūr (punishment of immorality, حدّ الفجور) etc. Therefore the phrase, ḥudūdu ’llāh (حدود الله) mentioned in the verse, means, the ‘‘restrictive ordinances of Allāh’’ and the command not to go near them figuratively means not to commit that sin. In short, it says: you should not commit the sins mentioned here, i.e., eating, drinking and copulating during the prohibited hours; you should not trespass beyond the limits ordained for you; you should not neglect the fast or the guarding of yourselves against evil in the period of that special worship.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘Food and copulation were unlawful in the month of Ramaḍān at night after sleeping.’’ (That is, if one prayed the prayer of al-‘ishā’ and slept without breaking one’s fast, then, he was not allowed to eat or drink even if he awoke later in the night. And sexual intercourse was unlawful in the month of Ramaḍān both in the day and in the night.) There was a companion of the Messenger of Allāh, Khawwāt ibn Jubayr al-Ansārī. He was brother of ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr, who in the battle of Uḥud, was deputed by the Messenger of Allāh at the mouth of the mountain-pass with fifty archers; most of them left him, but he remained at this station with only twelve soldiers and was martyred there. His brother Khawwāt ibn Jubayr, was an aged and weak person, and was fasting with the Messenger of Allāh in the battle of the Khandaq (Trench). In the evening he came to his house and asked: ‘‘Do you have any food?’’ They said: ‘‘Do not go to sleep; we shall prepare some food for you.’’ There was some delay in cooking and he was overcome with sleep before breaking his fast. When he woke up he said to his family: ‘‘Now eating is forbidden to me tonight.’’ Next day, he presented himself at the Khandaq and fainted. The Messenger of Allāh looked at him and felt pity for him. Also, there were some youths who had secretly indulged in sexual relations at night in the month of Ramaḍān. Therefore Allāh sent down (the verse); It is made lawful to you on the night of fast to go in unto your wives ... Thus Allāh allowed sexual relations during the nights of the month of Ramaḍān, and eating after going to sleep upto the dawn-break, as He said, until the white thread becomes distinct from the black thread (of night) at dawn-break. The Imām said: ‘‘It means the whiteness of the day from the darkness of the night.’’ [at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī]

The author says: The sentences (given in bracket), starting with ‘‘That is’’ and ending upto ‘‘both in the day and in the night’’, are explanatory notes of the narrator of this tradition.

This episode is narrated in other traditions also, by al-Kulaynī,al-

'Ayyāshī and others. All these traditions say that the words, eat and drink ... were revealed because of the event of Khawwāt ibn Jubayr al-Anṣārī; and the words It is made lawful to you …were revealed because of the secret doings of some Muslim youths.

There is another tradition in ad-Durru'l-manthūr from various commentators and traditionalists from Barā' ibn 'Āzib who said: ''It was the custom among the companions of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that if someone fasted and the time of ifṭār (breaking thefast) came but he went to sleep before breaking his fast, he did not eat that night and fasted the next day without eating anything, till the next evening came. Once Qays ibn Ṣarmah al-Anṣārī fasted, and that day he had been working in the field. The time came for breaking the fast and he came to his wife and asked: 'Do you have any food?' He could not keep awake and went to sleep. When his wife returned and found him sleeping she said: 'Woe unto you! Did you go to sleep?' In the noon of the next day, he fainted. This was reported to the Prophet (s.a.w.a.). Then this verse was sent down: It is made lawful to you on the night of the fast ... at dawn-break. And the Muslims were extremely happy at it.''

The author says: This story is narrated by other chains also. In some of them the name is given as Abū Qubays ibn Ṣarmah; in others, Ṣarmah ibn Mālik al-Anṣārī. There is some variation in the story also.

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn al-Mundhir have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās as follows:- ''The Muslims were forbidden (sexual relations with) women and food in the month of Ramaḍān once they had prayed the prayer of al-'ishā', till the next evening. But some of them ate food and had sexual intercourse with women after the al-'ishā' in one Ramaḍān; one of them was 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb. Then they complained about it to the Messenger of Allāh. Therefore Allāh sent down the verse, It is made lawful to you ... be in contact with them. [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

The author says: There are numerous traditions from Sunnī chains about this matter; most of them mention the name of 'Umar. All say with one voice that the rule about sexual intercourse in the night of Ramaḍān was the same as that about food and drink: All of these were allowed before the sleep, forbidden after it. But the obvious meaning of the first tradition is that the sexual intercourse was completely forbidden in the month of Ramaḍān, during the night as well as in the day-time; and the food and drink were allowed before sleeping, forbidden after that. And the context of the verse supports this tradition. Had the sexual relation been like food and drink (allowed before sleeping and forbidden after) it would have been necessary to mention here the farthest limit of the permission, as was done about food and drink (eat and drink until the white thread becomes distinct...) But it only says: It is made lawful to you on the night of the fast to go in unto your wives, without putting any limit to it. It shows that previously they were forbidden to indulge in this act the whole ‘‘night of the fast’’.

Some traditions say (and the one quoted last is one of them) that the Muslims were acting unfaithfully not only in the matter of sexual relations, but also in food and drink. But the sequence of the sentences of the verse does not support it. The sentence, Allāh knew that you were acting unfaithfully ... is put in the middle of the permission for sexual relations and the words eat and drink appear after this topic has ended. Therefore the ‘‘acting unfaithfully’’ cannot be connected with eating and drinking.

Verily, the Messenger of Allāh said: ‘‘The dawn is of two kinds. The one which looks like the tail of the wolf does not allow anything, nor prohibits anything. But the long one which covers the horizon allows the prayer (of dawn) and prohibits food.’’ [ad-Durru ’l-manthūr]

The author says: The traditions of this meaning are nearly mutawātir from Sunnī and Shī‘ah sources; as are the ones about i‘tikāf and prohibition of sexual intercourse in that period.

وَلا تَأْكُلُوا أَمْوَالَكُمْ بَيْنَكُمْ بِالْبَاطِلِ وَتُدْلُوا بِهَا إِلَى الْحُكَّامِ لِتَأْكُلُوا فَرِيقاً مِنْ أَمْوَالِ النَّاسِ بِالْإِثْمِ وَأَنْتُمْ تَعْلَمُونَ ـ ١٨٨ .

And do not swallow up your property among yourselves by wrongful means ; neither seek to gain access thereby to the authorities, so that you may swallow up a portion of the property of men wrongfully while you know (2:188)

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: And do not swallow up your property among yourselves by wrongful means.

Akl (to eat, to swallow up, الاكل) metaphorically means 'to take hold of, or to make use of '. The reason of this metaphorical use is that eating is the most common and the earliest natural desire; as soon as his life begins, man feels the need of food and then gradually proceeds to other needs like clothing, habitation and marriage, etc. Acquiring food is his first natural action and wilful doing. That is why if one uses or takes a thing it is said one has eaten it, and especially so in the case of wealth and property. And this figure of speech is common to all languages.

Māl (wealth, property, المال) literally means the possession which is desired. It seems that its root is mayl (inclination, desire, bent, الميل), because it is one of those things to which the heart is inclined, which it desires. Baynakum (among yourselves, بينكم) bayn (بين) means the gap between two or more things.

Wrong (bāṭil, الباطل) is opposite of truth (ḥaqq , الحقّ): ḥaqq (الحقّ) means a thing which is confirmed.

The proviso among yourselves added after the command do not swallow up your property shows that wealth is for all the people; but Allāh has distributed it among them — a just distribution — by promulgating laws based on justice and equity, which cut at the roots of corruption and immorality. If anybody trespasses the limits put by these laws, it will be invalid and wrong. This verse, in a way, explains the verse: He it is who created for you all that is in the earth (2:29).

Your property (amwālakum, اموالكم): History and ancient tradition show that ever since man put his foot on this globe, society has recognised the right to property and upheld it in one way or other. By using this possessive pronoun, Allāh confirms this right. This principle has been mentioned in the Qur'ān in more than a hundred places, in various words like dominion (mulk, الملک), property (māl, المال), the preposition for (l ... , ل) used for possession, and istikhlāf (to make man Allāh's deputy on earth, الاستخلاف); but there is no need to quote the references here. Likewise all the verses which regulate selling, trade and other commercial dealings implicitly recognise this right. For example: and Allāh has allowed trading (2:275), do not swallow up your property among yourselves by wrongful means, except that it be trading by your mutual consent (4:29), and the trade dullness of which you fear (9:25) and other such references. And mutawātir traditions support it.

Qur'ān: neither seek to gain access thereby to the authorities, so that you may swallow up a portion of the property of man wrongfully while you know.

Idlā' (translated here as ''to gain access'', الادلآء) literally means to send the bucket (dalū', الدّلوء) down into the well for drawing water. Its metaphorical use in this verse implies offering money, etc., to the authorities to induce them to give judgement in favour of the bribe-giver. It is a very nice allegory. The desired judgement is the water in the depth of the well; the bribe is the bucket which is sent down to bring the desired result.

A portion (farīqan, فريقا): It is a part separated from the whole.

This sentence is in conjunction with the word swallow up ; therefore, grammatically it is a prohibitory verb, and hence the sign of quiescence.

Another possibility: The ''and'' (w ..., و) (the conjunction word not appearing in the above translation) may be taken to mean ''with'' (ma', مع), and further it may be presumed that after it, the word that (inna, انّ) is implied. In this case the whole verse will be one sentence and will mean: ''…..by wrongful means with seeking to gain access. . .'' Thus, the verse prohibits the mutual understanding between the bribe-giver and bribe-taker so that they wrongfully swallow up the property of the people by sharing it between themselves — the bribe-taker taking the portion which has been offered to him, and the giver usurping the other portion — while they know that it is wrong and unjust.

TRADITIONS

In a tradition, aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) says about this verse: ‘‘The Arabs used to gamble with their wives and property. So, Allāh prohibited them to do so.’’ [al-Kāfī]

Abū Basīr says: ‘‘I asked Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) the meaning of the words of Allāh in His book: and do not swallow up your property among yourselves by wrongful means; neither seek to gain access thereby to the authorities. He (the Imām) said: ‘O Abū Basīr! Verily Allāh knew that there would be in this ummah judges who would do injustice. Verily, He did not mean (here) judges of a just authority, but He meant those of an unjust authority. O Abū Muḥammad! (i.e. Abū Baṣīr) If you had a right against someone and you summoned him to the judges of a just authority, but he did not agree to it and compelled you to put your case before the judges of an unjust authority, so that they might decide in his favour, then that man would be among those who had resorted to- the judgement of the ṭāghūt (Satan). And it is the word of Allāh: Have you not observed those who think that they believe in what has been sent down unto you and what was sent down before you? They intend to resort to the judgement of ṭāghūt (Satan), though they were commanded to deny (reject) him ... (4:60)’ ’’ [ibid.]

There is a tradition from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.): ‘‘The meaning of ‘wrongful means’ is the false oath with which property is usurped.’’ [Majma‘u ’l-bayān]

The author says: All the above traditions give some examples, but the verse is general.

ON SOCIAL SCIENCE

All organic things, vegetable, animal and human beings make use of other things to sustain their lives. They actively take advantage of those surrounding things which may help in their continued existence.

We have never heard of a thing which exists but is not active, or an action which is done without the doer expecting its benefit to return to him. Remark the vegetable kingdom which does whatever it does with the single aim of benefiting from it in its existence, growth, and reproduction. Similarly, all animals and human beings do whatever they do with the aim of getting benefit one way or another, even if that benefit be only in the imagination and thought.

Plants have been taught by the Creator, and animals and men know by their instinct that they cannot use any material for the fulfilment of their natural needs and the protection of their existence unless that material has a very special relation to them; in other words, unless it belongs to them. They know that one deed cannot be done by two doers. Accordingly, man and animal etc. prohibit others from interfering in their affairs and do not allow anything to utilize what they want to utilize for themselves. This is the foundation of this special relation - namely, possession which is recognised by one and all. Hence the words ‘my’, ‘your’, etc. etc.

For a further proof, look at any animal fighting to remove others from its territory, its prey, or its mate. Again, see children quarrelling for, and defending, whatever food, or toy, they have got. Even a suckling infant does not allow another infant to suck at the same breast. This is the lesson taught by nature. When man, being a social animal, established society, that natural instinct was bound to become more pronounced; and eventually became a well-organised and well balanced system that took the shape of social ethics and moral values; gradually the basic concept of that special relation branched off into various kinds with different names: the monetary relation was named ‘property’, the nonmonetary, ‘right’, and so on.

Human beings may have different views on the legality of various means of acquiring property, like inheritance, trade, confiscation by the ruling authority, etc., or on the suitability of the owner, whether he is adult or minor, sane or idiot, a single person or a group, and so on. But there is no escape from recognising the basic principle of ownership. That is why even those who apparently reject the idea of ownership, have only transferred it from the individual to the society or the state.

Even then, they have not been able to abolish private ownership totally; and they will never be able to do so, because it is the verdict of nature, and if nature is rejected, man will perish.

We shall discuss, God willing, in their proper places the details of this basic principle, according to the means of its acquirement, such as trade, profit, inheritance, war-booty, collection, etc. and according to the status of the owner, i.e. adult or minor, etc.

They ask you concerning the new moons. Say, they are(indications of) times fixed for men and (for) the pilgrimage. And it is not righteousness that you should enter the houses from their backs; but righteousness is the one who guards himself (against evil); and enter the houses by their doors and fear Allāh, so that you may be successful (2:189).

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: They ask you ... the pilgrimage. Ahillah (الأهلة) is plural of hilāl (crescent, الهلال). The moon is called hilāl (الهلال) at the beginning of the lunar month when it comes away from the direct rays of the sun; it is named crescent (hilāl, الهلال) on the first and second nights according to one group, while some others say that it is named so for the first three nights; still others say that this name continues until a faint circle of light shows the outline of the moon. A fourth group says that is a ''crescent'' until its light brightens the night; this occurs on the seventh night, after which it is simply called moon (qamar, القمر) and on the fourteenth night it becomes full noon (badr, البدر).Its general name in Arabic is zibriqān (الزّبرقان).

The Arabs say istahalla 'ṣ-ṣabiyy (استهل الصّبىّ) when the newly born child cries soon after birth. Also they say ahalla'l-qawmu bi 'l-ḥajj (اهل القوم بالحجّ) when the pilgrims call out loudly labbayk Allāhumma labbayk. Thus the root H-L-L (هلل) gives the idea of raising one's voice, and the new moon is called hilāl (الهلال) because people hail it and raise their voice to point it out.

Mawāqit (المواقيت) is plural of mīqāt (الميقات) which means the time appointed for a work. It also means the place appointed for it, as we say: The mīqāt of the Syrians or the Yemenes, which means the place where they wear the robes of iḥrām for pilgrimage. In this verse it has the first meaning, i.e. the appointed time.

They ask you concerning the new moons. It does not say what the question was. Some say that they wanted to know the reality of the moon and why it appeared in different shapes from night to night. Others think that they wished to know the reason for the reappearance of the new moon after its disappearing at the end of the month.

But the word used is ahillah (new moons, الأهلّة) in the plural, and it proves that the question was not about the reality of the moon or its various phases; because in that case it would have been appropriate to say ‘‘they ask you concerning the moon’’ not ‘‘the new moons’’. And if the question was about the reason of the new moon, the proper words would be ‘‘they ask you concerning the new moon’’. In both cases the use of the plural would be inappropriate. This plural ‘‘new moons’’ proves that the question was: What is the reason or benefit of the appearance of the moon as crescent after crescent and of its marking the lunar months? This question was shortened into ‘‘new moons’’ because it is the new moon which starts a new month; and then its benefit was explained.

This question may be inferred from the reply: say they are (indications of) times fixed for men and (for) pilgrimage. The times fixed for various actions and activities are the ‘months’, and not the various shapes of the moon but about the lunar months which are marked by the new moons. And Allāh explained that these months were the times fixed for the benefit of man in affairs of their material and spiritual lives. Man, by his nature, is obliged to measure all his activities by time. It was, therefore, necessary to divide time (which is the yard-stick of his actions) into various short and long portions. The mercy of Allāh which looks after the affairs of His creatures, and guides them towards the betterment of their lives, effected this division by creating night, day, month, season and year etc. The most obvious and the clearest division is the grouping of the days in the lunar months. Everyone may benefit from it, be he a scholar or an ignorant person, a bedouin or a city-dweller; everyone can observe the beginning of the new moon if his eye-sight is correct; and everyone may easily keep its count. These benefits are conspicuously absent in the solar calendar: mane did not wake to this idea, and could not come to grips with its complicated reckoning, until many centuries after human society came into being. Moreover, not every one can always know the dates of the solar calendar.

Therefore, the lunar months are the times fixed and prescribed for men for their use in their material and spiritual affairs, and especially so for the ḥajj (pilgrimage) because it is performed in the known months.

The ḥajj (pilgrimage) has espc :daily been mentioned here as an introduction to the topic which is dealt with in the following sentences.

Qur'ān: And it is not righteousness ... by their doors.

It is known from the reports that in the days before Islam it was the custom of some Arabs that after wearing the robes of iḥrām for pilgrimage, if they had to enter their houses for any reason, they did not use the doors, but cut a hole in the wall for that purpose. Islam disapproved that practice and told them to enter the houses from their doors. The verse has been revealed in a way that the above-mentioned report may be believed to be true.

Had there been no such reliable report, these words could be interpreted metaphorically as a prohibition of performing religious rites in any way other than the prescribed one. For example, pilgrimage should not be done but in its prescribed months, fast should not be kept in any month other than Ramaḍān, and so on. In that case, the sentence would have been complementary to the previous one. The meaning would have been: These months are the times prescribed for the religious deeds fixed for them, and it is not permitted to transfer those dees to other months, like doing ḥajj (pilgrimage) outside the prescribed months or .fasting in a month other than Ramaḍān.

But the first interpretation is supported by the traditions. The words, it is not righteousness to enter the houses from their backs, proves that this practice was never approved of by the religion; otherwise it would not have been said to be against righteousness. It was just a bad custom of the pre-Islamic times; and Allāh said that it was not righteousness. Rather, righteousness was the fear of Allāh and guarding oneself against evil.

but righteousness is the one who guards himself (against evil): Apparently, the sentence should have been ''but righteousness is guarding oneself (against evil)'', but Allāh used the expression the one who guards himself to show that the real virtue is in practicing ‘‘piety’’, and not in its abstract idea. It is like the verse: It is not righteousness that you turn your faces towards the east and the west but righteousness is the one who believes in Allāh ... (2:177) and enter the houses by their doors: It is not a compulsory order; it is a guidance that entering into houses from their doors is the proper method, as it is the usual and recognised way. People build houses and put doors in them for this very purpose, and there is no reason why a hole should be drilled for entering into, or going out of, the house. This sentence admonishes them not to follow a foolish custom which goes against common sense. In short, the sentence does not say that it is obligatory on every one to enter into a house through the door. It just tells them that it is the proper way. Of course, if one enters into a house by a way other than the door, thinking that this custom is a part of religion, then it will be an ‘‘unlawful innovation’’.

Qur’ān: and fear Allāh, so that you may be successful. It was mentioned in the beginning of this sūrah (chapter) that taqwā (piety) is virtue which gathers in its fold all ranks of the faith and all stages of perfection. Obviously, not every stage and rank leads one to spiritual success and happiness, as do the last stages which remove all shades of polytheism and misdirection. It is these last stages which guide one to success and bring the good tidings of happiness. That is why Allāh said, so that you may be successful, using the word ‘may’.

Also, it is possible to interpret the words, ‘‘fear Allāh’’, here as following this particular order, and discarding the practice of going into houses from their backs.

TRADITIONS

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘The people asked the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) concerning the new moons. Then this verse was revealed, They ask you concerning the new moons. Say, ‘they are (indications of) times fixed for men’; they know from them the time their loans are due, the waiting period (number of months a women must wait after divorce or the death of her husband before the next marriage) of their women and the time of their pilgrimage.’’ [ad-Durru ’l-manthūr] Some others from different chains are from Abu '1-'Āliyah, Qatādah and others.

There is another tradition that someone asked the Prophet about the various phases of the moon; so this verse was sent down. But we have already commented on this report that it is against the apparent meaning of the verse, and, therefore, is not worthy of consideration.

There is a tradition reported by Wakī', al-Bukhārī and Ibn Jarīr from al-Barā'. In the days of ''ignorance'', when they wore the iḥrām, they used to go into the house from its back. There fore, Allāh sent down the verse And it is not righteousness that you should enter the houses from their backs; but righteousness is the one who guards himself (against evil); and enter the houses by their doors. [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

There is another tradition reported by Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Ḥākim (and he has said that it is ''correct'') from Jābir. He said: ''The Quraysh were called ḥums (enthusiastic, strenuous, الحمس), and they used to enter by the doors in the condition of iḥrām. The anṣār (helpers) and other Arabs did not enter from the door in iḥrām. Once the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was in a garden, and came out from its door, and Quṭbah ibn 'Āmir al-Anṣārī came out with him. The people said, 'O Messenger of Allāh! Verily Quṭbah ibn 'Āmir is a sinner, he came out with you from the door.' The Prophet asked him: 'Why did you do so?' He replied: 'I saw you doing it, so I did as you did.' The Prophet said: 'I am an aḥmas (i.e. Qurayshite).' He said: 'But my religion is your religion.' Then Allāh sent down: it is not righteousness that you should enter the houses from their backs. [ibid.]

The author says: Other traditions of nearly the same meaning have been narrated from other chains. Ḥums (الحمس) is the plural of aḥmas (الاحمس) from ḥimāsah (الحماسة) which means ''hardiness''. The tribe of Quraysh was called ḥums (الحمس) because of their zeal in the matter of their religion, or because of their bravery and strength.

Apparently, this tradition shows that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had allowed the continuation of that custom by non-Qurayshites before this incident; and that is why he admonished him in these words: ''Why did you do so?'' If we accept this view then this verse was revealed to abrogate a rule which was enforced not by a verse but by the order of the Prophet. But you already know that the verse does not support this view. It says, it is not righteousness that you should enter ... It is unimaginable that Allāh or His Apostle on divine command enforced a rule and then Allāh at the time of its abrogation condemned and criticised it as being against righteousness.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said about the word of Allāh, and enter the houses by their doors: ‘‘Allāh means that every affair, whatever it may be, should be approached in its (proper) way’’. [al-Maḥāsin]

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘The Imāms (al-awṣiyā’) are the doors of Allāh, from which Allāh is approached; and had they not been there, Allāh would not have been known; and it is through them that Allāh has established His proof over His creatures.’’ [al-Kāfī]

The author says: This tradition gives an example of the general meaning of this verse, which has been explained in the previous one. There is no doubt that the verse is general in its meaning, even if it was sent down on a particular occasion. The Imām said: ‘‘had they not been there, Allāh would not have been known”. This refers to the true explanation of religion and the complete Call (Mission of the Prophet) which are with them. This sentence has a deeper meaning also; maybe we shall explain it later on. There are numerous traditions of the same meaning as given in these two.

GENERAL COMMENT

The context of the verses shows that they were revealed together. The whole talk has only one aim; permission, for the first time, of fighting with the polytheists of Mecca. These verses refer to driving them out from whence they drove the believers out, to disbelief and to reprisal; they prohibit fighting with them at the Sacred Mosque unless they fight the believers in it. All these matters were connected with the polytheists of Mecca. Also, the sentence: fight in the way of Allāh with those who fight with you, deserves more attention. It is not a condition, i.e., it does not mean, ''fight with them if they fight with you''. Nor is it a restrictive clause (as some people think) meaning, ''fight with the men, and not with their women and children who are not in a position to fight with you'', because nobody ''fights'' with those who are unable to fight back. Had it been the aim of the sentence, it would have been proper to say ''do not kill them''. Therefore, the words those who fight with you only refer to a fact — fight those who are presently engaged in fighting against you. And it points to the polytheists of Mecca.

The verses have the same significance as the following verses: Permission (to fight) is given to those upon whom war is made, for they have been oppressed, and most surely Allāh is able to help them; those who have been expelled from their homes with-out a just cause except that they say, Our Lord is Allāh (22:39—40). These verses also contain the initial (but unconditional) permission to fight with the fighting polytheists.

These five verses together promulgate a single law covering all its limits and details. And fight in the way of Allāh is the basic law; and do not exceed the limit puts disciplinary restriction on it; And kill them. wherever you find them defines the limits of pressure; and do not fight with them at the Sacred Mosque until they fight with you therein puts a restriction according to the place; and fight with them until there is no more mischief (dis-belief) shows its duration; The sacred month for the sacred month, and reprisal (is lawful) in all sacred things explains that this legislation is based on the principle of retaliation in fighting and killing, it is paying them in their own coin; And spend in the way of Allāh makes the believers responsible for the financial preparations for war: they must spend for their own preparation and for that of others. Therefore, it seems that all the five verses were sent down together about one subject. It is wrong to say (as some have done) that some of these verses abrogate the others; or that they were revealed separately on different occasions. In fact, the aim of all these verses is one: permission to fight against the polytheists of Mecca who were fighting the believers.

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: And fight in the way of Allāh with those who fight with you: qitāl (القتال) means attempting to kill someone who is attempting to kill you. This fight was in the way of Allāh because its aim was to establish the religion and to raise the belief of monotheism. It was an act of worship done to gain the favour of Allāh, and not to usurp the property of people or to damage their dignity. War in Islam is basically defensive; it protects the right of humanity sanctioned by nature, as will be explained later. Defence is by nature a limited venture; that is why Allāh said soon after this permission, and do not exceed the limit.

Qur'ān: and do not exceed the limit. Verily, Allāh loves not those who exceed the limit: i'tidā' (الاعتداء) means going beyond the boundary. The Arabs say 'adā (عدا) and i'tadā (اعتدى) when someone goes beyond the boundary. This prohibitory order is general and covers all the situations where one may be said to exceed the limit, like fighting someone before calling him to follow the path of truth, or starting a war, or killing women and children, or not desisting from war when ordered: Its other examples are explained in the traditions of the Prophet.

Qur'ān: And kill them wherever ... than slaughter: thiqāfah (ثقافة) means ''to find''. This sentence is similar to the verse: then slay the polytheists wherever you find them (9:6).Fitnah (الفتنة) is the means of testing a thing. It is also used for the test itself as well as its related things like difficulty and hardship. It is also used for punishment, and the crimes and sins which bring that punishment in their wake, like polytheism, disbelief and going astray. The Qur'ān has used this word in various places in all these meanings.

In this verse the word means ascribing a partner to Allāh and disbelieving in His Messenger and persecuting and oppressing the Messenger of Allāh and the believers as was done by the polytheists of Mecca before and after the Hijrah.

The verse says: Put the utmost pressure on the polytheists by killing them wherever they be found until they are compelled to go out of their town and emigrate from their land, as they did to you. And whatever they did to you was more grievous, because it was simply a mischief and an act of infidelity; and mischief and infidelity are more grievous than killing. Killing only terminates the life of this world while infidelity terminates this life as well as the next one and destroys both worlds.

Qur'ān: and do not fight with them ... recompense of the disbelievers. It prohibits fighting with them at the Sacred Mosque (Masjidu 'l-Ḥarām), to protect its sanctity, as long as they respect that sanctity. Therein refers to the Sacred Mosque.

Qur'ān: Then if they desist, then verily Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful.

Intihā' (الانتهاء) means to desist from, to abstain from. If they desist means ''if they desist from fighting near the Sacred Mosque'', because the sentence is mentioned immediately after that topic. It does not mean desisting from fighting altogether by accepting Islām and obeying its commands. However this topic comes soon after it and then Allāh will refer to it in these words, but if they desist then there should be no hostility except against the oppressors.

Thus the two sentences refer to two completely different matters, and there is no repetition.

Then verily Allāh is forgiving, Merciful. This sentence puts the cause in the place of the effect. The full meaning is: ''But if they desist from fighting at the Sacred Mosque, then you must desist from it, because Allāh is Forgiving and Merciful.''

Qur'ān: And fight with them until there is no more mischief (disbelief) and the religion be only for Allāh. This defines the time-limit of the fighting. Fitnah (الفتنة) (translated here as 'disbelief ' and 'mischief ') means here 'ascribing a partner to Allāh and worshipping idols', as was the custom of the polytheists of Mecca, who compelled others to do likewise. This meaning is inferred from the next sentence, and religion be only for Allāh.

This verse is similar to the verse: And fight with them until there is no mischief (disbelief), and the religion be only for Allāh; but if they desist, then verily Allāh sees what they do. And if they turn back, then know that Allāh is your Master; The Most Excel-lent Master and the Most Excellent Helper (8:39-40).

This verse shows that it is obligatory to call them to the right path before the war. If they accept the call, there will be no fighting; but if they reject it then there is no Master except Allāh, and He is the most excellent Master and the most excellent Helper ;He helps his believing servants. It is known that fighting is prescribed so that the religion be only for Allāh. Such a fighting cannot be started until the adversaries are first invited to come onto the right path, i.e. the religion based upon monotheism.

Some people wrote that this verse was abrogated by the verse: Fight those who do not believe in Allāh, nor in the latter day, nor do they prohibit what Allāh and His Apostle have prohibited, nor follow the religion of truth, from among those who were given the Book, until they pay the jizyah (tributory tax) with their hand while they are in a state of subjection (9:29).

But there is no question of either verse abrogating the other, because they deal with different subjects. The verse under discussion is, as explained earlier, about the Meccan polytheists and does not cover the People of the Book who are referred to inverse 9:29. And the religion be only for Allāh means that idol-worship be abolished and the oneness of Allāh be accepted. The people of the Book do believe in One Creator. We know their belief is in reality disbelief as Allāh says that they: do not believe in Allāh, nor in the latter day, nor do they prohibit what Allāh and His Apostle have prohibited, nor follow the religion of truth. But Islam is content with their mere profession of monotheism. Fighting with them was ordained not to make them believe in monotheism, but simply so that they might pay tribute to the Muslims, thus raising the true creed above their creed and making Islam victorious over all religions.

Qur'ān: but if they desist then there should be no hostility except against the oppressors. If they desist from disbelief in what you believe in, then cease fighting with them, because there is no hostility except against the oppressors. In this verse also, the cause has been mentioned in place of the effect. Instead of saying ‘‘then cease fighting with them’’ it points out the cause that there should be no hostility except against the oppressors. It is like the verse: But if they repent and establish the prayer and pay the zakāt, then they are your brethren in faith (9:11).

Qur’ān: The sacred month for the sacred month and reprisal (is lawful) in all sacred things. ḥurumāt (sacred things, الحرمات) refers to the sanctity of the sacred month, the sanctity of the ‘‘boundary’’ (ḥaram) of Mecca, and the sanctity of the Sacred Mosque. If the Meccan polytheists disregard the sanctity of the sacred month by fighting in it — and they did violate its sanctity when they prevented the Prophet and his companions from pilgrimage (‘umrah) in the years of Ḥudaybiyah (6 A.H.), and attacked them with arrows and stones — then the believers are allowed to fight them in that month and it would not be deemed disrespectful towards it. The believers are fighting in the way of Allāh and are obeying His Command to raise up His word. Likewise, if the infidels violate the sanctity of the boundary of Mecca or the Sacred Mosque by fighting in it or in that area then the believers may hit back at them in that place and that area.

The sacred month for the sacred month describes a particular example, followed by a general observation, and reprisal (is lawful) in all sacred things. This in its turn is followed by even more general principle*, whoever then acts aggressively against you, inflict the like aggression on him as he has inflicted on you.*

The meaning, thus, will be: Allāh has sanctioned reprisal in the sacred month because He has sanctioned it for all sacred things. And He has sanctioned reprisal for all sacred things because He has made it lawful for His servants to inflict aggression equal to the aggression inflicted upon them.

Then He exhorts them to remain steadfastly cautious when inflicting aggression in reprisal, lest they trespass the limit. After all, punishing an oppressor seems sweet, and all animal instincts are roused when one is engaged in taking revenge. There are more chances of deviation from justice, by the use of excessive force, and by disregard of the limits put by the religion. But the fact has already been mentioned that Allāh loves not those who exceed the limit. And the believers are most in need of the love of Allāh, His patronage and His help. Therefore, they are told to fear Allāh and know that Allāh is with those who guard (against evil).

The question arises: Why Allāh sanctioned acting aggressively when He does not love those who act aggressively (or, as translated above, exceed the limit)? Of course, acting aggressively is to be condemned, but only when it is not in response to an aggression. But if it is hi reprisal of an aggression, then it is not ‘‘exceeding the limit’’ or ‘‘acting aggressively’’. It is defending one-self from degradation, and liberating oneself from the fetters of slavery, oppression and injustive. It is like showing pride before a proud man, or the open utterance of evil in speech by the one who has been wronged.

Qur’ān: And spend in the way of Allāh and cast not yourselves into perdition with your own hands. It is the command to spend wealth for waging war in the way of Allāh. The clause, in the way of Allāh attached to ‘‘spending’’ has the same significance as when attached to ‘‘fighting’’ in 2:190. ‘‘With your hands’’ (biaydīkum, بايديكم); with (b ..., ب) here is extra, added for emphasis. The meaning is ‘‘and cast not your hands in perdition’’. The hand is a symbol of power, ability and strength; and the verse says: do not nullify or waste your strength by not spending money in preparation for war. Another interpretation: ‘‘with’’ (b... ب) signifies the cause or means; and the object of the verb is yourselves (anfusakum, انفسكم) which is deleted but understood. Accordingly, the meaning will be as translated above: and cast not your selves into perdition with your own hands.

Tahlukah (التّهلكة) and hilāk (الهلاک) are synonymous; both mean to perish, to fall in perdition. When man becomes in such a condition that he does not know where he is, this word is used. Tahlukah (التّهلكة) is with the paradigm of taf‘ulah (تفعله). There is no other infinitive verb in Arabic with this paradigm.

The order is, anyhow, general; and it prohibits any commission or omission which may cause perdition, whether it is on the side of excess or deficiency. For example, miserliness and avarice when preparing for war would weaken the fighters and make the army of Islām the target of the enemy; and many would be killed. On the other hand, extravagance in expenditure would bring poverty and misery to such a spender, degrade him in society and make life unbearable. Both these actions are prohibited by this verse.

Allāh finished this talk on ‘‘doing good’’, and said: and do good; verily Allāh loves the doers of good. Doing good does not mean desisting from fighting, or clemency in killing the enemies of the religion etc. It means doing a wok in its proper way: Fight when fighting is required; restrain yourselves when restraint is preferred; be strict where strictness is demanded by reason, and forgive where forgiveness will not embolden the enemy. In short, repulsing the oppressor by the most reasonable means is to do good for humanity, because this repulsion guarantees humanity its due right, and defends the religion which would improve man’s condition in both worlds.

Further, desisting from exceeding the limits while obtaining the due right is another good action. And love of Allāh is the final good of the religion; and it is essential for every follower of religion to be worthy of the love of Allāh by obeying His command and following His Apostle. Allāh says in the Qur’ān: Say ‘‘if you love Allāh then follow me, Allāh will love you and forgive you your sins’’ (3:30).

These five verses — and they are about fighting — began with the prohibition of exceeding the limit and that: Verily Allāh loves not those who exceed the limit, and ended with the command to do good and that: Verily Allāh loves those who do good. Its delicacy and subtlety need no explanation.

THE WAR, AS ORDAINED BY THE QUR’ĀN

The Qur’ān ordered the Muslims to desist from fighting and patiently bear all persecutions in the way of Allāh. See, for example, the following verses:-

> Say: ‘‘O unbelievers! I do not worship that which you worship, nor do you worship Him whom I worship; nor am I going to worship that which you worship; nor are you going to worship Him whom I worship. Unto you be your religion, and unto me my religion.’’ (Ch. 109)
>
> And bear patiently what they say. (73:10)
>
> Have you not seen those to whom it was said: Withhold your hands and establish prayer and pay the poor-rate (zakat), but when fighting was prescribed for them … (4:77)

This last verse refers to the following:-

Many of the people of the Book wish that they could turn you back into unbelievers after you had believed, out of envy on their part, (even) after the truth has become manifest unto them. But pardon and forgive (them) so that Allāh should bring about His command. Verily, Allāh is Powerful over all things. And establish prayer and give the poor-rate ... (2:109—110)

Then came the verses of fighting. Among them are the verses sanctioning fighting with the polytheists of Mecca and their allies:-

Permission (to fight) is given to those upon whom war is made, for they have been oppressed, and surely Allāh is able to help them; those who have been expelled from their homes without a just cause except that they say: Our Lord is Allāh (22:39-40). This verse might have been revealed to allow the Muslims to defend themselves at Badr etc.

And fight with them until there is no mischief (disbelief), and the religion be only for Allāh; but if they desist, then verily Allāh sees what they do. And if they turn back, then know that Allāh is your Master; the Most Excellent Master and the Most Excellent Helper (8:39—40).

And fight in the way of Allāh with those who fight with you, and do not exceed the limit. Verily, Allāh loves not those who exceed the limit (2:190).

And among them are the verses permitting fighting with the people of the Book:-

Fight those who do not believe in Allāh, nor in the latter day, nor do they prohibit what Allāh and His Apostle have prohibited, nor follow the religion of truth, from among those who were given the Book, until they pay the jizyah (tributory tax) with their hand while they are in a state of subjection (9:29).

Also among them are the verses for fighting against the polytheists in general, and here, this word covers all unbelievers except the people of the Book:-

Then slay the polytheists wherever you find them (9:6).

And fight the polytheists all together as they fight you altogether (9:36).

And finally there are the verses allowing the fight against the unbelievers in general:-

Fight those of the unbelievers who are near to you and let them find in you hardiness (9:123).

In short, the Qur'ān says that Islam — the religion of monotheism — is based on the foundation of true nature, and is responsible for the well-being of humanity in this life. Allāh says: Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion — the nature made by Allāh in which He has made men; there is no alteration (by anyone else) in the creation of Allāh; that is the established (or the custodian) religion, but most people do not know (30:30).Therefore, establishing and maintaining this religion is the most important right for humanity which has been laid down. Allāh says: He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and that which We have revealed unto you and that which we enjoined upon Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and 'Īsā, then establish the religion and be not divided therein (42:13). And to defend this prescribed natural right is another natural right. Allāh says: And had there not been Allāh's repelling some people by others, certainly would have been pulled down cloisters and churches and synagogues and mosques in which Allāh's name is much remembered. And surely Allāh will help him who helps Him (i.e. His cause), most verily Allāh is Strong, Mighty (22:40). It is, thus, made clear that the religion of monotheism can stand on its feet and remain alive only if there is proper arrangement for its defence against enemies, as Allāh says: And were it not for Allāh's repelling some men with others, the earth certainly would be in a state of disorder (2:251). Also, He says in the chapter of al-Anfāl in the middle of the topic of fighting: That He may establish the truth of what was true and bring to naught what was false, though the guilty ones disliked (8:8). After some verses, He says: O you who believe! Answer (the call of) Allāh and His Apostle when he calls you to that which gives you life (8:24). Here the war and fighting, to which the believers are called, has been termed as something giving them life. It means that fighting — whether waged for the defence of the Muslims, or that of the Islamic territory or even that which is initiated — is in reality in defence of the right of humanity in this life. Polytheism is the death of humanity and a corruption of nature, and it is the defence of its right that resurrects it and gives it a new lease of life.

An intelligent observer will realize at this juncture that Islam should have had a parallel defensive system to cleanse the earth from polytheism of every shade and to purify the faith of all those who believe in one Creator. After all, the fighting mentioned in the above verses has only two aims: Removing noticeable polytheism, that is idol-worship, and raising the word of truth above the creeds of the people of the Book by compelling them to pay jizyah. But it does not remove less noticeable polytheism; even the people of the Book are not true believers in One God. The same verse (9:29), which allows them to pay jizyah, declares that they do not believe in Allāh or His Apostle and do not follow the religion of truth. Therefore, they are in reality polytheists even though they profess to believe in one God; their polytheism is hidden behind their declared monotheism. And if the Muslims were to defend the natural right of humanity, they should bring them into the fold of Islam — the true religion.

The Qur'ān does not give such an order in clear words, but it promises them the final victory over their enemies; and the promised victory is of such a nature that it cannot be achieved with out waging this kind of war, a war to establish pure monotheistic belief. Allāh says: He it is Who sent His Apostle with the guidance and the religion of truth so that He may make it triumph over all the religions, though the polytheists may be averse (61:9). And clearer than this is the verse, And certainly, We did write in the Zabūr after the Reminder that the earth, shall inherit it my righteous servants (21:105). Even far more clear is the verse, Allāh has promised unto those of you who believe and do good deeds that He will certainly make them Successors in the earth as He made Successors those before them, and that He will certainly establish for them their religion which He has chosen for them, and that He will certainly, after their fear, give them security in exchange; they shall worship Me, not associating aught with Me (24:55). The words, they shall worship Me means sincere worship with the real faith, as may be inferred by the following clause, not associating aught with Me. We should remember that, in the eyes of Allāh, even some professed faith is in reality polytheism, as He says, And most of them do not believe in Allāh without associating others (with Him) (12:106). So, it is the promise of Allāh that He will cleanse the earth from every type of polytheism, and reserve it for the true believers, and then none shall be worshipped but Allāh.

Perhaps someone may say: That promise is of divine help; Allāh shall fulfil it through a divine reformer without using manifest means like war, etc. But this objection cannot be upheld in view of the words, He will certainly make them Successors. Successors clearly means that someone is removed from his place and another one is put therein. This implies war.

Also there is the following verse:-

O you who believe! Whoever of you turns away from his religion, then soon Allāh will bring a people that He will love them and they will love Him, humble before the believers and mighty against the unbelievers, they shall strive hard (shall fight) in the way of Allāh and will not fear censure of any censurer (5:57). This verse implies a call to the Truth and a religious movement which will happen by divine command; and it supports the view that this promise shall be fulfilled after the call of fighting in the way of Allāh.

From the above, we may know the reply to a very common criticism of Islam. The Christian missionaries call it the religion of the sword and blood; some say that it is the religion of force and compulsion. All this, because Islam has sanctioned jihād (war in the way of Allāh). They say that it is totally against the character of the religious movements of the previous prophets. The previous religions relied not on the sword but on persuasion and guidance.

The above is the gist of that criticism. But the Qur'ān has explained that Islam is based on the judgement of true human nature. Humanity can only achieve its perfection if it accepts that judgement. And that nature has decreed that all individual and collective affairs should be governed by the laws which are based on the belief in one Allāh. To defend this basic principle is a prescribed right of humanity. It can only be defended by spreading it among people and protecting it from disorder and destruction. And this right must be safeguarded by all possible means. Even then, moderation is the key-word in all this venture. It begins with the Call and patiently enduring the persecution by enemies. Then comes the defence of the lives of the Muslims and Islamic territory. Lastly comes the war started by order of the divine representative to defend the above mentioned human right and protect the Creed of the Oneness of God. Whatever the type of fighting, it must be preceded by calling them to come to the right path, and that Call should be based on reason and understanding, as the Prophet used to do. Allāh says: Call unto the way of thy Lord with wisdom and kindly exhortation; and have disputation

(discussion) with them in the manner which is the best (16:125). This verse is unconditional. Also, Allāh says: That he who would perish might perish after a clear proof, and he who would live might live after a clear proof (8:42).

There is no need to feel alarmed if jihād has in it an element of compulsion. When explanations, discussions and exhortations fail to bring a group of people onto the right path, and humanity is in disorder and turmoil because of that group's disregard for the basic right mentioned above, then there is no way but to compel them to come onto the right path of truth. This is the strategy adopted by all societies and states throughout the world. The outlaws who flout the laws of the state are first called to accept the authority of the state and obey its laws. Then, if they do not listen, they are compelled by all possible means to do so, even if it leads to killing and fighting.

A point to ponder: The compulsion will remain for one generation only. Coming generations will be so taught and trained that they will gladly accept the Religion of nature and the creed of the Oneness of God. It is not objectionable if one generation is compelled to see reason, if by that action all coming generations will gladly follow the right path till the end of the world.

The claim, that all the previous prophets adopted verbal persuasion as their only instrument of guidance, shows an ignorance of the facts. Most of the prophets had neither the opportunity nor the power to wage war. Read, for example, the lives of Nūḥ, Hūd and Ṣāliḥ (peace be on them all); they were under pressure from their enemies on all sides. The same was the case with ʻĪsā (a.s.) when he was among his people, trying to spread his call. His call did not spread until it was too late; it spread when the period of its validity was coming to its end, near the advent of Islam.

On the other hand, the Old Testament contains the lives of many prophets who waged war in the way of Allāh. The Qur'ān also mentions some of them. Allāh says: And how many a prophet fought with whom were myriads of Godly men; so they did not lose heart at what befell them in the way of Allāh nor did they weaken nor did they abase themselves. And Allāh loves the steadfast ones. And their saying was nothing but that they prayed, ''Our Lord! forgive us our sins, and our excesses in our affairs and make our feet firm and help us against the unbeliever people (3:146-147). And He says, inter alia, describing what happened when Mūsā called the Israilites to fight against the Palestinians: And (remember) when Mūsā said unto his people: ... ''O my people! Enter you the holy land which Allāh has assigned for you; and turn not on your backs, for then you will return (as) losers'' ... They said, ''O Mūsā! Verily we shall never enter it at all, while they remain therein. Go you and your Lord and fight you two, surely, we shall stay here sitting (5:22-27). There is another story about the fighting of Saul and Goliath which begins with the words: Have you not seen the chiefs of the children of Isrā'īl, after Mūsā, when they spoke to a prophet unto them (saying), ''raise up for us a king, so that we may fight in the way of Allāh ... (2:246—251).

Then there is the story of the prophet Sulaymān and the queen of Sheba, in which Sulaymān writes to her: That exalt not yourselves against me and come unto me in submission. After receiving her ambassador, he threatened him, return unto them; for we will certainly come to them with hosts which they shall have no power to resist, and we will certainly expell them out therefrom with abasement while they shall be in a state of ignominy (27:20-44). See how Sulaymān (a.s.) called them unto right path; and when the result was not as he had expected, he threatened them to initiate a war.

FROM THE SOCIOLOGICAL POINT OF VIEW

There is no doubt that every society — human beings as well as some animals — is based on the natural urge to save itself from extinction. Nature gave each species a right to make use of every thing which may help in keeping it alive. Man takes advantage of inorganic substances, plants, animals and even other human beings in every possible manner, even if it clashes with the rights of those animals or prevents organic and inorganic substances from reaching the point of their perfection. Likewise, animals make use of plants and other animals and their instinct tells them that they have a right to do so.

In the same way, nature gave them a right to defend the above right, because the right of use would not be complete without the right of defence. After all, it is an over-crowded place where every thing is in continuous struggle for its survival. Every species which is endowed with sense and movement feels that it has a natural right to protect its rights, and is sure this defence is as lawful as the basic right itself. For proof, see how the animals defend themselves, when in conflict with others, with their armaments: horns, teeth, claws, hooves, stings, beaks, etc. Those who are not gifted with such weapons protect themselves by fleeing or hiding or pretending to be dead. Others, like monkeys and foxes save themselves by cunning and deception.

Man has been given the power of thinking, by which he can employ other things for this defence. His nature issues commands and pronounces judgements. And one of those judgements is that man has a basic right of use and also a right to defend that basic right. It is this second right which prompts him to fight and quarrel on all occasions when he feels that his right is in danger.

The basic right of taking advantage of other things is bridled by the realization that it is not only he who wants to make use of others but others also want to exercise the same right over all others. These conflicting demands counterbalance each other and man is forced to come to terms with society and to realize that he also has to serve others as he wants others to serve him. This exchange of services has to be done on the scale fixed by the society.

It is clear from the above that the conflict and struggle to defend his rights is not based on the right to use other things, because this right of use was moderated and balanced by man himself as soon as he entered society; he had to agree that he would take advantage of others only according to the service which he himself was prepared to offer to others. As a result of this mutual understanding there was no place for fighting. Fighting is based on the second right, that is the right to defend his interests. Man believes that he has a right in some thing: when he sees that that presumed right is endangered, he stands up to defend and protect it.

Thus all wars are in reality defensive. Even kings and emperors assume that they have a certain right, let us say the right to rule; they believe that they deserve to reign.

Others feel that the solution to increasing population or the economic difficulties of their country depends on the annexation of additional territories; and they believe that they have a right to do this. However absurd these pretexts may seem to others, the man who advances them really believes in them. Once he, in his mind, gives that right to himself, he is ready to defend it, even if it means attacking others, shedding blood, creating disorder in the country and destroying land and people.

Thus the defence of the human rights is a right laid down in nature which a man is entitled to exercise. But the preceding paragraphs have made it clear that it is only a secondary right. The primary and basic right is the one of taking advantage of others.

If we have to decide whether a certain defensive action was proper, we should, first of all, see how important or proper the defended right was. We must be satisfied that the damage to society by our defensive action would not cancel or maybe even exceed the benefit of the defended right.

The Qur'ān has established that the most important human right is the belief in the oneness of God and the laws based on the divine revelation. Also, society unanimously believes that the most important was the right to live under such laws which protect the well-being of individuals.

As these two rights are the most important ones, their defence takes precedence over all other considerations.

TRADITIONS

Ibn ʻAbbās said about the verse, And fight in the way of Allāh ...: ''This verse was revealed about the treaty of Ḥudaybiyah. And it was like this: The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and his companions came out in the year when they wanted to perform ʻumrah. They were one thousand and four hundred persons. They proceeded till they reached Ḥudaybiyah. There the polytheists prevented them from reaching the Sacred House. Therefore, they slaughtered their sacrificial animals at Ḥudaybiyah. The poly theists made an agreement with them that they were to go back that year; they would return for ʻumrah next year when they would be allowed to enter and remain in Mecca for three days to perform ṭawāf and whatever religious rites they wished.

''The (Messenger of Allāh) thereon returned to Medina. Next year the Prophet and his companions made preparations for the ʻumrah which had become qaḍā the previous year. At the same time, they were afraid that the Qurayshites would not honour the agreement and would again prevent them from reaching the Sacred House and would fight. The Messenger of Allāh did not like the idea of fighting with them in the Sacred month within the sacred boundary of Mecca. Then Allāh sent down this verse.'' [Majma'u 'l-bayān]

The author says: Similar traditions have been written in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr with various chains from Ibn 'Abbās and others.

Another tradition from ar-Rabī' ibn Anas and 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān ibn Zayd ibn Aslam said: This is the first verse revealed about fighting. When it was revealed, the Messenger of Allāh used to fight with those who fought with him and desisted from fighting those who refrained from fighting, until was revealed the verses, Kill the polytheists wherever you find them. Thus the above verse was abrogated. [Majma'u 'l-bayān]

The author says: It is their own opinion. You know that the verse: Kill the polytheists wherever you find them does not abrogate the verse And fight in the way of Allāh ... Rather it generalizes an order which was specific.

About the verse, and kill them wherever you find them ...: This verse was revealed because one of the companions killed an infidel in the sacred month. The believers condemned him for it. Then Allāh made it clear that mischief in religion, i.e. polytheism, is more grievous than killing polytheists in the sacred month, even though it was not allowed. [Majma'u 'l-bayān]

The author says: You know that the singleness of the context and inter-relationship of all the five verses obviously proves that they were revealed all together, not piecemeal.

There is a tradition from various chains, from Qatādah. He said: ''And fight with them until there is no more mischief, i.e. polytheism, and the religion be only for Allāh.'' He said: ''till it is said, 'there is none to be worshipped except Allāh.' It is this cause which the Messenger of Allāh fought for, and called the people to. And we are told that the Prophet used to say, 'Verily Allāh ordered me to fight the people till they say, ''there is none to be worshipped except Allāh'', then, if they desisted (from polytheism), there should be no hostility except against the oppressors.'' He said: ''And verily the oppressor, who refuses to say 'there is none to be worshipped except Allāh' shall be fought with till he says 'there is none to be worshipped except Allāh'.''[ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

The author says: The sentence ''And verily the oppressor …'' is the saying of Qatādah; he has inferred it from the saying of the Prophet and it is a fine inference.

A similar interpretation has been reported from ‘Ikrimah.

al-Bukhārī, Abu sh-Shaykh and Ibn Mardawayh have narrated from Ibn ‘Umar that two persons came to him during the fitnah (mischief) of Ibn az-Zubayr and told him: ‘‘Verily, people have done (what they have done) and you are the son of ‘Umar and a companion of the Prophet; then why do you not come out?’’ He (Ibn ‘Umar) said: ‘‘It prevents me (from coming out) that Allāh has forbidden (shedding) the blood of my (Muslim) brother.’’ They said: ‘‘Has not Allāh said, fight with them until there is no (more) mischief'?’’ He said: ‘‘We fought until there was no more mischief and the religion became only of Allāh; but you want to fight until there he mischief and the religion be for other than Allāh.’’ [ad-Durru ’l -manthūr]

The author says: He was mistaken in the meaning of fitnah (الفتنة) and also the two questioners were mistaken. The meaning of fitnah (الفتنة) has already been explained. Theevent of Ibn az-Zubayr was not ‘‘polytheism or disbelief ’’, it was an example of disorder on earth, or fighting with one another without any just cause; and believers were not allowed to remain silent about it.

There is in Majma‘u ’l-bayān, under the verse, and fight with them until there is no (more) mischief: ‘‘That is polytheism’’, and the author of Majma‘u ’l-bayān said: ‘‘And it is narrated from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.).’’

There is a ḥadīth in the Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī about the words of Allāh: The sacred month for the sacred month; al-‘Ulā’ ibn al-Fuḍayl said: ‘ ‘I asked him (the Imām) whether it was allowed to the Muslims to start fighting with the polytheists in the sacred month. He said: ‘If the polytheists start the fight with them by (practically) making it lawful (to fight in the month), then the Muslims will see how they can overcome the polytheists (and do it). And it is the word of Allāh, The sacred month for the sacred month and reprisal (is lawful) in all sacred things.’ ’’

Aḥmad and Ibn Jarīr, and an-Naḥḥās in his Nāsikh, have narrated from Jābir ibn ‘Abdullāh that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh did not fight in the sacred month until he was fought with, and if ever he was in a fight and the sacred month began, he would desist (from fighting) until it came to an end.'' [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

Mu'āwīyah ibn 'Ammār said: ''I asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about a man who killed another man, outside the sacred territory and then entered the sacred territory. The Imām (a.s.) said: 'He will not be killed (therein), but he will not be given anything to eat or drink, and will not be sold anything until he comes out of the sacred territory; then he will be given the punishment of his crime'.'' The narrator said that he then asked the Imām (a.s.): ''Then what do you say about a man who killed someone in the sacred territory or stole therein. He (the Imām) said: 'He will be punished inside the sacred territory because he himself did not maintain respect of it. And Allāh has said, whoever then acts aggressively against you, inflict the like aggression on him.' (The Imām said) 'This is the law about the sacred territory; and Allāh said, there should be no hostility except against the aggressors'.'' [al-Kāfī]

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, and cast not yourselves into perdition: ''If a man spent in the way of Allāh all that he had, he would not have done good and God would not lead him to success. Does Allāh not say: and cast not yourselves into perdition with your own hands; and do good; Verily Allāh loves those who do good, i.e., who are economical.'' [ibid.]

aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated from Thābit ibn Anas that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh said: 'Obedience to the ruler is obligatory; and one who has left the obedience to the ruler has not obeyed Allāh and has entered into His prohibition, as He says: and cast not yourselves into perdition with your own hands'.''

It is narrated in ad-Durru 'l -manthūr with numerous chains, from Aslam Abī 'Imrān that he said: ''We were (fighting) at Constantinople; 'Aqbah ibn 'Āmir commanded the Egyptians, and Fuḍālah ibn 'Ubayd led the Syrians. There came out a big row of the Romans, and we stood in row against them. Then a man from our side attacked the Roman row until he entered in its midst. The people (Muslims) cried out, 'Glory be to Allāh! He is casting himself in perdition with his own hands!' Then Abū Ayyūb, the companion of the Messenger of Allāh, stood up and said: 'O people! You are interpreting this verse in this way, while (the fact is that) it was sent down about us, the group of the Helpers. Verily, when Allāh made His religion powerful, and its helpers increased in number, some of us told others, keeping it secret from the Messenger of Allāh, ‘‘Verily, our properties are ruined, and (now) Allāh had made Islam powerful and its helpers have increased. Therefore, (it would be better) if we stayed in our properties and mended what had been damaged therein.’’ Then Allāh revealed to his prophet, refuting what we had said, And spend in the way of Allāh and cast not yourselves into perdition with your own hands. So, perdition meant our staying in our properties and repairing them by leaving fighting (in the way of Allāh)’.’’

The author says: The difference of the traditions in interpreting the meaning of this verse supports what we have said that this verse is general and covers both extremes (extravagance and miserliness) in spending, and that it is not confined to spending only, but covers other aspects also where ‘‘casting oneself into perdition’’ can be applied.

COMMENTARY

These verses were revealed during the last pilgrimage (ḥajjatu 'l-widā' حجّة الوداع) performed by the Messenger of Allāh. They promulgated the pilgrimage of enjoyment (ḥajju 't-tamattu', حجّ التّمتع)

Qur'ān: And complete the hall and 'umrah for Allāh: Completeness (tamām, التّمام) of a thing is the final part, when added to the other parts it makes that thing whole, the thing becomes itself; and then the expected effects follow. When a thing is started and some of its parts are assembled and then the final part is added, it is called itmām (completion, to complete, الاتمام). Perfection (kamāl, الكمال) is a condition, virtue or characteristic which creates such an effect in a complete thing which would not be found in it without that perfection. When a human foetus receives all its limbs and organs, it is its completion. When he is called knowledgeable, courageous or chaste it is his perfection.

Sometimes, completion (tamām, التّمام) is used metaphorically in place of perfection (kamāl, الكمال) to show the extreme importance of that virtue or characteristic; the speaker implies that that virtue or is not something extra or external, it is an integral part without which the thing would remain incomplete.

In this verse, the completion of ḥajj and 'umrah has been used in the first (literal) sense; and it is proved by the following sentence, but if you be prevented. Obviously, this means prevented 'from carrying on the ḥajj and 'umrah to their last rite'; in other words, 'from completing them'. It cannot mean 'prevented from perfecting them'.

Ḥajj is a well-known Islamic act of worship, started by the Prophet Ibrāhīm (a.s.). It continued among the Arabs, and Allāh promulgated it for this ummah as a law which would continue upto the Day of Resurrection.

This action begins with iḥrām and the stay in 'Arafāt and then in the Sacred Monument. The pilgrims sacrifice an animal each at Mina, throw stones on the three Stone-pillars, circumambulate around the Ka'bah, pray, and march between the Ṣafā and the Marwah. There are some other obligations as well.

Ḥajj is of three kinds: ḥajju 'l-ifrād, ḥajju 'l-qirān and ḥajju 't-tamattu'. This last one was ordained in the last days of the Messenger of Allāh.

'Umrah is another act of worship. In 'umrah, the pilgrims visit the House of Allāh after putting on iḥrām from one of the appointed places. Then they go round the Ka'bah, pray, and march between the Safa and the Marwah and finally cut off some nails or hair.

Ḥajj and 'umrah are acts of worship and cannot be complete except when they are done for the sake of Allāh, as is seen in the sentence: And complete the ḥajj and 'umrah for Allāh.

Qur'ān: but if you be prevented ... offering reaches its destination: iḥṣār (الأحصار) means to prevent, to obstruct. The verse refers to being prevented from completing the ḥajj or 'umrah, after iḥrām, because of an ailment or enemy. Istīsār (الأستيسار) of a thing means its becoming easy, not difficult; this paradigm implies that that thing acquires easiness for itself . Hady (الهدى) means the animal presented by one man to another or to a place, to seek someone's pleasure with it. It is derived from hadyah (gift, present, الهدية); or from hudā (to lead to destination,). It is used in both masculine and feminine forms, hady (الهدى) and hadyah (الهدية) like tamr (التمر) and tamrah (date, التمرة). Here it means the animals brought or led by the pilgrims for sacrifice during the ḥajj.

Qur'ān: but whoever among you be sick ... or sacrifices: This sentence is an offshoot of the preceding one, do not shave your heads ... It implies that the sickness refers to only that one in which the man would suffer if his head were not shaved.

or has an affliction in his head: The conjunctive ''or'' shows that the affliction here means a suffering other than sickness, like vermin. It figuratively means to be afflicted with vermin, e.g., lice. These two things (sickness and lice) make it lawful to shave the head; but a redemption should be effected by any of the three ways: fast, alms or sacrifice.

It is narrated in a tradition that the fast is for three days; the alms are to feed six poor persons, and the sacrifice is one goat.

Qur'ān: But when you are secure (from the hindrance), then whoever enjoys by the 'umrah for the ḥajj: It is an offshoot of the sentence: if you be prevented. The meaning is: When you are safe from all hindrances like sickness, an enemy or other such things, then whoever enjoys by 'umrah for the ḥajj — i.e. enjoys because of 'umrah.

How does one enjoy because of ‘umrah? It is because ‘umrah is completed and the restrictions of iḥrām are lifted until the time comes to wear iḥrām again for ḥajj. Therefore, by (bi, ب) in by ‘umrah (bi ’l-‘umrah, بالعمرة) is causative. How does ‘umrah cause enjoyment? It is because when ‘umrah is completed, the restrictions of iḥrām like women, perfume, etc. are lifted, and one may enjoy them till the time comes for the iḥrām of ḥajj.

Qur’ān: (he should offer) whatever offering is easy to obtain: Obviously, the sacrifice of the animal is an independent rite. It is not a substitute to make up for not wearing iḥrām of ḥajj from an appointed place; as it puts un-called for strain on the mind to infer such a meaning from this verse.

Someone might say: (he should offer) whatever offering is easy to obtain is based on: then whoever enjoys by the ‘umrah, just as an effect is based on. its condition. In other words, the offering of the sacrifice is prescribed because of the enjoyment. Moreoever, the word enjoyment mentioned in the conditional clause hints that the sacrifice is a recompense of that enjoyment which was allowed to lighten the burden and hardship of pilgrims, and the sacrifice compensates for it.

The author says: The above argument is refuted by the phrase, by the ‘umrah, i.e. because the enjoyment is allowed after the ‘umrah comes to its end. The argument of lightening the burden could be advanced only if the enjoyments were allowed during the ‘umrah. But how can the words lightening the burden be used in this case when the ‘umrah is already completed and the restrictions of iḥrām terminated; and when the iḥrām of ḥajj is yet to start?

And if there is any hint, it is only that the sacrificing of the animal has been prescribed because of the ordination of enjoyment by the ‘umrah for the ḥajj. There is no hint whatsoever in it that the sacrifice is to compensate for not doing iḥrām of ḥajj from the appointed place (mīqāt, الميقات) outside Mecca.

Apparently the verse, then whoever enjoys by the ‘umrah for the ḥajj, (he should offer) whatever offering is easy to obtain, mentions ḥajju ’t-tamattu‘ (حجّ التّمتّع) as an already prescribed act of worship. It is not the original and initial ordination. It mentions enjoyment (tamattu‘, التّمتّع) as an established fact and then, on the basis of it, prescribes the sacrifice of the animal. It says, whosoever performs ḥajju’t-tamattu‘, shall offer a sacrifice. It does not say, ‘‘performs ḥajju’t-tamattu‘ and offer a sacrifice’’.

The original and initial prescription of tamattu' comes in the verse which comes later, this is for him whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque.

Qur'ān: but he who cannot find (any offering) should fast for three days during the ḥajj and for seven days when you return.

Ḥajj is mentioned as the time of the fast because the time and place of both are the same. The time of ḥajj — from the iḥrām of ḥajj to the returning from it — is the very time of the three days' fast. There are traditions from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt that the time of this fast is before the Day of Sacrifice (10th Dhu 'l-ḥijjah) or, if one could not fast at that time then, after the 13th of Dhu 'l-ḥijjah, or, as a last alternative, at the time of returning to one's home.

The time of the seven-day fast is after returning to one's home, as is clear from the words, when you return. It should be noted that Allāh did not say, ''at the time of returning''. Moreover, the change of pronoun from the (previously used) third person to the second person in when you return is a hint that the hearer is now present - at home.

Qur'ān: these (make) ten (days) perfect: Three and seven together make ten perfect days. The seven days make perfect the previous three days; they do not complete it. The difference between perfection and completion has been explained in the beginning of the verse; and it means that both groups of three and seven days have separate identities with separate rules. The fast of three days is a complete act in itself; it depends on the fast of seven days for its perfection, not completion.

Qur'ān: this is for him whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque: This order of enjoying by the 'umrah for the ḥajj is for the non-resident, i.e. the person who dwells not less than twelve miles away from the Sacred Mosque. His family (ahluh, اهله) here means his dependents, like his wife and children. The non-resident has been described as he whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque. It is a very fine way of expression as it not only promulgates the law but explains its reason also; and that reason is to lighten the burden. The pilgrims who come from far off places for the ḥajj have to undergo all kinds of troubles, hardships and difficulties during the journey; and when they reach Mecca, they are tired and worn out. They naturally need a place to rest and recuperate. Usually, one gets this rest with his family, but here is a pilgrim whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque. Therefore, Allāh ordained for him enjoyment (tamattu', التّمتّع); he may enjoy himself after completing the 'umrah upto the time of ḥajj and then may raise his voice in talbiyah (التّلبيه), i.e. he may wear the iḥrām of ḥajj from the Sacred Mosque without going back to an appointed place for that purpose.

It has been explained earlier that it is this sentence that promulgates ḥajju 't-tamattu'; it is a general ordinance, and is not limited to a particular time, or to a particular person, or to a particular situation. It is for all the non-resident pilgrims, for all times, and for all situations.

Qur'ān: and fear Allāh and know that Allāh is severe in requiting: This extreme severity in this humiliating way shows that there was a likelihood of the audience rejecting this order or hesitating to follow it. And this is what actually happened. Of all the laws of Islam, ḥajj had already been practised by the Arabs since the days of Ibrāhīm and all its rites were well-known to, and performed by, them. They were used to those rites, and when Islam came, it let it be, as it was, until the last days of the Prophet's life. Therefore, it was not an easy thing to make any change in its method; they were not expected to accept any change in it willingly. That is why they protested against the law of enjoyment by 'umrah and, as the traditions show, many of them did not welcome that order. So much so that the Prophet felt a pressing need to deliver a lecture telling them that the authority was from Allāh only, He ordains as He wishes, and that it was a general order, nobody was exempted from it - neither the Prophet nor the ummah. This explains why the verse ended on such a harsh note, ordering them to fear Allāh and threatening them with the chastisement of Allāh.

Qur'ān: ḥajj is the months well-known; ... nor quarrelling during the ḥajj: ḥajj at the beginning of the verse means ''the time of ḥajj''. ''Well-known'', i.e., to the Muslims; and the sunnah has explained it as Shawwāl, Dhu 'l-qa'dah and Dhu 'l-ḥijjah. So far as Dhu 'l-ḥijjah is concerned, it is only about a half of the month which is the time of ḥajj; but there is no objection to counting it as one of the ''months'' of ḥajj.

We say: ''The time of our reaching Mecca is Friday''. But we reach there at a certain hour and minute, not during the whole day.

The noun ḥajj has been repeated three times in this verse. Why was the pronoun not used, which could have shortened the sentence? The fact is that the sentence has been shortened by using the noun instead of the pronouns: ḥajj is the months ... means ''the time of ḥajj''; whoever determines the ḥajj means the action itself ; nor quarrelling during the hajj refers to ‘‘the duration and place of ḥajj. If the noun had not been repeated, it would have been necessary to lengthen the sentence to make the meaning clear.

so whoever determines the ḥajj therein: faraḍa fi hinna ’l-ḥajj (فرض فيهنّ الحجّ) literally means ‘makes ḥajj obligatory therein’; and it implies, ‘‘makes ḥajj obligatory for himself by beginning its rites’’, because Allāh says, And complete the ḥajj and ‘umrah for Allāh. Therefore, once one starts the ḥajj, it is obligatory on one to complete it.

Rafath (الرّفث) as mentioned in an earlier verse, literally means to say clearly such words which are generally unmentionable: fusūq (الفسوق) means ‘‘disobedience’’ and jidāl (الجدال) is ‘‘disputation in the talk’’. But sunnah has explained that in this verse rafath (الرّفث) means sexual inter course; fusūq (الفسوق) is lie; and jidāl (الجدال) is swearing by the name of Allāh — ‘No, by God’,‘Yes, by God’.

Qur’ān: and whatever you do, Allāh knows it: It is a reminder that one’s actions are not hidden from Allāh; it calls one to piety and fear of Allāh, so that one’s acts of worship might not be devoid of the spirit of devotion; so that one might not go through the external rites of worship with one’s mind absent and one’s heart forgetful. This is, generally, the style of the Qur’ān in all subjects. You will find it explaining the fundamentals of the faith, narrating the stories of previous peoples, or promulgating laws; but whatever the subject, it is invariably followed by a lesson and an admonition so that knowledge is not without practice. Knowledge without practice has no value in Islam. That is why this exhortation to piety and fear of God was immediately followed by the words, and fear Me, O people of understanding. In the preceding sentence the name of Allāh was mentioned in the third person (Allāh knows it) but immediately it is changed to the first person (fear Me) — it is to show the utmost importance of piety, and to imply that the pious person has not reached nearer to Allāh and is now directly addressed by Him.

Qur’ān: There is no blame on you if you seek bounty from your Lord: It is like the words of Allāh: O you who believe! when the call is made for prayer on Friday, then hasten to the remembrance of Allāh and leave off trading ... And when the prayer is ended then disperse in the land and seek of the grace of Allāh... (62:9—10). The trading of the first verse was changed to the seeking of bounty of Allāh in the next one, showing that both are the same. That is why the sunnah has interpreted the words, seek the bounty of Allāh in the verse under discussion as ''the trading''. This verse proves that trading during the pilgrimage is lawful.

Qur'ān: then when you march from 'Arafāt, remember Allāh near to the Holy Monumen t: ifāḍah (الافاضة) means going out from a place in a group. This verse, therefore, describes the stay at 'Arafāt as well as the stay at the Sacred Monument, i.e. al-muzdalafah (المزدلفة).

Qur'ān: and remember Him as He has guided you ... Remember Him intensely enough to be like His guidance to you, although before His guidance you were surely of those who had gone astray.

Qur'ān: Then march on from whence the people march on: The verse makes it compulsory to march on as ''the people'' were doing, and obliges the immediate audience to follow ''the people''. This supports the reports that the Qurayshites and their allies (together known as ḥums, الحمس) did not stay at 'Arafāt; instead they went direct to al-muzdalafah and stayed therein, claiming that they were the people of the sacred territory of Allāh and, therefore, they would not leave that boundary. Allāh, therefore, ordered them to march on (to al-muzdalafah) from whence the other people march on, i.e. from 'Arafāt. In other words, the Qurayshites also must stay at 'Arafāt and then march on from there with others.

That being the case, why did Allāh mention this order after the order to march from 'Arafāt, and begin it with then (thumma, ثمّ)? This sentence has been figuratively written as a sort of istidrāk (to catch up what had escaped, استدراک). The meaning thus, will be: ''The rules of ḥajj are as mentioned above, except that you are obliged to stay at, and march on from, 'Arafāt, not al-muzdalafah.''

Qur'ān: So, when you have performed ... intense remembrance: It is a call to remember Allāh with utmost intensity. The pilgrim should remember Him as he remembers his forefathers, or even more intensely. The grace of Allāh on him (i.e. the grace of guidance, as He mentioned it just above, remember Him as He has guided you) is far greater than the right of his forefathers upon him.

It has been said that the Arabs, in the days of ignorance, used to stay at Mina after the rites of ḥajj to boast vainly about their forefathers, in lectures and poetry. Allāh by this verse changed it to His own remembrance.

Aw (or, أو) in aw ashadda dhikran (or a more intense remembrance, أو اشدّ ذكرا) is used in the meaning of ‘‘rather’’. The remembrance should be ‘‘tense’’. Remembrance may be intense (in quality) or frequent (in quantity). See, for example, the following verses where the adjective of quantity kathīran (much, frequently, كثيرا) has been used: remember Allāh, remembering frequently, (33:35); and the men who remember Allāh much (33:35). Remembrance of Allāh, in reality, is not by words alone. It is a thing concerned with the heart and mind; words are merely a demonstration of that feeling. Therefore, it may be described as frequent (in quantity), if one remembers Allāh most of the time, as the Qur’ān says: Those who remember Allāh standing and sitting and reclining on their sides ... (3:191). And it may be described as intense (in quality) at some other times. As remembrance was ordered for a time (when you have finished your rites) when one is liable to divert one’s attention from Allāh and forget Him, it was appropriate to use the adjective ‘‘more intense’’ rather than ‘‘more frequent’’.

Qur’ān: For, of men there is he who says ... what they have earned. It is based on the sentence: then remember Allāh as you remember your fathers, rather a more intense remembrance. Nās (men, people, النّاس) is general; it describes all human beings, the unbelievers as well as the believer — the unbelievers who only remembers his forefathers. In other words, he only wants the vainglories of this world, only seeks material greatness, and has no concern with the Hereafter. And there is the believer who only seeks the pleasure of Allāh, and even when he wants something from this world, he wants only that which his Lord is pleased to bestow upon him.

In view of above explanations, it is clear that the word says in both places does not mean asking or saying in so many Words. It means ‘wanting’ by one’s state and inner feeling. Thus, the verses mean that some people do not ‘‘want’’ anything except this world, and they shall have no portion in the Here after; and there are others who do not seek anything except what Allāh is pleased to give them whether it be in this world or in the Hereafter; and they shall have their portion in the Hereafter.

Good (ḥasanah, الحسنة) is mentioned in the saying of the believers but not in that of the unbelievers. It is no secret that the one who wants this world, does not care whether it is good in the eyes of Allāh or not.

The whole world is sweet and good, in his thinking, if it satisfies his desire and if he can enjoy it. It is diametrically opposed to the thinking of the believer who wants the Hereafter. As the Hereafter will be either good or bad, he only wants and only asks for, the good, and not the bad.

The contrast between the sentences, and for him there shall be no portion in the Hereafter and they shall have (their) portion of what they have earned, shows that the deeds of the first groups (but not of the second) shall be void and forfeited. Allāh has said; And We will proceed to what they have done of deeds, so We shall render them like dust scattered in air, (25:23); And on the day when those who disbelieve shall be brought before the fire: You did away with your good things in your life of the world and you took your fill of pleasure in them ... (46:20); so their deeds become void and We will not assign to them any weight on the Day of Resurrection (18:105).

Qur'ān: and Allāh is quick in reckoning: sari'u 'l-ḥisāb (quick of reckoning, سريع الحساب) is one of the names of Allāh. Its generality suggests that it covers this world as well as the Hereafter. Even now the reckoning is in progress; whenever a man does any good or bad deed, Allāh gives him its full recompense.

In short, the purpose of these two verses is to exhort people to remember Allāh. Men are of two types: Some want this world, and do not know or remember anything else; such persons have no portion in the Hereafter. And there are others who want what God is pleased to give them; they shall have their share in the Hereafter; and Allāh is quick in reckoning - He quickly reckons what His servant wants, and recompenses him according to his wish. Therefore, you should remember Allāh so that you may be among those who will get their portion in the Hereafter; do not join that group which does not remember Allāh and, therefore, will have no portion. Otherwise, you will be disappointed on that day.

Qur'ān: And remember Allāh during the counted number of days: The counted days are the days of brightness, i.e., the 11th, 12th and 13th of Dhu 'l-ḥijjah. The proof that these counted days are after the 10th of Dhu 'l-ḥijjah is that this order has been given when all the rites of ḥajj have already been mentioned. The proof that they are three days may be found in the next sentence, then whoever hastens off in two days. One may ''hasten off'' in two days only when the original number of days is three.

And the traditions also have interpreted it in the same way.

Qur'ān: then whoever hastens ... him who guards (himself): No (lā, لا) here is for negation of a genus. There is no sin on him (lā ithma 'alayh لا اثم عليه) mentioned in the two sentences means that the pilgrim is free from the genus of sin, i.e. from all sin. Had Allāh meant to say that there would be no sin on the pilgrim in hastening off or in tarrying therein, the sentences would have contained some words to show it; but they are unconditional. Therefore, the verse means that the pilgrim who performs the rites of ḥajj is forgiven all his sins, there remains no sin on him whether he hastens off in two days or tarries therein.

It appears from the above that the aim of this verse is not to show that the pilgrim has an option between hastening off and tarrying; its purpose is to declare that all the sins of the pilgrim are forgiven in either case.

The words: (this is) for him who guards (himself), are not related to the forgiveness of .sins; otherwise it would have been ''on him who guards (himself)'', not ''for him''. Apparently it is like a previous sentence, this is for him whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque. As that sentence pointed to the group which shall be governed by the law of enjoying by 'umrah, likewise, the words, for him who guards, specify those who have the option of hastening off or tarrying therein. This option is for him who guards himself; if someone did not guard himself, then it is not for him. It follows that the guarding here is confined to guarding against those things which Allāh has forbidden during ḥajj. In other words, the meaning is this: This choice is given to him who guards himself from the things forbidden during the iḥrām. If he was not careful then he must stay a full three days at Mina and remember Allāh in those counted days. This meaning has been given in some of the traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt.

Qur'ān: and fear Allāh ... gathered together unto Him: The topic ends on the order to fear Allāh and on the reminder that all shall be resurrected and gathered unto Him. Piety and fear of Allāh cannot be complete, and sins not avoided, unless one remembers the Day of Recompense. Allāh says: Those who go astray from the path of Allāh, for them shall surely be a severe punishment, because they forgot the Day of Reckoning (38:26).

The choice of the word tuḥsharūn (you shall be gathered to gether, تحشرون) at the end of the topic of ḥajj (where people assemble and gather together from all parts of the world) is highly suitable. Also, it gives a hint that when the pilgrim, at the time of his ḥajj, sees the gathering and marching together, he should remember the Day when Allāh will gather them together and will not leave any one of them behind.

TRADITIONS

There is a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, And complete the ḥajj and ‘umrah for Allāh. He said: ‘‘They are obligatory.’’ [at-Tahdhīb and al-‘Ayyāshī]

There is a tradition narrated by Zurārah, Ḥimrān and Muḥammad ibn Muslim from Abū Ja‘far and Abū ‘Abdillāh (peace be on them). They said: ‘‘We asked both Imāms about the words of Allāh, And complete the ḥajj and ‘umrah for Allāh. Both replied: ‘Verily, it is the completion of ḥajj that one should not indulge in sexual intercourse, nor in bad language nor in quarrelling’.’’ [al-‘Ayyāshī]

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said in a tradition, inter alia: ‘‘(Allāh) means by their (ḥajj’s and ‘umrah’s) completion, performing them and guarding oneself from the things which a pilgrim in condition of iḥrām should guard against.’’ [al-Kāfī]

The author says: There is no conflict in these traditions and the meaning of completion (itmām, الاتمام) explained by us in the beginning, because their being obligatory and their performance is the same as completing them.

al-Ḥalabī narrates from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘Verily, when the Messenger of Allāh performed the last pilgrimage (ḥajj), he proceeded (from Medina) on the 26th of Dhu ’l-qa‘dah, until he reached (the Mosque of) Shajarah (which is the mīqāt (الميقات) i.e. appointed place of iḥrām for pilgrims from Medina) and prayed there. Then he led his camel till he reached the desert (i.e. open space) and he re-affirmed the intention (niyyah, النية) of the iḥrām there and said labbayk Allāhumma labbayk ...(talbiyah, التلبية) of ḥajj, and drove a hundred camels (of sacrifice); and (likewise) all the people put on the iḥrām of ḥajj; they did not have the intention of ‘umrah, and knew nothing about mut‘ah (enjoyment of ‘umrah, المتعة). When the Messenger of Allāh reached Mecca, he circumambulated the House and the people circumambulated with him; then he prayed two rak'ah near the Stand of Ibrāhīm and kissed the (Black) Stone. Then he said : 'I begin with what Allāh has begun with'. So, he came to (the hill of) Ṣafā and began from there and went between Ṣafā and Marwah seven times. When he finished his perambulation at Marwah, he stood up before them to give a lecture. (In that lecture he ordered them to end their iḥrām, and treat it (the rites performed so far) as 'umrah ; and that it was a system ordained by Allāh. So the people ended their iḥrām. The Messenger of Allāh told them that had he advanced from his affairs what he had delayed (i.e. had he known this system before) he also would have done as they were doing but he could not do so because he had led his sacrificial animals with him and Allāh had said: and do not shave your heads till the offering reaches its destination. Surāqah ibn Ja'tham al-Kinānī said: 'We have learned our religion as though we were born today. Do you think that this system which you have taught us is only for this year? Or for every year?' The Messenger of Allāh said: 'No. It is for eternity.' And another man stood up and said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! Shall we go out for ḥajj (on 8th of Dhu 'l-ḥijjah) and our heads shall be wet (by obligatory bath) because of going unto our women?' The Messenger of Allāh said: 'Verily, you shall never believe in it'.''

The Imām said: ''Then 'Alī (a.s.) proceeded from Yemen till he reached (Mecca near the time of) ḥajj; and found that Fāṭimah had ended her iḥrām, and felt the smell of perfume. So, he went to the Messenger of Allāh, to enquire about it. The Messenger of Allāh asked him: 'O 'Alī! On what did you raise your voice in talbiyah (التلبية) (i.e. what was the intention of your ḥajj)?' He said: '(My intention was) according to the intention of the Prophet.' So, the Messenger of Allāh told him: 'Then you do not end your iḥrām'. Then the Prophet gave him a share in his sacrificial animals, he gave him thirty seven and sacrificed himself sixty-three, slaughtering them by his own hand. He took a portion from each sacrifice, put all portions in one pot, and ordered it to be cooked. He ate from it and sipped a little of its soup and said: 'Now we have eaten from all of them. And ḥajju 't-tamattu' (mut'ah, المتعة) is better than ḥajju 'l-qirān in which the pilgrim leads his sacrificial animal, and better than ḥajju 'l-ifrād.' '' The narrator says: ''I asked the Imām whether the Messenger of Allāh began his iḥrām at night in the day-time.The Imām said: 'At day-time'. Then I asked, at what time.The Imām said ‘At the prayer of noon (ẓuhr,الظهر)!’ [al-Kāfī]

The author says: This matter has been reported in Majma‘u ’l-bayān and other books also.

There is a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘The ‘umrah has entered into ḥajj upto the Day of Resurrection. Then whoever enjoys by ‘umrah for the ḥajj (he should offer) whatever offering (sacrificial animal) is easy to obtain. Now, no one has any option but to perform ḥajju ’t-tamattu ‘, because Allāh sent it down in his book and it was started by the traditions of the Messenger of Allāh.’’[at-Tahdhīb]

There is from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the word of Allāh, whatever offering is easy to obtain, that it is ‘‘a goat’’. [al-Kāfī]

There is from the same Imām that he was asked what was the one doing ḥajj al-tamattu‘ to do if he did not get a goat. He said: ‘‘He will fast before the day of tarwiyah (8th of Dhu ’l-ḥijjah, التّروية) and on the day of the tarwiyah and the day of ‘arafah (9th of Dhu ’l-ḥijjah, العرفة)’’He was told: ‘‘(Suppose) he reached there on the very day of tarwiyah.’’ He replied: ‘‘He shall fast three days after tashrīq (i.e. after 13th, التشريق).’’ He was asked: ‘‘What if his camel-driver did not stay there?’’The Imām said: ‘‘He shall fast on the day of ḥaṣabah (الحصبة) and the following two days’’. It was asked: ‘‘And what is ḥaṣabah?’’ He said: ‘‘The day of his (return) journey.’’ It was said: ‘‘Will he fast when he is on a journey?’’ He said: ‘‘Yes. Is he not on journey on the day of ‘arafah (العرفة)? Verily, we the Ahlu ’l-bayt say so. Allāh says, should fast for three days during the ḥajj. Allāh means in Dhu ’l-ḥijjah.’’ [ibid.]

ash-Shaykh has narrated from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘Whatever is after the mīqāt upto Mecca, (its inhabitants) is the dweller of the Sacred Mosque and for him there is no ḥajju ’t-tamattu ‘ (mut‘ah, المتعة).’’

The author says: It means that the residence of the area from the appointed place of iḥrām up to Mecca come under the term ‘‘dwellers of the Sacred Mosque’’ and they cannot do ḥajju ’t-tamattu‘. And there are numerous traditions of the same meaning from the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt.

There is a tradition from al-Bāqir (a.s.) about the word of Allāh: ḥajj is the months well-known, that he said: ‘‘Ḥajj is in the months well-known, Shawwāl and Dhu ’l-qad‘dah and Dhu ’l-ḥijjah. Nobody can perform ḥajj in other months.’’ [al-Kāfī]

And there is a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh:

so whoever determines (to perform) ḥajj therein, that farḍ (obligation, determination, الفرض) is (by) talbiyah (labbayk Allāhumma labbayk, التّلبية) and ish'ār (putting some recognised signs on the sacrificial animals,الاشعار) and taqlid (putting a string on its neck, التّقليد). Whichever of these the pilgrim does, he determines to perform the ḥajj.'' [ibid.]

And ther eis in the same book from the same Imām under the word of Allāh, There shall be no uttering unmentionable words... that rafath (الرّفث) means sexual intercourse, fusūq (الفسوق) means a lie or abuse and jidāl (الجدال) is saying, 'No, by God'; 'Yes, by God'.

It is narrated from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, There is no blame on you if you seek bounty from your Lord, that the bounty (faḍl, الفضل) here means sustenance. When the pilgrim has ended his iḥrām and performed his rites then he may purchase and sell in that season. [al-'Ayyāshī]

The author says: It is said that according to their belief, trading during the season of ḥajj was a sin; so Allāh removed this misunderstanding with this verse.

''And it is said that it means that there is no blame on you if you seek forgiveness from your Lord. This meaning has been narrated by Jābir from Abū Ja'far (a.s.).'' [Majma'u 'l-bayān]

The author says: This tradition looks at ''bounty'' in its generality and interprets it with its best example.

There is a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the word of Allāh, Then march on from whence the people march on. He said: ''Verily, the people of the ḥaram (the Quraysh) used to stay at the Sacred Mosque and other people used to stay at 'Arafāt, and (the Quraysh) did not march on from there until the people of 'Arafāt came in sight (coming from 'Arafāt). There was a man, with the patronymic, Abū Sayyār; he had a fast donkey and always went ahead of the people of 'Arafāt. When he came into sight they said, 'Here is Abū Sayyār' and then started marching on. So, Allāh ordered them (i.e. the people of ḥaram) that they must stay at 'Arafāt and march on from there.'' [al-'Āyyāshī]

The author says: There are other traditions with this meaning.

There is a tradition from the same Imām about the words of Allāh: Our Lord! give us good in this world and good in the Hereafter. He said: ''The pleasure of Allāh and the Garden in the Hereafter, and increase in sustenance and good disposition in this world.''

And also he said: ''The pleasure of Allāh, and increase in sustenance and good company; and in the Hereafter, the Garden.''

And ‘Alī (a.s.) said: ‘‘Good in this world is a virtuous wife and good in the Hereafter is the hour; and the chastisement of the Fire is a bad (ill-tempered) wife.’’ [ibid.]

The author says: These traditions give some examples; otherwise the verse is general. The pleasure of Allāh can be got even in this world, although its complete manifestation will be in the Hereafter. That is why it may be counted as a good in this world (1st tradition) as well as in the Hereafter (2nd tradition).

There is a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the word of Allāh, and remember Allāh during the counted number of days. He said: ‘‘and they are the days of brightness (tashrīq, التشريق) (the. 11th, 12th and 13th of Lunar month). When the Arabs stayed at Mina after sacrificing the animals, they used to boast against one another. One would say: ‘My father used to do this and that.’ So Allāh said: when you have performed your rites, then remember Allāh as you remember your fathers, rather a more intense remembrance.’’ He further said: ‘‘And the takbīr is Allāhu akbar, Allāhu akbar, la ilāha illallāhu wa’llāhu akbar, wa lillahi ’l-ḥamd, Allāhu akbar ‘alā mā hadānā, Allāhu akbar ‘alā mā razaqanā min bahīmati ’l-an‘ām.’’ [al-Kāfī]

The same Imām said: ‘‘And the takbīr is in the days of brightness from the prayer of noon on the day of sacrifice till the prayer of dawn on the third day. And in (other) towns takbīr would be (recited) after ten prayers.’’ [ibid.]

About the word of Allāh, then whoever hastens off in two days, there is no sin on him, and whoever tarries (there) there is no sin on him, that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked about it, and he said: ‘‘It does not mean that he has the option to do like this if he wishes. But it means that he returns (from ḥajj) and his sins are forgiven, there is no sin on him. ’’ [Man lā yahḍuruhu ’l faqīh]

And there is a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘He returns and his sins are forgiven, there is no sin on him, (this is) for him who guards (himself).’’ [al-‘Ayyāshī]

And there is in al-Faqīh from the same Imām about the word of Allāh, (this is) for him who guards (Himself). He said: ‘‘He shall guard himself against hunting till the people of Mina return (from it).’’

And al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ‘‘(This is) for him who guards himself against sexual intercourse and bad language and quarrelling and those things which Allāh has forbidden in iḥrām.''

Also he said: ''for him who fears Allāh.''

And aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''for him who guards himself against big sins.''

The author says: The meaning of the sentence has already been explained. But it is possible to interpret taqwā (piety, fear of Allāh, التّقوى) in its general meaning, as has been done in the last two traditions.

TRADITIONS ON MUT'ATU 'L-ḤAJJ

al-Bukhārī and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he was asked about ḥajju 't-tamattu' (mut'atu 'l-ḥ ajj, متعة الحجّ). He said: ''The Emigrants (muḥājirīn) and the Helpers (anṣār) and the wives of the Prophet raised their voices in talbiyah (i.e. put on iḥrām) in the last pilgrimage, and we did likewise. When we reached Mecca, the Messenger of Allāh said: 'Make (i.e. change) your intention of ḥajj into that of 'umrah, except the one who has put string on his sacrificial animal.' So we circumambulated the House and (arched) between Ṣafā and Marwah; (then we ended our iḥrām) and went to the women and put on (sewn) clothes. And the prophet said: 'He who put string on the sacrificial animal shall not end his iḥrām until the sacrifice reaches (its destination).' Then he ordered us on the eve of tarwiyah (8th of Dhu 'l-ḥijjah) to raise our voice in talbiyah to wear the iḥrām of ḥajj. When we finished the rites (upto Mina), we came and circumambulated the House and (marched) between Ṣafā. and Marwah and our ḥajj was completed. And on us was a sacrifice, as Allāh said: Whatever offering is easy to obtain, but he who cannot find should fast for three days during the ḥajj and for seven days when you return to your towns; and a goat is enough. Thus the pilgrims combined the two rites, ḥajj and 'umrah, in one year. For, verily Allāh sent it down in His Book, and His prophet promulgated it and made it lawful for all people except the people of Mecca. Allāh has said: this is for him whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque. And the months of ḥajj, which Allāh has mentioned, are Shawwāl, Dhu 'l-qa'dah and Dhu 'l -ḥijjah. Therefore, he who performs mut'atu 'l-ḥajj in these months, on him is a sacrifice or the (10 days') fast. And rafath (الرّفث) is sexual intercourse, and fusūq (الفسوق) is sins and jidāl (الجدال) is quarrelling.'' [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

al-Bukhārī and Muslim have narrated from Ibn 'Umar tha he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh, in the last pilgrimage, enjoye (by the 'umrah for the ḥajj, and offered the sacrifice. He led the sacrificial animals with him from Dhu 'l-ḥalīfah. And the Messenger of Allāh began and raised his voice in talbiyah (i.e. put on iḥrām) of 'umrah. Later on, he raised his voice in talbiyah (i.e. put on iḥrām) of ḥajj. And the people enjoyed with the Prophet by the 'umrah for the ḥajj. Some people had taken their sacrificial animals with them, others had not done so. When the Prophet reached Mecca he told the people: 'Anyone of you who has led his sacrificial animal with him, (shall not end his iḥrām and) no such thing, which was forbidden for him, shall be allowed to him until he performs his ḥajj. And he who has not taken his sacrifice with him, he will go around the House, and (march) between Ṣafā and Marwah, and cut some hair or nails, and his iḥrām will come to end; then later he will raise his voice in talbiyah (i.e. will put on iḥrām) of ḥajj; and if he cannot find an offering, he will fast for three days during the ḥajj and for seven (days) when he returns to his family.' '' [ibid.]

al-Hākim has narrated (and said that it is ''correct'') through Mujāhid and 'Aṭā', from Jābir that he said: ''There are many people talking (without knowing the facts). We came out (from Medina) for ḥajj. When only a few days remained for our iḥrām to come to an end, we were ordered to (then and there) finish our iḥrām. We said, 'Well, shall one go to 'Arafāt (at the beginning of ḥajj) with one's penis dripping semen?' This talk reached the Messenger of Allāh, so he stood up to deliver a lecture, and said: 'O people! Do you (want to) teach me about Allāh? For, by Allāh, I am the most knowledgeable of you about Allāh, and the most God-fearing of you. And had I advanced my affair which I kept behind, I would not have taken any sacrifice with me and would have ended my ihrām as they had done. Then (at the time of ḥajj) he who did not have any sacrificial animal would fast for three days in the ḥajj and for seven (days) when he returns to his family; and he who had found animal would slaughter it. Thus, we slaughtered animals for seven days.''' Aṭā' said that Ibn 'Abbās said: ''Surely, the Messenger of Allāh distributed sheep and goats among his companions that day; and Sa'd ibn Abī Waqqāṣ received a he-goat and slaughtered it on his own behalf.''[ibid.]

Ibn Abī Shaybah, al-Bukhārī and Muslim have narrated from ‘Imrān ibn Ḥaṣīn that he said: ‘‘The verse of mut‘ah came down in the Book of Allāh and we did it in the company of the Messenger of Allāh, then there did not come down any verse to abrogate the verse of the mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj, nor did (the Messenger of Allāh) forbid it till he died. (And then) one man said by his own opinion what he wished.’’ [ibid.]

The author says: This tradition has been narrated (in another place) with different words but the same meaning.

There is a tradition from Muṭrif that he said: ‘‘ ‘Imrān ibn Ḥaṣīn sent for me in his illness in which he died, and said: ‘I was narrating to you some traditions so that Allāh may benefit you by them. Now, if I remain alive, keep them as my secret, and if I die, then narrate them on my authority, because then I will be safe. And know that the Prophet of Allāh combined the ḥajj and the ‘umrah ; then nothing was sent down on this subject in the Book of Allāh, nor was it forbidden by the Prophet of Allāh. (But) one man said about it by his own opinion what he wished.’ ’’ [Muslim; Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, as-Sunan, an-Nasā’ī]

It is reported that ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Umar was asked about mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj. He said: ‘‘It is ḥalāl (lawful).’’ The questioner told him: ‘‘Surely, your father forbade it!’’ He said: ‘‘If my father forbade it and the Messenger of Allāh performed it then what do you think I should do? Should I follow the order of my father or the order of the Messenger of Allāh?’’ The man said: ‘‘Rather, the order of the Messenger of Allāh.’’ He said: ‘‘Surely the Messenger of Allāh performed it.’’ [at-Tirmidhī, Zādu ’l-ma‘ād]

And there is from Muḥammad ibn ‘Abdullāh that he heard Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqāṣ and Ḍaḥḥāk ibn Qays, (in the year when Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān performed his ḥajj) talking about enjoyment by ‘umrah for ḥajj. Ḍaḥḥāk said: ‘‘Nobody shall do it except he who is ignorant of the command of Allāh.’’ Sa‘d replied: ‘‘What evil did you utter, O my nephew!’’ Ḍaḥḥāk said: ‘‘But surely ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb forbade it.’’ Sa‘d said: ‘‘Surely, the Messenger of Allāh did it and we did it in his company.’’ [at-Tirmidhī, as-Sunan, an-Nasā’ī; as-Sunan al-kubrā; al-Muwaṭṭa’ and al-Umm] al-Bukhārī, Muslim and al-Nasā’ī have narrated from Abū Mūsā that he said: ‘ ‘I came to the Messenger of Allāh while he was in al-Baṭḥā’. He said: ‘Did you raise your voice in talbiyah (Did you put on iḥrām)?’ I said: ‘I raised my voice as the Prophet did.’ He asked me: ‘Have you brought any sacrificial animal?’ I said: ‘No,’ The Prophet said: ‘Go around the House and (march) between Ṣafā and Marwah, then end your iḥrām.’ So I went around the House and (marched) between Ṣafā and Marwah. Then (after ending the iḥrām) I went to a woman from my people, she combed my head and I washed my head. Thereafter, I used to give religious decisions during the rule of Abū Bakr and ‘Umar. Once I was standing in the season (of ḥajj) when a man came to me and said: ‘You do not know what the leader of the faithful (‘Umar) has invented concerning the rites (of ḥajj).’ So I said: ‘O people! Whoever we might have given him our decision, let him wait, because this leader of the faithful is coming to you concerning it.’ When he (‘Umar) arrived, I asked him: ‘What have you invented concerning the rites?’ He said: ‘If we take the Book of Allāh, then Allāh says: And complet the ḥajj and ‘umrah for Allāh, and if we take the tradition of our Prophet, then he did not end his iḥrām until he slaughtered the offering.’ ’’ [ad-Durru ’l-manthūr]

Muslim has narrated from Abū Naḍrah that he said: ‘‘Ibn ‘Abbās used to order mut‘ah and Ibn az-Zubayr used to forbid it. This was reported to Jābir ibn ‘Abdullāh; so he said: ‘On my hand the talk progressed. We did mut‘ah in the company of the Messenger of Allāh; then when ‘Umar stood up (became caliph) he said: ‘‘Surely, Allāh used to make lawful for the Messenger of Allāh whatever He wished from whatever He wished. And surely the Qur’ān came down gradually. Therefore, complete the ḥajj and ‘umrah as Allāh has ordered you, and separate your ḥajj from your ‘umrah, as it is more completing for your ḥajj and more completing for your ‘umrah’’.’ ’’ [ibid.]

And there is from Abū Mūsā that ‘Umar said: ‘‘It (i.e. mut‘ah) is the sunnah (custom) of the Messenger of Allāh. But I am afraid that they will sleep with them (i.e. the women) under the trees and then proceed with them as pilgrims.’’ [Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal]

There is a tradition from Sa‘īd ibn Musayyab (that he said)that ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb forbade Mut‘ah in the months of ḥajj and said: ‘ ‘I performed it in the company of the Messenger of Allāh and I forbid it. And it is because one of you comes from a far away place dishevelled, worn out, having the intention of 'umrah in the months of ḥajj. And his dishevelment, and tiredness and talbiyah are only for his 'umrah. Then he arrives and goes around the House, and ends his iḥrām and wears (sewn clothes) and uses perfume and sleeps with his wife if she is with him. Thereafter, when the day of tarwiyah comes he raises his voice in talbiyah of ḥajj and proceeds to Minā, saying talbiyah of ḥajj in which there is neither dishevelment, nor tiredness nor talbiyah except for one day only. And the ḥajj is better than 'umrah. If we leave them on this system, they shall embrace them (i.e. the women) under the trees. Moreover, the people of the House (i.e. Meccans) have neither any cattle nor any crop, and their spring is only those who stay with them.'' [Jam'u 'l jawāmi']

There is from Muslim from Abū Naḍrah from Jābir. (Abū Naḍrah) said: ''I said: 'Verily, Ibn az-Zubayr forbids mut'ah and Ibn 'Abbās orders it.' He (Jābir) said: 'On my hand the talk progressed. We did mut'ah in the company of the Messenger of Allāh and in the company of Abū Bakr. When 'Umar became ruler, he delivered a lecture before the people and said: ''Verily, the Messenger of Allāh is this Messenger, and the Qur'ān is this Qur'ān. And, surely, there were two mut'ah's in the days of the Messenger of Allāh, and I forbid them and shall inflict punishment for them; one of them is the mut'ah of women; and I will not get hold of a man who marries a woman for a period, but that I shall eliminate him with stones; and the second is the mut'ah of ḥajj.'' '' '' [as-Sunan al-kubrā]

There is a tradition from Ibn 'Abbās that he said that he heard 'Umar saying: ''By Allāh, verily I forbid you the mut'ah, and surely it is in the Book of Allāh and surely the Messenger of Allāh performed it.'' He meant 'umrah in the ḥajj. [as-Sunan, an-Nasā'ī]

Muslim has narrated from 'Abdullāh ibn Shaqīq that he said: '' 'Uthmān used to forbid the mut'ah and 'Alī used to order it. So, 'Uthmān said something to 'Alī and 'Alī said: 'Surely, you know that we performed mut'ah in the company of the Messenger of Allāh.' 'Uthmān said: 'But we were afraid'.'' [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

Ibn Abī Shaybah and Muslim have narrated from Abū Dharr: ''Mut'ah in the ḥajj was (prescribed) especially for the companions of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.).'' [ibid]

Muslim has narrated from Abū Dharr that: ''The two mut'ah's are not suitable but for us especially.'' He meant the mut'ah of women and mut'ah of ḥajj. [ibid.]

The author says: The traditions of this meaning are very numerous, but we have quoted only what was relevant to the scope of our discussion, and that is to discuss the prohibition of mut'atu 'l-ḥajj from the point of view of the Tafsīr. Sometimes, the argument about it is to see whether the man who prohibited it was right or not, or whether had any excuse for it or not. But such a discussion comes under 'ilmu 'l-kalām (Theology); it is outside the limits of our book. And sometimes, the arguments are to see what reasoning has been advanced in the traditions concerning this subject, with special reference to the Qur'ān and the sunnah. Such a discussion is based on the meaning of the Qur'ān and the traditions. And it is relevant to the subject of this book of ours.

Therefore, we shall look, one by one, into the arguments put in these traditions:-

First Argument: It is claimed that the words of Allāh, And complete the ḥajj and 'umrah for Allāh show that ḥajju 't-tamattu' is not lawful, and that ḥajju 't-tamattu' was especially allowed for the Messenger of Allāh. This argument has been put in the tradition of Abū Naḍrah from Jābir that 'Umar said: ''Surely, Allāh used to make lawful for the Messenger of Allāh whatever He wished from wahtever He wished. And surely the Qur'ān came down gradually. Therefore, complete the ḥajj and 'umrah as Allāh has ordered you.''

Reply: You very well know that the words of Allāh, And complete the ḥajj and 'umrah for Allāh ... do not say anything except that it is obligatory to complete the ḥajj and 'umrah after one determines to perform them. For a further proof, see the next sentence, but if you are prevented, i.e. from completing them.

Complete the ḥajj and 'umrah cannot, by any stretch of imagination, mean that 'umrah and ḥajj should not be combined. Likewise, there is not even an iota of proof that combining the 'umrah and the ḥajj was an order given specially to the Prophet only, or to him and his companions on the last pilgrimage only.

By saying that it was an order especially for the Prophet and/ or his companions, one has to accept that it was a system/established by the Messenger of Allāh. See the tradition of an-Nasā'ī from Ibn 'Abbās that he heard ‘Umar saying: ‘‘By Allāh, verily I forbid you the mut‘ah, and surely it is in the Book of Allāh and surely the Messenger of Allāh performed it.’’

Second Argument: Mut‘ātu ’l-ḥajj was forbidden on the basis of the Book of Allāh and the tradition of the Prophet.

This argument is seen in the tradition of Abū Mūsā, where ‘Umar told him : ‘‘If we take the Book of Allāh, then Allāh says, And complete the ḥajj and ‘umrah for Allāh, and if we take the tradition of our Prophet then (we find that) he did not end the ihrām until he slaughtered the offering.’’

Replies: So far as the Book of Allāh is concerned, it has just been shown that it goes against his claim.

His reference to the tradition of the Prophet is equally weak:

First, he contradicts himself in this claim. He has already said in other traditions (some of which have been quoted earlier) that ‘‘surely the Messenger of Allāh performed it.’’

Second: The traditions loudly say that the Messenger of Allāh performed it; and that once he raised his voice in talbiyah of ‘umrah and later on raised his voice in talbiyah of ḥajj; and that he admonished the people, saying, ‘‘Do you (want to) teach me about Allāh?’’

The claim of Ibn Taymiyyah at this juncture that the Messenger of Allāh had performed ḥajju ’l-qirān that year is a very astonishing thing. Even more amusing is his claim that ḥajju ’l-qirān was called mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj!!

Third: What the traditions say is that the Prophet did not shave his head after performing the ‘umrah, because his sacrificial animals had not yet reached their destination. But it does not mean that he had not ended his iḥrām of ‘umrah or that he went to ḥajj with the same iḥrām. The verse clearly says that the pilgrim who leads his offerings with him, is not to shave his head until the offering reaches its destination. Also, it clearly says that the one whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque shall do mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj. If a non-resident pilgrim brings his offering with him, he is obliged to perform mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj (because he is non-resident) and at the same time, not to shave his head (because the offering is yet to reach its destination.) Merely not shaving the head does not mean that one has not ended one’s iḥrām of ‘umrah.

Fourth: Let us accept, for the sake of argument, that the Messenger of Allāh himself did not perform mut'atu 'l-ḥajj. But it is universally accepted that he ordered all his companions and family members to perform their ḥajj according to the newly established system of mut'atu 'l-ḥajj. Now which of the two could be called the system promulgated by the Prophet for his ummah? The one which was especially meant for his own self? Or the other which he ordered his ummah to follow and which was also supported by the Qur'ān?

Third Argument: It was claimed, that mutatu'l '-ḥajj creates a situation which is not suitable for the pilgrims. After 'umrah and before ḥajj, he is allowed to wear beautiful clothes, use perfume and sleep with the women. And it is against the dignity of ḥajj. This claim is found in the traditions of Abū Mūsā in which 'Umar is reported as saying: ''But I am afraid that they will sleep with them (women) under the trees and then proceed with them as pilgrims.'' And as he said, according to another tradition: ''Surely I know that the Prophet and his companions did it. But I did not like them sleeping with them (i.e. with their women) under the trees and then proceeding to ḥajj with the water dropping from their heads'' (because of the obligatory bath).

Replies: It is preferring one's own opinion against a clear order of Allāh. Allāh and His Messenger had clearly promulgated the system of mut'atu 'l-ḥajj; and Allāh and His Messenger knew very well that this system would lead to this supposedly undesireable effect. Still they thought it good for the Muslims. Then why should 'Umar be afraid of this effect?

It is interesting to note that the relevant verse of the Qur'ān gives the same reason for the promulgation of this system which he is using to show his displeasure and dislike. Allāh says: then whoever enjoys by the 'umrah for ḥajj. What is the meaning of enjoyment if not 'taking one's fill of the pleasure', 'sleeping one self with sexual activities, fine clothes, etc.' So, Allāh mentions it approvingly and 'Umar disliked it and was displeased with it!!

We are even more astonished when we see that the companions had offered the same criticism against Allāh and His Prophet (when the verse was revealed and the Prophet ordered them to adopt the system of mut'atu 'l-ḥajj) which 'Umar used as the basis of his prohibition. See the tradition reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr through al-Hākim from Jābir in which he says: ‘‘We said: ‘Well, shall one go to ‘Arafāt with one’s penis dripping semen?’ This talk reached the Messenger of Allāh, so he stood up to deliver a lecture’’ and replied to their objection and again ordered to perform mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj as he had ordered them the first time. Was that reply not enough to bury such displeasure for ever?

Fourth Argument: It is said that this system badly affects the market of Mecca. We see this argument in the tradition of al-Suyūtī from Sa‘īd ibn Musayyab, in which ‘Umar says: ‘‘The people of the House have neither any cattle nor any crop, and their spring is only those who stay with them.’’

Replies: This also is preferring one’s own opinion against a clear order of Allāh.

Moreover, Allāh has refuted such claims in a similar situation where He says: O you who believe! Verily, the idolators are unclean, so they shall not approach the Sacred Mosque after this very year; and if you fear poverty, then soon Allāh will enrich you through His grace, if He please; Surely Allāh is All-knowing, All-wise. (9:28)

Fifth Argument: It is claimed that mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj is allowed when one is afraid, and when there is no fear there should be no mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj. It is seen in the tradition of Muslim from ‘Abdullāh ibn Shaqīq that ‘Uthmān said to ‘Alī: ‘‘But we were afraid.’’ Also it is written in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr that Ibn Abī Shaybah, Ibn Jarīr and Ibn al-Mundhir have reported from Ibn az-Zubayr that he said in a lecture: ‘ ‘ O people! By Allāh, enjoying by ‘umrah for ḥajj is not as you do. It is for the men who raises his voice in talbiyah of ḥajj, then he is prevented by an enemy or illness or fracture or any other reasons till the days of ḥajj are gone, then he reaches (Mecca); so he shall change it to ‘umrah, and go on enjoying until the next year; then he shall perform ḥajj and offer sacrifice. This is the meaning of enjoyment by ‘umrah to ḥajj.’’

Replies: The verse is general and unconditional; it covers those who are afraid as well as those who are not afraid. It has been explained earlier that the sentence which promulgates mut‘atu ’l-ḥajj is the verse: this is for him whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque. And it is without any condition.

Moreover, the traditions clearly. say that the Prophet performed his last pilgrimage as ḥajju 't-tamattu' and he did the intention (*niyyah ,*النّيّة) of iḥrām twice — first for 'umrah and later for ḥajj. And nobody can say that at that time there was any risk or danger for the Muslims.

Sixth Argument: It is claimed in the two traditions of Abū Dharr, reported in ad Durru 'l-manthūr, that mut'atu 'l-ḥajj was a system meant especially for the companions of the Prophet.

Replies: If it means what 'Uthmān and Ibn az-Zubayr claimed that they were at that time in danger and, therefore, it was allowed to them, then the reply given to the fifth argument applies here also.

But if it means that it was a special rule made for them only, then it is refuted by the words of Allāh: this is for him whose family dwells not near the Sacred Mosque. It does not say, ''this is for the companions of Muḥammad only''.

Moreover, if it was meant especially for the companions of the Prophet, then why did some of the companions, like 'Umar, 'Uthmān, Ibn az-Zubayr, Abū Mūsā, Mu'āwiyah, and, according to a report, Abū Bakr reject it?

Seventh Argument: Some people say that 'Umar prohibited it by his own authority as he was Master of the Affairs (khalīfah) (waliyu 'l-amr, ولىّ الامر) and Allāh has made it obligatory on the Muslims to obey the Masters of the Affairs, as He says: Obey Allāh, and obey the Apostle and the Masters of the affair from among you. (4:59)

Replies: The authority vested in the Masters of the Affairs does not cover this case. There are very many verses in the Qur'ān which show that.

It is compulsory to obey and follow what Allāh has revealed to His Prophet: Follow what has been sent down to you from your Lord ... (7:3)

Whatever was ordained and promulgated by the Prophet was according to the command of Allāh, as may be understood from the verses: ....nor do they prohibit what Allāh and His Apostle have prohibited ...(9:29), ... and whatever the Apostle gives you, accept it, and from whatever he forbids you keep back ... (59:7). The meaning of gives you is 'orders you', because it is used here as the opposite of ''forbids you''. It is obligatory to obey Allāh and His Apostle by doing what he orders and keeping back from what he forbids.

Likewise, the judgement and decision must be according to the revelation sent down by Allāh: and whoso judges not by what Allāh has sent down, these then are the unjust. (5:45) and whoso judges not by what Allāh has sent down, these then are the transgressors. (5:47); and whoso judges not by what Allāh has sent down these then are infidels. (5:44). Again Allāh says: And it is not for a believer man or woman to have any choice in their affair when Allāh and His Apostle have decided a matter; and whoever disobeys Allāh and His Apostle, indeed he has strayed off a manifest straying (33:36*); And thy Lord creates whatever He pleases, and chooses too; it is not theirs to choose ...* (28:68). Choosing means judging and legislating, or else it is general in meaning which includes judging and legislating too.

The Qur'ān has openly declared that it is a Book not to be abrogated and that its laws will remain as they are upto the Day of Resurrection. And surely it is Mighty Book. Falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor from behind it; a revelation from the All-wise, the Most Praised One. (41:41-42). The verse is general and the ''falsehood'' includes abrogation also, which is rejected by this verse.

In short, whatever has been ordained by Allāh and His Prophet, or whatever has been decided by Allāh and His Prophet must be obeyed and followed by the whole ummah, the rulers as well as the ruled.

It is obvious from above that the word of Allāh, Obey Allāh and obey the Apostle and the Masters of the Affair from among you, gives ''the Master of Affairs'' authority in other than the sharī'ah. Because protecting and following the sharī'ah is obligatory on the rulers as well as the others; nay! it is more binding on the rulers. The authority of the Masters of Affair (ulu 'l-amr, اولو الامر) is confined to giving orders which they think to be in the interest of the ummah provided that the command of Allāh concerning that matter is protected and followed. It is only then that the ummah is expected to obey them.

A man has an option to eat on a certain day and abstain from food next day, while he accepts that it is lawful to him to eat from his own money. He is free to sell or buy at any time, or not to do so, if he so wishes, while the basic matter — trade — is lawful. If someone quarrels with him about his property, he may appeal to the judge to protect his right; on the other hand, he may refrain from doing so; but the basic sharī'ah will remain in force that it is his right to bring the matter before the judge. It all depends on his own choice on what he thinks to be in his best interest. But the basic rules remain intact, that it is lawful for him to eat, sell and buy, or to put his case before the judge.

But he has no right to drink liquor, or take interest or usurp other's property, even if he thought that it was in his best interest. Why? Because it directly conflicts with the laws ordained by Allāh.

The above were the examples of personal affairs. In the same way the ruler has the authority to manage the affairs of the state according to the best interest of the ummah, but always protecting and preserving the laws of Allāh as He has ordained. For example, he may decide to defend a frontier of the Islamic state at a certain time, or to retreat from it if it is more advantageous. He may announce a public holiday on a certain day and things like that, as he, in his best judgement, thinks beneficial for the ummah. But he cannot change the sharī'ah.

In short, as an individual has a right to take a decision in his personal or family affairs, keeping within the limits imposed by the relevant laws, so also, a ruler appointed by the authority of the Messenger of Allāh has the authority to take a decision in the affairs of the state and the ummah, keeping within the relevant laws ordained by Allāh.

Had a ruler been given authority to manipulate the laws of the divine sharī'ah, if he thought that the manipulation was in the interest of ummah, no rule and no law could remain intact; the talk that the sharī'ah of Islam was to continue upto the Day of Resurrection would become meaningless.

What is the difference between the three statements appended below?

''The law of enjoying the good things of life is not suitable for the pilgrim who was expected to spend his time in devotion and worship. Therefore, this law must be abolished.''

''The laws legalizing slavery are not suitable for the modern world which stands for general freedom. Therefore, these laws must be abolished.''

''The penal code of Islam cannot be tolerated by the advanced human society of modern times, nor is that code in conformity with current codes. Therefore, this code must be abolished.''

Why should the first statement be accepted and the others rejected?

Some traditions on this subject show that this basic principle was raised during that controversy. Isḥāq ibn Rā'wiyah (in his al-Musnad) and Aḥmad have narrated from Hasan: ''Verily, 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb wanted to prohibit mut'atu 'l-ḥajj. Ubay ibn Ka'b stood up and said: 'You have no right to do so. Surely, the Book of Allāh came with it (i.e., it was promulgated by the Qur'ān) and we did 'umrah (of tamattu') with the Messenger of Allāh.' There upon, 'Umar came down.'' [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

COMMENTARY

This is another classification of men according to their character. As the preceding verses (200—202) classified them according to their want of this world or the Hereafter, these verses do so from the point of view of their hypocrisy or the sincerity of their faith. And this is the link between these and the preceding verses.

Qur'ān: And among men ... most violent of adversaries: a'jabahu (اعجبه) means gave him pleasure, delighted him. The words, in the life of this world are connected with pleases you. The meaning is: his talk pleases you in this life, because in this life one has to rely on appearances. The deeper traits and inner feelings are hidden behind a curtain which cannot be lifted at all, although sometimes some clues are found which help one to surmise what lies behind the curtain.

Then come the word: and takes Allāh to witness as to what is in his heart. He talks in a way that pleases you: he seems eager to protect the way of the truth, appears keen to do good for the people, looks enthusiastic for the advancement of the cause of the religion and the ummah. And to show that his voice comes from the depth of his heart, he calls on Allāh to be his witness. But, in reality he is the most virulent enemy of the truth.

Aladd (الدّ) is the adjective in superlative degree, derived from ladda ludūdan (he became a very violent adversary, لدّ لدودا .) khiṣām (.الخصام) is plural of khaṣm (الخصم) by the paradigm of ṣa'b:ṣi'āb (صعب : صعاب) and ka'b:ki'āb (كعب : كعاب). Also it is said that it is an infinitive verb, and that aladdu 'l-khiṣām (الدّ الخصام) means ''most violent in enmity''.

Qur'ān: And when he become ruler he strives on earth that he may cause mischief therein : tawallī (التولىّ) means to get authority and power. Further support of this meaning comes from the next verse: he is overcome by honour (pride) by sin. It shows that he has got an honour (i.e., a cause of pride) earned with sin. (The sin is committed by his heart that does not conform with his tongue.)

Sa'y (السّعى) means to strive, to walk hurriedly. Thus the verse means: When this hypocrite, this most violent of adversaries, gets a chance to do something, and is given authority and rules over the people, he hastens hither and thither and strives to create mischief in the land.

Tawallī (التّولى) may also mean to turn back, to be out of sight. In that case the verse would mean: ''And when he turns back (from you), his actions in your absence belie his talk in your presence.'' The enthusiasm for the common welfare and the good of the ummah turns into striving in the land to create mischief and evil.

Qur'ān: and destroy the crop and the progeny: Apparently it is a description of the mischief. He creates mischief by destroying the crop and the progeny. The continued existence of the human species depends on food and procreation. These are the two most essential things which the human species cannot do without. Procreation is clear from the word 'progeny'. So far as food is concerned, man acquires it from the animal and the plant; animals again acquire it from plants. Thus, the basis of food is the plant which is obtained from crops. That is why the mischief and destruction has been explained in terms of crops and progeny. The verse means that he creates mischief and destruction in the earth by eliminating through the destruction of crop and progeny.

Qur'ān: and Allāh does not love mischief: fasād (الفساد) literally means deterioration, corruption, decay, negation, immorality; here it has been translated as mischief.

Fasād (الفساد) in this sentence does not refer to the physical decay or destruction in this world. This universe is based on such a system that every destruction leads to a subsequent construction. A struggle for survival is continuously going on; every existence is followed by extinction, every life by death. Both are found in this natural cosmos side by side. This is the system created by Allāh; and how can He hate a thing which He Himself has created and decreed?

It follows that the ‘‘mischief’’ here refers to corruption in the sharī‘ah and legislation. Allāh ordained the laws of religion for the betterment of the actions of His servants; these laws will improve their character and traits; they will keep human society and human beings on the straight path, on the path of moderation. Thereupon, they will find happiness and prosperity in this life as well as in the lfie Hereafter. (This will be further explained under the verse 2:213)

Then this man appears on the scene whose words belie his inner feelings; he starts running hither and thither to create immorality and mischief on the earth. He pretends to improve society, but in reality he destroys. He alters the words of Allāh by giving them a wrong meaning; he changes the laws ordained by Allāh; he manipulates the teachings of the religion. All this leads to depravity of character and perennial controversy in religion and society. And, in this manner, the religion is negated, humanity is eliminated and the whole world is ruined.

To appreciate how true these verses are, look at the history of Islam and see how unauthorised people took the reins of the state in their hands, how they imposed themselves on the Muslim ummah and how they corruptly conducted the affairs of religion and state. They did what they did and the losers were the religion (which got nothing but evil results), the Muslims (who are always in decline and decadence) and the ummah (which is perennially plagued with internal strife and dispute.) The religion is now a ball in the hands of anyone who wants to play with; and human values a toy to be treasured and then discarded at the whim of the child.

The result of this striving of that hypocrite is decay and deterioration on the earth; first, he corrupted religion and then destroyed humanity. That is why in some traditions and destroy the crops and progeny has been interpreted as the destruction of religion and humanity.

Qur'ān: And when it is said to him, fear Allāh, he is overcome by honour (pride) by sin; so enough for is Hell, and certainly it is an ill abode.

'Izzah (العزّة) means honour, mihād (المهاد) is the paved way, abode. Apparently, the words by sin qualify the word, the honour, and have no connection with he is overcome. The verse says that when he is told to fear Allāh, he is overcome by the apparent honour which he has earned through his sins and hypocrisy.

The real honour comes from Allāh as He says: and Thou exaltest whom Thou pleasest and abasest whom Thou pleasest (3:26); and to Allāh belongs the honour and to His Apostle and to the believer (63:8); Do they seek honour from them? Then, surely all honour belongs to Allāh (4:139). Honour is a status which Allāh attributes to Himself and declares that it is only He who bestows it on His chosen creatures. Such a thing cannot be a source of sin or evil. It naturally follows that the honour mentioned in this verse is not real honour which is given by Allāh. It is only a masquerade which deceives none except the ignorant people who mistakenly accept it as honour.

The preposition ''by'' (b ..., ب) in ''by sin'' (bi 'l-ithm , بالاثم) has no connection with the verb he is overcome; the word ''sin'' is neither the object of ''is overcome'', nor its cause. In other words, the verse does not say that his honour or pride drives him to sin and to rejection of the advice to fear Allāh, or incites him to answer back the said advisor in unbecoming language. Nor does it mean that sin drives him to pride. As mentioned above, the word by sin qualifies the word honour (or pride), and indicates the honour or pride gained by sin. Had the word honour been left unconditional, it would have meant that Allāh recognised it as real honour (which comes from Allāh). And in that case it could not be said to create, or be created by, sin or pride. That is why we say that it is conditional and means an apparent honour which is earned through sin and hypocrisy.

There is another verse where the word honour ('izzah, العزّة) has been used for the unbelievers. But there, also, the context shows that it means only an appearance of honour, not real honour. Allāh says: Nay, those who disbelieve are (steeped) in self-exaltation ('izzatin, عزّة) and opposition. How many did We destroy of the generations before them, then they cried but there was no longer any escape (38:2—3). Here the word 'izzatin (عزّة) (translated above as ''self-exaltation'') is a common noun, it does not have any definite article before it, and the next verse describes the destruction of people like them. These points clearly show that here also it is only an appearance of honour, a passing shadow which will not last long.

Qur'ān: And among the man is he who sells his self (soul) to seek the pleasure of Allāh; and Allāh is Affectionate to the servants.: This verse is in contrast to the preceding three ones. On one side there is a man priding himself in his sins, boasting and self-exalting, showing the doing of good to people, hiding his hypocrisy behind a mask of charming words; and religion and humanity cannot expect of him anything except ruin and destruction.

On the other side is a man who has sold his soul to Allāh, he wants nothing except what Allāh wishes; he desires nothing for his self; his honour and strength come only from Allāh, and he seeks nothing but the pleasure of Allāh. By his presence, religious and worldly affairs re-acquire their correct shape, the truth is revived, humanity enjoys a happy life and the good effects of Islam reach every one.

This also shows the connection of the end of the verse, and Allāh is Affectionate to the servants, with its beginning. Surely, the presence of such a man is a great mercy from Allāh to His servants. Had there not been such virtuous people to counteract the designs of those others (whose stock-in-trade is hypocrisy and mischief), the structure of religion would have fallen into ruins, and the foundation of righteousness and goodness would have been destroyed. But it is the method chosen by Allāh that He removes that wrong by this truth, and repairs the damage inflicted by His enemies with the good spread by His beloved and chosen servants. He has said: And were it not for Allāh's repelling some men with others, the earth certainly would be in a state of disorder (2:251); And had there not been Allāh's repelling some people by others, certainly would have been pulled down cloisters, and churches, and synagogues, and mosques in which Allāh's name is much remembered (22:40); therefore if these disbelievers in it, We have already entrusted it with a people who are not disbelievers in it (6:89). The decadance brought upon the religion and the world by those who love nothing but their own selves cannot be removed except through the good overflowing from those who have sold their souls to Allāh, who love nothing except Allāh and who desire nothing except that the world and the people of the world may become virtuous.

This deal has been praised by Allāh in many verses, one of which is as follows:-

Surely Allāh has bought from the believers their selves and their properties, for this that their's be the Garden; they fight in Allāh's way, so they slay and are slain; (this is) a promise which is binding on Him in the Torah and the Injīl and the Qur'ān; and who is more faithful to his covenant than Allāh? Therefore, rejoice in the trade that you have transacted; and that is the great achievement (9:111).

TRADITIONS

It is reported from as-Suddī about the verses, And among the men is he whose talk ... an evil abode, that they were revealed about Akhnas ibn Sharīq ath-Thaqafī, an ally of Banū Zuhrah. He came to the Prophet in Medina and said: ''I have come seeking Islam, and Allāh knows that surely I am truthful.'' The Prophet was pleased with that talk. The words of Allāh, and takes Allāh to witness as to what is in his heart refer to this aspect. Then he went out and passed by an agricultural field and some donkeys belonging to some Muslims. He burnt the filth and wounded and killed the donkeys. It was about that that the verse was revealed, and when he turns away (from you) he runs hither and thither on earth so that he may cause mischief therein and destroy the tillage and the stock. [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

It is narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that the three verses were revealed about the hypocrites because he shows what is opposed to what he hides in his heart. The author of al-Majma' (said that the same was also narrated from aṣ-Ṣādiq (as.). [Majma'u 'l-bayān]

The author says: But this interpretation does not fit the apparent meaning of the verse.

It is written in some traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l- bayt that these verses were revealed about their enemies.

It is narrated from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, and destroy the crop and progeny, that crop means religion, and progeny, humanity. [Majma'u 'l-bayān]

The author says: This tradition has already been explained earlier. In another tradition the crop has been interpreted as 'progeny and crop'. It is easy to see how this also may fit the earlier explanation.

ash-Shaykh has narrated in his al-Amālī a tradition from 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), about the verse: And among men is he who sells ... Affectionate to the servants, that he said: ''It was revealed about 'Alī (a.s.) when he slept (on the night of hijrah) on the bed of the Messenger of Allāh.''

The author says: There are innumerable traditions from both Shī'ah and Sunnī chains that this verse was revealed about 'Alī concerning his sacrifice on the night of hijrah. Tafsīr al-burhān gives five of those chains from ath-Tha'labī and others.

Ibn Marduwayh has narrated from Ṣuhayb that he said: ''When I intended to emigrate from Mecca to the Prophet in Medina, the Qurayshites told me, 'O Ṣuhayb! You came to us and you had no wealth. Now you want to emigrate with all this wealth of yours. By God, this can't be.' So I said to them, 'What do you think? Would you leave me if I gave you all my wealth?' They said: 'Yes!' Thereupon I gave them my wealth and they left me. I came out till I reached Medina. This incident was reported to the Prophet and he said: 'Ṣuhayb profited twice.' '' [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

The author says: He has narrated it from some other chains also, some of which add: and then the verse was revealed: And among men is he who sells his soul ...

Some other traditions say that it was revealed about Ṣuhayb and Abū Dharr because they purchased themselves by giving away their properties. But the verse does not say, ''he who purchases …'', it says, he who sells. And the interpretation of the verses does not agree with the meaning of ''purchase''.

There is a tradition from 'Alī (a.s.) that this verse refers to a man who is killed because of enjoining to do good and forbidding to do bad. [Majma'u 'l-bayān]

The author says: It is one example of the general meaning of the verse. There is no difficulty in explaining the meaning of the verse in general terms, though it was sent down on a particular occasion for a particular person.

COMMENTARY

These three verses, together with the four that follow them, guide us as how to preserve religious unity in human society: To enter into total submission, to limit oneself to the word spoken by Allāh and to that deed whose path is shown by Allāh. They declare that religious unity was never disintegrated, nor was the happiness of both worlds turned into misery with disaster visited upon the territory of a people, except when they left submission, manipulated the signs of Allāh by altering them and putting them into the wrong place. This had happened to the children of Israel and other people, and will surely happen to this ummah also. But in the end Allāh promises them His help, Surely the help of Allāh is near.

Qur'ān: O you who believe! Enter you one and all into submission wholly: slim (submission, السّلم), islām (الاسلام) and taslīm (التّسليم) all are the same. Kāffatan (كافّة) is for emphasis and means 'all', 'wholly'. As the verse is addressed to the believers, and they are ordered to enter into submission ''wholly'' the command covers the whole group as well as every individual. It is obligatory on each and every believer, as it is on the whole of Muslim society not to contravene this command and to submit all matters to Allāh and His Apostle. Hence the phrase one and all in the translation.

Again, as the hearers are already believers the submission called for means total submission to Allāh after believing in Him. Hence the word wholly in the translation. It follows that the believers must submit all their affairs to Allāh, they should not decide themselves what was good for them and what was not, they should not prepare or select any path for themselves without the guidance of Allāh and His Apostle. They must remember that no people were destroyed except that they followed their own views and desires, and talked without true knowledge; and no people forfeited the right of life and happiness except that they became disunited.

It is clear from the above that following the footsteps of Satan does not mean following him in all the falsehood which he invites to, because a believer cannot follow Satan in all satanic schemes. Rather, it means to follow him in the matters of religion. Satan furnishes some paths of untruth with the signposts of truth; in this way, he puts into religion what is not from religion. Thus, a believer is deceived into following that path without realizing his error.

One way of becoming aware of such an interpolation is to find out whether Allāh and His Apostle have ever mentioned it in their teachings of the religion.

The context and words of the verses also show what has been explained above. ‘‘Footsteps’’ are found in a trodden path. The believer is proceeding on that path; therefore, it must be the path of true religion. But Satan has put his marks thereon. So, the footsteps of Satan should refer to Satanic ways within the highway of true faith. The believer is obliged to enter into submission. Therefore, wherever he proceeds without wholly submitting himself to Allāh and His Apostle, it must be in the footsteps of Satan If he goes on to that path, he is following Satan’s footsteps.

This verse is similar to some others. For example: O men! Eat of what is in the earth lawful and good, and do not follow the footsteps of Satan; surely he is to you an open enemy. He only enjoins you evil and indecency, and that you should say against Allāh what you do not know (2:168—169); O you who believe! Do not follow the footsteps of Satan; and whoever follows the footsteps of Satan, then surely he enjoins indecency and evil. (24:21); Eat of what Allāh has given you and do not follow the footsteps of Satan, then surely he enjoins indecency and evil. (24:21); Eat of what Allāh has given you and do not follow the footsteps of Satan; surely he is your open enemy. (6:142). The difference between the verse under discussion and those quoted above is that this verse addresses the group as a whole, as it contains the word kāffatan (all, wholly, كافّة); but those other verses are general. Accordingly, this verse implies the same meaning as the verses, And hold fast by the cord of Allāh all together and be not divided. (3:103); And surely this My path is straight one, so follow it; and do not follow the (other) ways, for they will scatter you from His path. (6:153).

The verse implies that Islam guarantees that it contains all kind of laws and knowledge which are needed by the human beings for their welfare and good.

Qur'ān: But i f you slip ... Mighty, Wise: zallah (الزّلّة) means a slip, a falling. The verse says: If you did not enter one and all into submission, wholly and slipped - and the slip refers to following the footsteps of Satan — then know that Allāh is Mighty, Who is not prevailed upon in His orders, and Wise, Who decides in your affairs according to His Wisdom. Thus He shall decide about you according to His Wisdom and shall enforce it upon you and nobody will be able to hinder it.

Qur'ān: Do they await aught but that Allāh should come to them in the canopies of bright cloud and the angels: ẓulal (الظّلل) is plural of ẓullah (الظّلّة) which means ''anything used for shade'', like canopy, awring, tent.

Apparently, the word ''angels'' is in condjunction with the divine name ''Allāh''.

The preceding two verses were addressed to the believers (in the second person). This one dramatically changes it to third person and starts addressing the Apostle of Allāh; implying that those who slip up and follow the footsteps of Satan are not worthy of direct address from Allāh. It appears as though they are awaiting a decree by their following the footsteps of Satan and by their disunity and division. And that decree should be that Allāh and the angels come unto them in canopies of cloud, and the matter be decided while they are still unaware of it - or without having any pity on them and on their plight; and all matters are returned to Allāh; there is no escape from His judgement and decree.

The context shows that Do they await aught ... is the description of the threat implied in the previous sentence, then know that Allāh is Mighty, Wise.

It is self-evident truth, which is also proved by the Qur'ān and the sunnah, that attributes of the body cannot be used for Allāh, nor can He be described with adjectives of transient things. No such word, phrase or sentence can be used for Him which implies transcience, need, deficiency or want. Allāh says: Nothing whatsoever (is there) like the like of Him. (42:11); and Allāh is He Who is Self-sufficient (35:15); Allāh is the Creator of everything. (39:62) There are numerous such verses; and all of them are confirmed and decisive ones to which the ambiguous verses should be referred. It is these confirmed verses which guide us towards the correct interpretation of the ambiguous ones. If any verse apparently attributes to Allāh an action or a characteristic of transient things, then it must be referred to the confirmed verses and interpreted in a way which is not below His dignity nor opposed to His beautiful names.

Now here is a verse which attributes the action of ''coming'' to Allāh. A few other verses also have used this word for Him. And comes your Lord with the angels arrayed in ranks (89:22); then came upon them Allāh from whence they did not expect (59:2); so Allāh came upon their structure from the foundations (16:26). In all such verses, it is necessary to interpret them with such meanings which are worthy of Divine sublimity. We may give them the meaning of, let us say, sending His chastisement upon them, surrounding them with His power or wrath. Accordingly, the meaning of Allāh should come to them in this verse shall be ''Allāh should surround them with His power for enforcing His decree on them''.

Further, whenever Allāh is pleased to show that the apparent means and the intermediate causes are not independent of the order of Allāh, He discards attributing the action to such causes and means; instead He attributes it to Himself or to His order. He says in one place: Allāh takes the souls at the time of their death (39:42); while in other places He attributes this action to the angel of death or the angels; Say, the angel of death ... shall cause you to die (32:11); Until when death comes to one of you, Our messengers (i.e. angels) take him away (6:61). To make it more clear, look how He has declared about the angels that: only according to His command do they act (21:27).

Likewise, He says, Surely your Lord will judge between them (10:93), and when the order of Allāh came, judgement was given with truth (40:78).

And the same is the case with the verse under discussion (Do they await aught but that Allāh should come to them in the canopies of bright cloud and the angels) and the verse Do they await aught but that the angels should come to them or that the order of your Lord should come (16:33).

The above verse proves that the verse under discussion, Allāh should come, also means ‘‘the order of Allāh should come’’. Likewise, in every place where the action attributed to Allāh is below His power and dignity, we may safely say that the word ‘order’ or ‘command’ is implied, as the above verses have shown.

This explanation has been accepted by the majority of the commentators of the Qur’ān and it is correct. But there is even a deeper and finer meaning which can be understood if one ponders on the Qur’ān.

A characteristic which is accompanied by a deficiency, want or imperfection is not attributable to Allāh. But if that characteristic could be separated from that deficiency, want or imperfection, then there is no reason why it cannot be attributed to Allāh, provided it is suitable for His sublimity and perfection. The word ‘‘coming’’ creates in our mind a picture of a body gradually moving and shortening the distance between itself and another body till it reaches quite near to that. If we can remove the material characteristics from this meaning, there will remain the idea of ‘‘nearness’’, with the disappearance of any obstruction in between. In that case, it would be quite correct to use this word for Allāh literally, not metaphorically. Accordingly, Allāh should come to them would mean that there would remain no curtain between His creatures and His judgement about them.

Anyhow, this verse contains the threat which was implied in the preceding sentence, then know that Allāh is Mighty, Wise. This threat may be about the chastisement awaiting them in the Hereafter, as it is in the similar verse: Do they await aught but that the angels should come to them or that the order of your Lord should come (16:33), which, as its context shows, is clearly about the events of the Hereafter.

Or, it may be about something expected to happen in this world, as may be seen in the verses of sūrah Yūnus: so when their apostle came, the matter was decided with justice, and they shall not be dealt with unjustly. And they say, 'when this promise will come to pass, if you are truthful ...' Say, Do you see if His chastisement overtakes you by night or by day, what is there of it that the guilty hasten for? (10:47-50). The same is the implication of the verses, 30:30-36, and the verse, How many a town, which was unjust, We did destroy and We raised another people after it? (21:11).

The chastisement of this world is because this world is a foretaste of the life Hereafter, where every aspect of this world would appear more perfectly and completely.

And it is possible that the promised punishment would be in both worlds together.

In any case, the words, in the canopies of bright cloud would be interpreted according to the place where the promised punishment would be meted out.

Qur'ān: and the matter is decreed away; and all matters are returned to Allāh.: The matter is decreed away by Allāh, but His name is not mentioned to show His Greatness. There are many examples of such deletion in the Qur'ān.

TRADITIONS

Many traditions have been written concerning verse 2:168 (O men! Eat the lawful and good things out of what is in the earth; and do not follow the footsteps of Satan ...) which support the meaning given by us of following the footsteps of Satan.

Some traditions say that ''submission'' means the love and obedience of the Prophet and his progeny (wilāyah, الولاية). Such traditions give an example of a general meaning.

There is a . tradition from ar-Riḍā (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, Do they await aught but that Allāh should come to them in the canopies of bright cloud and the angels: He said: ''Allāh says: 'Do they wait aught but that Allāh should come to them with the angels in the canopies of bright clouds'. Like this it was revealed.'' And he said, about the word of Allāh; And comes your Lord with the angels arranged in ranks (89:22), that : ‘‘Surely, Allāh cannot be described with attributes of coming and going. Elevated is He from transferring from one place to another. Verily, it means, ‘And comes the command of your Lord with the angels arranged in ranks’.’’ [at-Tawḥīd and Ma‘ānī al-akhbār]

The author says: The words of the Imām at the beginning of the interpretation, ‘‘Allāh says’’, do not mean the actual word or recitation of the verse. The word ‘‘says’’ here stands for ‘‘means’’. The interpretation given in this tradition is the same which we have already explained, that ‘‘coming of Allāh’’ means coming of His command. The Angels do whatever they do, and come down whenever they come down, by the command of Allāh. He says about angels: Nay! They are honoured servants; they do not precede Him in speech and (only) according to His commandment do they act. (21:27), and He sends down the angels with the spirit by His commandment (16:2).

The verse begins with an interrogation which here stands for denial and disapproval. It means that ‘‘they do not await’’ or ‘‘they should not await’’. But some people have said that this denial and disapproval is comprehensive and refutes not only their awaiting but even the thing awaited. In other words, it means that they do not await aught but an impossible thing — that Allāh should come to them in the canopies of cloud as one body comes to another body, and that the angels should come with Him and He should order them and forbid them. Obviously such a thing is impossible; and the aim of the verse would be to hint that these people cannot mend their ways by these exhortations and sermons.

But this meaning does not agree with the context of the verse. It has been explained that all these verses have one context. Therefore, this verse also is about the condition of the believers. And the believers cannot be condemned in the suggested manner. Apart from that if Allāh had meant to show that the thing awaited was impossible or beneath His sublimity, He would have followed it with some words to show that it was so. And we find that it is the custom of the Qur’ān everywhere on such occasions. For example: And those who do not hope of our meeting say:‘‘Why have not angels been sent down upon us, or (why) do we not see our Lord?’’ Certainly they think too high of themselves and have revolted (in) a great revolt. (25:21); And they say: ‘‘The Beneficent (God) has taken to Himself a son!’’ Glory be to Him!

Apart from that, what would be, in this case, the significance of the words, in the canopies of bright cloud? And what would the subsequent words mean?

OTHER TRADITIONS

This last verse has variously been interpreted in the traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu'l-bayt as referring to the Day of Resurrection (al-ʻAyyāshi from al-Bāqir — a.s.) or the Day of Return (the raj'ah[1], الرّجعة) (aṣ-Ṣadūq from aṣ-Sādiq — a.s.) or the Reappearance of Imām al-Mahdī (a.s.) (al-ʻAyyāshī from al-Bāqir [a.s.] with two chains.)

And there are many such cases where a verse has been interpreted by them as referring to the Day of Resurrection in one tradition, and to the Day of Return in another, and to the Reappearance of Imām al-Mahdī (a.s.) in yet another one. It is because all these meanings are inter-related, so much so that they can be said to be basically one. As the people have not gone deep into the subject of the Resurrection and have not looked into it in the light of the Qur'ān they have gone their separate ways about these traditions. Some have discarded them altogether, even though there are probably more than five hundred traditions on its various aspects; some have interpreted them according to their own views even though the wordings of the traditions are very clear and explicit. A third group quotes these traditions and refrains from giving any opinion - these people are the most reasonable of all.

The non-Shīʻah Muslims believe that Imām al-Mahdī will appear; they have narrated mutawātir traditions about it from the Prophet, but they reject the idea of the raj'ah and say that this belief is a peculiarity of the Shīʻahs. And in these days some people, claiming to be Shīʻah, also have rejected this belief, saying that it has been foisted into Shīʻism by the Jews and some nominal Muslims like ʻAbdullāh ibn Sabā' [2]and his

[1] ar Raj'ah (return) means that after the re-appearance of Imām al-Mahdī (a:s.) and before the Day of Judgement some confirmed friends of Allāh and some of His confirmed enemies shall be returned to this world again to live under the rule of the Representative of Allāh.

[2] ʻAbdullāh ibn Sabā' is a mythical personality, who did not exist companions. One of them tried to refute this belief by intellectual argument, the gist of which is as follows:-

‘‘It is a special grace of Allāh that a living person is not given death until he reaches the perfection of the life and all his potentialities are converted into achievements. If after death he is again sent back to this world it would be retrogression, a backward step from accomplishment to potentiality, and it is impossible, except when a truthful informer tells us about it, i.e., Allāh or any of His Representatives, as He has informed us concerning the events of Mūsā, ‘Īsā, Ibrāhīm (peace be on them all) and others. But we have not been told by Him or them anything about ar-raj‘ah. And the evidence put by the believers in ar-raj‘ah is not complete.’’

After saying this he went on to claim about each and every tradition that it was weak — without knowing the difference between the correct ones and the defective ones. The poor man did not realize that this argument is not a rational one at all. Its first part refutes its second part. If some thing is impossible by nature it would remain inpossible without any exception. An ‘‘impossible’’ idea would not be turned into ‘‘possible’’ just because a truthful informer said so. Anybody who said about an impossibility that it became a possibility, would not be ‘‘truthful’’. And if he was supposed to be really truthful then that thing would not have been an impossibility in the first place. Would we say that he was truthful if he were to say that one is not a half of two, or that a truthful person was at the same time a liar?

This much about the consistency of his argument. Now, we come to his argument that (1) All people die when they reach the perfection of the life, and when their potentialities are converted into achievements; (2) What has attained achievement cannot be turned back to potentiality; (3) Therefore, a dead man cannot be returned to this life.

In this argument, the second premise is correct; the first is not. It is not ‘‘all’’ people, but only ‘‘some’’, who die after attaining perfection and converting their potentialities into achievements. A man, who completes his natural span of life and dies from old age, may be said to outside the imagination of some story-tellers. See ‘Abdullāh ibn Sabā’ wa asāṭīr ukhrā (عبد الله ابن سبا) by as-Sayyid Murtadā al-‘Askarī of Tehran.

have reached the last stage of his perfection. But what about another man who prematurely dies of an epidemic or fatal sickness, or is killed? Can it be claimed that he had already reached the last stage of his potential perfection? The answer is 'No'. Therefore, it cannot be said that it is impossible for such persons to be returned to the life of this world. Now it is obvious that his argument is neither comprehensive nor correct. We can think of many cases where it might be possible for a dead person (even if he had died after attaining his perfection) to be sent back to this world; for example, a man in his first life had a potential for a perfection which was not available at that time; he died; then by the progress of society, that perfectness became possible. What is there to prevent his return to this world to achieve that perfection for which he had a potential in the first life? Because it will not be a step back-ward - from perfection to potentiality; it will be progress from potential to perfection.

There are other examples, but this is not the place to go into the details of this subject.

As regards his argument against individual traditions, it has two serious defects: (1) These traditions are mutawātir, in their meaning, from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt — so much so that non-Shī'ite Muslims have counted the belief of ar-raj'ah, from the very early days of Islam, as one of the special beliefs of the Shī'ah and their Imāms - and a mutawātir matter cannot be refuted even if the individual traditions be really defective, or weak, or arguable. (2). There are many verses revealed on this subject and many traditions which are complete in their meaning and reliable in their chains. We shall mention them when we come to the relevant verses like: And on the day when We will gather from every people a party from among those who rejected Our signs, then they shall be formed into groups (27:83). There are other verses to prove this belief.

Apart from these specific verses, there are others which imply this meaning. For example, the words of Allāh which come shortly after the verse under discussion: Or do you think that you will enter the Garden while yet has not come upon the like of which came upon those who have passed before you (2:214). And one of the things which came upon previous nations was that some of their dead were resurrected, and lived again in this world, as the Qur'ān narrates concerning the stories of Ibrāhīm, Mūsā, 'Isā, 'Uzayr, Armia and others. And the Messenger of Allāh has said: ''By Him in Whose hand is my soul! Most certainly you shall follow the traditions of those who were before you, as in a pair of shoes the one tallies with the other, and as one flea looks like another, until you will not miss their path, nor will they miss yours; (and this means) the traditions of the Israelites.''

Moreover, these matters are among the reports of the great events of the latter days, foretold by the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt; these prophecies were preserved by reporters and narrators in books which were written and copied centuries before the events; and every day we see some of its parts fulfilled in exactly the same way without any addition or subtraction. This compels us to believe that the remaining part of those prophecies (including ar-raj'ah) must be true.

Now we come back to the topic in hand. We were discussing why a single verse is sometimes explained as referring to the Day of Resurrection and sometimes as describing ar-raj'ah or the re-appearance of Imām al-Mahdī (a.s.). It appears from the characteristics and details of the Day of Resurrection, mentioned in the Qur'ān, that it will be a day when no intermediate cause will hinder one from the signs of Allāh; there will remain no veil on the face of truth. All illusions will vanish and the signs of Allāh will appear in their perfect manifestation.

That day could exist side by side with this world, but it is obvious from the Qur'ān and sunnah that human beings, i.e., this species of homo sapiens who are descended from Adam and his wife, will become extinct in this world and only then will this great day dawn upon them.

The life of this world and the life of the Resurrection can exist side by side for different groups and species. The life of the period between death and the Day of Resurrection (barzakh, البرزخ) exists for our dead side by side with our life on this earth; neither does our life interfere with theirs, nor theirs with ours. Allāh says: By Allāh! Most certainly We sent (apostles) to nations before you, but Satan made their deeds fair seeming to them; so he is their guardian today and for them is a painful punishment (16:63).

This, therefore, is the reality of the Day of Resurrection, ''the Day on which men shall stand before the Lord of the worlds'' ''the Day when they shall come forth; nothing concerning them remains hidden from Allāh''. That is why sometimes even death is called Resurrection, because the veil of intermediate causes is lifted from the imagination of the dead person. 'Alī (a.s.) has said: ''Whoever dies his resurrection begins.'' This subject will be explained, God willing in its appropriate place.

The traditions which prove ar-raj'ah in spite of their large number, are one in their essence. They show that the world is proceeding towards a day when the signs of Allāh will appear in their perfect manifestation; man will not disobey Allāh, but shall worship Him with a sincere and pure heart, untainted by the desires of this world; and he will not be deceived by Satan. At that time some dead persons — some friends of Allāh and some of His enemies — shall be returned to the world again, and the truth will be separated from the falsehood.

It appears from above that the Day of Return shall be one of the stages of the Day of Resurrection. But it will be a lesser manifestation, because there shall remain, at that time, the possibility, to a certain extent, of evil and mischief, which will be impossible on the Day of Resurrection.

And that is the reason why in some traditions the same verses have been said to be related concerning the re-appearance of Imām al-Mahdī (a.s.). It is because at his re-appearance also the truth will be manifested perfectly, though it will be less than on the Day of ''Return''.

There are traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt that ''The days of Allāh are three: the Day of re-appearance, and the Day of Return, and the Day of Resurrection.'' Some of them say that ''The days of Allāh are three: the Day of Death, and the Day of Return, and the Day of Resurrection.''

The three days are one in their nature but different in degrees. It is because of this oneness of essence that a single verse is at different times interpreted by all three days.

The above discussion clearly shows that the Day of Return is not only possible, but a reality; and those who reject it have no reason to refute it.

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: Ask the children of Israel ... severs in requiting (evil): It reconfirms and emphasizes the threat contained in (2:209), that Allāh shall seize the sinners, in the manner of the One who is Mighty and Powerful. It says: These Israelites are within your sight and hearing. They were the people to whom Allāh gave the Book and the rule and prophethood and territory; and provided them with good things and made them excel other nations. Ask them how many a clear sign We gave them; and then see from when they started and where they went. They changed the words of Allāh from their places; they followed some selfinvented things in opposition to Allāh, His Book and His signs. And all this was done in revolt after they were given the knowledge. Then Allāh punished them with. the most severe punishment: They went astray, became disunited, disagreed among themselves; they unlawfully ate the property of their brethren; their power was gone, their happiness vanished; and humiliation and wretchedness were stamped upon them in this world, and the chastisement of the Hereafter is more humiliating and then they shall not get any help.

This is the tradition of Allāh: whoever changes the favour of Allāh and uses it wrongfully, Allāh surely chastises him and of course Allāh is severe in chastisement.

The sentence, whoever changes the favour of Allāh ... then surely Allāh is severe in requiting gives the general principle and describes the unchangeable habit of Allāh, so that the hearers may know the firm decree of Allāh in such cases.

Qur'ān: The life ... make those who believe: It explains the reason why the Israelites and the people like them went astray. The main reason is that the life of this world seems alluring to them. When materialism allures someone, it encourages him to fulfill the lust and desire of his heart and to satisfy his sensuous appetite; it makes him forget all truth and reality. The only aim of such a man remains to get whatever he can from this world status, dignity, wealth, beauty, and so forth. He makes use of everything to reach this goal — and 'everything' includes religion. Thus, he misuses religion to gain privilege and distinction. Religion becomes a means of honouring the leaders and the bosses and bestowing on them the prestige befitting their status and place in the world; it encourages the common man to seek nearness to those leaders, not to Allāh; it allows them to find ways to seek the favours of these nobles and leaders. This we see in the Muslim ummah today, just as it was seen in the Israelites before.

Those who disbelieve kufr (translated here as disbelief, الكفر) is apparently used in the Qur'ān in its literal meaning, i.e. to hide. In this general meaning it is comprehensive; it includes ''disbelief '' as well as ''hiding the truth''. The life of this world is made to seem fair not to the disbelievers only but to them also who hide any religious truth or change any religious favours. Accordingly, such a man also is hider of truth (kāfir, الكافر) who has been allured by the beauty of this life, and he also should prepare himself for the severe punishment.

Qur'ān: but those who guard (against evil) shall be above them ... without measure.: ''Those who believe'' of the preceding sentence has been changed in this sentence to those who guard themselves (against evil). It is to emphasize that mere belief (īmān, الايمان) without taqwā (guarding oneself against evil; piety, fear of Allāh, التّقوى) is of no use.

كَانَ النَّاسُ أُمَّةً وَاحِدَةً فَبَعَثَ اللهُ النَّبِيِّينَ مُبَشِّرِينَ وَمُنْذِرِينَ وَأَنْزَلَ مَعَهُمُ الْكِتَابَ بِالْحَقِّ لِيَحْكُمَ بَيْنَ النَّاسِ فِيمَا اخْتَلَفُوا فِيهِ وَمَا اخْتَلَفَ فِيهِ إِلَّا الَّذِينَ أُوتُوهُ بَغْيًا بَيْنَهُمْ فَهَدَى اللهُ الَّذِينَ آمَنُوا لِمَا اخْتَلَفُوا فِيهِ مِنَ الْحَقِّ بِإِذْنِهِ وَاللهُ يَهْدِي مَنْ يَشَاءُ إِلَى صِرَاطٍ مُسْتَقِيمٍ - ٢١٣ .

Mankind was but one people; so Allāh sent the prophets as bearers of good tidings and as warners, and He sent down with them the book with the truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed. And none differed about it but the very people who were given it, after clear signs had come to them, revolting among themselves; whereupon Allāh guided, by His will, those who believed to the truth about which they differed. And Allāh guides whom He pleases to the straight path.(213)

GENERAL COMMENT

This verse explains why religion was promulgated and mankind obliged to follow it, and why differences occurred in it.

Mankind, having been created with a natural urge to remain together and cooperate with each other, were in the beginning one single group. Then occurred differences about the acquisition of the necessities of life. These differences could only be settled by creating laws to give each one his right and to make him respect the rights of others. Allāh has ordained the law and sent it down as religion, accompanied by good tidings of reward for those who obey and a warning of punishment for the offenders. This religion was made perfect by the institution of worship. All this was accomplished by sending the prophets and the apostles.

After that, people differed again — this time about the knowledge of religion, or about matters concerning the beginning and end of mankind. Thus, religious unity was disrupted and various groups appeared on the scene, and their differences contaminated the other aspects of life.

These second differences only occurred because of the revolt of the very people who were given the book, after the fundamentals and characteristics of religion had been fully explained to them and the proof of Allāh had been completed for them.

It is clear that there were two differences: First, the difference about worldly gains, which was but natural; second, the difference about matters of religion which was based, not on nature, but on the revolt of mischief-makers. Then Allāh guided the believers to the truth about which they differed; and this guidance was done by His Will; and Allāh guides whomsoever He pleases to the straight path.

The divine religion is the only means of happiness and felicity for the human species, and it keeps life in order. It creates a balance between various human instincts and urges, and keeps them on the middle path, preventing them from going towards either extreme. Thus, there appears the best system and the highest discipline in the human life both of this world and of the Hereafter, the material as well as the spiritual.

This is an outline of the social and religious history of human beings, as given in this verse. The details may be seen in various verses throughout the Qur'ān.

HOW MANKIND CAME INTO BEING

It appears from various verses, found in various places in the Qur'ān, that mankind did not developed from any other species - neither from any animal nor from any plant. It is a species which was created by Allāh directly from the earth. There was a time when the sky existed and earth existed with the things of the earth; but there was no man. Then Allāh created a couple, male and female, of this species, and all present human beings are descended from that couple. Allāh says: O men! Surely We created you of a male and a female, and made you into tribes and families, so that you may recognise each other ... (49:13); and He says: He it is who created you from a single being and of the same (kind) did He make his mate. (7:189); again He says: as the likeness of Adam; He created him from dust ... (3:59)

The theory of scientists that one species changed into another, and that homo sapiens developed from some kind of ape or, going further back, originated from some water animal, is just a hypothesis. A hypothesis is not a definite fact; it is just a supposition made as a basis for reasoning, or as a starting point for academic investigation. There is no harm in treating it as a reality or as a possibility, because its only function is to provide a basis for scientific research, and to find out whether it can explain the causes and effects of a given matter. It has no more value than that. We discuss this subject fully under the verse (3:59), Surely the likeness of 'Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam; He created him from dust, then said to him 'Be' and he became.

HIS COMPOSITION FROM SOUL AND BODY

When Allāh created this species, He created it composed of two parts; a material substance, the body, and a non-material one, the soul or spirit. Man's body and soul remain together during his life in this world; then the body dies, the living soul departs, and thus man returns to his Creator. Allāh says: And certainly We created man of an extract of clay, then We made him sperm, in a firm resting place, then We made the sperm a clot, then We made the clot a lump of flesh, then We made (in) the lump of flesh bones, then We clothed the bones with flesh, then We did grow it into another creation, so Blessed by Allāh, the Best of the creators. Then after that you will most surely die; then surely on the Day of Resurrection you shall be raised. (23:12-16). (See at what stage Allāh says did grow it into another creation. The same meaning is found in the verse, So when I have made him complete and breathed into him of My spirit, then fall down making obedience to him (38:72). Then we come to the words of Allāh, where He describes the creation of man goes on to say: And they said: What! when we have become lost in the earth, shall we (even) then be (returned) into a new creation? Nay! They are disbelievers in the meeting of their Lord. Say: The angel of death, who is given charge of you, shall cause you to die then to your Lord you shall be brought back (32:10-11).

In this verse, Allāh first mentions the 'argument' of the unbelievers that there was no possibility of being raised to life again because all the limbs and organs of the body disintegrated and turned to dust after death. Then comes the reply that the angel of death causes them to die and fully takes hold of them; they are something different from the mere body; the bodies are lost in the earth but ‘‘they’’, i.e. their souls, are neither lost, disintegrated nor dead.

We shall explain in a proper place the teaching of the Qur’ān about the soul of man.

HIS PERCEPTION AND CONNECTION WITH OTHER THINGS

Allāh made man and gave him perception, and created in him hearing, sight and the heart (wisdom). He has been given the quality of mind which is known as intelligence and thinking power. By those faculties, he looks at the present, finds out about the past and surmises about the future; he has a sort of comprehensive knowledge of the things around him. Allāh says: (Allāh) taught man what he know not (96:5); And Allāh brought you forth from the wombs of your mothers, you did not know anything, and He gave you hearing and sight and the hearts (wisdom) so that you may give thanks (16:78); And He taught Adam all the names ... (2:31).

Allāh has given him such faculties so that he can establish a relation and connection with all things and can derive benefit from all of them; he can establish that connection either directly or through instruments and machines, the aim all the time being to use them to his own advantage. Look at the innumerable discoveries and inventions, and you will know how Allāh has made everything subservient to man. For example, He says: He it is Who created for you all that is in the earth (2:29); And He has made subservient to you whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is in the earth, all, from Himself (45:13).

HIS PRACTICAL KNOWLEDGE

The two faculties — intelligence and the ability to exploit other things — produced a third wonderful faculty: to find out new avenues of knowledge and perception, so as to use them in his exploitation of other things to his advantage.

Suppose you were looking at this species of homo sapiens for the first time. You would be overwhelmingly astonished to see how each member of this species used an unlimited amount of knowledge and ideas to make his life comfortable. That knowledge and those ideas were acquired, analysed, compared and developed either through the five senses, which provided knowledge of the external world, or through the five faculties of the mind, or through the power of thought, using and re-using the knowledge acquired by those senses.

Then if you were to look at that knowledge and perception, you would find that they could easily be divided into two groups. First, that knowledge which had no direct bearing on man's own actions. For example, the perceiving of the earth, the sky, men, horses, etc. or that four was an even number, or that water was a liquid. Such percepts are acquired by man's reaction to the world outside his own being. To acquire those percepts, man does not have to have any intention or action on his own part; they are just information of the outside world for which he is not obliged to do anything.

The second group is opposite to the first one. You will hear him saying: This is good; that is bad; this should be done; that must be avoided; justice is good; injustice is evil. Then, also, you might find him thinking about the ideas of ruling and subjection; of mastership and slavery. Such thoughts and percepts have a direct bearing on his actions and activities. All his intentional actions depend on those percepts and knowledge. And, unlike the first group, these percepts do not originate outside his being; they are formed in his mind either involuntarily, by his instinct, or voluntarily, through his own thinking, or feeling. For example, he has a system for digestion and nourishment and another for reproduction. These systems are governed by some inner motivating forces which make him desire what helps in these functions and dislike what hinders him in pursuit of those pleasures. This inner reaction creates in him such emotions and feelings as love, hate, inclination and desire.

These emotions and feelings compel him to think about what is good and what bad, what desirable and what undesirable, what compulsory and what permissible, etc.

Then taking such ideas as a base, he decides his course of action and uses the things around him accordingly.

It is clear from the above that those ideas, morals or ethics (whatever you call them) have no value unless and until they are acted upon. As mere ideas they are worthless. Therefore, we may call them practical knowledge.

As mentioned above, Allāh inspired man with these morals to prepare him for action and make him ready to exploit the hidden forces of the world: ‘‘in order that Allāh might bring about a matter which was to be done.’’ Allāh says: Our Lord is He who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (to its goal.) (20:50); Glorify the name of your Lord, the Most High, Who created, then made complete, and Who made (things) according to a measure, then guided (them to their goal.) (87:1—3) The guidance, mentioned in these verses, is the general guidance bestowed on every creature, sentient as well as insentient, to lead it to the perfection of its being, and to encourage it to act for its own protection and maintenance.

Allāh says, especially about the man: And (I swear by) the soul as it is made perfect, and He inspired unto it (about) its vices and its piety. (91:7—8) It shows that man knows about vice and virtue through a divine inspiration which is implanted in his nature. These two percepts — ‘should do’ and ‘should not do’ — have no existence outside his mind; and perhaps that is why Allāh used the pronoun ‘‘Its’’ (i.e. soul’s) about vices and piety.

Also, Allāh says: And this life of the world is nothing but a vain sport and play; and surely the abode of the Hereafter is certainly the life, if they but know (29:64). Sport or play is in the attitude of the mind only. If the same action were done as a responsibility or as a job, it would loose its charm. Likewise, the aspect of this life — prestige, riches, progress, backwardness, mastership, servitude — are only in the mind of man. These aspects do not exist outside the mind. For example, we say, ‘a man who is president’ or ‘a cloth which is possessed’. Now, ‘a man’ and ‘a cloth’ are the things which exist outside the mind of the speaker; but that man’s ‘presidency’ and that cloth’s being ‘possessed’ are not so. These aspects are in the mind only.

HIS EXPLOITATION OF OTHER THINGS

To make a long story short, one of these ideas is the belief that men must take all necessary steps to preserve his own life; and because of this belief he makes use of all the materials available to him. He exploits matter to fulfil his needs — the knife to cut, the needle to sew, pots to keep water, ladders to climb and innumerable such tools and machines for their benefit.

Likewise, he uses plants and vegetables for food, clothing, housing, etc. And subjugates animals to support his own existence; and takes advantage of their meat, blood, hide; hair, wool, tusks, horns, excrement, milk, bones and other such things. He benefits not only from the parts of their bodies, but also from their actions, as he rides a horse or uses the oxen for pulling carts and ploughs.

Man's exploitation does not end here. He goes further and exploits his own kind, subjugating other human beings, or taking advantage of them in other manners, as much as he can.

MAN IS SOCIAL BY NATURE

But man found, to his chagrin, that other men in their turn wanted to subjugate him in the same way as he was thinking about them. The result was a mutual understanding that they would take advantage of him as much as he benefited from them. This ''give-and-take'' prompted men to live in society and to cooperate with each other in their affairs. It necessitated the safeguarding of the rights of every member of that society to keep a balance between their rights and their duties. This is called social justice.

Society and social justice were founded on the unavoidable compulsion of the above-mentioned situation. Had it not been for that compulsion, man would not have agreed to it at all. This is the reality behind the claim that man is social by nature and that he follows the dictates of social justice! The fact is that this sociability and social justice came into being under the compulsion of the mutual tendency to exploit each other.

That is why whenever a man acquires power over his fellows, the dictates of social justice are forgotten ; and the mighty one ignores the rights of weaker ones. It is as much true in the case of individuals as in that of nations and states; and this has been going on from the early history of mankind until the present, which is called the age of civilisation and freedom!

This has been hinted in the verses: Surely he (i.e. man) is unjust, ignorant (33:72); Surely man is created avaricious (70:19); Surely man is very unjust, very ungrateful (14:34); Nay! Verily man is wont to rebel as he sees himself free from want (96:6-7).

Had social justice been the primary urge of his nature, most of society would have been overwhelmingly just and equitable. But what we see is always opposite to that. Always the demonstration of 'might is right' comes in front of our eyes; powerful ones coerce weaker ones into subjugation; victors humiliate the vanquished, and exploit them for their own advantage.

DIFFERENCE AMONG HUMAN BEINGS

So, there is the natural instinct to take advantage of others. Then there are the necessary differences among individuals in bodily physique, in habitat, habits, character and things like that, which in their turn create a difference in strength; some become stronger, others weaker. At this stage, the stronger men start ignoring the dictates of social justice and they no longer pay attention to the common weal of the society. The mighty one exploits the weaker one and gives him little in exchange; the victor takes advantage of the vanquished without giving him any benefit in return. The weak person makes it up by deception and trickery, always waiting for a chance to get the upper hand. And as soon as he gets a chance he avenges himself with a most severe reprisal.

Thus the difference leads to chaos, disorder and disturbance. Humanity comes near to extinction, and happiness and felicity depart from society.

It is this aspect to which the verse under discussion as well as some other verses refer: And men were naught but a single people then they differed (10:19); and they shall continue to differ except those on whom your Lord has mercy (11:118-119).

This disunity and difference was bound to occur in society. As has already been mentioned, men were different in the build of their bodies and the bent of the r minds. Of course, they were all human beings, and to a certain extent their activities and thinking were similar. But at the same time, their feelings, character and condition were different from each other. That resulted in a difference in their ambitions, sins and goals of life, which in its turn motivated them to different types of actions, and finally led to the disruption of the social system.

That disruption and disturbance made it necessary to legislate such comprehensive and fundamental laws as could remove that disturbance, difference and disagreement by, giving each one his due right. Also, it was essential to make people obey those laws.

Nowadays, societies use one of two methods to enforce the law:-

1) Compelling the people to obey laws (which are legislated to make all people share in the means of livelihood and to give everyone what could take him to the perfection of his life) and discarding religious tenets like belief in God and higher moral values. Faith in God is completely eradicated, and morality is made to follow the trends of society. Whatever is liked by a sizeable section of the community is accepted as virtue. One day chastity is held in high regard, the next day it is ridiculed and debauchery becomes the norm of the time. One day, truth is respected, the next day falsity is glorified. One day trustworthiness, the next day embezzlement and so on.

2) Making people obey laws by character-building and by training them to respect the laws — but after removing religion and religious teachings from the training programs.

The first method uses the sheer force of the rulers, the second, combines force with moral teaching. Apart from the rot that sets into society as a result, both methods are based on ignorance and negate the reality of human existence. Man is created by Allāh; his existence depends on his Master; he came from Allāh and to Him he will return. On his departure from this world, his life will continue in the next world forever and ever without disruption. But the quality of the next life will depend upon this life — how he behaved here, how he maintained his relation with his Creator and which characteristics he developed and which qualities he acquired. If a man builds his life here on the foundation of the rejection of the divinity, he will surely destroy his ‘‘self’’ and ruin his next life.

Let us take the example of a caravan. The company of travellers start for a far away place with sufficient provision for the journey. They camp in a caravanserai for a while, no sooner are they lodged for the night then they start quarrelling among themselves. They do not stop at any misdeed; they fight with each other, murder and defame one another, plunder belongings and commit many other atrocities. Then, appalled by the carnage, they sit together to find a way to save their lives and property. Someone says: ‘‘Let us jointly use, and benefit from, all these provisions, and allow every individual a right to enjoy them according to his service to the group. We have nowhere to go from this place. Anyone opposing this scheme will be severely punished.’’ Another person says: ‘‘Let us make a law to remove this difference; each of us shall concentrate on building his character; we must behave with kindness towards our companions, we should not deviate from the path of love, gallantry and nobility. Therefore, we should jointly enjoy the provisions which we have. After all, the provisions are for our own use in this very place.’’

There is no need to point out that both advisers are mistaken. They forget that the whole caravan is still on its way; and that the traveller, in all conditions and at all times, should remember his final destination and manage the affairs of his journey with only one goal in view: ‘‘What is the best way of his reaching home?’’ If he forgets this fundamental truth, there will be nothing left for him but becoming lost in the wilderness, and disaster and death.

A sensible adviser would have advised them with these words: ‘‘Use these provisions according to what you need of tonight; save the rest for other stopping places on the way; because your final destination is still very far and you must think to save some of the provisions for use after reaching home.’’

RELIGION REMOVES THE DIFFERENCE

This is why Allāh created laws, basing them on the belief of the oneness of Allāh, on true faith, on fine character and good deeds. In other words, these laws were made to teach people the reality of life, from the beginning upto its final destination; to make them realise that this life should be spent keeping the next life in view, and that this short life is but a preparation for the next one which will last forever and ever.

It is clear that it is only divine law which is based on knowledge. No other law was ever built on that foundation. Allāh says: Judgement is not but Allāh’s; He has commanded that you worship not but Him; this is the right religion, but most people do not know. (12:40) And He says in the verse under discussion: so Allāh sent the prophets as bearers of good tidings and as warners and He sent down with them the book with the truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed. Here the sending of the prophets to bring good tiding and to warn has been joined with sending down the book which contains the laws and rules, so as to remove their differences.

Another verse says: And they say: ''There is nothing but our life in this world; we die and live and destroys us not but time ''; and they have no knowledge of that, they only conjecture. (45:24) This insistence of theirs was not only to refute belief in the hereafter; its real motive was to wriggle out from the responsibilities which result from that belief. Reason says that, if you believe in the life hereafter, you must make this life subservient to that one; you must worship the Creator and obey the laws ordained by Him which will guide you in all the spheres of life: worship, social dealings, and the penal law. In short, belief in the hereafter makes it obligatory to follow the dictates of religion, to always keep the improvement of the next life in view. That was the reason why the unbelievers rejected that belief and based their social norms on the assumption that there was nothing beyond life in this world.

Again Allāh says: they do not follow anything but conjecture, and surely conjecture does not avail against the truth at all. Therefore, turn aside from him who turns his back upon Our reminder and does not desire anything but the life of this world. That is the (last) reach of their knowledge ... (53:28—30) In this verse Allāh makes it clear that they base their lives on conjecture and ignorance, while Allāh invites them to the Abode of Peace and His religion is based on truth and knowledges, and which the Prophet calls them towards what gives them life. Allāh says: O you who believe! Answer (the call of) Allāh and the Apostle when he calls you to that which gives you life ... (8:24). Life which is mentioned in this verse has been explained in the following verses:-

> Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like unto him whose similitude is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth? (6:122)
> Is then he who knows that what has been sent down to you from your Lord is the truth, like unto him who is blind? Only those possessed of understanding shall bear in mind. (13:19)

Say, this is my way. I invite (you) unto Allāh; with clear sight (are) I and and he who follows me; and glory be to Allāh, and I am not of polytheists. (12:108)

Say, are those who know and those who do not know alike? Only those possessed of understanding shall bear in mind. (39:9)

... an Apostle from among themselves who shall recite to them Thy communications and teach them the Book and the wisdom, and purify them ... (2:129)

There are many verses like these in the Qur'ān extolling the virtues of understanding, calling people to acquire knowledge and follow the path of wisdom. It attaches so much importance to knowledge that it has named the pre-Islamic days ''the period of Ignorance''.

With this background, you will realise how unjust is the claim that religion is based on blind faith and ignorance, and is opposed to knowledge and learning.

This allegation was laid by some scientists. They spent their time in the natural and social sciences and they did not find in these physical sciences anything which could prove anything metaphysical. And they thought that the ''non-existence of a proof'' is a ''proof of non-existence''. It is obvious that they were mistaken in that conjecture. Going further, they looked at some myths which some entrenched interests had imposed on the masses in their countries, claiming that it was religion, and which in fact was nothing but polytheism — and Allāh and His Apostle repudiate the polytheists. Then they heard the preaching of priests exhorting the public to accept, without any questioning, the dogma and tenets of that mythical religion.

All these factors led them to declare that religion was against knowledge. But the true religion is too great to encourage ignorance or blind faith, or to exhort to act without understanding. The true religion never uttered a word without proper guidance or without an illuminating book. And who is more unjust than the one who forges a lie against Allāh or gives the lie to the truth when it has come to him? (29:68)

DIFFERENCE IN RELIGION ITSELF

Allāh informs us in this verse that differences and disunity in the affairs of society and worldly life were removed for the first time by religion. If there are any laws which are apparently non-religious, they too are based on that first religious teaching.

Then Allāh informs us that later on there occurred differences in the religion itself. These differences were created by the followers of the religion, who were given the clear book and who possessed knowledge of it. It happened because of their revolt, injustice and rebellion. Allāh says: He has prescribed for you the religion which He enjoined upon Nūḥ, and that which We have revealed to you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and Īsā, to establish the religion and be not divided there in ... And they did not become divided until after the knowledge had come to them, out of rivalry among themselves; and had not a word gone forth from your Lord till an appointed time, certainly the affair would have been decided between them ... (42:13-14).

Also He says: And mankind was not but a single people, then they differed and had not a word already gone forth from your Lord, the matter would certainly have been decided between them in respect of that Concerning which they disagree. (10:19)

The word which had gone forth was the promise given to Adam: and for you there is in earth an abode and a provision for a (fixed) time. (7:24)

This difference among the followers of religion was based on rebellion and revolt, not on any dictate of nature. The divine religion is based on nature and normally people cannot go astray in a natural thing. Nor can the demand of nature change. Allāh says: Then set your face upright for religion, in natural devotion (to the truth) - the nature made by Allāh in which He has made men; there is no change in the creation of Allāh; that is the right (established) religion ... (30:30)

This in short is the foundation upon which this verse is based.

MAN AFTER THIS WORLD

Then Allāh informs us that man shall soon depart from this world and his intermediate station will be a place called barzakh (barrier, البرزخ), and the final destination is a place called the Hereafter.

His life, after this life, is an individualistic one; there will be no social cooperation, mutual help or partnership. Man shall leave this physical world behind, returning to his Lord and Creator. There shall be no room there for that knowledge which we named earlier 'practical knowledge'. There will be no exploitation or taking advantage of others; no civilisation, social ''give-and-take'', nor any other of the paraphernalia connected with the life of this world. His only companion will be his deeds which he did in this world; he will see the good or bad results of his actions. Reality will become clear to him, and he will clearly know the Great News about which they had differed.

Allāh says:

And We will inherit of him what he says and he shall come to Us alone (19:80)

And certainly you have come to Us alone as We created you at first, and you have left behind your backs the things which We gave you; and We do not see with you your intercessors about whom you asserted that they were (Allāh's) associates in respect to you; certainly the ties between you are now cut off and what you asserted is gone from you (6:94)

There shall every soul become acquainted with what it sent before and they shall be brought back to Allāh, their true Master and what they did fabricate shall escape from them. (10:30)

What is the matter with you that you do not help each other? Nay! On this day they are submissive. (37:25—26)

On the day when the earth shall be changed into a different earth, and the heavens (as well); and they shall come forth before Allāh, the One, the Subduer. (14:48)

And that there is not for man (aught) except what he strives for; and that his striving shall soon be seen; then shall he be recompensed for the fullest recompense. (53:39-41)

These and many such verses clearly show that man's system of life shall change after death. There shall be no cooperation and no striving. There he shall see the result of his striving and the fruits of his actions. All his striving shall appear before him in its true colour and he shall be recompensed for it with the fullest measure.

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: Mankind was but one people :nās (النّاس) translated here as 'mankind', literally means 'men'. Ummah (الامّة) translated here as 'people', means 'a group of men'. Sometimes it is used for only one man, as in the verses: Surely Ibrahim was a (ummatan, امّة) people, (devoutly) obedient to Allāh (16:120); sometimes for a long period, as in the verse: and remembered after an (ummatin, امّة) a long time (12:45) and in the verse: And if We hold back from them the punishment until (ummatin ma'dūdatin, امّة معدودة) stated period of time (11:8). A fourthusage is for religion, as in the verse: And surely this (ummatukum ummatan wāḥidah, امّتكم امّة واحدة) your religion is one religion and I am your Lord, therefore, fear Me (23:52) and, Surely this your religion is one 'religion' and I am your Lord, therefore worship Me. (21:92) In both these verses, according to some commentators, the word ummah (الامّة) has been used for 'religion'.

The word ummah (الامّة) is derived from amma (he had an aim, امّ); thus it is used for a company of people — not every company, but that which has a single aim, a single goal and a single ambition, and that unity of aim unites all the members, and makes them one people. That is why it is correct to use it for one man as well as for many; the other usages mentioned above are based on that basic meaning.

Anyhow, the sentence obviously refers to the beginning of humanity, when they were united, and lived a simple life and had simple thoughts. There were no differences or any tug-of-war in matters of life or livelihood, nor was there any disagreement about religion or religious matters.

That at that time there was no difference about matters of life is evident from the next sentence, so Allāh sent the prophets ... so that it (the book) might judge between the people in that in which they had differed, as it shows that the prophets were sent and the book was revealed to remove differences, because earlier they were one people. Thus the difference in matters of life occurred after the unity. And the proof that at that time there was no difference about matters of religion is seen in the following sentences, And none differed about it but the very people who were given it ... revolting among themselves, as it shows that the disagreement about religion was started by those who were given the book, which obviously means that it started after the book was revealed.

Experience also supports this. Mankind is continuously climbing the heights of knowledge and thought and ever progressing along the path of learning and culture, year after year, and generation after generation. Thus civilisation goes forward day by day, new ways are found to fulfil even the slightest needs, natural and physical obstacles are removed and ever newer instruments are invented to make life more and more comfortable.

On the other hand, if we retrace our steps, going back towards the early days of humanity, every step will take us to people less and less acquainted with the secrets of life and the mysteries of nature, till we reach early man who knew almost nothing of the possibilities of life except those facts that were self-evident, and who used only a little imagination to gather his means of livelihood by the simplest methods. His food consisted of plants and meat which he obtained by hunting; he lived in caves, and defended himself with sticks and stones.

It is clear that a people who lived such a primitive life would not become entangled in any considerable disagreement; nor could there occur among them any lasting differences. They were in a way like a flock of sheep, everyone following the others, all remaining together for the purposes of food and abode.

This was in the very beginning. But, as we have described earlier, man had the natural urge to take advantage of others. And although the need to cooperate with each other in gathering the necessities of life compelled people to remain together, it did not prevent them from quarrelling with, and getting better of, each other. And every day man acquired new skills, and every new experience added to his store of knowledge. Whenever he used a newly-acquired expertise, it opened new avenues of progress and dexterity for him. Also, because of the dictates of nature, some individuals were stronger while others were weaker. Those who were stronger in body or mind tried to reduce others to virtual subjugation, taking more from them than they gave them in return. That was the beginning of the differences, which was only natural as it was based on the natural urge to take advantage of others, although it had been the same urge which had led to the creation of society.

It may seem strange that the same natural urge compelled men to remain together, on one hand, and led them to quarrel and find differences, on the other. But there is nothing objectionable in the conflict between two natural demands, provided there is a third faculty above them to judge and decide, and to create a balance between them. For example, there is hunger which urges man to fill his stomach with whatever he can, even when the digestive system cannot tolerate it. There is a conflict between hunger and the power of digestion, but always there is the mind and reason to judge and decide between these two demands. It gives to each power only that which does not hinder the activities of the other.

The conflict between the two natural urges of marshalling others to one's service and cooperating with others as a single society is of the same category, because, Allāh decreed to remove that conflict by sending the prophets and revealing to them the book to decide and judge in the matters of their differences and contentions.

This is the correct interpretation of this verse. Unfortunately, some commentators have interpreted it in various other ways, but none of those interpretations conform to the meaning of the verse.

One of them has said: The verse says that all men were on the right path, because the differences began only when the book was sent down to them, and the followers of the book differed, revolting among themselves.

This man did not realize that the verse describes two conflicts, not one; and we have already explained this. Also he did not pause to think that if all men were already on the right path and there was no difference, then what was the justification of sending the prophets and revealing the book and thus giving them an opportunity to differ among themselves by revolt, and thus creating chaos in the world, sowing the seed of unbelief and sin, debauchery and immorality?

Another one has said: Mankind was one group in the meaning that all had gone astray. Otherwise, Allāh would not have said, so Allāh sent the prophets ...

This man did not ponder upon the verse with a clear mind. This going astray, to which he referred in this interpretation, has been indicated by Allāh in His words, whereupon Allāh guided ... those who believed to the truth about which they differed. It means that this difference and going astray had started because of the bad motives of the followers of the book and the scholars of religion after the book was revealed and its signs were clarified for people. If people had already gone astray, if they had already been treading the path of disbelief, hypocrisy, sin and immorality, before the coming of the prophets and the book, how could it be attributed to the followers of the book and the scholars of religion?

A third interpretation: Mankind (nās, النّاس) in this verse refers to the Israelites only. Allāh says somewhere else about them: but they did not differ until after knowledge had come to them, revolting among themselves. (45:17) As the same words have been used in the verse under discussion, it means that the people referred to are the same.

But it is proof which has no validity at all. If in one verse, a virtue or vice is attributed to a certain nation, it does not mean that that characteristic is confined to that nation or is its special characteristic.

Even more worthless is the fourth interpretation: Mankind means Adam; and the verse says that Adam (a.s.) was one group on the right path; then his descendants differed among themselves, so Allāh sent the prophets ...

But the context of the whole verse disagrees with such a meaning. It is not possible to accept even a part of this interpretation, let along the whole.

A fifth interpreter said: ‘‘Was’’ (kāna, كان) in this sentence should not be taken as a past tense; rather it stands for ‘‘is’’ and shows a continuously existing reality, as in the words of Allāh: and Allāh is (kāna, كان) Mighty, Wise (48:19). In short, it means that mankind is by nature one group, because people are dictated by nature to remain together, and as cooperation and sociability is their natural urge, they have to live together in a society. But this togetherness breeds difference and conflicts. Therefore, Allāh sent the prophets and revealed the book to judge about that difference.

There are three defects in this interpretation:-

First: It supposes that sociability and cooperation is the primary natural urge. But it has been explained that it is not so. The primary urge is to take advantage of others and use them for one’s own benefit. It is only when a man finds out that others have the same design about him that he comes to a compromise with them, and this ‘‘give-and-take’’ results in cooperation. So this cooperation is based on compromise, not on any natural urge. The Qur’ān also goes against that supposition, as has been explained earlier.

Second: The mere fact that man is ‘‘social by nature’’, does not justify sending the prophets and revealing the book, unless it is mentioned that this ‘‘natural sociability’’ leads to conflict and disturbance. In other words, this interpretation makes it necessary to read this verse in this way: ‘‘Mankind is but one people (but that oneness breeds conflict) so Allāh sent the prophets :..’’. But the said interpreter does not accept that ‘conflict’ is implied in this sentence.

Third: This interpretation mentions only one conflict. But the verse clearly shows two conflicts — first, before the revelation of the book, when the differences were common to all people(so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed); and, second, after its revelation, which was confined to the religious scholars, and not common to all people (And none differed about it - i.e. about the book - but the very people who were given it ... revolting among themselves.) Thus there were two differences, one was after receiving the knowledge and based on revolt, the other was not so.

Qur’ān: so Allāh sent the prophets as bearers of good tidings and as warners :

Ba‘th (البعث) literally means to revive, to awaken, to bring back to life. Its past tense, ba‘atha (بعث) has been translated here as `sent down', only to make the meaning clear; otherwise, ‘sent down’ is the translation of arsala (ارسل), not of ba‘atha (بعث).

Why did Allāh use here the word ba‘atha (awakened, revived, بعث) here and not arsala (sent down, ارسل) ? The early period of mankind, which is being discussed in this sentence, was a period of quietness and inactivity. And it was more relevant to say that they were awakened and revived than that someone was sent to them.

Perhaps that is also the reason why those representatives of Allāh are here referred to as prophets (nabiyyīn, النبيّين) and not apostles (mursalīn, المرسلين). It has been described in the first volume that the purpose of raising the prophets and revealing the books was to explain the truth to people, and .to teach them the realities of their existence, making them aware of the fact that they have been created by their Lord, Allāh Who has no colleague or partner in His divinity or power; and that they are to return to Him and then shall be resurrected and brought back to life on a great day; that presently they have halted in a mid way station which has no more reality than a sport or play. Having realised this basic fact, they must keep it before their eyes in all situation and all their actions, always bearing in mind where they have come from, where they are, and what is their destination. This waking up to the realities of life is more appropriately described by the word nabiyyīn (prophets, النبيّين) because nabī (النّبى) means ‘‘one who has the news (nabā’, النّبأ)’’.

Allāh sent the prophets: The authority and responsibility for sending the prophets is on Allāh alone. It is only He Who sends them. It proves their sinlessness in receiving the revelation and explaining it to the people. (This topic is described in detail at the end f this commentary).

The prophets were sent as bearers of good tidings and as warners. They brought the good news of the mercy of Allāh, and His pleasure and paradise for those who believe in Him and guard themselves against evil. And they gave the warning of the chastisement from Allāh, and His displeasure and Fire, to those who reject the truth and commit sins. The two aspects of prophethood — good tidings and warnings — are the most effective ways of keeping an average person on right path and making the prophetic mission a success, although some righteous servants of Allāh do good and desist from evil only for the sake of their Lord without thinking about any reward or punishment.

Qur’ān: and He sent down with them the book with the truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed: kitāb (الكتاب) is on the paradigm of fi‘āl (فعال) and means ‘the written’. The word generally refers to anything written by pen. But as the covenants and decrees are confirmed through writing, it is not infrequently used for compulsory and obligatory commands, and for every confirmed fact or idea which is irrefutable. And it has been used in this meaning in numerous verses of the Qur’ān. The Qur’ān itself is called the book (kitāb, الكتاب) with this very meaning; otherwise, it is the talk of Allāh. It is said in the Qur’ān: (It is) a ‘‘book’’ which We revealed to you, abounding in blessings ... (38:29); Surely, prayer is (compulsory) on the believers (kitāban mawaqūtā, كتبا موقوتا) a timedordinance. (4:103).

The words, in that in which they had differed show that the meaning is, ‘‘Mankind was but one people, then they differed, so

Allāh sent the prophets ...''

The definite article ''the'' (al, ال) in 'the book' (al-kitāb ,الكتاب) indicates either the genus of book (and, accordingly refer to all divine books revealed to the prophets) or a known (andimplied) book. In later case, it would refer to the book of Nūḥ(a.s.), because Allāh says in the Qur'ān : He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and .that which We have revealed unto you and that which We enjoined upon Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and 'Īsā ... (42:13). This verse describes the grace and favour of Allāh by saying that the sharī'ah (Law) sent down to the Muslims combines in itself what was given piecemeal to the previous prophets and over and above it contains many new features revealed to the prophet of Islam. It means that the Law was given only to those great prophets who are named here: N ū ḥ , Ibrāhīm, Mūsā, 'Īsā and Muḥammad (peace be on them all).

Now, the verse under discussion (He sent down with them the book ...) clearly says that the sharī'ah was given in written form. Look at these two verses together and you will see that:-

First: Nūḥ (a.s.) was given a book containing the Law, and that book is surely referred to in this verse, He sent down with them the book either alone (if ''the'' is for a known and implied book) or with other divine books (if ''the'' denotes the genus of the book).

Second: The book of Nūḥ was the first divine book containing the sharī'ah. Had there been any other such book before him it would have contained a Law to judge between the people, and Allāh would have mentioned that sharī'ah in verse (42:13).

Third: The period referred to in the sentence, Mankind was but one people was the era before the mission of Nūḥ (a.s.) and his book decided and judged between the people in their differences.

Qur'ān: And none differed about it but the very people who were given it, after clear signs had come to them, revolting among themselves:

It has been explained that it refers to the difference about the matters of religion among the followers of the religion. As the religion is based on the nature of man as created by Allāh (Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion — the nature made by Allāh in which He had made men — 30:30), Allāh attributed these differences to the revolt of the followers and the scholars of the religion.

The words but the very people who were given it indicate the origin of the religious differences about the meaning of the book. It does not say that every one who goes astray or follows a false religion is a rebel, although it is true that he has lost his way. Allāh would not accept the excuses of a rebel; but He might accept the entreaties of those who were confused and could not find the right path. Allāh says: The way (to blame) is only against those who do injustice to the people and revolt in the earth unjustly ... (42:42); And others have confessed evil (one); may be Allāh will turn to them (in mercy); surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful ... And others are made to wait Allāh's command — whether He will chastise them or whether He will turn (in mercy), to them; And Allāh is All-knowing, All-wise (9:102—106); Except the weakened ones from among the men and the women and the children who have not in their power the means nor do they find a way; so these, it may be, Allāh will pardon them, and Allāh is the Clement, Oft forgiving (4:98—99)

Moreover, nature may go hand in hand with forgetfulness or doubt, but it cannot with revolt and intentional transgression. That is why the verse uses the words of revolt especially for those who knew the book and for whom the signs were made clear. Allāh says: And (as to) those who disbelieve in and reject My signs, they are the inmates of the Fire, in it they shall abide. (2 39) There are numerous verses of this meaning in the Qur'ān; and in all of them the disbelief has been made conditional on the rejection of the signs of Allāh and then it is followed by the threat of punishment.

In short, this sentence shows that the second differences began because of the rebellion of the scholars of the book, after they were given knowledge of it.

Qur'ān: whereupon Allāh guided, by His will, those who believed to the truth about which they differed. And Allāh guides whom He pleases to the straight path.

the truth about which they differed explains the subjects of the differences and that it was the truth with which the book was sent down (''the book with the truth'').

At this juncture, Allāh guided the believers to the truth in both differences: differences in affairs of this life, and differences in the matters of religion. The guidance of the believers was by His will, because they could not make it binding upon Allāh to guide them, for the simple reason that there is none to impose upon Him. It is only He Himself who takes upon Himself whatever He pleases. Therefore, the guidance was by His will; if He were not pleased, He would not have willed and would not have guided.

Accordingly, the sentence, And Allāh guides whom He pleases to the straight path gives the reason of ''by His will''. He guided them because it is His discretion to guide whom He pleases, nobody can impose upon Him to guide this or to guide that. And He surely willed to guide the believers to the straight path.

Looking at the verses as a whole, we come to know the following:-

First: The definition of religion: Religion is a way of life which contains the good of this world in a manner that ensures perfection of the next life - the life that is the real and eternal one near to Allāh.

It means that the sharī'ah must contain the necessary laws for this worldly life and one's livelihood.

Second: Originally religion was promulgated to remove natural differences; then it was perfected to remove both types of differences; then it was perfected to remove both types of difference — the natural ones and the un-natural ones emanating from the rebellion of religious scholars.

Third: Religion goes on perfecting itself until its laws cover all the possible needs and eventualities of life. When it reaches that stage of perfection it is finalised and no other religion comes after it. Conversely, if a religion is the final one, it must be comprehensive enough to cover all eventualities and fulfil all the needs of life. Allāh said: Muḥammad is not the father of any of your men, but he is the Messenger of Allāh and the Last of the prophets… (33:40); and We revealed unto you the book, explaining clearly everything … (16:89*); and most surely it is a mighty book; falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor f r o m behind it …* (41:41-42).

Fourth: Every succeeding sharī'ah was more perfect than the preceding one.

Fifth: Why were the prophets sent and the books revealed? In other words, what was the reason for the prophetic mission? Man, by his nature, develops towards differences in matters of life, as much as he progresses towards social cooperation. As it is nature itself which leads to differences, it is not capable of removing them. How can it repel a thing when it is forcefully pulling it towards itself? Therefore, Allāh took it upon Himself to remove that conflict; and He sent the prophets with the laws to lead men to their perfection — real perfection which is a part of their creation. Allāh says: Our Lord is He Who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (to its goal.) (20:50) It shows that Allāh completes the creation of everything and guides it to its perfection. The creation of man is completed when he is guided to his perfection in both lives. Also He says: All do We aid — these as well as those — out of the bounty of your Lord; and the bounty of your Lord is not confined. (17:20) It means that Allāh aids out of His bounty everyone who is in need of His aid in his life and existence; He gives him what he deserves. His bounty is neither confined nor limited, so far as Allāh is concerned. If there is any limitation, it is from man's side, not from his Creator's.

Obviously, man cannot perfect himself, because it is his own nature which is the case of this defect. As it is nature which leads to the conflict, and as that nature is unable to mend what it has damaged, the reform (if there is to be any) must come from somewhere outside nature — it must come from the Creator; and it came in the form of prophethood guided by divine revelation. The sending of the prophets for this reform and removal of conflict has been given the name of ba'th (awakening, revival, البعث); and never has this verb been attributed, in the Qur'ān, to anyone except Allāh, although the prophetic calls, like everything else, have some connection with their place and time.

Prophethood is a divine (say, if you will, unseen) condition which has the same relation to general human perception and activity as wakefulness has to sleep. The prophet receives the knowledge by which the conflicts and differences of human life can be removed. This perception received from the unseen is called, in the language of the Qur'ān 'revelation'; and the quality and condition of receiving that revelation is called 'prophethood'.

Therefore, the reason for initiating the prophetic mission rests on the following factors:-

(1) Human nature leads man to social cooperation;
(2) At the same time it creates friction and conflict;

(3) Nature itself cannot remove that conflict;
(4) Therefore, a force outside of nature, should intervene to remove that conflict;
(5) Allāh completes creation and in His mercy, has taken it upon Himself to guide everything to its perfection;
(6) As a result of that undertaking, He sent prophets and revealed to them the book to reform human society.

All these factors are proved by reason and experience.

Never has man desisted from exploiting others to his advantage; never has that exploitation, after action and reaction, failed to created a society; never has any society been free from conflict; never has that conflict been removed without social laws; and never has human wisdom been able to make such laws which could cut away all the roots of conflict.

Look at the present world. See the chaos in human society, the degradation of moral values, the never-ending chain of wars, the destruction of crops and cattle, the fightings which exterminate millions and millions of people, the autocracies, the subjugation of nations, the abasing of the human spirit, the usurping of lives and property; you will find all these and much more. And it is happening in this, the twentieth century, the century of civilisation, the age of progress, the era of culture and science. What could have been the situation in the old day — the age of ignorance and darkness?

That the teaching and training of religion, emanating from the prophets and revelation, have the ability to eradicate this conflict is proved by reason and experience.

Reason: Religion calls people to real knowledge, high ethics, and noble deeds. Humanity can reach the highest peak of perfection by following such teachings.

Experience: Islam has proved it during the short period when it had control over Muslim society, as will be explained, God willing, in a proper place.

Sixth: The religion, which has been sent as the last of all religions, proves that humanity has reached the final stage of its completion and perfection. That is why the Qur'ān has decreed that prophethood has come to its end with Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). His religion will never be abrogated, and his sharī'ah will remain in force till the end of the world.

It means that human perfection, individual as well as collective, shall always, remain within the limits of the laws ordained by Islam. There can never arise a situation for which Islam has no guidance.

It is a prophecy of the Qur'ān confirmed by the history of humanity in the last fourteen centuries. Mankind has, in this period, progressed tremendously, and reached unimaginable heights in the field of the material and. physical sciences. Unfortunately, the same cannot be said about his ethics and morality. It has not progressed even one step since that time. Rather, it could be claimed that in this respect it has taken many steps backwards. Thus humanity has not progressed as a whole. It is a lop-sided development. Man has strengthened his body, neglecting his soul, which has become weaker.

It is clear from above that the laws of Islam have as much relevance in this era as they had fourteen centuries ago. And they will not loose their relevancy even in the future.

Some people say: The laws of religion were made for the reform of man and the good of society. If society changes, and climbs further towards the summit of perfection, religion and its law also must change, to stay in step with the changing society. It is no secret that the difference between this age and that when the Qur'ān came down and Islamic laws were promulgated is far greater than the difference between the times of Mūsā and 'Īsā (a.s.) and that of the Prophet of Islam. This vast difference demands the abrogation of the laws of Islam, so that other laws, more appropriate to a modern progressive society, can be ordained.

Reply: Religion does not aim only at the material and physical perfection of man. It looks at the human being as a whole, and seeks to make him perfect both physically and spiritually, so that he may attain both material and spiritual bliss. Its deal is the social man who is perfect from the above-mentioned point of view, not a social man who might be perfect in technology and politics but bankrupt in other aspects of humanity. These people looked at societies based on materialism. Matter is always in change, climbing up the ladder of perfection, and the same is true of materialistic societies. These people thought that a society based on religion would also always be subject to change and abrogation. But they over-looked the fundamental difference between the two societies. They forgot that Islam does not aim at a lop-sided development of man; instead, it seeks well-balanced development, where man becomes perfect as a whole, both in body and soul. Before demanding the abrogation of Islam, they should produce an individual or a society which combines religious tenets and material progress. Then they should say what deficiency has been left therein which should be completed by a new sharī'ah, or what weakness is there which needs a new law. Unless and until they produce such a society to point to the supposed defects, they have no justification in claiming that Islam should be abrogated.

Seventh: The prophets (peace be on them all) were sinless and protected from error and sin.

SINLESSNESS OF THE PROPHETS

'Iṣmah (العصمة) which is generally translated as ''sinlessness'', literally means 'protection'. The 'protection' with which we are concerned here, is of three kinds:

(1) protection from error in receiving the revelation,
(2) protection from error in communicating and imparting that revelation to the people, and
(3) protection from sins. Sin here means any thing or action which goes against the obligatory command of Allāh, and thus becomes a disgrace for the man. In other words, any word or action which is against the dictates of the servitude, homage and devoutness of man towards his Lord.

'Iṣmah (العصمة) in religious terminology, means the presence, in the man concerned, of a quality which protects him from committing any thing unlawful, any error or sin.

So far as 'iṣmah from extraneous things (i.e. other than receiving revelation and its communication, and sins) is concerned — for example, mistakes in perception by any of the five senses, or misjudging the benefit or harm of a medicine, food or other such thing, etc. — it is not relevant to this verse which we are now discussing.

Anyhow, the Qur'ān definitely proves that every prophet was ma'ṣūm (sinless, protected from mistakes, المعصوم) in all the above mentioned three aspects.

'Iṣmah from error in receiving the revelation and in its communication to the people: The following sentences, in the verse under discussion, prove these two aspects: so Allāh sent the prophets, as bearers of good tidings and as warners, and He sent down with them the book with the truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed. And none differed about it but the very people who were given it, after clear signs had come to them, revolting among themselves; whereupon Allāh guided, by His will, those who believed to the truth about which they differed.

These words show that Allāh sent them to bring the good tidings and to warn; and sent the book with them (and this was the ''revelation''), so that they might guide the people to true belief and true deeds. This was the aim and object of Allāh in appointing the prophets. And He says: errs not my Lord, nor does He forget. (20:52) It proves that Allāh errs not in His action, and makes no mistakes in His affairs; when He wills a thing, He wills it in its proper way which creates the desired effect without fail; when He proceeds with a work, the result is produced without any mistake. It is as it should be, because in His hand is creation and command, and for Him is power and judgement. And He sends prophets by revealing to them the true knowledge of religion and teaching it to them — and without fail it must be so; of necessity the prophets must receive and understand the revelation correctly; and He sends them to communicate that revelation to their people, and without fail it must be so; without any error or mistake they must communicate it as Allāh has willed. Allāh says: Surely Allāh attains His purpose; Allāh indeed has made a measure for everything (65:3); and Allāh is predominant over His affair. (12:21)

Another verse which proves these two types of 'iṣmah is as follows: The Knower of the Unseen; so He does not reveal His secrets to any except to him whom He chooses for an apostle; for surely He makes a guard to march before him and after him, so that He may know that they have indeed delivered the messages of their Lord, and He encompasses what is with them and He takes account of everything. (72:26—28) It is clear that Allāh reserves His revelation for His messengers; so He reveals His secrets to them and supports them by guarding them from in front of them and behind them; and encompasses what is with them to protect the revelation from decay and alteration, whether that alteration comes from Satan or others; and it is done to make sure that they have indeed correctly delivered the messages of their Lord. Another verse reports the words of the angels of revelation: and we do not come down but by the command of your Lord; His is whatever is before us and whatever is behind us and whatever is between these; and your Lord is not forgetful. (19:64) These verses prove that the revelation right from the start of its descent, to its reaching down to the prophets and up to its communication and delivery to the people is duly protected and guarded against change and alteration, from whatever source it might come.

These two verses prove the 'iṣmah of the prophets in receiving and delivering the revelation only; but they may also be used, with the addition of one rational premises, to prove their 'iṣmah from sins. For an average man, actions speaks as loudly as, if not louder than, words. If someone does a certain thing, his action proves that in his eyes that work is good and lawful; it is as if he was announcing its legality and virtue in so many words. If a prophet committed a sin, while he forbade it to his people, it would mean that he was preaching two contradictory things: his action allowed a thing, while his words forbade it. Thus he would be preaching two things contradictory to each other. And preaching contradictory things is against the preaching of truth, because one order would belie and invalidate the other. One who reports two contradictory items cannot be said to be reporting the truth. Therefore, 'iṣmah of the prophet in delivering the message of Allāh totally depends upon his 'iṣmah from the sins.

There are many other verses which prove 'iṣmah of the prophets in all its aspects:-

(a) These are they whom Allāh has guided; therefore, follow their guidance. (6:90) All the prophets were decidedly guided by Allāh. And Allāh says: and whomsoever Allāh lets go astray, there is no guide for him; and whom Allāh guides, there is none that can lead him astray; is not Allāh Mighty, the Lord of retribution? (39:36—37) Also He says: whomsoever Allāh guides, he is the rightly guided one. (18:17) According to these verses those who are guided by Allāh can never be led astray by any misleading agency. In other words, they are free from all misguidance; and every sin is a misguidance, as is shown by the words of Allāh, Did I not enjoin on you, O children of Adam! that you should not worship the Satan? Surely he is your open enemy, and that you should worship Me; this is the right way. And certainly he led astray a great multitude from among you. What! could not then understand? (36:60—62) In this verse, Allāh counts every sin as going astray, a misguidance as a result of the agency of Satan ; at the same time regarding it as the worship of Satan. Looking at all the above verses we find that:-

Allāh guided all the prophets by His guidance.

Anyone guided by Allāh's guidance can never be misled, can never go astray.

Every sin is a misguidance ; every sin is straying from the right path.

It follows that the prophets of Allāh were sinless, free from every sin and protected from every mistake in receiving and delivering the revelation of Allāh.

(b) And whoever obeys Allāh and the Apostle these are with those upon whom Allāh has bestowed the favours of the prophets and the truthful and the martyrs and the righteous ones; and excellent are these as companions! (4:69)

Also He says: Keep us on the right path, the path of those upon whom Thou hast bestowed favours, not (the path) of those inflicted with Thy wrath, nor (of those) gone astray. (1:5—7)

The prophets are described as of those upon whom Allāh has bestowed His favours; and those upon whom Allāh's favours have been bestowed are other than those who have gone astray. It means that the prophets never went astray. If they had committed a sin, they would have gone astray (as explained above). Also, if they had committed any error or mistake in receiving or communicating the revelation, they would have gone astray. There fore, the two verses together prove the 'iṣmah of the prophets in all these aspects.

(c) These are they on whom Allāh bestowed favours, of the prophets of the posterity of Adam, and of those whom We carried with Nūḥ, and of the posterity of Ibrāhīm and Israel, and of those whom We guided and chose. When the signs of the Beneficent (God) were recited to them, they fell down prostrating (in obedience) and weeping. But there followed after them an evil generation, who neglected prayer and followed sensual desires, so they shall soon meet (the result of their) sin. (19:58—59)

This verse attributes two virtues to the prophets: first, the bestowing of favours (upon whom Allāh bestowed favours); second, guidance (whom We guided and chose). Then it goes on praising them for the highest degree of obedience, devoutness and humility before Allāh.

Afterwards, it condemns the unworthy following generation for their evil traits. Obviously, we see here two opposite groups: one, the praiseworthy ones deserving to be honoured by Allāh; the other, the condemned ones. This second group has been described as those who followed sensual desires and who will soon see the result of their sins. It clearly means that the first group, i.e. the prophets, did not follow their desires and will not be overtaken by sin. Such sincere servants of Allāh could not commit any sin, even before their appointment as prophets. Had they committed any sin even before their receiving prophethood, they would have surely come under the condemnation, neglected prayer and followed sensual desires, so they shall soon meet (the result of their) sin. But, as we explained, theirs is a group of diametrically opposite to the condemned ones.

This Qur'ānic proof is somewhat similar to the rational proof given for. the 'iṣmah of the prophets, which is as follows:-

The sending of the prophets and the showing of miracles in their hands is the confirmation of their words. It means that they cannot tell a lie. Also, it is an endorsement that they have the ability to communicate the message of Allāh to their people. But a man who indulges in sins and such actions as would harm a project, cannot be said to be qualified to preach the usefulness of that project or to invite the people to participate in it. Therefore, when Allāh showed miracles in the hands of the prophets it not only authenticated their claim of prophethood, but also confirmed that they could not commit error in receiving and delivering the divine revelation, and that they faithfully obeyed all the commands of Allāh and desisted from all such things which were disliked by Allāh. In other words, they were sinless in all its aspects.

Question: All intelligent people take help, in all varieties of social needs and communications, from those who may discharge their duties to a certain extent, even if their delivery of the message or their performance in that social work is not quite perfect. What is wrong if Allāh sends prophets who are capable of doing His work to a certain extent, even if occasionally they indulged in sin?

Reply: Men overlook such defects in their agents for one of two reasons: either they do not mind a little short-coming and deficiency, or their aim is to get only that amount of service which the agent is qualified for.

But both these alternatives are unacceptable for a divine scheme. These alternatives show the deficiency and shortcoming of not only the agents but also of the principal. Allāh cannot be like us mortals.

An Objection: Allāh says, why should not then a company from every party from among them go forth that they may acquire (proper) understanding in religion, and that they may warn their people when they come back to them, so that they may be cautious? (9:122)

Here Allāh has entrusted Muslim scholars with the task of warning their people. And those scholars are not sinless.

Reply: Muslim scholars (admittedly not sinless) have been allowed by this verse to communicate to their people what they have learned about religion. It does not say that Allāh confirms their words of warning, nor that their words are recognised by Allāh as a divine proof over people. It is this divine confirmation and recognition which is the basic characteristic of prophethood, not mere warning.

(d) And We did not send any apostle but that he should be obeyed by Allāh's permission ... (4:64) The aim of sending an apostle is that he be obeyed, and the verse confines the aim to only this one thing. People should obey the apostle in both his words and actions, because preaching is done in both ways. And both these aspects of obedience are covered by Allāh's permission. If an apostle erred in understanding the revelation or in its delivery, it would still be Allāh's will, according to this verse, that people should obey and follow him. But Allāh only permits truth. How can His permission be related to an error or mistake? Thus, it is clear that an apostle cannot err in receiving or delivering a revelation. Likewise, if an apostle were to commit a sin, in words or actions, an impossible situation would arise. Sin is disliked by Allāh, forbidden by Him. But the verse enjoins people to obey and follow their apostle. Thus that same sin would, at the same time, be for the people an act of obedience which they would be required to follow and copy. It would mean that Allāh had, at one and the same time, willed it and not willed it, ordered it and forbade it; liked it and disliked it! As explained earlier, it would be an impossible order. We do not mean an order to do an impossible work (which, some do say, can be given by Allāh!): we mean that giving such an order is in itself an impossibility, because it would be, at one and the same time, an order and a non-order, a will and non-will, a liking and non-liking, a praise and non-praise, a condemnation and non-condemnation!!

(e) so that there may not remain any argument for people against Allāh, after the apostles ... (4:165) It is clear that Allāh wills to intercept the excuse which people might think of for their sins and disobedience; and that the only way of dismissing such excuse is by sending the apostles to them. The coming of the apostles could cut their excuse short only if the apostles themselves desisted from all those things which Allāh does not like — be it in word or action. Otherwise, people could easily give their apostles' sins and mistakes as their excuse, and that argument would be valid against Allāh. Therefore, if Allāh had sent a non-ma'sūm apostle, He would have defeated His own purpose.

Question: It is accepted that the verses prove that the prophets do not commit any mistake or sin. But this does not prove that they had 'iṣmah. 'Iṣmah, as defined by scholars, does not mean merely 'not committing any sin'; it is ''a faculty which protects a man from committing any sin or mistake''. Doing or not doing a work does not prove that the man concerned possesses the faculty, or characteristic, of that doing or not doing. The verses prove that they did not commit any sin; while to prove 'iṣmah it should be proved that they could not commit any.

Answer: What is needed for proving the subject matter of this verse, is only the fact that the prophets did not commit any sin or mistake. And the questioner accepts that the verses prove it.

To prove that this fact was based on a characteristic or faculty of the prophets, look up the subject of 'miracle' in the first volume. There it was shown that the verse, Surely my Lord is on the straight path (11:56), and Surely Allāh attains His purpose; Allāh indeed has made a measure for every thing (65:3) prove that every happening depends on a cause which brings it into being. Now in the case of a prophet, we see that all his actions throughout his life are invariably correct, proper and in obedience to Allāh. This firm and unchanging characteristic shows that there must be a faculty in his soul which protects him from committing any sin or mistakes, and causes all his actions to be in accordance with the commands of Allāh. And that faculty is 'iṣmah.

It is accepted that all actions of a prophet occur by his own will, as do our own actions. But his actions are always in obedience to Allāh, while our actions are sometimes in obedience and sometimes in disobedience. An action is said to occur by our will when it is based on our knowledge and discretion. Our actions differ in obedience and disobedience because of a difference in the knowledge and will from which they emanate. If our knowledge and will demand to fulfil the dictates of servitude by obeying the divine command, obedience comes into being. If, on the other hand, our knowledge and will prefer the pursuit of pleasure and the satisfaction of lust, then disobedience and sin occur. In short, the difference in the quality of our actions, obedience or disobedience, is caused by the difference in our knowledge and will. Had our knowledge and will remained unchanged throughout our life, all our actions would have been of one type only - either a life-long obedience to Allāh, or, God forbid, an unbroken chain of sins. As the actions of a prophet are invariably, according to the dictates of piety and in obedience to Allāh, it follows that the knowledge and will from which his actions emanate are healthy ones, invariably good and virtuous. In other words, it is ingrained in his mind and soul that he must always serve and obey Allāh. It is this firmly-rooted knowledge which is called a faculty, characteristics or trait, like the faculty of chastity, of bravery, of justice, and so on. When we admit that a prophet always obeys Allāh and never commits any sin, we accept that he possesses a spiritual quality or faculty which always keeps him on right path and protects him from sin and mistakes. And that faculty is 'iṣmah.

Also, we have shown that a prophet does not commit any error or mistake in receiving or delivering the divine revelation. It means that he possesses a spiritual quality which protects him from such mistakes.

If we say that a prophet does not have this spiritual faculty or characteristic (while it is known that he does not commit any sin or mistake) then it would mean that this unchanging habit (i.e. always following the divine command and desisting from mistake and sin) is not related to any spiritual or psychological trait of his own - in other words, it is caused directly by the will of Allāh, and that the prophet has no choice, option or will of his own in his actions; in short his actions are not caused by his knowledge and will. But it is already admitted that the actions of the prophet are based on his knowledge and will just like those of other human beings.

'Iṣmah comes from Allāh; He creates in the prophet a cause from which all his actions emanate — the actions which are done by his own will and are always in obedience to Allāh; and that cause is the firmly-rooted knowledge — in other words, the characteristic, trait or faculty.

ABOUT PROPHETHOOD

Allāh uses two words for those who received His revelations so as to guide people to the right path. These words are rasūl (apostle, messenger, الرّسول) and nabī (prophet, النّبىّ), which divide, or almost divide, them into two groups, Allāh says: ... and the prophets and the witnesses shall be brought up ... (39:69); On the day when Allāh will assemble the apostles, then say: What answer were you given? (5:109) Rasūl (الرّسول) means the one who brings the message (risālah, الرّسالة);nabī (النبى) is the one who brings the news (naba', النّبأ) Rasūl (الرسول) has the distinction of being an intercessor (or intermediary) between Allāh and His creatures. Nabī (النبى) has the distinction of having the knowledge of Allāh and from Allāh.

It is said that rasūl (الرّسول) is the one who is sent by Allāh and commissioned to convey the divine message to the people; and nabi (النّبىّ) is the one who is sent by Allāh, whether he is told to convey the message or not. According to this interpretation, the relationship between the Apostle and Prophet is such that all apostles are prophets but not all the prophets are apostles.

But the words of Allāh do not support this view. For example, Allāh says: And remember Mūsā in the Book; surely he was one purified and was an apostle, a prophet. (19:51) The aim of this verse is to praise Mūsā and show his greatness and in such a context the adjectives should progress from general to distinctive and not vice versa.

Also at another place, Allāh says: And We did not send before you any apostle or prophet but ... (22:52) This verse joins the apostles and the prophets together and then uses the verb ''to send'' (irsāl, الارسا ل)for both, making all of them apostle (mursal, المرسل)

But there are other verses which apparently show that everyone who was sent by Allāh to people was a prophet. See, for example, … and the book shall be laid down, and the prophets and the witnesses shall be brought up ... (39:69); ... but he is the Apostle of Allāh and the Last of the prophets ... (33:40); and also the verse under discussion, ... so Allāh sent the prophets as bearers of good tidings and as warners ... All these verses show that the prophets were sent with a divine message to people. Then what is the significance of the verse mentioned above, … and was an apostle and a prophet? Probably, the two words have been used here in their literal sense: Mūsā was a Messenger of Allāh and had the knowledge and information of the signs of Allāh and His secrets.

Likewise, the next-mentioned verse (And We did not send before you any apostle or prophet but ....) may be taken to mean that the prophet and the apostle both are sent to the people, but the prophet is sent to convey to them information of the unseen, as he knows the divine secrets, and the apostle is sent to bring them something more than a prophetic communication. This may be inferred from the verses, like: And every people had an apostle; so when their apostle came, the matter was decided between them with justice ... (10:47) and nor we chastise until We raise an apostle. (17:15) Accordingly, the prophet explains to people what is good for their lives in this world and in the hereafter, the roots of the religion and its branches, as the mercy of Allāh decides to guide the people to their bliss and felicity; and the apostle brings to people a special message to complete the proof over them, a message, rejection of which brings destruction and chastisement in its wake. Allāh says: … that there may not remain any argument for people against Allāh after the apostles. (4:165)

In short, the words of Allāh do not show any difference between the two except what appears from their literal meaning. And it leads us to the same conclusion which we have mentioned earlier, i.e., apostle has the distinction of being an intercessor (or intermediary) between Allāh and His creatures, and the prophet has the distinction of having the knowledge of Allāh and from Allāh.

We shall later quote the traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt about the difference between an apostle and a prophet.

The Qur'ān very clearly says that there were numerous prophets, and that Allāh has not described all of them in His Book. For example, Allāh says: And certainly We sent apostles before you: there are some of them that We have mentioned to you and there are others whom We have not mentioned to you ... (40:78)

There are twenty odd prophets mentioned by name in the Book of Allāh: ’Ādam, Nūḥ, Idrīs, Hūd, Ṣāliḥ, Ibrāhīm, Lūṭ, Ismā‘īl, Alyasa‘, Dhu ’l-kifl, Ilyās, Yūnus, Isḥāq, Ya‘qūb, Shu‘ayb, Mūsā, Hārūn, Dāwūd, Sulaymān, Zakariyyā, Yaḥyā, Ismā‘īl Ṣādiqu ’l-wa‘d[3], ‘Īsā, and Muḥammad, May Allāh bless them all.

Some other prophets have been mentioned, but not by name. Allāh says: Did you not look at the chiefs of the children of Israel after Mūsā, when they said to a prophet of theirs; Raise up for us a king ... (2:246); Or like him who passed by a town, and it had fallen down ... (2:259); When We sent to them two, and they rejected both of them, so We strengthened (them) with a third ….(36:14); Then they found one from among Our servants whom We had granted mercy from Us and whom We had taught knolwedge from Ourselves. (18:65); the grandchildren (2:136).

There are some about whom it is not clear whether they were prophets or not, like the boy (disciple) of Mūsā (And when Mūsā said to his boy — 18:60), Dhu ’l-Qarnayn, ‘Imrān (father of Maryam) and ‘Uzayr. (The first one is mentioned in the Qur’ān by an adjective and the other by name).

The Qur’ān has not mentioned how many prophets there were all together. The traditions giving their number are not mutawātir and differ among themselves. The most well-known is the tradition of Abū Dharr that the prophet told him that there were one hundred and twenty-four thousand prophets; three hundred and thirteen of them were apostles.

The chiefs of all the prophets are the ones endowed with fortitude (ulu’l-‘azm اولوالعزم); and they are Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm, Mūsā, ‘Īsā and Muḥammad (blessings of Allāh be on him and them all!) Allāh says: Therefore bear up patiently as did the apostles endowed with fortitude bear up with patience... (46:35) It will be explained later on that ‘azm (fortitude, determination, firm resolve, العزم) in this context means that they firmly upheld the first covenant they made with Allāh, and they never forgot it. Allāh says: And when We made a covenant with the prophets and with you, and with Nūḥ and Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and ʻĪsā, son of Maryam, and We took from them a firm covenant. (33:7). Also He says: And certainly We had covenanted unto Adam before, but he forgot and We did not find in him any determination. (20:115).

[3] This is as it appears in the Arabic orginal, but it is in fact the same prophet as the Ismā‘īl appearing earlier in the list.

Each of these five apostles brought a new law and a book. Allāh says: He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and that which We have revealed unto you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and ʻĪsā ... (42:13); Most surely this is in the earlier scriptures, the scriptures of Ibrāhīm and Mūsā. (87:18—19); Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light; with it the prophets ... were judging (matters) … And We sent after them in their footsteps ʻĪsā, son of Maryam, verifying what was before him of the Torah ... And We have revealed to you the Book with the truth, verifying what is before it of the Book and a guardian over it; therefore, judge between them by what Allāh has revealed and do not follow their desires (to turn away) from the truth that has come to you; for every one of you did We appoint a law and a way, and if Allāh had pleased He would have made you (all) a single people, but that He might try you in what He gave you ... (5:44—48)

These verses clearly show that these five ulu 'l-ʻazm prophets had been given laws, and that Ibrāhīm, Mūsā, ʻIsā and Muḥammad (peace be on them all) were given books. So far as the book of Nūḥ is concerned, we have already explained that the verse under discussion, read together with verse 42:13, proves that he was given a book. All these books contained a law and a sharīʻah.

The Qur'ān says that Dawud (a.s.) was given a book (And We gave Dāwūd the Zabūr (4:163)), and according to the traditions Ādam, Shīth and Idrīs also were given books. But we are not concerned here with those books, because they did not contain any law or sharīʻah.

Revelation is essential for prophethood. Revelation is a sort of talk of Allāh, and prophethood depends upon it. Allāh says: Surely We have revealed to you as We revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him ... (4:163). A full discussion of revelation will be given, God willing, in the chapter of ash-Shūra.

TRADITIONS

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ‘‘The men before Nūḥ, were one people, on the creation of Allāh, neither rightly guided nor gone astray, then Allāh raised the prophets.’’ [Majma‘u ’l-bayān]

There is a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said about this verse: And it was before Nūḥ. He was asked whether they were on the right path. He said: ‘‘Rather they were astray. When Ādam and his good children died, his successor, Shīth, was unable to expound the religion of Allāh which was followed by Ādam and his good children. It was so because Qābīl had threatened to kill him as he had killed his brother, Hābīl. Therefore, Shīth lived among them in fear, keeping his religion secret. Their straying increased day by day until nobody remained with them on the earth except those who had already passed away. And the successor (of Ādam) settled in an island to worship Allāh. Then Allāh decided to raise the apostles. And if these ignorant ones were asked they would say that He (Allāh) had finished the matter; but they are liars; verily it is thinga bout which Allāh decrees every year.’’ Then the Imam recited: Therein every wise affair is made distinct. (44:4). (Then he said:) ‘‘So Allāh decrees what should happen during the year, hardship or abundance or rain or other such things.’’ The narrator asked whether before the prophet they had gone astray or were on the right path. The Imām said: ‘‘They were not on guidance. They were on the creation of Allāh upon which they were created. There is no change in the creation of Allāh. And they were not to be guided until Allāh guided them. Do you not hear the words of Ibrāhīm, Had not my Lord guided me, I would certainly have been of the erring people. (6:77) i.e., forgetful of the covenant.’’ [al ‘Ayyāshī]

The author says: The words, They were not on guidance. They were on creation of Allāh, explain the words they were astray which have been used in the beginning of the tradition. It means that they were not guided in detail to the divine knowledge, but had its rudimentary knowledge. And such a guidance may be termed straying in the meaning of ignorance of details. The first tradition, quoted from Majma‘u ’l-bayān, mentions it in these words: ‘‘on the creation of Allāh, neither rightly guided nor gone astray.’’

The last words of this tradition, ‘‘forgetful of the covenant’’ also explain the straying mentioned earlier. Guidance is the remembrance of the covenant in its reality (as is the case with the perfect believers), or the carrying on like those who remember the covenant, even if one oneself does not remember it in reality (as is the case of most of the believers); and giving the name of guidance to this second group is only because of the mercy of Allāh.

Hishām ibn al-Ḥakam narrates that an atheist came to Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.), and asked him, ‘‘From whre did you prove the prophets and apostles?’’ The Imām said: ‘‘When we proved that there is a Creator and Maker who is elevated above us and above all the created things, and that that Creator is wise, and that it is not possible for His creatures to see Him or touch Him; and that He cannot live with them nor they with Him, and He cannot have discussion with them nor they argue with Him ; then it is proved that He must have in His creation some envoys to guide the people to their advantage and interest and to that on which depends their existence and the neglect of which brings their destruction. Thus it is proved that there should be some people to enjoin (good) and forbid (evil) on behalf of the (Creator who is) wise and Cognizant of His creation. It all proves that He has his interpreters, and they are the prophets, His chosen ones from among His creation, wise, well-trained in erudition, sent (to the people) with that (wisdom); not like the people in their conditions though they are like them in physique and the make-up of the body; supported by the Wise, the All-knowing with wisdom and proofs and arguments and evidence, like raising up the dead and healing the blind and the leper. So, the earth of Allāh cannot remain empty from a proof (of Allāh) with whom should be a sign to show that he is truthful in his words, and it is essential for him to be on justice.’’ [at-Tawḥid]

The author says: Evidently, this tradition contains three proofs about three subjects of prophethood:-

First: A reason to prove the necessity of prophethood in general. On deep consideration you will find it in conformity with what we have inferred from the verse under discussion.

Second: The proof that it is necessary that the prophet be supported with miracles. It conforms with what we said about miracles under the verse (2:23) And if you are in doubt as to that which We have revealed to Our servant, then produce a chapter like it ...

Third: The proof that there should always be a representative of Allāh on this earth, be he a prophet or an Imām. And we shall explain this, God willing, in a suitable place.

There is a tradition narrated by ‘Utbah al-Laythī from Abū Dharr (May Allāh have mercy on him) that he said: ‘ ‘I said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! How many prophets were there?’ The Prophet said: ‘One hundred and twenty-four thousand.’ I said: ‘How many of them were apostles?’ He said: ‘Three hundred and thirteen, a large crowd!’ I said: ‘Who was first of the prophets?’ He said: ‘Ādam.’ I said: ‘Was he an apostle from among the prophets?’ He said: ‘Yes. Allāh made him by His hand (power) and breathed into him of His spirit.’ Then the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘O Abū Dharr! Four of the prophets were Syrians: Ādam, Shīth, Ukhnūkh i.e. Idrīs (and he was the first to write with the pen) and Nūḥ; and four of them were Arabs: Hūd, Sāliḥ, Shu‘ayb and your prophet, Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.); and the first prophet among the children of Israel was Mūsā, and the last of them was ‘Īsā and (between them were) six hundred prophets.’ I said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! How many books were sent down by Allāh?’ He said: ‘One hundred and four books. Allāh sent down fifty books unto Shīth, and thirty books unto Idrīs, and twenty books unto Ibrāhīm, and He sent down the Torah, and the Injīl, and that Zabūr, and al-Furqān.’ ’’ [al-Khiṣāl and Ma‘ānī al-akhbār]

The author says: This tradition, and especially its first part describing the number of the prophets and the apostles, is famous, and it has been narrated by Shī‘ahs and Sunnīs in their books. And aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated a tradition of the same meaning in al-Khiṣāl and al-Amālī, from ar-Ridā (a.s.) through his forefathers from the Prophet; and (another tradition) from Zayd ibn ‘Alī through his father and grandfather from ‘Alī (a.s.); and similar traditions have been reported by Ibn Qawlawayh in Kāmilu ’z-ziyārah and by as-Sayyid in al-Iqbāl from as-Sajjād (a.s.) and in al-Baṣā’ir from al-Bāqir (a.s.).

There is a tradition from al-Bāqir (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: and he was an apostle, a prophet (19:51), that he said: ‘‘The prophet is the one who sees in his dream and hears the voice but does not see the angel; and the apostle is the one who hears the voice, and does not see in dreams, and sees the angel.’’[al-Kāfī]

The author says: There are other traditions with this meaning.

Possibly, their meaning may be inferred from such verses as, therefore, send Thou to Ḥarūn. (26:13) This tradition does not say that the apostle means the one to whom the angel of revelation is sent. It simply says that prophethood and apostleship are two ranks, the speciality of the one is seeing in the dream, and of the other is seeing the angel of revelation. Sometimes, both ranks are combined in one person, then the two specialities are found together; and sometimes prophethood is found without apostleship. Therefore, apostleship is more particular than prophethood, in practice, but not in meaning. See for example, the tradition of Abū Dharr, mentioned above, in which he asks, ‘‘how many of the prophets were apostles?’’

Therefore, it is clear that every apostle is a prophet but not vice versa. This clear explanation provides the answer to the misunderstanding of some people who say that the Holy Prophet of Islam was not the last apostle, though he was the last prophet. Their ‘‘argument’’ is as follows:

Allāh says: but he (i.e. Muḥammad) is the Apostle of Allāh and the last of the prophets. (33:40) The verse says that he was the last of the prophets, but does not say that he was the last of the apostles.’’

Reply: Prophethood is, in fact, more general and comprehensive than apostleship. When a general item is negated its particular groups are automatically negated.

And so far as the traditions are concerned they have never said that apostleship can be found without prophethood. As you have seen they clearly say that all apostles were prophets, but not all prophets were apostles.

Abu ’l-Ḥasan ar-Riḍā (a.s.) said: The ulu ’l-‘azm prophets were given this name because they were people of firm determination and (brought a new) law. It was like this: Every prophet coming after Nūḥ was on his sharī‘ah and his way, and followed his (Nūh’s) book upto the time of Ibrāhīm, the friend (of Allāh). And every prophet from the time of Ibrāhīm was on the sharī‘ah of Ibrāhīm and his way and followed his book upto the time of Mūsā. And every prophet from the time of Mūsā was on the sharī‘ah of Mūsā and his way and followed his book upto the time of ‘Īsā. And every prophet who was in the time of ‘Īsā and after him, was on the sharī‘ah of ‘Īsā and his way and followed his book upto the time of our prophet, Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). So, these five are ulu ’l-‘azm, and they are the best of the prophets and apostles (peace be on them all). And the sharī'ah of Muḥammad will not be abrogated till the Day of Resurrection. Therefore, anyone who makes a claim to prophethood after him or to bringing a book after the Qur'ān, his blood is allowed (i.e. it is allowed to kill him) to anyone who hears this (claim) from him.'' ['Uyūnu 'l –akhbār]

The author says: A tradition of similar meaning is reported from aṣ-Ṣadiq (a.s.) in Qiṣaṣu'l-anbiyā'.

About the verse: Therefore, bear up patiently as did the apostles endowed with fortitude bear up with patience, that the apostles referred to here are Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm, Mūsā and 'Īsā (peace be on them all). And the meaning of ''endowed with fortitude'' is that they were the first of all prophets in believing in Allāh, and they believed in every prophet who was before them or came after them; and they were determined to remain patient even when they were rejected (by their people) and tormented. [at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī]

The author says: It has been narrated by Sunnī chains from Ibn 'Abbās and Qatādah that the prophets endowed with patience were five: Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm, Mūsā, 'Īsā and Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). It is the same as narrated in the traditions of Ahlu 'l-bayt. There are other views attributed to some Sunnī scholars. One said that they were six: Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm, Isḥāq, Ya'qūb, Yūsuf and Ayyūb. Another said that they were the prophets who were given the order to fight in the way of Allāh, and thus waged war. Some one said that they were four: Ibrāhīm, Nūḥ , Hūd, and the fourth was Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). But all these sayings are without any proof.

There is a tradition narrated by ath-Thumālī from al-Bāqir (a.s.), that he said: ''The prophets between Ādam and Nūḥ were concealed, and that is why they were not mentioned in the Qur'ān nor were they named therein as were named those prophets who declared themselves (before their people).'' [al-'Ayyāshī]

The author says: This meaning has been narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt by numerous chains.

Tafsīr of aṣ-Ṣāfī quotes from Majma'u 'l-bayān a tradition of 'Alī (a.s.) that Allāh raised a black prophet whose story He did not reveal to us.

In the first of Nahju 'l-balāghah, 'Alī (a.s.) says, mentioning Ādam (a.s.):-

''Then (Allāh) sent him down to the place of trial and procreation of progeny. And from his progeny Allāh chose prophets and took their pledge for (His) revelation and for carrying (His) message as their trust. In the course of time, many people changed the covenant which Allāh had made with them; thus they ignored His right, and took partners along with Him. And Satan turned them away from knowing Him and cut them off from His worship. Then Allāh raised among them His apostles, and sent to them His prophets one after another, to exhort the people to fulfil the covenant of His creation; and to remind them of His bounties which were forgotten; and to argue with them by communicating (to them revelation), and to bring out for them the buried (treasures of) wisdom, and to show the signs of His omnipotence: namely, the roof (i.e. sky) which is raised over them, and the floor (i.e. earth) which is placed beneath them, and the means of livelihood that sustain them, and the deaths that make them die, and the ailments that turn them old, and the happenings that successively betake them. And Allāh never allowed His creation to remain without a prophet sent (by Him), or a book sent down (from Him), or a binding proof, or a laid-down highway — the apostles who were not discouraged by the smallness of their (followers') number or largeness of their rejectors. Among them was a predecessor who was told the name of his follower, or a follower introduced by his predecessor. In this way, ages passed by, and the times rolled on, and the fathers passed away while the sons took their place, till Allāh raised Muḥammad in fulfilment of His promise and to finalize His prophethood.''

The author says: ''In fulfilment of His promise'' refers to the promise made by Allāh to sending His Apostle, Muḥammad; and good tiding of him were brought by ʻĪsā and other prophets (peace be on them), as Allāh says: And the word of your Lord has been accomplished truly and justly ... (6:115)

There is a tradition narrated by ʻAbdullāh ibn al-Walīd from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said: ''Allāh said about Mūsā: And We wrote for him in the tablets admonition from everything ... (7:145) So, we know that He did not write for Musa everything (but only a portion 'from everything'). And He said quoting ʻĪsā: so that I may make clear to you part of what you differ in ... (43:63). And He said to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.):… and (will) bring you as a witness against these; and We revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything ... (16:89)'' [al-ʻAyyāshī]

The author says: The same meaning has been narrated in Baṣā'iru 'd-darajāt from ʻAbdullāh ibn al-Walīd by two chains.

The words of the Imām, ''Allāh said about Mūsā…'' point out that the words of Allāh, in the tablets ... from every thing explain the immediately following words about the Torah, and clear explanation of all things. If Allāh had meant a comprehensive description of every thing, He would not have said, from everything which refers only to a portion, not to the whole. This ''from'' shows that the ''explanation of everything'' means only a partial, not a comprehensive, explanation of everything.

PROPHETHOOD: FROM A PHILOSOPHICAL POINT OF VIEW

Prophethood, per se, is primarily a theological, not a philosophical, subject. It is concerned with ordained laws which have no independent physical existence; while philosophy is concerned with those things which exist outside the imagination, which have existence independent of the mind of the beholder.

Even then, looking from a different angle, we may say that it is also a philosophical subject.

Religious teachings — its fundamental beliefs and moral and practical laws — have a strong relation with the human soul; they etch on the mind firm knowledge and qualities which, in their turn, create firmly ingrained characteristics and abilities. This knowledge and these characteristics give a distinct identity to the human soul and decide its path, either towards bliss and nearness to Allāh, or towards perdition and distance from Him. Man, if he has true and correct beliefs and acts righteously, acquires those perfections which bring him nearer to Allāh and His pleasure and take him to paradise. On the other hand, if he has wrong beliefs and does evil acts, his soul will acquire an ugly face; he will have no other goal except this transitory world and its trinkets, and, as a result, after departing from this world, he will enter hell and perdition.

This journey of human soul — to paradise or to hell — is not a thing confined into mind; it is a fact and a reality existing independent of Human imagination. Accordingly it becomes a philosophical subject; and we may philosophically prove the institution of prophethood as follows:-

The earlier-mentioned abilities and characteristics of the human soul take him on the road to perfection. Man is a species existing in reality, and he is the cause of many effects which also exist in reality. Experience shows that all existing things have been given the ability to reach their perfection. And Allāh is the absolute Benefactor and there is no limit for His beneficence, so far as He is concerned. Therefore, every soul must have been given what it needs to reach its perfection, and to turn its abilities into accomplishments — the accomplishments which are called bliss if they contain good attributes and virtuous characteristics, and perdition if they take the shape of bad habits and evil characteristics.

These characteristics are acquired by those of man's actions which are done of his own will and choice. That choice is based on his belief that a certain thing is good and another bad. He has been given the instincts of love and fear. He loves what he thinks beneficial for him and fears what, in his thinking, is harmful. Love and fear are the only two instincts from which the actions of comman man emanate. Therefore, the beneficence of Allāh also should make use of these two faculties of man. Allāh should call man to follow the right path and live a virtuous life; and that call should be accompanied by love and fear, good tidings and warnings. In this way, true believers will reach their perfection of bliss and felicity; and unbelievers and the unjust will reach the perfection of misery and unhappiness.

And the call needs a caller to communicate the divine message to human beings. And that caller is the prophet sent by Allāh.

Question: The faculty of reason and wisdom is enough to exhort man to follow the truth in belief and action and to lead him to excellence and piety. So, what is the need of sending the prophets?

Answer: It has been explained earlier that there is a pure and spiritual wisdom which perceives the real nature of things. Also, there is practical wisdom which says, 'this is good' and 'that is bad'. It is this practical wisdom which invites man to follow the truth in belief and action. This wisdom bases its judgement on human feelings and emotions; and in the beginning, the only emotions that exist in man are desire and fear. The faculty of pure spiritual wisdom and intellect, which can control these emotions, remains only a potentiality.

It has been explained at length that it is this desire and fear, this emotion and feeling which lead man to conflict and difference. If man were left under the control of these emotions, his intellect and other potentialities would never turn into accomplishments. It does not take long for an individual or a nation, when they have been deprived of good training, to return to barbarism and savagery, even though they have the practical wisdom and are governed by natural instincts.

Therefore, there is always need of divine help in the form of prophethood to strengthen the intellect and pure spiritual wisdom.

SOCIOLOGICAL ARGUMENTS ABOUT PROPHETHOOD

Question: It may be accepted that human wisdom cannot act independently in all situations concerning an individual or a nation. But nature always progresses towards its good, and also society, which is based on nature, follows it and moves towards the good of its individual members, and finally acquires an ideal form which ensures the happiness of all its members. This principle is called the effect of the environment. Conflicting faculties and powers, after action and reaction, ultimately create a noble society, befitting human life. History and experience show that all societies are always in search of their perfection; they aspire for the common weal and are progressing towards a felicity and happiness which are the final ambition of every man. Some societies, like Switzerland, have already attained that goal, while others are on the way, and may be nearer to, or farther from, it.

Answer: Nobody can deny that nature always strives to attain perfection and happiness; and that society, which is based on nature, is also like that. But it should be remembered that its desired perfection and bliss is not real perfection and bliss. What nature possesses at the moment are the instincts of love and fear, not intellect. But it is the intellect which is the foundation of real perfection and bliss. Even the evidence offered in the question shows this fact. The perfection and happiness found in some countries and desired by others is only material perfection and the happiness of the body. But man is not body only; he is made of both body and soul. The body's perfection is not man's perfection. The body dies while the spirit lives forever. Perfecting only one side and neglecting the other (and that also the one which is to last forever) is not perfection at all.

Historical and sociological evidence strengthens our view that society, by trial and error, can only progress towards material perfection and physical happiness if any society wants to lead its members to the perfection of the total being, then it cannot do so without prophetic help and divine guidance.

Question: If it is true that the prophetic call has a connection with divine creative guidance which leads everything to its goal of perfection, then it must have a clear and existing influence on human societies. We see that not only man but everything is naturally guided to the matters of its advantage and benefit without fail. If the prophetic call had been a guidance like that, it would have been influential in all human societies and man would not have been able to ignore it, just as he is unable to ignore other natural calls. But we know that it is not so. So how can it be called a true reformation when it is not accepted by societies? So, the theory that the prophetic mission is necessary to remove the differences in society and life is just a theory which cannot be proved by facts.

Answer: First: (a.) The effects, of the religious call are there for every one to see and appreciate. Only an obstinate contender can deny it. Since its foundation and appearance, it has trained thousands and thousands leading them to bliss, and has condemned several times more to perdition and unhappiness — depending on their acceptance or rejection, submission or arrogance and belief or disbelief. Such an effective thing cannot be said to have had no effect.

(b) Some societies have from time to time been established based on religion, and they have shown what may be achieved by following this path.

(c) This world is still alive; the human species is not yet extinct. It is possible that one of these days human society will turn into a virtuous society founded on religion — a society which will guarantee the true happiness of man, and real excellence of character and morality. It will be a day when none shall be worshipped except Allāh, and justice and virtue shall be the norm of the day. Such a magnificent effect cannot be ignored or belittled.

Second: Sociology, psychology and moral science prove that our actions have a dual relationship with our characteristics: they come into being because of psychological factors, and they in their turn have an influence on psychological factors. The actions are the effects of soul and psyche; and they effect the psyche in its characteristics. It is this principle which has given birth to two principles the principle that man is influenced in his character and morals by society; and the principle that he inherits many characteristics from his forefathers. In short, these actions increase their scope horizontally through the environment, and continue from generation to generation vertically through heredity.

Now, it is known that the divinely appointed prophetic mission has remained with human societies since the dawn of humanity, not only in historical, but even in pre-historical, days. Nobody can deny that such a mission, such a call, must have deeply effected the man's social characteristics and high morals. This religious call must have influenced man's psyche very deeply, even if he does not believe in that call.

We would be justified in asserting that all the good qualities of present-day nations and societies are the effects of prophethood and religion, which they have acquired through heredity or the environment. Religion, since its inception, has been accepted and followed by many great societies and groups. And do not forget that religion is the only institution which calls man to the true faith, to noble character, justice and common welfare. Whatever good traits are found today in nations (however little they may be) are the residue of the effects of religion and its results.

Societies can be managed in any of three ways - there is no fourth alternative. First is the system of tyranny. It turns human beings into the slaves of the tyrant (or tyrants) in all aspects of their lives. Second is the system based on civil laws. These laws control overt actions only; they do not touch other aspects of the human personality, like character and ethics. Third is religion which controls and rules over the whole being — beliefs, ethics, and actions — and calls to keep all of them on right path, with truth and virtue.

It is clear from the above that if there is any good in this world or any happiness and bliss for man, it must be attributed to religion and its effects, because no other system aspires to give any guidance on these matters.

Look, for further proof, at the nations that have built their societies on materialism and have neglected religion and morality. They soon lost the virtue, love, mercy and purity of heart and forgot all probity and ethical excellence. It all happened while they were following the dictates of nature. Had nature, per se, been enough, and had those characteristics not been a legacy of religion inherited from the ancients, they would not have lost those noble virtues.

History says that the Christians, during and after the Wars of the Crusades, adopted important points of Islamic law and acted upon them. Now they have advanced, while the Muslims, who did not follow their own religion, have been left behind.

To make a long story short, heredity and environment have let the spirit of religion permeate human society, as they do with other things. Therefore, it is wrong to say that religion has had no impact on humanity.

Question: Well then, what is the role of nature in this scheme? It appears from the above that nature is of no use, and that happiness and bliss are in the hands of the prophethood. If that is so, then why should the prophethood claim that the sharī'ah is based on nature?

Answer: One has only to refer to what we have written on the relationship of the nature to man's felicity and bliss to realize that this objection is baseless. The happiness and perfection brought by prophethood is not something alien to the human species nor is it separate from man's nature. It is nature which finds its way towards that bliss, but it cannot find it alone without outside help; and that help (i.e. prophethood) also is not something separate from humanity and its perfection. In other words, prophethood is not like a stone put beside a man; otherwise, it would not have meant any credit to the prophet — that stone does not increase the weight of the man. The fact is that prophethood is the perfection of human nature; it is a special perception and a particular conception which is hidden in human nature; but only those few individuals can be led to find it whom the Grace of Allāh has specially chosen for it. An analogy may be given — though it is beneath the dignity of prophethood — to the pleasure of the sexual act which only mature persons can feel; minors can-not know it, even when that instinct which both adults and minors equally share is ingrained in human nature.

In short, neither is the reality of prophethood something extraneous from .the humanity of the man, who is the prophet, nor is the bliss which it brings to people who follow it anything separate from their humanity and nature. Otherwise, it could not be a perfection for the prophet or a bliss for his people.

Question: In that case, the objection is turned against prophethood. What the above explanation says is that nature by itself is enough, and prophethood is not separate from nature. It appears that the human species is social by nature and has diversity in its unity; that some individuals excel others in all good aspects: their nature is true, their intelligence free from imaginary things and lust, their character purified from undesirable traits. Those highly distinguished persons are guided by their straight-forward character and discriminating wisdom to what contains the good of society and the happiness of man. Then they legislate laws which ensure the common weal and prosperity of this world and the hereafter.

Accordingly, the prophet is a virtuous man who is a social genius.

Answer: Not at all. It is an interpretation which does not fit with the reality of prophethood nor with its accompanying factors:-

First: It is a hypothesis invented by some sociologists who had no knowledge of religious matters and knew nothing about the Creator or the final destination of man. It was their theory that a prophet is a genius who has a straight forward character and healthy, wisdom. Such a genius ponders over the social condition of his time and thinks how his chaotic society may be reformed and how the members of society may find happiness and bliss.

According to this theory, that genius is 'the prophet'; the good healthy thought which flows from the fountain-head of his thinking power is 'the revelation'; the laws made by him for the reform of the society are `the religion'; his pure spirit which showers these thoughts on his thinking power, and does not deceive the human world by following lustful desires is 'the Trustworthy Spirit' i.e. Jibrīl; the real inspirer of that revelation is 'God'; the book containing his lofty and pure thoughts is 'the heavenly book'; the natural powers or factors which call towards good are 'the angels'; the soul which incites to evil or the powers and factors inviting to bad deeds are 'Satan'; and so on.

It is a totally invalid theory, and I have mentioned under the subject of 'miracles' that prophethood with this meaning would be better called a political toy rather than divine prophethood. Also it has already been explained that this thinking, which they have named genius, is a particular phase of practical wisdom, which distinguishes between good and bad according to its benefit or harm, and is commonly found in all human beings. Also, it has been described that it is that wisdom which is the cause of all the conflicts and differences among human beings; and as such it cannot remove that difference itself. Surely, it needs another power to complete its work. And we have said just above that that power is a special type of perception which is found, by the Grace of Allāh, only in a few chosen persons who are called prophets.

Obviously, this special spiritual perception is totally different, in its reality, from the perception which comes through thinking. The results to which man reaches through thinking, logic and reasoning are completely unlike those which he perceives through the prophetic faculty. Not only the results, even the ways to obtain those results, are diametrically opposed to each other.

Psychologists are sure that man has an inner source of perception which occasionally manifests itself in some individuals. Then a door is opened before the eyes of this individual and he sees a world beyond this world and is given knowledge of astonishing facts and realities beyond the purview of reason and thinking. This fact is vouched for by all ancient psychologists as well as a group of modern European scholars.

In short the way of prophetic revelation is different from reasoning and thinking. And prophethood cannot be given the meaning invented by these people. The same is the case with the sharī'ah, religion, the heavenly Book, the angels, and Satan.

Second: What is recorded of the speech of the prophets who claimed they had received prophethood and revelation, like Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), 'Īsā, Mūsā, Ibrāhīm, Nūḥ and others (peace be on them all), and what is extant from their books (like the Qur'ān) clearly refutes the interpretations which these people have invented for prophethood, revelation, the sending of books, angels and the other realities of religion. The book of Allāh, the traditions of the Holy Prophet of Islam and the sayings of the earlier prophets (peace be on them all) clearly say that these realities and their effects are beyond the sphere of matter and nature, and they are not a part of natural phenomena and cannot be perceived by any of the human senses.

With this background, the interpretation which tries to bring these prophetic realities within the jurisdiction of the physical world and under natural laws is a futile attempt which does not conform to the context and nature of the above meanings and sayings.

It has been mentioned earlier that the factor which removes conflict in the human society is this inner spiritual perception which is independent of that perception which comes through the agency of thinking.

Question: It would mean that this inner perception is something extraordinary and abnormal. It is not a common experience; only a few persons have ever claimed to have had it. How can such a rare experience lead the whole of society to reform and to the removal of conflict and difference? How can it guide them to their true happiness? You have already said that the factor which will lead the people to bliss and happiness must be related to and connected with, their nature; it should not be some thing extraneous like a stone at the side of a man.

Answer: There is no doubt whatsoever that prophethood is an extraordinary thing; and that it is an inner spiritual perception unknown to the five senses. But reason does not deny that extraordinary and abnormal things and things hidden from our senses do exist in the world. What it denies is the existence of something which is impossible. Reason has its ways to verify whether a thing claimed to be abnormal and hidden from the senses really exists. It can prove its existence through its causes (deduction) or through its effects or its accompanying factors (induction).

Prophethood may be proved by one of two methods. (1) Through its effects — the religion brought by the prophet ensures the happiness of man in this world and in the hereafter. (2) Through its accompanying factors — the claimant of prophethood claims an abnormal thing, that Allāh talks with him through revelation; therefore, if his claim is true he should be able to produce some other abnormal signs, which are called miracles.

Therefore we have these two ways to verify a claim of prophethood, the good quality of the religion brought by the prophet, and miracles.

Question: It may be agreed that the conflicts of society can be removed by this inner perception which is called prophetic revelation. It may also be agreed that the prophet can prove it through miracles, and then it will be obligatory on people to accept and follow the religion promulgated by him. But what is the guarantee that the prophet cannot commit any mistake in the promulgation of the sharī'ah? After all, he is a human being like everyone else, and every one by nature commits mistakes. If an error occurred at this stage of promulgating the law and removing differences, the same process would have to be started again.

Answer: Previous explanations are enough to answer this question. The divine revelation does not come through human thinking, which might commit mistakes. It exists independently of human thought and imagination.

There is a law of creation, decreed by the Creator, that He, after creating a thing, guides it to its perfection. See the verse: Our Lord is He Who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (to its goal). (20:50) The thing created does exist in reality; it is a fact. There is no mistake or falsehood in a fact. Mistake and falsehood may occur when the man starts the process of his thinking and tries to acquire knowledge. Then what conforms with the fact is called truth and what does not conform is false hood. Thus it is human thought which may be contaminated by lies and falsehood, and not the divine creation, which is a fact, a reality.

Now, the Creator made man and He guides him to his bliss and happiness, to his perfection, through a guidance which is called revelation. That revelation is a thing created by Him; it is a fact and a reality. And no falsehood can be attributed to a fact and a reality. A fact is a fact; a reality is a reality. As this guiding agency is a fact and creation of Allāh, not a result of human thinking, there can never be any mistake or error or falsehood in it. Nor can there be any such possibility in perceiving or communicating that revelation, because this also is done through the creative guidance of Allāh. Neither does the creative power make any mistake in putting that prophetic spirit and spiritual perception (i.e. revelation) in the person of the prophet nor does that agency of divine guidance, i.e. the spiritual conception, make any mistake in discriminating between what is good for the humanity and what is bad for it.

That is why Allāh does not bestow prophethood on anyone without creating in him the faculty of 'iṣmah, the 'iṣmah from mistake in receiving and communicating the revelation and 'iṣmah in all matters connected with religion and promulgation of the sharī'ah. This 'iṣmah is other than 'iṣmah from sin.

Question: Why is this inner perception not subject to change, deterioration and feebleness like human reason and thinking. Human thinking power is something other than matter. But, because it has a connection with matter (as it passes through the brain) it is subject to all types of changes. It can be strong or feeble; it may exist or cease to exist completely, as in the case of lunacy; also there are variations in its degree, as in the cases of idiots, the feeble-minded or the mentally-retarded, or in senile people.

Now, this inner perception also has a connection with the body of the prophet, and, as such it may also be subject to changes, deterioration and other defects. In that case all the previously mentioned difficulties would arise afresh.

Answer: We have already said that this guidance of human beings to their true happiness is done, not by human thinking, but by the hands of the Creator who brings that agency of guidance into being; that agency is a truly existing thing, and there is no question of any mistake in an existing thing or 'fact'.

It is not accepted that every perception, having any relation with body, is liable to change and deterioration. What is accepted is that perception based on reason and logic is liable to such change and deterioration; but it is known that this inner perception, i.e. prophetic revelation does not come under this heading. For example, man has a perception of his own person, and this knowledge cannot change, disappear or deteriorate, because it is a self-evident knowledge, not based on reasoning or logic.

Now, we may sum up this long discussion as follows:-

First: Mankind proceeds towards a social life and its differences.

Second: These differences, which cut at the root of the happiness of the species, is not, and cannot be, removed by the laws made by human wisdom which acts through reason and logic and are liable to mistake.

Third: The differences can only be removed by prophetic perception, which is created by Allāh in some chosen human beings.

Fourth: The basis of this inner perception, found in the prophets, is totally different from the basis of human thinking, common to all sane men and women.

Fifth: This inner perception never makes any mistake in perceiving the beliefs and laws which are communicated to it by Allāh for the betterment of the human species in its true happiness.

Sixth: These conclusions (and the last mentioned three are the most important: the essentiality of sending the prophets, the basic difference between the perception of revelation and perception based on reasons, and the 'iṣmah of the prophet in receiving and communicating the revelation) are in conformity with the general scheme of things in this physical world. Every species in this world is progressing towards its perfection guided by the Creator who gave it the means to progress along the road to final perfection and bliss. Man is one of those species; and he has also been given the faculties by which he can acquire right beliefs and noble virtues., and can do good acts in a good and noble society. Therefore, it is necessary that the Creator should make arrangement to bring that potential bliss into real existence; that He should guide him with His creative guidance which is free from mistake or error.

أَمْ حَسِبْتُمْ أَنْ تَدْخُلُوا الْجَنَّةَ وَلَمَّا يَأْتِكُمْ مَثَلُ الَّذِينَ خَلَوْا مِنْ قَبْلِكُمْ
مَسَّتْهُمُ الْبَأْسَاءُ وَالضَّرَّاءُ وَزُلْزِلُوا حَتَّى يَقُولَ الرَّسُولُ وَالَّذِينَ آمَنُوا مَعَهُ
مَتَى نَصْرُ اللهِ أَلَا إِنَّ نَصْرَ اللهِ قَرِيبٌ - ٢١٤.

Or do you think that you would enter the Garden while yet the like of those who have passed away before you has not come upon you; distress and affliction befell them and they were shaken violently, so that the apostle and those who believed with him said: When will the help of Allāh come? Now, surely the help of Allāh is nigh! (2:214)

COMMENTARY

It has already been mentioned that these verses (from 2:208 to 2:214) are in one context and related to each other.

Qur'ān: Or do you think that you would enter the Garden: It concludes what was described in the previous verse: Religion is a guidance from Allāh to lead mankind to what contains their prosperity and happiness in this world and the hereafter; and it is a grace of Allāh bestowed upon them. Therefore, it is essential for them to submit themselves to this religion, without following in the footsteps of Satan. They should not create differences in it and should not turn the medicine itself into a disease; they should not change the bounty of Allāh into disbelief and ingratitude, by following their lust and desire, and seeking the trinkets of this world and its decorations. If they do so, they will incur the wrath of Allāh, as happened in the case of the Israelites when they perverted the bounty of Allāh given to them. They must remember that the trial is continuing and the test is in progress. They also will be tested as the previous people were put to test; and no one will get the bliss of religion and nearness to Allāh, the Lord of the worlds, except through fortitude and complete submission to His commands.

The first two verses were addressed directly to the believers, then the style was changed, treating them in the third person, finally in this verse they are again addressed in the second person, treating them as present. The fact is that the whole talk is with them and they are the real audience. But the style was changed in the middle verses for some good reasons (for example, those verses contained the topics of chastisement and punishment.) When the purpose was served, once again a direct address was resumed.

The word am (or, أم) gives here the meaning of ‘‘but’’. It is made for ‘‘or’’, but the context of the verses gives it the following meaning: Do you intend to devote yourselves solely to what I have told you — to submit to Me, to believe in Me and to remain steadfast on the right path of religion, maintaining unity and cooperation — Or do you not; but think that you would enter the Garden ...

Qur’ān: while yet the like of those who have passed away before you has not come to you. mathal (المثل) and mithl (المثل) are used for that likeness which creates a picture of the thing for which it is used in the mind of the hearer.

Mathal (adage, المثل) is generally used for a saying or story which brings to mind the intended meaning in the shape of an illustrative metaphor, as Allāh says: The similitude [mathal, المثل] of those who were placed under the Torah then they did not hold it, is as the similitude of the donkey bearing books ... (62:5) Also, mathal (المثل) is used in the meaning of adjectives, as Allāh says: See how they coin comparisons [amthāl, الأمثال] for you ... (25:9) They were using for him (s.a.w.a.) adjectives like insane, bewitching, lying, etc.

In this verse, the word mathal (المثل) is used in the first meaning, because the similitude is explained in the words, distress and affliction befell them ...

Qur’ān: distress and affliction befell them and they were shaken violently:

When a short reference was made to ‘‘the like of those who have passed away before you’’, the audience became anxious to know what had befallen them. Then Allāh described it in detail in these words, distress and affliction befell them ...

Distress (ba’sā’, الباسآء) is that hardship which befalls a man outside his person, like to property, prestige, family or in the general law and order of the society. Affliction (ḍarr’, الضّرّاء) means that hardship which befalls him in his person, like a wound, murder, sickness, etc. Zalzalah (الزّلزلة) and zilzāl (الزّلزال) means an earthquake. Its root is zalla (زلّ) which means ‘slipped up’, ‘stumbled’. The root word is repeated in this verb to imply repeated stumbling and slipping up. Anyhow the word is metaphorically used for being agitated and disturbed, and that is why we have translated it ‘‘were shaken violently’’.

Qur’ān: so that the apostle and those who believe with him said. When will the help of Allāh come?

Apparently it was the saying of the apostle and the believers together. There can be no objection as to why the apostle should utter such words. He might have exclaimed so to seek the help of Allāh which He had promised in these verses: And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the apostles, most surely they shall be the assisted ones. (37:171—172) Also He said, Allāh has written down: I will most certainly prevail, I and my apostles. (58:21)

Allāh says: Until when the apostles despaired and deemed they were indeed told a lie, Our help came to them ... (12:110) We may see that the tone of this verse is far harsher than the verse under discussion.

Qur’ān: Now, surely the help of Allāh is nigh : Apparently this is Allāh’s answer to the call of the apostle and the believers.

It has already been mentioned that the verse proves that the test and trial of the people will continue in this nation also as it did for the previous ones. Also, it shows that if the same actions and attitudes appear again, the same consequences will follow. It is true in the religion also, as historians say that the history repeats itself.

يَسْأَلُونَكَ مَاذَا يُنفِقُونَ . قُلْ مَا أَنفَقْتُم مِنْ خَيْرٍ فَلِلْوَالِدَيْنِ وَالْأَقْرَبِينَ
وَالْيَتَامَىٰ وَالْمَسَاكِينِ وَابْنِ السَّبِيلِ وَمَا تَفْعَلُوا مِنْ خَيْرٍ فَإِنَّ اللَّهَ بِهِ عَلِيمٌ ـ ٢١٥.

They ask you as to what they should spend. Say: Whatever of good you spend, it is for the parents, and the near of kin, and the orphans, and the poor, and the wayfarer; and whatever of good you do Allāh surely knows it. (2:215)

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: They ask you as to what they should spend. Say: Whatever of good you spend ... The scholars say that the style of this verse is one of philosophy. The questioners had asked about what they should spend. But that question was foolish, because one does not need divine revelation to know that what is spent is wealth in all its various shapes. Rather, they should have asked: Whom the wealth should be spent for. Therefore, Allāh mentioned, instead, the deserving beneficiaries, which the questioners should have asked in the first place.

It is good reasoning; but those scholars have left out one important point. Even though the verse did not reply to their question directly, it has touched on it, and has hinted at the reply in two places: Whatever of good you spend and whatever of good you do. The verse, therefore, shows that the thing to be spent is wealth, irrespective of its shape and quantity; and that spending it on worthy beneficiaries is a good deed and Allāh knows it very well; then it makes them aware that they should rather have asked the names of the beneficiaries, and guides them in this respect by giving the list: the parents, the near relatives, the orphans, the poor and the way-farer.

One finds in the commentaries of the Qur'ān some strange explanations of this verse:-

One of them says: ''what'' (mā, ما) in what they should spend was not used by the questioners to enquire about the quiddity and essence of the thing which should be spent, because it is from the terminology of logic, and is not worthy of any literary speech of eloquent style, let alone the Qur'ān which is the purest of the Arabic literature. Rather the word ‘‘what’’ was used for ‘‘how’’; they wanted to know how they should spend their wealth and on whom. Accordingly, the verse answered that question. The reply, therefore, is according to the question, and the reasoning of the scholars of eloquence (given earlier) is out of place.

Someone else went a step further. He said: It is true that ‘‘what’’ is used to ask about the essence; even then , the questioners’ aim was to ask as to ‘‘how’’ they should spend. It was known that ‘‘what’’ is spent is wealth. As this was well-known, there was no risk of their being misunderstood; the hearer was bound to understand that they wanted to ask about ‘‘how’’. It is like the verse: they said: ‘‘Call on your Lord for our sake to make it plain to us what she is, f o r surely to us all the cows are alike ... ’’ (2:70) They knew that the cow is an animal having such shape and such characteristics. Therefore, the words what she is could not be taken to mean that they wanted to know its quiddity — its genus and species. The only possible meaning, thus, was that they wanted to know the particulars of that cow so that they might distinguish it from the others. That is why they were given the reply, He (Mūsā) said: ‘‘He (Allāh) says, surely she is a cow not made submissive that she should plough the land ...’’ (2:71)

Both the commentators seem confused. It is true that mā (what, ما) is not used in language to ask about the quiddity of a thing, according to the terminology of logic — for a definition made up of the nearest genus and species. But it does not mean that it is made for the question about ‘‘how’’. It would be a linguistic mistake for the one who wants to ask, ‘‘for whom should I spend?’’ to say ‘‘what should I spend?’’

Mā (what, ما) is made so as to ask for the factors which might distinguish one thing from others. The reply may be given by a logical definition using the nearest genus and species, or by describing such other distinctive characteristics and qualities by which that thing may easily be recognised. The word ‘‘what’’ is, therefore, general and includes the logical term, but is not different from it. And certainly it is not made to ask ‘‘how’’. The question about the cow and its reply (2:70—71) was asked and given correctly according to the language. There was no deviation in either from the real meaning of ‘‘what’’ — the question was about distinguishing factors of a thing.

A third one said: As the quiddity and essence was well-known, there was no alternative but to divert the word ‘‘what’’ to mean ‘‘how’’.

It is a manifest error. That the answer is well-known, is no justification for changing the meaning of a word to mean something quite different.

There is one more strange explanation: The questioners had asked both questions — what should they spend, and where. The Qur’ān mentioned only the first question and omitted the second, because the reply pointed to it. What nonsense!

Now, we come back to the verse. There is no doubt that there is here a diversion, in the main reply, from the asked question, to remind the people that the question worthy of asking was ‘‘where’’, not ‘‘what’’, they should spend, because it was no secret that spending is done from wealth and riches.

We find in the Qur’ān that it often diverts its speech from one meaning to another, to point out that the new topic is more worthy of attention. It is a style of beauty which is difficult to find in other books. See for example:

And the parable of those who disbelieve is the parable of one who shouts to that which hears not but a call and a cry ... (2:17)

(Here the parable has been diverted to a satire against the idols.)

The likeness of what they spend in the life of this world is as the likeness of a wind in which is intense cold, (that) smote upon the tillage of a people who had done injustice to their souls, and destroyed it. (3:117)

(The parable is diverted from the wealth spent to its ultimate forfeiture.)

The parable of those who spend their wealth in the way of Allāh is as the parable of a grain growing seven ears, in every ear there are a hundred grains; and Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases; ... (2:261)

(The parable is diverted from those who spend in the way of Allāh to the manifold increase in its reward.)

The day on which neither property will avail nor sons, except him who comes to Allāh with a heart free (from evil). (26:88—89)

(Instead of praising the heart, free from evil, the believer is praised who has got that heart, to show the importance of the believer.)

Say: I do not ask you aught of recompense for it, except that he who will, may take the way to his Lord. (25:57)

Glory be to Allāh (for freedom) from what they describe, except the servants of Allāh, the purified ones. (37:159—160) There are many such verses.

Qur'ān: and whatever of good you do, Allāh surely knows it.: The word spending has been changed here to ''doing good''; likewise, in the beginning of the verse ''wealth'' was changed to ''good'' (''whatever of good you spend'').

This change guides us to two principles:

First: It is very much recommended that one should spend one's wealth on the recognised beneficiaries — it does not matter whether the amount is small or large. But what matters is that the thing spent should be ''good'', desirable and likeable. Allāh says: Never shall you attain to righteousness until you spend (benevolently) out of what you love (3:91); 0 you who believe! Spend (benevolently) out of the good things that you have earned and what We have brought forth for you out of the earth; and do not aim at what is bad that you may spend of it (in charity) while you would not take it yourselves unless you connive at it ... (2:267)

Second: The spending should not be in a bad manner. The spending should be without reminding the receiver reproachfully of it or injuring his feelings. Allāh says: … then do not follow up what they have spent with obligation (reproach) or injury ...(2:262); And they ask you as to what they should spend. Say: Whatever can be spared ... (2:219)

TRADITIONS

There is a saying of Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ''I did not see any people better than the companions of Muḥammad. They did not ask him except thirteen questions till he was taken away (from this world), all of those (questions) are in the Qur'ān. Among them are: 'They ask you about the intoxicants and games of chance'; 'They ask you about the sacred month'; 'They ask you about the orphans'; 'They ask you about the menses'; 'They ask you about the booty'; 'They ask you as to what they should spend'. They never asked but what was of (practical) to them.'' [ad-Durru'l-manthūr]

It is written in Majma'u 'l-bayān that this verse was revealed about ‘Amr ibn al-Jamūḥ; he was a very old man of great wealth. He said: ‘ ‘ O Messenger of Allāh! What should I give in charity and to whom?’’ Then Allāh revealed this verse.

The author says: This tradition has also been narrated in ad-Durru’l-manthūr through Ibn al-Mundhir from Ibn Ḥayyān. But the scholars have said that this tradition is weak. Apart from the weakness in the chain of narrators, it is not in conformity with the verse, because the verse mentions only one question as to what should be spent, and not on whom.

Similarly, two other traditions reported in that book do not conform with the verse. The first is narrated through Ibn Jarīr and Ibn al-Mundhir from Ibn Jarīḥ that he said: ‘‘The believers asked the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) where they should put (i.e. spend) their wealth. So, the verse was revealed: They ask you as to what they should spend. Say: ‘Whatever of good you spend ... ’ This, then, is voluntary (non-obligatory) expenditure; and zakāt is different from all of it.’’

The second one is narrated from as-Suddī that he said: The day when this verse was revealed, there was no zakāt. It is (about) the spending what one does on one’s family and the alms one gives away. Then (the law of) zakāt abrogated it.

The author says: It is clear that the relation between the verse of zakāt (Take alms out of their wealth — 9:103) and this verse is not of abrogation at all. Or does the word ‘‘abrogation’’ mean something else in their language?

Fighting has been prescribed for you, and it is (an object of) dislike to you; and it may be that you dislike a thing while it is good for you, and it may be that you love a thing while it is evil for you; and Allāh knows, while you do not know. (216) *They ask you concerning the sacred month about fighting in it. (217) Surely those who believed and those who fled (their home) and strove hard in the way of Allāh, these hope for the mercy of Allāh; and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful. (218)

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: Fighting has been prescribed for you, and it is (an object of) dislike to you: It has repeatedly been explained that kitābah

(writing, الكتابة), which has been translated here as prescription, means an obligatory command, if used in the matter of legislation, and a firm decree, if used in the matter of creation. This verse, therefore, shows that fighting in the way of Allāh is compulsory for all believers (as the verse is addressed to them) except those who are exempted by other verses or traditions. For example: There is no blame (in staying behind) on the weak, nor on the sick, nor on those who do not find what they should spend, so long as they are sincere to Allāh and His Apostle ... nor on those who when they came to you that you might carry them, you said: I cannot find that on which to carry you ... (9:91—92)

The verb, kutiba (has been written, اكتب) is in the passive voice, because it is followed by the phrase, and it is (an object of) dislike to you. It was not proper to mention clearly the name of the writer (i.e. Allāh) of a writing which was to be an object of dislike to the believers. By not using the active voice, the verse protected the sanctity of the divine name and removed every chance of slight to it.

Kurh (dislike, ألكره) is the hardship felt by man in his self, naturally or otherwise. Karh (compulsion, ألكره) is the hardship forced upon him by extraneous agencies as when he is forced to do a work which he does not like to do. Allāh says: … it is not lawful for you that you should take women as heritage against (their) will ... (4:19); ... so He said to it and to the earth: Come both, willingly or unwillingly ... (4:11)

Why was the ordained fighting to be an object of dislike to the believers? Three explanations have been given for it:-

1) Fighting entails loss of limbs and lives, economic hard ship, monetary loss and the deterioration of law and order; goods necessary for life disappear from the market and become scarce; and many other things crop up in society which man dislikes by nature. Allāh has praised the believers in His book and said that a group of them were sincere in their faith and successful in their endeavours. But, at the same time, He has admonished another group of them because of their shaky belief and crooked thinking, as may be seen in the verses revealed about the battles of Badr, Uḥud and Khandaq etc. The people addressed by this verse were, therefore, of two types: One, steadfast in their faith, who could not dislike any command of Allāh; the other, those who might dislike them, and this second group was more numerous. Therefore, it was quite in order to describe such a mixed group as disliking an order, especially when those disliking it were in the majority.

2) The believers were aware that the unbelievers were well-prepared for fighting and had more strength and material support than the Muslims. They, therefore, thought that fighting at that particular time would not be in the interests of the Muslims; hence, the order to fight should be delayed for some other suitable time. This postponement would give them time to increase their manpower, war-material and martial strength. Allāh told them in this verse that they were mistaken in this view, because Allāh in this affair has a purpose which shall surely be attained; He knows the hidden reality of everything while their knowledge is confined only to the apparent facts.

3) The believers were well-trained by the Qur'ān, and, accordingly, they felt clemency towards the creatures of Allāh, and mercy and pity had become second nature to them. They did not like fighting with the unbelievers, as it meant that a number of their adversaries would die in disbelief, and the believers were not pleased about that. They would have liked to deal with those adversaries with good humour, and live with them with nobleness and gentleness, inviting them to Islam with good exhortation, hoping that they would come to the right path. They thought that in this way, they would protect themselves from death, and the unbelievers from dying in disbelief and entering into eternal fire.

Allāh, in this verse, made it clear that this thought of theirs was not correct. Allāh, Who ordained the fighting knew very well that the call of truth would have no effect on those misguided souls who were spiritually a total failure. The true religion could not expect any good from them either in this world or in the next. They were in humanity like a totally degenerated limb which will certainly infect other organs if not removed from the body by a surgical operation.

These are the explanations given for the words of Allāh, and it is (an object of) dislike to you. But the first one is the most appropriate, especially if we look at the verses admonishing a group of believers (referred to in the explanation) and keep in view the passive voice of the verb, has been written on you, i.e., has been prescribed for you.

Qur'ān: and it may be that you dislike a thing while it is good for you: It has already been explained that the words like ''may be'' and ''perhaps'', when used in divine speech, mean ''it is hoped''. This hope is related not to the speaker (Allāh) but to the hearers. In other words, when Allāh says: may be it is so it does not mean that He hopes it will be so (Elevated be He from such uncertainties!); rather it means that the hearers should hope or expect it in this way.

The repetition of ‘‘may be’’ in this sentence and the following one (and it may be that you love a thing while it is evil for you) means that the believers disliked fighting and loved peace; so Allāh told them that they were mistaken in both. If the sentence is framed without repeating the word ‘‘may be’’ (i.e. ‘and it may be that you dislike a thing while it is good for you or love a thing while it is evil for you’) it will convey the idea that ‘‘your dislike and love have no significance, because such feelings are often misplaced.’’ Such a sentence is addressed to the one who .has erred in something, for example, if one dislikes meeting a certain person. But if he has erred in two things — e.g., he dislikes mixing with the people and loves seclusion — then the norms of elocution demand that he should be warned against both tendencies, e.g. ‘you are neither justified in your dislike, nor are you right in your love; it may be that you dislike a thing while it is good for you, and it may be that you love a thing and it is evil for you; because you do not know the unseen, and, therefore, you cannot find your way towards the hidden realities of any thing.’ As the believers, in addition to their dislike of fighting, also loved peace and ease (as is implied in the previous verse: or do you think that you would enter the Garden while yet the like of those who passed away before you has not come upon you). Allāh pointed to both mistakes in two separate sentences: it may be that you dislike ... and it may be that you lave ...

Qur’ān: and Allāh knows while you do not know: This is the final step in making their mistake known to them. Allāh has gradually made them realise that they were in manifest error. To begin with, He told them that it was possible that they were mistaken in their dislike of the fighting (it may be that you dislike ...). Their minds accepted the implication of those two sentences; and thus they were freed from their compound ignorance, as now they felt doubtful about the correctness of their views. When that stage was reached, Allāh told them clearly that the order which you dislike, is ordained by Him who is not unaware of the hidden realities of the things, while your views are based on your psyche which knows only that much which it has been allowed by Allāh to know. Therefore, it is incumbent upon you to leave all such decisions into His hand.

The verse proves that knowledge, in its reality and totality, is Allāh's only; and others have no knowledge of their own at all. This reality is explained in many other verses: Allāh, surely nothing is hidden from Him ... (3:5), and they cannot comprehend anything out of His knowledge except what He pleases... (2:255). And some explanation about fighting has been given in the verse 2:190, And fight in the way of Allāh...

Qur'ān: They ask you concerning the sacred month about fighting in it: The verse contains the prohibition of fighting in the sacred month. Then it goes on to say that disbelief and turning the people of the Sacred Mosque out of it are far graver sins and that the mischief is graver than the killing. These sentences show that there must have occurred some incident which prompted the believers to ask the question, and that there was some killing in that incident, but that killing was not intentional. (See the last verse: Surely those who believed ... these hope for the mercy of Allāh.)All these pointers confirm what has been described in the traditions that some believers had killed an unbeliever unknowingly in the sacred month in a battle, and that the unbelievers had ridiculed the Muslims for it. The incident was that of 'Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh and his companions.

Qur'ān: Say, fighting, in it is a grave matter; and hindering (men) from Allāh's way and denying it and (hindering men from) the Sacred Mosque ...: ''Allāh's way'' means worship and virtuous actions and especially the pilgrimage (ḥajj). Apparently the pronoun ''it'' in ''denying it'' refers to ''Allāh's way''; thus it would mean denial in practice, not in faith. And ''the Sacred Mosque'' is in conjunction with ''Allāh's way'', and means 'hindering from Allāh's way and the Sacred Mosque'.

The verse clearly shows that fighting in the sacred month is forbidden.

It has been said that this verse was abrogated by the verse: then slay the idolaters wherever you find them (9:5) But this view is not correct, and some explanation about it have been given in the commentary of the verses of fighting.

Qur'ān: and turning its people out of it are still graver with Allāh, and the mischief is graver than the killing: What the idolators had done — turning the Apostle of Allāh and the believers out of the Sacred Mosque (and they were truly the people of the Sacred Mosque) — is far graver than fighting. And the mischief done by them in rebuking the believers and calling them back to disbelief is graver than killing. Therefore, they have no right to reprove the believers for killing when they themselves had committed far graver sins. So far as the believers are concerned, they still hope for the mercy of Allāh, and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful.

Qur'ān : and they will go on fighting with you so that they may turn you back ... : ḥatta (حتّى) means ''till''; but here it signifies cause or purpose. That is why it has been translated here as ''so that''.

Qur'ān: and whoever of you turns back ... these it is whose dees are forfeited ... and they are inmates of fire: It threatens apostates with the forfeiture of their deeds and an eternal abode in the Fire.

FORFEITURE OF DEEDS

Forfeiture (ḥabṭ, الحبط) means nullification of a deed and invalidity of its effects. Whenever this word is used in the Qur'ān, it is always related to deeds; for example, Surely, if you associate (others with Allāh), your deed will certainly be forfeit and you will certainly be of the losers. (39:65) Surely those who disbelieve and turn away from Allāh's way and oppose the Apostle, after that guidance has become clear to them, cannot harm Allāh in any way, and He shall make null their deeds. O you who believe! Obey Allāh and obey the, Apostle, and do not make your deeds of no effect. (47:32—33) If we compare the last phrases of both verses, we shall see that the nullifying of the deeds is the same as the deeds being of no effect. This meaning is more clearly seen in the verse: and what they wrought in it shall be forfeit, and vain (null and void) is what they do. (11:16) And nearer to it is the word of Allāh, And We will proceed to what they have done of deeds, so We shall render them as scattered floating dust. (25:23)

In short, ḥabṭ (.الحبط) of deeds means their coming to nothing and their being of no effect. It has been said that it is derived from ḥabaṭa (حبط) which is used when an animal over-eats and its stomach distends, often resulting in its death.

The effect of forfeiture (ḥabṭ, الحبط) as described by Allāh, is nullification of the deed in both worlds, here as well as in the hereafter. Forfeiture has a connection with the deeds and it affects the life hereafter. The faith beautifies this world's life as well as it makes the life hereafter a pleasant one. Allāh says: Whoever does good, whether male or female, and he is a believer, We will most certainly make him live a happy life, and We shall most certainly give them their reward for the best of what they did.(16:97) Also it is clear, without any shadow of doubt, that the endeavours of the unbeliever are lost and his deeds are of no effect in this world; and it is especially true in the case of the man who turns back towards infidelity, leaving the true faith. His heart cuts itself away from its anchor in this stormy life — the anchor being belief in the One and only God. He has nowhere to turn — where he can express his joyful thanks when blessed with a bounty, find solace when confronted with a misfortune, and to whom he can pray when in need of something. Allāh says: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth? (6:123) This verse shows that the believer has in this world a good life and a light in his actions which the disbeliever does not possess. Also Allāh says: … then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy. And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life, and We will raise him, on the day of resurrection, blind. (20:124) This verse also proves that the life of the unbeliever in this world is a straitened one, full of difficulties, and that a believer's life, in contrast, is a blessed, happy and pleasant one.

All this explanation, together with the cause of both groups' happiness and unhappiness respectively, is given in this short verse: That is because Allāh is the Master of those who believe, and because the unbelievers have no master for them. (47:11)

It appears from the above details that deeds (a'māl, الأعمال) here means all the actions done by a man so as to attain happiness in life. The meaning of ''deeds'' in this context is not confined to the apostate's acts of worship and other virtuous deeds done by him when he was a Muslim. Moreover, the forfeiture of deeds has been mentioned even in connection with those who do not perform any act of worship, for example, disbelievers and hypocrites. It clearly proves that it is not only acts of worship which are forfeited. See, for example, the verses: O you who believe! If you help (the cause of) Allāh He will help you and make firm your feet. And (as for) those who disbelieve, for them is destruction, and He has let their deeds go astray. That is because they disliked what Allāh revealed, so He rendered their deeds null (47:7—9); Surely (as for) those who disbelieve in the signs of Allāh and slay the prophets unjustly and slay those among men who enjoin justice, announce to them a painful chastisement. Those are they whose deeds shall become null in this world, as well as the hereafter, and they shall have no helpers. (3:21—22) There are many verses like these.

The gist of the verse under discussion, like other verses of forfeiture, is that disbelief and apostasy make the deeds ineffective, i.e., such deeds lose their power to make life blissful. On the other hand, true faith and belief give life to the deeds and they create felicity, bliss and happiness in life. If someone acquires true faith after disbelief, his deeds are given a new life and they become effective in making life blessed and happy (although they were forfeit and ineffective before). Likewise, if he apostatizes after having been a believer, all his deeds become dead, null and void; they cannot make life in this world or in the here after happy. Thereafter, if he leaves his apostasy and comes back to the fold of Islam, it is hoped that his deeds will be revived; but if he dies in the apostasy, the forfeiture will have been confirmed and misery and unhappiness will be written down for him.

This explanation is enough to show that the controversy about the forfeiture of the deeds of an apostate — whether it is effected at the time of apostasy or at his death — is baseless. That controversy is as follows:-

Some people say that those deeds of an apostate which were done before his apostasy remain preserved until his death, and that if he does not return to the true faith before his death, they will become forfeit on his death. Their argument is based on this very verse which is under discussion: and whoever of you turns back from his religion, then dies while an unbeliever — these it is whose deeds are forfeited in this world and the hereafter ... They also bring in their support the verse: On the day when they shall see the angels ... And We will proceed to what they have done of deeds, so we shall render them as scattered floating dust. (25:22—23) This verse describes the condition of unbelievers at the time of death ; and it implies that if the apostate had returned to the true belief, those deeds which he had done before apostasy would have remained valid.

Others say that apostasy nullifies deeds completely; and they do not return to him even if he comes back to the true belief. Of course, the deeds done after his return to the true belief do belong to him. According to them, the verse contains the words, ‘‘then dies while an unbeliever’’ because it purports to show the condition of all his actions done during his life in this world.

But the explanation given by us shows that there is no ground here at all for any such controversy. The verse in fact conveys the meaning that all his actions and deeds become ineffective in the meaning that they cannot bring any bliss, felicity or happiness in his life.

There are two other questions here, somewhat related with the above one: The first is the theory of iḥbāṭ (الاحباط.). It is the theory that good and evil deeds cancel each other.

Some people said that actions cancel and invalidate each other. These people are further divided in two groups: One says that every subsequent evil deed cancels the preceeding good one, and vice versa. It means that at any given time a man has in his account either good only or evil only. The other group says that there is a system of counterbalancing good and evil deeds; the weight of the lighter side is deducted from the weightier side, the balance remaining on account. This theory, like the previous one, means that at the end there remains in the man’s account only good or only evil actions — if any balance is left after the said counter balancing.

Both these views are wrong, because:-

First: Allāh says in the Qur’ān; And others have confessed their faults, they have mingled a good deed and an evil one, maybe Allāh will turn to them (mercifully); surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful. (9:102) This verse clearly says that there are some good deeds and some evil ones, and that they will remain written in the account of the doer in their original form until the mercy of Allāh decides about them. This cuts away the roots of the theory of cancellation with all its interpretations.

Second: Allāh uses the same system of reward and punishment that is used by reasonable men in this world — rewarding the good deed and punishing the evil one, each separate from the other. Of course, if one commits a sin that cuts away the relationship between Master and servant (e.g. disbelief or idolatory), then all his deeds become forfeit. There are numerous verses to prove it; and there is no need to quote them here.

The second related question is the theory of takfīr (التّكفير).Takfīr (التّكفير) is the belief that the actions do not cancel each other; every action is preserved — a good action has its own effect and an evil one its own. But, as clearly mentioned in the Qur'ān, a good deed sometimes atones for, and removes, an evil one. Allāh says: O you who believe! If you fear Allāh, He will grant you a distinction and remove from you your evil ... (8:29); then whoever hastens off in two days, there is no sin on him, and whoever tarries (there) there is no sin on him (2:203); If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins … (4:31).

Not only this, but some good deeds change an evil action into a good one, as Allāh says: Except him who repents and believes and does a good deed; so these are they of whom Allāh changes the evil deeds to good ones; and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful. (25:70)

There is another matter which is like the basis of all these questions: When and where does the doer become entitled to recompense? Some have said: it is the time of the action. Others have said: the time of death. Still others have said: the hereafter. And a fourth group has said: it is the time of the action but only if the doer continues in the same condition upto his death.

Every group offers various verses of the Qur'ān in support of its view, and some add some rational argument too.

Let us say that reward and punishment, forfeiture and atonement are the effects of the deeds themselves (as we have explained in our commentary of verse 2:26). It follows that the human soul, as long as it is connected with the body, is subject to changes in its qualities. When man does something good, there appears in his soul a spiritual quality which entitles it to receive the reward; and when he commits a sin, the spiritual quality appearing in his soul entitles it to receive chastisement. As man in this world is subject to change from one condition to other, (because he continues to mingle good deeds with evil ones), his present spiritual quality may possibly be changed to its opposite as a result of his subsequent deeds. This goes on till death overtakes him. The soul departs from the body, actions stop, changes cease, potentialities come to an end, and qualities acquired upto that time are firmly established in his soul in a way that it no longer accepts any change or alteration (except through the mercy of Allāh or intercession by His chosen servants).

Or let us say, as we have said earlier, that Allāh uses the same system of recompense as is used by reasonable men in this world. It means that obedience or disobedience to divine laws and their recompense follows the same method which is seen in social laws. Reasonable people praise and commend the law-abiding and obedient man as soon as he does something good, and condemn a disobedient man as soon as he does something wrong. But, at the same time, they know that the said commendation or condemnation may be changed in the future, because the man concerned may alter his ways. In short, the praise or condemnation is offered at once, but its continuation depends on the man's continuing in the same way in the future. But an ever-lasting praise or ever-lasting condemnation, not subject to any further change, will attach to him when there is no longer any possibility of change in his quality, i.e. by death or by the loss of potentiality.

These explanations are enough to show that all the above mentioned views on this subject have, in one way or the other, deviated from the truth, because they have based their discourse on wrong premises.

The truth is as follows:-

First: A man becomes entitled to reward or punishment as soon as he does whatever he does; but that reward or punishment is still subject to change or alteration. It is only on death that it is confirmed without any possibility of alteration, as we have described above.

Second: The same is the case with the forfeiture of deeds as a result of disbelief, etc. The deeds become forfeited as soon as the man disbelieves, etc. But the forfeiture is confirmed at death.

Third: Forfeiture applies not only to the deeds related to the hereafter, but to those connected with this world also.

Fourth: Iḥbāṭ (الاحباط) i.e., the theory of good and evil deeds cancelling each other is wrong. But takfīr (التّكفير) is correct — the belief that good actions sometimes expiate evil ones.

AN ESSAY ON THE RULES GOVERNING ACTIONS

A) About Their Reward and Punishment:

There are various rules about the actions of man and their recompense, which are enumerated here:-

1) There are some sins which cause the forfeiture of good deeds in this world and the hereafter. One is apostasy. Allāh says in the verse under discussion: and whoever of you turns back from his religion then dies while an unbeliever, these it is whose deeds are forfeited in this world and the hereafter.

Other such sin is disbelief in the signs of Allāh and enmity towards them. Allāh says: Surely (as for) those who disbelieve in the signs of Allāh and slay the prophets unjustly and slay those among men who enjoin justice, announce to them a painful chastisement. Those are they whose works shall become null in this world as well as the hereafter ... (3:20—21)

Likewise, there are some acts of obedience, like (submission to) Islam and repentance, that expiate the evil deeds of this world as well as the hereafter; Allāh says: Say: O My servants! Who have acted extravagantly against their own souls, do not des pair of the mercy of Allāh; Surely Allāh forgives the faults (sins) altogether; surely He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. And return to your Lord (repent before Him) and submit to Him before there comes to you the punishment, then you shall not be helped. And follow the best that has been revealed to you from your Lord ... (39:53—55). Also, he says:… then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy. And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life, and We will raise him, on the day of resurrection, blind. (20:123—124)

2) There are some sins which cause the forfeiture of some of good deeds. Such, for example, is opposition to the Prophet. Allāh says: Surely those who disbelieve and turn away from Allāh's way and oppose the Apostle after that guidance has become clear to them, cannot harm Allāh in any way, and He shall make null their deeds. O you who believe! Obey Allāh and obey the Apostle, and do not make your deeds of no effect (null and void). (47:32—33)

A comparison between the two sentences implies that the order of ''obedience'' of the Apostle is the same as the prohibition of his opposition, and ibṭāl (nullification of the deed, الابطال) is its forfeiture.

Another such sin is raising one's voice above the voice of the Prophet. Allāh says: O you who believe! Do not raise your voices above the voice of the Prophet, and do not speak loud to him as you speak loud to one another, lest your deeds become null while you do not perceive. (49:2)

Likewise, there are some acts of obedience which expiate and atone some sins. Such are the obligatory prayers, ḥajj and the avoidance of great sins. Allāh says:

About prayer: And establish prayer in the two ends of the day and at the approaches of the night; surely good deeds take away the evil deeds; this is reminder to the mindful. (11:114)

About ḥajj: then whoever hastens off in two days, there is no sin on him, and whoever tarries (there), there is no sin on him. (2:203)

About avoidance of great sins: If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins ... (4:31)

Those who avoid the great sins and the indecencies except small sins (or just passing thoughts); surely your Lord is liberal in forgiving. (53:32)

3) There are some sins which transfer the good deeds from their doer to someone else. Murder is one of those sins. Allāh says: Verily I intend that you bear my sin and (also) your sin ... (5:29)

Other such sins, according to the traditions of the Prophet and the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt are backbiting and calumny, and others.

There are, likewise, some acts of obedience which transfer the evil deeds from the doer to someone else, as will be explained later.

4) There are some sins which transfer to the doer evil deeds similar to those committed by another person. Allāh says: That they may bear their own burdens entirely on the day of resurrection and also of the burdens of those whom they lead astray without knowledge. (16:25)

And most certainly they shall carry their own burdens, and other burdens with their own burdens. (29:13)

In the same way, some acts of obedience transfer to the doer good deeds similar to those done by another person. Allāh says: and We write down what they have sent before and their foot prints ... (36:12)

5) Some sins cause double punishment. Allāh says: In that case We would certainly have made you to taste a double (punishment) in this life and a double (punishment) after death ... (17:75);….the punishment shall be increased to her doubly (33:30)

On the other hand, there are some good deeds which bring double reward or even more. Allāh says about spending in the way of Allāh: The parable of those who spend their wealth in the way of Allāh is as parable of a grain growing seven ears, in every ear there are a hundred grain; and Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases. (2:261). Also He says; These shall be granted their reward twice (28:54); He will give you two portions of His mercy, and make for you a light with which you will walk, and forgive you. (57:28)

Moreover all good deeds get their rewards multiplied manifold, as Allāh says: Whoever brings a good deed, he shall have ten like it... (6:161)

6) Some good actions change the evil deeds into good ones. Allāh says: Except him who repents and believes and does a good deed; so these are they of whom Allāh changes the evil deeds to good ones ... (25:70)

7) There are some good deeds whose like is given to other than the doer (without the doer losing it or its reward). Allāh says: And (as for) those who believe and their offspring follow them in faith, We will unite with them their offspring and We will not diminish to them aught of their work ... (52:21)

The same may happen about some evil deeds. For example, if one oppresses orphans it brings the same type of oppression on his own children after his death. Allāh says: And let those fear who, should they leave behind them weakly offspring, would fear on their account ... (4:9)

8) Some good deeds transfer the evil deeds of the doer (let us call him Zayd) to another person (Bakr), and the good deeds of Bakr to Zayd. Likewise, some evil deeds transfer the good deeds of the doer, Zayd, to Bakr, and the evil deeds of Bakr to Zayd.

This is a surprising factor in reward and recompense, and we shall explain it in detail under verse 8:37: So that Allāh may separate the impure from the pure, and put the impure, some of it upon the other, and pile it up together, then cast it into hell ...

There are many traditions explaining the situations where the above-mentioned changes and exchanges may occur, and we shall quote them in the commentaries of these verses, God willing.

If we ponder on the various verses quoted above, we shall see that the system of the recompense of actions (their effectiveness in bringing about happiness and unhappiness) is entirely different from the system of their physical effect. For example, eating is a work which by various actions and reactions affects the eater and satisfies his hunger, but that satiation is not carried on to someone else, nor is it transferred from the eater to another person. Also, the object of the said eating is the food eaten; the eating changes the food stage by stage into various forms. But that eating cannot affect other food, nor can that food be changed or exchanged with other eaters, nor can the nature of the food be changed to something else. In the same way, if Zayd beats ‘Umar, the action is beating, not something else; the beater is Zayd, not someone else; and the beaten one is ‘Umar, not another person.

But when it comes to the effectiveness of the same actions in happiness or unhappiness, the system completely changes. Allāh says:... and they did not do Us any harm but they did harm their own souls ... (2:57); ... and the evil plan does not beset any save the authors of it. (35:43); See how they lied against their own souls ... (6:24); Then shall it be said to them: Where is that which you used to set up besides Allāh? They shall say: They are gone away from us, nay, we used not to call upon anything before. Thus does Allāh confound the unbelievers. (40:73—74)

In short, in the world of ‘‘recompense’’, one action is sometimes changed to another, sometimes transferred to someone other than the doer, sometimes given an opposite effect. In other words, the system of recompense is quite different from physical causes and effects.

Question: In that case, there will be no place for reason in the world of actions and their effects, and the rule of wisdom will come to an end; nothing will remain in its real form.

Answer: It is not correct to say that reason and wisdom have no place in this scheme. Allāh and His angels, as He has described in His Book, do offer intellectual arguments against the sinners at the time of death and in Barzakh; and they will offer the same type of proofs against them on the day of resurrection and in Paradise and Hell. Allāh says: And the trumpet shall be blown, so all those that are in the heavens and all those that are in the earth shall swoon, except such as Allāh please; then it shall be blown again, then Lo! they shall stand up awaiting. And the earth shall beam with the light of its Lord, and the Book shall be laid down, and the prophets and the witnesses shall be brought up, and judgement shall be given between them with justice, and they shall not be dealt with unjustly. And every soul shall be paid back fully what it has done, and He knows best what they do. (39:68-70).

The Qur'ān repeatedly says that Allāh shall decide on the day of resurrection between the people with justice in that which they differed in. For example, it narrates the argument which Satan will put forth on that day: And Satan shall say after the affair is decided: Surely Allāh promised you the promise of truth, and I gave you promises then failed to keep them to you; and I had no authority over you, except that I called you and you obeyed me; therefore do not blame me but blame yourselves: I cannot be your aider (now) nor can you be my aiders; surely I disbelieved in your associating me with Allāh before; surely it is the unjust that shall have the painful punishment. (14:22)

All such verses clearly show that rational arguments and proofs are not, and shall not be, abolished in the world of recompense, although that place is entirely different from this physical world.

Question: But how, then, to reconcile the two claims: that the world of recompense has its own system of reward and punishment, totally different from this world, and that reason also rules in that world?

Answer: The fact is that Allāh has talked with people, in guiding them, in their own language, and has used the expressions of social wisdom while addressing them, and has based His speech on the principles and rules of mastership and servitude. He calls Himself Master, the men are His slaves, the prophets are His messengers to them, He continuously maintains contact with them through commands and prohibitions, prophetic missions and admonishments, good tidings and warnings, promises and threats, and all related matters like punishment and forgiveness, and so forth.

This is the style of the Qur'ān when it talks with mankind. But it has made it clear that the real affair is far above human thinking and imagination. People cannot understand it, nor can their limited intellects comprehend it. That is why it has been brought down to the level of their mental power and clothed in a language which they can understand. In this way, it has been made possible for them to know as much of the sublime truth as was necessary for their happiness and bliss. Allāh says: (I swear) by the book that makes manifest (the truth): surely We made it an Arabic Qur'ān so that you may understand. And surely it is in the original of the Book with Us, truly elevated, full of wisdom. (43:2—4)

It is for this reason that the Qur'ān has based its description of the rules of recompense, and all related matters, on the fundamentals of social laws which are known to reasonable men and which are based on social good and evil.

It is really wonderful how those sublime realities, which are so much higher than the level of the common human intellect, can still be explained in terms of that very intellect. For example, practical social wisdom does not reject the idea of giving a harder punishment to a wrong-doer by holding him responsible for all the social evil resulting from his misdeed. Thus, a murderer may be held responsible for the loss of all social benefits and rights resulting from the death of the slain person. And a person starting an evil custom may be punished for the like misdeeds of his followers. In the first example, it may be decreed that the wrongs done apparently by the slain person, were done by the murderer; and in the second example, it may be decided that the like of the misdeeds done by the followers were also done by the initiator of that misdeed, while the followers are not free from the blame in any way — thus the deeds of the followers are the deeds of the initiator as well, and both shall be punished for them.

Similarly, there are situations in which it may be decreed that the doer of an action was not its doer, or that a particular action is in reality some other action, or that the good deeds of someone else belong to this man, or that this man shall have the like of the good deeds done by the other.

The Qur'ān offers reasons for all such changes and exchanges in the world of recompense and explains them in terms of the social laws found in human society, bringing these sublime realities down to the level of the human mind, although the system of that world is totally different from this physical one, and although our social laws have a limited scope and are not valid beyond this life. It is only on the day of resurrection that those hidden realities will manifest themselves before the eyes of man. Allāh says: And certainly We have brought them a book which We have explained with knowledge, a guidance and a mercy for the people who believe. Do they wait for aught but its final interpretation? On the day when its final interpretation comes about, those who neglected it before will say: Indeed the apostle of our Lord had brought the truth …(7:52—53) Also, He says: And this Qur'ān is not such as could be forged by those besides Allāh, but is a verification of that which is before it and a clear explanation of the book ... Nay, they rejected that of which they have no comprehensive knowledge, and its final interpretation has not yet come to them ... (10:37—39)

Question: These verses, describing such a strange system of recompense, are in conflict with other verses which say that everyone will be responsible for his own action. See for example the following verses:-

So, he who has done an atom's weight of good shall see it. And he who has done an atom's weight of evil shall see it. (99:78)

... and no bearer of burden shall bear the burden of another ... (6:164)

...every man is responsible for what he has wrought.(52:21)

And that man shall have nothing but what he strives for. (53:39)

Surely Allāh does not do any injustice to men, but men do injustice to themselves. (10:44)

There are numerous such verses, and they are diametrically opposed to the earlier-mentioned verses about this system of recompense.

Answer: Not at all. The earlier mentioned verses have decreed that the misdeeds done by a man who was slain unjustly were actually done by the unjust murderer. Now if the murderer is punished for those misdeeds, he is punished not for the deeds of the other person, but for those done by himself. Similarly, they have decided that if a man follows another in a sinful act, that action was not done by the follower alone; it is the work of the follower as well as the leader. Thus, there are two sins here, one of the follower and another of the leader. And the leader will be punished, not for the sin of the follower, but for his own. In the same way, those verses have judged that if someone aids an oppressor in his oppression or follows a leader on the wrong path, then the said helper or follower is a partner in those misdeeds; and whatever wrong is done by that oppressor or leader, the said helper or follower is its doer to the same degree.

Thus, these people and others like them are literally and completely governed by the verses quoted in the question, such as ''no bearer of burden shall bear the burden of another''. Such cases are not outside the sphere of such verses; they are not in conflict with them, nor are they as an exception from the rule.

The same fact is hinted at in the verse,...and judgement shall be given between them with justice, and they shall not be dealt with unjustly. And every soul shall be paid back fully what it has done, and He knows best what they do. (39:69—70) The sentence, He knows best what they do shows, or hints at, the fact that this paying back fully what every soul has done will be done according to the knowledge of Allāh, and according to His, not their, reckoning.

The sinners have no knowledge and no wisdom. Allāh has deprived them of reason in this world, as He narrates the confession of the people of the Fire: And they shall say: Had we but listened or pondered (or, understood), we would not have been among the inmates of the burring fire. (67:10). The same will be the case in the hereafter, as Allāh says: And whoever is blind in this (world), he shall also be blind in the hereafter, and more erring from the way. (17:72); also He says, It is the fire kindled by Allāh, which rises above the hearts. (104:6—7). This deprivation is confirmed in the verse:… until when they have all come up with one another into it, the last of them shall say with regard to the foremost of them: Our Lord! these led us astray, therefore, give them a double chastisement of the fire. He will say: Every one shall have double but you do not know. (7:38) This verse proves that both the leaders and the followers shall be given double punishment — the leaders, because they went astray and misled others into error; and the followers, because they went astray and kept the path of error open by walking in it. Then the verse says that they do not know.

Question: These verses, which say that the sinners are deprived of knowledge in this world as well as in the hereafter, contradict other verses which say that they do possess knowledge. For example, Allāh says: A book of which the verses are made plain, an Arabic Qur'ān for people who know. (41:3) Add to it the verses which offer arguments against them: how can one argue with someone who has no knowledge and cannot understand reasoning. Moreover, these verses themselves contain a sort of argument against them in the hereafter. All these things compel us to believe that sinners will possess knowledge and reason in the hereafter.

Apart from this, there are some verses which specifically say that they will possess knowledge and certainty in the hereafter. For example: Certainly you were heedless of it, but now We have removed from you your veil, so your sight today is sharp (50:22); And could you but see when the guilty shall hang down their heads before their Lord! Our Lord! We saw and we heard, therefore send us back, so that we may do good; surely (now) we are certain. (32:12)

Answer: When it is said that sinners have no knowledge in this world, it means that they do not act according to their knowledge. And when it is said that they shall have no knowledge in the hereafter, it means that they cannot escape from the effects of the foolish acts which they have done in this world, and that foolishness will continue to torment them in the hereafter. For example: And We have made every man's actions to cling to his neck, and We will bring forth to him on the resurrection day a book which he will find wide open (17:13); Until when he comes to Us, he says (to Satan): 0 would that between me and thee there were the distance of the east and the west ... (43:38). There are many verses which support this interpretation, and we shall explain this matter fully in the commentary of the verse 2:242: Then Allāh makes clear to you His signs so that you may under stand.

Imām al-Ghazālī has explained the matter of the transfer of deeds in a different way in one of his books. The gist of his discourse is as follows:-

''The exchange and transfer of good and evil deeds because of injustice and sin is affected in this world as soon as that injustice and sin occurs; but it will be known (only) on the day of resurrection. Then the oppressor will find his good deeds in the accounts of the oppressed. But that transfer had already been effected in this life. Then Allāh will say on that day, To whom belongs the kingdom this day? To Allāh, the One, the Subduer (of all). (40:16) Thus Allāh will declare in the hereafter that the kingdom belongs to Him. But that kingdom will not come to Him on that day; it is His always and will remain His forever, although this reality will not manifest itself to His creatures before the day of resurrection. And what a man does not know is for him non-existant, even if in reality it exists; when he comes to know of it, it is as though it came into existence just then.

''Some people say that ''action'' is an immaterial, incorporeal thing. It is not a substance which could be transferred from one person to another in this life. And it is equally impossible to transfer it in the hereafter; because after death the action ceases to exist, and a non-existent thing cannot be brought back to existence. Therefore, it is difficult to see how a good or evil deed can be transferred from one person to another, either in this life or in the hereafter.

''But this objection is not correct. When we say that a good deed is transferred, we mean that its reward is transferred. Just as the acts of obedience are done to obtain their reward, so the transfer of the reward, i.e. the effect, was metaphorically mentioned as the transfer of the cause, i.e. the good deed itself. That reward or effect is not something separate from the human soul; it is a quality ingrained in it. When the soul is brought back in the body, it will return with all its qualities, including the effects of good or evil deeds.

''When a man does a good deed, i.e. an act of obedience, a light appears in his heart. In the same way a sin or misdeed causes darkness to appear therein. The light of obedience connects the heart with the sublime world of divine light, knowledge and perception. On the contrary, misdeed and oppression remove the heart away from that world. The effects of good and evil actions are opposed to each other; each tries to weaken or eradicate the other. Allāh has said: Surely good deeds take away the evil deeds. (11:114) The Prophet has said: 'If you commit any evil deed, follow it up with a good deed, so that it may eradicate it.' Every ill or hurt removes the effects of some sins. That is why the Prophet has said: 'Verily, man is rewarded even for a thorn which pricks his foot.' Also he said: 'The punishments are atonements.'

''When an oppressor oppresses someone, his action creates in his own heart a darkness and hardness which cause the eradication of the effects of the light (that had appeared in his heart because of the previously-done good deeds). And his victim feels pain and hurt, and thereby his lust and base feelings are weakened and it causes the obliteration from his heart of the effects of the evil deeds done previously. Darkness gives way to light.

''In this way the light which was in the heart of the oppressor is transferred to the heart of the oppressed; and the darkness in the heart of the oppressed goes to the heart of the oppressor. This is the meaning of the transfer or exchange of the good and evil deeds.

''It can be said that it is not the real transfer. What it actually means is that the light of the oppressor's heart is extinguished, and a new light is created in the heart of his victim. And the darkness of his victim's heart is removed and a new darkness is created in the heart of the oppressor. And it is not the real interchange.

''The above observation is correct, but the use of this word is still justified. We say: 'The shadow moved from here to there', or 'The light of the sun or of the lamp moved from the floor to the wall'. Such sentences are quite in order, as they are based on metaphor. And there is a double metaphor in our saying that good deeds are transferred from one man to another. First, the reward of the good deed is called a good deed, using the name of the cause for its effect; then the eradication of a feature at one place and the creation of its like at other place is called the exchange or transfer of the feature. Such figures of speech are common in every language and it could be proved by logical proofs. The evidence from the Qur'ān and traditions is in addition to that.''

This was the gist of the views expressed by Imām al-Ghazālī. As he himself has said, his explanation reduces this belief to a double metaphor, or a metaphor in metaphor. If we were to extend this interpretation, then all the rules mentioned in this essary would become metaphors. We have written earlier that Allāh has based the system of recompense on social practical wisdom. And there is no doubt that reason treats these laws as a reality, not as a metaphor. Therefore, the system of recompense should also be treated as a reality, not as a metaphor.

This is true so far as this world of practical wisdom is concerned. Of course, if one were to look at the spiritual world, then this whole material world would be seen to be just a metaphor. But here the discussion is not in that context.

Now, we return to the details about deeds:-

B) Actions preserved, written and embodied:

Deeds are preserved and written; and assume the form of a body. Allāh has said:

> On the day that every soul shall find present what it has done of good, and what it has done of evil, it shall wish that between it and that (evil) there were a long duration ... (3:30)

And We have made every man's actions to cling to his neck, and We will bring forth to him on the resurrection day a book which he will find wide open. (17:13)

... and We write down what they have sent before and their footprints, and We have fully recorded everything in a clear writing. (36:12)

Certainly you were heedless of it, but now We have removed from you your evil, so your sight today is sharp. (50:22)

This subject has already been discussed in the first volume.

C) Relation between actions and. ''natural'' phenomena:

There is a relation between actions and happenings outside. By ''actions'' we do not mean here physical movements; what we mean is good and evil deeds. Allāh says:

And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults). (42:30)

Surely Allāh does not change the condition of a people until they change their own condition; and when Allāh intends evil to a people, there is no averting it. (13:11)

This is because Allāh was never to change a favour which He has conferred upon a people until they change their own condition ... (8:53)

These verses clearly show that there is a relation between our actions and the happenings around us, whether good or bad.

This matter is concisely put in two Qur'ānic verses:

And if the people of the town had believed and guarded (against evil), We would certainly have opened up for them blessings from the heaven and the earth; but they rejected, so We overtook them for what they had earned. (7:96)

Mischief has appeared in the land and the sea on account of what the hands of men have wrought, that He may make them taste a part of that which they have done, so that they may return. (30:41)

Obviously, natural phenomena are somehow related to human deeds. If humanity remains obedient to the commandments of Allāh and walks on His chosen path, happiness and goodness follow and the doors of bliss are opened. On the other hand if he strays from the path of obedience and continues in his error, mischief and bad faith, chaos appears in the land and on the sea, nations are destroyed because of the injustice prevalent in them, the state of law and order deteriorates, conflict and war become the norm of the day; in short, happiness becomes a scarce commodity and unhappiness reigns in the land. Not only this; natural calamities and disasters appear, like flood, earthquakes, lightening, cyclones, etc. Allāh has mentioned the deluge of the dam of Ma'ārib, the flood of Nūḥ, the lightening of Thamūd and the gale of ʻĀd as some examples of phenomenon.

When a wicked nation is submerged in depravity, vice and evil, Allāh makes it taste the bad consequences of its misdeeds, and this leads to its decline, fall and destruction. Allāh says:

> Have they not travelled in the earth and seen how was the end of those who were before them? Mightier than these were they in strength and in fortifications in the land, but Allāh destroyed them for their sins; and there was not for them any defender against Allāh. (40:21)
>
> And when We wish to destroy a town, We send our Commandment to the people of it who lead easy lives; thus the word proves true against it, so We destroy it with utter destruction. (17:16)
>
> Then We sent Our apostles one after another; whenever there came to a people their apostles, they called him a liar; so We made some of them follow others and We made them stories; so away with a people who do not believe. (23:44)

So this is the story of evil people. Diametrically opposed to it is the story of good and virtuous nations.

Individuals, like groups and nations, are taken over by the effects of their good and evil deeds, by calamities and misfortunes. In addition to this, an individual is sometimes blessed with the blessings given to his forefathers, and is also sometimes overtaken by the results of his ancestors' misdeeds and oppression. Allāh quotes Yaʻqūb (a.s.) as saying to Yūsuf (a.s.): And thus will your Lord choose you and teach you the interpretation of sayings and make His favour complete to you and to the children of Yaʻqūb as He made it complete before to your fathers, Ibrāhīm and Isḥāq ... (12:6) The favours mentioned in this verse refer to the kingdom, honour, etc. which Allāh gave to Yūsuf.

Thus We made the earth to swallow up him and his abode... (28:81)

….and We assigned to him a lofty tongue of truthfulness. (19:50)

Probably this ‘‘lofty tongue of truthfulness’’ means good and righteous offspring, as Allāh says in another place; And He made it a word to continue in his posterity ... (43:28)

And as for the wall, it belonged to two orphan boys in the city, and there was beneath it a treasure belonging to them, and their father was a righteous man; so your Lord desired that they should attain their maturity and take out their treasure ... (18:82)

And let those fear who, should they leave behind weakly offspring, would fear on their account ... (4:9) It hints that the offspring may be overtaken by the effects of the injustice of their forefathers.

When Allāh bestows a bounty on a nation (or an individual), and that nation (or individual) is righteous, then that bounty is a blessing — and at the same time a trial to test its (or his) faith. Allāh says about Sulaymān (a.s.) that: he said: This is of the grace of my Lord that He may try me whether I am grateful or ungrateful; and whoever is grateful, he is grateful only for his own self, and whoever is ungrateful, then surely my Lord is Self-sufficient, Honoured. (27:40) Again Allāh says: If you are grateful, I would certainly give you more, and if you are ungrateful, My chastisement is truly severe. (14:7) These two verses prove that thank fullness to Allāh is in itself a good deed which brings about the blessings of Allāh.

If that blessed nation (or individual) is unrighteous and wicked then that blessing is a devise of Allāh to lead it step by step to its ruin, or a respite given to it to complete the proof of Allāh against it. Allāh says: … and they devise plans and Allāh too arranges a plan; and Allāh is the best of planners. (8:30). We will lead them on by steps from whence they perceive not; and yet I respite them; surely My plan is firm. (68:44-45); And certainly we tried before them the people of Pharaoh... (44:17)

And if misfortune comes to a nation (or individual), and trouble and travail plague them, and they are righteous people, then that affliction is a test and trial by which Allāh separates his good servants from the evil ones. They come out of that suffering more purified, like gold when it is melted in the fire. Allāh says: Do men think that they will be left alone on saying, We believe, and not be tried? And certainly We tried those before them, so Allāh will certainly know those who are true and He will certainly know the liars. Or do they who work evil think that they will escape Us? Evil is it that they judge! (29:2—4); ... and We bring these days to men by turns, and that Allāh may know those who believe and take witness from among you ... (3:140)

And if the people undergoing hardship are wicked, then that hardship is the chastisement of their misdeeds and a sign of the wrath of Allāh. Earlier-mentioned verses are enough to show this aspect.

So this is the story of actions which happen in the world and ultimately returns to their doer.

It is necessary to mention here that the following verse has no connection with the subject under discussion:-

> And were it not that all people would have been of one way of life, We would certainly have assigned to those who disbelieve in the Beneficent God (to make) of silver the roofs of their houses and the stairs by which they ascend, and the doors of their houses and the couches on which they recline; and (other) embellishments of gold; and all this is naught but provision of this world's life, and the hereafter is with your Lord only for those who guard (against evil). (43:33—35)

The purpose of this verse is to condemn this world and its paraphernalia, and to show that it has no value or importance in the eyes of Allāh, and that is why He bestows it even on the disbelievers. And had it not been misleading to the people, He would have reserved all the ease and comfort of this world for the disbelievers.

Question: Calamities, whether common to all or particular to a group or an individual, like floods, earthquakes, epidemics, wars, famines, and so on occur because of their well-known physical or natural causes. When the causes appear, the results follow; and makes no difference whether the nation or individual is good or wicked. Therefore, there is no reason to say that such phenomena occur because of good or evil deeds. Such a claim is just a theory invented by religion which is not supported by facts or experience.

Answer: We will discuss this philosophical question in detail in the commentary of the verse 7:96, And if the people of the towns had believed and guarded (against evil), We would certainly have opened up for them blessings from the heaven and the earth.

But a short reply is appended below:-

This objection arises because the meaning of the discourse of the Qur'ān is not understood properly. When the people of the Qur'ān say that good or bad actions bring out similar good or bad happenings in the world., they do not mean that there are no natural or physical causes for those happenings, or that those causes have lost their effectiveness in such incidents. Also, they do not say that those good or evil deeds are, together with natural causes, joint causes of those happenings. For example, when we say that there is a Creator for this world, we do not mean to negate the system of cause and effect which is found in the universe, nor do we say that these causes are partners with Allāh in the creation of the world. What we say is that there is a cause over and above all other apparent causes. Likewise, when we say that good or evil actions result in good or evil incidents in the world, .we do not deny the effectiveness of natural causes; we only mean that there is a higher and more powerful cause, i.e. the good or evil deeds of human beings which serves as the motive power of the natural causes. When a man writes, it is the pen which draws the letters on the paper; but the pen moves not on its own account but by the movement of the hand; and a man with open eyes will not stop even there — he will see the person who moves his hand. When he says that that person writes, he does not negate the effect and force of the hand or the pen; but he knows who the real writer is.

Experience and observation have shown that creation has given every species the means to avert damage or deterioration. Why should homo sapiens alone be an exception to this rule? Also every species is confronted by one or more opposing forces to sharpen its own defensive powers, and in this way it continues from strength to strength till it reaches its perfection. Why should man not be provided with this means of reaching the height of his perfection?

Allāh says: And We did not create the heavens and the earth and what is between them in sport. We did not create them both but with the truth, but most of them do not know. (44:38—39); And We did not create the heaven and the earth and what is between them in vain; that is the opinion of those who disbelieve ... (38:27) If a maker makes anything without any purpose just in sport, there remains no further relation between him and the thing made; he does not care what happens to that thing. But if he makes it for a purpose, he looks after it; if any snag appears in its proper functioning, he mends and repairs it by adding or subtracting something or by dismantling and re-assembling it. The same is the case with the creation of the heavens and the earth and what is between them, including human beings. Allāh did not create all these in vain or in sport; He created them with a purpose and they have to return to Him, as He has said: What! Did you then think that We had created you in vain and that you shall not be returned to Us? (23:115); And that to your Lord is the end goal. (53:42).

With this background, it is exceedingly clear that God's Providence should be concerned with leading mankind to the goal of its perfection, first by calling them to come to the right path and guiding them to it; then through test and trial; and finally by destroying those about whom there is no hope at all that they may attain the goal of their creation. It is only in this way that the creative goal of individuals and the whole of the species can be achieved; and damaged, nay, damaging parts can be discarded and thrown into perdition, giving relief and respite to the other parts. Allāh says: And your Lord is the Self-sufficient One, the Lord of mercy; if He pleases, He may take you off, and make whom He pleases successors of you, even as he raised you up from the seed of another people. (6:133)

(Ponder upon the place and significance of the sentence, And your Lord is the Self-sufficient One, the Lord of mercy.)

To make a long story short, this divine system of trial and retribution is, as declared by Allāh, an insuperable, invincible and irresistible force which no one can control or subdue. Allāh says: And whatever affliction befalls you it is on account of what your hands have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults). And you cannot escape in the earth, and you shall not have a guardian or a helper besides Allāh. (42:30—31) Also He says: And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the apostles. Most surely they shall be the assisted ones, and most surely Our host alone shall be the victorious ones. (37:171-173).

D) Actions with reference to happiness and misery:

Those actions causing happiness will always be victorious over those causing misery. Every good quality belongs to actions causing happiness: victory, steadfastness, stability, peace, hope, eternity, etc. Its opposite factors, destruction, nullity, shakiness, fear, decline and defeat, belong to actions causing misery.

There are numerous Qur'ānic verses declaring the above fact. See, for example, the following parable: Have you not seen how Allāh sets forth a parable of a good word (being) like a good tree, whose root is firmly fixed and whose branches are in heaven, yielding its fruit on every moment by the permission of its Lord? And Allāh sets forth parables for men that they may reflect. And the parable of an evil word is as an evil tree pulled up from the earth's surface; it has no stability. Allāh confirms those who believe with the sure word in this world's life and in the hereafter, and Allāh lets the unjust go astray, and Allāh does what He pleases. (14:24—27) Also Allāh says: That He may manifest the truth of what was true and show the falsehood of what was false, even though the guilty ones disliked (8:8); ... and the (good) end is for guarding (against evil) (20:132); And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the apostles. Most surely they shall be the assisted ones, and most surely Our host alone shall be the victorious ones (37:171—173); ...and Allāh is predominant over His affair, but most people do not know. (12:21) There are other similar verses.

The last words of the last-mentioned verse, but most people do not know, show that this predominance and victory is not as people think, because most of them are unaware of this victory. Had it been material victory which could be perceived by everyone, the majority would not have remained ignorant of it. This ignorance and unawareness results from two factors:-

First: The thinking power of man is limited; his eyes see only those things which are near to him; he talks about the present and is unaware of what the future has in store. His kingdom is of this day, and his predominance is of this moment. He measures the whole of existence according to the scale of his short span of life and its small possessions. But Allāh is the Master of time and space and the Ruler of this world as well as the hereafter. He has power and authority over everything. When He judges, He separates the right from the wrong; when He decrees, it is done with truth. This world and the hereafter are but one in His sight; He is not afraid that anything will escape away from His authority. He, therefore, makes no haste in any affair. It is possible (rather, it is a fact) that He may decree a single day's disturbance to establish peace and order for a long time; or the tragedy of one individual as a means of happiness for the whole nation. Now the ignorant man thinks that Allāh was helpless and could not remove that disturbance or tragedy. (How evil is what he thinks!) But, the fact is that Allāh sees the whole chain of time even as He sees a single link of it; He judges about His whole creation as He judges about a single person. One affair does not make him oblivious of another affair; and the preservation of both does not tire Him; and He is the High, the Great. Allāh says: Let it not deceive you that those who disbelieve go to and fro in the cities (fearlessly). A brief enjoyment! Then their abode is hell, and evil is the resting place! (3:195—196)
