Second: A spiritual victory is not the same as a material one. A material victory and predominance means that the victor controls the actions of the vanauished, by depriving them of their freedom of choice, and by ompelling them to do what they do not like. It is enough to look at colonial and imperial powers: at how they gave themselves licence to kill and enslave the weaker people and how they ruled on them as it suited their whim and fancy. But experience shows that tyranny and compulsion cannot last long; and, that therefore, a colonial authority cannot rule over its colonies forever — it is but a passing show.

A spiritual victory, on the other hand, depends on capturing hearts and minds; it trains people who believe in the cause and are ready to sacrifice themselves to make the cause succeed. There is no grade above perfect faith, and no fortress stronger than belief. When one believes in a cause it is bound to manifest itself one day, even if, for the present, it remains hidden from the public eye. It is for this reason that the great powers and living societies put such a great emphasis on the dissemination of their views throughout the world. Sometimes, they spend more time and energy on such propaganda than on arms and ammunition. It is because they know that faith in a cause is more powerful than guns and tanks. If this is correct about these illusionary causes of politics, it must be far more correct about the eternal truth to which Allāh invites the mankind.

Nothing stands in opposition to truth, per se, except falsehood. And what is there after truth except error and falsehood? It is known that falsehood cannot stand against truth. It is bound to fall, and truth is bound to vanquish error and falsehood.

Truth, in its effectiveness, as well as in its conveyance to the destination, is not inconsistent nor does it fail to bring about its result. If a believer overcomes an enemy of the truth, in this life, then he is the victor and also gets the good reward for it in the hereafter. If, on the other hand, he is defeated by the enemy of the truth, and the enemy compels him to adopt things which are disliked by Allāh, it is his duty to act accordingly and save his life — and Allāh will be pleased with that apparently irreligious behaviour. Allāh says:...except (when) you guard yourselves against (them) for fear from them (3:28). And if the enemy kills him, then it will be for him an everlasting pleasant life, not death. Allāh says: And do not speak of those who are slain in Allāh's way as dead; nay, (they are) alive, but you do not perceive.(2:154)

In this way, the believer is never vanquished; he is always victorious — either both apparently and in reality, or only in reality. Allāh refers to this aspect in the verse, Say: Do you await for us but one of the two most excellent things ... (9:52)

The truth, therefore, is always victorious in this world.

Nature, i.e. creation, is leading the human species towards truth and felicity — it is leading it creatively — and certainly it will reach its goal. The apparent victory of falsehood which we experience from time to time is not worthy of our attention: these are stepping stones for the truth to reach its height. Why should we worry? 'Time' has yet to come to its end, the world still exists, and the system of creation is still all powerful. There is enough time for truth to overpower falsehood. This much about the victory of truth in appearance. There is no need to explain in so many words about its victory in reality: we all know that the truth is always victorious.

Why did we say in the beginning that every good characteristic, such as permanence, stability and beauty, belongs to the true word and deed; and every evil characteristic, such as instability, infirmity, evil and ugliness, belongs to the false word and deed? We have mentioned previously the following verses: That is Allāh, your Lord, the Creator of every thing; there is no god but He; whence are you then turned away? (40:62); Who made good everything that He has created ... (32:7); Whatever benefit comes to you, it is from Allāh, and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself. (6:79) All these verses show that wrongs and evils are ''non-existence''; and as such they cannot be attributed to Allāh who is the Creator, Originator and Bestower of existence.

The case of the good is just the opposite. It is, therefore, attributed to Allāh. And it is because of this that good words and good deeds are the source of every beauty and elegance, and the origin of every virtue and felicity (like stability and permanence, blessing and benefit), in contrast to evil words and deeds. Allāh says: He sends down water from the heavens, then the valleys flow according to their measure, and the torrent bears along the swelling foam; and from what they melt in the fire, for the sake of (making) ornaments or apparatus, arises a scum like it; thus does Allāh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it remains in the earth; thus does Allāh set forth parables. (13:17)

E) Actions with reference to reason:

Good words and deeds conform with the dictates of reason, in contrast with the evil words and deeds. It has already been explained that Allāh has made his laws on the foundation of reason. By reason we mean that faculty by which man perceives right and wrong, and distinguishes between good and bad.

It is for this reason that Allāh commanded man to follow his reason, and forbade everything which deranges the reason or throws it into confusion, like drinking alcoholic liquids, gambling, uttering vain words, adultery, cheating, and so on. He also forbade lying, slandering, false accusation, embezzlement, murder, and, in short, all such things which throw reason out of gear and lead it to a wrong judgement. Human life is built on the basis of correct perception and proper thinking, in all its affairs – individual as well as social. If you analyse the personal and collective ills of humanity, you will find that they spring from actions which disturb and confuse the reason. This subject will be explained, God willing, in another place.

TRADITIONS

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘I was riding (on a camel) behind the Messenger of Allāh. He said: ‘O Ibn ‘Abbās! Be satisfied with what Allāh (qaddara, قدّر) has measured (decreed) for you even if it is against your wishes; because it is so written in the Book of Allāh.’ I said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! And where is it, and I have read the Qur’ān?’ He said: ‘and it may be that you dislike a thing while it is good for you, and it may be that you love a thing while it is evil for you; and Allāh knows, while you do not know.’ ’’ [ad-Durru ʾl-manthūr]

The author says: This tradition implies that taqdīr (measure, decree, التّقدير) is a general word, covering both legislation and creation, and that its meaning varies according to the context. But this tradition does not show that ‘asā (may be, عسى) can be used to mean obligation. it has been explained that this word is used in the Qur’ān in its literal meaning, and that is ‘‘may-be’’, expectation. Therefore, the opinion expressed by a commentator that wherever the word ‘asā (عسى) has been used in the Qur’ān, the ‘‘may-be’’ of Allāh implies compulsion is not worthy of consideration. Even more strange is the view of another that wherever ‘‘may-be’’ comes in the Qur’ān it indicates compulsion (obligation) except in two verses, one in the chapter of at-Taḥrīm (Maybe if he divorces you …), and the other in the chapter of al-‘Isrā (It may be that your Lord will have mercy on you…)

There is a tradition narrated by Ibn Jarīr from the chain of as-Suddī: The Messenger of Allāh sent a company consisting of seven of his companions, under the command of ‘Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh al-Asadī. The other members were: ‘Ammār ibn Yāsir, Abū Ḥudhayfah ibn ‘Utbah ibn Rabī‘ah, Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqāṣ, ‘Utbah ibn Ghazwān as-Sulamī (an ally of Banī Nawfal), Sahl ibn Bayḍā’, ‘Āmir ibn Fuhayrah and Wāqid ibn ‘Abdullāh al-Yarbū‘ī (an ally of ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb).

The Prophet wrote a letter and gave it to ‘Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh telling him not to read it until he camped at Malal. When ‘Abdullāh camped at the valley of Malal, he opened the letter. Written in it was: ‘‘Proceed till you camp in the valley of Nakhlah.’’ On reading it he told his companions: ‘‘Anyone who is ready to die let him proceed (with me) and make his will, because I am making my will and proceeding as ordered by the Messenger of Allāh.'' So he went on, and only Sa'd ibn Abī Waqqāṣ and 'Utbah ibn Ghazwān remained behind because they had lost their camel. And 'Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh went forward, and lo! they unexpectedly met al-Ḥakam ibn Kaysān, 'Abdullāh ibn al-Mughīrah ibn 'Uthmān and 'Amr al-Ḥaḍramī. They fought and arrested al-Ḥakam ibn Kaysān and 'Abdullāh ibn al-Mughīrah; and al-Mughīrah fled away; and 'Amr al-Ḥaḍramī was killed by Wāqid ibn 'Abdullāh. And it was the first booty taken by the companions of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). When they returned to Medina with the two captives and the booty, the polytheists said: ''Muḥammad thinks that he follows the commands of Allāh and he is the first to desecrate the sacred month.'' Then Allāh sent down the verse: They ask you concerning the sacred month about fighting in it. Say: *Fighting in it is a grave matter; is not allowed. And what you did, 0 polytheists! is still graver than killing in the sacred month, because you disbelieved in Allāh, and hindered Muḥammad from Allāh's way; and the mischief, that is polytheism, is graver before Allāh than the killing. And this is the saying of Allāh, and hindering (men) from Allāh's way and denying it ...[ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

The author says: The traditions giving this and similar meanings are numerous from Sunnī chains. And this meaning is also narrated in Majma'u 'l-bayān; and some traditions say that the company consisted of eight persons, the ninth being their leader.

Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from the chain of Yazīd ibn Rawmān from 'Urwah, that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh sent 'Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh to Nakhlah, and told him: 'Stay there until you bring to us some news about (the activities and intentions of) the Quraysh.' And he did not order him to fight. And it was in the sacred month. And he (i.e. the Messenger of Allāh) wrote for him a letter before informing him about the journey, and told him: 'Go out with your companions; when you have travelled two days, open (this) your letter and look into it and proceed to do what I have ordered you in it. And do not force any of your companions to go with you (against his wishes)' When he travelled for two days, he opened the letter and found in it (the words): 'Proceed further until you camp at Nakhlah, and bring for us whatever information reaches you about the Quraysh.' When he (‘Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh) read the order, he told his companions: ‘Hearing and obeying! Whoever among you desires martyrdom, should come with me, for I am proceeding on the order of the Messenger of Allāh. And whoever among you dislikes it let him go back, because the Messenger of Allāh has forbidden me to compel anyone of you (against his wishes).’ The whole group proceeded with him until they reached Najrān where Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqāṣ and ‘Utbah ibn Ghazwān lost a camel which they rode alternately. They, therefore, remained behind to search for it; and the others went forward till they camped at Nakhlah. Then passed by them ‘Amr al-Ḥaḍramī, al-Ḥakam ibn Kaysān, ‘Uthmān and al-Mughīrah ibn ‘Abdullāh; with them was the merchandise which they had brought from aṭ-Ṭā’if: condiments and oil. When they saw them, Wāqid ibn ‘Abdullāh rose high to show himself to them, and he had shaved his head. When they saw him with shaved head, ‘Amr said: ‘No harm will befall you from him.’ And the companions of the Messenger of Allāh consulted with one another about the polytheists; and it was the last day of Jumāda ’l-ukhrā. They thought: if we kill them it will be in the sacred month, and if we leave them, they will enter Mecca this night and they will be on guard. At last, they all decided to kill them. Wāqid ibn ‘Abdullāh at-Tamīmī shot an arrow at ‘Amr al-Ḥaḍramī and killed him. ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Abdullāh and al-Ḥakam ibn Kaysān were captured, and al-Mughīrah ran away and they could not catch him. And they took the caravan and came with it to the Messenger of Allāh. He told them: ‘By God! I had not ordered you to fight in the sacred month.’ And he kept the matter of the goods and the captives in suspense and did not accept anything from it. When the Messenger of Allāh said to them what he said, they felt ashamed and thought that they had fallen into perdition; and their brethren, the Muslims, upbraided them harshly. When the report of the incident reached the Quraysh, they said: ‘Muḥammad spilled unlawful blood, and took property, and arrested men and desecrated the sacred month.’’ Then Allāh sent down the verse: They ask you concerning the sacred month about fighting in it ... When it was revealed, the Messenger of Allāh retained the merchandise and freed the two captives on ransom. The Muslims asked: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! Do you hope that it will be (counted as) a jihād (religious war) for us? Then Allāh revealed the verse: Surely those who believed and those who fled (their home) and strove hard in the way of Allāh these hope for the mercy of Allāh; and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful. And they were eight people, and the ninth was their leader, ‘Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh.’’ [ad-Durru ’l-manthūr]

The author says: There are other traditions showing that this verse: Surely those who believed ... Merciful, was revealed about the group of ‘Abdullāh ibn Jaḥsh.

This verse proves that if someone performs an act of obedience, with the intention of coming nearer to Allāh, but it turns out to be a mistake, not a good deed, then he is not counted as a sinner because he did it inadvertently. Also, the last sentence of the verse, mentioning the forgiveness of Allāh, shows that divine forgiveness covers even those situations where there was no sin or error. Therefore, the use of the word ‘‘forgiveness’’ or its derivatives does not necessarily mean that the recipient of the divine forgiveness had committed a sin.

The traditions imply that ‘‘They ask’’ refers to the Muslims, not the polytheists who ridiculed the Muslims. This view is supported by the tradition of Ibn ‘Abbās mentioned under the preceding verse: ‘‘I did not see any people better than the companions of Muḥammad. They did not ask him except thirteen questions till he was taken away (from this world), all of those questions are in the Qur’ān. Among them are: They ask you about the intoxicants and games of chance; They ask you about the sacred month ... Also, the context of the verse supports it, as the words: and they will go on fighting with you ... , are addressed to the believers.

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance. : According to the language, intoxicant (khamr, الخمر) is every liquid which is made to intoxicate. The root word, khamr (الخمر) means to ''to hide''. The liquor is called khamr (الخمر) because it hides reason and does not allow it to discriminate between right and wrong, between good and bad.

From the same root is derived khimār (الخمار) i.e., the veil which covers the head of a woman. Khammartu 'l-'inā'(خمّرت الاناء); means ''I covered the opening of the pot''. When yeast is added to dough, they say ikhmarrati 'l-'ajīn (اخمرّت العجين). And the yeast itself is called khamīrah (الخميرة), because when it is mixed with flour, it covers the flour when it rises and ferments.

The Arabs did not know any alcoholic beverages except those made from grapes, dates and barley. Gradually, new kinds were invented and now its types and kinds are innumerable, with varying grades of intoxication. But all are intoxicant (khamr, الخمر). Maysir (الميسر), according to the language, is gambling. The gambler is called yāsir (الياسر).

The root word, yusr (اليسر) means ease. Gambling was called maysir (الميسر) because by it one might get wealth with ease without going to the trouble of earning and working.

The word maysir (الميسر) was mostly used for a particular method of gambling with arrows. It was also called azlām (الازلام) and aqlām (الاقلام). It was played by ten persons in the following manner:

A camel was purchased, slaughtered and divided into twentyfour parts. There were ten arrows: each had a separate name and its specified share. Their names (with their shares in brackets) are given hereunder:

Fadhdh (1); taw'am (2); raqīb (3); hils (4) nāfis (5); musbil (6); mu'allā (7). The remaining three arrows drawn with the names of the participants; anyone on whose name one of the first seven arrows was drawn took the number of the shares alloted to it; those on whose names the last-named three arrows were drawn got nothing and had to pay the price of the camel.

Qur'ān: Say: In both of them ... sin is greater than profit: Sin (ithm, الاثم) is near to evil (dhanb, الذّنب) in meaning. It means a condition in the thing or in reason which prevents the man from getting the good. In other words, ithm (الاثم) is that evil which brings unhappiness and failure even in other affairs, and disturbs the felicity of life even in other matters.

Clearly, alcoholic drinks and games of chance fit this description.

The health hazards of alcohol have been described in untold numbers of books written by ancient and modern physicians, in which they have listed the havoc created by it in the stomach, the intestines, the liver, the lungs, the nervous system, the veins and arteries, the heart and the organs of perception, i.e. the eyes, the tongue, etc. The data collected by them show the vast magnitude of the damage to the millions and millions of people who are attacked by a variety of diseases caused by this killing poison.

The social and moral disasters appearing in the wake of addiction to drink are too well-known to need any description. Depravity of character, debauchery, shamelessness, the leakage of secrets, scandals, slanders, destruction and damage to others, crimes, murder — name any immorality, alcohol will lead to it. In short, it nullifies all ethical laws and moral values upon which are based the felicity and bliss of this life and, more particularly, the values of chastity and probity. Who can protect society from a drunkard who does not understand what he says and does not know what he does. Look at the crimes which have wrecked havoc throughout the world and have made human life a misery; search for their causes, and behind almost all of them you will see the hand of alcohol, directly or indirectly manipulating the minds of the criminals.

Nobody can deny the damage inflicted by alcohol upon the mind. Is there any need to describe how it negates the reason, puts the thinking process out of equilibrium and distorts the feelings and perceptions, not only during intoxication, but even afterwards. This damage to the whole system of perception and reason is the biggest sin and disaster of alcohol, from which sprout all other sins and disasters.

Islam, as described earlier, has based its laws on true reason, and has most emphatically forbidden all such actions which hinder the proper functioning of reason. Intoxicants, games of chance, adultery, falsehood and other such sins come in this category. The activities which are most damaging to the faculty of reason are drinking alcohol (among the deeds) and speaking lies (among the words).

These activities which nullify the rule of reason, and especially the politics which is based on alcohol and lies, endanger humanity, and destroy the foundation of happiness. Whenever such a policy bears a fruit, it proves far more bitter than the previous one. When a burden proves unbearable, they add on some more weight and hope that the practice will make the bearer perfect, and would give him more strength! Such endeavours result in failure; such activities end in loss. This one characteristic of Islam — that it has based its sharī'ah on reason and has prohibited all such things which damage it — is enough to place it at the top of all the systems invented by human beings throughout the world.

Human beings, because of their animal tendencies, eagerly run towards the satisfaction of their lust. Lustful activities easily contaminate the environment, in contrast to chastity and piety. It is easy to acquire a bad habit and very difficult to leave it. That is why Allāh legislated such laws gradually, and led people to the ultimate goal step by step and sympathetically. One of those widely-spread evils was the drinking of alcohol. And a cursory glance at the four verses revealed about the subject will show how, by easy stages, they were weaned from this bad habit.

First, Allāh revealed, Say: My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed, and sin and rebellion without justice, and that you associate with Allāh that for which He has not sent down any authority, and that you say against Allāh what you do not know. (7:33)

This verse was revealed in Mecca, and it has clearly forbidden the sin (ḥarrama, حرّم). Now we know that there is sin — great sin even — in alcohol, although at that time Allāh did not clarify what sin was. This ambiguity was, perhaps, a sort of compassion; it was as though the sharī'ah wanted to overlook that sin of theirs for the time being. The same is the reason for the indirect hint in another verse of the same Meccan period: And of the fruits of the palms and the grapes — you obtain from them intoxication and goodly provision (16:67) It separated intoxication from ''goodly provision'' but stopped short of declaring it as a ''bad provision''.

Apparently people were not aware that intoxication was a great sin, until the verse was revealed: O you who believe! Do not go near prayer when you are intoxicated until you know (well) what you say ... (4:43)

This verse was revealed at Medina, and it promulgated the partial prohibition of liquor in the best of the times and the best of the places — at the time of prayer in the mosque.

Reason and the context of the verse shows that this verse could not have been revealed after the verses of the chapters of al-Baqarah and al-Mā'idah (which will be described shortly), because those verses promulgate total prohibition. There was no reason why a partial ban should be imposed after a total prohibition. Also, we know that this prohibition was promulgated gradually, and such a case demands proceeding from an easier step to a more difficult one, and not vice versa.

Then came the verse under discussion. It says that there is in intoxicants and games of chance a great sin and (some) profit for men, and their sin is greater than their profit.

This verse, revealed after the above-mentioned verse 4:43, promulgates total prohibition of intoxicants and games of chance. It clearly says that ''there is great sin'' in these two evils. And verse 7:33, mentioned in the beginning, revealed at Mecca, had clearly prohibited sin.

This explanation exposes the absurdity of a commentator who says that this verse was not clear about the prohibition of liquor. First, let us give you a gist of what he says:-

''This verse of the chapter of al-Baqarah was not clear about the prohibition of alcohol and gambling; the words of Allāh that there is great sin in them only show that these are sinful acts, and sin means harm. Even if we say that every harmful thing is prohibited, it does not include those things which are partially harmful and partially beneficial. That is why there was a difference of opinion about alcohol among the companions of the Prophet. Some of them left drinking after the revelation of this verse, while others continued to drink. Perhaps, the drinkers thought that they could easily enjoy its profit safeguarding themselves from its harms. When the ground was thus prepared, Allāh revealed the verse of the chapter of al-Mā'idah which totally and clearly prohibits these things: O you believe! Intoxicants and games of chance and (sacrificing to) stones set up and (dividing by) arrows are an abomination of Satan's handiword; shun it therefore that you may be successful ... Will you then desist? (5:93-94)''

Now let us look critically at the above argument:

First: A major part of this argument rests on the assumption that sin means harm. But it is wrong. Just because in this verse it is followed by the words, and (some) profit for men, it does not imply that its meaning is ''harm'' or ''loss'', i.e. the opposite of ''benefit''. How can the word ''sin'' (ithm, الاثم) be taken to mean ''harm'' in the verses listed below? :-

> And whoever associates anything with Allāh, he devises indeed a great sin. (4:48)
> And whoever conceals it (i.e. testimony), his heart is surely sinful. (2:283)
>
> Surely I wish that you should bear my sin as well as your own sin. (5:29)
>
> Every man of them shall have what he has earned of sin. (24:11)
>
> And whoever earns a sin, he earns it only against his own self. (4:111)

There are many such verses.

Second: The verse did not say that .the order was given ‘‘because’’ of the harm inherent in alcohol. It just promulgated the law. There was no justification for the companions to follow their own opinion in this case.

Even if we admit, for the sake of argument, that the verse gives the reason for that order, that reason is not the harm, but the greatness of the harm as compared with the profit. The verse says in clear words, and their sin is greater than their profit. Such a clear declaration leaves no room at all for the exercise of one’s own opinion. Opinion has no place in the presence of a clear order of Allāh and the Apostle.

Third: Let us suppose, for the time being, that the verse did not clearly say that liquor and gambling were forbidden. But did it not say in clear words that they were great sins? Was not this verse revealed at Medina? Had not verse 7:33, revealed years ago at Mecca, clearly prohibited the sin? What excuse can be offered by those companions who followed their own opinion. in opposition to these verses of Mecca and Medina, which taken jointly clearly prohibit alcohol and games of chance?

Verse 7:33 prohibits all sins. And this verse under discussion uses the adjective ‘great’ (kabīr, الكبير) and ‘greater’ (akbar,. الاكبر) for the sins of alcohol and gambling. In view of this nobody can remain in any doubt that these two evils are the greatest of all sins; nor can there remain any doubt about their absolute prohibition. The Qur’ān has termed murder, the hiding of testimony, lying and slander etc. as ‘‘sin’’, but it has not used the adjective ‘‘great’’ for any sin except polytheism (….and whoever associates anything with Allāh, he devises indeed a great sin. — 4:48) and alcohol and games of chance.

In short, there is no doubt that this verse clearly prohibits these two sins.

Lastly the two verses of the chapter al-Mā’idah were revealed: O you who believe! Intoxicants and games of chance and (sacrificing to) stones set up and (dividing by) arrows are only an abomination of Satan’s handiwork; shun it therefore that you may be successful. Satan only desires to cause enmity and hatred to spring in your midst by means of intoxicants and games of chance, and to keep you off from the remembrance of Allāh and from prayer. Will you then desist? (5:93—94)

The last sentence (Will you then desist?) shows that the Muslims had not desisted from drinking alcohol even after the revelation of the verse of the chapter al Baqarah under discussion; and that there was a need for such a strong admonition.

This much about liquor. So far as gambling is concerned its social evils and the ruin caused by it in the structure of life are well-known, and need no description. But we shall further explain it in the fifth chapter.

Now we come back to the meaning of the words used in the verse. Sin (ithm, الأثم) has just now been explained. Greatness (kibr, الكبر) in volume is as numerousness (kathrah, الكثرة) in number. Their opposite are smallness (ṣighar, الصّغر) and paucity (qillah, القلّة) respectively.

These two adjectives are relative ones. When there are two things, one of them may be greater than the other, which then will be called smaller than the first. But the first one which was called ''greater'' may be smaller than a third one. If there was no comparison, there would be neither the greatness nor the smallness; nor would there by an numerousness or paucity.

Probably people first became aware of greatness when they looked at the size of material things around themselves. Later on they extended this concept to mental visions and ideas. Allāh says: Surely it (i.e. hell) is one of the greatest (misfortunes). (74:35); a great (i.e. grievous) word it is that comes out of their mouths. (18:5); great (i.e. hard) to the unbelievers is that which you call them to. (42:13)

'Iẓam (العظم) has the same meaning as kibar (الكبر): both denote greatness. Apparently 'iẓam (العظم) is derived from 'aẓm (bone, العظم); as the greatness of the body of an animal or man is related to the size of the skeleton - the bones inside — the word 'aẓm (bone, العظم) was metaphorically used for greatness, and gradually ''greatness'' became its first meaning.

Naf' (profit, النفع) is opposite of ḍarar (harm, loss, الضرر) These words are used for the things which are desired or disliked because of other things; while good and bad are used for the things which are liked or disliked by themselves.

Profits for men: It refers to the monetary gains as well as the amusement and merry-making for which people indulge in these two sins.

Allāh used here the plural form (profits); but while comparing it with sin He used the singular form (their sin is greater than their profit). As the comparison was in size, and not in number, there was no reason to use the plural which describes the number, not the size.

Qur'ān: And they ask you as to what they should spend. Say:Whatever can be spared.

'Afw (العفو) originally meant 'to go to a thing to get it.' Then, keeping in view various connections and relations, it came to be used for forgiveness, obliteration of footprints and moderation in spending. It is this last meaning which is intended in this verse, and that is why it has been translated as ''whatever can be spared''.

In this verse, the reply fits the question in the same way as was explained in the verse 2:215, They ask you to what they should spend. Say: Whatever of good you spend, it is for the parents ...

Qur'ān: Thus does Allāh make clear to you the signs that you may ponder about this world and the hereafter. Fid-dunyā wa 'l-ākhirah (فى الدّنيا و الاخرة) literally means ''in this world and the hereafter''. But it does not mean 'you may ponder while you are in this world and in the hereafter'. It refers to the subject upon which men are expected to ponder. That is why we have translated it ''may ponder about this world ...''

The verse exhorts the believers to ponder on the realities and affairs of both the worlds. This world is a place which Allāh has created for you to live in and for you to earn in it what might be beneficial to you in your permanent home, i.e. the hereafter. That is the place where you will return to your Lord and He will give you the recompense for what you did in this world.

This verse urges people to enquire about, and investigate, the realities of existence, the percepts of the beginning and the end and the mysteries of nature; and to think and ponder upon the social concepts, moral and ethical values, and the laws of life governing individuals and groups. In short, man is expected to think about all the knowledge right from his beginning upto his returning to his Lord, as well as all the affairs coming between these points which have any bearing on the. happiness and misery of mankind.

This verse also shows that although the Qur'ān demands complete obedience from man towards the command of Allāh and His Apostle, without any if and but, yet it likes people to ponder on those commands and their philosophy so that they may grasp their realities and, instead of blindly following the laws, may see the light of those brilliant teachings and follow that light to ultimate destination.

Thus Allāh does make clear probably means the explanation of the philosophy behind the given laws and commands, and the clarification of the fundamentals of the faith and belief.

Qur'ān: And they ask you concerning the orphans. Say: ''To set right for them (their affairs) is good.'' There is a hint, a clear indication even, in this verse that it was revealed to lighten some burden — it allows mingling with the orphans, and then goes on to say: and if Allāh had willed, He would certainly have made it hard for you. It shows that prior to this verse the rules concerning the guardianship of the orphans were hard and difficult, which had caused anxiety and alarm among the Muslims, and which led them to ask the question referred to in the verse.

There were some verses about the orphans, very severe in tone: And give to the orphans their property, and do not substitute worthless (things) for (their) good (ones), and do not devour their property (as an addition) to your own property; this is surely a great crime. (4:2);As for those who swallow the property of the orphans unjustly, surely they only swallow fire into their bellies and soon they shall enter into burning fire. (4:10) Apparently the verse under discussion was revealed after these verses; and the traditions, which will be quoted later, support this view.

The iṣlāh (to set right, اصلاح) is used here as a common noun. It denotes, according to the usage of the Arabic language, really good management, not just a show; and the sentence, and Allāh knows the mischief-maker from the well-doer, points to this.

Qur'ān: and if you mingle with them, they are your brethren: This sentence refers to the Islamic concept of the equality of all the believers. This concept nullifies all distinctions which are the basic cause of every mischief which appears in society. It abolishes various types of injustice and rebellion; putting oneself on a high pedestal, treating others as one's slaves, thinking of them as an inferior, and weak species. This abolition of differences creates equilibrium in various social weights; there appears a fine balance between a weak orphan and his powerful guardian, between a rich tycoon and a wretched beggar, and so on. Allāh says: The believers are but brethren. (49:10)

Now, the verse under discussion allows the guardian to mingle with the orphan only when it is done like the mingling of two brothers who have equal obligation towards each other. If something is taken from an orphan's property, then something of equal value must be given to him and added to his property. In this context, this verse runs parallel to the verse mentioned earlier, And give to the orphans their property, and do not substitute worthless (things) for (their) good (ones), and do not devour their property (as an addition) to your own property; this is surely a great crime. (4:2) A comparison between the two verses shows that the verse under discussion has somewhat lessoned the burden of the guardians; and the sentence, and Allāh knows the mischief-maker from the well-doer, also hints at this relaxation of rigour. The meaning is: Now you may mingle with your wards, the orphans (and this is the relaxation of the previous rule); but the mingling should be as of two brother who have equal obligations towards each other. If this condition is fulfilled, then there should be no anxiety and fear on your part. If that mingling is with good intentions, and in order to set their affairs right for them, then it is good; and the reality cannot be hidden from Allāh, and He will not reproach you just because you mingled and mixed with the orphans, provided you did it for their good, like brethren, and Allāh knows the difference between a mischief-maker and a well-doer.

Qur'ān: and Allāh knows the mischief-maker from the well doer: Here the preposition, from (min, من) has been used after ''knows'' (ya'lamu, يعلم); probably it is a hint that ''knows'' in this verse has the significance of ''distinguishes''; and the sentence means, ''Allāh distinguishes the mischief-maker from the well-doer.''

'Anat (العنت) means difficulty and hardship.

TRADITIONS

'Alī ibn Yaqṭīn said: ''al-Mahdī asked Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Kāẓim (a.s.) about whether intoxicants were prohibited in the Book of Allāh, because the people know that it is not allowed but do not know that it is prohibited.

''The Imām said: 'But it is prohibited.' He asked: 'Where in the Book of Allāh is it forbidden? O Abu '1-Ḥasan!' He replied: 'The word of Allāh: Say: My Lord has only prohibited indecencies, those of them that are apparent as well as those that are concealed, and sin and rebellion without justice ...' (7:33) Then the Imām explained: 'And as for sin, it is intoxicants themselves, because Allāh said somewhere else, They ask you about intoxicants and games of chance. Say: ''In both of them there is a great sin and (some) profits, for men, and their sin is greater than their profits.'' So the sin according to the Book of Allāh is intoxicants and games of chance, and their sin is greater than their profit, as Allāh has said.'

''al-Mahdī said: 'O 'Alī ibn Yaqṭīn! This is the legal decree of the house of Hāshim.' I said: 'You spoke the truth, O leader of the faithful! Praise be to Allāh who did not take this knowledge out from you, O people of the house!' ''

'Alī ibn Yaqtīn says: ''By God, al-Mahdī could not restrain himself from saying to me, 'You spoke the truth, O Rāfidī!' '' [al-Kāfī]

The author says: The meaning of this tradition can be understood from the commentary.

There is a tradition narrated from Abū Basīr that one of the two Imāms (i.e. fifth or sixth — a.s.) said: ''Verily Allāh made a house for sin, then He made a door for the house, then He made a lock for the door, then He made a key for the lock; and (that) key of sin is intoxicants.'' [al-Kāfī]

There is another tradition from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.): ''The Messenger of Allāh said: 'Verily intoxicants are the head of every sin!' '' [ibid.]

There is a tradition narrated by Ismā'īl, in which he said: ''Abu Ja'far (a.s.) went into the Sacred Mosque; some Qurayshites saw him and said: 'He is the god of the people of Iraq.' Someone said: 'If you send one of you to him.' So a young man from among them came to him and asked: 'O Uncle! What is the greatest of the great (sins)?' He said: 'Drinking alcohol.' '' [ibid.]

There is a tradition narrated by Abu '1-Bilād, that one of the two Imāms (al-Bāqir or aṣ-Ṣādiq — a.s.) said: ''Allāh has not been disobeyed with anything more powerful than drinking alcohol. Verily one of them leaves the obligatory prayers, and jumps upon his mother and daughter and sister, and he does not know.'' [ibid.]

''An atheist asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.): 'Why did Allāh prohibit alcohol when there is nothing more delicious than it?' (The Imām said: 'He prohibited it because it is the mother of all wicked things and the head of every evil. There come a time to the drinker ,of it when he loses his reason, then he does not know his Lord, and leaves no sin but that he commits it …' '' [al-Iḥtijāj]

The author says: The traditions explain one another and experience and observation support them.

A tradition from Jābir is reported that Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said: ''The Messenger of Allāh cursed ten persons concerning an alcoholic beverage — the one who plants it, the one who guards it, the one who squeezes its juice out, the one who drinks it, the one who serves it, the one who transports it, the one to whom it is trans ported, the one who sells it, the one who purchases it, and the one who eats its price.'' [al-Kāfī]

Another tradition says that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The Messenger of Allāh said: 'Cursed is he, cursed is he who sits at a table where alcohol is drunk.' '' [ibid., al-Maḥāsin]

The author says: The above two traditions are confirmed by the words of Allāh, and do not help one another in sin and transgression. (5:3)

aṣ-Ṣadūq reports through his chains, from Abū Amāmah that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh said: 'There are four persons at whom Allāh will not look (with mercy) on the day of resurrection — the one who is disobedient (to his parents), the one who helps a man and then reminds him of it, the one who denies the destiny (decreed by Allāh), and the one who habitually drinks alcohol'.'' [al-Khiṣāl]

Ibnu 'sh-Shaykh has reported in al-Amālī, through his chains, from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that the Prophet said: ''My Lord, Great is His Glory! has sworn thus: No servant of mine will drink alcohol in this world but that I shall make him drink on the day of resurrection from the boiling water (of hell) as much as he had drunk alcohol; (it would make no difference) whether after that he is punished or forgiven.'' The Prophet said: ''Verily the one who drinks alcohol shall come on the day of resurrection, with blackened face, blue eyes, a slanting jaw-bone and running saliva, licking his tongue from his back-side.''

Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said: ''It is an obligation upon Allāh (i.e. Allāh has made it incumbent upon Himself) that He will make the drinker of alcohol drink what comes out from the vulva of fornicating women. From that vulva will come out pus and thick blood, its heat and stink will offend (even) the inmates of the fire.'' [at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī]

The author says: These traditions may be supported by the word of Allāh, Surely the tree of Zaqqūm is the food of the sinful, like molten brass; it shall boil in (their) bellies, like the boiling of hot water. Seize him, then drag him down into the midst of Hell; then pour over his head of the torment of the boiling water: 'Taste (it); you forsooth are the mighty, the honourable! (44:43—49)

There are numerous traditions with the same meaning as described above.

There is a tradition narrated by al-Washshā' that he heard Abu'1-Ḥasan (a.s.) saying: ''Maysir (المیسر) is gambling.'' [al-Kāfī]

The author says: Traditions giving this explanation are numerous; and there is no doubt whatsoever about the meaning.

It is reported, under the verse, And they ask you as to what they should spend ... , that Ibn 'Abbās said: ''Verily, some people from the companions, when they were told to spend in the way of Allāh, came to the Prophet and said: 'We do not know what this ''spending'' is which we have been ordered in our properties. So, what should we spend from it?' Then Allāh revealed: and they ask you as to what they should spend. Say: 'Whatever can be spared' And before that, one used to spend his wealth until he no longer had anything left to give in alms, and until there remained no property to eat from.'' [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

It is narrated from Yaḥyā that he was told that Ma'ādh ibn-Jabal and Tha'labah came to the Messenger of Allāh and said: ''O Messenger of Allāh! Verily we have our servants and families; what, therefore, should we spend from our properties?'' Then Allāh revealed: And they ask you as to what they should spend. Say: 'Whatever can be spared' '' [ibid.]

It is reported that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the word 'afw (العفو); which we have translated as ''whatever can be spared'' that 'afw is the middle (course). [ibid., al-'Ayyāshī]

And it is written that al-Bāqir (a.s.) and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said that it is modicum, a sufficiency. And the tradition of Abū Basīr interprets it as frugality, thrift. [al-'Ayyāshī]

It is reported from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the verse: And they who when they spend, are neither extravagant nor parsimonious, and (keep) between these the just mean (25:67) that he said: ''This (stage) is after this stage; it is the middle.'' [ibid]

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: '' 'afw (العفو) is what is in excess of the maintenance of the year.'' [Majma'u 'l-bayān]

The author says: The tradition express the same meanings in different words; and the last one gives an example of 'afw (العفو)

There are innumerable traditions showing the excellence of alms, its ways, place and quantity; some of which shall be quoted in the relevant places, God willing.

There is a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the verse: And they ask you concerning the orphans ... that he said: ''When the verse: (As for) those who swallow the property of the orphans unjustly, surely they only swallow fire into their bellies and soon they shall enter burning fire, everyone who had any orphan with him turned him out; and they asked the Messenger of Allāh about turning them out. Then Allāh revealed: And they ask you concerning the orphans. Say: ' To set right for them (their affairs) is good; and if you mingle with them, they are your brethren; and Allāh knows the mischief-maker from the well-doer ... ' ''[at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī]

There is a tradition from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: When Allāh revealed: And do not approach the property of the orphan except in the best manner ... (6:153) and those who swallow the property of the orphans unjustly ... , every one who had an orphan with him went (to his home) and separated his (orphan's) food from his own food and his drink from his own drink; and he put some extra portion in the orphan's food, and kept it reserved for him till he ate it or it deteriorated and he threw it away. This system proved very hard for them, so they mentioned it to the Messenger of Allāh. Then Allāh revealed: And they ask you concerning the orphans ... and if you mingle with them, they are your brethren... Then they mixed their food with their own food and their drink with their own drink. [ad-Durru 'l-manthūr]

The author says: The same thing has been narrated from Sa'īd ibn Jubayr, 'Aṭā' and Qatādah.

وَلاَ تَنْكِحُوا الْمُشْرِكَاتِ حَتَّى يُؤْمِنَّ وَلَأَمَةٌ مُؤْمِنَةٌ خَيْرٌ مِنْ مُشْرِكَةٍ وَلَوْ أَعْجَبَتْكُمْ وَلاَ تُنْكِحُوا الْمُشْرِكِينَ حَتَّى يُؤْمِنُوا وَلَعَبْدٌ مُؤْمِنٌ خَيْرٌ مِنْ مُشْرِكٍ وَلَوْ أَعْجَبَكُمْ أُولَئِكَ يَدْعُونَ إِلَى النَّارِ وَاللهُ يَدْعُو إِلَى الْجَنَّةِ وَالْمَغْفِرَةِ بِإِذْنِهِ وَيُبَيِّنُ آيَاتِهِ لِلنَّاسِ لَعَلَّهُمْ يَتَذَكَّرُونَ ـ ٢٢١ ٠

And do not marry the idolatresses until they believe; and certainly a believing bondswoman is better than an idolatress, even though she should allure you; and do not give (believing women) in marriage to idolaters until they believe; and certainly a believing bondsman is better than an idolater, even though he should allure you; those invite to the fire, and Allāh invites to the garden and to forgiveness by His leave; and makes clear His signs for men, so that they may be mindful. (221)

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: And do not marry the idolatresses until they believe: ar-Rāghib has said in al-Mufradāt: The original meaning of nikāḥ (النّكاح) is 'aqd (the marriage-tie, العقد). then it was metaphorically used for sexual intercourse. It is impossible that it could be the other way round, because all the words denoting sexual inter course are but metaphors; they thought it indecent to mention it, just as they disliked to declare the act itself. It is not possible, for one who does not intend to utter an obscenity, to use the name of an unmentionable act for a decent thing like marriage.

This observation of ar-Rāghib is very good; but for this reasoning to be valid, the word 'aqd (العقد) should be taken to mean the marriage-tie, not the formulae of the proposal and acceptance of marriage. The mushrikāt (idolatresses, المشركات) is the ismu 'l-fā'il (active participle, i.e. the noun derived from an infinitive verb denoting its doer, اسم الفاعل) of the verb ishrāk (الاشراك) which means ''to ascribe a partner to Allāh''; it is also called polytheism. It is well-known that polytheism may be open or hidden, and these two qualities may be of various degrees and grades. The same is the case with belief and disbelief.

The most open kind of polytheism is to believe that there is more than one god and to take and worship idols and treat them as intercessors before God. Less open is the polytheism of the people of the book, as they deny the prophethood of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), and, especially their belief that ‘Uzayr was the son of God, or ‘Īsā was the son of God, and so is their claim that they themselves are sons of God, and His beloved. All this is polytheism, but less manifest than that of the idolaters. More hidden than that is believing that apparent causes independently create their effects; and then relying on these causes.

The most hidden polytheism is the one from which only the chosen servants of Allāh, with pure hearts, can escape. And that is to be forgetful of Allāh and to divert attention to other than Him.

But there is an important point which must be cleared here. Attributing a verb, adjective or active participle (in its literal sense) to someone is one thing; but using that adjective or active participle as a nomenclature is an entirely different matter. If a believer neglected an obligatory act, it might be said that he denied it or disbelieved in it; but the nomenclature, unbeliever/disbeliever, cannot be used for him. Allāh says: and for the sake of Allāh, pilgrimage to the House is incumbent upon men (upon) everyone who can afford the journey to it; and whoever disbelieves, then surely Allāh is Self-sufficient, independent of the worlds. (3:97) Here the verb, ‘‘disbelieves’’, has been used for him who neglects the pilgrimage, still he is not called an ‘‘unbeliever’’, he is a sinner; and if the adjective ‘‘unbeliever’’ or ‘‘disbeliever’’ is used for him at all, it must be conditional, e.g. ‘‘disbeliever in pilgrimage’’.

The same is the case with all active participles and adjectives used in the Qur’ān, like righteous, thankful, purified; and like sinner, unjust, etc. These terms cannot be used as a nomenclature in every place where the verb, adjective or active participle is used.

Accordingly, we cannot use the nomenclature, polytheist, for all those who indulge in hidden or open polytheism. ‘‘Idolater’’ or ‘‘polytheist’’ is a Qur’ānic terminology and we should look at the Qur’ān to know who is called a polytheist. The Qur’ān does not use this term for the Jews or the Christians. Instead it invented for them a new term, ‘‘people of the book’’. And the term ‘‘disbeliever’’ (kāfir, الكافر) is general, covering all those who are outside the pale of Islam.

So far as the term, polytheist or idolater, is concerned, the Qur'ān uses it in a context where it is known that the disbelievers, other than the people of the book, are meant. See, for example, the following verse: Those who disbelieved from among the people of the book and the polytheists could not have separated themselves (from the faithful) until there had come to them the clear evidence (98:1); ... the idolaters are nothing but unclean, so they shall not approach the Sacred Mosque after this year ... (9:28); then slay the idolaters wherever you find them (9:5); How can there be an agreement for the idolaters with Allāh and with His Apostle? (9:7); ... and fight the polytheists all together as they fight you all together ... (9:36) etc.

Now we come to the verse: And they said: Be Jews or Christians, you will be rightly guided. Say: Nay! (We follow) the religion of Ibrāhīm, the upright one, and he was not one of the polytheists. (2:135) The last sentence, ''he was not one of the polytheists'', is not an innuendo against the Jews and the Christians. To know its meaning, let us look at another verse: Ibrāhīm was not a Jew, nor a Christian; but he was an upright (man), a Muslim, and he was not one of the polytheists. (3:67). The word ''upright (man)'' is an adverse allusion to the Jews and the Christians; it exalts Ibrāhīm above the soulless ritualism of the Jews as well as the dogmatism of the Christians, the materialism of the one and the misguided spiritualism of the other. It says that Ibrāhīm was on the middle path, neither a Jew nor a Christian. And then it uses the word ''a Muslim'', and shows that he was purely a Muslim, not ascribing any partner, associate or colleague to Allāh; and then it adversely alludes to the polytheists by the words, ''he was not one of the polytheists.'' Likewise, in verse 2:135, the word ''the upright one'' indirectly hints against the Jews and the Christians who had gone astray; and the sentence, ''and he was not one of the polytheists'' alludes to the idol-worshippers.

In short, this verse does not refer to the Jews and the Christians as polytheists.

Now we come to some verses where the active participle, polytheist (mushrik, المشرک) has been used for other than idol-worshippers:-

> And most of them do not believe in Allāh without associating other (with Him). (12:106)
> ... and woe to the polytheists who do not give zakāt, and they are unbelievers in the hereafter. (41:6—7)

His (Satan's) power is only over those who befriend him and those who associate others with Him (Allāh). (16:100)

These verses have used the active participle, ''polytheists'', for those who, for example, befriend Satan and are under his power. Obviously, almost all the believers (except an infinitesimal minority who are friends of Allāh, and are His truly righteous servants) would come under this definition. But we would not be justified in giving them the name, ''polytheists'' because the active participle and the nomenclature are two different things.

This lengthy explanation shows that the apparent meaning of the verse under discussion prohibits marriage with idol-worshipping men and women only; marriage with the people of the book is not included in this verse.

In this context, there are no grounds at all for saying that this verse abrogated verse 6 of the chapter of al-Mā'idah; This day have been made lawful for you (all) good things; and the food of those who were given the book is lawful to you and your food lawful for them; and the chaste (ones) from the believing women and the chaste (ones) from those who were given the book before you (are lawful for you) when you have given them their wage (dower) with chaste intention, not fornicating nor taking them for paramours in secret … (5:6) Nor is there any reason for saying that this verse (2:221) joined with the verse, ... and hold not to the ties of marriage of unbelieving women ... (60:10), abrogates verse 5:6. Nor is it correct to say that the verse 5:6 has abrogated the two verses, 2:221 and 60:10.

Why are the above opinions wrong?

It is because:

First: As explained above, the verse under discussion apparently says nothing about marriage with the people of the book, while the verse of the chapter of al-Mā'idah (5:6) is concerned only with marriage with the people of the book. As the subject matters of the two verses are totally different, there is no question of one of them abrogating the other.

So far as verse 60:10 is concerned, it speaks about not holding ties of marriage with unbelieving women, and at the first glance it appears contradictory to verse 5:6 which allows marriage with chaste women of the people of the book. But a little more thinking will show (as will be explained later on) that this speaks about a man who accepts Islam and his wife remains a disbeliever, then he is forbidden to hold intact the marriage-tie with that woman, while the verse 5:6 speaks about performing a new marriage with a woman who is from the people of the book. The subject matters, therefore, of the two verses are not the same. Accordingly there arises no question of abrogation at all.

Second: Even if we accept for the time being that verses 2:221 and 60:10 forbid marriage with a Jewess or a Christian woman, the context compels us to believe that they cannot abrogate verse 5:6 which allows that marriage. Verse 5:6 shows some relaxation of the rule and Allāh describes it as His grace upon the believers. Such a verse cannot be abrogated. In Islam relaxed rules usually get the upper hand over strict ones. Therefore, if there were any abrogation, verse 5:6 would abrogate verses 2:221 and 60:10*,* and not vice versa.

Third: The chapter of al Baqarah (ch. 2) was the first one revealed at Medina soon after Hijrah ; and the chapter of al-Mumtaḥanah (ch. 60) was revealed at Medina before the take-over of Mecca in 8 A.H.: while the chapter of al-Mā'idah (ch. 5) was the last one revealed — it abrogated some previous rules but no rule revealed in it was ever abrogated.

How could the verses revealed before the chapter 5 abrogate the verse of that chapter which was yet to be revealed?

Qur'ān: and certainly a believing bondswoman is better than an idolatress, even though she should allure you: The people at that time accorded no dignity to slave-girls and anyone marrying such a woman immediately became an object of scorn. This verse, by qualifying the word ''bondswoman'' with the adjective ''believing'' and leaving the word ''idolatress'' without any condition, emphasizes the principle that a believing woman, even if she is a slave, is better than an idolatress even if she comes from a noble family and is rich and beautiful — the factors which usually attract a man towards a woman.

Someone has said that the word ''bondswoman'' (amah, أمة) here and the word ''bondsman'' ('abd,* عبد) in the next sentence, mean slave woman and slave man of Allāh — in other words, believing woman and believing man. But this interpretation is farfetched.

Qur'ān: and certainly a believing bondsman is better than an idolater, even though he should allure you: The same comment as above.

Qur'ān: Those invite to the fire, and Allāh invites to the garden and to forgiveness by His leave :

It explains the reason why marriage with idol-worshippers has been prohibited. The idolaters believe in falsehood, walk on the wrong path, and, thus, evil characteristics become firmly rooted in their psychology. Disbelief and sin look attractive to them and their eyes lose the ability to see the light of truth. As a result, their whole life becomes an open invitation to follow them to eternal perdition. In short, by their actions and talks they try to allure and entice the believers to the fire of hell.

The believers, on the other hand, proceed on the path of true faith, and live a righteous and virtuous life; and by their good example in words and deeds invite people to the paradise and the Lord's forgiveness by His leave, as He allowed them to call the people into the right path, leading them to eternal bliss — paradise and forgiveness.

Apparently, it would have looked proper to say, ''and these (i.e. the believers) invite to the paradise…'', as the contrasting sentence says: ''those invite to the fire.'' But Allāh used His own name instead of the believers to show that the believers in this invitation, nay, in all their activities and affairs, rely on their Creator and Lord; they are not independent of Allāh, their Master. Allāh says:...and Allāh is the Master of the believers. (3:68)

This sentence may be interpreted also in another way: The invitation to the garden and to forgiveness may be a reference to this law itself — the rule forbidding marriage with polytheists is in itself an invitation to paradise and the forgiveness of Allāh.

TRADITIONS

It is written about this verse that it was revealed about Marthad ibn Abī Marthad al-Ghanawī. The Messenger of Allāh sent him to Mecca to bring some Muslims out; and he was a strong and brave man. A woman, 'Unāq by name, offered him her person, but he refused; they had been friends before the advent of Islam. Then she said: ''Well, will you then agree to marry me?'' He said: ''Not before I seek permission from the Messenger of Allāh'' When he returned (to Medina), he asked permission to marry her. [Majma'u 'l-bayān] manthūr from Ibn ‘Abbās.

The author says: The same thing has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-

al-Wāḥidī has narrated through the chain of as-Suddī from Abū Mālik from Ibn ‘Abbās about this verse that it was revealed about ‘Abdullāh ibn Rawāḥah. He had a black slave-girl; once he became angry and slapped her (on the face). Then he felt frightened, and coming to the Prophet told him the story. The Prophet said: ‘‘What is she? O ‘Abdullāh!’’ He replied: ‘‘She keeps the fast, prays, does wuḍū properly, and offers testimony that there is no god except Allāh and that you are His Messenger.’’ The Prophet said: ‘‘O ‘Abdullāh! She is a believing woman.’’ ‘Abdullāh said: ‘‘By Him Who sent you with truth! I shall surely set her free and then marry her.’’ He did so. Some Muslims ridiculed him and said, ‘‘Lo! He married a slave-girl’’. They thought it better to establish marriage-ties with polytheist men and women, because they were of ‘‘honourable’’ families. Then Allāh revealed: and certainly a believing bondswoman is better than an idolatress ... [ad-Durru’l-manthūr]

Another tradition, quoted in the same book from Muqātil says that she was a bondswoman of Ḥudhayfah, whom he emancipated and married.

The author says: The above traditions are not contradictory. Maybe there were various such cases, and then the verse was revealed covering all of them.

There are some traditions showing that this verse abrogated verse 5:6, or was abrogated by it. We have shown the absurdity of these views, and we shall discuss those traditions when commenting on verse 5:6.

And they ask you about menstruation. (223)

COMMENTARY

Qur'ān: And they ask you about menstruation. Say: It is a discomfort: maḥīḍ (المحيض) and ḥayḍ (الحيض) are verbal infinitives; the Arabs say: ḥāḍati 'l-mar'aḥ (حاضت المرأة) when the natural system of the woman discharges the well-known periodic blood, which has its own special colour, etc. and is a peculiarity of women. Its active participle (ismu 'l-fā'il, اسم الفاعل) is used in both masculine and feminine genders, because there is no risk of misunderstanding. They say ḥā'iḍ (الحائض) and ḥāiḍah (الحائضة) i.e. the woman having monthly period; as they say ḥāmil (الحامل) and ḥāmilah (الحاملة) i.e. the pregnant women.

Adhā (الاذى) means discomfort and distress. Some people say that it is synonymous with ḍarar (harm, loss,الضّرر) . But it is not correct. The opposite of ḍarar (harm, loss , الضّرر) is naf' (benefit, profit, النّفع); but naf' (النّفع) is not the opposite of adhā (الاذى) . Also people say dawāun muḍirrun (harmful medicine, دوآء مضر); but if they said dawā'un mu'dhin (دوآء مؤذ) it would give another meaning; disagreeable or unpleasant medicine. Moreover, the Qur'ān says: They shall by no means harm you (lan yaḍurrūkum, لن يضرّوكم) but with a distress (adhḍ, اذى) (3:111) There would be no sense if you read it as: ''they shall by no means harm you but with a harm.'' In some other verses, also, it is difficult to interpret adhā (اذى) as ḍarar (loss, harm, ضرر): Surely (as for) those who annoy (yu'dhūna, يوذون) Allāh and His Apostle ... (33:57); O my people! Why do you give me trouble (tu dhūnanī, تؤذوننى) and you know indeed that I am Allāh's Apostle to you (61:5). Apparently, discomfort (adhā, اذى) signifies the effect of a disagreeable thing, and there may be times when a situation can be a discomfort as well as a harm or loss.

Menstruation is called adhā (اذى) in the meaning described above — discomfort, distress, disagreeable.

Those who interpret adhā (اذى) as harm, say that the question was about sexual intercourse during the monthly period, and Allāh replied that it was harmful. The physicians have said that at that time nature is occupied with cleansing the womb and making it ready for pregnancy, and sexual intercourse in the midst of that would creat a disturbance which is harmful to the health.

Qur'ān: therefore, keep aloof from the women during the menstruation and do not go near them...: i'tizāl (اعتزال) means to withdraw, to retire, to avoid mingling. They say 'azalta naṣībahu (عزلت نصيبه) when you separate his share and keep it in a place away from the others' shares.

Qurb (to be near, القرب) is the opposite of bu'd (to be far away, distant, البعد). It is used with the preposition min (from, من) and also without any preposition, as in this verse.

Keep aloof from woman during the menstruation means ''do not establish sexual relation with them during the passing of blood.''

People have had different views and customs about women in their monthly period. The Jews were extremely harsh in this matter. They ostracized such a woman even in food and drink. Her pots were separated, she took her meal apart from others, sat away from all the household, and slept alone. The Torah had ordained very severe rules concerning that period: about the woman as, well as about those who were unfortunate enough to go near her or even to touch her.

The Christians had no restriction at all about mingling, or even sleeping with them. The pagans of Arabia had no fixed rule. The Arabs of Medina and its neighbourhood had adopted some of the Jewish customs, and had thus made the lives of rich women difficult for them. On the other hand some pagans liked to have sexual intercourse with them in the belief that if a woman became pregnant at that time, the child would be cruel and extremely fond of shedding blood — these were admirable qualities for a man among the bedouins!

Apparently the words of this verse confirm the Jewish custom, but it is not so. When we read the next sentence, then when they have cleansed themselves, go in to them as Allāh has commanded you, we know that it means 'going in to them from their front'. It means that it was only this act, i.e. sexual intercourse in to their front, which was prohibited by the preceding sentences, and that the words, ''keep aloof from them'' and ''do not go near them'' are not used in their literal meaning; rather they are metaphors for sexual relations. Accordingly, this verse prohibits only this one action, and imposes no restriction whatsoever on mingling with them in food, drink, sleep, etc. In short, Islam adopted the middle course between the severe restrictions of the Jews and the free license of the Christians.

The word ''menstruation'' (maḥīḍ, المحيض) appears in the question, and then again in the answer (keep aloof ... during the menstruation) Why has the word been repeated instead of using a pronoun in the answer? It is because there is a difference in meaning of the two words: the first refers to the menstruation, and the second to its period.

Qur'ān: until they have become clean; then when they have cleansed themselves, go into them as Allāh has commanded you:

Cleanliness (ṭahārah, الطّهارة) and its opposite, uncleanliness (najāsah, النّجاسة) are among the most extensively applied concepts in Islam. They have their own comprehensive laws which cover a major part of religious commandments. The two words, because of their very common use, have become al-ḥaqīqatu 'sh-shar'iyyah (الحقيقة الشّرعيّة) as though they were ''originally made to express these religious concepts.''

The meaning of cleanliness is known to the whole of mankind inspite of the differences in their languages. It shows that the idea of ṭahārah (الطّهارة) is well-known to all human beings whatever their origin and period.

Life depends on exploiting material things, and using them to achieve its goal. Man desires whatever he desires only because of its benefit, use and characteristics. The most basic and most comprehensive are the benefits concerned with feeding and reproduction.

Sometimes some changes occur in these material things which cause repulsion; and man wants to throw such things away. Such changes appear mostly in taste, smell or colour. When this change appears, the material becomes unsavoury and repulsive. This change is called uncleanliness (najāsah, النّجاسة). Its opposite is ṭahārah (الطّهارة) which implies that the thing is still in its original condition of benefit and use, which attracts the man to it.

Cleanliness and uncleanliness are, therefore, two mutually exclusive qualities of a thing: it has either a quality which makes it lie likeable or another which makes it repulsive.

Man in the beginning must have perceived these qualities within the sphere of the five senses; gradually the concept would have been widened to cover mental and spiritual subjects, depending on whether those ideas were attractive or repulsive. Thus we come to the concept of ṭahārah (الطّهارة) and najāsah (النّجاسة) in parentage, character, belief, action and word.

There are four words with nearly the same meaning: naẓāfah (النّظافة), nazāhah (النّزاهة), quds (القدس) and subḥān (سبحان)

Naẓāfah (النظافة): It is the cleanliness of a thing after it had become unclean. It is exclusively used for the things which may be perceived by one of the five senses.

Nazāhah (النّزاهة): Its real meaning is ‘‘to be far away, distant’’. Its use for cleanliness is metaphorical — the thing is far from ugliness, uncleanliness.

Quds (قدس) and subḥān (سبحان) are preserved for mental and spiritual subjects.

Near in meaning to najāsah (النجاسة) are qadhārah (filthiness, القذارة), rijs (dirtiness, الرّجس) and rujz (uncleanliness, الرّجز).

Qadhārah (القذارة): Its real meaning is ‘‘to be distant’’. The verbs and adjectives derived from this verbal infinitive are used for a she-camel which remains aloof from the drove, for an unsocial man who does not mingle with others, for a person isolated from others and for a thing which is disliked. Therefore, its use in the meaning of najāsah (النّجاسة) must be metaphorical because an unclean thing is left and put aside until it is clean again.

Rijs (الرّجس) and rujz (الرّجز): Their original meaning is fright and aversion. Their use in the meaning of uncleanliness is metaphorical.

Islam has extended the meaning of cleanliness and uncleanliness to cover not only the things perceived by the five senses but also to ideas and thoughts. According to Islam, even general principles and social laws are either clean or unclean. For example, Allāh says in this verse: do not go near them until they have become clean ... (Here cleanliness refers to cessation of menstruation, — a material cleanliness) Also, He says: And your garments do purify (74:4); ... but He intends to purify you ... (5:6); These are they whom Allāh does not intend to purify their hearts …(5:41); None shall touch it save the purified ones. (56:79) Some of these verses refer to spiritual purifications and cleanliness.

The Islamic sharī'ah treats some unclean things as al-a'yanu'n-najisah (inherently unclean things, الاعيان النّجسة). Some of them are the blood, urine, stool and semen of man and of some animals, corpses, dogs and pigs. It has ordered the believers to protect themselves from these things in prayers, food and drink.

Ṭahārah (الطّهارة) is of two categories: From khabath (الخبث) by which one becomes clean after coming into touch with the above mentioned inherently unclean things; and from ḥadath (الحدث), which comes through wuḍū or an obligatory bath as explained in the books of Islamic laws.

It was explained earlier that Islam is the religion of monotheism. This monotheism is the root to which all the branches owe their existence. Now the belief in monotheism is the highest cleanliness before Allāh. After that come other fundamentals of faith, and they increase the spiritual purification of man. Then comes ethical righteousness, and the laws of sharī'ah made for the good in this world and the hereafter. The verse quoted above may be explained by keeping this principle in view. Also, it explains the verse of purity, Allāh only desires to keep away the uncleanliness from you, O People of the House! and to purify you a (thorough) purifying. (33:33)

Now we return to the explanation of the words used in this verse under discussion: ''until they have become clean'', i.e. until the blood stops. That is the beginning of the period of cleanliness (ṭuhr, الطّهر).

Then when they have cleansed themselves, i.e., when they have taken an obligatory bath or at least washed the part of body from where blood comes out.

go into them as Allāh has commanded you: This command comes after the order forbidding sexual relation with them; therefore, it signifies only that the restriction is now lifted; in other words, it means that sexual relations with them are allowed after their becoming clean, not that it is obligatory. Go into them is a metaphor for that relation. It is an example of the character building of the Qur'ān; as is the phrase, as Allāh has commanded you. Sexual relations are generally regarded as an amusement. But the Qur'ān draws man's attention to the fact that it is a thing ordered by Allāh, the order being ingrained in his nature. We may call it a creative order — an order given not in words, but programmed into our creation and nature. Thus the Qur'ān reminds us that it is an action without which the human species cannot survive; such an important function should not be treated as a sport or an amusement; it is one of the fundamental laws of nature.

This verse is similar to the words of Allāh:...now be in contact with them and seek what Allāh has written for you ... (2:187), and:... go into your tillage when you like, and do good beforehand for yourselves ... (2:223)

Apparently, the order to go into them refers to that ''creative order'' which is known because Allāh has given human beings reproductive organs and has created in them the power and inclination which lead them to reproduce.

Possibly the ''command'' could be interpreted as a legislative order: that it was obligatory to marry for a sufficient number of people to ensure continuity of the human race. But such a meaning is far-fetched.

Some commentators argue that the words as Allāh has commanded you prohibit going into the posterior of the women. But it is the weakest argument; this subject is difficult to prove from this verse. The argument cannot be based on the order, go into them, because, as explained earlier, this order, coming after a prohibition, signifies only the permission to establish sexual contact, it is not an obligatory rule. Therefore, if one were to ignore it one would not be committing an offence. Nor can it be argued on the strength of the words, as Allāh has commanded you, because, the command referred to herein is the creative, not the legislative one, as we have explained just now. And even if we accept, for the sake of argument, that it is a legislative order, it would be obligatory for only ''a sufficient number of people'', as we have explained above. And going against an obligatory order is unlawful only when that order is personally obligatory on oneself.

Qur'ān: Surely Allāh loves those who turn much (to Him) and He loves those who purify themselves: tawbah (usually translated as repentance, التّوبة) means returning to Allāh. Taṭahhur (التّطهّر) means purifying and cleansing oneself; in other words, turning away from dirtiness and returning to the original cleanliness. The meanings of both words come true when one obeys the command of Allāh, and especially so in the matters of cleanliness and uncleanliness. By doing whatever Allāh has told one to do, and abstaining from what He has forbidden, one purifies oneself from the uncleanliness of disobedience, and comes back to his Lord. That is why Allāh has ended this verse on these words; they are, therefore, applied to all the rules mentioned before them - Keep aloof from the women during the menstruation and go into them as Allāh has commanded you.

The sentences, Surely Allāh loves those who turn much (to Him) and He loves those who purify themselves, are not limited with any qualification or condition. Therefore, they apply to all the grades of cleanliness, as mentioned earlier. And the forms mutaṭahhirīn (المتطهّرين) and tawwābīn (التوّابين) signify great emphasis. These two factors taken together signify that Allāh loves all kinds of repentance (be it by asking for His for giveness, obeying all His commands or having true faith and belief) and all kinds of purification (be it by washing oneself, doing ablution, taking the obligatory bath, performing good deeds or acquiring true spiritual knowledge). Also, it signifies an increase by number: Allāh loves repeated repentance and repeated cleanliness.

Qur'ān: Your women are a tillage for you, so go unto your tillage when you like : ḥarth (الحرث) is an infinitive verb, meaning to ''to till, to cultivate''. It is also used for the land which is tilled or cultivated.

Annā (انّى) is an adverb meaning ''when'', ''whenever''. In this sentence it is synonymous with matā (when, متى). Sometimes it is also used for ''where''. Allāh says:... O Maryam! Whence (annā, انّى) comes this to you? She said: It is from Allāh.(3:36)

If, in the verse under discussion, annā (انّى) means ''where'', then its meaning would be, ''where you like''. If it means, ''when'', then it means, ‘‘when you like’’. In any case, it gives a sort of freedom to the couple, and that is why we cannot take the words, ‘‘so go unto your tillage’’, to be an obligatory order. No one gives a compulsory order and then leaves it in the hands of the doer to do as he likes.

The verse begins with the sentence, Your women are a tillage for you; after this reasoning comes the order, and there also the word ‘‘tillage’’ is repeated. This emphasis shows that the freedom given to man of going in to the women is either about the place of the intercourse or about its time; but it is not a freedom of entering anywhere in her body. She is a tillage and that idea must be kept in mind when approaching her.

If the order means, ‘so go into your tillage at any place you like’, then it is not concerned with the time of intercourse, and has no conflict whatsoever with the previous verse, keep aloof from the women during the menstruation and do not go near them. If, on the other hand, it means, ‘so go into your tillage at any time you like’, then it shall be limited to the period of purity from menstruation, because of the previous verse.

Just to avoid any misunderstanding, it is necessary to point out that this verse could not have abrogated the verse of menstruation — no matter whichever of the two was revealed first: The verse of menstruation gives two reasons why sexual relation in that period is forbidden — and both reasons are still valid, in spite of the verse of tillage. First, it says that menstruation is a discomfort and it continues to be a discomfort. Second, it shows that this order was given to avoid dirtiness and to remain clean, and Allāh always loves those who remain clean and pure; so much so that He counts keeping them cleansed as one of His graces upon them ; Allāh does not desire to put on you any difficulty, but He intends to purify you and that He may complete His favour on you ... (5:6) Such a language cannot be abrogated by a verse like that of tillage. Why? Because this verse says that your women are your tillage, so come into your tillage when you like. Now, the reason for this putative ‘‘concession’’ was present even when the prohibition was ordained. If it could not stop its promulgation, how can it cause its abrogation after it had already been firmly established? Second, the verse of tillage ends on the words, ‘‘and do good beforehand for yourselves, and fear Allāh, and know that you will meet Him.’’ Such an ending would be out of place if the verse (of tillage) contained a concession.

The meaning of the verse is as follows: Women are to humanity as tillage is to an individual. Agricultural land is needed to preserve the seed and to produce food, so that the human race may continue to exist. Likewise, women are needed for the continuity of humanity. According to the system created by Allāh, the woman's womb is the place where a child is made and develops from a microscopic sperm to a human being. As the original place of that sperm is the body of man, He created between the man and the woman a love and compassion and an attraction which excites the man to seek the woman.

As the creative purpose of this mutual attraction is to pave the way for the continuity of the human race, there was no reason why it should be confined to one place and not another, or one time and not another, as long as it helped in achieving that goal and did not hinder any other obligatory work.

This explanation shows the relevance of the words do good beforehand for yourselves, coming after the verse of tillage.

Someone has written that the verse of tillage gives permission to remove the male organ from the woman just before ejaculation. Such an interpretation is patently absurd. No less absurd is the view that the words, do good beforehand mean saying...bismi'llāh ... (by the name of Allāh …...الله. بسم) before the intercourse.

Qur'ān: and do good beforehand for yourselves; and fear Allāh, and know that you are to meet Him, and give good news to the believers. Obviously, these words addressed to males, or both males and females, are a sort of encouragement to keep the human species alive through marriage and reproduction. But is not an end in itself. Mankind and its continuity is desired only for the continuity of the religion of Allāh, the dominance of monotheism and the divine worship through piety. Allāh says: And I did not create the jinn and the human beings except that they should worship Me. (51:56) When He commands them to do anything concerning their life in this world, it is done only to make it easier for them to worship their Lord; it is not done with the aim of encouraging them to submerge themselves in sexual desire and wordly attractions.

No doubt the apparent meaning of do good beforehand for yourselves is ‘‘reproduce and bring into this world new souls to replace those who are dying every day’’; but it is not the final goal: the real aim is to keep the remembrance of Allāh going on, by producing righteous people who will do good deeds, the recompense and reward of which will reach their forefathers who were instrumental in bringing those good-doers into the world. Allāh says: ...and We write down what they have sent before and their footprints ... (36:12)

This leads us to believe that the real meaning of do good beforehand for yourselves is ‘send good deeds beforehand for the day of resurrection’. Allāh says:...the day when man shall see what his two hands have sent before ... (78:40); ... and whatever of good you send on beforehand for yourselves you will find it with Allāh ... (73:20)

This verse under discussion (and do good beforehand for yourselves, and fear Allāh, and know that you are to meet Him ...) is similar to verse 59:18: O you who believe! Fear Allāh, and let every soul consider what it has sent on for tomorrow and fear Allāh; surely Allāh is Aware of what you do.

In short, the meaning of these sentences is as follows:-

and do good beforehand for yourselves: Send on good deeds beforehand for the day of resurrection. Producing children and training them to be righteous servants of Allāh and good members of the society is one of those good deeds.

and fear All`ah : taqwā (fear of Allāh, piety, التّقوى) consists of going into the tillage as commanded by Allāh, neither exceeding the limits imposed by Him, neglecting the divine ordinance, nor committing unlawful acts.

and know that you are to meet Him. The order, in fact, means ‘fear Allāh whom you have to meet on the day of resurrection, lest your reckoning be severe’. The same is the significance of verse 59:18, mentioned earlier which says: and fear Allāh; surely Allāh is Aware of what you do. It is not uncommon to use the verb ‘‘to know’’ for the meaning ‘‘to be on guard’’, ‘‘to safeguard’’ and ‘‘to look out’’. Allāh says:… and know that Allāh intervenes between man and his heart ... (8:24); it means, ‘be afraid of His intervention between you and your hearts.’

and give good news to the believers. Good deeds and fear of the day of reckoning are the chief characteristics of faith. Therefore, the talk was ended by giving good news to the believers.

For this very reason, verse 59:18 began with the words: O you who believe.

TRADITIONS

Aḥmad, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd, ad-Dārimī, Muslim, Abū Dāwūd, at-Tirmidhī, an-Nasā’ī, Ibn Mājah, Abū Ya‘lā, Ibn al-Mundhir, Abū Ḥātim, an-Nahḥās (in an-Nāsikh), Abū Ḥayyān, and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated from Anas: ‘‘The Jews, when a woman of their house was in monthly period, turned her out of the house; they did not eat with her, did not drink with her, nor did they live with her in the same house. The Messenger of Allāh was asked concerning this matter. Then Allāh sent down the verse: And they ask you about menstruation. Say: It is a discomfort; therefore, keep aloof from the women during the men struation ... The Messenger of Allāh, therefore, said: ‘Remain with them in the (same) houses, and do everything except sexual intercourse.’ This report reached the Jews, and they said, ‘This man does not want to leave anything to our customs without going against it.’ Usayd ibn al-Ḥuḍayr and ‘Abbād ibn Bishr came and said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! The Jews are saying so-and-so. Should we not now establish sexual relations also with them?’’ On hearing it the face of the Messenger of Allāh changed and we thought that he had become angry with them. Then they went out; and at the same moment some milk was brought to the Messenger of Allāh as a present; so he sent it behind them and made them drink it. Thus they knew that he was not angry with them.’’ [ad-Durru ’l-manthūr]

It is reported from as-Suddī about the verse, And they ask you about menstruation that the man who asked it was Thābit ibn ad-Daḥdāḥ. [ibid.]

The author says: The same thing has been narrated also from Muqatil.

There is a tradition that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the word of Allāh, go into them as Allāh has commanded you: It is about seeking a child; therefore seek a child from where Allāh has commanded you. [at-Tahdhīb] aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked: ‘‘What can the husband of a menstruating woman get from her?'' He said: ''Everything except the front part itself.'' [al-Kāfī]

Another tradition is reported from the same Imām about the woman whose blood stops at the end of her usual period. The Imām said: ''If her husband is overcome by sexual desire, then he should order her to wash her front part, then he may touch her, if he so wishes, before she takes her obligatory bath.'' Other tradition adds: ''And the bath is preferable to me.'' [ibid.]

The author says: There are numerous traditions of the same meaning. The word used in the Qur'ān is recited ḥattā yaṭhurna (till they have become clean حتّى يطهرن); and it refers to the stopping of blood. Therefore, the Qur'ān and these traditions support each other.

It is said that the difference between the two words, yaṭhurna(they have become clean, يطهرن) and yataṭahharna (they have cleansed themselves, يتطهّرن) is that the second form implies doing something by one's own choice; therefore, it would mean taking the bath; but the first does not imply any choice; thus it would refer to the stopping of blood.

Accordingly, sexual intercourse is prohibited until they have become clean, i.e., until the blood stops. As soon as the blood stops, relations are again allowed.

When they have cleansed themselves go into them : If the cleansing refers to washing it would mean that the washing, as described in this tradition, is sunnah (commendable); and if it means taking the obligatory bath, then the verse would imply that it is commendable (sunnah) to go into them after they have taken their obligatory bath, as the above tradition says, ''and bath is preferable to me''. But in no case does this verse imply that going into them after stopage of blood and before the bath is prohibited, because the moment of prohibition lasts until the blood stops.

There is a tradition about the words of Allāh, Surely Allāh loves those who turn much (to Him), and He loves those who purify themselves, that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The people used to cleanse themselves (after defecation) with cotton and stones etc. Then was instituted cleansing with water, and it is a good habit. Therefore, the Messenger of Allāh ordered it and did it. Then Allāh sent down in His Book: Surely Allāh loves those who turn much (to Him), and He loves those who purify themselves. ''[al-Kāfī]

The author says: There are numerous traditions with this meaning, and it is said in some of them that the first man to cleanse himself with water was Barā' ibn 'Āzib; then this verse was revealed and the custom established.

There is a tradition in the same book from Salām ibn al-Mustanīr that he said: ''I was with Abū Ja'far (a.s.) when Ḥimrān ibn A'yun entered and asked him concerning some things. When Ḥimrān wanted to stand up (and go back), he told Abū Ja'far (a.s.): 'I wish to inform you — May Allāh prolong your life and may He grant us the benefit of your presence — that we come to you; and before we go out from your presence, our hearts become soft, our souls think no more about this world, and we disdain the wealth which people have in their hands. Then we go away from your presence, and when we mingle with people and traders, we (again) love this world.' Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said: 'It is these hearts; at one time they become hard, at another, soft.' Then the Imam continued: 'Surely, the companions of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) once told him : '' O Messenger of Allāh! We are afraid of hypocrisy (appearing) in ourselves.'' He asked: ''And why do you feel so?'' They said: ''When we are in your presence and you remind us (of Allāh) and invite us (to piety), we become afraid (of the displeasure of Allāh), and we forget the world and foresake it, so much so that we (seem to) see the hereafter and the garden and the fire; this all is so long as we are in your presence. But as soon as we come out of your presence, and enter these (our) houses, and feel the scent of our children and see our families, our condition changes almost completely, as though we had no conviction of anything. Do you fear that it is hypocrisy on our part?'' Then the Messenger of Allāh told them: ''Not at all. Surely, these steps are of Satan who wants to attract you towards this world. By Allāh! If you continued in that condition which you have just described, you would indeed shake hands with the angels, and would walk upon the water. And had it not been that you commit sins and then seek pardon from Allāh, He would certainly create (another) creation who would commit sins and then ask forgiveness of Allāh, so that Allāh would forgive them. Verily the believer is seduced, (but is also) often-returning (to Allāh).'' Have you not heard the words of Allāh: Surely Allāh loves those who turn much (to Him), and He loves those who purify themselves. And Allāh says: And that ask forgiveness of your Lord, then turn to Him ... (11:3)' ''

The author says: A similar tradition has been reported by al-'Ayyāshī in his at-Tafsīr.

The words of the Prophet, ''if you continued in that condition…'' point to the position of wilāyah (friendship of Allāh, الولاية) which means keeping aloof from the world and fixing the eyes on to what is with Allāh. We have explained it partly under verse 2:156.

His words, ''And had it not been that you commit sins ...'', allude to a mystery of the divine decree. And we shall talk about it under verse 15:21 (And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure) and other such verses.

The words, ''Have you not heard….'', are of Abū Ja'far (a.s.) and are addressed to Ḥimrān. These words interpret tawbah (التّوبة) and ṭahārah (الطّهارة) as returning to Allāh by desisting from wrong and removing the filth of sins from the soul and the rust of mistakes from the heart. It is an example of deducing a conclusion by looking at a verse from one level while at another level a new result (but never in conflict with the first) may be obtained. For example, the verse, None shall touch it save the purified ones (56:79) proves at one level that none has the knowledge of the Book except the sinless members of the family of the Prophet, while, on other level, it declares that touching the writing of the Qur'ān without doing wuḍu or taking the bath is prohibited.

Creation progresses, taking from the treasures that are with Allāh, until it reaches the last level of maqādīr (the measures, decrees, المقادير). Allāh says: And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure. (15:21)

Likewise, the decrees do not come down to us except after passing through various stages of reality. This subject will be further explained under the verse, He it is Who has revealed the Book to you; some of its verses are decesive ... (3:7)

From above, it may be understood that the verse under discussion, at one level refers to returning the soul and heart to Allāh by cleansing them from the dirt of sins (as mentioned just above), and, at another level, obliges one to take the bath; and at this level these two words would mean returning the body towards Allāh by removing uncleanliness.

This explains also the tradition of the Imām: ‘‘Allāh sent down to Ibrāhīm (a.s.) uprightness (ḥanīfiyyah, الحنيفيّة) and it is cleanliness (ṭahārah, ,الطّهارة). And it is ten things — five in the head, and five in the body. That which is in the head is: trimming the moustache, keeping the beard, cutting the hair, cleansing the teeth, and picking the teeth; and that which is in the body is: removing the hair from the body, circumcision, cutting the nails, taking bath after janābah (i.e. after sexual intercourse or ejaculation during sleep), and cleansing by water after an evacuation of the bowel. This is the pure uprightness brought by Ibrāhīm; it was not abrogated, nor will it be abrogated upto the day of resurrection ... ’’ [at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī]

There are many traditions showing that the above things are a part of cleanliness. Some of them say: Indeed nūrah (hair removing paste,النّورة) is a purifier.

There is a tradition about the words of Allāh: Your women are a tillage for you ... narrated by Mu‘ammar ibn Khallād that Abu ’1-Ḥasan ar-Riḍā (a.s.) told him: ‘‘What do you say about going into the women in their posterior? I said: ‘I have been told that the people of Medina have no objection about it.’ He said: ‘Verily the Jews said that if a man comes (into her) from her behind, his child (resulting .from that intercourse) will be cross-eyed. Therefore, Allāh revealed: Your women are a tillage for you, so go into your filth from where you like, that is, from their behind.’ ’’ [al-‘Ayyāshī]

There is in the same book a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said about this verse: ‘‘From her front and from her behind (but) in the vagina’’.

Another tradition in the same book reports that Abū Baṣīr asked Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) about a man who enters into the posterior of his wife. The Imām expressed his abhorance of it and said: ‘‘Beware of the anus of women.’’ Then he said: ‘‘Your women are a tillage for you, so go into your tillage as you like’’ only means ‘‘whenever you like’’.

The same book narrates from al-Fatḥ ibn Yazīd al-Jurjānī that he wrote same question to ar-Riḍā (a.s.); and the same reply came: ‘‘You asked about the man who enters into a woman in her posterior; the woman is a play-thing; she should not be hurt, and she is a tillage as Allāh has said.’’

The author says: There are numerous traditions with this meaning narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) in al-Kāfī, at-Tahdhīb, and Tafsīrs of al-'Ayyāshī and al-Qummī. All of them show that the verse of tillage only proves that intercourse should be into the front part. Of course, there is a tradition in Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī narrated by 'Abdullāh ibn Abī Ya'fūr in which he says: ''I asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about going into women in their posterior; he said: 'There is no harm'; then he recited the verse: Your women are a tillage for you, so go into your tillage when (as) you like.

But, apparently the meaning of ''going into women in their posterior'' means entering into vagina from behind; and the verse quoted supports this meaning, as has been seen in the tradition of Mu'ammar ibn Khallād, mentioned above.

Ibn 'Asākir has narrated a tradition from Jābir ibn 'Abdullāh that he said: ''The Anṣār (of Medina) used to go into their women lying down; and the Quraysh (of Mecca) used various postures. A Qurayshite man married a woman from Anṣār, and wanted to sleep with her (in his own way). She said: except in the way it should be done. The case was reported to the Messenger of Allāh; so Allāh revealed: so go into your tillage when (as) you like. That is, in any posture, standing, sitting or lying down, but it should be into the same passage.'' [ad Durru 'l-manthūr]

The author says: This meaning is narrated with numerous chains from various companions, giving the same reason for its revelation. And the tradition of ar-Riḍā (a.s.) has already been quoted giving the same meaning. The words in this last tradition, ''in one passage'' allude to the rule that intercourse should be in the front part only. There are numerous traditions showing that going into their posterior is prohibited; the traditions are from numerous chains through numerous companions from the Prophet.

Even those traditions narrated by our Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt which show that entering into their posterior is allowed but with the utmost abhorance do not offer the verse of tillage as their proof. They argue on the basis of verse 15:71, which quotes Lūṭ as saying: ''He said: 'These are my daughters if you are to do (aught)'.'' Here Lūṭ (a.s.) offered his daughters to them, knowing well that they did not enter into the front part. And this was not abrogated by any Qur'ānic verse. We shall talk about it there. Here it is enough to say that the verse of tillage has no relevance to this topic.

But, even according to the Sunnī traditions, the ruling is not unanimous. It has been narrated from ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Umar, Mālik ibn Anas, Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī and others that they did not see any harm in that practice and they used the verse of tillage as their proof. Ibn ‘Umar goes so far as to say that it was revealed specifically to legalise this practice.

It is reported on the authority of ad-Dār Qutnī (in al-Gharā’ib of Mālik) through his chain to Nāfi‘ that he said: ‘‘Ibn ‘Umar told me, ‘Keep the Qur’ān before me, O Nāfi‘!’ Then he recited until he reached the verse: Your women are a tillage for you, so go into your tillage when you like. He asked me: ‘Do you know, O Nāfi‘! about whom this verse was revealed?’ I replied: ‘No!’ He said: ‘It was revealed about a man from Anṣār who entered into the posterior of his woman; so people thought it a grave matter. Then Allāh revealed: Your women are a tillage for you, so go into your tillage when you like.’ I said: ‘From her back side into her front part?’ He said: ‘No. But into her back side itself.’ [ad Durru ’l-manthūr]

The author says: This meaning has been narrated from Ibn ‘Umar with numerous chains. Ibn ‘Abdi ’1-Barr has said: ‘‘The tradition with this meaning from Ibn ‘Umar is ṣaḥīḥ (correct) well-known and famous.’’

Ibn Rāhwayh, Abū Ya‘lā, Ibn Jarīr, at-Ṭaḥāwī (in his Mushkilu.’l-āthār) and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated with good chains from Abū Sa‘īd al-Khudrī that a man entered into the posterior of his woman; people thought it bad of him; then the verse of tillage was revealed. [ad Durru ’l-manthūr] al-Khaṭīb has narrated in the ‘‘narrators of Malik’’ from Abū Sulaymān al-Jawzjānī that he said: ‘‘I asked Mālik ibn Anas about intercourse with lawful women into their posterior. He told me: ‘Just now I have washed my head (i.e. taken a bath) after (doing) it.’ ’’ [ibid.]

aṭ-Ṭaḥāwī has narrated from the chain of Aṣbagh ibn al-Faraj from ‘Abdullāh ibn al-Qāsim that he said: ‘‘I did not find anyone whom I follow in my religion who was doubtful about its legality, (meaning, entering into the back-side ,of the women). Then he read: Your women are a tillage for you. Then he asked: ‘So what is more clear than this.’ ’’ [ibid.]

There is a tradition in as-Sunan of Abū Dāwūd, from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘Surely Ibn ‘Umar, May Allāh forgive him, fell into error (in interpreting the verse of tillage in this way). The fact is that there were some tribes of Medina, and they were idol worshippers, residing with some tribes of the Jews, and they were the people of the Book. And these Medinites thought that the Jews were superior than them in knowledge, and they, therefore, followed them in many of their customs. And those people of the Book did not go to the women but in one posture only (i.e. lying down), and that was most comfortable to the woman. And these tribes of Anṣār of Medina adopted this method from them. Now these Qurayshite used very strange postures; and they enjoyed keeping them in various position — lying down, facing them or entering from their back side. When the emigrants came to Medina, one of them married a woman from Anṣār and started doing like this with her. She complained of it to him and said: ‘We were doing it in one way; you do like that or keep away from me.’ This news spread, till it reached the Messenger of Allāh. Then Allāh revealed the verse: Your women are a tillage for you, so go into your tillage when you like. It means, facing them, from their back side or lying down, meaning in the place of child (i.e. in the place where conception may take place).’’

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated it through other chains also, from Mujāhid from Ibn ‘Abbās.

It is reported in the same book: Ibn ‘Abdi ’l-Ḥakam has narrated that ash-Shāfi‘ī argued with Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan on this subject. Ibn al-Ḥasan argued that ‘‘the tillage can be in the front part only.’’ ash-Shāfi‘ī said: ‘‘Then doing it anywhere except in the front part will be prohibited?’’ He agreed. He (ash-Shāfi‘ī) said: ‘‘Do you think, if he did with her between her thighs or in the folds of her belly, is there any tillage in it?’’ He replied: ‘‘No!’’ He asked: ‘‘Will it then be unlawful?’’ He said: ‘‘No!’’ ash-Shāfi‘ī said: ‘‘Then why do you bring an argument which you yourselves do not believe in?’’

It is reported in the same book: Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abi ’l-Ḥātim have narrated from Sa‘īd ibn Jubayr that he said: ‘‘Mujāhid and I were sitting with Ibn ‘Abbās when a man came to him and said: ‘Will you not satisfy me about the verse of menstruation?’ He replied: ‘Surely! Recite it.’ He recited: And they ask you about menstruation ... go into them as Allāh has commanded you. Ibn ‘Abbās said: ‘From where the blood was coming, you are ordered to go into the same place.' The man said: 'Then what about the verse: Your women are a tillage for you, so go into your tillage when you like?' He replied: 'O Woe unto thee! Is there any tillage in the posterior? If what you say were correct then the verse of menstruation would be abrogated, because if that place was not open (because of blood) you would go into this (other) place! But his verse means ''whenever you like'' in the night or day!' ''

The author says: The last argument is defective. The verse of menstruation only says that in that period going into the front part of the women is prohibited. If, allegedly, the verse of tillage. allows going into their posterior, it would cover a new subject, and there would be no conflict between it and the verse of menstruation. So, there would be no question of either abrogating the other. Moreover, we have already explained that the verse of tillage does not say that going into women in their posterior is allowed. Of course, some traditions narrated from Ibn 'Abbās argue that the words, ''go into them as Allāh has commanded you'', prove that going into women in their posterior is forbidden. But we have already explained that it is the most defective argument, because the verse only says that entering into their front part is prohibited so long as they have not become clean. It says nothing about other matters; and the verse of filth also says nothing except that one may go into one's tillage at any time.

This subject is from Islamic law; we have dealt here with only that side of it which was relevant to the subject of at-Tafsīr.

APPENDIX "B"

In this book the references of the Qur'ãnic verses have been given by writing serial number of the relevant chapter, followed by a colon (:) that is followed by the number/s of the verse/s. The names of the chapters have been omitted for the sake of brevity.

The names of the chapters with their serial numbers are given here for the guidance of the readers.

To find, for instance, the verse 5:67 in the Qur'ãn, the reader should open the fifth chapter, that its, al-Mã'idah (اَلمَآئِدة = The Table) and then find the 67th verse.

1. al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī (1321/1904 — 1402/1981) — may Allāh have mercy upon him — was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān which will be published, by the help of Allāh, in the near future.

2. al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzān fī tafsīri ’l-Qur’ān which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allāmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzān because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustādh al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and its discussions.

4. We have proceeded to publish the translation of the second volume of the Arabic al-Mīzān earlier as it was ready for printing, whereas the first volume is not ready yet for the reasons which we do not wish to state here. So we saw no reason in delaying its printing. We have included two appendixes: one for the authors cited in all the volumes of al-Mīzān, and the other for the books cited therein. These two appendixes have been attached to the first volume of the English translation. Apart from this, the reader will find two appendixes in all the volumes of the translation of al-Mīzān.

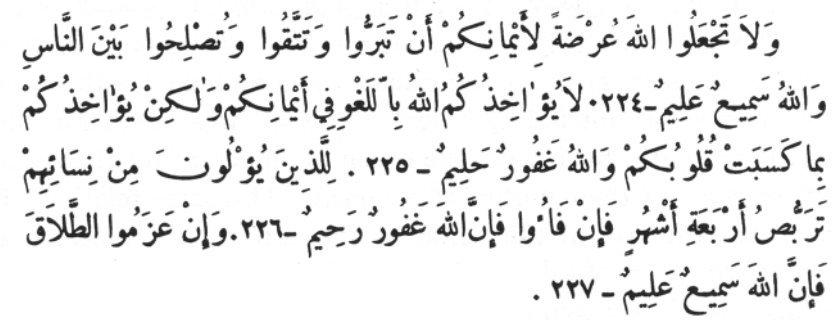
* * * * *



We implore upon Allāh to effect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work which we have started. May Allāh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Helper.

QUR'ĀN: And make not Allāh . . . and Allāh is Hearing, Knowing.'' al-''Urḍah'' (العُرْضَة) is derived from al-ʿarḍ (العَرْضُ) which means to display a thing to show its fitness for the purpose for which it is made. For example, to display goods for sale, to show a house for rent, to offer food for consumption. Some of the uses of al-'urḍah are: a target for shooting practice is called al-'urḍah of the arrows; a horse readied for a journey is called al-'urḍah for travel; a girl of marriageable age is called al-'urḍah of marriage. All these are relevant to its original meaning. But the use of this word for a hindrance on the road (and other similar uses) have come into vogue later as metaphors.

''al-Aymān''(اَلاَيْمَانُ) is plural of al-yamīn (اليَمينُ) and means ''oaths''. Its original meaning is the right hand. As they strike by, raise, or give, the right hand when taking an oath, showing allegiance or concluding a deal, the word was metaphorically used for the oath, borrowing the organ of an action for the action itself, because of their mutual relationship. This same relationship also allows the use of the name of the action for its organ, as as-sabbābah (السَّبَّابَة = the one who abuses) is used for the forefinger which is often used to point with when abusing.

The meaning of the verse, then, shall be as follows (And Allāh knows better!):

And do not use (the name of) Allāh (like) a target upon which to attach your oaths which you have sworn to the effect that you will not do a good deed or will not guard yourselves against evil or will not make peace between people; because Allāh does not like it that His name be made a means of desisting from what He Himself has ordered. (This meaning is supported by the traditions which will be quoted later.)

Based on this meaning, the verse can be analysed grammatically in three ways : —

a) An tabarrū (اَنْ تَبَرُّوُا = literal meaning: that you do good) is in fact an la tabarrū (اَنْ لا تَبَرُّوُا = that you do not do good). In the translation we have followed this meaning and the negative has been expressed by the word ''against'' (your swearing against your doing). Such an omission of the negative is common after ''an'' (اَنْ) which turns the verb into an infinitive. See for example verse 175 of ch. 4: Allāh makes it clear for you (lest) you err. (4:177)

b) Or there is no omission; and the words ''your doing good . . .'' is governed by the negative ''make not''. The meaning, in this case, will be that Allāh forbids you to take such oaths.

c) Or the al-'urḍah (target) may imply excess, as a target is used for shooting practice. The verse, in this case, will be a prohibition of excessive swearing by the name of Allāh. It will mean, ''Do not swear every now and then by the name of Allāh, because it will lead you to abstain from doing good, etc.'' A habitually swearing man does not care what he swears about. As he becomes used to it, it loses its importance, and it may encourage him to make a false oath. This much about his own attitude. So far as society is concerned, he will lose his respect, people will look down upon him — after all, swearing implies that the man himself is not sure that people will accept his words as true. If, in this way, he degrades his own words, why should other believe what he says. Ultimately, he will become a subject of the verse: and do not obey (i.e. accept the words of) any mean swearer. (68:10)

The words of Allāh, ''and Allāh is Hearing, Knowing'' are a sort of threatening, whatever meaning one accepts of the preceding sentence. But the first meaning (upon which our translation is based) is the most obvious.

QUR'ĀN: Allāh will not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths, but He will call you to account for what your hearts have earned . . . : A ''al-laghw'' (اللَّغْوُ = vain) action is that which has no effect. The effect of a thing varies according to variations in its attachments, etc. An oath may have an effect in so far as it is a word, or in so far as, it emphasizes speech; or thirdly in so far as it is a vow; or fourthly if it is broken, or if one perjures, and so on. In this verse the vain oath is contrasted with that (oath) which hearts have earned. It shows that the vain oath here means that which has no effect on the intention of the speaker, that is, such oaths which one utters (like 'No, By God', 'Yes, By God') without taking those words seriously.

''al-Kasb'' (الكَسْبُ) means to earn profits by a work or profession etc. Originally, it was used for the obtaining of those things which fulfil material needs. Then it was metaphorically used for any good or evil a man may get as a result of any of his actions, like earning praise and good reputation through good character and social services, and earning good knowledge, superiority, and nobility by striving for them; or earning condemnation, abuse, and slander; or sin and error by one's evil actions. This is the meaning of al-kasb and al-iktisāb (الاكْتِسَابُ).

Some people say that al-iktisāb is used when one earns a benefit for one's own self; and al-kasb refers to earning a benefit whether it is done for one's own self or for others, as when a servant earns for his master, or a guardian for his ward.

In any case the active participle al-kāsib (الكَاسِبُ) and al-muktasib (المُكْتَسِبُ), (both of which mean ''one who earns'') are used only for a human being.

THE MEANING OF ''HEART'' IN THE QUR'ĀN

The above explanation is a proof that the words ''your hearts'' in the verse refer to the man himself — his spirit and soul. The faculties of thought, understanding, love, hate, fear, and so forth, may be attributed (basing what one says on the common man's belief) to the heart, as hearing is attributed to the ears, sight to the eyes, and taste to the tongue. But the word 'earning' can only be attributed to man. As the verse uses the expression, ''for what your hearts have earned'', it proves that the ''heart'' here stands for the 'soul', 'spirit'.

The same meaning applies to the verses: . . . his heart is surely sinful (2:283) and: . . . and comes with a penitent heart. (50:33)

When man looked at animals and at himself he found that perceptions and thinking sometimes become ineffective, for example, during epilepsy or lunacy, yet life continues, as is witnessed by the heart-beat and the pulse. This led him to believe that the source of life is the heart; he thought that the spirit of life first attaches itself to the heart, and that it is from there that life extends to all parts of the body. He further believed that all the psychological faculties, such as perception, will, love, hate, hope, fear and other such things, belong to the heart because it is the seat of the psyche — the spirit. Of course, every organ is the source of its own function — the mind for thinking, the eyes for seeing, the ears for hearing, the lungs for breathing, and so on. But all are like tools which are used in the work they are made for; it is the heart that is the tool-wielder.

And it is a fact that physical research and experiments have not been able to pin-point the source of control which rules over the whole body. There is no doubt that the limbs and organs of the body, even though they are different from each other and have different functions and duties to perform, are united under the control of one ruling power, and are really one unit.

It is not that the ancients were not aware of the mind and its functions. Man knew the importance of the head from the very beginning. Does one not see that all the nations and races, with their different languages, name the ''authority'' the ''head'', and with it its derivatives. For example ar-ra's (الرَّأسُ = head), ar-riyāsah (الرِّيَاسَةُ = headship, meaning presidency) and ar-ra'īs (الرَّئِيسُ = head, that is, President). Then there are the phrases like head of a thread, the head (beginning) of a period, the head (starting-point) of a distance, the head (beginning) of a speech, the head (summit) of a mountain, a head (individual number) of animals or cattle, the head of the year (new year's day), etc.

Apparently, this is the reason why people attribute perception and thinking and sentiments (which are not totally void of perception) like love, hate, hope, fear, will, envoy, chastity, bravery, etc. to the heart. But by heart they mean the spirit which runs into or is attached to, the body. They attribute perceptions and sentiments to the heart, as well as to the spirit and soul, and also to their own selves. They say: I love him; my soul loves him, my heart loves him. Then the metaphorical use of heart for spirit and soul came into general use; then this use was extended to the breast, because the breast contains the heart; and, therefore, to it were attributed the faculties of perception, action and the sentiments.

There are many such uses in the Qur'ān: . . . He expands his breast for Islam . . . (6:125); . . your breast straitens at what they say (15:97); . . . and the hearts rose up to the throats . . alluding to the constriction of the breast (33:10); Surely, Allāh knows whatever is in your breasts. (5:7)

A point to consider: Can these expressions not be a support for the common belief mentioned earlier, even if it is yet to be clarified? Shaykh Abū 'Alī ibn Sīnā is inclined to believe that it is the heart that perceives, and the brain is its tool.

Anyhow, now we come back to the verse. The sentence, ''but He will call you to account for what your hearts have earned'', is a metaphor in a metaphor. The. preceding sentence says: Allāh will not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths. The contrasting sentence should have been, ''. . . for what is firmly considered of your oath''. Instead it mentions the effect, that is, the sin, which will come into being if one breaks that vow. It is done to show that Allāh looks only at the heart, as He says:. . . and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it Allāh will call you to account for it (2:284); There does not reach Allāh their flesh nor their blood, but to Him reaches your piety . . . (22:37)

The words, ''and Allāh is Forgiving, Forbearing'', hint at the undesirability of vain swearing and oath-taking, because such a thing should not be done by a believer. Allāh says: Successful indeed are the believers, who are humble in their prayers, and who keep aloof from what is vain . . . (23:1 — 3)

QUR'ĀN: For those who swear (to abstain) from their wives. . . surely Hearing, Knowing:''al-Ilā' ''(الايْلاَء = to swear), in Islamic jurisprudence, means the swearing by husband that he will not go to his wife, provided it is done in anger with an intention to harm the wife. This is the meaning intended in this verse. The preposition ''from'' after the verb ''swear'' gives the meaning of distance; thus the verse implies the meaning of swearing to abstain and to remain aloof from the wife. The waiting of four months implies the same, because it is the period at the end of which cohabitation is, according to the sharī'ah, obligatory on the husband.

''If they resolved on divorce''.The verse means the intention followed by its implementation. It is also implied by the words, ''Allāh is surely Hearing, Knowing'', because ''Hearing'' can be applied to the spoken words of the divorce, not its intention only.

The words at the end of verse 2:225, ''Allāh is Forgiving, Forbearing'', show that if one goes back to his wife then one shall not be punished in the hereafter. So far as this life is concerned, he is obliged to pay its penalty, al-kaffārah (الكَفَّارَةُ) because this penalty is not forgiven. Allāh says: Allāh does not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths, but He calls you to account for the making of deliberate oaths; so its expiation is the feeding of ten poor men out of the average (food) you feed your families with, or their clothing, or the freeing of a neck, but whosoever cannot find (means) then fasting for three days; this the expiation of your oaths when you swear. And guard your oaths. (5:89)

The meaning of the verses is that if one swears to abstain from his wife, then the Muslim Qāḍī (judge) shall give him a time of four months to go back to her. If by the end of that period, he gives the penalty for the oath, and establishes .sexual relations with her, then he shall get no punishment in the hereafter. If on the other hand, he decides to divorce her, that is another way out. And Allāh is Hearing, Knowing.

TRADITIONS

There is a tradition in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī, from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: And make not Allāh a target of your swearing, that he (the Imām) said: ''It is the word of man: 'No, by God', 'Yes, by God'.''

Another tradition in the same book, from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.), about this verse, says: ''That is, a man swears that he would not talk with his brother, and other such oaths, or that he would not talk with his mother.''

Another tradition in al-Kāfī from aṣ-Sādiq (a.s.) about it says: ''When you are called to make peace between two persons, do not say on oath that you will not carry out.''

The author says: The first tradition gives one explanation of the verse, the second and third give another. There is another tradition of nearly the same meaning in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that they said: ''He is the man who makes peace between two persons, and carries the burden of the sin that is between them . . .'' Apparently the tradition means that such a man should not swear that he will not try to do it; he should make peace between them, even if he has to carry the sin, and Allāh will forgive him, and he will be an example of him who follows this verse.

There is in al-Kāfī from Mas'adah from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said about the verse: Allāh will not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths . . . ''Vain is the saying of a man, 'No, by God', and 'Yes, by God', without having any firm intention about anything. ''

The author says: The same meaning is narrated in al-kāfī from him by another chain; and in al-Majma'u 'l-bayān from him and al-Bāqir (a.s.).

There is a narration in al-Kāfī from both Imāms that they said: ''If a man swears that he will not go near his wife, then she has not got any say or any right for four months; and he has no sin in not going to her in that period. If the four months pass away and he does not touch her, then, so long as she is silent and does not complain, he is absolved and free (from any responsibility). Then if she brings her case (before the Qāḍī), the husband will be told: either go back to her and touch her or divorce her. 'Resolve of divorce' means that he should leave her; then when she sees her monthly blood and (afterwards) becomes clean, he will divorce her. And he has, moreover, the right of ar-raj'ah (الرَّجْعَةُ = returning to her; revoking the divorce) before the expiry of three monthly periods. So this is the al-'īlā', which Allāh revealed in His Book, and which the Apostle of Allāh ordained. ''

There is in the same book a tradition from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) in which he says, inter alia: ''And al-'īlā' is that he says, 'By Allāh, I shall not cohabit with thee so and so' or says, 'By Allāh, I shall put thee to sorrow', and then puts her to sorrow.''

The author says: There are some differences between Sunnis and Shī'ahs about some particulars of al-'īlā'; but the discussion of it concerns Islamic jurisprudence.

And the divorced women should keep themselves in waiting for three monthly courses; and it is not lawful for them that they should conceal what Allāh has created in their womb, if they believe in Allāh and the last day; and their husbands have a better right to take them back in the meanwhile if they wish for reconciliation; and they have rights similar to those upon them in a just manner, and for the men is (right) a degree above them, and Allāh is Mighty, Wise (228). Divorce is twice; then keep (them) in fairness or let (them) go with kindness; and it is not lawful for you to take any part of what you have given them, unless both fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh; then if you fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh, there is no blame on them for what she gives up (to become free thereby). These are the limits of Allāh, so do not exceed them, and whoever exceeds the limits of Allāh then these it is that are the unjust (229). So if he divorces her she shall not be lawful to him afterwards until she marries another husband; then if he divorces her there is no blame on them both if they return to each other (by marriage), if they both think that they can keep within the limits of Allāh, and these are the limits of Allāh which He makes clear for a people who know (230). And when you divorce the women and they reach their prescribed time then either retain them in fairness or set them free with fairness, and do not retain them for injury, so that you exceed the limits, and whoever does this, he indeed is unjust to his own self, and do not take Allāh's signs for a mockery, and remember the favour of Allāh upon you, and that which He has revealed to you of the Book and the Wisdom, admonishing you thereby; and fear Allāh, and know that Allāh is the Knower of all things (231). And when you have divorced the women and they have ended their term (of waiting), then do not prevent them from marrying their husbands when they agree among themselves in a lawful manner; with this is admonished whosoever among you believe in Allāh and the last day; this is more profitable and purer for you; and Allāh knows while you do not know (232). And the mothers should suckle their children for two complete years for him who desires to make complete the time of suckling, and their maintenance and their clothing must be borne by the father according to usage; no soul shall have imposed upon it a duty but to the extent of its capacity; neither shall a mother be made to suffer harm on account of her child, nor a father on account of his child; and a similar duty (devolves) on the (father's) heir; then if both desire weaning by mutual consent and counsel, there is no blame on them; and if you wish to engage a wet-nurse for your children, there is no blame on you so long as you pay what you promised according to usage; and fear Allāh and know that Allāh sees what you do (233). And (as for) those of you who die and leave wives behind, they should keep themselves in waiting for four months and ten (days); then when they have fully attained their term, there is no blame on you for what they do for themselves in a proper manner; and Allāh is aware of what you do (234). And there is no blame on you respecting that which you speak indirectly in the asking of (such) women in marriage or keep (the proposal) concealed within your minds; Allāh knows that you will soon mention them, but do not give them a promise in secret unless you speak in a proper manner; and do not resolve the marriage-tie until the prescribed term is completed, and know that Allāh knows what is in your mind, therefore beware of Him, and know that Allāh is Forgiving, Forbearing (235). There is no blame on you if you divorce the women while yet you have not touched them or appointed for them a dowry, and make provision for them, on the wealthy according to his means, and on the straitened in circumstances according to his means, a provision according to usage; (this is) a duty on the doers of good (to other) (236). And if you divorce them before you have touched them and you have appointed for them a dowry, then (pay to them) half of what you have appointed, unless they remit or he remits in whose hand is the marriagetie; and it is nearer to piety that you should remit, and do not forget generosity between you; surely Allāh sees what you do (237). Maintain the prayers and the middle prayer and stand up truly obedient to Allāh (238). But if you are in danger, then (say your prayers) on foot or on horseback; and when you are secure, then remember Allāh as He has taught you what you did not know (239). And those of you who die and leave wives behind, (make) a bequest in favour of their wives of maintenance for the year without turning (them) out, then if they themselves go away, there is no blame on you for what they do of proper deeds about themselves, and Allāh is Mighty, Wise (240). And for the divorced women (too) provision (should be made) according to usage; (this is) a duty on those who guard (against evil) (241). Thus Allāh makes clear to you His signs, so that you may understand (242).

These verses promulgate the laws concerning divorce and the period of waiting as well as about a divorcee suckling her child ; in middle of it are some rules concerning prayer.

QUR'ĀN: And the divorced women should keep themselves in waiting for three monthly periods: ''aṭ-Ṭalāq'' (الطَّلاَقُ ) literally means to release from bonds, to remove the fetters. Then it was metaphorically used for releasing the women from the tie of marriage, and it was so exclusively used in this sense that eventually it became its real meaning.

''Yatarabbaṣna bi anfusihinna'' (يَتَرَبَّصْنَ بِاَنْفُسِهِنَّ = should keep themselves in waiting) : at-tarabbuṣ (التَّرَبُّصُ) is to wait, to hold back. This word is followed here by ''bi anfusihinna'' (بِاَنْفُسِهِنَّ ; literal meaning = concerning their own selves) ; it thus gives the meaning that they should not attach themselves to any man. In other words, it ordains the rule of al-'iddah (العِدَّةُ = waiting period) of divorce.

''A woman is in al-'iddah'' means that she is holding herself back from marrying again, lest the sperm of the original and subsequent husbands be mixed, and genealogies and consanguinity be corrupted.

The words ''should keep themselves in waiting'' thus not only legislate a law but also hint at its philosophy. It is not necessary for that philosophy and benefit to be found in every individual case; the laws are made keeping in view the good of the majority of people, not all.

The words thus mean: the divorced women should keep themselves in waiting, by not giving themselves to another husband, so that the sperm should not be mixed and consanguinity and parentage not corrupted.

It is an order, but the sentence (in Arabic) is constructed as a statement. This form of expression is used for emphasis.

''al-Qurū' ''(الْقُرُوءُ) is the plural of al-qur' (الْقُرْءُ). This is used for the monthly period and also for the period of cleanliness; and is, thus, a word made with two opposite meanings, as some people have said. But the fact is that its root q-r-' (قرء) indicates collection, gathering, joining together, but not every collection and gathering, only that which is followed by dispersal and transmission. Keeping this in view, it is obvious that the original meaning of al-qur', would have been the period of cleanliness, because it is the time when blood accumulates in the womb; then it was used also for the period of menstruation because it is the time when blood is discharged after its accumulation.

al-Qar' (الْقَرْءُ) is also used for reading and reciting, because in recitation and reading, letters and words are first joined together and then proclaimed. The scholars of language have clearly said that al-qar' means collection and gathering. And that it indicates such gathering may be inferred from the following verses: Do not move your tongue with it to make haste with it. Surely on Us is the collecting of it and ''qur'ānahu'' (قُرْاٰنَهٗ) the reciting of it. Therefore, when We have recited it, then follow its recitation (75:16 — 18). And a Qur'ān which We revealed in portions so that you may read it to the people by slow degrees . . . (17:106).

Both verses are concerned with the collection and revelation of the Book of Allāh; and in both it is referred to as the Qur'ān, not as the Book or the Furqān etc.

It is for the same reason that it is given the name Qur'ān.

ar-Rāghib says in his al-Mufradāt: al-Qur' in fact means the start of the menses after cleanliness. As it has two elements in its meaning — cleanliness and the following menses — it is used for both meanings, even separately. When a noun is made for a meaning with two elements, it is also used for those elements separately. For example al-mā'idah (الْمَآئِدَةُ) is used for a table upon which food is arranged; now it is often used either for the table only or the food only. But al-qur' was originally made for cleanliness only nor for the menses only. A girl who has not yet seen blood is not said to be in al-qur'; likewise a sick woman whose blood continues without stopping is not said to to be in al-qur'.

QUR'ĀN: And it is not lawful for them that they should conceal what Allāh has created in their wombs, if they believe in Allāh and the last day: The divorced woman should not conceal the fact of her being pregnant or her monthly period. Without this prohibition she might have been tempted to conceal it, so that she might soon complete the al-'iddah or that her husband might not get chance of revoking the divorce.

This prohibition of concealment has a proviso: ''If they believe in Allāh and the last day'', while the basic law of the waiting period has no such clause. This clause shows that the order given is an essential requirement of the belief, and the women must adhere to it faithfully and scrupulously. It is as we say: Live with the people honestly if you want good.

QUR'ĀN: And their husbands have a better right to take them back in the meanwhile if they wish for reconciliation: ''al-Bu'ūlah'' (اَلْبُعُوْلَةُ) is plural of al-ba'l (اَلبَعْلُ), which means the male spouse, so long as the couple are married. Later, the word acquired a shade of meaning of domination, strength and firmness, because of the position of the husband vis-a-vis the wife. Now, we find other usages all based on this meaning. For example, a horse rider is called its al-ba'l; a high land is called al-ba'l, there was an idol named ba'l (بَعْلُ), and a date-tree is named al-ba'l when it grows high.

''Their husbands'': The pronoun ''their'' stands for ''the divorced women''. But the order is not for those who are given an irrevocable divorce; it is meant only for those divorced revocably.

''In the meanwhile'' refers to the period of waiting.

The proviso, ''if they wish for reconciliation'', is very important. It shows that taking them back, that is, the revocation of the divorce, must be. with good intention, with a wish to make amends. The husband should not revoke the divorce only to inflict harm and injury upon the woman, because, such a behaviour is clearly forbidden in the verse, ''and do not retain them for injury.''

''Aḥaqq'' (اَحَقُّ) is the comparative (and superlative) and means ''having more right''. it always requires another person having less right. For example, the previous husband had a right to the divorcee, and the other proposers also have right to her, but the previous husband has more right to her, because of the previous marriage-tie.

But this meaning apparently is not correct here, because this verse is not talking about a fresh marriage; it is speaking about ''taking them back'', revoking the divorce; and it is a right which no one shares with him. So, why use the phrase ''have a better right''? The fact is that there is a very interesting deletion in the verse. Its complete meaning is: their husbands have more (or a better) right to them than another proposer, and this right can be utilized by taking them back and revoking the divorce during the period of waiting.

This right exists only in revocable divorce; and it is this circumstantial evidence which proves that the order is only about such divorcees and not about those who have been given an irrevocable divorce.

The verse explains the law concerning only those divorcees with whom marriage has been consummated, provided they are at the age of menstruation and are not pregnant. For others, there are other verses.

QUR'ĀN: And they have rights similar to those upon them in a just manner, and for the men is (right) a degree above them:

''al-Ma'rūf'' (المَعْرُوفُ = variously translated in these verses as ''a just manner'', ''fairness'', a ''lawful manner'', ''usage'', a ''proper manner'' and ''proper deeds'') literally means ''known''. It refers to the things and usages established in society by the mutual dealings of its members, and recognized as just and good by general acceptance. This word has been repeatedly used in these verses — in twelve places. It shows how much importance Allāh attaches to fairness and justice in matters concerning divorce. al-Ma'rūf is a comprehensive word which covers the guidance of reason, the laws of religion, nobility of character and moral and ethical values.

As Islam has built its Sharī'ah on the foundation of nature, (al-ma'rūf = known) in its eyes is that custom which is known to the people when they walk on the straight path of nature and do not deviate from it.

The natural law of society says that all the members of society should be treated equally, they should have as much rights as they have obligations. At the same time it decrees that every individual's personal perfection and attributes must be recognized. The ruler's authority, the people's subordination, the scholar's knowledge, the illiterate person's ignorance, all must be weighed in the scale of their usefulness for, and effect on, society; and with that recognition everyone should be given his proper right.

The same principle was applied by Islam concerning the rights and obligations .of woman. It gave her as much right upon the husband as it ordained upon her for the husband. At the same time, it preserved her rightful value and place in her union with the man; and in this area, Islam found that men have a right a degree above women.

It is clear from the above that the sentence, ‘‘and for the men is (a right) a degree above them’’, is like a clause which completes the principle sentence. The whole sentence means that women, or divorcees, are equal with men, but that men are a degree above them; therefore, Allāh has given the women as much right as is laid upon them, with the preservation of the authority of men over them.

We shall discuss this subject later on.

QUR’ĀN: Divorce is twice; then keep (them) in fairness or let (them) go with kindness; and it is not lawful for you to take any part of what you have given them:

‘‘al-Marrah’’ (المَرَّةُ) means once; it is derived from al-murūr (المُرُوْرُ = to pass). ad-daf‘ah (الدَّفْعَةُ), al-karrah(الكَرَّةُ) and an-nuzlah (النُّزْلَةُ) have the same meaning. at-tasrīḥ (التَّسْرِيْحُ) means to send forth the cattle to pasture. as-sarḥ (السَّرْحُ) is a tree, the fruit of which is eaten by the camel. The Arabs say sarraḥtu ’l-ibal (سَرَّحْتُ الابِلَ = I let loose the camel to feed on sarḥ). at-tasrīḥ is derived from the same root, and is used in this verse as a metaphor for releasing the divorced woman by not taking her back during the waiting period.

‘‘Divorce is twice’’: The divorce referred to here is the revocable divorce. That is why it has been followed by the words, ‘‘then keep (them) in fairness or let (them) go with kindness’’. The third divorce, after these two, is mentioned in verse 2:230, which says: So if he divorces her, she shall not be lawful to him until she marries another husband.

To let them go with kindness means to let them go free by not revoking the divorce. They are either to be retained in fairness bi-ma‘rūfin (بِمَعْرُوْفٍ) or to be freed with kindness ‘‘bi iḥsānin’’ (بِاِحْسَانٍ). The difference between these expressions is important. Retaining the divorcee by revoking the divorce could be done with a bad intention, to injure and harm her. For example, a man divorces his wife, then waits until she nearly completes the waiting period and then he revokes the divorce and takes her back; then again he divorces her and the procedure is repeated. Such things could be done to mentally torture the woman; and it is unjust, unfair and cruel;the sharī‘ah of Islam dislike such behaviour. The revocation which is commendable in this religion is the one carried out for, and based on reconciliation, at which there is hope for the good companionship and love which Allāh has created between husband and wife.

In the same way, letting her go could be done in an ugly manner; for example, quarrelling with her, showing rage and anger, and demonstrating a spirit of revenge. Such behaviour is not allowed in Islam. The sharī'ah says that this ''letting her go'' should be done in a manner recognized as noble by society and accepted as lawful by religion. It is this ''fair dealing'' which has been mentioned in the coming verse (then either retain them in fairness or set them free with fairness 2:231). But the verse under discussion goes a step further and commands the man, if he wishes to let her go, to do so ''with kindness''. The expression has been changed to prepare minds for the next rule: ''and it is not lawful for you to take any part of what you have given them''.

Obviously, the words ''in fairness'' and ''with kindness'' were necessary to prevent unscrupulous persons from misusing the law and defeating its purpose by following its letter but not its spirit. The real aim of the rule or revocation of divorce is to facilitate reconciliation. Therefore, it was necessary to ordain that it should be done ''in fairness'', not to inflict any harm up-on the woman. Allāh says in a coming verse: ''and do not retain them for injury, so that you exceed the limits''. Likewise, the purpose of the ordinance to ''let her go'' is to safeguard her rights, so that the man does not take back all or part of the dowry given to her. For this purpose the word, ''in fairness'' was not sufficient, because some societies might not think it bad to take back the dowry, in whole or part, at the time of divorce. Therefore, the expression was changed to ''with kindness''. Now it paves the way for the next sentence, ''and it is not lawful . . . '', and compensates to some degree the loss that the woman suffers in the ruination of her family life and the breaking of the marriage-tie.

QUR'ĀN: Unless both fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh: ''Both fear'' means both have an overriding opinion that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh. ''Limits of Allāh'' are His commands and prohibitions, the things prohibited or made obligatory by Him.

The situation mentioned in this verse appears when their mentalities, characters and manners are opposed to each other, and thus hate becomes the predominant factor in¸ their relation-ship.

QUR'ĀN: Then if you fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh, then there is no blame on them for what she gives up (to become free thereby): The change from the dual for ''khāfā'' (خَافَا = both feared) of the previous sentence to the plural ''khiftum'' (خِفْتُمْ = you — three or more — feared) here indicates that the fear, suspicion or opinion should be a reasonable one, recognized as such by common people. Doubts based on evil suggestions, infatuations or hypochondria will not do. That is also the reason why the whole phrase, ''that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh'', has been repeated. If a pronoun were used (i.e., if you fear 'it') there would be a chance that the couple's unreasonable doubts and suspicions would become the basis of this rule. This repetition has removed the chance of such a misunderstanding.

''There is no blame on them'': Before that, the husband was prohibited from taking any part of what he had given the wife. It means that the wife, on her part, was prohibited from giving him anything back, because if she gave him anything while he was not allowed to take it, she would be cooperating with him in a sin and transgression. Now, this verse gives an exception to that general rule: In the al-khul' (الخُلْعُ) form of divorce they are allowed to agree on an amount which the wife pays to the husband to get herself free. In this situation, there is no blame on the husband for taking it, nor on the wife in giving it. Hence the expression, ''there is no blame on them''.

QUR'ĀN: These are the limits of Allāh, so do not exceed them, and whoever exceeds the limits of Allāh then these it is that are the unjust:

''These'' is the demonstrative pronoun, pointing to the above-mentioned laws. These are matters of social legislation coupled with ethical teachings and other academic subjects.

It may be inferred from these verses that one should not try to separate legislative rules from moral principles. It is wrong to stick to the letter of the law, neglecting the spirit behind it. This sanctimoniousness defeats the purpose of the sharī'ah, negates the aims of religion and changes the bliss of life into misery. Islam is a religion of deeds, not of words; a sharī'ah of action, not of dogma. The Muslims have only reached this level of retrogression and backwardness, because their whole attention was fixed on the body of the law, and they completely forgot that there was also a soul and spirit inside that body. The coming verse: ''and whoever does this, he indeed is unjust to his own self '', proves this assertion of ours.

This verse frequently changes the pronouns from plural to singular and from second person to third person and then returns to the original form. This style helps to hold the attention of the audience, and the variation of style refreshes the mind.

QUR'ĀN: So if he divorces her she shall not be lawful to him afterwards until she marries another husband . . . clear for a people who know:

This verse promulgates the law of the third divorce. If after the two divorces and returns mentioned above, he divorces her a third time, she shall be prohibited to him until she marries another husband.

It is the wife herself who is said to be prohibited, while prohibition applies to marrying her as well as to cohabiting with her. This mode of expression has been used because ''she is prohibited'' implies both meanings; and, accordingly, ''until she marries another husband'' also implies marriage followed by cohabitation. Then if he, that is, the second husband, divorces her there is no blame on them both, that is, the woman and her first husband, if they return to each other, that is, by means of a fresh marriage, after reconciliation and mutual consent. The verb used is ''yatarāja'ā'' (يَتَرَاجَعَا) which means, ''both return to each other''; it is not the return or revocation after the first two divorces over which the husband has the right and which the women cannot refuse. This mutual return should be effected if they both think that they can keep within the limits of Allāh. The words ''limits of Allāh'' have again been repeated in the final sentences because these are other than those mentioned earlier.

This verse is a miracle of brevity and conciseness. Such a short verse contains fourteen pronouns all referring to different things; and although they are all near each other there is no ambiguity in the meaning, nor any difficulty in its understanding.

This verse and the two before it contain numerous common nouns and many metaphors without any adverse effect on their eloquence and elocution. For example, the phrase ''fa imsākun bima'rūfin au tasrīhūn bi iḥsānin'' (فَاِمْسَاكٌ بِمَعْرُوْفٍ اَوْ تَسْرِيْحٌ بِاِحْسَانٍ = than keeping them in fairness or letting them go with kindness) contains four common nouns coming one after other. Also, there are the following metaphorical expressions:

''What you have given them'':	Dowry.
''If you fear'':	If you have reasonable ground to believe.

‘‘What she gives up’’:	The redemption paid in al-khul‘.
‘‘So if he divorces her’’:	The third divorce.
‘‘She shall not be lawful to him’’:	He is prohibited to marry her again and cohabit with her.
‘‘Until she marries another husband’’:	Until she marries and cohabits with him. (N.B. the politeness of the Qur’ān).
‘‘If they return’’:	If they marry again.

Then there is the contrast between ‘‘keep’’ and ‘‘let go’’, and between ‘‘both fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh’’ and ‘‘both think that they can keep within the limits of Allāh’’. Look also at the variation of style in ‘‘so do not exceed them’’ and ‘‘whoever exceeds them’’.

QUR’ĀN: And when you divorce the women and they reach their prescribed time, then either retain them in fairness or set them free with fairness, and do not retain them for injury, so that you exceed the limit :

‘‘They reach their prescribed time’’: When their prescribed time is about to expire. The verb al-bulūgh(البُلُوغُ = to reach) is used not only for arriving at the destination, but also for coming near it. The reason of our opting for this meaning is clear from the next words, ‘‘then either retain them in fairness or set them free with fairness’’. The husband has neither of these options when her prescribed period has expired.

The words, ‘‘and do not retain them for injury, so that you exceed the limit’’, forbid retaining her with the intention of injuring her. A preceding verse had already prohibited taking back ‘‘any part of what you have given them’’ when one decides to let them go free. The only exception is al-khul‘ (الخُلْعُ) .

QUR’ĀN: And whoever does this, he indeed is unjust to his own self, and do not take Allāh’s signs for a mockery;

It describes the reason why retaining the woman with the intention of causing her harm is prohibited. Marriage completes the bliss of life. This bliss cannot be achieved unless both husband and wife are happy with each other, and complement each other to attain a natural perfection.

Dovorce disturbs that harmony; and revocation is an attempt to mend that damage, to join after separation and to unite after coming apart. How can this purpose be attained if he retains her so as to inflict harm upon her? The two purposes are diametrically opposed. Anyone who resorts to such ugly behaviour is unjust to his own soul, because he drives it away from the straight path to which human nature leads. Obviously, he treats the signs of Allāh as a joke. Allāh has not ordained a soulless sharī'ah concerned only with the body of deeds, like giving, taking, keeping, letting go, etc. In fact, all these rules have been made for the common weal, to make up the deficiencies of society, and to perfect the bliss of human life. Then Allāh combined these rules with good ethics to develop the psyche, and cleanse the soul. All the laws of Islam are finely meshed with fundamental knowledge, like the Oneness of God, and the Mastership of the Prophet and the Imāms etc. If anyone confines his religion to the external rules and throws things out, he surely has taken the commandments and signs of Allāh as a mockery.

QUR'ĀN: And remember the favour of Allāh upon you, and that which He has revealed to you of the Book and the Wisdom . . . the Knower of all things :

''The favour of Allāh'': The grace bestowed in the form of religion, or the reality of religion, that is, the blessings one gets after following the Divine Commandments, an example of which is the happy life one lives when husband and wife love and respect each other and when there is harmony in domestic life. Allāh calls the blessings of the religion His favour. For example: This day I have perfected your religion for you and have completed My favour on you . . . (5:3); . . . so that He may complete His favour on you . . . (5:6); . . . so by His favour you became brethren . . . (3:103).

Accordingly, the next words, ''and that which He has revealed to you of the Book and the Wisdom, admonishing you thereby'', would be a description of that favour; and the Book and the Wisdom would refer to the body and soul of the sharī'ah respectively — to its commandments and their philosophy.

Also, the favour may be taken to refer to all the Divine Graces — creative and otherwise. In this case, the verse would mean: Remember the mystery of your life, and think how it has been made into a perfect unit, and how the creative forces have established the wonderful harmony between husband and wife. Then heed to the admonition of Allāh which He has addressed to you in the form of the commandments of sharī'ah , and to their philosophy. If you ponder upon these matters you may hope to advance on to the road of blessings and bliss and you will not carelessly ruin the perfection of your life; and fear Allāh and remember that He knows every thing; your appearance, therefore, should not differ from the depths of your reality. In short, you should not try to defeat the purpose of the law by apparently following the letter of the law.

QUR'ĀN: And when you have divorced the women and they have ended their term (of waitng), then do not prevent them from marrying their husbands when they agree among themselves in a lawful manner: Apparently the order in ''do not prevent them'' is addressed to guardians and other relatives against whose wishes the women cannot usually go. ''Their husbans'' means the husbands who had given them divorce. The verse forbids guardians and other relatives from preventing the woman from re-marrying her husband if, after the expiry of the waiting period, both are reconciled to each other, and wish to re-establish the marriage-tie. It often happens that the relatives of the woman do not wish her to establish such a union again with the same husband, as they hate and dislike him because he divorced her in the first place. This verse says that they should not allow such feelings to become a hindrance in the path of such a reunion.

This verse does not prove in any way that marriage is not lawful without the permission of guardian:

First: because, even if it does not prove that guardianship has no effect on marriage, it surely does not prove that it has any such effect.

Second: There is no reason to say that the command, ''do not prevent'', is addressed to guardians only. Obviously, it is a general command addressed to all the relatives whose advice or pressure may create difficulty in such a re-marriage. Also, the order, apparently, is of an advisory nature, to draw the attention of the relatives to the benefits and gains which may accrue as a result of her re-marrying the same husband. That is why it has been recommended by the words, ''this is more profitable and purer for you ''.

A commentator has said that the command, ''do not prevent'', is addressed to the husbands who give the divorce, and it forbids them to hide for some time the news of the divorce from the women so that they have to start their ‘‘period of waiting’’ late on receiving the news, and thus are prevented from entering into marriage early. Accordingly, the meaning would be like this: ‘‘And when you have divorced the women, (O husbands!) and they have ended their term of waiting, then do not prevent them from marrying (other men who would be) their husbands.’’ But this interpretation does not conform with the words of the verse. If that were the purpose of the verse, it should have said, ‘do not prevent them from marrying’ or ‘from taking other husbands’. It would not have said, ‘‘their husbands’’. (Also, the verse says that they have already completed their period of waiting; so where is the question of unnecessarily prolonging the period of waiting?)

‘‘Fa-balaghna ajalahunna’’(فَبَلَغْنَ اَجَلَهُنَّ) literally means ‘and they have reached their term’. But it means ending their term, as we have written in the translation. If the period of waiting had not ended, no guardian or relative could prevent her return to the husband: ‘‘and their husbands have a better right to take them back in the meanwhile’’. Moreover, in that case Allāh would have said, ‘‘do not prevent them from returning’’ not ‘‘from marrying’’.

QUR’ĀN: With this is admonished whosoever among you believes in Allāh and the last day; It is exactly the same admonition as the one in verse 2:228, ‘‘it is not lawful for them that they should conceal what Allāh has created in their wombs, if they believe in Allāh and the last day’’. These two commands have been tied especially with the proviso of belief in Allāh and the last day, because it is the belief of at-tawḥīd (التَّوْحِيْدُ = Monotheism, Oneness of God); and the religion of Monotheism encourages unity, not disunity; togetherness, not separation.

In these sentences, Allāh has first used the singular pronoun (is admonished whosoever), then the plural (among you,) again the singular (believe in . . .), then again He returns to the plural (for you). Basically, the verse is addressed to the Apostle of Allāh together with his ummah; therefore plural pronouns are quite in order. Yet, sometimes the talk is addressed to the Apostle only, because he is the original recepient of the revelation, and others are addressed only through him. This happens mostly in those sentences in which no law or command is promulgated. So far as those verses are concerned which bring any law or command, almost all of them are in the plural form. This style alternatively widens the circle, then shortens it, then again widens it. This variation holds the attention of the audience and keeps them alert.

QUR'ĀN: This is more profitable and purer for you: ''Azkā'' (اَزْكي) is derived from az-zakāh (الزَّكوة) which means 'good and pleasant growth'; therefore, it has been translated here as 'more profitable'. Purity has been explained earlier. The demonstrative pronoun, ''this'', refers either to not preventing them from re-marrying their previous husbands, or to such re-marriage itself. The result in both cases is the same. Such a re-marriage would create harmony in place of discord and would mend broken relationships. This would strengthen the feeling of unity and accord, from which would sprout healthy religious virtues. Such a re-marriage would augment the women's virtues of chastity and modesty, and would put a protective cover on their shame. Also, it would be purer for their souls because it would prevent them from thinking about other men when searching for the next husband.

Islam is the religion of az-zakāh (good growth, purification), at-ṭahārah (الطَّهَارَةُ = cleanliness) and knowledge. Allāh says: . . . reciting to them his communications and purifying them, and teaching them the Book and the Wisdom . . . (3:164); . . . but He intends to purify you . . . (5:7).

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh knows while you do not know: that is, except what He teaches you, as He says: . . . and teaching them the Book and the Wisdom (3:164); . . . and they cannot comprehend any thing out of His knowledge except what He pleases . . . (2:255). There is no conflict between this verse and the preceding one, ''. . . which He makes clear for a people who know'', as it means, 'who know by the teaching of Allāh'.

QUR'ĀN: And the mothers should suckle their children for two whole years for him who desires to make complete the time of suckling: The words used in this verse are ''al-wālidāt'' (الوَالِدَاتُ = those who give birth to) and ''mawlūdun lahu'' (مَوْلُوْدٌ لهُ = he to whom the child is born). The more common words al-umm (الأُمُّ = mother) and al-ab (الأبُ = father) have not been used, because al-umm is more general than al-wālidah (الوَالِدَةُ) — the grandmother, aunt and wet-nurse are also called al-umm (mother), but only the woman who gives birth to the child may be called its al-wālidah. Likewise, al-ab is more general than al-wālad (الوَالِدُ = he from whose seed the child is born); and al-ibn (الابْنُ = son) is more general than al-walad (الوَلَدُ = the born child) The rule prescribed in this verse concerns especially the born child and the woman who bore it and the man to whom it was born. The verse has discarded even the word al-wālid (father) and has used a longer word mawlūdun lahu (he to whom the child is born) because this new word gives in a nut-shell the reason of this rule. As the child is born to the father and is attached to him in most affairs the father is obliged to bear the full responsibility for it, feeding and clothing it, care of it and bringing it up. This includes feeding and clothing the child's mother, who feeds it from her breast. On the other hand, the mother is obliged not to harm the father of the child, because it is he who is ultimately responsible for that child, born of her womb.

A strange interpretation has been written by one commentator. He says: ''Allāh used the word 'he for whom the child is born' , instead of 'father' , to show that mothers are only a means of bearing children for fathers, but that children actually belong to fathers, and that is why, at the time of mentioning parentage, only the names of the fathers are shown, not those of the mothers. And al-Ma'mūn al-Rashīd has said in a couplet :'And surely, the mothers of the people are but receptacles, where the seeds are deposited, and the sons are of the fathers only.' ''

The poor fellow forgot that this very verse says in the beginning ''awlādahunna'' (اَوْلادَهُنَّ = their, that is, the mothers' children): and again it says, ''bi waladihā'' (بوَلَدِهَا = her child). More amusing is his attempt to argue on the strength of the poetry of al-Ma'mūn. al-Ma'mūn and his ilk are too worthless to have their words quoted in an explanation of the Qur'ān. Many men of literature get confused between different disciplines; they are unable to distinguish literature from legislation, or social laws from the decrees of creation. They, therefore, offer evidence to solve a social problem or a mystery of creation.

In fact, the child belongs to both the father and mother as far as creation is concerned. But in social affairs, various nations follow various systems: in matriarchies, the child is attached to the mother; in patriarchies, to the father. This verse confirms this second system by referring to the father as "he to whom the child is born''.

''al-Irḍā' '' (الارْضَاعُ = suckling) is on the paradigm of al-if'āl (الافْعَالُ) from ar-riḍā'ah (الرِّضَاعَةُ) and ar-raḍa' (الرَّضَعُ); both of which mean 'to suck milk from the breast'.

''al-Ḥawl'' (الحَوْلُ) is ''year''. Its literal meaning is to turn, to change. The year is given this name because it turns and changes. ''Two complete years'': As the year is made up of many parts (e.g.360 days), the word sometimes is used for even an incomplete period. If one stays in a place for, let us say, eleven months, he often says that he stayed there for a year. This is why the adjective, ‘‘complete’’, has been used to show that two whole years are intended here.

‘‘For him who desires to make complete the time of suckling’’: It proves that the custody (guardianship) and suckling of the child is a right of the divorced mother, and is left to her discretion. Also deciding on the end of the prescribed period is her right. If she wishes to suckle the child for two complete years, she may do so: and if she does not want so, it is at her discretion. The husband has no say in it except when the divorced wife agrees to it by mutual counsel, as is described in the words, ‘‘if both desire weaning by mutual consent and counsel’’.

QUR’ĀN: And their maintenance and their clothing must be borne by the father according to the usage; no soul shall have imposed upon it a duty but to the extent of its capacity:

Allāh has prescribed the maintenance and clothing of the mother, according to the level of al-ma‘rūf (المَعْرُوْفُ = known, usual), that is, as is generally known and accepted in families of that status. The reason for this rule is given in the next sentence that Allāh does not impose any duty beyond the capacity of His servants.

Upon this general and basic principle are based two rules mentioned after it: (1) The right of the woman concerning the custody and suckling of the child, and other related rules. The husband has no right to come between the child and its mother, by not allowing her to keep the child in her custody, or by preventing her from seeing it and so on. The rights of the mother must be accorded to her; otherwise, it will injure and harm her and put her under an unjustified mental and emotional strain. (2) On her part, the woman is forbidden to injure and harm the husband, for example, by not allowing him to see the child.

The above two rules are ordained in the words, ‘‘neither shall a mother be made to suffer harm on account of her child, nor a father on account of his child’’. Why did Allāh not use a pronoun? Instead of saying, ‘‘on account of his child’’, it could be said, ‘‘on account of him’’. But a pronoun in this place would have created an apparent contradiction. The sentence mentions the father as, ‘‘he to whom the child is born’’. The pronoun ‘‘him’’ would have referred to ‘‘her child’’ in the preceding sentence. So the purport of the supposed sentence would have been: nor shall he to whom the child is born be made to suffer on account of ''her'' child!

But the sentence in its present form does not give room for such a contradiction. Not only that; the actual style recognizes factors of creation as well as social legislation: it recognizes that in creation, the child belongs to both parents, and, therefore, it is referred to as ''her child'' and ''his child''; then it shows that in social laws, it belongs to the father, who is, thus, referred to as the one to whom the child is born.

QUR'ĀN: And a similar duty (devolves) on the (father's) heir: The duty imposed upon the father regarding the maintenance and clothing of the suckling mother devolves, if he dies, on his heir.

Some other meanings have been written for this verse which are not in conformity with its apparent meaning; we do not intend to quote them here. What we have written is according to the traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu'l-bayt (a.s.), and is also in accord with the apparent meaning of the verse.

QUR'ĀN: Then if both desire weaning by mutual consent. . . according to usage: This is an offshoot of the right of the mother and of the avoidance of harm to either party. The upbringing and suckling of the child is not an obligation on her; it is a right of hers and she may waive her right if she so wishes. Therefore, it is perfectly right if the parents agree by mutual counsel to wean the child before the completion of the two years. Also, the father may engage another wet-nurse for the child, if the mother returns the child to him and refuses to suckle it; or if she is sick or has not got enough milk or for any other reason. But it is incumbent upon him to give the wet-nurse her rightful dues without infringing any of her rights, as Allāh says: ''and if you wish to engage a wet-nurse for your children, there is no blame on you so long as you pay what you promised according to usage''.

QUR'ĀN: And fear Allāh and know that Allāh sees what you do: It is an order to fear Allāh and to be careful of one's obligations towards Him, which in present context means to obey these orders and to show fairness in their implementation. As these matters may be seen and observed, Allāh reminds man to know that He sees what man does. Compare it with the ending of the previous verse which forbids husbands to retain their wives with the intention of inflicting harm upon them, and then reminds them that Allāh knows every thing. As the intention cannot be ''seen'', man was reminded there that Allāh ‘‘knows’’ every thing, and even his intention is not hidden from Him.

QUR’ĀN: And (as for) those of you who die and leave wives behind, they should keep themselves in waiting for four months and ten (days):

‘‘at-Tawaffī’’ (اَلتَّوَفِّي) means to cause to die. It is said tawaffāhu ’llāh (تَوَفَّاهُ اَللّٰهُ) when Allāh gave him death, and the dead man is called al-mutawaffā (اَلمُتَوَفَّي is one who is given death).

‘‘Yadharūn’’ (يَذْرُوْنَ) like yad‘ūn (يَدْعُوْنَ) means ‘‘they leave’’, or ‘‘they shall leave’’. These two verbs have no past tense.

‘‘ ‘Ashran’’ (عَشْرًا = ten) here means ten days. ‘Days’ was deleted as the meaning was clear.

QUR’ĀN: Then when they have fully attained their term, there is no blame on you for what they do for themselves in a proper manner:

‘‘Bulūghu’l-ajal’’ (بُلُوْغُ الْاَجَلُ = reaching the term) means completing the waiting period of death, prescribed above. ‘‘There is no blame on you . . .’’ is a way of expressing the widows’ full authority on their own affairs; if they wish to enter into marriage again, they are free to do so, and no relative of theirs, or of their deceased husbands, has any right to interfere. The verse puts a stop to the foolish custom of some societies which, owing to ignorance, blind prejudice, miserliness or envy, do not like widows to remarry. It says that widows have a right to do so, and that right is recognized by the sharī‘ah; no one has any power to forbid a lawful action.

Various nations had various customs regarding the widow. Some, like the Hindus, burnt her alive with the dead husband; others, like many ancient tribes in Africa and elsewhere, buried her alive with the husband’s body; some like the ancient Christians, did not allow her to marry again and she had to remain single until death released her from this chain; some others, like the Arabs of the pre-Islamic days, kept her secluded for one year, or, like some advanced societies of nowadays, for nine months; there are others who say that the deceased husband has a right upon the widow which prevents her from re-marrying for a certain period — without fixing that time. All these customs and traditions are based on the assumption that marriage basically joins two lives together, and is the manifestation of love and affection; and that this love has a sanctity which must be respected. This respect is binding on both the parties, and whoever dies first, the surviving spouse must show grace, dignity and decorum as a natural courtesy towards his or her departed partner in life. But this courtesy is more binding on the woman, because she is expected to be a model of modesty and chastity and has to protect herself from other men's eyes. It is not in keeping with her dignity to appear as cheap merchandise handled by various admirers one after another. The above-mentioned customs and traditions are based on this belief.

Islam has prescribed a term of nearly a third of a year for this waiting.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh is aware of what you do:

As the verse contained the rules of al-'iddah of death and the right of widows to remarry and as these legislations were about actions and were based on Divine wisdom, it was appropriate to remind the audience that Allāh knows all about their actions, and He knows best what should be allowed and what should be forbidden; therefore, widows have to wait in one instance and have freedom in the other.

QUR'ĀN: And there is no blame on you respecting that which you speak indirectly in the asking of (such) women in marriage or keep (the proposal) concealed within your minds:

''at-Ta'rīḍ'' (التَّعْرِيْضُ), translated here as speaking indirectly, is speaking obliquely in a way that the hearer understands the real aim which the speaker does not want to declare openly. The difference between speaking indirectly and metaphor is that in speaking indirectly the apparent meaning also remains valid and the indirect meaning is inferred from it. For example, the suitor says to the woman: ''I am a good companion, of generous nature.'' While the clear meaning also is valid, the purport of the talk is to let the woman know that if she married him she would be happy. But in metaphor the apparent meaning vacates its place for the metaphorical one. For example, one says about a brave man, ''I saw a lion''. Here real meaning of lion (the particular animal) is not valid at all.

''al-Khaṭb'' (الخَطْبُ) means speaking and reiterating. ''al-khiṭbah'' (الخِطْبَةُ) and ''al-khuṭbah''(الخُطْبَةُ) both are derived from it. The former means proposing to a woman asking her hand in marriage. The suitor is called al-khāṭib (الخَاطِبُ plural: al-khuṭṭāb الخُطَّابُ); the latter means a lecture. The lecturer is called al-khaṭīb (الخَطِيْبُ plural: al-khuṭabā' الخُطَبَاءُ).

''al-Iknān'' (الاكْنَانُ) is derived from al-kann (الكَنُّ), and both mean ‘to hide’, ‘to conceal’. But al-iknān is concealing an idea in the mind, as the verse says: ‘‘or keep concealed within your mind’’; and al-kann is hiding or covering something with, or in, a material thing like a cloth, a house, etc. Allāh says: As if they were eggs carefully sheltered: (37:49); the like of the hidden pearls (56:23).

The verse says that it is not improper to speak to such women indirectly, letting them know that you are interested in marrying them when they are free, or to hide this idea in your mind.

QUR’ĀN: Allāh knows that you will mention them . . . in a proper manner: It gives the reason of the above sentences. Mentioning such women in the context of marriage is a natural thing for you, and Allāh does not forbid a thing which is ingrained in your nature.

This is one of the rules which clearly show that Islam is based on the foundation of nature.

QUR’ĀN: And do not resolve the marriage-tie until prescribed term is completed ‘‘al-‘Azm’’ (العَزْمُ = resolve, determination) is to set the heart on a work with firm intention of doing it, so that no weakness remains in the effect of that resolve, unless that resolve itself is cancelled. ‘‘al-‘Uqdah’’ (العُقْدَةُ = knot, tie) is derived from ‘‘al-‘aqd’’ (العَقْدُ) which means to tie. The verse likens the bond of marriage with the knot which joins two cords together so that they become one; thus the husband and wife become one by the marriage-tie.

The marriage-tie is connected in this verse with resolve and determination, which is a matter of the heart and mind. The verse thus indicates that the reality behind the marriage rite is something dependent on, and connected with, intention, faith and belief. Marriage is, in fact, a matter based on society’s (or religion’s) recognition, and has no existence outside common belief. It is the same as was described about ownership and other such matters under the verse 2:213. The verse, thus, contains an allegory and a metaphor.

‘‘Hattā yablugha ’l-kitābu ajalahu’’ (حَتَّي يَبْلُغَ الكِتَابُ اَجَلَهُ); ‘‘al-kitāb’’ (الكِتَابُ) means ‘written’ that is, a prescribed rule, and it refers to the waiting imposed on the women who are in al-‘iddah. Literally the phrase means, ‘‘until the prescribed rule reaches (the end of) its duration’’.

The verse thus means: Do not perform marriage with them until their prescribed waiting period has been completed.

It is clear from this verse that the talk in this and the preceding verses is about those women who are in the waiting period, Therefore, the definite article ‘‘the women’’ refers not to all women but to the previously-mentioned group. That is why it has been translated, ‘‘. . . in the asking of (such) women in marriage . . .’’

QUR’ĀN: And know that Allāh knows what is in your mind; therefore beware of Him, and know that Allāh is Forgiving, Forbearing: By mentioning the Divine attributes of Knowledge, Forgiveness and Forbearance, Allāh warns the believers that the matters discussed in the two verses — proposing to women during their waiting period, and speaking to them obliquely about it, and giving them a promise in secret — are extremely perilous things; Allāh does not like them at all, although He has allowed what He has allowed.

QUR’ĀN: There is no blame on you if you divorce the women while yet you have not touched them or appointed for them a dowry: To touch allegorically means to cohabit. ‘‘Aw tafriḍū lahunna farīḍatan’’ (اَوْ تَفْرِضُوا لَهُنَّ فَرِيْضَةً), literally means ‘or appointed for them a (prescribed) duty’, and it refers to fixing the dowry.

The verse means that it shall not be a hindrance in divorce if the marriage was not yet consummated, or if the dowry was yet to be fixed.

QUR’ĀN: And make provision for them, on the wealthy according to his means, and on the straitened in circumstances according to his means, a provision according to usage:

‘‘al-Mut‘ah’’ (المُتْعَةُ) and ‘‘al-matā‘ ’’(المَتَاعُ) is what may be used, or enjoyed. ‘‘matti‘uhunna’’ (مَتِّعُوْهُنَّ) means ‘give them usable, enjoyable goods or wealth’. The word, ‘‘a provision’ is the object of the verb, ‘‘make provision’’ ; between the verb and its object is placed the paranthetic clause, ‘‘on the wealthy . . . and on . . . to his means’’. ‘‘al-Mūsi‘ ’’ (المُوْسِعُ) is the active participle of ‘‘awsa‘a’’ (اَوْسَعَ = he became wealthy) This paradigm is reserved for transitive verbs. Perhaps, this verb was originally used with an object; gradually the object was omitted and the verb became intransitive.

The verse says: It is incumbent upon you, if you divorce a woman when the dowry was not yet fixed, to make for her a provision according to usage. And it should be according to the means of the husband.

Accordingly, she is entitled to get an amount similar to the dowry of her equals like her mother, her sister, etc. But this order does not cover the case of a woman divorced before cohabitation, because her case is explained in the next verse.

QUR'ĀN: (this is) a duty on the doers of good (to others). Apparently the attribute of doing good to others is closely connected with this legislation. As ''doing good to others'' is not incumbent, it follows that the order given above should be a recommendation, not a compulsory law. But clear traditions of Ahlu 'l-bayt say that the order is compulsory and obligatory. Perhaps it may be inferred from this verse in this way: Allāh has earlier said, ''Divorce is twice; then keep (them) in fairness or let (them) go with kindness''. There the Arabic word, for which we have used ''Kindness'', is al-iḥsān (الاحْسَانُ), which in this verse has been translated as doing good to others. Anyhow, kindness and doing good is incumbent on those who let the women go, that is, those who give divorce. Therefore, the divorcers are obliged to be doers of good. And this verse orders the doers of good to make provision for the divorced women. In other words, it obliges the divorcers to make such provision. (And Allāh knows better).

QUR'ĀN: *And if you divorce them before you have touched them . . . that you should remit:*If you divorce them before the consummation of marriage and a dowry was already fixed, then you are obliged to pay them half the prescribed amount. Of course, if the women themselves or their guardians remit this amount then the half also would be waived.

The husband may also be termed the ''one in whose hand is the marriage-tie''. Therefore, if he has already paid the full dowry and if he remits it, then it will not be necessary for the divorced wife to pay back to him half of that amount. And, in any case, remitting the due portion of the dowry is nearer to righteouness and piety. One who gives up his rightful dues (which he is entitled to, according to sharī'ah) shall more easily and readily turn away from what is not lawful, and shun what is forbidden.

QUR'ĀN: And do not forget generosity between you; surely Allāh sees what you do:

''al-faḍl'' (الفَضْلُ = translated here as generosity) originally means to exceed, to surpass. The same is the meaning of al-fuḍūl (الفُضُوْلُ). But al-faḍl is used for excellence in virtue, nobility and merit, while al-fuḍūl is used for unwarranted excesses, like chattering and gossiping.

The verse exhorts the separated couple to do good and be generous to each other by forgoing their own rights and giving the other party more than its due.

The comment about ‘‘surely Allāh sees what you do’’ is similar to that given concerning the last sentence of the verse 2:234.

QUR’ĀN: Maintain the prayers and the middle prayer and. stand up truly obedient to Allāh: ‘‘Ḥāfiẓū’’ (حَافِظُوْا = maintain) is derived from ‘‘al-ḥifẓ’’ (الحِفْظُ) which means to take hold of a thing and preserve it. Mostly it is used for retaining ideas and perceived pictures in the mind. The middle prayer is the prayer falling in the middle. The verse does not say which of the prayers is the middle one. It is explained in traditions which will be quoted later on.

‘‘Stand up for Allāh’’: The ‘‘L’’ (ل = for) shows the aim, that is, purely for the pleasure of Allāh. ‘‘Standing up’’ metaphorically means to start a work and be engaged in it.’’ ‘‘Qānitīn’’ (قَانِتِيْنَ) is derived from ‘‘al-qunūt’’ (القُنُوْتُ) which means obedience, submission, surrender. Allāh says: All are obedient to Him’’ (2:116); And whoever of you is obedient to Allāh and His Apostle . . . (33:31).

The meaning of the verse in short is: Remain engaged in the obedience of Allāh, being submissive to Him, purely for His pleasure.

QUR’ĀN: But if you are in danger. . . what you did not know: The conjunctive ‘‘F’’ (ف = but) joining this sentence in the subjunctive mood with the previous verse shows that there was a deleted (but understood) conditional clause, therein: ‘‘Maintain, if you are not in danger’’. ‘‘ar-Rijāl’’ (الرِّجَالُ) is plural of ar-rājil (الرّاجِل = pedestrian), ‘‘ar-rukbān’’ (الرُّكْبَانُ) is plural of ar-rākib (الرَّاكِبُ = rider). This verse prescribes the rule of the prayer of danger.

‘‘F’’ implies that maintaining the prayer and attending to it regularly is a rule which can never be relaxed. If you are not in danger, then perform it as you have been taught ; but if there is any danger or risk, then do it in the best possible way, standing or walking on foot, or even riding. Then after the danger passes away and you are secure, perform it in the usual way, and remember Allāh as He has taught you what you did not know. ‘‘K’’ (ك = as) in ‘‘as He has taught you’’ is for analogy. ‘‘What you did not know’’ shows the magnitude of the favour of Allāh; for this reason, it points to all the things taught by Allāh, instead of mentioning only the teaching ,of the prayer.

The meaning of the sentence, thus, will be: So, remember Allāh with a remembrance equal to His favour in teaching you the obligatory prayer among other teachings concerning the rules of the religion.

QUR'ĀN: And those of you who die and leave wives behind (make) a bequest in favour of their wives of maintenance for the year. . . . ''Bequest'' in this sentence is an object; its verb ''bequeath'' is deleted because it is easily understood.

The definite article al- (اَلْ = the) in ''al-ḥawl'' (الحَوْلُ = the year) shows that the verse must have been revealed before the rule of al-'iddah of death (waiting for four months and ten days) was promulgated. The women in pre-Islamic days used to wait, after the death of their husbands, for a whole year. And this verse directs the husbands to bequeath for them enough property with which they might maintain themselves during that period of waiting, without turning them out of the house. It was their right, and they could demand it. But they could as well forgo that right and go away. In that case, there was no blame on the heirs of the deceased husband for what they did of proper deeds about themselves.

This verse is like verse 2:180: Bequest is prescribed for you when death approaches one of you, if he leaves behind wealth, for parents and near relatives, according to usage, a duty (incumbent) upon those who guard (against evil).

Obviously, the verse under discussion was abrogated by the verses of al-'iddah of death and inheritance.

QUR'ĀN: And for the divorced women (too) provision (should be made) according to usage; (this is) a duty on those who guard (against evil): The command is in respect of all the divorcees. The proviso of piety, ''those who guard against evil'', implies that it is a recommendation, nor a compulsion.

QUR'ĀN: Thus Allāh makes clear to you His signs, so that you may understand: ''al-'Aql'' (العَقْلُ) is ''to tie'',''to shackle''. Accordingly, the faculty of perception is called al-'aql, because it holds fast the perceived picture; the perceived idea or picture is also called al-'aql, as is the power by which man distinguishes between good and evil, and right and wrong. Its opposites, from various view-points, are insanity, idiocy, foolishness and ignorance.

The words used in the Qur'ān for the various facets of perception are very many: nearly twenty. Their list, with their approximate meanings, is as follows:-

al-Yaqīn	(	اليَقِينُ	)	Conviction, Certitude
aẓ-Ẓann	(	الظَّنُّ	)	Weightier Supposition
al-Ḥisbān	(	الحِسْبَانُ	)	Reckoning, Consideration
ash-Shu'ūr	(	الشُّعُوْرُ	)	Sense
adh-Dhikr	(	الذِّكْرُ	)	Remembering al-'Irfān	(	العِرْفَانُ	)	Knowledge, Recognition al-Fahm	(	الفَهْمُ	)	Understanding al-Fiqh	(	الفِقْهُ	)	Knowledge
ad-Dirāyah	(	الدِّرَايةُ	)	Comprehension
al-Fikr	(	الفِكْرُ	)	Thinking
ar-Ra'y	(	الرَّأي	)	Opinion
az-Za'm	(	الزَّعْمُ	)	Assumption al-Ḥifz	(	الحِفْظُ	)	Preservation al-Ḥikmah	(	الحِكْمَةُ	)	Wisdom
al-Khubrah	(	الخُبْرَةُ	)	Full Knowledge
ash-Shahādah	(	الشَّهَادَةُ	)	Witness al-'aql	(	العَقْلُ	)	Intellect, Sense, Reason

To this list may be added:

al-Qawl	(	القَوْلُ	)	Saying, i.e., Opinion
al-Fatwā	(	الفَتْوي	)	Decree, Decision al-Baṣīrah	(	البَصيرَةُ	)	Insight and other words.

al-Yaqīn (اليَقِينُ = conviction) : When the conviction is so strong that the mind does not entertain the opposite idea at all.

If an idea and its opposite both are equally balanced in mind, so that no side is heavier than the other, it is called ash-shakk, (الشَّكُّ) that is, doubt.

But if one side has more weight than the other, the weightier side is called aẓ-ẓann, and the lighter one al-wahm (الوَهْمُ), that is, fancy, illusion.

al-Ḥisbān (reckoning, consideration) is nearer to aẓ-ẓann in meaning. But its use in this meaning is allegorical, as is the case with al-'add (العَدُّ). Both words mean ''to count''. When it is said, ''He counted Zayd among the braves'', it is implied that he thought Zayd to be brave.

ash-Shu'ūr (sense) is derived from ash-sha'r (الشَّعْرُ = hair) ;therefore implies a finer perception. It is mostly used for sensing the material things. Hence the five senses are called al-mashā'ir (المَشَاعِرُ) .

adh-Dhikr (remembering) is to recall the picture stored in the memory after its absence from the sense; or to prevent its absence from the senses.

al-'Irfān and al-ma'rifah (المَعْرِفَةُ), that is, knowledge, recognition, is conformity of the picture obtained in the mind with the ideas or pictures already stored in the memory. That is why it is said that al-'irfān is the knowledge after a previous knowledge.

al-Fahm (understanding) is the reaction of an outside factor by which a picture is created in the mind.

ad-Dirāyah (comprehension) is even deeper and more comprehensive understanding of the subject, so that even hidden and lessknown points become known and clear. That is why it is mostly used when the importance of the subject matter is to be shown. Allāh says: The sure calamity! What is the sure calamity? And what would make you ''comprehend'' what the sure calamity is! (69:1—3); Surely We sent it down on the night of destiny. And what will make you comprehend what the night of destiny is? (97:1—2)

ar-Ra'y (opinion) is the opinion reached at through thinking and consideration. Mostly it is used for ''practical knowledge'', that is, what should be done and what not; rather than for theoretical subjects like physical sciences.

Nearer to it in meaning are al-baṣīrah (discernment, insight); al iftā' (الإفْتَاءُ = the giving of a decision) and al-qawl (saying).But the use of ''saying'' in meaning of view is metaphorical, putting an inseparable thing for its companion (as the saying necessarily shows the decided opinion of the sayer).

az-Za'm (assumption) indicates a picture in mind, whether it is a confirmed or a probable idea.

al-'Ilm (العِلْمُ = knowledge) is the comprehension which does not

al-Ḥifẓ (preservation) is to save the known picture protecting it from change and deterioration.

al-Ḥikmah (wisdom) is the knowledge which is confirmed and precise.

al-Khubrah (full knowledge): Full academic knowledge, so that the knowledgeable person perceives all the conclusions from the premises.

ash-Shahādah (witnessing) is to get the thing in specie, either through the five senses, or the internal perceptive powers like the feeling.

Apart from the last-mentioned five words, the meanings of all others are more or less related to matter, movement and change. Therefore, they are not attributed to Allāh. We do not say that He, for example, presumes, thinks, guesses or senses etc.

But the last five words are free from such defects in meanings. They do not have any shade of deficiency. They are therefore used for Him. He says: . . . and Allāh knows what you do (2:234); . . . and Allāh knows every thing (4:176); and your Lord is the preserver of all things (34:21); and He is the Knower, the Wise (12:83); surely He is a witness over all things (41:53).

Now we return to our original discussion. al-'aql is the faculty of perception which holds fast the perceived picture, according to the Creation of Allāh. It knows truth and falsity in theoretical matters, and good and evil and the benefit and harm in the practical field. First it recognizes itself, then it perceives the sensual phenomena through the five senses, then it turns to the inner feelings and through them becomes connected to the outside world — like will, love, hate, hope, fear and similar emotions and sentiments. Then it analyses the perceived ideas and pictures, and re-arranges them, generalizing and particularizing them. Then it forms an opinion in theoretical matters and decides its own course of action in practical ones. This, in short, is al-'aql that is, reason and its function.

But sometimes some forces overpower man by subdueing all other powers. For example, lust and anger subjugate all the other faculties, either vanquishing them completely or weakening them. Thus man deviates from the middle path, straying to excess or deficiency in his moral and ethical life. In short, reason does not function as it should normally do, even though it seems to work. It is like a judge who bases his judgement on false testimonies or faked evidence. His judgement will be a perversity of justice, even though he does not mean to be unjust. He will be called a judge, but at the same time he will not be a judge. Likewise, when a man chooses his course of action on the basis of wrong premises, he is not working reasonably, even though this exercise is tolerantly given the name of ''reason''. It is because the man by such an exercise goes against the dictates of healthy nature and right path.

''Reason'', as defined by the divine representatives, is that which benefits a man in his religion, and leads him to the true knowledge and virtuous deeds. If it is not so, it is not ''reason'', even if it helps him in distinguishing between worldly good and bad affairs. Allāh says: And they shall say: Had we but listened or pondered ''na'qil'' (نَعْقِلُ) we would not have been among the inmates of the burning fire (67:10); Have they not travelled in the land so that they should have hearts with which to understand, or ears with which to hear? For surely it is not the eyes which become blind, but blind become the hearts which are in the breasts (22:46).

The two verses use the verb al-'aql for the knowledge which man acquires on his own and the verb ''to hear'' for the perception acquired with the help of others, provided both are done through true natute. Allāh says: And who forsakes the religion of Ibrahim but he who makes himself a fool. . . (2:130). This verse, as explained earlier, is a contraposition of the tradition: ''al-'aql (reason, wisdom) is that by which the Beneficent (Allāh) is worshipped . . . ''

Now it is obvious that when Allāh uses the word al-'aql it refers to the perception which a man gets when his nature is healthy and perfect. This explains the meaning of the words of the verse, ''Thus Allāh makes clear to you His signs so that you may understand.'' The clarifying creates knowledge and knowledge is the foundation of wisdom and understanding, as Allāh says: And these examples, We set them forth for the people, and none understand them but the learned (29:43).

TRADITIONS

There is a tradition in as-Sunan of Abū Dāwūd from Asmā', daughter of Yazīd ibn as-Sakan al-Anṣāriyyah, that she said: ‘‘I was given divorce in the days of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and there was no waiting period for a divorce. When I was divorced, the (rule of) waiting period of divorce was revealed: And the divorced women should keep themselves in waiting for three monthly courses.’’ Thus, she was the first woman about whom the (rule of) waiting period for divorce was sent down.

And there is a tradition about this verse in at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī from Zurārah that he said: ‘‘I heard Rabī‘ah ar-Rā’ī saying: ‘In my opinion, al-aqrā’ (الأقْرَاءُ = period) which Allāh has ordained in the Qur’ān is the period of purity between two menstruations, and not the menstruation itself.’ ’’ Zurārah said: ‘‘Then I came to Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) and narrated to him what Rabī‘ah had said. He (the Imām) said: ‘But he did not say it by his own opinion; it has reached him from ‘Alī (a.s.).’ I said: ‘May Allāh put your affairs right for you ! Was ‘Alī (a. s.) saying so?’ He said: ‘Yes! He had said, ‘‘Surely al-qur’ (الْقُرْءُ) is aṭ-ṭuhr (الطُّهْرُ = the period of purity); the blood accumulates in that period and when the time comes it is expelled.’’ ’ I said: ‘May Allāh put your affairs right for you! (What do you say) If a man divorces his wife in the period of purity, without cohabiting with her (in that period), in the presence of two just witnesses?’ He said: ‘When she enters into her third menstruation, her waiting period is finished and she becomes lawful for another husband . . .’ ’’

The author says: This meaning is narrated from him (the Imām) from various chains. Zurārah asked ‘‘whether ‘Alī (a.s.) was saying so?’’ because it is generally believed by the Sunnīs that ‘Alī (a.s.) said that the word meant the period of menstruation and not of purity. (It is reported in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from ash-Shāfi‘ī, ‘Abdu ’r-Razzāq, ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd and al-Bayhaqī from ‘Alī [a.s.] that he said: ‘‘It is allowed to her husband to return to her until she bathes from the third menstruation, and [then] she becomes lawful to [another] husband.) But the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt deny it; and attribute to him the word that al-aqrā’ is the period of purity, not menstruation, as was mentioned in the above tradition. This opinion has been attributed to other companions also, like Zayd ibn Thābit, ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Umar, and ‘Ā’ishah; and it has been narrated from all of them.

There is in Majma‘u ’l-bayān from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) explaining the words of Allāh: And it is not lawful for them . . . conceal what Allāh has created in their wombs, that he said: ‘‘Pregnancy and menstruation.’’

It is written in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī: ‘‘Surely Allāh has delegated to women (the information of) three things: purity, menstruation and pregnancy.’’

It is written in the same book about the words of Allāh: And for the men is (right) a degree above them, that the Imām said: ‘‘The right of men over women is superior to the right of women over men.’’

The author says: This is not contradictory with their equality in the ordainment of rights.

There is a tradition in at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī about the verse: Divorce is twice; then keep (them) in fairness or let (them) go in kindness, from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘Verily Allāh says: ‘Divorce is . . . go in kindness’; and letting them go in kindness is the third divorce.’’

And there is a tradition in at-Tahdhīb from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘Divorce, according to the sunnah, is that he divorces her once, that is, in her period of purity, without cohabiting (in that period), in the presence of two just witnesses, then leaves her until her period of waiting expires. Thus she becomes completely separated from him. Then he may become one of the suitors, she may marry him is she so wishes; and not, if not. And if he wants to revoke the divorce, he should keep witnesses to return her (to himself) before the expiry of her period of waiting; and in this case, she will remain with him after that divorce . . .’’

Ḥasan ibn Faḍḍāl is reported in Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l-faqīh as saying: ‘‘I asked ar-Riḍā (a.s.) of the reason why the woman who is divorced (twice and returned twice) during her period of waiting, is not lawful to her husband until she marries another husband. He (the Imām) said: ‘Surely Allāh allowed him to give divorce twice, as He said: Divorce is twice; then keep (them) in fairness or let (them) go in kindness, that is, in the third divorce. And because he entered into what Allāh dislikes, that is, divorce, He prohibited her to him, so that she would not be lawful for him until she marries a husband other than him; so that people should not treat divorce lightly and the women should not be harmed . . .’ ’’

The author says: It is the madhhab of Ahlu 'l-bayt, as narrated by the Shī'ite sources, that divorce with one word or in one sitting is not but only one divorce, even if he said: ''I divorce thee three divorces''. But the Sunnīs have contradictory traditions about it. Some show that it would be only one divorce, others say that it would be three and some narrate it from 'Alī and Ja'far ibn Muḥammad (aṣ-Ṣādiq - a.s.). But it appears from some Sunnī traditions, narrated by Muslim, an-Nasā'ī, Abū Dāwūd (in their aṣ-Ṣiḥāḥ) and others that it was 'Umar who, two or three years after receiving the caliphate, validated pronouncement of three divorces with one word. It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr: 'Abdu 'r-Razzāq, Muslim, Abū Dāwūd, an-Nasā'ī, al-Ḥākim and al-Bayhaqī have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ''It was (the system of) divorce during the days of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and Abū Bakr and two years during the caliphate of 'Umar that three divorces (i.e., in one sitting) were (counted as) one. Then 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb said: 'Surely the people are making haste in a matter in which they were given time. Therefore, (it would be good) if we sanction it.' He then validated it.''

And it is reported in as-Sunan of Abū Dāwūd from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: '' 'Abd Yazīd Abū Rukānah divorced Umm Rukānah and married a woman from the tribe of Muzīnah. Then she (i.e., the new wife) came to the Prophet and said: 'He does not satisfy me even as much as this hair. (She said it taking out a hair from her head.) Therefore, separate between him and me.' On hearing it the Prophet felt enraged and called Rukānah and his brother, and asked his companions: 'Do you see that this resembles him (Abū Rukānah) in this and this, and that in this and this?' They said: 'Yes' Then the Prophet told 'Abd Yazīd: 'Give her divorce.' He did so. Then (the Prophet) said: 'Take back your wife, Umm Rukānah.' He said: 'I have given her three divorces, O Messenger of Allāh!' The Prophet said: 'I know. Yet you take her back.' '' Then he recited, O Prophet! when you divorce women, divorce them for their prescribed time. . . (65:1).

It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from al-Bayhaqī from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ''Rukānah divorced a woman three times in one sitting; then he grieved for her. So, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) asked him : 'How did you divorce her?' He said: 'I divorce her thrice in one sitting.' The Messenger of Allāh said: 'Then take her back if you so wish.' So he took her back.'' Therefore, Ibn 'Abbās was of the opinion that the divorce can be given (once) only in every period of cleanliness; and that it is the sunnah which Allāh has ordered, ''Divorce them for their prescribed period.''

The author says: This meaning is narrated in other traditions also. So far as the ''sanction'' given by 'Umar is concerned, the arguments against it are like those described in the subject of mut'atu 'l-ḥajj.

The word of Allāh, ''Divorce is twice'', has been offered as a proof that three divorces in one word (e.g., I give thee three divorces, or, I divorce thee thrice) are not effective at all. The words 'twice' and 'thrice' are not used for a thing effected by one word, and all Muslims accept this principle when they talk about al-li 'ān (اللِّعَانُ = mutual imprecation).

The author of Majma'u 'l-bayān says about the word of Allāh, ''or let (them) go with kindness'': Two interpretations have come down to us of this phrase; first, that it is the third divorce, second, that the woman should be left to complete her period of waiting, so that she becomes completely free of the marriage-bond. It is narrated from as-Suddī and aḍ-Ḍaḥḥāk; and the same meaning is reported from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.).

The author says: As you see, there is a difference in the traditions about the meaning of this phrase.

It is reported in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī about the words of Allāh, ''and it is not lawful for you to take any part of what you have given them unless both fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh; then if you fear that they cannot keep within the limits of Allāh, there is no blame on them for what she gives up to become free thereby:'' aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The khul' (Redemption) is not effected except when the woman tells her husband, 'I shall not fulfil for you your vow' and 'I will surely go out without your permission' and 'I will surely get other man to sleep in your bed' and 'I will not take the obligatory bath of al-janābah on your account' (i.e., I will not sleep with you); or she says, 'I will not obey any order of yours or let you give me divorce'. When she says such things, then it is allowed to him to take back from her all that he had given her and all that he can get from her which she gives him. When both are agreed on it, he will divorce her in her period of cleanliness in the presence of the witnesses. Thus (on expiry of her waiting period) she separates from him with one divorce; and now he may be one of those who want to marry her. And if she so wishes, she may marry him again, and if she so wishes, she may reject him. If both remarry, she will be with him, and yet two more divorces (like this) may be given to her. And he should make a condition with her (when he takes ransom from her for giving her divorce), like that made in case of al-mubārāt (Mutual Freeing), that 'if you take back anything from this ransom given me by you, then I have more right on you' (i.e., the divorce will become a revocable one).''

And he (the Imām) said: ''There is no al-khul', al-mubārāt or at-takhyīr (option) except in a period of cleanliness without cohabitation (in that period) taking as witnesses two just men. And if a woman who obtains divorce as al-khul', marries another husband and then he (also) divorces her, it is lawful for the first husband to marry her.''

And he said : ''The husband has no right to revoke the divorce in case of al-khul' and al-mubārāt, excep when the woman changes her decision (and agrees to return to him) ; then he shall return to her whatever he took from her (and then may revoke the divorce).''

It is reported in Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh from al-Bāqir (a.s.) that he said: ''When the woman said to her husband the sentence, 'I shall not obey any order of yours', whether she elaborates it or not, it becomes lawful to him to take (ransom) from her (to give her al-khul') and he has no right to get her back (i.e., to revoke the divorce).''

It is written in al-Durru 'l-manthūr: Aḥmad has narrated from Sahl ibn Abī Ḥathmah that he said: ''Ḥabībah bint Sahl was married to Thābit ibn Qays ibn Shammās; but she disliked him; he was an ugly man. So she came and said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! Surely, I will not see him; and had it not been for fear of Allāh, I surely would have spat in his face'. So he asked her: 'Will you give him back his garden which he gave you as dowry?' She said: 'Yes.' Thereupon she gave him back his garden and (the Messenger . of Allāh) separated them. And this was the first al-khul' in Islam.'' at-Tafsīr of al-Ayyāshī quotes al-Bāqir (a.s.) as saying in the explanation of the word of Allāh: These are the limits of Allāh, so do not exceed them . . . : ''Verily, Allāh was displeased with one who fornicates, and therefore He prescribed for him a hundred lashes. Now if someone becomes enraged and increases it, then I repudiate him before Allāh; and this is the word of Allāh: These are the limits of Allāh, so do not exceed them.''

It is reported in al-Kāfī from Abū Baṣīr that he asked (Imām aṣ-Ṣādiq - a.s.) about the woman who is not allowed to her (former) husband until she marries another husband. He (the Imām) said: ''It is that woman who is divorced then returned, then (likewise) divorced the third time; it is she who is not lawful to that husband until she marries another husband and he tastes her sweetness.

The author says: al-'Usaylah (العُسَيْلَةُ translated here as sweetness) means sexual intercourse. It is written in aṣ-Ṣiḥāḥ: al-'Usaylah is used in the meaning of sexual intercourse. That enjoyment was likened to al-'asal (العَسَلُ), that is, honey, and then was given diminutive form by adding ''h'' (ة) (because al-'asal, is mostly used as a feminine) ; so it became (al-'usaylah). Also it is said that it was given the feminine form because it means 'a piece or portion of honey' as they refer to a piece of adhdhahab (الذَّهَبُ = gold) as adh-dhahabah (الذَّهَبَةُ).

And the words of the Imām, ''and he tastes her sweetness'' are based on the words of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) which he used in the incident of Rifā'ah, ''No! Until you taste his sweetness and he tastes your sweetness''. The incident is reported in al-Durru 'l-manthūr as follows: ''al-Bazzāz, aṭ-Ṭabarānī and al-Bayhaqī have narrated that Rifā'ah ibn Samu'āl divorced his wife. Then she came to the Prophet and said: 'Messenger of Allāh! 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān married me and he has not but like this.' (Saying it she pointed to a fringe of her dress.) The Messenger of Allāh kept ignoring her talk; at last he told her: 'You want to return to Rifā'ah? No ! Until you taste his (i.e., 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān's) sweetness and he tastes your sweetness.' ''

The author says: This tradition is well-known; and has been narrated by a multitude of Sunnī narrators of the books of aṣ-Ṣiḥāḥ and others, as well as by some Shī'ah ones. And although the wordings of the various narratives are different from each other, most of them contain these words.

It is written in at-Tahdhīb that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked the question whether the mut'ah marriage (with a second husband) would make the woman lawful (for the first one), to which he replied: ''No! Because Allāh says: So if he divorces her she shall not be lawful to him afterwards until she marries another husband; then if he divorces her there is no blame on them both if they return to each other; and there is no divorce in the mut'ah.''

The same book quotes Muḥammad ibn Muḍārib as saying: ''I asked ar-Riḍā (a.s.) whether a eunuch could make the woman lawful (for her first husband). He (the Imām) said: 'He cannot make her lawful.' ''

It is written in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī under the words of Allāh: And when you divorce the women and they reach their prescribed time . . . and do not retain them for injury . . . that the Imām said: ''When he divorces her, he is not allowed to take her back (i.e., to revoke the divorce) if he does not really want her.''

It is reported in Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''It is not proper for a man to divorce his wife and then to take her back (to revoke the divorce) when he does not really want her and then divorce her again. It is the injury which Allāh has forbidden. (It is improper) except that he divorces her and then takes her back and he intends to retain her.

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī under the words of Allāh: And do not take Allāh's signs for a mockery . . . , from 'Umar ibn aj-Jamī' through his chain to 'Alī (a.s.) in a tradition in which he said, inter alia: ''And whoever from this ummah read the Qur'ān and (even then) entered the hell, then he was from among those who took the Allāh's signs for a mockery . . . ''

It is reported in aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī about the words of Allāh: And when you have divorced the women and they have ended their term . . ., that the sister of Ma'qil ibn Yasār was divorced by her husband, then he (the husband) left her alone until her waiting term was completed. Then again he proposed to her. Thereupon Ma'qil refused. Then the verse was revealed: . . . then do not prevent them from marrying their husbands when they agree among themselves in a lawful manner. . .

The author says: This meaning has been quoted in al-Durru 'l-manthūr from al-Bukhārī as well as other compilers of aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ like an-Nasā'ī, Ibn Mājah, at-Tirmidhī, Abū Dāwūd and others.

It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from as-Suddī: This verse was revealed concerning Jābir ibn 'Abdullāh al-Anṣārī. He had a cousin (daughter of his uncle); her husband gave her one divorce, and her period of waiting expired. Then the (said) husband wanted to take her back (i.e., to remarry her). But Jābir refused saying, ‘‘You divorced our cousin and now you want to marry her second time!’’ And the woman herself wanted (to marry) her husband. Thereupon Allāh sent down the verse: And when you have divorced the women . . .

The author says: According to the madhhab of Ahlu 'l-bayt, a brother or a cousin has no guardianship or authority over the woman in the matters of marriage. Therefore, if either tradition is accepted, it would mean that the prohibition in the verse: . . .then do not prevent them from marrying their husbands . . ., is not concerned with the scope of guardianship nor does it promulgate any rule except showing that it is improper to come between a man and his wife (or would-be wife). Or that this dislike or prohibition of such interference is addressed to everyone who might prevent the woman from such remarrying, whether they be a guardian or not.

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī, under the words of Allāh: And the mothers should suckle their children for two complete years . . ., that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘As long as the child is in the suckling-period, he is between both parents equally; thereafter, when he is weaned, the father has more right upon him than the other relatives. And if the father finds someone to suckle the child for four dirhams, and the mother says that she would not suckle him but for five dirhams, then he may take the child away from her; but it is more comforting, more uplifting and more clement to the child that he be left with his mother.’’

The same book reports that the same Imam said about the words of Allāh, ‘‘neither shall a mother be made to suffer harm on account of her child, nor a father on account of his child’’: The woman used to resist with her hand when the man wanted to cohabit with her, saying. ‘‘I shall not allow you; I fear to become pregnant on my child.’’ And (likewise) the man used to say to the woman, ‘‘I shall not sleep with you; I am afraid that you will conceive, and thus I shall cause the death of my child.’’ Therefore, Allāh forbade the man to make the woman suffer harm, and the woman to make the man suffer.

It is narrated in the same book about the words of Allāh: And a similar duty (devolves) on the (father’s) heir, that one of the two Imāms (al-Bāqir or aṣ-Ṣādiq - a.s.) said: ‘‘It is about maintenance. The duty of the heir (in this respect) is like that of the father.’’

Another tradition in the same book about this verse says that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘It is not proper for the heir to make the woman suffer harm (for example) to say, ‘I shall not let her child visit her’, and to inflict harm on her child, if they have something with him; and he should not be parsimonious for him.’’

There is a tradition in the same book from Ḥammād from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘There is no suckling after weaning.’’ Ḥammād said: ‘‘I told him, ‘May I be your ransom, and what is the weaning?’ He said: ‘The two years mentioned by Allāh.’ ’’

The author says: ‘‘The two years’’ is the quotation from the verse, and that is why he (the Imām) explained it as ‘‘mentioned by Allāh.’’

It is reported in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr: ‘‘It is narrated by ‘Abdu ’r-Razzāq (in al-Muṣannaf) and Ibn ‘Adī from Jābir ibn ‘Abdullāh that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘There is no orphan after puberty, and there is no suckling after weaning; and there is no (fast of) silence of the day upto the night, and there is no joining in the fast (i.e., fasting two days without breaking the fast at night), and there is no vow in a sin, and there is no maintenance in the sin, and there is no oath cutting the relationship, and there is no returning to normadic life after al-hijrah (الهِجْرَةُ = emigration), and there is no emigration after the conquest (of Mecca), and there is no oath (vow) for a wife with the husband nor for a child with his father nor for a slave with his master (i.e., without their permission), and there is no divorce before marriage, and there is no emancipation before owning.’ ’’

There is a tradition in at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī from Abū Bakr al-Ḥaḍramī that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘When it was revealed: And (as for) those of you who die and leave wives behind, they should keep themselves in waiting for four months and ten (days), the women came arguing with the Messenger of Allāh and said: ‘We shall not wait’. The Messenger of Allāh told them: ‘It was (your custom) that when a woman’s husband died she took the dropping (of a camel) and threw it behind her in her private room and then sat down (therein); then when the same day (i.e., date) came after a year, she took (the dropping) and broke it and applied it (to her eyes) as antimony; and then she could marry. Now Allāh has put down (reduced) from you eight months.’ ’’

It is narrated in at-Tahdhīb from al-Bāqir (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘In every marriage, when the husband dies it is (incumbent) upon the woman (whether she is a free woman or a slave), and by whatever system the matrimonial bond was established (whether by mut'ah, permanent marriage or slavery), to observe the waiting period of four months and ten days.''

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from Muḥammad ibn Muslim that he asked al-Bāqir (a.s.): 'May I be your ransom! Why is the waiting period of a divorced woman three menstruations or three months and that of the woman whose husband dies four months and ten days?'' He (the Imām) said: ''As for the waiting period of three months for a divorced woman, it is (prescribed) to make sure that there is no child in the womb. And as for the waiting period of a woman whose husband dies surely Allāh has laid down a provision for the women and one upon them: The provision made for them is in al-'īlā', a period of four months, as He says: For those who swear (to abstain from their wives is ordained) a waiting for four months. It is, therefore, not lawful for anyone (to abstain from the wife) for more than four months; because Allāh knows that it is the furthest limit to which a woman may keep her sexual desire under control. And the provision made against them is that He ordered her to observe waiting period, when her husband dies, for four months and ten days. In this way, He (Allāh) took from her for him at the time of his death what He took from him for her during his lifetime.

The author says: This meaning is also narrated from ar-Riḍā and al-Hādī (a.s.) from other chains.

It is written in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: And there is no blame on you respecting that which you speak indirectly in the asking of (such) women in marriage: ''The women in her 'iddah, you speak to her in a graceful manner to attract her towards yourself. And you do not say, 'I do this and this' or 'I perform like this', hinting at indecent things.'' And another tradition says: ''You tell her, when she is in her 'iddah, 'O so-and-so! I do not like but only that which pleases you; and if your 'iddah expires, you will not find me missing, God willing; and you should not keep yourself (alone). All this (you may say) without resolving the marriage-tie.''

The author says: There are other traditions of the same meaning from the Imāms.

The at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī quotes aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he explained the words of Allāh: And if you divorce them before you have touched them . . ., in these words: ‘‘When the man divorces his wife before cohabiting with her, then she shall get half of her dowry; and if he had not appointed for her a dowry, then (for her) is a provision according to usage, on the wealthy according to his means and on the straitened in circumstances according to his means. And there is no waiting period for her and she may immediately marry whoever she wishes.

There is a tradition in al-Kāfī from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the man who divorces his wife before cohabiting with her: ‘‘On him is half of the dowry, if anything was fixed (as dowry); and if nothing was fixed then he should give her a provision as other women of her status are provided for.’’

The author says: This tradition explains the words, ‘‘a provision according to usage.’’ al-Kāfī, at-Tahdhīb, at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī and other books narrate from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) under the words of Allāh: ‘‘In whose hand is the marriage-tie’’, that both Imāms said: ‘‘It is al-walī (الوَلِيُّ = the guardian of the marriage).’’

The author says: There are numerous traditions giving this explanation. And there are some Sunnī traditions narrated from the Prophet and ‘Alī (a.s.) that it means ‘‘the husband’’.

It is narrated in al-Kāfī, Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l-faqīh, at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī and that of al-Qummī, about the words of Allāh: Maintain the prayers and the middle prayer, through numerous chains from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that: ‘‘Surely, the middle prayer is the noon prayer.’’

The author says: It is what is narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.) in their traditions with one voice. Of course, some of those traditions show that it is the Friday prayer. But it appears from the same traditions that they treat the noon and the Friday prayers as one prayer, not two. It is narrated in al-Kāfī and at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī from Zurārah from al-Bāqir (a.s.) — and the wording quoted here is from al-Kāfī — that he (the Imām) said: ‘‘Allāh says: Maintain the prayers and the middle prayer, and it is the prayer of the noon, the first prayer the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) prayed, and it is (in) the middle of the day and between the two prayers of the day-time — the dawn and afternoon prayers.'' And he said : ''And this verse was revealed and the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was on a journey, so he (the Holy Prophet) recited qunūt in it and continued it likewise in the journey and at the home-town, and he added two rak'ahs for him who is in his home-town. And those two rak'ahs added by the Prophet were dropped on Friday, for him who is in his home-town, because of the two sermons recited by the Imām. Therefore, he who prays on Friday without congregation, shall pray four rak'ahs of noon prayer like all other days . . .''

This tradition, as you see, counts the noon and the Friday prayers as one prayer, and says that it is the middle prayer. But most of these tradtions are al-maqṭū' (المَقْطُوْعُ i.e., their chain of narrators are broken, or do not reach a ma'ṣūm); and those that are connected to a ma'ṣūm, their texts are not free from confusion, like the above-mentioned tradition of al-Kāfī. Moreover it does not clearly fit the meaning of the verse. And Allāh knowns better.

It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr: Aḥmad, Ibn al-Manī', an-Nasā'ī, Ibn Jābir, ash-Shāshī and ad-Ḍiyā' have narrated through the chain of az-Zibriqān: ''Verily, there was a group of the Quraysh, and Zayd ibn Thābit passed by them and they were assembled. So they sent two of their boys to him to ask him about the middle prayer. And he said: 'It is the noon prayer'. Then the boys came to Usāmah ibn Zayd and asked him (the same question). And he said: 'It is the noon prayer. Verily, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) used to pray the noon prayer in the summer and there would not be behind him except one or two lines, and the people were in their siesta or at their trade. Thereupon, Allāh sent down the verse: Maintain the prayers and the middle prayer and stand up truly obedient to Allāh. Then the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''The men should desist (from that behaviour) or most surely I shall burn down their houses.'' ' ''

The author says: The same reason has been narrated by Zayd ibn Thābit and others from other chains.

And know that there is much difference of opinion regarding the meaning of ''the middle prayer'', much of it arises because of differences in the Sunnī traditions. It has been said that it is the dawn prayer, and it has been narrated from 'Alī (a.s.) and some companions. Others say that it is noon prayer, and it has been reported from the Holy Prophet and a number of the companions. Again it is said that it is the afternoon prayer, and this also has been reported from the Prophet and a number of companions — as-Suyūṭi has narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr more than fifty traditions of this meaning. Some say that it is the evening prayer. Other say that it is hidden among the prayers as the Night of Destiny is hidden among the nights of Ramaḍān. This is reported in some traditions from some companions. And also it is said that it is the night prayers ; and, lastly, that it is the Friday prayer.

It is reported in Majma'u 'l-bayān about the words of Allāh; And stand truly obedient to Allāh, that al-qunūt (اَلْقُنُوْتُ = obedience) is the invocation in the prayer during the standing posture, and it is narrated from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.).

The author says: Also it is narrated from some companions.

There is a tradition in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about this verse: ''(al-Qunūt means) one's going towards prayer and maintaining (i.e., praying) it in its time, so that nothing diverts one's attention or keeps him from it.''

The author says: There is no conflict between the two traditions, as one may easily understand.

It is reported in al-Kāfī about the words of Allāh: But if you are in danger, then (say your prayers) on foot or on horse back . . ., that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''When he is afraid of a beast or a thief, he will say at-takbīr and point (for the actions of prayer).''

And there is another tradition in Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh from the same Imām about the prayer when marching on: ''It is at-takbīr and at-tahlīl.'' Then he (the Imām) recited this verse.

There is another tradition in the same book from the same Imām : ''If you are in a fearful land and are afraid of a thief or a beast, then say the obligatory prayer and you are on your (riding) animal.''

And the same book quotes a tradition of al-Bāqir (a.s.): ''He who is afraid of a thief shall pray by sign while (riding) on his mount.''

The author says: There are numerous traditions of this meaning.

It is reported in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from Abū Baṣīr that he said: ''I asked him (the Imām) about the words of Allāh: And those of you who die and leave wives behind, (make) a bequest in favour of their wives of maintenance for the year without turning (them) out. He (the Imām) said: 'It is abrogated.' I said: 'And how was it?' He (the Imām) said: 'It was (a custom) that when a man died, his wife was maintained from his capital for one year; then she was turned out without any inheritance. Then it was abrogated by the verse of one-fourth and one-eigth. Now the woman is given maintenance from her own share.' ''

There is another tradition in the same book that Mu'āwiyah ibn 'Ammār said: ''I asked him (the Imām) about the words of Allāh: And those of you who die . . . He said: 'It is abrogated; the verse: . . . they should keep themselves in waiting for four months and ten (days), abrogated it, and the verse of inheritance abrogated it.' ''

It is reported in al-Kāfī and at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī: aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked about a man who divorces his wife, should he make provision for her? He said: ''Yes. Does not he like to be one of the doers of good? Does not he like to be one of those who fear (Allāh)? ''

A SCIENTIFIC DISCOURSE ABOUT WOMAN

It is well known that Islam — and we should not forget that it is Allāh who legislated it — did not base its laws on experiments, like all other laws. Yet, we are sometimes obliged to look at the rules, laws and customs of modern and even ancient peoples, so that we may rationally judge the sharī'ah of Islam. We have to look at the felicity of the human races and then see whether other customs and laws fulfil the requirements of humanity or not. In this way, we may see the difference between Islamic and non-Islamic rules, and appreciate the living and powerful spirit of Islam in comparison with others. That is why we refer to the history of nations and societies, and describe what they have to say on particular subject.

Accordingly, we should discuss the ideas and ideals of Islam about the following:

1. The identity of woman and the comparison of it with the identity of man.
2. Her value and importance in society — so that we may know what influence she had and has in human life.
3. Her rights and the laws made about her.

4. The foundation of the above-mentioned laws.

But before we discuss the above subjects from the Islamic point of view, it is necessary to look at history and see what her life was like before the advent of Islam, and what treatment has been accorded to her by non-Muslim nations — both civilized and uncivilized — uptil now. It is not within the scope of this book to go into the detail of these subjects; but a short review will not be out of place.

THE LIFE OF WOMAN IN UNCIVILIZED NATIONS

In uncivilized tribes and nations — like the tribes of Africa, the aboriginals of Australia, the inhabitants of the Pacific Ocean islands, the Red Indians of America, etc., a woman's life in comparison with a man's life was exactly like the life of a domestic animal as compared with the life of a human being.

Because of the natural instinct of exploitation, man believes that he has a right to possess cattle and other domestic animals, and to use them as he wishes and in any work he likes. He makes use of their hair, wool, meat, bones, blood, hides and milk; they serve him as a guard and watch; they are exploited even for breeding and procreating; their offspring and their profit serve the purpose of man; they carry his burden, are used in agriculture and hunting and satisfy the need of man in countless other ways.

These animals have no say at all about their own necessities of life and their desires, like food and drink, living space, their sexual urge, and the rest. It is only their owner who provides them with these items according to his own wish. And he would never wish but what is beneficial to himself through those animals. If we were to look from the eyes of that animal at the arrangements made by man we would surely be alternately amused and enraged at his high-handedness; we would find an animal being persecuted without any fault, another one crying for help without anyone paying any heed to it, a third one oppressing others without any hindrance; we would see one living a blissful and enjoyable life without doing any work to deserve it, like the stallion or the bull kept for breeding, which lives a most happy life according to its own view; and would find others living a distressed and difficult life without having committed any sin to deserve such a punishment, like a donkey which carries loads heavier than itself and the horse in the mill.

Such animals do not have even the right of life. The owner believes that it is he who has the right of their lives. If someone kills a horse, he is not charged with the murder of that horse, he is only accused of destroying the property of the owner. It is because man thinks that the animal's existence is an appendage to his own existence, its life is an offshoot of his own life; and that its status is that of a hanger-on.

The position of a woman vis-a-vis a man in these tribes and societies is exactly the same. According to their belief, woman was created for man. She was her man's appendage even in existence and life.

It was the father who owned her so long as she was not married, and the husband assumed that right soon after marriage.

The man could sell her, gift her away or loan her to some other man for the purpose of cohabitation, procreation, or service, etc. He could mate out to her any punishment he decided upon, even the death penalty. He could abandon her, without caring whether she would die. He could kill her to feed on her meat, especially in feasts and during famine. All the properties and rights of the woman belonged to the man; only he, and not she, could enter into dealings — selling, buying, accepting, rejecting — on her behalf.

And the woman was duty-bound to obey the man — her father or husband — whether she liked it or not; she was not expected to act independently even in her, let alone his affairs. It was her duty to look after the house and the children and make sure that the man's whims and desires were properly satisfied. When there was work to do, she always got the hardest, like carrying heavy load on her back, digging the earth, etc., and from vocations and handicrafts her share was the lowest and the most worthless. Things got bad to such extent that in some tribes a woman, after giving birth to a child, had to get up at once and engage herself in household drudgery, while the man lay on her bed convalescing and getting treatment for himself.

These were her rights and her duties. Every tribe and society had its own special rules and characteristics according to its habit and habitat; anyone interested should study the books written on this subject.

WOMAN IN PRE-ISLAMIC CIVILIZATIONS

Now we come to those nations who lived under traditional well-defined customs which they had inherited from their forefathers, and which were not based on any book or codified law. Such were the people of ancient China, India, Egypt and Iran.

In all these civilizations the woman had no independence or freedom, either in her intentions or her actions; she was totally under the guardianship and mastership of man. Neither could she decide on anything concerning herself, nor had she any right to interfere in civilian affairs like the government, the judiciary, etc.

It was her duty to participate with man in all the responsibilities of life, like earning a livelihood. In addition, it was her exclusive duty to look after domestic affairs and the children. She had to obey her man in all his orders and desires.

On the whole, a woman in these societies was in a better position than her sisters in uncivilized nations. She was not killed, and her meat was not used in feasts. She was not entirely deprived of the right to property; she owned to a certain extent what she got from inheritance or marriage, though she could not administer it independently. The man had the right to take as many wives as he desired, and to divorce whomever he wished. The husband could marry after the death of his wife, but in most cases the widow had no such right; and mostly she was forbidden to participate in society beyond her door-step.

Each of these civilizations had some particular customs. The class system in Iranian society, gave women of the upper class a right to participate in government and state and to succeed to the throne. Also it recognized as valid a marriage with women having close affinity, like the mother, daughter or sister.

In China, marriage was a sort of servitude for woman. The husband almost purchased and owned her. She had no right in inheritance and could not eat with men, not even with her own sons. Polyandry was allowed; many men jointly married one woman, and shared her among themselves, and the child was affiliated in most cases with the strongest husband.

In India, she was completely an appendage of the man. She was not allowed to remarry after the death of her husband — she would be burnt alive with the body of the deceased husband; otherwise she would live in disgrace. During her monthly period she was treated as the dirtiest thing; even her clothes could not be touched by others.

In short, the status of women in these nations was something between a human being and an animal. She was treated as a minor child under his guardianship; but unlike the child, she was never thought fit to be free from the yoke of her man's guardianship.

WOMAN IN SOME OTHER CIVILIZATIONS

There were some other nations who lived under, and were governed by, a codified law or book, like the Chaldeans, the Romans and the Greeks.

The Chaldeans and the Assyrians followed Hammurabi's Code, which made the woman an appendage of her husband; she was not independent in her decision or action. If the wife disobeyed her husband in any way, or decided independently on anything, the husband could turn her out of his home or could bring in another wife degrading the offending wife to concubinage. If she made any mistake in household management or exceeded the limits of the domestic budget, the husband could lodge complaints before the judge and on being found guilty she could be drowned in water.

The Romans were the first to enact civil laws. The earliest laws were made four centuries before the Christian era; and were gradually completed and perfected. The Roman law gave some freedom to the woman in her own affairs. The master of the house, that is, her husband and the father of her children, was vested as a sort of godhead; he was worshipped by the people of his household, as he, in his return, worshipped his forefathers and ancestors. He had full authority and decisive will in all that he desired and ordered concerning his family — he could kill them, if he so wished, without anybody lifting a finger to restrain him. The females of the family — wife, dauther and sister — were in a worse condition than the male members, even than their own sons. The women were not a part of society; their complaints were not heard, their dealings were not recognized and they could not interfere in social affairs. But the men, like brothers and sons, even the adopted ones (adoption and affiliation of children to other than their real fathers was a common practice in Roman society as well as in Greek, Iranian and Arabian) could be granted independence in their affairs by the master of the house.

The females were not a part of the household. The men were the members of the family, and the women were their appendage. Any formal relationship, giving the right of inheritance, etc., was reserved for between the males. The women had no formal relationships — neither between themselves like mother with daughter, or sister with sister, nor between themselves and the men like wife with husband, mother with son, sister with brother or daughter with father. And there was no mutual right of inheritance except where there was the formal relationship. Of course, the natural relationship was not denied, and some consequences of that half-hearted acceptance were the prohibition of marriage between close relations in many societies, and the guardianship of the master of the house over her women.

In short, woman, in their eyes, was a parasite, completely dependent in her social and domestic life; the rein of her life and her will was in the hands of the master of the household — her father if she was with him, or husband if she lived with him, or others. The master could do with her whatever he wished, and decide about her as he thought fit. He sold her, gifted her away, loaned her to others for sexual enjoyment, gave her in repayment of debt, rent or taxes. He punished her by beating and even killing her. He had the authority to administer her property if she got hold of any through marriage or if she earned it with the permission of her master; but not through inheritance because she had no such right. Her father or other male relatives gave her in marriage and her husband had the right to dissolve the marriage.

The custom of the Greeks in the composition of the household and the mastership of the males was almost identical with the Romans. Their social and domestic organization was made up of the males; the females were their dependants. They had no independence in their will or action except under the guardianship of men. But there was a surprising contradiction in that system: if there was any decision to be taken against the woman, she was treated as an independent person, and if there was any judgement in her favour, she was a dependant of men — provided such orders were of benefit to the men. Thus, the woman was punished for all her faults and crimes as though she were independent, but she was never rewarded for her good work except under guardianship of her man.

This shows that these legal systems did not think that woman was a part of human society, not even a weaker part dependent on others; instead, they treated her as a harmful bacterium which disturbed society and damaged its health; but there was the unavoidable reality that she was needed to continue the human race; therefore it was necessary to look after her. Even then she should be punished if she made a mistake or committed a crime; and her rewards should be given to the man when she did a good work. She was not to be left to do as she liked; otherwise, society would come to harm. In this she was like a powerful enemy who has been defeated, caught and enslaved; he lives his long life under duress; if he does any wrong he is punished, but if he does a good deed he is not thanked.

As society, according to their thinking, was made up of the men only, they believed that the progeny in reality consisted of male children only, and the family could continue only when there was a male child to carry it on. This belief was the basis of the system of the adoption of sons. The house which had no male child was thought to be ruined, and such a family was deemed extinct and dead. No wonder then that they had to adopt others' sons as their own to save the family from extinction. Such adopted sons were treated as legitimate, legally recognized sons, having mutual rights of inheritance, and subject to all the rules and customs concerning natural sons. When a man thought himself to be sterile, he brought one of his relatives like a brother or a brother's son to sleep with his wife, so that she could conceive by that relative, and the son born thereof would be called his own son, and the family would continue.

Marriage and divorce in Greece was like the Roman system. They could marry more than one wife, but only one of the wives would be officially recognized; others were unofficial.

WOMAN IN ARABIA: THE ENVIRONMENT IN WHICH THE QUR'ĀN WAS REVEALED

The Arabs lived in the Arabian peninsula, an infertile land with an extremely hot climate. Most of them belonged to nomadic tribes far away from any civilization; they lived on raid and plunder. Their neighbours were Iran on the one side, Rome (the Byzantine Empire) on the other and Ethiopia and Sudan on the third.

As a result of this geography, most of their customs and traditions were barbarous, and traces could be found in them of some Roman and Iranian traditions, as well as some Indian and ancient Egyptian customs.

The Arabs did not accord any independence to the woman in her life; nor did she have any honour or dignity except that of her family. She was not entitled to inheritance. A man could marry as many wives as he desired; there was no restriction on divorce. Daughters were buried alive. This wicked custom was started by Banū Tamīm when many of their daughters were made captive after a war against Nu'mān ibn Mundhir. This disturbed them very much and they started burying their daughters alive. Gradually the practice was adopted by other tribes. When a daughter was born, the father thought it a disgrace and hid himself from others' eyes. On the other hand, his joy knew no bounds when he got news that a son was born — the more the better, even if the son was an adopted one. They gladly affiliated to themselves the son born as a result of their adultery. Sometimes, when many people slept with one woman in one month and a son was born, every one of them claimed him for himself and often than not, this led to dispute and conflicts.

Even then, it was seen in some families that their women had some freedom, and especially the daughters were free in matrimonial affairs, their consent and choice was respected and accepted. In this they were influenced by Iranian upper class society.

Anyhow, their treatment of women was a mixture of the civilized systems of Rome and Iran (not giving them any independent rights, not allowing them to participate in public affairs like government and war, except in exceptional cases) and the barbarous systems of primitive nomads. The women were deprived of many human rights, but not because the master of the house was a sacred person deserving to be worshipped. It was simply a matter of the stronger party subjugating and exploiting the weaker one.

So far as worship was concerned, all of them (men and women both) worshipped idols, as was also done by the aṣ-Ṣābi'īn, the worshippers of stars etc. Every tribe had its own idol made according to its liking and preference. They also worshipped the celestial bodies and the angels (whom they thought to be the daughters of Allāh!) and made idols representing them according to their own fancy. The idols were made of various materials, often of stone and wood, though Banū Ḥanīfah are reported to have made their idol from flour. They worshipped it for a long time, then came a time of famine, so they ate it. A poet says about it:

The (tribe of) Ḥanīfah ate its lord,
At the time of hardship and famine.
They did not fear their lord,
About (its) evil consequences and effect.

Sometimes they worshipped a stone; then if a more beautiful stone came to hand, the first one was thrown away and replaced by the second one. If nothing suitable was found, they took a double handful of earth, brought a sheep or goat and milked it over that mound of earth. Then they started going round it and worshipping it.

Such deprivation and misery created in woman's mind a weakness which made her an easy prey to superstition and credulity. Books of history and anthropology have recorded how she fell into error whenever she tried to explain natural phenomena and simple events.

This in short, was the condition of woman in human society in various eras before the advent of Islam. It may be seen from above that:

First: Men thought that women were human beings, but on the level of dumb animals, or with very weak and low grade human qualities, who could not be trusted if set free. The first was the view of primitive people, and the second, of others.

Second: Society did not accord her the status of a member; and she was not considered an integral part of humanity. For primitives, she was one of the necessities of life like a home and accomodation. For civilized people, she was a captive and dependdant on her masters who took advantage of her labour and always remained alert lest she escaped or cheated.

Third: Both types of societies deprived her of all common rights; she was given only that much which was necessary for her exploitation by men.

Fourth: They treated her as a strong person treats a weakling. In other words, the basis of their dealings with her was exploitation. In addition, civilized nations believed that she was a weak human being, incapable of independently looking after herself, and who could not be trusted in any matter.

Different nations and tribes had different ways, and sometimes customs and beliefs were mixed; also there were variations in the degrees and grades of the above treatment.

WHAT ISLAM BROUGH FOR WOMAN

Woman had to undergo patiently the above-mentioned treatment, which imprisoned her in the dungeon of humiliation and disgrace. Consequently, weakness and inferiority became her second nature; she was brought up in this environment and lived and died in it. Ultimately, the word 'woman' became synonymous with 'weakness' and 'insignificance' — not only in the conversation of men but even in the language of women themselves.

Look at any society, primitive or civilized, and you will find adages and proverbs reflecting on woman's feebleness and unimportance. Take any two or more languages of different origins and unrelated developments, and you will find one thing in common: allegories, metaphors and similes connected with the word 'woman' to scold a coward, to rebuke a weakling and to chide a contemptible and despised person. An Arab poet said:

I do not know (and would that I knew),
Whether the family of Ḥiṣn are people or women.

Such expressions may be seen in hundreds and thousands in every language.

These idioms and expressions were enough to show what human society believed about women, even if there were nothing recorded in the books of history and culture, because the ideas and ideals of a nation may clearly be gleaned from its language.

The only thing showing any consideration and care towards her is found in a few sentences of the Torah and in the admonition of Jesus to have mercy on her.

Then came Islam, the religion of truth and monotheism, accompanied by the Qur'ān. Islam originated and initiated in her favour a system which the world had never known before, from the early dawn of humanity. It set forth straight away against the dictum of the whole world, and rebuilt, for her, her natural place, which the world had completely destroyed, from the very beginning. It cancelled and dismissed as baseless their belief about her identity and their practice concerning her treatment.

HER IDENTITY: Islam declared that woman is as much a human being as man is. Every person, male or female, is a human being, whose substance and ingredients combinedly originate from two human beings — one male and one female, and no one has any superiority over the other except through piety. Allāh says: O you people! Surely We have created you of a male and a female, and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allāh is one among you who guards (him/her self) most (against evil) ; surely Allāh is Knowing, Aware (49:13). Allāh clearly says that every human being originates and is made from two human beings, a male and a female, and they both jointly and in equal degree are the source of his existence; and everyone, male or female, is a combination of the substances taken from those two. Note that Allāh did not say as the Arab poet had said: ‘‘And surely the mothers of the people are but receptacles’’. Nor did He say like another poet:

Our sons are (those who are) the sons of our sons; and as for our daughters,
Their sons are the sons of distant men.

Instead He (Allāh) declared that every one was created jointly from both male and female. All were, therefore, similar to each other. There could be no declaration more complete and more appropriate. Finally, He declared that being a male or a female or being born in a certain family or tribe is not the criterion of superiority. Superiority originates only from piety.

Also, Allāh has said: . . . that I will not waste the work of a worker among you, whether male or female, the one of you being from the other . . . (3:195).

Here it is clearly said that endeavour is not repulsed and work is not wasted. And why? Because the one of you is from the other. This verse in this way clearly says what was implied in the words of the previous verse, ‘‘surely We have created you of a male and a female’’: The man and the woman together are a single species, without any difference in their origin and root. He goes on to say that the work of anyone from these two groups is not wasted before Allāh; it will not be neglected, nor will its reward be given to another person; every soul is mortgaged against its own endeavours. It is not as the people have said, that women were responsible for their mistakes, but so far as their good work was concerned, its reward should be given to the men.

Every male and every female shall get what he or she does, and there is no superiority except of piety. The virtues are a part of piety like faith with its various degrees, beneficial knowledge, balanced wisdom, good character, patience and forbearance. Therefore, a believing woman (in various stages of the faith), or a learned and wise one, or one who is of noble character, will be superior in her own right, and higher in grade than those men, whosoever, who are not equal to her in these virtues. Because there is no superiority except of piety and noble character.

There are other verses of the same meaning, and rather more clear. Allāh says:

> Whoever does good, whether male or female, and he is a believer, We will most certainly make him live a happy life, and We will most certainly give them their reward for the best of what they did (16:97).
> . . . and whoever does good, whether male or female and he is a believer, these shall enter the garden in which they shall be given sustenance without measure (40:40).
> And whoever does good deeds, whether male or female and he is a believer, these shall enter the garden, and they shall not be dealt with a jot unjustly (4:124).

And Allāh has condemned their desdain of the daughters in these words (and it is the most telling condemnation):

> And when a daughter is announced to one of them his face becomes black and he is full of wrath. He hides himself from the people because of the evil of that which is announced to him. Should he keep it with disgrace or bury it (alive) in the dust? Now surely evil is what they judge (16:58 — 59).

Obviously they hid themselves because they thought that a daughter was a disgrace for the father. They thought that she would soon reach marriageable age and would become a toy in the hands of her husband who would use her for sexual enjoyment — a shameful thing; and this shame would effect her family and her father; it was, therefore, better to bury her alive. (The original reason of this custom has already been described.) Allāh severely condemned this practice in these word: And when the buried alive shall be asked for what sin she was killed (81:8-9).

There has remained a residue of such superstitions among Muslims, a legacy of their pagan ancestors, which has not been washed away from their hearts. You will see them thinking that illicit sexual relations are a shame and disgrace for the woman (even if she repents) but not for the man (even if he continues in that sin) ; while Islam has declared that disgrace and evil belongs to the sin in which the man and the woman were equal partners.

HER VALUE IN SOCIETY: Islam has made the man and the woman equal in their will and action so far as the management of their lives is concerned. Allāh said: The one of you being from the other (3:195). She is independent in her will and intention and independent in her action. The woman owns the products of her own will and action as the man owns his own without any difference whatsoever. For her is the benefit of what she earns, and on her is the responsibility of what she does.

According to Islam both are equal; the Qur'ān confirms it and Allāh shows the truth to be the truth by His words. Side by side, Islam recognizes two special qualities in her, by which the Creator has distinguished her from the man: First, she is like a tilth for the creation and propagation of the human race. The species cannot exist without her. This distinction calls for some special rules concerning her life. Second, she has a comparatively delicate body and a sensitive perception. This has a tangible effect on her life and on the social and domestic responsibilities entrusted to her.

This is her value in human society — and also the value of the man may be understood from it. These two distinctions are the basis of all the rules that are common to both groups and of those that are reserved for either of the two. Allāh says: And do not covet that by which Allāh has made some of you excel others; men shall have the benefit of what they earn and women shall have the benefit of what they earn; and ask Allāh of His grace; surely Allāh knows all things (4:32). It shows that the contribution made by each group to society is the criterion of the excellence granted to it. And it is this excellence which gives special status to one in comparison to the other. For example, man has been given preference over woman in the share of inheritance; while woman has been given preference over man by being exempted from the responsibilities of maintenance. And no one should covet the preference given to someone else.

There is another type of excellence which results from the deeds of the doer, whoever he or she might be. For example, the virtues of faith, knowledge, reason, piety and other admirable qualities. And it is the grace of Allāh, He gives it to whomsoever He wishes, and ask Allāh of His grace.

The proof of the above statement is found in the words of Allāh, following the above-mentioned verse: Men are the maintainers of women . . . (3:34).

COMMON AND SPECIAL RULES: Woman, like man, is subject to all the rules concerning worship and social rights. She may act independently in all matter in which man is free to act, like inheritance, earning, dealings with other people, learning, teaching, making a claim, defending her rights, and so on. In all such affairs, Islam makes no discrimination between man and woman.

Of course, in other matters it has limited her sphere of activity, because of her natural characteristics. For example, she may not be made a ruler or a Qāḍī, she is exempted from participation in fighting, although she may attend the jihād and be entrusted with its other responsibilities, like nursing and treating the wounded soldiers; and she gets half the share of man in inhertance. She has to hide her body and the places of adornment; she has to obey her husband so far as his conjugal rights are concerned. To compensate these burdens, she is exempted from her own maintenance; it is her father or husband who must maintain her, and they are also obliged to protect her to their utmost ability, and she has the right to bring up her children. Islam has also enjoined that her person and honour must be protected — her name may not be used in an undignified manner. Also, she is exempted from worship during her monthly period and after delivery. In short, Islam says that in all conditions and in every way she should be treated with ternderness and kindness.

What she is obliged to learn and do, in brief, is as follows: On the side of learning, she must know the fundamentals of the faith and the commandments of the sharī'ah concerning worship and civil rules. And on the side of action, she must follow the rules of the religion and obey her husband by giving him his conjugal rights.

But she is not obliged to earn her livelihood by any employment, handicrafts or artisanship. Nor she is obliged to take up the drudgery of domestic work. Similarly, it is not her duty to burden herself with what is considered useful for the general welfare of the society, like learning various disciplines (other than those mentioned earlier) or participating in useful industries or handicrafts.

She is not obliged to do so. But if she acquires such extra knowledge or looks after her domestic arrangements or affairs useful for the society, it will be regarded as her extra excellence, provided she keeps within the limits imposed upon her by the sharī'ah. It will be a matter of pride for her. Islam has allowed, nay, encouraged her to boast of such achievements before her compatriots, although it has forbidden the men to boast (except in jihād).

The traditions of the Prophet support what we have said. Space does not allow full details; otherwise, we would have liked to describe how the Prophet lived with his wife, Khadījah, and his daughter, Fāṭimah, as well as with his other wives; and how he behaved with the women of his community and what he said and enjoined about women. Also, we would have quoted the traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt and their women like Zaynab (d/o 'Alī), Fāṭimah and Sakīnah (ds/o Husayn) and others, and what they said about women. Perhaps we will get a chance to quote some of them in the traditions connected with the verses concerning woman.

THE FOUNDATION: The foundation upon which these rules have been built is nature. It may be understood from the explanation under the heading, ''Her value in the Society''. Further, details are as follows:

The scholars of social sciences will no doubt agree with the premise that the duties imposed by society should be based upon natural abilities and demands. It is nature which has led human beings to this collective social life from the earliest dawn of humanity. Of course, a certain society may at times deviate from the natural course. As the body, by deviating from its natural way, looses its health and becomes sick, likewise, a society, by astraying from natural dictates, deteriorates into chaos.

Society, healthy or sick, is thus based on nature; although a sick society has been contaminated by extraneous and harmful elements during its progress.

This fact has been mentioned, or alluded to, by scholars of social sciences. And the Book of Allāh, long before these researches, has explained it in the most excellent style: Our Lord is He who gave everything its creation, then guided it (20:50); Who created, then made complete, and Who made (things) according to a measure, then guided (87:2—3); And (I swear by) the soul and Him Who made it perfect, then He inspired it to understand what is wrong for it and right for it (91:7-8).

These and other such verses show that all things, including human beings, are guided to what they have been created for; and that they have been equipped with what is needed to reach their goal. The blissful life is that which conforms perfectly with the dictates of nature. It has been pointed out in these words of Allāh: Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion — the nature made by Allah in which He has made men; there is no alteration (by anyone else) in the creation of Allāh; that is the established religion . . . (30:30).

So far as social norms are concerned, nature demands that all individuals should have equal rights and duties. It does not approve of giving one more than his due and oppressing another by depriving him of his rights. But this equality does not mean that every individual should be offered every responsibility and every office. It would be wrong, for example, for a young inexperienced man to be given the place of a well-experienced official, or for an idiot to be given the chair of a professor; or to expect from a weakling the performance of a strong and brave person. If we treat capable and incapable persons equally, it will be harmful to both.

What is then the meaning of this equality? It means that every person should be given his right and put in his proper place. This equality between individuals and groups implies that each shall get his due rights without any let or hindrance; no right shall be usurped or denied unjustly. The following words of Allāh point to it:

. . . and they have rights similar to those upon them in a just manner, and for the men is (the right) a degree above them . . . This verse ordains equality between the rights of both groups at the same time as it shows the difference between both.

Both groups, men and women, share equally in the basic gifts of thinking and will (which in their turn create free choice). She should, therefore, be equally free in her thought and will and should have free choice. In other words, she should be free to look after her life's affairs — as well as social, except where there is any genuine reason to the contrary. Islam gave her this freedom and independence in full measure, as has been explained earlier. She, thus, became, by the grace of Allāh, an independent personality, unfettered in her will and action by men and their guardianship. She got what the world had denied her throughout all her existence since the beginning of humanity and which was unheard of in all her history. Allāh says: There is no blame on you for what they do for themselves in a proper manner (2:234).

But while sharing these basic qualities with man, she differs from him in other ways. An average woman lags behind an average man in the build of her body and its basic organs, like the brain, the heart, the veins, the nerves, her height and weight. (The details may be seen in any book of anatomy.) As a result, her body is comparatively soft and elegant, while a man's is tough and rough. And the fine sentiments, like love, tender-heartedness, and inclination towards beauty and adornment are more pronounced in her than in man. On the other hand, the reasoning power is more prominent in man than in woman. The woman lives a sentimental life; the man an intellectual one.

It was for this reason, that Islam differentiated between men and women in those duties and responsibilities which were related to reason and those related to sentiment. Ruling, judging and fighting have been reserved for man, because these things are closely related to reasoning and thinking. And the bringing up of, and looking after, the children, the domestic management has been reserved for woman. Her maintenance is the responsibility of her husband, for which he is compensated by a double share in inheritance.

Look at the division of inheritance in this way: It is as though inheritance is divided in two equal shares. Then one-third of the woman's share is given to the man in lieu of her maintenance. Thus the man gets two-thirds of the estate and the woman is left with one-third. But the expenses of her maintenance are not less than that of a man. In this way, she gets the benefit of the man's two-thirds share in equal measure. (One-third's benefit goes to her while the man gets the benefit of the remaining one-third.) The nett result is that the man gets two-thirds in species while the woman gets two-thirds in benefit. Man has been given more to manage, because reasoning is his predominant characteristic; woman has been bestowed with more to benefit from and enjoy, because feeling and sentiment is more pronounced in her nature. (This topic will be explained under the verses of inheritance.) Then Allāh completed His grace and bounty to women by giving them the concessions and exemptions mentioned earlier.

QUESTION: The above-mentioned clemency granted in Islam to woman makes her idle. When she is told to hide herself from strangers and is guaranteed all the necessities of life (by transferring its burden onto man) she is bound to become slow, lazy, idle and unproductive; she will not be able to exert herself in difficult works and professions. Thus her growth will be retarded and her progress will turn into backwardness; she will not be able to contribute meaningfully in making society perfect. And experience is an irrefutable proof of this aspect.

REPLY: It is one thing to ordain laws to improve the conditions of humanity; and a completely separate thing to enforce these laws through exemplary character and good upbringing (which leads humanity to progress). It was the tragedy of Islam in the past that it did not get good rulers and striving guardians. Consequently, the laws were suffocated, upbringing halted and then turned in the opposite direction. Irrefutable experience shows that mere theories and beliefs do not produce the desired result, unless, and until, they are ingrained in the soul by exhortation and good training and example. The Muslims in their long history could not take any good example to follow from their rulers, who usurped full authority over them. Look at Mu‘āwiyah speaking on the pulpit of Iraq after taking over the caliphate: ‘‘I did not fight you to make you pray or fast — this is your own affair. I fought you only to become your ruler, and this I have now become.’’ Also look at other caliphs from the Umayyid and ‘Abbāsid dynasties and other rulers after them. All of them were of the same type. And had it not been that this religion gets its light from the light of Allāh which cannot be extinguished (and Allāh is to complete His light even if the unbelievers dislike it), judgement would have been pronounced against the Muslims long ago.

THE FREEDOM OF WOMEN IN WESTERN CIVILIZATION

There is no doubt whatsoever that Islam was the first to release woman from her bondage and to grant her freedom of will and action. All the slogans of the emancipation of woman raised in western countries are an echo of the clarion call of Islam. These nations in this matter are just following the lead given by Islam — even though they have made mistakes in this endeavour. The principle laid down by Islam is a perfectly circular ring, and nothing can be added to, or substracted from, this circle without distrubing the whole alignment.

These people tried to improve upon the masterpiece of Islam, and decided to create complete equality between man and woman in all rights and privileges. This was done after long agitations and demands. They did not pause to ponder that woman lags behind man in many powers and faculties.

They explain away the inherent weakness of the woman by attributing it to the defective training and upbringing to which she has been subjected since time immemorial (perhaps, since the beginning of humanity) even though she was equal to man in all her natural potentials.

But it may be asked that if the natural potentials of both groups were the same, why did society since the dawn of humanity decide to oppress her? Why and how did man succeeded in subjugating her in the first place? And why has this oppression never changed its course?

Western civilization, in spite of its keen desire to emancipate woman, has not succeeded in doing so. The data collected show that woman is far behind man in all those professions and activities which Islam has reserved for man, like ruling, judging and military service.

And as to what has been the fruit of this endeavour, the less said the better.

A DISCUSSION ABOUT MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE

Marriage is one of the fundamental sociological institutions. Mankind, since its very beginning, has been keeping to it without any disruption. Such an institution must have been based on the foundation of nature itself.

Islam has based its matrimonial laws on the correlation between masculinity and femininity. There is no need to emphasize that this complementary system created in man and woman — and it is the most intricate and interrelated system permeating their whole bodies — was not created in vain and without purpose. The male by his nature is attracted to the female and vice versa. And this system has only one goal in sight: reproduction and the continuity of the race. Marriage is based on this reality; and all its rules revolve around this axis. That is why Islam in its matrimonial laws has kept in view the fundamental principle of sexual interrelation; and on this principle are based the laws concerning chastity and conjugal rights; exclusive attachment of the wife to the husband and the rules of divorce and 'iddah; legitimacy and parentage, the custody and upbringing of the children; inheritance and other related subjects.

Modern non-Islamic laws have laid the fondation of matrimony on a co-operation between husband and wife in their struggle for life. Marriage accordingly, is a co-operative institution much narrower than other such institutions like municipality etc.

It is for this reason that modern laws do not pay any attention to the rules of chastity etc., which are an integral part of the matrimonial laws of Islam.

This basis, co-operation in life, has given rise to a vast multitude of social problems and domestic upheavals. Apart from that, it is not in conformity with the realities of creation and nature. Why does a man want to join others and co-operate with them? It is because his well-being depends on countless things and innumerable actions which he alone cannot get and do. He is by necessity obliged to join hands with others. Consequently each person co-operates with the others, dividing labour and work according to their aptitudes. And all the required work is completed with their joint effort.

This development requires co-operation between any two persons — it does not specifically call for co-operation between a man and a woman. Therefore, building the edifice of matrimony is fundamentally wrong. Nature has based it on the need of procreation and not on social or domestic co-operation. Otherwise, there would not have been any need of any special laws for marriage; the general rules governing association and co-operation would have been enough. It would negate the virtue of chastity and fidelity, nullify the concept of legitimacy and affinity, and abrogate the rules of inheritance — as communism has done. If we accept this ultimate result of the western philosophy of marriage, we would have to accept that all this complicated and interrelated system in the bodies of man and woman was created without any purpose.

This is a short review of the Islamic and western philosophies of marriage. More explanation will be given in some other relevant place.

So far as divorce is concerned, it is a thing which the sharī'ah of Islam should be proud of. It has been made lawful and this legalization also is based on nature. There is nothing in nature to interdict it. Details of the conditions of its validity will be given in the chapter of ''Divorce'' (chap.55). Here it should be noted that today all the nations of the world (not excepting the Roman Catholic countries) have had to adopt this system in their civil codes, even though previously they ridiculed Islam on this account.

QUR'ĀN: Did you not see those who went forth from their homes, and they were (in) thousands, for fear of death: ''To see'', in this verse means ''to know''. It implies that the thing described here is so obvious that to know it is to see it. Other examples of this expression are: Did you not see that Allāh created the heavens and the earth with truth? (14:19); Did you not see how Allāh has created the seven heavens one above another? (71:15).

az-Zamakhsharī has said that the phrase ''Did you not see'' is an idiom used to express wonder and astonishment. It implies, ''Are you not surprised that . . .'' ''ḥadhara 'l-mawt'' (حَذَرَ الْمَوْتِ) may mean 'for fear of death ' (as translated here) ; or it may mean, 'they were afraid of death, a great fearing'.

QUR'ĀN: Then Allāh said to them ''Die ''; (and) afterwards He gave them life: The order was 'creative', not 'legislative'. It does not mean that they did not die of a 'natural' cause, as the traditions say that they died of the plague.

Instead of saying, 'Then Allāh gave them death and afterwards gave them life', Allāh used this expression, because it more forcefully shows the effectiveness of His order and supreme domination of His power. The use of the imperative mood in matters of creation is a more forceful style; likewise, it is more eloquent and emphatic to use a news style while ordaining a legislation (''you shall not take other's property unjustly'').

''Afterwards He gave them life'' implies that they were raised from death to life, and that they remained alive for some time. Had they been resurrected just as an example and warning for others, or to complete the proof, or to explain some other reality, Allāh would have pointed it out, as is customary in the Qur'ān. (See, for example, the story of the people of the Cave.)

Moreover, the next sentence, ''most surely Allāh is Gracious to people'', also shows that they were not raised for only a short time.

QUR'ĀN: But most people thank (Him) not. The repetition of the word ''people'' here (instead of pronoun) reflects on the low level of their thinking. Moreover, the word ''people'' in the preceding sentence (''most surely Allāh is Gracious to people'') refers to the particular group that was raised from dead; while in this sentence it stands for the whole of mankind.

This verse has some connection with the next verses which describe the importance of jihād, fighting in the way of Allāh — jihād also gives a new life to the nation when it is dead.

A commentator has said that this verse is a parable to illustrate the condition of the ummah — how it remains backward and dies when foreigners bring it under their yoke and keep it under their rule and domination, and how later on it rises to defend its rights and snatches its freedom from that colonial power; and thus becomes alive again. The following is the gist of his argument : —

''The verse does not refer to any historical event of either the Israelites (as many traditions say) or others (as some others say).

Otherwise, it would have been essential to mention that it happened in this or that nation, or to disclose the name of the prophet concerned, as the Qur'ān invariably does in all its stories. Moreover, the Torah also does not mention it in the history of the prophet Hezekial (a.s.). This proves that the traditions narrated in this connection are from Jewish mythology which were taken over by the Muslims.

''Apart from that, there is only one death and one life in this world, as is shown by the Qur'ānic words: They shall not taste therein (i.e., in the Paradise) death except the first death (44:56). They (i.e., the inmates of Fire) shall say: ''Our Lord! Twice didst Thou make us subject to death, and twice hast Thou given us life'' (40:11). Therefore, there cannot be two lives in this world.

''Obviously, the verse is a parable: A nation was attacked by powerful enemies, who humiliated and subjugated them. The enslaved nation did not defend its freedom and went out of their homes, even though they were in thousands, in great numbers, but they were afraid of death. Thereupon Allāh said to them, ''Die, the death of disgrace and ignorance''. Because ignorance and inertia is death, as knowledge and self-respect is life. Allāh says: O you who believe ! Answer (the call of) Allāh and His Apostle when he calls you to that which gives you life (8:24). Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth? (6:122).

''The nation died, that is, they were disgraced and overcame by their enemies and remained in that condition. Afterwards, Allāh again gave them life, by inspiring them to rise against their oppressors and to defend their rights. So, they stood up and drove their oppressors out and became independent. Those were the people to whom Allāh gave life a second time, although so far as their identity was concerned, they were not the same people who had died the death of disgrace. But as both groups were of the same nation, Allāh counted them as one people who first died and then were raised to life again. Allāh has used similar expressions in various places in the Qur'ān. For example, He says, addressing the Jews of the Prophet's time: And We delivered you from Pharaoh's people who subjected you to severe torment (7:141). Then We raised you up after your death that you may give thanks (2:56).

‘‘Lastly, if this verse were not taken as a parable, it would have no connection with the verses following it, which are about fighting in the way of Allāh.’’

This interpretation is based on some patently false premises:

First: It is based on the rejection of miracles, or at least some miracles, like giving life to the dead. But we have proved the existence of miracles. Moreover, here we are dealing with the Qur’ān, and the Qur’ān loudly declares the existence of miracles, like raising the dead, etc. Even if we fail to prove such miracles through intellectual reasoning, the irrefutable fact remains that the Qur’ān believes in them.

Second: It claims that the Qur’ān proves the impossibility of more than one life in this world. But the verses describing the raising of dead (in the stories of Ibrāhīm, Mūsā, ‘Īsā and ‘Uzayr) clearly and definitely prove that dead animals and persons were again raised to life in this world.

Moreover, a life in this world is not to be counted as two lives simply because a death intervenes in between. The story of ‘Uzayr is clear on this point: He remained dead for a hundred years; but on raising again he was not even aware of that death.

Third: It is a false assumption that the Qur’ān ought to have identified the nation or the prophet concerned, if it were the narration of a real event.

The style of speech differs according to its time, place and context. Sometimes details are given; on other occasions only a passing reference is made. For example, the Qur’ān refers to a people (without identifying them in any way): Cursed be the fellows of the ditch of the fire (kept burning) with fuel, when they sat by it, while they were witnesses of what they did with the believers (85:4 — 7). And of those whom We have created are a people who guide with the truth and thereby do justice (7:181).

Fourth: The claim that if this verse were not a parable it would have no connection with the subsequent verses, has no meaning at all.

The Qur’ān was revealed little by little, and there is no need to search for any connection between two adjacent verses unless they are clearly in one context and obviously revealed all together.

The truth is that the verse narrates a real event.

What style, eloquence and force would be in a verse which most of the hearers believe to be a real event, while in reality it is but a parable having no factual basis at all.

Moreover, it is an invariable habit of the Qur'ān to distinguish a simile or parable from other modes of expression. For example: Their parable is like the parable of one who . . . (2:17). The likeness of this world's life is only as . . . (10:24). The similitude of those who were placed under the Torah . . . (62:5) and so on.

TRADITIONS

It is reported in al-Iḥtijāj from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said, inter alia, in a tradition: ''Allāh made alive again a people who left their homes fleeing from the plague; they were innumerable. So Allāh gave them death for a long time until their bones decayed, their limbs disintegrated and they all became dust. Then Allāh sent a prophet, named Hezekiel, at a time when He wished to show him His creation. So He called them, and their bodies re-composed and their souls returned, and they stood up in the same shape as they had died, not a single one was missing from their group. Then they lived after that for a long time.

The author says: This interpretation has been narrated by al-Kulaynī and al-'Ayyāshī in some detail, and at the end of that tradition are the words, ''and about them was revealed this verse.''

So when he had crossed it, he and those who believed with him, they said: ''We have today no power against Goliath and his forces.'' Those who thought that they would meet their Lord said: ''How often has a small party vanquished a numerous host by Allāh's permission, and Allāh is with the patient ones''* (249). And when they went out against Goliath and his forces they said: ''Our Lord, pour down upon us patience, and make out feet firm and help us against the unbelieving people'' (250). *So they routed them by Allāh's permission and Dāwūd slew Goliath, and Allāh gave him kingship and wisdom, and taught him of what He pleased. GENERAL COMMENT

All these verses were obviously revealed together. The connection between the obligation of fighting, the exhortation of a goodly loan to Allāh and the moral of the story of Ṭālūt, Dāwūd and Goliath needs no explanation. The import of the verses is to show how fighting in the way of Allāh strengthens the collective life, what the spirit is by which a nation goes forward in its worldly and religious life, and what gives it its real happiness and felicity. Allāh declares that jihād is obligatory for the Muslims, calls them to spend in His way, by contributing in preparation for war so that their military power increases and they are ready for their enemies. This spending has been called ‘‘lending to Allāh’’ because it is done in His way. Also, it very forcefully exhorts the hearers to spend in His way to gain nearness to Him. Then comes the story of Ṭālūt, Dāwūd and Goliath, so that the believers who are told to fight should take lessons from it. The moral is that the kingdom and victory belong to faith and piety, even if its adherents be small in number; and defeat and destruction is the fare of hypocrisy and sin, even if its followers be numerous. See how the Israelites lived in disgrace and servitude as long as they remained inert and idle, and were too lazy to do anyting to improve their condition. But when they stood up to fight in the way of Allāh and sought help from the word of truth, Allāh helped them to vanquish their enemy, even though only a few of them were really truthful. Look at the majority of them turning back when fighting was prescribed for them, and objecting to the appointment of Ṭālūt, and drinking from the stream, and saying that they had no strength to fight against Goliath and his armies. In spite of all these shortcomings Allāh made them victorious; they vanquished their enemy by the permission of Allāh; Dāwūd slew Goliath and kingdom was established in them. They were given a new life and their power and sovereignity came back to them. It was not but because of a word which faith and piety made them utter when they stood before Goliath and his forces: ‘‘Our Lord, pour down upon us patience and make our feet firm and help us against the unbelieving people.’’ Thus should the believers follow in the footsteps of the good people of previous nations, because they shall have the upper hand if they are believers.

QUR’ĀN: And fight in the way of Allāh: It makes fighting obligatory and compulsory. Here and everywhere in the Qur’ān, the order of fighting has the stipulation, ‘‘in the way of Allāh’’. It is to forestall any possible misunderstanding that this important religious duty was ordained to establish the worldly domination of the Muslims over other nations and to spread the kingdom of the Muslim's — as many modern Muslim scholars think. The proviso, ''in the way of Allāh'', shows that this order was given to spread the domination of religion, by which the people could prosper in both worlds.

QUR'ĀN: And know that Allāh is Hearing, Knowing: It is a warning to the believers — they should not utter a single word against any order given by Allāh and His apostle, nor should they dislike in their hearts any such order as the hypocrites do. They should not be like the Israelites when they first objected about Ṭālūt, saying, ''How can he hold kingship over us . . .'', and then said, ''We have today no power against Goliath and his forces'', and retreated and turned away when fighting was prescribed for them, and drank from the stream after Ṭālūt had forbidden them to do so.

QUR'ĀN: Who is it that will lend to Allāh a goodly loan, so that He will multiply it for him manifold: The meaning of loan is wellknown. Allāh has named what is spent in His way as a loan to Himself, to exhort people to spend, and because it is done in His way, and also because it will surely be returned to them manifold.

The style has been changed from the imperative mood of previous verse (And fight in the way of Allāh) to the interrogative here (Who is it that will lend?) to refresh and enliven the mind of the audience — an order is always received with a feeling of helplessness, but not so an invitation and exhortation.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh holds and extends and to Him you shall be returned: ''al-Qabḍ'' (القَبْضُ) is to hold a thing towards oneself. al-basṭ (البَسْطُ) is its opposite. ''al-Baṣṭ'' (البَصْطُ) is a rendering of al-basṭ — 'S' (س) of which has been changed to 'Ṣ' (ص) because it is joined to 'Ṭ' (ط) which is pronounced with a full voice, and Ṣ also has a full voice.

This sentence mentions three attributes of Allāh: He holds, He extends and to Him all are to return. It is to remind the Muslims that whatever they spend, lending it to Him shall not be in vain, nor should they be surprised at how it will be increased manifold. Because Allāh holds and extends — He decreases whatever He pleases and increases whatever He pleases; and they are to return to Him, and then He will repay them th[e] said loan a goodly repayment.

QUR'ĀN: Did you not see the chiefs of the children of Israel . . . in the way of Allāh: al Mala' (المَلَاءُ) is said to mean a group of people having the same opinion. It is derived from al-mal' (المَلَاءُ) to fill, because it fills the eyes by its greatness and prestige.

The request, ''Raise up for us a king (that) we may fight in the way of Allāh'', implies that the king, Goliath by name, had subjugated them and treated them so badly that they had lost all traces of a free life, like their homes and children. It happened after Allāh had saved them from the people of Pharaoh by raising among them Mūsā and making him their head, and after the rule of the successors of Mūsā had come to an end. Then the hardship increased to such an extent that their slumbering self-respect was awakened by the shock of it, and their elders went to a prophet of theirs asking him to raise for them a king to remove their internal differences and unite their power which had became ineffective because of disunity, so that they could fight under his command, in the way of Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: He said: ''May it not be that if fighting is ordained for you, you would not fight?'': The Israelites had asked their prophet to raise for them a king, so that they could fight under him in the way of Allāh. But it was not in the power of the prophet; it was the prerogative of Allāh. That is why the prophet attributed the appointment and the order of fighting to Allāh. But he did not mention the divine name clearly. In their reply he questioned them about their possible disobedience, and he knew by divine revelation that they would surely disobey. Therefore, he did not mention the name of Allāh clearly, but only indicated that the authority is from Him and of Him only. How did he indicate it? By using the word ''written'' (lit. transl.: ''if fighting is written on you'') ; and writing, in the meaning of ordaining, is done only by Allāh.

Although, the prophet knew that they would not obey the command of Allāh, he put this matter in the form of a question, so that the proof might be completed against them by their protests of sincerity, as their reply showed.

QUR'ĀN: They said. ''And what reason have we that we should not fight in the way of Allāh, and we have indeed been turned out of our homes and our children'': Their dispersal from their homes meant that they could not manage their affairs, as they had been sent away from their ancestral abode. Thus, ''turned out of our homes'' alludes to their inability to look after their homes and to benefit from them. It is this meaning that justifies the use of this verb, ‘‘turned out of’’ in connection with children.

QUR’ĀN: But when fighting was ordained for them, they turned back, except a few of them, and Allāh knows the unjust: It is an offshoot of their prophet’s question (May it not be that . . . you would not fight?) and their reply (And what reason have we that we should not fight?). The words, ‘‘And Allāh knows the unjust’’, show that the question of the prophet was based on divine revelation that they would surely turn away from fighting.

QUR’ĀN: And their prophet said to them: ‘‘Surely Allāh has raised Ṭālūt . . . he has not been granted an abundance of wealth?’’: The announcement, ‘‘Allāh has raised’’ was a reminder to them that they were mistaken in asking the prophet to raise a king for them so that they would fight. The prophet attributed this raising to Allāh to teach them that it was a prerogative of Allāh.

The declaration about Ṭālūt prompted them to protest. In their eyes, Ṭālūt had two defects, which made him unfit for kingship. The first ‘‘disqualification’’ was alluded to in their words narrated by Allāh: ‘‘How can he hold kingship over us while we have a greater right to kingship than he’’. They did not think it necessary to elaborate why they were more deserving; it means that it was an obvious thing. The fact is that the house of prophethood and the house of kingship were well-known among the Israelites — the two houses were highly respected because of these two graces of Allāh. And Ṭālūt was from neither. That is why they objected that they — the people of the house of kingship or both kingship and prophethood — had a greater right to kingship than Ṭālūt; Allāh had put kingship in their family, how could they accept its transfer to someone else?

This objection was a result of their belief that Allāh cannot abrogate or change any of His orders; they said: the hand of Allāh is tied up. (Their hands be shackled!) Their prophet replied to this objection when he said: ‘‘Surely Allāh has chosen him over you.’’

The second ‘‘disqualification’’ is described in their words, ‘‘and he has not been granted an abundance of wealth’’. Ṭālūt was a poor man. Their prophet replied to it by saying: ‘‘and He has increased him abundantly in knowledge and physique''.

QUR'ĀN: He said. ''Surely Allāh has chosen him over you, and He has increased him abundantly in knowledge and physique '': al-Iṣṭifā' (الاصْطِفَآءُ) and al-istiṣfā' (الاسْتِصْفَآءُ) means to choose. Its root is aṣ-ṣafw (الصَّفْوُ = clearness, choice) ; al-basṭah (البَسْطَةُ) is expansion and power. These sentences are the replies to their objections:

Objection 1: They had a greater right of kingship than Ṭālūt because they were from the chosen family.

Reply: It was a distinction given to their family by Allāh. Now that Allāh has chosen someone else, he has a greater right than they; and now his family will have precedence over theirs and he has become nobler and higher in rank than they. The superiority follows the choice of Allāh.

Objection 2: ''and he has not been granted an abundance of wealth''.

Reply: Kingship is establishment of supreme authority over a group of people. Its only purpose is to unite the people under one will and join them together by creating a relationship with all of them. Everyone shall progress on the road of perfection without colliding with one another. No one shall be given preference without justice; no one shall be kept behind without justice. In short, kingship was created so that the ruler should manage the society in such a way that every member might reach his deserved perfection. To achieve that object, the king must have two qualities: (1) Knowledge of all that is good for his people and all that is bad; (2) Physical strength to implement and enforce what he thinks is good for the people.

Allāh points this out in the words, ''and He has increased him abundantly in knowledge and physique''. So far as wealth is concerned, to count it among the necessities of kingship is foolishness.

Then He concisely put all these arguments in one sentence: ''and Allāh grants His Kingdom to whom He pleases''. The kingdom belongs to Allāh alone; nobody has any right in it, except what Allāh bestows from it on any one. Even then it really belong to Allāh only — see how the word ''kingdom'' is qualified here by possessive pronoun ''His''. When you keep this reality in view, you will know that Allāh has full authority to do in His kingdom as He pleases and as He wills. Nobody has any right to say 'why' or 'how'. One cannot ask why Allāh did this or that, because He is the Real cause; nor can one enquire how and by which means He did it, because Allāh is the Perfect cause and He does not need any supplementary causes. Therefore, the Israelites should not have asked why He transferred the kingdom from one family to another, or why He gave it to someone who had neither a big family nor abundant wealth.

It is true that Allāh bestows His bounty and grace as He wishes and upon whom He pleases. Still, it is not done at random or without reason. When we say, ''Allāh does what He wishes and gives His kingdom to whom He pleases'' we do not mean that Allāh does not have any object in view in His actions. Nor do we say that He acts haphazardly; that if there occurs any benefit from it, well and good, and if not, then what does it matter; -after all, the kingdom is His, He may do whatever He pleases. What we actually mean is this: Allāh is the final and real cause of every creation, with matter and without matter. Benefit and usefulness also, like all other things, are His creation. In view of this, Allāh, in His actions, cannot be governed by any aim and object, as we are; when He does a work (and whatever He does is good) or creates a thing (and whatever He creates is beautiful), His action is beneficial to His creatures. But He is not subservient to any benefit.

The above explanation serves to resolve the apparent contradiction in this verse: The authoritative declaration, ''Allāh grants His kingdom to whom He pleases'', seemingly cannot be reconciled with the reasons given earlier, ''He has increased him abundantly in knowledge and physique''. Had there been any discordance between His absolute power to do as He pleases, and His actions being full of benefit and reason, the two arguments could not be advanced side by side, let alone be complementary to each other.

The last sentence of the verse, ''and Allāh is Ample-giving, Knowing'', makes it even more clear. ''Ample-giving'' shows that He cannot be restricted by anyone or anything in bestowing His bounties or in any other action. ''Knowing'' shows that all His actions are done by His true knowledge which is never wrong. In other words, He does whatever He pleases, and He never does but what is beneficial.

''Wāsi' '' (وَاسِعٌ = translated here as ''Ample-giving'') is the active participle of al-wus'ah (الوُسْعَةُ) and as-sa'ah (السَّعَةُ) which is the capacity of a body to accomodate another body, like the capacity of a water-pot to hold water, that of a box for things packed in it, and that of a house to accomodate its residents. Then it was borrowed for riches: but not for every wealth and not in all conditions; it is used for riches when the possibility of spending and giving is taken into consideration. It is as though the wealth has the capacity to be spent and given. It is this meaning in which Allāh is called al-wāsi' (الوَاسِعُ), that is, the Possessor of wealth who has power to give whatever He pleases.

QUR'ĀN: And their prophet said to them: ''Surely the sign of his kingship is that there shall come to you the Ark in which there s tranquillity'': ''at-Tābūt''(التَّابُوْتُ = translated here as ''Ark'') means chest. It is on the paradigm of fa'lūt (فَعْلُوتُ) from at-tawb (التَّوْبُ = to return).A chest is given this name because man returns to it every now and then.

MEANING OF ''AS-SAKĪNAH''

''as-Sakīnah'' (السَّكِيْنَةُ = tranquillity) is derived from as-sukūn (السُّكُوْنُ) which is opposite of movement. as-sakīnah is used for tranquillity of the heart. When a man is of stable mind and is not perturbed in taking a firm decision, he is said to have as-sakīnah. It is a virtue of a wise man who has a strong will. Allāh has made it a characteristic of al-īmān (الايْمَانُ = faith) in its higher degree, and has counted it as one of His most valuable gifts.

Man, according to his nature, bases his action on reasoning. He arranges logical premises, analyses the benefits of a particular action, and sees how it will effect the bliss of his life and bring the good of the society as a whole. Then he decides what to do and what not to do.

When man goes forward on the path of nature in the process of his reasoning, and his only aim is to gain real benefit and happiness in life, then his thinking is accompanied by peace of mind and tranquillity of heart without any nervousness and perturbation. On the other hand, if he clings in his life to the world and follows his low desires, he becomes confused, and his thought and will-power are distorted by his unhealthy vision. As a result, he goes astray from the path of truth; or remains undecided, confused and irresolute in his decisions and cannot perform any difficult and dangerous task which requires strong will-power and firm feet.

A believing man, because of his belief in Allāh, relies on a firm support and an unshaking pillar of strength. He bases his life on true knowledge where doubt and confusion cannot intrude; sets forth in his actions in the light of divine commandments which he is sure are the most perfect guide. He knows that his affairs are not in his own hands; he is, therefore, not afraid of any possible loss; and if any harm comes to him, he is not sorry about it. He is not puzzled when he has to distinguish good from evil.

But a disbeliever has no guardian to look after his affairs. His good and evil are in his own hands. He wanders in the darkness of confusion, undecidedness and uncertainty, because his thoughts are permeated by low desires, spectres of unreality, and unhealthy feelings.

Allāh says :

. . .and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers (3:68). That is because Allāh is the Guardian of those who believe, and because the unbelievers have no guardian for them (47:11).

Allāh is the Guardian of those who believe; He brings them out of darkness into the light; and (as to) those who disbelieve, their guardians are the Satans who take them out of the light into the darkness (2:257).

Surely We have made the Satans to be the guardians of those who do not believe (7:27).

It is only the Satan that frightens his friends. . . (3:175). The Satan threatens you with poverty and enjoins you to be niggardly, and Allāh promises you forgiveness from Himself and abundance . . . (2:268).

. . . and whoever takes the Satan for a guardian rather than Allāh, he indeed shall suffer a manifest lost. He gives them promises and excites vain desires in them; and the Satan does not promise them aught but (in) deception . . . (it is) a promise of Allāh, true (indeed); and who is truer of word than Allāh? (4:119 — 122).

Now surely the friends of Allāh — they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve (10:62).

These verses, as you see, put all fear, grief, perturbation and deception on the side of disbelief; and the opposite virtues on the side of faith.

Even more clear is the verse:

Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth? (6:122). It shows that the disbeliever gropes about awkwardly in his journey of life because he has fallen in utter darkness and cannot see any thing. But the believer has a divine light by which he sees his path and knows what is good for him and what is bad. It is because Allāh has bestowed upon him a fresh and new life in addition to this material life which he shares with the disbelievers. That new life accompanies this light which illuminates its path. Allāh says: O you who believe! Fear Allāh and believe in His Apostle: He will give you two portions of His mercy, and make for you a light with which you will walk, and forgive you . . . (57:28).

Again He says: You shall not find a people who believe in Allāh and the latter day befriending those who act in opposition to Allāh and His Apostle, even though they were their (own) fathers, or their sons, or their brothers, or their kinsfolk; these are they into whose hearts He has written (impressed) faith, and whom He has strengthened with a spirit from Him (58:22).

It shows that this new life is from a spirit from Allāh, and is accompanied by a firm faith deeply impressed into their hearts. These believers are strengthened by a spirit from Allāh, which confirms the faith into their hearts, gives a new life to their bodies and creates a brilliant light to lead them forward.

It is easy to see that the import of this verse is similar to that of verse 4 of chap. 48: He it is who sent down tranquillity into the hearts of the believers that they might have more of faith added to their faith — and Allāh's are the hosts of the heavens and the earth, and Allāh is Knowing, Wise.

''Tranquillity'' in this verse corresponds with the ''spirit'' in the previous one; and ''having more of faith added to their faith'' of this one corresponds with ''impressing the faith into their hearts'' of the previous one. This conformity becomes more obvious when we look at the sentence, ‘‘and Allāh’s are the hosts of the heavens and the earth’’, because the Qur’ān often uses the term ‘‘hosts’’for the angels and the spirit.

Similar in the meaning are the verses: . . . then Allāh sent down His tranquillity on His Apostle and on the believers, and made them keep the word of guarding (against evil), and they were entitled to it and worthy of it (48:26); and So Allāh sent down His tranquillity upon him and strengthened him with hosts which you did not see . . . (9:40).

From the above discussion; it may be inferred that as-sakīnah is a divine spirit, or accompanies a divine spirit, by divine command; it creates tranquillity in heart, firmness of purpose and peace of mind. This does not involve us in far-fetched interpretations which would remove the word from its real meaning. And the traditions on this subject should be interpreted in this light.

QUR’ĀN: And residue of the relics of what the family of Mūsā and the family of Hārūn have left, the angels bearing it . . . ‘‘al-Āl’’ (الأَلُ) of a man means those of his family who are most closely related to him; and, when used without any condition, it includes also the man himself. Therefore, the phrase here means Mūsā, Hārūn and their most closely related family-members. ‘‘The angels bearing it’’ shows the state of the Ark. The words of Allāh, ‘‘most surely there is a sign in this for those who believe’’, like the words at the beginning of the verse, prove that they had asked their prophet for a proof of the truth of what he had told them, ‘‘Surely Allāh has raised Ṭālūt to be a king over you.’’

QUR’ĀN: So when Ṭālūt departed with the forces . . . they drank from it: ‘‘al-Faṣl’’ (الفَصْلُ) here means to depart from a place: the same is the meaning of the word in 12:94, ‘‘And when the caravan had departed.’’ Sometimes it means ‘‘to cut’’, that is, to separate two things, as Allāh says: And He is the best of separaters (between truth and falsehood) (6:57). Thus, the verb is used sometimes transitively and at other times intransitively.

The word ‘‘al-jund’’ (الجُنْدُ) signifies a dense concentration of something. The army is called al-jund, because people are densely concentrated in it. In this verse, the word is used in plural, and it shows that their number was very great — and this was after the people had ‘‘turned back except a few of them’’ (2:246).

The whole talk is a comment on the condition of the Israelites and how they ‘‘fulfilled’’ the covenant made with Allāh. All together they pleaded that a king be raised for them, and made a very strong covenant to fight under him; and they were so numerous that when they all turned back except a few of them, those few were ‘‘forces’’; and those forces also were of no avail because they drank from the stream; thus, what was left, was a residue of the residue, and among them were also those who had taken a handful of water, and as a result were overcome by cowardice and hypocrisy. And then Allāh declares how a handful of believers, who were forbearing in the way of Allāh, were given victory over the huge armies of Goliath.

The position of the exceptional clause in this verse requires special attention: Allāh will try you with a stream; whoever then drinks from it, he is not of me, and whoever does not taste of it, he is surely of me, except he who takes with his hand as much (of it) as fills the hand. It would appear at the first glance that the words, ‘‘except he who takes with his hand . . .’’ should have come after the sentence, ‘‘whoever then drinks from it, he is not of me’’. But the fact is that this is not related at all with those who would drink from the stream. The Qur’ān mentions that those who would drink were not from Ṭālūt, and that is that. Then it changes the word ‘‘drink’’ to ‘‘taste’’ and says, ‘‘and whoever does not taste of it, he is surely of me’’. Only then comes the exceptional clause. Had this clause been put after the first sentence, ‘‘whoever then drinks from it, he is not of me’’, it would have signified that he who took only a handful of water was of Ṭālūt. This in its turn would have meant that the whole army from the beginning was of Ṭālūt, and then those who drank from the stream were cut off from him. But the present sequence, in which two categories have been mentioned — one of those who would drink and the other of those who would not drink — shows that the real position of the soldiers of the army was at that time undecided and unknown. It was only after the test of the stream that the reality was to be known. Those who would drink from it would be known to be not of Ṭālūt; and those who would not even taste of it would be known to be of Ṭālūt. After these two separate sentences comes the exceptional clause, which removes those who would take a handful of water from the first group — but it does not put them in the second one. If there were only the first sentence, the exceptional clause would have given the meaning that by taking a handful of water one would not be cut off from Ṭālūt, that is, would remain of him. But now that two separate categories have expressly been mentioned, removal from one group does not automatically mean inclusion in the other. In short, the position of the exceptional clause shows the existence of three groups: those who were not of Ṭālūt, those who were of him, and the takers of handful of water. After crossing the stream, two later groups remained with Ṭālūt. That is why there appeared so much difference in their states; one group was forbearing, the other was restless; one had full confidence in Allāh, the other was perturbed and troubled.

QUR'ĀN: So when he had crossed it . . . Allāh is with the patient ones.

''al-Fi'ah'' (الفِئَةُ) means a group of people. A glance at the verses is sufficient to show that those who said, ''We have today no power against Goliath and his forces'', were those who had taken a handful of water; and those who replied them were those who had not tasted of it. ''Those who thought that they would meet their Lord'': The ''thought'' here means ''certainty'', that is, ''those who were sure . . .''. Also, it may be an allegorical style to show that in their humility they did not believe themselves worthy of meeting their Lord. They did not say, ''It is possible for a small party to vanquish a numerous host.'' Instead they said, ''How often has a small party vanquished . . .''. Thus they put forward a fact as their argument (instead of a theoretical possibility) to make the reply more convincing.

QUR'ĀN: And when they went out . . . against the unbelieving people:

''al-Burūz'' (البُرُوْزُ) is to appear. From it is derived ''al-barāz'' (البَرَازُ) which means to appear or set forth for battle. ''al-Ifrāgh'' (الافرَاغُ) means to pour a liquid material in a mould. In this invocation, they beg Allāh to pour down upon them patience according to their capacity. It is a very fine allegory. ''Make our feet firm'' is another allegorical expression which signifies determination, steadiness and firmness in front of the enemy, so that they do not flee from him.

QUR'ĀN: So they put them to flight . . . taught him of what He pleased: ''al-Hazm'' (الهَزْمُ) means to repel, to drive back.

QUR'ĀN: And were it not for Allāh's repelling some men with others, the earth would certainly be in a state of disorder; but Allāh is Gracious to the creatures. It is obvious that the disorder of the earth means the disorder among those who are on the earth, that is, the disorder in human society. If society's disorder brings in its wake disorder on the earth's surface, it would also have to be included in the meaning of this verse, not because of itself but because of its being a result of society's disorder.

This verse hints at a philosophical reality, which is as follows:

The felicity and good of the human species is incomplete if there is no society and no mutual assistance. This factor depends on unity, to a certain degree, in society, so that various individuals may join together to form a single group. The group together becomes a single unit; metaphorically speaking, it becomes as though it has a single body and a single soul. It acts and reacts like a single individual. Social unity, and the place in which it occurs, that is, the assembly of human individuals, is just like unity in creation, and the place in which it occurs, that is, the universe. We know that unity in this system of creation results from the action and reaction occuring in the components of the universe. The various creative causes struggle with each other, repel, or are repelled by opposing forces, and it is as a result of this constant action and reaction that various parts of this system remain connected with each other. Otherwise, the universe would have ceased to exist.

Likewise, the system of human society is based on action and reaction, on repulsion and overpowering; otherwise the various members of society could not remain bound with each other, and society would have ceased to exist; in short the felicity of the species would have vanished. If we suppose that there is no repelling each other, in this meaning, (i.e., overpowering others and making them obey the victor's will), every individual member will do what he thinks fit, even if it goes against the interest of the other members (whether those interests are lawful is not our concern at this juncture); and those other members will have no means to prevent him from that course of action. Thus the unity of the members will cease to exist and society will be finished. We have described this subject fully under verse 2:213; where it was explained that the basic factor upon which society is founded is the human instinct of subjugating others for one's own benefit; and mutual assistance and civilization is a side product of this instinct, it is a secondary cause.

This repulsion and overpowering is an overwhelming factor in human society. Man tries to make others do what he wants, and to repel them from what he does not like. It is seen in war as well as in peace, in comfort as well as in discomfort, in ease as well as in hardship. Man does it instinctively; he becomes conscious of it only when someone opposes his will, and then he begins the process of the said repulsion as he thinks necessary. That repulsion has degrees of strength and weakness. War is one of those degrees.

This natural instinct is seen in action when a believer repulses his oppressor in defence of his lawful rights; and it is also seen when someone uses it to protect his unlawful gains. Nature bestows its bounties on the believers and the unbelievers alike. It is not that a believer has a nature separate from that of the unbeliever. If this trait of repelling and overpowering were not present in human nature, no body would have defended anything, whether it be a lawful right or an unlawful gain.

It is this natural trait from which man gains so many benefits — first, society is founded on it, then he makes others follow his own will, and through it he keeps what he has gained, lawfully or otherwise; and it is through it that he tries to get back what has been taken from him unjustly; and lastly it is through this trait that he makes the truth live after it has died, and tries to keep society on the path of eternal bliss. In short, it is a natural factor from which man derives many more benefits than harm.

''Perhaps'' it is these things which are referred to in this sentence: *And were it not for Allāh's repelling some men with others, the earth would certainly be in a state of disorder.*The next sentence supports this interpretation: And Allāh is Gracious to the creatures.

There are some interpretations which are not so appropriate:

Some commentators have said: The repulsion mentioned here means the repelling of the unbelievers by the believers, as the context shows. Also, another verse may be quoted in its support: And had there not been Allāh's repelling some people by others, certainly there would have been pulled down cloisters and churches and synagogues and mosques in which Allāh's name is much remembered (22:40).

Comment: The meaning in itself is correct as far as it goes; but it is not the whole meaning. What the verse means by the good of the earth, is a comprehensive and continuous good which keeps society alive; not any particular good which appears for a short time and then disappears, like in the story of Ṭālūt and in some other events.

Others have said: This verse refers to the fact that Allāh saves the sinner from perdition and destruction, because of the righteous one. Many traditions from both Sunnī and Shī'ite chains of narrators mention this fact: A tradition of jābir is recorded in Majma'u 'l-bayān and ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, that he said: ''The Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Verily Allāh, because of the good of a Muslim man, makes good his child and the child of his child, and the people of his house, and of the houses around it; and they remain in the protection of Allāh so long as he remains in them.' ''

Another tradition, in al-Kāfī and at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī, quotes aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) as saying: ''Verily Allāh, repels (the misfortune) from that of our Shī'ahs who does not pray, because of the one who prays, and if they all unite on neglecting the prayer, all of them would perish. And verily, Allāh repels from that of our Shī'ahs who does not pay zakāt, because of the one who pays it, and if they all unite on its non-payment, all would perish. And verily, Allāh repels from that of our Shī'ahs who does not perform hail, because of the one who performs it, and if they all unite on neglecting the ḥajj, all would perish.''

Comment: The two verses mentioned earlier obviously do not fit the meaning of these two traditions; although it may be said that these traditions give examples as to how Allāh repels some people by some others.

Someone has said: The verse means that Allāh repels the oppressors with other oppressors.

Comment: Its absurdity is to obvious.

QUR'ĀN: These are the signs . . . you are (one) of the apostles: This verse is a sort of epilogue to conclude the story. Also the last sentence, ''and most surely you are (one) of the apostles'', creates a clear connection with the next verse.

TRADITIONS

'Abdu'r-Razzāq and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from Zayd ibn Aslam that he said: ''When the verse was revealed: Who is it that will lend to Allāh a goodly loan, so He will multiply it . . . , Abu 'd-Daḥdāḥ came to the Prophet and said: 'O Prophet of Allāh! Do I not see our Lord asking a loan from us from the same which He has given us for ourselves?! And verily I have two plots of lands, one in the higher region, and the other in the lower one; and verily I dedicate the better one as ṣadaqah (alms).' And the Prophet used to say: 'How many pampered clusters of dates Abu 'd-Daḥdāḥ has got in the Garden!' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This tradition has been narrated through numerous chains.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''When the verse was revealed: Whoever brings good deed, he shall have better than it (27:89), the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'O Allāh! Increase for me.' So, Allāh sent down the verse: Whoever brings a good deed, he shall have ten like it (6:160). The Messenger of Allāh (again) said: 'O Allāh! Increase for me.' Then Allāh revealed, Who is it that will lend to Allāh a goodly loan, so He will multiply it for him manifold. Thereupon, the Messenger of Allāh knew that ''many'' from Allāh cannot be counted and has no limit. (al-Ma'ānī)

The author says: aṭ-ṬabarsĪ in Majma'u 'l-bayān and al-'Ayyāshī in his at-Tafsīr have narrated a similar tradition. And a tradition nearly like it has been narrated from Sunnī chains also.

The words of the Imām, ''Thereupon, the Messenger of Allāh knew'' : The end of the verse hints at it, ''and Allāh holds and extends'', because no limit can be put on the bounty of Allāh; He has said: And the bounty of your Lord is not confined (17:20).

A tradition of Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) recorded in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī says that this verse is about the gift for the Imām.

The author says: A similar tradition is narrated from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) in al-Kāfī; it gives an example of a general rule.

Majma'u 'l-bayān says about the words of Allāh, ''when they said to a prophet of theirs'' that the prophet was Ushmu'īl who is Ismā'īl in Arabic.

The author says: Sunnī traditions also confirm it. And Ushmu'īl is Samuel of the Bible.

al-Qummī narrated from his father from an-Naḍr ibn Suwayd from Yaḥyā al-Ḥalabī from Ḥarūn ibn Khārijah from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) saying: ''Verily, the Israelites, after the death of Mūsā, indulged in sins, and changed the religion of God, and acted arrogantly against the commandments of God; and there was a prophet among them, who ordered them (to do good) and forbade them (evil), but they did not obey him. (And it is narrated that he was the prophet, Armiah [1] — may the peace of Allāh be upon our prophet and him!) Thereupon, Allāh gave Goliath mastery over them; and he was a Coptic.[2] He humiliated them, and killed their men, and turned them out of their homes and their properties, and kept their women as slave-girls. Therefore, they resorted to their prophet and said: 'Ask Allāh to raise up for us a king, so that we may fight in the way of Allāh.' And there was the prophethood in one house of the children of Israel and kingship and rulership in another house. And Allāh had not kept the prophethood and kingship in one house; that is why they asked their prophet to 'raise for us a king, so that we may fight in the way of Allāh.' Thereupon their prophet said to them: 'May it not be that if fighting is ordained for you, you would not fight?' They said: 'And what reasons have we that we should not fight in the way of Allāh, and we have indeed been turned out of our homes and our children.' And it happened as Allāh said: But when fighting was ordained for them, they turned back, except a few of them; and Allāh knows the unjust. And their prophet said to them: 'Surely Allāh has raised Talut to be a king over you.' Then they were enraged by this (appointment), and said: 'How can he hold kingship over us, while we have a greater right to kingship then he and he has not been granted an abundance of wealth?' And the prophethood was in the house of Lāwi[3], and the kingship in the house of Yūsuf; and Ṭālūt was from the house of Binyāmīn[1] , the full brother of Yūsuf, and was, thus, from neither the house of prophethood nor from that of kingship. Then their prophet said to them: 'Surely, Allāh has chosen him over you, and He has increased him abundantly in knowledge and physique, and Allāh grants His Kingdom to whom He pleases, and Allāh is Ample-giving, Knowing.' And Ṭālūt was the greatest of them in physique, the most powerful and knowledgeable of them all, but he was a poor man. So, they vilified him because of his poverty, and said that he had not been given an abundance of wealth. Thereupon, their prophet said to them: 'Surely the sign of his kingship is that there shall come to you the Ark in which there is tranquillity from your Lord and residue of the relics of what the family of Mūsā and the family of Hārūn have left, the angels bearing it.' And it was the chest which was sent by Allāh and Mūsā's mother put him in it and threw it in the river; and it was among the Israelites and they sought blessings through it. When Mūsā was about to die, he put inside it in the tablets, and his coat of mail and whatever signs of prophethood he had, and gave it in trust to his successor, Yūsha'.[2] And the Ark remained in them until they made slight of it, and the children played with it in the streets. Thus, the Israelites remained with honour and dignity as long as the Ark was with them, but when they committed sins and profaned the Ark, Allāh took it away from them. When they asked their prophet, Allāh raised Ṭālūt as king over them, and he let them in the fight then Allāh returned the Ark to them, as he said: 'Surely the sign of his kingship is that there shall come to you the Ark in which their is tranquillity from your Lord and residue of the relics of what the family of Mūsā and the family of Hārūn have left, the angels bearing it.' '' And he (Abū Ja'far) said: ''The residue is the children of the prophets.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: The sentence, ''And it is narrated that he was the prophet, Armiah'' is another tradition, parenthetically inserted in this trandition.[3]

1 Benjamin, in the Bible.

2 Joshua, in the Bible.

3 As mentioned in a previous tradition, the prophet was Samuel, and not

‘‘And it happened as Allāh said’’: It means that a majority of them turned back and only a small minority of them obeyed the order to fight. And some traditions say that this minority was sixty thousand souls. It has been narrated by al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr (al-Qummī narrated from his father from al-Ḥusayn ibn Khālid from ar-Riḍā, a.s.) and by al-‘Ayyāshī in his at-Tafsīr from al-Bāqir (a.s.).

‘‘And the prophethood was in the house of Lāwī and the kingship in the house of Yūsuf.’’ Some people say that the kingship was in the house of Yahūdhā.[1] But there is an objection on it: There was no king among the Israelites before Ṭālūt, Dāwūd and Sulaymān. So how can it be said that ‘‘before Ṭālūt’’ kingship was in the house of Judah? This objection is strengthened by the traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt that the kingship was in the house of Yusuf, because the kingship of Yūsuf is accepted by all.

‘‘The residue is the children of the Prophets’’: This sentence is a conjecture of the narrator. The Imām explained the words, ‘‘the family of Mūsā and the family of Hārūn’’ with the words, ‘‘the children of the prophets’’; and the narrator fancied that it was the explanation of the word, ‘‘residue’’. And this view is supported by the tradition recorded in the at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked about the words of Allāh, ‘‘and residue of the relics of what the family of Mūsā and the family of Hārūn have left, the angels bearing it’’, and he replied: ‘‘The children of the prophets.’’

Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyā narrated from Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad from Muḥammad ibn Khālid and al-Ḥusayn ibn Sa‘īd from an-Naṣr ibn Suwayd from Yaḥyā al-Ḥalabī from Ḥarūn ibn Khārijah from Abū Baṣīr from Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) saying in a tradition, inter alia: ‘‘And Allāh reports the words of Ṭālūt: ‘Surely Allāh will try you with a stream; whoever then drinks from it, he is not of me, and whoever does not taste of it, he is surely of me.’ But all of them drank from it, except three hundred and thirteen men, among them were those who took a handful of water as well as those who did not drink at all. When they went out against Goliath, those who had taken handful of water said, 'We have today no power against Goliath and his forces'; and those who had not taken it said, 'How often has a small party vanquished a numerous host by Allāh's permission, and Allāh is with the patient ones.' '' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: That there remained with Ṭālūt only three hundred and thirteen men (equal in number to the Muslim ''army'' in the battle of Badr) is mentioned in numerous traditions from Shī'ah and Sunnī chains. The details that those who said: ''We have today no power . . .'' were those who had taken a handful of water, and those who said, ''How often a small party . . .'' were those who had not tasted it at all, may be inferred from the position of the exceptional clause in the verse, as we have already explained.

al-Kulaynī narrated through his chains from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad from al-Ḥusayn ibn Sa'īd from Faḍālah ibn Ayyūb from Yaḥyā al-Ḥalabī from 'Abdullāh ibn Sulaymān from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) who said about the words of Allāh, surely the sign of his kingdom . . . the angels bearing it: ''They bore it in the shape of a cow.'' (al-Kāfī)

It will have been noted that we have quoted the complete chain of narrators of this tradition, although generally we do not do so in this book. We omit the chains where the traditions are in conformity with the Qur'ān, because then there is no need to mention the chains of narrators. But where the tradition mentions a thing which is not in the Qur'ān, and which cannot be inferred from it, then it is necessary to quote the complete chain. Still, we write in this book only those traditions which are correct according to the chains of the narrators, or are supported by the context or other associations.

al-'Ayyāshī writes in his at-Tafsīr a tradition from Muḥammad al-Ḥalabī that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''Dāwūd had four brothers; and their father was an old-aged man; and Dāwūd had remained behind to look after the sheep of his father. Ṭālūt departed with his forces. Dāwūd's father called him (and he was the youngest) and said: 'O my son! Take to your brothers this (food) which we have prepared for them, so that they may get strength to overcome their enemy.' And he (Dāwūd) was short of stature, dark, with very little hair, but pure of heart. So, he went away, and (by that time) the two forces had reached near to each other.''

At this juncture, another tradition of Abū Baṣīr says that he heard the Imām saying: ‘‘Then Dāwūd passed by a stone, and it said: ‘O Dāwūd! Take me and kill Goliath with me, because, verily, I have been created to kill him.’ So he took it and put it in his bag in which he kept the stones for his sling which he used in the herding of his sheep. On entering the army camp, he heard them greatly magnifying the affair of Goliath. So he said to them: ‘Why are you so overwhelmed by his affair? By Allāh! If I see him I will kill him.’ Thereupon, they started talking with each other about it till he was brought before Ṭālūt. Ṭālūt asked him: ‘O young man! How much strength do you have? And what experience have you of yourself?’ Dāwūd said: ‘It happens that if a lion attacks a goat of my herd and catches it; then I overtake him, catch his head, open his jaws and rescue the goat from his mouth.’ (Hearing this) Ṭālūt said: ‘Bring me a full-size coat of mail.’ It was brought unto him and he put it in Dāwūd’s neck, and lo! His body filled it completely. Thereupon, Ṭālūt and those Israelites who were present there were awe-struck by him; and Ṭālūt said: ‘By Allāh! Most probably Allāh will kill him (Goliath) by him.’

‘‘When the morning came and people gathered around Ṭālūt, and the people (of the two forces) stood against each other, Dāwūd said: ‘Show me Goliath.’ When he saw him, he took the stone, and putting it in his sling, threw it towards him, and it hit him between his eyes, reaching to his brain; and (Goliath) fell down from his stead; and people cried: ‘Dāwūd has killed Goliath.’ Then the people made him their king until nobody was heard talking about Ṭālūt. And the Israelites gathered around Dāwūd; and Allāh sent down Zabūr to him, and taught him the handicraft of iron, making it soft for him; and ordered the mountains and the birds to join him in glorifying God.’’ The Imām said: ‘‘And nobody was given a voice like him. Thereupon Dāwūd lived among the Israelites, hidden from them; and he was given strength to worship (God).’’

The author says: The Shī‘ah and Sunnī traditions unanimously say that Dāwūd killed Goliath by a sling.

‘Alī (a.s.) said: ‘‘The tranquillity which was in the Ark, was a pleasant breeze from the Garden; it had a face like that of a human being.’’ (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

The author says: This meaning has been narrated in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr — from Sufyān ibn ‘Uyaynah and Ibn Jarīr, through the chain of Salmān ibn Kuhayl from ‘Alī (a.s.); — and from ‘Abdu ’r-Razzāq and Abū ‘Ubayd and ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibn Jarīr and Ibn al-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Ḥākim (and he has said that the tradition is ‘‘correct’’), and Ibn ‘Asākir and al-Bayhaqī (in his ad-Dalā’il), through the chain of Abū al-Aḥwaṣ from ‘Alī (a.s.).

al-Qummī narrated from his father from ‘Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn ibn Khālid from ar-Riḍā (a.s.) saying: ‘‘The tranquillity is a breeze from the Garden, it has a face like that of a human being.’’ (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: The same meaning has been narrated by aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) in Ma‘ānī ’l-akhbār and by al-‘Ayyāshī in his at-Tafsīr from ar-Riḍā (a.s.).

These traditions explaining the meaning of as-sakīnah (tranquillity) are not mutawātir; yet, if they are accepted as correct, they may be interpreted in the following way, so as to fit the meaning of the verse of the Qur’ān:

‘‘The tranquillity has a face like that of a human being.’’ It means that it is one of the stages of spiritual perfection. At that stage, the soul remains tranquil and at peace with the commands and decrees of Allāh. Such expressions, explaining a reality in an allegorical way, are found in many traditions of the Imāms’. According to this interpretation, tranquillity would mean the spirit of faith, and that is the meaning we have given to it earlier. And it is in this light that the following tradition of Abu ’l-Ḥasan (a.s.), mentioned in Ma‘ānī ’l-akhbār, should be seen and interpreted: ‘‘(Tranquillity) is the spirit of God, which speaks; when they differed among themselves on any matter, it spoke up and informed them (of truth). . .’’ Obviously, it means that it is the spirit of faith and it guides the believer to the truth about which the people differ.

A PHILOSOPHICAL AND SOCIAL DISCUSSION ABOUT THE STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE AND THE SURVIVAL OF FITTEST

According to scientists, scientific experiments show that existing things struggle with each other for their existence, because it is ingrained in their nature to protect themselves from extinction, and to make use of their powers in the purpose for which they are created. This struggle is carried on through mutual action and reaction — each influences the others, and is in its turn influenced by others. In the end, the more powerful and more perfect being vanquishes the weaker and the less perfect one. It means that nature goes on selecting, among individuals of a species, the fittest and the most perfect, and it alone is allowed to continue and propagate the species and all others gradually become extinct. Thus we get two laws of nature: the struggle for existence, and natural selection and survival of the fittest.

As the society is based on the demands of nature, the abovementioned two laws are found in civilization also.

The best society is the one which is based on the foundation of a complete and firm unity; in which the rights of the individuals and groups, and of society in general, are well-balanced and well-preserved. Such a society has more right to survive; and others lacking in these qualities deserve to perish and vanish. Experience has shown that only those nations do survive which look well after their collective duties, and proceed, fully alert, on the road of collective bliss and felicity. On the other hand, when disunity creeps into a nation, hearts become disunited, differences crop up, tyranny and mischief poison the atmosphere, the lords of the land indulge in luxuries and the will to strive for a cause is weakened in them, and, as a result, the nation or group is obliterated from the face of the earth.

Archaeologists have unearthed fossils, bones and skeletons of many animals which have become extinct, like the brontosaurus; or from whose species only a few examples have survived like alligators and toads. The only factors which led to their extinction were the laws of the struggle for existence, natural selection and survival of the fittest. Likewise, the species which are found today are constantly changing because of the said struggle and survival; and only the fittest and strongest deserves to survive. Then those strong and good traits are transmitted to the next generations, and thus the species continues to develop and flourish.

According to them, that is also how evolution initially began. Matter was scattered in space, and when it joined together, the stars, the planets and the species living therein came into being. Then what was fit for survival survived and existence passed on from generation to generation; and what was unable to withstand the struggle of stronger beings was destroyed.

This, in short, is the theory of the scientists.

Later scientists have had their own objections against this theory. There are even today many weaker species, both in animals and in vegetables, that go on flourishing. For example, man has domesticated and developed many species of vegetables and animals, these varieties are definitely fitter and stronger than their natural counterparts. Yet the natural varieties go on reproducing and transmitting their weak traits to the next generations. This phenomenon shows that the supposedly basic natural laws of struggle for existence, natural selection and survival of the fittest are not comprehensive.

This difficulty led later scientistists to invent a new theory and that is adaptation to the environment. ‘‘Environment’’ covers all the surrounding conditions of time and space and factors which influence the state of a thing. The nature of thing adjusts itself to the surrounding influences. That is why every living thing, be it in the water or on dry land, in polar regions or in the equatorial zone, has limbs and faculties which are suited to that particular environment. If a life adjusts itself to the influences of its environment, it continues; otherwise, it is finished. The previously mentioned two laws — the struggle for existence, and. natural selection and survival of the fittest — should be based on this basic law of adaptation to the environment; and where this latter law is isolated, the former two laws, even if their conditions are fulfilled, cannot save a species.

The difficulty is that even this law is not comprehensive, as scientists themselves admit.

The fact, as admitted by science, is that these laws are correct to a certain extent, but they are not comprehensive and all-inclusive.

A comprehensive philosophical interpretation can be offered in the following way:

All that happens in this material world, whether it is the existence of a thing or the changes and alterations occurring in it, revolve around the law of cause and effect. Every material being tries to influence other things to make it agreeable to itself. The net result of this action is that every active agent takes some thing from the object of its action to add to its own perfection. Thus every thing is constantly engaged in preserving its existence. To this extent, it may be accepted that there is a struggle for existence and survival in this world.

A strong active agent either changes a weaker object to suit its own needs or destroys it completely for the same purpose. Had that weaker object been stronger, it could have faced the opposite forces and preserved itself from the forced changes and destruction. To this extent, it may be accepted that there is a law of natural selection and survival of the fittest in this world.

When many causative factors gather around an object, and all, or most, of them combine to create an effect on the said object, it cannot escape from their combined force, and has to adjust itself accordingly. To this extent, the law of adaptation to the environment must be accepted.

But it must be remembered that these laws effect (in the thing which is capable of being effected) only that object's accidental properties and supplementary factors. It cannot change the thing per se into another thing.

Materialists do not believe that there are separate genera and species, completely different from eath other. They think all things are basically the same — one matter, and that the different shapes are the result of different accidental properties; and it is only by these accidental or supplementary factors that species differ from each other. Otherwise, there is no basic difference between them. Every thing, after disintegration, returns to the same state — matter. It is because of this view, that they said that a species changes into another through the above-mentioned laws. We shall discuss this view, God willing, in an appropriate place.

To come back to our original topic:

A commentator of the Qur'ān has said that the verse: And were it not for Allāh's repelling some men with others, the earth would certainly be in a state of disorder; but Allāh is Gracious to the creatures, points to the laws of the struggle for existence and natural selection. According to him other two verses also point to the same laws: Permission (to fight) is given to those upon whom war is made, for they have been oppressed, and most surely Allāh is well able to assist them. Those who have been expelled from their homes without a just cause except that they say, Our Lord is Allāh. And had there not been Allāh's repelling some people by others, certainly there would have been pulled down cloisters and churches and synagogues and mosques in which Allāh's name is much remembered; and surely Allāh will help him who helps Him (i.e. His cause) ; most surely Allāh is Strong, Mighty. Those who, should We establish them in the land, will keep up prayer and pay the zakāt and enjoin good and forbid evil; and Allāh's is the end of the affairs (22:39 — 41).

According to him, this verse points to the struggle for existence and for the defence of the truth; and that this struggle leads to the survival of the fittest and preservation of the beat.

The second verse, which he put for his argument, is verse 17 of chap. 13: He sends down water from the heavens, then the valleys flow according to their measure, and the torrent bears along the swelling foam, and from what they melt in the fire for the sake of (making) ornaments or apparatus arises a foam like it; thus does Allāh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it remains in the earth; thus does Allāh set forth parables. According to the said commentator, this verse signifies that the torrents of the happenings and the scale of the struggle throws away and nullifies the scum of falsehood which might have harmed society, and the pure gold of truth, beneficial for society, remains. It clearly shows the law of the survival of the fittest in action.

The author says: The laws of the struggle for existence and natural selection (in the meanings mentioned earlier) are correct to a certain extent, and also it is agreed that the Qur'ān supports them in the said meaning. But the two types of verses quoted by the said commentator have nothing to do with these two laws.

The first type of verse was revealed to show that Allāh's will cannot be defeated; and that the truth, that is, religious beliefs and knowledge as confirmed by Allāh, shall always prevail; and likewise, the standard-bearer of that truth shall always vanquish falsehood. To see the purpose of the verse, look again at the phrases, ''for they have been oppressed, and most surely Allāh is well able to assist them'' and ''Those who have been expelled from their homes without a just cause except that they say, Our Lord is Allāh''. The purpose of those clauses is to make it clear that the believers shall be victorious; but not because of the struggle for existence and the survival of the fittest. We should not forget that the strongest and the fittest, in the language of these laws, means the one who is the strongest and fittest in the physical and material sense; it does not mean strong in truthfulness or fittest in the spiritual sense. According to these two laws whoever is better equipped with military hardware and more trained and better disciplined, will vanquish the weaker party — it makes no difference which party is in the right and which in the wrong. But these verses tell us that the believers shall be victorious because they have long been oppressed for speaking the truth, and Allāh is truth and He shall help the truth to prevail; falsehood shall not be able to withstand the proof of truth; Allāh Himself shall assist the bearer of truth if he is sincere in his heart. The next words show this aspect clearly: ‘‘and surely Allāh will help him who helps Him; most surely Allāh is Strong, Mighty. Those who, should We establish them in the land, will keep up prayer . . .’’ It shows that their confession of truth is based on sincerity. Then Allāh ends the verse on the words, ‘‘and Allāh’s is the end of the affairs.’’ This sentence reminds one of many Qur’ānic sentences which prove that creation is relentlessly progressing on the path of perfection towards truth and real felicity and bliss. Doubtlessly, the Qur’ān proves that victory is for Allāh and His forces only: Allāh has written down, I will most certainly prevail, I and My apostles (58:21), And certainly Our word has already gone forth in respect of Our servants, the apostles, Most surely they shall be the assisted ones, and most surely Our host alone shall be the victorious ones (37:171 — 173) and: and Allāh is predominant over His affair (12:21).

In all these verses, victory has been reserved for the people of sincere faith and true belief, irrespective of their physical or material strength, while the laws of struggle and survival are based on physical and material strength and fitness.

Likewise, the second verse, quoted by the said commentator, which describes the parable of pure water and gold in contrast to the foam and scum, is revealed to show that truth shall last and falsehood shall go away. How? It does not say. It may be by physical struggle as in the case when truth and falsehood are both of a material kind. On the other hand, it may not be governed by the law of struggle, if either truth, or falsehood, or both are of the spiritual, and not the material, world. Allāh says: And the faces shall be humbled before the Living, the Self-subsistent God (20:111); Whatever is in the heavens and the earth is His; all are obedient to Him (2:116); and that to your Lord is the goal (53:42). Thus, Allāh is victorious and predominant over all things, and. He is the One, the Subduer.

It has already been explained that the verse under discussion, ‘‘And were it not for Allāh’s repelling some men with others, the earth would certainly be in a state of disorder’’, points to that reality upon which society. is based. Man’s instinct for subjugating others for his own benefit. This reality includes, to a certain extent, in the meaning accepted by us earlier, the laws of the struggle for existence and natural selection. But the basic law, which is also comprehensive, is the same instinct of subjugating others. And the verse should be interpreted in this light. It should not be based on two partial and non-comprehensive laws.

Let us look at this topic from another angle: The two laws — the struggle for existence and natural selection — demand that plurality be replaced by singularity. Both sides of the struggle aim at annihilating the opposite party, so that the victor may add to itself the advantages of the vanquished party’s existence and its attachments. And nature, by its selection aims at keeping alive only the best. The net result will be to vanquish and annihilate many and to let only the one, that is, the best and the fittest, survive. This is basically against the concept of society, because society is formed of a multitude, all of whom are expected to co-operate with, and help, each other. It is this natural law which is the basis of society and civilization, not those laws which exhort one man to eat up the other. The repelling which, as mentioned under verse 2:213, builds nations and protects them from mischief, is that repulsion which leads to togetherness and that unity which is based on plurality. It is not that repulsion which negates togetherness, nor is it that unity which destroys plurality.

The jihād and fighting ordained by Allāh develops the earth and protects it from chaos, disorder and mischief, because it is through this fighting that the collective rights of the oppressed and down-trodden people are revived; and not because it shatters unity, annihilates people and obliterates their foot-prints. This basic difference between the two theories must always be kept in mind.

HISTORY AND HOW MUCH THE QUR'ĀN IS CONCERNED WITH IT

Oral and written history has been the favourite subject of people since the beginning of humanity. So far as we are aware, there have always been some persons who remembered, wrote or otherwise transmitted the great and small events of the past to the generations who came later, and who preserved what they were given by the ancients. Man benefits from history in various fields of his life: society comes to know its origin; people take lessons from the achievements and failures of the past generations; events are used as stories, for information and amusement; political, economic and industrial guide-lines are charted out in the light of the experience of the past.

In spite of all these benefits, which in themselves would be enough to bestow on history a halo of virtuousity, two factors have always worked to divert it from the path of truth and reality:

First: History has always been a slave of the rulers of the time. Every government wants to advertise what is beneficial to it and to suppress the report of what may be harmful to its interests. It keeps its dark side either completely hidden or alters its details and presents falsehood disguised as truth.

Second: Even the historians, reporters, narrators and writers of the books of history can never be free from their feelings and prejudice. In the past, the historians and the governments were, on the whole, people who believed in one or another religion, and at that time, religious prejudice and national feelings tainted historical writings. Now-a-days, materialism and nationalism occupy the same place, and the reports of past and present events are seen through these glasses. Ancient writers seldom wrote anything that could damage the religious faith of their contemporaries. Modern writers seldom write anything without injecting into it some items to support their materialistic view.

Apart from these two basic factors, there were and are other difficulties which have put history into disrepute. In the old times, there were scarcely any tools to record, preserve, transmit, copy, edit and preserve historical material. Now, with the progress of technology, all such tools are in the hands of historians; but a new enemy has overpowered them, and that is professional politics. The same event is reported in ten or twenty ways, depending on the nationality and political leaning of the reporters.

These glaring defects have robbed written history of its value. Now scholars have more confidence in archaeological evidence than in written records. Even in that field, national feelings and prejudice play their part. And politics dictate how much should be disclosed, and even what interpretation should be put on archaeological discoveries.

So, this is history and its various defects which can never be glossed over or corrected. With this background, we should never compare the historical events mentioned in the Qur'ān, with the narrations of the same events given in the books of history. The Qur'ān is a divine revelation, free from mistake and falsehood. How can it be judged with the help of history, the history which nobody believes to be free from lie and error? Many historical events, as given in the Qur'ān, like this very story of Ṭālūt, differ from the reports in the Bible. But why should we worry? The Bible is no better than other history books; The alterations, suppressions, additions and omissions carried out in these books are too well-known to need any description. The story of Samuel and Saul was written in the Bible by an unknown hand. The story of Ṭālūt in the Qur'ān is the true words of Allāh.

This much about history in general. Now let us see what is the main object of the Qur'ān in such narrations. The Qur'ān is not a book of history, nor does it describe an event with all its details as a book of history purports to do. The Qur'ān is divine speech, poured into the mould of revelation, ''With it Allāh guides him who follows His pleasure into the ways of safety.'' That is why it does not narrate an event from the beginning to the end with all its details. It only picks out a few such points of an event as will be useful to the listener as a lesson, sermon and moral. Look for example at this very story. It begins with the words, ''Did you not see the chiefs of the children of Israel'', and then picks out the following points as highlights: ''And their prophet said to them: Surely Allāh has raised Ṭālūt to be a king over you''; ''And their prophet said to them, Surely the sign of his kingdom is . . .''; ''So when Ṭālūt departed'' ; ''And when they went out against Goliath . . .'' Obviously if one wants to write the fully story of Ṭālūt, one will have to add many paragraphs between all these highlights. But the Qur'ān is not interested in a story per se. We have mentioned this fact in the story of the cow, and this principle applies to all other Qur'ānic stories. It selects for description only that much which is needed to stress some points in moral lessons, wise teachings and spiritual guidance, or to show how Allāh dealt with ancient nations and the people who passed away before the Muslims. Allāh says:

> In their stories there is certainly a lesson for men of understanding (12:111).
> Allāh desires to explain to you, and to guide you into the ways of those before you (4:26).
>
> Indeed there have been examples before you; therefore travel in the earth and see what was the end of the rejectors. This is a clear statement for men who guard (against evil) (3:137 — 138).
> There are many similar verses.

And if Allāh had pleased, those after them would not have fought one with another after clear arguments had come to them; but they differed; so there were some of them who believed and others who denied; and if Allāh had so pleased they would not have fought one with another, but Allāh does what He intends* (253). O You who believe! Spend out of what We have given you, before the day comes in which there is no bargaining, neither any friendship nor intercession; and the unbelievers — they are unjust (254).

GENERAL COMMENT

These two verses do not differ much in context from the preceding verses which ordained fighting and spending in the way of Allāh. Then came the story of Ṭālūt, in this context, so that the believers might learn important lessons from it, and that story ended on the words, ‘‘and most surely you are one of the apostles’’ which are immediately followed by the opening sentence of this verse, ‘‘These apostles, We have made some of them to excel the others.’’ Thereafter, it describes why those who came after those apostles fought one with another. (In the story of Talut also, there was a restrictive phrase, ‘‘after Mūsā’’ to describe ‘‘the chiefs of the children of Israel’’.) Then it reverts to the exhortation of spending in the way of Allāh before the fmal day comes.

All these similarities in context strongly support the view that these two verses are connected with the previous ones, and that all of them were sent down together.

The verse purports to remove a common misunderstanding, which is as follows:

The apostleship, especially when it was accompanied by clear evidence, that is, arguments and miracles to prove its truth, should have ended the scourge of fighting. It could have happened in one of the two ways: (1) When Allāh sent the apostles and gave them clear signs for the specific purpose of guiding people to their bliss in both worlds, it would have been proper if He had also prevented them from fighting among themselves and united them all in the truth. So, why is there so much fighting going on among the followers of those apostles? This objection becomes all the more telling after the advent of Islam which counts unity as one of the pillars of its sharī‘ah and the basis of its laws. (2) The sending of the apostles and the giving to them of the clear signs was done for the specific purpose of creating faith in peoples’ hearts. Belief and faith is a spiritual characteristic, which cannot be created by force and coercion. Then what the use of fighting once the prophets and the apostles had been sent.

We have explained this objection together with its reply in the commentary of the verses of fighting.

In this verse, Allāh gives the following reply: The fighting among the followers of the apostles occurred because the said followers differed among themselves. Had they not differed, there would not have been any fighting among them. The cause of the fighting was, therefore, their difference. It is true that if Allāh so wished, there would not have occurred any difference; and thus there would not have been any fighting. Alternatively, He could have disconnected the cause, that is, the difference, from its effct, that is, fighting; so that even if there was difference, there would not have occurred any fighting. But Allāh does what He wishes; and He has decreed that the effect will follow its cause; also, that the people will have freedom of choice, and that there will not be any compulsion for them to follow a certain course.

And that is why they differed, and were not prevented from it, and that is why the said difference caused the fighting.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: These apostles, We have made some of them to excel the others: It demonstrates the greatness of the apostles and the grandeur of their status. That is why the demonstrative pronoun ''tilka'' (تِلْكَ = those) has been used, which is meant to point to a distant object. The verse shows the excellence given by Allāh to some of them over others — some of them have been given more excellence than the others. But all of them are great, as the apostleship in itself is an excellence, which all of them share. There is a difference among the apostles, of their grades and ranks; and there is a difference among their followers, as the verse describes. But the two types of differences have nothing in common: The difference among the apostles is only in their ranks and grades, but they all are one in the basic excellence of apostleship; and the conflict of the people of the apostles is the one which is found between belief and disbelief, between affirmation and negation. It goes without saying that the two differences are quite separate from each other. And that is why Allāh has used separate words for each. The difference in the rank and grade of the apostles has been named excellence, and it has been attributed to Allāh, ''We have made some of them to excel others''. The conflict of the followers of the apostles has been called a difference, and it has been attributed to the men themselves, ‘‘they differed’’.

The verse ends on the topic of fighting, and the preceding verses were also concerned with admonition to fight in the way of Allāh, and with a story about it. It obviously means that the sentences under discussion, ‘‘These apostles . . . with the holy spirit’’, are a prologue to make the meaning of the next sentences clearer. It shows that the institution of apostleship, in spite of all its blessings and good, has not been able to end fighting among the people, because the said fighting is initiated by the people themselves.

The apostleship has a high, towering excellence; and its good and bliss have ever-lasting freshness; whenever you look at it you will see a new beauty, and whichever aspect you ponder upon, you will find a new virtue. This excellent institution, in spite of its brilliant splendour and awe-inspiring magnificence, in spite of its accompanying clear evidence and miracle, is not able to eradicate the differences of people in belief and disbelief. It is so, because this difference is caused by the people themselves. Allāh has mentioned this fact in various verses: Surely the religion with Allāh is Islam; and those to whom the book had been given did not differ, but after knowledge had come to them, out of envy among themselves (3:19). Mankind was but one nation. . . and none differed about it but the very people who were given it revolting among themselves (2:213).

The fact remains that if Allāh had so wished He could have prevented this difference and the resulting fighting by His creative decree. But Allāh has established a system of cause and effect in the universe, and difference is the established cause of conflict and fighting. Also, if He had so wished, He could have forbidden it by His legislative decree; or He could have refrained from giving the believers the order to fight in His way. But He gave this order; and made it a criterion of faith, ‘‘so that Allāh may separate the impure from the pure’’, ‘‘and most certainly Allāh will know those who believe and most certainly He will know the hypocrites’’.

In short, fighting among the people of the apostles cannot be avoided, as there is always the possibility of people differing because of envy and revolt. The apostleship and its clear evidence are sufficient to refute wrong beliefs and clear away doubts. But envy, revolt, obstinacy and other such moral defects cannot be removed and the earth cannot be purged of them except by fighting in the way of Allāh, which will better the condition of humanity. Experience proves that in many cases arguments alone were not effective unless they were supported by the sword. That is why Allāh ordered His apostles, whenever necessary, to stand in support of truth and fight in His way. He so ordered in the days of Ibrāhīm and the prophets of the children of Israel, and after the Apostle of Allāh came. More details have already been given under the verses of fighting.

QUR'ĀN: Among them are some to whom Allāh spoke, and some of them He exalted by degree (of rank): In these sentences the pronouns and verbs have been changed from the first person of the preceding one (We have made some of them to excel) to the third person. The reason — and Allāh knows better — may be as follows:

Meritorious epithets are of two kinds: First, that which in itself is enough to show the merit and honour of the person or thing so described; for example, the clear evidence and the miracle, and being strengthened with the holy spirit, which has been mentioned in respect of 'Īsā (a.s.). There is no doubt that these epithets are, per se, splendid and lofty. Second, that which in it-self has no value unless it is related to a great subject, and its merit and honour depend upon the prestige of the doer; for example, being spoken to, per se, has no virtue, but if one is spoken to by a great personality it bestows an honour to the man who is spoken to. And it carries a very great splendour if one is spoken to by Allāh. Likewise, being raised in rank, per se, has no virtue unless it is done for example, by Allāh.

In this light, we may easily appreciate the great eloquence of the Qur'ān in changing the pronouns in three sentences: ''among them are some to whom Allāh spoke, and some of them He exalted by degree (of rank) ; and We gave clear (evidence) to 'Īsā . . .'' When Allāh described the virtues of being spoken to and being raised in rank, He changed the pronouns to the third person clearly mentioning the name, 'Allāh', as the bestower of these merits. When the epithets reached clear evidence, etc., which were honoured in themselves, the pronouns reverted to the first person of the starting sentence and said: ''and We gave clear evidence to 'Īsā son of Maryam''.

The commentators advance various opinons as to who is meant by the two sentences. It is said that ‘‘some to whom Allāh spoke’’ refers to Mūsā, as verse 164 of chap. 4 says: And We spoke to Mūsā (directly) speaking (to him), and as several other verses testify. Also, it is said that it means the Apostle of Allāh, Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), because Allāh spoke to him on the night of the ascension when Allāh brought him near Himself to such a degree that all intermediate links vanished completely, and Allāh addressed to him His revelation directly without any intermediary. He says: Then he (i.e., Muḥammad) drew near, and he became pending (i.e., in between the Creator and His creatures); so he was the measure of two bows or closer still. And He revealed to His servant what He revealed (53:8 — 10). A third interpretation is that the speaking means revelation in general, because revelation is a secret speaking, and it has been termed speaking in the verse, And it is not for any man that Allāh should speak to him except by revelation, or from behind a veil, or by sending a messenger so that he reveals by His permission what He pleases (42:51). But this last interpretation does not conform with the preposition ‘‘min’’ (مِنْ = from, among) which denotes that not all, but only ‘‘some’’, of the apostles were given this distinction — and revelation was not confined to only a few of them, it was common to all.

The most appropriate interpretation is that it refers to Mūsā (a.s.), because Allāh’s speaking with him was already mentioned in a chapter of Meccan period (which was revealed long before this chapter 2, which is a Medinite chapter): And when Mūsā came at Our appointed time and his Lord spoke to him . . . He said: ‘‘O Mūsā! Surely I have chosen you above the people with My message and with my speech . . . ’’ (7:143-144). Obviously the fact that Mūsā was spoken to by Allāh had been well-understood when the verse under discussion was revealed.

Likewise, various interpretations have been offered for the sentence, ‘‘and some of them He exalted by degree (of rank)’’.

It is said that it refers to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), as Allāh raised him in status and exalted over all the apostles, because He:

— sent him towards all the men —: And We have not sent you but to all the men . . . (34:28);

— made him a mercy to the worlds —: And We have not sent you but as a mercy to the worlds (21:107); — made him the Last of the prophets —: . . . but he is the apostle of Allāh and the last of the prophets . . . (33:40);

— gave him the Qur'ān, which is the guardian over all books and explains clearly everything, and is protected from the alterations of wrong-doers, and, in short, is a miracle which will last up to the end of the world —: And We have revealed to you the Book with the truth, verifying what is before it of the book and a guardian over it (5:48); And We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything . . . (16:89); Surely We have revealed the Reminder and We will most surely be its guardian (15:9); Say: If men and jinn should combine together to bring the like of this Qur'ān, they could not bring the like of it, even though some of them were aiders of the others (17:88).

— and gave him especially the established and upright religion which is responsible for all the good of this world and the next —: Then set thy face upright to the established religion (30:43).

Another interpretation is that it refers to various prophets who were raised in status in one way or the other. For example, the following prophets:

Nūḥ (a.s.) — : Peace be on Nūḥ in all the worlds (37:79).

Ibrāhīm (a.s.) — : And (remember) when his Lord tried Ibrahim with certain words, then he fulfilled them. He said: ''Surely I will make you Imām for mankind . . .'' (2:124); And make for me a truthful tongue (i.e., goodly mention) among the posterity (26:84);

Idrīs (a.s.) — : And We raised him to a high station (19:57);

Yūsuf (a.s.) — : We raise the degrees of whomsoever We please (12:76);

Dāwūd (a.s.) — : And We gave to Dāwūd Psalm (4:163); and likewise various other prophets.

A third interpretation is that the words, ''These apostles'', in the beginning of the verse, refer to those apostles only who have been mentioned in this chapter of the Cow, like Ibrāhīm, Mūsā, 'Īsā, 'Uzayr, Armiah, Ushmu'īl, Dāwūd, and Muḥammad, the peace of Allāh be on them all. Out of them Mūsā and 'Īsā have especially been mentioned in this verse, and from among the rest it is Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) who has been raised in degrees of rank over the others.

A fourth interpretation: ''These apostles'' refers to only those who have been mentioned in the preceding story; and they are Mūsā, Dāwūd, Ushmu'īl and Muḥammad. Mūsā's distinction has been mentioned, and that is his being spoken to. Then comes the topic of raising the degrees of rank, and from the above list, no one is more deserving for it than Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). Probably, that was the reason why 'Īsā had to be mentioned in this verse by name — because in the preceding story he was not mentioned at all.

But a well-balanced interpretation would be as follows:

There is no doubt that the exalted rank of the Prophet, Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), is included in the meaning of this sentence; but there is no reason to suppose that the sentence refers only to his excellence or only to those prophets who are mentioned in the story of Ṭālūt or in the chapter of the Cow, because all such view are arbitrary and without any justifiable reason. It is quite obvious that the verse is general; ''these apostles'' refer to all the apostles sent by Allāh, and ''some of them He exalted by degrees of rank'' covers all those apostles who were exalted by Him in any way.

Someone has said: The context shows that the sentence, ''some of them He exalted . . .'', refers only to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). The verse gives a lesson to those nations that fight among themselves, after their apostles, even though their religion is one — and only three such nations were present when the verse was revealed: the Jews, the Christians and the Muslims. Therefore, it was appropriate to mention their apostles especially; Mūsā and 'Īsā have already been described in the verse, and it means that the remaining sentence, ''some of them He exalted . . .'', specifically refers to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.).

Comment: The Qur'ān decrees that all the apostle were sent to all of mankind, as Allāh says: . . . We do not make any distinction between any of them . . . (2:136). The apostles brought them clear signs, arguments and miracles. This fact in itself should have been enough to cut at the root of mischief and disorder, and to prevent fighting among their followers. But those followers differed with one another because of their rebellion, envy and worldly desire. This was the basic cause which gave rise to the fighting. Therefore, Allāh ordains fighting when the good of mankind depends upon it, so that He may manifest the truth of what was true by His words, and cut away the root of the wrong-doers.

This context shows that the verse is not particularly concerned with any nation; rather its import is general.

A TALK ABOUT THE SPEECH OF ALLĀH

The sentence, ‘‘among them are some to whom Allāh spoke’’, shows that Allāh did speak to some people; it proves that an actual occurrence did happen, that it is not an allegory or analogy; and that Allāh has named that occurrence His ‘‘speech’’. We shall discuss this subject in two parts:

First: The words of Allāh prove that all the blessings, bounties and distinctions which Allāh has reserved for His prophets and apostles and which are hidden from other people’s perception, like revelation, speaking, the descent of the spirit and the angels, and the witnessing of the great divine signs; as well as the things which He has informed His prophets and apostles about, like the angels, Satan, the Tablet, the Pen, etc., are actual and factual things. There is no allegory in their claims: when they said ‘‘angels’’ they did not mean ‘‘mental powers calling towards good’’; when they talked about ‘‘revelation’’, they were not referring to ‘‘the products of those mental powers’’; the holy spirit and faithful spirit, in their language, were not used for ‘‘the highest degree of those mental powers from which pure thoughts rain down for the good of the human society’’; Satan and jinn were not allegorical names for ‘‘base desire and unjustified anger which call towards evil and disorder’’; ‘‘the whispering of slinking Satan’’ was not another name for ‘‘the evil thoughts which disrupt a good society or make one commit bad actions’’; and so on.

The Qur’ānic verses, as well as the declarations of the previous prophets, show in the clearest way that they used these words in their actual meanings, not in an allegorical style. Nobody, except an obstinate and reckless contender, can have any doubt about it — and we have not undertaken to convince such a contender! If such clear expressions were to be explained away in this way, then all the spiritual facts given by these apostles could be interpreted in purely materialistic terms, totally rejecting existence beyond the matter! We have discussed it in short in the topic of miracle.

Anyhow, divine speech is a factual and actual thing, and it creates the same result which is created by our talking. It may be explained as follows:

Allāh has named some of His actions ‘‘speech’’ and ‘‘speaking’’: And Allāh spoke to Mūsā (directly) speaking (to him) (4:164); among them are some to whom Allāh spoke (2:253). And He has explained this vague expression in the verse: And it is not for any man that Allāh should speak to him except by revelation, or from behind a veil, or by sending a messenger so that he reveals by His permission what He pleases (42:51). The exceptional clause, ‘‘except by revelation . . .’’, would be meaningless unless the speaking (mentioned in ‘‘should speak to him’’) is taken to mean real speaking. It then follows that the speaking by Allāh is real, even though it may have a special style and method. In short, the principle of ‘‘speaking’’ by Allāh is a reality and cannot be denied.

What is the reality of speech from our point of view? Man needs society and civilization, and, as a result, needs all the essential ingredients of co-operative civilization — and ‘‘speaking’’ is one of them. Nature has guided man to express his thoughts through the medium of the voice which is produced from his mouth. He has made various combinations of his voice as signs to describe various ideas which are produced in his mind. Needless to say that the only way to convey hidden ideas and thoughts to others is to appoint, and agree upon, some signs for them. Man needs. speech because there is no method to understand, and make others understand, other than words, the variously mixed and combined sounds which have been agreed upon as signs, and made as tokens for objects and ideas. That is why a language is closely related to the developmental stage of the society which it serves. When the society develops, the language also widens its circle to cope with it. In this manner, languages develop and widen their circles in direct relation with the development stages of the respective societies.

Speech makes others understand what is in the mind of the speaker, through the medium of combined sounds; these sounds have been agreed upon, by the speaker and the listener, as tokens and signs to convey certain ideas.

It follows that man develops speech when he is with other men.

(Also, some animals who live together in colonies, and who have voices, use some particular sounds to express some particular feelings. This may be called their speech.) If there were a man completely cut off from other human beings, he would not need any speech, because there would be no need to communicate with others. Likewise, other creatures, who do not need any society or co-operation in their existences, do not need speech; two examples of this category are the angels and Satan.

It is certain that the speech of Allāh does not emanate from Him as it does with us. The human voice issues from the larynx and arrives at particular sounds by movements of the tongue, teeth, jaws and lips, and interaction between them. And, what is more, our speech is only a sign or token which we have agreed upon; sounds, per se, have no value or meaning if there be no prior agreement as to what they mean. But Allāh is too great in splendour and too high in glory to have any limb or organ, or to need help from such things as words, which have no real worth at all — whose value depends upon the agreement of the speaker and the listener. Allāh has said: Nothing is like a likeness of Him (42:11).

Still, Allāh in the verse mentioned earlier, (And it is not for any man that Allāh should speak to him except by revelation . . . — 42:51), confirms for Himself the reality of speaking, although He disallows for Himself that speaking with which we are familiar. Allāh dissociates Himself from that speech which is known to us and whose only value is that of a token or sign — which depends on agreed upon meanings. But He confirms speech for Himself with its particular effect. As the particular effect is the same, that is, making the other party understand the message, it can be called ‘‘speech’’ although it has no resemblance to our speech. It is like the words, scale, lamp and armament, which were made in old days for certain primitive tools and implements, and are now equally correctly used for new types of machine scales, electric bulbs and modern military hardware, because their effects are the same, even though the shapes are completely different.

The method by which Allāh lets His apostles and prophets know what He intends to convey to them is His speech. But we have not been told what is its reality and how it happens. But, in any case, its effect is the same: making the listener understand the intended message.

Divine speech is a divine action, like His other actions — giving life and death, sustaining, guiding, forgiving, etc. In other words, it is an attribute of action, not an attribute of person like knowledge, power and life. (The attributes of persons are not other than the person-himself). As ‘‘speaking’’ is an attribute of action, like other such attributes, it may be described in terms of space and time. Allāh has said: And when Mūsā came to Our appointed time and his Lord spoke to him, he said: ‘‘My Lord: show me (Thyself), so that I may look upon Thee.’’ He said: ‘‘You can never see Me’’ (7:143); . . . and indeed I created you before when you were nothing (19:9); . . . then Allāh said to them, Die; (and thereafter) He gave them life (2:243); We give sustenance to you and to them (6:151); . . Our Lord is He Who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (20:50); then He turned to the (mercifully) that they might turn (to Him) (9:118). In these verses the speech of Allāh is qualified by the time and the place of its occurrence, like His other actions, e.g., creating, giving death, life and sustenance, guiding and turning towards His servants with mercy.

This explanation is enough for tafsīr, which is the subject of our book. We shall comment shortly afterwards on theological disputes and philosophical arguments concerning this topic.

Here another aspect of this subject should be looked into. Allāh has not used the words ‘‘speech’’ and ‘‘speaking’’ except about His talk with human beings. Of course, ‘‘word’’ and ‘‘words’’ have been used in other contexts. He has said: The Massiah, ‘Īsā son of Maryam is but an apostle of Allāh and His word which He communicated to Maryam (4:171). Here, ‘‘word’’ has been used for a human being himself. Also He says: And the word of your Lord that is the highest (9: 40); And the word of your Lord has been accomplished truly and justly (6:115); . . . the words of Allāh will not come to an end (31:27). In these verses, ‘‘word’’ and ‘‘words’’ mean the decree of Allāh, or some sort of creation.

The word, ‘‘saying’’, has been used by Allāh referring to His talk with human beings as well as with others. He says in connection with His talk:

— with man: So We said: ‘‘O Adam! Surely this is an enemy to you and to your wife’’ (20:117);

— with angels: And when your Lord said to the angels: ‘‘I am going to place in the earth a khalīfah'' (2:30); When your Lord said to the angels; ''Surely I am going to create a man from dust'' (38:71);

— with Satan: He said: ''O Iblīs! what prevented thee that thou shouldst do obeisance to him whom I created with My two hands'' (38:75);

— with inanimate things: Then He directed Himself to the heaven and it was a vapour, so He said to it and to the earth: ''Come both, willingly or unwillingly.'' They both said: ''We come willingly'' (41:11); We said: ''O Fire! be cold and a safety to Ibrāhīm'' (21:69); And it was said: ''O earth! swallow down thy water, and 0 sky! withhold (thy rain). . .'' (11:44).

All the above, with their diversity, are included in the following two verses:

His command, when He intends anything is only that He says to it: 'Be' and it is (36:82).

. . . when He has decreed a matter He only says to it: 'Be' and it is (19:35).

We find that Allāh uses the word, ''saying'', about His address to those who have reason and hearing power, like man, as well as to inanimate things which do not have such powers (as we understand them) like the earth and the sky. Also, it is clear that the last mentioned two verses are a sort of explanation to the previously mentioned verses.

On pondering on all these aspects, one finds out that the divine ''saying'' means creating a thing to show the intended meaning. So far as the matters of creation are concerned, when Allāh creates a thing and brings it into existence, it exists. And the very thing is a ''saying'' of Allāh, because it, by its existence, shows the particular intention of Allāh for its creation. It is known that when He intends a thing and says to it : 'Be' and it comes into being, no word passes from the Creator to the thing created; there is in fact only the existence of the thing, and nothing else. Therefore, that is the thing created, and also it, in itself, is the word 'Be'. In short, His saying, in matters of creation, is the creation itself, it is nothing separate from it.

In matters other than creation — for example, when He says something to .a man — it means that He creates something which gives that man an inner knowledge of the intended message. It may be by creating a voice in a body (like in the tree, for His talk with Mūsā; and in the curtain of light, in the case of the Prophet Muḥammad - s.a.w.a.); or by some other method which we do not know, or whose modelity we do not understand.

The same is, more or less, the case of His speaking to the angels or Satan. But there is an important difference.

Unlike our existence, the existence of the angels and Satan is not biological and social. As a result, they do not achieve gradual perceptive perfection as we do. They do not have to make signs and tokens to indicate their intentions. When they want to understand, or make someone else understand, a thing it is not done through the medium of the voice. There is no combined sound, emanating from the larynx with inter-related actions by various parts of the mouth; and, also, there is no hearing, through a hole called the ear, receiving the sound from the air and conveying it through an intricate mechanism to the brain. Still, the reality of ''saying'' exists in both groups — and in their like, if there by any. And, as explained earlier, that reality is ''making the addressee understand the intended message.''

In short, among the angels, as well as among the Satans, there is ''saying'', but not like ours. Likewise, between Allāh and the angels (and between Him and the Satans) there is ''saying'' but not through the medium of voice and word.

In the same way, we may explain the ''saying'' which is attributed in the Qur'ān to the animals. For example, Allāh says: . . . an ant said: ''O ants! enter into your dwellings . . . '' (27:18); . . . then said (the hoopoe): ''I comprehend that which you do not comprehend, and I have brought to you a sure information from Sheba'' (27:22).

The same meaning may be applied in the cases where Allāh ''says'' or ''reveals'' something to such animals. For example, And your Lord revealed to the bee, (saying): ''Make hives in the mountains and in the trees and in what they build'' (16:68).

There are some other words synonymous, or near in meaning, to ''saying'' and ''speaking''; for example, revealing, inspiring, informing and relating. Allāh says:

> Surely We have revealed to you as We revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him . . . (4:163).

And (I swear by) the soul and Him Who made it perfect, then He inspired it to understand what is wrong for it and right for it (91:7 — 8).

He (the Prophet) said: ''Informed me the All-knowing, the All-aware'' (66:3).

He relates the truth . . . (6:57).

The explanation, written in the beginning about the speech of Allāh, applies to these words also: There is an actual and factual occurrence which Allāh has named His , speaking, revealing and inspiring etc.; and it has the same effect that speaking, etc. has; it makes no difference whether we know its reality or not. (We shall have some further discussion about Revelation in chapter 42, God willing).

Even though the basic meaning is common to all the abovementioned words, their use is determined by context, and its suitability for the literal meaning. An utterance is called ''speech'' when the main emphasis is on conveying the message to the listerner's mind; that is why this word had been used when Allāh wanted to show the excellence and high status of the prophets, because, in this context, the emphasis is on communicating which naturally draws the attention to the recipient of the communication. It is called ''saying'' when the main attention is on the intended meaning; and it is for this reason that the creative and legislative decrees and commandments are called ''saying'': He said, ''The truth then it is and the truth do I speak, that I will most certainly fill hell with thee and with those of them who follow thee, all'' (38:84 — 85). And it is called ''revelation'' when it is hidden from others; and, therefore, the communication of the message to the prophets is named thus: Surely We have revealed to you as We revealed to Nūḥ and the prophets after him . . . (4:163).

Second: How is the word ''speaking'' used? In the beginning, words were made for phenomena which can be perceived by one of the five senses. Gradually the meanings shifted towards those meaning which could be perceived by the mind only. When a word is made for a material thing is used for a mental process or a metaphysical meaning, it is in the beginning done with allegorical sense; but the continued use makes the latter its real meaning. Likewise, the advancement of civilization and technology amends, improves and changes the tools and implements which are used by man. But even with such continuous changes and improvements, the name does not change. In old days, a ‘‘lamp’’ was a metal or earthen receptacle containing oil or fat in which a wick was placed and then lighted for illumination at night. From stage to stage it changed shape, technique and source of light; and now we have these electric bulbs, in which not a single thing of the original ‘‘lamp’’ remains. Still, we call it and similar other things ‘‘lamp’’ because the purpose is the same; this apparatus illuminates the night as the original lamp did. So long as this basic purpose is served by a new apparatus the original name, ‘‘lamp’’, is transferred to it in reality, not allegorically, even if all appearances have changed.

This example shows that a word is easily transferred to a change or new shape of the original form if the purpose of the original remains unchanged, and that this also will be its ‘‘real’’, and not ‘‘allegorical’’, meaning. Today, there are thousands and thousands of old names used for new items, and these names are treated as their real ones, not allegorical; because, in spite of radical changes in shapes and techniques, the original purpose has remained intact. Likewise, in every language there are countless words which were made for material things, and were later used for metaphysical objects — in reality, not as an allegory.

It shows that when the words ‘‘speaking’’ and ‘‘saying’’ are used in places where the effect is ‘‘letting the audience know the message’’ they are used in their real meaning. It is for this reason that we said earlier that when ‘‘saying’’ or ‘‘speaking’’ was attributed to Allāh, it was used in its real sense. It is the same with other words which are used sometimes for Allāh, and at other times for human beings, like life, knowledge, will, giving, withholding, etc. As the net result and effect of these words is found in the person and actions of Allāh, they are attributed to Him in their real meanings, even though their modelity and other aspects are totally different from what we understand from these words.

The same is the explanation of ‘‘exalting the apostles by degrees of rank’’. This exalting is a real thing, and not just a thing found in the mind of the speaker. We have already explained the difference between real existence and the existence in mind, under the heading ‘‘Knowledge and Action’’ under verse 2:213. We gave there the example of the phrase ‘‘a man who is president’’. Now ‘‘a man’’ has a real existence, but his ‘‘being president’’ is a thing found in the minds of people only. Such aspects have no existence outside the mind.

Many sincere men of religion have fallen into the error of thinking that this exalting by Allāh is also like the above-mentioned presidency. Once they had committed themselves to this explanation, they had to say that the effects of that exalting (for example, the things of the next world — paradise, hell, the questioning, the reckoning etc.) had the same relationship with this exalting as the parapharnalia of the presidency have with the said office — that the said relationship was, so to say, in the mind of the speaker only; it had no existence outside. They did not realize that such an explanation lowers the dignity of God, reducing Him to a position of sub-ordinate to His own suppositions and thoughts — Glorified is He from such sacrilegious imputations. Such people, because of that basic error, are not ready to believe that the prophets of Allāh and His chosen servants have been give some really-existing spiritual perfections, which the Qur'ān and the traditions clearly attributed to them; these people try to interpret such verses and traditions in such a way as to rob them of their real existence and turn them into the above-mentioned things which exist only in the mind.

QUR'ĀN: And We gave clear (evidence) to 'Īsā, son of Maryam, and strengthened him with the holy spirit: In this sentence, the original ''first person'' pronouns have been used; and we have already explained the reason for this. A question arises as to why only 'Īsā, and no other prophet, has been mentioned here by name. The reason is this: What has been mentioned in his excellence — giving clear evidence and strengthening with the holy spirit — are things common to all apostles. Allāh says: Certainly We sent Our apostles with clear evidence (57:25); He sends down the angels with spirit by His commandments on whom He pleases of His servants, (saying): Give the warning . . . (16:2).

But these otherwise common factors were found in 'Īsā in a rather special way. All his miracles — raising the dead, creating the bird by breathing into it, giving sight to the blind, curing lepers and giving information of the unseen — had a very special relation with the life and the spirit. Therefore, those factors were mentioned as the special excellence of 'Īsā, and his name was clearly mentioned. Had Allāh only said, ''and We gave clear evidence to some of them and strengthened him with the holy spirit'', it would not have pointed especially to 'Īsā, because, as you know, these two factors were common to all apostles. It was necessary to mention the name to show that these were given to ʻĪsā in a rather special way. Moreover, ʻĪsā himself was a clear evidence of the power of Allāh, as he was born without a father. Allāh says: and made her (Maryam) and her son a sign for the worlds (21:91). Thus, the son and his mother together were the signs of Allāh, and it was their special distinction.

QUR'ĀN: And if Allāh had pleased, those after them would not have fought one with another after clear arguments had come to them'': Here Allāh again refers to Himself in the third person, because the context demands a clear declaration that the divine will cannot be obstructed and His power cannot be foiled. All happenings, in all their positive and negative aspects, are under divine control and authority. It is the attribute of godship which emanates unlimited power and unrestricted authority; and that is why the divine name, Allāh, had to be clearly mentioned to emphasize the fact that if Allāh had so willed, they would not have fought. This force could not be produced by saying, ''if We had so willed . . .'' And it is for the same reason that the divine name, and not the pronoun, has been repeated in the next sentences, ''and if Allāh had so pleased they would not have fought'', and ''Allāh does what He intends''.

QUR'ĀN: But they differed; so there were some of them who believed and others who denied: We have already described why Allāh attributed the difference to the people, and not to Himself. He has declared several times that the difference in belief and disbelief appeared among people because of their envy, rebellion and evil desire; and such things cannot be attributed to Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: And if Allāh had so pleased they would not have fought one with another, but Allāh does what He intends: We have already explained this. If Allāh had so wished, ie could have disconnected the cause, the difference, from its effect, the fighting. But Allāh does what He intends, and He has decided that the difference will cause the fighting, according to the system of cause and effect which He has decreed in this world.

In short, the verse says that the apostles sent by Allāh are His servants, very near to Him, above mankind in their excellence; they have been exlated, some above others, in the degrees of their ranks but they all equally share the basic excellence of apostleship. They came to their peoples with clear, arguments and miracles; they clearly pronounced the truth and unmistakably showed the right path. It might have been expected that their followers, after them, would not have abandon the unity, love and mutual regard in the cause of the religion of Allāh. But there was another factor, lurking about, and that was their envy and rebellion, which divided them up into believers and non-believers; and this difference spread and affected all aspects of their lives. If Allāh had so wished, He could have taken away the causative power of this difference, and then it would not have led to fighting. But He did not wish so, and let the system of cause and effect take its course; and He brings out what He wishes.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! Spend . . . and the unbelievers — they are unjust: The meaning is quite clear. The last sentence implies that not spending in the way of Allāh is unbelief and injustice.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh: These apostles . . .: ''There is in this (verse) that which may be a proof that the companions of Muḥammad did differ (among themselves) after him, so there were some of them who believed and others who disbelieved.'' (al-Kāfī)

Aṣbagh ibn Nubātah said: ''I was standing with the Leader of the faithfuls, 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.) on the day of the Camel. There came a man and stood before him and said: 'O Leader of the faithfuls! These people (i.e., the enemies) said takbīr (Allāhu Akbar), and we said it; and they said tahlīl (lā ilāha illa 'llāh) and we said it; and they prayed and we prayed. Then, on what (ground) are we fighting them?' He ('Alī - a.s.) replied: 'On (the basis of) this verse: These apostles, We have made some of them to excel others; among them are some to whom Allāh spoke and some of them He exalted by degree (of rank); and We gave clear (evidence) to 'Īsā, son of Maryam, and strengthened him with the holy spirit. And if Allāh had pleased, those after them would not have fought one with another — so we are those after them — but they differed; so there were some of them who believed and others who disbelieved; and if Allāh had so pleased they would not have fought one with another, but Allāh does what He intends. So we are those who believed and they are those who disbelieved.' Thereupon, the man said: 'These people are unbelievers, by the Lord of the Ka'bah!' Then he attacked and fought them until he was killed; may Allāh have mercy on him!'' (at-Tafsīr, of al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: This event has been narrated by al-Mufīd in his al-Amālī, and by ash-Shaykh in his book of the same name, and by al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr. This tradition shows that 'Alī (a.s.) interpreted ''disbelief'' in this verse in a general sense, which includes hidden, disbelief as well as open disbelief which is termed al-kufr (الكُفْرُ = infidelity) in Islam and with which Islam deals in a special way. It is well-known from traditions and history that 'Alī (a.s.) did not treat his opponents (in the battles of the Camel, Ṣiffīn and Nahrawān) like any group of the unbelievers — they were not dealt with like unbelievers, whether from the people of the book or others, nor like the apostates. The only implication of this special treatment is that he thought them to be unbelievers in their hearts but not openly. And he (a.s.) used to say: ''I fight against them on the interpretation (of the Qur'ān), not on (its) revelation.''

The verse clearly supports this meaning. It says that the clear evidence brought by the apostles did not prevent the fighting of their followers because they differed among themselves; and such a difference cannot be removed by those arguments and evidence because it is not based on reason but on envy and rebellion. The verse thus describes the phenomenon mentioned in the following verses:

> And peple were naught but a single nation, then they disagreed; and had not a word already gone forth from your Lord, the matter would have certainly been decided between them in respect of that concerning which they disagree (10:19).
> Mankind was but one people, so Allāh sent the prophets . . . And none differed about it but the very people who were given it after clear signs had come to them, revolting among themselves; whereupon Allāh guided, by His will, those who believed to the truth about which they differed (2:213).

. . . and they shall continue to differ, except those on whom your Lord has mercy . . . (11:118 — 119).

All this shows that difference about the book, that is, about the religion, between the followers of the apostles, after the departure of those apostles, cannot be avoided. Allāh says particularly about this ummah: Or do you think that you would enter the Garden while yet the like of those who have passed away before you has not come upon you? (2:214). And He informs us of the complaint of His Apostle on the Day of Resurrection: And the Apostle cried out: ''O my Lord! surely my people treated this Qur'ān as a forsaken thing'' (25:30). In these, and many other verses, this factor has been explicitly or implicitly mentioned.

And it is a fact that difference in the Muslim ummah started in the days of the companions. History and mutawātir and near mutawātir traditions clearly show that, in the troubles and discords which started soon after the Apostle, the companions themselves dealt with each other in this same way. In their own eyes they were treading the path of the discord and difference mentioned in these verses. And none of them claimed that he was above any difference on account of 'iṣmah (sinlessness) or good tidings given to him by the Apostle, or ijtihād, nor did anyone say that he was not included in these verses. (We do not include Ahlu 'l-bayt of the Prophet in the term 'companion'.) More details of this difference is beyond the scope of this book.

al-Mufīd narrates in his al-Amālī from Abū Basīr that he said: ''I heard Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) say: 'Allāh, Great is His name, was ever Omniscient in His person and there was nothing to be known; and He was ever Omnipotent in His person and there was nothing to be ordained.' I said: 'May I be your ransom! Was He then ever Speaking?' He said: 'Speech is created. There was Allāh and He was not speaking, then He created speech.' ''

Ṣafwān ibn Yaḥyā said: ''Abū Qurrah, the traditionalist, asked ar-Riḍā (a.s.) and said: 'Tell me, may I be your ransom! About Allāh's speaking to Mūsā.' He (the Imām) said: 'Allāh knows better in which language He spoke to him.' Abū Qurrah caught his own tongue and said: 'I am asking you about this tongue.' Thereupon Abu '1-Ḥasan (a.s.) said: 'Glorified is Allāh from what you say! And may Allāh protect you (from thinking) that He might resemble His creatures or might speak like they speak; rather, He, Golorified be He, there is nothing like Him, nor there is any speaker or doer like Him.' (Abū Qurrah) said: 'How?' (The Imām) said: 'The speech of Allāh with His creature is not like the speech of a creature with another creature; and He does not speak with a mouth and tongue; rather He says to it: 'Be' and it is. It was by His will He addressed (His) command and prohibition to Mūsā without any meditation in His Self.' '' (al-Iḥtijāj)

Alī (a.s.) said in a sermon: ''Speaking, not by meditation, Wishing, not by contemplation.'' (Nahju 'l-balāghah)

In the same book, he ('Alī-a.s.) says, inter alia, in another sermon: ''He Who spoke to Mūsā (directly) speaking, and showed him of His great signs, without limbs and organs and without implements, sound or uvula.''

The author says: The traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt with this meaning are numerous, and all of them show that the speech of Allāh (to use the terminology of the Qur'ān and sunnah) is an attribute of action, and not an attribute of Person.

A PHILOSOPHICAL DISCUSSION ABOUT THE SPEECH OF ALLĀH

Philosophers point out that when a speaker conveys his thought to the mind of a hearer, by means of words, it is popularly called speech and talk, and its net result is that the hearer understands and the speaker is understood. The reality of speech is ''what conveys an idea to the other party''; rather particulars — the medium of words, and their being produced by the passage of air through the larynx, mouth, and lips and their entering the ears of the hearer — are inconsequential; they are not essential to the reality of speech. Whatever describes the intended meaning is speech; even the movement of your hand to call someone to your side or to indicate to him to sit down, etc. is your speech, albeit without your uttering a single word.

Taking this as their basis, the philosophers say: the things found in the universe depend on their causes for their existence and for their characteristics. By their existence they pronounce the existence of their causes; and by their characteristics and faculties they show the characteristics and faculties of their causes. Therefore, every ‘‘effect’’ is a speech for its cause, and by this speech that cause talks about its own perfection.

And all existing things taken separately or jointly, and their aggregate, the universe, are, in this way, the speech of God; by this speech, God describes His perfect attributes which are otherwise hidden from us. Allāh is the Creator of the universe, and the universe is His creation. In the same manner, He speaks via the medium of the universe about His names and attributes, and the universe is His speech.

They go even further: They say that deep thinking leads one to the belief that the ultimate ‘‘speech’’ is God Himself. We say that the universe leads to the Creator; but leading is a quality of existence and nothing in the universe exists on its own. Every thing exists because God has given it existence. When a thing leads to the Creator, it does so by the existence and qualities given to it by the Creator. In other words, it is the Creator Himself Who leads to Himself through His creation. In the same way, it is He Himself Who leads to His creation. He Himself leads us to Himself; in this sense, He is the speech and the Speaker and the meaning; and at this stage, we may say that His speech is His person or an attribute of His person. Also, He Himself, by creating the universe, leads us to His power and wisdom; the universe is, thus, His speech to lead us to the Creator; and in this sense, speech (i.e., the universe) is an attribute of His action.

The author says: Quite apart from the question of the correctness of this interpretation, the words of the Qur’ān do not support it.

Speech, as mentioned in the Qur’ān and sunnah, is something different from the Speaker and the hearer. Allāh says: Among them are some to whom Allāh spoke (2:253); and Allāh spoke to Mūsā (directly) speaking (4:164); and Allāh said: ‘‘O ‘Īsā!’’ (3:55); and We said: ‘‘O Ādam!’’ (2:35); Surely We have revealed to you (4:163); informed me the All-knowing, the All-aware (66:3); there are numerous similar verses. Obviously, the speech or talk mentioned in them cannot mean the Person of Allāh by any stretch of imagination.

DISCUSSION OF SPEECH IN THEOLOGY: This subject was among the very first points of contention in the Muslim world; and that is why theology was named 'ilmu 'l-kalām (عِلْمُ الْكَلاَم = the knowledge of speech) in Islam. The question which split the Muslim scholars was whether the speech of Allāh was eternal.

The Ash'arites said that it was eternal. But they invented a new meaning for 'speech'. According to them, 'speech' means the thought and meaning which is found in the mind of the speaker, and the spoken word is a mere manifestation of that 'speech'. They named it al-kalāmu 'n-nafsī (الْكَلاَمُ النَّفْسِيُّ) that is, the speech found in the person. Armed with this new meaning, they said that the ideas and thoughts of Allāh are nothing more or less than the Knowledge of Allāh. And, as the knowledge of Allāh, they are self-existent, eternal. So far as the spoken words are concerned, they are obviously created, and separate from the person of Allāh.

The Mu'tazilites said that it was created. And they interpreted 'speech' as the words which are spoken and which show the meanings for which they are made. They said that this was the meaning of 'speech' as understood by all; and what the Ash'arites had named ''the speech found in the person'' is not speech; it is knowledge. In other words, when we talk, we do not find in our minds anything other than the mental pictures or the meanings which we express in our words. If that mental picture is called ''the speech found in the person'' then it is knowledge and nothing else. And if they use this name for something else, that something is unknown to us all.

The Ash'arites say that it is possible to use two or more adjectives or names for a single thing, depending on the aspect or aspects which are to be emphasized. Now, if we think about that mental picture in terms of its being the picture of a truth or fact, then it will be called ''knowledge''; and if we look at it as a picture which can be transmitted to others, then it will be called ''speech''.

The author says: All this conflict and polemic is quite beside the point. The Knowledge of Allāh, whether its meaning, is al-'ilmu 'l-ḥūḍūrī (العِلْمُ الْحُضُوْرِيُّ), that is, the knowledge which is always present; the knowledge which is not separate from the person of Allāh.

And what these theologians, the Ash'arites and the Mu'tazilites, are arguing and talking about is al-'ilmu 'l-ḥuṣūlī' (العِلْمُ الْحُصُولِيُّ), that is, the knowledge which is acquired. Such knowledge is acquired when ideas are produced in the mind; these ideas do not exist outside the mind. And we have proved somewhere else that ideas and quiddities are abstract things which do not exist outside the minds of human bings (and of some animals which perform their duties of life with the help of the five senses and some feelings).

Allāh, High and Glorified is He, is too great to be attributed with a ‘‘mind’’ with which He might perceive ideas and quiddities, which are not found outside the imagination of the perceiver. Otherwise, He would become a compound or composed thing and would be liable to transitory phases; and even His speech would have the potentiality to be wrong. Great and Glorified is He from such things.

It is clear from the above explanation that the polemics of the Muslim theologians are totally beside the point. What they were talking about was a kind of acquired knowledge which is beneath Divine dignity. And the ever-present and eternal Knowledge of Allāh is not under dispute as it is not called ‘‘speech’’ even by the Ash‘arites.

Further details, as to how He knows the ideas which we express in words, will be given in a more appropriate place.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: Allāh is He besides Whom there is no god, the Ever-living, the Self-subsisting by Whom all subsist: In the chapter of the Opening, some explanation was given of the name, ''Allāh'', and it was mentioned that it ultimately means ''The Being Who concentrates in Himself all the attributes of perfection''; it makes no difference whether it is derived from alaha 'r-rajul (اَلَهَ الرَّجُلُ = the man was bewildered; yearned for) or from alaha (اَلَهَ = worshipped). ''He besides Whom there is no god'': It has been explained under verse 2:163. Its literal translation is, ''there is no god except He''. It shows that other deities worshipped besides Allāh, in fact have no existence at all.

''Ever-living'': ''al-ḥayy'' (اَلحَيُّ) is on a paradigm which denotes perpetuity; the word, therefore, means not only living but Ever-living. Man, in the very beginning, found out that there were two kinds of things around him: first, those things whose condition do not change as long as they exist, like stones and other such materials; second, those which go on changing, like trees, animals and man himself. He also found that after sometimes such things start to deteriorate, and even lose consciousness; still they exist; until at a certain point when their existence come to an end. Thus he realized that there was something else, besides the senses, which keeps one alive and which is the source of all the senses and their perceptions. He called it ''life'', and its absence was named ''death''. It is life which is the source of knowledge (perception) and power.

Allāh has mentioned this life in many places as an accepted fact: Know that Allāh gives life to the earth after its death (29:17); And among His signs is this, that you see the earth still, but when We send down on it the water, it stirs and swells; most surely He who gives it life is the Giver of life to the dead (41:39); Neither are the living and the dead alike (35:22); We have made of water every thing living (21:30). These verses describe all three kinds of living things, the vegetable, the animal and the human being.

Likewise, Allāh describes various types of life; . . . and are pleased with the world's life and are content with it . . . (10:7); They shall say: ''Our Lord! twice didst Thou make us subject to death and twice hast Thou given us life . . . (40:11). The two lives refered to in this verse are the life of al-barzakh (اَلبَرْزَخُ = the period after death in this world and before the Dayof Resurrection) and the life on the Day of Resurrection. Thus, there are various types of life, as there are various types of living things.

Although Allāh mentions the life of this world as an accepted fact, in various other verses of the Qur'ān He describes it as an unsound, imperfect and insignificant thing, as He says: . . . this world's life is nothing compared with hereafter but (only a) means (13:26); . . . coveting the (transitory) goods of this world's life . . . (4:94); . . . desiring the adornments of this world's life . . . (18:28); And this world's life is naught but a play and an idle sport . . . (6:32); . . . and this world's life is naught but means of deception (57:20). So these are the attributes used for this world's life. It is a means, and a means is sought to obtain an end and to reach a goal, it is not an end in itself. It is a transitory thing, and transitory things go away soon. It is an adornment, and an adornment is used to attract eyes towards the things adorned: in other words, what catches the eyes is not the real thing, and the real thing does not attract the eyes. It is a play, and a play keeps you oblivious of the really important responsibilities. It is a vain sport, and a vain sport is indulged in for imaginary, not real, reasons. And it is a means of deception, and such a thing deceives man.

A comprehensive verse, which also explains the above-mentioned ones, is the following:

> And this life of the world is nothing but a sport and a play; and as for the next abode, the most surely is the life — did they but know! (29:64).

The life of this world, in comparison to the life hereafter is not a real life, as the above-mentioned verse shows. It is transitory, while the life hereafter is the real life, because that life will not end; death will not reach it. Allāh says: . . . in security; they shall not taste therein death except the first death (44:55 — 56); They shall have therein what they wish and with Us is more yet (50:35).

Thus, there will be no death in the life hereafter, and there shall be no deficiency in that life nor there shall be any annoyance for them. But the first factor, that is, security is the basic characteristic of that real life.

The life hereafter, therefore, is the real life because there is no death in it; and, as Allāh Himself has declared in many other verses, it is He Who controls it. Obviously, the life hereafer is also dependent and not independent. It has not got this characteristic of eternity by itself; it is a gift given to it by God.

Going a step further, it will be realized that the real life is only that which 'cannot' be overtaken by death. The life hereafter 'will not' be overtaken by death; but it 'can' be overtaken, if God so pleases. Therefore, that also is not ''real'' life. Real life is that in which non-existence at any stage is impossible; which is essential being; in other words, where life is not acquired by the person, but the person is life itself and life is the person himself. Allāh says: and rely on the Ever-living Who dies not (25:58). Thus, the only real life is Divine Life, Essential Being.

The above discourse shows that the exclusiveness in the verse: He is the Living, there is no god but He (40:65) is real, not relative: In reality, He is the only Living One, because real life, unconquered by death or deterioration, is His alone.

In the verse under discussion, as in a similar verse: Allāh there is no god but He, the Ever-living, the Self-subsisting . . .(3:2), the word ''Allāh'' is the subject, ''there is no god but He'' is its first predicate, ''the Ever-living'' is the second and ''the Self-subsisting . . .'' the third predicate. Accordingly, the meaning would be ''Allāh is the Ever-living . . .''; and life would be reserved for Allāh only; others would get life only when He bestows it on them.

''al-Qayyūm'' (الْقَيُّوْمُ = the Self-subsisting by Whom all subsist) is on the paradigm of fay'ūl (فَيْعُوْلُ), from the verb al-qiyām (الْقِيَامُ = to stand); as is al-qayyām (الْقَيَّامُ) on the paradigm of fay'āl (فَيْعَال), in the same meaning. It is a paradigm which is used to show the maximum degree of a quality. The original meaning of the verb (to stand) has, by association, been extended and now it is used for protecting a thing, accomplishing a task and managing it, bringing up a thing, looking after it and having power over it. Allāh clearly said that He ''stands'' with the affairs of His creation, that is, watches it, looks after it and brings it up and has all power over it. He says: Is it He then who stands over (i.e., watches) every soul as to what it earns? (13:33). Another verse is more comprehensive: Allāh bears witness that there is no god but He (and so do the angels and those possessed of knowledge), standing with (maintaining) justice, there is no god but He, the Mighty, the Wise (3:18). He maintains His creation with justice. He does not give and does not withhold but with justice — and existence is nothing except giving and withholding. He gives to everything what it deserves. Lastly, He declares that this maintaining with justice is according to His two great names, the Mighty, the Wise: by His Might He maintains every thing; and by His Wisdom He, does justice to it.

Allāh is the origin of every thing. Existence as well as all attributes, qualities and the effects of every thing begin from Him. All other ‘‘origins’’ originates from Him. He stands over every thing in the real and comprehensive sense of ‘‘standing’’, as explained above. There is no weakness or flaw in His ‘‘standing’’; and other things cannot stand except by Him. This attribute is reserved for Him in both ways: ‘‘Standing’’. cannot be found except in Allāh, and Allāh is never anything but standing. The former is understood by the syntax of the sentence: Allāh is the ‘‘Standing’’. The latter is understood by the next sentence: ‘‘Slumber does not overtake Him nor sleep’’.

This discourse leads us to believe that the name al-qayyūm (The Standing) is the basis for all the divine names which refer to His attributes of action in any way, like the Creator, the Sustainer, the Originator, the Resurrector, the Bestower of life, the Giver of death, the Forgiver, the Compassionate, the Affectionate and so on.

QUR’ĀN: Slumber does not overtake Him nor sleep: ‘‘as-Sinah’’ (السِّنَةُ) means drowsiness; ‘‘an-nawm’’(النَّوْمُ) is sleep, the inert condition in which the muscles are relaxed and the consciousness suppressed by natural factors in the body of an animal or a human being. ‘‘ar-Ru’yā’’ (الرُّؤْيَا = dream) is something else; it is the vision which passes through the mind in sleep.

A criticism has been levelled against this sentence that is contrary to the sequence demanded by rhetoric: when two things are thus mentioned [i]n an affirmative sentence the weaker point is mentioned first and then one progress to the stronger one; for example, we say, ‘‘Zayd can carry a load of fifty kilogram, even a hundred.’’ But in a negative sentence the sequence is reversed; it goes from stronger to weaker point; for example, ‘‘He cannot carry a load of a hundred kilogram, let alone fifty’’; ‘‘he does not spend hundreds of pounds on himself, let alone tens.’’ According to this rule, as the sentence here is negative, it should have been written thus: ‘‘Sleep does not overtake Him nor slumber’’.

REPLY: The sequence does not always follow the affirmativeness or negativeness of the sentence. Look, for example, as the sentence, ‘‘He is too weak to carry a load of twenty kilogram or even ten.’’ It is an affirmative sentence, and still the stronger point comes first. It would be against the norms of rhetoric, if the weaker point, that is, 10 kilogram were mentioned first. In fact, the only correct procedure is to look at the context and see what it demands. Now, look at this Qur’ānic sentence. Sleep is more contrary to the attribute of ‘‘Standing’’ in comparison to slumber. Therefore, eloquence demanded that, first, slumber be denied, and. then the stronger point, sleep, be negated. The meaning, thus, will be: The weaker factor (slumber) has no effect on His power and standing, nor does even the stronger one (sleep).

QUR’ĀN: Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His; who is he that can intercede with Him but by His permission?: The perfect and comprehensive ‘‘Standing’’ of Allāh means that He owns, in real ownership, the heavens and the earth and what is in them. That is why His attribute of ‘‘Standing’’ is followed here by a declaration of that ownership. It was for the same reason that the attribute of ‘‘Standing’’ was joined with the declaration of His Oneness: His Oneness would not be complete if He were not ‘‘Standing’’.

There are two sentences here, both of which are followed by other sentences to remove chances of misunderstandings. The sentence, ‘‘whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His’’, is followed by the sentence, ‘‘who is he that can intercede with Him but by His permission?’’ And the next sentence, ‘‘He knows what is before them and what is behind them’’, is followed by the words, ‘‘and they cannot comprehend anything of His Knowledge except what He pleases.’’

‘‘Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His’’: Allāh owns everything, and has authority over them all. Things and all their attributes, properties and traits exist because of God and by Him. The verse, from the word ‘‘the Self-subsisting’’ upto this sentence, proves that the total authority is Allāh’s alone. There is no work connected with anything, right from its existence upto its ultimate end, that is not done by Him and does not proceed from Him.

On realizing this eternal truth, one might wonder about the system of ‘‘cause-and-effect’’ prevalent in this world. What is the significance of these causes? How could they have any influence on any effect when nothing has any effect or power except Allāh?

The sentence, ‘‘who is he that can intercede with Him but by His permission?’’ answers this speculation. These causes are intermediaries in such affairs. In other words, they are intercessors who cause the bringing of a thing or effect into being, by the permission of Allāh. Intercession means being an intermediary in bringing about a good or averting an evil. There is no doubt that an intercessor has some influence on the affairs of the thing for which he intercedes. Such influence could be contrary to the complete authority and total sovereignty of Allāh, had it not been based on the permission of Allāh Himself. But every cause draws its effectiveness only from the decree of Allāh Himself. There is no cause and no instrument which is independent of the will of Allāh. Every cause is a cause, because Allāh has made it so. Therefore, whatever effect and influence it has on anything is in fact done by Allāh. Ultimately, there is no authority except that of Allāh, and no ‘‘standing’’ except His.

As already explained, intercession means being an intermediary in the world of cause and effect — it may be a creative intercession, that is, being an intermediary cause of creation; or a legislative intercession, that is, interceding in the award of recompense on the Day of Judgement, as is clearly mentioned in the Qur’ān and sunnah (as was described in the commentary on verse 2:48). The sentence, ‘‘who is he that can intercede with Him . . .’’ is preceded by a description of His ‘‘Standing’’ and total authority; these two attributes cover His power and authority in both creation and legislation. Therefore, the intercession mentioned in this sentence must cover both creative and legislative intercessions.

The context of this verse, so far as intercession is concerned, is like the following verses: Surely your Lord is Allāh Who created the heavens and the earth in six periods, and He is firmly established on the ‘Arsh (Throne) regulating the affair; there is no intercessor except after His permission; this is Allāh, your Lord; therefore worship Him; will you not then ponder? (10:3); Allāh is He Who created the heavens and the earth and what is between them in six periods, and He is firmly established on the ‘Arsh (Throne); you have not besides Him any guardian or any intercessor; will you not then ponder? (32:4). It was described in the topic of intercession that it includes creative causation as well as legislative intercession. Every cause intercedes with Allāh for its effect, and becomes a medium for bestowing the grace of existence on it, by adhering to the divine attributes of grace and mercy. The system of ‘‘cause-and-effect’’ is found in intercession as well as in prayer and invocation. Allāh says: All those who are in the heavens and the earth do beseech Him; every day He is in a (new) splendour (55:29) ; And He gave you of all that you ask Him (14:34). This aspect has been described in the commentary on verse 2:186.

QUR’ĀN: He knows what is before them and what is behind them, and they cannot comprehend anything out of His knowledge except what He pleases: The sentence comes after the topic of intercession, and in its context it is like the following verses: Nay! They are honoured servants; they do not precede Him in speech and (only) according to His commandment do they act. He knows what is before them and what is behind them, and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves, and for fear of Him they tremble (21:26 — 28).

Apparently, the pronouns of the third person plural in the verse under discussion refer to the intercessors, who are implied in the preceding sentence. To say that ‘‘He knows what is before them and what is behind them’’ is to say that He encompasses them completely. He has given them permission to intercede; but it does not mean that they can do anything without His prior permission. Nor may others take undue advantage of that intercession.

The following two verses throw light on the same subject: And we do not come down but by the command of your Lord; His is whatever is before us and whatever is behind us and whatever is between these, and your Lord is not forgetful (19:64); The Knower of the unseen! So He does not reveal His secret to any, except to him whom He chooses of an apostle; for surely He makes a guard to march before him and after him, so that He may know that they have indeed delivered the messages of their Lord, and He encompasses what is with them and He takes account of every thing (72:26 — 28). These two verses show that Allāh encompasses the angels and the prophets, so that they cannot do anything without His permission; they cannot descend unless bidden to do so, and cannot deliver except what He wishes them to deliver. It may be inferred that ‘‘what is before them’’ refers to what is seen by them; and ‘‘what is behind them’’ to what is not seen by them and is far away from them. In other words, the two phrases refer to the seen and the unseen. In short, the sentence says that Allāh knows very well what is present with them and what is yet to come to them; and then the talk is completed by the words, ‘‘and they cannot comprehend any thing out of His knowledge except what He pleases’’. He knows them and encompasses what they know, but they cannot comprehend His knowledge except what He pleases.

We have proved that the intercessor, in this verse, means both creative causes and legislative interceders. The pronouns used in three places in this verse are those of the third person plural, masculine gender, normally used for rational beings. Someone might think that these pronouns could not be used for creative causes (as these causes are not ‘‘people’’ or rational beings). It is not so. Intercession, interceding, glorifying the Creator and offering thanks to Him are normally the acts of rational beings; and for this reason the Qur’ān mostly uses such pronouns even for inert or lifeless things, when it declares them to perform such deeds. Allāh says:. . . and there is not a single thing but glorifies Him with His praise, but you do not understand their glorification (17:44); Then He directed Himself to the heaven and it was vapour, so He said to it and to the earth; Come both willings or unwillingly. They both said. We come willingly (41:11). In both verses the pronouns of rational beings have been used for ‘‘everything’’ and for the heaven and the earth. There are many similar verses.

The sentence, ‘‘and they cannot comprehend anything out of His knowledge except what He pleases’’, shows total authority and perfect management. Perfect management demands that the subordinate should not know what is to happen next; otherwise, he might try to wriggle out of a forthcoming unpleasant situation, and the plan of the manager might be put in disorder. It is easy to see in the light of the above discussion the import of this sentence: it wants to show that the management of all affairs is in the hands of Allāh only, and it is done by His knowledge and by His control of the intermediary causes which He Himself has created. So far as these intermediary causes are concerned (and especially those with life and intellect), their effectiveness and their knowledge is derived from His knowledge, will and pleasure — and ultimately is a reflection of divine knowledge and power. And none of them can proceed against the will and decree of Allāh in any way.

The sentence, moreover, shows that knowledge (not ‘‘the thing known’’) is of Allāh only. No creature has any knowledge except what Allāh is pleased to bestow upon him. It is the same as when Allāh has said that power, honour and life belongs to Him only. For example: . . . and O that those who are unjust could see, when they see the chastisement, that the power is wholly Allāh's, and that Allāh is severe in requitting (evil) (2:165); Do they seek honour from them? Then surely all honour is for Allāh (4:139); He is the Living, there is no god but He (40:65). The following verses also may be brought as evidence that knowledge belongs to Allāh only: surely He is the Knowing, the Wise (12:83); and Allāh knows while yo do not know (3:66). There are many other verses of the same meaning.

The verb of knowledge in the preceding sentence has been changed to the verb of comprehension here and it has raised the verse to a very high plane of eloquence.

QUR'ĀN: His Chair (knowledge) extends over the heavens and the earth: ‘‘al-Kursi’’ (الكُرْسِيُّ) means chair. Metaphorically it sometimes is used for kingdom; thus the chair of king means the sphere of his authority and the region under his sovereignty.

The preceding sentences show that the whole universe belongs to Allāh and is encompassed by His knowledge. This sentence also says that His ‘‘Chair’’ extends over the whole universe. It is reasonable to believe that the extension of the ‘‘Chair’’ refers to all-encompassing divine authority. The ‘‘Chair’’, thus, would mean the divine position by which the heavens and the earth are maintained, possessed, managed and known. Ultimately, the ‘‘Chair’’ would be a degree of divine knowledge. And extension of the chair would mean maintainance and preservation of everything that is in the heavens and in the earth, with all its characteristics; and that is why the sentence is followed by the words, ‘‘and the preservation of them both tires Him not.’’

QUR'ĀN: ‘‘and the preservation of them both tires Him not, and He is the Most High, the Great’’: ‘‘al-Awd’’ (الأَوْدُ) means to tire, to weigh down, to depress. Although, the objective pronoun after the verb ‘‘tires’’ is generally taken to refer to ‘‘Allāh’’ (as is seen in the translation), equally correctly it may be taken to refer to the ‘‘Chair’’ and then it would be translated as ‘‘tires it not’’. The declaration at the end of the verse that ‘the preservation of the heavens and the earth tires Him not’ is befitting to its beginning: ‘‘Slumber does not overtake Him nor sleep’’.

This verse, in short, says that there is no god except Allāh, for Him is Life and to Him belongs the attribute of al-qayyūmiyyah (الْقَيُّوْمِيَّةُ = Standing, Self-subsisting by Whom all subsist), in its unrestricted sense without any weakness or defect. That is why the verse ends on the words, ‘‘and He is Most High, the Great’’. He is Most High: the hands of creatures cannot reach Him and can in no way weaker His authority or enfeeble His being. He is Great: the great number of the creatures does not overwhelm Him, and the magnitude of the heavens and the earths does not tire Him.

This sentence also shows that eminence and greatness in their true sense are for Allāh only. This restriction is real, because eminence and greatness are parts of perfection, and every perfection in its real sense is found in Allāh only. Also, the restriction may have been used to strengthen the claim that the eminence and greatness are reserved for Allāh only — the heavens and the earth are insignificant before His majesty and greatness.

TRADITIONS

al-‘Ayyāshī narrates in his at-Tafsīr from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.): ‘‘Abū Dharr said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! What is the best of that which has been revealed to you?’ He said: ‘The verse of the ‘‘Chair’’. The seven heavens and the seven earths in the ‘‘Chair’’ are but like a ring thrown in a vast open space.’ Then he said: ‘And surely the excellence of al-‘Arsh (الْعَرْشُ = the Throne) over the chair is like that of the open space over the ring.’ ’’

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has quoted the first part of this tradition in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from Ibn Rāhwayh (in his al-Musnad) who has narrated it from ‘Awf ibn Mālik from Abū Dharr; and also he has quoted Aḥmad, Ibnu ’ḍ-Ḍarīs and al-Ḥākim (who said that it is correct) and al-Bayhaqī (in his Shu'abu'l-'īmān) who have narrated it from Abū Dharr.

Aḥmad and aṭ-Ṭabarānī have narrated from Abū Amāmah who said: ''I said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! Which (verse) revealed to you is the greatest?' He said: 'Allāh is He besides Whom there is no god, the Ever-living, the Self-subsisting by Whom all subsist; the verse of the Chair.' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has also narrated the same thing through al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (in his Tārīkh) from Anas from the Prophet.

In the same book he quotes ad-Dārimī who has narrated from Ayfa' ibn 'Abdullāh al-Kalā'ī that he said: ''A man said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! Which verse in the Book of Allāh is the greatest?' He said: 'The verse of the Chair; Allāh is He besides Whom there is no god, the Ever-living, the Self-subsisting by Whom all subsist . . .' ''

The author says: This verse was named ''the verse of the Chair'' in the early period of Islam during the lifetime of the Prophet; and was thus described by the Prophet himself as the traditions quoted from him and the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt and the companions prove. That this verse was given a special name shows how much importance was attached to it. It could only be because of the highest nobility of its meaning and the elegance and grace of its style. It establishes the pristine belief of the Oneness of God (Allāh is He besides Whom there is no god), and then goes on to the attribute of ''standing'' which is the foundation of all His names which describe His attributes of action. Then it gives details of those attributes in all small and big things and affairs of the universe, showing that whatever emanates from His authority is a part of that authority. It is because of these fine points that the traditions have called it ''the greatest verse of the Qur'ān''. It deals in detail with various aspects of monotheism and divine authority. Of course, there are some other verses which deal with this subject, for example; Allāh is He besides Whom there is no god; His are the very best names (20:8). But it lacks the details which have been given in this verse of the Chair. It is for this reason that some traditions have said that the verse of the Chair is the chief of all the verses of the Qur'ān. See for the proof the tradition narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Abū Hurayrah from the Prophet. Some, other traditions say: Every thing has a summit, and the summit of the Qur'ān is the verse of the Chair. It has been narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from 'Abdullāh ibn Sinān from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.).

aṭ-Ṭūsī has narrated in his al-Amālī, through his chains from Abū Amāmah al-Bāhilī that he heard 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.) say: ''I do not think that a man who enters into Islam on attaining wisdom, or was born in Islam (i.e., in a Muslim family) should pass a night's darkness . . .'' (At this juncture Abū Amāmah interrupted by asking, ''and what is the meaning of a night's darkness?'' 'Alī [a.s.] said: ''the whole night'') ''until he recites this verse: Allāh is He besides Whom there is no god . . . ''; and he recited the complete verse upto the end: and the preservation of them both tires Him not; and He is the Most High, the Great. Then he said: ''If you but knew what it is (or, as another version says, ''what is in it'') you would not leave it on any condition. Surely, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said, 'I have been given the verse of the Chair from the treasure (that is) below al-'Arsh (the Throne); and no prophet before me was given it:' '' Then 'Alī (a.s.) continued: ''I have not spent a single night, since I heard it from the Messenger of Allāh, without reciting it . . .''

The author says: This has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr quoting 'Ubayd, Ibn Abī Shaybah, ad-Dārimī, Muḥammad ibn Naṣr, Ibnu 'ḍ-Ḍarīs and ad-Daylamī, all from 'Alī (a.s.). There is a multitude of traditions, from both Sunnī and Shī'ite sources, about the excellence of this verse. The tradition of the Prophet quoted in this tradition (''I have been given the verse of the Chair from below the Throne'') has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr on the authority of al-Bukhārī (in his at-Tārīkh) and Ibnu 'ḍ-Ḍarīs from the Prophet. It may be inferred from it that the Chair is below al-'Arsh and is encompassed by it. We shall describe it later.

Zurārah said: ''I asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: His Chair extends over the heavens and the earth — whether the heavens and the earth encompass the Chair or the Chair extends over the heavens and the earth? He said: 'Verily, every thing is in the Chair.' '' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: In many traditions the same point has been emphasized in reply to similar questions. This question looks strange, because nobody has ever recited the verse in a way which could justify such confusion. Apparently, the questions were based not on the recital of the Qur'ān but on the common understanding that the Chair was a particular body kept over the heavens or over the seventh heaven (i.e. above the material world), and from there the affairs of the material world were managed. That being the picture of the Chair in their minds, it was reasonable to suppose that the heavens and the earth encompassed the Chair because it was placed over the heavens as a wooden or iron chair is placed over a floor. And with this background it would seem more appropriate to say that the heavens and the earth encompassed the Chair. And that gave rise to the question as to why Allāh, instead, said: ''His Chair extends over the heavens and the earth?'' A question of the same type was asked about the 'Arsh and the reply was given that the extension (or encompassing) was not as a material thing encompasses another material thing.

Ḥafṣ ibn al-Ghiyāth said: ''I asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: His Chair extends over the heavens and the earth. He said: 'His knowledge.' '' (Ma'āni'l-akhbār)

There is another tradition in the same book from the same Imām about this verse which says: ''The heavens and the earth and whatever is between them is in the Chair, and the Throne is that knowledge which no one can measure.''

The author says: These two traditions show that the Chair is one of the levels of the knowledge of Allāh. Many other traditions supports this interpretation.

As will be explained later, there exists a level of knowledge which is not limited or measured. In other words, there is a world, on a higher plane than ours, whose constituents are not bound by material dimensions. They exist and at the same time are known to Allāh. And that knowledge also is unlimited. God willing, we shall describe it in detail when commenting on the verse 10:61: . . . and there does not lie concealed from your Lord the weight of an atom in the earth or in the heaven, nor any thing than that nor greater, but it is in a clear book. This boundless knowledge has been refered to in the tradition of the Imām in these words, ''and the 'Arsh is that knowledge which no one can measure.'' The import of the tradition is not to show the great number of the known things, because number is not unlimited and anything which is created is finite. What the tradition wants to say is that the limitations and restrictions of this material world are not found in that world. Existence, on that level, is perfect and the conditions, dimensions and distinctions of this material world are not found there. It is as Allāh says: And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure (15:21).

When those existing things are known by unlimited knowledge, that is, when they exist without any limitation attached to them, that knowledge is called al-'Arsh (The Throne); and when they exist in the world of limitations and known with those limitations, that knowledge is called al-Kursī (The Chair).

At this stage we may probably say that the words, ''He knows what is before them and what is behind them'' allude to this plane of knowledge. What is before them (i.e. the future) and what is behind them (i.e. the past) is not what is with them (i.e. the present). It refers to a plane where past, present, and future loose their limitations of time, and are all equally present.

Ḥannān said: ''I asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about the Throne and the Chair. He replied: 'Verily, the Throne has many diverse attributes. Allāh uses in the Qur'ān various adjectives to describe its various aspects. He says: the Lord of the great Throne (9:129). It means; Lord of the great kingdom or authority. And He says: The Beneficent (God) on the Throne is firm (20:5). It means that He is firm in His kingdom. And it is the knowledge of the ''how'' of the things. Also, the Throne, although together with it, is distinct from the Chair; because they are two of the greatest doors of the unseen, and they both are unseen. And they are together in the unseen, because the Chair is the manifest door of the unseen, from which appears creation and from which all the things come. And the Throne is the concealed door of the unseen in which is found the knowledge of the states, conditions and existence; of measure and limit; of will and intention; as well as the knowledge of words, actions and omissions, and the knowledge of the beginning and the return. Thus, the two are two gates of knowledge joined together, because the dominion of the Throne is other than the dominion of the Chair, and its (the Throne's) knowledge is more hidden than the knowledge of the Chair. That is why Allāh said, ''the Lord of the great Throne'' ; that is, its attribute is greater than that of the Chair, and both are joined in it.' '' (Ḥannān says) ''I said: 'May I be your ransom, then why did it become associated with the Chair in excellence?' He (the Imām) said: It was associated with it because the knowledge of the state and condition is found in it. And in it are found the manifest doors of al-badā' (البدآء = the decree hidden from other); as well as its reality and the dimensions of its joining and separating. Therefore, they are two neighbours, one of which contains the other in itself. And by similitudes are turned those who know, and so that they may offer proof for the truth of their claims. Because He chooses especially whom He pleases for His mercy, and He is the Mighty, the Powerful.' '' (at-Tawḥīd)

The author says: The words of the tradition, ''the Chair is the manifest door of the unseen'', may be understood in the light of the short explanation given earlier. The level of the knowledge of measured things is nearer to our material world than infinite knowledge which has no limits. Further explanation will be given under verse 7:54: Surely your Lord is Allāh Who created the heavens and the earth in six periods of time, and He is firm on the Throne.

''And by similitudes are turned those who know'': It is an indication that the words, throne, chair and similar other expressions, are similitudes which have been given to people for their understanding, and only those who have knowledge understand this.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a tradition: ''Every thing which Allāh has created is in the receptacle of the Chair, except His Throne, because that is too great for the Chair to encompass.'' (al-Iḥtijāj)

The author says: Its meaning may be understood from the earlier discourse. And it is in conformity with other traditions. Contrary to it there is a tradition which says that the Throne is that knowledge which Allāh gave to His prophets and apostles and the Chair is that knowledge which no one was made aware of. It has been narrated by aṣ-Ṣadūq through Mufaḍḍal from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.). But in view of all other traditions, it can only be surmized that the narrator was confused and changed the names, Throne and Chair, from their proper places. If this is not accepted then the tradition will have to be discarded like the one that is attributed to Zaynab al-'Aṭṭārah.

al-'Ayyāshī narrates in his at-Tafsīr from 'Alī (a.s.) that he said: ''Verily the heavens and the earth and whatever is between them is created in the hollow of the Chair; and it has four angels who bear it by the order of

Allāh.''

The author says: aṣ-Ṣadūq has narrated it from ʻAlī (a.s.) through Aṣbagh ibn Nubātah. It is the only tradition narrated from Ahlu 'l-bayt which says that there are angels who bear the Chair. But other traditions mention such bearers only for the Throne; and it is in conformity with the Book of Allāh, as He says: Those who bear the Throne and those around it celebrate the praise of their Lord . . . (40:7); and above them eight shall bear on that day the Throne of your Lord (69:17). It may be said that the Chair is somewhat joined with the Throne, as a manifest side of a thing is joined with its hidden side; and in this way the bearers of one may be called the bearers of the other.

al-ʻAyyāshī narrates in his at-Tafsīr from Muʻāwiyah ibn ʻAmmār that he asked aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about (the verse), Who is it that can intercede with Him but by His permission? He said: ''We are those intercessors.''

The author says: It has also been narrated by al-Barqī in al-Maḥāsin. You know that the intercession in this verse is common to creative and the legislative intercedings, and therefore includes the intercession of the Prophet and the Imāms. This tradition, thus, gives an example of the intercessors.

QUR'ĀN: There is no compulsion in the religion; truly the right way has become clearly distinct from error: ''al-Ikrāh'' (الاِكْرَاهُ) means to compel someone to a work without his willingness. ''ar-Rushd'' (الرُّشْدُ) is to get at the reality of an affair; to reach the right path. ''al-Ghayy'' (الغَيُّ) is its opposite. These two words are more general than ''al-hudā'' (الهُدَي) (to find the path which leads to the destination) and ''aḍ-ḍalāl'' (الضَّلاَلُ) (not to find such path) respectively. Obviously, when the word ar-rushd is used for reaching the right path it is done in the way of applying a general word for a particular example: a walker reaches reality when he travels on the right path. Thus the words ar-rushd and al-hudā are made for two different meanings, but one is used for the other because of a special associations. Allāh says: . . . then if you find in them maturity of intellect: ''rushdan'' (رُشْداً) (4:6); And certainly We gave to Ibrāhīm his rectitude: ''rushdahu'' (رُشْدَهُ) before (21:51).

The same applies to al-ghayy and aḍ-ḍalāl. That is why we have mentioned before that aḍ-ḍalāl is to deviate from. the right path but with knowing and remembering the goal and destination; while al-ghayy is to deviate from the right path without even remembering the goal and destination — without knowing what one wants and where one wants to go.

''There is no compulsion in the religion'' negates and disapproves compulsion and coercion in religion. Religion is a set of truths which are believed in, and some of them are then acted upon. In short, religion is belief and faith, it is a matter of conscience, and such a thing cannot be created by coercion and compulsion. One may force someone to do a certain physical action against his will but he cannot be forced to believe against his will. Belief follows reason and understanding; and nothing but reason and understanding can create it.

''There is no compulsion in religion'' may be treated as a bit of information or a piece of legislation. If it is information of a creative decree, it will give rise to a legislative order that compulsion should not be used in matters of belief and faith. And if it is an order in the form of information then the meaning is clear. Apparently, this alternative is more correct, because the next sentence (''truly the right way has become clearly distinct from error'') gives the reason for this legislation. And this prohibition of compulsion for religion is based on a factor of creation: the fact that compulsion can influence physical action but not matters connected with the heart and conscience.

‘‘Truly the right way has become clearly distinct from error’’: As mentioned above, it gives the reason for the prohibition of compulsion. A wise person resorts to compulsion only when the truth of the order cannot be explained, either because the person so coerced has no capacity to understand it or for some other reasons. But there is no need for compulsion in an important matter whose advantages and disadvantages are clearly defined and the reward and punishment of accepting and rejecting well-explained. A man, in such a clear matter, should be free to choose his course of action himself — whether he takes it or rejects it, whether he wants the rewards of obedience or is prepared to take the punishment. The realities of religion have been explained, and its path well-laid; the divine revelation and prophetic explanation have illuminated this highway to the utmost degree. It has now been made clear that the religion is truth, that the only right thing is to accept it and follow it; and that if one deviates from this road he will fall in perdition. Why should anyone, after all these clarifications, compel others to follow the religon?

It is one of the verses that show that Islam is not based on the sword and killing, and that it does not allow Muslims to compel or coerce others to accept Islam. It is contrary to the view held by many Muslims and non-Muslims alike that Islam is the religion of the sword. They bring as their evidence the legislation of jihād which is one of the pillars of Islam.

We have already clarified, while writing the commentary on the verses of fighting, that the fighting ordained by Islam is not for the purpose of material advancement nor for spreading the religion by force. It was ordained only for reviving the truth and defending the most precious treasure of nature — the faith of monotheism. Where monotheism is accepted by the people — even if they remain Jew or Christian — Islam does not fight with them. Therefore, the objection arises from clouded thinking.

The verse: ‘‘There is no compulsion in the religion’’, is not abrogated by the verse of the sword, although some writers think so. The order is followed by its reason: ‘‘truly the right way has become clearly distinct from error’’. Such an order cannot be cancelled unless and until its reason is also abrogated. So long as the reason is valid the rule must remain valid. There is no need to emphasize that the verse of the sword cannot negate the clear distinction of the right way from error. For example, the verses: . . . and kill them wherever you find them. . . (4:89) and: And fight in the way of Allāh . . . (2:190), have no effect whatsoever on the clear distinction of truth from falsehood; and therefore they cannot abrogate an order based on that distinction.

In other words, this order is based on the fact that the right way is made clearly distinct from error. And this distinction is as valid after the revelation of the verses of fighting as it was before that. And as the cause is not changed, the effect, that is, the said order, cannot be changed or cancelled.

QUR'ĀN: Therefore, whoever disbelieves in the rebels (false deities) and believes in Allāh, he indeed has laid hold on the strongest handle, for which there is no break off: ''aṭ-Ṭāghūt'' (الطَّاغُوْتُ) means rebellion and transgression. This paradigm conveys an intensification of the meaning of the root like al-malakūt (المَلَكُوتُ = great kingdom) and al -jabarūt (الجَبَرُوْتُ = great power). aṭ-Ṭāghūt is used for the agents and causes of rebellion and transgression like false deities and idols, satans, jinn and wrong leaders among the human beings; and, in short, everyone who is followed without the permission of Allāh. This word is common for masculine and feminine genders, as well as for singular, dual and plural numbers.

In this sentence, disbelief in the rebels has been mentioned before belief in Allāh. This sequence keeps in view the next sentence (he indeed has laid hold on the strongest handle). When one wants to lay one's hold on a thing, one has to discard all other things before that. In other words, one has first to leave unwanted things, then comes the stage of holding fast to the desired thing. Therefore, the verse mentioned first the rejection (of the rebels) and then the belief (in Allāh). ''al-Istimsāk'' (الاستِمْسَاكُ) means to hold fast; ''al-'urwah'' (العُرْوَةُ) denotes that part of thing which is made to hold it by, like the handle of a bucket, or of a pot. Also, this word is used for evergreen plants and trees. Its root meaning is attachment; it is said 'arāhu (عَرَاهُ) and i'tarāhu (اِعْتَرِيهُ), both of which mean ''was attached to him''.

The sentence, ''he indeed has laid hold on the strongest handle'', is based on allegory. It conveys the idea that belief in Allāh has the same relation with eternal bliss that a pot's handle has with that pot and its contents. You cannot be sure of your hold unless you keep the handle in your grip; likewise, one cannot be hopeful about eternal and real bliss unless one believes in Allāh rejecting all false deities.

QUR'ĀN: For which there is no break off; and Allāh is Hearing, Knowing: ''al-Infiṣām'' (الانفِصَامُ) is to be cut off, to be broken. The phrase, ''for which there is no break off'' describes the condition or state of the handle, and emphasize the phrase, ''the strongest handle''. The next sentence, ''and Allāh is Hearing, Knowing'', points to the fact that belief and disbelief are matters connected with the heart and the tongue.

QUR'ĀN: Allāh is the Guardian of those who believe . . . in it they shall abide: Some explanation has been given, in a previous verse, of ''bringing out of the darkness into the light''. It has been described there that this bringing out and other such phrases express real things, and that they are not used in any allegorical sense. There are two other interpretations given by other commentators of the Qur'ān, which we shall quote here before commenting upon them :

First Interpretation: This bringing out of the darkness into the light and other such phrases are allegorical expressions. They are used for man's actions and physical stillness and movements, and for the good or evil results of such actions. Accrodingly, ''light'' is used for correct belief which removes the darkness of ignorance, the confusion of doubt and the perplexity of the heart. Also it is a metaphor for good deeds because its connection with the right path is clear and its effect on bliss self evident. And the ''light'' has all these attributes and qualties. On the other hand, ''darkness'' is metaphorically used for wrong belief, confusion and doubt as well as for evil deeds. According to this interpretation, the bringing out from darkness into the light (attributed to Allāh) and taking out of light into the darkness (attributed to the rebels and false deities) refer to only true and wrong beliefs and good and evil deeds respectively — there is nothing other than those beliefs and deeds. Allāh or the false deities do not do any action (like bringing out) in this respect, nor is there any effect of such action (like light and darkness).

Second Interpretation: Surely Allāh does the actions like bringing the people out of the darkness into the light, giving life, bestowing abundance and mercy and similar things. And surely there appear effects of such actions, like light and darkness; the soul and mercy; and the coming down of the angels. But our intellect cannot comprehend it and our senses cannot perceive it. Even then, we believe, as we have been told by Allāh — and Allāh speaks the truth — that these things do exist and that they are the actions of Allāh, although we do not understand them.

This interpretation, like the first one, treats words like light, darkness, taking out, etc. as metaphors. The only difference between the two is that the first one says that the light and the darkness are our correct and wrong deeds and beliefs; and this one says that the light and the darkness are things other than our beliefs and deeds, but we have no way of knowing them or comprehending and understanding them.

Both the interpretations are far from the truth. One has failed to reach the target, the other has overshot it. The fact is that these things, which Allāh has said He creates and does when we obey Him or disobey Him, are real things; there is no allegory in such expressions, but these divine actions are related to our beliefs and deeds — are inseparable from them. And we have already explained this. Of course, it is admitted that the sentences, ‘‘He brings them out of the darkness into the light’’, and ‘‘(they) take them out of the light into the darkness’’, are metaphors and mean ‘‘He guides them’’ and ‘‘they misguide them’’ respectively.

In other words, there are two separate matters to decide:

1) Whether the light, the darkness and other such expressions refer to some real things in this life or are merely metaphors?

2) If they refer to some real things then, is the use, for example, of the word ‘‘light’’ for guidance real or metaphorical? According to what we have already explained, such expressions refer to real things in this life. And using the ‘‘light’’, for example, for guidance is metaphorical.

And in any case, the two sentences mentioned above, are metaphors to denote guidance and misguidance. If we were to interpret them in their literal sense, it would mean that the believer and the disbeliever both have light and darkness together. ‘‘Allāh brings the believers out of the darkness into the light’’, if literally interpreted, would mean that the believer was first in the darkness! Conversely, the second sentence would mean that the disbeliever was first in the light! How can this meaning be correct about the overwhelming majorities of believers and disbelievers who are born in believing or disbelieving families and remain in light or in darkness (as the case may be) from their birth? Such literal interpretation would mean that a child remained in light and darkness at one and the same time; and when, on attaining majority, he accepts the true faith by his own choice, he is removed out of the darkness into the light, and if he disbelieved, he was taken out of the light into the darkness. The absurdity of such an interpretation is quite obvious.

(Of course, it may be said that man in his creation, has the light of natural faith. But it is a general light, which needs details and particularization. In this way, he has the natural light; but, at the same time, is in darkness, so far as detailed knowledge and good deeds are concerned. And, looking from these different angles, it is possible for the light and the darkness to be present in one place at one time. When the believer acquires correct faith, he goes out from that darkness into the light of knowledge and good deed. And the disbeliever, by his disbelief goes out from the natural light into the darkness of disbelief and evil deeds.)

Allāh in both sentences has used ‘‘the light’’ (in the singular) and ‘‘the darkness’’ (in the plural). It is to indicate that truth is one — there is no difference in it; and that falsehood is multifaced, diverse and variable — there is no unity in it. Allāh says in another place: And (know) that this is My path, the straight one, therefore follow it; and follow not (other) ways, for they will scatter you away from His path (6:153).

TRADITIONS

Abū Dāwūd, an-Nasā’ī, Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Hātim, an-Naḥḥās (in his an-Nāsikh wa ’l-mansūkh), Ibn Mandih (in his al-Gharā’ib), Ibn Ḥibbān, Ibn Marduwayh, al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan), aḍ-Ḍiyā’ (in his al-Mukhtārah) have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘(It was customary for) a woman of the Anṣār that if her child died in infancy, she would make a vow that if her child lived she would turn him into a Jew. Thus, when the tribe of Nadīr was banished (from Medina), there were many children of the Anṣār among them. They said that they would not leave their sons (to migrate). Then Allāh sent down the verse: There is no compulsion in the religion.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: The same thing has been narrated, by other chains, from Sa'īd ibn Jubayr and ash-Sha'bī.

'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu 'l-Mundhir have narrated from Mujāhid that he said: ''(The tribe of) Naḍīr had suckled some people from the tribe of Aws. When the Prophet ordered their banishment, their foster sons from the Aws said: 'We shall go with them and enter into their religion.' But their families prevented them and compelled them to (accept) Islam. Then came down the verse about them: There is no compulsion in the religion. (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This thing too has been narrated from other sources. It is not in conflict with the preceding tradition (about the vow of the women of the Anṣār), as both may be correct.

Ibn Ishāq and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he said about the words of Allāh: There is no compulsion in the religion: ''It was revealed about a man from the Anṣār (from the clan of Banu Sālim ibn 'Awf), named al-Ḥuṣayn, who had two Christian sons, and he himself was a Muslim. So he said to the Prophet: 'Should I not compel them, because they have refused, but (remain) the Christianity.' Thereupon, Allāh sent down this (verse) about hint.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr) aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The light is the progeny of Muḥammad and the darkness are their enemies.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: This tradition gives examples of the light and the darkness, or explains its inner meaning or interpretation.

Did you not see him who disputed with Ibrāhīm about his Lord, because Allāh had given him the kingdom? When Ibrāhīm said: ''My Lord is He Who gives life and cause to die'', he said: ''I give life and cause death.'' Ibrāhīm said. ''So surely Allāh brings the sun from the east, then bring it (you) from the west.'' Thus he who disbelieved was confounded; and Allāh does not guide aright the unjust people (258). Or like him who passed by a town, and it had fallen down upon its roofs; he said: ''How will Allāh give it life after its death?'' So Allāh caused him to die for a hundred years, then raised him to life. He said: ''How long have you tarried?'' He said: ''I have tarried a day, or a part of a day.'' Said He: ''Nay! You have tarried a hundred years; then look at your food and drink — years have not passed over it; and look at your donkey; and that We may make you a sign to men; and look at the bones, how We assemble them together, then clothe them with flesh.'' So when it became clear to him, he said: ''I know that Allāh has power over all things'' (259). And (remember) when Ibrāhīm said: ''My Lord! Show me how Thou givest life to the dead.'' He said: ''What! and do you not believe?'' He said: ''Certainly, but that my heart may be at ease.'' He said: ''Then take four of the birds, then cut them (into pieces), then place on every mountain a part of them, then call them, they will come to you flying; and know that Allāh is Mighty, Wise'' (260).

COMMENTARY

The three verses describe the Oneness of the Creator and His Omnipotence. They have, therefore, some connection with the preceding verses; and possibly these were revealed together with them.

QUR'ĀN: Did you not see him who disputed with Ibrāhīm about his Lord: ''al-Muḥājjah'' (المُحَآجَّةُ) is to bring a proof against the opposite party's, to prove one's own claim or to refute the other party's argument.

The basic meaning of al-ḥujjah (الحُجَّةُ) is intention; now it is generally used for ‘‘proof’’ by which one intends to prove one’s claim. The phrase ‘‘about his Lord’’ is connected with the verb ‘‘disputed’’. The pronoun in ‘‘His Lord’’ refers to Ibrāhīm, as may be inferred from the next sentence, ‘‘Ibrāhīm said: ‘My Lord is He Who gives life and causes to die.’ ’’ The man who disputed with Ibrāhīm was the king of his time; and according to history and traditions, he was the Babylonian king, Namrūd (Nimrod).

We may understand the nature of this argument and the subject of the dispute, if we look at the context of the verse and reflect upon the behaviour of mankind in the past as well as in the present.

Man, by his nature, has always remained submissive to the powers about him which effect, in one way or the other, his life. No student of anthropology, who has studied the behaviour of the ancients, or has looked at the present generations of various nations, can have any doubt about it. We have described it in preceding discourses; and also it has been pointed out that man, by his nature, accepts that there is a Crator for the universe, Who has brought it into existence, and Who manages it. Every man, by the dictate of nature, believes this — be he a monotheist (a follower of the prophets), a polytheist (like an idol-worshipper) or an atheist (like a materialist). Nature’s demand cannot be negated so long as man is man (although the effect of it may at times become weaker or dormant).

Primitive man, in his simplicity, thought of every thing in the light of his own experience. He saw that he performs different acts by means of his different organs and limbs; and likewise, in society’s structure, various people discharge various duties and functions. And the natural phenomena in the world happen because of their respective natural causes which are closely related to them. Yet, his nature led him to believe in a Crator who had all the affairs of the universe in His hand. Not surprisingly, he thought that every phenomenon of the world had a special deity of its own — and all those deities were under the authority of a Supreme God. Sometimes he named them deities for various things; for example, the deity of the earth, the deity of the rivers, the deity of fire, the deity of wind, etc. At other times, he attributed these functions to the stars, and especially to the planets, the sun and the moon, ascribing to each various faculties believing that each of them affected this world of ours in its own way. This belief was held by the Sabaeans. The next stage was to make images and statues for those lesser deities. Then he started to worship those idols so that the particular image might intercede on behalf of the worshipper with its particular deity, which in its turn was expected to intercede with the Supreme God — thus ensuring bliss and success for the worshipper in this life and after death.

That also explains why the idols were made in different shapes in different tribes. Views and opinions as regards the attributes of various species and the conceptions of their related deities could not be the same in two nations; and even in one nation they changed with the times. Sometimes other considerations and inclinations crept into the system. Gradually, the idols usurped the place of the said deities, and even the Supreme God was relegated to obscurity. Worshippers intended to give their devotion more and more to what was near them, which they could see and touch, and thus they tended to forget what was beyond their five senses. In this way, idols took the place of the Creator. All this happened because initially they thought that those lesser deities had some influence and control over the affairs of their lives — that the will of those deities dominated their own will and that those deities' management prevailed over their own plans and management.

When some powerful personality appeared on the scene and took the reins of the kingdom in his hands, he often exploited this trend of thought; he had their affairs and their lives in his hands, and it was easy for him to claim for himself the status of divinity, declaring himself to be a god. This is what was done by Pharaoh, Namrūd and many others. It is interesting to note that such people included themselves in the list of deities, while, like their subjects, they continued to worship the idols of their nations. But invariably they always ended up by usurping the dominant position for themselves. In this design of theirs the same process of thought helped them which had raised the idols' status in their people's eyes: the king's influence, authority and hold over his people were more manifest than those of the other deities. Pharaoh declared before his people: ''I am your most high Lord'' (79:24). And he made this claim of supremacy while continuing to worship the other deities. Read for proof the words of Allāh giving the import of the talk of the courtiers of Pharaoh with him showing the danger from Mūsā (a.s.): ''. . . and to forsake you and your gods?'' (7:127). The same was the claim of Namrūd as may be inferred from his assertion: ''I give life and cause death.''

The above discourse may easily explain this dispute between Ibrāhīm (a.s.) and Namrūd. Namrūd believed that there was a Supreme God. Otherwise, he would not have been confounded by the argument of Ibrāhīm (a.s.), ‘‘So surely Allāh brings the sun from the east, then bring it (you) from the west.’’ If he had not believed in a Supreme God, he could have said that it was he (i.e., Namrūd) or some other deity, who brought the sun from the east, and not Ibrāhīm’s Allāh. Apart from the Supreme God, he and his people believed in some other deities too. The lifestory of Ibrāhīm provides ample proof that they worshipped the sun, the moon and the stars, as well as idols. Also read the talk of Ibrāhīm with his uncle on the subject of idols, and see how he shattered their idols (except the big one). All of it shows that Namrūd believed in the divinity of Allāh, as well as in other deities, but at the same time claimed to be a god — indeed the highest god — himself. That was why he tried to prove his own divinity in this dispute with Ibrāhīm, and did not even mention the other, lesser, deities.

Now we should look at the dispute. It was Ibrāhīm’s claim that his Lord is Allāh, and no one else. Namrūd said: ‘‘No! I am your Lord and the Lord of everyone else.’’ Ibrāhīm argued: ‘‘My Lord is He Who gives life and causes to die.’’ Namrūd said: ‘‘I give life and cause death.’’ He wanted to show that he held the power which Ibrāhīm attributed to his Lord; therefore, Ibrāhīm should submit to him, and worship him, neither Allāh nor other lesser deities deserved to be worshipped. Note that he did not add ‘‘and’’ in his reply; he did not say, ‘‘and I give life . . .’’ Why? Because the conjunctive ‘‘and’’ would have meant that he shared this power with Allāh; and he did not want to admit any such ‘‘partnership’’ he wanted to be worshipped as the most supreme Lord of the universe. And it was for this very reason that he did not say either, ‘‘and the gods give life . . .’’

He could not honestly refute the argument of Ibrāhīm; so he resorted to sophism, fallacy and deception. When Ibrāhīm mentioned life and death, he meant life and death as we find them in living things. His argument was that these living things could only be created by One who was the source of life. Lifeless nature cannot bestow life on others when it has no life itself. Nor can other living things give life to others, because their life is their existence and their death their extinction — and a thing cannot create or destroy its own self.

If Namrūd had interpreted Ibrāhīm's argument honestly, he could not have refuted it at all. But he resorted to deception, interpreting life and death with an allegorical meaning. ''To give life'' really means, for example, to create a living foetus; but it may be used equally correctly (but in metaphorical way) if you rescue someone from an extremely dangerous situation. Likewise, ''to cause to die'' really means the act of God by which a soul departs from a body; but metaphorically it may be used for murder, etc. Taking advantage of this metaphorical usage, Namrūd ordered two prisoners to be brought before him; one he ordered to be killed and the other was set free. It was at this stage that he uttered the words, ''I give life and cause death''. The courtiers were taken in by this ruse and accepted the ''truth'' of the argument. Ibrāhīm was not in a position to unmask the fallacy of this reply; he saw how Namrūd has duped the audience with his deception and how blindly they agreed to his sophism. Nobody would have agreed with Ibrāhīm even if he had tried to expose that fallacy. Therefore, he switched to another clearer argument which his obstinate opponent could not twist in any way, and said: ''So surely Allāh brings the sun from the east; then bring it (you) from the west.''

Those people (or some of them) believed the sun to be a deity. (Look at the story of Ibrāhīm, concerning the stars, the moon and the sun in the Qur'ān 6:77 — 78) But they also believed that these sources of light and their various phases, rising, setting, etc., were ultimately in the hands of Allāh, who, according to them, was Lord of Lords, God of gods. When a doer does an act by his own free will, he may just as easily reverse that action if he so changes his intention; the direction of his action follows his will. Therefore, when Ibrāhīm put this argument before Namrūd, he was confounded. He could not say: ''The rising of the sun from the east has been, since the very beginning, a matter of chance; it needs no cause'', because commonsense demands a cause for an effect. Nor could he say: ''This system is not caused or controlled by Allāh'', because he himself professed to believe in the Lord of Lords who controlled the sun, etc. And he could not say: ''It is I who bring it from the east''; because Ibrāhīm had already closed this line of argument by saying, ''then bring it (you) from the west''. He was thus ignominiously humiliated and disgraced. ''And Allāh does not guide aright the unjust people.''

QUR'ĀN: Because Allāh had given him the kingdom? The import of this sentence is like one's saying: ''He mistreated me because I did good to him.'' The speaker wants to say: I did good to him; it was to be expected that he also would do good to me; instead, he misbehaved towards me. An Arabic proverb points to this very trait of human nature: ''Be on guard against the evil of him to whom you did good.'' A poet says:

His sons rewarded Abu 'l-Ghaylān, for his old age and good deeds, as was rewarded Sinimmār.[1]

In this sentence L (ل = because) is deleted but understood. It puts a reason in place of its opposite. This style puts the accusation in a sharper perspective. The rebellion and trangression of Namrūd would have been understandable if there had been any ungenerosity shown towards him by Allāh. But Allāh did nothing to him except good and He gave him the kingdom too. Therefore, this generosity was mentioned as the cause of his rebellion, to emphasize his ingratitude. In a way, it is like the verse: And Pharaoh's family took him (Mūsā) up, so that he might be an enemy and a grief for them (28:8).

This is one reason why his getting the kingdom has been mentioned here. There is another reason too: to show that his claim was absurd ab initio. He claimed to be god because of the kingdom which was given to him by Allāh; he did not own it himself. He had become Namrūd, the king, the mighty and powerful, because, Allāh had made him so. Strip him of this bounty of Allāh and what was left of him? Just a common man with no special quality or attribute. That is the reason why Allāh did not mention him by name; he was described just as the one who disputed with Ibrāhīm about his Lord. This was done to show his insignificance and lowliness.

Why did Allāh say that it was He who gave Namrūd the kingdom? In previous discourses it has been shown that this cannot be objected to. The kingdom, like all other powers and authorities, is a bounty and grace of Allāh; He gives it to whom He pleases and man has been give the knowledge of God in his nature, and because of that natural instinct he inclines towards Him. Now, if he made good use of that kingdom putting every thing in its place, it would be a bliss and blessing for him, as Allāh says: And seek by means of what Allāh has given you the future abode . . . (28:77). And if he transgressed the limits and deviated from the right path, it would become a curse and perdition for him, as Allāh says: Did you not see those who changed Allāh's favour for ungratefulness and made their people to alight into the abode of perdition? (14:28). It has already been explained that every thing is attributed to Allāh, but in a way that is befitting to His majesty, glory and sanctity — from the view of the good points of that thing, and not from that of its bad points.

One commentators has erroneously thought that the pronoun, ''him'', in the phrase, ''because Allāh had given him the kingdom'' refers to Ibrahim. According to him, it means that Namrud disputed with Ibrāhīm because Allāh had given Ibrāhīm the kingdom; that it refers to the kingdom of Ibrāhīm mentioned in the Qur'ān: Or do they envy the people for what Allāh has given them of His grace? So indeed we have given to Ibrāhīm's children the Book and the wisdom, and We have given them a great kingdom (4:54). According to that commentator, the kingdom in the verse under discussion cannot refer to that of Namrūd, because it was a kingdom of oppression and sin; it cannot be said that such a kingdom was given by Allāh.

But this assumption is wrong because:

First: The Qur'ān attributes such a kingdom and many similar things to Allāh. For example, it quotes the believer from the family of Pharaoh as saying: O my people! Yours is the kingdom this day, being masters in the land. . . (40:29); and the words of Pharaoh himself are quoted (without any adverse comment): O my people! Is not the kingdom of Egypt mine? (43:51). And at the same time it declares: . . . to Him (i.e. Allāh) belongs the kingdom . . . (64:1). This verse confines the kingdom to Allāh; there is no kingdom but of Him and from Him. The Qur'ān quotes Mūsā (a.s.) as saying: Our Lord! Surely Thou host given to Pharaoh and his chiefs finery and riches in this world's life . . . (10:88); and Allāh says about Qārūn: . . . and We had given him of the treasures, so much so that its keys would certainly weigh down a company of men possessed of strength . . . (28:76); and He says addressing his Prophet: Leave Me and him whom I created alone, and I gave him vast riches. . . (74:11 — 12); there are many similar references.

Second: Such an interpretation does not fit the obvious meaning of the verse. The verse shows that Namrūd was disputing with Ibrāhīm about the latter's belief and monotheism, not that he had any argument with him about his kingdom. The kingdom was already in Namrūd's hands and Ibrāhīm had no worldly kingdom for which Namrūd could have disputed with him.

Third: Everything is attributed to Allāh, as explained earlier, and kingdom is no exception. There is no snag in attributing it to Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: When Ibrāhīm said: ''My Lord is He Who gives life and causes to die'': Life and death are found even in vegetation; but Ibrāhīm (a.s.), in this argument, meant the life and death found in animals and human beings, or he kept in view their general meaning which included human life and death. The evidence for this meaning may be seen in the reply of Namrūd: ''I give life and cause death''. Obviously Namrūd, by this claim, did not mean the giving of life to vegetables (through tilling and farming), or animals (by breeding inem and bringing the male and female together). This type of life giving was not special to him; any human being could do it. The traditions also support our interpretation: he had two prisoners brought before him, he freed one and killed the other, and then he said: ''I give life and cause death''.

Ibrāhīm (a.s.) selected for his proof the authority of giving life and causing death, because nature, having no life or sense itself, cannot give life to any thing; and more evidently, it cannot be supposed to give life to animals and humans as it is accompanied by sense and perception. And the same is the case with death. Such a clear and indisputable proof failed to convince the people of Namrūd. Their intellectual degradation and mental confusion had sunken far lower than the level which Ibrāhīm (a.s.) had credited them with. They thought that the life and death referred to included the metaphorical meaning of freeing from prison and killing. Thus, Namrūd claimed, and they vouched that he gave life and caused death.

This talk shows how low the level of intellectual development was in that time, as far as abstract and non-material ideas were concerned. Do not be misled by their advanced civilization, signs of which are found in the archaeological remains of the Babylonia of the Chaldeans and the Egypt of the Pharaohs. Material advancement is one thing, and progress in abstract and non-material ideas is something else. We see the same phenomenon in this world of ours which has made a fantastic advancement in the material field, and has sunk so terribly low in morality, ethics and spiritual knowledge.

Ibrāhīm (a.s.) did not put before them the argument that the whole universe needed an Omnipotent, Omniscient Originator of the heavens and the earth. He had used this method in his early days; and Allāh quotes him as finally saying: ''Surely I have turned my face, being upright, wholly to Him Who originated the heavens and the earth, and I am not of the polytheists (6:79). No doubt, those people, forced by natural instinct, believed vaguely in a Supreme Creator. But their intellectual capacity was too limited to let them clearly and truly understand about that Creator. Had Ibrāhīm (a.s.) put this argument before them, they could not have appreciated it at all. Look, at what they understood from his argument: ''My Lord is He Who gives life and causes to die ! ''

QUR'ĀN: he said: ''I give life and cause death'': Therefore, I am that Lord of yours who, you say, gives life and causes death.

QUR'ĀN: Ibrāhīm said: ''So surely Allāh brings the sun from the east, then bring it (you) from the west''; thus he who disbelieved was confounded: When Ibrāhīm (a.s.) saw that his argument based on giving life and death had been twisted by his opponent, and that the public had been mislead by that deception, he thought it would be useless to clarify what he meant by giving life and causing death. Instead, he switched to another argument. Even then, he based this second argument on his opponent's claim in the first argument. That is why he began the second argument with ''So''; it shows a connection with the preceding sentence, and its import is as follows: If what you say is correct, and you are my Lord, and the Lord, as we both accept, manages and looks after this universe, then Allāh manages the sun by bringing it from the east; so show your authority by bringing from the west. It will clearly prove that you are the Lord, as Allāh is the Lord of everything, or that you are Lord of Lords. Thus, the disbeliever was confounded.

Ibrāhīm (a.s.) offered his second argument as an offshoot of Namrūd's claim, to remove the chance of someone thinking that Namrūd's argument was complete, perfect and irrefutable. And he changed the word ''my Lord'' (used in the first argument) to ''Allāh'' (in this argument) because the opponent had misused that adjective and claimed that it referred to him. To remove the chance of that type of sophistry, Ibrāhīm (a.s.) used the proper name, ''Allāh''.

It has been described earlier that it was not possible for Namrūd to reply to this argument in any way, and, as a result, he was confounded and remained silent.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh does not guide aright the unjust people: Apparently it gives the reason for Namrūd' being confounded, not for his disbelief. Allāh did not guide him, and, therefore, he was humiliated; had Allāh guided him aright, he would have been able to reply to Ibrāhīm. It does not say that Allāh did not guide him and therefore he became an unbeliever. Obviously, the talk centres around his dispute and argument, and is not about his belief.

The word ''unjust people'' hints at the cause of not being guided. Allāh does not guide them because they are unjust. The same point has been kept in view wherever such sentences have been revealed. Allāh says: And who is more unjust than he who forges a lie against Allāh while he is invited to Islam? And Allāh does not guide the unjust people (61:7); The similitude of those who were placed under the Torah, then they did not hold it, is as the similitude of the donkey bearing books; evil is the similitude of the people who belie the signs of Allāh; and Allāh does not guide the unjust people (62:5). ''Transgression'' is likewise the cause of not being guided, as Allāh says: but when they turned aside; Allāh made their hearts turn aside; and Allāh does not guide the transgressing people (61:5).

In short, injustice is to turn aside from the path of justice, and to leave aside what should be done, and to do what should not be done. It diverts man from his intended goal, and leads him to disappointment and failure in the life hereafter. This fact is made abundantly clear in many verses of the Qur'ān, which puts much emphasis on it.

GOOD AND EVIL DEEDS, VIS-A-VIS GUIDANCE AND MISGUIDANCE

Good deeds cause guidance and evil deeds make one go astray. It is a universal rule to which there is no exception. The Qur'ān describes it in different words, and has based on it many of its realities. Allāh says: Our Lord is He Who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (to its goal) (20:50). It means that everything, after its creation is completed, is guided by Allāh to the goals of its creation and to its perfection. For this purpose, it has been bound to other things, and takes their advantage through action and reaction, uniting and separating, associating and dissociating, advancing and retreating, taking and leaving and so on and so forth. No mistake occurs in the effect of the system of creation, and it never misses its targets. For example, when a fire licks dry wood, it does not want to cool it; and when a tree grows it does not intend to make itself smaller. The Qur'ān says: . . . surely my Lord is on the straight path (11:56). Thus, in the world of creation the effect never fails to follow the cause, and there is no discord in it.

The above paragraph gives us two axioms: creative guidance is general and the fact that no mistake ever occurs in creative matters. These two realities are the basis of the system of cause and effect. There is a way, or ways, between a thing and its intended goal, and only through those specific ways it can reach there. A seed grows into a tree only if it passes along its own particular path, complying with all its conditions and means. And a fruit tree grows only its own particular fruit, not something else. In short, each cause creates its own particular effect, and each effect follows its own particular cause. Allāh says: And as for the good land, its vegetation springs forth (abundantly) by the permission of its Lord, and (as for) that which is bad (its herbage) comes forth but scantily (7:58). Reason and experience vouch for it; otherwise, the law of cause and effect would go awry.

Creation guides everything to a particular goal; and that goal can be reached through that particular way. It is the system created by Allāh who has perfected everything. Every link in this chain of causes leads to a particular end; and if a single link is changed, the effect will invariably change. This much about creation.

The same rule applies to other fields like social affairs. Society too is the result of creative factors and follows the laws of ''creation''. Social affairs and the activities of society are connected with their own effects: those activities can result only in those particular effects, and those effects can be produced only by those particular activities. Good upbringing can be accomplished only by a ''good'' tutor; if a ''bad'' tutor brings up a child, even if he shows himself to be a good man and actually sticks to good and proper methods in his bringing-up the hidden evil will unfailingly pollute the mind of the child, and it will produce an undesirable and evil result. A hundred veils and a thousand curtains cannot prevent the tutor's spiritual evil effecting the character of the pupil. When someone unlawfully takes hold of a country, or when an incompetent judge sits and delivers judgements on public disputes, or when someone takes upon himself, without the sanction of the sharī'ah, to discharge a social responsibility, its evil effects most certainly manifest themselves in society. Let a wrong disguise itself as right, or an evil masquerade as good, or a lie take the place of truth, or dishonesty appear as honesty, or deception camouflage itself in sincerity — all these disguises may fool the onlookers for a period, but ultimately all the protective coverings must come off, revealing the ugly reality underneath. It is the system created by Allāh in His creatures, and: you shall not find any alteration in the system of Allāh, and you shall not find any change in the system of Allāh (35:43).

The truth does not die, nor does its effect fade, even if, for a short time, it is not perceived by lookers on. And a lie can never stand on its feet, nor can its effect be sustained — even if at times it causes confusion. Allāh says: So that He may manifest the truth of what was true and show the falsehood of what was false . . . (8:8). Allāh shows the truth of what is true by stabilizing its effect; and manifests the falsehood of what is false by exposing its corruption and depravity and unmasking its reality. He says: Have you not seen how Allāh sets forth a parable of a good word (being) like a good tree, whose root is firmly fixed and whose branches are in heaven, yielding its fruits on every moment by the permission of its Lord? And Allāh sets forth parables for men that they may reflect. And the parable of an evil word is as an evil tree pulled up from the earth's surface, it has no stability. Allāh confirms those who believe with the sure word in this world's life and in the hereafter, and Allāh lets the unjust go astray, and Allāh does what He pleases (14:24 — 27). Thus Allāh lets the unjust people go astray in their affairs. And what is their affair? It is that they want their evil ways to lead to good results. As Allāh quotes Yūsuf (a.s.) as saying: I seek Allāh's refuge! Surely my Lord made good my abode: Surely the unjust do not prosper (12:23). An unjust person cannot prosper in his injustice, nor can his injustice lead him to where a virtuous man is led by his virtue and a pious one by his piety. Allāh says: And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them unto Our ways; and Allāh is most surely with the doers of good (29:69). And He says: . . . and the (good) end is for piety (20:132).

The Qur'ānic verses with this meaning are very numerous; but the most complete and most comprehensive is the following:

> He sends down water from the heavens, then the valleys flow according to their measure, and the torrent bears along the swelling foam; and from what they melt in the fire for the sake of (making) ornaments or apparatus arises a scum like it, thus does Allāh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it remains in the earth, thus does Allāh set forth parables (13:17).

As mentioned earlier, reason also confirms this truth. The universal system of cause and effect demands it and human experience testifies that it is so. Every man knows one or another episode which shows that the end of unjust people is always bad, and that their endeavours never succeed.

QUR'ĀN: Or like him who passed by a town, and it had fallen down upon its roofs: ''al-Khāwiyah'' (الخَاوِيَةٌ) means empty. The Arabs say khawati 'd-dār (خَوَتِ الدَّارُ) to indicate that ''the house became empty''. ''al-'Urūsh'' (العُرُوْشُ) is the plural of al-'arsh (العَرْشُ = trellis); it is a roof-like structure standing on poles or pillars used as support for climbing plants, like vines. Allāh says: garden trellised and untrellised (6:141). This word is also used for as-saqf (السَّقْفُ = roof). But there is a difference as-saqf is only a roof or house-top which is laid on the walls: al-'arsh is the top together with its poles or pillars. Because of this difference, it is idiomatic to say for a ruined village that, ''hiya khāwiyatun 'alā 'urūshihā'' (هِيَ خَاوِيَةٌ عَلي عُرُوْشِهَا) which literally means, ''it is empty on its trellis''; but it would be wrong to say: ''empty on its roof''.

Many explanations have been given by the commentators for the conjunctive ''Or'' in ''Or like him who . . .'' It is said that:

1) It is in conjunction with ''him (he) who disputed with Ibrāhīm'', in the previous verse; and ''K'' (ك = like) is in place of mithl (مِثْل = like). The meaning accordingly is, ''Or have you seen like him who passed . . .'' This commentator thinks that the word ''like'' in this context indicates that it is a separate proof.

2) The word ''like'' is extra. The meaning, accordingly, will be

‘‘Did you not see him who disputed with Ibrāhīm . . . or him who passed . . . ’’

3) The conjunction is of meaning, and not of words. The meaning is, ‘‘Have you seen like him who disputed . . . or like him who passed . . . ’’

4) It is the continuation of the argument of Ibrāhīm in reply to his opponent’s claim. According to this interpretation, Ibrāhīm told Namrūd that if he claimed to give life then he should give life like him who passed by a town . . .

But you will notice that none of the above explanations is satisfactory.

The author believes that the conjunction is of meaning, as claimed in the third explanation, but not in the way described there. Allāh had earlier said: ‘‘Allāh is the Guardian of those who believe; He brings them out of darkness into the light; and (as to) those who disbelieve, their guardians are rebels; they take them out of the light into the darkness’’. It had shown that Allāh guides the believers to the truth, and that He does not guide the disbelievers; instead they are misled by the guardians whom they have taken for themselves. Now Allāh gives three examples, showing three consecutive methods of His guidance. Guidance is of three types, or, let us say, three stages:—

First: Guidance through reasoning and argument, as is seen in the story of Namrūd who disputed with Ibrāhīm about his Lord. Allāh guided Ibrāhīm to the truth, and his opponent was misguided by his disbelief. In this story the guidance of Ibrāhīm is not mentioned clearly; rather more attention is given to his opponent’s affairs, and it has thrown light on a new fact: ‘‘Allāh does not guide aright the unjust people’’.

Second: Guidance through demonstration, as is seen in the story of him who passed by a town which had fallen down upon its roofs. In it, what had seemed difficult to him (i.e. ‘‘how Allāh would make a thing alive after its death?’’)was shown to him actually happening. He was given death and then made alive. In this way he was guided to the truth through demonstration.

Third: Guidance by demonstrating the fact and simultaneously unveiling its cause. It is the most effective method and the highest stage of guidance. This method was used in the third story, in which Ibrāhīm, by permission of Allāh, made the four birds alive.

Let us suppose that a man has not seen cheese, and has some doubt about it. His doubts may be removed if someone who has seen it and tasted it testifies before him about it. The second and more effective method is to show him a piece of cheese and make him taste it. The third and the most effective way of removing the doubt would be to put a pot of milk before him and make cheese from it before his eyes and then let him taste it.

The three verses describe these three consecutive stages. Each one begins in a different style: ‘‘Did you not see him who . . .’’, ‘‘Or like him who passed by a town . . .’’, ‘‘And (remember) when Ibrāhīm said . . .’’ Each of these styles could have been used to describe the three events. It could have been said: Allāh guides the believers to the truth; have you not looked at the story of Ibrāhīm and Namrūd, or at the story of him who passed by a town, or at the story of Ibrahim and the birds. Alternatively, it could have been said: Allāh guides the believers to the truth; either as He guided Ibrāhīm in his dispute with Namrūd (and it was one way of guidance), or as He guided him who passed by a town (and it was another way of guidance), or as He did in the event of Ibrāhīm and the birds (and it was the third way of guidance.

Thirdly it could have been said: Allāh guides the believers to the truth; remember the episodes which prove it — remember the story of the dispute, and remember him who passed by a town, and remember when Ibrāhīm said: ‘‘My Lord! show me how Thou givest life to the dead.’’

But Allāh used a different style for each verse, as it is more refreshing for the mind, and excites a new interest in each episode.

Now we may revert to the original topic, how this verse is in conjunction with the preceding one. The conjunctive ‘‘or’’ in ‘‘or like him’’ joins this sentence with a deleted but understood word in the preceding verse. The reconstructed sentences would be like this: Either like him who disputed with Ibrāhīm . . . or like him who passed by a town. Likewise, the conjunctive ‘‘and’’ in the next verse joins it with deleted but understood words in the preceding two verses. The sentences then would be like this: Remember the story of dispute . . . and remember him who passed by a town . . . and remember when Ibrāhīm said . . .

Allāh has not disclosed the identity of him who passed by. Nor has the name of the town or the people who used to live in it been mentioned. Nor have those been identified for whom the said passer-by was made a sign. It would appear that their identities should have been disclosed as it would have removed many doubts. But a far more important consideration made it necessary to keep all these details vague.

The sign shown, that is, giving life to the dead, was a very compelling and overwhelming one, as was the guidance resulting from it; also, the passer-by had used words which reflected his thought that it was not an easy task. Therefore, the norms of eloquence demanded that it be described as a very insignificant affair, so that the said passer-by as well as the audience of the Qur'ān would not be over-awed by it; and so that they could appreciate that it was not a big task as far as the power of Allāh was concerned. Have you not seen that great people talk about great affairs and about their great officers and nobles in a very ordinary manner; they want to emphasize that such affairs or such people have no greatness for the speakers. The same principle has been applied here: bare facts have been mentioned, but all details as to who, where and when have been omitted; it is to show that this affair was not an important one in the eyes of Allāh. It was for the same reason that the name of the opponent of Ibrāhīm (in the first story) was omitted, and the names of the birds and the hills, and the number of pieces the birds were cut into, and so on, in the third story.

Only the name of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) has been mentioned in the two stories. The Qur'ān accords him a special honour and distinction. For example: And this was Our argument which We gave to Ibrāhīm against his people; We exalt in dignity whom We please . . . (6:83); And thus did We show Ibrāhīm the kingdom of the heavens and the earth, and that he might be of those who are sure (6:75). The same special consideration prompted mentioning his name in the two stories.

The point mentioned above also explains why Allāh mentions the matters of giving life and causing death, in most places, as a very unimportant and insignificant thing; as He says: And He it is Who originates the creation, then returns it, and it is most easy to Him; and His are the most exalted attributes in the heavens and in the earth, and He is the Mighty, the Wise (30:27); He said: ''O my Lord! how shall 1 have a son, and my wife is barren, and I myself have reached indeed the extreme degree of old age?'' He said: ''So shall it be; your Lord says: It is easy to Me, and indeed I created you before, when you were nothing'' (19:8 — 9).

QUR'ĀN: he said: ''How will Allāh give it life after its death?'' ''It'' refers to the ''town''; but it metaphorically means ''people of the town''. It is like the words of the Qur'ān: And ask the town in which we were . . . (12:82); that is, ''the people of the town''.

He uttered these words because he felt that it was a very great thing and that it manifested the power of Allāh as few other things did; not that he thought life-after-death improbable. That is why he said at the end of the episode, ''I know that Allāh has power over all things''. He did not say, 'Now I know', as the wife of the chief of Egypt had said: Now has the truth become established. . . (12:51). Further details will be given later.

Furthermore, the passer-by was a prophet to whom Allāh had spoken, and was a sign sent to the people; and the prophets are sinless. They can never entertain any doubt or suspicion about Resurrection, which is one of the pillars of the religion.

QUR'ĀN: So Allāh caused him to die for a hundred years, then raised him to life: The clear meaning is that he was given death by the taking out of his soul, remained dead for a hundred years, then was made alive by the returning of his soul to him.

One commentator has given a strange explanation of this verse. He says: The ''death'' mentioned in this verse means a coma, that is, a prolonged loss of consciousness in which the subject remains barely alive but has no sense or feeling. It may continue for days, months and even years, as is evident from the story of the Fellows of the Cave and their sleep in the cave which lasted for three hundred and nine years; then they were awakened. Allah has used that sleep and re-awakening as a proof of Resurrection. Therefore, this story too is like that one.

The said commentator goes on to say: The known duration of coma does not exceed a few years. A coma lasting for a hundred years is an unusual occurrence, but He who puts a man in a coma for a few years also has the power to keep him in that condition for a hundred years; and when it comes to accept what is clearly mentioned in the Qur'ān, we believe that we should only see whether it is possible or impossible; and if it is possible we must accept it. Allāh has offered this episode of keeping him in a coma for a hundred years and then returning his senses and feelings to him after such a long period as a proof that life can be returned to the dead after a gap of thousands of years.

This was his explanation. Let us suppose for the time being that the Fellows of the Cave were kept in a coma — the word used for them in the Qur'ān is ''asleep'', not comatose. But how could their supposed coma infect this passer-by? The Qur'ān clearly says: ''Allāh caused him to die''. Death means loss of life; and not coma. A commentator has no right to invent a meaning for a word. He has used analogy where no one has allowed it, and that is in the matter of finding the meaning of a word. And if Allāh could keep that passer-by comatose for a hundred years when it is not an usual occurrence, why could not He keep him dead for a hundred years and then resurrect him? One unusual occurrence is like another, according to the said commentator. So why invent one meaning and reject the other which incidently is the real meaning? The trouble with him is that, for his own reasons, he thinks that the resurrection of the dead in this world is impossible — without giving any reason to support his belief. That is why he has misinterpreted the next sentences, ''and look at the bones, how We assemble them together, then clothe them with flesh''. We shall comment upon it afterwards.

In short, the meaning of the words: ''Allāh caused him to die . . . then raised him to life'', is quite clear, and no doubt can be entertained about it, especially when we look at the preceding and following sentences: ''How will Allāh give it life after its death?''; ''look at your food and drink — years have not passed over it''; ''and look at your donkey''; ''and look at the bones''.

QUR'ĀN: He said: ''How long have you tarried?''He said: ''I have tarried a day or a part of a day''. Said He: ''Nay! You have tarried a hundred years'': ''al-Labth'' (اللَّبْثُ) is to tarry, to stay, to abide. The uncertainty in the reply, ''a day or a part of a day'', shows that the time of day of his resurrection was different from that of his death — for example, the forenoon and afternoon. He thought that he had slept and was now woken, then he looked at the difference in the time, and was uncertain whether a night has passed while he was still asleep. Therefore, he said: ''a day'' (if a night has passed), ''or a part of a day'' (if he had woken up the same day). Allāh said: ''Nay! you have tarried a hundred years.''

QUR'ĀN: ''then look at your food and drink — years have not passed over it; . . . then clothe them with flesh'': There are many apparently puzzling things in these sentences: The word, ''look'', has been repeated three times, when, at a first glance, only one would have been enough; there is mention of food, drink and a donkey, when apparently there was no need for it; and the sentence, ‘‘and that We may make you a sign to men’’, has been written in between, when seemingly it would have been more appropriate after the next sentence about assembling the bones and clothing them with flesh. Moreover, what he had wondered about, the resurrection of bodies after a long gap, after undergoing all types of deterioration, had been clearly demonstrated by his own resurrection; then what was the need to tell him to look at the bones? But if we ponder deeply on the various implications of this verse, all these doubts will be removed. Let us look at the story, which is as follows:

The verse make it clear that the passer-by was a virtuous servant of Allāh, who was well aware of divine power and majesty, and followed His commandments. Not only this, he was a prophet whom Allāh had spoken to. The clear implication of his words: ‘‘I know that Allāh has power over all things’’, is that he was fully aware of the power of Allāh even before this episode. And the style of the sentences, ‘‘then raised him to life. He said: ‘How long have you tarried?’ ’’ implies that he was well accustomed to being spoken to by Allāh, and that it was not the first revelation. Otherwise, the sentence should have been somewhat like this: ‘then when He raised him to life, He said . . .’ See how the first divine talk with Mūsā has been mentioned: So when he came to it, a voice called: O Mūsā (20:11); And when he came to it a voice called from the right side . . . (28:30).

He had departed from his home for a place which was at some distance from his town. This is inferred from the facts that he rode on his donkey, and took food and drink for his provisions. On the way, he passed by a town which had fallen ‘‘on its roofs’’. It was not his intended destination; but as he passed by it, he stood there, seeing in it a warning lesson for mankind, a town turned into ruins, whose inhabitants had perished, overtaken by death all together, whose rotten bones were scattered everywhere in full view of the passers-by. He pointed to the dead and said: ‘‘How will Allāh give it life after its death?’’ He did not mean ‘‘How will this town be populated again?’’ Otherwise, he would have used the word ‘‘yu‘ammir’’ (يُعَمِّرُ = will make populated), and not ‘‘yuḥyī’’ (يُحْيِي = will make alive) which he did use. Moreover, a ruined town may become inhabited again, and there is nothing extraordinary in this development to cause wonder and awe. How do we know that the bodies and bones were in full view of the passers-by? Because if they had been buried and he had stood looking at their graves, Allāh would have clearly mentioned the graves, instead of the town.

Anyhow, he stood taking lessons from the scene before his eyes. He was over-awed by it and thought about the length of time involved, and the continuing deterioration of the parts of the body until it turns into dust. At this stage, he said: ‘‘How will Allāh give it life after its death?’’ This question was based on two factors: The length of time, (How will Allāh give it life after such a long gap since its death?) and the deterioration of the body (How will it be resurrected when all its parts and limbs have been scattered and untold number of changes have come over it?) Therefore, Allāh explained both questions together. The first question was answered by giving him death and resurrecting him after a hundred years. The second question was answered by giving life to the bones of his donkey under his own eyes.

Thus, Allāh gave him death and then raised him from the dead. The two things happened at different times of the day, as has been explained above. Allāh asked him: ‘‘How long have you tarried?’’ He replied: ‘‘I have tarried a day or a part of a day’’. Obviously, he was given death in the early part of the day, and resurrected in the afternoon. Had it been the other way round, he would have said, ‘‘a day’’ without any hesitation. Allāh pointed out to him: ‘‘Nay! you have tarried a hundred years.’’ Thus he realized that he had thought a hundred years like a day or a part of a day. This was the reply to his question about the length of time.

Then Allāh gave him the proof of his remaining dead for a hundred years by saying, ‘‘then look at your food and drink — years have not passed over it; and look at your donkey’’. As he had not realized that he had died and had been brought to life after such a long time, the information that he had tarried a hundred years was liable to be doubted (not necessarily by him), because his body had not changed at all; and if a man dies and a hundred years pass over him, his body usually undergoes innumerable changes until the bones rot and turn into dust. To remove this possible doubt, Allāh ordered him to look at his food and drink which had not changed a bit all this time; and to look at his donkey whose bones had rotted. The condition of the donkey would indicate the length of time and the condition of the food and the drink would show him the possibility of remaining in one condition for such a long period without undergoing any change.

It shows that the donkey had also been given death and had become rotten. But the Qur'ān, in its unsurpassed good style, did not like to mention the donkey's death when it had said that the prophet had been caused to die.

In this way Allāh made him realize that his amazement, which was based on the length of time, was not appropriate. He himself admitted that a hundred years were to him like a day or a part of a day. It was the same feeling which the resurrected will show on the Day of Resurrection. Thus he became aware that the time passed between death and resurrection, whether short or long, has no effect whatsoever on the power of Allāh Who rules over everything. His power is no subservient to time and space. Changes, whether big or small, which occur in a body make no difference to His power. Giving life to old dead bodies is as easy to Him as resurrecting new ones. Old and new, far and near, are all equal to Him. As He says: Surely they think it to be far off, and We see it nigh (70:6 — 7); . . . the matter of the Hour is but as the twinkling of an eye or it is still nearer . . . (16:77).

''And that We make you a sign to men'': The conjunction ''and'' signifies that there was some other purpose also. It means: We did what We did so that We may explain to you certain things and so that We may make you a sign to men. Thus there were two aims: the purpose of showing him how Allāh assembled the bones and clothed them with flesh was to show him how He gives life to the dead; and the purpose of causing him to die and to make him alive again was to demonstrate that fact to him and to make him a sign for other men. That is why the sentence, ''and that We make you a sign to men'', was written before the mention of the bones and their being clothed by flesh.

The above discourse also shows why the word ''look'' has been repeated thrice in this verse. Each order has a special purpose which is not shared by the other two.

Allāh gave him death and then made him alive. In this way, he himself experienced what most people will feel on the Day or Resurrection; as Allāh says: And at the time when the Hour shall come, the guilty shall swear (that) they did not tarry but an hour; thus they used to utter lies. And those who are given knowledge and faith will say: Certainly you tarried according to the decree of Allāh till the Day of Resurrection; so this is, the Day of Resurrection, but you did not know (30:55 — 56).

Then Allāh explained to him the second aspect of his question: How will the parts and components of the body return to their original shape, after all those innumerable changes? So Allāh told him to ''look at the bones, how We assemble them together, then clothe them with flesh''. Obviously, it refers to the bones of the donkey, and not to those of the dead people of the town. Otherwise, not he alone, but all the resurrected people of the town would have become ''signs'' of Allāh to the mankind.

The commentator whose misinterpretation of ''death'' and ''life'' we have commented upon earlier explains away this sentence in a strange way as well. He says that the ''bones'' refer to the bones in a living body; the fact that they grow and are clothed with flesh is a proof of resurrection. The Creator Who gave it life and growth is surely the Resurrector of the dead; surely He has power over everything. Allāh has argued for resurrection in a like manner by referring to the dead earth which is made alive again with vegetation.

Such an interpretation is obviously absurd.

The explanation which we have given above show that the whole story beginning from: ''So Allāh caused him to die'' upto the end of the verse is one single reply to the prophet's question, ''How will Allāh give it life after its death?'' There is no repetition in it at all.

QUR'ĀN: So when it became clear to him, he said: ''I know that Allāh has power over all things'': He returns, after the demonstration, to the knowledge which he already had before that. It seems that when the question as to how Allāh could make it alive came into his mind, he satisfied his curiosity by remembering the all-encompassing power of Allāh. Then Allāh made the matter clear to him by demonstrating how He gives life to the dead. After this re-assurance, he clearly knew the truth of his previous knowledge, and spoke to Allāh in these words, the import of which is as follows: Thou hast always guided me aright; and what I had always known about Thy Omnipotence was not to be doubted; it was the truth which I should always rely upon.

One may find examples of such re-assurance everywhere. Many are the times when a man has definite knowledge of a subject, then some thought occurs in his mind which goes against that, not because of any doubt or ignorance, but because of some other factors. Thereupon he satisfies himself about the previous certainty, till the doubt is removed. Then, he returns to his previous knowledge and says: 'I know that it is so'. In this way his knowledge is confirmed and his perplexity is removed.

In short, the sentence, ''I know that Allāh has power over all things'', does not mean that before it became clear to him, he was in some doubt about the power of Allāh. Such an interpretation would be wrong, because:

First: He was a prophet, who was spoken to by Allāh. And the prophets cannot be ignorant of Allāh's person and attributes; and especially of His Omnipotence which is an attribute of person.

Second: Had he been ignorant of Allāh's power, he would have said, ''Now I know . . .'' or ''Now I knew . . .'' But he said: ''I know'', that is, from before.

Third: What he had seen was a proof that Allāh had power to give life to the dead. It did not prove that He had power ''over all things''. But he said that he knew that Allāh had power over all things. It shows that this knowledge was not based on that demonstration.

Of course, it is possible that a man of lesser strength of character would be stunned and bewildered by such a manifestation of divine power, and would declare, forgetting all other things, that He Who gives life to the dead has power over all things. But it would be just a conjecture, based on fear and awe; it would be wiped out as soon as that fear or awe was removed. Moreover, it would not be acceptable to him who has not experienced that fear or awe. In any case, such an illogical conclusion cannot be relied upon. But we see in this verse that Allāh confirms his declaration by putting it under His seal of approval. It naturally, follows that this knowledge had not come to him as a result of that manifestation.

In other words, if he had acquired that knowledge through that manifestation, then all he would have known was that Allāh had the power to give life to the dead. He should therefore not have said that Allāh had the power over all things. Such talk would be wrong in fact, and would be beneath the dignity of a prophet.

QUR'ĀN: And (remember) when Ibrāhīm said: ''My Lord! Show me how Thou givest life to the dead'': It has been explained earlier that the conjunctive ''and'' is related to a deleted (but understood) word, ''remember''; and that that deleted word governs the adverb ''when''. Someone has said that the word ''when'' is governed by ''What ! and do you not believe?'' But this is patently wrong.

The plea of Ibrāhīm, ''My Lord! show me how Thou givest life to the dead'', proves:

First: that he asked for demonstration, not for logical reasoning. The prophets (and especially a prophet like Ibrāhīm, the friend of Allāh) are too great to believe in resurrection on the Day of Judgement without any logical reason. A belief without reason is either blind following, or also is based on defective intellection. And neither of these two can be attributed to Ibrāhīm (a.s.). Moreover, he used the word ''how'' which is used to ask about the state and condition of a thing, not about the thing itself. When you say: ''Have you seen Zayd?'', the question is about the seeing itself. But if you say: ''How did you see Zayd?'', the seeing is already known and accepted; the question is only about the condition of it and its particulars. When Ibrāhīm (a.s.) asked, ''how Thou givest life to the dead'', he already knew by logic and reason that Allāh gives life to the dead; now he only wanted to see how it was done.

Second: that the question asked by Ibrāhīm (a.s.) could mean either of the two following things:

1) How could the material parts of a dead man come together after being scattered hither and thither, and how could they accept life and become alive? In other words, how could they be governed by the power of Allāh?

2) How does Allāh bestow life on the dead. The first question is concerned with the effect and the result; the second one with the reason and the cause. This second aspect is in a way the kingdom, which Allāh mentions in the Qur'ān: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it, ''Be'', and it is. Therefore, glory be to Him in Whose hand is the kingdom of all things, and to Him you shall be brought back (36:82 — 83).

Which of the two questions did Ibrāhīm (a.s.) ask? He asked the second one, and not the first, because:

a) he asked ''how Thou givest life''. He wanted to see the action of Allāh. The effect of the action on the dead was not his primary concern; otherwise he would have asked ‘‘how the dead become alive’’;

b) if he only wanted to see how dead bodies respond to life, Allāh could have given life to any dead animal before the eyes of Ibrāhīm (a.s.), and there would have been no need to make it happen in Ibrāhīm’s hands;

c) if he wanted to see how a dead body comes to life, then the story should have been ended on something like, ‘‘Know that Allāh has the power over all things’’, and not on the words actually used, ‘‘Know that Allāh is Mighty, Wise.’’ The Qur’ān always uses the appropriate adjectives at the end of verses. The first meaning of the question concerns the power of Allāh and if that was the purpose of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) in asking, the attribute of power should have been mentioned at the end. But Allāh used the attributes of Might and Wisdom which are more appropriate for bestowing of life, rather than for the acceptance of life by matter.

A commentator has interpreted this verse in a strange way, which is given hereunder. (Our comments on this interpretation will be given afterwards.) He says:

When Ibrāhīm (a.s.) said: ‘‘My Lord! Show me . . .’’, he only wanted to ‘‘know’’ how the dead were given life; he did not want to ‘‘see’’ how it was done. And the reply does not go beyond that information. The said commentator further says: There is nothing in this verse to show that Allāh ordered him to give life to the birds. Nor that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) did as he was ordered. Not every order is intended to be complied with. Information is often given in the imperative mood. Suppose that someone asks you how ink is made. You tell him: ‘‘Take this and that material and then mix it in this way, and your ink shall be ready.’’ You want to explain to him how ink is made; not that you are ordering him to make ink then and there, even though you use the imperative mood.

He further says: There are many verses in the Qur’ān in which information has been given in the form of an order. This particular verse gives just a similitude for the resurrection of the dead. It tells Ibrāhīm: Take four birds, make them tame and train them so that they obey your call. (The birds are the fittest of all animals for such training.) Then put each bird on a mountain, and then call them. See how swiftly they come to you, their separation and their distance from you shall not prevent them from coming to you, flying. The same is the similitude of the decree of your Lord. When He intends to give life to the dead, He calls them with the word of creation, ‘‘Be alive’’, and they at once become alive. It is the same as was in the beginning of creation. He said to the heaven and to the earth, ‘‘Come both willingly or unwillingly’’; they both said, ‘‘We come willingly’’.

The said commentator has given two ‘‘proofs’’ for his interpretation:

First: The word of Allāh, ‘‘fa-ṣurhunna’’ (فَصُرْهُنَّ) according to him means ‘‘make them inclined’’. That is, tame them and make them affable towards yourself. It is because of this meaning that it is followed by the preposition ‘‘ilā’’ (إِلي = to). The verb ṣāra (صَارَ) when followed by ilā gives the meaning of inclination.

He says that it is wrong to say (as commentators have done) that fa-ṣurhunna means, ‘‘then cut them into pieces after killing them.’’ This interpretation is not in conformity with the preposition mentioned above.

He further says: Some commentators have said that the preposition is related to the word ‘‘fa-khudh’’ (فَخُذْ = then take), and the verse in effect says, ‘‘then take to you four of the birds, then cut them into pieces’’. But such an interpretation is against the clear sequence of the words.

Second: Apparently, the pronouns in the words fa ṣurhunna (make them inclined), ‘‘minhunna’’ (مِنْهُنَّ = a part of them), ‘‘ud‘uhunna’’(اُدْعُهُنَّ = call them) and ‘‘ya’tīnaka’’ (يَأْتِيْنَكَ = they will come to you), all refer to the ‘‘birds’’. If we accept the interpretation of the commentators that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was told to cut the birds into pieces and that after mixing their parts, he was to put portions of them on mountains, and after that he was to call them, then the pronouns would differ in their meanings: the first two would refer to the birds, and the third and fourth to the pieces of the birds. And such a thing is against the apparent meaning of the Qur’ān.

The said commentator wrote the above-mentioned two arguments. Another commentator, who agrees with him, has added three more ‘‘proofs’’, which we append below:

Third: What is the meaning of ‘‘showing how a thing is created?’’ Does it mean demonstrating how the scattered parts and components are joined and assembled and how they change back to their original living shape? If yes, then it could not be shown by cutting the birds into pieces, mixing them together and putting small portions on far away hills. How could Ibrāhīm (a.s.) see from such a distance what changes and movements were occurring in the smallest atoms of the pieces? Or, does it mean showing him how Allāh gives life to the dead? In other words, does it mean comprehending the reality of the creative decree? But the creative decree is the divine will which brings things into being; and the Qur'ān openly says, and Muslims agree, that it is impossible for a human being to comprehend the creative decree of Allāh; the attributes of Allāh cannot be subjected to ''how''.

Fourth: The words of the Qur'ān ''then place on every mountain . . .'' point to some delay, and it is in conformity with the idea of taming and training. The same is the import of the words fa ṣurhunna which should be translated, ''then make them inclined''. The idea of killing the birds and cutting them into pieces does not conform with the ''delay'' implied in ''thumma'' (ثُمَّ = then).

Fifth: If the events occurred as most of the commentators say, then the verse should have ended on the divine name ''Powerful'' and not on ''Mighty, Wise''; because ''Mighty'' is the one who cannot be comprehended.

The author's comments: The above was the interpretation of this group. But if you ponder on the explanation given by us earlier, you will realize that none of their arguments are valid. The plea of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) begins with the word, ''show me''; then come the words, ''how Thou givest life . . .''; and the verse goes on describing how this ''giving life'' was performed in the hands of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) himself. Add to it the words, ''then place on every mountain a part of them''; clearly ''a part'' refers to a part of the bird, not a complete and alive bird. All this clearly negates the interpretation offered by these people.

Now let us look at their arguments.

Reply to the first argument: fa ṣurhunn definitely means, ''then cut them into pieces''. The preposition ilā (to) is used here to imply inclination. This implication of it was described in the commentary of the words ''arrafathu ilā nisā'ikum (الرَّفَثُ اِلي نِسَآئِكُمْ = to go into your wives) (in verse 187 of this chapter). Thus, its complete meaning is: cut them into pieces inclining them towards you.

Reply to the second argument: All the four pronouns refer to the birds. Now comes the question: how could the pronouns in ''call them'' and ''they will come to you'' refer to the birds, when there was no bird at all, when only the pieces of those birds had remained? This question arises because the said commentator does not know the difference between mere verbal speech and creative speech. See, for example, the verse: Then He directed Himself to the heaven and it was a vapour, so He said to it and to the earth: ''Come both, willingly or unwillingly'' They both said: ''We come willingly'' (41:11). Here Allāh addressed the heaven, while it was non-existent; only its matter was present at that time. Likewise, Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was told to call the birds, while they did not exist; only their pieces existed at that time. Then there is the verse: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it, 'Be', and it is (36:82). Here a non-existent thing is addressed by the creative speech ''Be''.

The fact is that verbal speech requires an addressee to exist before the speech. But the opposite is true in the case of creative speech. There, the existence of the addressee follows that speech. In this case, the talk, address or speech means ''creation''; and existence is caused by creation. In the above-mentioned verse 36:82 ''and it is'' (i.e., existence) depends on the creative word ''Be'' (i.e., creation).

Reply to the third argument: We believe that the second alternative is correct: that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) wanted to see how Allāh gives life to the dead; he did not want to see how a dead body accepts life.

The said commentator has argued against this alternative. He says that it implies comprehension of the will of Allāh, which, being an attribute of Allāh, is impossible to comprehend.

But the fact is that the will of Allāh is an attribute of action, and is inferred from divine actions like creating, giving life, and so forth. What is impossible to comprehend is the Person of Allāh, as He says: . . . they do not comprehend Him in knowledge (20:110).

Will is deduced from action. It is creation accompanied by the existence of the created thing. It is the word ''Be'' mentioned in verse 36:82: ''. . . that He says to it 'Be' and it is''. This word, ''Be'', is the kingdom of everything that is mentioned in the next verse: Therefore glory be to Him in Whose hand is the kingdom of everything . . . (36:83). And Allāh has said that He had shown Ibrāhīm (a.s.) the great kingdom of His creation: And thus did We show Ibrāhīm the kingdom of the heavens and the earth, and that he might be of those who are sure (6:75). Obviously, among the great kingdom shown to Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was this giving life to the birds, mentioned in this verse.

Why are these people so confused? It is because they do not understand the force behind such miraculous happenings. They think that when Ibrāhīm (a.s.) called the birds and they became alive, or when ʻĪsā (a.s.) said to a dead body, ‘‘Rise up by permission of Allāh’’ and it rose up, or when Sulaymān (a.s.) ordered the wind to blow and it did so, it was because of some effective cause which was hidden in those words by Allāh; or because of the thinking process of these prophets which showed itself in these words (made of letters), as our words lead one to their meanings. These people do not realize that all this was based upon these prophets' spiritual connection with the divine power which can never be overpowered; and with Allāh's Omnipotence which knows no bounds and which is the real power that brings everything into being.

Reply to the fourth argument: The delay inferred from the word thumma (then) is found in cutting the birds into pieces as well, dividing and mixing the parts and putting them on various mountains. This matter needs no elaboration.

Reply to the fifth argument: This argument, in fact, goes against the objector. What he wants to prove is that Allāh only explained to Ibrāhīm (a.s.), in an academic and theoretical manner, how the things were made alive; He did not show it to him by demonstration. If that was the case, then the verse should have been ended on the adjective ‘‘Powerful’’, instead of ‘‘Mighty, Wise’’. We have explained earlier that the adjectives ‘‘Mighty’’ and ‘‘Wise’’ are more appropriate for our explanation of the verse.

Another commentator has interpreted this verse in another wrong way. He thinks that what Ibrāhīm (a.s.) wanted to see was how a dead body accepts life and becomes alive; that his question was concerned with the effect and the result, not with its reason and cause. His argument is as follows:

Ibrāhīm (a.s.) did not ask about any religiously essential matter. He only wanted to know how the dead become alive, so that he might have knowledge of it. It is not necessary for true belief to know ‘‘how’’ the dead are resurrected. Thus Ibrāhīm (a.s.) wanted to acquire some knowledge which was not necessary for true belief. This view is supported by the mode of the question: ‘‘how?’’ This particle is used to ask about a state or condition. If you say ‘‘How does Zayd judge between people?’’, the fact that he does judge between people, is already known to you. What you want to know is only the condition under which, and the manner in which, he does this work. On the other hand, if you want to enquire about the fact of his judging, you would say ‘‘Does Zayd judge between people?’’ It proves that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) already knew and believed that Allāh gives life to the dead; he only wanted to know how it was done. Then why did Allāh tell him: ‘‘What! and do you not believe?’’ This question was asked to remove any possible misunderstanding about Ibrāhīm’s faith. The mode of questioning, used by Ibrāhīm, is mainly to ask about the state and condition. But it is also used, at times, to show the disability of the person so addressed. Someone claims that he can lift an extremely heavy weight, and you tell him: ‘‘Well, show me how you lift it’’. This question shows your conviction that he is unable to do so. As Allāh knew that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) had not meant any such thing in his question. He put this counter-question to him, so that he might clarify this point in unambiguous words, and might thus remove any misunderstanding that the wording of the first question could have caused. In this way, his prestine faith was clearly confirmed and no hearer could entertain any doubt about it. The words ‘‘but that my heart may be at ease’’ mean that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) wanted his heart not to wonder hither and thither thinking about various ways in which a dead body might become alive again. He wanted it to be at ease by seeing it with his own eyes. That his heart was not at ease before had no adverse effect on his faith in the power of Allāh to give life to the dead. And when he was shown how the dead were made alive, nothing was added to his already perfect faith. He just acquired some knowledge which was not very necessary for the faith.

Then, after a long discussion, he says: This verse shows the excellence of Ibrāhīm (a.s.). He was at once shown what he had asked for, and that, also, in the easiest way; while ‘Uzayr [1] was shown what he wanted to know after undergoing death for a hundred years.

[1] ‘Uzayr = Ezra or Ezrah of the Apocrypha. He is known as Esdras in the Roman Catholic Bible.

The author's comments: Our previous explanation is enough to show that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) wanted to know how Allāh gives life to the dead and not as to how the dead accept life. He wanted to see the cause, not the effect. That is why he said, ''how Thou givest life to the dead'' (active voice); and did not say, ''how the dead are made alive'' (passive voice). Then there is the fact that the whole episode was made to happen through the activities of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) himself. If he had wanted to see only the effect (and not the cause), it would have been enough to show him any dead body coming alive, as was shown to the one who passed by a town when it had fallen upon its roofs; Allāh told him to ''look at the bones, how We assemble them together, then clothe them with flesh''. There would have been no need to make everything happen through the agency of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) himself. The trouble is that these people measure the spiritual condition of the prophets with the measure of their own common spirits, and in this way fail to understand how the prophets receive divine knowledge and how they perform miracles. They do not appreciate the difference between showing a prophet how the dead became alive and making him the active agent to give life to the dead: for them, both have the same significance! They have lost touch with divine realities, and fallen into this error. And the more they search for the truth, the farther they go from it. See how he interprets the ''ease of heart''. He says that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) wanted his heart not to wonder hither and thither thinking about the various ways in which a thing might be made alive. This alleged wondering hither and thither is a nonsense that is utterly impossible for a prophet like Ibrāhīm (a.s.).

Moreover, if Ibrāhīm (a.s.) had wanted to see how dead bodies come alive, the reply was not an answer to his query at all. He said, ''how Thou givest life to the dead ''. The word used in the question is ''al-mawtā'' (المَوْتي = the dead ones); it is plural and general. He might have meant the dead men, or the dead ones in general, including dead human beings and all types of animals. But Allāh showed him only the resurrection of four birds.

Then the said commentator has shown, according to his thinking, the superiority of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) over 'Uzayr (whom he identifies as the passer-by, mentioned in the preceding verse). He thinks that the two stories have the same significance; both men wanted to see how the dead were made alive and both were shown. But, as we have mentioned earlier, neither story is concerned in any way with that question. And he has been unable to see the brilliant exposition and deep realities which the two verses contain.

Lastly, if the verse intended just to explain how the dead come alive, it would have been appropriate to end it on the adjective ‘‘Omnipotent’’, or ‘‘Powerful’’, and not on ‘‘Mighty, Wise’’. See, for instance, the following verses:

And among His signs is this, that you see the earth still, but when We send down on it the water, it stirs and swells: most surely He Who gives it life is the Giver of life to the dead; surely He has power over all things (41:39). As you see, the verse explains ‘‘how’’ the dead are given life, and it ends on the attribute of Omnipotence.

Have they not seen that Allāh, Who created the heavens and the earth and was not tired by their creation, is able to give life to the dead? Aye! He has surely power over all things (46:33). Here again the ‘‘how’’ is explained through a simile, and the verse ends on the attribute of power.

QUR’ĀN: He said: ‘‘What! and do you not believe?’’ He said: ‘‘Certainly, but that my heart may be at ease’’: ‘‘Balā’’ (بَلٰي = certainly) is used to negate a negative question; and thus the negative of the question becomes positive. For example, Allāh asked the souls: ‘‘Am I not your Lord?’’ They said: ‘‘Certainly’’ (7:172). Had they replied, na‘am (نَعَمْ = yes), it would have become infidelity. at-Ṭamānīnah (الطَّمَانِيْنَةُ) and al-iṭmīnān (الاِطْمِيْنَانُ) is the quiet of the heart after its being troubled and agitated. It is derived from the words, iṭma’annati ’l-arḍ (اِطْمَأَنَّتِ الاَرْضُ = the earth was depressed) and arḍun muṭma’innah (اَرْضٌ مُطْمَئِنَّةٌ = low land) which are used when the earth becomes low, so that if the water comes in, it stays therein and if a stone falls in, it remains motionless.

Allāh said: ‘‘and do you not believe?’’ Had He said, ‘do you not believe?’, it would have shown that the original question (‘‘Show me how Thou givest life to the dead’’) was asked because of disbelief; and it would have become an admonition and reproach. By adding ‘‘and’’, Allāh showed that Ibrāhīm’s question was quite in order, but it should not be associated with disbelief in resurrection. ‘‘wa’’ (وَ = and) is a conjunctive and it joins two words, phrases or sentences. When Allāh added it in His question, it changed the import of the sentence. Now it means: Your question is in order, but it is associated with disbelief in resurrection? Without this conjunctive, it would have meant: Do you ask it because you do not believe? It would have turned it into a censure and reprimand.

''Belief'' mentioned in the divine question is general, it is not used with any condition or restriction. It signifies that one cannot believe in Allāh if one is doubtful about the resurrection of the dead. No doubt the question ''and do you not believe?'' was asked in the context of giving life to the dead. But the context does not restrict the general meaning of the word. ''Belief'', therefore, retains its unconditional meaning, and shows that nobody could be a believer unless he believed in resurrection.

Likewise, the words of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) quoted by Allāh ''that my heart may be at ease'' are unconditional. It means that he wanted to acquire total tranquillity and to cut at the roots of all types of fancies and imaginations. Human imagination is bound to the senses; all its activities are confined within the circle of the things perceived by these senses. It shrinks from those things which are known through reason only, even when a man believes them to be true, like those principles of metaphysics which are beyond the sphere of matter and which cannot be known through any of the five senses. The mind resists those realities even when their premises are sound and certain. There always remain some vague doubt about the authenticity of those conclusions. Such doubts and conflicting ideas become stengthened by inclinations and desires, although the spirit firmly accepts the truth of those principles and believes in them unconditionally. Thus, belief and faith should remain firm and intact ; the imagination should only harm it by a slight distress, which we may call pricks. A man sleeps in a dark room in which is placed a dead body. He knows that the dead person is just a lump of matter without any sense or will; it cannot harm anybody in any way. But the imagination refuses to accept this truth, it goes on thinking fantastic things concerning that dead body; and it frightens the man to such an extent that it may happen that he loses the balance of his mind, or even dies because of terror.

This example shows that the existence of some thoughts or fantasies conflicting with the sure truths, is not always contrary to faith and belief. But surely it annoys the spirit and robs it of its tranquillity and ease. Such an imaginary distress cannot be removed except by demonstration or sensual perception. That is what is meant by the saying: Seeing has an effect which knowledge does not have. For instance, Allāh informed Mūsā (a.s.), when he was at his appointed place, that his people had gone astray and were worshipping a calf. Hearing it, he believed it. Yet, his distress and anger showed itself only when he returned to them and saw them with his own eyes, in their idolatory. Then his violent grief reached its highest point; he threw down the tablets and seized his brother by the head dragging him towards himself.

From this and the previous explanations it is clear that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) had not asked to see a phenomenon which could be perceived through the senses; that is, he did not want to see how the parts and pieces of a dead body accept life after death. He wanted to see the action of Allāh in giving life to the dead. But this action could not be seen, although it was not unrelated to a perceived phenomenon, that is, the acceptance of life by the pieces of the dead bodies. Thus Ibrāhīm (a.s.) had in fact asked for an evident truth and certainty.

QUR'ĀN: He said: ''Then take four of the birds, then cut them (into pieces), then place on every mountain a part of them, t h e y will come to you'': The word ''ṣurhunna'' (صُرْهُنَّ = c u t them into pieces) is derived from ṣāra; yaṣūru (صَارَ، يَصُوْرُ = he cut / he inclined; he is cutting/he is inclining). Another recitation is ṣirhunna (صِرْهُنَّ), derived from ṣāra; yaṣīru (صَارَ، يَصِيْرُ.) with the same meanings. The context shows that it means ''cut them''. The preposition, ''ilā'' (إِلي = to) gives a hint of inclination, as was explained earlier. The meaning, then, will be: cut them (into pieces), inclining them towards you; or, incline them towards you cutting them into pieces.

Anyhow, the above sentences are the answer to the prayer of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) when he said: ''My Lord! show me how Thou givest life to the dead.'' Obviously, the answer should fit the question. The norms of eloquence and the wisdom of the speaker leave no room for verbosity; a wise and eloquent speaker does not allow his speech to be encumbered by unnecessary words which have no bearing on the intended meaning. This is especially so with the Qur'ān, the best speech, revealed by the best of speakers to the best of hearers. The story is not as simple as it appears at first glance. Had it been so, the answer would have been completed by the giving of life to any dead body in any manner, and the extra details would have been deemed unnecessary. But the facts tell us otherwise: Allāh included in it many extra particulars and details. It was decided that the dead to be given life should be from among the birds; they should be alive, should be four in number, they should be killed and their parts and pieces be mixed together, then the mixed matter should be divided into many portions; then every portion should be placed in places distant from each other like the peak of this mountain and summit of that hill; then they should be given life through Ibrāhīm (a.s.), that is, the very man who had asked for it ; and thus they should all gather around him alive and none the worse for their experience.

All these details and peculiarities must have had some connection with the aim of the story. The commentators have written many reasons for these points, which only add to the readers' confusion (as may be seen in the more extensive books of exegesis of the Qur'ān).

However, these particulars must have been related to the question. We fmd that there are two aspects in the question of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) which require special attention:

First: His use of the active voice, ''how Thou givest life''. He wanted to see the giving of life, in-as-much as it is an attribute of Allāh. He did not want to see it from the other side, that is, how the various parts of a dead body accept life after death.

Second: His use of the plural, ''dead ones'', which is an added particular.

Keeping these two matters in view, we fmd that the answer fits the question perfectly, there is nothing unnecessary or extraneous in it.

The first aspect was fully answered by making it happen through Ibrāhīm (a.s.) himself. The words ''then take'', ''then cut them'' and ''then place'', were all essential for this purpose. Finally Allāh said, ''then call them, they will come to you flying''. Their coming to Ibrāhīm flying, that is, their life, was caused by Ibrāhīm's call. Allāh made his call the cause of the giving of life to the dead birds — and there is no bestowing of life except by the decree of Allāh. The call of Ibrāhīm, by order of Allāh, had a sort of connection with the decree of Allāh which gives life to all. In this way, Ibrāhīm saw this bestowing with his own eyes, and saw how the divine decree creates life. Had the call of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) not been connected with the decree of Allāh (Who, when He intends a thing, say to it ''Be', and it is), and had it been connected, like our own talk, with the images in his mind only, it could not create anything, could not give life to any dead thing.

The second aspect, the use of the plural, ‘‘dead ones’’, shows that the multiplicity of the dead had some bearing on the question. The bodies, after they had died, their components disintegrated, their shapes altered and their conditions totally changed, could not be recognized, nor could there remain any connection or attachment between their former parts; they became lost in the darkness of nothingness, like forgotten myths that exist neither in reality nor in the imagination. Ibrāhīm (a.s.) wanted to see how the life-giving power of Allāh would encompass them when there was nothing to be encompassed.

This same question was asked arrogantly by Pharaoh, and Mūsā (a.s.) replied to him by knowledge. Allāh says quoting this talk: (Pharaoh) said: ‘‘Then what is the state of the. former generation?’’ He (Mūsā) said: ‘‘The knowledge thereof is with my Lord in a book; errs not my Lord, nor does He forget’’ (20: 51 — 52).

Anyhow, this aspect of the question was answered by Allāh when He ordered Ibrāhīm (a.s.) to take four of the birds (perhaps, the birds were chosen for this demonstration because it could be carried out on them easily and without delay) so that he might observe their ways, see their distinguishing features and particular shapes, and thus might know them perfectly. He was then ordered to kill them, chop and mince them, mixing their small particles completely together. Then he was required to divide that mixture into portions and put each portion on a separate mountain, so that there should not remain any chance of recognition. Then he was to call them, and they would come to him flying. By this demonstration, he would see that the re-establishing of separate identities and the bestowal of life follows the call; and that the call was addressed to their souls. The body follows the soul, it is not the other way round. The body is a dependant of the soul, and not vice versa. The body has the same relation to the soul that a shadow has to the body. The shadow appears when the body exists; it inclines according to the inclination of the body; and when the body ceases to exist, the shadow becomes extinct. Likewise, when Allāh creates a living thing, or gives life to a dead animal or man, the creative decree affects, originally, the spirit, and the material parts follow the spirit and come into being, because of the special bond created by Allāh between the spirit and its body — the bond which is preserved by Allāh and which we cannot comprehend. In this way, the identity of the body follows the identity of the spirit, without any gap and without any hindrance. Allāh refers to it in His words, ‘‘they will come to you flying’’, that is, without any delay whatsoever.

The same principle has been enunciated in verse 32:10 — 11, And they say: ‘‘What! when we have become lost in the earth, shall we then indeed be in a new creation?’’ Nay! they are disbelievers in the meeting of their Lord. Say: ‘‘The angel of death who is given charge of you causes you to die, then to your Lord you are brought back.’’ We have explained to some extent this verse while discussing the non-materiality of the soul; further details will be given in a proper place, God willing.

‘‘Then take four of the birds’’: He was given this order so that he might identify them perfectly. Thus there would be no room for doubt when they had been made whole and alive again. Also he would observe their particulars and peculiarities, and then would see how all distinctions had been lost after death.

‘‘Then cut them (into pieces), then place on every mountain a part of them’’: Kill them, cut them into pieces, mix those pieces all together and divide the portions on the mountains found in your locality. In this way, the parts of each bird would be scattered here and there, and they would not be recognizable.

This order indicate that this event occurred after Ibrāhīm (a.s.) had migrated from Babylonia to Syria; because there are no mountains in Babylonia.

‘‘Then call them’’: Call the birds ‘O peacock!, O this!, O that!’ The pronoun ‘‘them’’ refers to the ‘‘four birds’’. If Allāh had wished Ibrahim to call the pieces of the birds, He-would have said ‘‘nādihinna’’ (نَادِهِنَّ = cry out to them), because the pieces were on far away mountains, and not ud‘uhunna (اُدْعُهُنَّ = call them) which is used for calling someone nearby. The order to ‘‘call them’’ indicates that he was to call the birds (i.e., their spirits) themselves.

‘‘They will come to you flying ’’. That is, they will get their own bodies and shapes, and will acquire all their faculties and powers including flying.

QUR’ĀN: And know that Allāh is Mighty, Wise: He is Mighty; if a thing ceases to exist, it is not lost to Him. He is Wise; He does not do a thing but by its proper method. He creates bodies by creating souls, and not the other way round.

TRADITIONS

About the words of Allāh: Did you not see him who disputed with Ibrāhīm about his Lord: aṭ-Ṭayālisī and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib that he said: ‘‘He who disputed with Ibrāhīm about his Lord was Namrūd (Nimrod), son of Kan‘ān.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Abū ‘Alī aṭ-Ṭabrisī has said: ‘‘There is a difference of opinion as to the time when this dispute occurred. It is said that it was when he shattered the idols, before he was thrown into fire. (It is reported from Muqātil.) Also it is said that it was after he was thrown into fire, and it had became cool and safe for him. (It is reported from aṣ-Ṣādiq - a.s.)’’ (Tafsīru ’l-burhān)

The author says: The verse does not say when the dispute had taken place. But it may fairly be inferred that it was after Ibrāhīm had been thrown into fire. The stories written in the Qur’ān about the early period of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) — when he argued with his uncle and other people and then shattered the idols, give us to understand that he first met Namrūd when he was taken to his court accused of breaking their idols; and Namrūd ordered him to be burnt alive. At that time Namrūd was too busy in sentencing him to have any dialogue with him about his Lord: whether it was Allāh or Namrūd. Also, if this event had occurred at that time, Namrūd would have disputed with him on behalf of the idols, and not for establishing his own divinity.

There are many traditions, narrated by the Sunnī and the Shī‘ite narrators that the one ‘‘who passed by a town and it had fallen down upon its roofs’’ was the prophet, Armiah. Other traditions say that he was ‘Uzayr. But both types of traditions are ‘‘solitary’’, (i.e., not mutawātir) and one is not bound to accept any of them. Moreover, the chains of some are weak. The Qur’ān too is silent about the passer-by’s identity, and the Bible does not mention this story.

The story given in those traditions is long, and there are some differences among them. In any case, those traditions are beyond the scope of our book. Those wishing to read them should look for them into other books.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) told in a tradition about the words of Allāh: And (remember) when Ibrāhīm said: ''My Lord! Show me how Thou givest life to the dead . . . '': ''And this verse is allegorical; it means that he (Ibrāhīm - a.s.) asked about 'how'?, and 'how' is an action of Allāh, Mighty and Great is He; (it is a thing that) if a knowledgeable person did not know it he cannot be faulted for it nor can any defect be attributed to his belief in monotheism . . .'' (Ma'āni 'l-akhbar)

The author says: The meaning of this tradition may be understood from our earlier explanations.

'Alī ibn Asbāṭ says that Abu '1-Ḥasan ar-Riḍā (a.s.) was asked about the words of Allāh: He (Ibrāhīm) said: ''Certainly! but that my heart may be at ease.'' ''Was there any doubt in his heart?'' The Imām said: ''No! but he wanted an increase (in it) from Allāh . . .'' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: This matter has been narrated in al-Kāfī from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) and al-'Abdu 's-Ṣāliḥ (a.s.). Its meaning has been explained earlier.

al-Qummī narrated from his father from Ibn Abī 'Umayr from Abū Ayyūb from Abū Basīr from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) saying: ''Verily Ibrāhīm saw a dead body on a river-bank; aquatic carnivores were eating it, then they attacked each other and some of them ate the others. Ibrāhīm was astonished (to see it) and said: 'My Lord! show me how Thou givest life to the dead.' Allāh said: 'What! and do you not believe?' He said: 'Certainly, but that my heart may be at ease.' Allāh said: 'Then take four of the birds, then cut them into pieces, then place on every mountain a part of them, then call them, they will come to you flying; and know that Allāh is Mighty, Wise.' Thereupon, Ibrāhīm took a peacock, a rooster, a pigeon and a crow. Then Allāh said: 'Cut them into pieces and mix their flesh together and place them separately on ten mountains.' Thereafter he (Ibrāhīm - a.s.) called them and said: 'Be alive by the permission of Allāh.' The birds began assembling, the flesh and bones of each joining together with its head; and they flew towards Ibrāhīm. (Seeing it) Ibrāhīm said: 'Verily, Allāh is Mighty, Wise.' '' (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: al-'Ayyāshī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr from Abū Baṣīr from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.); and it has been narrated through Sunnī chains from Ibn ‘Abbās.

The words of the Imām: ‘‘Verily, Ibrāhīm saw a dead body . . . ‘My Lord! Show me how Thou givest life to the dead’ ’’, describe the reason why Ibrāhīm asked this question: he had just seen the pieces of the body being disjoined and scattered, and their condition changed. He observed their dispersal in all directions and the deterioration in their condition which was to such an extent that nothing of the original body remained there.

Question: The tradition apparently says that the doubt was that which is known as the doubt of the eater and the eaten; because it mentions that the carnivores attacked each other and some of them ate the others, and that the wonder and question of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was based on this phenomenon.

Comment: There are two doubts: 1) the scattering and dispersal of the parts of the bodies, the change in their properties and shapes, in short, their complete extinction so that apparently nothing remained to accept the life; 2) the parts of one animal become the parts of another animal; how could the two animals be resurrected whole? The part of one is also the part of another; whichever is resurrected whole, the other one will be incomplete. This is called the doubt of the eater and the eaten.

The answer given by Allāh — that the body follows the soul — is sufficient to remove both doubts. But what Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was ordered to do was not related to the doubt of the eater and the eaten; it was directly concerned with the first doubt — dispersal of the parts and total extinction, even though the basic answer removes both doubts.

What the tradition mentions some of the carnivores eating the others is not intended to be a part of the explanation of the verse.

The Imām (aṣ-Ṣādiq - a.s.) has said: ‘‘Thereupon, Ibrāhīm took a peacock, a rooster, a pigeon and a crow.’’ Some other traditions say that the birds were a vulture, a duck, a peacock and a rooster. It has been narrated by aṣ-Ṣādiq in ‘Uyūnu ’l-akhbār from ar-Riḍā (a.s.). It has also been reported from Mujāhid, Ibn Jarīḥ, ‘Atā’ and Ibn Zayd. Still others say that it was a hoopoe, a sparrow-hawk, a peacock and a crow. It has been narrated by al-‘Ayyāshī, through Ma‘rūf ibn Kharabbūdh, from al-Bāqir (a.s.): and is reported from Ibn ‘Abbās too. Another Sunnī tradition quotes Ibn ‘Abbās as saying that the birds were a crested crane, a peacock, a rooster and a pigeon. There is only one name which appears in every report: peacock.

The Imām said: ‘‘place them separately on ten mountains.’’ That the mountain were ten is unanimously mentioned in the traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt. Somone has put their number as four; another as seven.

‘Alī ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Jahm said: ‘‘I was present in the court of al-Ma’mūn and with him was ar-Riḍā (‘Alī ibn Mūsā). al-Ma’mūn said to him: ‘O Son of the Messenger of Allāh! Is it not your belief that the prophets were sinless?’ He said: ‘Certainly.’ Then he (al-Ma’mūn) asked him (ar-Ridā - a.s.) about some verses of the Qur’ān, and said to him, among others: ‘Now tell me about the words of Allāh: ‘‘My Lord! show me how Thou givest life to the dead. ’’He said: ‘‘What! and do you not believe?’’ He said: ‘‘Certainly, but that my heart may be at ease.’’ ar-Riḍā said: ‘Verily Allāh, Blessed and High is He!, had revealed to Ibrāhīm: ‘‘I am going to take from my servants a friend; if he asks me to give life to the dead, I will grant his prayer.’’ It came into the heart of Ibrāhīm that he was that friend. Therefore, he said: ‘‘My Lord! Show me how Thou givest life to the dead. ’’Allāh said:¸ ‘‘What ! and do you not believe?’’ Ibrāhīm said: ‘‘Certainly, but that my heart may be at ease about Thy friendship . . .’’ ’ ’’ (‘Uyūn ’l-akhbār)

The author says: We have expressed our views (while discussing about the Garden of Adam) about ‘Alī ibn Muḥammad ibn al-Jahm and about this tradition which he has narrated from ar-Riḍā (a.s.).

However, this tradition throws some light on the fact that the status of the friendship of Allāh brings with it the granting of prayers. The language supports this too. al-Khallah (الخَلَّةُ) means ‘need’. The friend is called al-khalīl (الخَلِيْلُ) because when friendship is perfect, one friend describes his needs to the other friend — and why should one describe his need if his friend cannot fulfil it?

The parable of those who spend their wealth in the way of Allāh is as the parable of a grain growing seven ears, in every ear there are a hundred grains; and Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases; and Allāh is Ample-giving, All-knowing (261). Those who spend their wealth in the way of Allāh, then do not follow up what they have spent with reproach or injury, for them is their reward with their Lord, and they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve (262). A kind word and forgiveness is better than charity followed by injury; and Allāh is Self-sufficient, Forbearing (263). O you who believe! do not nullify your charity by reproach and injury, like him who spends his wealth to be seen of men and does not believe in Allāh and the last day. So his parable is as the parable of a smooth rock with (some) earth upon it, then a heavy rain falls upon it, so it leaves it just a bare stone. They shall not gain anything of what they have earned. And Allāh does not guide the unbelieving people (264). And the parable of those who spend their wealth seeking the pleasure of Allāh and keeping firm their souls is as the parable of a garden on an elevated ground, upon which heavy rain falls so it brings forth its fruit twofold; but if heavy rain does not fall upon it, then light rain (is enough). And Allāh sees what you do (265). Would anyone of you like that he should have a garden of palms and vines with streams flowing beneath it; he has in it all kinds of fruits; and old age has overtaken him and he has weak offspring, when (lo!) a whirlwind with fire in it smites it so it gets burnt up. Thus Allāh makes the signs clear to you, that you may reflect (266). 0 you who believe! spend (benevolently) out of the good things that you have earned and of what We have brought forth for you out of the earth, and do not aim at what is bad of it, that you may spend (in charity), while you would not take it yourselves unless you connived at it; and know that Allāh is Self-sufficient, Praiseworth (267). Satan threatens you with poverty and enjoins you to abomination; and Allāh promises you forgiveness from Himself and abundance; and Allāh is Ample-giving, All-knowing (268). He grants wisdom to whom He pleases, and whoever is granted wisdom, he indeed is given a great good; and none but men of understanding mind (269). And whatever alms you give or (whatever) vow you vow, surely Allāh knows it, and the oppressors shall have no helpers (270). If you give alms openly, it is well, and if you hide it and give it to poor, it is better for you; and this will remove from you some of your sins; and Allāh is aware of what you do (271). To make them walk in the right way is not incumbent on you, but Allāh guides aright whom He pleases; and whatever good thing you spend, it is to your own good, and you do not spend but to seek Allāh's pleasure, and whatever good thing you spend shall be paid back to you in full, and you shall not be wronged (272). (Charity is) for the poor who are besieged in the way of Allāh — they cannot go about in the land; the ignorant man thinks them to be rich on account of their self-control (from begging) ; thou wouldst recognize them by their countenance; they do not beg from men importunately; and whatever good thing you spend, surely Allāh knows it (273). Those who spend their wealth by night and by day, secretly and openly, for them is their reward with their Lord, and they shall have no fear, nor shall they grieve (274).

GENERAL COMMENT

The context of the verses indicates that they must have been revealed all together. Their theme is spending in the way of Allāh. They begin with a parable to show that charity increases in the hands of Allāh, one to seven hundred or even more, by the permission of Allāh. Another parable shows that this increase is sure to happen; it cannot fail. They go to forbid insincerity in spending, that is, spending to show others how generous one is, and give one more parable to demonstrate the futility of this, that such spending does not increase and bears no fruit. Also, they admonish the believers not to follow charity with reproach and injury, because these two evils nullify alms and make their reward forfeit. Then they say that spending should be from their good and lawful wealth, and not from unlawful or worthless things, as it shows niggardliness and miserliness. Thereafter they prescribe who should be given charity — the poor men who are besieged in the way of Allāh. Finally it again reminds them of the great reward of charity which they shall find with Allāh.

In short, the verses exhort the believers to spend and explain to them the following things:

First: The purpose of spending: It should be to seek the pleasure of Allāh, not to show off to people.

Second: The fashion and condition of this good work: It should not be followed by reproach and injury.

Third: The quality of the wealth to be spent: It must be lawful and good, not unlawful or worthless.

Fourth: The qualification of the receivers: It should be given to those poor who are besieged in the way of Allāh.

Fifth: The rewards of such spending in this world and in the next.

SPENDING IN THE WAY OF ALLĀH

One of the two pillars of Islam is the Rights of the people; and spending for the welfare of the people is one of the things to which Islam pays the utmost attention. It exhorts a believer to spend for this purpose, and has laid down the rules and opened up the ways for such spending — some of these ways are obligatory and others highly recommended: zakāt, khums (the one-fifth tax), penalties to expiate certain illegalities, various types of redemption, obligatory spending and recommended charities. Then there are laws to establish and regulate endowments, settlements for residence, or for life, wills, gifts and many similar things.

All this has been done to improve the living standars of the poor classes — the people who cannot meet their expenses without help from others. The intention of Islam is to raise their level to bring them nearer to the people of means.

On the other hand, it has strictly forbidden the rich people from pompous living and showing off their wealth. It has allowed them to live in a reasonable and honourable manner; but has prohibited extravagance and the squandering of wealth in a lavish style which is above the reach of the average person.

The aim of both sets of rules was to create a community life that would be neither too low nor too high, whose various groups would be nearer to each other, and would have a fairly uniform standard of life. Such a society would give life to the institution of unity and co-operation; and would eradicate conflicting designs and uproot enmity and antagonism. The Qur'ān holds that the true religion must organize life in all its multifarious activities, putting it in order in such a way that man's bliss is guaranteed in this life as well as in the next one. Such a religion will bless man with true knowledge, noble character and pleasant life; he will be free in this life to enjoy the bounties given to him by Allāh, and to remove from himslef unpleasant things and all types of misfortune.

This will be possible only when society enjoys a good life and all its members share its bliss equally or almost equally. This, in its turn, demands that all their needs are fulfilled and the condition of society reformed. All this needs money and wealth. The way to get that money for this most important purpose is by contributions from the members of society — they are required to spend out of what they have earned by their labour. Surely the believers are brothers to each other; and the earth is of Allāh, and property and wealth belong to Him.

This is a fact, the truth of which was demonstrated by the Prophet during his lifetime when he had the authority in his hands. He showed its correctness and' demonstrated how it created a stable society, growing, developing and bearing good results.

It was this society for which the Leader of the faithfuls, ‘Alī (a.s.) felt nostalgia, and the passing away of which he remembered sorrowfully, in one of his speeches:

‘‘You live in a period when the steps of virtue are moving backwards, and the steps of evil are moving forward; and Satan is increasing his eagerness to ruin people. This is the time when his equipment is strong, and his traps have been widely spread and his prey has become easy (to catch). Cast your glance wherever you like. Do you see (anything) except a poor man suffering (the pangs of) poverty, or a rich man changing Allāh’s favour for ungratefulness, or a miser trampling the right of Allāh to increase his wealth, or an arrogant person (who behaves) as though his ears hear any counsel with difficulty.’’ (Nahju ’l-balāghah, Sermon 129).

The passage of time has proved the validity of this Qur’ānic system — that the various classes should be brought together, the poor should be helped through ‘‘spending’’, and the rich forbidden extravagance, pomposity and vanity. When western culture took the upper hand, people’s ideals and outlook changed. They clung to the earthly life, tried their utmost to acquire and keep all worldly trinkets coveted by animal greed and sensual desires, and adopted for it whatever means they could. The result: wealth was confined within a limited circle, the pleasures of life were reserved for a wealthy minority, and the only share of the lower class in it was deprivation. The upper classes continued to swallow each other like cannibals, until a very select group monopolized the blessings and bliss of this life and the vast majority, that is, the common people, were denied even the right of life.

This behaviour generated all evil tendencies on both sides; it gave rise to the saying, ‘‘Every man for himself’’. No one leaves anything nor does he spare anything. It has resulted in a class struggle, and open enmity between the two groups, the rich and the poor, the haves and the have-nots, each side wanting to exterminate the other. This was the basic cause of the World Wars and the emergence of Communism. Truth and nobility have been cast aside, peace of mind and tranquillity of heart have departed from the world, and the human species on the whole does not have any feeling of joy in life. This is the position which the chaos of human society has reached today — what tomorrow holds is more grievous and horrible.

One of the most damaging factors in this social disorder is the closure of the gate ‘‘spending’’, and the opening of the doors of interest. Allāh has explained the evil of this in seven verses coming after these verses of ‘‘spending’’; Allāh had warned the mankind that if interest becomes widespread, the world will fall in disorder. It is one of the prophecies of the Qur’ān which has been fulfilled in these days. When the Qur’ān was revealed, interest was a foetus; now it has been born from the womb of western economy and is growing by leaps and bounds.

To understand what we have just mentioned, read the following verses:

Then set your face uprightly for the (right) religion in natural devotion (to the truth) ; the nature made by Allāh in which He has made men; there is no alteration in the creation of Allāh; that is the right religion, but most people do not know — turning to Him. And be careful of (your duty to) Him, and keep up prayer and be not of the polytheists, of those who, divided their religion and became sects, every sect rejoicing in what they have with them. And when harm afflicts men, they call upon their Lord, turning to Him; then when He makes them taste of mercy from Him, lo! some of them begin to associate (others) with their Lord, so as to be ungrateful for what We have given them; but enjoy yourselves (for a while), for you shall soon come to know . . . So give to the near of kin his due, and to the needy and the wayfarer; this is the best for those who desire Allāh’s pleasure, and these it is who are successful. And whatever you lay out as interest, so that it may increase in the property of men, it shall not increase with Allāh; and whatever you give in charity, desiring Allāh’s pleasure — it is these (persons) that shall get manifold . . . Disorder has appeared in the land and the sea on account of what the hands of men have wrought, that He may make them taste a part of that which they have done, so that they may return. Say: ‘‘Travel in the land, then see how was the end of those (who were) before (you); most of them were polytheists.’’ Then set thy face upright to the right religion before there comes from Allāh the day which cannot be averted; on that day they shall become separated (30:30 — 43). There are verses of the same import in the chapters of Hūd, Yūnus, the Night journey, the Prophets etc. We shall explain them later on.

This is apparently the reason why these verses of spending exhort the believers and give so much emphasis to ‘‘spending’’.

COMMENTARY

QUR’ĀN: The parable of those who spend their wealth in the way of Allāh is as the parable of a grain . . .: ‘‘The way of Allāh’’ means anything which leads to the pleasure of Allāh; any religious purpose for which work is done. The phrase in the verse is unconditional, although it comes after the verses of ‘‘fighting in the way of Allāh’’, and although the phrase ‘‘in the way of Allāh’’ is combined in many verses with fighting. But such recurring usage does not restrict the phrase to fighting.

Some scholars have said: The words, ‘‘as the parable of a grain growing seven ears . . .’’ actually mean, ‘‘as the parable of him who sowed a grain that grew seven ears . . .’’ The ‘‘grain growing seven ears’’ is the parable of property spent in the way of Allāh, and not ‘‘of those who spend’’ that wealth. And it does not need much explanation.

This interpretation, although sound in itself, is not in total conformity with the Qur’ān. On deep contemplation, we find that an overwhelming number of the Qur’ānic parables are of this same style. See, for example, the following verses:

And the parable of those who disbelieve is as the parable of one who shouts to that which hears not but a call and a cry . . . (2:171). As we see, it is the parable of him who calls the disbelievers, not of the disbelievers themselves.

> The likeness of this world’s life is only as water which We sent down from the sky; by its mingling, the herbage of the earth which men and cattle eat grows; un.til when the earth puts on its golden raiment and it becomes garnished, and its people think that they have power over it, Our command comes to it, by night or by day, so We render it as reaped, as though it had not been in existence yesterday; thus do We make clear the signs fora people who reflect (10:24).
> . . . the parable of His light is as a niche in which is a lamp . . . (24:35).

Look also at other parables mentioned in these very verses:

So his parable is as the parable of a smooth rock . . . And the parable of those who spend their wealth seeking the pleasure of Allāh and keeping firm their souls is as the parable of a garden on an elevated ground . . .

There are many such verses and all of them have one thing in common — all restrict themselves to the main element of the likeness, the essential ingradient of the parable; and omit other factors for the sake of brevity.

A parable is an actual or imagined story which has a marked resemblance to the subject matter in some aspects; it creates a picture in the mind which helps to fully grasp the idea for which the parable has been used. For example, there are the Arabic proverbs, ‘‘I have neither she-camel nor he-camel’’; and, ‘‘In summer you wasted the milk’’. These sayings remind the hearer of the related true stories by fitting the story to the topic at hand, and at once the picture flashes before his mind’s eyes in clear perspective. That is why it is said that proverbs do not change.

Another example: ‘‘The parable of those who spend their wealth in the way of Allāh is as the parable of the one who sows a grain, it growing seven ears, in every ear there are a hundred grains.’’ This is an imaginary story.

The basic element of a parable — the essential ingredient of the similarity that produces the clear and well-defined image of the topic — is sometimes the whole story; and occasionally a part of the story. Examples of the former are:

And the parable of an evil word is as an evil tree pulled up from the earth’s surface; it has no stability (14:26).

The similitude of those who were placed under the Torah, then they did not hold it, is as the similitude of the donkey bearing books (62:5).

The example of the latter, where the basic element is only a part of the story, is this parable under discussion — spending in the way of Allāh has been likened to the grain growing seven ears, every ear having a hundred grains. This is the basic element of analogy; but in explaining it we earlier added the words, ‘‘of him who sows’’; it was added just to complete the story.

In the Qur'ānic parables, where the basic element of the analogy is the whole story, Allāh has mentioned it without any omission. But where that element is only a part of the story, only that part has been described and others have been left out. Why should the full story have to be described when the purpose of the parable is fully served by the short version. Moreover, this style creates alacrity in the hearer's minds — they do not find what they anticipate and an unexpected picture is flashed before their minds' eyes. But it fully serves the purpose: it is different from the anticipated picture and yet it is the same. This is brevity through alteration in its finest way; and the Qur'ān uses it whenever necessary.

QUR'ĀN: Growing seven ears, in every ear there are a hundred grains: ''as-Sunbul'' (السُّنْبُلُ = ear of corn, spike) is on paradigm of fun'ul (فُنْعُلُ). It is said that its root meaning is to draw a curtain. The ear of corn was given this name because it hides the grains in their husks.

A most foolish objection has been levelled against this verse, that it is a simile of a thing which is not found in the world — no ear contains a hundred grains.

Reply: It is not necessary for a similitude that the picture compared with be found outside the imagination. Analogies with imaginary ideas and images are found by their thousands in every language.

Moreover, ears containing a hundred grains, and a single seed yielding seven hundred grains are very often found in many places.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases; and Allāh is Ample-giving, All-knowing: Allāh gives more than seven hundred to whom He pleases: He is Ample-giving; no one can put any hindrance on His generosity; nor can anyone restrict His grace. Allāh says: Who is it that will lend to Allāh a goodly loan, so He will multiply it for him manifold (2:245). In this verse, ''manifold'' is unrestricted; there is no numerical limit to it.

Someone has said: This sentence means, ''Allāh increases this much, that is, seven hundred for one, for whom He pleases.'' According to this interpretation seven hundred would be the limit of multiplication.

But if we accept this interpretation as correct, then this sentence would show the cause of the previous statement (. . . seven ears, in every ear there are a hundred grains). In that case, it should have begun with the word inna (اِنَّ = verily, surely, indeed). See for example another verse, where the causative sentence begins with the word ''surely'':

Allāh is He Who made for you the night that you may rest therein and the day to see; most surely Allāh is Gracious to men (40:61). There are many verses in the same style.

The seven-hundred-fold reward is unrestricted — it is not restricted to the Hereafter. The promise is as valid for this world as it is for the Hereafter.

And on reflection, one has to support this idea. You spend your property in the way of Allāh; you may be thinking at first that you have lost that property without getting anything in exchange. But if you ponder a little on this matter you will appreciate that mankind is like one living body; it has various limbs and organs, all of different shapes and with distinctive names, but all of them are united in the goal of life, all are joined together in each other's effects and benefits. If one of these limbs loses its health, becomes weak or falters in its function, the whole body is adversely affected and fails to reach its goal. The eyes and the hands are two organs with different names and separate functions. But man has been given his eyes so that he may distinguish objects from each other through light, colour and distance. When this task is accomplished, the hands come into action to take hold of what man should acquire for himself, and to repulse what should be repulsed. If the hands fail in their function, man has to make up the loss through other limbs; but, to begin with, it creates untold misery and hardship for him, and also decreases the normal functions of those limbs to the extent they are used as substitutes for the hands. But if other limbs were to send to the ailing hands some of the blood cells and energy from their own stock and the hands to become restored to health, the whole body would grow better and every limb would share in the benefits — the benefits which may be hundreds and thousands times more than the small amount of blood, etc., which it expended for the hands.

Likewise, when a man spends for the betterment of the condition of another, it saves the beneficiary from evils which are generally caused by poverty; he feels love for the benefactor in his heart, his tongue speaks his name with respect; and he busies himself in his work with more vigour and energy and thus prospers. The whole of society feels its good effects, and as a member of that society, the benefactor also shares in that social upliftment. This is more evident when the spending is done for social services like education, training, etc. This much about general spending.

When that spending is done in the way of Allāh, seeking His pleasure, the increase is sure to occur without fail. If wealth is spent, but not for the pleasure of Allāh, then it is done for selfish aims — the rich man spends on a poor man to avert his evils from himself. Or he thinks that if the poor man becomes self-supporting, the whole of society will become a better place to live in, and in this way the benefactor will live in it more happily. This type of spending is a sort of subjugation of the poor who is exploited by the rich for selfish purposes. Such a charity creates bad effects in the poor. Sometimes these hard feelings accumulate and then burst out in riots and revoultions.

But the spending which is done only for the pleasure of Allāh is free from these defects; it creates only good, and only bliss and blessings result from it.

QUR'ĀN: Those who spend their wealth in the way of Allāh, then do not follow up what they have spent with reproach or injury, for them is their reward with their Lord, and they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve:

''al-Itbā' '' (الاتْبَاعُ) is used with both transitive and intransitive meanings. It means 'to follow' and 'to persue' ; and 'to attach one thing to other'. This word has been used in these two meanings in the verses: Then they persued them at sunrise (26:60); And We attached to them a curse in this world . . . (28:42).

''al-Mann'' (المَنُّ) means to say what may turn charity into annoyance, for example, to tell the beneficiary: ''I gave you this and that''. The root-meaning of this word, as has been said, is ''to cut''. The word has been used in this meaning in the verse: . . . for them surely is a reward never to be cut off (41:8).

''al-Adhā'' (الأذي) is immediate harm, a little injury. ''al-Khawf'' (الخَوْفُ = fear) is the expectation of harm or trouble. ''al-Ḥuzn'' (الحُزْنُ = grief) is the sorrow which greatly disturbs the soul, and which is caused by a real or almost real misfortune.

QUR'ĀN: A kind word and forgiveness is better than charity followed by injury. . .: ''Kind word'' is that which is not disliked by the common man. It may vary according to circumstances. ''al-Maghfirah'' (المَغْفِرَةُ = forgiveness) literally means to cover. ''al-Ghinā'' (الغِني = self-sufficiency) is the opposite of need and poverty. ''al-Ḥilm'' (الحِلْمُ = forbearance) means to remain silent when confronted with disagreeable words or actions.

The contrast between a kind word and forgiveness, on the one hand, and charity followed by injury, on the other, shows that the ‘‘kind word’’ means that if one wants to turn away a suppliant without fulfilling his need and the suppliant has not uttured unpleasant words, one should express one’s good wishes and utter good words to him. The ‘‘forgiveness’’ refers to the same situation, provided the suppliant has said unpleasant things about the intended benefactor. In both cases, if one uses a kind word and forgives the suppliant it is far better than fulfilling his need and then following it with reproach and injury. Such reproach, in fact, shows that the benefactor thinks that what he has spent is a great wealth, and that he is annoyed with the people’s requests and supplications. But a believer should be far above such moral defects and petty thoughts. The believer must mould himself on the attributes of Allāh. And Allāh is Self-sufficient: no bounty is great in His eyes; He gives and bestows whatever He wishes. Also He is Forbearing: He makes no haste in meting out punishment to evil-doers; He does not become angry on His creatures’ follies. It was to point out this important matter that the verse ended the sentence, ‘‘and Allāh is Self-sufficient, Forbearing’’.

QUR’ĀN: O you who believe! do not nullify your charity by reproach and injury: The verse proves that charity becomes forfeited if it is followed by reproach and injury.

Some people say that this verse shows that subsequent sins (and especially big ones) nullify the good deeds preceding them. But this inference is uncalled for. The verse .only talks about reproach and injury vis-a-vis charity.

The topic of forfeiture has already been explained in detail.

QUR’ĀN: Like him who spends his wealth to be seen of men and does not believe in Allāh and the last day: As the verse is addressed to the believers, and as one who does a good deed to show to men is not a believer (because he does not do that deed for the sake of Allāh) the prohibition was not extended to showiness; it was confined to reproach and injury, because there is no danger of showiness for a believer. The verse likens the almsgiver who follows his alms with reproach and injury to the one who spends to show off to men; and the likeness is in the forfeiture of charities, although there is a difference between both. The charity of one who spent to show off to men was null and void ab initio; while that of the one who followed it with reproach and injury was correct and valid to begin with, but was later nullified because of these sins.

The verb ‘‘does not believe’’ has the same form and tense as the preceding one, ‘‘spends’’; it does not say ‘‘did not believe’’. This similarity of tense shows that the disbelief here implies the showing person’s disbelief in the divine call of spending and in His promise of its great reward. Had he believed in the divine call to the believers to spend in His way, and also in the last day when the promised reward would be given, he would have done his good deed to seek the pleasure of Allāh and would have longed for the reward of the last day, instead of doing it to be seen by men.

It shows that disbelief here does not imply that the showy person does not believe in Allāh at all.

Also it proves that doing a deed with the intention of showing off to men implies that such a doer has no faith in Allāh and the last day, in so far as that deed is concerned.

QUR’ĀN: So his parable is as the parable of a smooth rock . . . does not guide the unbelieving people: The pronoun, ‘‘his’’ refers to ‘‘him who spends his wealth to be seen of men’’; the parable is for him. ‘‘aṣ-Ṣafwān’’ (الصَّفْوَانُ) and ‘‘aṣ-ṣafā’’ (الصَّفَا) are smooth rock. The same is the meaning of ‘‘aṣ-ṣald’’ (الصَّلْدُ).

‘‘al-Wābil’’ (الوَابِلُ) is heavy rain, descending with force. The pronoun in ‘‘They shall not gain ’’ refers to ‘‘him who spends to be seen of men’’, because ‘‘him’’ stands for the whole group of showy persons. The sentence ‘‘They shall not gain anything of what they have earned’’ describes the reason for the analogy; and it is the common factor of the two sides of this simile. The sentence ‘‘And Allāh does not guide the unbelieving people’’ describes the general principle: a man who does a deed to show to people is in that particular respect an unbeliever, and Allāh does not guide such people. This sentence, therefore, gives the reason for the forfeiture mentioned in this verse.

The man who spends to show off to people can get no reward for such spending. Look at a smooth rock, upon which is some earth, then a heavy rain falls upon it. Now, rain, and especially a heavy downpour, is the apparent cause of the earth coming to life again; it makes it green and adorns it with plants. But if earth settles on a smooth rock it cannot remain in place in a heavy rainfall; it is washed away and the bare rock is left there for everyone to see — the rock which cannot absorb water, nor can it nourish a seed to grow. Rain and earth both together are the most important causes of plant life and growth; but as their place was a smooth rock their effect was totally nullified, although none can attribute any fault or defect to these two life-giving ingredients.

Thus is the case of the man who does a good deed but not with intention of seeking the pleasure of Allāh; his action becomes totally null and void, even when the deed, for example, spending in the way of Allāh, is among the most effective causes of getting divine reward. But the heart of such a man is like that smooth rock; it is unable to receive divine mercy and grace. And thus he gets nothing of what he had earned.

The verse shows that the acceptance of a deed depends on sincere intention and on the pure aim of seeking the pleasure of Allāh. Sunnīs and Shī‘ahs have narrated from the Prophet that he said: ‘‘Verily, deeds are according to intentions’’.

QUR’ĀN: And the parable of those who spend their wealth seeking the pleasure of Allāh and keeping firm their souls: ‘‘Seeking the pleasure of Allāh’’ means doing what Allāh has ordered His servant to do. When the master gives an order to his servant and the servant complies with that order, the master faces him, pleased with him, Likewise, Allāh orders His servant concerning certain things and when the servant obeys His command Allāh turns towards him with pleasure and mercy.

The phrase ‘‘and keeping firm their souls’’ has been interpreted in various ways:

a) It means ‘‘certitude and confirmation’’.
b) ‘‘at-Tathbīt’’ (التَّثْبِيْتُ = to keep firm) means at-tathabbut (التَّثَبُّتُ = to make sure). The phrase means that they want to make sure where they spend their wealth.
c) It means to make sure how they spend: if it is for the pleasure of Allāh, they spend it; if there is any shade of impurity in intention, for example, and eargerness to be seen by men, they desist from spending.
d) It means keeping the souls firm in obedience to Allāh.
e) It means establishing the soul firmly in faith by making it accustomed to spending property for the sake of Allāh.

Obviously, these interpretations do not fit the verse unless one is prepared to stretch the meaning of the word ‘‘keeping firm’’ beyond its linguistic limit. Probably a more appropriate interpretation (and Allāh knows better!) may be as follows:

Allāh, first, unconditionally praised spending in His way, and mentioned that it had a very great reward in the presence of Allāh. Then He excluded two kinds of spending, because Allāh is not pleased with them and no reward will be given for them: 1) spending to show off to people, and such a deed is null and void ab inition; 2) spending that is followed by reproach and injury, for although such a deed is valid initially, it becomes nullified because of the subsequent sins of reproach and injury.

In these cases the deed is nullified, either because the doer does not seek the pleasure of Allāh from the very beginning (as in the first case) or because his soul changes the initial correct intention and seeks wordly satisfaction through reproach and injury (as in the second case).

Now Allāh describes the condition of His good servants who spend purely for His sake. These are they who spend to seek the pleasure of Allāh and then ‘‘keep firm their souls’’ on this pure intention without following it with bad deeds which could nullify it.

In short, ‘‘seeking the pleasure of Allāh’’ neans that the doer of a good deed should not contaminate his intention with showiness or other such things which would indicate that his action is for other than Allāh. And ‘‘keeping firm their souls’’ means that he should fix his soul firmly in that pure and uncontaminated intention.

This ‘‘keeping firm’’ is done by the soul on the soul. Grammatically, ‘‘tathbītan’’ (تَثْبِيْتاً = keeping firm) is ‘‘at-tamyīz’’ (التَّمِيْزُ = accusative of specification); ‘‘min’’ (مِنْ = from) shows origination; ‘‘anfusihim’’ (اَنْفُسِهِمْ = their souls) is the subject ‘‘from’’ which the action of ‘‘keeping firm’’ originates; its object is another ‘‘anfusahum’’ (اَنْفُسَهُمْ = their souls) which is deleted but understood. Accordingly, the phrase means that their souls keep firm their souls.

Alternatively, the word, ‘‘keeping firm’’ may be ‘‘al-maf‘ūlu ’l-muṭlaq’’ (المَفْعُوْلُ المُطْلَقُ = cognate accusative) for emphasis of a deleted but understood verb of the same meaning.

QUR’ĀN: As the parable of a garden on an elevated ground . . . what you do: The root word ar-rabā’ (الرَّبَاءُ) means increase. ‘‘ar-

Rabwah'' (الرَّبْوَةُ) means a good earth which increases its growth and gives a high yield. The word is also used as ar-rubwah (الرُّبْوَةُ) and ar-ribwah (الرِّبْوَةُ). ''al-Ukul'' (الأُكُلُ) is what is eaten, al Aklah (الاكْلَةُ) means one morsel. ''aṭ-Ṭall'' (الطَّلُّ) is a drizzle, which has little effect.

The parable has been revealed to show that spending which is done to seek the pleasure of Allāh cannot fail to bring about a good effect. The spending was done for Allāh and its connection with Allāh has continued; therefore, divine care always looks after it, making it grow and flourish; it must surely bring forth its fruits. Of course, the degree of care varies according to variation in the degree of purity of the intention; and the strength of the deed is correlated with the firmness of soul.

There is a garden on a good earth; a heavy rain falls on it and it brings forth its fruits abundantly — although the yield may vary in quality and quantity, according to the amount of rain which falls on it.

As there is bound to be such variation, the verse ended on the sentence, ''and Allāh is aware of what you do''. He never has any doubt in the matter of rewards; the rewards of various deeds are never confused in His eyes; He does not give this one's recompense to that one, and that one's to this one.

QUR'ĀN: Would anyone of you like . . . that you may reflect: ''al-Wudd'' (الوُدُّ) is to love, to long for, to yearn ''al-jannah'' (الجَنَّةُ) is a clump of trees, their branches touching each other. ''al-Jann'' (الجَنُّ) means to cover, to shield. A garden is called al-jannah because it covers the earth and protects if from the rays of the sun, and the like. This word is used for a clump of trees only, not for the plot of land upon which those trees stand. That is why it is correct to say, as the verse says, ''streams flowing beneath it''; if the word included the earth, the phrase would have been wrong. When the plot or earth is intended, the expression is changed: . . . a lofty ground having meadows and springs (23:50). On the other hand, the phrase, ''garden beneath which rivers flow'', repeatedly occurs in the Qur'ān.

The preposition ''of'', in ''a garden of palms and vines'', is for description; it describes the main type of trees and fruits; it does not give a full list of them. If the major part of a garden contains palms, it is generally called a palm garden, although it contains other trees also.

That is why Allāh said immediately after it, ‘‘he has in it all kinds of fruits’’. ‘‘al-Kibr’’ (الكِبْرُ) is old age; ‘‘adh-dhurriyyah’’(الذُّرِّيَّةُ) means children, offspring; ‘‘aḍ-ḍu‘afā’ ’’ (الضُّعَفَآءُ) is the plural of ‘‘aḍ-ḍa‘īf’’ (الضَّعِيْفُ = weak).

This parable joins the old age of the progenitor with the weakness of the progeny to emphasize the utmost need of the said garden, in the absence of any other means of livelihood. Had the garden owner been young and strong he could have earned his livelihood with his hands even if the garden had been burnt down. Alternatively, if he had had no weak offspring, even if he had been an aged person, he would not have felt the effects of this calamity so much; he would have known that his days were numbered and soon he would be free from all troubles. And if he had been of old age but had had strong offspring who could have work and earn their livelihood, they could have lived on their earning and the loss of the garden would not have caused much distress. But when old age coincides with weak offspring and the garden is burnt down, all possible means of livelihood are cut off. The old man cannot regain his youth and strength, so that he can re-create the garden as he had done before. His offspring are weak and they cannot do it themselves. And the garden is burnt down, it cannot regain its bloom and fruit.

‘‘al-I‘ṣār’’ (الاعْصَارُ) is a cyclone. This parable puts before our eyes the position of those who spend their wealth and then follow it with reproach and injury, and thus their deed is nullified; and there is no way to return that deed to its state of validity again. The parable perfectly fits this situation.

Through this parable Allāh expects such people to ponder upon their position. Such deeds are done only when people are overtaken by such evil traits as love of wealth and honour, pride and avarice. These evil traits do not let them contemplate and meditate; do not give them a chance to distinguish between what is beneficial and what is harmful, between good and bad. And if they had stopped to ponder they would have seen the truth.

QUR’ĀN: O you who believe! spend (benevolently) . . . Allāh is Self-sufficient, Praiseworthy: ‘‘at-Tayammum’’ (التَّيَمُّمُ) is to aim, to intend; ‘‘al-khabīth’’ (الخَبِيْثُ = bad) is opposite of ‘‘aṭ-ṭayyib’’ (الطَّيِّبُ = good); ‘‘of it’’ is related to the word ‘‘bad’’. The phrase ‘‘that you may spend in charity’’ shows the ‘‘state’’ of the subject of the verb ‘‘do not aim''; the phrase ''while you would not take it yourselves'' shows the ''state'' of the subject of the verb ''you may spend it''; it is governed by the same verb. The phrase ''unless you connive at it'' is in place of an infinitive verb. It is said that a ''li'' (لِ = because) is understood before it — thus it would mean, ''except because of your connivance at it''. Others have said that a ''bi'' (بِ = with) is understood here — in this case it would mean ''except with your connivance at it''

Whatever the grammatical explanation, the meaning of the verse is a quite clear. Allāh explains the condition of the wealth which should be spent: it should be from one's good property; and not from bad property which the spender himself would not deign to accept unless he connived at it. Giving bad wealth in charity is not generosity at all; it is getting rid of an unwanted item. Such spending will not create any love of generosity in the donor's heart, nor will it bring to him any spiritual perfection.

That is why the verse ends on the sentence ''and know that Allāh is Self-suficient, Praiseworthy''. When you spend anything, keep in view the Self-sufficiency and Praiseworthiness of Allāh. He needs nothing, yet He appreciates your good spending. Therefore, spend from your good property.

Or, it may mean: He is Self-sufficient and Praiseworthy. You should not bring to Him what is not fit for His Great Sanctity.

QUR'ĀN: Satan threatens you with poverty . . . Allāh is Ample-giving, All-knowing: The verse explains that choosing a bad thing for charity is not good for the charity-giver; it is only good property which is good for them to spend. The prohibition is for their own good, as the thing prohibited is bad for them. They dislike giving good items in charity because they believe that a good property makes one wealthy and rich; they therefore resist the idea of giving it away in charity. A bad item is worthless, and so they are ready to donate it in alms. But it is the temptation of Satan who frightens his friends with poverty. The fact is that donating property and spending it in the way of Allāh to seek His pleasure is just like any other good trade and dealing — it has its recompense and profit, as Allāh has mentioned in these verses. Moreover, it is Allāh who makes one rich and bestows abundance; property, by itself, has no power to enrich anyone. Allāh says: And that He it is Who enriches and gives to hold (53:48).

In short, it was a mistake on their part to withhold the good and likeable items from their charity because of fear of poverty. Allāh points this out in the sentence ‘‘Satan threatens you with poverty’’. This sentence puts the cause (Satan’s threatening) in place of its effect (fear of poverty). This figurative expression has been used to indicate that this fear is damaging to their interest, because whatever Satan incites one to do is bound to be wrong and an error — either directly or indirectly, that is, through something disguised as right.

Someone might have thought that this fear of poverty was reasonable, even if it was caused by Satan. The next sentences do not leave any room for such a misunderstanding: ‘‘and enjoins you to abomination’’. This withholding, this heavy-heartedness in spending good things creates in their souls the trait of miserliness and niggardliness, which in its turn leads one to disobey and reject those commands of Allāh that effect one’s wealth and property; it is clear disbelief in the Great Lord. Also, it casts the needy people into the perdition of poverty, privation and depression, which in its turn leads to loss of lives, and honour, and to every hope of crime and abomination. Allāh says: And there are those of them who made a covenant with Allāh: ‘‘If He gives us out of His grace, we will certainly give alms and we will certainly be of the good.’’ But when He gave them out of His grace, they became niggardly of it and they turned back and they withdrew. So He made hypocrisy to follow as a consequence into their hearts till the day when they shall meet Him because they failed to perform towards Allāh what they had promised with Him and because they told lies . . . Those who taunt the free-givers of alms among the believers and them who cannot find but their hard earnings, so they scoff at them; Allāh will pay them back their scoffing, for them is a painful chastisement. (9:75 — 79)

‘‘And Allāh promises you forgiveness from Himself and abundance; and Allāh is Ample-giving, All-knowing.’’: It further removes the earlier-mentioned possible misunderstanding. Allāh had already clearly told the believers that there is either truth or falsehood; there is no third alternative. Truth is the straight path, that is from Allāh; and falsehood is from Satan. Look at the following verses of the Meccan period: . . . and what is there after the truth but error? (10:32); Say: ‘‘Allāh guides to the truth’’ (10:35); . . . surely he (i.e. Satan) is an enemy, openly leading astray (28:15). In short, the above-mentioned sentence reminds them that the idea of niggardliness coming into your mind because of the fear of poverty is based on a bad judgement; forgiveness of Allāh and increase in wealth (mentioned in previous verses) come from spending from good property, not from niggardliness or from giving away unwanted items.

The sentence ‘‘Allāh promises . . .’’ puts (like the preceding sentence ‘‘Satan threatens you . . .’’) the cause in place of its effect. Also, it shows the contrast between the promise of Ample-giving, All-knowing Allāh and the threat of Satan, so that the spenders may look at both and choose for themselves what is in their own interest.

The verse, in short says:

You choose bad items for spending, instead of good property, because you are afraid of poverty; and because you are unaware of the good results which accrue from spending good things. So far as the fear of poverty is concerned, it is the evil suggestion of Satan, and Satan always wants to put you in perdition and lead you to falsehood and abomination: you should never follow his evil whisperings. What follows a charity of good things is abundance and forgiveness. And it is sure to follow, because it is Allāh Who has promised it, and His promise is true; He is Ample-giving — it is easy for Him to fulfil His promise and to give you abundance and forgiveness from Himself; He is All-knowing, not a single thing or condition is hidden from Him; therefore, what He has promised is based on His All-encompassing knowledge.

QUR’ĀN: He grants wisdom to whom He pleases: ‘‘al-Ītā’ ’’ (الاِيْتَآءُ) is to grant, to give. ‘‘al-Ḥikmah’’ (الحِكْمَةُ = wisdom) is on paradigm of fi‘lah (فِعْلَةُ) which denotes a species or a variety of it. Its literal meaning will, therefore, be a sort of precision and perfection, or a species of perfect and precise thing in which there is no defect or flaw. Mostly it is used for intellectual cognition that is true and not liable to falsehood and error at all.

This sentence shows that what has preceded it (spending, its causes and its good effects on human life) is based on wisdom. al-hikmah (wisdom) is a true proposition, conforming to the facts; it contains the bliss and felicity of man, because it clarifies the divine realities concerning the origin and the end of the world and mankind, and explains the principles of the physical world in-as-much as it touches on human bliss and felicity; it includes the fundamental truths of nature upon which are based the laws of religion.

QUR'ĀN: And whoever is granted wisdom, he indeed is given a great good: The meaning is clear. The sentence is in the passive voice, although the preceding sentence has clearly said that it is Allāh Who grants wisdom; this passive voice has been used to show that wisdom, in itself, is the source of a great good; whoever gets it, is bound to get that great good; and that good is not only because wisdom is given by Allāh. If ''giving'' is attributed to Allāh it does not necessarily mean that the thing given is good, or that it will end in good. Allāh says about the Qur'ān: . . . and We had given him of the treasures, so much that its keys would certainly weigh down a company of men possessed of strength . . . Thus We made the earth to swallow up him and his abode; so he has no body of helpers to assist him against Allāh . . . (28:76 — 81).

The verse attributes ''great good'' to wisdom, instead of unqualified ''good'', although wisdom has a high status and a great splendour. It was to show that every affair depends, for its good end, on the care and help of Allāh; and that blessings and bliss is good only when its end is good.

QUR'ĀN: And none but men of understanding mind: ''al-Lubb'' (اللُّبُّ) literally means kernel, the softer part within hard shell. It is used in the meaning of al-'aql (العَقْلُ = understanding because understanding has the same position vis-a-vis the man as the kernel has vis-a-vis its hard shell. It is used in this very meaning in the Qur'ān. The use of the noun al-'aql with the meaning of understanding, seems to be of a later origin; that is why it has not been used in this form in the Qur'ān; although its verb have often been used, for example, ''ya'qilūn'' (يَعْقِلُوْنَ = they understand). ''at-Tadhakkur'' (التَّذَكُّرُ) means to remember, to mind. It means going from a conclusion to its premises or from the premises to their conclusion. The verse shows that wisdom depends on minding, which in its turn depends on understanding. There is no wisdom where there is no understanding. Some details about understanding have been given earlier in the discussion about the words used for perception.

QUR'ĀN: And whatever alms you give or whatever vow you vow surely Allāh knows it; and the oppressors shall have no helpers: What Allāh has called you to spend, and what you have made obligatory on yourselves through a vow is not hidden from Allāh. He shall give rewards to him who obeys Him, and shall chastise him who is unjust to others and oppresses them. There is a shade of threatening in this sentence (. . .

Allāh knows it), and this is emphasized by the next sentence: ''and the oppressors shall have no helpers''.

This last sentence proves four things:

First: The oppression in this verse means the oppression of the needy and poor by not spending on them and by withholding their financial rights. It does not mean other sins and injustices, because there are helpers, atonements and interceders in the case of other sins. For example, there is repentance, the avoidance of great sins, and the intercessors on they Day of Resurrection for the sins concerning the rights of Allāh. Allāh says: . . . do not despair of the mercy of Allāh; surely Allāh forgives the faults altogether . . . And return to your Lord . . . (39:53 — 54); If you avoid great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins (4:31); . . . and they do not interced except for him whom He approves . . . (21:28).

This also explains why this verse mentions ''helpers'' (in the plural). It is because there shall be many helpers in case of other sins.

Second: This oppression, that is, neglect of charity, is not liable to expiation. Had it been a minor sin, it would have been wiped out by expiation. In other words, it is a great sin. Also, it proves that it is not forgiven by repentance. It gets support from the traditions which say that repentance from sins concerning the rights of people is not accepted unless the sinner returns and gives all the due rights to those who possess them. Nor shall the intercession of the intercessors avail them on the Day of Resurrection, as is clearly seen in the words of Allāh: Except the people of the right hand, in gardens; they shall ask each other about the guilty: ''What has brought you into Hell?'' They shall say: ''We were not of those who prayed, and we used not to feed the poor . . .'' So the intercession of the intercessors shall not avail them (74:39 — 48).

Third: This oppressor is not of those with whom Allāh is pleased. Intercession shall be for only those whose religion Allāh approves and is pleased with. (Vide the topic of Intercession.) This shows why Allāh used, in verse 2:265, the words ''seeking the pleasure of Allāh'', and did not say ''seeking the Person of Allāh''.

Fourth: Not spending property on the needy and poor when they are present and need assistance is a great and mortal sin. Allāh has counted some kinds of not spending as equivalent to ascribing partners to Allāh and disbelieving in the last day. For example, He says about not giving alms: . . . and woe to the polytheists, who do not give zakāt and they are unbelievers in the hereafter (41:6 — 7). It should be noted that this chapter is from the Meccan period when az-zakāt (الزَّكوة = poor rate) as known to us was not ordained. Therefore, it must refer to general alms.

QUR'ĀN: If you give alms openly, it is well, and if you hide it and give it to the poor , . . . and Allāh is aware of what you do: ''al-Ibdā' '' (الإبْدَآءُ) means to show, to exhibit. ''aṣ-Ṣadaqāt'' (الصَّدَقَاتُ) is the plural of aṣ-ṣadaqah (الصَّدَقَةُ), which means expenditure in the way of Allāh; it is a general word used for both obligatory and voluntary spending. Sometimes it is said that its original meaning is voluntary spending.

Allāh praises both ways of spending because each has some good effects. Giving alms openly presents a practical example of enjoining good; it encourages people to spend and to be generous. Also, it makes the needy and poor happy — they see that there are in society people who have sympathy with them, that there is some wealth earmarked for them, and kept in reserve for the day they will need it. This, in its turn, removes their pessimistic feelings, gives them a new vigour to persue their activities, and creates a feeling of oneness between them and the wealthy members of society. And all these effects are good.

Hiding alms and giving secretly to the poor is also good; such an alms-giving is far removed from showiness, reproach and injury; it protects the poor members of society from shame and disgrace, and preserve their honour and prestige in the eyes of the public.

Thus, open charity creates good effects in society much more than secret charity; and secret charity is purer in intention.

The foundation of religion is purity of intention; the more a deed is nearer to this purity, the more it is nearer to excellence. That is why Allāh gave more weight to secret alms: ''and if you hide it and give it to the poor, it is better for you''. Needless to say that ''better'' is in the comparative.

And Allāh is well-aware of the actions of His servants; there is no chance of His mistaking the ''better'' deed for some thing else, ''and Allāh is aware of what you do''.

QUR'ĀN: To make them walk in the right way is not incumbent on you, but Allah guides aright whom He pleases: It is a parenthetic sentence addressed to the Prophet, in between the general talk addressed to the believers. The Apostle of Allāh felt that there were many differences in various aspects of the charities given by the believers: some of them were sincere, while others indulged in reproach and injury, or were reluctant to spend out of their good property. This observation saddened him, because all of them were believers. Therefore, Allāh consoled and comforted him by reminding him that the belief found in them and their guidance are in the hands of Allāh; He guides whom He pleases to belief and the various degrees of it; it is not in the power of the Prophet to create it or to preserve it. Therefore, it is not the responsibility of the Prophet to preserve their belief, nor should he worry about its weakening or extinction, nor should he be disappointed by the threatenings and harsh tone used in some of these verses.

When an infinitive verb is joined to a noun or pronoun in a possessive phrase, it implies that verb's coming into being. In this verse Allāh has used the phrase ''hudāhum'' (هُدَاهُمْ) which means ''their guidance''. As explained above, it implies the ''guidance'' which actually exists. That is why we have translated it as ''To make them walk in the right path''.

Apart from this, whenever Allāh has attributed guidance to Himself, showing that the Prophet has no power to guide them, it has been done to comfort and console him.

In short, this sentence is parenthetic, inserted between the address to the believers, so that the Prophet may not be disheartened. It is like verse 75:16 — 18: Do not move your tongue with it to make haste with it. Surely on Us is the collecting of it and the reciting of it. Therefore when We have recited it, then follow its recitation.

When the purpose was served, the speech reverted to the original talk with the believers.

QUR'ĀN: And whatever good thing you spend . . . and you shall not be wronged: Now the speech is again addressed to the believers, in a style which is devoid of both good news and warning, unaffected by the tone of mercy or anger. Obviously, it results from the preceding words, ''but Allāh guides aright whom He pleases''.

Now the speech only calls them to spend, clearly saying that the speaker has nothing to gain from this call. Whatever benefits are in spending are for their own good — provided they do not spend except to seek Allāh's pleasure. The sentence ''and you do not spend but to seek Allāh's pleasure'' shows the state of the principle sentence, and its meaning is: ''and whatever good things you spend it is to your own good while you do not spend but to seek Allāh's pleasure''.

As it was possible for someone to think that this benefit (which was supposed to accrue to them from spending) was just a name without any substance, Allāh continued the verse, saying ''and whatever good thing you spend shall be paid back to you in full, and you shall not be wronged''. These sentences make it clear that the benefit of this recommended spending, that is, the reward promised for it in this world and in the hereafter, is not an imaginary thing; it is a factual and actual existent; Allāh shall pay it back in full to the spender, and he shall not be wronged, that is, his repayment shall not be reduced or lost.

The verb, ''shall be paid back to you in full'', is in the passive voice. The payer (i.e. Allāh) has not been mentioned by name. This style was opted for so that the speech may be more effective. Whatever benefit is there, is for the spender only; the Giver of the rewards gains nothing from it; look here, even His name is not mentioned in this verse.

The verse, in short, is like a speech which has no speaker; if there is any benefit from it, it will accrue to the listener only.

QUR'ĀN: (Charity is) for the poor who are besieged in the way of Allāh . . . surely Allāh knows it: ''al-Ḥaṣr'' (الحَصْرُ) gives the meaning of constraint. ar-Rāghib has written in his al-Mufradāt: al-Ḥaṣr and ''al-iḥṣār'' (الاحْصَارُ) mean to prevent people from the way of the House (of Allāh). al-iḥṣār is used for the manifest hindrance (like the enemy) as well as for the hidden snag (like sickness). But al-ḥaṣr is used for the hidden hindrance only. Therefore, the words of Allāh: but if you be prevented (2:196), cover both types of hindrance; so also are the words ''for the poor who are besieged in the way of Allāh''. But the words of Allāh ''or who come to you, their hearts shrinking'' refer to hidden hindrances like cowardice and miserliness.

''at-Ta'affuf'' (التَّعَفُّفُ) means to acquire the characteristics of chastity and integrity; ''as-sīmā'' (السِّيْمَا) is the sign, the mark, ''al-ilḥāf'' (الالْحَافُ) is to beg importunately.

The verse explains the way to use alms — the best use: those poor persons who have been besieged in the way of Allāh and are confined in it, because of some factors beyond their control. For example: an enemy who took away their dress and covering, or prevented them from going out to earn their livelihood; a sickness which closed the door of income for them; an activity (like acquiring knowledge) which does not leave them time to earn their livelihood.

The words, ‘‘the ignorant man (i.e., ignorant of their condition) thinks them to be rich on account of their self-control’’, mean that they do not display their poverty, except that which cannot be hidden in any way, like the etchings of poverty on their faces, or like old clothes, etc.

It is said that the words ‘‘they do not beg from men importunately’’ mean that they do not beg from men at all, so that it could push them to importunity. Once a man begs from someone for his needs, he loses his restraint and soon a time comes when he begs from everyone importunately and shamelessly.

More probably, the sentence means what it says; it negates importunity in asking from men, and not discrete asking. Importunate begging may mean such asking which exceeds the limit of the necessary description of one’s needs. It should not be forgotten that explaining one’s needs in extreme hardship is not only allowed but sometimes becomes even necessary. But exceeding that limit is importunity, and is condemned.

Allāh said ‘‘thou canst recognize them by their countenance’’; and did not say ‘‘you can recognize them’’. It was done to protect their honour and preserve their self-respect, because of which they exercised self-control and did not ask from men indiscreetly. Had Allāh said ‘‘you can recognize them’’ it would have meant that their poverty was well-known to everyone; and it would have been against their honour, an open humiliation. But there is no disgrace for them if the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) knows their conditions by looking at their countenance: after all, he is their Prophet, sent to them, has mercy on them and is kind to them. This is the reason — and Allāh knows better — why in this sentence the singular pronoun has been used, in contrast to the other pronouns in this verse.

QUR’ĀN: Those who spend their wealth . . . nor shall they grieve: The words ‘‘secretly’’ and ‘‘openly’’ are opposite to each other and they describe the condition of spending. This verse covers all possible times (by night and by day) and conditions (secretly and openly) of spending; it shows how much those spenders were keen on obtaining the reward, and how deep was their desir o seek the pleasure of Allāh. As a result, Allāh turned towards them with mercy and promised them a good promise in the language of kindness and grace: ‘‘for them is their reward with their Lord, and they shall have no fear, nor shall they grieve’’.

TRADITIONS

It is narrated in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr, about the words of Allāh: and Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases: Ibn Mājah has narrated from al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, Abu ’d-Dardā’, Abū Hurayrah, Abū Amāmah al-Bāhilī, ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Umar, Jābir ibn ‘Abdullāh and ‘Imrān ibn Ḥaṣīn, all of them narrating from the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) that he said : (And Ibn Mājah and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from ‘Imrān ibn Ḥaṣīn from the Messenger of Allāh that he said:) ‘‘He who spent a property in the way of Allāh and himself stayed in his house, shall get for every dirham seven hundred dirhams; and he, who himself fought in the way of Allāh and spent his property in this way, shall get on the Day of Resurrection for every dirham seven hundred thousand dirhams’’. Then he (the Prophet) recited this verse: and Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘When a believer does well in his deed, Allāh multiplies his deed, every good deed seven hundred times. And this is the word of Allāh: and Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases. Therefore, make good your deeds which you do to obtain the reward of Allāh.’’ (at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī)

This tradition has been narrated by al-Barqī also.

‘Umar ibn Muslim said: ‘‘I heard Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) saying: ‘When a believer does well in his deed, Allāh multiplies his deed, every good deed seven hundred times. And this is the word of Allāh: and Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases. Therefore, make good your deeds which you do to obtain the reward of Allāh.’ I (i.e. ‘Umar ibn Muslim) said: ‘And what does ‘‘making good’’ mean?’ He said: ‘When you pray, make your rukū‘ and sajdah good, and when you fast, keep away from that which spoils your fast, and when you do ḥajj, be on guard against all that is forbidden to you in your ḥajj and ‘umrah.’ Then he said: ‘And every deed that you do should be clean from impurity.’ ’’(ibid.)

In the same book there is a tradition from Ḥimrān from Abū Ja‘far

(a.s.). Ḥimrān said: ‘‘I asked him (i.e. Abū Ja‘far - a.s.): ‘Do you think that a believer has superiority over a Muslim in anything like inheritance, judgements and orders, so that a believer should have more than a Muslim in inheritance or other things?’ He said: ‘No. They both proceed on the same path (i.e., are equal) in all this, when the Imām decides between them; but the believer has a superiority over the Muslim in so far as their deeds are concerned.’ ’’ He (Ḥimrān) said: ‘‘I told him: ‘Has not Allāh said: Whoever brings a good deed he shall have ten like it? And you think that they (i.e., the other Muslims) are gathered together with the believers in prayer, fasting and the ḥajj?’ He (the Imām) said: ‘Has not Allāh said that Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases manifold? Thus, the believers are those for whom the good deeds are multiplied, for every good deed seventy fold; so this is among their excellence; and Allāh multiplies for the believer his good deeds according to the rectitude of his belief a manifold multiplication; and Allāh does for the believer what He pleases.’ ’’

The author says: There are other traditions with this meaning. And all of them are based on the view that the sentence: and Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases is general, and that it covers doers of other good deeds also, in addition to those who spend in the way of Allāh. And this view is the correct one; because the only thing that can be said for limiting it to the spenders is the fact that it was revealed in the context of spending; but we know that if a verse is revealed at a certain time or in a certain context, that time or that context does not restrict the general meaning of the word or the sentence.

And as the verse is not limited to spending, likewise, the word ‘‘yuḍā‘if’’ (يُضَاعِفُ = increases, multiplies) should be treated as general; it implies every kind of increase, in number as well as in other ways. In short, the meaning of the verse will be: And Allāh increases, enhances and multiplies a good deed in any way He pleases for anyone He pleases; He multiplies for every doer of good his good deed seven hundred times, or more, or less, as He increases for those who spend more than seven hundred times when He so pleases.

Question: You said earlier that it was wrong to interpret this sentence as saying ‘‘and Allāh multiplies this multiplication for whom He pleases’’, and now you interpret it here in this very way.

Reply: What we refuted there was limiting this meaning to those who spend. And this tradition also rejects the idea that the verse is limited in any way.

The words of the Imām ‘‘Allāh multiplies for whom He pleases manifold’’ combine two verses together: one, this very verse under discussion, and second, verse 245 of this second chapter: Who is it that will lend to Allāh a goodly loan, so He will multiply it for him manifold.

It may be inferred from this traditon that the deeds of (those of) other sects of Islam (apart from the believers) may be accepted and given their reward. We shall discuss this topic under verse 98 of chap. 4: Except the weakened ones from among the men . . .

The author of Majma‘u ’l-bayān says: This verse is general about spending in all these things (i.e. jihād and other ways of charity); and the same is narrated from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.).

‘Abdu ’r-Razzāq has narrated in his al-Muṣannaf from Ayyūb that he said : ‘‘A man came to the Prophet from Ra’s Tall. There-upon they (i.e. the companions) said: ‘How brave is this man? Would that his bravery were in the way of Allāh!’ The Prophet said: ‘Is only he who was killed in the way of Allāh?’ Then he explained: ‘The one who went out in the earth seeking a lawful (earning) to sustain his parents is in the way of Allāh; and the one who went out seeking a lawful (earning) to sustain his family is in the way of Allāh; and the one who went out seeking a lawful (earning) to sustain himself is in the way of Allāh; and the one who went out vying in exuberance is in the way of Satan.’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibnu ’l-Mundhir and al-Ḥākim have narrated (and the latter has said that it is correct) that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) asked al-Barā’ ibn ‘Āzib: ‘‘O Barā’! How is your spending for your mother?’’ (And al-Barā’ was generous to his family.) He replied: ‘‘O Messenger of Allāh! How good it is! (i.e, it is very good).’’ (The Prophet) said: ‘‘Verily, your expenditure on your family and child and servant is alms; therefore, you should not follow it with reproach or injury.’’ (ibid.)

The author says: The traditions containing this meaning are numerous from the chains of both sects; and those traditions say that every deed which Allāh is pleased with is in the way of Allāh; and every expenditure in the way of Allāh is alms.

There is a tradition in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī, under the verse: ‘‘Those who spend their wealth in the way of Allāh . . . ’’, from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.)

that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''Whoever conferred something good on a believer and then injured him (i.e. his feelings) with his talk or reproached him has surely nullified his charity . . .'' aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: aṣ-Ṣafwān (الصَّفْوَانُ) is a big rock in a desert. al-Wābil (الوَابِلُ) is rain; and aṭ-ṭall (الطَّلُّ) is what settles at night on trees and plants. al-I'ṣār (الاعْصَارُ) is wind.

Ibn Jarīr has recorded from 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: O you who believe! spend (benevolently) out of the good things that you have earned (he said, ''from gold and silver''), and of what We have brought forth for you out of the earth, (he said, ''from grain and dates and everything in which zakāt is prescribed). (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Ibn Abī Shaybah, 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, at-Tirmidhī (and he has said that this tradition is correct), Ibn Mājah, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu '1-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Ibn Marduwayh, al-Ḥākim; (and he has said that it is correct) and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated from al-Barā' ibn 'Āzib, that he said about the words of Allāh, and do not aim at what is bad of it that you may spend (in charity): ''It was revealed about us, the group of the Helpers (anṣār). We owned date-palms. (It was our custom that) a man used to come from his trees, however numerous or few they might be; and he brought a bunch of dates or two, and hung it in the mosque; and the people of the ''raised platform'' (Ahlu 'ṣ-Ṣuffah) had nothing to sustain them. Therefore, when one of them felt hungry, he used to come to that bunch and hit it with his stick; thus, unripe and ripe dates dropped down and he ate them. And there were some people, not inclined to generosity, who brought bunches which had gone bad and had dried, and also broken bunches; and they hung them (in the mosque). Thereupon, Allāh sent down the verse: O you who believe! spend (benevolently) out of the good things that you have earned and what We have brought forth for you out of the earth, and do not aim at what is bad of it that you may spend (in charity), while you would not take it yourselves unless you connived at it. Allāh commented that if one of you were given a present like that which he gave in charity he would not accept it except if he connived at it or felt shy of rejecting it.'' al-Barā' then said: ''Therefore, everyone of us used to bring the best that he had.'' (ibid.)

There is a tradition in al-Kāfī, that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh: O you who believe! spend (benevolently) out of the good things that you have earned and of what We have brought forth for you out of the earth, and do not aim at what is bad of it that you may spend (in charity): ‘‘When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) ordered az-zakāt (poor-rate) on dates, some people used to bring various types of dates as poor-rate, (dates) of the worst kind. They took out as their poor-rate the dates called aj-ju‘rūr and al-mi‘āfārah, those with little flesh and big stones. And others brought good dates. Thereupon, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Do not estimate these two (types of) dates and do not bring any of them (as poor-rate).’ And concerning this was revealed: and do not aim at what is bad of it that you may spend (in charity), while you would not take it yourselves unless you connived at it. And conniving means to take these two dates.’’

There is another tradition from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) about the above-mentioned verse, that he said: ‘‘The people had earned bad earnings in the (days of) ignorance. When they became Muslims, they wanted to take that (unlawful earning) from their property to give it in charity. But Allāh did not allow them except that they should take out from the best of their earnings.’’

The author says: There are may traditions with this meaning from the chains of the both sects.

It is quoted in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī about the words of Allāh: Satan threatens you with poverty . . . that Allāh means, ‘‘Satan tells you, ‘Do not spend, otherwise you shall become poor’, and Allāh promises you forgiveness from Himself and abundance’’, that is, He shall give you if you spend for His sake and shall reimburse you abundantly.

at-Tirmidhī (and he has said that this tradition is correct), an-Nasā’ī, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu ’l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Ibn Ḥibbān and al-Bayhaqī (in his ash-Shu‘ab) have narrated from Ibn Mas‘ūd that he said that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘Verily, Satan has a nearness with the son of Adam and the angel has a nearness (with him). As for the nearness of Satan, it is a threatening with evil and a denying of truth. And as for the nearness of the angel, it is promising of good and a confirming of truth; therefore, whoever felt it, should know that it is from Allāh, so let him thank Allāh. And whoever felt that other (effect), should seek the protection of Allāh against Satan.’’ Then (the Messenger of Allāh) recited: Satan threatens you with poverty and enjoins you to abomination . . . (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr) at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī quotes Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, and whoever is granted wisdom, he indeed is given a great good, that he said: ‘‘The knowledge (of Allāh). ’’

The same book quotes aṣ-Sādiq (a.s.) as saying: ‘‘Verily, wisdom is the knowledge (of Allāh) and understanding of the religion.’’ al-Kāfī quotes aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) as saying in explanation of this verse : ‘‘Obedience to Allāh and knowledge of the Imām.’’

The author says: There are other traditions with the same meaning; and they present some examples of a general meaning.

There is in al-Kāfī a tradition: from a group of our companions, from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad ibn Khālid, from some of our companions, who mentioned the chain of narrators reaching the Messenger of Allāh; the narrator said that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘Allāh did not distribute among (His) servants anything better than wisdom; so, the sleep of the wise is better than the wakefulness of the ignorant, and the staying of the wise is better than the rising of the ignorant. And Allāh did not send any prophet nor any apostle till (his) understanding was perfected and his wisdom was superior to all the wisdom of his people. And what the prophet keeps hidden in his mind is superior to the endeavours of the endeavourers. And the servant does not fulfil his obligations (towards) Allāh until he knows Him; and all the worshippers together do not reach in the excellence of their worship what a wise (person) attains; and the wise people are the people of understanding; Allāh says: and none but men of understanding mind.’’

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘Wisdom is the light of knowledge, and the weighing scale of piety, and the fruit of truth; and if you were to say that Allāh did not bestow upon His servant a bounty greater and higher and better and more magnificent than wisdom, you would be saying (the truth). Allāh, Powerful and Great is He, has said: He grants wisdom to whom He pleases, and whoever is granted wisdom, he indeed is given a great good; and none but men of understanding mind.’’

The author says: There are many traditions about the verse: And whatever alms you give . . ., concerning the alms, the vow and the injustice, which we shall write, God willing, in more appropriate places.

It is reported in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from several chains from Ibn ‘Abbās, Ibn Jubayr, Asmā’ bint Abī Bakr and others that the Messenger of Allāh used to forbid (the giving of) alms to non-Muslims; and the Muslims disliked spending on their non-believing relatives. Then, Allāh sent down this verse: To make them walk in the right way is not incumbent on you . . . Thereupon, (the Messenger of Allāh) allowed it.

The author says: It has already been explained that the phrase ''hudāhum'' (هُدَاهُمْ = their guidance; to make them walk in the right way) appropriately means guiding the Muslims themselves by making them follow the right path; it has no connection with the unbelievers. The verse, therefore, is quite unrelated to the story of its revelation mentioned in the above report. Moreover, the very next verse which prescribes the group on which the alms should be spent (for the poor who are besieged in the way of Allāh . . .) does not support this story.

So far as spending on a non-Muslim is concerned, the generality of the verse is enough to allow it provided it is done in the way of Allāh and to seek the pleasure of Allāh.

al-Kāfī quotes aṣ-Sādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: And if you hide it and give it to the poor, it is better for you, that he said: ''It is in other than az-zakāt; verily az-zakāt is openly, not secretly.''

There is another tradition in the same book from the same Imām: ''Whatever Allāh has made obligatory on you, announcing it is better than hiding it; and whatever is voluntary, hiding it is better than announcing it.''

The author says: There are other traditions with the same meanings as the two above traditions. And its meaning may be clearly understood from earlier explanations.

It is written in Majma'u 'l-bayān, under the verse: (Charity is) for the poor who are besieged in the way of Allāh . . ., that Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said: ''It was revealed about the companions of the raised platform.'' the author of Majma'u 'l-bayān goes on to say that the same thing has been narrated by al-Kalbī from Ibn 'Abbās. ''And they were about four hundred men; they had no houses in Medina, nor were there any people of their clans where they could find shelter. Therefore, they got themselves settled in the mosque; and they said: 'We shall go out in every expedition sent by the Messenger of Allāh.' Therefore, Allāh exhorted the people to (help) them. Then (it became a custom that) if a man took his meal and some food was left over, he brought it to them.''

In at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī, Abū Ja'far (a.s.) is quoted as saying: ''Verily Allāh hates the one who begs importunately.''

It is written in Majma'u 'l-bayān, under the words of Allāh: ''Those who spend their wealth by night and by day . . .'' Ibn 'Abbās said describing the reason of its revelation: ''It was revealed about 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.); he had four dirhams; and he gave them in charity, one at night-time, and one in the day-time, one secretly and one openly. Then came down this verse: Those who spend their wealth by night and by day, secretly and openly . . .'' aṭ-Ṭabrisī (author of Majma'u 'l-bayān) further said: ''And the same is narrated from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) and Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.).''

The author says: And this thing has been narrated by al-'Ayyāshī in his at-Tafsīr; al-Mufīd in his al-Ikhtiṣāṣ, and aṣ-Ṣadūq in his 'Uyūnu 'l-akhbār.

'Abdu 'r-Razzāq, 'Abd ibn Ḥamīd, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, aṭ-Ṭabarānī and Ibn 'Asākir have narrated through the chain of 'Abdu '1-Wahhāb ibn Mujāhid from his father from Ibn 'Abbās about the words of Allāh: Those who spend their wealth by night and by day, secretly and openly . . ., that he said: ''It was revealed about 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (a.s.) that he had four dirhams; and he spent them (in charity) at night one dirham, and in the day one dirham, and secretly one dirham, and openly one dirham.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr) al-Burhān (Tafsīr) quotes Ibn Shahrāshūb (in his al-Manāqib) who narrated from Ibn 'Abbās, as-Suddī, Mujāhid, al-Kalbī, Abū Ṣāliḥ, al-Wāḥidī, aṭ-Ṭūsī, ath-Tha'labī, aṭ-Ṭabrisī, al-Māwardī, al-Qushayrī, ath-Thumālī, an-Naqqāsh, al-Fattāl, 'Abdullāh ibn al-Ḥusayn and 'Alī ibn Ḥarb aṭ-Ṭā'ī (in their books of at-Tafsīr) that: 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib had some silver dirhams; so he gave in charity one at night and one in the day, and one secretly, and one openly. Thereupon was revealed (the verse): Those who spend their wealth by night and by day, secretly and openly . . . Thus Allāh named (his) every dirham a wealth and gave him the good news of acceptance.

It is written in some books of tafāsīr (pl. of tafsīr, i.e., commentary) that the verse was revealed about Abū Bakr; he gave in charity forty thousand dinars — ten by night, and ten by day and ten secretly and ten openly.

The author says: al-Ālūsī has written in his at-Tafsīr under this tradition: ''al-Imāmu 's-Suyūṭī has commented that the report of his (i.e., Abū Bakr's) giving forty thousand dinars in charity has only been narrated by Ibn ‘Asākir in his history from ‘Ā’ishāh, and there is no mention of the revelation of this verse in that report. It seems that those who claimed it (i.e., the revelation of the verse about Abū Bakr) inferred it from the tradition narrated by Ibnu ’l-Mundhir from Ibn Isḥāq that he said: ‘When Abū Bakr died and ‘Umar became Khalīfah, he addressed the people; he thanked Allāh and praised Him as He should be praised; then he said: ‘‘O people! verily, some avarice is poverty, and some abandoning of hope is self-sufficiency; and verily you gather what you do not eat, and you hope for what you do not get. And know that some miserliness is a branch of hypocrisy; therefore, spend for your own good.’’ Then he said: ‘‘So where are the people of this verse?’’ — and saying it, he recited this verse. And you know that these words do not show in any way that this verse was revealed about Abū Bakr.’ ’’

It is reported in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr, through various chains, from Abū Amāmah, Abu ’d-Dardā’, Ibn ‘Abbās and others that the verse was revealed about the people of the horses.

The author says: ‘‘The people of the horses’’ refers to those who kept the horses (for the purpose of jihād) and spent on them by night and by day. But the wording of the verse, ‘‘secretly and openly’’, does not fit this interpretation. What would be the sense of this generalization and particularization in the case of spending on horses?

There is also in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from al-Musayyab that this whole verse was revealed in praise of ‘Abdu ’r-Raḥmān ibn ‘Awf and ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān when they spent on ‘‘the army of straitened circumstances’’ (i.e., army of Tabūk).

The author says: The same objection arises here as has been levelled against the preceding interpretation — that it does not fit the wordings of the Qur’ān.

Those who swallow down interest cannot stand except as one whom Satan has confounded with (his) *touch does stand. That is because they say, trade is only like interest. GENERAL COMMENT

These verses were revealed to emphasize the prohibition of interest and to put strong pressure on the interest-takers; they are not the verses that originally legislated the prohibition of interest; their language is not that of legislation. The law forbidding interest was ordained most probably by the following verse of the third chapter :

O you who believe! do not devour interest, making it double and redouble, and fear Allāh, that you may succeed (3:130).

Also look at one of the verses under discussion: ‘‘O you who believe! fear Allāh and forgo what remains (due) from interest, if you are believers’’. It shows that the Muslims, even after the previous prohibition, sometimes took interest; and therefore Allāh ordered them to desist from this practice and to remit that part of the interest which remained due from the debtors. With this background, the meaning of the following sentence becomes quite clear: ‘‘To whomsoever then the admonition has come from his Lord, then he desists, for him shall be what has already passed, and his affair rests with Allāh . . .’’

Even long before the verse of the third chapter, a Meccan chapter (the 30th), had condemned the practice of taking interest: And whatever you lay out as interest, so that it may increase in the properties of men, it shall not increase with Allāh; and whatever you give in charity, desiring Allāh's pleasure — it is these (persons) that shall get manifold (30:39).

It shows that interest was a thing abhored since the early days of the Call, before the hijrah; then it was clearly forbidden in the third chapter; and finally it was most forcefully condemned and denounced in these seven verses (under discussion), the style of which clearly shows that interest was forbidden long before they were revealed. It also proves that these seven verses were revealed after the third chapter.

Moreover, interest was prohibited in Judaism, as Allāh says about the Jews: And their (Jews') taking interest, though indeed forbidden were they against it (4:161); and also He says quoting them: this is because they say: there is nothing upon us in the matter of the unlearned people (3:75). Add to it the fact that the Qur'ān verified their book and did not abrogate this law. All of this together was enough to make the Muslims understand that interest was prohibited and forbidden in Islam.

These verses of interest have some connection with the preceding verses of spending in the way of Allāh. And this connection has been clearly pointed out in these verses: for example, ''Allāh effaces interest and He causes charities to grow''; ''and that you remit (it) as alms is better for you''. Likewise the verse of the thirtieth chapter contrasts it with alms; and that of the third chapter is followed by praise of spending, exhorting the believers to spend benevolently in the way of Allāh.

Moreover, reason also recognizes the contrast and mutual opposition of interest and charity. Interest is taking without giving anything in exchange; charity is giving without taking anything in exchange. The evils emanating from interest are poles apart from the good effects of charity. Charity spreads mercy and love, strengthens the morale of the poor members of society, increases wealth, maintains good social order, and then as a result of mutual love and respect, peace reigns over the land. The evils resulting from interest are exactly opposite to these good effects.

Allāh has, in these verses, condemned interest in the most emphatic words. No other deed has been condemned in such a harsh tone. The only exception is befriending the enemies of religion, which also has been execrated with equal force. All other major sins have been condemned emphatically in the Qur'ān, but the level of their condemnation is far below that used for these two evils. Not only fornication, liquor and gambling, but even more grievous sins like murder and creating mischief in the earth seem milder than these two — interest and making friends with the enemies of religion. Why? The reason is very clear. The bad effects of the above-mentioned sins remain mostly confined to individuals, one or more; further, they impair only some particular psychological traits of the doer.

But these two evils bring such destruction in their wake that religion is uprooted and even its signs are obliterated; the life-line of human social order is severed; human nature is over-powered by their harmful intoxication, and it loses all its control over the people's thinking and action.

History has shown why the Qur'ān had spoken so forcefully against befriending the enemies of religion and against interest. Look at the pitiable condition of the Muslim countries. They started adulating the enemies of Islam, making friends with them and adoring them. They inclined psychologically towards them. And now we see the result: they have fallen down into the pit of perdition; they are plundered and pillaged by the same ''beloved'' enemies; they have no control over their own destiny; they have lost their wealth, their honour and even their identity; they deserve neither death nor life; they are not allowed to die, and they are not given any breathing space to enjoy the bounties of life. Religion has departed from there, and virtue abandoned them long ago.

As for interest, it caused the treasures of the earth to be concentrated in few select houses, and the wealth to be hoarded by the takers of interest. The money gave them power over other less fortunate human beings. It was the real cause of the world wars. It divided mankind into two opposing groups: the wealthy who enjoy all the blessings of life, and the poor who fmd it difficult to meet their barest necessities. The grouping has already appeared. It is a calamity which has shaken the earth and levelled the mountains. It is threatening humanity with downfall and the world with destruction. Then evil was the end of those who did evil (30:10).

You will see that what Allāh described about interest and making friends with the enemies of religion was a forecast of the carnage .which has now come true.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: Those who swallow down interest cannot stand except as one whom Satan has confounded with (his) touch does stand: ''al-Khabṭ'' (الخَبْطُ) means to walk unevenly; to grope about awkwardly. They say khabaṭa 'l-ba'īr (خَبَطَ البَعِيْرُ = the camel became disorientated in its walk).

Man has a straight path for his life, from which he normally does not deviate. He acts according to the norms of the society in which he lives; those norms are based on reasonable ideas, and man tries to fit his individual and social activities to them. He eats when he is hungry, drinks when thirsty, desires rest when tired, and looks for shelter when staying somewhere, and so on. He feels happy with some things, and becomes annoyed with others. When he wants some task done, he produces its cause, and when he needs an effect, he brings about its necessary ingredients.

This, in short, is man's normal way of life — the actions related to the ideas, in a well-balanced relationship. Man was guided to this straight path by a power ingrained in his nature, the power that discrimantes between good and bad, differentiates between beneficial and harmful, and distinguishes virtue from evil.

But a man whose discriminating power is confounded sees no difference between good and bad, between beneficial and harmful and between virtue and evil. He treats every thing like its opposite. It is not because he has forgotten the meaning of good and bad — after all, he is a human being who has his own freewill and choice, and a man can only do a man's deeds. Rather, it happens because he believes evil to be virtue, and virtue to be evil. He is, in short, confused and confounded; he applies the rules in completely wrong places, and does not know which demands which.

It is not that he always treats the normal as abnormal and vice versa. If it were so, he would have at least been consistent in his misjudgements. We could have said that he had some organized way of thinking, although he applied his judgements in a wrong way. But he has not even this consistency. Good and bad, virtue and evil, normal and abnormal, all are equal in his eyes. Whatever he wants at a given moment is to be done and obtained — like a camel that has become disorientated; he starts walking forward, no matter which direction he happens to face at that time; he has lost his bearing, and normal and abnormal are the same to him.

This is, then, the condition of the interest-taker.

What do we mean by interest? It is giving a thing and later taking back a similar thing plus an increase. Social life is based on a sound principle. Let us say that Zayd has a property in excess of his needs, and he needs something else which Bakr has got. Now Zayd may give his excess property to Bakr and take in exchange Bakr's property (which, incidently, is in excess of Bakr's requirements). It is trade and it is the dictate of human nature.

But giving a property and taking back a similar thing with some increase nullifies the demands of nature and destroys the basis of the economy. The property is snatched from the hands of the debtor, and accumulates in the coffers of the interest-taker. The interest-taker's wealth grows and grows; but this growth is achieved by adding another man's wealth. Thus wealth goes on decreasing and diminishing, on the one side, and increasing and accumulating on the other.

The debtor who has to pay interest is burdened with that much extra expenditure; as the days pass, he goes on paying interest, without getting anything in exchange; his need of more and more money increases and he is caught in a vicious circle — he must borrow ever more to fulfil his normal needs as well as to pay the ever-increasing expense of interest. Thus his life is ruined.

Interest is, therefore, diametrically opposed to the balance and equilibrium of society; it destroys that system which man had created with the guidance of the Divine Creation.

So, this is the interest-taker, confounded like the one touched by Satan. Taking interest makes his reason topsy-turvy; he sees no difference between normal and abnormal, between trade and interest. When he is told to leave interest and stick to trade, he says: ‘‘Trade is only like interest; it has no superiority over interest; why should I leave interest and stick to trade?'' That is why Allāh showed his confusion by quoting his reply, ''trade is only like interest''.

From the above discourse, the following matters become quite clear:

First: The word ''standing'' in the phrase, ''cannot stand except as one whom Satan has confounded with (his) touch does stand'', means ''managing'' one's life and ''looking after'' one's livelihood. It is one of the meanings of ''standing'' which people generally use in their speech. Allāh says: . . . so that men may stand with justice (57:25); . . . the heavens and the earth stand by His command (30:25); . . . and that you should stand for the orphans with justice (4:127). This word has not been used here with the meaning of ''standing up'' (i.e., as opposed to ''sitting''), because such an interpretation would not fit the topic, and the meaning of the verse would not be correct.

Second: ''Confoundedness of the touched one in standing'' does not refer to the involuntary movements of an epileptic during or after an attack of epilepsy, as some commentators have written. Such a meaning would have no relevance to the topic at hand. Allāh has given us the simile of the interest-taker who does not differentiate between trade and interest, and who acts according to that idea. This is done by his own choice and will — the choice that is based on his confused thinking. There is nothing in it like the involuntary convulsions of an epileptic.

This phrase, in short, means that the interest-taker manages the affairs of his life and livelihood as does the one whom Satan has confounded with his touch.

Third: There is a fine point in saying ''they say, trade is only like interest'' instead of saying ''interest is only like trade''. The reason for choosing the former expression may be understood from the above explanations. For an interest-taker, normal and abnormal are both alike. We shall explain it in detail later on.

Fourth: The similitude, that is, ''as one whom Satan has confounded with (his) touch'', gives a hint that this may happen sometimes in cases of lunacy. The verse does not say that every madness is caused by the touch of Satan; but it indicates that some cases of lunacy are the result of Satan's touch. Further, the verse does not say that this touching is done by Iblīs himself, because Satan means the evil one; this word (Satan) is used for Iblīs as well as for other evil ones among the jinn and human beings. And Iblīs is from the jinn. What looks certain from this Qur'ānic hint is that the jinn are instrumental in the madness of some persons, if not of all.

Some commentators have opined that this simile is not based on any fact. People in those days believed that lunacy was caused by the touch of the jinn; and Allāh used that belief of their's for this similitude; it is just talking to people in their own language. There is, of course, no harm in it, because it is just a similitude; it does not confirm that common belief. Such a comparison is not wrong just because the thing has no actual existence. What the verse, therefore, means is simply this: 'These swallowers of interest are like a lunatic who is confounded by the touch of Satan.' It is against belief in the Justice of Allāh to say that madness could be caused by the touch of Satan. Allāh is Just; He cannot give Satan authority to overpower the intellect of His servant, or to subdue His believing servant.

But this opinion has many flaws:

1) Allāh is too Great to insert any vain or incorrect promise in His talk without indicating its invalidity. Allāh has said about His Book: and most surely it is a Mighty Book; falsehood shall not come to it from before it nor from behind it, a revelation from the Wise, the Praised One (41:41 — 42); Most surely it is a decisive word, and it is no joke (86:13 — 14).

2) He says that it is against belief in the Justice of Allāh to say that Satan can manipulate and disturb the intellect of a person, and can turn him into a lunatic. Well, is it not against belief in the Justice of Allāh to say that lunacy occurs because of natural causes? Are not the natural causes created by Allāh? And yet they do disturb the mind of man.

The fact is that there is no problem in believing that Allāh allows the mind of man to be disturbed — no matter through which agency it is done. Because Allāh at once removes all responsibilities away from such man. Of course, there could be a problem if his thinking power were taken away and still the responsibilities of a sane person were imposed on that man. Also it would be against belief in the Justice of Allāh to say that Satan can manipulate a sane man in such a way that, in spite of his sanity, he sees truth, falsehood and virtue as evil and vice versa.

But there would be no problem if a man's intellect is disturbed or ceases to exist provided the responsibilities of sanity are also removed from him — no matter whether the disturbance occurred through natural causes or through Satan's touch.

Moreover, when we attribute madness to the touch of Satan we do not mean that he confounds the intellect directly without any middle cause. Rather, we believe that natural causes, like nervous disorders and psychological disturbances are the near causes, and Satan is a cause beyond these causes. Likewise, many miracles are attributed to the angels, although there occur natural causes in between. An example of this may be seen in two verses both of which quote Ayyūb (a.s.) beseaching his Lord after his affliction. In one verse he says: Satan has afflicted me with toil and torment (38:41); and in the other he says: Harm has afflicted me and Thou art the Most Merciful of the merciful (21:83). ''Harm'' here refers to his sickness; and sickness has its own natural causes. See how, in the first verse, he attributes his sickness, caused by natural causes, to Satan.

The root of the trouble is this: When the materialists hear us attributing events to Allāh (or attributing some happenings to the spirit, to an angel or to Satan) they think that it amounts to a rejection of natural causes, and that it sets metaphysical agencies in the place of physical causes. They should be somehow made to understand that by such declarations we add one more (metaphysical) link at the farther end of the chain of (physical) causes. We do not replace the physical causes with metaphysical ones. (We have mentioned this fact in previous discussions several times.)

Fifth: Also, it is wrong to say, as some other exegetists have done, that the similitude aims at describing the state of interest-takers on the Day of Resurrection; and that they will rise from their graves on that day like an epileptic who is afflicted by madness.

Evidently, the verse does not support this meaning. The tradition which describes the condition of interest-takers is about the Day of Resurrection; it does not purport to explain the similitude of this verse.

It is written in al-Manār (Tafsīr): ''The similitude, that one who swallows interest stands like one who has been confounded by the touch of Satan, has been explained by Ibn 'Aṭiyyah as follows: 'The aim is to show the likeness of the interest-taker in this world to the one who is confounded and afflicted with epilepsy; as it is said about the man who is convulsed with various involuntary movements, that he has gone mad.'

''I say (the author of al-Manār): This is the meaning which comes into my mind on reading this verse. But a major group of commentators have gone against it. They have said: 'The standing mentioned in the verse refers to the rising from the grave at the time of resurrection; that Allāh has made it a sign of the interest-takers on the Day of Resurrection that they shall be raised like epileptics.' They have narrated it from Ibn 'Abbās and Ibn Mas'ūd; and aṭ-Ṭabarānī has narrated a tradition of 'Awf ibn Mālik (which he has referred to the Prophet): 'Beware of the sins that shall not be forgiven: embezzlement, so whoever embezzles anything, shall be brought with it on the Day of Resurrection; and interest, so whoever swallows interest shall be raised on the Day of Resurrection as a lunatic who gropes hither and thither aimlessly.' '' (The author of al-Manār goes on saying:) ''The commonly under-stood meaning is the one given by Ibn 'Aṭiyyah, because when the word 'standing' is used, one generally understands it to mean managing some affairs; and there is no association to show that it refers to the rising from grave. So far as traditions are concerned none of them is free from one or another defect in the chains of narrators; and those traditions were not revealed together with the Qur'ān, nor does the al-marfu' (المَرْفُعُ = tradition raised to the Prophet) purport to interpret this verse. (It only talks about the condition of interest-takers on the Day of Resurrection, without mentioning this verse.) And had not this tradition been there no-one would have interpreted this verse except in the way Ibn 'Aṭiyyah has done . . . And it was the custom of the forgers of traditons, when they were perplexed by the apparent meaning of a Qur'ānic verse, to forge a tradition to explain it; and there are few exegetical traditions that are really correct.''

He is right when he exposes the mistake of the exegetists. But he himself has gone wrong when he tries to explain the meaning of this similitude. He says: ''What Ibn 'Aṭiyyah has said is quite clear. Those who are entangled in the love of wealth do become its slave. Their whole existence revolves around money; they want wealth for the sake of wealth. They have abandoned the natural means of earning, and have concentrated on earning money through money only. In this way, their souls deviate from the straight path of moderation on which most of the people are. This immoderation, this loss of equilibrium, shows itself in their movements and actions. Look at the speculators on the stock exchange or compulsive gamblers; the more they indulge in these activities the more they become entangled in it, until a time comes when their behaviour becomes illogical, and their movements disorientated. It is this aspect which is the common factor between their activities and the movements of confounded lunatics. The Arabic word translated as ''has con-founded'' is derived from al-khabṭ (الخَبْطُ) which means disorganized movement.''

The author's comment: To say that the interest-takers' movement become disorientated and disorganized is correct in itself. But interest-taking is not the only cause of such disorientation. This occurs when man forgets that he is a servant of his Creator and Master, and when material pleasure becomes his only goal — and this is the final reach of his knowledge! Then he loses self-control (which come through religion) and sobriety of demeanour. And he gets at once affected by every big or small worldly pleasure; and this results in a disorientation of his movements. It may be observed in any person who is immersed in worldly pleasure, and who has forgotten Allāh, even if he has not taken a single penny as interest all his life.

Nor is that disorientation the purpose of this similitude. The proof, given in the verse, of their being confounded does not fit this supposed purpose of the similitude. Allāh says that they are confounded in their standing, ''because they say, trade is only like interest''. If that disorientation of their behaviour was the purpose of the similitude, it would have been more appropriate to prove it by their disorganized actions and disorderly movements.

Obviously, what we have described in explanation of this simile and about its purpose, is the only reasonable interpretation.

QUR'ĀN: That is because they say, trade is only like interest: We have already described why trade was likened to interest, and not interest to trade. A man confounded in his thinking and disorientated in his movements is in an abnormal condition. Good and bad, virtue and evil are both the same to him. If you tell him to leave the bad deed that he is doing and to do the good, he will reply to you — if he replies — that what you tell him to do is like that which you are forbidding him; that has no preference over this.

Now note the difference. If he had said, ‘‘what you forbid me to do is like that which you tell me to do’’, he could not be said to be confounded or mad. At the most he would have been called a sane person who is mistaken in his view. Why? Because his reply would have shown that he knows that the thing ordered is good and should be done; but he mistakenly thinks that the forbidden thing also is good like the former. In other words, he knows and appreciates the superiority of good actions. He does not think that nothing is good or bad, or that all are equal.

Interest-takers say that trade is like interest. It shows that they have lost their bearings; they do not accept that trade has any superiority over interest. If they had said ‘‘interest is like trade’’, it would have meant that they were not confounded, they knew that trade was a good thing; but they thought that interest too was good like trade. In that case; they could have been called rejectors of the sharī‘ah and sinners against Allāh, but not ‘‘confounded like the one touched by Satan’’.

Ponder over the sentence, ‘‘That is because they say, trade is only like interest’’. Apparently they had not spoken these words by their tongues; it was their state and behaviour which was crying out loudly about their thinking. This style of narrating the state as uttered speech is very common in every language.

Once it is understood, the error of the following two interpretations becomes self-evident:

1) Some people have said: The interest-takers said that trade was like interest, because they treated both in a like manner. The reason why they reversed the simile and said, ‘‘trade is like interest’’ was to emphasize — it was as though interest was the main thing and trade a secondary matter which would become respectable if it was likened to interest.

All this is out of place. They did not utter this sentence in words, so that it should require all this explanation.

2) Someone else has said: Maybe the simile is not reversed. They thought that trade was allowed so that one might earn profit. And profit was a certain thing in interest and rather uncertain in other means of earning. Therefore, they gave primacy to interest and assigned a secondary place to trade.

The same comment applies here as was written about the first.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh has allowed trade and forbidden interest: It is a new sentence. It is not in conjunction with the preceding sentence, and does not show the state of that sentence. In other words, it does not mean: ''they say trade is only like interest, while Allāh has allowed trade and forbidden interest''. If a sentence, beginning with a verb in the past tense, is inserted to denote the state of the preceding sentence, it invariably always begins with qad (قَدْ = a prefix, used before past and aorist tenses); for example, ''Zayd came to me'' wa qad ḍaraba 'Umar (وَ قَدْ ضَرَبَ عُمَرَ = when he had beaten 'Umar). In this verse, the meaning of the preceding sentence does not allow one to say that this sentence is its 'state'. The phrase denoting 'state' restricts the main sentence to the time and state denoted. If we treat this sentence as a phrase of state, it would mean: ''The interest-takers' confoundedness (because of their saying that trade is only like interest) is confined to the time when Allāh allowed trade, and forbade interest''. But the fact is otherwise. They were confounded before this legislation as much as they were after it.

Therefore, this is an independent sentence, and not a phrase of state. Also, this sentence is not the original legislation forbidding interest. As mentioned in the beginning, these verses evidently show that interest was already prohibited before they were revealed. They explain and emphasize what was legislated by the following verse of the third chapter: O you who believe! do not devour interest making it double and redouble, and fear Allāh, that you may succeed (3:130).

Therefore, the sentence, ''And Allāh has allowed trade . . .'' does not ordain a new law; it just refers to a previously given order, and paves the way for the next sentence, ''To whomsoever then the admonition has come from his Lord, then he desists, he shall have what has already passed . . .'' This is the apparent meaning of the verse.

Someone has said: The words, ''And Allāh has allowed trade and forbidden interest'' are meant to refute the interest-takers' assertion, ''trade is only like interest''. If their claim were correct, the legal position of trade and interest would not have been different from each other in divine legislation, while the fact is that Allāh has allowed one and forbidden the other.

Reply: The argument mentioned above is correct in itself; but it is not in conformity with the wording of the verse. It could be correct only if this sentence were a phrase of state. But it is not so.

Someone else has written another explanation: The sentence, ‘‘And Allāh has allowed . . .’’, means that the increase of wealth through trade is not like its increase through interest, because ‘‘I have allowed trade and forbidden interest; and order is My order, and creatures are My creatures; I ordain about them as I wish, and make them obey My command in any manner I please; none among them has any right to protest against My decision.’’

Reply: This also is dependent on the wrong theory that this sentence is a phrase of state. Moreover, it is based on a denial of any relationship of cause and effect between religious laws and their benefits. If you accept this interpretation, you will have to reject the relationship of cause and effect in the whole universe, and to attribute every action to Allāh without apparent and middle causes. Evidently such an idea is wrong. Further, this explanation is against the Qur’ānic style. The Qur’ān often explains the reason for a given order, and mentions the general or special benefits emanating from a particular law. Even in the present instance, various sentences hint at the reason upon which this rule is based: ‘‘. . . and forgo what remains (due) from interest if you are believers’’; ‘‘neither shall you deal unjustly, nor shall you be dealt with unjustly’’; ‘‘Those who swallow down interest . . . trade is only like interest ’’. All these hint at the reason why trade has been allowed: It is in conformity with nature’s demand; and why interest has been forbidden. First, it is a deviation from the straight path of life; second, it is not in conformity with belief in Allāh; and third, it is injustice.

QUR’ĀN: To whomsoever then the admonition has come from his Lord, then he desists, for him shall be what has already passed, and his affair rests with Allāh; and whoever returns (to it) — these are the inmates of the fire; they shall abide in it: These sentences branch out from the preceding sentence, ‘‘And Allāh has allowed trade . . .’’ The principle laid down in this statement is not restricted to interest; it is a general rule although it is mentioned in a particular context. The meaning, therefore, will be as follows: ‘‘What We have told you on the subject of interest, is an admonition; and to whomsoever the admonition comes from his Lord and he desists, for him shall be what has already passed and his affair rests with Allāh; accordingly, if you now desist from interest, you shall have what you have already taken, and your affair rests with Allāh''.

It is clear from the above explanation that ''the admonition has come'' means ''the information of the law ordained by Allāh has reached''; ''then he desists'' means ''then he repents and desists from the forbidden action''; ''for him shall be what has already passed'' means ''the ordained law shall not be applied retrospectively, rather it shall be enforced from the time the information has reached him''; ''for him shall be what has already passed and his affair rests with Allāh'' means that he shall not be affected by the ever-lasting punishment mentioned in the next sentence (and whoever returns [to it] — these are the inmates of the fire; they shall abide in it). In this way, they shall be allowed the benefit of their previous action, still their affair is in the hands of Allāh — He may leave them free in some matters, and may sometimes oblige them to make up for the past shortcomings.

This verse needs special attention. Beginning from the words ''to whosoever then the admonition has come'' upto the end of the verse, in spite of the given concession and the severe threatening, a basic principle is explained; it is a general law covering all mortal sins. Yet people have missed this clear point, and have interpreted it as though it were confined to the topic of interest only.

In view of the above-mentioned generality, the words, ''for him shall be what has already passed, and his affair rests with Allāh'', can be taken only as a general principle — its particulars depending on the nature of the sin concerned. Whoever desists from a sin after receiving the admonition from his Lord, shall be forgiven the sins committed in the past — no matter whether the transgression was against Allāh or against the people. But it does not mean that he shall automatically be absolved from its other consequences. His affair is in the hands of Allāh: He may prescribe for him some expiation or amendment — as, for example, if he neglects prayers, he should pray and make up the arrears; if he did not fast, he should fast the same number of other days; if he took any property unlawfully, he should return it to the lawful owner, and he should undergo the prescribed penal sentences in relevant cases — all this going hand in hand with repentance and desisting from that sin in the future; and thus the past sins are forgiven. Or, Allāh may forgive the sin altogether, after repentance, without imposing any penalty or expiation — as, for example, when a polytheist repents and enters into Islam, or when a liquor-drinker or a singer repents and desists from these sins. The words, ‘‘To whosoever then the admonition has come from his Lord, then he desists’’, are general; they cover all the believers and unbelievers of the Prophet’s time as well as all those who came later or shall come afterwards.

‘‘And whoever returns (to it) — these are the inmates of the Fire; they shall abide in it’’: The word, ‘‘returns’’ here is in contrast to the word, ‘‘desists’’, in the preceding sentence. There-fore, it means, ‘‘does not desist’’. Thus, it refers to the person who goes on committing that sin and does not accept the divine command. Such an attitude exposes the infidelity or apostasy that is hidden in his heart even if he does not utter a single word to show it. Whoever returns to a sin and does not desist from it, and does not even feel ashamed of it, has in fact not submitted to the command of Allāh; and he shall never succeed. Thus the two sides mentioned in this verse are: (1) accepting and obeying the divine command which creates the resolve that one will not go against the law; (2) continuing in the sin which proves that one has not accepted that divine command, which, in its turn, makes one liable to remain in the Fire for ever.

The Mu‘tazilites offer this verse as a proof of their belief that the one who commits a major sin shall remain in the Fire forever.

The author’s comment: No doubt that the verse shows that not only the one who commits a major sin, but anyone who commits any sin, shall remain in chastisement for ever. But it is conditional; it refers to only that sinner who commits a sin and does not accept the divine command. And such a person will admittedly abide in the Fire. But it is different from the view of the Mu‘tazilites.

Other commentators have mentioned many possibilities and explanations about the words of Allāh, ‘‘for him shall be what has already passed’’, ‘‘his affair rests with Allāh’’, and ‘‘whoever returns . . .’’ But all those discussions are based on their erroneous understanding of the verse (as we have explained earlier). It is not worthwhile mentioning them here, since their very basis is wrong.

QUR'ĀN: Allāh effaces interest, and causes charities to grow. . . .: ''al-Maḥq'' (اَلْمَحْقُ) is gradual decrease and deterioration leading to extinction; ''al-irbā' '' (الاِرْبَآءُ) is to make grow; ''al-athim'' (الاَثِيْمُ) is the sinner. The verse contrasts the growing of charities with the effacement of interest. It has been described earlier how the growing and multiplication of charities is not confined to the hereafter; it is its general characteristic which is found in this world as well as in the hereafter. Therefore, effacement and obliteration of interest must also be common to this world and the hereafter.

It is the characteristic of charity that it grows and grows, necessarily and inevitably. It spreads love, propagates mercy, creates good accord, unites hearts and brings peace and security in society; it protects the psyche from evil thoughts and anger. The members of such a society never think to usurp other's property, or to take it openly by force, or stealthily by theft, and so forth. Charity leads them to unity, co-operation and mutual help. As a result, most of the ways in which property can deteriorate become closed; and it helps in making property grow, and grow many times.

On the other hand, it is the characteristic of interest that it gradually obliterates and destroys wealth. It spreads hard-heartedness and cruelty, creates enmity and distrust, destroys peace and security and incites the ''have nots'' to take revenge from the ''haves'' in any possible way — be it by talk or by action, be it directly or indirectly; in short, it leads towards disunity and discord. As a result, most of the ways of deterioration and destruction of the property are opened; and wealth becomes a target misfortune and calamity.

These two items — charity and interest — have a direct impact on the life of the poor section of society. Needless to say, poverty and need inflame their feelings, and they are provoked to defend their rights and are ready to confront the others, come what may. With this background, if society treats them with kindness and does good to them without asking for anything in exchange, their noble feelings are stirred and they welcome this generosity with goodwill and brotherly feelings; and it creates loving effects. If, on the other hand, they are treated with hard-heartedness and greed, and are faced with danger to their property, honour and life, they stand up to take their revenge from their oppressors in any possible way.

Those who have seen and heard about those who swallow interest know that such people seldom escape the evil effects of such confrontation. Often their properties are lost, their houses are ruined and their endeavours go in vain.

It is necessary to mention here two things:

First: The causes upon which social effects are based differ from physical and creative causes in one important aspect. While the perfect physical and creative causes can never fail to produce their effects, social factors and causes bring about the expected result in most, but not all, cases. We deal with someone in a certain manner and expect those results which appear in the wake of that behaviour — in most cases.

If we ponder upon the Qur'ānic verses which describe the benefits and harms of the given actions, we shall find that the Qur'ān (when it shows the relation between actions and their causes, and between actions and their effects) has adopted this very system, and mentions a frequently recurring effect as an ever-recurring one.

Second: Society is like an individual in its various conditions and states. An individual is born, lives, dies, acts and leaves his footprints on the sand of life. Likewise, a society has its own birth, life, death, actions and effects. Allāh says in the Qur'ān: And never did We destroy a town but it had a fixed-term. No people can hasten on their doom nor can they postpone (it) (15:4 — 5)

But an individual's life and death are different from a society's, as are the effects of their respective activities.

Now, if an individual's characteristic spreads to the whole of society, the ways of its existence and extinction, as well as its effects will change considerably. Let us look, for example, at chastity and licentiousness. They have an effect on life, when they are found in an individual. People generally look down upon a profligate man, they do not like to set up marriage with him; his company is avoided and he is not trusted. It all happens when it remains an individual's vice, and if society on the whole is free from this evil. But if this debauchery spreads in society, and people become used to it, the above-mentioned effects simply vanish away. Those effects were the product of general abhorance and common distaste of this evil; when it spreads to the whole of society, that abhorance and distaste give way to general acceptance. In this way, this effect of an individual's immorality ceases to exist when that immorality spreads to the whole of society. Yet its other evil effects will surely follow: venereal disease will spread, reproduction will be effected; and other undesirable social evils would increase — for example, natural affinities will be destroyed and relationships will be upset.

Also, the effects of a characteristic found in an individual are felt very soon, while those of the same characteristic found in a society take a longer time to appear.

Allāh effaces interest and makes charities grow. But there is a difference between an individual taking interest and a society doing so. When an individual indulges in this sin, the interest almost always destroys him; few and far between are the cases in which an interest-taker, because of some other mitigating factors, escapes this punishment. But retaliation is not so swift in case of a society wallowing in interest. Look at today's world: interest is a recognized institution of all societies and governments; the economy is founded, and laws are made, on the foundation of interest, and it is interest that is the corner-stone of banking. Now some of the evil effects mentioned above may not happen in this case, because society has adopted it and people never pause to think about its evils and wickedness. Yet, its natural results must follow: the accumulation of wealth on one side, and an all-pervasive need on the other. Complete separation of, and confrontation between, the two — the have and have-nots — have already appeared; and its ill effects are already darkening the world's atmosphere. This has taken longer to appear than in case of an individual; yet judging from the life-span of society it has appeared rather soon. The life of society is different from an individual's; and a day for society may be equal to an aeon in the eyes of an individual. Allāh says: and We bring these days to men by turns (3:140). This ''day'' refers to the time when people stand against people, nations against nations, governments confronting governments, and states opposing states.

It is necessary that man's bliss be always cared for, be it of an individual, of society or of the whole of humanity. The Qur'ān looks after both types of bliss — of an individual as well as of the whole of mankind. It was sent down to manage the man's affairs, and to safeguard the world's happiness and felicity — of the individual as well as of the species, in the present day as well as in the time to come.

Let us now look at the words of Allāh: ''Allāh effaces interest and He causes charities to grow''. These sentences describe the ultimate state of these two activities — whether done by individuals or by society. Effacement is the inseparable characteristic of interest, as growth is that of charity. Interest is effaced, although it is named ar-ribā (الرِّبَا = growth); and charity continuously grows, although it is not called by any such name. And to this reality Allāh draws our attention in these words: ''Allāh effaces interest, and He causes charities to grow''; thus He attributes ''growth'' to charities of all kinds, and describes interest ar-ribā (literally, growth) in a word, effacement, which is its opposite in meaning.

After this explanation, the weakness of the following interpretations of other exegetists becomes obvious:

1) Someone has written: the effacement of interest does not mean that such money is lost or that such endeavours do not succeed. Because experience proves otherwise. What is actually meant by the sentence ''Allāh effaces interest'' is that Allāh deprives the interest-taker from the main objective of this activity. The interest-taker aims at hoarding wealth through interest so that he may enjoy a good life; but he never gets a chance to rejoice in his wealth, as he remains too busy in adding money to money. Then he has to remain on guard against defaulters; and ultimately he passes his days in disappointment when he finds that he has become unpopular and is especially hated by the poor.

The weakness of this interpretation is obvious.

2) Other exegetists have said: The frame of reference for this effacement is the life hereafter. The one who takes interest neglects many good deeds because of his involvement in interest; and his many acts of worship are nullified because he uses money gained by interest in them.

The author's comment: No doubt, this xplanation gives examples of effacement. But effacement is not restricted to the life hereafter.

3) The Mu'tazilites attempt to prove from the words, ''and whoever returns (to it) — these are the inmates of the Fire; they shall abide in it '', that one who commits a major sin shall remain in Hell for ever.

We have already shown the defect of this argument, and described the true import of this sentence.

QUR'ĀN: And Allāh does not love any ungrateful sinner: ''al-Kaffār'' (الكَفَّارُ) translated here as ''ungrateful'' is on a paradigm which is used for emphasis. Thus, it means, ''inveterately ungrateful''; ''abstinately unbelieving''.

This sentence gives the main reason of the effacement of interest. The swallower of interest shows his obstinacy and ingratitude for the countless bounties of Allāh. He puts obstructions in the natural path of human life, that is, in natural modes of dealing; he rejects a major part of the rules about worship and mutual dealings; he uses the unlawful money of interest for his food, drink, clothing and housing, and in this way nullifies most of his acts of worship. Also, by using that money in his commercial transactions, he invalidates most of his dealings and usurps others' property, and the liability for such things remains on his own head. Further, he tramples ethical values under foot, remains immersed in greed and avarice, becomes hard-hearted and uses force and coercion to collect from his debtors what he thinks is his due. In this way, all his faculties and actions are submerged in disbelief and ingratitude. And also he is ''athīm'' (اَثِيْمٌ), that is, sin is ingrained in his nature. And Allāh does not love him, because He does not love anyone sunk in ingratitude, sin and disbelief.

QUR'ĀN: Surely they who believe . . . nor shall they grieve: It is a general principle — those who believe and obey the divine law, ''they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve ''. This general rule fits those who spend in charities and desist from swallowing interest, which Allāh has forbidden.

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! fear Allāh and forgo what remains (due) from interest, if you are believers: The verse addresses them with their attribute of belief and faith, and then reminds them to fear Allāh. It prepares the ground for the order which follows, ''and forgo what remains (due). from interest ''. It shows that when these verses were revealed, there were some believers who indulged in this sin and their debtors still owned them some interest payments. Therefore, Allāh ordered them to forgo that amount. This order was followed by the threat ''But if you do (it) not, then be apprised of war from Allāh and His Apostle''.

It supports the tradition (to be quoted later) which gives the reason why these verses were revealed.

The verse ends on the words, ''if you are believers''. This shows that desisting from interest is an inseparable characteristic of belief. It puts more emphasis on the preceding sentences: ''and whoever returns (to it) — these are the inmates of the Fire . . .'', and ''Allāh does not love any ungrateful (unbeliever) sinner''.

QUR'ĀN: But if you do (it) not, then he apprised of war from Allāh and His Apostle: ''al-Idhn'' (الاذْنُ) means to know. ''Fa'dhanu'' (فَأْذَنُوْا = be apprised, know) has also been recited as fa'ādhinu (فَأْذِنُوْا = announce) imperative mood of al-'īdhān (الايْذَانُ = to announce). The preposition ''bi'' (بِ) in ''biḥarbin'' (بِحَرْبٍ = of war) gives the meaning of certainty. The meaning thus shall be: Be sure of war from Allāh and His Apostle. ''War'' is used as a common noun, to hint that it shall be a great war, or to refer to various kinds of war. The war is attributed to Allāh and His Apostle because it is in connection with a law which was legislated by Allāh and promulgated by His Apostle. Had it been connected with Allāh only, it would have been a creative decree. So far as His Apostle is concerned, he is not independent of Allāh in any affair; Allāh says: you have no concern in the affair (3:128).

How do Allāh and His Apostle wage war with one who does not obey a law? They fight with such a disobedient Muslim to compel him to submit to divine authority, as is declared in the Qur'ān: . . . then fight that (party) which acts wrongfully until it returns to Allāh's command (49:9).

Moreover, Allāh has another way of defending His laws; and that is fighting against the offenders through the agency of nature. He lets the masses flare up against them; and in this way their lands are devastated and their footprints obliterated. Allāh says: And when We wish to destroy a town, We send Our commandment to the people of it who lead easy lives, but they transgress therein; thus the word proves true against it, so We destroy it with utter destruction (17:16).

QUR'ĀN: And if (the debtor) is in staitened circumstances, then let there be respite until (he is in) ease: ''Kāna'' (كَانَ = is) in the beginning of the verse has not been used as an auxiliary verb; it is an independent verb and means ''exists''; ''an-naẓirah'' (النَّظِرَةُ) is respite, a moratorium. ''al-Maysarah'' (المَيْسَرَةُ) is ease, affluence; it is the opposite of ''al-'usrah'' (العُسْرَةُ = straitened circumstances).

The verse says: If there is one of your debtors who is at present unable to repay your loan, then give him respite until he is affluent enough to repay it.

The verse is general and not restricted to the loan given with interest, although it covers such cases also. They used to demand repayment when the stipulated time came; if the debtor was not in a position to pay, he asked for some more time, agreeing to pay more interest. The verse forbids this interest, and tells the creditor to give his debtor respite until he is in ease.

QUR'ĀN: and that you remit (it) as alms is better for you, if you knew: If you forgo the loan and remit it as charity, it shall be better for you; because by this remittance you will change into charity what you intended to increase through interest; in other words, you will change what was sure to be effaced with what is sure to grow many times.

QUR'ĀN: And fear the day . . . and they shall not be dealt with unjustly: This is the epilogue of the preceding verses of interest; it reminds the believers of the Day of Resurrection, and mentions some of its aspects which are relevant to this topic. The verse prepares the audience to fear Allāh and desist from the things forbidden by Allāh, especially concerning the people's rights upon which whole edifice of life is founded. It says that a day is coming in which you shall be returned to Allāh and then every soul shall be paid back in full what it has earned, and they shall not be dealt with unjustly.

What is the meaning of being returned to Allāh while we are never far from Him? And what is this ''paying back in full''? We shall explain it, God willing, in the sixth chapter (The Cattle).

It has been said that this verse was the last one to be revealed to the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). A tradition to this effect will be found in the following discussion.

TRADITIONS

There is a tradition in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī, under the verse:

‘‘Those who swallow down interest . . .’’, that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘When I was taken to the heavens, I saw such a group that if any of them wanted to stand up, he could not do so, because of the bulkiness of his stomach. I said: ‘Who are they, O Gabriel?’ He said: ‘These are they who swallow up interest; they cannot stand except as one whom Satan has confounded with (his) touch stands; and lo! they are on the path of the people of Pharaoh; they are exposed to the Fire in morning and at night, and they say: ‘‘Our Lord ! when shall the Hour come?’’ ’ ’’

The author says: It is an illustrative example pertaining to the period between death and resurrection. It confirms the Prophet’s words: ‘‘As you live, so shall you die; and as you die, so shall you be raised.’’ al-Isbahānī has narrated, in his at-Targhīb, from Anas (ibn Mālik) that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘The swallower of interest shall come on the Day of Resurrection, confounded, dragging both his sides.’ Saying it, he recited: they cannot stand except as one whom Satan has confounded with (his) touch stands.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: There have come numerous traditions about the punishment for interest, both from Shī‘ah and Sunnī chains. Some of them say that interest is equal to seventy acts of incest the swallower of interest would have committed with his mother.

There is a tradition in at-Tahdhīb that ‘Umar ibn Yazīd Bayyā‘ as-Sābirī said: ‘‘I said to Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.): ‘May I be your ransom! Verily, people say that taking profit from a ‘‘needy’’ person is unlawful.’ He said: ‘Have you seen anyone, whether rich or poor, purchasing anything unless he ‘‘needs’’ it? O ‘Umar! Allāh has allowed trade and forbidden interest. Therefore, take profit; but do not take interest.’ I said: ‘And what is interest?’ He said: ‘Dirhams by dirhams, two against one; and wheat by wheat, double (weight) against single (weight).’ ’’

‘Ubayd ibn Zurārah narrates from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘There is no interest except in that which is measured or weighed.’’ (Man lā yaḥḍuruhu ’l-faqīh)

The author says: There is a difference of opinion as to which things are liable to interest. It is the madhhab of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) that there is no interest except in gold and silver and those things which are measured or weighed. Further details are beyond the scope of this book, as the topic concerns Islamic jurisprudence.

There is a tradition in al-Kāfī from one of the two Imāms (al-Bāqir or aṣ-Sādiq - a.s.) and in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh: To whomsoever then the admonition has come from his Lord, that he said: ''The admonition is repentance.''

Muḥammad ibn Muslim said: ''There came to Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) a man from Khurāsān who had dealth with interest till he had amassed a fortune. 'He asked the scholars of jurisprudence, and they said: No deed of yours shall be accepted until you return it (the interest) to its owners.' Then he came to Abū Ja'far (a.s.) and told him his story. Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said: 'Your way out is the verse from the Book of Allāh, Mighty and Great is He ! To whomsoever then the admonition has come from his Lord, then he desists, for him shall be what has already passed, and his affair rests with Allāh'. Then he (the Imām) said: 'Admonition is repentance.' '' (at-Tahdhīb)

There is a tradition in al-Kāfī and Man lā yaḥduruhu 'l-faqīh that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''Every interest which people swallowed because of ignorance, and then they repented, it shall be accepted from them when the repentance is known from them.'' And he said: ''If a man inherits a property from his father, and he knows that that property includes interest, but it is mixed up with (the money of) trade, then it is lawful for him; so let him consume it. And if he recognizes something of it (interest) then he should keep his principal and return the excess.''

A tradition is narrated in Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh and 'Uyūnu 'l-akhbār from ar-Riḍā (a.s.): ''It (interest) is a major sin, after explanation.'' And he said: ''And to treat it as a small matter is to enter into disbelief.''

The Imām was asked about a man who consumes interest thinking that it is lawful. He said: ''There is no harm for him in it until he takes it on purpose (i.e. knowing that it is unlawful). When he indulges in it on purpose, then he shall be (liable) to the place which Allāh has mentioned.'' (al-Kāfī)

It is reported in al-Kāfī and Man lā yaḥḍuruhu 'l-faqīh that aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked about the words of Allāh: Allāh effaces interest, and He causes charities to grow. . . , and was told (by the asker): ''I have seen

(many a man) who swallows interest and his wealth increases.'' He (the Imām) said: ''What effacement could be more effective than that of the dirham of interest? It obliterates religion; and if he repented, his wealth would go and he would become poor.''

The author says: The tradition, as you see, explains effacement in terms of religious obliteration — he does not become owner of that property and he is not allowed to use it. Charity is just its opposite in these respects. This tradition does not go against the general meaning of effacement which we have written earlier.

'Alī (a.s.) said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has cursed five persons concerned with interest: the one who consumes (i.e. takes) it, the one who gives it to be consumed, its two witnesses and its writer.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The author says: The same thing has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from the Holy Prophet through several chains.

There is a tradition in at-Tafsīr of al-Ayyāshī from al-Bāqir (a.s.) that he said: ''Allāh, High is He, has said: 'I have given (some) authority to others (i.e. angels etc.) about things, except charity, because I take hold of it with My (own) hand. So much so that a man or a woman gives half a date in alms, and I nurture it for him as one of you nurtures his calf and colt; until I shall leave (i.e., return) it on the Day of Resurrection (and it shall be) bigger than the (mountain) of Uḥud.' ''

The same book quotes 'Alī ibn al-Ḥusayn (peace be on them both) narrating from the Prophet that he said: ''Verily, Allāh nurtures the alms for one of you, as one of you brings up his child; until he (the alms-giver) shall find it on the Day of Resurrection, and it shall be like Uḥud.''

The author says: The matter has been narrated also through a Sunnī chain from many companions like Abū Hurayrah, 'Ā'ishah, Ibn 'Umar, Abū Barzah al-Aslamī, all from the Prophet.

It is written in at-Tafsīr of al-Qummī that when Allāh sent down (the verse): Those who swallow down interest . . . , Khālid ibn al-Walīd stood up before the Messenger of Allāh and said: ''O Messenger of Allāh! My father lent (money) with interest in the (tribe of) Thaqīf, and he told me at the time of his death to collect it. Thereupon Allāh revealed: O you who believe! fear Allāh and forgo what remains (due) from it. . .''

The author says: Nearly the same thing has been narrated in Majma'u 'l-bayān from al-Bāqir (a.s.)

as-Suddī and 'Ikrimah have said: (This verse) was revealed about the balance of interest due to al-'Abbās and Khālid ibn al-Walīd; they were partners in pre-Islamic days, they lent with interest to some people of Banū 'Amr ibn 'Umayr, a clan of the (tribe of) Thaqīf. Then came Islam, and they had great riches in interest. Thereupon, Allāh revealed this verse. So the Prophet said: ''Now, surely every interest of the pre-Islamic days is waived, and the first interest which I waive is that of al-'Abbās ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib; and all the blood of pre-Islamic days is waived, and the first blood which I waive is that of Rabī'ah ibn al-Ḥārith ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib'' (He was given to Banū Layth for suckling and was killed by Banū Hudhayl.) (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The author says: This has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim from as-Suddī. But there the name of Khālid is not mentioned openly. It says that it was revealed about al-'Abbās ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and a man from Banū al-Mughīrah.

Abū Dāwūd, at-Tirmidhī (who has said that it is correct), an-Nasā'ī, Ibn Mājah, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Bayhaqī (in his as-Sunan) have narrated from 'Amr ibn al-Aḥwaṣ that he participated in the last pilgrimage with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); so he (the Messenger of Allāh) said: ''Now surely every interest of the days of ignorance is waived, you shall have your capital, neither shall you deal unjustly, nor shall you be dealt with unjustly.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: There are numerous traditions with a similar meaning. What is deduced from Shī'ah and Sunnī traditions is that the verse was revealed about some interest money which Banū al-Mughīrah had due from Thaqīf; and they used to lend money to them with interest in the pre-Islamic days of ignorance. When Islam came, Banū al-Mughīrah demanded from Thaqīf the balance which was due; they refused to pay (interest) because Islam had waived it. Their case was put before the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); then this verse was revealed.

It supports what we have mentioned in the General Comment that interest was prohibited in Islam long before these verses were revealed; and that the aim of these verses was to emphasize that prohibition.

With this background, those few traditions which say that the law prohibiting interest was revealed in the last days of the Apostle of Allāh, and that he died before he could explain the rules concerning interest are not worthy of interest. Such traditions are reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, through Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Marduwayh from ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭab that he said in a lecture ‘‘Among the last verses to be revealed was that of interest; and the Apostle of Allāh died and he had not explained it to us. Therefore, leave what seems doubtful to you for what is not doubtful to you.’’

Moreover, it is the madhhab of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt that Allāh did not give death to His Prophet until He had legislated all that was needed by people for their religious affairs, and until His Prophet had explained it all to his people.

It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr through several chains from Ibn ‘Abbās, as-Suddī, ‘Atiyyah al-‘Awfī, Abū Ṣāliḥ and Sa‘īd ibn Jubayr that the last verse to be revealed was: And fear the day in which . . . shall not be dealt with unjustly.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘Much stress was laid on the prohibition of interest so that people should not refrain from doing good through loan or charity.’’ (Majma‘u 'l-bayān)

The same book narrates from ‘Alī (a.s.): ‘‘When Allāh intends to destroy a town, interest appears among them.’’

The author says: The earlier comments make the meanings of these traditions clear.

The author of Majma‘u 'l-bayān writes under the verse, ‘‘And if (the debtor) is in straitened circumstances, then let there be respite until (he is in) ease’’: ‘‘There is a difference of opinion regarding the definition of straitened circumstances. And it has been narrated from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: ‘It is when he does not have anything in excess of his own sustenance and that of his dependants, in the sense of economics.’ . . . to give respite to a poor man is compulsory in every religion, as is narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās, aḍ-Ḍaḥḥāk and al-Ḥasan; and similar traditions have come from Abū Ja‘far and Abū ‘Abdillāh (peace be upon them both). al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ‘Until (he is in) ease’, means, until his report reaches the Imam; then the Imām shall repay (on his behalf) out of the share of 'those in debt', provided he had spent that loan on lawful expenses.''

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''The Messenger of Allāh ascended the pulpit one day; he thanked Allāh and praised Him and asked for His blessings on His prophets, and then said: 'O people! he who is present should convey (it) to him who is absent. Now, whoever gives respite to a poor person, Allāh shall credit him every day with charity equal to his money (given in loan), until he recovers it.' '' Then Abū 'Abdillāh (aṣ-Ṣādiq - a.s.) said: ''And if (the debtor) is in straitened circumstances, then let there be respite until (he is in) ease; and that you remit (it) as alms is better for you, if you knew that he is in straitened circumstances, then give him your money (principle) as alms, as it is better for you.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: This tradition explains the divine words ''if you knew''; and its other meaning has been mentioned earlier. The tradition on this and related subjects are very numerous; and the reader is advised to refer to the chapters concerning loans in the books of Islamic jurisprudence.

ABOUT INTEREST

It has been repeatedly mentioned that man has only one aim in sight when he does any work. That aim is to gain perfection in his life; in other words, to fulfil his physical and material needs. He does a work and obtains the necessities of life. Thus, he is the rightful owner of his work and of the things made by him. The word ''work'' is used here with a comprehensive meaning; it includes his actions and reactions as well as every relationship with other things which produces an effect on them, and which society acknowledges. He acquires and reserves for himself what effect he has produced on a matter, and believes that it is his lawful property; the sane persons of society also accept his owner-ship of that item.

But it was not possible for him to fulfil all his needs by his own labour. This led to mutual co-operation in society; it became inevitable for one to benefit from others' endeavours. This resulted in the mutual exchange of properties. It became customary that a man worked in one or a more vocations, and produced many necessary items, then kept for himself according to his needs, and exchanged the excess items for what he needed from another man's products. This was the foundation of mutual dealing and barter.

Now, it was found that most of the products and items were totally different from each other; many were of completely different species; some were in great demand while others were not needed so frequently; one thing was found in large quantity while the other was rare, and so on. This created difficulties in bartering. Fruit is used for eating, a donkey for carrying loads, water for satisfying the thirst, and pearls and gems for jewelry, and so on. All these things have different values as necessities of life, and are totally unrelated to each other. How can they be exchanged with justice and fairness?

Thus arose the need to fix the value of a thing in terms of money. They took a rare item, like gold, and turned it into a standard by which the value of other products and goods could be decided. They also fixed units of length, mass and weight, for example, the metre, the litre and the kilogram to measure and weigh goods. In this way, confusion and complication was removed, and the worth of a thing in relation to other things could be decided by comparing both with gold. Let us say that a carat of diamond is equal to four dinars, and a certain heap of wheat flour is equal to one-tenth of a dinar. Now we can easily decide that a carat of diamond is equal to forty such heaps of wheat flour.

Gradually, it was found more practicable to make coins of some other metals also, like siliver, copper, bronze and nickel; finally currency notes made of paper came into being. The details about this may be found in books on economics.

Now the road of trade and commerce was open. Some people took for themselves the occupation of keeping various commodities with them and exchanging them for money or other goods. Their purpose was to earn profit by this exchange. The profit represented the extra price obtained from the customer for the goods sold.

Then a time came when people began treating money as though it was all that was needed for life. The price almost usurped the place of the commodity itself. It was because by acquiring money man could acquire all the necessities of life.

Some people treated it as a commodity to be sold and purchased. These people are called money-changers. They change foreign and local currencies and earn profit by this transaction.

This is an outline of the story of trade and money. It will be seen from above that its basic element is bartering one thing for another, because someone needed one thing more than another; or exchanging an item for its price, because one needs the profit. In all these cases, the thing given is always different from the thing received in exchange. It is this difference upon which commercial life is based.

So far as exchanging a commodity for the same type of commodity (e.g. wheat for wheat) is concerned, it could be either without any increase or with increase. If it is without increase (e.g. lending money or food grain and taking it back without any increase), then it is a reasonable dealing, which sometimes becomes necessary; it corrects the imbalance of society, fulfils the needs of the poor, and no harm comes out of it. But if it is with increase on the side of repayment, then it is interest. Now, let us see what its effect can be.

The basic element of interest is the exchange of one commodity for the same commodity with an increase in repayment; for example, lending ten dirhams for a fixed time and taking back twelve dirhams; or selling an item on credit at ten dirhams and recovering twelve at the end of the stipulated term. Why does a buyer or debtor take any money or commodity on loan? Because his needs are greater than his earnings. Let us say that he earns ten dirhams daily, while his necessities cost him twenty. He is obliged on the first day to take a loan of ten dirhams, with interest of two dirhams. On the second day, he has to pay two dirhams of interest from his earnings of ten; now he is left with eight dirhams only, so he has to take another loan of twelve dirhams with larger interest. This is the beginning of his ruin. Day by day, ever larger portions of his earnings go in paying ever-increasing interest, until a day comes when the interest eats up his total earnings; he pays ten in interest and is left without a single dirham to meet his needs. It is sheer destruction of life and livelihood.

And the lender gets back his own ten, plus the ten of the debtor; he gets the whole twenty. The wealth of both sides accumulates on one side, while the other side is left in the lurch with-out any money.[1]

In this way, interest leads to the destruction of the poor section of society, and all wealth gravitates towards the already wealthy group. Because of this financial strength, they become arrogant, they manipulate the money market, and rule over people's properties, honour and lives in any way they wish and desire (exploitation of others is, after all, ingrained in human nature). On the other hand, the deprived and exploited people try their best to protect themselves from this humiliation, and to free themselves from the domination and exploitation by wealthy persons; they use all means of defence and offence available to them. As a result of this confrontation, chaos appears on the earth, and disorder and violence spread in society. Humanity races towards extinction and civilization towards obliteration.

This is apart from the periodic loss of capital — not every debtor is able, or willing, to pay the accumulated principal plus interest.

This much about loans which rich people give to poor persons. In other cases of interest, for example, commercial loans given by banks to traders to increase their trade, the defects are not so transparent. But their least harm. is that they gradually pull wealth to those trading houses by increasing their capital far in excess of their actual capacity and strength. Then those commercial concerns try to compete with each other; the more powerful ones, swallow up the weaker ones. In this manner, weaker traders go out of business; the list of needy persons becomes longer and longer; and wealth concentrates in a few houses.

The scholars of economics must admit that the only reason why communism was started, and why socialism spread so much, was the preposterous and exorbitant accumulation of wealth withint a few houses,

[1] This is now happening on a much larger scale in dealings between developed and developing nations. The former started giving interest-bearing loans to the latter, to ''help'' them out of their troubles. (Of course, this ''generosity'' had many strings attached to it; but that is not our concern here.) Every poor nation fell into this trap. Many such loans accumulated; and after a short respite the interest on them began falling due in rapid succession. Many nations, unable to meet their obligations, took further loans to repay the interest due. It is an open secret that many a poor nation has already been swallowed up to its neck in this quicksand.

while the overwhelming majority was deprived of the bare necessities of life. The reader should be made aware of an interesting phenomenon. The wealthy minority always swore in the name of civilization, justice and freedom; they preached equality and human rights. They said with their mouths what was not in their hearts. They used words for totally opposite ideas. By this method, they hoped to keep the common people, the exploited masses, in their place, to keep them lulled in their servitude, so that they might go on oppressing them more and more. But very soon it boomeranged back to them; the cunning phrases of the exploiters came back to haunt them; they planned, and Allāh also planned, and Allāh is the best of planners; thus evil was the end of those who did evil.

And only Allāh knows what the future holds for this troubled humanity.

Another evil effect of interest springs from the facility it provides for accumulating wealth in the hands of a few. Huge amounts of money, in millions and billions, are kept idle in the strong rooms of banks. Some people enjoy extravagant living and inexhaustible luxuries, idling their times on the thrones of their financial empires; at the same time, there are others who spend their lives in idleness, but for a totally different reason; these hungry masses remain idle, because they are unemployed. One group does not work because of its superabundant treasures; the other group does not work because it is deprived of employment. Both become idle — an affront to human nature which says that man must work for his livelihood.

ANOTHER DISCOURSE ABOUT INTEREST

al-Ghazālī has written in his Iḥyā'u 'l-'ulūm (chapter of ''Thanks'') as follows:

''One of the bounties of Allāh is the creation of the dirham and the dīnār; and the world cannot do without them. They are two metals, which are of no use in themselves; still mankind depends upon them. Every man needs a multitude of items like food, clothing and various other necessities. Sometimes he does not have what he needs, and has in his hands what is not needed by him. For example, he has in his possession a quantity of saffron, but he is in need of a camel to ride. And someone else has a camel which he has no use of, and he needs saffron. Both should exchange their properties. But it is necessary to estimate the worth of the things so changed. Naturally, the owner of the camel will not give away his camel in lieu of a small quantity of saffron. And there is no correlation between camel and saffron, so that it can be said that the camel owner should be given saffron, for example, equal in weight to the camel. The same difficulty would arise if one wanted to purchase a house with cloth, or flour with a donkey. These things have no correlation with each other. Exchange would be extremely difficult in this way.

‘‘These unrelated and dissimilar items neeed an intermediary who can decide between them with justice, and can fix each item’s place, worth and rank. By this assignment of ranks, it would be known which things are equal and which are unequal.

‘‘Accordingly, Allāh created the dirham and the dinar as two judges for, and intermediaries between, properties, so that properties might be measured by them. Now, it can be said that this camel is worth one hundred dīnārs, and this much saffron is equal to one hundred dīnārs, therefore, this camel is equal in value to this amount of saffron.

‘‘This comparison by means of the two metals is possible because they are not wanted in themselves. If they, like other commodities, were wanted in themselves, somebody would have needed them and another could have refused to accept them if he had no use of them at that actual time. And the whole system would have been disturbed. Therefore, Allāh created them to circulate in the hands of people, and to decide between properties with justice.

‘‘There was also another benefit: One may acquire all things through the dirham and the dīnār. It is because they are precious items in themselves, and they are of no use in themselves. Their relationship with all other commodities is the same. Therefore, for anyone who owns them, it is as though he owns everything. This benefit is not found in other thing. A man who owns a cloth has only that cloth; if he needs food, he cannot be sure that the owner of the food will accept his cloth in exchange; perhaps that man needs a horse; why should he take cloth? Hence the need of a thing which in appearance is nothing, and in reality is everything.

‘‘Only that thing which has no particular form of its own can have an equal relation to various different things. A mirror has no colour of its own, therefore it reflects every colour which comes before it; prepositions have no independent meaning of their own, so they make other words’ meanings clear. Likewise coins serve no purpose on their own, that is why all purposes are served through them. This is the second benefit; there are other benefits also; but they are not mentioned here for the sake of brevity.’’

After this al-Ghazālī expresses his views, the gist of which is as follows:

‘‘As these two coins are the bounties of Allāh (because of the benefits mentioned above) anyone who uses them in a way that nullifies their originally intended benefits is guilty of ingratitude against the bounties of Allāh.’’

After this, he infers the reasons for many laws from his above-mentioned principle:

According to him ‘‘it is because of this principle that the hoarding of the dirham and the dīnār is prohibited, as this is injustice and nullifies their benefit. Hoarding them is like putting a judge in prison — it prevents him from discharging his duties, and creates disorder in society.’’

He also says: ‘‘It is because of this reason that one is not allowed to make or use pots of gold or silver. Using them as pots turns them into things that are wanted for their own sake, while they have been created only as a means to acquire other things. This also is injustice; it is like forcing a judge to work as a weaver, to collect levies or to do other such jobs which are done by lowly people.’’

And he has justified the prohibition of interest in the dirham and the dīnār by the same principle. According to him, it is injustice and ingratitude against the bounties of Allāh, because gold and silver have been created for the sake of other things, not for their own, as there is no need which can be fulfilled by gold and silver in the same way as gold and silver.

This was, in short, al-Ghazālī’s explanation. But he seems confused in his principle, as well as in the reasons by which he has inferred various rules from that principle.

First: He says that gold and silver are not sought for their own sake. If so, then how could they determine the value of other things? The hand is used to measure the lengths of things. How is that done? By the length of the hand itself. A piece of iron is used to determine the weight of a thing. How is it done? By the weight of the iron itself. If gold and silver were unwanted in themselves, how could they decide the worth, that is, ‘‘wantedness’’, of other things?

Further, he admits that they are precious items in themselves. How can they be precious in themselves unless they are wanted for their own sake? How can a thing be called ‘‘precious’’ if it is not wanted?

Moreover, if they were created only as a means to acquire other things, then there should be no difference between gold and silver in worth and prestige. But the fact is otherwise. According to al-Ghazālī’s principle, both metals should be equal in value!

Second: The reason why the hoarding of gold and silver is prohibited is not that which al-Ghazālī has thought — that a hoarder treats them as though they were wanted for their own sake. The real reason has been mentioned in the words of Allāh: And (as for) those who hoard up gold and silver and do not spend it in Allāh’s way, announce to them a painful chastisement (9:34). It is clear that their hoarding is prohibited because it deprives the poor of their dues; and also because they are needed for keeping the cycle of work, payment and exchange in motion.

Third: The reason which he has ascribed to the prohibition of making and using pots of gold or silver, that it is injustice and ingratitude, is equally applicable to ornaments made of gold and silver, as well as to money changing. And these things have not been prohibited by the sharī‘ah, nor are they considered by religion as injustice or ingratitude.

Fourth: What he has written as the reason for the prohibition of interest in gold and silver neither includes all cases of interest nor excludes cases of ‘‘non-interest’’. If the reason given by him, that is, injustice and ingratitude, were the real reason, it would have prohibited even money-changing and foreign exchange, just like those financial dealings in which interest is involved. And it would not have prevented interest in other things which are measured or weighed, like wheat and milk.

Therefore, his whole explanation is wrong in basic principle as well as in the other topics based on that principle.

The real reason for the prohibition, which Allāh has mentioned, fits perfectly the explanation given before by us: that the excess amount is taken without giving anything in exchange. Allāh says: And whatever you lay out as interest, so that it may increase in the properties of men, it shall not increase with Allāh; and whatever you give in charity, desiring Allāh's pleasure — it is these that shall get manifold (30:39). This verse shows that interest increases ''in the properties of men''; in other words, it increases by adding to itself parts of other people's properties, as a seed grows by nourishing itself on earth, and adding parts of the earth to itself. Likewise, interest grows and grows while other people's properties go on decreasing until they are totally expended.

It is this Qur'ānic reason which we have described earlier.

Also, look at the words of Allāh, ''and if you repent, then you shall have your capital; neither shall you deal unjustly, nor shall you be dealt with unjustly''. The verse says that you shall not deal with people unjustly, nor shall you be dealt with unjustly by the people or by Allāh. It means that interest is injustice against the people.

يَا أَيُّهَا الَّذِيْنَ آمَنُوا إِذَا تَدَايَنْتُمْ بِدَيْنٍ إِلَى أَجَلٍ مُسَمًّى فَاكْتُبُوهُ وَلْيَكْتُبْ

O you who believe! when you deal with each other in contracting a loan for a fixed time, then write it down; and let a scribe write it down between you with justice; and the scribe should not refuse to write as Allāh has taught him, so he should write; and let him who owes the debt dictate, and he should fear Allāh, his Lord, and not diminish anything from it, but if he who owes the debt is unsound in understanding, or weak, or (if) he is not able to dictate himself, then let his guardian dictate with justice; and call in to witness from among your men two witnesses; but if there are not two men, then one man and two women from among those whom you approve of the

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: O you who believe! when you deal with each other in contracting a loan . . . and Allāh knows all things: ''at-Tadāyun'' (التَّدَايُنْ) is to give a loan to another; ''al-imlāl'' (الإمْلاَلُ) and ''al-imlā' '' (الإمْلاَءُ) both mean 'to dictate'; ''al-bakhs'' (البَخْسُ) is to diminish, to do justice; ''as-sa'mah'' (السَّأمَةُ) is to be fed up; to disdain; ''al-muḍārrah'' (المُضَآرَّةُ) on the paradigm of ''al-mufā'ilah'' (المُفَاعِلَةُ) from ''aḍ-ḍarar'' (الضَّرَرُ =harm) means to harm one another; ''al-fusūq''(الفُسُوْقُ) is transgression, refusal to obey; ''ar-rihān'' (الرِّهَانُ) has also been recited as ar-ruhun (الرُّهُنُ), both are the plurals of ar-rahn (الرَّهْنُ = the thing mortgaged, pawned or deposited as security).

‘‘And let him who owes the debt dictate . . . but if he who owes the debt is unsound in understanding . . .’’ The whole phrase ‘‘he who owes the debt’’ has been repeated here instead of using a pronoun. It was done to remove any possible misunderstanding, as a pronoun could easily be mistaken to refer to the ‘‘scribe’’ mentioned in the preceding sentence.

‘‘. . . or (if) he is not able to dictate himself, then let his guardian dictate . . .’’ The manifest and separate pronoun ‘‘huwa’’ (هُوَ = translated here as ‘‘himself’’) has been included in the sentence to show that in this particular case the debtor and his guardian both have the right to dictate. In the first two situations, when the debtor is deficient in understanding or is weak (in body or mind), the guardian has total authority, and the debtor himself cannot deal in his own affairs. But in this third situation when the debtor is, for any reason, unable to dictate himself, then the guardian shall have joint authority to do so. Therefore, this pronoun has given the following meaning to the phrase: ‘‘what such a debtor himself can do, he should do it; but what he is unable to do, his guardian shall do it ’’.

‘‘ . . . so that if one of the two errs, the (second) one of the two may remind the other’’: In this sentence a word, ḥadhar (حَذَرَ) is understood before an (اَنْ); together they literally mean, ‘‘lest one of the two errs . . .’’; the words, ‘‘one of the two’’ have been repeated in this sentence. While at first glance it would appear that the second phrase could be replaced by a pronoun, the fact is that the two phrases do not have the same significance. The first phrase (if one of the two errs) refers to either of the two without pointing to a particular woman; the second phrase (the one of the two may remind . . .) points particularly to the second who has not erred. That is why we have added the word (second) in its translation.

‘‘And fear Allāh’’; The believers should guard themselves against disobeying the orders and prohibitions promulgated in this verse. ‘‘And Allāh teaches you’’; it is an independent sentence, not connected with the preceding one, ‘‘and fear Allāh’’. The sentence describes the grace of Allāh bestowed on the believers. In this respect it is like the words of Allāh in the verse of inheritance: Allāh makes it clear to you lest you err (4:176). Allāh in both these sentences shows that He has bestowed His bounties upon the believers by teaching them the rules of religion and by instructing them as to what they were allowed to do and what not.

Some people have said that the sentence, ‘‘and fear Allāh, and Allāh teaches you’’, were connected to each other. According to them, they show that there is a relation of cause and effect between the two — when people fear Allāh then Allāh teaches them.

Comment: The principle mentioned above is correct in itself, and is supported by other verses of the Qur’ān and by traditions. But this verse has nothing to do with that principle. The second sentence begins with ‘‘and’’; if it had wanted to enunciate that principle, the word ‘‘and’’ would not have been there; the sentence would have been like this: ‘‘and fear Allāh, He will teach you’’. Moreover, the said interpretation is not supported by the context; if we accept it then the end of the verse will be quite irrelevant to the main topic of the verse.

The above-mentioned reconstruction of the verse gives us another argument against that interpretation. Had that meaning been correct, the divine name, Allāh, would not have been repeated in ‘‘and Allāh teaches you’’, a pronoun would have been more appropriate.

In these three consecutive short sentences, the divine name, Allāh, has been repeated three times. It was necessary in the first sentence, ‘‘and fear Allāh’’; it had to be repeated in ‘‘and Allāh teaches you’’, because it was an independent sentence; and in the last sentence, ‘‘and Allāh knows all things’’, the name gives the proof of this statement — He knows all things because He is Allāh.

The two verses contain nearly twenty basic rules concerning loan, mortgage, evidence, etc. There are numerous traditions about these and related topics. But the proper place to go into these details are the books of jurisprudence. Therefore, we shall not quote them here.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's: Allāh is the Owner of all creation, whether it is in the heavens or in the earth. This declaration paves the way for the next sentence, ''and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it, Allāh will call you to account for it''. To Him belongs all that is in the heavens and in the earth; and among those things are you as well as your actions, and all that your souls have earned. Therefore, Allāh encompasses you and preserve your deeds; it makes no difference to Him whether your actions are manifest or hidden, He will call you to account for them.

It has been said that the heavens have an affinity with the mind's faculties, psychological traits and spiritual characteristics. What is in our souls or minds is a part of what is in the heavens, and it belongs to Allāh. When the hidden traits and characteristics manifest themselves through the actions of the body; they become a part of what is in the earth, and that also belongs to Allāh. Thus, whatever is found in our minds, whether it is manifested or remains hidden, belongs to Allāh, and He will decide about it after calling us to account for it.

QUR'ĀN: and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it, Allāh will call you to account for it: ''al-Ibdā' '' (الإبْدَاءُ = to manifest) is opposite of ''al-ikhfā' '' (الإخْفَاءُ = to hide).

''What is in your souls'' means ''what is settled in your minds''; it is the meaning that is understood by scholars of the language as well as the general public. It refers to traits and characteristics, whether good or bad, like belief and disbelief, love and hate, strength or weakness of the will, and so on. These traits may be manifest or hidden. They are manifested through the actions of body, which may be perceived by others and which prove the existence of those traits in the doer. One knows that but for those particular traits, for example, love or hate, belief or disbelief, inclination or repulsion, those deeds could not be done. In this manner, actions manifest the motives that are fixed in the minds of the doers.

Conversely, these traits may remain hidden if one does not do any action that could prove their existence in one's mind.

We have said above that ''what is in your souls'' means what is settled in your minds. It does not mean ineradicable and firmlyrooted characteristics; rather it refers to the substantial existence of such characteristics from which actions may emanate.

The two alternatives, ''whether you manifest . . .'' and ''hide it'', show that those characteristics are capable of being shown or hidden; it may be a well-ingrained trait or some appropriate psychological state. But it does not, and cannot, mean passing notions and transient ideas that invade one's mind without one's intention; for example, the mental image of a sin when one has no intention or inclination to do it. The words of the verse do not include such involuntary notions, because they are not ''settled'' in the mind, nor does any action emanate from them.

The verse, in short, says that mental states, the characteristics and traits settled in mind, are the basis of a man's actions, obedient as well as disobedient; and Allāh will call man to account for them. In this respect, this verse has the same significance as the following verses:

Allāh will not call you to account for what is vain in your oaths, but He will call you to account for what your hearts have earned (2:225).

. . . his heart is surely sinful (2:283).

. . . surely the hearing and the sight and the heart, all of these, shall be questioned about that (17:36).

These verses prove that there are some conditions and characteristics of hearts, that is, minds, for which man will be called to account. The following verse also proves it:

Surely (as for) those who love that scandal should circulate respecting those who believe, they shall have a grievous chastisement in this world and the hereafter . . . (24:19).

It shows that the chastisement shall be because of the ‘‘love’’ of circulating scandal; and love is a state of mind.

This is the apparent and clear meaning of this verse. It proves that man shall be called to account for what is settled in his mind, whether he hides it or shows it. But the verse is silent on the questions as to whether the chastisement in all cases — manifesting it or hiding it, acting according to one’s intention or not doing so, succeeding in the intended transgression or not succeeding — will be the same or different.

Most of the commentators have misunderstood the significance of the verse. They have thought that it is said that man will be asked about even a passing notion that invades the mind, even if it has not settled therein and even when it is beyond the control of a man. Holding a man responsible for such fleeting notions is, without doubt, imposing a duty beyond the limit of one’s ability. From this point on, these commentators have differed among themselves.

a) Some have admitted that Allāh might impose on a soul a duty beyond its furthest limit.

Others have tried to escape from this difficulty in various ways :

b) Some have accepted that the verse ordained for man what was in fact a duty beyond his ability. But, they claimed, it was abrogated by the sentence in the next verse: ‘‘Allāh does not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability’’.

Comment: It has been clearly shown that the verse does not include such transitory ideas and notions. Therefore, the whole argument and interpretation is out of place. Moreover, imposing a duty beyond one's ability is, ab initio, against reason; Allāh cannot do so even for a single moment. He has declared that He never ordained anything in religion beyond our ability: . . . and (He) did not lay upon you any hardship in religion (22:78).

c) Some others said that the verse was connected with the preceding one, and that it speaks particularly about the hiding of testimony.

Comment: This restriction of meaning is clearly against the general nature of the verse.

d) Still others have said that it was restricted to the unbelievers. Only they shall be called to account for their fleeting fantasies.

Comment: This restriction too is against the generality of the verse.

e) Someone else has interpreted the verse in this way: If you manifest your hidden evil by committing transgression openly, or if you keep it hidden by committing sins secretly, in both cases Allāh will call you to account for it. According to this interpretation, the chastisement shall be, not for the ideas, but for the sins.

Comment: Such interpretation is totally against the apparent and clear meaning of the verse.

f) Yet others have said that ''what is in your souls'' means any kind of idea, whether fixed or otherwise. But ''Allāh will call you to account for it'' means ''Allāh will inform you of it''. According to this interpretation, the verse is similar to the verse: . . . so He will inform you of what you did (5:105). Whether we manifest such ideas and notions or hide them, Allāh will tell us about them on the Day of Resurrection.

Comment: This interpretation too, like the preceding one, is totally against the clear meaning of the verse.

QUR'ĀN: then He will forgive whom He pleases and chastise whom He pleases; and Allāh is powerful over all things: The alternatives of ''forgiveness'' and ''chastisement'' give a hint that ''what is in your souls'' refers especially to evil thoughts and characteristics. Although ''forgiveness'' has also been used in the Qur'ān in a few such cases where no sin was involved, it is a very uncommon, indeed a rare, usage, and there should be some strong reason and clear association before the word ‘‘forgiveness’’ is being diverted to such meaning.

‘‘And Allāh is powerful over all things’’: It gives the reason for the said forgiving and chastising; or it may show the reason for the whole verse.

TRADITIONS

It is narrated in aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim from Abū Hurayrah that he said: ‘‘When the verse: Whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is Allāh's; and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it, Allāh will call you to account for it was revealed to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), the companions of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) were very much perturbed. They came to the Messenger of Allāh and crouched down (before him) and said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! we were ordered to do what we were able to do — prayer, fasting, fighting and charity; but (now) Allāh has sent down this verse and it is beyond the extent of our ability.’ Thereupon, the Messenger of Allāh said: ‘Do you want to say as the people of the book before you said, ‘‘We hear and we disobey’’? Rather, you should say, ‘‘We hear and obey; our Lord! Thy forgiveness (do we crave) and to Thee is (our) march.’’ ’ When they recited it, and their tongues had been subdued by it, Allāh immediately revealed: The Apostle believes in what has been revealed to him from his Lord, and (so do) the believers . . . . and to Thee is (our) march. When they did so, Allāh abrogated that (law) and revealed (the verse): Allāh does not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability . . .’’

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has narrated in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr through Aḥmad, Muslim, Abū Dāwūd (in his an-Nāsikh wa ’l-mansūkh), Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu ’l-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim from Abū Hurayrah; and he has narrated another tradition with nearly the same meaning through several chains from Ibn ‘Abbās. And the abrogation has been narrated through several chains from other companions too, like Ibn Mas‘ūd and ‘Ā’ishah.

And it has been narrated from ar-Rabī‘ ibn Anas that the verse is confirmed and unabrogated; and that ‘‘calling to account’’ means that Allāh will inform the servant, on the Day of Resurrection, about his deeds which he did in this world.

And it has been narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās through several chains that the verse is restricted to hiding and giving testimony. Accordingly, it is a confirmed verse, not abrogated.

And it has been narrated from ‘Ā’ishah that calling to account means the vexation and grief which a man feels when he intends to commit a sin and does not do it. This interpretation also treats the verse as confirmed and unabrogated.

And it has been narrated, through the chains of ‘Alī, from Ibn ‘Abbās about the words of Allāh: and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it (i.e. all your hidden and manifest affairs) Allāh will call you to account for it, that it is not abrogated. When Allāh gathers the creatures on the Day of Resurrection, He shall say: ‘‘I shall inform you of what you had hidden in your souls which my angels were not aware of.’’ Then, as for the believers, He shall tell them what they had imagined in their souls, and will forgive them. It is the word of Allāh: Allāh will call you to account for it, that is, will inform you. And as for the people of doubt and suspicion, He shall inform them of the denial of truth which they had kept hidden; and it is the word of Allāh: . . . but He will call you to account for what your hearts have earned.

The author says: All these traditions, in spite of their mutual differences. have one thing in common: All are against the clear meaning of the Qur’ān, as explained earlier. The verse clearly says that men will be called to account for what their hearts have earned either directly or through other limbs; and there is no ‘‘earning’’ in passing notions and fleeting images which invade the mind. And testimony does not differ in this from other affairs, nor is there any difference in this matter between a believer and an unbeliever; and ‘‘calling to account’’ evidently does not mean informing someone of his transitory thoughts; it obviously means calling one to account for reward or punishment. This is the clear meaning of this verse, and all other verses confirm this meaning.

So far as those traditions are concerned which say that this verse was abrogated, there are several defects in them.

First: They are against the evident meaning of the Verse, as explained above.

Second: They claim that there is no injustice in imposing a duty on a soul beyond the limits of its ability. Such a thing is evidently invalid, and especially so if it is attributed to Allāh. The subsequent abrogation cannot right this wrong, rather the incongruity will increase; the tradition says, ‘‘. . . when they recited it . . . Allāh abrogated . . . ’’, in other words, the order was abrogated before it was acted upon. And such an ab ogation is not acceptable in Islam.

Third: You will see in the commentary of the next verses that the sentence, ‘‘Allāh does not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability’’, is not capable of abrogating any rule. That verse says that every soul is confronted by whatever it has earned, whether it finds it hard to bear or easy. If such a thing was imposed upon a soul which it did not have the strength to bear, or if such a burden was laid upon it as was laid upon those before us, it was all the result of what the soul had itself earned, because of its wrong choice; it should not blame anyone but itself. With this background, the sentence: Allāh dos not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability: looks like a parenthetic sentence, written to remove any postiihie misunderstanding.

Fourth: The subject of the next two verses has nothing to do with fleeting thoughts and transitory ideas ; nor do those verses stand face to face with this verse as an abrogating verse stands in relation to an abrogated one.

In short, the purpose of the next verses is quite different from the aim of this verse, as you will see.

GENERAL COMMENT

These are the last verses of this chapter. They summarize the details given in it, and recapitulate its main objective. As we mentioned at the beginning, the chapter aimed to show that it was an integral part of the worship of Allāh to believe in all that He sent to His creatures through His apostles, without making any difference between those apostles. It is this reality which is described in the first of these verses: ‘‘The Apostle believes . . . between any of His apostles’’.

The chapter then gives many stories of the Israelites: How Allāh bestowed upon them His countless bounties, like the Book, the prophethood, the kingdom, etc., and how they answered it with disobedience, rebellion, breach of covenant and even infidelity. It is these stories that are obliquely hinted at in the remaining part of the first and the whole of the second verse, where the believers are reported as saying ‘‘We hear and obey’’, and then they go on seeking the protection, forgiveness and help of Allāh.

Thus, these verses connect the end of the chapter with its beginning. The epilogue is a mirror of the prologue.

Allāh opens this chapter by describing the qualities that are essential for a God-fearing people, and without which they cannot discharge their duties towards their Lord. He says that His pious and God-fearing servants believe in the unseen, keep up prayer, spend out of the sustenance given to them by Allāh, believe in that which was revealed to the Apostle and to the previous apostles and are sure of the life hereafter (vide verses 2 — 5 of this chapter). Allāh guides them through the Qur’ān; and then He shows the contrast between them and the infidels and hypocrites.

Then the talk turns to the affairs of the people of the Book and especially the Jews. It explains how Allāh, in His grace, guided them, and exalted them with His bounties and favours. And what was their response to all those favours? They became arrogant, disobeyed the commandments of Allāh, and repaid His bounties with ingratitude; they stood against Allāh and His apostles, bore malice against His angels, and made differences between one apostle and the other, and one book and the other. As a result, Allāh laid on them heavy burdens, like the order to kill their own people; and imposed upon them that which they had no strength to bear, like turning them into apes, and sending lightening and plague from the sky on them.

After going into all these details, Allāh recounts in these two verses the good attributes of the Apostle and the believers who have followed him; He shows that their condition is in clear contrast with that of the people of the Book. They have responded to the divine bounties and guidance with submission and obedience; they believe in Allāh, His angels, His books and His apostles, without making any difference between any of the apostles. And they know their own limitations as powerless mortals, and recognize the all-pervasive power of Allāh. Although they have unconditionally submitted to the Caller towards the truth, they confess that they cannot do justice to that Call because of their inherent weakness and ignorance. They are afraid that they may transgress the limit by forgetfulness or mistake, or that they may fall short in their duties of divine worship; they are worried lest a sinful act puts them in disgrace, as happened with the people of the Book before them. Therefore, they beseech the All-merciful Lord and pray to Him not to punish them if they forget or make a mistake, not to lay on them a burden and not to impose upon them that which they have not the strength to bear; they entreat Him to pardon them, to forgive their mistakes and to have mercy on them, and to help them against the unbelieving people.

This is the true place of these two verses in the scheme of this chapter; they are a sort of resume of the chapter. This observation should be enough to further repudiate the claims of the commentators:

a) that these verses were connected with the preceding one: ‘‘and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it, Allāh will call you to account for it’’;

b) that this preceding verse imposed a duty upon every soul beyond the limit of its ability;

c) that the first of these verses, ‘‘The Apostle believes . . . and to Thee is (our) march’’, describes how the companions submitted to, and accepted, this imposition of duty beyond the limit of their ability;

d) And that the second of these verses, ‘‘Allāh does not impose . . . help us against the unbelieving people’’, abrogated that verse which imposed such duty.

Moreover, our explanation is in perfect harmony with the reported ‘‘reason of revelation’’ of this chapter, that it was the first chapter revealed at Medina. The Prophet emigrated to Medina, and settled therein; the Medinite believers, that is, the Helpers (anṣār), eagerly accepted the divine religion, and stood up to help the Apostle of Allāh with their properties and lives; the Emigrant believers (muhājirūn) abandoned their properties and homes, and left their families and children in the cause of Islam, and came to Medina to remain with the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). That was indeed the time when Allāh should have praised them for their answering the Call of His Prophet with acceptance and obedience, and thanked them for their submission.

The last sentence ‘‘Thou art our Guardian, so help us against the unbelieving people’’ also indicates that this prayer was at a time when Islam had begun its march forward, and when there was danger of attack from the unbelievers.

This verse contains wonders of elocution; there is generality followed by specification, and brevity by amplification; it shows the servants of Allāh the perfect way of submission and servitude; and, in short, contains all the basic elements of perfection and felicity.

COMMENTARY

QUR’ĀN: The Apostle believes in what has been revealed to him from his Lord, and (so do) the believers; This makes known the belief of the Apostle and the believers. The Apostle has been mentioned separately as the one who believes in what has been revealed to him from his Lord; then the believers have been joined to him in this virtue; it has been done to maintain the dignity of the Apostle. It is the usual style of the Qur’ān: On such occasions, it first mentions the name of the Apostle separately, and thereafter the believers are joined to him. Look, for example, at following verses: . . . then Allāh sent down His tranquillity on His Apostle and on the believers (48:26); . . . on the day on which Allāh will not abase the Prophet and those who believe with him . . . (66:8).

QUR’ĀN: they all believe in Allāh and His angels and His books and His apostles: This specifies the generality of the preceding sentence: ‘‘What has been revealed’’ to the Messenger of Allāh demands belief in Allāh and acceptance of the truth of the books and apostles and angels who are Allāh’s honoured servants. Whoever believes in what has been revealed to the Messenger of Allāh must believe in all those things, in a suitable manner.

QUR’ĀN: We make no difference between any of His apostles: It is the quotation of the believers’ saying, without using the introductory verb, ‘‘They said’’. We have explained in the commentary of verse 2:127 (And when Ibrāhīm and Ismā‘īl were raising the foundations of the House; ‘‘Our Lord! accept from us; surely Thou art the Hearing, the Knowing’’) the general reason for this type of quotation, and how it is one of the most elegant styles of the Qur’ān. Apart from that basic reason of portraying the speakers before the eyes and ears of the imagination there was in this case one particular reason for omission of the words ‘They said’: this speech depicts the believers’ state of mind; it does not describe their verbal declaration. Even if we suppose that they actually uttered these words, each of them must have done so individually and in his heart; they never said it jointly and together by their tongues. It was only their shared faith that announced this belief, not in words but in their state of minds, which spoke louder than the words.

This verse quotes two sayings of the believers, one after another, but with different styles: ‘‘We make no difference . . .’’ is without the words ‘They said’; then the sentence is followed immediately by, ‘‘and they say: ‘We hear and obey . . .’ ’’ which, as we see, is introduced with, ‘‘they say’’. Yet both are the believers’ sayings when they answered the Call of the Prophet. The reason for this difference is that the first sentence describes the state of their minds, while the second was actually uttered by them in words.

The verse begins by describing the belief of all the believers, ‘‘everyone of them’’ taken separately. Then it turns to plural verbs and pronouns (We make no difference . . .), and it continues upto the end. What was done in this respect by the people of the Book was done by their whole of their nations. The Jews made a difference between Mūsā on the one hand, and ‘Īsā and Muḥammad on the other; the Christians made a difference between Mūsā and ‘Īsā on one hand, and Muḥammad on the other. Thus they became divided into many groups and sects, although Allāh had created them one people. Also, they were chastised and heavy burdens were imposed on the whole of their groups jointly, not separately. And the prayer at the end of the verse 'to be helped against the unbelieving people' was, likewise, a collective affair. Therefore, all these things demanded plural words. In contrast to this, ''belief'' is a personal and individual matter, and it was appropriate to describe it in an individualistic style and a singular number.

QUR'ĀN: And they say: ''We hear and obey; Our Lord! Thy forgiveness (do we crave), and to Thee is (our) march'': ''We hear and obey'' is not information; it is the declaration of their submission to the divine command. To hear allegorically means to accept and believe in; to obey is used for complying with order. Together these two words point to the acceptance of the call through believing with the heart and doing one's duty with the body. Thus hearing and obeying refer to perfect belief.

Their declaration to hear and obey is, thus, fulfilment of the rights Allāh has on His servants; it is the sum total of the duties that Allāh has imposed upon them: to hear and to obey. It is the ''worship'' mentioned in the following verses : And I did not create the jinn and the human beings except that they should worship Me. I do not desire from them any sustenance and I do not desire that they should feed Me (51:56 — 57); Did I not enjoin you, O children of Adam! that you should not worship the Satan? Surely, he is you open enemy, and that you should worship Me; this is the right way (36:60 — 61).

And Allāh has decreed on His Own Self a right for His servants, in consideration of the above-mentioned duty imposed on them, that is, forgiveness. It is a thing which nobody can do without — right from the apostles and the prophets to an ordinary believers. Allāh promised them that He would forgive them if they obeyed and worshipped Him. This promise was the first thing ordained when the sharī'ah was given to Adam: We said: Get down you therefrom all together; and when there comes to you a guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, no fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve (2:38). And it is what forgiveness means.

The believers said ''We hear and obey''; their declaration of faith and obedience was unconditional, they did what was expected of them about the rights of their Lord. Then they asked the Lord to bestow upon them His promised grace, that is, forgiveness. They said: ‘‘Thy forgiveness (do we crave), and to Thee is (our) march.’’ ‘‘al-Maghfirah’’ (المَغْفِرَةُ) , and al-ghufrān (الغُفْرَانُ), both of which are translated as ‘‘forgiveness’’, literally mean ‘‘to cover’’. When Allāh forgives the sin of a servant, the due punishment is averted from him; in other words, Allāh covers and hides his shortcomings. This grace will be bestowed upon the servant when he reaches His Lord. That is why they said, soon after praying for forgiveness, ‘‘and to Thee is (our) march.’’

QUR’ĀN: Allāh does not impose upon any soul a duty but to the extent of its ability; for it is (the benefit of) what it has earned, and upon it (the evil of) what it has wrought: ‘‘al-Wus‘ ’’ (الوُسْعُ) is ability and power. Originally, the word was used for dimension, to show the area or capacity of a place or receptacle; then the power of man was thought of as a receptacle from which his actions come forth. A man has the ability to do a certain task; it is as though the said task is accomodated in his ability. On the other hand, a task which he cannot do is too great for his power and ability. In this way, the word ‘dimension’ came to mean power and ability.

As mentioned above, it is the sum total of the rights of Allāh on man that he should hear and obey. Obviously, man can say ‘‘I hear’’ only about that which he can understand; how can he answer by hearing and accepting what he cannot understand? Also, he can say ‘‘I obey’’ only about that which can be performed by his faculties and organs directly or through some tools. Obedience means that man follows the given order, and his faculties and organs are actuated to perform accordingly. The question of obedience does not arise about things that cannot be done; for example, if one is told to hear by his eyes, or to sit in two rooms at the same time, or that one should be born from his parents a second time. No such order can be given by any sane person. When the believers answer the Call of religion with hearing and obedience, it means that the Call is about such things that are within their power and ability; and it is these things which man obeys or disobeys, earning for himself what will benefit him or harm him. The ‘‘earning’’, mentioned in this verse, is the best proof to show that what man earns, he earns through his ability and power.

The words of Allāh ‘‘Allāh does not impose upon any soul . . .’’ describe the divinely established system that Allāh does not impose upon His servants what is beyond their power; for example, He does not tell them to believe in that which is beyond their understanding; nor does He ordain for them a duty which they cannot do. This is, also, the custom of all sane persons. It is a sentence that is neither more nor less than the believers’ declaration ‘‘We hear and obey’’; it agrees with it perfectly.

This sentence, that is, ‘‘Allāh does not impose upon any soul . . .’’, is in perfect harmony with the preceding and the following sentences. It is related to the preceding one, as it shows that Allāh does not impose any duty except that which the servants can hear and obey, that is, which is within their ability and power.

And it is related to the following sentences, as it shows that what the Apostle and the believers prayed for — that Allāh should not punish them if they forget or do a mistake, and should not lay on them burden as He laid on past nations, and should not impose upon them anything which they do not have strength to bear — was not an imposition beyond the extent of their ability, although such things, if imposed, could cause hardship. When Allāh imposes upon a group that which they have not the strength to bear, it is not the imposition of a duty; it is the imposition of a punishment for their transgression and rebellion.

Forgetfulness and committing mistakes, per se, are beyond man’s power; but, more often than not, it is man himself who paves the way for them. It is possible to prevent these two (forgetfulness and erring) by desisting from those things which cause them. It is especially true in cases where one forgets or commits a mistake because of his wrong choice.

The same may be said about laying on one a burden like that which was laid upon previous people. It refers to the cases in which Allāh imposed hard rules in place of easy ones, when those people went against those easy rules. It was not the unwarrantable imposition of duty beyond one’s ability; it was brough upon them by those people themselves because of their wrong choice. And such punishing rules are not bad in law.

QUR’ĀN: Our Lord! do not punish us if we forget or do a mistake. They first said, ‘‘We hear and obey’’ which showed their unconditional surrender and obedience. Then they looked at themselves and became aware of their intrinsically weak and imperfect being. Also, they remembered what had happened to previous nations. This prompted them to beseech their Lord for mercy, and they prayed to Him not to take them to task as He had done with past people. They sought His protection because Allāh had taught them that there was no power or strength except from Allāh, and that nothing can save from Allāh's displeasure except His mercy.

Why did the Apostle prayed to Allāh in these words when he was sinless and protected from mistake and forgetfulness? He did so because his sinlessness had come from Allāh; he was protected from mistake and forgetfulness by Allāh's protection. Therefore, it was quite in order for him to include himself in the group of believers to ask from his Lord what he knew was a grace of the Lord.

QUR'ĀN: Our Lord! do not lay on us a burden as Thou didst lay on those before us: ''al-Iṣr'' (الاصْرُ = burden) is also interpreted as detaining a thing by force. This is not very far from the first meaning: If a thing is confined and detained forcefully it puts a heavy burden on it.

''Those before us'' refers to the people of the Book and especially the Jews, because this chapter describes many strories about them; and because the seventh chapter, inter alia, refers to the Apostle of Islam in these words: . . . and removes from them (the people of Torah and Injīl) their burden and the shackles which were upon them . . . (7:157).

QUR'ĀN: Our Lord! do not impose upon us that which we have not the strength to bear: It does not refer to unbearable rules of the sharī'ah, because reason does not allow such rules, and Allāh has Himself said that He does not impose any duty beyond one's limit of ability; and the words of the believers ''We hear and obey'' show that Allāh's commandments are within their ability to understand and act.

This sentence in fact refers to severe punishments meted out to previous peoples — the imposition of retaliatory hard rules, sending upon them severe chastisements or transforming them into animals or insects.

QUR'ĀN: And pardon us and forgive us and have mercy on us: ''al-'Afw'' (العَفْوُ) is to erase the signs of a thing; al-maghfirah is to cover it ; ''ar-raḥmah'' (الرَّحْمَةُ) is mercy. From the linguistic point of view, the three sentences proceed from branch to root and from particular to general. The believers beseech Allāh first to erase and eradicate the sign of their sin (by removing its due punishment from them) , then they ask Him to cover and hide the sin (by letting all concerned forget about it completely); lastly they crave for His mercy that will cover the sin and make them worthy of of His grace.

The three sentences are in conjunction with the previous ones: ‘‘Our Lord! do not punish us if we forget or do a mistake . . .’’ The context shows that the pardon, forgiveness and mercy asked for are in connection with such sins which they might commit by forgetfulness or mistake. Therefore, the forgiveness asked for in this verse is in a particular context; it is not like the forgiveness aked for in the previous verse, ‘‘Thy forgiveness (do we crave) ’’, which is an unrestricted and unconditional forgiveness in consideration of the believers’ unrestricted and unconditional acceptance of the Call.

It is clear from the above that there is no repetition of the prayer of forgiveness, because both are in separate contexts.

In these prayers the word ‘‘Lord’’ has been repeated four times. This was done to invoke the divine mercy. The name ‘‘Lord’’ by contrast, hints to the servitude and total dependence of the beseecher.

QUR’ĀN: Thou art our Guardian, so help us against the unbelieving people: It is an independent sentence and a separate prayer. ‘‘al-Mawlā’’ (المَوْلي) means ‘helper’ — not any helper, but that one who looks after the affairs of the helped one. The root word is al-wilāyah (الولايَةُ = to govern, to rule, to take charge of). Allāh is the Ruler of the believers; therefore, He is their Guardian in all their affairs. Allāh says: . . . and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers (3:68); That is because Allāh is the Master of those who believe, and because the unbelievers have no master for them (47:11).

This prayer of theirs shows that their only desire, after hearing and obeying the basic religion, was to spread the true faith and to fight in the way of Allāh to establish the word of truth, so that all the nations could unite in that cause. Allāh says: Say: ‘‘This is my way: I invite you unto Allāh; with clear sight (are) I and he who follows me; and glory be to Allāh, and I am not of the polytheists’’ (12:108). To call to the faith of monotheism is the way of true religion. It involves one in fighting, enjoining the good and forbidding the evil, and in all the methods of propagation of religion. This is done to remove the root of discord from the human species. The importance attached to this endeavour may be understood from the verse: He has prescribed for you of the religion what He enjoined upon Nūḥ and that which We have revealed unto you, and that which We enjoined upon Ibrāhīm and Mūsā and ʻĪsā, that establish the religion and be not divided therein (42:13).

This prayer of the believers (Thou are our Guardian, so help us . . .) proves that the first thing that came into their minds after firmly deciding to hear and obey, was the general call to invite the whole of mankind to the religion of truth. And Allāh knows better.

Wa ʾl-ḥamdu li ʾllāh (And praise and thank be to Allāh).

1. al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabātabā’ī (1321/1904 — 1402/1981) — may Allāh have mercy upon him — was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān.

2. al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzān fī tafsīri ’l-Qur’ān which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allāmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzān because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustādh al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and its discussions.

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the sixth volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān. This volume corresponds with the first half of the third volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allāh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendixes included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of the English translation of al-Mīzān: One for the authors and the other for the hooks cited throughout this work.

* * * * *

We implore upon Allāh to affect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work which we have started. May Allāh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Heiper.

GENERAL COMMENT

This chapter aims at exhorting the believers to remain united in religion and to defend its cause with patience, forbearance and determination. It makes them aware of the dangers surrounding them: Their enemies, the Jews, the Christians and the polytheists, have made their preparations, and are determined to extinguish the Light of Allāh with their hands and mouths.

In all likelihood, the chapter was revealed all together; its verses — 200 in all — seem to be well-connected and adhere to a laid down scheme. From the beginning to the end, the verses are related to one another and have consistent aims.

It looks as if this chapter was revealed when Islam had begun to spread in Arabia, but had not yet established a firm foothold outside Medina. It mentions the battle of Uḥud, describes the planned imprecation with the Christians of Najrān; speaks about the Jews and exhorts the believers against the polytheists; and in all these discourses, there is a constant refrain telling them to remain patient and united. It supports the view that this chapter was revealed at a time when the Muslims were engaged in defence of religion with all their might and when all their resources were devoted to this one task. On one side, they had to remain alert against internal sabotage planned by the Jews and the Christians; the believers had not only to refute their arguments, but also to neutralize their craftily-planned subterfuges to demoralize the Muslims. On the other, they had to fight the polytheists; they lived in a state of war, and peace seemed a forlorn hope. The call of Islam was reaching far and wide; this had prompted the enemies of truth — the Jews, the Christians and the Arabian polytheists — to attack the Muslims, in order to annihilate them before it was too late. Beyond the boundary of Arabia, the Byzantines and the Persians had the same design.

Allāh in this chapter reminds the believers of the realities of religion that would make them happy and remove from their hearts the rust of doubts and satanic suggestions; and will keep them on guard against the deceptions of the People of the Book. He makes it clear that He has not relinquished the management of His kingdom for a single moment; nor have His creatures made Him weary. He has chosen the religion for them, and has guided a group of His servants to it — according to His established system: the system of cause and effect. Believer and unbeliever both walk on this very path. One day it is the unbeliever that looks victorious, the other day the believer vanquishes the unbeliever. The world is the place of tests and trials; the time is the time of action; and the result will be known tomorrow — not today.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: Allāh is He besides Whom there is no god, the Everliving, the Self-subsisting by Whom all subsist: Its explanation has been given in ''the verse of the Chair'' (2:255). It might be inferred from it that Allāh looks after the affairs of creation and management in the most comprehensive and perfect way. The whole universe, all the things and their actions and reactions, are managed by Allāh. This management is not like that of the physical and natural causes that create an effect on an object but have no sense or understanding themselves. His management is that of ''life'' that entails knowledge and power. The Divine knowledge is comprehensive — nothing is hidden from Him; the Divine power controls everything — nothing can happen unless He intends it to happen and allows it to appear.

That is the reason why, after two more verses, it has been said: Allāh, surely nothing is hidden from Him in the earth or in the heaven (5). He it is Who shapes you in the wombs as He likes . . . (6).

These six verses are a sort of prologue of this chapter, giving in a nutshell what the chapter contains in detail. Of these verses, this one is a sort of introducing speech, describing a basic truth that leads to the intended result. And the fifth and sixth verses, mentioned above, give the reason of the preceding verses. Therefore, the main theme of the prologue is contained in the two verses of the middle: He has revealed to you the Book with truth, verifying that which is before . . . and Allāh is Mighty, the Lord of retribution.

According to these verses, the believers must remember that Allāh, in Whom they believe, is One in His Godhead, maintains the creation and manages its affairs — a living management; He cannot be overpowered in His kingdom, nor there happens anything therein except what He intends and allows to happen: If they believe in it, they shall know that it is He Who has revealed the Book that guides to the truth; the Separator that distinguishes the right from the wrong. They shall appreciate that in this matter also, He has decreed the same system of cause and effect, and has therefore given the man freedom of choice; he who believes shall have his reward; he who disbelieves, shall get its chastisement, because Allāh is Mighty, the Lord of retribution. It is because He is Allāh, besides Whom there is no god to decide in these affairs; nothing of His servants' affairs is hidden from Him; their belief and disbelief is not independent of His will and decree.

QUR'ĀN: He has revealed to you the Book with truth, verifying that which is before it: The word translated as ''revealed'' is a verbal form of ''at-tanzīl'' (اَلتَّنْزِيْلُ). It was explained in the second volume that at-tanzīl (to send down) implies gradualness, while ''al-inzāl'' (اَلْاِنْزَالُ) shows sending down all at once.

It may be argued that the following verses go against this implied gradualness: . . . Why has not the Qur'ān been revealed to him all at once? (25:32); . . . Is thy Lord able to send down to us food from heaven? (5:112); . . . Why has not a sign been sent down to him from his Lord? Say: Surely Allāh is able to send down a sign . . . (6:37). In all the four instances, verbs derived from at-tanzīl have been used, but they do not mean gradual descent. An exegete has tried to overcome this difficulty by suggesting that the words, ''sent down (i.e., revealed) to you the Book'', means: sent it down sending after sending.

Reply: Gradualness in revelation (sending down) does not necessarily mean considerable gap between revelation of one part and the other. There are composite things whose existence is the same as that of their parts, like rain. Sometimes the speaker looks at the rain as a whole, and treats it as one undivided thing — it is quite in order, in this case, to describe it with the verb al-inzāl (sending down all at once), as Allāh says using this same verb: He sends down water from the heavens (13:17). At other times, He looks at its parts, that is, drops of water, descending one after the other — it does not matter whether the gap between two drops is considerable or minimal — and then it may be described with the verb at-tanzīl (sending down gradually), as Allāh has done in another verse: And He it is Who sends down the rain . . . (42:28).

It appears from above that the verses, put forth against our explanation that at-tanzīl is for sending down gradually, are not against it at all. For example, the verse, . . . why has not the Qur'ān been revealed to him all at once? means: Why has not the Qur'ān been revealed to him verse after verse at one stretch without considerable gaps between their revelation? Other verses may be correctly understood in this light. So far as the said exegete's proposed meaning is concerned, it, first of all, necessitates inventing a meaning according to one's own liking, and it is not permissible in any language. And even then the suggested meaning does not remove the objection in any way.

Allāh frequently uses the words, at-tanzīl and al-inzāl when describing the revelation of the Book to the Prophet. ''Coming down'' requires a higher level from which a thing departs and a lower level where it reaches and settles. Allāh has used for His Person the attribute of highness, as He says, for example: . . . surely He is High, Wise (42:51). And He has said about His Book that it is from Him: And when there came to them a Book from Allāh verifying that which they have . . . (2:89). Therefore, it is very appropriate to use the word, ''coming down'', when describing the revelation settling down into the heart of the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.).

''al-Ḥaqq'' (اَلْحَقُّ) and ''aṣ-ṣidq''(اَلصِّدْقُ) both are translated as ''truth''. But al-ḥaqq is the information inasmuch as there is an established fact in front of it; and aṣ-ṣidq is the information inasmuch as it conforms with a such a fact. The emphasis in the former is on the established fact, while in the latter it is on conformity.

According to this explanation, the word al-ḥaqq is used for Allāh and for other existing realities, because they are true and actual facts about which the information is given. Anyhow, the word ''truth'', as used in this verse, means an established fact that cannot be invalidated.

The preposition ''bi'' (بِ = with) in ''bi 'l-ḥaqq'' (بِالْحَقِّ = with truth) is for togetherness. The verse, therefore, means: He has revealed to you the Book, a revealing accompanied by truth. Naturally, this accompanying would mean that untruth and falsehood could never mix with it; it is always safe from falling a prey to falsity and lie. The verse, thus, hints at this fact obliquely.

Some other exegetes have explained the preposition, ''with'', in some other ways; but none of them is free from defects.

''at-Taṣdīq'' (اَلتَّصْدِيْقُ) is derived from aṣ-ṣidq (truth) and means to verify, to acknowledge the truth of, to believe one to be truthful in the given information. ''That which is before it'', refers to the Torah and Injīl. Allāh says: Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance . . . and We gave (ʻĪsā) the Injīl in which was guidance . . . And We have revealed to you the Book with the truth, verifying what is before it of the book and a guardian over it . . . (5:44 — 48). These verses show that the Old and the New Testaments that are today in the hands of the Jews and the Christians contain between them some of the revelations sent to Mūsā and ʻĪsā (a.s.), although they are not free from omissions and alterations. The Torah and the Injīl found in the days of the Apostle of Allāh were the same Pentateuch and the same four Gospels that are known to us today; and the Qur'ān verifies the same scriptures that were in existence then and have continued to our days. But this verification is partial, not total. There are many Qur'ānic verses that speak of omission and alteration in these two scriptures. Allāh says: . . . We cursed (the Jews) and made their hearts hard; they alter the words from their places, and have forgotten a part of what they were admonished with ... And of those who say, ''Verily, we are Nazarenes (Naṣārā = Christians)'', We did take their covenant, but they forgot a portion of what they were admonished with . . . (5:13 — 14).

QUR'ĀN: and He revealed the Torah and the Injīl, aforetime, a guidance for the people: Torah is a Hebrew word for ''law''. Injīl is the Arabic rendering of a Greek word, meaning 'good news'[1]. Some people say that it is derived from a Persian word[2]. We shall discuss in detail about these two books under the verse: Surely We sent down the Torah in which was guidance and light . . . (5:44).

The Qur'ān insists on naming the book of ʻĪsā as Injī1 (Gospel, in singular) and on saying that it was sent down from Allāh. It is in spite of the fact that there are several Gospels, and the four attributed to Mathew, Mark, Luke and John, existed since before the revelation of the Qur'ān, and were well-known at that time. These two factors — the use of singular, Gospel, and the declaration that it was sent down from Allāh — clearly show the Qur'ānic belief that there was a Gospel, revealed to 'Īsā (a.s.) that was later altered and deleted.

[1] Greek word, euangelion, means ''good news''. In old English it was translated to 'godspell' (good tidings, good news) which later became gospel, a name now used in English for the Injīl (tr.).

[2] There is no evidence to support this claim (tr.).

Anyhow, the references to these two books so early in the beginning is an allusion to the Jews and the Christians, hinting that the affairs of these two groups (including the story of 'Īsā) are to be described in this chapter.

QUR'ĀN: and He sent down the al-Furqān: ''al-Furqān''(اَلْفُرْقَانُ) as explained in aṣ-Ṣiḥāḥ, is what distinguishes truth from falsehood. The word, literally, means ''that which distinguishes one thing from another''. Allāh says: . . . on the day of distinction, the day on which the two parties met . . . (8:41); . . . He will grant you a distinction . . . (8:29). The distinction and discrimination, that Allāh approves in matter of guidance, is the distinction between truth and falsehood in belief and knowledge, and between what consistitutes the duty of a servant of Allāh and what does not do so. Thus, al-Furqān (distinction) may correctly be used for all basic principles and adjunct matters revealed by Allāh to His prophets — whether it is in form of a book or not. Allāh says: And certainly We gave to Mūsā and Hārūn the al-Furqān . . . (21:48); And when We gave Mūsā the Book and the distinction (al-Furqān) . . . (2:53); Blessed is He Who sent down the al-Furqān upon His servant that he may be a warner to the nations (25:1).

Allāh has also described the same meaning with the word, ''al-mīzān'' (اَلْمِيْزَانُ = weighing scale, balance) in the verse: Certainly We sent Our apostles with clear arguments, and sent down with them the Book and the balance that men may conduct themselves with equity (57:25). This verse has the same import as the verse: Mankind was but one people; so Allāh sent the prophets as bearers of good news and as warners, and He sent down with them the Book with truth, so that it might judge between the people in that in which they had differed (2:213). The balance, like the distinction, is the religion that decides between the people with equity, and contains the true knowledge and explains the duties of the servants towards their Lord.

Others have interpreted the word 'distinction' in various ways: It has been said that the word means the Qur'ān; the proof that separates right from wrong; the convincing argument of the Prophet against those who talked with him about 'Īsā; the (Divine) help; or the wisdom. But what we have said gives the basic meaning and implication of the word.

QUR'ĀN: Surely those who disbelieves . . . the Lord of retribution: ''al-Intiqām'' (اَلْاِنْتِقَامُ = retribution) is said to mean punishing the wrong-doer for his wrong. It is not done necessarily to satisfy the feeling of the wronged party. Of course, this happens in man's retribution; when one does a wrong to us, it causes a damage or shortcoming on our side, and we make that up by severe retribution that assuages our heart feelings. But Allāh is too great to get any profit or loss from any action of His servants. Yet, He has given us a promise — and His promise is true — that He shall surely judge between His servants with truth, and will give them their dues — if good, then good, and if evil, then evil. He has said: And Allāh judges with the truth (40:20); . . . that He may reward those who do evil according to what they do, and (that) He may reward those who do good with goodness (53:31). He is Mighty in the most comprehensive meaning of the might, nobody and nothing can do any harm to Him. (It has been said that the basic meaning of the ''might'' is invincibility.)

The verse says that surely those who disbelieve in the signs of Allāh — they shall have a severe chastisement. The chastisement is not restricted to the Day of Resurrection or to the next world. The verse, therefore, may refer to chastisement in both worlds — this life as well as the life hereafter. This is a Qur'ānic dictum to which the scholars have paid little attention. This neglect betrays a basic misunderstanding of ours: We never think that a thing is a chastisement unless it inflicts pain upon our body or causes decrease or deterioration in our material belongings. Loss of property, death of kith and kin and weakness or sickness of body are the examples of chastisement in our eyes. But the Qur'ān gives us a totally different concept of chastisement.

CHASTISEMENT AS EXPLAINED BY THE QUR'ĀN

In the eyes of the Qur'ān, a man who forgets his Lord lives a straitened life — even though in our eyes he may be living most luxuriously. Allāh says: And whoever turns away from My remembrance, his shall surely be a straitened life . . . (20:124); and it counts even the wealth and the children as chastisements, even though we count them as pleasant blessings: And let not their properties and their children excite your admiration; Allāh only wishes to chastise them with these in this world and (that) their souls may depart while they are unbelievers (9:85).

It was described, in short, under the verse 2:35 (And We said: ''O Adam! dwell you and your wife in the garden . . . '') that:

First: Man's joy and sorrow, pleasure and displeasure, attraction and repulsion, enjoyment and suffering, all depend on his views as to what constitutes his good fortune, and what his misfortune.

Second: Comfort and discomfort etc., vary according to the subjects to which they are related. The spirit has its own joy and sorrow; and the body its own comfort and discomfort. Likewise, animal's sense of ease or pain is not on the same level as that of man.

A man having material outlook does not acquire the Divine attributes, and his characteristics do not reflect the light of sublime virtues. Such a man counts the material felicity as the true felicity; in his eyes, spiritual bliss is not a bliss at all. He remains inordinately engrossed in wealth, children, prestige and worldly power and domination. It is reasonable to suppose that once he gets these things he would be happy and his bliss would be complete. But reality belies expectation. What he wanted was pure blessing free from every shade of distress. What he got was a pleasure surrounded by a thousand agonies. When he had not got what he longed for, he was distressed because of deprivation; when he got it he was grieved because it was very different from what he expected. Each acquirement brought with it a lot of stings; the causes he relied upon failed to bring about the desired effects. And as he had not established any connection with the 'real cause' beyond the apparent causes, he could not find solace in any misery, nor could he get peace of mind in any adversity. Thus, even after getting what he strived for, he remained in despair and desolation.

Such dissatisfaction of man with what he gets spurs him to even farther goals, in the hope of a really blessed future. And the story is repeated again and again. He remains worried before getting his objective; he becomes distressed after getting it.

The Qur'ān, on the other hand, teaches us that man is made of two things: a spirit that is eternal, and a body that is subject to changes and deterioration. He remains like this, until he returns to his Lord; then he gets eternity without any change or deterioration. Whatever constitutes the bliss of the spirit, (for example, knowledge) is his real bliss; and whatever is the bliss of the spirit and the body together, like property and children, is also his bliss and felicity — and what a good thing it is! — provided it does not divert his attention from Allāh and does not tie him down to materialistic ideas. In the same way, a thing which causes discomfort, or even destruction, to the body, but brings about spiritual blessings, is his blessing (like being killed in the way of Allāh, destruction of property in the cause of religion and so on). It is like tolerating, for a moment, the bitter taste of a medicine to secure permanent health.

On the contrary, what brings about a comfort to the body but harms the spirit, is the real suffering of man; it is his chastisement and evil reward. The Qur'ān calls the comfort of the body only as a brief enjoyment: Let it not deceive you that those who disbelieve go to and fro in the cities (fearlessly). A brief enjoyment! then their abode is hell, and evil is the resting place (3:196 — 197).

Also that which harms the body and spirit both, is called by the Qur'ān a chastisement. The unbelievers too call it a chastisement, but their reasoning is different from that of the Qur'ān. The Qur'ān calls it a chastisement because it harms the spirit; they call it a chastisement, because it harms the body. Look, for example, at various retributions sent down to previous nations. Allāh says: Have you not seen how your Lord dealt with 'Ād, the (people of) Iram, possessors of many-columned buildings, the like of which were not created in the cities; and (with) Thamūd, who hewed out the rocks in the valley; and (with) Pharaoh, the lord of the stakes, who transgressed in the cities; so they made great mischief therein? Therefore, your Lord let fall upon them the whip of chastisement. Most surely your Lord is on watch (89:6 — 14).

The pleasure and displeasure, for sentient things, depend on feeling and perception. We do not count a pleasant thing used by us, as a blessing, if we did not feel it. Likewise, a painful experience is not painful to us if we do not feel its affect.

It shows that what the Qur'ān teaches us about the happiness and unhappiness is quite different from material comfort and discomfort. Man, surrounded by material things, needs some especial training to perceive the real happiness as happiness, and the real unhappiness as unhappiness. It is for the purpose of this training, that the Qur'ān asks its people not to attach their hearts to other than Allāh; to realize that their Lord is the Real Owner Who owns everything; everything depends on Him; nothing should be obtained but for His sake.

A man having this outlook will always find in this world unlimited sources of happiness: either the bliss of spirit and body together, or that of the spirit only. Other things, he will count as misfortune and as sources of unhappiness.

But a man who is entangled in worldly pleasure and material comfort, thinks, at least in the beginning, that what he has acquired of the trinkets of this world is a blessing and good fortune for him, that it is the root of his happiness. But soon he realizes that he is wandering aimlessly in a desert full of dangerous beasts, poisonous snakes and tormenting scorpions. What he thought to be his good fortune turns into greatest misfortune. Allāh says: Therefore, leave them to go on with (false) discourses and sport until they come face to face with that day of theirs which they are promised (70:42); Certainly you were heedless of it; but now We have removed from you your veil, so your sight today is sharp (50:22); Therefore turn aside from him ' '. turns his back upon Our reminder and does not dec 're anything but this world's life. That is the (last) reach of the, knowledge . . . (53:29 — 30). Whatever pleasure they get is contaminated with a lot of worry and distress.

This leads us to believe that the perception and thinking found in the people of Allāh and the Qur'ān, are quite different from those of other people, although both groups are human beings. And between the two extremes there are countless ranks of those believers who have not yet perfected their divine character.

This, in short, is the chastisement, as explained by the Qur'ān. Of course, the Qur'ān uses the word torment or chastisement for bodily discomfort and pain also. But it counts it as the discomfort of body, unrelated to the real, that is, spiritual chastisement. Allāh quotes Ayyūb (a.s.) as saying: The Satan has affected me with toil and torment ('adhāb, عَذَاب) (38:41); also He says: And when We delivered you from Pharaoh's people who subjected you to severe punishment (sū'a 'l-'adhāb, سُوْءَ الْعَذَابِ), killing your sons and sparing your women, and in this there was a great trial from your Lord (7:141). Note how Allāh calls what they were subjected to as a trial and test from Allāh, but a torment in itself — not from Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: Allāh, surely nothing is hidden from Him in the earth or in the heaven: In the preceding verse, Allāh mentioned, as the reason of His punishing the disbelievers, the fact that He ''is Mighty, the Lord of retribution''. But there was a possibility of misunderstanding there — someone might think that the Mighty Lord of retribution might remain unaware of one's disbelief and thus one might escape His retribution. Hence, this verse that shows that He is such a Mighty One that nothing is hidden from Him.

Possibly, what is ''in the earth'' and ''in the heaven'' may refer to the actions done by the body's organs, and the ideas settled in the mind, respectively, as we had hinted in commentary of the verse: . . . and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it, Allāh will call you to account for it (2:284).

QUR'ĀN: He it is Who shapes you in the wombs as He likes: ''at-Taṣwīr'' (اَلتَّصْوِيْرُ) is to give ''aṣ-ṣūrah (اَلصُّوْرَةُ) form a thing. The ''form'' means two-dimensional pictures as well as three-dimensional objects — or, as they say in Arabic, that which does not have a shadow, and that which has; ''womb'' is uterus, the organ in female mammal in which child or young is conceived and nourished till birth.

This verse takes the discourse to a level higher than the preceding two. First it was said that Allāh would chastise those who disbelieve in His signs, because He is Mighty, Lord of retribution Who knows what is hidden and what is manifest; He is not overpowered in His affairs; He it is Who dominates everything. Now this verse says that the reality is even greater than that. The one who rejects Allāh's signs and disobeyes His commandments has no power of his own to do any work — even when He disbelieves in Divine signs and thinks that he is independent of Allāh in his actions, he does so by the power given to him by none other than Allāh. It is not that he overpowers the decree of Allāh, nor that he disturbs the fine system which Allāh has established for His creatures; nor does his will overcome the will of Allāh. The fact is that Allāh Himself has given him the latitude to do as he wishes — whether he walks on the straight path of belief and obedience or wanders away in the wilderness of disbelief and disobedience. Allāh has given this freedom of choice to man so that the test may be meaningful; so that whosoever wishes so, may believe, and whosoever wishes so, may disbelieve. And they do not wish except that Allāh wishes, the Lord of the universe.

Everything — including the belief and disbelief — is from a Divine decree: Allāh has created everything and programmed it in such a way that it smoothly proceeds towards its intended goal and acquires its objective. And this Divine decree is all-encompassing and predominates all wills and power. And Allāh is Predominant in His affairs, Overpowering in His will, Guardian over His creatures. Man, in his ignorance, thinks that he does what he does, by his own will and choice, and that when he goes against the commandments of Allāh, he disturbs the system which Allāh has established. But the reality is otherwise. Man is irremovably imprisoned in the above-mentioned Divine system; and even this transgression and rebellion is governed by that very system — the system of free will and choice. To this hints the sentence, ‘‘He it is Who shapes you in the wombs as He likes’’. Your existence is so programmed from the ##earliest days of your foetal life that you irresistibly proceed on the road Allāh has opened for you — opened it by giving you freedom of will, not by compelling you to follow a certain path.

The verse only mentions the decree so far as man is concerned; it does not involve itself with other things; thus it keeps itself confined to the topic at hand. Also, it is an oblique hint against the Christians concerning their belief about Jesus Christ; even the Christians do no deny Christ's development inside the womb; and that he did not make himself.

Allāh changed the pronoun from singular (revealed to ''thee'') to plural (shape ''you'') in this verse to show that even the belief of the believers, just like the disbelief of the disbelievers, is not independent of that decree. By appreciating this truth, the believers will be happy with the mercy and bounties that Allāh has bestowed on them; and will not be depressed on hearing about the retribution that shall be meted out to disbelivers.

QUR'ĀN: there is no god but He, the Mighty, the Wise: The verse reverts to the initial topic, that is, monotheism. It, in a way, condenses the arguments for the sake of emphasis. The topics described in the preceding verses — guiding the creatures after creating them, revealing the book and establishing a criterion for discrimination between right and wrong, confirming the arrangement by punishing the disbelievers — all need a god to manage them; and as there is no god except Allāh, then it is He Who guides the people, reveals the Book and sends down the distinction, and chastises those who disbelieve in His signs; and whatever He does, He does it by His Might and His wisdom.

TRADITIONS

It is reported in Majma'u 'l-bayān, from al-Kalbī, Muḥammad ibn Isḥāq and ar-Rabī' ibn Anas that eighty odd verses from the beginning of the chapter were revealed about the delegation of Najrān. And they were sixty riders; they came to the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); and among them were fourteen persons from their nobles; and three among those fourteen had the final authority in their hands: (1) al-'Āqib, the leader of his people and their counsellor, they did nothing without his advice, and his name was 'Abdu '1-Masīḥ; (2) as-Sayyid, their patron and leader of their caravan, and his name was al-Ayham; and (3) Abū Ḥārithah ibn ‘Alqamah, their bishop, prelate, religious leader, and head of their schools; he had very high prestige in their eyes and had studied their books; the Byzantine emperors accorded him great respect, and had built for him many churches; all this was because of his learning and energetic efforts.

So they came to the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) in Medina, and entered his mosque when he had finished the afternoon prayer. They had put on fine Yemenite clothes: cloaks and mantles; (they were) handsome like the people of Balḥārith ibn Ka‘b. Some of the companions of the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); who had seen them, have said: ‘‘We never saw a delegation like them.’’ Then the time of their prayer came, and they started ringing their bell and stood up and prayed in the Mosque of the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). The companions said: ‘‘O Apostle of Allāh. This (is happening) in your mosque?’’ The Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘Do not disturb them’’. So they prayed facing towards the east. Then as-Sayyid and al-‘Āqib had a talk with the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). The Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) then invited them to become Muslim. They replied: ‘‘We had been Muslims (i.e., believers) before you.’’

He said: ‘‘You both tell wrong. What prevents you from accepting Islam is your claim that Allāh has a son, and your worship of the cross and your eating the pig.’’

They said: ‘‘If he (i.e., Jesus Christ) was not son of God, then who was his father?’’

Then they all started arguing about Jesus. Thereupon, the Prophet told them: ‘‘Do you not know that there is no son but that he resembles his father?’’

They said: ‘‘Yes.’’

He said: ‘‘Do you not know that our Lord is Ever-living, He shall not die? And that ‘Īsā will die?’’

They said: ‘‘Yes.’’

He said: ‘‘Do you not know that our Lord is the Guardian of everything; He protects it and gives it sustenance?’’

They said: ‘‘Yes.’’

He said: ‘‘Does ‘Īsā possess any such power?’’

They said: ‘‘No.’’

He said: ‘‘Do you not know that nothing is hidden from Him in the earth or in the heaven?’’
They said: ‘‘Yes.’’
He said: ‘‘Then does ‘Īsā know anything of it except that which he was taught?’’
They said: ‘‘No.’’
He said: ‘‘So our Lord shaped ‘Īsā in the womb as He liked; and our Lord neither eats, drinks nor does He discharge excrement?’’
They said: ‘‘Yes.’’
He said: ‘‘Do you not know about ‘Īsā that his mother kept him (in womb) as a woman does, and gave birth to him as a woman does; then he was fed as a child is fed; then he used to eat, drink and discharge excremenent?’’
They said: ‘‘Yes.’’
He said: ‘‘Then how can it be as you think?’’

Thereupon, they remained silent. Then Allāh revealed about them eighty odd verses from the beginning of the Chapter of ‘‘The Family of ‘Imrān’’.

The author says: The same thing has been narrated by as-Suyūṭī in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from Abū Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr and Ibnu ’l-Mundhir from Muḥammad ibn Ja‘far ibn az-Zubayr; and also from Ibn Isḥāq from Muḥammad ibn Sahl ibn Abī Amāmah.

The story shall be quoted later; as regards their claim that (only) the first eighty odd verses were revealed in this connection, it appears that it was their personal opinion; otherwise, as earlier explained, the context and style obviously show that the whole chapter was revealed all together.

It is narrated from the Prophet: The unfortunate is he who became unfortunate in the womb of his mother; and the fortunate is he who became fortunate in the womb of his mother.

It is narrated in al-Kāfī from al-Bāqir (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘When Allāh wants to create a semen — and it is among that from which covenant was taken from the loin of Adam — (or as He may decide later); and (wants) to put it in the womb, He excites the man for sexual intercourse, and reveals to the womb, ‘Open thy door so that My creature and My firm decree may enter into thee.’ So it opens its door. The sperm reaches the womb, and moves therein for forty days: then it becomes a clot for forty days; then becomes a lump of flesh for forty days, then flow in it interlaced veins. Then Allāh sends two creator angels who make in the wombs what Allāh wishes; they enter into the belly of the woman, from the woman’s mouth; so they reach the womb, and in it is the ancient spirit, that was transferred into loins of men and wombs of women. Then they blow in it the spirit of life and eternity, and they create openings for his hearing and sight, and (make) his limbs and all that is in the stomach, by permission of Allāh. Then Allāh reveals to the two angels: ‘Write on him My decree and My destiny and firm order; and write down that I may change that which you write.’ They say: ‘O Lord! what are we to write?’ Thereupon Allāh reveals to them to raise their heads towards the head of the mother. They raise their heads, and lo! there is a tablet striking the mother’s forehead. They look into it and find in it his features, his embellishment, his death time, his covenant — whether he shall be a fortunate or an unfortunate one, and all his affairs. Thereupon, one of them dictates to the other; thus they write down all that is in the tablet, and make it conditional on the final decision (of Allāh). Then they seal the writing and put it between his eyes. Then they make him stand upright in the womb of his mother.’’ (The Imām) said: ‘‘Sometimes he disobeys and turns upside down, and it does not happen except in case of an arrogant and rebellious one. And when time comes for the foetus to come out, developed or undeveloped, Allāh reveals to the womb: ‘Open thy door so that My creature may go out to My earth, and My order may be enforced about him, because now time has come for him to go out.’ ’’ (The Imām) said: ‘‘Then the womb opens the door of the child; so he turns upside down, his feet go over his head, his head reaches the lower part of the (mother’s) stomach. (It is done) so that delivery may be easier for the woman and the child. Then Allāh sends to him an angel, named ‘the Admonisher’, who sternly tells him to go out; the child becomes frightened; when it delays some more, the angel tells him once again to get out; the child becomes (even more) frightened and falls on the earth crying, terrified because of that rebuke.’’

The author says: The words of the Imām, ‘‘When Allāh wants to create a semen'', mean, when Allāh wants to create a well-made perfect human being from a semen. The parenthetic sentence, ''it is among that from which covenant was taken'' alludes to the fact that man before coming into this world existed in a world, called in the traditions as ''the world of motes'' and ''the world of covenant''; and this life follows the pattern of that one. Whatever soul made covenant in that world must surely be born in this world well-made and perfect. The other parenthetic sentence, ''or as He may decide later'', refers to that foetus that is not from among those who had covenanted in that world; such foetus does not develop to its perfection and is miscarried. The phrase, ''and to put it in the womb'' is in conjunction with the preceding words, ''when Allāh wants to create''. ''They enter into the belly of the woman, from the woman's mouth'': There is a possibility that the phrase, ''from the woman's mouth'', is an explanatory note added by the narrator of the tradition; this possibility is supported by the fact that the word ''woman's'' has been repeated instead of saying ''from her mouth''. But if it is the word of the Imām then it shows that their entrance is not as a body enters into another body. The way into womb is from vagina; the only other way may be through blood-vessels including that through which menstrual blood reaches uterus. Surely, this passage is not easier than the vagina. And it proves that their entering through mouth has some reason other than the ease of passage. ''And in it is the ancient spirit that was transferred into loins of men and wombs of women'': Probably it is the spirit of vegetation that is the source of nourishment and growth. ''Then they blow in it the spirit of life and eternity'': Apparently, the pronoun, ''it'', refers to the ancient spirit; accordingly, the spirit of life and eternity is blown into the spirit of vegetation. If the pronoun stands for the ''lump of flesh'', then it would mean that the spirit of life and eternity is blown into the lump of flesh that has already got vegetative life. In any case, it shows that flowing of human spirit into foetus is a forward step of vegetative life; and that at that stage it gets a new vigour and vitality.

The above explanation also throws light on transference of the ancient spirit into loins of men and wombs of women. The spirit exists with the body, that is, the semen and the menstrual blood that feeds the foetus; and these two things are parts of the bodies of the parents. Thus, the foetus has its share from the lives of its parents, and they in their turn are parts of the lives of their parents, and so on. Whatever happens to a man is somewhat a reflection of the lives of his father and mother. In a miniature form he represents all his ancestors — he is in a way the ‘‘contents’’ of the book that existed before him [1].

This also may explain the sentence, ‘‘Allāh reveals to (the angels) to raise their heads towards the head of the mother’’. So far as the decrees concerning the child are concerned, their link with his father was disconnected when the semen separated from him; now his only relation is with the mother. It is referred to in these words: ‘‘and lo! there is a tablet striking the mother’s forehead.’’ The forehead is centre of perceptive powers and a main feature of one’s appearance. The angels on studying it find in it the child’s features, appearance and life as well as his covenant, whether he will be a fortune or an unfortunate person; in short, they see in it all his affairs; one of the angels dictates it all to the other — their mutual relationship is like that of an active agent and a passive one. They write all that is in the tablet. ‘‘And make it conditional on the final decision of Allāh’’: The feature does not contain all the causes and factors affecting a man’s life. External events and circumstances also play important part in it. Hence the need of this conditional phrase [2].

This tradition attributes to Allāh all the details of conception and birth of a child: Allāh excites the man; reveals to the womb, sends two angels to shape the child, and another angel to get him out of the womb, and so on. The tradition does not deny the existence of natural causes for these events. According to Islam, there are two sets of perfect causes for every happening — one metaphysical and the other physical. They are not against one another; nor do they together constitute a joint perfect cause. Both are perfect causes — each on its own level.

Allāh sends the prophets and Imāms, to guide the people to their spiritual bliss and happiness; and to lead them to their spiritual perfection, The path laid down for it is spiritual. It is those divine leaders' duty to talk to their people in a way that they may proceed and progress on this path. For this purpose, it is essential that the people be reminded of their Lord at every step. That is why the religious guides attribute man's all affairs to Allāh, mention the agency of angels and explain that good fortune and felicity depend on their help; and that misfortunate and trouble are caused by the Satans and their deception; then they remind that ultimately everything is attributed to Allāh, so far as it is proper for His sanctity and sublimity. Thus, the people come to understand guidance and misguidance, profit and harm and, in short, every affair of the life hereafter.

[1] Probably, this phenomenon may be illustrated by DNA, the hereditary material of life, found in chromosomes, in viruses, and in bacteria. This microscopic compound is the instrument through which hereditary characteristics are transmitted to the next generation .(tr.)

[2] Probably, the author wants to say that the angels write down his affairs as much as his hereditary characteristics reveal; but leave out the changes that may be affected in it by factors of environment.(tr.)

But those leaders did not deny the natural causes, nor did they put it in second place. Physical and natural causes are one of the two pillars of human life; they are the foundations upon which is based the life of this world. It is essential for man to know all about these causes too as it is for him to know all about metaphysical and spiritual causes. Only then he will know his own ''self''; and that will lead him to know his Lord.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: He it is Who has sent down to thee the Book: In this verse, the verbal form ''al-inzāl'' (اَلْاِنْزَالُ = to send down all together) has been used, instead of at-tanzīl (اَلتَّنْزِيْلُ = to send down gradually) that was used in the verse 3. It is because this verse looks at the whole Book in its entirety, and describes some especial characteristics of the complete Book. It discloses that the Book on the whole contains some decisive verses and some ambiguous ones, import of which may be known by returning them to the decisive ones. As the Book is here looked at as one entity, the use of the verbal form al-inzāl was more appropriate.

QUR'ĀN: of it there are some verses decisive, they are the basis of the Book, and others are ambiguous: ''al-Muḥkamāt'' (اَلْمُحْكَمَاتُ = translated here as decisive) is derived from the root word ḥ — k— m (حكم); this root implies that a thing is so protected that nothing can pervert or break it or interfere with it. Some infinitive verbs made from it are al-iḥkām (اَلْاِحْكَامُ = to make precise, to confirm, to strengthen), at-taḥkīm (اَلتَّحْكِيْمُ = to arbitrate) and al-ḥukm (اَلْحُكْمُ = to judge); some other words are al-ḥikmah (اَلْحِكْمَةُ = perfect knowledge, wisdom) and al-ḥakamah (اَلْحَكَمَةُ = bit of a horse's bridle). All these meanings have the elements of protection and preciseness in them. Some people say that the root-word gives the meaning of protection and reformation.

al-Iḥkām of the verses means making them so precise that no ambiguity remains therein, contrary to ''al-mutashābihāt'' (اَلْمُتَشَابِهَاتُ = ambiguous) ones.

Before going further, it should be mentioned here that in various places, Allāh has described all the verses as being al-muḥkamāt; and again the whole Book has been called al-mutashābih (اَلْمُتَشَابِهُ). But the words have been used in those verses for meanings other than ''decisive'' and ''ambiguous'' respectively. Allāh says: (This is) a Book, whose verses were confirmed; uḥkimat (اُحْكِمَتْ),then they were divided, from one Wise Allaware (11:1). This verse uses the verbal form of al-iḥkām (to confirm, to make precise); but it goes on to mention ''division''; this association shows that the verb al-iḥkām (to confirm) refers to that state when the Book, before its revelation, was an indivisible one; it points to that ‘‘confirmation’’ and stability which was found in it before it was subjected to particularization for the purpose of revelation. This confirmation is an attribute of the whole Book; and obviously it is something different from al-iḥkām (decisiveness), mentioned in the verse under discussion, which is an attribute of only a part of the Book — those verses that are unambiguous in their meaning.

In other words, when Allāh divided the verses of the Book in two categories, the decisive (i.e., unambiguous) and ambiguous, it was self-evident that the preciseness and decisiveness mentioned in this verse was not the same preciseness and confirmation which was attributed to the whole Book in verse 11:1.

Likewise, Allāh says: Allāh has revealed the best discourse, a Book mutashābihan (مُتَشَابِهاً), conforming (in its various parts) oft-repeated . . . (39:23). Here the whole Book has been called mutashābihan (conforming); so we know that in this verse it means something other than mutashābihāt (ambiguous), mentioned in the verse under discussion, in which only apart of the Book is given this name.

The decisive, unambiguous verses have been called ‘‘ummu’l-kitāb’’ (اُمُّ الْكِتَابِ =translated here as the ‘‘basis of the Book’’). ‘‘al-Umm’’ (اَلْاُمُّ) literally means a thing to which another thing returns; in which it takes refuge. That is why the mother is called al-umm. The decisive and unambiguous verses have been given this title because the ambiguous verses return to them. One part of the Book (i.e., the ambiguous verses) returns to the other part, (i.e., to the unambiguous ones). The possessive case ‘‘the basis of the Book’’ does not imply that this basis is something different from the Book, as is the case, for example, in ‘‘the mother of the children’’ — the mother is different from the children. Rather it denotes a portion or part, as in the phrase, ‘‘women of the nation’’ women are a part of the nation; in the same way the basis of the Book is a part or portion of the Book. The Book contains some verses that are the basis of the other verses. ‘‘Basis’’ is singular; it shows that there is no difference in the unambiguous decisive verses; all are united and well-connected.

The verse contrasts the decisive verses with the ambiguous ones — which it calls mutashābihāt. ‘‘at-Tashābuh’’ (اَلتَّشَابُهُ) means similarity of different things in some of their characteristics and conditions. As mentioned above, Allāh has praised the Qur'ān with this word in the verse: Allāh has revealed to thee the best discourse, a Book conforming (in its various parts), oft-repeated, whereat do shudder the skins of those who fear their Lord . . . (39:23). Obviously, it refers to the fact that there is a consistency in the style of the Qur'ān; eloquent composition and elegant modality, coupled with unveiling of realities and guidance to unalloyed truth (as the words used in this verse show) are the common and ever-present features of the Book.

But at-tashābuh mentioned in the verse under discussion means something different. The verse contrasts such verses with the decisive ones that are the basis of the Book, and then goes on to say that those in whose heart there is perversity follow such verses seeking to mislead people and to give them their own interpretation. This context makes it clear that the adjective mutashābihāt, refers here to ambiguous verse whose connotation cannot be decided by the hearer just by hearing; his mind remains undecided between one meaning and the other; this continues until he refers to the decisive verses and only then is able to fix the true connotation and semantic value of the ambiguous one. At this stage, the ambiguous verse too becomes decisive and unambiguous but with the aid of decisive verse; while the decisive verse is decisive by itself.

For example, when man first hears the verse, The Beneficent God (istawā, اِسْتَوَي =) firmly sat upon the Throne (20:5), he is unable to decide whether these words have been used in their literal sense. Then he refers to other verses like: nothing is like a likeness of Him (42:11); then only he understands that ''firmly sitting on the Throne'' means mastery over the kingdom and dominance over the creatures; that it does not mean sitting in a place or on a thing, because it is an attribute of body and Allāh is not a body, because nothing is like Him. Thus, by returning that ambiguous verse to a decisive one, he will translate it as, ''The Beneficent God is firm in power''.

Another example: When the verse: Looking to their Lord (75:23), is returned to the verse: Visions comprehend Him not, and He comprehends (all) visions (6:103), it becomes clear that ''looking at'' in the former does not mean ''seeing'' with the eyes.

In the same way, when an abrogated verse is returned to the abrogating one, it is known that the order given in the former was for a limited time until the latter was revealed. And so on.

This is the meaning of ‘‘decisive’’ and ‘‘ambiguous’’, as an average man may easily understand, looking at the whole verse together. At least this verse is surely ‘‘decisive’’, even if all others be not.

Just think of the troubles that would crop up if this verse is said to be ambiguous: First, the whole Qur’ān would be ambiguous, as no other verse has clearer meaning; second, the categories (decisive and ambiguous) mentioned in it would be meaningless; third, the remedy shown in the words, ‘‘they are the basis of the Book’’, would be useless; fourth, the words of Allāh: A Book of which the verses are made plain, an Arabic Qur’ān for a people who know, a herald of good news and a warner . . . (41:3 — 4), would not be true; fifth, the argument contained in the verse: Do they not then meditate on the Qur’ān? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82), would not signify anything. Add to it all those verses that say that the Qur’ān is a light, a guidance, a clarification, an explanation and an open reminder, etc., that shall be deprived of meaning if this verse under discussion is said to be ambiguous.

No one can find a single verse in the Qur’ān whose words or phrases are bereft of meaning. Every verse points to its true meaning — either it is the only meaning understood by an Arabicspeaking person, or is one of several meanings which may be inferred from it. When a verse is ambiguous and can be interpreted in more than one way, the true meaning is surely one of those interpretations. The true meaning cannot go against the accepted principles of the Qur’ān, like the existence of the Creator, His Oneness, coming of the prophets, promulgation of the law, the Day of Judgment etc. It conforms with those principles, and is based on them; and those principles decide which of the possible meanings is the true one. Thus, some parts of the Qur’ān explain the others; some verses are the basis to which the others are returned.

When such a reader shall read this verse, ‘‘of it there are some verses decisive, they are the basis of the Book, and others are ambiguous’’, he will certainly know that the decisive are those verses that contain the accepted principles of religion, and ambiguous those whose meaning can be decided through these principles.

Question: In every subject there are some principles and some adjuncts; the latter are invariably always referred to the former. It is true in other writings as much as about the Qur'ān. But it does not create ambiguity in other books. So why in the Qur'ān?

Reply: The Qur'ān contains two sets of realities, and there is possibility of ambiguity in each:-

First: There are high spiritual and metaphysical realities that are beyond the scope of perception or matter. A man of average understanding, on hearing such verse, is perplexed whether the words have been used in their literal (that is often physical) meaning, or denote something higher. For example, when he hears the words: Most surely your Lord is on watch (89:14); And your Lord comes . . . (89:22), his mind races at first to the literal senses of these words, which if accepted, would show that Allāh is a body! The uncertainty is removed when he refers these verses to the Qur'ānic principles which show that Allāh is not a body, and that matter and actions and reactions connected with matter cannot be attributed to Him.

This type of ambiguity occurs in all metaphysical and spiritual talks and writings; it is not peculiar to the Qur'ān. Other scriptures — the unaltered parts — when talking of high spiritual things face the same difficulty. Even philosophy suffers from this handicap. To this fact, the Qur'ān refers in the following verse:

> He sends down water from the heavens, then the valleys flow according to their measure, and the torrent bears along the swelling foam; and from what they melt in the fire for the sake of (making) ornaments or apparatus arises a scum like it; thus does Allāh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it remains in the earth; thus does Allāh set forth parables (13:17).
> Surely We have made it an Arabic Qur'ān, so that you may understand. And surely it is in the Original of the Book with Us, truly elevated, full of wisdom (43:3 — 4).

Second: There are social legislations and other rules. Some rules, when the reasons for which they were legislated were no longer valid, were abrogated. Moreover, the verses were revealed piecemeal. These two factors create ambiguity in such verses; and it is necessary to return the abrogated verses to the abrogating ones; and then the ambiguousness goes away.

QUR'ĀN: then as for those in whose hearts there is perversity, they follow the part of it which is ambiguous, seeking to mislead, and seeking to give it (their own) interpretation: ''az-Zaygh'' (اَلزَّيْغُ) is deviation; it is accompanied by anxiety and disquite. The verse goes on to contrast such people with those who are firmly rooted in knowledge, who say: ''We believe in it, it is all from our Lord.'' It divides the people, so far as their behaviour regarding the Qur'ān is concerned, in two categories: There are they in whose hearts is deviation, who are worried and pertubed — they follow the ambiguous verses to mislead the people and to interpret the verses according to their own liking. And there are those who are firmly rooted in knowledge, with stable mind — they follow the decisive verses, and believes in the ambiguous ones but do not act upon them, and pray to Allāh not to make their hearts deviate after guidance has come to them.

It shows that ''following ambiguous verses'' means to act upon them. They are condemned because they follow the ambiguous verses without returning (i.e., referring) them to the decisive ones. Had they referred them to decisive verses before acting upon them, it would, in effect, have been acting upon the decisive verses; and they would have been free from reproach.

''al-Fitnah'' (اَلْفِتْنَةُ = literally, mischief) means here to mislead the people. Making mischief and misleading are near in meaning. Allāh says that they follow ambiguous verses so that they may mislead the people. Not only this — they want something even more grievous: They seek to acquire the knowledge of the interpretation of the Qur'ān; their aim is to find everything from ambiguous verses, so that they would be independent of the decisive ones, and thus the foundation of the religion of Allāh would be destroyed completely.

''al-Ta'wīl'' (اَلتَّأْوِيْلُ) is derived from al-awl (اَلْأَوْلُ = to return).

at-Ta'wīl of an ambiguous verse is its ''returning base'' to which it is returned. at-Ta'wīl of the Qur'ān is the source from which it gets its realities. For want of a better word, it is mostly translated as interpretation, final interpretation, or the end; although these words do not convey its true connotation. We shall try to lead the reader step by step to its real significance.

Allāh has used the word at-ta'wīl in various places in the Qur'ān:

1. And certainly We have brought them a Book which We have made clear with knowledge, a guidance and a mercy for a people who believe. Do they wait for aught but its final interpretation? On the day when its final interpretation comes about, those who neglected it before will says: ''Indeed the apostles of our Lord had brought the truth . . .'' (7:52 — 53).

That is, what the apostles told their people was all truth: that Allāh is their True Lord; that what they call upon besides Allāh has no reality at all; that the prophethood is truth and the religion is truth; that Allāh will surely raise those who are in graves; in short, all the information about the unseen, truth of which will be manifest on the Day of Resurrection.

Keeping in view this manifestation, it has been said that at-ta'wīl of a verse is the fact with which that verse conforms, and that it would be manifested later on; like the happenings on the Day of Judgment that would be in conformity with the informations given by the prophets and the Books.

But this explanation is not comprehensive. It covers only those verses that describe the Divine attributes and actions, and explain the events of the Day of Judgment. But many more verses have no ''facts'' that would manifest themselves later on: the verses containing law and rules — they give orders, not information, and thus have no facts to conform with; the ones describing what is a clear rational proposition, for example, many ethical teachings — their ta'wīl (in the proposed events) is within themselves, it is not to appear later; those narrating the stories of the prophets and past nations — their ta'wīl has already appeared, it is not to appear on the Day of Judgment. And the verse under discussion is talking about at-ta'wīl of the whole Book: ''Ta'wīlahu'' (تَأْوِيْلُهُ =)its, i.e., Book's, final interpretation. Clearly the suggested meaning of at-ta'wīl cannot be applied here, because, as described above, it is true for only a portion of the Book, not for the whole.

2. And this Qur'ān is not such as could be forged by those besides Allāh, but it is a verification of that which is before it and a clear explanation of the Book, there is no doubt in it, from the Lord of the worlds. Or do they say: ''He has forged it?'' Say: ''Then bring a chapter like this and call whom you can besides Allāh, if you are truthful.'' Nay, they have rejected that of which they have no comprehensive knowledge, and its final interpretation has not yet come to them; even thus did those before them reject (the truth); see then what was the end of the unjust (10:37—39).

Here again at-ta'wīl has been attributed to the whole Book.

Someone has improved upon the definition of at-ta'wīl suggested in (1); he has said: at-ta'wīl is the real fact upon which the talk depends. If the talk contains an information, then the event or fact mentioned is its ''interpretation'' — it does not matter whether the events have already passed, like those of the prophets and past nations, or will be manifested in future, as concerning the verses describing the attributes, names and promises of Allāh and all that is to happen on the Day of Judgment; and if it promulgates a law, then the benefit emanating from it is its ''interpretation''. Look, for example, at the words of Allāh: And give full measure when you measure out, and weigh with a true balance; this is good and the fairest ''in the end'' (17:35). The original word, translated here as ''in the end'', is ''ta'wīla'' (تَأْوِيْلاً). It shows that the ''final interpretation'' of giving full measure and weighing with true balance is the benefit accruing to the society from honest dealing.

But this explanation too is defective, as will be seen from the following clarifications.

First: The verse of measure and weight is clear on one point: the ''final interpretation'', that is, the social benefit, depends on people's doing what they have been told to do, that is, on their actually giving full measure and correct weight; those benefits would not occur merely by promulgating this rule. In other words, the final interpretation is a real fact (benefit to the society) that emanates from a real fact (measuring and weighing correctly).

Obviously, the ‘‘final interpretation’’ is a real fact; and the thing that ‘‘returns’’ to it, or, let us say, through which that final interpretation emanates is also a real fact — it is not only an information or order. When Allāh says that the verses of the Book have ‘‘final interpretation’’, it means that those verses narrate some real facts (as, for example, in the stories) or are concerned with actually-existing practical matters (as, for example, in the verses promulgating laws), which, in their turn, have a final interpretation. This capability of having a final interpretation is not an attribute of the speech; it is the property of the subject matter of the speech.

Second: As explained earlier, at-ta'wīl literally means to return, or the returning base. But it is not every return or returning base, but a special type of it. A dependent returns to his principal, but the principal is not his ‘‘final interpretation’’; all numbers return to ‘‘one’’, but ‘‘one’’ is not their final interpretation.

To understand it more clearly let us look at the Qur'ānic story of Mūsā and Khiḍr (a.s.). Khiḍr (a.s.) used the word at-ta'wīl twice when he told Mūsā: . . . now I will inform you of the interpretation of that with which you could not have patience (18:78); This is the interpretation of that with which you could not have patience (18:82).

What he explained to Mūsā was the true significance of his three actions which Mūsā had misjudged because of his unawareness of their real purposes.

The three events were as follows:

1. . . . until when they embarked in the boat he made a hole in it . . . (18:71).
2. . . . until when they met a boy, he slew him (ibid. 74).
3. . . . until when they came to the people of a town, they asked them for food, but they refused to receive them as guests. Then they found in it a wall which was on the point of falling, so he set it upright (ibid. 77).

And this is how Mūsā (a.s.) misconstrued these events:

1. (Mūsā) said: ‘‘Have you made a hole in it to drown its inmates? Certainly you have done a grievous thing’’ (ibid. 71).
2. (Mūsā) said: ‘‘Have you slain an innocent person otherwise than for manslaughter? Certainly you have done a horrible thing (ibid. 74).

3. (Mūsā) said: ''If you had pleased, you might certainly have taken a recompense for it'' (ibid. 77).

And the following are the ''final interpretations'' of them, as explained by Khiḍr (a.s.):

1. ''As for the boat, it belonged to (some) poor men who worked on the river and I wished that I should damage it, and there was behind them a king who seized every boat by force'' (18:79).

2. ''And as for the boy, his parents were believers and we feared lest he should oppress them by disobedience (to them) and disbelief (in God). So we desired that their Lord might give them in his place one better than him in purity and nearer to having compassion'' (ibid. 80 — 81).

3. ''And as for the wall, it belonged to two orphan boys in the city,.and there was beneath it a treasure belonging to them, and their father was a righteous man; so your Lord desired that they should attain their maturity and take out their treasure, a mercy from your Lord . . . (ibid. 82).

Then he answered all the objection of Mūsā (a.s.) in a short sentence: ''And I did not do it of my own accord'' (ibid.).

It is now obvious that the ''return'' mentioned in these verses is just as a punishment given to a child ''returns'' to his character-building — he is punished for the ''purpose'' of his reform. It is this type of ''return'' that is meant by at-ta'wīl in the above-mentioned verses. It does not mean that conformity which a true information has with its fact — as the sentence, Zayd came, has with the coming of Zayd.

For further clarification let us look at uses of this word in Chapter 12 (Joseph):

1. When Joseph said to his father: ''O my father! surely I saw eleven stars and the sun and the moon — I saw them prostrating before me'' (12:4); And he raised his parents upon the throne and they (all) fell down in prostration before him, and he said: ''O my father! this is the interpretation of my vision of old; my Lord has indeed made it to be true . . .'' (ibid. 100).

In this instance, the dream he saw of the sun, the moon and eleven stars prostrating before him ‘‘returned’’ to the prostration of his parents and eleven brothers. But this ‘‘returning’’ was just as an allegory returns to the thing for which it is used.

The same is the case with the following verses:

2. And the king said: ‘‘Surely I see eleven fat kine which seven lean ones devoured; and seven green ears and (seven) others dry; O Chiefs! explain to me my dream, if you can interpret the dream’’. They said: ‘‘Confused dreams, and we do not know the interpretation of (such) dreams.’’ And of the two (prisoners) he who had found deliverance and remembered after a long time said: ‘‘I will inform you of its interpretation, so let me go.’’ Joseph! O truthful one! explain to us seven fat kine which seven lean ones devoured, and seven green ears and (seven) others dry, that I may go back to the people so that they may know.’’ He said: ‘‘You shall sow for seven years continuously, then what you reap leave it in its ear except a little of which you eat. Then there shall come after that seven years of hardship which shall eat away all that you have beforehand and laid up in store for them, except a little of what you shall have preserved" (12:43 — 48).

3. And two youths entered the prison with him. One of them said: ‘‘I saw myself pressing wine.’’ And the other said: ‘‘I saw myself carrying bread on my head, of which birds ate. Inform us of its interpretation; surely we see you to be of the doers of good’’ (ibid.36); ‘‘O my two mates of the prison! as for one of you, he shall give his lord to drink wine; and as for the other, he shall be crucified, so that the birds shall eat from his head; the matter is decreed concerning which you enquired’’ (ibid. 41).

4. ‘‘. . . and teach you the interpretation of saying . . . ’’ (ibid. 6).

5. . . . and that We might teach him the interpretation of sayings . . . (ibid. 21).

6. ‘‘. . . and taught me of the interpretation of sayings . . . ’’ (ibid. 101).

The word at-ta’wīl in all these verses is used for the events to which the dreams referred. The dreamers saw the events not as they actually happened but in their allegorical forms; and Joseph ‘‘retuned’’ those allegories to the real events which they represented.

The dreams were the forms, and their interpretations were the substances behind those forms. In other words at-ta'wīl (interpretation) is the reality that is allegorically represented by the words or expressions; those words or expressions must be ''returned'' to the realities which they represent, if one wants to know their true significance.

The verse quoted above in the story of Mūsā and Khiḍr (peace be on them) also were of the same nature, as are the words of Allāh mentioned earlier: And give full measure when you measure out, and weigh with a true balance; this is good and the fairest ''in the end'' (17:35).

Pondering over the verses about the Day of Judgment, one realizes that this word has been used in the same meaning in the earlier-mentioned verses: Nay, they have rejected that of which they have no comprehensive knowledge, and its final interpretation has not yet come to them (10:39); Do they wait for aught but its final interpretations? On the day when its final interpretation comes about . . . (7:53). Look at verses such as: Certainly you were heedless of it, but now We have removed from you your veil, so your sight today is sharp (50:22). It shows that the vision with which man will see the informations brought by the prophets and the Book turning into reality will be of a different kind — that perception will not be like this physical perception, which we are used to in this world. Even the manifestation of the Day of Judgment as well as the governing principle of that day shall be something beyond the worldly perception of ours. (It will be further explained somewhere else.) Therefore, when it is said that the informations given in the Book and tradition shall ''return'' to their true meanings on the Day of Judgment it is not the same thing as fulfilment of a forecast in future.

From the above discourse, it becomes clear that:

First: The sentence, ''This verse has an at-ta'wīl to which it returns'', conveys a meaning different from the sentence, ''this verse is ambiguous and it returns to a decisive verse ''.

Second: at-Ta'wīl is not a peculiarity of the ambiguous verses; it is an attribute of the whole Qur'ān; decisive verses have their at-ta'wīl, as do the ambiguous ones.

Third: at-Ta'wīl is not the meaning of a word; it is some real fact found outside the imagination. When we say that this verse has an at-ta'wīl, we mean that the verse describes a real fact (past or future) or a real happening, which in its turn points to another reality — and that is its at-ta'wīl, or final interpretation.

Note: In later days, this word was taken to mean ''the interpretation that is against the apparent meaning of the word''. But it is not interpretation; it is misinterpretation, an abuse of language. This wrong connotation was unknown at the time when the Qur'ān was revealed, and there is no evidence to suggest that this late meaning is intended in this verse.

QUR'ĀN: but none knows its interpretation except Allāh: Apparently, the pronoun, ''its'' refers to ''the part of it which is ambiguous''; also, the pronoun, ''it'' in the immediately preceding phrase, ''to give it (their own) interpretation'', refers to the same. But it does not necessarily mean that only the ambiguous verses have their ''final interpretations''.

Another possibility: This ''its'' may refer to ''the Book'', as does the pronoun, ''it'', of the phrase, ''they follow the part of it''.

The restriction, ''none . . . except'', apparently means that the knowledge of its interpretation is restricted to Allāh. The word, ''and'', in the next words, ''and those firmly rooted in knowledge'' is to begin a new sentence; and this new sentence describes the state of the second category which is in clear contrast with the first one, ''those in whose hearts there is perversity''. People, in their acceptance of the Book, are of two categories; those who follow the ambiguous part of the Qur'ān, and those who, when coming to such a verse, say, ''We believe in it, it is all from our Lord''. And what is the basis of this difference? It is the perversity of the hearts, on one side, and firmly rooted knowledge, on the other.

The word, ''and'', in ''and those firmly rooted in knowledge . . .'' is not a conjunctive, that is, it does not say that ''those firmly rooted in knowledge'' know, as Allāh does, the interpretation of the ambiguous verses. Had it been so, the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) would certainly have been one of them; rather he would be the first and foremost of them — it is unthinkable that the Qur'ān was revealed to him and he did not know what it meant! And, as mentioned in volume 4 (Eng. transl. p.320), whenever the Qur'ān mentions a group or describes the virtue of a people and the Apostle is among them, it invariably always mentions his name separately and first of all, and then the whole group is mentioned together. This protocol maintains the dignity and prestige of the Apostle. Look for example at the following verses:

The Apostle believes in what has been revealed to him from his Lord, and (so do) the believers (2:285).

Then Allāh sent down His tranquillity upon His Apostle and upon the believes (9:26).

But the Apostle and those who believe with him . . . (9:88).

. . . and this Prophet and those who believe . . . (3:68).

. . . on the day on which Allāh will not abase the Prophet and those who believe with him (66:8).

Therefore, if Allāh had intended to say that ''those firmly rooted in knowledge'' knew the final interpretation of the ambiguous verses — and the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) is certainly one of them — He would have mentioned his name separately and said: ''none knows its interpretation except Allāh and His Apostle and those firmly rooted in knowledge''. However, it may be argued that as the verse had begun with the words, ''He it is Who has sent down to thee the Book'', it necessarily showed that the Apostle knew the Book; therefore, there was no need to mention his name again.

Apparently, the knowledge of the interpretation is restricted to Allāh — so far as this verse is concerned. Although there are exceptions to it, they only serve to prove the rule. There are, for instance, several verses that say that the knowledge of the unseen is restricted to Allāh; yet an exception is given in the verses: The Knower of the unseen! so He does not reveal His secrets to any except to whom He chooses of an apostle . . . (72:26 — 27).

Also, there would be no difficulty if other verses were to show that the very people who were firmly rooted in knowledge were exempted from this restriction. This verse describes one characteristic of those people — that they believe in the ambiguous verses, but refrain from acting upon them and leave the matter in the hand of Allāh, contrary to the behaviour of those whose hearts are perverted. If other verses showed that all or some of those who were firmly rooted in knowledge knew the reality of the Qur'ān and the interpretation of its verses, then it could not be said that they were contradictory to this verse — because their subject matter would be quite different from this one.

QUR'ĀN: and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge say: ''We believe in it, it is all from our Lord'': ''ar-Rusūkh'' (اَلرُّسُوْخُ) is to be firmly rooted, fixed or established. The contrast shown between them and those whose hearts are perverted, and then the praise that they say, ''We believe in it, it is all from our Lord'' , gives their full description: They have knowledge of Allāh and of His signs, a knowledge that is immune from every doubt and suspicion; their knowledge of decisive verses is firmly established, there is no uncertainty in it; they believe in it and act upon it; and when they find an ambiguous verse, their hearts are not perturbed, nor it affects their knowledge of the decisive verses; so they believe in that ambiguous verse, but refrain from acting upon it.

Their declaration, ''We believe in it, it is all from our Lord'', gives both the proof and the conclusion. Decisive verses and ambiguous ones, all are from Allāh — therefore, one must believe in all of them. Decisive verses have clear meanings; therefore, one must also act upon them; the ambiguous ones also must be believed in, because they are from Allāh; but only that meaning can be accepted and acted upon that does not go against a decisive verse. In other words, ambiguous verses must be returned to the decisive ones.

Therefore, the sentence, ''it is all from our Lord'', is the proof of two things: (i) Decisive verses must be believed in and followed; (ii) Ambiguous ones must be believed in, but for the purpose of action they should be returned to the decisive ones.

QUR'ĀN: and none do mind except those having understanding: ''at-Tadhakkur'' (اَلتَّذَكُّرُ = translated here as ''to mind'') means to turn towards the premises to get to the conclusion. It has been mentioned above that the believers' declaration, ''it is all from our Lord'', was their proof by which they found the righteousness of their behaviour; therefore, Allāh called it ''at-tadhakkur'' and praised them for it.

''al-Albāb'' (اَلْاَلْبَابُ) is plural of al-lubb (اَللُّبُّ) which means an understanding, clear and free from defects. The people of understanding have been praised very handsomely by Allāh in His Book. According to the Qur'ān, it is they who believe in Allāh, turn towards Him and follow the best word; it is they who always remember their Lord, and consequently acquire true knowledge through its premises, and they become the people of wisdom and knowledge. Read the following verses:

> And (as for) those who keep off from the worship of the idols and turn to Allāh, they shall have good news; therefore, give good news to My servants, those who listen to the word, then follow the best of it; those are they whom Allāh has guided, and those it is who are the men of understanding (39:17 — 18).
> Most surely in the creation of the heavens and the earth and the alternation of the night and the day there are signs for men of understanding, those who remember Allāh standing and sitting and lying on their sides and reflect on the creation of the heavens and the earth . . . (3:190 — 191).

This unceasing remembrance, and the resulting humility and submissiveness keep them pondering on the signs of Allāh from which they get the true and real knowledge. Allāh says:

> . . . and none minds but he who turns (to Him) again and again (40:13).
> . . . and none do mind except those having understanding (2:269; 3:7).

QUR'ĀN: Our Lord! make not our hearts to deviate after Thou hast guided us (aright); and grant us from Thee mercy; surely Thou art the most liberal Giver: This prayer is an indication of their firmly rooted knowledge. They know their Lord and understand His power. They believe that everything belongs to Him only, and that they have no authority whatsoever on their own selves. There is a possibility that Allāh may cause their hearts to deviate even after their firmly rooted knowledge. Therefore, they seek refuge in their Lord and ask Him not to make their hearts deviate after He has guided them aright, and to grant them His own mercy so that this bounty may remain with them for ever and ever, helping them to walk on the straight path, bringing them nearer and nearer to their Lord.

Why did they ask from Allāh to grant them mercy from Himself, when they had already asked Him not to make their hearts deviate? It is because non-deviation of heart does not necessarily mean remaining firmly rooted in knowledge. It is possible that one's heart is not deviated, but at the same time is deprived of the knowledge — one in this condition would be figuratively speaking in a vegetative state: neither blessed with knowledge nor cursed with deviation; rather in a state of ignorance and feebleness. But they know that their firmly rooted knowledge is a must for them; so they pray for the Divine mercy, so as not to be deprived of that knowledge.

Apart from that, they are still on their way; and before the journey is completed they are in need of every type of mercy — the mercies that cannot be known or counted except by Allāh. Those knowledgeable believers are fully aware of this great need of theirs. The sentence coming after this verse, ''Our Lord! surely Thou art the Gatherer of men on a day about which there is no doubt'', shows their awareness of their dependence on Divine mercy till the end of this journey.

The first prayer (make not our hearts deviate after Thou hast guided us aright) seeks to ward off a misfortune; the second one (and grant us from Thee mercy) pleads for the greatest fortune, the Divine mercy that would keep their hearts alive for ever. The word, ''mercy'' has been used as a common noun, and it has been qualified with the phrase, ''from Thee''; they have used this style to show that they do not know anything about this mercy; the only thing they know is that, but for this mercy of their Lord, they cannot succeed in any way.

They sought refuge in Allāh from the deviation of their hearts and asked from Him His mercy. It proves that they knew that everything belonged to Allāh; their eyes were directly on the Real Cause, ignoring all the middle causes.

QUR'ĀN: Our Lord! surely Thou art the Gatherer of men on a day about which there is no doubt; surely Allāh fails not (His) promise:

This pleading of theirs gives the reason of their prayer for mercy. They know that this system of creation, this call to the religion, this striving by man in his path of life, all are precursors of their gathering together on the Day of Resurrection when no one shall avail anyone and none shall be helped except by the Divine mercy. Allāh says: Surely the day of discrimination is their appointed time, of all of them; the day on which a friend shall not avail (his) friend aught, nor shall they be helped, save those on whom Allāh shall have mercy . . . (44:40 — 42). That is why they prayed to Him for His mercy; and left all its details to His discretion, so that it be of real benefit to them.

They said that there was no doubt about that day. It showed their deep concern about the mercy asked for. Then they ended their prayer on the sentence, ‘‘surely Allāh fails not (His) promise’’. They were firmly rooted in knowledge; knowledge about a thing is not firmly established unless one knows the cause from which that thing emanates. They had no doubt about the Day of Resurrection, because it had been promised by Allāh; and Allāh does not fail His promise.

This pleading contains a proposition followed by its reason. They have used the same style in the whole invocation.from the very beginning:

They said, ‘‘We believe in it’’, and gave its reason in the next sentence, ‘‘it is all from our Lord’’.

Then they prayed, ‘‘Our Lord! make not our hearts deviate’’, and added a phrase that gives a sort of its reason, ‘‘after Thou hast guided us (aright)’’.

Then came the pleading, ‘‘and grant us from Thee mercy’’, followed by its reason, ‘‘surely Thou art the most liberal Giver’’. In fact there is a double proposition and likewise a double reason in this prayer. They did not ask for ‘‘any’’ mercy, but a mercy ‘‘from Thee’’. Thereafter, the sentence giving the reason contains two singular pronouns of second person: ‘‘Ka’’ (كَ = Thou) and ‘‘anta’’ (اَنْتَ = Thou) and the predicate has been given the definite article, ‘‘al’’ (اَلْ = the); these two restrictive devices emphasize that the only Giver is Allāh; and hence they have asked for only His mercy.

They are the people who believed in their Lord and remained firm on it. Therefore, Allāh guided them aright and perfected their wisdom. Now they do not utter any word except with knowledge, nor do they do any work that is not based on knowledge. Consequently, Allāh praised them by calling them as ‘‘those firmly rooted in knowledge’’; and gave them the title of ‘‘people of understanding’’.

If you read once again how Allāh has praised the people of understanding, you will see that all those attributes perfectly fit these people. Look again, for example, at the verses: And (as for) those who keep off from the worship of the idols and turn to Allāh, they shall have good news; therefore give good news to My servants, those who listen to the word, then follow the best of it; those are they whom Allāh has guided, and those it is who are the men of understanding (39:17 — 18). These verses say that the people of understanding have faith, follow the best of the word and turn to Allāh. The same characteristics have been attributed in this verse to those who are firmly rooted in knowledge.

They have used the second person singular pronouns for Allāh throughout the prayer; but have ended it with mentioning the Divine name (and thus switching to third person) and said: ‘‘surely Allāh fails not (His) promise’’. It is because this promise is not especially for them; it is a general promise; therefore they changed the phrase, ‘‘Our Lord!’’ to the Divine name ‘‘Allāh’’, as this name shows His sovereignty over all things.

A DETAILED DISCOURSE ABOUT THE DECISIVE AND AMBIGUOUS VERSES AND THE INTERPRETATION

What we have explained above about the meaning of decisive and ambiguous verses, as well as their ‘‘interpretation’’, is what one understands after deep consideration of the Qur’ānic verses and the traditions of our Imāms.

But the Muslims have entangled themselves in sharp controversies about every aspect of these subjects right from the early days; and divergent views have been quoted regarding every detail even from the companions of the Prophet and their disciples. And in all this confusing polemics, not a single explanation conforms with ours; we may say that none of them even superficially resembles it.

The main cause of this conflict is the confusion which exists about the subject matter — they have mixed the discussion of decisive and ambiguous verses with that of interpretation. As a result, they are in a muddle concerning the issues to be decided; there is disorderliness in their ways of arguments and they are confused about the conclusions drawn from their discourses. We propose to give a systematic analysis of all their opinions under different headings.

1. The Decisive and the Ambiguous Verses

''al-Iḥkām'' (اَلْاِحْكَامُ = to make precise, to conform, to make decisive, to strengthen) and ''at-tashābuh'' (اَلتَّشَابُه = conformity of one thing with other, ambiguity) are commonly used words with clear meanings. Allāh has attributed these adjectives and verbs to the whole Book: (This is) a Book whose verses were confirmed . . . (11:1); . . . a Book conforming (in its various parts), oft-repeated . . . (39:23). These verses point to the fact that the whole Book has a forceful eloquence, and a well-integrated style, and that its various parts conform with each other in structural elegance and elocutionary beauty — and its every word leads to sublime realities.

But when we look at the verse, ''He it is Who has sent down to thee the Book, of it there are some verses decisive, they are the basis of the Book, and others are ambiguous . . .'', we know that the adjectives, ''al-muḥkamāt'' (اَلْمُحْكَمَاتُ = confirmed, decisive) and ''al-mutashābihāt'' (اَلْمُتَشَابِهَاتُ = conforming, ambiguous), as used in this verse, mean something different from the earlier mentioned two verses. Why? Because this verse divides the verses in two categories and then says that only one is ''decisive'' and the other is ''ambiguous''. These words in this verse cannot have the same meanings which were applicable to the whole Book.

The exegetes should have endeavoured to find out from the Qur'ānic verses themselves which meanings could be applied in this case. Instead, various people have interpreted them, according to their own thinking, in more than fifteen ways:

First: The decisive are the three verses in Chapter 6 (Cattle): Say: ''Come I will recite what your Lord has forbidden to you —

(remember) that you do not associate anything with Him and be good to (your) parents, and do not slay your children for (fear of) poverty — We provide for you and for them — and do not draw near to indecencies . . . this He has enjoined you with that you may be mindful (6:152 — 154). And the ambiguous are those parts that confused the Jews, and they are the ‘‘letter symbols’’ revealed at the beginning of many Qur’ānic chapters, like Alif lām mīm rā, Ḥā mīm, etc. As it happened, the Jews tried to interpret them in the light of their numerical values, and they thought that Alif lām mīm hinted that the Muslim nation would continue for only 71 (1 +30 +40) years. Then other ‘‘letter symbols’’ were revealed, and the Jews became confused.

This opinion has been attributed to Ibn ‘Abbās, a companion of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

Comment: First, it is an opinion without any proof or evidence. Second, there is no evidence that decisive and ambiguous verses are only those three and the letter symbols respectively. Third, if we accept this view, then almost the whole Qur’ān — except those three verses and the letter symbols — would fall in a third category ‘‘non-decisive, non-ambiguous’’; but the verse clearly divides the whole Book in two categories only.

The fact is that attribution of this view to Ibn ‘Abbās is out of place. According to the narration, he had said that the three verses were decisive — he had not said that the decisive verses were only these three. It is reported in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from Sa‘īd ibn Manṣūr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim, al-Ḥākim (who said that the tradition was correct) and Ibn Marduwayh that ‘Abdullāh ibn Qays said: ‘‘I heard Ibn ‘Abbās saying about the words of Allāh: of it there are some verses decisive; he said: three verses at the end of the Chapter of the Cattle are decisive: Say: ‘Come . . . ’ and two following verses.’’

That he mentioned these verses just as an example, is supported by another tradition narrated from him by the same author — that explaining the words of Allāh, ‘‘verses decisive’’, he said: ‘‘From here, Say: ‘Come. . . ’ upto three verses, and from here, And your Lord has commanded that you shall not worship (any) but Him . . . (17:23 — 25) upto three verses ’’.

Both traditions clearly show that he mentioned these verses as examples of decisive verses; not that the decisive verses were only these.

Second: Opposite of the first view: The decisive are the letter symbols at the beginning of various chapters; and ambiguous are all the other verses.

It has been attributed to Abū Fākhitah; he said about the words of Allāh, they are the basis of the Book, that they are the opening words of the chapters; the Qur'ān is composed from them: Alif lām mīm; this Book, there is no doubt in it, the Chapter of the Cow is composed from them: Alif lām mīm; Allāh is He besides Whom there is no god, the Chapter of the Family of 'Imrān is composed from them.

A similar interpretation is reported from Sa'īd ibn Jubayr, about the words: they are the basis of the Book. He said: ''The basis of the Book,because they are written in all the books.''

It appears that, according to Abū Fākhitah and Sa'īd ibn Jubayr, the letter symbols at the beginning of the chapters are just that — the symbols of the alphabets; and that by putting them in the beginning, Allāh has drawn the attention of the hearers to the fact that this Book, which is revealed to you, is made up of these alphabets from which words and sentences are made, and yet no one can bring a like of it.

It is one of the views about the significance of the letter symbols.

Comment: First, it is based on a premise (the supposed significance of the letter symbols) which itself is without any proof or evidence. Second, it is not in conformity with the verse under discussion. According to this interpretation the whole Qur'ān, other than the letter symbols, is ''ambiguous''; and Allāh has in this verse condemned those who follow the ambiguous verses, and has said that it results from perversity of their hearts; it means that one should not follow any verse of the Qur'ān, except the letter symbols — and there is nothing to follow in those symbols! On the other hand, Allāh praises those who follow the Qur'ān; in fact, to follow it is the most important obligation. For example, He says: . . . and follow the light which has been sent down with him, these it is that are the successful (7:157).

Third: Ambiguous means unspecified, indistinct, vague verses, and decisive are the specified and clear ones.

Comment: The particulars mentioned in the verse, about the decisive and ambiguous verses, do not fit this interpretation.

A word is called vague and indistinct, when various aspects of its meaning are mixed together and it is difficult to disentangle them and to know which one is really intended. Such a word is not acted upon unless it is joined by another clarifying word which makes its meaning clear, and then it is acted upon and followed.

It must be noted here that, in the above-mentioned case, what is followed is the same previously indistinct and vague word as clarified by the distinct and clear one. The clarifying word, in itself, is not followed.

Therefore, if ambiguous means the vague and indistinct verse and decisive is the distinct and clear one, then it is the ambiguous verse that should be followed when clarified by the decisive one — and not the decisive verse itself. Accordingly, to follow an ambiguous verse should not invite condemnation and should not be associated with perversity of heart.

And coming to the practical side, no one — neither those whose hearts are perverted nor those who are firmly rooted in knowledge — follows a vague word unless it is clarified. But Allāh condemns the former for following ambiguous verses. It means that ambiguous verses are not vague.

Fourth: Ambiguous are those verses which were abrogated; one believe in them but does not act upon them. Decisive are the verses that abrogated the former, because they are believed in and acted upon.

This opinion has been ascribed to Ibn ‘Abbās, Ibn Mas‘ūd and some other companions. And that is why Ibn ‘Abbās used to say that he knew the interpretation of the Qur’ān.

Comment: First, even if we accept this explanation as correct, there is no proof that only the abrogated verses are ambiguous. The description that some people follow the ambiguous verses to mislead the people and to interpret them in their own way, is true about a lot of unabrogated verses too, like the ones about the attributes and actions of Allāh. Second, this explanation leaves a majority of the verses unaccounted for — those that neither abrogated any, nor were abrogated by any. Was there a third category, which Allāh did not mention?

And so far as the view of Ibn ‘Abbās is concerned, it is known that his explanation of decisive and ambiguous verses was more comprehensive, and that he mentioned these two types — abrogated ones and those that abrogate — just as examples. It is quoted in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu ’1-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim, through the chain of ‘Alī, from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘The decisive verses are the ones that abrogated other verses, contain the lawful and unlawful, describe the limits and duties, and (in short) those which are believed in (and acted upon); and the ambiguous are the ones that are abrogated, in which there is some juxtaposition, the parables, the oaths, and that which is believed in but not acted upon.’’

Fifth: Decisive are those verses whose proof is clear and evident, like the proofs of Oneness of Allāh, and of His power and wisdom. And ambiguous are those which require thinking and consideration.

Comment: What is the meaning of a verse having clear and evident proof? Does it mean that the main idea of a verse should have a rational and self-evident proof? If so, then all verses containing the laws or explaining the duties would become ambiguous, because not a single such law has a self-evident rational proof. Consequently, acting upon the verses containing the rules of the sharī‘ah would be condemnable! And Islam says that they must be followed and acted upon! Or does it mean that the idea of a verse should have a clear proof from the Book itself? If so, then all the verses do have this quality. And why not? After all, it is a Book, conforming in its various parts, oftrepeated, a light, a clear discourse. So, according to this interpretation, all the verses would be decisive, and there would remain no ambiguous one. But the Qur’ān says that some of its verses are ambiguous.

Sixth: Decisive is everything that can be known with the help of a clear or hidden proof; and ambiguous is that which cannot be known in any way, like the time of resurrection.

Comment: Being decisive or ambiguous are the characteristics of the verses of the Book. The Arabic name of a verse is al-āyah (اَلْاٰيَةُ = sign), because it shows a reality from the Divine realities. Whatever is described by a Qur’ānic verse cannot be said, by any stretch of imagination, to be ‘‘unknowable’’; nor is it incomprehensible — it may surely be correctly understood either by itself or with the help of other verses. How can it be said that a verse intends to say something but its words fail to convey the intended meaning? Allāh has described His Book as the guidance, the light and the clarification; and that even unbelievers could comprehend it — let alone the believers: A revelation from the Beneficent, the Merciful Allāh, a Book of which the verses are made plain, an Arabic Qur'ān for a people who know; a herald of good news and a warner but most of them turn aside so they hear not (41:2—4); Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ān? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82). Obviously, no subject matter dealt with in the Qur'ān is incomprehensible or unknowable. And what cannot be known, like the time of resurrection and other secrets of the unseen, has not been touched by any verse. So, how can any verse be called ambiguous in the suggested meaning?

In fact, this explanation confuses between the meanings of ‘‘ambiguous’’ and ‘‘final interpretation’’, (the true significance of which has already been described by us in the beginning).

Seventh: Decisive are the verses containing the laws and the sharī'ah; and ambiguous are the other verses, some of which affects the others.

This opinion has been attributed to Mujahid among others.

Comment: This interpretation is wrong in both ways: Apparently ‘‘affecting each other’’ means helping in fixation of the intended meaning, as a. specifying word qualifies a general one; or as a context pin-points the idea conveyed. If so, then even the verses containing the laws should be counted as ambiguous, because they too are subject to this inter- action.

On the other hand, this interpretation gives an impression about the basic characteristic of a decisive verse: That there is no vagueness in its meaning; it distinctly points to its intended idea; that its import is known by itself, while others' sense is understood by its help. If it is so, and if it is accepted that only the verses containing the laws are decisive, then nothing of the Qur'anic knowledge and realities (except the rules of the sharī'ah) can be known; there is supposedly no decisive verse in that group and, therefore, those verses cannot be referred to any decisive one, and consequently, their substance would remain unknowable for ever.

Eighth: Decisive is the verse that cannot be interpreted except in one way; ambiguous is the one that may be interpreted in more than one way.

It has been ascribed to ash-Shāfi‘ī. Probably, he means that the decisive verse ‘‘apperently’’ has only one meaning; and the ambiguous has more than one ‘‘apparent’’ meaning.

Comment: This ‘‘explanation’’ just changes one word with another: ‘‘decisive’’ has been changed to ‘‘one having only one meaning’’, and ‘‘ambiguous’’ to ‘‘one having more than one meaning’’.

Apart from that in his view, at-ta’wīl (interpretation) signifies the meaning of the word; and, as we have earlier explained, it is not correct. If ‘‘interpretation’’ is the same thing as the meaning of a word, then its knowledge could not be restricted to Allāh, (or to Allāh and those firmly rooted in knowledge). We know that the verses of the Qur’ān explain the meanings of each other; and believers and unbelievers; those firmly rooted in knowledge and those in whose hearts is perversity — all equally understand this meaning.

Ninth: Decisive are those verses which have been confirmed and in which the news of the prophets and their peoples has been given in detail; and those ‘‘conforming to each other’’ are those stories that have been repeatedly mentioned in various chapters and whose words conform to each other.

According to this interpretation, the two categories — decisive and ambiguous — are confined to the stories only.

Comment: First, there is no proof that the Qur’ānic division is confined to the verses of the stories. Second, the given characteristics of decisive and ambiguous verses — that those who follow the ambiguous do so to mislead the people and to give the verse their own interpretation; and that following the decisive verse has no such defect — do not agree with this explanation. These characteristics are found in other verses as much as in stories, and in once narrated story (like instituting the khilāfah in the earth) as well as in oft-repeated ones.

Tenth: Ambiguous is that verse which needs explanation; decisive one does not need it. This view is ascribed to Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal.

Comment: The verse containing the sharī'ah need to be explained by the Prophet, although they are certainly among the decisive ones. On the other hand, the abrogated verses are among the ambiguous ones (as was described earlier), and they do not need any explanation (because they are not acter upon), even though in all other respects they are like any other verse of the sharī'ah.

The suggested meaning is, therefore, neither all inclusive nor exclusive.

Eleventh: Decisive is the verse that is believed in and acted upon; and ambiguous is believed in but not acted upon.

It has been attributed to Ibn Taymiyyah. Perhaps, he wanted to say that the stories and informations were ambiguous, and those containing the laws were decisive. If this is the idea behind this explanation, then it could be counted as a separate view; otherwise, it could be fitted to many of the previously mentioned opinions.

Comment: It would mean that all verses, other than those concerning the sharī'ah, would be ambiguous. In other words, it would be impossible to have knowledge of any Divine reality or any spiritual fact mentioned in the Qur'ān (other than the matters of law) because there would be no decisive verse in that group to which the rest of it could be referred.

On the other hand, abrogated verses are concerned with the sharī'ah, but certainly they are not decisive.

Apparently, he looked at the words, ''. . . those in whose hearts there is perversity, they follow the part of it which is ambiguous'', and ''those who are firmly rooted in knowledge say: 'We believe in it, it is all from our Lord' ''; and then paraphrased it in these words that decisive verses are believed in and acted upon while ambiguous ones are believed in but not acted upon. He did not realize that this believing in and following, or only believing without following, expresses the duty of the believer 'after' he has distinguished between the decisive and ambiguous verses. In other words, it is not the criterion by which one may know the decisive verses from the ambiguous; there must be some other test to distinguish between the two categories.

Twelfth: Ambiguous are those verses which describe the attributes, whether of Allāh, for example, All-knowing, Powerful, Wise and All-aware, or of His prophets, for example, the verse about ʻĪsā (a.s.): . . . and His Word which He conveyed unto Mary, and a Spirit (proceeding) from Him . . . (4:171), and other verses of this type.

It too has been attributed to Ibn Taymiyyah.

Comment: Accepted that the verses of attributes are ambiguous; but there is no evidence that ambiguous verses are confined to only those.

He has written a long passage from which it appears that he takes these two terms in their literal meaning. A gist of his discourse is as follows:

‘‘Decisive is the verse whose meaning is distinct; ambiguous is the one which has two or more possible meanings. The two concepts are relative: may be a verse is ambiguous for an ordinary man, and distinct and decisive for a more knowledgeable one. This relativity manifest's itself very clearly in the verses of attributes. Most of the people fail to understand their significance. Their comprehension does not go beyond the limits of the matter. They interpret the Divine Attributes — knowledge, power, sight, hearing, pleasure, displeasure, hand, eye and other such expressions — in material terms, or in wrong ways. Thus people are misled, wrong beliefs and practices crop up and various schools of thoughts come into being.

‘‘So this is the meaning of decisive and ambiguous. Both are within the purview of human knowledge. What cannot be known is the interpretation of ambiguous verses, that is, the reality that is hidden behind such verses. Let us say that we know the meaning of the words of Allāh: Most surely Allāh has power over everything, and Most surely Allāh knows everything. Still, we do not know the reality of His power and knowledge. The same is true about all Divine Attributes and actions. It is this final interpretation of the ambiguous verses which no one knows except Allāh.’’

We shall comment on it when discussing the subject of ‘‘interpretation’’.

Thirteenth: Decisive is what can be reached by the understanding; ambiguous is opposite to it.

Comment: First, it is an opinion that is not supported by any proof. Second, it is correct that the Qur'ānic verses may be divided in this way; but this division is totally different from that which groups the verses in two categories of decisive and ambiguous. The characteristics of decisive and ambiguous do not fit to the two sides of this division. Third, it is not all inclusive; the verses of the sharī'ah are surely decisive, and human understanding has no way to reach them.

Fourteenth: Ambiguous is a verse whose interpretation is against the apparent meaning of its words. Decisive is opposite to it; its interpretation is the same as its apparent meaning. This is the view popular among the later scholars; and they use the word at-ta'wīl for an interpretation that is against the apparent meaning of the words.

Perhaps, the same was meant by the scholar who said: Decisive is that verse whose interpretation is the same as its revelation, and ambiguous is the one that cannot be comprehended except through interpretation.

Comment: It is a new terminology and the given characteristics of decisive and ambiguous verses do not agree with it.

Ambiguous is an expression that is capable of more than one meaning; but only one of those meanings is intended. And that intended meaning is not its ''interpretation''. The interpretation, as explained earlier, is a common factor of all the Qur'ānic verses, the decisive and the ambiguous alike.

Moreover, there is not a single verse in the Qur'ān whose connotation is against its apparent meaning. A few verses that give such impression, are governed by the decisive verses — and the Qur'ānic verses explain each other. Obviously, a meaning based on context and associations cannot be said to be against the apparent meaning; and especially when the Speaker Himself declares beforehand that various parts of His speech are all related to each other and should be understood with each other's help, and that no difference can be found in it if one ponders over it; Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ān? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82).

Fifteenth: If there is unanimity about the interpretation of a verse, then it is decisive; otherwise, it is ambiguous.

This opinion is ascribed to al-Aṣamm. Perhaps, what he says may be expressed in other words: There is no difference of opinion as to what a decisive verse means; while there is always such a difference about an ambiguous one.

Comment: If that be the criterion, then the whole Qur'ān would become ambiguous, contrary to the division mentioned in this verse. Not a single verse is free from controversy; there is always some difference either about its word or its meaning; always some disagreement whether its apparent meaning is intended. This has led some people to say that the whole Qur'ān is ambiguous; and he offers the verse: . . . a Book conforming in its various parts (39:23), as his proof. He seems oblivious of the inherent contradiction in this reasoning: This argument means that at least this verse is decisive so that it may be relied upon, while he wants to prove from it that not a single verse is decisive!

Some others, believing that the whole Qur'ān was ambiguous, said that the apparent meanings of the Qur'ān are not a proof at all.

Sixteenth: Ambiguous is the verse that is difficult to explain, because it resembles another verse — the difficulty may arise because of the word or because of the meaning.

It is the opinion of al-Rāghib. He has written in Mufradātu 'l-Qur'ān:

''Ambiguous verses of the Qur'ān are those that are difficult to explain because of their resemblance to other verses — it is either in word or in meaning. The religious scholars have said: 'The ambiguous is the verse whose apparent meaning does not indicate its real connotation.' The fact is that the verses, when compared to each other, are of three kinds: The decisive, the ambiguous, and that which is decisive in some respects and ambiguous in others.

''The ambiguous, in all, is of three kinds: ambiguous in word, ambiguous in meaning, and ambiguous in word and meaning both.

''The ambiguous in word is of two kinds: Where ambiguousness is caused by one word — it is not a commonly used word, like al-abb (اَلْاَبُّ = herbage) and yaziffūn (يَزِفُّوْنَ = they are hastening); or has more than one meaning, like al-yad (اَلْيَدُ = hand, power) and al-'ayn ( اَلْعَيْنُ = eye, sun, supervision) — and where ambiguousness results from the structure of the sentence. This may happen in one of the three ways: when some explanatory words are omitted for the sake of brevity, for example: And if you fear that you cannot act equitably towards orphans, then marry such women as seem good to you, two and three and four (4:3); when some words are added into the sentence for some reason, for example: There is nothing like the likeness of Him (42:11) — it would have been easier to understand for a common man if it were said, 'there is nothing like Him'; and when a word is transferred from its usual place for rhyming or other reasons, for example: . . . Who revealed the Book to His servant and did not make in it any crookedness. Rightly directing . . . (18:1 — 2) — the word, 'Rightly directing' describes the state of ''the Book'' and should have come soon after it; another example: . . . and were it not for believing men and believing women . . . had they been widely separated . . . (48:25).

''And the ambiguous according to meaning are the attributes of Allāh and details of the Day of Resurrection. These things are beyond the limit of our imagination — we cannot imagine a thing that is not perceived by us, or does not resemble any such perceived thing, at least.

''And the ambiguous in word and meaning both is of five kinds: First, the ambiguity, because of quantity; when it is arguable whether the word is used in its general or particular meaning, for example, ''kill the polytheists''. Second, the ambiguity because of quality; whether the given order is obligatory or recommended, for example, ''then marry such woman as seem good to you''. Third, the ambiguity because of time, when it is arguable which of the two given orders is abrogated and which one abrogated it. Forth, ambiguity because of the place and the incident about which the verse was revealed, for example: And it is not righteousness that you should enter the houses from their backs . . . (2:189); and Postponing (of the sacred month) is only an addition in unbelief (9:37). It is difficult for a man who does not know the pre-Islamic Arabs' customs to understand these references. Fifth, ambiguity because of the conditions that make an action valid or void, for example, the conditions of prayer and marriage.

‘‘If you ponder on these divisions, you will see that all that the exegetes have written or said concerning the meaning of the ‘ambiguous’, comes under one or the other of its headings and sub-headings; for example, the saying that ambiguous are the letter symbols, or Qatādah’s opinion that the ambiguous is the abrogated verse, and the decisive is that which aborgated it, and the view of al-Aṣamm that there is unanimity about the interpretation of decisive verses, while there is no such unanimity about ambiguous ones.

‘‘Then all the ambiguous verses — whatever the reasons of their ambiguity — are of three categories: First, that which cannot be known by anyone in any way, like the time of resurrection, the appearance of the walker of the earth, and what that walker is, etc. Second, that which may be understood by man, like the uncommon words and complicated syntax. Third, that which may be comprehended by some of those who are firmly rooted in knowledge, and may remain hidden from others. It is this third category, about which the Prophet prayed for ‘Alī (may Allāh be pleased with him), ‘O Allāh! give him the knowledge of religion and teach him the ‘‘interpretation’’ ’; and prayed like this for Ibn ‘Abbās too.’’

This was the opinion of ar-Rāghib; it is the most comprehensive of all such views; and combines many of the previously mentioned opinions.

Comment: First, it is against the obvious meaning of the verse to say that ‘‘ambiguousness’’ includes such cases as the uncommon words, complicated sentence-structure, generality and particularity of expressions etc. The verse says that the ambiguous verses may be understood by referring them to the decisive ones. But the above-mentioned word problems cannot be solved by the decisive verses; there are other methods to solve them, like the grammer, dictionary etc.

Moreover, the verse says that those who follow the ambiguous verses do so to misguide and to interpret them in their own ways. But nobody follows a general word without knowing its particulars, or an uncommon word without ascertaining from the dictionary what it means. If anyone did so, people would not listen to him, because it would be against the universally accepted principles of language; and, as no one would listen to him, there could be no misleading and no misinterpreting.

Second, his final division of the ambiguous into three categories — that which can be understood by common man, that which cannot be understood, and that which can be understood by some and not by others — shows that he thinks that ‘‘interpretation’’ is a peculiarity of ambiguous verses. But we have already explained that ‘‘interpretation’’ is common to both ambiguous and decisive ones.

These were the opinions of the scholars about the meanings of the decisive and ambiguous verses. As you have seen, none of them is free from defects, nor does any conform with the clear purport of the verse. What one understands from the verse is this: An ambiguous verse is capable of more than one meaning, but the more apparent meaning is doubtful — not because of any difficulty of language or syntax (which can easily be removed with the help of well-recognised literary and linguistic methods), but because it is against the semantic value of a decisive verse. Therefore, the actually intended meaning may be ascertained only with the help of that decisive verse.

Obviously, the apparent meaning of an ambiguous verse should be familiar to the common people and the simple minds would readily accept it and believe in it. Or if both meanings require some explanation, then the explanation leading to unintended meaning would be easier to understand for an uninitiated and unlearned man.

Look at the innovations and wrong sectarian beliefs; study the never-ending schisms that have been shattering the Muslim community since the moment the Prophet left this world; try to find out the basic cause of their differences in matters of belief and law — and you will see that most of them have resulted from following the ambiguous verses and from interpreting them in a way not approved by Allāh.

Every sect proves its beliefs from the Qur’ānic verses: A party finds in it evidence that Allāh is a body; a group proves from it that man has no free will concerning his actions, while another faction tries to show that man is totally independent of Allāh in this respect; some people argue that the prophets committed mistakes and sins, and they quote the verses in their support; a circle says and proves it from the Qur’ān, that Allāh is so sublime that even ‘‘Divine Attributes'' should not be attributed to Him, while another faction says, and proves it too from the Qur'ān, that Allāh is just like His creatures and His attributes are separate from His Person. And so on and so forth. All this is a result of following the ambiguous verses without ''returning'' them to the relevant decisive ones.

Then look at a group saying that the laws of the sharī'ah were ordained to serve as a path to reach the goal; if one finds a shorter route that leads to the same destination, it would be obligatory to walk on this new route, because the main thing is to reach there, through any easy way. Another one says that the rules of the sharī'ah were promulgated to lead the man to perfection; there is no justification of burdening a man with them after he has reached that goal — therfore, one who has attained perfection is not obliged to observe the rules of the sharī'ah. All the rules of the sharī'ah, all the religious obligations, the complete penal code and all Islamic policies were established and enforced in the days of the Prophet, not a single item was neglected or kept in abeyance. Then, after his departure, the Muslim governments began suspending law after law. It was a continual process. Whenever a law or a penalty was discarded, those who were responsible for it argued: The religion was sent down for the good of the world and the good of the man; what we have adopted now, in place of the old out-moded law, is far more better for the people. Now, we have reached a stage where it is said: The only purpose of the sharī'ah was to make the world a good place to live in; the world, nowadays, is not in a mood to accept the policies and punishments prescribed by Islam — it cannot digest it; the advanced civilization demands advanced and civilized laws — the laws of Islam are not good for this stage. Also, it is said: The religious rites were established so that they might purify the hearts and lead the minds to correct perception; those hearts that have been well-trained by the society and those spirits that are solely devoted to the service of mankind, do not need such purifications as ablution, obligatory bath, prayer and fast etc.

Ponder over such views — and their number is beyond counting — and then study the words of Allāh, ''then as for those in whose hearts there is perversity, they follow the part of it which is ambiguous, seeking to mislead, and seeking to give it (their own) interpretation'', and you will have to admit that all those disorders and calamities that befell Islam and the Muslims, have emanated from only one source — following the ambiguous verses seeking to give them one's own interpretation.

That is the reason — and Allāh knows better — why the Qur'ān has used such a tough language in this respect, most strictly forbidding the Muslims to follow the ambiguous verses seeking to mislead the people, and to interpret them according to one's own liking; and why it has condemned the tendency of distorting the signs and words of Allāh, explaining them without true knowledge, and following the footsteps of Satan. It is the usual practice of the Qur'ān to put greatest emphasis on condemning those matters that were likely to destroy any fundamental part of the religion, which, in its turn, could lead to ruination of the whole structure. Look, for example, at the severest admonitions against befriending the unbelievers; about the love of the near relatives of the Prophet; for staying of the wives of the Prophet inside their houses; against the interest; and concerning the unity in the word of religion etc.

What is the basic source of perversity of heart and of the tendency to mislead the people? It happens when one is inclined towards this material world, loves to remain on the earth for ever and succumbs to desires. How can the rust of perversity be removed? How can the door of misdirection be closed shut? The only way is to remember the Day of Reckoning, as Allāh says: (as for) those who go astray from the path of Allāh, for them surely is a severe punishment because they forgot the Day of Reckoning (38:26). That is why those who are firmly rooted in knowledge and who do not wish to interpret the Qur'ān in a way their Lord does not approve, point to this fact at the end of their prayer: ''Our Lord! Surely Thou art the Gatherer of men on a day about which there is no doubt; surely Allāh fails not (His) promise.''

2. ''The Decisive Verses are the Basis of the Book.'' What does it mean?

A group says: The decisive verses are the basis of the Book — it means that they are the foundation of the Book upon which the edifice of religion, its principles and laws, are built up; and religion is only a collection of beliefs and deeds. Therefore, such verses are believed in and acted upon. So far as the ambiguous verses are concerned, they are believed in but not acted upon, because their meanings are not distinct and their connotations are vague.

Comment: This meaning necessarily emanates from some of the opinions about the meaning of the decisive and ambiguous verses. If one believes that ambiguous is the verse whose interpretation is difficult to comprehend, or that its ambiguousness may be removed totally or partially with the help of reason, grammar, dictionary or other means used to solve a word-problem, then he would have to explain the ‘‘basis of the Book’’ in the way written above.

Others say that the sentence, ‘‘Decisive verses are the basis of the Book’’, refers to the fact that ambiguous verses return, that is, are referred, to them. But what is the meaning of this ‘‘return’’ or reference? Some people say: It means that ambiguous verses should be believed in, but when it comes to action, only the relevant decisive verse should be followed. For example, an abrogated verse should be believed in, but at the time of action it should be returned to its relevant decisive verse, that is, the one that abrogated it.

Comment: This explanation is not very different from the first one.

There is a third explanation and it is the correct one: The decisive verses are the basis of the Book, inasmuch as they clarify and explain the ambiguous ones and remove their ambiguousness.

As explained in the Commentary, ‘‘al-umm’’ (اَلْاُمُّ = translated here as ‘‘basis’’) literary means a thing to which another thing returns. The word ‘‘basis’’ or foundation does not convey the full sense of this word. The first explanation interprets it merely as the foundation; but it does not explain its full import. The word al-umm points to a special kind of return — as a part returns to its whole, or a branch returns to its roots; the thing that returns is derived from, and is a part of, the thing to which it returns. This word, therefore, indicates that ambiguous verses have such meanings that branch out from, and return to, the decisive ones. And that is why the decisive ones explain and clarify the ambiguous ones.

Moreover, the ambiguous is given this name because it is capable of more than one meaning; and not because it has an ‘‘interpretation’’ — interpretation is found in decisive verses also; the Qur’ānic verses explain each other, and it is only decisive verses that can clarify the ambiguous ones. Let us repeat the example of the verse: Looking to their Lord (75:23); it is ambiguous; but when it is returned to the words of Allāh: nothing is like a likeness of Him (42:11), and: Visions comprehend Him not (6:103), it becomes clear that ‘‘looking at’’ in this phrase means something different from the optical vision connected with the eyes.

Likewise, Allāh has said: The (Prophet’s) heart belied not what he saw. What! do you then dispute with him as to what he saw? . . . Certainly he saw of the greatest signs of his Lord (53:11 — 18). The verse proves that the heart has a sight of its own. And this vision of heart is something different from ‘‘thinking’’ and ‘‘consideration’’. Because the thought and consideration is a process that consists of a subject and a predicate; while vision is a single action, it looks at the object without joining it to any subject or predicate. Therefore, this vision of heart is neither a material nor a mental consideration; it is the orientation of heart towards the object.

The same is the case with all other ambiguous verses.

3. The Meaning of ‘‘at-Ta’wīl’’

According to some exegetes at-ta’wīl (interpretation) is synonymous for exegesis, explanation or meaning of the sentence. Meanings of some parts of the Qur’ān are certainly known to the people. Accordingly, the interpretation mentioned in the verse (seeking to give it their own interpretation, but none knows its interpretation except Allāh) must be restricted to the meaning of the ambiguous verses. Therefore, they say that none can know, in any way, the meaning of an ambiguous verse, except Allāh — or except Allāh and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge.

Another group says that ‘‘interpretation’’ is the meaning that is against the apparent meaning of the word. This explanation has become so wide spread that, at present, it has become the real meaning of at-ta'wīl, while originally this word meant ''to return'' or ''the returning place''. Anyhow, this explanation is popular among the later exegetes, while the first-mentioned explanation was familiar to the ancients, whether they believed that its knowledge was restricted to Allāh only, or said that they too, who were firmly rooted in knowledge, knew it; for example, it has been narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he used to say: ''I am one of those who are firmly rooted in knowledge and I know its interpretation.''

A third group says: ''Interpretation'' is that meaning of the verse which is not known except to Allāh (or to Allāh and the ones firmly rooted in knowledge), and which is against the apparent meaning of the word. In other words, an ambiguous verse has many meanings — one behind the other; some meanings are showing themselves just behind the words, and may be perceived by one and all; others are far behind and none knows them except Allāh (or except Allāh and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge).

There is, within this group, a difference of opinion as to how those various meanings are related to the word. It is sure that all of them are not on the same level; otherwise, it would mean that one word is used in more than one meaning at the same time, and that is not permissible in language (as has been explained in the Fundamentals of Jurisprudence). Therefore, those meanings must be taken consecutively. Now comes the difference: Some say that one meaning is the real one; the second is its concomitant; the third is the second's concomitant and so on. Others say that the meanings are all ranked one behind the other, as an esoteric meaning is hidden behind a manifest one. When a man speaks a word, he intends it to convey its familiar meaning, .and with the same intention he aims at its esoteric meaning. You say: Give me water to drink. You ask only for drink; but that very word is also a demand to satiate your thirst; and this in its turn is a call to satisfy a need of life, and then a determination to acquire the perfection of existence. Note that you had not given four orders; you only told him to give you water to drink, but this one demand contained in itself all the unspoken but intended demands — one inside the other.

There is a fourth explanation: Interpretation is not a sort of a meaning intended from the word. It is a thing really existing outside imagination, upon which the talk is based. If the speech is of imperative mood — enjoining or forbidding — then its interpretation is that reason for which the said commandment is given. There is an order: Establish prayer. Its interpretation is that spiritual perfection which illuminates the soul of the one who prays, and prevents him from evil and sin. If the speech is an information — of a past event — then that event itself is its interpretation. Look, for example, at the verses narrating the stories of the prophets and their peoples. And if it is an information of a present or future happening, then it is of two kinds: (1) If the subject may be perceived by one of the senses or comprehended by mind, then its interpretation is the same subject as it exists or shall exist in reality: For example, Allāh says: and among you are those who hearken for their sake (9:47); and: The Romans are vanquished, in a near land, and they, after being vanquished, shall overcome within a few years (30:2 — 4). (2) If it is a future event of unseen that cannot be perceived by worldly perceptions, nor can it be comprehended by our minds, like the affairs of the Day of Resurrection, the time of its happening, the raising of the dead and their gathering together, the questioning, the reckoning, the flying of the books of deeds etc., and like the reality of the Divine Attributes and Actions. (These latter are above the reach of time and beyond the limit of minds), then too their interpretation is the same reality that exists or shall exist outside imagination.

There is a big difference between the verses that describe these last-mentioned realities (attributes and actions of Allāh and the affairs related to the Day of Resurrection) and those describing other subjects. It is possible to know the interpretation of the verses that describe other subjects; but so far as the verses describing the Divine Attributes etc., are concerned, none knows their interpretation except Allāh; although those who are firmly rooted in knowledge may be given this knowledge by Allāh to the extent of their mental capacities and spiritual perfection. Still, the reality, that is, the full and final interpretation, is not given to any creature at all.

These are the four main opinions concerning the meaning of ‘‘interpretation’’. There are some other views also; they are, in fact, various branches of the first opinion although those who expressed them have not acknowledged this fact: —

1. Exegesis is more general than interpretation. Exegesis is mostly used for explanation of words; interpretation is mostly used for explanation of the meanings and sentences. The term, ‘‘interpretation’’ is generally used only for the Divine Books; while exegesis is used for other books too.

2. Exegesis is explanation of a word that has only one meaning; interpretation is choosing, with help of some rules and reason, one meaning out of several possible ones.

3. Exgesis shows the definite meaning of the word; interpretation chooses one among many possible meanings. (It is not very different from no. 2.)

4. Exegesis shows the reason of the meaning; interpretation explains the reality of the meaning. For example, look at the verse: Most surely your Lord is on watch (89:14). Its exegesis shall be as follows: ‘‘al-Mirṣād’’ (اَلْمِرْصَادُ = watching place) is on paradigm of al-mif‘āl (اَلْمِفْعَالُ) from the verb raṣada; yarṣudu (رَصَدَ ، يَرْصُدُ = he watched; he is watching). And its interpretation is the warning against slackening in matters of the sharī‘ah and thinking little of the commandments of Allāh.

5. Exegesis is a description of the clear meaning of a word; interpretation is the explanation of its difficult meaning.

6. Exegesis is concerned with tradition and narration; interepretation is related to reason.

7. Exegesis is limited to following and listening (what the ancients said); interpretation is concerned with inference and reason.

These seven are in fact various facets of the first opinion; and all objections levelled against that are valid about these too. Anyhow, one cannot rely on any of the four opinions or their branches.

One defect is common to all: They presume that ‘‘interpretation’’ is the meaning of the verse, or that it is the happening or cause to which the verse refers. But it has been explained in the Commentary that ‘‘interpretation’’ is not the meaning of a verse — it does not matter whether the meaning is the apparent one or is against it. Also, it has been clarified therein that although interpretation is a real event or fact, but not every event — it is that fact with which the word has the same relation as a proverb has with its purpose; or as an exterior has with its interior.

The detailed comments on the four opinions are as follows:

About the first opinion: One who believes it, must also believe that at least some of the Qur'ānic verses are unintelligible; that its ''interpretation'', that is, exegesis cannot be understood from its words. But there is no such verse in the Qur'ān; the Qur'ān clearly says that it has been revealed so that an average mind may easily understand it.

A man having this opinion cannot avoid this difficulty except by saying that the only ambiguous verses are the letter-symbols at the beginning of some chapters, as their meanings are not known to the people. But, there is no proof that only the letter-symbols are ''ambiguous''; and just because at-ta'wīl means to return and at-tafsīr (اَلتَّفْسِيْرُ = exegesis) also has a shade of this meaning in it, it does not follow that both are synonymous — a mother is the returning place for her children, but she is not their ''interpretation''; a principal is the returning place of his dependents, but he is not their ''interpretation''. Moreover, according to the verse, one of the characteristics of the ambiguous verses is that perverted persons follow them to mislead the people. But who has ever been misled by letter-symbols? Most of the misguidance in Muslim community has occurred because of following those verses that describe the attributes of Allāh and other such things.

About the second opinion: It says that there are verses in the Qur'ān whose intended import is against their apparent meanings, and those apparent meanings cause misguidance in religion as they are against the decisive verses. This statement boils down to this: The verses of the Qur'ān are contradictory to each other and that contradiction cannot be removed unless some verses are deprived of their open meanings and given some such connotations that, in normal course, would not be understood from them.

This, in its turn, would invalidate the argument contained in the words of Allāh: Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ān? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82).

If the discrepancy between two verses can be removed only by saying that one or both do not mean what their words apparently say; that they have an interpretation (i.e., a meaning against the apparent one) that is not known to anyone other than Allāh, then the verse 4:82, written above, cannot prove that the Qur'ān is from Allāh. One can easily remove contradiction and discrepancy from any literary or academic work of any author, if one were to change the apparent meanings of contradictory statements and give them new connotations unknown to any linguist. But such removal of contradiction would not prove that that work is a Divine revelation. The fact is that every speech — even one that is admittedly false or is just a jumble of words — can be presented as a true fact or a serious discourse if its words were given some hitherto unknown meanings against their clear connotations. But such an absence of discrepancy would not mean that that speech was from a Speaker Who is above the changes, Whose decrees and statements do not contradict each other, Who is not liable to forgetfulness and error, Who is Allperfect by Himself and has not acquired perfection through trial and error, experience and passage of time.

The verse 4:82, proves that the Qur'ān is understandable to common minds and may be pondered and meditated upon; that no verse of it has a meaning that is against the clear dictate of Arabic language; in short, it does not contain puzzles and riddles.

About the third opinion: No one who has meditated on the Qur'ān would deny that the Qur'ānic verses have various consecutive connotations — one behind the other. But all those connotations are, in fact, various levels of the meanings of the words — and especially so if we say that they are concomitants of the first meaning. And their understandability varies according to the intelligence levels of the readers. But this idea has no resemblance with at-ta'wīl (interpretation). Remember what Allāh has said about the ''interpretation'' of the Qur'ān that none knows it except Allāh. And note the fact that one does not need piety and spiritual purity to understand a complicated or deep philosophical discourse; what one requires is a sharp intelligence. Then you will realize that it would be inappropriate to say that only Allāh knew the interpretation (in the meaning given in this opinion) of the Qur'ān. (It does not mean that piety and spiritual purity do not help in comprehension of Divine knowledge and realities; but they are not the main foundation of this comprehension. This place is reserved for intelligence and scholarship.)

About the fourth opinion: He is right when he says that at-ta'wīl (interpretation) is not restricted to the ambiguous verses, it is found in the whole Qur'ān. Also, he is right in saying that interpretation is not the meaning of the word; it is a real fact on which the speech is based. But he is wrong when he says that every fact, referred to by the verse, is its interpretation, and when he says, for example, that the past events or the future happenings are the interpretations of the relevant verses. Again, he is wrong in thinking that only the verses describing the Divine Attributes and the events of the Day of Resurrection are ambiguous. Why do we say that he is wrong in these assumptions? The answer is as follows:

What is the meaning of the words: ''and seeking to give it (their own) interpretation, but none knows its interpretation except Allāh''? Do the pronoun ''it'' and ''its'' refer to ''the Book''? In other words, does the verse say that none knows the interpretation of the whole Book except Allāh? If the interpretation means real events and causes mentioned in the verses, then the above statement would not be correct, because interpretations (in the. meaning just described) of a great many verses are known to many other than Allāh and other than those who are firmly rooted in knowledge; in fact, it may be known to even those in whose hearts there is perversity — such are the verses narrating the stories of the past nations and the current events, and even the verses dealing with laws and ethics. Everyone can acquire the knowledge of these things, and no one can fail to understand their interpretation (in this meaning).

Or, do the pronouns, ''it'' and ''its'' refer to ''the part of the Book that is ambiguous''? If so, then it will be correct to restrict the knowledge of its interpretation to Allāh (or to Allāh and those firmly rooted in knowledge). And then it would be the import of the verse that none, except Allāh (and those firmly rooted in knowledge) should seek to interpret the ambiguous verses; otherwise, the people would be misled and misguided.

But it would be wrong in this case to say that only the verses describing the attributes and actions of Allāh, and those connected with the Day of Judgement were ambiguous. Misguidance is caused by misinterpretation of other types of verses too; for example, the verses related to the sharī'ah and the stories of the prophets and their nations. It has been claimed by a group that the main purpose of the law is to reform and develop the society; if the good of the society depends on a law other than the one ordained by religion, or if that ordained law is no longer suitable for this enlightened era, a new law should be adopted and the religious command should be discarded. Likewise, it has been claimed that the miracles attributed by the Qur'ān to the prophets were not supernatural events; they were normal occurrences, which the Qur'ān narrated in a way as to put on them a halo of mystery; as a result of this dramatic style, it succeeded in attracting the attention of the audience and to make them submit to what they thought to be a super-power, above all powers. Such misleading explanations and interpretations are found in their hundreds in all the sects that have deviated from true Islam. And all are the result of interpreting the Qur'ān according to one's own liking, seeking to mislead the people. Therefore, it is wrong to say that only those verses are ambiguous which describe the Divine Attributes and the affairs of the Day of Resurrection.

Now, it should be clear that the meaning of ''interpretation'' given by us in the Commentary is the only true one:

Interpretation is that reality to which a verse refers; it is found in all verses, the decisive and the ambiguous alike; it is not a sort of a meaning of the word; it is a real fact that is too sublime for words; Allāh has dressed them with words so as to bring them a bit nearer to our minds; in this respect they are like proverbs that are used to create a picture in the mind and thus help the hearer to clearly grasp the intended idea. That is why Allāh has said: (I swear) by the Book that makes manifest (the truth); surely We have made it an Arabic Qur'ān, so that you may understand. And surely it is in the original of the Book with Us, truly elevated, full of wisdom (43:2 — 4). And this thing has been explicitly and implicitly mentioned in several Qur'ānic verses.

Moreover, you have seen in the Commentary that whenever the Qur'ān uses the word, ''interpretation'' (and it has been used seventeen times), it intends this very meaning, described by us.

4. Does Anyone, Other than Allāh, know the ''interpretation'' of the Qur'ān

This issue too has caused sharp controversy among the exegetes. The main reason of the controversy is the meaning of ‘‘and’’, in the sentence, ‘‘and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge say: We believe in it, it is all from our Lord’’. Is it a conjunctive? Or, has it been used only to begin a new sentence?

Some early exegetes, some Shāfi‘ites and most of the Shī‘ites believe that it is a conjunctive; that the verse says that those too who are firmly rooted in knowledge know the interpretation of the ambiguous verses of the Qur’ān.

Most of the early exegetes and the Ḥanafites believe that with this ‘‘and’’ a new sentence begins; that none knows the interpretation of the ambiguous except Allāh, Who has kept this knowledge to Himself. Both groups bring in their support a lot of academic explanations and traditions; the polemics goes on, arguments are put forward, are refuted by the opposite group, then the refutations in their turn are refuted; thus it goes on and on.

Both sides suffer from confusion about the issue to be decided. They have confused the interpretation of the Qur’ān with returning the ambiguous verse to the decisive. Therefore, it will be a waste of time and space to quote here their arguments and counter-arguments. So far as the traditions are concerned they are against the clear meaning of the Qur’ān:

1. Let us look, to begin with, at the traditions that say that those who are firmly rooted in knowledge know the interpretation. These traditions use ‘‘interpretation’’ as synonymous for the ‘‘intended meaning of the ambiguous’’; but, as mentioned repeatedly, interpretation of the Qur’ān is something else.

It has been narrated through the Sunnī chains that the Prophet prayed for Ibn ‘Abbās: ‘‘O Allāh! give him knowledge of the religion and teach him the interpretation.’’ And Ibn ‘Abbās is reported as saying: ‘‘I am among those who are firmly rooted in knowledge and I know its interpretation.’’ Also he said: ‘‘The decisive are the verses that abrogated and the ambiguous are the abrogated ones.’’ All these traditions put together give an impression that the decisive verse is the interpretation of the ambiguous one.

But we have already explained that this verse is not concerned with this sort of interpretation.

2. Now we come to those traditions that show that knowledge of the interpretation of the ambiguous verses is restricted to Allāh:

a) Ibn ‘Abbās is reported to recite the verse in this way: ‘‘and none knows its interpretation except Allāh, and say those who are firmly rooted in knowledge: ‘We believe in it . . .’ ’’ The same recitation is ascribed to Ubay ibn Ka‘b. Likewise, Ibn Mas‘ūd is reported to recite: ‘‘And its interpretation is not except with Allāh. And those who are firmly rooted in knowledge say: ‘We believe in it . . .’ ’’

But such traditions can prove nothing: First, because such uncommon recitations are of no value at all; secondly, utmost that can be shown from them is that this verse does not prove that those who are firmly rooted in knowledge know the interpretation; but there is a world of difference between not proving that Zayd exists and proving that he does not exist.

b) It is narrated by aṭ-Ṭabarānī from Abū Mālik al-Ash‘arī that he heard the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) saying: ‘‘I am not afraid for my ummah but from three things: that their wealth would increase, and they would envy each other and kill each other; and that the Book would be opened for them, and the believer would take it seeking to interpret it, and none knows its interpretation except Allāh; and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge say: ‘We believe in it, it is all from our Lord’; and none do mind except those having understanding; and that their knowledge would increase and they would waste and neglect it.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

This tradition — if we accept that it has any relation with the subject matter — would only show that common believers did not know the interpretation; but it could not be proved from it that those too who were firmly rooted in knowledge did not have its knowledge. And the controversy is about this latter group; it is not about general believers.

c) Some people offer those traditions as their proof which say that the decisive verses should be followed and ambiguous ones should only be believed in.

But such traditions have no relevance to the issue under dispute.

d) al-Ālūsī has quoted in his at-Tafsīr: al-Marfū' (اَلْمَرْفُوْعُ)[1] tradition through Ibn Jarīr from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ''The Qur'ān has been revealed on four words: The lawful, and the prohibited (none is excused from acquiring its knowledge); and the explanation (it is done by the scholars); and the ambiguous, none knows it except Allāh, and the one who claims to know it (except Allāh) is a liar.''

Let us have a cursory glance at this tradition: First, some names from the chain of its narrators are omitted. Secondly, it is against the previously mentioned traditions that say that the Prophet prayed for him to be given the knowledge of interpretation, and against his own claim that he had this knowledge. Thirdly, it is against the clear import of the Qur'ān that interpretation is something other than the meaning of the ambiguous.

What is, then, the reply to the question asked in the beginning? Does anyone, other than Allāh, know the interpretation of the Qur'ān? The answer is: Yes, the Qur'ān proves the possibility of the knowledge of its interpretation to someone other than Allāh; although this verse does not prove it.

Let us explain the second statement first. The context shows the theme of this verse: It wants to say that the Book is divided in two categories — the decisive and the ambiguous — and also the people are of two types: there is a group which, because of perversity of hearts, seeks to follow the ambiguous verses; and there is another group that is firmly rooted in knowledge and therefore follows the decisive verses and believes in the ambiguous ones. It is clear, in this light, that the phrase, ''those who are firmly rooted in knowledge'', is used here primarily to describe their good faith and behaviour vis-a-vis the Qur'ān, and to extol their virtue in contrast to those in whose hearts there is perversity. The sentence aims at nothing else. And there is no reason, so far as this verse is concerned, to join those who are firmly rooted in knowledge, with Allāh, in knowledge of the Book's interpretation. The arguments put forward in this respect are defective, as we have shown above.

[1] al-Marfū': is a tradition in which a narrator mentions the name/s of person/s from whom he narrates, but a later narrator omits his/their name/s. (tr.)

In short, the restriction, ‘‘none knows its interpretation except Allāh’’, remains valid, without any opposing or qualifying clause — there is no conjunction, exception or qualification in this absolute statement. Therefore, so far as this verse is concerned, the knowledge of the Qur’ān’s interpretation is reserved for Allāh.

Nevertheless, there may be other proofs to show that someone, other than Allāh, may be knowing this interpretation. There are in the Qur’ān instances in which an absolute restriction of one verse has been qualified by another. Take the example of the knowledge of the unseen. The Qur’ān has declared in many verses that it is confined to Allāh:

Say: ‘‘No one in the heavens and the earth knows the unseen but Allāh’’ (27:65).

Say: ‘‘The unseen is only for Allāh’’ (10:20).

And with Him are the keys of the unseen — none knows them but He (6:59).

And after all these restricting statements, comes the following verse:

The Knower of the unseen! so He does not reveal His secrets to any, except to him whom He chooses of an apostle’’ (72:26 — 27).

This verse clearly says that some persons other than Allāh, that is, the chosen apostles, are given the knowledge of the unseen.

Now time has come to discuss the first statement: Other verses of the Qur’ān prove that it is possible for someone, other than Allāh, to have the knowledge of the Qur’ān’s interpretation:

As repeatedly explained, interpretation is a real fact existing outside imagination, and the meaning of the verse has the same relation with it as a proverb has with its purpose and purport. Interpretation is not the meaning of the verse; rather it transpires through that meaning — a special sort of transpiration. There is a proverb in Arabic used when someone intends to do a work but has already destroyed its means: ‘‘In summer you spoiled the milk.’’ When it is used, its literal meaning (a woman’s spoiling the milk in summer) does not fit the occasion, yet it presents a clear picture before the eyes of the audience, and that picture leads to the purpose of the talk.

The same is the case of the interpretation. There is a spiritual reality which is the main objective of ordaining a law, or basic aim of describing a Divine Attribute; there is an actual significance to which a Qur'ānic story refers. That spiritual reality or actual significance is not seen in the words or the meaning of the verse — that order, prohibition, explanation, or narration does not mention that spiritual reality or actual significance in its words. But it transpires from that order etc., because the order etc., is founded it We may as well say that the order or story etc., points to that spiritual reality or significance. A man tells his servant: ''Give me water to drink.'' This order emanates from the natural instinct of man to perfect his existence. It is this basic reality that demands preservation of self; this in its turn arranges to replace what is used up in the body; this requires replenishment with food and drink; this need is announced through hunger and thirst; thirst demands satiation, which in its turn causes the man to give that order to his servant. The interpretation of the said order, therefore, is the natural instinct of man to perfect his existence. If this reality, this natural instinct, changes for any reason, the order, ''Give me water'', also would change.

Likewise, various societies have some recognized ethical and social norms based on what they think to be good or evil. This in its turn, depends on a set of customs and traditions that are firmly settled in the doer's mind, through heredity and environment. This compound cause is the interpretation of his action and inaction. If those social factors change for any reason, his action and inaction will also change.

A subject — whether it is an order, a story or any other topic — that has an interpretation will certainly change if that interpreation changes. Now ponder on the words of Allāh: then as for those in whose hearts there is perversity, they follow the part of it which is ambiguous, seeking to mislead, and seeking to give it (their own) interpretation, but none knows its interpretation except Allāh. Note that they have been condemned because they try to give that verse their own interpretation which is not the real one; and this misinterpretation causes misguidance and makes people go astray.

Had they followed its true interpretation then it could not be condemned. They would have followed truth and reality, it would have led them to the relevant decisive verses, and it would have been a praiseworthy act.

Now it is clear that the interpretations of the Qur'ān are the facts actually existing outside imagination; the Qur'ānic verses its spiritual realities, laws and stories — are based upon them; if supposedly any of those facts changes for any reason, the relevant verses would also surely change.

This fits perfectly the purport of the verse: (We swear) by the Book that makes manifest (the truth), surely We have made it an Arabic Qur'ān so that you may understand. And surely it is in the original of the Book with Us, truly elevated, full of wisdom (43:2 — 4). This verse shows that the Qur'ān, when it was with Allāh, was too elevated to be comprehended by human understanding; too precise and firm to admit any break or fragmentation. But Allāh, because of His mercy, made it into a Book to be recited, and clothed it with Arabic language, so that people may understand what they could not comprehend as long as it was in the original, or basis, of the Book. This original or basis of the Book has been mentioned in these verses: Allāh effaces what He pleases and establishes (likewise), and with Him is the basis of the Book (13:39); Nay! it is a glorious Qur'ān, in a guarded tablet (85:21 — 22).

And in a general way the following verse also proves it:

(This is) a Book, whose verses were confirmed (or, made decisive), then they were divided, from one Wise, All-aware (11:1). The confirmation and decisiveness refers to its condition when it was with Allāh without any fragmentation or break, and the division refers to that state when it was made into chapters and verses and was revealed to the Prophet.

This last condition (division), which is based on the first (confirmation), is mentioned in the verse: And a Qur'ān which We revealed in portions so that you may read it to the people by slow degrees, and We sent it down (i.e., revealed it) in portions (17:106). It is clear that the Qur'ān, in its original, was undivided, then it was made into portions and sent down piecemeal and revealed gradually.

The above statement does not mean that the whole Qur'ān, when it was with Allāh, was arranged in chapters and verses, a sort of a book written and bound, and then it was divided into pieces and sent to the Prophet a little bit at a time, so that he might read to the people by slow degrees, as a teacher divides a book in portions and teaches the student every day a portion according to his mental capacity. There is a basic difference between revealing the Qur'ān to the Prophet in portions and teaching a student a book, piece by piece. The verses were revealed according to the events that had a bearing on their revelation. But there is no such thing in teaching of a student. Various pieces that are to be taught to a student may be, and are, gathered and put together in a book form beforehand; then the teacher teaches a piece or a portion every day, as he thinks fit. But it cannot be said about many Qur'ānic verses, such as the following: so forgive them and pass over them (5:13); fight those of the unbelievers who are near to you (9:123); Allāh has surely heard the plea of her who pleads with you about her husband and complains to Allāh (58:1); Take alms out of their wealth, you would cleanse them and purify them thereby (9:103); there are numerous such verses. It is not possible to ignore the reasons and occasions that resulted in their revelation; one cannot arbitrarily say that this or that verse was revealed in the earlier or later days of the Call, discarding the reasons of its revelation. Therefore, it cannot be said that the Qur'ān was with Allāh in chapters and verses, as we know, it today.

And it shows that the ''Qur'ān'' mentioned in the verse, ''And a Qur'ān which We revealed in portions'', refers to a Qur'ān other than this one which is made of chapters and verses.

What one understands from the above verses, is that there is something, beyond this Qur'ān which is read and understood by us. And that ''something'' has the same relation with this Qur'ān as the spirit has with the body, or as the significance of a proverb has with that proverb. It is that spirit of this Qur'ān which is called by Allāh as: the confirmed (or wise) Book (10:1). The Qur'ānic teachings and meanings depend upon it. That spirit of the Qur'ān is not made of words or words' meanings.

The above-mentioned characteristics of the spirit of the Qur'ān are the same as those of the ''interpretation'' of the Qur'ān. The above discourse makes it even clearer; and makes us realize why it is said that the interpretation of the Qur'ān cannot be even touched by common minds and unclean spirits.

Then Allāh says: Most surely it is an honoued Qur'ān, in a Book that is hidden; none do touch it save the purified ones (56:77 — 79). These verses clearly say that the purified servants of Allāh do touch the honoured Book which is hidden and protected from any change; minds cannot reach it, because that also would be a sort of a change. Anyhow, the purified ones do touch it — the only meaning of the words — ''touch'' in this context is that they know it and understand it. Also, it is known that this hidden Book is the same ''basis of the Book'' and ''original of the Book'' mentioned in the verses: Allāh effaces what He pleases and establishes (likewise), and with Him is the basis of the Book (13:39); and surely it is in the original of the Book with Us, truly elevated, full of wisdom (43:4).

Those are the people whose heart are purified; and this purification emanates from none other than Allāh, because He has attributed this purifying to Himself: Allāh only desires to keep away the uncleanliness from you, O People of the House! and to purify you a (thorough) purifying (33:33); . . . but He intends to purify you (5:6). Wherever in the Qur'ān, the spiritual purification is mentioned Allāh has attributed it to Himself or to His permission. What is this purity? It is removal of impurity and uncleanliness from the heart. What is meant by ''heart'' in this context? It is the means of perception, understanding and will. The purity of heart, then, is the purity of the soul in knowledge and belief as well as in will. Thus, the heart remains firm in its true beliefs, without any doubt or confusion; and this firmness makes it steadfast in following and acting upon that true belief and knowledge, obeying the commandments of Allāh, without deviating to the path of desire, without breaking the covenant of knowledge. Such a man is said to be firmly rooted in knowledge. Because the same are the characteristics, described by Allāh, of those who are firmly rooted in knowledge. Allāh has praised them that they are rightly guided and steadfastly firm on what they know; that there is no perversity in their hearts and they do not seek to mislead the people. These are the same characteristics as of the purified ones. It means that the purified ones are firmly rooted in knowledge.

But there is a fine distinction that should not be overlooked. What has been proved above is this: The purified ones know the interpretation of the Qur'ān; and it is a concomitant of their purity that they are also firmly rooted in knowledge — because that purification is attributed to Allāh Who cannot fail in what He intends.

But it does not mean that the knowledge of the Qur'ānic interpretation is given to them because of their being firmly rooted in knowledge. In other words, the firmly rooted knowledge is not the cause of their knowledge of the Qur'ānic interpretation, because the verse does not prove it; rather it may be inferred from its context that they were not conversant with that interpretation: ''(they) say: 'We believe in it, it is all from our Lord' ''. Moreover, Allāh has praised some of the people of the Book that they were firmly rooted in knowledge, and has extolled them for their acceptance of true faith and good deeds; and still it does not show that they knew the interpretation of the Book. The relevant verse is as follows: But those firmly rooted in knowledge among them as well as the believers believe in what has been sent down to you and what has been sent down before you . . . (4:162).

Also, it should be noted that the verse: None do touch it save the purified ones (56:79), proves only that the purified ones ''touch'' the hidden Book; in other words, they know the interpretation of the Qur'ān to a certain extent. But it does not say that they have comprehensive knowledge of its complete interpretation, or that they are not unacquainted of any portion of its interpretation at any time. The verse is silent on this matter. If it is to be proved, some other evidence should be brought for it.

5. Why the Book Contains the Ambiguous Verses

One of the objections levelled against the Qur'ān is the one based on the presence of the ambiguous verses in it. They say: The Muslims claim that whatever the mankind would need for its guidance upto the Day of Resurrection is in the Qur'ān; that it is a decisive word that distinguishes between truth and falsehood. And then we see that every group, among the innumerable Muslim sects, relies on the Qur'ān to prove the correctness of its beliefs and actions. It would not have been possible if there were no ambiguity in its verses. Had this Book been made clear and kept free from this maze of ambiguous verses, it would have served its purpose in a better way, and there would not have been any chance of controversy and perversity.

The Muslims have variously replied to this objection; some of the replies are patently absurd and foolish. For example:

''The presence of ambiguous verses makes it hard to get to the truth, and entails intense search and research. This makes the true believer eligible to better and greater reward! ''

''Had it clearly supported a certain sect, all other sects would have left it unread and unstudied. It is because of the ambiguous verses that all of them look into, and ponder on it; and thus there remains a possibility that they would see the right path and follow it.''

''The ambiguous verses have made it necessary to seek support of one's views from rational arguments. Thus, these verses take the Muslims out of the darkness of blind following into the light of contemplation and research.''

''The presence of such verses compelled the Muslims to argue about their various interpretations; and this is in its turn led them to master various branches of knowledge, like language, conjugation, syntax, and fundamentals of jurisprudence! ''

Such replies do not merit any comment. There are three other replies which we append below with our comments:

First: The Qur'ān contains ambiguous verses, so that the hearts may be purified by believing in them. Had all the verses been distinct, decisive and clear — about which nobody could have any doubt — believing in them would have not been a meaningful and significant thing; it would have not entailed surrender to the words of Allāh and submission to His apostles.

Comment: Submission is the reaction of a weaker person in front of a stronger force. A man surrenders before a thing, the greatness of which he comprehends; or before a thing that is beyond his comprehension, and with whose greatness he is completely overwhelmed; like the power, greatness and other Attributes of Allāh — when man tries to understand them, he feels stunned and bewildered.

But why should he submit to a thing which, although beyond his comprehension, seems to him within his grasp? If a man mistakenly believes that he knows the interpretation of an ambiguous verse (although in fact he does not know it), he will never submit himself to it nor will he surrender before its greatness.

Second: Ambiguous verses were revealed to motivate the minds to meditate and research. Had all the verses been distinct there would not have been any need for mental exercise and the power of understanding would have withered away. And understanding is the most precious element of human life; it must be nourished and developed for the sake of human perfection.

Comment: Allāh has ordered the man to meditate and ponder on the signs found in the universe and in the man himself — this exhortation is sometimes phrased in general terms and often with reference to particular subjects, like the creation of the heavens, the earth, the mountains, the trees, the animals and the human beings; the difference in colours and languages of mankind etc. He has called him to think and meditate, to walk in the earth and take lesson from the previous nations' affairs. He has forcefully urged them to apply the minds to the wonders of the world and to think hard. And He has extolled knowledge and cognition in the best terms.

Was not all this enough for sharpening the mind and intensifying the intelligence? Was there any further need of sending down ambiguous verses — to trap the minds and ensnare the intellect?

Third: The prophets were sent to all the people — the average ones and the above average, the intelligent and the dull, the learned and the ignorant. Some realities and ideas cannot be explained in plain language. Such subjects must necessarily be described in a language clothed with allegory and metaphor. Only the learned, intelligent and the above average persons will be able to understand it; common people must necessarily be told to believe in it and leave the matter to Allāh.

Comment: The Book, according to the verse under discussion, contains some ambiguous verses, and some decisive ones which are the basis of the Book, and which do explain the ambiguous verses when they are returned to them (decisive ones). In other words, the ambiguous verses do not contain any ideas other than those which may be clarified by the decisive ones. And it leaves the question still unanswered: What is the use of the ambiguous verses when all their meanings are clearly described by the decisive ones?

The exegete, who wrote this reply, seems a bit confused. He has divided the meanings of the Qur'ān into two mutuallyexclusive groups: Meanings that may be understood by one and all (and they are the meanings of the decisive verses), and those that cannot be understood except by some special people (and they are the connotations of the ambiguous ones). If we accept this classification, then the ambiguous verses shall not be returned to the decisive ones — but it is against the clear declarations of the Qur'ān that its verses explain each other.

If no reply is free from defect, then what is the answer to the question given in the beginning?

The fact is that the presence of ambiguous verses is necessary in the Qur'ān, and it has resulted from the existence of the interpretation. When we use the word, ''interpretation'', we refer to its true connotation explained under the third heading. Various ambiguous verses, when compared with each other, lead to the said interpretation.

To understand this statement, one should first ponder on the style of the Qur'ān, the factors on which the Divine teachings are based, and the ultimate aim of the revelation. We may describe it as following:

1. Allāh has said that there is an interpretation for His Book. All the Qur'ānic realities, laws and teachings move around that interpretation. But the said interpretation is a sublime reality; minds cannot grasp it; intelligence cannot reach it; and imagination cannot perceive it. The only exception is of those purified souls from whom Allāh has removed every impurity; only they can touch it.

It is the ultimate that Allāh demands from human beings — that they should answer His call to acquire the real knowledge of His Book. This Book has the explanation of everything, and the key to its secrets is the Divine Purification. Allāh says: Allāh does not desire to put on you any difficulty, but He wishes to purify you (5:7). In other words, the ultimate aim of ordination of the sharī'ah is the said Divine Purification.

This human perfection, like other ideals, is not attained except by a few special persons, although the Call is addressed to all. The religious training creates purity in various degrees in various people. Some reach its highest point, some to various points in between. It is like the piety (i.e., fear of Allāh) to which Islam invites: . . . fear Allāh as is due to Him . . . (3:102). But only a handful of believers acquire perfect piety; others remain behind them, and a third band behind the second, and so on. It happens because people differ in their aptitudes and understanding.

The same is the case with social norms. The society expects every member to reach the zenith of all desirable characteristics, like knowledge, industry, riches, comfort etc. — but only a few attain this goal; others remain behind at various points in the way, because of difference in their abilities.

Although society never remains without some individuals who attain the highest possible rank in all perfections, not everyone reaches there.

2. The Qur'ān declares that the only way by which a man can reach this destination is to know himself, by acquiring true knowledge and acting upon it. On the side of knowledge, he should be taught the realities about his beginning and end as well as about what is between these two points; then he may truly know himself, in the context of all relevant realities. On the side of action, he should be made to follow the social rules — the rules that would make him live a good social life, and would not hinder him from the pursuit of knowledge and contemplation; then he should be told to perform rites of Divine Worship — these rites, if performed regularly, draw the soul towards the Creator, help the heart in concentrating on one's beginning and end, and bring it nearer to the spiritual perfection and purity, keeping it clean from the filth and dirt of materialism.

First study the verse: To Him do ascend the good words; and the good deed lifts them up (35:10). Then add to it the following, among other such verses:

> Allāh does not desire to put on you any difficulty, but He wishes to purify you and that He may complete His favour on you . . . (5:7).

O you who believe! take care of your souls; he who errs cannot hurt you when you are on the right way (5:105).

Allāh will exalt those of you who believe and those who are given knowledge, in high degrees (58:11).

Then you will clearly see what was the aim of Allāh in sending down the religion and guiding the man to it, and appreciate the way He used for this guidance.

Through all this, we reach to an important conclusion:

The social laws of Islam are the stepping stones for the rites of Divine Worship, which in their turn lead the man to the knowledge of Allāh and of His Signs. Even a minor infringement of, and change or alteration in, these social laws would disturb and deflect the commandments concerning Divine Worship; and that in its turn would disrupt the man's knowlede of Allāh.

It is a clear conclusion; and the experience shows its truth. If you ponder on the manner in which corruption stealthily crept into Islamic affairs, and find out how it began and where it has reached, you will see that it began with social laws, then surreptitiously it contaminated the rites of worship and ended with the rejection of the spiritual realities and man's knowledge of Allāh.

Also, it was described earlier that the misleading began with following the ambiguous verses, seeking to interpret them according to the people's own liking.

3. Religious guidance is based on two pillars: Prohibition of blind following, and progress of knowledge among the religionists to the furthest limit. It is in conformity with the ultimate goal of Islam, that is, the knowledge. There is not a single Divine Book, nor a single religion, that puts so much empahsis on knowledge, and so forcefully exhorts its followers to seek it to the farthest corners of the world as Islam does.

That is why the Qur'ān explains first, the spiritual realities, and then shows the relation of its practical laws to those realities. It tells the man that he exists because Allāh has created him by His own power; and has appointed some intermediate agents for his creation and survival, like the angels, the skies, the earth, the sun, the moon, the stars, the vegetables, the animals and, in short, the time and the space. Now he is being irresistibly driven towards his returning place and time; striving hard to reach his Lord to meet Him; then he shall be recompensed for what he has done — either to the paradise or to the hell. This is the first set of the spiritual knowledge.

Then the Qur'ān teaches him which deeds would lead him to the felicity of the paradise, and which to the infelicity of the hell. In other words, it teaches him the rules of Divine Worship and the social laws. This is the second set of that knowledge.

Then it makes him understand that these laws and commandments lead to the bliss in the next world. In other words, it tells him that the second set is related to the first; that these laws have been ordained for his own benefit, as they contain his good of this world as of the next. This is the third set.

The second set is like the preliminary; the first is like its conclusion; and the third is like the binding cord that joins the second set with the first. The verses describing all these sets are numerous and clear in their meaning; and it is not necessary to quote them here.

4. People, generally, do not comprehend what cannot be perceived by the five senses; they do not understand ideas and realities beyond the limit of matter and nature. And those who train their minds through academic exercises to understand abstract ideas and spiritual meanings, are not all on the same level — each attains a certain degree of intellectual development and can-not understand that which is beyond it. This phenomenon causes sharp divergence in their perception of spiritual and metaphysical subjects. This vast difference is a fact tha none can deny.

When we want to explain to someone a certain new idea we can do so only with the help of his previously acquired knowledge. If his perception is limited to the natural phenomena, that new idea can only be explained within the framework of that limited understanding. For example, if one wants to explain the ''taste'' of marriage to a minor child, one could only say that it was sweet like honey. And if that person has some advanced intellectual capacity, we may explain those spiritual realities to the extent of his ability.

Also, it should be understood that the religious guidance is not for a special group; it is for all the people.

5. These two factors — the difference in people's understanding and the fact that religious guidance is meant for all the people — together with the existence of the interpretation for the Qur'ān, made it necessary that the spiritual realities be described in the words and phrases akin to proverbs and simile. It takes what the man already knows and uses it, because of a certain similarity, to create a picture of what he does not know. As a commodity is weighed with a stone or iron weight — there is no resemblance between the stone or iron and that commodity in form or substance, mass or volume, kind or species; the only similarity is in weight.

The Qur'ān has, in the verses quoted earlier (e.g., Surely We have made it an Arabic Qur'ān, so that you may understand. And surely it is in the original of the Book with Us, truly elevated, full of wisdom, 43:3 — 4) has hinted to this fact. But it has not stopped there. It has described it clearly with the help of a parable concerning truth and falsehood; He sends down water from the heavens, then the valleys flow according to their measure, and the torrent bears along the swelling form, and from what they melt in the fire for the sake of (making) ornaments or apparatus arises a scum like it; thus does Allāh compare truth and falsehood; then as for the scum, it passes away as a worthless thing; and as for that which profits the people, it remains in the earth; thus does Allāh set forth parables (13:17).

This parable is as much true about Allāh's action as it is about His word. His action, like His word, is meant for truth; but both are accompanied by some unintended things. Those unintended things temporarily cover, and come above, the intended truth; but they soon go away; the truth remains and survives to benefit the people, and the scum is removed by another truth.

The above-mentioned phenomenon is a mirror of the ambiguous verses. Such a verse contains a true meaning that is actually intended; but it is accompanied by another unintended meaning that hides the intended one and races to the minds before it. But soon it is overcome and removed by another truth (a decisive verse) that indentifies the true meaning, and erases the unintended one, although it had temporarily gained the upper hand. It is so that the truth is shown to be truth by His words, and falsehood is seen to be falsehood, even though the guilty may be averse to it.

This explanation shows how the parable fits the Divine words; it may in the same manner be applied to His actions.

The parable shows that the Divine realities and spiritual knowledge are like the water which Allāh sends down from the heavens. At that time it is water, in the pure sense of the word, unencumbered with any other condition. Then it starts flowing in the valleys; and now it takes the shape of the watercourse — a wide river, a narraow stream and so on. These shapes and measures are established facts, they are not imaginary things. (In this respect they resemble the benefits of the rules of the sharī'ah — we have said that they are the binding cord that connect those rules with the spritual truths. This characteristic of the rules is an established fact; it does not depend on verbal description.)

Those rules, in the course of their flow, are often accompanied by swelling foam that appears for a time being and then vanishes. An example may be given of an abrogated verse; in the nature of thing it should have remained in force permanently, but another verse comes along, abrogates it, and puts another rule in its place. This development also is an established fact; it does not matter whether this religious reality has been clothed with words.

The spiritual realities and metaphysical ideas, inasmuch as they are placed in the containers of the words, take the shape of those containers; and are fettered with the demands of the word and the language — though originally they had no such limitation or restraint. These words are true and fact, because they were chosen by the truthful Speaker to convey His message. Yet they are like a similitude that represents the real meaning — the meaning that is unfettered by the words, unencumbered by the shapes of these containers. Therefore, the words pass through the minds of the hearers and unintended meanings surround them and ride high above them. It happens because the minds look at the words in the light of their previously acquired ideas. This mostly happens about those realities that are not familiar to common minds, like the spiritual facts, the real reason for which a certain rule was ordained and so on. But so far as the rules themselves are concerned, there occurs no change, because invariably always they talk about what is within the sphere of man's own activities, and is, therefore, familiar to him. This discourse shows that ambiguous verses are ambiguous because they contain the spiritual realities and not the rules of religion and sharī'ah.

6. Now we have reached the stage where we may explain why the presence of ambiguous verses was necessary in the Qur'ān.

The verbal expressions of the Qur'ān are like similitudes to the sublime Divine realities. Those realities have been brought down, in these verses, to the level of common minds. An average mind does not perceive except the natural phenomena; it cannot comprehend the abstract Divine realities unless they are put in the mould of concrete expressions.

When pure spiritual facts are expressed in terms of body and matter, either of the two things may happen — both of them dangerous:

a) The mind may stop at those material expressions, taking them to mean natural phenomena. It will thus fail to see the reality beyond those expressions. It will, in short, take a proverb in its literal sense, not knowing that it signifies something else; and that that something is often not shown by its letters. Thus the intended meaning will be neglected. The minds will not try to look behind the screen of the words, as it will not know that it has missed anything.

b) If the mind realizes that the verse is a sort of a similitude and tries to see beyond the curtain of the words, by removing from it unwanted elements that have no bearing on its intended significance, then there is a danger that it may discard some important element or leave intact some unnecessary one.

There is an Arabic proverb: ''In the morning, the travellers appreciate the previous night's journey.'' Because we know the story behind this saying, when we hear it, we dispense with all its surrounding details, like the morning, the travellers and the previous nights's journey. What we understand from the proverb is this: A work is appreciated only when it is completed and its good results begin to appear; but so long as the man is engaged in that work and is undergoing hardships in that activity he does not like it. If we did not know the story, and stopped at the literal meaning of the proverb, we would not know its significance, and the proverb would turn into a proposition or news.

On the other hand, if we did not know the story but realized that it was a proverb, we would not know how much of it should be discarded and what was its true significance.

There is only one way to avoid these two dangers, and that is to express that one significance in various proverbs, moulding each in a different mould — one proverb would contain some details that would be missing from the other, and the former would not have some details of the latter, and so on. In this way, those sentences would, through comparison and action and reaction, clarify each other and all together would show their true significance. First, the hearer, on hearing various expressions, would realize that they were not used in their literal sense; they were like the similitudes describing an abstract idea in the moulds of various concrete expressions. Thereafter, he would be in a position to know which details were to be discarded and which to be retained — because the essential factors would be present in every sentence, while unnecessary ones would be missing from one or the other.

This device to explain difficult ideas and complicated thoughts is not peculiar to the Qur'ān. It is found in every language, every nation and every place. Man, by his nature, knows that if only one story, proverb or similitude is given to illustrate an abstract idea, unessential details would confuse the minds, and might convey to them a wrong meaning. Therefore, he tries to make the audience understand his idea with the help of a lot of stories and varied similitudes. So that they may distinguish the true significance from the unnecessary details.

It is now crystal clear that it was necessary — nay, essential — that the Qur'ān should contain ambiguous verses; and that that ambiguousness should be removed with the help of other unambiguous verses. Those who object on the presence of such verses in the Qur'ān do not know what they are talking about.

6. Conclusion

This discourse on ambiguous and decisive verses and the Qur'ānic interpretation has become a bit lengthy. But through it, we have been able to clarify the following ten points:

First: The Qur'ān contains two kinds of verses, the decisive and the ambiguous. If a verse, seen alone, is capable of more than one meaning, it is ambiguous; otherwise, it is decisive.

Second: The whole Qur'ān, with all its decisive and ambiguous verses, has its interpretation. That interpretation is not the connotation of its words; it is an actually existing reality; a reality that has the same relation with the knowledge, facts and ideas mentioned in the Qur'ān, as the significance of a proverb has with that proverb. All the Qur'ānic knowledge is like a similitude for the Qur'ānic interpretation that is with Allāh.

Third: The interpretation may be known to the purified servants of Allāh; they are the ones who are also firmly rooted in knowledge.

Fourth: It has been said in the second conclusion that the Qur'ānic knowledge and ideas are like a similitude for the Qur'ānic interpretation. Now, we come to a further lower level, that is, the Qur'ānic words and expressions. These words and expressions, in their turn, are like a similitude to the abovementioned Qur'ānic knowledge, facts, and ideas.

Fifth: It was as essential for the Qur'ān to include some ambiguous verses, as it was to have some decisive ones.

Sixth: The decisive verses are the basis of the Book, to which the ambiguous ones are returned, that is, the latter are explained with the help of the former.

Seventh: Decisiveness and ambiguousness are relative qualities. The same verse may be decisive in one context and ambiguous in another. Also, it may be decisive in comparison to one verse and ambiguous in relation to the other.

There is no absolutely ambiguous verse in the Qur'ān; although there is no reason why one or more verses may not be decisive.

Eighth: It is essential that the verses of the Qur'ān should explain each other.

Ninth: The meaning of the Qur'ān has various grades. They are placed vertically one behind the other. They are not ranked side by side, horizontally; otherwise, it would entail the use of one word in more than one meaning — and it is not permissible. Nor are they like real and metaphorical meanings; nor like various adjunct meanings attached to a real one. Rather, they are all various grades of the one real meaning — thus, they all are its real meanings, and the peoples' minds comprehend its various grades, according to their intellectual and spiritual capacity.

This statement requires some elaboration:

Allāh has said: Fear Allāh as is due to Him (3:102). The word, ''at-taqwā'' (اَلتَّقْوي = piety, fear of Allāh), denotes abstaining from what Allah has forbidden and doing what He has ordered. As the verse shows, the highest grade of piety is the one mentioned therein: ''as is due to Allāh''. By inference, there must be other lower grades. ''Piety'', or in other words, ''good deeds'', are therefore of various grades, one above the other.

Also, He says: Is then he who follows the pleasure of Allāh like him who has brought upon himself the wrath from Allāh, and whose abode is hell? And it is an evil destination. They are of (diverse) grades with Allāh, and Allāh sees what they do (3:162 — 163).

It shows that all deeds — good and evil alike — are of various grades and ranks. That the diverse grades mentioned in the verse refer to the deeds, is clear from the concluding sentence, ''and Allāh sees what they do''. Two more verses are as follows:—

And for all are grades according to what they did, and so that He may pay them back fully their deeds and they shall not be dealt with unjustly (46:19).

And all have grades according to what they do; and your Lord is not heedless of what they do (6:132).

There are many verses of this tenor, and among them are those that show that the grades of the paradise and depths of the hell are based on the grades and degrees of the good and bad deeds respectively.

It is known that action, of whatever kind it may be, emanates from knowledge, that is, from the relevant conviction of the heart. That is why Allāh has proved infidelity of the Jews, evil intentions of the polytheists, and duplicity of the hypocrites from their actions; as the belief and faith of the prophets and the believers has been proved from their actions. The verses having this semantic flow are very numerous and there is no need to quote them here.

Every action emanates from a relevant knowledge and demonstrates it. And then that action enhances that relevant knowledge and belief and makes it firmly settled in the mind and soul. As Allāh says:

And (as for) those who strive hard for Us, We will most certainly guide them onto Our ways; and Allāh is most surely with the doers of good (29:69).

And worship thou thy Lord until there comes to you the certainty (or, that which is certain) (15:99).

Then evil was the end of those who did evil, because they rejected the signs of Allāh and used to mock them (30:10).

So He made hypocrisy to follow as a consequence into their hearts till the day when they shall meet Him because they failed to perform towards Allāh what they had promised with Him and because they told lies (9:77).

There are a lot of verses of this significance; and they show that every action — good or bad — creates knowledge or ignorance (i.e., wrong knowledge) respectively.

There is a verse that contains the gist of this topic about good deeds and useful knowledge:

To Him do ascend the good words; and the good deed lifts them up (35:10).

It clearly says that the good word, that is, true belief, ascends to Allāh and brings the believers nearer to Him; and the good deeds lifts this knowledge and belief up. The ascension of knowledge and belief depends on their purity from doubt and confusion; and on undisturbed attention of the soul towards Allāh. The more intense this purity, the higher the reach of that knowledge and belief.

The words used in the verse hint to this fact: The good words do ascend, and the good deeds do lift them up. Ascension is opposite of descension, and lifting up is opposite of putting down. When a thing moves from a lower to a higher level it is described in these two terms that look at the two points of the movement. It is said to be ascending, because it moves towards the higher level, coming nearer to it; and is said to be rising or lifting up, because it leaves the lower place moving away from it.

The good deeds lift the man up and remove him away from this transient world and its base desires. They do not let him ensnare himself in the trinkets of this material life, or to go and get lost in the maze of the unenduring and ever-changing ‘‘knowledge’’. The more the good deeds lift him up, the higher his good words do ascend, and purer becomes his spiritual knowledge, farther from the impurities of confusion, doubt and imagination.

The good deeds are of diverse grades and degrees; and every grade lifts the good words and creates the knowledge of Divine realities according to its own strength and condition.

The same details are true, in reverse, for the evil deeds and bad words, that is, wrong knowledge. Evil deeds sink down the man into the yawning depths of ignorance, hypocrisy and infidelity. This subject was discussed in short in the Commentary of the verse, Guide us to the straight path (1:6).

Now, it is clear from above that people are of different grades and ranks, so far as their nearness or distance from Allāh is concerned. It all depends on their good or evil deeds and good or evil words, that is, knowledge. It goes without saying that what people of a certain grade would understand from a Divine Speech would be quite different from what those on a higher or lower level would understand from the same. That is what we mean when we say that the Qur'ān has various meanings, all ranked vertically one behind the other.

Allāh has mentioned in the Qur'ān various categories of His servants, and has reserved for each a special kind of knowledge and cognition, For example:

a) Those who are freed (from sins) — they have been given knowledge of the attributes of their Lord: Hallowed be Allāh, from what they ascribe, except the servants of Allāh, freed (from sins) (37:159 — 160). They have also been given some other knowledge, which we shall describe, Allāh willing, in some other place.

b) Those who are sure — they have the distinction. of being shown the kingdom of the heavens and the earth: And thus did We show Ibrāhīm the kingdom of the heavens and the earth and that he might be of those who are sure (6:75).

c) Those who turn to Him again and again — they have been favoured with minding: . . . and none minds but he who turns (to Him) again and again (40:13).

d) The learned ones — they understand the parables of the Qur'ān: And these examples, We set them forth for the people, and none understand them but the learned (29:43). They are also the people of understanding who meditate on the Qur'ān: Do they not then reflect on the Qur'ān? Nay, on the hearts there are locks

(47:24); Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ān ? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82). The three verses point to the same meaning — those who understand and meditate on the Qur'ān, know the true meaning of the ambiguous verses returning them to the decisive ones.

e) The purified ones — they have the special distinction of the knowledge of the interpretation of the Book: Most surely it is an honoured Qur'ān, in a Book that is hidden; none do touch it save the purified ones (56:77 — 79).

f) The friends of Allāh — they are the people submerged in the love of Allāh; they are inattentive to everything other than Allāh; that is why they are afraid of nothing and grieve for nothing: Now surely the friends of Allāh — they shall have no fear nor shall they grieve (10:62).

Likewise, there are those who are near to Allāh, the chosen ones, the truthful ones, the good ones and the believers. Each of these groups has a special kind of knowledge and perception reserved to it; and we shall describe them under relevant verses.

Face to face with these, are the grades of evil and falsehood, every grade having a peculiar type of misinformation and ignorance. The people of those grades are called unbelievers, sinners, unjust and so on. They are inclined to misinterpret the signs of Allāh, and not to grasp the spiritual realities and their knowledge. For the sake of brevity, the verses are not given here.

Tenth: The Qur'ānic verses have the capacity to be applied wherever their meanings come true. A verse is not confined to the event or circumstances in which it was revealed. It covers all situations that are akin to the circumstances of its revelation. In this respect also they are like the proverbs that are not restricted to their original occasion, but are applied to all similar situations. The principle is called the ''flow of the Qur'ān'', of which a short description was written in the beginning of the first volume.

TRADITIONS

It is written in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī: Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) was asked about the decisive and the ambigous verses. He said: ‘‘The decisive is that which is acted upon; and the ambiguous is that which is doubtful for the one who is ignorant of it.’’

The author says: There is a hint in the last sentence that the knowledge of the meaning of the ambiguous verse is possible to him who is not ignorant of it.

The same book quotes the same Imām as saying: ‘‘The Qur’ān is decisive and ambiguous. As for the decisive, you believe in it, act upon it and submit to it; and as for the ambiguous, you believe in it but do not act upon it. And it is the word of Allāh, Mighty and Great is He: then as for those in whose hearts there is perversity, they follow the part of it which is ambiguous, seeking to mislead, and seeking to give it (their own) interpretation, but none knows its interpretation except Allāh; and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge say: ‘We believe in it, it is all from our Lord.’ And those who are firmly rooted in knowledge are the progeny of Muḥammad (s.a.w.s.).’’

The author says: We shall discuss the last sentence later.

The same book quotes Mas‘adah ibn Sadaqah as saying: ‘‘I asked Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) about the abrogating (verse), and the abrogated, and the decisive and ambiguous (ones). He said: ‘The abrogating is the firm (verse) that is acted upon; and the abrogated is the one that was acted upon and then came the verse that abrogated it; and the ambiguous is the one that is doubtful to him who is ignorant of it.’ ’’

In another tradition this reply is reported as follows: ‘‘The abrogating is the firm (verse); and the abrogated is the one that passed away; and the decisive is the one that is acted upon; and the ambiguous is the one whose one part resembles the other.’’

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a tradition: ‘‘So the abrogated (verses) are among the ambiguous ones.’’ (al-Kāfī) ar-Riḍā (a.s.) said: ‘‘He who returned the ambiguous (part) of the Qur’ān to its decisive (part), was guided to the straight path.’’ Then he said: ‘‘Verily, there is ambiguous in our traditions, like the ambiguous of the Qur'ān; therefore, return its ambiguous to its decisive, and do not follow its ambiguous, lest you go astray.'' ('Uyūnu 'l-akhbār)

The author says: All the above-mentioned traditions explain the term ''ambiguous'' in nearly the same way. All of them support our earlier statement that the verses' ambiguousness may be removed by explaining them in the light of the decisive verses. Also, it was explained why the abrogated verse was counted among the ambiguous: It is because it seems to promulgate a perpetual law and then comes the abrogating verse and shows that its ''perpetuity'' is cut short. The word of the Imām, that there was ambiguous in their traditions like the ambiguous of the Qur'ān and decisive like the decisive of the Qur'ān, is supported by many other traditions of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.), that are nearly al-mutawātir. Reason also supports it. Their traditions deal with the same subjects that are described in the Qur'ān; and ambiguousness is the characteristic of those subjects inasmuch as they are clothed with the words; it is not a characteristic of the word, per se. In short, ambiguousness happens because the verses are like the parables of the sublime spiritual facts. And this factor is equally present in the traditions. Therefore, like the Qur'ān, the traditions also are ambiguous and decisive. And it has been narrated that the Prophet said: ''We, the group of the prophets, have been ordered to talk with the people according to the capacity of their understanding.''

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad from his father (peace be on them both) that a man said to Amīru 'l-mu'minīn (a.s.): ''Will you describe to us our Lord, so that we may love and know Him more.'' Hearing it, he became angry and delivered a sermon, in which he said:

''You should stick, O servant of Allāh: to what the Qur'ān has shown you about His attributes, and the Apostle has guided you about His knowledge; and seek illumination from the light of his guidance, because it is a bounty and a wisdom that you have been given. Therefore, accept what you have been given and be of the grateful ones. And whatever task Satan imposes on you, which neither the Book has imposed upon you nor the traditions of the Apostle and the (truly) guiding Imāms have ordered you (to know), then entrust its knowledge to Allāh; and do not (try to) measure the greatness of Allāh. And know, O servant of Allāh! that those who are firmly rooted in knowledge are those whom Allāh has kept above the need of crashing into the screens put before the unseen; so they took it upon themselves to acknowledge all that they were unaware of its explanation, from the unseen that is screened off, and they said: 'We believe in it, it is all from our Lord.' And Allāh has praised (them for) their acknowledging their inability to get that which their knowledge had not encompassed. And when they refrained from going into what Allāh had not ordered them to search, Allāh called this refraining as being firmly rooted in knowledge. Therefore, be content with this much, and do not measure the greatness of Allāh with the measure of your understanding; otherwise, you would be of those who are doomed to perdition.''

The author says: The sentence, ''And know . . . that those who are firmly rooted in knowledge . . .'', throws further light on the meaning of ''and'' in the word of Allāh, ''and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge say . . .''. This tradition shows that, according to the Imām, that ''and'' is not a conjunctive; it starts a new sentence, as we have explained in the Commentary. What this tradition, however, shows is that this verse does not prove that those who are firmly rooted in knowledge know the interpretation of the Qur'ān; not that it proves that they do not know the said interpretation. It does not deny the existence of other proofs to show that they know this interpretation, as we have explained earlier; and some traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt also support it. The words, ''are those whom Allāh has kept above the need of . . .'', are the predicate of the subject, ''those who are firmly rooted . . .''

The sermon exhorts the enquirer to hold fast to the practice of those who are firmly rooted in knowledge; to confess his ignorance of what he does not know — in this way he would become one of them.

It means that, according to the Imām, those people are firmly rooted in knowledge who hold fast to what they know and do not cross the boundary to what they do not know. ''The unseen that is hidden behind the screens'' is the intended meaning of the ambiguous verse that is hidden from common minds. That is why the Imām mentioned soon after that they ‘‘acknowledge all that they were unaware of its explanation from the unseen . . .’’; note that he did not say, ‘‘unaware of its interpretation . . .’’.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘We are those who are firmly rooted in knowledge; and we know its interpretation.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The author says: It may appear from this tradition that the Imām took the word ‘‘and’’, in the verse, ‘‘and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge’’, as a conjunctive and that, in addition to Allāh, those also knew the Qur’ānic interpretation who were firmly rooted in knowledge. But this apparent connotation is not in place, because of the explanation given earlier, and also because of the preceding tradition.

Also, it is possible that the Imām used the word ‘‘interpretation’’, as a synonymous for ‘‘exegesis’’; such usage was common in the early centuries.

‘‘. . . and we know its interpretation’’: A preceding tradition also had said: ‘‘And those who are firmly rooted in knowledge are the progeny of Muḥammad’’. This statement is found in other traditions too. All this is a part of the flow of the Qur’ān — applying the verses wherever they fit perfectly.

It is reported in al-Kāfī from Hishām ibn al-Ḥakam that he said: ‘‘Abu ’l-Ḥasan Mūsā ibn Ja‘far (a.s.) told me: ‘. . . O Hishām! Verily, Allāh quoted a good people as saying: Our Lord! Make not our hearts to deviate after Thou hast guided us (aright); and grant us from Thee mercy; surely Thou art the most liberal Giver. They were aware that the hearts could deviate and return to their blindness and perdition. Verily, he did not fear Allāh who did not understand from Allāh; and (as for him) who did not understand from Allāh, his heart would not be resolute with a confirmed knowledge, which he could visualize and whose reality he could find in his heart. And only that one can be like this whose word confirms his deeds, and whose private (life) is in conformity with his manifest (one); because Allāh (Honoured is His name!) did not prove (one’s) esoteric (and) hidden wisdom except through its manifestation and declaration.’ ’’

The author says:‘‘Verily, he did not fear Allāh who did not understand from Allāh'': It expresses the same idea as the words of Allāh: Verily fear Allāh only those of His servants who are possessed of knowledge (35:28). The sentence, ''and (as for him) who did not understand from Allāh, his heart would not be resolute with a confirmed knowledge . . .'', is the best expression to explain the significance of being firmly rooted in knowledge. Unless a reality is thoroughly understood, the loopholes of doubts and confusion would not be closed, and the heart would remain perturbed and perplexed in believing it. But when the understanding is completed and the heart resolutely believes in it, it would not go against the dictates of that firm knowledge; and would not fo[l]low the temptations of desire. Then there would be no discrepancy between his secret and open lives; what would be in his heari: would manifest itself through his deeds; what he would say would conform with what he does.

The words, ''and only that one can be like this whose word confirms . . .'', describe the characteristics of those who are firmly rooted in knowledge.

Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and aṭ-Ṭabarānī have narrated from Anas, Abū Amāmah, Wāthilah ibn Asqa' and Abu 'd-Dardā' that the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was asked about: those who are firmly rooted in knowledge. He said: ''He whose oath is abode by, and his tongue is truthful, and his heart is steadfast, and whose stomach and genitals are chaste, then that is among those who are firmly rooted in knowledge.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This tradition may be explained in terms of the preceding one.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ''Verily, those who are firmly rooted in knowledge are those in whose knowledge there is no discrepancy.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: This explanation fits the verse perfectly. The verse shows that perversity and deviation of heart is opposite of firmly rooted knowledge. Therefore, there would be no deviation, confusion and discrepancy in the knowledge of those who are firmly rooted in knowledge.

Ibn Abī Shaybah, Aḥmad, at-Tirmidhī, Ibn Jarīr, aṭ-Ṭabarānī and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from Umm Salmah: ‘‘Verily, the Apostle of Allāh used to say very often in his invocations, ‘O Allāh, O Turner of the hearts! Keep my heart firm on thy religion.’ I said: ‘O Apostle of Allāh! and do the hearts turn?’ He said: ‘Yes. Allāh has not created a single human being from the progeny of Adam but that his heart is between two of the fingers of Allāh; then if He wills, He keeps it straight; and if He wills, He turns it away . . .’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: This idea has been narrated through several chains from a number of companions, like Jābir, Nawwās ibn Sam‘ān, ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Umar and Abū Hurayrah. The well-known are the words of the tradition of Nawwās: ‘‘The heart of the son of Adam is between two of the fingers of the Beneficent (Allāh).’’ And the same words have been narrated, as I think, by ash-Sharīf ar-Raḍī in his al-Majāzātu ’n-nabawiyyah.

It has been narrated from ‘Alī (a.s.) that he was asked: ‘‘Is there with you anything of the revelation? (i.e., Do you receive any revelation from Allāh?) He replied: ‘‘No, by Him Who split the grain and created the soul! Except that Allāh gives a servant understanding of His Book.’’

The author says: It is one of the most important traditions. The least that may be proved from it is that all that astonishing knowledge that spread from him and which even today stuns the minds, was all derived from the Qur’ān.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) narrated from his father through his forefathers (peace be on them all) that the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘O people! You are in an interim station, and you are riding on a journey, and the speed with which you are taken away is fast; and you have seen the night and the day and the sun and the moon (how) they wear out every new (thing), and bring near every distant (object), and bring out every promised (affair); therefore, prepare your outfit for the distant journey.’’ The Imām said that at this point al-Miqdād ibn al-Aswad stood up and asked: ‘‘And what is the interim station? O Apostle of Allāh!’’ He said: ‘‘The house of communication and cessation. Therefore, when mischiefs come to confuse you like the segments of a dark night, then hold fast to the Qur’ān; as it is the intercessor whose intercession shall be granted; and a credible advocate; and whoever keeps it before him, it will lead him to the Garden; and whoever keeps it behind, it will drive him to the Fire; and it is the guide that guides to the best path; and it is a Book in which there is explanation, particularization and recapitulation; and it is a decisive (word), and not a joke; and there is for it a manifest (meaning) and an esoteric (one) ; thus its apparent (meaning) is firm, and its esoteric (one) is knowledge; its exterior is elegant and its interior deep; it has (many) boundaries, and its boundaries have (many) boundaries; its wonders shall not cease, and its (unexpected) marvels shall not be old. There are in it the lamps of guidance and the beacon of wisdom, and a guide to knowledge. for him who knows the attributes. Therefore, one should extend his sight; and should let his eyes reach the attribute; so that one who is in perdition may get deliverance, and one who is entangled may get free; because meditation is the life of the heart of the one who sees, as the one having a light (easily) walks in the darkness; therefore, you must seek good deliverance and (that) with little waiting.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The author says: al-‘Ayyāshī has narrated it upto the words, ‘‘therefore, one should extend his sight’’.

It is narrated in al-Kāfī and at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) that he said that the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘The Qur’ān is a guide from wilderness, an eyesight for the blind, a pardon for the sinner, and a light against darkness; a brightness from the happenings, and safety from disaster, and guidance from going astray; a clarity in the chaos, and the means to reach (safely) from this world to the next; and there is in it the perfection of your religion; and no one deviated from the Qur’ān except to the Fire.’’

The author says: There are countless such traditions narrated from the Prophet and the Imams of Ahlu ’l-bayt (peace be on them all).

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from al-Fuḍayl ibn Yasār that he said: ''I asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.) about this tradition: 'There is no verse in the Qur'ān but it has an exterior and an interior, and there is no word in it but it has a boundary, and every boundary has a watching place.' (I asked him) what was the meaning of exterior and interior. The Imām said: 'Its exterior is its revelation; and its interior is its interpretation; some of it has already passed (i.e. happened) and there is some of it that has not come about yet; it runs along as run the sun and the moon, when a thing of it comes (to its appointed place and time) it happens. Allāh has said: and none knows its interpretation except Allāh and those who are firmly rooted in knowledge; we know it.' ''

The author says: ''Some of it has already passed and there is some of it that has not come about yet'': Apparently the pronoun ''it'' stands for the Qur'ān — for its revelation and interpretation both. Therefore, the sentence ''it runs along as run the sun and the moon'', will apply to both the revelation and the interpretation. So far as the revelation (i.e., the revealed word) is concerned it is the same thing as applying the verse to all situations in which its import comes true; and which is termed as the flow of the Qur'ān. For example, look at the verse: O you who believe! fear Allāh and be with the true ones (9:119). It was addressed, initially, to the believers who were present at the time of its revelation. Now it is applied to all the believers who came afterwards and will come upto the Day of Resurrection. It is the most obvious application that is practised not only by the Muslims but by all sensible persons in every language.

But there are some other ways of finer and still more finer applications. For example, when the verses of fighting are used to exhort, the believers to fight against their own selves, or when the verses condemning the hypocrites are applied to the sinful believers, it is a finer application.

When one proceeds further in one's spiritual journey then the above-mentioned verses of fighting and hypocrisy as well as the verses concerning the sinners are applied to those virtuous servants of Allāh who for a fleeting moment turn towards unavoidable worldly affairs, thus disrupting their meditation, remembrance of, and presence before, Allāh. Needless to say that it is a much more finer application than the previous ones.

And its finest application comes when those most perfect, most virtuous and most beloved servants of Allāh apply those verses to themselves because they, in their love of Allāh, think that they have failed in discharging their duty to Allāh.

From the above discourse, it becomes clear that:

First: The Qur'ān has connotations of varying degrees, that are applied to various groups according to their spiritual perfection. Those who have described the stages of faith in, and love of, Allāh, have mentioned even more finer applications than those written above.

Second: ''Exterior'' and ''interior'' are relative attributes. Every exterior is interior when seen in relation to a more exterior meaning; and every interior is exterior in comparison to a more interior one. The following tradition explicitly mentions this fact.

al-'Ayyāshī has narrated, in his at-Tafsīr, from Jabir that he said: ''I asked Abū Ja'far (a.s.) the explanation of (a verse of) the Qur'ān, and he xplained it to me. Thereafter, I asked him (the same question) and he gave me a different reply. So I told him: 'May I be your ransom! You had given me, before this day, a different reply to this very question!' Thereupon he said: 'O Jābir! verily, the Qur'ān has an interior, and for its interior there is an interior; and (it has) an exterior, and for its exterior there is an exterior. O Jābir! and there is nothing farther from the understanding of the men than the explanation of the Qur'ān. Verily a verse, its first (part) is about (i.e., throws light on) one subject, and its middle is about another matter, and its end is about a third thing, and (still) it is a well-connected speech, (that) revolves in various ways.' ''

The same book narrates a tradition from the same Imām in which he said: ''If a verse is revealed about a people and those people die, that verse does not die. Otherwise, nothing would have survived of the Qur'ān. But the Qur'ān, its first is applied to its last, so long as the heavens and the earth will continue. And for every group there is a verse, which they recite, they are from it (i.e., it is applied to them) either from good or from evil.''

Ḥumrān ibn A'yan said: ''I asked Abū Ja'far(a.s.) about the exterior of the Qur'ān and its interior; and he said: 'Its exterior are those people about whom the Qur'ān was revealed; and its interior are those who do as those had done; that which was revealed about those flows about these (i.e., is applied to the followers also).' '' (Ma'āni 'l-akhbār)

It is narrated in the Tafsīr aṣ-Ṣāfī that 'Alī (a.s.) said: ''There is no verse but it has four meanings: Manifest, and esoteric, and boundary and rising (or watching) place. So, the manifest is the recitation, and esoteric is the comprehension, and boundary is the commandments of lawful and unlawful, and rising (or watching) place is the Divine purpose, expected of the servant through this verse.''

The author says: ''Recitation'' is counted as one of the meanings; it shows that this word refers to the apparent meaning of the verse. Then ''comprehension'', which is given as its opposite, would mean the inner (esoteric) meaning hidden behind the apparent one; ''the commandments of lawful and unlawful'' refers to that Qur'ānic knowledge which one acquires in its first or intermediate stages; thus it stands face to face with the ''rising (or watching) place'' which is the highest grade of the meaning. Probably, the boundary and the rising place are relative terms, as the manifest and the esoteric are — thus every higher grade may be called a rising place in comparison to a lower level.

''al-Maṭla' '' (اَلْمَطْلَعُ = rising place, horizon) may also be read al-muṭṭala' (اَلْمُطَّلَعُ = the watching place). As the Imām has said, it refers to that Divine purpose for which the verse was revealed and which the servant of Allāh is expected to fulfil.

These four meanings have also been mentioned in a famous tradition of the Prophet which is as follows:

''Verily, the Qur'ān has been revealed on seven letters: For every verse of it, there is an exterior and an interior, and for every boundary there is a rising place.''

In another version the last sentence is as follows: ''and for each there is a boundary and a rising place''.

According to the first version (''for every boundary there is a rising place''), it means that for each exterior and interior — that is, the boundary — there is a rising place to which it ascends. This meaning is clear. And the second version (''for each there is a boundary and a rising place'') may also be interpreted in the same way: each exterior and interior has a boundary, that is, its own meaning, and each has a rising place to which it ascends — in other words, it would be referring to the ''interpretation''. But this explanation is not in conformity with the tradition of 'Alī (a.s.) mentioned above (''There is no verse but it has four meanings . . .'').

In the light of the above given discourse, the four terms may be explained in the following way:

The exterior is the manifest meaning that is understood from the words of the verse.

The interior is the esoteric meaning which is hidden behind the manifest one. It may be one or more — one behind the other — nearer to the manifest one or distant, with or without any intermediate link.

The boundary is the meaning, whether the exterior or the interior.

The rising place is that meaning from which the boundary (as explained above) arises. In other words, it is the esoteric meaning that is immediately adjacent to the boundary.

There is a tradition, narrated through both the Shī'ah and the Sunnī chains, from the Prophet that he said: ''The Qur'ān has been revealed on seven letters.''

The author says: Although there are some minor differences in the wordings of various versions of this tradition, it has been narrated by so many people as to make it nearly al-mutawātir; and the narrations are nearly similar in meaning, and have come both from the Shī'ahs and the Sunnīs. There is a great controversy concerning the meaning of this tradition — some forty explanations have been given for it. But, in reality, there should not be any difficulty in understanding it, because its explanation is given in the traditions themselves; and that should be followed, instead of inventing new explanations.

Some of these traditions say: The Qur'ān has come down on seven letters: order, restraint, exhortion, intimidation, argument, stories and parables.''

Another version counts them as follows: restraint, order, lawful, unlawful, decisive, ambiguous and parables.

'Alī (a.s.) is reported as saying: ''Verily Allāh revealed the Qur'ān on seven categories, each of which is sufficient and satisfying; and they are: order, restraint, exhortion, intimidation, argument, parables and stories.''

Therefore, the seven letters must be explained as seven modes of address, seven kinds of expression. They are seven; yet they are one in their aim, because all invite to Allāh, and call to His straight path.

It may be inferred from these traditions that all fundamental spiritual knowledge is confined within the parables; because other six categories cannot be applied to those realities, except by stretching the meanings of the words.

TRADITIONS ON INTERPRETING THE QUR'ĀN ACCORDING TO ONE'S OPINION

The Prophet said: ''Whoever interprets (i.e., explains) the Qur'ān according to his opinion, should settle himself in his seat of Fire.'' (aṣ-Ṣāfī)

The author says: This matter has been narrated by both the Sunnīs and the Shī'ahs. And there are many other traditions of the same import, narrated from the Prophet and the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.).

It is narrated in Munyatu 'l-murīd that the Prophet said: ''Whoever spoke about the Qur'ān without knowledge, should settle himself in his seat of Fire.''

The author says: Also, it has been narrated by Abū Dāwūd in his as-Sunan.

The Prophet said: ‘‘Whoever speaks about the Qur’ān without knowledge, shall come on the Day of Resurrection reined with a rein of fire.’’ (Munyatu ’l-murīd)

The same book narrates that the Prophet said: ‘‘Whoever spoke about the Qur’ān of his own opinion (even if) he was right, he committed wrong.’’

The author says: This tradition has also been narrated by Abū Dāwūd, at-Tirmidhī and an-Nasā’ī.

The Prophet said: ‘‘What I am afraid of, most of all, concerning my ummah after me, is the man who will take the Qur’ān putting it in wrong place (i.e., giving wrong interpretations).’’ (al-Munyatu ’l-murīd)

Abū Baṣīr said that Abū Abdillāh (a.s.) said: ‘‘Whoever interprets the Qur’ān according to his own opinion, if he gets to the right interpretation, he shall not be rewarded; and if he errs then he shall be farther away from the heaven. (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The same book quotes Ya‘qūb ibn Yazīd who narrated from Yāsir that ar-Riḍā (a.s.) said: ‘‘Opinion in the Book of Allāh is infidelity.’’

The author says: This theme is found in other traditions written in ‘Uyūnu ’l-akhbār, al-Khiṣāl and at-Tafsīr of al-‘Ayyāshī among other books.

The words of the Prophet: ‘‘Whoever interprets (i.e., explains) the Qur’ān according to his opinion’’: ar-Ra’y (اَلرَّأيُ = opinion) means the belief reached at after diligent research. It is also used for the opinion based on desire and one’s own inclination. The Prophet has used the phrase, ‘‘his opinion’’; it shows that what is condemned is the interpretation of a verse independently without looking at other relevant verses. It does not forbid striving hard and doing one’s utmost to understand the meaning of the Qur’ān; nor does it say that one should confine oneself to what has been said in the traditions of the Prophet and Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.) relating to the exegesis of the verses (as many traditionalists think). Otherwise, it would be diametrically opposed to the many verses which show that the Qur'ān is plain Arabic and which exhort the people to meditate on it; also it would be against many traditions that tell them to turn to the Qur'ān and judge the traditions by it.

What the words, ''according to his opinion'', refer to is explaining the Qur'ān according to one's personal views by being independent of other Qur'ānic declarations. This happens when an exegete depends solely on the instruments of Arabic language and literature, which are used for understanding a human talk. When we hear a speech of a man we at once look towards the rules of the language so that we may understand what the speaker means, and in this way we decide its import; we use this method everywhere, even in legal matters like testimony and acknowledgement. We use this method because human speech is based on the rules of language and rhetorics.

But the Qur'ān's diction is not based on this foundation, as we have explained earlier. The whole Qur'ān is a speech whose sentences and verses are all related to one another; at the same time they are separate from each other; one part speaks with, and leads to the others, as 'Alī (a.s.) has said: ''Obviously, it is not enough to look at a single verse in the light of language and literature and decide what it means, unless one meditates on all the relevant verses and strives one's utmost to find out from all of them together what that particular verse means. The verse 4:82 points to this very fact, as we have explained in the topic of brevity: Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ān? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy.''

Explaining the Qur'ān according to one's opinion is, thus, prohibited. And this prohibition is directed to the way of exegesis, and not to the exegesis itself. In other words, the Prophet has forbidden the people to try to understand the Divine words by the same methods which are used to understand a human speech — it is irrelevant whether they succeed in comprehending its true meaning or not. That is why he (s.a.w.a.) has said in another tradition: ''Whoever spoke about the Qur'ān of his own opinion, (even if) he was right, he committed wrong.'' This dictum clearly proves that the mistake lies in choosing the way; it does not matter whether that way takes one to the true destination or not. The same is the explanation of the words, narrated in the tradition of al-‘Ayyāshī: ‘‘if he gets to the right interpretation, he shall not be rewarded’’.

This view is supported also by the state of affairs in the days of the Prophet. The revelation of the Qur’ān wa not yet completed; and what was revealed was not yet arranged; not all the Muslims had in their hands all the revealed verses — most of them had only a few chapters and verses with them. Had they been allowed to explain every piece or verse separately, without comparing that piece with other relevant verses, they would almost certainly have fallen into error.

It appears from the above discourse that what the exegete has been forbidden is to interpret a verse of the Qur’ān independently, relying on his own knowledge and opinion, without reference to another authority. In other words, it is necessary, when one wants to explain a Qur’ānic verse, to seek help from others by referring the matter to them. Who is that other authority? It could only be either other Qur’ānic verses, or the traditions. The second alternative is out of question, because the Prophet has ordered the Muslims to refer the traditions to the Qur’ān; it cannot be the other way round. The tradition’s meanings and even their authenticity is tested by the Qur’ān; how can tradition decide the meaning of the Qur’ān? Thus, there remains only one valid and approved way of explaining the verses of the Qur’ān, and that is with the help of other relevant verses.

This much is enough to show the irrelevance of numerous explanations written about the tradition of ‘‘interpretating the Qur’ān by one’s own opinion’’. The scholars have explained this tradition in not less than ten ways:

First: It means interpreting the Qur’ān without expertise in those subjects which are essential for knowing its exegesis. And as-Suyūṭī has said in al-Itqān that they are fifteen in all: Language, syntax, conjugation, etymology, styles of literature, rhetoric, elocution, recitation of the Qur’ān, roots of religion, fundamentals of jurisprudence, reasons and occasions of revelations (as well as the stories mentioned in the Qur’ān), abrogating and abrogated verses, law of the sharī‘ah, traditions that explain the general and unspecific verses, and the gifted knowledge. This last phrase refers to a tradition of the Prophet: ‘‘Whoever acts upon what he knows, Allāh gives him knowledge of what he does not know.’’

Second: It refers to the attempts of finding the interpretations of the ambiguous verses, which no one knows except Allāh.

Third: It is interpretation of the Qur’ān to support a wrong belief or action. It happens when an exegete makes his own view or belief the foundation upon which he builds the exegesis of the Qur’ān; he fits the verse on his own belief in any possible way — no matter how weak or far-fetched that might be.

Fourth: It is declaring, without any proof, that a certain explanation is the meaning really intended by Allāh.

Fifth: It refers to explaining the Qur’ān according to one’s inclination and desire.

These five explanations of the said tradition have been narrated by Ibnu’n-Naqīb, as as-Suyūṭī has quoted in al-Itqān. There are five other explanations which we enumerate here from other books:

Sixth: It is explaining the difficult passages of the Qur’ān in a new way which was not narrated from the companions and their disciples — because such an interpretation would make the exegete liable to the displeasure of Allāh.

Seventh: The tradition is about explaining the Qur’ān in a certain way, while the speaker knows that it is not the true explanation.

These last two have been mentioned by Ibnu ’l-Anbārī.

Eighth: The tradition forbids talking about the Qur’ān without knowledge and without making sure — it does not matter whether the speaker knows or not that another explanation is true.

Ninth: It forbids reliance on the apparent meaning of the Qur’ān. It is the explanation of those who think that the apparent meaning of the Qur’ān is not a valid authority; to understand a verse, one must look to a clear tradition narrated from a sinless authority (i.e., the Prophet, his daughter and the twelve Imāms, peace be on them all). But in fact it shall not be an exegesis of the Qur’ān; rather it shall be following the tradition. Anyhow, according to this group, exegesis of the Qur’ān depends on the explanation of a sinless authority.

Tenth: There were some people who believed that the Qur’ān had valid apparent meanings, but said that common people could not understand it. According to this view also, relying on the apparent meaning of the Qur'ān was forbidden by this tradition. One must look for clear traditions of the sinless authorities to interpret the Qur'ān.

These are ten explanations of the said tradition — although some may in effect be identical to some others. In any case, none of these is supported by any proof. Moreover, some are obviously wrong, or their inaccuracy may be understood from what we have earlier said about this tradition. There is no need to point it out again.

There are many verses that support the traditions mentioned earlier: —

Do they not meditate on the Qur'ān? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82).

Those who made the Qur'ān into shreds (15:91).

Surely they who distort Our signs are not hidden from Us. What! is he then who is cast into the fire better or he who comes safe on the Day of Resurrection? Do what you like, surely He sees what you do (41:40).

. . . (there are those who) alter words from their places . . . (4:46).

And pursue not that of which you have not the knowledge (17:36).

Such verses in conjunction with the above-mentioned traditions make it clear that the prohibition contained in those traditions is about the method used for the exegesis; they show that when explaining the Divine Speech, one should not adopt the same means that are used for explaining human talks.

What is the difference between Divine and human speeches? It is not in the use of words, the construction of sentences or the style of elocution. The Qur'ān is in plain Arabic, and all norms of eloquence have been mentioned in it. Allāh Himself has said: And We did not send any apostle but with the language of his people, so that he might explain to them clearly (14:4); . . . and this is clear Arabic language (16:103); Surely We have made it an Arabic Qur'ān so that you may understand (43:3).

The difference between the two is about the meaning and its application. This statement needs some elaboration:

We are at home in this material word, and surrounded with its natural phenomena. As a result, when we hear a word our mind, first of all, looks at its physical connotation and application. When a fellow human being describes a thing or affair, we apply his words to what we are accustomed to in this world; because we know that the speaker too is governed by the same forces as we are, and his comprehension and cognition is not different from ours. In this way the application of a word affects its meaning — it may particularize a general meaning or vice versa; the circumstances may manipulate a word's connotation in a lot of ways. It is what we call rational context, in contrast to the textual evidence.

For example, if we hear a powerful and wealthy man saying, ''There is not a thing but with us are the treasures of it'', first we shall look at the literal meaning of this sentence, then will come the stage of its application. At this stage, we shall say that he has many strong and well-protected buildings which have got a lot of containers of various types to store his treasures, that consist of a large quantity of gold, silver, currency notes, bonds, jewels, various commodities, ornamental items, arms and ammunitions etc. We get this picture in our mind because this is what we call treasure and that is how it is kept safe and secure. But we will never imagine that he has in his treasury the earth and the heavens, the continents and the oceans, the sun and the moon, the animals and the human beings. These too are ''things'', but they are not possessed, gathered and put in a treasury. Because of this rational context we do restrict the generality of the word ''thing'' and apply it to a few selected items only; and in those items too only a small amount is presumed to be kept in his treasury. We know that a lot of things are not treasured, and what is treasured, only a small amount comes into possession of one man, and that small quantity is preserved in strong, impregnable buildings to protect it from theft and other damages. And this knowledge of ours has restricted the general meaning of the words, ''thing'' and ''treasures''.

But now we hear Allāh revealing to His Apostle (s.a.w.a.): And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it (15:21). If our mind is not developed, and is still on the lowest rung of comprehension, we shall interpret this verse in exactly the same manner. Of course, we shall not have any proof to say that the verse has been used in the same sense; yet we shall rush to that explanation, because our mind is accustomed to it. This is, then, explaining the Qur'ān according to our own opinion without knowledge.

Now let us say that our understanding is a bit more developed, and we know that Allāh does not gather things to put them in a treasury. We think over this verse and read the next sentence: and We do not send it down but in a known measure; and then we compare it with another verse : . . . and (in) what Allāh sends down sustenance from the cloud, then gives life thereby to the earth after its death . . . there are signs for a people who understand (45:5). We shall at once say that the word ''thing'', in the verse under discussion, refers to the sustenance like bread and water; and that ''sending it down'', in the next sentence, refers to the coming down of rain. We shall give it this interpretation because we do not know of anything, except the rain, that comes down from heavens; therefore, we shall say that accumulation of everything near Allāh and then its coming down in measured quantity refers to the accumulation of rain and its coming down to the earth to produce food grains. This too shall be interpreting the Qur'ān according to one's own opinion ''without knowledge''. What is our argument? It is that we do not know of anything, except the rain, that descends from the heaven. But ''not knowing'' that a certain thing exists is quite different from ''knowing'' that it does not exist.

If our knowledge is more advanced and our mind more developed, we shall try not to say anything concerning the Qur'ān without knowledge. We shall say that the words of the verse are general; they should not be restricted in any way. ''Thing'' includes everything, and the word, ''treasures'', covers every single item of everything. We shall arrive at the conclusion that the sentence describes the affairs of the creation and the creatures. Then will come the puzzling sentence, ''and We do not send it down but in a known measure''. Doubtlessly, human beings, animals and vegetables do not come down from the heavens; they grow from, and are born on, the earth. Faced with this difficulty, we shall say that the first sentence, ''And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it'', is a metaphorical way of saying that everything in its existence is subservient to the will of Allāh; that the Divine will is like a treasure that holds every creature, and only as much issues forth from it as is willed by Allāh. But this interpretation also, like the previous two, is based on ‘‘not knowing’’. We ‘‘do not know’’ that the things descend (in the meaning known to us) from Allāh, and, therefore, we explain away the sentence in an allegorical way.

If you look at the Divine names, attributes and actions as described in the Qur’ān, or at the Qur’ānic declarations about the angels, the Divine Books, the apostles and the Day of Resurrection and its details, or at the laws of the sharī‘ah and their significance as given in the Qur’ān, and then ponder on the way people want to interpret them in the light of rational context, you will see that all such exercises are but interpretations according to one’s own liking without knowledge; that they should better be called misinterpretations.

We have shown under the fifth heading in the discourse of the decisive and the ambiguous verses that the Qur’ānic expressions vis-a-vis the Divine realities are like a proverb in relation to its significance; and those realities have been explained in various expressions and diverse wordings, so that all taken together may lead the hearers to their real significance. That is why the verses are said to be witnesses of each other; and that is how they explain one another. Otherwise, the Divine realities could never be correctly explained; and people would have fallen in the pitfall of interpreting the Qur’ān without knowledge.

The above discourse shows that interpreting the Qur’ān according to one’s own opinion is always accompanied by speaking about it without knowledge. The tradition of the Prophet points to this fact: ‘‘Whoever spoke about the Qur’ān without knowledge should settle himself in his seat of Fire.’’

It is such interpretations that make it look as though the verses of the Qur’ān were contradictory to one another. Interpreting the verses by one’s own opinion, without true knowledge, disturbs the semantic flow of the Qur’ān. Thus the verses are misinterpreted, the words shifted from their right places and used in wrong contexts. Then it becomes necessary for these exegetes to explain some or most of the verses in a way that is against their apparent meanings; Divine words and sentences are given such meanings which the linguists had never heard of. Thus we find a group explaining away the verses of free will and choice, and their opponents misinterpreting the verses of Divine decree and measure. Most of the Muslim sects are guilty of this type of misinterpretation, especially in those verses whose apparent meanings go against their beliefs. They seek refuge in clothing such verses with meanings of their own choice, and their socalled arguments boil down to this sentence: The apparent meaning of this verse is against what has already been established by rational proofs; therefore, it must be given a new meaning, against the apparent one.

This practice creates confusion; the logical sequence of the verses is disrupted, their semantic flow is disturbed and they seem to contradict each other. Thus both lose their validity.

It is known that there is no discrepancy in the Qur'ān. If a certain explanation shows that two verses are contradictory to each other, the only defect would be in that explanation.

This has been termed, in many traditions, as hitting one part of the Qur'ān with the other. See for example the following traditions:

It is narrated in al-Kāfī and at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from aṣ-Ṣādiq from his father (peace be on them both) that he said: ''A man does not hit a part of the Qur'ān with the other (part) but that he becomes an infidel.''

Ma'āni 'l-akhbār, al-Maḥāsin (through their chains) and at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī: aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''A man does not hit a part of the Qur'ān with the other (part) but that he becomes an infidel.'' aṣ-Ṣadūq says that he asked Ibnu 'l-Walīd what this tradition meant. He replied: ''It is replying'to a man concerning the exegesis of one verse, with the exegesis of another one.''

The author says: This reply of Ibnu 'l-Walīd is somewhat vague. If by this expression he means the above-mentioned mixup — as the polemicists, argue by offering one verse ''against'' another, adhering to the one and explaining away the other — then he is correct. But if he wants to disallow explaining one verse with the help of the other and bringing the one as evidence for the other, then it is wrong, as may be seen from the following two traditions too:

It is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-Nu‘mānī, through his chains to Ismā‘īl ibn Jābir that he said: ‘‘I heard Abū ‘Abdillāh Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad aṣ-Ṣādiq (peace be upon them both) saying: ‘Verily, Allāh — Benevolent and High is He — sent Muḥammad and ended with him (the chain of) the prophets thus there is no prophet after him; and He sent down to him a Book, and ended with it (the chain of) the Books; thus there is no (Divine) book after it. He allowed in it the lawful (things) and prohibited in it the unlawful; so its lawful is lawful upto the Day of Resurrection, and its unlawful is unlawful upto the Day of Resurrection; there is in it your sharī‘ah, and the information of the people (who passed away) before you and (who are to come) after you; and the Prophet (may Allāh have mercy on him and his progeny!) appointed it as a standard (that will remain) for ever in his successors. But the people left them (those successors) although they were the witnesses over the people of all times; and they (i.e., the people) deviated from them, then they killed them, and followed others and gave those others their unalloyed obedience. (This continued) till they extended their enmity to him who showed his love of those invested with authority (from Allāh) and who sought their knowledge. Allāh has said: . . . and (they) have forgotten a part of what they were admonished with, and you will not cease to be informed of deceit from among them (5:14). And it is because they hit a part of the Qur’ān with the other; and they argued with the abrogated (verse) thinking that it was the abrogating one, and debated with the help of the ambiguous thinking that it was the decisive; and offered a particularized verse for their argument assuming that it was a general one; and stuck at the beginning of a verse leaving aside the reason of its interpretation; and they did not see what was the beginning of the speech and what was its end; and they did not know its arrival or its departure, because they did not take it from its people; thus they went astray and misled others.

‘‘ ‘And know, may Allāh have mercy on you! that he who does not distinguish in the Book of Allāh the abrogating verse from the abrogated one, and a specific from a general one, and a decisive from an ambiguous; and does not differentiate between a permission and an obligation, and does not recognize a verse of Meccan period from a

Medinite one, and does not know the reasons of revelation; and does not understand the difficult words of the Qur'ān (whether simple or compound); and does not comprehend (what has been hidden in it of) the knowledge of (Divine) decree and measure; and is ignorant of advancing and delaying (in its verses); and does not distinguish the clear from the deep, nor the manifest from the esoteric, nor the beginning from the termination; and is unaware of the question and the answer, the disjoining and the joining, and the exceptions and the allinclusive, and is ignorant of an adjective of a preceding (noun) that explains the subsequent one; and is unaware of the emphasized subject and the detailed one, the obligatory laws and the permissions, the places of the duties and rules, and the meaning of its lawful and unlawful (in which the unbelievers have perished); and does not know the joined words, and the words that are related to those coming before them, or after them — then such a man does not know the Qur'ān; nor is he among the people of the Qur'ān; And if someone claims knowledge of these variations, without a proof, then he is a liar, a doubting (person), and a fabricator of lies against Allāh and His Apostle, and his resting place is the hell, and what an evil destination it is!' ''

It is written in Nahju 'l-balāghah and al-Iḥtijāj that 'Alī (a.s.) said in a sermon: ''When a legal problem is put before one of them he passes judgment on it according to his opinion. Then exactly the same problem comes before another of them and he gives an opposite verdict. Then these judges bring this matter to their leader who had appointed them and he confirms all their (contradictory) verdicts, although their Allāh is one and their Prophet is one and their Book is one. Is it because Allāh had ordered them to differ and they obeyed Him? Or He had prohibited them from it but they disobeyed Him? Or is it that Allāh had sent an incomplete religion and sought their help to complete it? Or, they are His partners, so that it is their right to say and it is His duty to agree? Or is it that Allāh sent a complete religion but the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) fell short of conveying it and handing it over (to the ummah)? And Allāh,¸ the Glorified, says: We have not neglected anything in the Book (6:38); and that in it is the clarification of everything; and He has said that one part of the Book confirms the other and that there is no discrepancy in it: And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy (4:82). And verily, the exterior of the Qur'ān is elegant and its esoteric (meaning) is deep. Its wonders cannot be enumerated, and its marvels will not cease; and the darknesses cannot be removed except by it.''

The author says: This narration clearly shows that every religious opinion and view must be based on the Qur'ān. The sentence, ''in it is the clarification of everything'', paraphrases a Qur'ānic verse, (. . . and We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything [16:89]).

Ibn Sa'd, Ibnu 'ḍ-Ḍurays (in his al-Faḍā'il) and Ibn Marduwayh have narrated from 'Amr ibn Shu'ayb from his father from his grandfather: ''The Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) appeared before a group who were bandying arguments about the Qur'ān, and he was very angry and said: 'This is how the nations before you went astray — they disputed with their prophets and hit one part of the book with the other.' Then he said: 'And verily the Qur'ān has not been revealed so that its parts would contradict each other; rather, it has been revealed so that its part would confirm each other. Therefore, follow what you know (of it) and believe in what is ambiguous to you (from it):' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

Aḥmad has narrated in another way from 'Amr ibn Shu'ayb from his father from his grandfather that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) heard some people disputing with one another. So, he said: ''That is how those who were before you had perished; they hit one part of the Book of Allāh over the other. And the Book of Allāh has been revealed (and) its one part confirms the other; therefore, do not (try to) refute its one part with the other part. What you know of it, you should believe in it, and what you do not know of it, you should leave it to him who knows it.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: As you see, these traditions count ''hitting one part of the Qur'ān with the other'' as opposite to ''confirming some of its parts with the others''. In other words, this ''hitting'' refers to confusing the meanings of the verses, disturbing their aims and objects, mistaking, for example, the decisive verses for the ambiguous ones and vice versa. It means that speaking in the Qur'ān accroding to one's own opinion, and explaining the verses without knowledge (described in earlier quoted traditions) and hitting some parts of the Qur'ān with the others (mentioned in the above traditions) refer to one and the same thing, that is, explaining the Qur'ān with the help of other than the Qur'ān.

Question: No doubt, the Qur'ān was revealed so, that the people may comprehend and understand it. See, for example, these two verses:

Surely We have revealed to you the Book with the truth for the sake of men . . . (39:41).

This is a clear statement for men (3:138).

Also there is no doubt that it was the Prophet who had the authority to explain it. As Allāh says: . . . and We have revealed to you the Reminder that you may make clear to men what has been revealed to them . . . (16:44). And surely he explained it to his companions, who transmitted it to their disciples. What has come to us from the companions and their disciples is doubtlessly the explanation given by the Prophet, and we cannot disregard it, as the Qur'ān tells us to follow what is given to us by the Prophet. As for those explanations which the companions gave us without ascribing them to the Prophet, it is true that they cannot have the same authority as the Prophet's declarations; yet we feel more at ease with them (instead of looking for them on our own). Why? Because either they had heard it from the Prophet, or they were led to it by their expertise in religion — the expertise they had acquired from the Prophet's instruction and exposition. The same applies to their disciples and the disciples' disciples. Surely the meaning of the Qur'ān could not be hidden from them — they had deep rooted knowledge of Arabic language; they were keen on learning the Qur'ānic interpretation from the Prophet himself; and they strived their utmost to acquire the knowledge of religion. All this may be seen in biographical details of the early scholars of religion.

Looking at the above-mentioned details, we come to the conclusion that deviating from their method and tradition, going out of their company or explaining any verse in a way that is not found in their opinions and sayings, is an innovation; and that one must remain silent where they have not given any opinion.

What the companions and their direct and indirect disciples have said is enough for the purpose of understanding the Qur'ān. There are thousands of traditions on exegesis, and as-Suyūṭī has counted some seventeen thousand traditions on this subject, narrated from the Prophet and his companions and their disciples.

Reply: Its reply may be inferred from what we have written earlier. There are numerous verses which invite the public in general, the believers as well as the unbelievers, those who were present at the time of revelation as well as those who came later or shall come in future, to understand the Qur'ān and meditate and ponder on it. For example, see the verse 4:82 which has been quoted repeatedly: Do they not then meditate on the Qur'ān? And if it were from any other than Allāh, they would have found in it many a discrepancy. It clearly shows that the Qur'ānic knowledge may be acquired through meditation and contemplation; and that by this process the apparent discrepancy between the verses disappears completely. Remember that this verse puts a challange to unbelievers that they would not find any discrepancy in the Qur'ān if they pondered on it. And in this context they could not be advised to go to the companions and their disciples if they wanted to understand its meaning; nay, even the advice to refer to the Prophet would have been irrelevant: If the Prophet's explanation were in conformity with the apparent meaning of the verse, then people would understand that meaning from the verse itself on meditation and contemplation — and there would be no need to refer to the Prophet. And if his explanation were against the apparent meaning of the Qur'ān — a meaning that an average man would not understand from the words — then the challenge would be futile and the argument of the verse 4:82 would not stand.

Of course, so far as the details of various Qur'ānic laws are concerned, they cannot be known without the Prophet's explanation, as the Qur'ān itself says: . . . and whatever the Apostle gives you, take it, and from whatever he forbids you, keep back . . . (59:7). Also, the details of the Qur'ānic stories and of the Day of Judgment depend on his exposition.

It shows that the Prophet's responsibility, in this respect, was of teaching only. A teacher guides and helps his student in understanding what would be difficult to comprehend without his help. The teaching brings the meaning nearer to the mind; it does not create a meaning. The teacher arranges the subject matter to make it easier to comprehend, so that the student is not obliged to waste his time and energy in self-education — a proposition that carries with it a risk of wrong deductions. This aspect of the Prophet's responsibilities is mentioned in many verses. For example, . . . and We have revealed to you the Reminder that you may make clear to men what has been revealed to them, and that haply they may reflect (16:44). . . . And teaches them the Book and the Wisdom . . . (62:2). The Prophet, therefore, teaches the people what the Qur'ān itself says and the Divine Speech itself shows, and which the people themselves may understand even if it requires some meditation. It is not the Prophet's function to bestow on the verses such meanings as cannot be normally understood from those words. Such an explanation would not conform with the following Qur'ānic declarations:—

A Book of which the verses are made plain, an Arabic Qur'ān for a people who know (41:3).

. . . and this is clear Arabic language (16:103).

Then there are the traditions of the Prophet exhorting the Muslims to hold fast to the Qur'ān and to verify with its help the traditions attributed to him. It necessarily follows that all what the Prophet has said may be known from the Qur'ān. Otherwise, he could not tell us to check with it all the sayings attributed to him.

Now, if we say that understanding of the Qur'ān depends on the Prophet's explanation, it would be a vicious circle. The Qur'ān would be understood only if explained by the traditions, but the authenticity of the tradition could be established only if one understands the Qur'ān.

Now we come to the traditions narrated from the companions. First, we are faced with the problems concerning the chains of the narrators, because not all of them are free from one or the other defect. Second, the companions have differed a great deal with one another in their expositions of the Qur'ān. Third, in many cases, divergent views have been ascribed to a single companion, as anyone may find out by looking in the books of traditions and exegesis. What is one supposed to do when faced with such discrepancies? We are told by these people that we should choose one of those diverse opinions and stick to it; that we should not destroy the ‘‘composite unanimity’’ of the companions, nor should we go outside their circle. But the trouble is that the companions themselves were not averse to differ from each other; then why should we not differ from them? They themselves never claimed that their opinions were vested with an authority which others were duty bound to accept; nor did they ever say that, although they differed from one another, others should not differ from them.

If we were stuck up with the Qur’ānic exegesis narrated from the companions and their disciples, the forward march of knowledge would be arrested and academic research negated. Look at the explanations transmitted to us from the early scholars, and study the books of exegesis written in early centuries. You will find that they contain only simple word meanings, and are devoid of deep thoughts and fine ideas. If we stop at those explanations, where we can find the vast and deep knowledge mentioned in the verse: . . . and We have revealed the Book to you explaining clearly everything . . . (16:89).

Then it is said that it is unthinkable that the companions did not know the meaning of the Qur’ān, in spite of their keen interest in religious knowledge and their understanding and serious efforts in this way. But the very discrepancy in their various explanations belies this argument. Discrepancy and difference could not occur unless the truth was hidden from their eyes, and unless they were confused.

The truth is that the highway to the understanding of the Qur’ān is wide open; and the Divine Speech itself leads one to its own understanding; it does not depend, for this purpose, on any other guide. It is a Book introduced by Allāh as the guidance, the light and the clear explanation of everything. It cannot be said to need another guide, to seek illumination from another light or to depend on an outside factor for its own explanation.

Question: The correct traditions say that the Prophet said in his last sermon: ‘‘Certainly I am leaving among you two weighty things: The bigger one and the smaller one. As for the bigger one, it is the Book of Allāh; and as for the smaller one, it is my progeny, the people of my house. Therefore, keep me in mind about these two things; because you shall never go astray so long as you hold fast to them.'' This tradition has been narrated by both sects from a great many companions of the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); it has come to us through so many chains that one can entertain no doubt about its authenticity. The traditionalists have counted that it has been narrated by thirty-five companions. Some narrations contain the sentence: ''They shall not separate from one another till they come to me on the reservoir (i.e., Kawthar).'' This tradition proves that the words of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) on the Qur'ān are a binding authority and that one must adhere to what has come down to us from them concerning the exegesis. Otherwise, one would be guilty of separating the Qur'ān from the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.).

Reply: What was said earlier regarding the explanation of the Prophet applies here too. The tradition quoted in the question is not intended to negate the authority of the apparent meaning of the Qur'ān, nor does it say that the exegesis given by the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) is the only authoritative explanation. The Prophet has used the words, ''they shall not separate from one another''. It means that authority belongs to the Qur'ān and the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) together; the Qur'ān explains its meaning and makes manifest the Divine realities, and the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) guide to the true path and direct the people to the Qur'ānic aims and goals.

Moreover, like the Prophet, the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) too have directed the Muslims to hold fast to the Qur'ān, to meditate on it and to verify from it the traditions attributed to them.

Furthermore, a considerable number of the exegetical traditions of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) themselves have used the method of explaining a verse with the help of the other. This method can be meaningful only if the Qur'ānic verses may be understandable to an average man — provided the correct direction is followed.

Apart from these rational arguments, some traditions of the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.) explicitly mention this fact. al-Barqī has narrated through his chains from Abū Labīd that Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said in a tradition: ''Whoever thought that the Book of Allāh was vague, fell in perdition and destroyed others.'' Another tradition has been narrated in the same book as well as in al-Iḥtijāj that Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said: ''When I narrate to you anything, you should ask me where it was in the Book of Allāh . . . ''

The above discourse makes it clear that there is no conflict between those traditions which say that the Qur'ānic knowledge is not unintelligible and that it may be understood with the help of the Qur'ānic verses themselves, and those which are apparently against it. For example, it is narrated in at-Tafsīr of al-'Ayyāshī from Jābir that he said: ''Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) said: 'Verily, the Qur'ān has an interior, and for its interior there is an exterior.' Then he said: 'O Jābir! and there is nothing farther from the understanding of the men than it (i.e., the Qur'ān). Verily, a verse, its first (part) is revealed about one subject and its middle (part) about another thing, and its end about something else; and yet it is a well-connected speech, (that) revolves in various ways.' '' This theme has been given in various other traditions. In some of them, the sentence, ''and there is nothing farther from the understanding of the men . . . '', has been ascribed to the Prophet. Also, 'Alī (a.s.) is reported as saying: ''Verily, the Qur'ān may be explained in many ways; it has many faces . . .''

It is clear that what has been allowed, nay, encouraged, is explaining it through its own path, and what has been forbidden is explaining it through another path. The prescribed way is exegesis of the Qur'ān with the help of the Qur'ān itself, explaining a verse with another verse. A man can do so only when he is well-versed in the traditions of the Prophet and his Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.); it gives him correct perspective and creates in him a discriminating taste. It is after acquiring this taste that one may explain the Qur'ān with confidence. And Allāh is the best Guide.

GENERAL COMMENT

It was described earlier that when this chapter was revealed, the Muslims were hard-pressed by internal sabotage and external hostilities. There were inside Medina the hypocrites and their informants, who listened to, and spread the evil whisperings of, the enemies of Islam to upset the Muslims' programmes and make their efforts ineffective. And almost the whole Arabia and the two most powerful neighbouring empires were bent upon their annihilation. The polytheists, the Jews and the Christians, all were united in their determination to kill Islam in its infancy with all possible means — by words or by swords. This chapter was revealed to exhort the Muslims to remain united, firm and patient. These qualities would keep their society healthy, eradicate the internal troubles and confound the external enemies.

The preceding verses had mentioned the hypocrites' perversity, and exhorted the Muslims to faithfully follow what they had learned of the realities of religion, and to surrender themselves to, and believe in, what they do not understand of the Qur'ān. The verses warned the Muslims not to follow the ambiguous parts of the Qur'ān, seeking to give them their own interpretation; otherwise, their well-balanced religion would be distorted and they themselves would fall into perdition. In this way, they would be deprived of their felicity; their religious guidance would give way to misguidance, and their unity would turn into disunity.

Now, these verses turn to the unbelievers and polytheists. These infidels will soon be vanquished; they cannot defeat the purpose of the Almighty Allāh, nor can they triumph in their rebellion. What has misled them into straying is their entanglement with inordinate pleasures of this world. They think that their riches and their children can make them independent of Allāh; but they are mistaken in their thinking; because Allāh is predominant in His affairs. If wealth and man-power could make anyone independent of Allāh, they would have saved the people of Pharaoh and other unjust nations in the past, who had acquired much more power and strength. But Allāh caught them for their sins and they could do nothing. Likewise, these enemies of Divine religion would soon be vanquished. Therefore, the Muslims should remain on guard; they should not fall victim of these desires and pleasures. If they followed this guidance, they would get felicity in this world and eternal reward in the next — and, of course, the pleasure of their Lord is the greatest reward.

In short, these verses are mainly concerned with the affairs of the unbelievers. (With verses coming after these begin the comment on the People of the Book).

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: (As for) those who disbelieve, surely neither their wealth nor their children shall avail them in the least against Allāh: That is, their wealth and children shall not make them independent of Allāh.

Man's first instinctive awareness is of his dependence on others. This instinct guides him to his Maker and Sustainer. Looking at intermediate causes he, first of all, realizes that for the development and perfection of his body ¸he depends on food and children. Then his attention is drawn to other animal perfections like fancy attire, comfortable abode, attractive spouse and things like that. At this stage, the desire of food changes into that of wealth and property, because he thinks that wealth is the panacea of all difficulties of life. Now he believes that the felicity of his life comes from wealth and children; in other words, wealth replaces food. At this stage his short-sightedness prevents him from seeing beyond these intermediate causes; he thinks that they are independent causes and forgets his Lord. His heart becomes inseparably attached to wealth and children; and this ignorance leads him to perdition. He fails to see the signs of his Lord and disbelieves in them. He does not realize that his lord is Allāh besides Whom there is no god, the Ever-living, the Selfsubsisting; nothing can ever be independent of Him; nothing can ever avail against Him.

The above explanation also makes it clear why the verse has given precedence to wealth over children — man's dependence on wealth (or food, a kind of wealth) precedes his dependence on children — although at times his love for children overpowers his lust for wealth.

The verse seems to have abridged a long sentence. Its full import is as follows: Those who disbelieve have rejected Our signs and they think that their wealth and their children will avail them against Allāh; but they are mistaken, because nothing can ever avail anyone against Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: and those it is who are the fuel of the fire: ''al-Waqūd'' (اَلْوَقُوْدُ) is fuel; that which feeds a fire and enflames it. The verse runs on the line of the following two:

. . . then be on guard against the fire of which men and stones are the fuel . . . (2:24).

Surely you and what you worship besides Allāh are the firewood of hell . . . (21:98).

This subject has been explained to some extent in the Chapter of the Cow.

This sentence has many devices that are used for restriction: It is an al-jumlatu 'l-ismiyyah (اَلْجُمْلَةُ الْاِسْمِيَّةُ = nominal sentence; a sentence that begins with noun or pronoun) ; it begins with a demonstrative pronoun and uses a pronoun that points to a distant object; has inserted a second disjunctive personal pronoun between the subject and the predicate; and has added the words ''of fire'' after the word, ''fuel'' — all these things clearly show that only the unbelievers are the fuel of the fire; they are the basic source of the chastisement; they are the fuel that keeps the hell burning; others will burn in the flames that will be fuelled with the unbelievers: The verse 8:37 points to this fact: That Allāh may separate the impure from the pure, and put the impure, some of it upon the other, and pile it up together, then cast it into hell . . .

QUR'ĀN: Like the wont of the people of Pharaoh . . . Allāh is severe in requiting: ''ad-Da'b'' (اَلدَّأْبُ) is continuing movement. Allāh has said: And He has made subservient to you the sun and the moon pursuing their courses . . . (14:33). Thereupon the word was used for habit, custom or wont, because that also is a perpetual movement. In this verse, it has been used in this latter meaning.

''Like the wont . . .'' is related to a deleted sentence which may be understood from the phrase, ''shall not avail them''; ''the wont'' is explained by the words, ''they rejected Our signs''. Thus, the complete sentence would be as follows: Those who disbelieve have rejected Our signs and continued on this habit unfailingly; they think that their wealth and their children will avail them against Allāh; it is like the wont of the people of Pharaoh and those before them, who also had rejected Our signs. ''So Allāh caught them 'bi-dhunūbihim'

(بِذُنُوْبِهِمْ) for their sins.'' ''bi'' (بِ = translated here as ''for'') apparently shows the reason; in other words, Allāh caught them because of their sins. But the two verses stand face to face comparing the condition of these unbelievers with that of the people of Pharaoh and those who lived before them. It strongly suggests that ''bi'' here points to the instrument of this catching. The unbelievers are the fuel of the fire, which shall burn them and they shall get the punishment by their own fire. Likewise, the people of Pharaoh and those who were before them were caught by their own sins; the chastisement meted out to them was another form of their own misdeeds; it was their own evil plan which surrounded them, their own injustice and oppression that destroyed them. Allāh says: . . . and the evil plan does not beset any save the authors of it (35:43); . . . and they did not do Us any harm, but they did harm their own selves (2:57).

The above explanation makes the meaning of the next sentence clearer: ''and Allāh is severe in requiting (evil)''. The chastisement meted out by Allāh is not confined to one direction, one place or one state. When a man punishes another man, his punishment comes from only a certain direction, for example, from above or below etc., and at one place, not at the others. The man so punished may run away from that particular place, or may shield himself against that particular direction. But the Divine chastisement is all-encompassing. He catches a man by the misdeeds and sins committed by that man himself; his action is always with him, in his exterior as well as in his interior; it does never separate from him. That sin turns its doer into a fuel of the fire, a fire that surrounds not only all sides of his exterior but permeates even his inner self; he cannot save himself by running away; nor can he benefit from standing still; there is neither any shelter nor any refuge against it. That is why Allāh is called ''severe in requiting evil''.

First, the verse mentioned the Divine name in the third person (Allāh), then it was changed into the first person (Our signs), again it was reverted to the original third person (Allāh caught). This change in the middle of the sentence serves two purposes: It freshens the mind and puts more emphasis on the truth of the proposition. Suppose someone says: ''That man is foul-mouthed and uses obscene language; and I myself have experienced his indecent manner; therefore, you should avoid his company.'' The sentence, ''I myself have experienced his indecent manner'', confirms the preceding information of his obscenity, by turning the news into experience and into a sort of testimony.

The import of the verse then would be — and Allāh knows better — something like this: The people of Pharaoh had the same traits as these unbelievers have. They disbelieved and rejected Our signs. There is no doubt at all about it, as We were present there and yet they rejected Our own signs, so We caught them.

When this purpose was served, the pronouns were again changed to the third person. This reversion also served two purposes: It puts the sentence on the orginial track and brought into focus the great and all-encompassing Divine authority and power. The name, Allāh, brings to mind the fact that He has all the world's affairs in His Own hands and looks after every big and small thing. It was not difficult for Him to catch the disbelievers for their sins.

And that is why the name has been repeated in the next sentence. It says, ''and Allāh is severe in requiting'', instead of saying, ''and He is severe . . .'' The name draws attention to the fact that their disbelief and their rejection of the signs was nothing but a rebellion against Almighty Allāh; and it is easy for Him to catch the offenders and give them severe punishment, because He is Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: Say to those who disbelieve: ''You shall be vanquished . . . the resting place'': ''al-Ḥashr'' (اَلْحَشْرُ) is to force a group out from their abode. It is never used with a singular object. Allāh says: . . . and We will gather them and leave not any one of them behind (18:47). ''al-Mihād'' (اَلْمِهَادُ) literally means bed.

The context proves that ''those who disbelieve'' refers to the polytheists, because in the first verse also this phrase has been used for the same group, and not for the People of the Book. Both verses are inter-related — the previous one mentioned that they put their confidence in wealth and children and sought strength from them; and this one says that they shall surely be vanquished and shall all be driven together to the hell.

QUR'ĀN: Indeed there was a sign in the two hosts (which) met together in encounter: The context shows that this verse also is addressed to ‘‘those who disbelieve’’; that it is the continuation of the preceding verse which told the Prophet to tell the unbelievers that they would be vanquished. There is also another possibility: It may have been addressed to the believers, inviting them to ponder on the grace of Allāh bestowed on them on the day of Badr. He helped them with His wonderful aid by affecting the sights of the eyes in a previously unheard of way. If this explanation is accepted then this verse enlarges the circle of audience — the preceding ones were addressed to the Prophet only, but this one includes the believers too. But the first explanation is more appropriate.

The verse does not name the event to which it refers; but the description fits on the battle of Badr. This chapter was revealed after the battle of Badr, or even Uḥud. The style shows that the event referred to was well-known to the audience who knew it with all its particulars. It was only in the battle of Badr that Allāh affected the visions of the participants. In Chapter 8, this phenomenon has been described in the following words: And when He showed them to you, when you met, as few in your eyes, and He reduced you to appear as few in their eyes, in order that Allāh might bring about a matter which was to be done; and to Allāh are returned all affairs (8:44). But this verse mentions reducing them to appear as few; while the verse under discussion talks about showing them as twice their number. Probably, Allāh made the believers appear as few in the eyes of the polytheists, so that the enemies of Islam would feel bold to attack the believers and would not abandon the thought of fighting; then after the start of the encounter, He made them appear as twice their number, so that the enemies would flee away and be vanquished.

In any case, if the verse is addressed, through the Prophet to the polytheists, it does not fit except the battle of Badr. (Some reciters have recited, ‘‘you saw them’’, instead of ‘‘they saw them’’; this recitation also supports the above-given explanation.)

What the verse says is this: O polytheists! if you have any wisdom, then what you saw on the day of Badr should be enough to convince you that victory belongs to the truth, that Allāh helps by His aid whom He wishes, and that He cannot be overpowered by wealth or children. The believers, on that day, were fighting in the way of Allāh: they were a small and weak band, not even one-third of the army of the unbelievers; and their strength was not even worthy of comparison with that of the unbelievers; the Muslims were only three hundred and thirteen souls, their armament and provision amounting to a grand total of six coats of mail, eight swords and two horses. And the army of the polytheists consisted of nearly one thousand warriors, their provisions, strength, horses, camels and other preparations were beyond estimate. But Allāh helped the believers, in spite of their small number and weaknesses, over His enemies; He made the Muslims appear twice their actual number, in the eyes of the polytheists; and the angels were sent to help the believers. The polytheists, who thought that their wealth and children would make them strong and victorious, were destroyed; and their great multitude and overwhelming material strength proved totally ineffective against Allāh.

The wont of the people of Pharaoh and those who were before them — their rejecting the Divine signs and being caught by Allāh for their sins — has been repeated twice in Chapter 8.

The polytheists have been admonished and reminded of the the events of Badr. It is a hint that the victory of the Muslims mentioned in the preceding verse is the victory by killing and destroying the enemies. These verses, therefore, threaten the polytheists of fighting.

QUR'ĀN: one party fighting in the way of Allāh and the other unbelieving: Allāh did not say, ''and the other in the way of Satan'', or, ''in the way of false deities'' etc. The talk is not concerned with comparison between the two ways; its main purport is to show that nothing can be independent of Allāh; that nothing can avail against Him; and that the victory belongs to Him. The comparison is, thus, between the belief in Allāh and fighting in His way on one hand and disbelieving in Allāh on the other.

It appears from the context that the pronouns, ''them'' and ''their'', in the phrase, ''they saw them twice their number'' stand for the phrase, ''one party fighting in the way of Allāh''. In other words, it says that the unbelieving party saw the believers twice the actual number of the believers, that is, the believers appeared in their eyes as six hundred and twenty-six (instead of the three hundred and thirteen). The words do not support the idea that the two pronouns stood for the two groups separately. In other words, the verse does not say that the unbelievers saw the believers twice the number of the unbelievers themselves.

Someone has mentioned another possibility: That both pronouns stood for the unbelieving party, and that the unbelievers saw themselves twice their own actual number, and instead of one thousand they saw themselves as two thousand. In this way, they saw the believers even smaller in proportion than they actually were; three hundren and thirteen is less than one-sixth of two thousand, while the believers were in fact about one-third of the enemies. It would also explain the verse 8:44 mentioned earlier: And when He showed them to you, when you met, as few in your eyes, and He reduced you to appear as few in their eyes . . . Without this explanation the two verses would appear contradictory to each other.

Reply: If Allāh wanted to say what has been suggested above, it was necessary to say clearly, ‘‘they saw themselves twice their own number’’. To express this idea in the present form (they saw them twice their number) creates confusion, which is unworthy of an eloquent talk. Also, it is wrong to think that this verse appears contradictory to the verse 8:44. To show contradiction, one would have to prove that both verses refer to the same time and the same situation. But it cannot be done. Probably, Allāh made each group appear, as fewer than their actual number, in the eyes of the opposite party; it made them bold to attack and start fighting. Then, after the battle waxed hot and the opposing forces raged into each other, Allāh made the unbelievers see the believers twice their actual number, and they lost their heart, were demoralized and fled away. So, where is the supposed discrepancy?

This case is similar to the two verses describing the affairs of the Day of Resurrection: So on that day neither man nor jinn shall be asked about his sin (55:39); And stop them, for they shall be questioned (37:24). There is no conflict here because each verse is about a different time and stage.

Some other exegetes have written some other views about the two pronouns; but as all of them are against the apparent meaning of the word, there is no use of quoting them here.

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh aids with His aid whom He pleases; most surely there is a lesson in this for those who have sight: ''at-Ta'yīd''(اَلتَّأْييدُ = to strengthen) is derived from al-ayd (اَلْاَيْدُ = strength). ''al-Abṣār'' (اَلْاَبْصَارُ) is sight. Some people say that here it refers to the eyes, because the verse describes how Allāh influenced their eye-sight. Others say that it means wisdom and knowledge, because it is through them that one may take lesson from some event. But this controversy is misplaced, because Allāh counts him who does not take lesson from events and parables as blind; and says that eyes must see and differentiate the truth from falsehood. It is a sort of claim that the truth, to which Allāh invites all His creatures, is a manifest, embodied substance which is within the perception of these physical eyes. In short, the body's eye and the mind's eye are treated as one (metaphorically, ofcourse) so far as comprehension of spiritual knowledge is concerned, because this knowledge is open for all to see. This theme is found in many verses, some of which are as follows: For surely it is not the eyes that become blind, but blind become the hearts which are in the breasts (22:46). In other words, the eyes are in the breasts, not in the heads: . . . and they have eyes which they do not see with . . . (7:179). This verse shows astonishment at their being blind to the truth: . . . and put a covering upon his eyes (45:23).

All of it shows that ''sight'' in this verse refers to the manifest eyes; this expression is based on an implied claim that it is these eyes that see the truth and take lesson from the past experience. It is a fine exmaple of al-isti'āratu bi 'l-kināyah (اَلْاِسْتِعَارَةُ بِالْكِنَايَةِ = a simile which contains neither the first or second side nor its particle — instead it mentions only a concomitant of the second side in order to hint at the allegory). Its import is to show that truth is such a manifest substance that it may be seen by these eyes. What has enhanced further the beauty of this expression is the context — the verse describes the effect the Divine decree had had on their eyesights.

Obviously, the sentence, ''most surely there is a lesson in this for those who have sight'', is not a part of the talk which the Prophet was to address to the unbelievers (Say to those who disbelieve . . .). It is addressed to the Prophet himself. Its proof is the singular second person pronoun ''ka'' (كَ = thou) added as suffix in ''dhālika'' (ذٰلِكَ = this). It is an indication that the unbelievers are so blind of hearts that they cannot take lesson from past events; therefore, they are not worthy of any advice.

QUR'ĀN: It has been made to seem fair . . . : This and the following verses elaborate the preceding ones (As for those who disbelieve surely neither their wealth nor their children shall avail them in the least against Allāh . . .). The unbelievers erroneously thought that these things would make them independent of Allāh. Now, this verse explains the reason of their mistaken idea: They have submerged their souls under the love of these worldly materials and are so overwhelmed with them that they have forgotten the life hereafter. But they are mistaken, because these things are just the provisions of this transient life, their only purpose is to pave the way for the next destination that is with Allāh. These people are oblivious of the reality of this worldly provision: Allāh has ingrained in human nature the love of these fair and beautiful items, so that this worldly life may attain its completion and perfection. Without this inclination, continuity of human race would be endangered. It is through this love and desire that the decree of Allāh is enforced: . . . and there is for you in the earth an abode and a provision for a time (2:36). Allāh created in man this inclination, so that he may use it as a means to reach his final destination; so that he may take from it what would benefit him in the next life. People were not expected to treat these worldly trinkets as permanent things, or to forget what lies ahead. They are on journey, going forward to their Lord; they should not take the path as the destination. Allāh says: Surely We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment for it, so that We may try them (as to) which of them is best in deed. And most surely We will make what is on it bare ground without herbage (18:7 — 8).

But these simpletons thought that these apparent causes of worldly pleasure were independent of Allāh, (while actually they were created by Allāh to be a means to obtain the pleasure of Allāh). Instead, the unbelievers thought that these things would avail them against Allāh. By their behaviour, they turned the bliss into misery, and changed the reward into punishment. Allāh says: The likeness of this world's life is only as water which We sent down from the sky; by its mingling the herbage of the earth of which men and cattle eat grows; until when the earth puts on its golden raiment and it becomes garnished, and its people think that they have power over it, Our command comes to it, by night or by day, so We render it as reaped, as though it had not been in existence yesterday; . . . And on the day when We will gather them all together, then We will say to those who associated others (with Allāh); Keep where you are, you and your associates; then We shall separate them widely one from another . . . and they shall be brought back to Allāh, their true Master, and what they did fabricate shall escape from them (10:24 — 30). These verses show that the life and its adornments are in the hands of Allāh; none but He controls them. Man, in his foolishness, is deceived by its appearance and thinks that he is in control of his own affair, and that it is he who manages it and keeps it in order. He ascribes some associates in it, like idols and things like idols (wealth and children etc.). But Allāh will make him aware of his follies; the embellishments will go away, the relationship between him and his associates will be cut off, and all that man had fabricated against Allāh will be lost to him. Then he will understand that what he was admonished with in this world was true. Alas! understanding at that time when he will be returned to his Lord, will not benefit him at all.

Allāh says: ‘‘It has been made to seem fair to men the love of desires . . .’’ The question is: Who has made it to look fair to man? The world appears before man’s eyes as a beautiful and adorable thing — it shows the elegance of independence and beauty of purpose. Does Allāh make it appear in this light? Reason says, No. The All-knowing Wise Lord is too great to manage a thing in such a way that it would defeat His Own purpose. He says: . . . surely Allāh attains His purpose (65:3); and Allāh is predominant over His affair (12:21). If this phenomenon is to be attributed at all, it should be attributed to Satan. Allāh says: . . . and Satan made what they did fair-seeming to them (6:43). And when Satan made their deeds fair-seeming to them . . . (8:48).

Of course, it is all according to the system decreed by Allāh. He has given the man freedom of will to choose his own path, and Allāh does not interfere in the man’s choice. This system is called ‘‘permission’’, it is so that the test may be conducted, and so that the spiritual training may progress in a just manner. Allāh says: Do men think that they will be left alone on saying, ‘‘We believe’’, and not be tried? And certainly We tried those before them, so Allāh will certainly know those who are true and He will certainly know the liars. Or do they who work evil think that they will escape Us? Evil is it that they judge (29:2 — 4).

There is a verse in which this ‘‘making fair-seeming’’ has been attributed to Allāh: Thus have We made fair-seeming to every people their deeds (6:108). This verse may be explained by the above-mentioned system of ‘‘permission’’. It may also be explained in the light of the previously explained verse: Surely We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment for it, so that We may try them (as to) which of them is best in deed (18:7).

This ‘‘making fair-seeming’’ is of two kinds. First, world and worldly embellishments are made fair-seeming to man so that he may use it wisely — to get happiness in the next world, and to seek the pleasure of Allāh in all his actions through this wealth, honour, children and self. It is a good and divinelyinspired characeristic and Allāh has attributed it to Himself in the verse 18:7 (Surely We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment . . .), and in other verses mentioned earlier. Also the following verse refers to this reality: Say: ‘‘Who has prohibited the embellishment of Allāh which He has brought forth for His servants and the good provisions?’’ (7:32).

Second, world is made to appear lovely in the eyes of man, to ensnare his heart, so that he may forget his Creator. It is an evil plan which Allāh has attributed to Satan, and admonished His servants to remain on guard against it. For example: . . . and Satan made what they did fair-seeming to them . . . (6:43); He (Satan) said: ‘‘My Lord! because Thou hast left me to stray, I will certainly make (evil) fair-seeming to them on earth, and I will certainly cause them all to go astray . . . ’’ (15:39); . . . the evil of their doings is made fair-seeming to them . . . (9:37), etc.

Sometimes even this type of ‘‘making fair-seeming’’ is attributed to Allāh, inasmuch as Satan and all other causes of good and evil do whatever they do only because Allāh has given them the ‘‘permission’’ (as explained above). This system was necessary to attain the Divine purpose of test, in order that the doers of good may succeed because of their good intention and choice; and the sinners may be separated from them.

The above explanation makes it clear that it is not Allāh who has made it seem fair to men the love of various desires mentioned in the verse under discussion. No doubt, every ‘‘making fair-seeming’’ may be attributed to Allāh, either directly, (if it is a good adornment leading man to His worship) or indirectly, that is, by permission (if it makes one to forget one’s Creator). But this verse contains some factors which cannot be attributed to Allāh directly. Therefore, it was in keeping with the good manners of the Qur’ān not to attribute this adornment to Allāh; instead, it attributes it to some unspecified agent — it could be either Satan or the man himself.

An exegete has rightly said that the implied doer of the verb, ‘‘It has been made to seem fair’’, is Satan, because the love of desires is not a likeable trait, nor is the love of excessive wealth; and therefore, it cannot be attributed to Allāh. Allāh has attributed to Himself the good things mentioned at the end of this verse and in the next one.

But another commentator has said that it cannot be attributed to Satan. He says: The matters related to the human nature and its love and inclinations can never be ascribed to Satan; what may be attributed to him is evil whispering that makes evil thoughts and deeds look attractive to man. He continues his argument as follows: The Qur’ān has never attributed to Satan anything except making evil deed fair-seeming. Allāh says: And when Satan made their deeds fair-seeming to them (8:48); . . . and Satan made what they did fair-seeming to them (6:43). But the Book does not attribute the realities and natures of the things except to the Wise Creator Who has no partner. Allāh says: Surely We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment for it, so that We may try them (as to) which of them is best in deed (18:7); Thus have We made fair-seeming to every people their deeds (6:108). The verse talks about the ‘‘people’’, which is another way of talking about the nature of society.

Comment: He is right when he says that the realities and natures of things cannot be attributed to other than Allāh. But he is mistaken in thinking that the verse speaks about the naure of man, or about his natural traits. This statement of ours may be understood if wo look at the central theme of this chapter.

The main purpose of this chapter is to describe the following realities:

Allāh is Self-subsisting by Whom all subsist: He manages all affairs of all His creatures; He creates them and looks after them. He guides them to their eternal bliss. Those who indulge in hypocrisy, reject His signs or revolt against Him by differing in His Book — the hypocrites, the unbelievers, the polytheists and the People of the Book — in short, all those who obey Satan and follow their desires, cannot weaken the authority of Allāh, nor can they overpower Him, nor is His all-encompassing management affected by their misbehaviour. Everything, including the creatures' belief and disbelief, obedience and disobedience, is based on the system decreed by Allāh. He has created in this world the systems of the cause and effect, and of the test and trial. He has created the nature, its properties and traits, its inclinations and actions. It has been done so that man may proceed forward to his Lord, may attain nearness to Allāh and may get eternal honour in the Divine presence.

It was because of this system of test that He permitted Satan and did not prevent him from whispering into men's hearts and putting evil ideas into their minds. Nor did He prevent man from obeying Satan or following his own base desires. By this ''permission'' the test and trial remains free and fair; those who believe are distinguished from the disbelievers and the hypocrites; and the pure hearted servants of Allāh are raised in status to become witnesses of Allāh.

These things have been described in this chapter to give comfort to the believers. At that time they were overwhelmed by hardships and difficulties. Within their society, they had to endure the double-dealings of the hypocrites and ignorance of those with disease in their hearts. These two groups disturbed their plans and disrupted their affairs; as a result the commands given by Allāh and His Apostle were not fully obeyed. On the outside, they were in constant danger from various groups. There were, within Arabia, the polytheists and the People of the Book (especially, the Jews); and the neighbouring Romans and Persians were threatening them with all their might and forces. All those disbelievers were mistaken and confused in their ideas and ideals. They were entangled in this transient world and its embellishments; they thought that it was their goal and final destination. They had forgottent that this world was only a path, and the destination was the next world.

It is obvious that the chapter discusses the nature of the people, but in a wider framework that includes the purpose of their creation, and all that it entails, like the character and behaviour, the good and evil deeds, the obedience and disobedience. It declares that all this is under the management of Allāh, Who can never be defeated or overpowered — neither in this world nor in the next. In this world, all things happen by His ‘‘permission’’, which makes the test meaningful. In the next world, all will be based on the principle of recompense — good for good and evil for evil.

The verses under discussion also were revealed with the same theme. The disbelievers were given those bounties in order that they might obtain with their help the pleasure of Allāh and enter into His paradise. Instead, they rejected the signs of their Lord and changed those bounties into a source of eternal misfortune; they relied on those worldly embellishments; and thought that those things would avail them against Allāh; in short, they were so enchanted by created things that they forgot the Creator. But these people cannot weaken the hold of Allāh over them; they cannot overpower Him, nor can they escape from Him. Allāh shall catch them for their sins, and shall help His believing servants against them. He shall gather all the disbelievers together unto hell and it is an evil abode. It is their greatest mistake to rely on that which is only a provision of this worldly life, and to forget that the best destination is with Allāh.

These verses too speak about the nature of the disbelievers, but in a wider context that includes their good and bad deeds.

Therefore, it is wrong on the part of that exegete to think that, because the verse speaks about human nature, the verb, ‘‘It has been made to seem fair’’, cannot be attributed to other than Allāh.

Further, he has offered the verse: ‘‘Thus have We made fair-seeming to every people their deeds’’, as a proof that realities can only be attributed to Allāh, and it is only the deeds that may be attributed to Satan. But this verse clearly proves the opposite, because it attributes the deeds to Allāh. Its context further strengthens this proposition. The complete verse is as follows: And do not abuse those whom they call upon besides Allāh, lest exceeding the limits they should abuse Allāh out of ignorance. Thus have We made fair-seeming to every people their deeds; then to their Lord shall be their return, so He will inform them of what they did (8:108). It makes clear what we have said.

Another exegete has said: This ‘‘Making fair-seeming’’ is of two types: Commendable and condemnable. Likewise, human actions are of two kinds: good and evil. Only that which is commendable, good and praiseworthy can be attributed to Allāh; and the other type is escribed to Satan.

Comment: The above statement is correct to a certain extent — in so far as the direct attribution is concerned. In other word, it is valid about the direct actions of Allāh. Allāh does not do except good and He does not enjoin indecency and evil. But there is no reason why actions, other than the good and praiseworthy, should not be attributed to Him indirectly. In other words, Allāh may ‘‘permit’’ His creatures to do good or evil as they like. They do whatever they do by the power given to them by Allāh, and according to the system of test decreed by Him. And in this sense, all actions may be ascribed to Allāh — indirectly, of course. If one says that some actions cannot be ascribed to Allāh even indirectly, it would be difficult for him to believe that Allāh is the Lord of everything, Creator of everything and Owner of everything, or that He has no partner or colleague in any affair at all. Moreover, the Qur’ān contains many verses in which ‘‘unpraiseworthy’’ actions have been ascribed to Allāh: Allāh makes whosoever He wills go astray (13:27); . . . Allāh made their hearts turn aside (61:5); Allāh mocks them and leaves them alone in their inordinacy (2:15); . . . We order the people of it who lead easy life, so they transgress therein (17:16); there are many verses of this kind in the Qur’ān.

What is the source of this erroneous ideas of people like that exegete? They looked at things and meditated on their mutual relationship, on their actions and their effects. They thought that every single thing has an independent existence, is separate from all surrounding things, and has no connection with things that have passed nor with those that are yet to appear.

Allāh has decreed that every event should be a result of interaction of numerous causes. But these people put every thing and every event in a separate pigeonhole, unconnected with any other thing or event. According to their thinking, each event is related only to its immediate cause, and each action belongs only to its doer; other, distant causes have nothing to do with that event or action. Planets revolve, rivers flow, ships run, earth supports its inhabitants, vegetables grow, animals walk and man lives and strives: All these phenomena are separate from each other; there is no bond that binds them to one another; neither any metaphysical reality joins them together nor any physical force keeps them united.

Going a step further, they ascribed the same separateness to human actions and affairs. Virtue and evil, felicity and infelicity, guidance and misguidance, obedience and disobedience, benevolence and malevolence, justice and injustice, nothing is related to any other thing, nothing has any connection with anything else in its existecne.

These people have overlooked the most obvious reality — that the universe, with all sorts of creatures and all kinds of components, is a single entity, whose parts are finely aligned together. Not only that — its components are often interchanged: Today it is a human being, tomorrow it will change into dust and the day after tomorrow will grow as a grass; one's life is the other's death; the ''new'' arises from the ashes of the ''old''.

The events happening herein are likewise all related to each other; they are the links that are connected together to form the chain that is called the universe. An apparently insignificant alteration in the position of a small link affects the positions of all other links on both sides. A minute change in an atom causes changes in the whole system of the world, although we may not notice it. (If we do not know that a thing exists, it does not mean that it does not exist.)

This universal inter-relation was known to, and described by, the ancient philosophers; and it has been fully manifested by modern sciences. And the Qur'ān had explained to the Muslims this phenomenon long before they learned it from philosophers, scientists and mathematicians of other nations, and then started to do their own researches on these lines. The Divine Book tells us how the system of the heavens and the earth are interlocked, how one affects the other, how all are joined together in attaining to the purpose of creation, how the Divine decree permeates every thing, how all are proceeding towards their Lord, and how the final destination is with Allāh.

Likewise, the characteristics and attributes of our actions are linked together. Even the opposite actions stand face to face with each other, and if one of them goes away, the other would not be recognized. It resembles the physical world where making of one thing depends on unmaking of the other, and the one's progress causes the other's retrogress. If one of the opposite is missing, the other's desired effects on the society would also disappear. The same is the case of virtue and evil as shown by the Divine religion. Obedience is a virtue because disobedience is an evil; good deeds deserve good recompense because bad deeds attract severe requital; reward is pleasant because punishment is unpleasant; and pleasure is desired because displeasure is undesireable. Man by nature gravitates towards felicity and happiness; and runs away from infelicity and unhappiness. If this natural movement stops, the existence itself would dissolve into nothingness.

Obedience, then good deeds, then reward, then pleasure, then happiness — it is a chain that runs parallel to disobedience, then evil deeds, then punishment, then displeasure, then unhappiness. Each side manifests itself by hiding the other; each one gets life in the death of its opposite. How can one call to good deeds without warning against its opposite misdeeds?

We can see in this light that in the Divine wisdom it was necessary for the universe to contain the opposites — virtue and evil, obedience and disobedience. At this stage, there appears an important difference: Creation and destruction, making and unmaking in all things, except human actions, are attributed to Allāh, because the creation and all its affairs are in His hands, He has no partner or colleague. So far as the actions are concerned, if they are good and virtuous, they too are directly attributed to Allāh, because He has guided the man to them. But evil deeds and affairs, like whispering of Satan, overpowering of man by desires or rule of a tyrant over a nation, may be indirectly attributed to Allāh, inasmuch as He withdraws His help from the doers of such deeds and leaves them free to go astray. It is this factor that is called ''permission''. It is correct to say that Allāh has permitted Satan to misguide human beings with his whisperings and deceptions; that He does not prevent man from following his base desires; and that He does not hinder an unjust person from his oppression. He has decreed this system because felicity and infelicity are based on freedom of choice; if a man succeeds, it shall be by his own free choice; and if he fails, it too shall be by his own free choice. Otherwise, the proof of Allāh could not be completed against His servants, and the intended test would be irrelevant.

What prevented the said exegete and others like him from letting the Qur'ānic arguments and expressions progress to their logical result, was their reluctance to accept what seemed to them a wrong conclusion. Those who believed that everything is done by Allāh and that there is no cause other than Allāh were disinclined to accept that things were linked together in a chain of cause and effect, because, according to their thinking, it implied a reduction in the all pervasive power of Allāh. Others thought that if deeds of all types could be attributed to Allāh — directly or indirectly — it would absolve the man from responsibility of his action, as it would mean that he was not free in his action; rather he was a helpless tool in the hands of Allāh. Once it was accepted, the system of test, reward and punishment would be negated; and there would be no justification for ordaining the Divine law and religion.

But they should have meditated on the words of Allāh revealed in the Qur'ān: . . . and Allāh is predominant over His affairs (12:21); . . . surely His is the creation and the command (7:54); Now surely of Allāh is what is in the heavens and the earth . . . (10:55). There are many similar verses that prove what we have explained above; and a short description of this topic was given under the verse: Surely Allāh is not ashamed to set forth any parable — (that of) a gnat or any thing above that (2:26).

Now we return to our original topic: Apparently the doer of the verb, ''It has been made to seem fair'', is something other than Allāh — it is either Satan or the man's soul itself. There are four reasons to support this view of ours:

First: The verse condemns the disbelievers because they are inclined to these embellishments of the world — wealth and children — and think that these things may avail them against Allāh. It is an adornment that turns one away from remembrance of Allāh, and it is not proper to ascribe such a ‘‘making fair-seeming’’ to Allāh.

Second: If this ‘‘making fair-seeming’’ is attributed to Allāh, it would point to the natural inclination, ingrained in human creation. In that case, it was more appropriate to use the word, ‘‘al-insān’’ (اَلْاِنْسَانُ = human being, man) or ‘‘children of Adam’’; because Allāh uses such words on such occasions: Certainly We created man (al-insān) in the best make. Then We rendered him the lowest of the low (95:4 — 5); And surely We have honoured the children of Adam, and We carry them in the land and the sea, and We have given them of the good things, and We have made them to excel by an appropriate excellence over most of those whom We have created (17:70). But in the verse under discussion Allāh has used the word, ‘‘an-nās’’ (اَلنَّاسُ = men, people) which more often than not has been used in the Qur’ān to show worthlessness of the people referred to, to show their immaturity and narrow-mindedness. For example, . . . but most men do not consent to aught but denying (17:89); O you people! surely We have created you of a male and a female . . . (49:13), etc.

Third: The items of desires enumerated in this verse do not fit properly the inclinations ingrained in human nature. If the Qur’ān wanted to refer to the natural desires, then it would have been more appropriate to change the words, ‘‘women and sons and hoarded treasures of gold and silver’’ with the words, ‘‘spouses, and children and wealth’’. After all the natural inclination towards the opposite sex is found in women as much as in men; and the parents love their daughters as much as their sons; and man loves wealth in general and not only the hoarded treasures of gold and silver.

Those who say that the doer of the verb, ‘‘It has been made to seem fair’’ is Allāh, have had to say that the word, ‘‘women’’, refers to matrimony in general; the ‘‘sons’’ means children of both sexes; and the phrase, ‘‘hoarded treasures of gold and silver’’ stands for wealth in general. They say that the words used in the verse have been given just as the most popular examples of every item.

But it is stretching the meanings too far.

Fourth: To say that it is Allāh Who has made these items fair-seeming to men is not in conformity with the end of the verse: ‘‘this is the provision of the life of this world; and Allāh is He with Whom is the best destination. Say: 'Shall I tell you of what is better than these?' '' Obviously these words have been used to divert their attention from these worldly desires, and create in them love of the things that are with Allāh — paradise, pure mates and pleasure of Allāh. The natural desire of worldly embellishments has been created by Allāh, in order that man may use them to reach his spiritual destination — the same paradise and pleasure of Allāh. That natural desire is the means to obtain that result. If Allāh admonished men to forget these worldly desires and yet told them to reach the intended goal it would be self-contradictory. Who would want to satiate his hunger and yet abstain from food?

Question: This verse in its theme is not different from the verse, Say: ''Who has prohibited the embellishment of Allāh which He has brought forth for His servants and the good provisions?'' Say: ''These are for the believers in the life of this world, purely (theirs) on the Resurrection Day . . . '' (7:32). In this verse the embellishment is ascribed to Allāh; likewise, the doer of this ''making fair-seeming'' in the verse under discussion should be Allāh.

Reply: There is a clear difference in the import of the two verses. The verse under discussion condemns these desires; because they divert the attention of men from Allāh and from what is with Allāh. It exhorts them to turn aside from these worldly entanglements and to look forward to what is with Allāh. The theme of the verse of Chapter 7 is quite different. It says that these embellishments have been created for the benefit of human beings; the believers enjoy them in this world together with the others; and it will be reserved for the believers only in the next world. It should be noted that this verse uses the word ''His servants'', instead of the ''men'' and it counts the embelilishment as ''the good provisions''.

Question: What has been made fair-seeming is ''the love of desires'', not the desires themselves. The fact that love seems fair to man and attracts him is a natural reality. The expression, that love has been made fair-seeming to men, means that it has been made effective in their hearts; in other words, love has been created in their hearts; and creation cannot be attributed to other than Allāh. Therefore, He is the doer of this verb.

Reply: The context (to which we have referred) shows that adornment of love means that love has been given a power that attracts people to itself and prevents them from looking at other things. Adornment is an attractive thing that is used or worn by another thing; it attracts the people primarily to itself and then transfers that attraction to the wearer or user. A woman uses cosmetics and ornaments, in order to attract her man to herself — by way of those embellishments. Primarily the man is attracted by those embellishments, but the real objective of the woman is to attract him to herself. In this background, the semantic flow of the word, ‘‘It has been made fair-seeming . . . the love of desires . . .’’ is that primarily the love attracts the men to itself but the real objective is to enchant the people and let them sink in inordinate desire of the named trinkets of the world. In short, the effect of love is not the true objective; and therefore the argument mentioned in the question is out of place. The real goal (which has been condemned) is the desire, as may be seen in the verse: But there followed after them an evil generation, who neglected prayer and followed the sensual desires, so they shall soon meet (the result of their) sin (19:59). This meaning is supported by the given list of the desired things. Moreover, the word ‘‘desire’’, although used here for desired things, has a shade of inordinate passion in its meaning.

QUR’ĀN: of women and sons and hoarded treasures of gold and silver and well-bred horses and cattle and tilth: ‘‘an-Nisā’ ’’ (اَلنِّسَاءُ = women) is plural, it has no singular from this root; ‘‘al-banīn’’ (اَلْبَنِيْنَ = sons) is plural of al-ibn (اَلِابْنُ = male offspring, direct or indirect); ‘‘al-qanāṭīr’’ (اَلْقَنَاطِيْرُ) is plural of al-qinṭār (اَلْقِنْطَارُ = a waterskin full of gold, a filled waterskin); ‘‘al-muqanṭarah’’ (اَلْمُقَنْطَرَةُ) is passive participle (object-noun) of al-qinṭār although the latter is an inflexible noun. In Arabic language, they often ascribe to an inflexible noun a shade of meaning that makes it resemble an infinitive verb, and then make various words from it, for example, al-bāqil (اَلْبَاقِلُ), at-tāmir (اَلتَّامِرُ) and al-‘aṭṭār (اَلْعَطَّارُ) for seller of al-baql (اَلْبَقْلُ = vegetable), at-tamr (اَلتَّمْرُ = date) and al-‘iṭr (اَلْعِطْرُ = perfume) respectively. It qualifies the word al-qanāṭīr (اَلْقَنَاطِيْرُ = treasures) with an adjective al-muqanṭarah (اَلْمُقَنْطَرَةُ = treasured, hoarded) which is derived from the same word. This device doubly confirms the meaning of the qualified words, for example, danānīr mudannarah (دَنَانِيْرُ مُدَنَّرَةٌ = coined dinars), dawāwīn mudawwanah (دَوَاوِيْنُ مُدَوَّنَةٌ = recorded register), ḥijāb maḥjūb (حِجَابٌ مَحْجُوبٌ = veiled curtain) and sitr mastūr (سِتْرٌ مَسْتُورٌ = concealed screen). ''al-Khayl'' (اَلْخَيْلُ = horses) ; ''al-musawwamah '' (اَلْمُسَوَّمَةُ) has two meanings: left free to pasture or branded. ''al-An'ām'' (اَلْاَنْعَامُ) is plural of an-na'am (اَلنَّعَمُ) which means camel, cow, buffalo, goat and sheep; al-bahīmah (اَلْبَهِيْمَةُ) is more general than that and is used for all quadrupeds and excludes carnivora, birds and insects. ''al-Ḥarth'' (اَلْحَرْثُ = tilth) has a meaning of earning in it; it means farming (or cultivated plant) for a livelihood.

The list of desired things given here does not mean that every man has so many loves of desires, as some exegetes have thought; they took the verse to refer to the natural love of spouse, children and wealth. But then they had to explain why human being has been referred to as ''men'' or people, why ''children'' has been changed to ''sons'' and why ''wealth'' has been described as ''hoarded treasures''.

The fact, however, is that the verse only says that people, in their inordinate love of worldly desires, are of various types: There are some lecherous persons whose only aim in life is lusting after women; it brings in its train numerous sins and social ills, like using musical instruments, singing, drinking liquor and many other evils. Such debauchery is found mostly in men; women as a rule are free from it (except, in rare cases). Then there are those who ardently love their sons and want their number to increase in order to become a strong and powerful clan; this tendency is more prominent in nomadic tribes, and it especially concerns the sons, not the daughters. A third category is of those greedy avaricious persons who live only for the purpose of hoarding treasures and riches; this madness manifests itself especially in filling their coffers with gold and silver, or similar things like currency notes and bonds, other items are not valued very much by such people. This covetousness is predominent in inhabitants of villages and towns, and is seldom seen in nomads. Finally, come those who want to own a string of pedigreed horses. (It is those who are fond of horsemanship or horse-race); some others love to have cattle; yet others eagerly desire for agricultural farm. The last named three types of desire are sometimes found together.

People usually are overwhelmed by one of the above-mentioned desires primarily, and the rest is given a secondary place. One seldom (or, never) finds a man whose love of all these items is of equal degree.

Other desired ‘‘things’’, like power, position, prestige, presidency, ministry etc., are only imaginary things, that have no existence outside imagination. Man desires them not for their own sake, but only because they give him a chance to acquire wealth. And, in any case, it is not the purport of the verse to enumerate all the desires.

It proves what we mentioned earlier that the ‘‘love of desires’’ means inordinate attachment to these things (and it is ascribed to Satan); it does not refer to the natural love that has been ingrained in human psyche (and which is attributed to Allāh).

QUR’ĀN: this is the provision . . . best destination: These desires are such as may be useful to manage the affairs of this life; but this life itself, like its provisions, is a transient thing; it will soon cease to exist. The good life and the best destination is only with Allāh.

QUR’ĀN: Say: ‘‘Shall I tell you . . . and Allāh’s pleasure: It elaborates the preceding sentence, ‘‘and Allāh is He with Whom is the best destination’’. It puts, in place of the above-mentioned transient and misleading desires, other things that are best for the man, because they shall remain for ever and are really good, without any shade of imperfection. Although these good enjoyments are similar to those evil desires, but they are free from all evil and bad effects, and they do not divert the man’s attention from sublime Divine realities. The three good enjoyments are the paradise, the pure mates and the pleasure of Allāh.

Among the blessings of the paradise are the pure mates. The verse has already mentioned the paradise. Then what was the need of mentioning the ‘‘pure mates’’ separately. It is because sexual intercourse is the greatest physical pleasure of a human being. It was for the same reason that the preceding verse mentioned ‘‘women’’ before ‘‘sons’’ and ‘‘hoarded treasures’’.

‘‘ar-Riḍwān’’ (اَلرِّضْوَانُ) is also read as ar-ruḍwān (اَلرُّضْوَانُ); it means pleasure, when a reality is agreeable to one’s heart; as-sukhṭ (اَلسُّخْطُ = displeasure) is its opposite.

The Qur’ān repeatedly mentions the pleasure of Allāh. Allāh is pleased with a servant if he obeys His command; also He is pleased if the servant acquires such attributes and qualities which are good and praiseworthy. But in most — nay, all — places where it has been mentioned in the Qur’ān, it is related to the obedience. That is why sometimes it is described side by side with the pleasure of the servant. Allāh is pleased with His servant because of his obedience; the servant is pleased with his Master because of the good reward given to him. Allāh says: Allāh is well pleased with them and they are well pleased with Him (98:8); O tranquilled soul (that art at rest)! Return to thy Lord, well pleased (with Him), well pleasing (to Him) (89:27 — 28); And (as for) the foremost, the first of the Emigrants and the Helpers, and those who followed them in goodness, Allāh is well pleased with them and they are well pleased with Him (9:100).

Pleasure of Allāh has been counted here as one of those things that are better for men than the desires of this world’s life. It shows that this pleasure itself is one of the things that man should desire — or, it accompanies such things that should be desired by him. That is why it has been joined in this verse with the gardens and the pure wives. In other verses, it has been jointly mentioned with grace, forgiveness and mercy of Allāh: . . . seeking the grace from their Lord and (His) pleasure . . . (5:2); and forgiveness from Allāh and (His) pleasure . . . (57:20); . . . mercy from Himself and (His) pleasure . . . (9:21).

The verse under discussion implies a sublime reality that one may comprehend on meditating on the verses mentioned above, for example, Allāh is well pleased with them . . . (98:8) and: well pleased with Him, well pleasing (to Him) (89:28). The verses say that Allāh is well pleased with them; it is different from saying that He is well pleased with their deeds. It proves that Allāh shall never reject any of their prayers; He shall never disappoint them in whatever they ask Him for. It leads to us to the verse: They have therein what they wish and with Us is more yet (50:35). In short, when Allāh is pleased with a man, that man shall be granted all his wishes without any reservation.

Now we may realize the true significance of the verses. Man thinks that if he acquires the worldly objects mentioned in the preceding verse — and especially the hoarded treasures — it will give him freedom of action; he will be able to do whatever he wishes and he will get unlimited power; but he is grossly mistaken in it. Such unlimited power comes only from the pleasure of Allāh, Who has every affair in His own hands.

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh sees the servants: The two verses showed that Allāh has created for man in both worlds many bounties and pleasant things which he is wont to enjoy, for example, sexual pleasure, food, drink, property and things like that. These items are found in both worlds, with one difference — the pleasures of this world are available to both the believers and the non-believers; but the bounties of the next world are reserved for the believers only; non-believers will have no share in it.

A question could be asked: Why this difference? Why only the believers will be given the pleasant things of the next world? The sentence, ''Allāh sees the servants'', answers this unasked question. This difference between the believer and non-believer is based on a basic difference between their conditions, and Allāh sees them and knows the difference between them. The dividing factor is piety and fear of Allāh, which is found in the believer only. That attribute of piety and fear of Allāh has been elaborated in the next two verses: ''Those who say . . . forgiveness before dawn''. The pious believers declare that they depend on their Lord in all their affairs; and they confirm that declaration with good deeds. The unbeliever, on the other hand, thinks that he is independent of Allāh; he remains entangled in worldly desires, forgets the next world and his ultimate destination. Therefore, he shall be denied the pleasures of that world.

Now read again the verses, ''this is the provision of the life of this world; and Allāh is He with Whom is the best destination. Say: 'Shall I tell you of what is better than these?' For those who guard (against evil) are gardens with their Lord, beneath which rivers flow, to abide in them, and pure mates . . .'' Also, look at other verses of the same theme, for example, Say: ''Who has prohibited the embellishment of Allāh which He has brought forth for His servants and the good provisions?'' Say: ''These are for the believers in the life of this world, purely (theirs) on the Resurrection Day; thus do We make the signs clear fora people who know'' (7:32). If you ponder on such verses, you will easily grasp the reality of the bounties of the paradise; also you will know how baseless is the following objection directed against them by many writers:

Objection: Look at any worldly thing; all its actions and reactions emanate from various organs and faculties which are found in its system. Allāh has equipped it with those organs and faculties to protect and preserve its existence. After all, existence is not a matter of chance, nor does it happen at random or without a purpose. Here is the man; his whole body is equipped with the most efficient and most mind-boggling systems, all geared to one aim — to ingest and digest the food he takes. The digested food replaces the burnt up cells, tissues and other parts of the body; through this ever-continuing process, man remains alive, his body recoups its losses and even grows. Likewise, he has been given the most intricate reproductory systems — male and female complementing each other in the most awe-inspiring manner. And the purpose behind it is to preserve and propagate the human species.

What has been said about the man, is equally true for the animal and the vegetables.

The nature very cunningly put delicious taste and irresistible pleasure in these actions, compelling the creatures, and especially the man and the animal, to do it again and again in pursuit of pleasure. Immersed in the pleasure of food and sexual intercourse, man is seldom aware that the nature is using him for its own goal, that is, preservation of human race. If the food and sexual intercourse were devoid of pleasure, no man would have indulged in them — even if he was told that the survival of his race depended on it. But in the present set-up man gladly endures whatever hardships come in his way and obtains those pleasures. When he gets his desire, he feels happy and even proud of his achievement. But it is the nature that should really be proud of its planning: It wanted to keep the individual alive — and it was done through eating; and it wanted the species to survive — and this goal was attained through copulation. And what was left for the self-satisfied man? Nothing except the memory of a transient pleasure.

These worldly pleasures are ingrained in our system but for a limited and transitory purpose. There is no reason why they should be transplanted from this world to the next where that purpose cannot be attained. The pleasure of food, drink and other such things is meant to protect the body from weakness, sickness and death. The pleasure of sexual intercourse and other related things is meant for the continuity and survival of the human race. If a man is taken out of this world and given an everlasting existence which is immune from death and annihilation; a life that is free from every hardship and difficulty, and every sorrow and grief, then there is no reason why he should be encumbered with these worldly organs and faculties. Why should he be burdened with various systems of the body and a myriad of organs like stomach, kidneys, bladder, spleen, liver, etc.? After all, they were needed only in the worldly life which was transitory; what purpose would they serve in the eternal life?

Reply: Allāh has created these pleasures as well as the bounties from which they spring forth, as an embellishment of this world's life. The aim is to attract the man initially to them — and through them to the life itself. Allāh has said:

Surely We have made whatever is on the earth an embellishment for it . . . (18:7).

Wealth and children are an adornment of the life of this world . . . (18:46).

. . . coveting the (transitory) goods of this world's life . . . (4:94).

And do not stretch your eyes after that with which We have provided different classes of them, (of) the splendour of this world's life, that We may thereby try them; and the sustenance (given) by your Lord is better and more abiding (20:131).

Note: This verse covers all aspects of the subject under discussion.

And whatever things you have been given are only a provision of this world's life and its adornment, and whatever is with Allāh is better and more lasting; do you not then understand? (28:60).

There are many verses of the same import. They make it 'ar that all the bounties of this world have been created to make this life pleasant — this life which is so short and finite. If there were no life, these bounties and their pleasures would not have been created. This is a fact and upto this point we totally agree with our adversaries.

Now comes the important reality which has been overlooked by the said objector. When he says that the man is given an everlasting existence in the next world, what meaning does he assign to the word ‘‘man’’? Man has no other identity except this existence which he perfects in various stages. He is a combination of a spirit and a body — the body which is made of various organs, faculties, powers and senses. Remove these organs and faculties etc., and there will remain neither any person nor his existence — nothing will survive. Negation of body and its various systems and organs is not just a negation of man’s continued existence, it is negation of the man himself.

Man, in fact, is a being who procreates, eats, drinks and copulates; he manages the things given them to, and receiving them from, others; he feels, thinks and understands; he feels happiness and is overcome by sorrow. All these actions and reactions form his personality — we may say that he is the sum total of these faculties and systems. Then Allāh transfers him from this transitory world to the everlasting abode and makes him an eternal being — either enjoying everlasting reward or undergoing abiding punishment. But Allāh does not do so by nullifying man’s entity and giving him another one; He only bestows on his present entity the quality of eternity, removing from it the defects of changes and death. Whatever bounties he is awarded, they must be similar to those he had enjoyed in this world; otherwise, he would not enjoy it at all. And what are the pleasures he is familiar with? There is nothing except sexual intercourse, food, drink, clothes, house, friends, and other such enjoyments. Of course, there will be one difference: While the pleasure of this world is transitory, that of the next will be eternal. Likewise, the punishments given to him should be similar to the hardships and afflictions of this world, with the same difference — while the calamities of this world are transitory, those of the next will be everlasting.

In short, man in the next world will remain the same man; there too he will need and require the same things which he needed and required here. The difference between the pleasures and displeasures of this world and those of the next is that the latter will be eternal and everlasting.

This reality manifests itself in the words of Allāh, where He describes the creation of man: And certainly We created man of an extract of clay; then We made him a small life-germ in a firm resting-place, then We made the life-germ a clot, then We made the clot a lump of flesh, then We made (in) the lump of flesh bones, then We clothed the bones with flesh; then We caused it to grow into another creation; so blessed be Allāh, the best of the creators. Then after that you will most surely die. Then surely on the Day of Resurrection you shall be raised (23:12 — 16). Note the verbs in the beginning, ''We created'', and ''We made''; the Arabic verbs are derived from al-khalq (اَلْخَلْقُ) which implies collection, combination and re-arrangement. Then comes the verb ''ansha'nāhū'' (اَنْشَأْنَاهُ = We caused it to grow into); it implies a change in the mode of creation. (Obviously, it refers to the relation of the soul with the body.) Lastly, comes the declaration, ''Then surely on the Day of Resurrection you shall be raised''. The sentence addresses the same person who was given a body and then was caused to grow into another creation. It is that combination of body and soul that will be raised on the Day of Resurrection. Likewise, He says: He (also) said: ''Therein shall you live, and therein shall you die, and from it shall you be raised'' (7:25). In other words, the man's life is the earthly one, made of its joys and its sorrows. We have explained it to a certain extent under the verse: Mankind was but one people . . . (2:213).

Allāh says about the bounties of this world: this is the provision of the life of this world (3:14); and then He says: and this world's life is nothing in the hereafter but (only some) provision (13:26). The very life of this world is a provision in the hereafter; it is a means of enjoyment in the next life. It is a very unique expression; and it opens a thousand doors of knowledge for those who may ponder on it. The verse confirms the tradition of the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.):

‘‘As you live, so you shall die; and as you die, so you shall be raised.’’ To sum it up, the life of man is made up of the worldly existence together with the good or evil he may have earned. It is this very life which shall be his provision in the hereafter, where he shall reap the reward or punishment according to what he thinks to be his success and prosperity, or failure and loss. He will be awarded his pleasures and enjoyments and will thus get eternal happiness; on the other hand, if he were deprived of those pleasures and enjoyments, he would remain in eternal sorrow. And this what is meant by the bounties of the Garden and the tornment of the Fire.

Let us explain it further. Man has a felicity according to his nature, and an infelicity according to the same. The felicity and infelicity are related to his survival as an individual and as a species. This servival depends on his various physical actions, like eating, drinking, copulation etc. Allāh has made these actions attractive to him by investing them with pleasure and satisfaction. Thus, the man proceeds on the path of perfection and begins working consciously according to his senses and will. At this stage, his perfection becomes inextricably interlocked with his senses and will. He does not recognize any perfection unless he desires it and feels it, even if it is a perfection in the eyes of the nature. For example, we do not draw any pleasure from that which we do not actively feel, even if it is a natural source of pleasure, like the health, wealth and child. On the other hand, we get pleasure from what we actively feel to be pleasant, even if it is not so in reality, like a patient who believes himself to be in good health.

At this stage, these preliminary pleasures become real perfection for the man, although according to the nature they were but preliminary ones. When Allāh bestows eternity on such a man, his happiness will depend on only those pleasures which he would himself wish for and desire. And his unhappiness will emanate from that which he would not desire. Felicity of a man having perception and will emanates from that which he knows and desires; and his infelicity from that which he knows but does not desire.

The man would be happy in the hereafter only if he got the pleasures which he used to desire in the life of this world, like the food, the drink and the spouses — and even more; and this is the paradise. And he would be unhappy if he did not get that; and this is the hell. Allāh says: they shall have in them what they please (16:13).

QUR'ĀN: Those who say: ''Our Lord! surely we believe, therefore forgive us our sins and save us from the chastisement of the fire'': The pronoun, ''those'', refers to ''those who guard (against evil)'', mentioned in the preceding verse. They call upon Allāh and say, ''Our Lord!'' By declaring His lordship, they confess their own servitude and seek His Mercy to grant them what they are asking for. ''surely we believe'': The sentence is not an attempt to lay God under their obligation, becuse it is Allāh Who lays the believers under His obligation by helping them to believe. Allāh says: . . . rather Allāh lays you under an obligation by guiding you to the faith . . . (49:17). Rather it is a plea to Allāh to fulfil for them the promise of forgiveness made with the believers: . . . and believe in Him, He will forgive you of your faults . . . (46:31). That is why the next clause begins with ''therefore'', (therefore forgive us our sins), showing that this prayer is based on the preceding clause. The assertive particle ''inna'' (إِنَّ = surely) emphasizes their truth, showing that they are firm in their belief.

The forgiveness of sins, per se, does not necessarily mean release from punishment. Saving a sinner from punishment is a grace which Allāh bestows on him who believes in Him and worships Him. It is not a right of the servant that Allāh should save him from the chastisement of the Fire, or that He should admit him into the Garden. Even the servant's belief and obedience are from the grace of Allāh; obviously they cannot give the servant any right upon Allāh. Of course, sometimes Allāh in His mercy establishes some rights for the servants on Himself; and one of those rights is the promise given to them that He would forgive their sins and save them from the chastisement of the Fire — provided they believed in Him: . . . and believe in Him, He will forgive you of your faults and protect you from a painful punishment (46:31).

Nevertheless, it may be inferred from some Qur'ānic verses that the protection from the punishment of the Fire is one and same with the forgiveness and the Garden. Allāh says: O you who believe! shall I lead you to a merchandise which may deliver you from a painful chastisement? You shall believe in Allāh and His Apostle, and struggle hard in Allāh's way with your properties and your lives, that is better for you, did you but know. He will forgive you your faults and cause you to enter into gardens beneath which rivers flow, and goodly dwellings in gardens of perpetuity; that is the mighty achievement (61:10 — 12). The last sentences (saying that the believers' faults shall be forgiven and they shall enter into gardens) explain in detail what the first sentence had said in a general way: ''shall I lead you to a merchandise which may deliver you from a painful chaystisement?'' Thus, deliverance from chastisement means forgiveness of sins and entry into the garden. It is a very subtle idea, and we shall explain it in a more appropriate place, God willing.

QUR'ĀN: The patient, and the truthful, and the devout (ones) and those who spend (benevolently) and those who ask for forgiveness before dawn: The five attributes refer to ''those who guard (against evil)''; these are the virtues which are essential for piety, for guarding against evil.

Patience: This virtue has been mentioned first and without any condition. It, therefore, covers all three kinds of patience: Patience (i.e., steadfastness) in obedience of Allāh; patience (i.e., abstaining) from the disobedience; and patience (i.e., forebearance) in face of a calamity.

Truth: The final analysis of truth means conformity of a man's exterior — his word and deed — with his inner-self. In this sense, it covers all the other virtues mentioned here, like patience and devoutness etc. Obviously, such a meaning would not fit the context. We have, therefore, to interpret it as the truth in words only. And Allāh knows better.

Devoutness: It means humility before Allāh; and covers all the acts of worship and obedience.

Spending (benevolently): It is giving money to him who deserves it.

As for asking for forgiveness before dawn, it makes it necessary for the servant to pray in the last hours of night in order that he may ask for forgiveness in that prayer. Traditions say that it refers to the non-obligatory prayer after midnight, and to the asking for forgiveness in al-qunūt (اَلْقُنُوْتُ = the special invocation before bowing down in the ṣalāt) of al-watr (اَلْوَتْرُ = the last, that is, eleventh rak'ah of the prayer after midnight; it is performed as an independent unit, with a qunūt before bowing down). Allāh has pointed to it as a way that leads man to his Lord. Vide Chapters 73 and 74, where mentioning the prayer after midnight. Allāh says: Surely this is a reminder, so whoever pleases takes to his Lord a way (73:19; 76:29).

QUR'ĀN: Allāh bears witness that there is no god but He, and (so do) the.angels and those possessed of knowledge, maintaining (His creation) with justice: The verbal noun, ''ash-shahādah'' (اَلشَّهَادَةُ) originally meant ''to look at'', ''to see''; one got knowledge of a thing or an event by being present at the time and place of occurrence and looking at it. Then it was used for describing it to others and bearing witness to the knowledge thus gained. Thereafter, the word was concurrently used for both meanings, both being treated as its real meanings. After all, there was not much distance from acquiring a knowledge to describing it to others. Mostly one acquires knowledge of an event with one aim in view: to preserve the reality and truth — lest it be invalidated or falsified as a result of a dispute or because of someone's attempt to conceal the truth and usurp the right, or because one really forgets it. A witness protects the truth and reality. Acquiring the knowledge and bearing the testimony accordingly is called witnessing — protecting the truth.

''al-Qisṭ'' (اَلْقِسْطُ) is justice.

The preceding eight verses, beginning with, ''(As for) those who disbelieve'' and ending at, ''those who ask for forgiveness before dawn'', have shown that there is no god other than Allāh, and that nothing can avail one against Him; whatever the man relies on in this life, whatever he thinks may avail him against his Lord, it is but an embellishment and a provision — the Lord has given him that provision in order that he may use it for a better purpose — for his success in the hereafter. But that success cannot be attained except with piety and fear of Allāh. The bounties of this world are commonly enjoyed by both the believer and the unbeliever; but the bounties of the hereafter are reserved for the believers only. Those verses have described the fundamental truth; now in this verse Allāh reconfirms it bearing witness that what has been told above is pure truth without a shadow of doubt.

Allāh bears witness that there is no god but He. As there is no god besides Allāh, nothing whatsoever can avail a man against Allāh — be it his wealth or his children or any other embellishment of this life. If any of these could avail a man against Allāh, it would have become a god itself; or at least it would be relying on some other god. But there is no god except Allāh.

He bears this witness while He stands with justice in His actions, looks after His creation with equity. He manages the affairs of the universe through a system of cause and effect. This system has been created by Him; and ultimately every thing — the cause, the effect and their mutual relationship — returns to Him. He has placed in this highway of progress countless bounties in order that the man may enjoy and use them in this world, and then get their benefit in the hereafter. It is a provision for the road; man should make its use as a temporary measure. He should not settle permanently on the roadside.

Allāh bears witness to these facts, and He is a Just Witness.

Here we should point to a very fine point:

The justice of Allāh is a witness for itself as well as for His Oneness. In other words, His justice is a self-sustaining reality and also proves that Allāh is One. When we hear a testimony, we insist that the witness must be a just one, of approved probity; he must be proceeding on the straight path of nature, and should not deviate from it — neither to the right nor to the left. In short, he should put every thing in its right place, and should do every work at its proper time and place in a proper way. Such a man is called just and his testimony shall be accepted because it should be free from lie and falsehood. The man becomes just by adhering to the path of nature. When conformity with that path and system bestows justice on a man, how can there be any doubt about the justice of that system itself. It is a pure justice — and it is the work of Allāh.

When we feel waxed on account of an event occuring in the nature, or when we find it taking place against our inclination and desire, we, in our annoyance, dispute about it and object against it. (Interestingly we depend, in that disputation too, on the same natural system.) Then on further investigation we come to understand the reason of that event, and find that our objection had no leg to stand upon. Or may be we failed in our search and could not find any reason for it; so what have we got in our hand? Only the ignorance of the reason. But the absence of the knowledge of reason is not the same as the knowledge of the absence of reason. To make a long story short, the system found in the universe (and it is the handiwork of Allāh) is pure justice. And if there were any other god besides Allāh, the whole system could not be called all-encompassing justice; the work of each god would have been ‘‘just’’ only within the sphere of his own activity, only in his own jurisdiction. Thus, the justice of the system of creation proves the Oneness of the Creator.

Allāh bears witness — and He is the Just Witness — that there is no god but He. He testifies in clear words and says: ‘‘Allāh bears witness that there is no god but He’’. The verse contains the testimony of Allāh for His Oneness; in this respect, it resembles the verse 4:166 which says: But Allāh bears witness by what He has revealed to you that He has revealed it with His knowledge (also); and Allāh is sufficient as a witness.

The angels bear witness that there is no god but He. Allāh informs us in the verses of Meccan period, revealed long before this one, that the angels are His honoured servants, who act according to His commandment and declare His glory in His praise: Nay! they are honoured servants; they do not precede Him in speech and (only) according to His commandment do they act (21:26 — 27); . . . and the angels declare His glory in the praise of their Lord . . . (42:5). And their declaration of His glory includes the testimony that there is no god besides Him.

Those possessed of knowledge bear witness that there is no god but He. They look at and ponder on His signs in the universe and in their own selves; and those signs have overwhelmed their perception and taken deep root in their minds.

The foregoing discourse makes it clear that:

First: The witness, mentioned here, is the testimony in words, as the verse manifestly shows. It does not refer to bearing witness by actions — although the Divine actions too are evidence of His Oneness. There is an intricate system permeating the creation right from the smallest particle to the whole universe; and this oneness of system bears witness to the Oneness of the Creator. Nevertheless, this verse refers to the verbal testimony only.

Second: The clause, ‘‘maintaining (His creation) with justice’’, is a circumstantial one, referring to the subject, ‘‘Allāh’’ and governed by the verb, ‘‘bear witness’’. In other words, His ‘‘maintaining (His creation) with justice’’ is not witnessed for, neither by Allāh nor by the angels or those possessed of knowledge; rather it means that Allāh, maintaining (His creation) with justice, bears witness that there is no god but He; and the angels and those possessed of knowledge bear witness to His Oneness.

This meaning is obvious from the position of this clause. ‘‘there is no god but He’’, is the reality that has been witnessed for; and the clause, ‘‘maintaining (His creation) with justice’’ has been separated from it by the words, ‘‘and (so do) the angels and those possessed of knowledge’’. If this clause were a part of the testimony, it should have been joined to the former clause and written thus: ‘that there is no god but He, maintaining (His creation) with justice, and (so do) the angels . . .’

Some exegetes have written that the clause may be explained in both ways; but the above explanation shows that it is not so.

Someone has offered a very absurd explanation. He thinks that the testimony mentioned in this verse is not verbal, is not given in words. According to him, if the testimony were a verbal one, the belief in Oneness of God would depend on someone’s words, and not on rational reasoning. But acceptance of that word and testimony depends on the belief in God. A vicious circle !

He goes on to say: That is why some exegetes have said that the verb, ‘‘bears witness’’, has been used here in a metaphorical sense. The creation, with all its interwoven, interdependent and intricate systems, proves that the whole universe has been created by One Creator. It is as though Allāh Himself, through this practical demonstration, is speaking and testifying for His Oneness. Likewise, the angels worship Him and act according to His commandment, and the knowledgeable people look at the signs pointing to His Oneness — and their attitude and behaviour are tentamount to the witness that there is no god but Allāh.

Reply: This explanation is based on a fallacious presumption. It is true that where we can acquire a knowledge ourselves through external senses or intellectual reasoning, we do not rely on other's reporting or testimony. The reason being that such a reporting or testimony does not create the firm knowledge which may be gained through intellectual reasoning or external senses. But if there is a report that create as firm a knowledge as the intellectual reasoning (or even firmer than that), then it will be as much reliable as that reasoning (if not more than that). For example, a mutawātir report is far more effective and creates a much more surer knowledge than an intellectual reasoning based on logic or analogy, although the latter too creates certainty.

Now, suppose there is a witness who, we know, cannot tell lies — because his truth and veracity has been proved by clear proofs — then his testimony would create as much certainty as a rational argument. And we know that Allāh can never utter a falsehood, because nothing can be further from His sublime presence than a defect or a falsehood. His witness about His Oneness is, therefore, a true witness. Likewise, His report, that the angels and those possessed of knowledge bear witness for His Oneness, firmly proves that they really bear this witness.[1]

Moreover, the polytheists, who ascribe to Allāh some partners like idols and other deities, only believe those idols or deities to be intercessors, the links between Allāh and His creation; Allāh quotes them as saying: We do not worship them save that they may make us nearer to Allāh (39:3).

Likewise, those who are guilty of the hidden polytheism, that is, those who while believing in Allāh do good deeds for the sake of worldly things (e.g., to satisfy their own desire, to please some other persons, or

[1] This reply does not meet the objection, which said: ''Acceptance of (cont. page 172) that testimony depends on the belief that this verse is a true revelation from God, which in its turn depends on the belief in God. And it is a vicious circle.'' The author too has based his reply on the assumption that ''there is a God Who is free from all defects and falsehoods and Who cannot, therefore, tell a lie''. So, the objection remains in its place, and the vicious circle is not broken. If the acceptance of this witness depends on believing — through rational arguments — that Allāh cannot tell a lie, then it is better to take this witness as a supporting argument of the Oneness of Allāh, and not as the main proof. And then it may be accepted as a verbal testimony. (tr.)

to gain some wealth or prestige, and so on), they too believe that these things are created and given their power by Allāh. In other words, whoever ascribes a partner to Allāh, does so with a belief that Allāh has taken that partner to Himself; no one says that the putative partner got that partnership on its own. In this background, when Allāh bears witness that He has not taken any partner to Himself, it is enough to refute the claim of those who ascribe any partner to Him. Accordingly, the verse will have the same connotation as the verse: And they worship beside Allāh what can neither harm them nor profit them, and they say: ''These are our intercessors with Allāh.'' Say: ''Do you (presume to) inform Allāh of what He knows not in the heavens and the earth?'' Glory be to Him and supremely exalted is He above what they set up (with Him) (11:18). It is a rebuttal of the claim that He has got any partner. How can it be when He Himself does not know of any such partner, neither in the heaven nor in the earth? And He knows every thing; nothing is hidden from Him. The fact is that the verse under discussion is a proposition like other informations that have come to us from His sublime presence, for example, the final clause in the verse 11:18 mentioned just above, ''Glory be to Him and supremely exalted is He above what they set up (with Him)''. But as this proposition is in fact a claim and as the speaker is not only just but also the source of every justice, it was put before the audience in the form of a testimony, for the sake of variety in style. According to this interpretation, the meaning of the verse would be as follows: Had there been any deities other than Allāh, having some say in the creation and management of the universe, in their capacity as partners with, or intercessors before Allāh, undoubtedly Allāh would have known them and testified for them; but He says that He does not know of any partner for Himself; it surely means that He has no partner at all. Also, the angels are the intermediaries who carry out His commandment in respect of creation and management. Had there been any such partner, they would have known of him and admitted his presence. But they too bear witness that there is no god except Allāh. Finally, the knowledgeable persons would have known of such a partner and noticed the hallmarks of his creation or management. But the only signs they see are those pointing to the One and only God, and therefore they too bear witness that He has no partner or colleague.

This argument is similar to the following one: If there were in a certain country a king, other than the king who is known to us, this king would certainly have known of him; it would have been impossible for him not to know of someone supposed to be his partner. Likewise, the officials of the government would have known of him; how could they be oblivious of his existence when they were supposed to take orders from him and enforce his dicta among the subjects? And in the same way, the knowledgeable persons among the populace would have known of his presence; after all, they are supposed to live in his kingdom and obey his laws. But the king rebuts the existence of any such partner in his kingdom, and the government officials do not know of any such person, and the knowledgeable class of the subjects have not seen anything to prove his existence. All this together makes us absolutely sure that no such man exists.

QUR'ĀN: there is no god but He; the Mighty, the Wise: It is a sort of a parenthetical sentence, having no connection to the main argument, yet complying with the demands of the Divine sublimity. It is a set practice of the Qur'ān to declare the glory of Allāh and pay respect to Him, whenever something unworthy of His sublime name is mentioned. For example: They say: ''Allāh has taken a son (to Himself)!'' Glory be to Him (11:68). The phrase, ''Glory be to Him'', pays respect to Allāh because the preceding sentence had quoted a saying that was unworthy of Allāh's attributes. Another verse: And the Jews say: ''The hand of Allāh is tied up!'' Their hands shall be shackled and they shall be cursed for what they say (5:64). Now, in the verse under discussion, the first part mentioned the testimony of Allāh, the angels and those possessed of knowledge that Allāh had no partner or colleague. Therefore, it was a right of Allāh on the reporter of that testimony (who, incidentally, is Allāh Himself) as well as on the hearers to declare that He is really One, and has no partner; everyone, on hearing that testimony, should reiterate, ''there is no god but He''.

There is another verse which gives a similar lesson; it admonishes the believers who heard a lie spoken against a wife of the Prophet: And why did you not, when you heard it, say: ''It does not beseem us that we should talk of it; glory be to Thee! this is a great calumny'' (24:16). It is a right of Allāh, when we hear a calumny and want to declare the innocence of the person slandered, to glorify Allāh before that.

This sentence, ''there is no god but He, the Mighty, the Wise'', is a sort of a praise for Allāh, to give Him His due respect; that is why it ends with the adjectives, ''the Mighty, the Wise''. In other words, it is not an offshoot of the preceding witness; otherwise, it would have ended with the adjectives showing His Oneness and Justice.

Allāh has a right that His oneness should be declared whenever the said witness is mentioned; He alone is the Mighty One, His might and power is absolute, there is no partner in His godhead to dilute His might; He alone is the Wise One, His wisdom does not allow anyone to interfere in the creation or the management of the affairs.

The above paragraphs show why the phrase, ''there is no god but He'', has been repeated, and why it has been ended with the adjectives, ''the Mighty, the Wise''. And Allāh knows better.

TRADITIONS

Muḥammad ibn Isḥāq has narrated through his chain of narrators: ''When the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) defeated the Quraysh at Badr and returned to Medina, he gathered the Jews at the market of Qīnaqā', and said: 'O Jewish people! Be on your guard against Allāh, lest comes to you similar to that which has afflicted the Quraysh at Badr; and accept Islam before descends upon you that which has descended upon them. And you know that I am a prophet, sent (by Allāh), you find it (written) in your books.' They said: 'O Muḥammad! Don't be deluded if you fought against an inexperienced people who knew nothing of the (tactics of) war and thus you got a chance to afflict them. As for us, by Allāh, if we fought against you, you will know that we are indeed the (real) people.' Then Allāh revealed the verse: Say to those who disbelieve: 'You shall be vanquished . . .' '' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The author says: The above tradition has also been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, qouting Ibn Ishaq, Ibn Jarir and al-Bayhaqī (in his ad-Dalā'il), from Ibn ‘Abbās. The Shī‘ah exegete, al-Qummī, too has a nearly similar tradition in his at-Tafsīr. But as would have been clear from the foregoing commentary, this tradition is not in perfect harmony with the context of the verses. It seems more likely that these verses were revealed after the battle of Uḥud. And Allāh knows better.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘People do not enjoy, in this world or in the hereafter, any pleasure greater than the pleasure of women; and that is the word of Allāh: It has been made to seem fair to to men, the love of desires of women and sons . . .’’ Then he said: ‘‘And certainly the poeple of the garden shall not savour of anything of the garden more delicious to them than the sexual intercourse — neither food nor drink.’’ (al-Kāfī; al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: It has been inferred from the sequence of the desired things in the verse, as the women have been placed before everything else. Then it has been said that it is only a provision of the life of this world, and the pleasures of the paradise are better than that.

When the Imām said that sexual intercourse was the most delicious of all the pleasures, he was comparing it with the pleasures related to the body.[1] He was not speaking about spiritual pleasure, for example, the delight a man gets from his own existence, or the joy a friend of Allāh feels from being nearer to Him, seeing His great signs and receiving His pleasure and blessings. Rational arguments prove that the pleasure a man gets from his existence is the greatest; other proofs show that the pleasure he feels from the existence of his Lord is even greater than that; and there are numerous traditions saying that the bliss a servant enjoys from being nearer to Allāh is the greatest of all pleasures. It has been narrated in al-Kāfī from al-Bāqir (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘ ‘Alī ibn a1-Ḥusayn (a.s.) used to say: ‘It makes my Soul agreeable to early death and murder which beset us that Allāh has said: Do they not see that We come into the land, curtailing it of its sides? (13:41); and it refers to the departure of the learned people (from this world).' '' Other such traditions will be given in other relevant places.

[1] It is obvious from the last clause of the tradition where the Imām.(a.s.) compares it with the food and drink. (tr)

al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the word of Allāh, and hoarded treasures: ''al-Qinṭār (اَلْقِنْطَارُ) is gold that could fill the hide of an ox.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The Imām said: ''al-Khaylu 'l-musawwamah (اَلْخَيْلُ مُسَوَّمَةٌ = translated here as well-bred horses) means the horses which are put on pasture.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''Whoever recites seventy times while he is in standing pasture, in his prayer of al-watr (اَلْوَتْرُ), 'I seek forgiveness from Allāh and return to Him', and continues to do so regularly for (at least) a year, Allāh writes him among those who ask for forgiveness before dawn, and he is bound to get forgiveness from Allāh, the High.'' (Man lā yaḥḍuru 'l-faqīh; al-Khiṣāl)

The author says: This meaning is given also in other traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.); and it is one of the sunnah of the Prophet. A similar tradition has been reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr through Ibn Jarīr from Ja'far ibn Muḥammad (aṣ-Ṣādiq — a.s.) that he said: ''Whoever prays a part of the night, then asks for forgiveness at the end of the night, he will be written among those who ask for forgiveness.''

The statement of the Imām: ''and he is bound to get forgiveness from Allāh'', is based on their prayer mentioned in the preceding verse: ''Our Lord! surely we believe, therefore, forgive us our sins . . .'' Allāh has quoted their prayer without any comment; it implies that He has granted the prayer.

COMMENTARY

The verses refer to the People of the Book. They are the last — and most important — of the three groups commented upon in this chapter. It was about the People of the Book — the Jews and the Christians — that a major part of this chapter was revealed.

QUR'ĀN: Surely the religion with Allāh is Islam: We have already described the literal meaning of ''al-Islām'' (اَلْاِسْلَامُ = to submit, to surrender oneself to Allāh). Apparently this is the meaning intended here, because it is followed by description of the difference of the People of the Book — the difference which they created after knowing the truth, because of envy among themselves.

The explanation of the verse, therefore, would be as follows: The religion with Allāh is only one; there is no difference or discrepancy in it; He has commanded His servants to follow only this religion; it was this religion which was described in the Books revealed to His prophets, and to which the Divine signs pointed. It is the Islam, that is, surrender to the truth, with correct belief and sincere deeds; Islam is to accept willingly all the knowledge and commandments sent down by Allāh. Admittedly, the commandments varied in quality and quantity in various laws brought by various prophets — and Allāh Himself mentions this fact in His Book — but in reality there was only one religion. The difference between various laws was in the degree of perfection, it was not because of any discrepancy or contradiction. All were one inasmuch as all called the people to surrender and submit themselves to the will of Allāh, to His commandments sent through His prophets.

It is this religion which Allāh expects His servants to follow, which He has sent down for them. It necessarily follows that man should accept all the knowledge which has been clearly explained to him, and should stop at doubtful matters — submitting himself to the will of Allāh, without trying to interpret it according to his desire and thinking.

As for the difference of the People of the Book, (the Jews and the Christians) in the matter of religion, it was not because they did not know the truth; they certainly knew it; they were aware that the religion was only one, because Allāh had revealed the Book which clearly explained that religion to them. Nevertheless, they differed among themselves because they were envious and unjust. Although they continued to believe in Allāh, their envy and injustice made them disbelieve in the signs of Allāh, in the Book of Allāh, which had clearly explained to them the reality of religion. And whoever disbelieves in the signs of Allāh then surely Allāh is quick of reckoning; He will quickly call them to account in this world as well as in the hereafter. They shall be recompensed in this life with disgrace and ignominy, and in the hereafter with painful chastisement of the Fire.

Why do we say that the reckoning spans both lives? It is because Allāh says after two verses: ‘‘Those are they whose works shall become null and void in this world as well as the hereafter’’.

The above explanation makes two things clear:

First: The clause, ‘‘the religion with Allāh’’, refers to religion in the meaning of sharī‘ah; the verse says: There is only one religion ordained by Allāh, the difference between various prophets’ sharī‘ah being in the quality only; and the quality differed because of the capabilities of the various nations for which those rules were made.

In this verse, religion does not refer to the system of creation. In other words, it does not say that all people were created with a natural instinct to believe in God.

Second: The word ‘‘al-āyāt’’ (اَلْاٰيَاتُ = signs) refers to the verses of the Divine Books, sent to the prophets; it does not refer to the signs in the creation which lead one to the belief in one God.

The verse contains a threat to the People of the Book: They shall surely be punished for their envy and rebellion. It is similar to the threat addressed earlier to the polytheists and disbelievers: Say to those who disbelieve: ‘‘You shall be vanquished and gathered together to hell . . . ’’ (3:11). Probably, that is the reason why the next verse joins the People of the Book and the polytheists together and says: ‘‘And say to those who have been given the Book and the unlearned people: ‘Do you submit yourselves?’ ’’ There is a threat implied by the tone of this question too.

QUR’ĀN: But if they dispute with you, say: ‘‘I have submitted myself (entirely) to Allāh and (so has) every one who follows me’’: Obviously, the pronoun ‘‘they’’ refers to the People of the Book. The disputation points to their arguments about the difference. They would say: ‘‘Our difference does not emanate from any envy or injustice; we have tried our best to acquire the knowledge of the realities of religion; nevertheless, in this endeavour each one’s thinking process and wisdom has led him to a different conclusion. It does not mean that we have become arrogant or rebellious, nor that we are not submissive to Allāh. Even what you call us to, 0 Muḥammad! similarly emanates from a different process of thinking. You too have differed from us in the same way ''. Allāh demolishes such disputations in the next two sentences: ''. . . say: 'I have submitted myself (entirely) to Allāh . . .' '' and ''. . . say to those who have been given the Book and the unlearned people: 'Do you submit yourselves?' '' These sentences are not an attempt to avoid the issue; they contain the clear rebuttal of the disputations of the People of the Book.

The connotation of the verse, read in conjunction with the preceding one, is as follows:

The religion with Allāh is submission to Allāh; the Books sent by Allāh are unanimous on this point, and the untainted wisdom accepts it. Nobody can, therefore, blame you, O Muḥammad! for submitting to the will and command of Allāh. You are a Muslim. If the People of the Book dispute with you about the religion, then you should tell them clearly that you have submitted yourself entirely to Allāh and so have done all your followers. This is the real religion and no argument can be brought against this reality. Then you should ask them whether they too would submit themselves to Allāh. If they did so, then they would indeed proceed on the right path, they would accept what had been revealed to you and to those prophets who came before you; there would be no argument against them and your mutual difference would come to an end. On the other hand, if they turned back, then do not enter into any disputation or argument with them. It is a self-evident truth that religion is total surrender to Allāh, and there is no point in labouring to prove a self-evident reality. You should just convey the Divine message to them and that is all.

Allāh has joined the People of the Book and the unlearned polytheists together in this verse: ''And say to those who have been given the Book and the unlearned people: 'Do you submit yourselves?' '' It is because both believed in religion and in Allāh, although they differed because of their respective beliefs of monotheism and polytheism.

The phrase, translated here as ''I have submitted myself (entirely) to Allāh'', literally means, I have submitted my face to Allāh. ''al-Wajh'' (اَلْوَجْهُ = face, front). Most of the senses and organs of perception are concentrated in the face; therefore, submitting one's face to Allāh signifies total submission to Allāh's will, willing obedience to His commandments.

The clause, ''and (so has) every one who follows me'', shows the excellence of the Prophet, and also enhances the rank of the followers by joining them to him (s.a.w.a.).

QUR'ĀN: And say to those who have been given the Book and the unlearned people . . .: ''the unlearned people'' refers to the polytheists; it shows the contrast between them and the People of the Book; also the People of the Book used to call them unlearned, as Allāh quotes them as saying: There is not upon us in the matter of the unlearned people any way (to reproach) (3:75). ''al-Ummiyy'' (اَلْاُمِّيُّ = one who does not read or write).

The clauses ''and if they turn back, then upon you is only the delivery of the message; and Allāh sees the servants'' signify three things:

First: Undesirability of unnecessary disputations; entering into arguments with someone who denies a self-evident truth would inevitably lead to obstinacy and obtrusiveness.

Second: The total authority concerning the people and their affairs is of Allāh; the Prophet is an Apostle and a conveyer of the Divine message, he is not a guard to watch over men. Allāh says: You have no concern in the affair (3:128); You are not a watcher over them (88:22).

Third: The clauses contain a threat to the People of the Book and the polytheists; the connotation cannot be lost to one who reads the clauses. The verses, in their theme and the threat, are similar to the verses: Say: ''We believe in Allāh . . . and to Him do we submit''. If then they believe as you believe, they are indeed on the right course, and if they turn back, then they are only in great opposition; so Allāh will suffice you against them, and He is the Hearing, the Knowing (2:136 — 137). According to this verse if the People of the Book turn back, then it means that they are obstinate in their opposition and heedless to the truth; then it comforts the Prophet in a way that contains a threat to his adversaries. Likewise, the verse under discussion tells the Prophet, ‘‘and if they turn back, then upon you is only the delivery of the message’’; it is a hint that the Prophet should leave them to their Lord Who sees His servants and Who would deal with them in a suitable way, and punish them as they deserve.

Some exegetes have written that the verse gives the people freedom of religious belief and that there is no compulsion in religion. But the explanation given above manifestly shows that it implies the opposite of freedom; it threatens the disbelievers with chastisements if they did not submit themselves to Allāh.

‘‘Allāh sees the servants’’: It could have been. phrased as ‘‘Allāh sees the men’’ or ‘‘Allāh sees them’’; instead Allāh chose the epithet, ‘‘the servants’’, to remind them that they are His servants and slaves; His order against them will certainly be carried out in its entirety, because they are totally dependant on Him, whether they consciously submitted to Him or not; they can never escape His judgment.

QUR’ĀN: Surely (as for) those who disbelieve in the signs of Allāh . . . and they .shall have no helpers: The verse deals with another aspect of the subject; nevertheless, it has a threatening overtone, not unlike the last parts of the preceding verse. This verse too speaks about the People of the Book, especially the Jews.

‘‘Those who disbelieve . . . and slay the prophets . . . and slay those among men who enjoin justice.’’: The verbal form used in these sentences implies persistence and continuity. It conveys the idea that it was their ingrained habit, a characteristic trait, to disbelieve in divinely sent communications, to reject the revealed truth out of envy and arrogance, to murder the prophets — and such a slaying was undoubtedly against justice and to kill those of their compatriots who called them to justice and tried to keep them away from injustice and rebellion. And the history of the Jews confirms that these things were a part of their national character; they had murdered a multitude of their prophets and good believers who enjoined the good and forbade the evil. The Christians too followed in their footsteps and killed countless good Christians.

‘‘announce to them a painful chastisement’’; It announces that the wrath of Allāh had descended upon them. The chastisement was not confined to the hereafter only; they were to be punished in this life too. Read for the proof the next ‘‘Those are they whose works shall become null in this world as well as the hereafter’’. In the hereafter they shall have to endure the painful chastisement of the Fire; in this world, they were punished with mass murders, dispersion, loss of lives and properties, and Allāh has inflicted them with enmity and hatred among themselves which is to continue upto the Day of Resurrection, as the Qur’ānic verses have said (e.g., 5:14).

This verse (3:22), moreover, proves two things:

First: If a man killed someone just because the latter used to enjoin the good and forbid the evil, the killer’s good deeds would become null and void, would be forfeited.

Second: On the Day of Resurrection, intercession shall not avail such a killer, because Allāh says: ‘‘and they shall have no helpers’’.

QUR’ĀN: Have you not considered . . . and they withdraw: It further shows how steeped the People of the Book are in their envy and rebellion. They rebel against Allāh by creating disputes and frictions in religion. When they are invited to the Book of Allāh in order that it might decide between them they do not agree to it, they turn away and withdraw from it. This tendency of theirs emanates from their self-delusion that the Fire shall not touch them but for a few days; they are deceived by their own forgery!

The words, ‘‘those who are given a portion of the Book’’, refer to the People of the Book. This changed phrasing points to a well-known historical fact: The Jews and the Christians do not have in their hands the complete Books; what they have got is only some portions of the revealed Scriptures. They have altered, changed and edited the Books so extensively that the major part of the original has been lost for ever. The last sentence too alludes to this fact: ‘‘and what they have forged deceives them in the matter of their religion’’.

The verse, in short, says — and Allāh knows better — that the Jews and the Christians turn back from the judgment of the Book of Allāh, being deceived by their own claim, and misled by what they have themselves forged; they demonstrate, by their behaviour, that they do not need the Book of Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: This is because . . . matter of their religion: Its meaning is quite clear. Usually a man is not deceived by his own deception; then how did those people fall prey to their own forgery? It was because the deceived people had not forged it themselves; it was forged by a past generation. Then why did the Qur'ān ascribe that deception and forgery to those Jews and Christians who were contemporaries of the Prophet? It was because they were one nation — the later generations were (and are) pleased with what their ancestors had done.

Moreover, it was not improbable for the People of the Book, and especially the Jews, to be carried away by their own delusion — knowing well that it was a delusion — or to boast of their exploits in this field. Allāh has described their involvement in an even more astonishing deception: And when they meet those who believe they say: ''We believe''; and when they are alone one with another they say: ''Do you talk to them of what Allāh has disclosed to you that they may argue with you by this before your Lord? Do you not then understand?'' What! Do they not know that Allāh knows what they conceal and what they proclaim. (2:76 — 77)

Also, man's actions emanate for the most part from the traits ingrained in his psyche; he always returns to the things which his psychological build up has made attractive to him. When he is attracted by that pull, knowledge is left behind, and becomes ineffective. For example, the drug addicts, the chainsmokers and the people like them use those things although they know that they are extremely harmful and ruinous to their health, and they are fully aware that such things must be avoided. But the ingrained habit becomes the second nature, and the addict is irresistibly pulled to those ''pleasures'', without giving his knowledge or thinking power any chance to influence his decision.

Likewise, the People of the Book, as a result of their perennial indiscipline, had acquired the traits of arrogance, envy and rebellion, and were overcome by the irresistible urge to base desires. This had become a second nature to them. And under its influence they forged many things — the forgeries that were disastrous to their religion. And they repeated those forgeries — knowing fully well that they were lies — so often and so long that they themselves began believing in them, and the repeated falsehood replaced the truth in their mind; they fell prey to their own devices. Psychologists know that such phenomenon does occur from time to time. The continuously repeated and diligently taught forgeries got hold of the whole nations to such an extent that they became deceived in the matters of their religion, and refused to submit themselves to Allāh and accept the truth revealed in His Book.

QUR'ĀN: Then how (will it be) when . . . shall not be dealt with unjustly: The phrase governed by the interrogative ''how'' was omitted because it could be understood from the context; it could be something like, how will it be, or, how will they fare.

The verse continues the threatening mode of the preceding verses. It shows that those, who turn back and withdraw when called to the Book of Allāh, cannot defeat the Divine judgment. The Day of Reckoning is approaching fast; how will they behave on that Day about which there is no doubt? Then they will be quite submissive, in clear contrast with their arrogance and haughtiness of this world! It was to show this contrast that Allāh used the word, ''We shall gather them together'', and did not say, We shall raise them, or, We shall make them alive.

The meaning of the verses is as follows — and Allāh knows better: When the People of the Book are invited to the Book of Allāh in order that it might decide between them, then a part of them turn back and withdraw; it is because they are deceived by what they have forged in the matter of their religion, and also because they arrogantly refuse to submit to the truth. Well, what will they do when We shall gather them together on the day about which there is no doubt, the day when the judgment will be decisively, truthfully and justly pronounced, and every soul shall be fully paid what it had earned, and they shall not be dealt with unjustly, because the judgments will be based on justice? As they know this fact, it is necessary for them not to turn away from the Book of Allāh, not to withdraw from it, as though they could defeat the purpose of Allāh or could overrule His decrees! Do not they know that every power belongs to Allāh, and that this life is but a trial?

TRADITIONS

Muḥammad ibn Muslim said: ‘‘I asked the Imām about the word of Allāh, Surely the religion with Allāh is Islam. And he said: ‘that (Islam) which contains (true) belief’ ’’. (al-‘Ayyāshī)

Ibn Shahrāshūb narrates from al-Bāqir (a.s.) about the word of Allāh: Surely the religion with Allāh is Islam, that he said: ‘‘Submitting to ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib in (his) mastership.’’

The author says: The explanation is based on the principle of the ‘‘flow’’ of the Qur’ān. And probably the preceding tradition too has the same connotation.

The same narrator reports that ‘Alī (a.s.) said: ‘‘I shall define Islam as no one has defined before me, and no one shall do after me. Islam is submission, and submission is conviction, and conviction is affirmation, and affirmation is acknowledgement, and acknowledgement is discharge (of obligation), and discharge (of obligation) is action. The believer has taken his religion from his Lord. Certainly. The belief of a believer is recognized in his deed, and the disbelief of an unbeliever is recognized in his denial. O people! (look after) your religion, (look after) your religion, because a sin in it is better than a good (deed) in other (religions); the sin (committed while believing) in this (religion) will be forgiven, and the good (deed) in other (religions) will not be accepted.’’

The author says: The words of the Imām, ‘‘I shall define Islam’’: ‘‘an-Nisbah’’ (اَلنِّسْبَةُ = literally, relation, to relate) here means to define; Chapter 112 (the Unity) has been named in some traditions as the chapter of an-nisbah of Allāh.

The Imām has defined all the terms with the help of their concomitants, except the first word, ‘‘al-Islām’’ (اَلْاِسْلَامُ = submission) which has been explained with its more clearly understood synonym ‘‘at-taslīm’’ (اَلتَّسْلِيْمُ = submission). We may also possibly take the word, Islam, to signify the religion brought by Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.); in that case the first phrase too (Islam is submission) would be a definition with a concomitant.

However, the Imām means to say: This religion known as Islam entails submission of man, in his person and his action, to Allāh; he surrenders his soul and all his activities to Allāh's command and will; it is called at-taslīm (submission); at-taslīm in its turn entails firm conviction and certainty about Allāh, in a way as not to allow any doubt whatsoever about Him; conviction entails affirmation of the religion's truth; and affirmation entails acknowledgement of its firmness, that is, the fact that religion is firmly rooted and unshakable; and this acknowledgement leads the believer to discharge all his obligations accordingly, and the discharge of obligations necessitates acting according to the dictates of religion.

''and the good (deed) in other (religions) will not be accepted'', that is, the doer will not be given its reward in the hereafter. Or it may mean: It will not create any good impression with Allāh either in this world or in the hereafter. As we have explained the sentence, it is not in conflict with other traditions which say that the unbelievers are rewarded for their good deeds with the good provisions of this world. Allāh has said: So he who has done an atom's weight of good shall see it (99:7).

Abū 'Ubaydah al-Jarrāḥ said: ''I said: 'O Apostle of Allāh! which people shall suffer the severest punishment on the Day of Resurrection?' He said: 'A man who killed a prophet or (murdered) a man who enjoined good and forbade evil.' Then he recited: '(those who) slay the prophets unjustly and slay those among men who enjoin justice . . .' Then he said: 'O Abū 'Ubaydah! the Israelites killed forty-three prophets in one hour. Then stood up one hundred and twelve persons from among the devout Israelites and enjoined those killers to do good and forbade them (to do any) evil. Thereupon, they killed all those (devout persons) by the end of the same day. And it is this (massacre) which Allāh has mentioned (in this verse).' '' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

The author says: The same explanation has been narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr, through Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim, from Abū 'Ubaydah.

It is reported in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr: Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr, Ibnu 'l-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ‘‘The Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) went to a group of the Jews in (their) house of midrash, and invited them to Allāh. al-Nu‘mān ibn ‘Amr and Ḥarth ibn Zayd asked him: ‘On which religion are you? O Muḥammad!’ He said: ‘‘On the faith and religion of Ibrāhīm.’ They said: ‘But Ibrāhīm was a Jew!’ Thereupon the Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) told them: ‘Then bring to me the Torah; it is (the judge) between you and us.’ They rejected his (proposal). Then Allāh revealed: Have you not considered those who are given a portion of the Book? . . . deceived them in the matter of their religion.’’

The author says: Some people have narrated that the verse, ‘‘Have you not considered . . .’’, was revealed in connection with the episode of stoning. We shall give its detail under the verse: O People of the Book! indeed has come to you Our Apostle making clear to you much of what you concealed of the Book . . . (5:15).

However, these two traditions are from aḥād,[1] and are not so strong.

[1] Aḥād, the plural of al-wāḥid (اَلْوَاحِد = one). In Islamic terminlogy it is used for a tradition which is not narrated by a great enough number of narrators as to create a certainty of its truth. (tr)

COMMENTARY

The two verses do have a sort of connection with the preceding talk about the People of the Book, and especially the Jews. They were earlier threatened with the chastisements of this world and the hereafter. It was a part of that chastisement that Allāh deprived them of their kingdom, and they were inflicted by abasement and humiliation upto the Day of Resurrection; also they lost so many lives and their rule was shorn of sovereignty.

Apart from that, the main theme of the chapter, as was mentioned in the beginning, is to show that the creation and all its affairs are totally in the hands of Allāh; He is the Master of the Kingdom, He gives Kingdom, honour and good to whomsoever He pleases; and takes away the Kingdom, honour and good from whomsoever He pleases.

The verses are, thus, in total conformity with the theme of the chapter.

QUR'ĀN: Say: O Allāh, Master of the Kingdom! The verse advises the believer to seek refuge with Allāh — in Whose hand is all the good and all the power — in order that he may remain unaffected by baseless ideas of the hypocrites, the polytheists and the People of the Book, the groups who were under the illusion that they had the kingdom and honours in their hands and that in this way they were independent of Allāh! Such thoughts were their undoing; they were totally lost and ruined because of this illusion. The believer should steer clear of such ideas and should present himself with humility before Allāh Who bestows good and gives sustenance without measure to whomsoever He pleases. The meaning of ''al-milk'' (اَلْمِلْكُ = property, possession) is known to, and understood by, all; and we recognize it as a lawful concept and reality.

''Possession'' is of two kinds:

1. Real Possession: It is the ability inherent in a creature, for example, man, to dispose, manage and manipulate another thing in any way he likes. For example, a man may use or not use his eyesight, depending on his choice; he may use his hand in getting hold of a thing or letting it go; and so on. There exists between such a possessor and such a property a real, unchangeable and untransferable relationship; a relationship that makes the property dependent on the possessor for its very existence — it cannot be separated from the possessor without being destroyed. In the above example, the eye or the hand cannot be removed from the man without losing its usefulness and even its existence in the process.

In this category comes the possession and ownership, which belongs to Allāh, of this universe with all its big and small components, as well as of all its affairs. He has the right, authority and power to do with it, and in it, as He pleases.

2. Conventional Possession: It is the possession based on man-made convention; the ability of, let us say, a man to dispose and manage a thing, as he likes — the authority based on the convention laid down by wise men to achieve the society's aims. They looked at the plane of creation and found it replete with real possession and its effects; so they invented a similar institution for the plane of civilization and laid down the system of the conventional possession for the society. Their goal was to obtain benefits from the world's provisions similar to those a real owner gets from his real possession. This relationship between a conventional owner and his property is not a real thing; it is just an abstract idea based on society's convention; and that is why such an ownership, unlike the real one, may be transferred to another person through trade, gift, inheritance etc.

''al-Mulk'' (اَلْمُلْكُ = kingdom) too is a sort of ''al-milk'' (possession) inasmuch as the king or ruler owns what the people of a country do own; he manages and disposes what the people have in their possession, without there occurring any clash between their management and his, between their will and his. It is in fact an ownership over ownership — the king's ownership being vertically above the public's; in the same way as, for example, a master owns his slave and also all that is owned by the slave.

The kingdom too, being a sort of possession, is divided into two categories: the real and the conventional.

Allāh is the absolute Owner of every thing; His is the absolute Lordship and absolute management; He is the Creator of every thing and God of every thing. He says: That is Allāh, your Lord, the Creator of every thing; there is no god but He (40:62); whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His (2:255). There are numerous verses showing that whatever is called a ''thing'' exists because of Allāh, is dependent in its quiddity and existence on Him; it cannot stand without Him. Nothing can prevent Allāh from disposing and managing a thing in any way He pleases; and as we explained earlier, it is the real possession.

And He is also the absolute King of the creation, because He is its absolute Owner. There is a system of ownership pervading the universe — the causes own their effects; every thing owns its active faculties and powers; those faculties and powers own their activities. For example, man owns all his limbs, organs and faculties like the eyes and ears; and the eyes and ears own their faculties of sight and hearing. As mentioned above, Allāh owns every thing; therefore, He owns every owner as well as all his (or its) possessions; and this is what is called the Kingship. He is therefore the absolute King of all the creation. He has said: to Him belongs the Kingdom, and to Him is due (all) praise (64:1); . . . with a most Powerful King (54:55); there are numerous such verses. Needless to say, it is the real possession and kingships.

As for the conventional possession and kingship, this too actually belongs to Allāh. Allāh is the conventional Owner too, because it is He Who bestows the ownership to every thing which owns any thing. He could not do so unless He Himself did own that thing; otherwise it would have looked as if He was bestowing a thing He did not own to someone who could not own! Allāh says: and give them of the wealth of Allāh which He has given to you . . . (24:33). Also, He is the conventional King, because He is the Law-giver and the Ruler, Who regulates, by His order, all the things which the people own, just as the kings regulate the financial affairs of their subjects. Allāh says: Say: ''I seek refuge in the Lord of men, the King, of men'' (114:1 — 2); And He gives you all that you ask Him; and if you count Allāh's bounties, you will not be able to compute them (14:34); and spend out of what He has made you to be successors of (57:7); And what reason have you that you should not spend in Allāh's way? And Allāh's is the inheritance of the heavens and the earth (57:10); To whom belongs the kingdom this day? To Allāh, the One, the Subduer (of all) (40:16). The verses show that Allāh owned all that is in our hands before it came in our possession, and He continues to own it even when it belongs to us, and He will remain its owner (or let us say, Inheritor) when we are gone. His Kingship and ownership remains unaffected throughout.

It appears from the above that the words, ''O Allāh, Master of the Kingdom'', point to the following three themes:

First: To Allāh belongs every kingdom; He is the Owner of the Kingdom. In other words, He is the King of the kings; He gives every king his kingdom, every ruler his rule; He says: . . . because Allāh had given him the kingdom (2:258); and We have given them a grand kingdom (4:54).

Second: The Divine name ‘‘Allāh’’, precedes the epithet, ‘‘Master of the Kingdom’’; this arrangement explains the basis of His Kingship; He is the Master of the Kingdom becuse He is Allāh, Great is His Majesty !

Third: ‘‘The Kingdom’’ here refers to its both kinds — the real and the conventional. (And Allāh knows better!) The matters mentioned in the first verse (Thou givest the Kingdom to whomsoever Thou pleasest and takest away the Kingdom from whomsoever Thou pleasest, and Thou exaltest whom Thou pleasest and abasest whom Thou pleasest) refer to various aspects of the conventional kinship; while the next verse refers to the affairs of the real kingship. Allāh is, therefore, the absolute Master of the Kingdom.

QUR’ĀN: Thou givest the Kingdom to whomsoever Thou pleasest and takest away the Kingdom from whomsoever Thou pleasest: The statement is unrestricted and thus covers every kingdom, no matter whether it is obtained legally or illegally, nor whether it is based on justice or injustice. (We have explained this subject under the verse 2:258; . . . because Allāh has given him the kingdom.) The kingdom, per se, is one of the bounties of Allāh; it has the potential of doing good in, and improving, the human society. Man, by his very nature, loves to rule and dominate over others. A kingship, which falls into the hands of an undeserving person, is disliked and condemned, not because it is a kingship, but because it has been captured by one who has no right to it, (e.g., when someone usurps it through coup d’etat), or because of his bad character, injustice and oppression. This second reason is, in a way, another facet of the first.

To sum it up, if the king or the ruler is good, able and just, then the kingdom is a bounty of Allāh for him. On the other hand, if he is undeserving and undesirable, then for him it is an affliction and trial. In either case, it is attributed to Allāh, and is a means of trial, by which Allāh tests His servants — the ruler and the ruled.

We have described earlier somewhere that when the Qur’ān attaches the proviso of ‘‘Allāh’s pleasure’’, as in this verse, it does not mean that Allāh's actions are done without a reason or without an aim. This proviso is a reiteration that Allāh's power and His will are supreme; that Allāh is not under any compulsion to do or not to do any particular work; nobody can oblige Him in any way; whatever He does, it is done according to His absolute will and power, and not because someone compels Him to do so. Nevertheless, all His actions are done and all His decrees issued for one purpose: the good and well-being of His servants.

QUR'ĀN: and Thou exaltest whom Thou pleasest and abasest whom Thou pleasest: ''al-'Izz'' (اَلْعِزُّ = to be hard to get; to be difficult to obtain). We say for a rare book or thing that it is 'azīzu 'l-wujūd (عَزِيْزُالْوُجُوْدِ); a man having a high prestige in his tribe, country or nation is called 'azīzu 'l-qawm, because it is difficult to subdue or overpower him. Then it was used for all types of difficulties; it is said "ya'izzu 'alayya kadhā"(يَعِزُّعَلَيَّ كَذا = it is hard for me to; it grieves me to). Allāh says: . . . grievous to him is your falling into distress . . . (9:128). Also, it is used for overpowering. There is a proverb: man 'azza bazza (مَنْ عَزَّ بَزَّ = he who vanquishes, takes the booty). Allāh says: . . . and he has prevailed against me in discourse (38:23). But the basic meaning in all these usages is the same.

Opposite to it is ''al-dhull'' (اَلذُّلُّ = to be easy to get orsubdue — by real or supposed overpowering). Allāh says: And abasement and humiliation were brought down over them (2:61); and lower unto them the wing of humility out of compassion (17:24); . . . humble before the believers . . . (5:54). The words translated as ''abasement'', ''humility'' and ''humble'' are various derivatives of ''al-dhull''.

al-'Izzah (اَلْعِزَّةُ = exaltation; might; honour) is an inseparable attribute of the absolute Kingship of Allāh. Whoever, other than Allāh, possesses any thing he gets it is because Allāh has given him its ownership; whoever gets kingship, it is because Allāh gives him that kingdom. Therefore, real honour and exaltation belong only to Allāh; whatever honour is enjoyed by others, it is but a gift bestowed by Allāh. He says: Do they seek honour from them? Then surely all honour is for Allāh (4:139); . . . and to Allāh belongs the might and to His Apostle and to the believers . . . (63:8). This is the true honour, real might. What others have got is only abasement in the guise of might, humiliation behind the mask of honour. Allāh says: Nay! those who disbelieve are in (self-) exaltation and opposition (38:2). Then to show that that self-exaltation is just an allusion, Allāh immediately reminds them: How many did We destroy before them of the generations, then they cried while the time of escaping had passed away (38:3).

Abasement and dishonour, being the opposite of might and honour, are governed by the opposite factors. Everything, other than Allāh, by itself is abase and without any honour — except him who is exalted by Allāh; ‘‘and Thou exaltest whom Thou pleasest and abasest whom Thou pleasest’’.

QUR’ĀN: in Thine hand is the good; surely Thou hast power over all things: ‘‘a1-Kahyr’’ (اَلْخَيْرُ = the good) basically connotes ‘selection’. We call a thing ‘khayr’ (good) when we compare it with another thing and choose it — thus it is ‘khayr’ (good) because it is the chosen one, the selected on. And why did we select it? Because it was more suitable for the purpose we had in mind. In other words, this thing is good because it is a means to obtain the ultimate good, that is, the purpose aimed at. The real ‘‘good’’.is that which is desired for itself. It is called good because it is chosen when compared with other things.

The word ‘‘good’’ carries a connotation of favourable comparison with other things. This. has given rise to a misunderstanding that it is an adjective of comaparative degrees, and that originally it was akhyar (اَخْيَرُ). But it is not so; it is not in comparative degree, although its root meaning carries a comparative value, and therefore it is often used as a substitute for ‘‘better’’, ‘‘more exalted’’ etc. We say: Zayd is afḍal (اَفْضَلُ = more exalted) than ‘Amr; the same meaning is conveyed when we say: Zayd is khayrun (خَيْرٌ) than ‘Amr. We may say: Zayd afḍaluhumā (زَيْدٌ اَفْضَلُهُمَا), or we may change it to Zayd khayruhumā (زَيْدٌ خَيْرُهُمَا) both sentences will convey the same meaning: Zayd is the better of the two. But this interchangeabilitity of the two words does not make al-khayr an adjective of comparative degree; otherwise, it would have been conjugated on the paradigm of comparative degree, i.e., on the paradigm of ''aftḍal, afāḍil, fuḍlā, fuḍlayāt'' (اَفْضَلُ،اَفَاضِلُ،فُضْلٰي،فُضْلَيَاتُ). But ''khayr'' is not conjugated like that. Instead we say: khayr, akhyār, khayrah, khayrāt (خَيْرٌ،اَخْيَارٌ،خَيْرَةٌ،خَيْرَاتٌ) like shaykh, ashyākh, shaykhah, shaykhāt (شَيْخٌ،اَشْيَاخٌ،شَيْخَةٌ،شَيْخَاتٌ = old man, old men, old woman, old women). Therefore, it is a aṣ-ṣifatu 'l-mushabbahah (اَلصِّفَةُ الْمُشَبَّهَةُ = adjective denoting an inseparable attribute).

Moreover, khayr is also used in places where the context does not allow any comparison. For example, Say: ''What is with Allāh is better (khayrun = خَيْرٌ) than sport . . . (62:11). Now there is no good in the sport so that it could be said, ''better than sport''. What it actually means is: What is with Allāh is good, and the sport is not good. (Those who think that the word al-khayr, is in comparative degree, say that in the sentences like the above, the word looses its comparative value. Such explanations neeed no comment!) The fact is that al-khayr gives a connotation of selection and choosing, and generally, but not necessarily, the thing which is not selected also has some good in it.

The above discourse shows that Allāh is ''good'' absolutely and without any reservation or condition, because He it is Who is the ultimate goal and destination of every thing. Yet, the Qur'ān has never used this word as a Divine name, although it has been used as an adjective referring to Allāh: and Allāh is better and more abiding (20:73); are sundry lords better or Allāh the One, the Supreme? (12:39).

Of course, the word, khayrun (خَيْرٌ = better, best) has been used as the first construct of those Divine names which are in genitive case; for example: and Allāh is the best (khayr) of sustainers (62:11) ; and He is the best of the judges (7:87); and He is the best of deciders (6:57); and He is the best of the helpers (3:150); and Allāh is the best of planners (3:54); and Thou art the best of deciders (7:89); and Thou art the best of the forgivers (7:155); and Thou art the best of inheritors (21:89); and Thou art the best to cause to alight (23:29); and Thou art the best of the merciful ones (23:109).

The reason for this fine distinction in usage is not difficult to understand. As the word, al-khayr, has a connotation of selection and option, it was not used as a name of God — it would not have been proper to compare Him in a general way with others, because all are subservient to Him. But there was no such difficulty in using the word as an adjective or as a relative description in a genitive case.

The sentence, ‘‘in Thine hand is the good’’, has a semantic value of restriction: the definite article in ‘‘the good’’ makes it cover all and every good; and the adverbial clause of place, ‘‘in Thine hand’’, coming at the beginning of the sentence, puts all the good exclusivesly into the hand of Allāh. The meaning therefore is: Every good, which anyone may ever desire, is only under Thy management and control; it is Thou Who gives it to whomsoever Thou pleasest.

The sentence gives the reason of the preceding ones, which mention His giving the kingdom and honour to whomsoever He pleases and taking them away from whomsoever He pleases. It explains the particular, that is, bestowing kingdom and honour, with the help of a general attribute, ‘‘good’’: ‘‘good’’ is an all-encompassing term, which covers other bounties too. Allāh controls every ‘‘good’’, and kingdom and honour are two of those good things; therefore, it is Allāh who bestows them to whomsoever He pleases.

The taking away of the kingdom. and abasing are ‘good’ in the same way as giving the kingdom and exalting are. It is true that they are ‘‘evil’’; but what is evil? It is absence of good. Taking away the kingdom is the same as not giving the kingdom; abasing is the same as not exalting. To say, Allāh has the power to give it, is the same as saying, He has the power to withold it. When every good emanates from Him, then every withholding of the good must necessarily emanate from Him. What we have to be careful about is that we should never attribute to Him any thing which is beneath His sublime sanctity; for example, we cannot say that the sins, errors and improprieties of the servants emanate from Him. Nevertheless, we may say that Allāh leaves the sinners to do as they wish, and that He does not help such servants. (We have explained this matter before.)

Let us look at this matter from another angle: There are good and evil in the sphere of creation, like giving the kingdom and taking it away, exalting someone and abasing him and so on. The good, at this level, is a positive reality, and there is no difficuty in attributing it to Allāh. And the evil, at this level, is just not giving the good to someone, and even here, there is no difficulty in attributing it to Allāh; He is the only Master of every ‘‘good’’; if He gives to someone from that good, then He should be thanked; if, on the other hand, He withholds it from someone, then nobody has any right to ask Him why, or to compel Him to give it. Whatever He does, is done for the general well-being of His creatures, for the good of the system which pervades every single component of the universe.

Likewis, there are good and evil in the sphere of legislation — various kinds of obedience and disobedience. Man is responsible for these actions, inasmuch as they are done by his own choice and will. Certainly, such actions can never be attributed to other than the man himself. It is this relationship between man and his actions which makes it possible to say, this is good, or, that is bad. If man had no freedom of will and choice, none of his deeds could be termed as good or evil. And these deeds cannot be attributed to Allāh, except in the sense that He helps (in good deeds) or withholds His help (from evil ones), according to the reasons demanding such help or its withdrawal.

It shows that the good, all of it, is in the hand of Allāh, and all the affairs of the universe — gain and loss; good and evil — emanate from that good.

An exegete has written: There is a deleted by implied word in the sentence, ‘‘in Thine hand is the good’’; according to him, it actually says, in Thine hand is the good and evil. He gives the example of another verse: and He has given you garments to preserve you from the heat (16:81), in which ‘and cold’, is implied.

We understand tine motive of the above assertion. He wanted to keep his distance from the Mu‘tazilities. The Mu‘tazilites do not attribute an evil to Allāh, not even indirectly. Of course, their stand was wrong and we have already dealt with this topic in a previous volume. But it does not justify such strange implied additions to the speech of God; it is astonishing to see someone having the audacity to hazard such explanations in respect of the Qur’ānic verses.

QUR’ĀN: Thou hast power over all things: It shows why all good is in Allāh’s hand. He has absolute and exclusive power over every thing; it follows that anyone who has got any power, gets it by the authority of Allāh. If not so, then that person’s power would be outside the purview of Allāh's power; in that case, Allāh would not have power over all things. But we know that He has absolute and all-encompassing power; and therefore, every imaginable good is in His power. Consequently, all the good, that emanates from others' hands, is, in fact, bestowed by Allāh. In short, the good, per se, is in His hands only. It was this exclusiveness to which the preceding sentence had referred: ''in Thine hand is the good''.

QUR'ĀN: Thou makest the night to enter into the day and Thou makest the day to enter into the night: al-Wulūj (اَلْوُلُوْجُ) is to enter; its transitive is ''al-īlāj'' (اَلْاِيْلَاجُ = to make enter, to insert).

Apparently, the above sentences refer to the continuously changing lengths of days and nights, throughout the year, depending on the latitude of a region and the position of the earth vis-a-vis the sun. In the northern hamisphere, from mid-winter to mid-summer, days become longer and longer and nights shorter and shorter — it is the entering of the day into the night. And from mid-summer to mid-winter, nights become longer and longer and days shorter and shorter — and it is the entering of the night into the day. The position in the southern hemisphere is just opposite. When the nights are longer in one hemisphere, they are shorter in the other; the same happens with the days. In this way, Allāh is always making the day to enter into the night, and the night to enter into the day.

As for the two imaginary points of the north and the south poles, and the imaginary latitude of the equator, it seems that the days and the nights remain equal throughout the year. But in reality changes occur at those points too[1] .

[1] This explanation is correct, as far as it goes. But another explanation, given by Maurice Bucaille, seems more comprehensive.

''[The astronauts have seen] how the Sun permanently lights up (except in the case of an eclipse) the half of the Earth's surface that is facing it, while the other half of the globe is in darkness. The Earth turns on its own axis and the lighting remains the same, so that an area in the form of a half-sphere makes one revolution around the Earth in twenty-four hours while the other half-sphere, that has remained in darkness, makes the same revolution in the same time. This perpetual rotation of night and day is quite clearly described in the Qur'ān. It is easy for the QUR'ĀN: and Thou bringest forth the living from the dead and Thou bringest forth the dead from the living: That is, Allāh brings forth a believer from the loin of an unbeliever, and an unbeliever from the loin of a believer. Allāh has named belief as life and light, and He calls disbelief as death and darkness. For example, He says: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people, like him whose likeness is that of one in utter darkness whence he cannot come forth (6:122).

The sentences may also be explained in a general way: Allāh creates living organism, like vegetable and animal, from the earth which has no sense or feeling; and then gives death to the living things returning them to the earth. The Qur'ānic verses almost clearly say that He changes the living into dead and the dead into living. He says: . . . then We caused it to grow into another creation; so blessed be Allāh, the best of creators. Then after that you will most surely die (23:14 — 15). There are other verses having the same connotation.

Some scientists say: The life emanated from some germs, evolving from one germ into another, and from that into a third and so on; that it did not spring up from senseless matter. The reason for this hypothesis lay in their belief that the universe came into being by itself, it was not created[1]. But experiments show that the living germs too are overcome by death. Thus the life changes into death, establishing a correlation between the two. (We shall further explain this subject somewhere else.)

However, this verse, ''Thou makest the night . . . bringest forth the dead from the living'', describes Allāh's management of His real human understanding to grasp this notion nowadays because we have the idea of the Sun's (relative) immobility and the Earth's rotation. This process of perpetual coiling, including the interpenetration of one sector by another is expressed in the Qur'ān . . .'' (The Bible, the Qur'ān and Science; North American Publications, Indianapolis; 1979; p. 164.) (tr.)

[1] That is, they wanted to avoid answering the question: How did a living cell evolve from a lifeless matter? How could the matter be the source of life when it had no life itself? (tr.) possession; as the preceding verse, ‘‘Thou givest the Kingdom . . . abasest whom Thou pleasest’’, shows His management of His conventional possession.

The two verses run parallel to each other: One describing four aspects of His management which stand face to face with the other four described by the other. The former mentions giving the kingdom and taking it away; the latter subtends it with the description of making the night to enter into the day and making the day to enter into the night. Then the former talks about exalting and abasing; and the latter speaks of bringing forth the living from the dead and vice versa. This juxtaposition provides a refreshing insight into the Qur’ānic eloquence.

To give a kingdom to someone is to let him impose his authority over his compatriots; thus, to a certain extent, the freedom of the people is lost into the authority of the ruler. It is not dissimilar to making the night dominate over the day; the night (comparable to subjugation) takes away certain portions of the day (comparable to the freedom of the people).

The opposite is true for taking away the kingdom vis-a-vis making the day to enter into the night.

To exalt someone is similar to giving him a new life; he would have remained unknown and unrecognized, if Allāh had not bestowed honour upon him. That is why it has been put parallel to bringing forth the living from the dead.

Likewise, abasing and bringing forth the dead from the living stand face to face. Honour is life; and dishonour, death.

Also, Allāh, in His Book, describes the day as having a manifest sign, and the night as having one blotted away; He says: . . . then We have made the sign of the night blotted away and We have made the sign of the day manifest . . . (17:12). Looking at human society from this point of view, establishment of a kingdom and its downfall are mirrors of the manifestation of the day and the effacement of the night respectively.

In the same way, He counts life as the fountain-head of knowledge and power; and death deprives man of these faculties; He says: Dead (are they), not living, and they know not when they shall be raised (16:21). And he has exclusively reserved the honour and might to Himself, and to His Apostle and the believers: and to Allāh belongs the might and to His Apostle and to the believers (63:8). And it is these who, according to the Qur'ān, are alive. Consequently, might and respect is the mirror of life, and humiliation and abasement represents death. It is now clear how giving of kingdom and taking it away as well as exalting and abasing (of the former verse) run parallel to making the night to enter into the day, and making the day to enter into the night as well as bringing forth the living from the dead, and the dead from the living (in the latter) respectively.

The concluding sentence of the latter verse, (and Thou givest sustenance to whom Thou pleasest, without measure) likewise stands face to face with the concluding sentence of the former (in Thine hand is good . . .), as the following paragraph makes it clear.

QUR'AN: and Thou givest sustenance to whom Thou pleasest, without measure: Apparently it gives the reason for the foregoing factors; the conjunctive, ''and'', is, therefore, for explanation; and it explains the afore-mentioned particular actions in term of a general faculty. The meaning: Allāh manages His creatures in the foregoing way because He is the Sustainer, Who gives sustenance to whom He pleases, without measure.

That is why we said earlier that it stands face to face with the concluding sentence of the former verse; because, ''in Thine hand is the good; surely, Thou has power over all things'' also explains the reason of the actions mentioned therein.

SUSTENANCE IN THE QUR'ĀN

ar-Rizq (اَلرِّزْقُ), usually translated as sustenance, maintenance, or means of livelihood, is a well-known concept. A glance at its various usages shows that the word has a connotation of bestowal by someone to someone else, for example, the sustenance given by the king to the soldiers. Originally, it was used for only the foodstuff. For example, Allāh says: and their maintenance and their clothing must be borne by the father according to usage (2:233). Mark that the clothing has not been counted as a part of the maintenance.

Thereafter, the meaning was extended to include every foodstuff, even if the giver was not known — in any case, it was a bestowal of good luck. The process of generalization continued, and now it is used for every useful thing — food or something else — which comes to someone; it includes all the paraphernalia of life, like: wealth, prestige, family, supporters, beauty, knowledge and so on. Allāh says: Or is it that you ask them a recompense? But the recompense of your Lord is best, and He is the best of those who provide sustenance (23:72). Also, He quotes Shu'ayb (a.s.) as saying: O my people! have you considered if I have a clear proof from my Lord and He has given me a goodly sustenance from Himself . . . (11:88). Here the sustenance refers to the prophethood and the Divine knowledge etc.

Allāh says: Surely Allāh, He is the Bestower of sustenance, the Lord of Power, the Strong (51:58). The context confines the bestowal of sustenance to Allāh only. The verse leads us to the following concepts:

First: Bestowal of sustenance, in reality, cannot be ascribed to any one other than Allāh. Of course, there are some verses that attribute it to others also; for example: and Allāh is the Best of sustainers (62:11). (There are many sustainers, but Allāh is the Best.) Also, He gives the order: . . . and maintain them out of it, and clothe them (4:5). But such usages do not give them any independent status; the only Sustainer is Allāh, others are just a means of conveying Allāh's gift to His servants. It is not different from the Kingdom and the Might which actually belong to Allāh, although others too get them by Allāh's bestowal and permission.

Second: Whatever good the people get and which they make use of, and derive benefit from, in their existence, is their sustenance; and it is Allāh Who bestows it to them. There is a large number of the verses of sustenance to prove this fact. In addition, there are numerous verses on the theme of creation, management, decree, possession, will, and good, which prove that all these things belong exclusively to Allāh — and giving sustenance is interwoven with these factors.

Third: Suppose a man takes advantage of a certain thing to obtain an unlawful benefit. Inasmuch as it was the cause or means of a sin, it would not be attributed to Allāh. Allāh has clearly said that on the level of legislation, He does not sanction any sin or evil. He says: And when they commit an indecency they say: ''We found our fathers doing this, and Allāh has enjoined it on us.'' Say: ''Surely Allāh does not enjoin indecency; do you say against Allāh what you do not know?'' (7:28). Also, He says: Surely Allāh enjoins the doing of justice and the doing of good (to others) and the giving to the kindred, and He forbids indecency and evil and rebellion . . . (16:90). It is just unimaginable that He would forbid a thing and then, at the same time, would allow it; or that He would declare something unlawful and then confine a servant's sustenance to it! And unlawful benefit is not ''sustenance'' on the level of legislation. Nevertheless, it is ''sustenance'' on the level of creation. The religious responsibility does not reach up to the level of creation — and there is nothing bad on that level. When the Qur'ān says that Allāh gives sustenance to every body, it looks at this subject from the level of creation. A Divine talk cannot be reduced to the level of the simpletons' understanding; in other words, it cannot overlook the deep Divine realities just because they are beyond the mental capacity of common man. The Holy Book contains what is a healing for the believers' hearts; nobody may fall into perdition by it except the unjust: And We reveal of the Qur'ān that which is a healing and a mercy to the believers, and it adds only to the perdition of the unjust (17:82).

Moreover, there are verses showing that it was Allāh Who gave kingdom to Namrūd (Nimrod), Pharaoh and others like them, and bestowed wealth and treasures to Qārūn and his like. They got all these things not without the permission of Allāh; He gave them the kingdom and wealth as a means of trial, to test their spiritual condition, and to complete His proof against them; it was as though Allāh left them to go astray if they so wished, and gave them enough rope to hang themselves.

It should be noted here that, in the above examples, we took those cases to the level of legislation and yet found good explanations for them that would satisfy the reason and were not against the sublime Divine Justice. If such things are unobjectionable at the level of legislation, certainly there can be no objection in providing sustenance, at the level of creation — even if it be ‘‘unlawful’’ for legislation’s point of view.

Allāh has said that every thing has been created by Him, is sent down by Him from His treasures of mercy: And there is not a thing but with Us are the treasures of it, and We do not send it down but in a known measure (15:21). Further, He has said: and whatever is with Allāh is better . . . (28:60). These two (and other similar) verses read together prove that whatever a man gets in this life, it comes from Allāh and is good and beneficial for him. This theme may also be inferred from the verse: Who made good every thing that He has created . . . (32:7), read in conjunction with the verse: That is Allāh, your Lord, the Creator of every thing; there is no god but He (40:62).

Yet, there is no denying that some Divine gifts appear to be evil and harmful to the recipient. But its evil and harm is just relative; it may be so for this particular person, while it brings good and benefit to a great many people; in other words, that personal hardship may be good, in the wider context of the world-system. Or it could have been misused by the man himself. Allāh points to this factor when He says: and whatever misfortune befalls you, it is from yourself (4:79). However, we have already dealt with this subject in a previous volume.

In short, whatever good Allāh bestows on His creatures (and all that He bestows is good and beneficial), it is called sustenance, in its literal sense: it is a gift that benefits the recipient. Probably, it is this theme that the verse 20:131 points at: and the sustenance (given) by your Lord is better . . .

The above discourse shows that, for almost all practical purposes, the three concepts — sustenance, good and creation — are one and the same. Every sustenance is good and created; and every creation is a sustenance and good. Nevertheless, there is a fine difference between sustenance and good on one side and creation on the other.

Sustenance presupposes the existence of something to be sustained, to whom the sustenance would be given. Food is sustenance for the digestive system because it needs that food; the digestive system is sustenance for the man as he needs it; that man is sustenance for his parents because they benefit from him; likewise, the existence is a sustenance for the man, per se. Allāh says: . . . Who gave to everything its creation . . . (20:50).

Likewise, good presupposes a selector who would choose what he wants from among a lot of things. Food is good for the digestive system because it needs it, and opts for it when given a choice; the digestive system is, in the same way, good for the man, and similarly the existence is good for him.

But as for creation, it does not require any actual or imaginary pre-existing thing. Food, digestive system, man, every thing is created in its own right; it by itself is the object of creation; it does not need any other object.

Every sustenace belongs to Allāh; every good belongs to Allāh. Whatever sustenance comes from Him, whatever good is given by Him, it is given gratis, not in exchange of or return for anything. Suppose you wanted to give to Allāh something as price of the sustenance; well, what could you give Him? Whatever you may think of, it already belongs to Allāh; you have no right whatsoever on any thing. It is just a mercy of Allāh that He has undertaken to give sustenance to every one, and has made it obligatory for Himself to sustain all the creatures; He says: And there is no animal in the earth but on Allāh is the sustenance of it (11:6); and in the heaven is your sustenance and what you are threatened with. And by the Lord of the heavens and the earth! it is most surely the truth, just as you do speak (51:22 — 23).

It shows that although sustenance is a right on Allāh — because He Himself has undertaken to give sustenance to everyone — yet it is in fact a free gift from Him, because no creature is in his own right entitled to get it.

The above talk makes one thing clear: Even if a man obtains his sustenance unlawfully, originally he was alloted a lawful sustenance. It is unimaginable that Allāh would undertake to give sustenance to a man, then compel him to get it through unlawful means; and then would tell him not to use it, and punish him if he disobeyed.

Let us explain it in another way: Sustenance is a Divine gift containing good; as such it is a Divine mercy for all the creatures. We have already mentioned that there are two kinds of mercy: There is a general mercy which covers all the servants, believers and unbelievers, pious ones and sinners alike; and it is not confined to the human beings, it encompasses other creatures too. And there is a special mercy, the one that is reserved for the walkers on the path of felicity and righteousness, for example, true belief, piety and ultimately the paradise. Likewise, there are two kinds of sustenance: A general sustenance which is provided to every thing for its protection and survival; and a special sustenance which remains within the limits of legality.

The general mercy as well as the general sustenance is foreordained and measured; Allāh says: and Who created every thing, then ordained for it a measure (25:2). Likewise, the special mercy and the special sustenance are foreordained and measured. For example, guidance is a special mercy; and on the level of legislation it is foreordained and decreed for every man, be he a believer or an unbeliever. That is why Allāh raised the prophets and sent down the books. He says: And I did not create the jinn and the human beings except that they should worship Me, I do not desire from them any sustenance and I do not desire that they should feed Me. Surely Allāh, He is the Bestower of sustenance, the Lord of power, the Strong (51:56 — 58). Also, He says: And your Lord has commanded (decreed) that you shall not worship (any) but Him . . . (17:23). It means that worship (which depends on guidance and is one of its concomitants) is a decreed measure — on the level of legislation. And so is the special sustenance (which is obtained lawfully), on the same level. Allāh says: They are lost indeed who kill their children foolishly without knowledge, and forbid what Allāh has given to them, forging a lie against Allāh; they have indeed gone astray, and they are not the followers of the right course (6:140). Also, He says: And Allāh has made some of you excel others in the means of subsistence, so those who are made to excel do not give away their sustenance to those whom their right hands possess, so that they should be equal therein . . . (16:71). These two verses are unconditional and general; they cover the believers as well as the unbelievers, and include the one who obtains his sustenance in lawful way as well as the one who does so unlawfully.

One thing more: As was explained in the beginning, sustenance is the gift or bestowal which the sustained benefits from. It follows that only that much of it can be truly called sustenance which is used up by the sustained. A man has been given a lot of wealth, but he eats only a small portion of it; therefore, his sustenance, strictly speaking, is the portion he ate up; the remainder cannot be called his sustenance except in the sense that he was given it. In other words, when we say, Zayd has got ample (or little) sustenance, it does not necessarily mean that he has got a lot of (or little) wealth.

There are some other aspects of this topic, which we shall write about under the verse: And there is no animal in the earth but on Allāh is the sustenance of it, and He knows its resting place and its depository; all (things) are in a manifest book (11:6).

Now we come back to the clause under discussion, that is, ‘‘and Thou givest sustenance to whom thou pleasest, without measure’’. The sustenance is ‘‘without measure’’ because Allāh gives it to the creatures gratis, and they by themselves have got no right to it. Whatever they could offer in exchange, even their requests, invocations and thanks, in reality belongs to Allāh, they have got nothing of their own to offer in consideration of the sustenance. Therefore, there is no measure for the sustenance given by Allāh. Clearly, the clause does not imply that the given sustenance is unlimited and unmeasured. How can it be when the verses of ‘‘measure’’ clearly refute it? For example, Allāh says: Surely We created every thing according to a measure (54:49); and whoever fears Allāh, He will make for him an outlet, and give him sustenance from whence he thinks not; and whoever trusts in Allāh, He is sufficient for him; surely Allāh attains His purpose; Allāh indeed has made a measure for every thing (65:2 — 3).

Sustenance, therefore, is a free gift from Allāh, yet it is measured according to the pleasure of Allāh.

The two verses together make the following concepts clear:—
First: The possession as well as the Kingdom exclusively belongs to Allāh.

Second: Every good is in His hand, and comes from Him.

Third: Sustenance is a gift from Allāh, without any recompense or exchange.

Fourth: Kingdom, might, honour, and every single conventional good, occurring in the social framework, (like: wealth, prestige, power, etc.) are various aspects of the sustenance, given by Allāh to His servants.

TRADITIONS

'Abdu'l-A'lā (mawlā, client of the Āl [tribe of] Sām) has narrated from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.). He says: ''I told him: 'Say O Allāh; Master of the Kingdom! Thou givest the kingdom to whomsoever Thou pleasest and takest away the kingdom from whomsoever Thou pleasest. Is it not that Allāh gave the kingdom to the Umayyads?' He said: 'It is not as you think. Surely Allāh Mighty and Great is He! gave the kingdom to us, and the Umayyads usurped it; it is as though a cloth belongs to a man, and another person takes it away; yet the cloth does not belong to the man who took it away.' '' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: al-'Ayyāshī has narrated a similar tradition through Dāwūd ibn Farqad from Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.).

We have already explained that giving the kingdom is of two kinds: (1) Giving it at the level of creation: Such a kingdom means that the king enjoys an over-riding authority over the people and they are subdued by his power — it makes no difference whether his rule is based on justice or not. For example, Allāh says referring to Nimrod: . . . because Allāh had given him the kingdom (2:258). The effect of such a kingdom is that the king's words are obeyed, his command carried out and his will enforced. (We shall later explain what a kingdom on the level of creation really entails.) (2) Giving it at the level of legislation, that is, decreeing that he is a king whose obedience is obligatory. For example, Allāh says: Surely Allāh has raised Ṭālūt to be a king over you (2:247). The effect of this type of kingdom is obligation of the people to obey the king's command and confirmation of his mastership of the people. Such a kingdom is always based on justice; and is liked and praised by Allāh.

Now the kingdom the Umayyads had got was of the former type, that is, the one decreed at the level of creation, with its accompanying effect of overall authority on the people. But the questioner was confused; and erroneously thought that it had the effect of the other type of kingdom — he assumed that the Umayyads were entitled to the obedience of the people, that they were the rightful masters of the ummah, and had got a lawful and praiseworthy status in the eyes of Allāh. The Imām told him that such a kingdom (on the level of legislation) did not belong to the Umayyads — it belonged to the rightful successors of the Prophet, that is, the Imāms, and only they were entitled to the unquestioning obedience of the ummah.

In other words, the same kingdom which in the Umayyad's hands was devoid of every virtue, would have been praiseworthy if it were in the Imāms' hands. In the Umayyds' hands it was totally condemnable, because they had usurped it from its rightful owners. Nevertheless, its bestowal would be attributed to Allāh as a plan to give them enough rope to hang themselves, as He did in the case of Nimrod and Pharaoh.

The Umayyads themselves had misunderstood the connotations of this verse, and thought that their kingdom was the sign of Divine approval of their rule, as may be seen in Kitāb al-Irshād (of al-Mufīd) where it mentions the events after the martyrdom of Imām al-Ḥusayn (a.s.) and his companions: al-Mufīd says: ''When the heads (of the martyrs) were put before Yazīd and among them was the head of al-Ḥusayn (a.s.), Yazīd recited:

We will split even the skull of a man we held in great respect;
But they were disobedient and oppressive.''

Again al-Mufīd says: ''Then (Yazīd) looked towards the people of his court and said: 'Verily, this (al-Ḥusayn) used to boast against me and say: ''My father is better than the father of Yazīd, and my mother is better than his mother, and my grandfather is better than his grandfather, and I am better than him.'' As for his claim that his father was better than the father of Yazīd, indeed my father disputed with his father and Allāh decreed in favour of my father against his father. And as for his saying that his mother was better than Yazīd's mother, by my life he was right; certainly Fāṭimah, daughter of the Apostle of Allāh was better than my mother. And as regards his saying that his granfather was better than my grandfather, no one believing in Allāh and the Last Day can say that he is better than Muḥammad. And as for his saying that he was better than me, perhaps he had not read this verse: Say: ''O Allāh, Master of the Kingdom! Thou givest the kingdom to whomsoever Thou pleasest . . .'' ''

And Zaynab, daughter of ʻAlī (peace be on him and her) rebutted his claims using the same explanation as aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) did in this tradition. as-Sayyid ibn Ṭāwūs and others have reported her reply, in which she, inter alia, said: ''Do you think, O Yazīd! that — just because you cut us off from the regions of the earth and the horizons of the sky, so that we are being held like the captives — we are abased before Allāh? Or that you are exalted before Him? Or that it has happened because of your great importance with Him? So (now) you behave arrogantly and look around hilariously and cheerfully, when you find the world in your bondage and (your) affairs well in order, and when our kingdom and our authority is totally usurped by you! Take it easy! Don't be hasty!! Have you forgotten the words of Allāh: And let not those who disbelieve think that Our granting them respite is better for their souls; We grant them respite only that they may add to their sins; and they shall have a disgraceful chastisement (3:178).''

It is reported in Majmaʻu 'l-bayān about the words of Allāh, and Thou bringest forth the living from the dead . . .: ''It is said that it means: Thou bringest forth the believer from the unbeliever and Thou bringest forth the unbeliever from the believer.'' Further, it is written: ''And this meaning has been narrated from Abū Jaʻfar (al-Bāqir) and Abū ʻAbdillāh (aṣ-Ṣādiq), peace be on them.''

The author says: A nearly similar tradition has been narrated by aṣ-Ṣadūq from al-ʻAskarī (a.s.).

Ibn Marduwayh has narrated through the chain of Abū ʻUthmān an-Nahdī from Ibn Masʻūd or Salmān from the Prophet about the words, He brings forth the living from the dead and He brings forth the dead from the living, that he said: ''The believer from the unbeliever and the unbeliever from the believer.'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

It is reported through the foregoing chain from Salmān al-Fārisī that he said: ‘‘The Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘When Allāh created Adam (a.s.), He took out his offspring, then He took a handful in His right hand and said: ‘‘These are the people of the garden; and I don’t care.’’ And He took a handful in the other (hand) and came into it every bad (person); and He said: ‘‘These are the people of the Fire; and I don’t care.’’ Then He mixed one (group) with the other. Thus comes out an unbeliever from a believer, and a believer from an unbeliever; and that is (the meaning of) His words, Thou bringest forth the living from the dead and Thou bringest forth the dead from the living.’ ’’ (ibid.)

The author says: Several exegetes have narrated this meaning from Salmān, with the chain of narrators disconnected. The tradition is one of those related to the ‘‘tiny particles’’ and the covenant; and, Allāh willing, we shall explain them in a more suitable place.

Muḥammad ibn Yaḥyā narrated from Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad and several of our companions, from Sahl ibn Ziyād, from Ibn Maḥbūb, from Abū Ḥamzah ath-Thumālī that Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) said: ‘‘The Apostle of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and his progeny, said in (his) last pilgrimage: ‘Verily, the Trustworthy Spirit (i.e., Gabriel) has revealed to my heart that no soul was to die until it had completed its sustenance. Therefore, be on guard against (the wrath of) Allāh, and act decently in seeking (the sustenance). Even if you feel that a sustenance is late in coming to you, it should not induce you to seek it through some thing that is a sin against Allāh; for surely Allāh has distributed the sustenance among His creation, with lawful means, and He has not distributed it with unlawful means. Therefore, whoever fears Allāh and remains patient, his sustenance comes to him from lawful means; and whoever tears apart the curtain (put by) Allāh and takes it (i.e., the sustenance) through unlawful means, his lawful sustenance is reduced (proportionately) and (also) he will be answerable for that.’ ’’ (al-Kāfī)

‘Alī (a.s.) said: ‘‘O son of Adam! Livelihood is of two kinds: the livelihood which you seek and the livelihood which seeks you; if you do not reach it, it will come to you. Therefore, do not impose a year’s worry on your one day’s worry. Whatever you get every day should be enough for you for the day. If you have a whole year of your life even then Allāh, the Sublime, will give you every next day what He has destined as your share. If you do not have a year in your life then why should you worry for what is not for you. No seeker will reach your livelihood before you nor will anyone overpower you in the matter of that livelihood. Similarly, what has been destined as your share will not be delayed for you?'' (Nahju 'l-balāghah)

Ibn Ṭarīf narrated from Ibn 'U1wān, from Ja'far (a.s.), that his father (al-Bāqir — a.s.) said: ''The Apostle of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and his progeny, said: 'Verily, the sustenance comes down from the heaven to the earth (abundantly) like the number of the rain-drops, to every soul according to what has been alloted to it. Yet, Allah is very Munificent; so you should beseech Allāh for His munificence.' '' (Qurbu 'l-asnād)

The author says: Numerous traditions have been narrated of the same connotation. We shall discuss, Allāh willing, in the Chapter of Hūd (ch. 11), the traditions of sustenance in detail.

AN ESSAY ON KINGDOM AND ITS PLACE IN SOCIETY

It has already been explained that possession and property are among those conventional but essential concepts which man cannot do without — it makes no difference whether he lives alone or in a society. Possession basically is a recognized relationship between the owner and the property.

Likewise, kingdom is a conventional, nevertheless essential, concept; a subjective institution which man cannot do without. But it is as a member of society, not as an individual, that man needs this institution. No sooner do the people establish a society than they start disputing with one another; everyone wants what is in the other's hands even if it means trespassing the limits and crushing other's rights under his heels. This tendency leads to chaos and conflict. The society which was established to ensure happy and peaceful life, becomes a source of misery and disorder; the medicine turns into a poison.

This anomaly cannot be removed except by creating an overall authority which could compel each member to remain within the limits — thus curbing the reckless ambitions of the oppressor and giving new hope and vigour to the oppressed. That authority, which is called kingdom or rulership, lets everyone enjoy his due rights and keeps every member in his proper place.

Exploitation of weaker sections has been a constant feature of human history. In ancient times some strong persons imposed their will on the society and subdued their compatriots to accept them as their overlord or king. Although such kings and their officers themselves were mostly epitome of oppression and injustice, still their presence was of some benefit to the society. They, in their own interest, did not allow any section to oppress the others — because they did not want anyone to become strong enough to rise one day against their own authority. In this way peace reigned in the society; everyone was afraid of the autocratic king and no one had any opportunity or inclination to think about the general welfare of the society. If an individual ruler was less oppressive, the subjects sang his praise; if he was unjust beyond their tolerance, they complained and cried.

Sometime a king or ruler was killed or overpowered; and the subjects experienced chaos and disorder, to prevent which they made some strong and able man to take the rein of power in his hands, and he ascended the throne; and thus began the same story of oppression and injustice.

This continued for a long time. Ultimately, society was fed up with the autorcratic and dictatorial monarchy. In order to restrain the king's hands, people devised constitutions, delineating the mutual rights and duties of the ruler and the ruled, and somehow or other forced the king to agree. The autocratic monarchy thus became a constitutional one. Yet, it was a hereditary institution.

Then the public became aware of another big defect: Once a king ascended the throne, there was no way to remove him, no matter how unjust or unfit he might prove. Another defect was its hereditary nature; the first born child of a king got the kingdom, irrespective of his physical, moral and intellectual abilities. They found the answer in republic. Now they had an elected president for a fixed period instead of a hereditary king who ruled for life.

Various nations invented various other system to restrain their rulers; and future might be holding various hitherto unimagined systems in store for us.

All these attempts throughout the world, to regulate the functions of the ruler, prove one thing, if nothing else. Humanity really needs the institution of rulership, no matter by what name it is called in a certain country at a certain time. One overriding authority must subdue all other people's individual ambitions and aims; otherwise, society will suffer from discord, conflict and disorder. That is why we said at the outset that kingdom is an essential concept of the society. And like all other such concepts, society is constantly trying to perfect it by removing from it the harmful elements.

The institution of prophethood has played the most important part in this process. When an idea spreads in the public — especially if it is in accord with the nature, and satisfied the human expectations — it becomes the strongest bond to unit the differing groups, to unify the divergent views and to turn the individuals into a well disciplined society, which no power can defy.

Prophethood since its earliest days calls the people to do justice and to abstain from injustice; it teaches them to worship Allāh and to submit only to Him; and it forbids them to follow the arrogant pharaohs and exploiting nimrods. This cry has constantly been raised generation after generation, in one nation after another, exhorting the big bosses to submit to the rule of justice, and encouraging the weaker sections to stand up for their rights. It is impossible for such a powerful factor to remain active in the society for so many centuries and not to affect the human psychology, not to mould mankind's way of thinking.

The Qur'ān often quotes revelations to this effect sent to the previous prophets, Nūḥ (a.s.) is quoted complaining before his Lord: ''My Lord! surely they have disobeyed me and followed him whose wealth and children have added to him nothing but loss. And they have planned a very great plan. And they say: 'By no means leave your gods . . . ' '' (71:21 — 23). The same thing appears in his disputation with the big bosses of his people: They said: ''Shall we believe in you while the meanest follow you?'' He said: ''And what knowledge have I of what they do? Their account is only with my Lord, if you could perceive'' (26:111 — 113). Likewise, Hūd (a.s.) admonished his people: ''Do you build on every height a monument? Vain is it that you do: And you make strong fortresses that perhaps you may abide: And when you lay hands (on men) you lay hands (like) tyrants'' (26:128 — 130). And Ṣāliḥ (a.s.) advised his people: ''Therefore, guard against (the punishment of) Allāh and obey me: And do not obey the bidding of the extravagant: Who make mischief in the land and do not act right'' (26:150 — 152).

In the same way Mūsā (a.s.) stood up against Pharaoh to oppose his tyranny and to defend and liberate the Israelites; the same stance was taken by Ibrāhīm (a.s.) against Nimrod; and by ʻĪsā (a.s.) and other Israelite prophets vis-a-vis the oppressors of their times. All of them condemned and attacked the arrogance and injustice of their kings and rulers, and called their people to throw away the yokes of tyranny and stand boldly against the exploitors and transgressors.

So far as the Qur'ān is concerned, it is no secret how it exhorts the people not to yield to the transgressors, not to surrender to the oppressors; it encourages the oppressed to stand up boldly against the oppressor to safeguard his self-respect and human dignity; and it warns the arrogant of the bitter fruits of haughtiness, of the chastisement that awaits the oppression and injustice. For example: Have you not seen how your Lord dealt with ʻĀd, (the people of) Iram, possessors of many columned buildings, the like of which were not created in the cities; and (with) Thamūd, who hewed out the rocks in the valley; and (with) Pharaoh, the lord of stakes; who transgressed in the cities, so they made great mischief therein? Therefore your Lord let fall upon them the whip of chastisement. Most surely your Lord is on watch (89:6 — 14).

The Qur'ānic comment, at the end of the story of Ṭālūt, is in itself enough to prove that the kingdom (or rulership) is essential for the mankind: And were it not for Allāh's repelling some men with others, the earth would certainly be in a state of disorder; but Allāh is Gracious to the creatures (2:251). We have shown in its commentary how it confirms this institution in a general way.

Many verses in the Qur'ān talk about kingdom, guardianship and obligation of obedience etc. Some of them count the kingdom as a bounty and gift from Allāh: . . . and We have given them a grand Kingdom (4:54); . . . and made you kings and gave you what He had not given to any other among the nations (5:20); . . . and Allāh grants His Kingdom to whom He pleases . . . (2:247). Nevertheless, it is an honour only when it is accompanied by piety. Piety is the only basis of honour, to the exclusion of all other illusory sources of respect. Allāh says: O you people! surely We have created you of a male and a female and made you nations and tribes that you may recognize each other; surely the most honourable of you with Allāh is the most pious of you . . . (49:13).

But it is only Allāh Who decides the worth of a servant's piety. Consequently, no one should use his piety as a lever to hoist himself over his compatriots. Nobody should boast about anything whatsoever: If the cause of boasting is some worldly thing, then it is obviously worthless; if it concerns the next world, then it is in the hands of Allāh. In any case, a Muslim, who is given this grace of Allāh which we call Kingdom, has nothing to boast about, nor any reason to think himself as superior to the others. All he has got for himself is an unenviable burden of responsibilities of the state. What brightens this gloomy picture is the hope that his Lord will give him great reward in the next life if he manages the affairs of the state with justice and piety.

This is the spirit which animated the whole lives of the true friends of Allāh. We shall write later on, Allāh willing, on this topic, looking at the lives of the Prophet and his purified progeny; we shall describe, with the help of the correct traditions, what they gained for themselves from their kingdoms: ''nothing''; their only interest in the kingdom and authority was to use it to crush the tyrants, to cut the root of mischief in the earth, to bring the arrogants and transgressors back within the limits of religion. And that is the only worth of the kingdom.

The Qur'ān treats the kingdom as a tool which is necessary for running the affairs of society — just as education and martial power is necessary for its intellectual and defence needs. Kingdom is an instrument of society; it is not the foundation upon which the society stands. The Qur'ān does not invite the Muslims to unite to establish an empire to shame the Byzantine and Iranian empires; it calls them to unite in Islam, and admonishes them not to differ in religion. This unity in religion is the foundation which the Islamic society is built upon. Allāh says: And (know) that this is My path, the straight one, therefore follow it; and follow not (other) ways, for they will scatter you away from His way (6:153); Say: ''O People of the Book! come to a word, common between us and you, that we shall not worship any but Allāh and (that) we shall not associate anything with Him and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh''; but if they turn back, then say: ''Bear witness that we are Muslims'' (3:64). Clearly, the Qur'ān calls the people to surrender to no one except Allāh; the society which it recognizes is the one that is based on religion. It demolishes all other loyalties; a Muslim is not to submit to anyone besides Allāh; he is not to bow down before any magnificent palace or grandiose castle; he is not to humiliate himself before any Ceasar or Khusraw. Consequently, the Qur'ān does not recognize the artificial boundaries which have cut the earth of Allāh into small pieces which they call countries, nor the resulting ''nationhood'' that divides the humanity into territorial segments, putting one group against the others.

A PHILOSOPHICAL DISCOURSE ON ATTRIBUTION OF KINGDOM AND OTHER ABSTRACTS CONCEPTS TO ALLĀH

The Creator, as the Essential Being, is the ultimate Cause of all that is there in the universe; the relationship between Him and the universe (the whole as well as its components) is that of the cause and effect. It is a proved axiom of philosophy that causality governs the existence only — the real existence of the effect emanates from the existence of its cause; other things, for example, quiddity, are outside the domain of the cause. Consequently, that which has no real existence, does not come within the system of the cause and effect; and as it is not the effect of any cause, it has no chain of causality reaching up to the ultimate Cause.

Problem arises about the abstract ideas and imaginary concepts, which have no real existence outside the imagination. Being devoid of real existence, they cannot be said to be caused by the ultimate Cause, that is, Allāh. But one of those imaginary concepts, is the sharī'ah with its commandments and prohibitions, its rules, principles and conventions. So are the kingdom, the honour, the sustenance etc. Should not these things be attributed to Allāh? If the answer is yes, then how?

Reply: These concepts, although devoid of real existence, leave in their track some effects which are inseparable from them; and these effects have real existence. As these effects can be, and are, attributed to Allāh, the concepts from which they emanate can as easily be attributed to Him. Kingdom, for example, is an imaginary concept, which has no real existence outside our imagination; we have established this institution to achieve a real benefit. It is through this abstract idea of kingdom that we try to curb the unscrupulous offenders of the society, to rein the unrestrained designs of the transgressors, and to avenge the oppressed from the oppressor. These are real facts and they can, and are, attributed to Allāh. As these effects of kingdom are ascribed to Allāh, so can be the kingdom itself, by association.

The same applies to the honour, the rules of the sharī'ah and its principles etc.

In short, all such abstract ideas and concepts may be attributed to Allāh, by attributing their effects to Him, in a way that is in keeping with the sanctity of His name.

COMMENTARY

The verses are not disconnected with the preceding ones, which admonished the People of the Book and the polytheists. If the word ''unbelievers'', coming at the beginning of these verses, covers the People of the Book too, then these verses forbid the believers to befriend, and fraternize with, the polytheists and the People of the Book all together; if it refers to the polytheists only, then the verses admonish the believers not to be friendly with them; instead they should join the party of Allāh, loving Him and His Apostle.

QUR'ĀN: Let not the believers take the unbelievers for friends rather than the believers: ''al-Awliyā' '' (اَلْاَوْلِيَآءُ = friends), the plural of al-walīy (اَلْوَلِي), is derived from al-wilāyah (اَلْوِلَايَةُ). The root word denotes authority to manage something, that is, guardianship. Guardian of a minor, insane or idiot is called his al-walīy, because he has the authority to manage their affairs and property, although the property belongs to the said ward.

Then the word was used — with increasing frequency — in the context of love; if two people love each other, each feels free to look after the other's affairs. Love empowers the beloved to manage the affairs, and influence the life, of the lover.

In this verse, taking the unbelievers for friends means establishing a psychological rapport with them. Such a friendship would taint the believer's vision, and would adversely affect his thoughts and character, encouraging him to follow his unbeliever friends in his life and manners. The clause, ''rather than the believers'', points to this fact. It refers to a stage when the believer prefers the unbelievers rather than the believers as the object of his love and as the model for his life; the more he moves nearer to his unbeliever friends, the more he distances himself from the believers.

Many verses strictly forbid the believers to take the unbelievers, and the Jews and the Christians for friends; but in every instance, there are clauses which delineate which type of friendship is forbidden. For example, this verse contains the abovementioned clause, ‘‘rather than the believers’’; the verse: O you who believe! do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends (5:51), goes on to say: they are friends of each other; and the prohibition: O you who believe! do not take My enemy and your enemy for friends . . . (60:1), is further on explained by the words: Allāh does not forbid you respecting those who have not made war against you on account of your religion and have not driven you forth from your homes . . . (60:8).

The adjectives used in the verse under discussion point to the reason of the prohibition. The believers should not take the unbelievers for friends rather than the believers. Belief and disbelief are diametrically opposed to each other; they can never reconcile. The same mutual repulsion would permeate the whole lives of the believers vis-a-vis the unbelievers. Their thoughts and deeds, their spiritual journey towards Allāh, and in short their whole being would be totally different from the opposite party. Such a position is not in harmony with that of friendship; because friendship demands unity and rapport.

And when such a friendship begins and grows with complete disregard to the friendship with the believers, it first spoils the fruits of the faith, then damages its branches and finally destructs its very roots. That is why Allāh warned them in the next sentence, ‘‘and whoever does this, he shall have nothing (to do) with Allāh’’. Then comes the exception of taqiyyah, because taqiyyah is only a show of love, not its reality.

‘‘rather than the believers’’: dūn (دُوْن) is a proposition of place, meaning: below, under (in rank, value) ; this side of, short of; without, with the exclusion of; leaving aside. ‘‘min dūn’’ (مِنْ دُوْن) signifies, ‘beginning from a place below that of the believers’, because the believers are far above them in rank. Originally this preposition denoted nearness combined with lowness, for example, dūnaka Zayd (دُوْنَكَ زَيْدُ = Zayd is near you but below; he does not measure up to you). Then it was used for 'other than', 'besides', for example, . . . two gods besides Allāh . . . (5:116); . . . and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases . . . (4:48). Also, it is used as a nomen verbi; in this sense, dūnaka Zayd would mean: adhere to Zayd. These later usages are based on some association with the original meaning, not that the word was made for them.

QUR'ĀN: and whoever does this, he shall have nothing (to do) with Allāh: ''does this'', that is, takes the unbelievers for friends in preference to the believers. This misconduct is hated so much by the Speaker that He does not like to mention it in words, and just alludes to it; people often use pronouns to refer to indecent things. Also Allāh did not say, whoever of the believer does this; it was far beneath the dignity of the believers to attribute such a misconduct to them.

The clause, ''he shall have nothing (to do) with Allāh'', literally means, he is not from Allāh in anything. Idiomatically, this expression shows that he is not of the group or party of Allāh. Allāh says: And whoever takes Allāh and His Apostle and those who believe for a guardian, then surely the party of Allāh are they that shall be triumphant (5:56). Also Ibrāhīm (a.s.) is quoted as saying: . . . then whoever follows me, he is surely of me . . . (14:36).

Anyhow, the sentence means: Whoever does this, he shall in no way remain with the party of Allāh; his thoughts and deeds will be those of the enemies of Islam.

QUR'ĀN: except (when) you guard yourselves against (them) for fear from them: ''al-Ittiqā' '' (اَلِاتِّقَآءُ = to seek protection because of fear); the word is sometimes used for fear, by association; probably taqiyyah has the same connotations.

The exception in this sentence is disjoined: To show attachment to someone because of his fear without loving him in reality is quite different from befriending him and having a rapport with him; love and fear are two opposite feelings and have opposite effects on the heart; how can they be found in one place?

The verse clearly allows taqiyyah, as is shown by the traditions of the Imāms of Ahlu 'l-bayt. Also, it is clearly proved by the verse revealed about ‘Ammār, and his parents, Yāsir and Sumayyah: He who disbelieves in Allāh after his having believed — not he who is compelled while his heart is at rest on account of faith, but he who opens (his) breast for disbelief — on these is the wrath of Allāh, and they shall have a grievous chastisement (16:106).

The Qur'ān and the sunnah both agree that taqiyyah is permissible in places. Also, reason supports it. The main purpose of the religion and the Apostle is to keep the truth alive; and sometimes this purpose can be achieved by practising taqiyyah, by keeping good relations with the enemies of the religion, while discarding taqiyyah would serve no purpose at all. It is a reality which no reasonable man can deny. We shall further write about it under ‘Traditions’, and also under the verse 16:106 mentioned just now (. . . not he who is compelled while his heart is at rest on account of faith . . .).

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh cautions you of Himself and to Allāh is the eventual coming: ''at-Taḥdhīr'' (اَلتَّحْذِيْرُ) is the transitive of al-ḥadhar (اَلْحَذَرُ = to beware of a frightful thing). Allāh has warned His servants of His chastisement, as He says: . . . surely the chastisement of your Lord is to be dreaded of (17:57). And He has warned them of the hypocrites and the mischief of the unbelievers, as He says: . . . they are the enemy, therefore beware of them (63:4); . . . and be cautious of them, lest they seduce you . . . (5:49). But in this verse as well as in a following one He cautions them of His Own Self. The crime of befriending the unbelievers to the exclusion of the believers is so serious that no curtain or protection remains between Allāh and the criminal, there is nothing to save him from Allāh, there is no helper or intercessor to intercede on his behalf; he is left without any shield, to face directly the chastisement of Allāh. This style puts utmost emphasis to the threat, and its repetition in a following verse further intensifies it; then it has been further highlighted by the concluding clauses, ''and to Allāh is the eventual coming'' (in this verse) and ''Allāh is Compassionate to the servants'' (in the other), as we shall explain later on.

Look at this verse and the others obliging the Muslims not to take the unbelievers for friends. You will see that this sin is tentamount to rejecting the guardianship of Allāh, going out from the band of His servants, and joining the party of His enemies — to damage the affairs of the religion. This transgression is a dry-rot that destroys the fibre of religion; it is more damaging and harmful to Islam than the open disbelief and polytheism of the unbelievers and pagans. One can easily prepare for an open enemy and can repulse his attacks on one's fortress; but it is not so easy if the enemy is inside and poses as a friend. If a Muslim establishes fraternal bonds with the enemies of Islam, his character is gradually influenced by their manners, deeds and thoughts. A time comes when disbelief replaces the belief; the Muslims slowly discard the tenets and symbols of Islam one after the other, and before they realize it, Islam loses its hold on the society. It is death without any hope of revival, perdition without any chance of resurrection.

It is ''the transgression''; and his case is directly in the hands of Allāh: Have you not seen how your Lord dealt with 'Ād, (the people of) Iram, possessors of many columned buildings, the like of which were not created in the cities; and with Thamūd, who hewed out the rocks in the valley, and (with) Pharaoh, the lord of stakes; who transgressed in the cities, so they made great mischief therein? Therefore your Lord let fall upon them the whip of chastisement. Most surely your Lord is on watch (89:6 — 14). The transgression leads the transgressor to a place where Allāh is on watch — and where there is no one but Allāh; and He smites the guilty with the whip of His chastisement — and there is no one to protect the transgressor from Him.

It is for the same reason that those who take the unbelievers for friends have been warned of Allāh Himself: Such a friendship is open transgression, a transgression that damages and destroys the religion of Allāh.

The same theme has been explained in the verse: Stand fast then (in the right path) as you are commanded, as also he who has turned (to Allāh) with you, and do not transgress (O men!), surely He sees what you do. And do not incline to those who are unjust, lest the Fire touch you, and you have no guardians besides Allāh, then you shall not be helped (11:112 — 113). This verse, according to the traditions, is the one which, the Prophet said, had aged him.

However, this verse and the one under discussion, clearly show that inclination towards the unjust and the unbelievers is a transgression which throws one into the Fire where he will not find any helper; it is the chastisement given by Allāh Himself, and no one can save from it.

The sentence, ‘‘and Allāh cautions you of Himself’’, shows that the threatened punishment is a firmly-decreed affair which cannot be cancelled. What the offender has been warned of is Allāh Himself; there is nothing between Allāh and the culprit; and there is no protector from Allāh; He has threatened to punish this offender, and what He has said is surely to happen. The same thing appears from the verse 11:113 quoted above: . . . lest the Fire touch you . . . then you shall not be helped.

‘‘and to Allāh is the eventual coming’’: You cannot escape from Him; nobody can stop you from this eventual return to Allāh. As mentioned earlier, it re-emphasizes the threat.

These verses, ‘‘Let not the believers take the unbelievers for friends . . .’’, are among those which, in the form of admonition, contain a prediction of what was to happen in this ummah in the coming days; we shall explain it in detail, Allāh willing, in Chapter 5 (The Table).

QUR’ĀN: Say: ‘‘Whether you hide what is in your hearts or manifest it, Allāh knows it’’: The theme is the same as in the verse: . . . and whether you manifest what is in your souls or hide it, Allāh will call you to account for it (2:284). Nevertheless, a fine difference in style attracts our attention, The verse 2:284 talks about calling to account, and accounting is more often than not a manifest affair; therefore in this verse manifesting comes before hiding. But the verse under discussion talks about the knowledge of Allāh, and knowledge is more germane to what is hidden in the hearts; therefore this verse has reversed the order, mentioning first what is hidden in the hearts, then coming to what is manifest.

Allāh ordered His Apostle to convey this message to the offending servants; it is because He did not like to address directly those who, He knew, would surely disobey His order and would befriend the unbelievers. It shows His displeasure in the same way as the words in the preceding verse: ‘‘and whoever does this . . .’’

QUR’ĀN: and He knows whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth; and Allāh has power over all things: It has the same connotation as the verse 2:284, mentioned above.

QUR’ĀN: On the day that every soul shall find present what it has done of good and what it has done of evil: Apparently, it is a part of the message which the Prophet was to convey. ‘‘On the day’’ may refer to a deleted but understood verb, ‘‘remember’’ or ‘‘describe’’ — Remember (or Describe) the day that every soul . . . Alternatively this adverb of time may qualify the preceding verb, ‘‘Allāh knows it’’ or ‘‘He knows’’, that is, Allāh shall know on that day what is in your hearts; or He will know on that day what is in the heavens and the earth. There is no difficulty in this interpretation; it is not that He would not know these things before the Day of Judgment; what the expression means is this: We, the servants of Allāh, will manifestly see the effects of His all-encompassing knowledge on that day. According to this explanation, this verse describes the manifestation of His knowledge on that day in the same way as the following verses describe manifestation of His power on that very day: (of) the day when they shall come forth; nothing concerning them shall remain hidden to Allāh. To whom belongs the Kingdom this day? To Allāh, the Subduer (of all) (40:16); . . . there is no protector today [1] from Allāh . . . (11:43); . . . and 0 that those who are unjust could see, when they see the chastisement, that the power is wholly Allāh’s . . . (2:165); . . . and the command on that day shall be entirely Allāh’s (82:19). Obviously, to Allāh belongs all the Kingdom, power and command, always — before and after the Day of Judgment as well as on that day. But these verses especially refer to that day in this connection, because it will be on that day that we, the servants of Allāh, will clearly see His Kingdom and rule, without any doubt about His exclusive authority and power.

Likewise, if the ver, ‘‘He knows’’, is qualified by the adverb, ‘‘that day . . .’’, it would not mean that Allāh would not know the hidden secrets of His servants or their good and evil deeds before the Day of Judgment.

‘‘On the day that every soul shall find present what it has done . . .’’ The word translated here as ‘‘present’’ is muḥḍaran (مُحْضَراً) which literally means, presented, brought in. The choice of this word, rather than ḥāḍiran (حَاضِراً = present), points to the fact that the good and bad deeds are existent and safe from extinction, because only such a thing may be brought in and presented which already exists (even if out of sight); Allāh will bring the deeds in on the Day of Judgment. But who would be preserving them all these days, if not Allāh? This too shows that His power, authority and Kingdom are not confined to the Day of Judgment. He says: and your Lord is the Preserver of all things (34:21); and with Us is a writing that preserve (50:4).

‘‘Tajid’’ (تَجِدُ = shall find) is derived from al-wijdān (اَلْوِجْدَانُ = to find); its opposite is to lose. ‘‘of good’’ and ‘‘of evil’’: ‘‘of’’ describes the thing that will be presented. ‘‘good’’ and ‘‘evil’’ have been used as common noun, to show its generality — he will find there every good however trivial and every evil however insignificant. It appears from the context that the second clause, ‘‘what it has done of evil’’ is in conjunction with the preceding one, ‘‘what it has done of good’’.

It is one of those verses which prove embodiment of deeds, as we have described in detail in a previous volume.

QUR’ĀN: (it) shall wish that between it and that (evil) there were a long duration of time: The subject of this sentence is a deleted pronoun referring to the soul. ‘‘Law’’ (لَوْ = if) is a conjunctive, as a rule introducing hypothetical conditional clauses; ‘‘law’’ followed by ‘‘anna’’ (لَوْ اَنَّ = if) introduces nominal clauses; this combination has frequently been used in the Qur’ān; therefore, no attention should be paid to the claim of a writer that this combination was not correct.

‘‘al-Amad’’ (اَلْاَمَدُ) denotes distance of time. ar-Rāghibr has said in his Mufradātu ’l-Qur’ān: al-Amad and al-abad (اَلْاَبَدُ) have nearly the same meaning; but al-abad denotes the eternal duration, without an end; that is why it is never restricted by a limit, it cannot be said, to this or that al-abad. On the other hand, al-amad generally signifies a limited duration but with unknown limit; sometimes the limit is specified, for example, amada kadhā (اَمَدَ كَذَا = such and such period), as they say this or that time. The difference between al-amad (span of time) and az-zamān (اَلزَّمَانُ = time) is that al-amad looks at the terminus of time while az-zamān looks at the whole period from beginning to end. That is why some have said that al-amad and al-madd (اَلْمَدي = space of time, distance) are nearly similar in meaning.''

The wish of the evil-doer, that there should be between him and his deed a long duration of time, shows that the presence of that evil would cause him sorrow; it follows that the presence of good deed would make the good-doer happy.

He will only wish for a long duration of time between himself and his deed, and not for its complete disappearance. Why? He will see how Allāh has preserved it from the day it was done to the Day of Judgment; he will realize that it was of no avail to wish that a thing under such Divine protection should disappear; therefore, he will only wish for the next ''best'' thing: Would that it had not appeared at the most awkward time, in that most difficult situation. He will wish the same for the evil companion: And whoever turns himself away from the remembrance of the Beneficent God, We appoint for him a Satan, so he becomes his associate . . . Until when he comes to Us, he says: ''O would that between me and thee there were the distance of the East and the West'', so evil is the associate! (43:36 — 38).

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh cautions you of Himself; and Allāh is Compassionate to the servants: The repeated warning emphasizes the threat beyond any doubt. Also, it may be that this warning refers to the punishment of the Day of Judgment (as that is the subject of this verse), while the first warning related to the result of that offence in this life or in both lives.

''and Allāh is Compassionate to the servants'': It reminds the servants of their relation to Allāh — they are His servants and slaves, and He is their Compassionate Master. Nevertheless, this clause makes the preceding threat doubly emphatic. Such expressions are used for warning someone in the severest term. The import of such clause will be like this: Do not do such a thing, because I have firmly decided not to forgive such offence; I warn you before hand because I have compassion for you.

The meaning then will be as follows: Allāh is Compassionate to the servants; that is why He has warned them before hand not to go near this evil; because if they did so, they would have to undergo the punishment; and they would find no intercessor or protector to intercede on their behalf or to save them.

QUR'ĀN: Say: ''If you love Allāh, then follow me, Allāh will love you'': When writing about the verse 2:165 (. . . and those who believe are stronger in love of Allāh . . .), we had explained the meaning of love, and said that in reality it relates to Allāh, and after that it may relate to others.

No doubt, Allāh in His Book invites His servants to believe in Him, to worship Him with sincere devotion, and to steer clear of polytheism. He says: Now, surely, sincere religion is for Allāh (alone) (39:3); And they were not enjoined anything except that they should worship Allāh, being sincere to Him in religion . . . (97:5); Therefore call upon Allāh, being sincere to Him in religion, though averse be the unbelievers (40:14). This theme is found in many other verses.

Sincerity in religion can truly be achieved only when man's heart is not attached to anything other than Allāh — be it another deity or some desired object; be it a worldly ambition or even some other worldly goal like entering the garden or protection from the Fire. When the heart cuts all links with such things and attaches itself exclusively to Allāh, then the man attains the sincerity of religion, and the love of Allāh.

Love is the only link that connects a lover to his beloved; it attracts and pulls the lover to the beloved. The lover wants to make up through the beloved the defects and imperfections that he finds in his own life. The biggest news for him is that his beloved requites his love. At this stage, both love each other; both become lovers, both become beloved.

Man loves food, and gets it to make up the deficiency which shows itself in hunger; he loves the opposite sex, to satisfy a biological need; he loves his friend for genial companionship. A servant loves his master for his kind patronage. Look at the instances of love, read the stories of well-known lovers — you will find everywhere the truth of what we have mentioned.

When a sincere servant loves Allāh, his only ambition is to attract the love of Allāh to himself; would that Allāh should love him as he loves Allāh; would that Allāh should become his, as he has become of Allāh. This is the reality of Allāh's love.

Love, as mentioned above, is a link that joins one thing to the other. But Allāh does not count every love as true love. True love demands that the lover — in this case, the believer — should love all that is related to Allāh; he should devoutly accept all that comes from Him. On Allāh depends everything in its existence and in all its affairs; everything seeks a medium to Him; and every big and small thing ultimately returns to Him. In this background, true love of Allāh, sincerity in that love, can be achieved only through believing in the religion of monotheism, that it, Islam, and surely the religion with Allāh is Islam. It is the religion which His representatives brought and which His apostles and prophets taught. It is especially true about the religion brought by Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.); it teaches a sublime devotion, an unsurpassed sincerity; it is the natural religion which contains the last law, brought by a Law-giver with whom the chain of the prophets came to its end. All these facts may easily be inferred from the Qur'ān, if one ponders on it.

The Prophet introduced his path as the path of monotheism, the path of sincerity; as he was ordered by Allāh to say: Say: ''This is my way: I invite (you) to Allāh; with clear sight (are) I and he who follows me; and glory be to Allāh; and I am not of the polytheists'' (12:108). Accordingly, his way was to invite people to Allāh, with clear sight, with sincerity, without ascribing any partner to Allāh. His way was the way of invitation to Allāh and of sincerity about Allāh. Anyone who wants to follow him, should proceed on the same highway.

Then Allāh said that the way of invitation and sincerity can be found only in the sharī'ah brought by Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.): Then We have made you follow a sharī'ah in the affair, therefore follow it . . . (45:18); also He said that it means total submission to Him: But if they dispute with you, say: ''I have submitted myself (entirely) to Allāh and (so has) everyone who follows me''. . . (3:20); then He attributed this way to Himself and declared that it was His straight path: And (know) that this is My path, the straight one, therefore follow it (6:153). If we read all these verses together, it will be clear that Islam (i.e., the sharī'ah brought by the Prophet, containing fundamental beliefs, moral teachings, practical laws, and having his own sacred life as its model) is the path of sincerity, that is based on love. It is the religion of sincerity, the religion of love.

The above discourse makes clear the meaning of the verse under discussion: ''Say: 'If you love Allāh, then follow me, Allāh will love you' ''. It gives the following import — and Allāh knows better: If you want to be sincere to Allāh in your servitude, truly basing it on His love, then follow this sharī'ah; it is based on love, and is the embodiment of sincerity and submission; it is the straight path of Allāh, whoever proceeds on it is sure to reach nearer to Allāh. If you follow me in this path, then Allāh will love you; reaching this stage you will get what you want. Your love will be requited.

This is the general import of the verse if looked in isolation. But the context gives it some particular implications too. It comes soon after the verses forbidding the believers to befriend the unbelievers. Friendship is love between the friends. Therefore, the verse exhorsts the believers to follow the Prophet if they are sincere in the claim that they love Allāh and belong to His party. Love of Allāh cannot be reconciled with following the unbelievers in their vain desires and unhealthy views; remember that friendship certainly makes a friend follow the other friend in thoughts and deeds. One who loves Allāh should not run after the worldly trinkets found with the unbelievers, and should not set his eyes on their worldly honour and wealth. If you love Allāh you should follow His Prophet in his religion, as He declares: Then We have made you follow a sharī'ah in the affair, therefore follow it, and do not follow the low desires of those who do not know. Surely they shall not avail you in the least against Allāh; and surely the unjust are friends of each other, and Allāh is the guardian of those who guard (against evil) (45:18 — 19). It should be noted how smoothly the verse goes from the theme of following to that of friendship, showing that both are, in fact, one and the same.

In short, anyone claiming to love Allāh, to belong to Allāh, must follow the Prophet, in order that it may take him to the stage where Allāh requites his love and loves him.

The verse mentions only love of Allāh, and not His guardianship because guardianship is founded on love. Also, it mentions only Allāh's love, because the love of the Prophet and the believers is in reality a part of Allāh's love; it has no independent existence.

QUR'ĀN: and forgive you your sins; and Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful: Allāh's mercy is all-encompassing; His grace is without limit, and His munificence without restriction; it is not confined to any individual or group. The river of His mercy is flowing; everybody is free to take from it as much as he can. Whatever restriction there is, it is not in the river, it is in the receptacle one brings with him. The servants' ability, or disability, imposes its own limitations; Allāh has not put any limit to His mercy: and the bounty of your. Lord is not confined (17:20).

Sin is the impediment, holding one back from reaching nearer to Allāh, from partaking of the bounties resulting from it, like the paradise etc. If the rust of sin is removed from a man's heart, the door of Divine bliss will automatically open for him, and he will join the chosen people in the abode of Divine honour and eternal happiness. That is why Allāh added forgiveness of sins to the good news of His love. As described earlier; love attracts the lover to the beloved. When the servant loves Allāh, it moves him to come nearer with sincere monotheism and unalloyed devotion and worship. When Allāh loves a servant, He comes nearer to him and removes the curtains which hide the sublime reality. As mentioned above, there is no curtain except sin, and removing it means forgiving the sins. Once that hindrance is removed, there is no obstacle in the way; and Divine munificence will take over from there; and he can partake of the ever-lasting honour and never ending bounties as much as he likes.

To understand this reality even more clearly, ponder on the verse, Nay! rather, what they used to do has become like rust upon their hearts. Nay! most surely they shall on that day be debarred from their Lord (83:14 — 15), in conjunction with the verse, ‘‘Allāh will love you and forgive you your sins’’.

QUR’ĀN: Say: ‘‘Obey Allāh and the Apostle’’: The preceding verse invited the servants to ‘‘follow’’ the Apostle. To follow means to process behind in someone’s track. The believer follows the Apostle in the way taken by the Apostle. The way the Apostle has taken is the straight path which belongs to Allāh. It is the sharī‘ah ordained for the Apostle and conveyed through him to the mankind; and the servants are to obey the Apostle and adhere to his sharī‘ah. That is why the order to follow the Apostle was changed to his obedience. The Apostle’s path of sincerity is the sum total of his sharī‘ah — his orders and prohibitions, his mission and his guidance. When one follows the Apostle in his tracks, He in fact obeys Allāh and the Apostle in the sharī‘ah. Allāh’s name has been added with the Apostle’s, to show that the obedience of Allāh is one and the same with the obedience of the Apostle. The Apostle’s name was necessary to mention with that of Allāh because the talk is about following his tracks.

Someone has written that the sentence means: Obey Allāh in His Book and obey the Apostle in his sunnah. But what we have written above clearly shows the unsoundness of this explanation. It is obvious that the words, ‘‘Obey Allāh and the Apostle’’, have been revealed as explanation of the preceding words, ‘‘If you love Allāh, then follow me . . .’’ Further, this verse shows that the obedience of Allāh and obedience of the Apostle are one; that is why the word ‘‘obey’’, has not been repeated. Had there been two different things to be followed (the Book, for Allāh; the sunnah for the Apostle), it would have been appropriate to say, ‘Obey Allāh and obey the Apostle’, as has been said in another verse: O you who believe! Obey Allāh and obey the Apostle and the masters of the affair from among you . . . (4:59). Anyhow, the verse has the same general and particular aspects as the previous one.

QUR’ĀN: but if they turn back, then surely Allāh does not love the unbelievers: The ending clause shows that those who disregard this order are unbelievers; the same is the import of other verses obliging the believers not to take the unbelievers as friends.

This clause too shows this verse to be an explanation of the previous one. That verse described that Allāh loves those believers who accept and obey the order to follow the Apostle. This one says that Allāh does not love those ‘‘unbelievers’’ who neglect this order to obey the Apostle.

These verses make the following things clear:

First: Taqiyyah is allowed in certain circumstances.

Second: The punishment for befriending the unbelievers will not be waived; the sin of disobeying this order will not be forgiven; it is a firmly decreed order.

Third: The Divinely ordained sharī‘ah exemplifies the sincerity towards Allāh; and that sincerity exemplifies the love of Allāh. In other words, if we analyse the religion — the sum total of Divine knowledge and faith, the ethical teachings and practical laws, with all their details — it will resolve into sincerity (a sincere servant of Allāh believes that his person, his character and his actions, all belong to Allāh); and on further analysis this sincerity resolves into the love of Allāh.

If we reverse the process and start from the other end, then the love of Allāh constitutes the main ingredient of the sincerity, and the sincerity leads to the sharī‘ah.

Looking from another angle, religion resolves into submission, and submission into monotheism.

Fourth: It is disbelief to take the unbelievers for friends. It is a disbelief related to the branches of religion, not to its roots. Other examples are the disbelief of the one who does not pay zakāt, and of the one who does not pray.

It may possibly be explained in another way. The one who befriends an unbeliever, has himself been called unbeliever, because that is the ultimate destination where such a friendship leads to. We have described this theme earlier, and shall further explain it in Chapter 5 (The Table).

TRADITIONS,

It is written in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr, about the words of Allāh: Let not the believers take the unbelievers for friends . . .: ‘‘Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Hātim have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘al-Ḥajjāj ibn ‘Amr was an ally of Ka‘b ibn al-Ashraf and Ibn Abi ’1-Ḥaqīq and Qays ibn Zayd; and they were secretly meeting with some Helpers with a view to seduce them from their religion. (Seeing this) Rifā‘ah ibn al-Mundhir, ‘Abdullāh ibn Jubayr and Sa‘d ibn Khuthaymah told those Helpers to keep away from those Jews and to be wary of their secret talks, ‘‘lest they lead you away from your religion’’. But they refused (to listen). Then Allāh revealed: Let not the believers take the unbelievers for friends . . . and Allāh has power over all thing’ ’’.

The author says: Apparently this tradition has applied the verse to that story. Otherwise, the Qur’ān uses the word ‘‘unbelievers’’, for a wider circle than the People of the Book. If any verse were revealed about that story, it would have been the one forbidding friendship with the Jews and the Christians, not these verses.

The tafsīr, aṣ-Ṣāfī quotes under the words: except (when) you guard yourselves against (them) . . ., from al-Iḥtijāj, that the Commander of the faithful (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a tradition: ‘‘and He ordered you to practise taqiyyah in your religion; because Allāh says: Be careful, and be careful again, not to expose yourself to perdition, and not to neglect taqiyyah which I have ordered you (to practise); otherwise, you will cause shedding of your blood and the blood of your brethren (as well); will expose your bounties as well as theirs to ruin; and will cause their humiliation at the hands of the enemies of the religion of Allāh, while Allāh has ordered you to exalt them.’’

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘The Apostle of Allāh used to say: ‘He has no religion who does not have taqiyyah;’ then he used to say: ‘Allāh says: except (when) you guard yourselves against them for fear from them.’’ (al-‘Ayyāshī)

al-Bāqir(a.s.) said: ‘‘taqiyyah is (allowed) in every matter about which a man falls in predicament; and Allāh has made it lawful to him.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The author says: There are very many traditions from the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.) — probably reaching the limit of mutawātir — containing the permission of taqiyyah; and you have already seen how the Qur'ānic verses incontestably prove it.

Sa'īd ibn Yāsar said: ''Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) told me: 'Is religion anything other than love? Verily Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, says: Say: ''If you love Allāh, then follow me, Allāh will love you.'' ' '' (Ma'āni 'l-akhbār)

The author says: This tradition has been narrated in al-Kāfī from al-Bāqir (a.s.); also al-Qummī and al-'Ayyāshī have narrated it in their tafsīrs from the same Imām through al-Hadhdhā'; again al-'Ayyāshī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr from the same Imām through Burayd and from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) through Rib'ī.

These traditions support our explanation given in the Commentary.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''He who disobeyes Allāh, does not love Him.'' Then he quoted (the following poem):

You disobey Allāh and (at the same time) you manifest His love;
By my life! this is a strange behaviour.
If your love were true, you would have obeyed Him; Verily, the lover obeys his beloved. (Ma'āni 'l-akhbār)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a tradition: ''And whoever likes to know that Allāh loves him, his action should be in obedience to Allāh and he should follow us. Has he not heard the talk of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, with His Prophet: Say 'If you love Allāh, then follow me, Allāh will love you and forgive you your sins . . . '''(al-Kāfī)

The author says: We shall explain how the Imāms' obedience is one and the same with the obedience of the Prophet when writing about the verse: O you who believe! obey Allāh and obey the Apostle and the masters of the affairs from among you . . . (4:59)

'Abd ibn Ḥamīd has narrated from al-Ḥasan that he said: ''The Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Whoever feels an aversion to my sunnah, he is not from me.' Then he recited this verse: Say: 'If you love Allāh, then follow me, Allāh will love you . . . ' '' (ad-Durru 'l- manthūr)

It has been narrated by Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Abū Na‘īm (in his Ḥilyatu ’l-awliyā’) and al-Hākim, from ‘Ā’ishah that she said: ‘‘The Apostle of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Polytheism is more undetectable than the crawling of an ant on a (smooth) rock in a dark night; and its least (grade) is that one should love something because of (its) injustice and should hate something because of (its) justice; and what is religion except loving and hating in the cause of Allāh? Allāh has said: Say: ‘‘If you love Allāh, then follow me, Allāh will love you . . . ’’ ’ ’’ (ibid.)

Aḥmad, Abū Dāwūd, at-Tirmidhī, Ibn Mājah, Ibn Ḥabbān and al-Ḥākim have narrated through Abū Rāfi‘ from the Prophet that he said: ‘‘I should not find one of you, reclining on his couch, saying — when there comes to him one of my commands, in which I have ordered or prohibited something — ‘We do not understand (it); we shall follow (only) what we find in the Book of Allāh.’ ’’ (ibid.)

COMMENTARY

Now begins the story of ‘Īsā, son of Maryam, with all the related topics, sifting the truth from the falsehoods that cover his life and personality; the chapter further offers clear arguments against the People of the Book. The two verses serve as the joining link between the coming discourse about ‘Īsā (a.s.) and the preceding verses regarding the People of the Book.

QUR’ĀN: Surely Allāh chose Adam and Nūḥ . . .: It was explained under the verse 2:130 (and most certainly We chose him in this world) that ‘‘al-iṣṭifā’ ’’ (اَلِاصْطِفَآءُ) means to take the choicest part of a thing; to purify a thing from all impurities. It may be translated, for all practical purposes, as selection or choosing. Comparing it with various stages of ‘‘al-wilāyah’’ (اَلْوِلَايَةُ = friendship of Allāh), we find that it fits perfectly the stage of ‘‘Islam’’, that is, total surrender of the servant to the will of his Lord, being truly happy with what the Lord decrees for him.

But that ‘‘selection’’ is not what this verse implies. It does not say, Allāh chose them from among the worlds. It says, He chose them ‘‘above all the worlds’’. ‘‘From among the worlds’’ would have implied that only they were the Muslims; that the total surrender to the will of Allāh was exclusively reserved for them. Obviously, such a connotation would be wrong. The clause used in the verse, ‘‘above all the worlds’’, has given a new connotation to the selection, and shows that they were chosen and given excellence and precedence over other people in some things exclusively given to them. To appreciate the difference between the two selections, look at the verse 3:42 which says: And when the angels said: ‘‘O Maryam! surely Allāh has chosen you and purified you and chosen you above the women of the worlds’’, Clearly the first choosing is related to her own virtues without looking at anyone else, and the second implies a sense of comparison, exalting her over all other women.

First of the chosen ones was Adam (a.s.). He was the first human vicegerent of Allāh appointed for this earth, as Allāh says: And when your Lord said to the angels, ‘‘Verily I am going to make in the earth a vicegerent’’ . . . (2:30); was the first to open the door of repentance and Divine forgiveness, as Allāh says: Then his Lord chose him, so He turned to him (i.e., with forgiveness) and guided him (20:122); and was the first of those for whom Allāh ordained the religion, as He says: So if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, he shall not go astray nor be unhappy (20:123). These virtues exclusively belong to him, and enough are they for one’s excellence!

Then the verse mentions Nūḥ (a.s.). He was the first of the five ulu ’l-‘azm apostles who were given a Divine Book and a new sharī‘ah, as we explained under the verse: Mankind was but one people, so Allāh sent the prophets . . . (2:213). Also, he was the second father of the human race; and Allāh sent peace on him in the worlds, saying: And We made his offspring the survivors. And We perpetuated to him (praise) among the later generations. Peace be on Nuh in all the worlds (37:77 — 79).

Then Allāh mentions the descendants of Ibrāhīm and thedescendants of ‘Imrān among the chosen ones. ‘‘al-Āl’’ (اٰلٌ) of a man is someone closely related to him. ar-Rāghib says in his Mufradātu ’l-Qur’ān: ‘‘al-Āl: It is said that it is an altered form of al-ahl; yet its diminutive, al-uhayl (اُلَيْهٌ) has got the ‘‘h’’ (ہ) restored; but it has the peculiarity that, unlike al-ahl, it is always annexed (in genitive construction) to the proper names of rational beings, and not to common nouns, places or eras. It is said: Āl of Zayd; but not āl of man, nor āl of this place or that period. Also they do not, for example, say, āl of the tailor; rather it is always annexed to a great and noble personality, for example, āl of the Sultan, āl of Allāh. As for al-ahl, it is annexed to all types of words; for example, they say, ahl of Allāh, ahl of the tailor; likewise they say, ahl of this era, ahl of that town etc. (On the other hand) some people say that al-āl actually means the name of a person; and that its diminutive is uwayl (اُوَيْلٌ); and it is used for someone who is very closely and personally related to a person, either by close kinship or by love and attachment.’’

Accordingly, āl of Ibrāhīm and āl of ‘Imrān mean their closely related family members and those who were exclusively attached to them. (That is why we have translated the word as ‘descendants’.)

Obviously, āl of Ibrāhīm should refer to all the purified ones among his descendants, for example, Isḥāq, Israel and other prophets from the house of Israel as well as Ismā‘īl and his purified descendants, chief of whom was Muḥammad (may Allāh bless him and his progeny); and those who followed them to various stages of the friendship of Allāh. But the verse then mentions āl of ‘Imrān, and it shows that āl of Ibrahim does not have such a wide connotation. The said ‘Imrān is either the father of Maryam or the father of Mūsā (a.s.), and in any case he was himself a descendant of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) and so were his descendants; by mentioning them separately, it has been made clear that the phrase āl Ibrāhīm (اٰلُ اِبْراهِيْمُ = the descendants of Ibrāhīm) refers to some, and not all, of his purified descendants.

Allāh has said in another place in the Qur’ān: Or do they envy the people for what Allāh has given them of His grace? So indeed We have given to Ibrāhīm’s children (descendants) the Book and the wisdom, and We have given them a grand kingdom (4:54). The context shows that this verse describes and condemns the envy of the Israelites which they felt against Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). Other verses too support this interpretation. And it makes it clear that the phrase, ‘‘descendants of Ibrāhīm’’, does not include here the Israelites; in other words it has been used for Ibrāhīm’s descendants other than Isḥāq, Ya‘qūb and the progeny of Ya‘qūb (who are generally called the Israelites). After excluding that branch, the only descendants to whom this phrase is applicable are Ismā‘īl and his purified descendants, including the Prophet and his progeny. (Allāh willing, we shall later prove that the word, ‘‘the people’’, used in the verse 4:54, refers to the Prophet, and that undoubtedly he is one of the ‘‘descendants of Ibrāhīm’’ mentioned therein.)

Some other verses also support this connotation. For example: Most surely the nearest of people to Ibrāhīm are those who followed him and this Prophet and those who believe; and Allāh is the guardian of the believers (3:68). And when Ibrāhīm and Ismā‘īl were raising the foundations of the House: Our Lord! accept from us; surely Thou art the Hearing, the Knowing; Our Lord! and make us both submissive to Thee and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting to Thee, and show us our ways of devotion and turn to us (mercifully), surely Thou art the Oftreturning (with mercy), the Merciful. Our Lord! and raise up in them an Apostle from among themselves who shall recite to them Thy communications and teach them the Book and the wisdom, and purify them; surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise (2:127 — 129).

The phrase, the descendants of Ibrāhīm, therefore, refers to his offspring from the branch of Ismā‘īl.

It should be pointed out here that the verse in no way implies any exclusiveness; it simply says that certain named prophets and families were chosen and given excellence over the nations; it does not say that others were not chosen or exalted. It follows that:—

1. There is no discrepancy between this verse (which is silent about the excellence of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) himself, and of Mūsā (a.s.) and other Israelite prophets) and numerous other verses which eulogize their virtues and excellence. (The Qur’ān, contains very many such verses and there is no need to quote them here.) However, as we said, to affirm one thing does not mean to negate or reject the others.

2. Likewise, there is no conflict between this verse and those which bestow similar excellence to the Children of Israel; for example: And certainly We gave the Book and the wisdom and the prophecy to the Children of Israel, and We gave them of the goodly things, and We made them excel the nations (45:16).

3. The fact that two prophets and two families were exalted and given excellence over the nations, does not mean that others could not similarly be given excellence over the nations; nor that some others could not be exalted and given excellence over those already exalted. Giving excellence to one or various groups and nations only implies that they were given precedence, in some worldly or other worldly virtue, over those below them. It does not say anything on whether some others could be given excellence over them or whether some others too could be exalted over the worlds.

4. They were chosen over all the worlds. This is not in conflict with the concept that some among them were made to excel the others. We know that Allāh chose the prophets over all other people, but at the same time He gave some of them more prestige than the others. He says: and every one (i.e., of the prophets) We made to excel the world (6:87). And again He says: and certainly We have made some of the prophets to excel others . . . (17:55).

Now we come to the ‘‘descendants of ‘Imrān’’: Apparently the name, ‘Imrān, refers to the father of Maryam. These two verses are immediately followed by the stories of the wife of ‘Imrān and their daughter, Maryam; moreover, ‘Imrān, father of Maryam, has been repeatedly mentioned by his name in the Qur’ān, while ‘Imrān, father of Mūsā, has not been mentioned even once in a way as to make it clear that it was he who was intended. All this supports the view that here too ‘Imrān refers to the father of Maryam; and ‘‘āl ‘Imrān’’ (اٰلُ عِمْرَانُ = translated here as descendants of ‘Imrān) refers to Maryam and ‘Īsā (peace be on both of them), alone or together with the wife of ‘Imrān.

Reportedly the Christians do not agree that Maryam’s father was called ‘Imrān: but the Qur’ān is not bound to cater to their views.

QUR’ĀN: Offspring, one from the other: It is said that ‘‘adhdhurriyyah’’ (اَلذُّرِّيَّةُ) originally meant small children: later the meaning was extended to cover all the offspring. It is the latter meaning that is implied in this verse. The word is in the accusative because it has the force of an explanatory conjunction.

The clause, ‘‘one from the other’’, shows that if you look at any one of the group, it begins from, and returns to, the others. In other words, the whole is made of similar parts, one part does not differ from the other in its attributes and qualifications. The clause, in the framework of its theme and context, implies that these descendants do not differ from one another in the attributes of excellence, and that it is for this reason that Allāh made them to excel over the worlds; actions of Allāh are not done haphazardly or at random — surely such a selection cannot be done recklessly, because it is the spring-head of such good thing in this world.

QUR’ĀN: And Allāh is Hearing, Knowing: Allāh hears their speech which shows their inner thoughts; He knows what is in their minds and hearts. This concluding sentence gives the reason why they were chosen. And the preceding clause, ‘‘Offspring, one from the other’’, explains why the whole group was considered worthy of this Divine selection. The verse implies the following connotation: Allāh made them to excel the worlds; that excellence and selection covered them all, because they were a group, each of them being similar to the others, in their spiritual sublimity, surrender of hearts and established truth of the words; Allāh, bestowed this excellence on them because He is the Hearing and Knowing, He hears what they say, and knows what is in their minds.

TRADITIONS

ar-Riḍā (a.s.) had a talk with al-Ma’mūn; during which al-Ma’mūn said: ‘‘Has Allāh given the offspring (of the Prophet — s.a.w.a.) excellence over all other people?’’ Abu ’l-Ḥasan (ar-Riḍā — a.s.) said: ‘‘Indeed Allāh has clearly described, in His decisive Book, the excellence of the (said) offspring over all the people.’’ al-Ma’mūn asked: ‘‘Where is it in the Book of Allāh?’’ ar-Riḍā (a.s.) said: ‘‘In His words: Surely Allāh chose Adam and Nūh the descendants of Ibrāhīm and the descendants of 'Imrān above all the worlds; offspring, one from the other . . .'' ('Uyūnu 'l-akhbār)

Aḥmad ibn Muḥammad narrates from ar-Riḍā (a.s.) (who narrates) from Abū Ja'far (a.s.) that he said: ''Liar is he who thinks that He (Allāh) is finished with the (management of the) affairs, because the pleasure is of Allāh regarding His creation; He wills what He pleases and does what He pleases. Allāh has said: offspring, one from the other, and Allāh is the Hearing, the Knowing. Its (i.e., the offspring's) last is from its first, and its first is from its last. Therefore, if you were told that a certain thing would happen in respect of a particular offspring, and it happened about another (person) from the same (offspring), then the thing happened exactly as you were told.'' (al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: This tradition proves the explanation written earlier, of the verse, ''offspring, one from the other''.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) recited this verse and said: ''We are from them, and we are the remnant of that al-'itrah (اَلعِتْرَةُ = family).'' (ibid.)

The author says: al-'itrah actually means the foundation, the root, the basis which a thing relies upon. That is why it is used for the children and near relatives of preceding generations. In other words, it refers to the vertical geneology of a person.

It is because of this semantic value of the word that the Imām has taken the clause (offspring, one from the other) to refer to a vertical geneological line beginning with Adam, and passing through Nūḥ to the āl of Ibrāhīm and āl of 'Imrān.

It also explains why Allāh has mentioned Adam (a.s.) and Nūḥ (a.s.) with the two families; it was done to establish an unbroken chain of selection right from the beginning of the human race to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and his purified and sinless progeny.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: When the woman of 'Imrān said: ''My Lord! surely I vow to Thee what is in my womb, to be devoted (to Thy service): accept therefore from me; surely Thou art the Hearing, the Knowing'':

When a man makes a ''an-nadhr'' (اَلنَّذْرُ = vow), he in effect binds himself to do something which hitherto was not compulsory for him. ''at-Taḥrīr'' (اَلتَّحْرِيْرُ) is to release from a bond; that is why emancipation of slave is called ''at-taḥrīr''; the same word is used for writing, probably because writing releases the ideas from the repository of mind and memory. ''at-Taqabbul'' (اَلتَّقَبُّلُ) is to accept willingly and gladly, for example, accepting a gift, accepting a prayer and so on.

The words, ''When the woman of 'Imrān said: 'My Lord ! surely I vow to Thee what is in my womb, to be devoted (to Thy service)' '', clearly show that she made this vow during her pregnancy, and that she was pregnant from 'Imrān. It also implies that 'Imrān was not alive at that time; otherwise, she could not make the vow so independently to release her child for Divine worship. The same idea is implied in the verse: . . . and you were not with them when they cast their pens (to decide) which of them should have Maryam in his charge . . . (3:44).

Obviously, when the parents release the child, it does not mean that they emancipate it from any slavery. What the said release amounts to is that the child is freed from the bonds of parental guardianship; the parents undertake not to train or use the child for their own benefit, nor to demand from it their various rights like obedience etc. Such a release liberates the child from the authority of the parents. If the child has been released for the service of Allāh, it is taken under Divine protection and guardianship, and devotes its time to the service of Allāh, that is, serving in synagogues, churches and other places reserved for Divine worship. This would continue upto the period the child would otherwise have remained under parental guardianship. Reportedly they used to release the child for the service of Allāh; the parents did not use the child in their work, or for their benefit. He was put in the synagogue, to clean it and serve in it. This continued till he reached the age of puberty; then he was free to remain therein or to go away; if he decided to continue, he stayed therein; and if he liked to go away, he did so.

The verse shows that she firmly believed the child in her womb to be a male, not a female. It is remarkable how confidently she made the vow with her Lord, in full certainty, without attaching any proviso; she said: ‘‘My Lord! surely I vow to Thee what is in my womb, to be devoted (to Thy service)’’, without saying, for example, ‘if he is a male child’. And she used the masculine form ‘‘muḥarraran’’ (مُحَرَّراً = released; translated here as, devoted) referring to what was in her womb. Of course, according to its syntactical position it may be construed as showing the state of the relative pronoun ‘‘mā’’ (مَا = what [is in my womb]), which may be used for either gender. But undoubtedly her choice of word was based on her belief that she carried a male child in her womb. Otherwise, if she had taken a vow to release whatever. was in her womb, be it a boy or a girl, she would not have shown such a dissappointment when she delivered a girl: ‘‘My Lord! surely I have brought it forth a female;’’ nor was there any reason for the Divine comment, ‘‘and the male is not like the female’’.

One thing more. Allāh quotes (without any adverse comment) her words showing her firm belief. It implies that her conviction was not without a reason; nor was it based on her keen observations which give some such indications to experienced women. After all, such things are mere conjectures; and surely conjecture does not avail against the truth at all. And it is a habit of the Qur’ān that whenever it quotes a false idea, it invariably always points to its falsehood. Allāh says: Allāh knows what every female bears, and that of which the wombs fall short of completion and that in which they increase (13:8); Surely Allāh is He with Whom is the knowledge of the hour, and He sends down the rain and He knows what is in the wombs (31:34). The verses clearly say that the knowledge of ‘‘what is in the wombs’’ is one of the unseen, exclusively reserved for Allāh. And Allāh says: The Knower of the unseen! so He does not reveal His secrets to any, except to him whom He chooses of an apostle (72:26 — 27). It means that others may know the unseen only through Divine revelation. In this background, when Allāh quotes her as saying something confidently about a subject exclusively reserved for Allāh, it means that her belief, (that she was pregnant with a male child) was somehow based on a Divine revelation. That is why she did not lose hope of a male child even when she found her own child a female; instead, she again said with full conviction and certainty: ‘‘and I commend her and her offspring into Thy protection from the accursed Satan''. Look at her belief that Maryam would have an offspring — obviously such a commendation was beyqnd her knowledge, if not based on revelation. ''accept therefore from me'': She did not mention object of the verb ''accept''. Possibly it could be the afore-mentioned vow, as it was a good deed; but more probably, she was beseeching Allāh to accept her released child. The wording of the next verse, ''So her Lord accepted her with a good acceptance'', clearly supports the latter meaning.

QUR'ĀN: So when she brought her forth, she said: ''My Lord! surely I have brought it forth a female'': By putting a feminine pronoun in ''brought her forth'', the Qur'ān did away with the necessity of a longer description. What this concise sentence actually stands for is this: When she brought forth that which was in her womb and came to know that it was a female, she said: ''My Lord! I have brought it a female.'' This last sentence, although an informative, was in fact an exclamation to show her disappointment.

QUR'ĀN: and Allāh knew best what she brought forth, and the male is not like the female: These are parenthetic sentences, and the speaker of both is Allāh, not the woman of 'Imrān; even the second sentence is not spoken by her.

There is no doubt that the first sentence is a saying of Allāh, commenting on her sorrowful cry. The words, ''and Allāh knew best what she brought forth'', in effect convey the following idea: Allāh knew that she had delivered a female child; but He intended to fulfil through this daughter of hers all her hopes and expectations, in a far better way. Had the wife of 'Imrān know what Allāh's plans were in making her child a female, she would not have shown any sorrow and disappointment. As the later events showed, the male child she hoped for could not accomplish what Allāh intended this female child to achieve. Suppose, she were given a son, instead of the daughter she got; what could that son achieve? He, like 'Īsā, could be made a prophet; he could give eyes to the blind and heal the lepers; he could raise a few men from the dead. And this was the utmost he could do. But this female child, which Allāh has given to the wife of 'Imrān, will be a means to complete the word of Allāh; she will bring forth a son without a father; Allāh will make her and her son together a sign for the people; that son will talk with people in his cradle; he will be a spirit and a word of Allāh; his likeness before Allāh will be like Adam; and there will be many manifest signs in giving this daughter, Maryam, to the wife of ‘Imrān and giving to Maryam a son, ‘Īsā, rather than giving a son directly to Imrān’s wife.

Now it should be clear that the words, ‘‘and the male is not like the female’’, are spoken by Allāh. Had they been uttered by the wife of ‘Imrān, she would have said, ‘and the female is not like the male’; she would not have reversed the syntactic arrangement as the Qur’ānic sentence has done. If a man hopes to get a very good thing or to be awarded a very high status, and then he gets an inferior thing or a lower rank, he regretfully says; The thing I got is not what I expected and hoped for. He would never say: The thing I hoped for is not like that which I got.

In view of the above explanation, the definite articles in ‘‘the male’’ and ‘‘the female’’, (or at least in ‘‘the female’’) refer to the particular son and daughter spoken about; and the meaning would be as follows: The male she hoped for is not like the female she was given.

Many exegetes have taken the sentence, ‘‘and the male is not like the female’’, to be a part of the speech of the woman of ‘Imrān. Then they were faced with the difficulty of explaining its apparently reversed syntactic arrangement. They have tried without success to bring about some worthwhile explanation. Any interested reader should consult their books.

QUR’ĀN: and I have named her Maryam, and I commend her and her offspring into Thy protection from the accursed Satan: It is said that Maryam in their language means the worshipper and the servant.[1] In that case, it is easy to see why she hastened to name the child soon after delivery and mentioned the name to Allāh.

[1] Arabic Maryam is Miryām in Hebrew. According to the Westminster Dictionary of the Bible (by John D. Davis, revised and rewritten by Henry Snyder Gehman; ed. 1944) the root-word of Miryām signifies ‘‘obstinacy, rebellion’’, that is, opposite of the ‘‘reported meaning’’ of worship and service. (tr.)

Apparently, when she found out that the child was not a male (who could easily be released for worship of Allāh and service of the synagogue), she hastened to give the child the name, Maryam — thus dedicating her for the said worship and service. The words, ‘‘and I have named her Maryam’’, implied that she had dedicated that female child to the worship of Allāh and released her for the synagogue’s service. The words were in effect a sort of renewed vow, and that is why Allāh accepted her offering in these words: ‘‘So her Lord accepted her with a good acceptance and made her grow up a good growing’’.

Thereafter, she commended Maryam and her offspring to the protection of Allāh from the accursed Satan, in order that she might dedicate herself for Divine worship and remain devoted to the service of the synagogue, in a way that the name might truly represent the named.

She confidently talks with Allāh about the offspring of Maryam, without any condition or proviso. Such words cannot be spoken in presence of Allāh by someone who knows nothing of the future. What the future holds for a man is a part of the unseen and its knowledge is reserved for Allāh. However, she talks here in the same assured way as she did when she made the vow first: ‘‘My Lord! surely I vow to Thee what is in my womb, to be devoted . . .’’ This confidence shows that she had the knowledge that she would get from ‘Imrān a son of good faith and deed; when she became pregnant and ‘Imrān died, she became absolutely sure that what she carried in her womb was the same promised son; when she delivered a daughter and became aware of her mistaken guess, she at once understood that that promise would be fulfilled through that daughter, that she would get that son from the offspring of that daughter. As soon as she realized this fact, she transferred her vow from the son she hoped for to the daughter she was given, named it Maryam (i.e., one who worships and serves), and entrusted her and her offspring to the protection of Allāh against the accursed Satan.

All these aspects of the story may be understood from meditation on the words of Allāh.

QUR’ĀN: So her Lord accepted her with a good acceptance and made her grow up a good growing: ''al-Qubūl'' (اَلْقُبُوْلُ = acceptance), conjoined by the adjective ''ḥasan'' (حَسَن = good), gives exactly the same meaning as ''at-taqabbul'' (اَلتَّقَبُّلُ = to accept willingly and gladly). Then why did Allāh choose three words, ''with good acceptance'', in place of one, ''gladly'' or ''gracefully''? It was to show that goodness of acceptance was the main theme of the talk; and also because clear mention of ''good acceptance'' was more ennobling and more edifying.

Maryam's mother had used two sentences in her invocation: ''and I have named her Maryam and I commend her and her off spring to Thy protection . . .'' The two sentences (in answer to her call) run parallel to them. It is then reasonable to believe that the first sentence, ''So her Lord accepted her with a good acceptance'' is a response to her words, ''and I have named her Maryam''; and the second sentence, ''and made her grow up a good growing'', is the fulfilment of her second plea, ''and I commend her and her offspring to Thy protection from the accursed Satan''. Obviously, accepting a good acceptance does not refer to accepting the vow of 'Imrān's wife and to giving her the reward in the next life for that good deed of hers; in other words, it was Maryam who was accepted, not the vow. Maryam was accepted, as she grew up to be a sincere worshipper of Allāh and was freed to serve the sanctuary. In this light, the acceptance implies that she was chosen for this purpose by Allāh. (We have already explained that this selection implies the chosen one's total surrender to Allāh.)

The words, ''and made her grow up a good growing'', mean that Allāh bestowed on her and her offspring guidance and sanctity, and gave them a purified life free from the whisperings of Satan, untouched by his misleading suggestions. That is what is called ''cleanliness'', in the language of Islam.

These two aspects, that is, good acceptance and good growing — which ultimately mean her being chosen and purified, respectively — have been referred to in a forthcoming verse: And when the angels said: ''O Maryam! surely Allāh has chosen you above the women of the worlds'' (3:42). We shall further explain this topic under that verse, Allāh willing.

The above discourse makes it clear that it was in answer to her mother's call that Maryam was chosen and purified. Likewise, the fact that she together with her son was made a sign for the nations, was a verification of the Divine words, ''and the male is not like the female''.

QUR'ĀN: and gave her into the charge of Zakariyyā: Zakariyyā got her charge because his name came out in the lot that was drawn. They had disputed among themselves to get the privilege of her custody; then they agreed to decide it by a lot in which Zakariyyā's name was drawn. Allāh refers to this episode when He says: . . . and you were not with them when they cast their pens (to decide) which of them should have Maryam in his charge, and you were not with them when they contended one with another (3:44).

QUR'ĀN: whenever Zakariyyā entered the sanctuary to (see) her, he found with her food . . . : ''al-Miḥrāb'' (اَلْمِحْرَابُ) means a place in mosque or house, reserved for worship. ar-Rāghib has said: ''Miḥrāb (i.e., niche) of the mosque: It is said that it was given this name because it is the place where one fights against Satan and his desires. Others say that it is because once a man enters it, it is his duty to be al-ḥarīb (اَلْحَرِيْبُ = wrested away) from worldly deeds and wandering thoughts. Some others have said that originally the foremost portion of the sitting place was called miḥrāb of the house; when the mosques were built, their foremost part was given the same name, miḥrāb. Yet others say that the word miḥrāb was originally used for the niche of the mosque, as it is its most important portion; then the foremost part of a house was also given this name, inasmuch as it resembles the mosque's niche; and probably this (explanation) is more correct. Allāh has said: They made for him what he pleased of fortresses and images . . . ''

Some scholars have said that the word ''miḥrāb'' here refers to what the People of the Book call altar; and it is a closest in front of the synagogue, it has a door, to reach which one has to ascend a few steps; anyone inside remains hidden from others present in the synagogue.

The author says: In Islamic world the recess (reserved for the leader of prayers) in a mosque owes its origin to that.

''Rizqan'' (رِزْقًا = food) in the clause, ''he found with her food'', has been used as a common noun, implying that it was an unexpected and unusual food. It has been said that he used to find with her the fruits of the winter in the summer and those of the summer in the winter.

The common noun may be interpreted differently if we look at the clause in isolation. It may be said that the food was not of unusual kind, yet the word ''food'', is used as a common noun to show that Maryam's sanctuary was never without some kind of food; whenever Zakariyyā went to see her, he always found some food with her. But such an interpretation does not agree with the context. Had the food been of the usual kind, Zakariyyā could not be satisfied by the reply that it was from Allāh and Allāh gives sustenance to whom He pleases without measure. Such a reply in that context would not remove the possibility that someone from the people of the synagogue visited her, either with good intention or bad.

Moreover, the words ''There did Zakariyyā pray to his Lord . . .'' show that Zakariyyā thought the presence of that sustenance to be a miraculous event which could only be attributed to Allāh. That is why he felt irresistible urge to call on Allāh to grant him a good offspring from Himself. It means that the sustenance was of such unusual type as to show the honour of Maryam before Allāh.

The sentence, ''He said: 'O Maryam! whence comes this . . .' '', also proves it. This sentence comes after the words ''he found with her food''; yet the two sentences are not joined by any conjunctive. It means that he did not ask the question more than once. When she gave the reply and he was convinced of her prestige in the eyes of Allāh, he felt it was the time to pray to Allāh to grant him too an unusual prayer and give him a good offspring in his old age.

QUR'ĀN: There did Zakariyyā pray to his Lord; he said: ''My Lord! grant me from Thee good offspring . . . '': A thing is good aṭ-ṭayyib (اَلطَّيِّبُ), if it is suitable for the purpose it is required for. A good land is suitable for its inhabitants in its water, atmosphere, climate and other necessities of life. Allāh says: And as for the good land, its vegetation springs forth (abundantly) by the permission of its Lord (7:58). A good life is the one whose various aspects are in harmony with each other and give satisfaction to the man concerned. By the same reason, a good perfume is called aṭ-ṭīb (اَلطِّيْبُ). Accordingly, a good offspring would mean a child who, in his attributes, qualities and activities, would fulfil the hopes, and satisfy the ambitions of his father. Zakariyyā (a.s.) prayed to Allāh: ‘‘My Lord! grant me from Thee good offspring.’’ It happened when he saw the grace of Allāh on Maryam and found out how great her prestige was before the Lord. He was so overwhelmed by that experience that he could not refrain from praying to Allāh to bestow on him too a similar bounty. Implied in the adjective ‘‘good’’ was a plea that the said offspring should possess a personality much like that of Maryam, and should be granted a similar prestige and honour before Allāh. He was then and there granted all that he had asked for. Allāh gave him a son, Yaḥyā — the prophet most similar to ‘Īsā (peace be on both); he was given all the qualities of perfection and excellence which ‘Īsā and his Truthful mother, Maryam, were granted. It was for this reason that Allāh named him Yaḥyā, and sent him to verify a Word from Allāh, and made him honourable and chaste as well as a prophet, from among the good ones. As will be explained later, it was the nearest that any man could resemble Maryam and her son ‘Īsā, peace be on them all.

QUR’ĀN: Then the angels called to him as he stood praying in the sanctuary: ‘‘That Allāh gives you the good news of Yaḥyā . . . ’’: The third and second person pronouns refer to Zakariyyā. al-Bushrā (اَلْبُشْرٰي), al-ibshār (اَلْاِبْشَارُ) and at-tabshīr (اَلتَّبْشِيْرُ), all have the same meaning: To give good news, to bring good tidings of what would make the recipient happy.

‘‘Allāh gives you good news of Yaḥyā’’. It shows that it was Allāh who gave him the name, Yaḥyā; some verses in Chapter 19 also indicate the same: O Zakariyyā! surely We give you good news of a boy whose name shall be Yaḥyā (19:7).

The name, Yaḥyā, and its bestowal from Allāh at the very beginning of the good tidings (before his birth and even conception), support what we have said above, that Zakariyyā had asked his Lord to give him a child with a prestige in Divine presence similar to that enjoyed by Maryam. She and her son, ‘Īsā (peace be on them), were jointly a sign of Allāh, as He says: and We made her and her son a sign for the nations (21:91).

Allāh therefore gave Yaḥyā, to the utmost possible extent, all the qualities and attributes given to Maryam and ‘Īsā. The attributes of Maryam had fully blossomed in ‘Īsā; and Yaḥyā was made to resemble ‘Īsā as completely and perfectly as was possible. Yet ‘Īsā had precedence of Yaḥyā, because his creation and birth was firmly decreed long before the prayer of Zakariyyā for Yaḥyā was accepted. That is why ‘Īsā was given superiority over Yaḥyā, and made an ulu 'l-‘azm apostle, bringing a new sharī‘ah and a new Book. Apart from such necessary dissimilarities, Yaḥyā and ‘Īsā resembled each other to the maximum possible extent.

For a glimpse of this similarity, look at the stories of Yaḥyā and ‘Īsā as narrated in Chapter 19 (Maryam).

About Yaḥyā (a.s.): O Zakariyyā! surely We give you good news of a boy whose name shall be Yaḥyā: We have not made before anyone his namesake . . . O Yaḥyā! take hold of the Book with strength; and We granted him wisdom while yet a child, and tenderness from Us and purity, and he was one who guarded (against evil), and dutiful to his parents, and he was not insolent, disobedient. And peace on him on the day he was born, and on the day he dies, and on the day he is raised to life (19:7,12 — 15).

Now, compare it with what has immediately been said about ‘Īsā (a.s.): So she took a curtain (to screen herself) from them; then We sent to her Our spirit, and there appeared to her a wellmade man. . . . He said: ‘‘I am only a messenger of your Lord: That I give you a pure boy.’’ . . . He said: ‘‘Even so; your Lord says: ‘It is easy to Me and that We may make him a sign to men and a mercy from Us’ ’’; . . . But she pointed to him. They said: ‘‘How should we speak to one who is a child in the cradle?’’He said: ‘‘Surely I am a servant of Allāh; He has given me the Book and made me a prophet; and He has made me blessed wherever I may be, and He has enjoined on me prayer and zakāt as long as I live; and dutiful to my mother, and He has not made me insolent, unblessed; and peace on me on the day I was born, and on the day I die, and on the day I am raised to life’’ (19:17 — 21, 29 — 33).

The verses of this chapter too point to this similarity of the two prophets.

Allāh named him Yaḥyā[1]; and the son of Maryam was called ‘Īsā which reportedly means ya‘īsh (يَعِيْشُ = he lives)[2]; Yaḥyā was sent to verify a Word from Allāh, that is, ‘Īsā, as Allāh says: . . . a Word from Him whose name is the Messiah, ‘Īsā son of Maryam (3:45); Yaḥyā too, just like ‘Īsā, was given wisdom and taught the Book while yet a child; he too is praised, like ‘Īsā, to be a tenderness from Allāh and purity, and to be dutiful to his parents, not insolent or disobedient; also much like ‘Īsā peace was sent to him on three junctures of his existence. Also, Allāh made Yaḥyā honourable as ‘Īsā was made worthy of regard; and he was made chaste and a prophet, from among the good ones, as ‘Īsā was. All this was in answer to the prayer of Zakariyyā, when he asked for a good offspring, to be his heir, and with whom Allāh would be well pleased. As explained earlier, he had prayed to Allāh to this effect when he was overwhelmed by what he saw of the distinction and excellence of Maryam before Allāh.

‘‘verifying a Word from Allāh’’: It shows that he was a harbinger of ‘Īsā; ‘‘Word’’ in this context refers to ‘Īsā, as the verse 3:45 (quoted above) says that Maryam was given good news of a Word from Allāh.

‘‘honourable’’: ‘‘as-Sayyid’’ (اَلسَّيِّدُ = chief, head of community); the one who manages the people’s affairs related to their lives and livelihood or concerning a socially accepted virtue; subsequently, it was used with increasing frequency, for honorable and noble, inasmuch as the above-mentioned management of affairs entails honour and excellence — emanating from his authority, wealth or other such virtues.

[1] Yaḥyā = He lives.

[2] ‘Īsā: In Hebrew it is Yèshūa‘; it is a later form, by vowel dissimilation, of Yòshūa‘ (Yūsha‘ يُوْشَعْ in Arabic, and Joshua in Latin), which in its turn was a contracted form of Yehòshūa‘. Its meaning: Yahwah, that is God, is salvation, or Yahwah saves. See Dictionary of Proper Names and Places in the Bible, published by Robert Hale, London, 1982; Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, published by McGraw-Hill Book Co. Inc., 1963. (tr.)

‘‘chaste’’: ‘‘al-Ḥuṣūr’’ (اَلْحُصُوْرُ = one who abstains from women). In the present context it signifies a man who totally abstains from women because he forsakes all the worldly desires, and leads a life of asceticism and self-denial.

QUR’ĀN: He said: ‘‘My Lord! how shall there be a son (born) to me, and old age has already come upon me and my wife is barren?’’: The question is a mirror of the awe and the wonder which overwhelmed Zakariyyā when he heard the good news; he wanted to ascertain how and when this promise would be fulfilled. In no way does this question imply that he thought it unlikely to happen, or too great a boon to come his way. How could he harbour any doubt about it when he was clearly told that Allāh would give him the son he had asked for? Moreover, he had already mentioned these two factors (which are the basis of this question) in his invocation, as Allāh quotes him as saying: ‘‘My Lord! surely my bones are weakened and my head flares with hoariness, and, my Lord! never have I been unsuccessful in my prayer to Thee: and surely I fear my relatives after me; and my wife is barren; therefore grant me from Thyself an heir . . .’’ (19:4 — 5).

Furthermore, the question reflects on an interesting psychological — nay, spiritual — ecstasy experienced by Zakariyyā. No sooner did he look at Maryam and the grace of Allāh she enjoyed than he was transported to the plane of ecstasy and felt himself overwhelmed by Divine Mercy and love; while in that state, he asked from his Lord for a good child, and mentioned in that prayer the basic factors — his own old age and his wife’s barrenness — which had contributed to that sorrowful and pitiable condition. When his prayer was granted and he was given the good news of a son, it was as though he woke up from that trance; then he began expressing his joyful astonishment on such a marvellous phenomenon — Oh! Would I beget a son, in spite of my old age, even though my wife is barren! The same factors which in the past had caused him sorrow and distress, now enhanced his happiness and joy.

We may also look at this episode in the following light. Zakariyyā was assured that his prayer had been accepted; thereupon he started mentioning one snag after the other. Actually, he wanted to ascertain as to how each hindrance would be overcome, how each snag would be removed. He liked to know all the particulars concerning that Divine Grace, in order that his enjoyment would be complete and his happiness perfect. We find the same emotions shown by Ibrāhīm when he was given a similar good tidings: And inform them of the guests of Ibrāhīm: When they entered upon him, they said, ''Peace''. He said: ''Surely we are afraid of you.'' They said: ''Be not afraid, surely we give you the good news of a boy possessing knowledge.'' He said: ''Do you give me good news (of a son) when old age has come upon me? — Of what then do you give me good news!'' They said: ''We give you good news with truth; therefore be not of the despairing.'' He said: ''And who despairs of the mercy of his Lord but the erring ones?'' (15:51 — 56) When the angels told him not to despair, he made it clear that his question had not emanated from any despair; how could it be so, when despairing from the mercy of Allāh was an error, a straying, and he was not an erring or straying servant? The angels must surely know that when a master turns with mercy to a slave in a way as to bring the slave nearer to himself, to raise him in rank, and exalt him in prestige, the slave feels so exhilarated, so overjoyed, that he yearns to hear those words over and over again, repeatedly going into all its details, joyously looking at all its aspects!

One may easily see the good manners of the purified servants of Allāh, if one reflects on the words, ''and old age has already come upon me''. What Zakariyyā alluded to was the fact that he had become too old to have ability, or even desire, to perform sexual act; as for his wife, she suffered from double impediment: Old age and barrenness. The clause, ''my wife is barren'', is expressed, in 19:8, in a way as to mean, my wife had been barren. It signifies that she had not become unable to bear children because of the advanced age; that she was barren from the very beginning.

QUR'ĀN: He said: ''Even so; Allāh does what He pleases.'': The actual replier is Allāh — either directly or through the agency of the angels who had called to Zakariyyā. But apparently the pronoun in ''He said'' refers to the angel; he was the sayer, although the saying is attributable to Allāh as it was conveyed to Zakariyyā by His command. This interpretation is supported by the verse: He (i.e., the Spirit) said: ''So shall it be; your Lord says: 'It is easy to Me, and indeed I created you before, when you were nothing.' '' (19:9)

The above discourse shows that:

First: Zakariyyā heard that voice from the same place whence he used to hear the angel's voice before.

Second: ''Even so'' is predicate of a deleted subject; the completed subject would be something like this: The matter is even so. It emphasizes that the Divine Grace, of which he was given the good news, was certain to appear; it was a firmly decreed matter which would surely take place. This reply is similar to the one given by the spirit to Maryam: He said. ''Even so; your Lord says: 'It is easy to Me; . . . and it is a matter which has been decreed.' '' (19:21)

Third: ''Allāh does what He pleases'': It is a separate sentence, explaining the reason of the preceding ''Even so''.

QUR'ĀN: He said: ''My Lord! appoint a sign for me.'' Said He: ''Your sign is that you would not speak to men for three days except by signs; . . . in the evening and the morning'': It is written in Majma'u 'l-bayān: ''ar-Ramz'' (اَلرَّمْزُ) is to make signs with the lips; sometimes it is used for gesturing with eyebrows, eyes and/or hands; but mostly it is used in the first meaning.'' al-'Ashiyy (اَلْعَشِيُّ = evening) indicates the end portion of the day; probably it is derived from al-'ashwah (اَلْعَشْوَةُ = dimsightedness); the evening time was given this name because it merges into the darkness of the night and thus affects the eyesight. ''al-Ibkār'' (اَلْاِبْكَارُ = early morning); originally it meant to make haste, to come early.

The verse throws light on yet another similarity between Yaḥyā and 'Īsā. Compare it with the advice which 'Īsā gave to his mother soon after his birth: Then if you see any man, say: ''Surely I have vowed a fast to the Beneficent Allāh, so I shall not speak to any man today.'' (19:26)

Zakariyyā asked his Lord to appoint a sign for him. Sign is a symbol that points to another thing or idea. There is a difference of opinion regarding the purpose behind this prayer: Did he want to ascertain, with the help of the sign, that the good news was really from Allāh; that it was an angelic (or a Divine) speech, and not a satanic voice? Or, was it to know the time when his wife would be pregnant, so that he might be sure of the conception?

The context and the framework of the story does not agree very much with the second view. Yet the exegetes are reluctant to accept the first interpretation. They are not inclined to say that Zakariyyā wanted to be sure of the Divine Origin of that message. The prophets were sinless and protected from errors and mistakes; as such they knew perfectly well the difference between the angelic inspiration and the satanic whispering; the Satan could not interfere in their affairs, nor could he confuse them in a way as to cast doubt about the Divine revelation sent to them.

This observation is correct as far as it goes. But it should be remembered that they knew that difference not by themselves, but because Allāh had given them that knowledge. If so, then what objection can be raised if Zakariyyā prayed to Allāh to appoint for him a sign to help him ascertain the Divine Origin of that news? Of course, this objection could be entertained had his prayer been rejected — had Allāh refused to appoint for him a sign as he had asked for.

The appointed sign itself — not being able to talk to the people for three days — supports (nay, proves) the first view. Utmost that the Satan can do against the prophets is to touch them with some ailments in their bodies; to put hindrance in their mission; to sabotage their efforts; to mislead the people away from the prophetic path; and to encourage and strengthen their enemies. Allāh says: And remember Our servant Ayyūb, when he called upon his Lord: ''The Satan has afflicted me with toil and torment'' (38:41); And We did not send before you any apostle or prophet, but when he desired, the Satan made a suggestion respecting his desire; but Allāh annuls that which the Satan casts, then does Allāh establish His communications . . . (22:52). ''. . . then I forgot the fish, and nothing made me forget to speak of it but the Satan . . .'' (18:63). But such touches and afflictions do not go beyond annoying or discomforting the prophet concerned. But the Satan can never get any power over the person of the prophets themselves; they are protected from it. (In previous discussions we have proved the 'iṣmah of the prophets.) Now we come to the present subject matter. It was the sign appointed by Allāh for Zakariyyā that he would not speak to the people for three days; he would remain tongue-tied for all kinds of speeches except for the remembrance of Allāh and His glorification. ''Said He: 'Your sign is that you would not speak to men for three days except by signs; and remember your Lord much and glorify Him in the evening and the morning.' '' It was a sign that affected Zakariyyā's person itself and made him tongue-tied. It was such an effect as was absolutely beyond the power of the Satan, because Zakariyyā was protected by Divine 'iṣmah. This was, therefore, a sure sign that it was affected by Allāh, and not by the Satan. And such a sign is more in accord with the first view than the second.

Question: It will be difficult, if we take the first view, to explain the verse, ''He said: 'My Lord! how shall there be a son (born) to me, and old age has already come upon me, and my wife is barren?' He said: 'Even so; Allāh does what He pleases.' '' This verse clearly says that he spoke to his Lord and asked Him what he wanted to ask, and got an answer to his enquiry. Now, if he harboured any doubt concerning the genuineness of the voice, then why all this dialogue? And if he had no doubt, then why this demand to be given a sign?

Reply: Certainty and belief have many grades, varying in the degrees of intensity. Possibly, Zakariyyā was sure from the very beginning that it was an angelic voice by the command of the Beneficent Allāh; then he asked his Lord concerning the details of the birth of his promised son, because it was a truly awe-inspiring phenomenon, and again he heard the angel's voice answering his question and was again sure of its genuineness; then he prayed to his Lord to appoint for him a sign in order that his certainty — that it was a Divine communication — should reach the degree of tranquillity.

The clause, ''Then the angels called to him'', supports this interpretation. an-Nidā' (اَلنِّدَآءُ) means to call from a distance. That is why it is generally used for a shout, a loud utterance — we cannot speak from a distance except in a loud voice — although loudness is not a part of its meaning. For example, Allāh refers to the prayer of Zakariyyā in these words: When called he (nādā = نَادي) unto his Lord in a low voice (nidā'an khafiyyan = نِدَآءً خَفِيًّا) (19:3). His prayer was termed as a call from a distance — the distance being the spiritual one between Zakariyyā's humility and modesty and the Divine sublimity, might and grandeur; otherwise, it could not be described as ''a low voice''. Anyhow, ''the angels called to him'' may be taken to mean that Zakariyyā had only heard the voices of the angels without setting his eyes on them. (And therefore.he decided to ask for a sign.)

An exegete has written: ''That Allāh gave him a sign of not speaking, means that Allāh forbade him to speak to the people for three days; he was to remain silent and spend the stipulated time in remembrance and glorification of Allāh; it does not mean that he became tongue-tied and could not speak to the people at all . . . The fact is that Zakariyyā, being a human being, wanted to know the exact time when the conception would take place, in order that he himself might feel tranquillity and could also inform his wife of the great event. That is why he asked what he asked. When his question was answered, he called upon Allāh to prescribe for him a special prayer (in order that he might hasten to show his gratitude to Allāh), which would terminate in fulfilment of his hope. In other words, the end of that period of thanks-giving would indicate that the time of conception had arrived. Thereupon, Allāh told him not to speak to the people for three days, devoting all that time in remembrance and glorification of Allāh; if there arose a need to talk with someone, he was to communicate with him in signs only. When the appointed three days passed, it would be the time to convey the good news to his wife.''

Comment: Clearly, no trace of this imaginary narrative can be found in the verses. The Qur'ān has nowhere mentioned — either directly or indirectly — any such story. The said writer has given free rein to his fancy when he says that Zakariyyā asked for a special regimen of worship in order to offer his thanks to Allāh, that the end of that worship period was to lead to the conception, that the termination of that time was a sign for the beginning of the pregnancy, that the words, ''you would not speak to men'', were an order to him not to speak, and that he wanted to convey, at the end of the stipulated time the good news to his wife.

ANGELIC INSPIRATION AND SATANIC WHISPERING: THE SPEECH OF ALLĀH

We have repeatedly mentioned that when a word is made for a meaning, it actually looks at the main purpose behind that meaning. The words, ‘‘talk’’ and ‘‘speech’’, refer to voice, because voice conveys the idea of the speaker to the hearer. Therefore, whatever conveys that idea may be called a talk or speech. It may be a voice or a combination of several voices; in fact, it may not have any sound at all, as for example, is the case with sign language and symbols. If a siren conveys a complete idea, it may be called a speech, even though it is not uttered by mouth. Likewise, people use the word, ‘‘speech’’, for signs and symbols although no sound is involved in them.

It is for this reason that the Qur’ān uses the words, ‘‘speech’’ and ‘‘talk’’, for the ideas created in man’s mind by the Satan. Allāh narrates the claim of the Satan:

And most certainly I will . . . bid them so that they shall slit the ears of the cattle, and most certainly I will bid them so that they shall alter Allāh’s creation . . . (4:119)

Also, He says:

Like the Satan when he says to man: ‘‘Disbelieve’’, but when he disbelieves, he says: ‘‘I am surely clear of you . . .’’ (59:16)

. . . the slinking (Satan) who whispers into the hearts of men . . . (114:5)

. . . the Satans from among men and jinn, some of them suggesting to others varnished falsehood to deceive (them) . . . (6:112)

And the Satan shall say . . .: ‘‘Surely Allāh promised you the promise of truth, and I gave you promises then failed to keep them to you . . .’’ (14:22)

Satan threatens you with poverty and enjoins you to abomination, and Allāh promises you forgiveness from Himself and abundance; and Allāh is Ample-giving, All-knowing. He grants wisdom to whom He pleases, and whoever is granted wisdom, he indeed is given a great good. (2:268 — 269)

Clearly, these misleading ideas, coming into a man's mind, have been ascribed to the Satan, and have been called his bid, order, talk, whispering, suggestion, promise and threat; all these are various modes of speech and talk, although the Satan does not utter them by mouth, nor does the man hear them by his ears.

The last quoted verse mentions the promise of Allāh — for forgiveness and abundance — face to face with the satanic threat. It implies that this promise stands for an angelic inspiration in contrast to the satanic whispering. And that inspiration has been termed as ''wisdom''. Also there are other verses pointing to this reality in various terms. For example:

. . . and (He will) make for you a light with which you will walk . . . (57:28)

He it is Who sent down tranquillity into the hearts of the believers that they might have more of faith added to their faith — and Allāh's are the hosts of the heaven and the earth . . . (48:4)

(We have explained this verse while writing about as-sakīnah [السَّكِيْنَةُ = tranquillity] under the verse: . . . in which there is tranquillity from your lord . . . — 2:248)

Therefore (for) whomsoever Allāh intends that He would guide him aright, He expands his breast for Islam; and (for) whomsoever He intends that He should leave him to err, He makes his breast strait and narrow as though he were ascending into the sky; thus does Allāh lay uncleanliness on those who do not believe (6:125).

It should be noted here that the satanic whispering has been called ''the uncleanliness of the Satan'' in the verse 8:11.

The above discourse makes it clear that the Satan and the angels ''speak'' to man by putting ideas into his mind.

Then there is a speaking reserved for Allāh, as He says: And there is not for any man that Allāh should speak to him except by revelation, or from behind a veil, or by sending a messenger so that he reveals by His permission what He pleases (42:51). Apart from sending a messenger, that is, an angel (with which we are not concerned here), Allāh speaks to man in two ways: (i) Revelation, in which there is no veil between Allāh and the person spoken to; (ii) Speaking from behind a veil or curtain.

These are, in short, various kinds of angelic inspiration and satanic whispering; and various modes of Allāh's speech.

As for the Divine Speech which is called revelation, it needs no extraneous factor for its recognition, no other distinguishing element to ascertain its authenticity. It is a direct speech, without any curtain between Allāh and the recipient of the revelation; and it is just impossible for any doubt to creep up into such a talk. But other kinds of Divine Speech need some supporting evidence, which in its turn relies on the direct revelation.

As for a distinction between the angelic and the satanic talks, the signs mentioned in the above quoted verses are sufficient to separate one from the other. The angelic inspiration accompanies expanding of breast, calls to Divine forgiveness and abundance, and encourages man to follow the religion of Allāh as expounded in the Divine Book and the prophetic sunnah. The satanic whispering, on the other hand, causes the breast to be strait and narrow, tempts one to follow one's desire, threatens with poverty, enjoins abomination, and finally pushes one to act in a manner opposed to the Book of Allāh and the sunnah, and contrary to the demands of the healthy nature.

The prophets and their close followers sometimes saw and recognized the angels and the Satan, as Allāh describes in the stories of Adam, Ibrāhīm, and Lūṭ (peace be on them). Obviously, in such cases, there was no need for any extraneous identifying factor. But in other cases when they did not see the angel (or the Satan), they, like other believers, needed some identification to ascertain that the speaker was in fact from Allāh — and that identification ultimately depended on the direct revelation from Allāh.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, When the woman of 'Imrān said. . .: ''Verily Allāh revealed to 'Imrān: 'I am going to give you a male (child), of sound health and blessed, who shall heal the blind and the leper and raise the dead (to life) by the permission of Allāh; and I'll appoint him an apostle to the children of Israel.' 'Imrān informed his wife, Ḥannah, of it — and she is the mother of Maryam. When Ḥannah conceived, she thought that she was carrying the same male child. But when she brought it forth, she said: 'My Lord! surely I have brought it forth a female, and the male is not like the female.' (She said it because) a female cannot be an apostle. Allāh says: And Allāh knew what she brought forth. Thereafter, when Allāh gave 'Īsā to Maryam, (it was understood that) the good news and promise (which Allāh had given to 'Imrān) were in fact about that (grandson). Therefore, you should not think it strange if we say something about one of us (Ahlu 'l-bayt) and it appears (not in him, but) in his child or grandchild.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: A nearly similar tradition has been narrated from the same Imām in al-Kāfī, and from al-Bāqir (a.s.) in al-'Ayyāshī.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the same verse: ''A released child lived in the synagogue (and) did not go out. So, when (the wife of 'Imrān) delivered her, she said: 'My Lord! surely I have brought it forth a female, and the male is not like the female.' The female has her menstruation, and (therefore she) will (have to) go out of the place of worship, while a released child does not go out of the place of worship.'' (al-'Ayyāshī) al-Bāqir or aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''She had vowed what was in her womb to the synagogue for serving the worshippers; and the male is not like the female in service.'' Then the Imām said: ''Then she grew up; and she served them and looked after them, until she attained maturity. Then Zakariyyā told her to hide herself behind a screen (away) from the (other) worshippers.'' (ibid.)

The author says: As you see, the traditions support what we said in the Commentary. But evidently they take the clause, ''and the male is not like the female'', to be a part of the speech of 'Imrān's wife, not a comment from Allāh. In that case, it will be necessary to explain why ‘‘the male’’ was mentioned before ‘‘the female’’, against the norms of grammar and eloquence; also, it will be essential to find out a reason as to why she gave her daughter the name she gave, that is, Maryam (Released;devoted) — unless it can be shown that there was no correlation between releasing her and making her an attendant of the synagogue.

The first tradition shows that ‘Imrān was a prophet who received revelations from Allāh. It is also proved by another tradition narrated by Abū Baṣīr in which he says: ‘‘I asked Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) whether ‘Imrān was a prophet. He said: ‘Yes, he was a prophet sent (to his people) . . .’ ’’ (Biḥāru ’l-anwār)

That tradition also shows that the wife of ‘Imrān was called Ḥannah, as is generally believed. Some other traditions say that her name was Marthār (Martha?). However, it is not an important subject for us to labour on.

The same tradition (quoted from al-Qummī) goes on to say: ‘‘When Maryam reached the age of puberty, she entered the sanctuary and put a curtain (on the entrance) to hide herself; and no one entered therein. And Zakariyyā used to enter the sanctuary; and he used to find with her the fruits of summer in the winter and the fruits of winter in the summer; he used to say: ‘Whence comes this to you?’ And she used to reply: ‘It is from Allāh. Surely Allāh gives sustenance to whom He pleases without measure.’ ’’

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘When Zakariyyā prayed to his Lord to give him a child and the angels called to him as they did, he desired to ascertain that the said voice was (really) from Allāh. Thereupon Allāh revealed to him that it was the sign (of its Divine Origin) that he would remain tongue-tied for three days. When he became tongue-tied and could not speak, he understood that no one, other than Allāh, could do that. And it is the (meaning of the) word of Allāh: He said: ‘My Lord! Appoint a sign for me.’ ’’ (al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: A nearly similar tradition has been narrated by al-Qummī in his at-Tafsīr. It has been made clear in the Commentary that this theme does not go against the context of the verse.

An exegete has very strongly objected to many of the themes expounded in these traditions; for example, sending the revelation to ‘Imrān, presence of the off-season fruits in Maryam’s sanctuary, request of Zakariyyā for a sign in order that he could ascertain the authenticity of the voice etc. He has said: These are the things which cannot be proved. Neither Allāh has mentioned them nor the Prophet has described them; nor can they be proved by reason or any reliable history. There are only some Israelite (and some non-Israelite) legends. Why should the Muslims go out of their way to explain the Qur’ān in terms of those unverified legends, which are anyhow too far-fetched to be acceptable?

Comment: The said exegete has made claims without offering any argument in his support. Of course, these traditions are āḥād, and some are even weak in their chains; also it is not incumbent, for a scholar to accept them or to use them as an argument. Yet, when we ponder on the verses of the Qur’ān, we find ourselves ready to accept those traditions (because they are consistent with the Qur’ān). It is all the more correct for the traditions narrated from the Imāms of Ahlu ’l-bayt, as they do not contain any theme unacceptable to the reason.

Of course, one has to be on guard against some untenable things attributed to some early exegetes. For example, Qatādah and ‘Ikrimah are reported to have said: ‘‘The Satan came to Zakariyyā and created a doubt (in his mind) whether the good news was really from Allāh. He said (to Zakariyyā): ‘Had it been from Allāh, He would have talked to you in a low voice as you had called unto Him in a low voice.’ ’’ There are many such baseless things which cannot be accepted at all. Another such example may be seen in the Gospel according to Luke, where it says:

> And the angel answering said unto him, I am Gabriel, . . . And, behold, thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believest not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season. (Luke,1:19 — 20).

OTHER TRADITIONS ABOUT ''THE ONE SPOKEN TO''

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''There is no heart but it has two ears, on one of them is a guiding angel, and on the other a tempting Satan; this orders him and that restrains him the Satan enjoins him to (commit) sins, and the angel holds him back from it. And this is the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: . . . sitting on the right and on the left. He utters not a word but there is by him a watcher at hand (50:17 — 18).'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: There are many traditions of the same meaning, some of which will be quoted later on. In this tradition, Imām (a.s.) has applied the verse to an angel and a Satan, while other traditions apply it to the two angels who write down the good and evil deeds of a man. But the two sets of traditions are not mutually exclusive. The verse only says that there are ''watchers'' with every man who receive (i.e., note down) all his utterances, and that there are two of them, one on his right side and the other on his left. But the verse does not say whether those watchers are from only the angels or from the angels and the satans. As it is silent on this point, it may be applied to either explanation.

Zurārah said: ''I asked Abū 'Abdillāh (a.s.) about the apostle, the prophet and al-muḥaddath (اَلْمُحَدَّثُ = the one spoken to). He said: 'The apostle is the one who sees the angel (who) brings the message of his Lord to him, and tells him: ''(Allāh) orders you so-and-so.'' And the apostle is a prophet with (the added rank of) apostleship. And the prophet does not see the angel; something comes down to him — the news (comes) to his heart; and he becomes as though he be in a trance, and he sees (the vision) in his dream.' I said: 'Then how does he know that what was (shown to him) in his dream was truth?' He said: 'Allāh makes it clear to him, so that he knows that it is truth; and he does not see the angel . . .' '' (ibid.)

The author says: ''The apostle is a prophet . . .'' It shows that the two ranks may be combined together in one person. We have explained in detail the meaning of apostleship and prophethood in the Commentary of the verse 2:213, ‘‘Mankind was but one people . . . ’’

‘‘He becomes as though he be in a trance’’: It explains the next sentence, ‘‘and he sees (the vision) in his dream’’. It clarifies that what is meant by ‘‘dream’’ is not the dream as known to us; it only refers to a condition in which the prophet becomes oblivious of his surroundings.

‘‘Allāh makes it clear to him’’: Allāh makes the truth known to the prophet, enabling him to differentiate between an angelic inspiration and a satanic whispering.

Burayd enquired from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (peace be on both of them), inter alia, in a tradition: ‘‘Then what are the apostle, the prophet and the one spoken to?’’ (The Imām) said: ‘‘The apostle is the one that the angel appears before him and talks to him; and the prophet sees (the vision) in the dream; and sometimes apostleship and prophethood are combined in one (person); and al-muḥaddath (اَلْمُحَدَّثُ = the one spoken to) is the one who hears the voice but does not see the form.’’ Burayd said: ‘‘I said: ‘May Allāh make your affairs good! How can the prophet know that what he saw in (his) dream was truth and that it was from the angel?’ (The Imām) said: ‘He is helped (by Allāh) in it until he knows it. Certainly Allāh ended (the series of divine) books with your Book, and the prophets with your Prophet . . .’ ’’ (Baṣā’iru ’d-darajāt)

The author says: It has the same connotation as the preceding tradition. The Imām has sufficiently explained the meaning of ‘‘the one spoken to’’ — it is the one who hears the voice of an unseen speaker who speaks by order of Allāh. The words, ‘‘Certainly Allāh ended the (series of divine) books . . .’’, point to this reality.

When writing on the following verses, we shall discuss in detail about ‘‘the one spoken to’’.

In the Name of Allāh,
The All-compassionate, The All-merciful

Praise belongs to Allāh, the Lord of all being;
the All-compassionate, the All-merciful;
the Master of the Day of Judgement;
Thee only we serve, and to Thee alone we pray for succour;
Guide us in the straight path;
the path of those whom Thou hast blessed,
not of those against whom Thou art wrathful, nor of those who are astray.

* * * * *

O' Allāh! send your blessings to the head of your messengers and the last of your prophets,
Muhammad and his pure and cleansed progeny.
Also send your blessings to all your prophets and envoys.

بِسْمِ اللّٰهِ الرَّحْمٰنِ الرَّحِيمِ

اَلْحَمْدُ لِلّٰهِ رَبِّ الْعَالَمِينَ الرَّحْمٰنِ الرَّحِيمِ

مَالِكِ يَوْمِ الدِّينِ إِيَّاكَ نَعْبُدُ وَإِيَّاكَ نَسْتَعِينُ

اِهْدِنَا الصِّرَاطَ الْمُسْتَقِيمَ صِرَاطَ الَّذِينَ

اَنْعَمْتَ عَلَيْهِمْ غَيْرِ الْمَغْضُوبِ عَلَيْهِمْ

وَلَا الضَّالِّينَ

اَللّٰهُمَّ صَلِّ عَلَى

سَيِّدِ رُسُلِكَ وَخَاتَمِ اَنْبِيَائِكَ

مُحَمَّدٍ وَاٰلِهِ الطَّيِّبِينَ الطَّاهِرِينَ

وَصَلِّ عَلَى جَمِيعِ الْأَنْبِيَاءِ وَالْمُرْسَلِينَ

تصدير

٢- اشتهر العلاّمة الطّباطبائي رحمه الله بالعديد من آثاره و أهمّها تفسيره الكبير (الميزان في تفسير القرآن) الّذي يصحّ أن يعدّ الدّعامة الأساسيّة للتّقدير العلميّ الّذي ناله العلاّمة الطّباطبائي في العالم الاسلاميّ.

٤- قدّمنا نشر ترجمة الجزء الثاني من (الميزان) لأنّه كان قد تهيّأ للنشر، والجزء الأوّل لم يتهيّأ بعد - لأسباب لا نريد أن نشرح أمرها هنا - فلم نر من الصّالح إرجاء نشره. و قد وضعنا قائمتين (الأولى) باسماء المؤلّفين الوارد ذكرهم في مجموع أجزاء (الميزان) و(الثّانية) بأسماء الكتب الّتي هي بحاجة الى التّعريف، و قد ألحقنا هاتين القائمتين بالجزء الأوّل من التّرجمة الانجليزيّة. و لكنّا وضعنا جدولين آخرين يجدهما القارئ ملحقين بكل جزء من أجزاء التّرجمة.

و من الله سبحانه نسأل، و اليه نبتهل أن يجعل عملنا خالصا لوجهه الكريم، و أن يوفّقنا لإتمام ما بدأنا و يسدّدنا في خطوتنا هذه و خطواتنا المقبلة، إنّه نعم المولى و نعم النّصير.

1. al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī (l321/1904 — 1402/1981) — may Allāh have mercy upon him — was a famous scholar, thinker and the most celebrated contemporary Islamic philosopher. We have introduced him briefly in the first volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān.

2. al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī is well-known for a number of his works of which the most important is his great exegesis al-Mīzān fī tafsīri ’l-Qur’ān which is rightly counted as the fundamental pillar of scholarly work which the ‘Allāmah has achieved in the Islamic world.

3. We felt the necessity of publishing an exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān in English. After a thorough consultation, we came to choose al-Mīzān because we found that it contained in itself, to a considerable extent, the points which should necessarily be expounded in a perfect exegesis of the Holy Qur’ān and the points which appeal to the mind of the contemporary Muslim reader. Therefore, we proposed to al-Ustādh al-‘Allāmah as-Sayyid Sa‘īd Akhtar ar-Raḍawī to undertake this task because we were familiar with his intellectual ability to understand the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and his literary capability in expression and translation. So we relied on him for this work and consider him responsible for the English translation as al-‘Allāmah aṭ-Ṭabāṭabā’ī was responsible for the Arabic text of al-Mīzān and its discussions.

4. We have now undertaken the publication of the fifth volume of the English translation of al-Mīzān. This volume corresponds with the first half of the third volume of the Arabic text. With the help of Allāh, the Exalted, we hope to provide the complete translation and publication of this voluminous work.

In the first volume, the reader will find two more appendixes included apart from the two which are to appear in all volumes of the English translation of al-Mīzān: One for the authors and the other for the books cited throughout this work.

* * * * *

We implore upon Allāh to effect our work purely for His pleasure, and to help us to complete this work which we have started. May Allāh guide us in this step which we have taken and in the future steps, for He is the best Master and the best Heiper.

And when the angels said: ''O Maryam! surely Allāh has chosen and purified you and chosen you above the women of the worlds (42). O Maryam! keep to obedience to your Lord and prostrate and bow down with those who bow'' (43). This is of the tidings of the unseen which we reveal to you; and you were not with them when they cast their pens (to decide) which of them should have Maryam in his charge, and you were not with them when they contented one with another (44). When the angels said: ''O Maryam! surely Allāh gives you good news of a Word from Him whose name is the Messiah, 'Īsā son of Maryam, worthy of regard in this world and the hereafter and of those who are made near (to Allāh) (45). And he shall speak to the people when in the cradle and when of mature age, and (he shall be) one of the good ones'' (46). She said: ''My Lord! how shall there be a son (born) to me and man has not touched me?'' He said: ''Even so; Allāh creates what He pleases; when He has decreed a matter, He only says to it: 'Be,' and it is (47). And He will teach him the Book and the Wisdom and the Torah and the Injīl (48). And (make him) a messenger to the Children of Israel: 'That I have come to you with a sign from your Lord, that I create for you out of dust like the form of a bird, then I breathe into it and it becomes a bird with Allāh's permission, and I heal the blind and the leper, and bring the dead ones to life with Allāh's permission, and I inform you of what you eat and what you store in your houses; most surely there is a sign in this for you, if you are believers (49). And a verifier of that which is before me of the Torah, and that I may allow you part of that which has been forbidden to you, and I have come to you with a sign from your Lord, therefore fear Allāh and obey me (50). Surely Allāh is my Lord and your Lord, therefore worship Him; this is the straight path' '' (51). But when 'Īsā perceived unbelief on their part, he said: ''Who are my helpers to Allāh?'' The disciples said: ''We are helpers of Allāh: We believe in Allāh and be (our) witness that we are submitting ones (52). Our Lord! we believe in what Thou halt revealed and we follow the messenger; so write us down with those who bear witness'' (53). And they planned and Allāh (also) planned, and Allāh is the best of planners (54). And when Allāh said: ''O 'Īsā! I am going to take you away completely and cause you to ascend unto Me and purify you of those who disbelieve, and make those who follow you above those who disbelieve to the Day of Resurrection; then to Me shall be your return, so I will decide between you concerning that in which you differed (55). Then as to those who disbelieve, I will chastise them with severe chastisement in this world and the hereafter, and they shall have no helpers'' (56). And as to those who believe and do good deeds, He will pay them fully their rewards; and Allāh does not love the unjust (57). This we recite to you of the signs and the wise reminder (58). Surely the likeness of 'Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam; He created him from dust, then said to him: ''Be,'' and he was (59). The truth is from your Lord, so be not of the doubters (60).

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: And when the angels said: ''O Maryam! surely Allāh has chosen you and purified you: The conjunctive, ''And'', joins it to the verse 35: When the woman of 'Imrān said ... Both verses therefore describe the selection of the descendants of 'Imrān mentioned in the verse 34: Surely Allāh chose Adam...

This verse proves that Maryam was one of ''the spoken to''; the angels talked to her and she heard their speech. It is proved also by the words of Allāh in the Chapter of Maryam: then We sent to her Our Spirit, and there appeared to her a well-made man ... He said: ''I am only a messenger of your Lord ... '' (19:17 — 21): We shall write, at the end of this Commentary, about ''the spoken to''.

We have earlier written explaining the Divine Words, So her Lord accepted her with a good acceptance and made her grow up a good growing (3:37), that these sentences answer the pleas of Maryam's mother: ''and I have named her Maryam, and I commend her and her offspring into Thy protection from the accursed Satan'' (3:36); also it was mentioned that the angels' words in the verse under discussion, ''O Maryam! surely Allāh has chosen you ...'', show the status which Maryam had near Allāh. You may refer to that explanation for further details. Thus her choosing means that she was accepted a good acceptance for the worship of Allāh; and her purification implies that she held fast to the protection of Allāh. She was therefore a chosen one who was protected from sin. It has also been said that her purification means that she was a virgin who did not menstruate — thus she was not obliged to go out of the synagogue at any time. There is nothing wrong in this explanation although the meaning given by us is more in conformity with the context.

QUR'ĀN: ''and chosen you above the women of the worlds: We have already described (in the Commentary of the verse 3:33, Surely Allāh chose Adam ... above all the worlds) the connotation of choosing ‘‘above’’ the worlds; ‘‘above’’ shows that the chosen one was given excellence and precedence over other people in something exclusively given to him; and that it is more than mere selection which implies total surrender to the will of Allāh. The announcement that Maryam was chosen ‘‘above the women of the worlds’’ thus, means that she was given precedence over them.

Was she given precedence over them in all things? Or only in some matters? Look at the following verses:

When the angels said: ‘‘O Maryam! surely Allāh gives you good news of a Word from Him whose name is the Messiah...’’ (3:45).

And she who guarded her chastity, so We breathed into her of Our Spirit and made her and her son a sign for the worlds (21:91).

And Maryam, the daughter of ‘Imrān, who guarded her chastity, so We breathed into it of Our Spirit, and she accepted the truth of the words of her Lord, and she was of the obedient ones (66:12).

These verses describe the only distinction which she was given to the exclusion of all women of the worlds — and that is her miraculously conceiving and giving birth to ‘Īsā (a.s.). It shows that it was this aspect of her life in which she was given precedence over all the women. The other qualities attributed to her in these verses (her purification, her acceptance of the words of Allāh and His Books, her obedience to God and her being spoken to) were not her exclusive virtues — they are found in others too.

It is said that she was chosen above the women of her time. But the verse is unconditional and general, and as such it cannot accept any limitation put to it.

QUR’ĀN: ‘‘O Maryam! keep to obedience to your Lord and prostrate, and bow down with those who bow’’: ‘‘al-Qunūt’’ (اَلْقُنُوْتُ) means keeping to obedience with submission and humility; as-sajdah (اَلسَّجْدَةُ = translated here as prostration) is well-known ritual of worship; ar-rukū‘ (اَلرُّكُوْعُ = to bow down; to be humble).

When someone calls another person, the called one looks towards the caller and listens to him. In this verse, Maryam is again called by name. It is as though the angels wanted to tell her: We have brought to you good news and again some more; you should listen to both of the good tidings. The first concerns with the rank and status you have been given by Allāh. The second is what you are obliged to do alongside that Divine Favour; in other words, what you have got to offer to Allāh of the duties of servitude; it will show your gratitude for that rank and meet the demands of servitude. In this light, this verse, ‘‘O Maryam! keep to obedience ...’’, seems to branch out from the preceding one, ‘‘O Maryam! surely Allāh has chosen you ...’’; that is, because Allāh has chosen you, purified you and chosen you over the women of the worlds, you should keep to obedience to Him and prostrate and bow down with those who bow down. Each of the three orders given in this verse may possibly have emanated from one of the three excellences mentioned in the preceding one — although their respective relationship is not clear.

QUR’ĀN: This is of the tidings of the unseen which we reveal to you: Allāh has counted it as a tiding of the unseen as He has done after relating the story of Yūsuf (a.s.): This is of the tidings of the unseen (which) we reveal to you, and you were not with them when they resolved upon their affair, and they were devising plans (12:102). Of course, the scriptures of the People of the Book contain stories about them, but no credence can be attached to them, because they have not remained safe from alterations, deletions and interpolations. For example, a lot of details and particulars given by the Qur’ān concerning the story of Zakariyyā are nowhere to be found in the Bible.

It is probably for this reason that Allāh goes on to say: ‘‘and you were not with them when they cast their pens...’’

Moreover, the Prophet and his people were unlettered; they had not known these stories, nor had they read them in books, as Allāh says after mentioning the story of Nūḥ: These a, e of the tidings of the unseen which We reveal to you; you did not know them — (neither) you nor your people — before this (11:49). But the first interpretation is more in keeping with the context of the verse.

QUR’ĀN: and you were not with them when they cast their pens (to decide) which of them should have Maryam in his charge: ‘‘al-Qalam’’ (اَلْقَلَمُ = pen; plural: al-aqlām = اَلْاَقْلَامُ), also means arrow shaft or arrow which was used for casting lot; in this meaning it is synonymous to as- sahm (اَلسَّهْمُ). Therefore, ‘‘when they cast their pens’’, means, when they cast their arrows to decide by lot which of them should have Maryam in his custody. This sentence shows that the contention mentioned in the next phrase, ‘‘and you were not with them when they contended one with another’’, refers to this same conflict which they had had about the guardianship of Maryam, and that they did not stop arguing with each other until they agreed to decide the matter by lot. They cast the lot and it came out in favour of Zakariyyā, and he took her charge, as Allāh says: and gave her into the charge of Zakariyyā (3:37).

According to some people, this contention and decision by lot probably occurred when Maryam was grown up and Zakariyyā had become too weak to look after her. Why did this idea occur to them? Probably it was because this contention and its settlement through lot has been mentioned after the story of Maryam’s birth and her being chosen by Allāh, and also because the guardianship of Zakariyyā has already been mentioned before. Thus, according to them, this verse refers to another guardianship.

But it is not unusual, while describing an event, to repeat, or to allude to, some of its previously mentioned aspects in order to prove a claim. A similar style has been used in the story of Yūsuf, where Allāh says at the end: This is of the tidings of the unseen (which) We reveal to you, and you were not with them when they resolved upon their affair, and they were devising plans (12:102). This points to their conspiracy which is mentioned at the begining of the story: When they said: ‘‘Certainly Yūsuf and his brother are dearer to our father than we, ... Slay Yūsuf or cast him (forth) into some land ...’’ A speaker from among them said: ‘‘Do not slay Yūsuf, and cast him down into the bottom of the pit if you must do (it), (so that) some of the travellers may pick him up’’ (12:8 — 10).

QUR’ĀN: When the angels said: ‘‘O Maryam! surely Allāh gives you good news of a Word: Evidently it refers to the same event which is mentioned in the Chapter of Maryam in these words: then We sent to her Our Spirit and there appeared to her a well-made man. She said: ‘‘Surely I fly for refuge from you to the Beneficient God, if you are pious.’’ He said: ‘‘I am only a messenger of your Lord: That I should give you a pure boy’’ (19:17 — 19). The good tiding ascribed to the angels in the verse under discussion is thus attributed here to the Spirit.

It is said that the word ‘‘angels’’ refers to Gabriel. He has been described with a plural, ‘‘angels’’, to show his great honour and high rank. People say: He went on a journey riding horses and sailing in ships — while actually he rode one horse and sailed in one ship only. Also, we say: People told him so, while in fact it was only one person who gave him the news. A similar style is seen in the story of Zakariyyā, mentioned earlier: Then the angels called to him… He said: ‘‘Even thus; does Allāh what He pleases’’ (3:39 — 40).

Others have said that there were other angels with Gabriel and they jointly gave her the good news.

However, if you ponder on the verses which describe the angels, you will see that the angels are of various ranks; some have precedence over others, some are nearer to Allāh than others. Those who are behind are mere followers of the orders of those who are in the forefront. The actions and words of the follower are counted as the actions and the words of the leader himself. It is not different from the activities of our own powers and limbs which are counted as our own activities without there being any duality of doers. We say: My own eyes saw it, my own ears heard it; and the same idea is conveyed when we say: I saw it and heard it. We say: My hand did it; my fingers wrote it; and also we say: I did it, I wrote it. Likewise the deeds and words of the angels of higher ranks are counted as the deeds and words of those of lower rank who follow the former’s orders, and vice versa. And similarly the actions and words of all the angels — the leaders and the followers — are attributed to Allāh Himself. Look at the action of giving death: In one place, Allāh attributes it to Himself: Allāh takes completely the souls at the time of their death (39:42); another verse ascribes it to the angel of death: Say: ‘‘The angel of death who is given charge of you shall take you completely’’ (32:11); and yet another one attributes it to a group of the angels: until when death comes to one of you, Our messengers take him completely (6:61).

A similar interchange is seen in the following verses: Surely We have revealed to you (4:163); The Faithful Spirit has descended with it upon your heart (26:193 — 194); Say: ‘‘Whoever is the enemy of Jibrīl — for surely he revealed it to your heart …’’ (2:97); Nay! surely it is an admonishment. So let him who pleases mind it. In honoured books, exalted, purified, in the hands of scribes, noble, virtuous (80:11 — 16).

Now it is clear that the announcement of good news by Gabriel was precisely the annoucement by the group of the angels under his authority. And Gabriel is one of the chiefs of the angels, one of those who are nearer to Allāh, as the Divine Words show: Most surely it is the word of an honoured messenger, the possessor of strength, having an honourable place with the Lord of the Throne, one (to be) obeyed, and faithful in trust (81:19 — 21). We shall explain it further, Allāh willing, under the ch. 35.

You may have a glimpse of the above mentioned reality in the verse: He said: ''Even so; Allāh creates what He pleases ...'' (3:47). Apparently the speaker of these words is Allāh, while in ch. 19 the same thing has been attributed to the Spirit: He (i.e., the Spirit) said: ''I am only a messenger of your Lord: That I should give you a pure boy.'' She said: ''How shall I have a boy and no mortal has touched me, nor have I been unchaste?'' He said: ''Even so, your Lord says: 'It is easy to Me ... ' '' (19:19 — 21).

That the angels and the Spirit talked with Maryam, shows that she was one of ''the spoken to''. Not only this; the earlier quoted words of ch. 19 show that in addition to hearing their speech, she even saw an angel: then we sent to her Our Spirit, and there appeared to her a well-made man. We shall further explain it, Allāh willing, under the Traditions.

QUR'ĀN: ''a Word from Him whose name is the Messiah, 'Īsā son of Maryam: We have fully explained the significance of the ''speech of Allāh'', under the verse: Those apostle, we have made some of them to excel the others (2:253).

al-Kalimah (اَلْكَلِمَةُ = word) is a collective noun, one unit of which is called al-kalim (اَلْكَلِمُ), as is the case with at-tamrah and at-tamr (اَلتَّمْرَةُ، اَلتَّمْرُ = date). al-Kalimah is used for one meaningful word as well as for a sentence (e.g., Zayd is standing); also, it is used with equal validity for a phrase or incomplete sentence (e.g., If Zayd is standing …). This explanation is according to language. As far as the terminology of the Qur'ān is concerned, as for example where it attributes a word to Allāh, it means: 'that which shows the will of Allāh'; it may be an order, e.g., the word of creation when He says to a thing, 'Be'; or it may be a word of revelation and inspiration, etc.

What is the meaning of ‘‘a Word from Allāh’’ when it is applied to ‘Īsā (a.s.)? Some people say: This title was given to ‘Īsā (a.s.) because the prophets who preceded him (or especially the prophets of Israel) had foretold his advent, giving the good news that he would be the saviour of Israel. We say in similar situations: This is my word which I had said. And it is in the same meaning that this word has been used by Allāh in connection with the advent of Mūsā (a.s.): and the good word of your Lord was fulfilled in the Children of Israel because they bore up (sufferings) patiently (7:137).

COMMENT: Although the books of the Bible may support this interpretation, the Qur’ān does not subscribe to it. According to the Qur’ān, ‘Īsā son of Maryam was a prophet who had brought the good news of a Messenger who will come after me, his name being Aḥmad (61:6); he was not the one whose good news was given by the others. Moreover, the phrase, ‘‘whose name is the Messiah’’, does not fit this interpretation; because according to this interpretation, ‘‘a Word from Him’’ refers to the advent of ‘Īsā, and not to ‘Īsā himself; while the phrase ‘‘whose name is the Messiah’’, says that the Messiah is the name of the word — and not the name of him in whom the word of Allāh was fulfilled.

Another interpretation: The ‘‘Word’’ refers to ‘Īsā (a.s.) because he explained the Torah giving it the meaning intended by Allāh, pointing out the interpolations and alterations made by the Jews, and clarifying the religious matters in which they had differed. Allāh quotes him as saying to the Children of Israel: … so that I may take clear to you part of what you differ in (43:63).

COMMENT: This interpretation justifies application of the ‘‘Word’’ to ‘Īsā (a.s.); but there is no association or proof in the Qur’ān to support it.

Third interpretation: The ‘‘Word’’ refers to the good news itself; Maryam was told that she would conceive ‘Īsā and deliver him. Accordingly, ‘‘Allāh gives you good news of a Word from Him,’’ means that Allāh gives you good news that you will give birth to ‘Īsā without the agency of man.

COMMENT: Obviously, the phrase, ‘‘whose name is the Messiah, ‘Īsā son of Maryam'', does not fit this interpretation.

Fourth interpretation: It refers to 'Īsā (a.s.) because he was the word of creation, i.e., the Divine Command, 'Be'. No doubt every man, nay, every thing, comes into being by the creative word, 'Be'; but every man is conceived and born according to the well-known normal system: the usual course is for the male sperm to fertilize the female ovum — and it requires many main and supporting causes to materialize. That is why conception is attributed to man as its efficient cause — as every effect is attributed to its immediate cause. But conception of 'Īsā did not follow this course; many usual and gradual causes were simply missing. His existence was just by the creative word, 'Be', and no usual causes intervened. And in this way, he became the ''Word'' itself, as we see in the verse: ... and His Word which He communicated to Maryam (4:171). It gets support from the verse 3:59, coming at the end: Surely the likeness of 'Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam; He created him from dust, then said to him, ''Be'', and he was.

COMMENT: This is the best of the interpretations.

al-Masīḥ (اَلْمَسِيْحُ = anointed; wiped clean), 'Īsā (a.s.) was given this name because he was anointed with success and blessing. Or because he was wiped clean of sins, was purified. Or because he was anointed with holy olive-oil, with which the prophets were anointed. Or because Gabriel wiped him with his wings at his birth, so that it should be a protection from Satan. Or because he used to touch and wipe the heads of the orphans. Or because he used to wipe the eyes of the blind and they gained eye-sight. Or because whenever he touched and wiped any suffering person, he became whole. These are the reasons given by the exegetes for this name.

The fact is that this name was included in the good news given by Gabriel to Maryam, as Allāh quotes him as saying: O Maryam! surely Allāh gives you good news of a Word from Him whose name is al-Masīḥ, 'Īsā son of Maryam. This word is the Arabicised form of the Meshiha, which is found in the Old and the New Testaments.[1]

The Bible shows that when a king was enthroned among the Children of Israel, the priests anointed him with the holy oil, so that he might be blessed in his rule. The king was therefore called messiah. It may be inferred from it that the messiah means either the king or the blessed one.

[1] The original Hebrew māshiaḥ became mashīḥā in Aramic; in Greek this became messiah, the form now in common use. (tr.)

It appears from their books that ʻĪsā (a. s.) was called the Messiah because the messianic prophecies of the Old Testament contained the prophecy of his kingdom; it was believed that there would appear in the Children of Israel a king who would deliver them from bondage. The Gospel according to Luke describes the angel's good news to Maryam in these words:

> And the angel came in unto her, and said, Hail thou that are highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women, And when she saw him, she was troubled at his saying, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favour with God. And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: And he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end. (Luke, 1:28 — 33)

And that was the excuse offered by the Jews for not accepting ʻĪsā's claim of prophethood. They said that the good news contained the prophecy of his kingdom and it did not materialize at any time during his life. And it was precisely to overcome this objection that the Christians interpreted the promised kingdom as the spiritual, and not the temporal one. Some Muslim exegetes too have taken the same line.

The author says: It is not unlikely that the name al-Masīḥ used in the good news may have meant ''the blessed''. When they anointed a king with the holy oil, it was done to bring blessings on him. This connotation may be supported by the verses: He said: ''Surely I am a servant of Allāh, He has given me the Book and made me a prophet: and He has made me blessed wherever I may be ...'' (19:30 — 31).

ʻĪsā was originally Yashūʻ which they interpret as deliverer, saviour. Some Muslims' traditions say that it means ''he lives''. It seems more appropriate in view of the perfect similarity between ʻĪsā and Yaḥyā whose name too means ''he lives''.[1]

[1] See the translator's note in vol. 5, p. 263, under the explanation of the verse 3:39. (tr.)

The name ʻĪsā is qualified with the phrase, son of Maryam, although the good news was being given to Maryam herself. It was done to emphasize the fact that he would be born without the agency of a father, and therefore would be known with this name; and that Maryam would jointly share this sign with him. Allāh says: and made her and her son a sign for the worlds (21:91).

QUR'ĀN: ''worthy of regard in this world and the hereafter and of those who are made near (to Allah): al-Wijāhah (اَلوجَاهَةُ = translated here as worthiness of regard) means esteem, prestige, eminence and acceptability. ʻĪsā's eminence and acceptability in this world is not a secret; and the Qur'ān confers this position to him in the hereafter too. Undoubtedly ʻĪsā (a. s.) was one of ''those who are made near''. He is near to Allāh, included in the rank of the friends of Allāh and the near angels in the verse: The Messiah does by no means disdain that he should be a servant of Allāh, nor do the angels who are near to Him (4:172). Allāh has explained the importance of being made near to Him, in the ch. 56. He says: When the great event comes to pass, ... and you shall be three sorts ... And the foremost are the foremost; these are they who are drawn near (to Allāh) (56:1 — 11). These verses point to the reality of the nearness to Allāh: Man presses forward leaving others behind in the way that leads one back to Allāh, then he comes nearer to Allāh. Proceeding on this way is prescribed for every man, nay, everything. Allāh says: O man! surely thou art striving to thy Lord, a hard striving, so that thou art to meet Him (84:6). Also, He says: now surely to Allāh do all affairs eventually come (42:53).

There is another aspect to this reality. Nearness to Allāh is an attribute of some angels. It means that this nearness is not necessarily a thing to be acquired by one's endeavours; whatever it is a gift from Allāh. It may therefore be said that it is a rank it is a gift from Allāh. It may therefore be said that it is a rank and status which the angels get by Divine bestowal and the men by their striving.

The expression, ''worthy of regard in this world and the hereafter'' is a circumstantial phrase; and so are other words in conjunctive with it, i.e., ''and of those who are made near''; ''and he shall speak''; ''and one of the good ones''; ''and He will teach him ...''; ''and a messenger ...''

QUR'ĀN: 'And he shall speak to the people when in the cradle and when of mature age ...'':al-Mahd (اَلْمَهْدُ = cradle; bed or cot for infant, especially one on rockers). al-Kahl (اَلْكَهْلُ = one of mature age) is derived from al-kuhūlah (اَلْكُهُوْلَةُ = to be of mature age); it is the middle age between youth and old age, it is the time when the body is at the height of its perfection and strength. That is why it is said that middle age is when white hair mixes with black. Others say that mature age means the age of forty-three.

In any case, it was a prophecy that he would live until he reached middle age; it was another good news for Maryam.

The Gospels say that he did not live on the earth more than thirty-three years. And yet the Qur'ān clearly talks about his middle age. It is a point to be pondered upon. It is because of this that some people have said that his middle age speech would occur after his coming down from the heaven — because he was not on the earth till his middle age. Some others have claimed that according to ''historical research'' 'Īsā (a.s.) lived for about sixty-four years, contrary to what the Gospels say. But the expression, ''when in the cradle and when of mature age,'' shows that he would not reach old age — his life on this earth would end in his middle age. In other words, the verse gives us both sides of his age — the infancy and the middle age.

Usually a child is put in cradle in the beginning of its life when it is in diapers, before it starts crawling or walking — generally in its second year or even before; and it is the age when it starts talking. Therefore, for a child to speak in cradle is not an extraordinary achievement. But the verse obviously has another importance: It means that he would speak to the people, when in the cradle, a complete and thought provoking speech which men of understanding would listen to, as they listen to the talk of a middle-aged man. In other words, he would talk to them in his cradle in the same manner as he would do in his mature age. Surely such a talk from an infant is extraordinary sign, a miracle.

Apart from that, the story as given in the ch. 19, clearly shows that he had spoken to the people in the very first hour of his life, when Maryam brought him to them soon after his birth. And undoubtedly when a child talks on the day he is born, it must be a miracle. Allāh says: And she came to her people with him, carrying him (with her). They said: ''O Maryam! surely you have done a strange thing. O sister of Hārūn! your father was not a bad man, nor was your mother an unchaste woman.'' But she pointed to him. They said: ''How should we speak to one who is a child in the cradle?'' He said: ''Surely I am a servant of Allāh; He has given me the Book and made me a prophet: And he has made me blessed wherever I may be, and He has enjoined on me prayer and zakāt so long as I live: And dutiful to my mother, and He has not made me insolent, unblessed: And peace on me on the day I was born, and on the day I die, and on the day I am raised to life'' (19:27 — 33).

QUR'ĀN: She said: ''My Lord! how shall there be a son (born) to me and man has not touched me?'': She addressed her talk to the Lord, although it was the Spirit in the form of a well-made man who was talking to her. It was based on the earlier explained reality that the talk of the angels and Spirit is in fact the talk of Allāh. She knew that it was God who was talking to her although the talk occurred through the agency of the Spirit or the angels. That is why she expressed her perplexity to her Lord.

Also, it is possible to look at this sentence as a cry for help. In that case, it will be a sentence in parenthesis, somewhat similar to the expression: he says: ''Send me back, my Lord, send me back'' (23:99).

QUR'ĀN: He said: ''Even so; Allāh creates what He pleases when He has decreed a matter, He only says to it, 'Be', and it is: We have described earlier the syntactic position of the word, ''Even so''. We have shown that, putting this reply by the side of the verse 19:21 (He said: ''Even so; your Lord says: 'It is easy to Me: and that we may make him a sign to men and a mercy from Us; and it is a matter which has been decreed' ''), it may be inferred that the word, ''Even so'', is a complete sentence, implying: Even so is the matter. That is, what you have been told is a matter which has been decreed; nothing can avert it.

As for her astonishment, it could only be in place if the matter was beyond the power of Allāh, or very difficult for Him to do. So far as His power is concerned, it is unlimited, He does whatever He pleases. And as for difficulty it is imaginable only where the matter depends on preliminaries and causes — the more numerous and more formidable the causes and preliminaries, the more difficult that matter. But Allāh does not create, what He creates, with the help of the causes; ''when He has decreed a matter, He only says to it, 'Be', and it is''.

It is thus evident that the word, ''Even so'', is a complete sentence meant to remove the perplexity of Maryam; the next sentence, ''Allāh creates what He pleases,'' aims at getting rid of the possible misunderstanding about Allāh's power; and lastly the sentence, ''when He has decreed a matter, He only says to it, 'Be', and it is,'' removes the delusion of difficulty and hardship.

QUR'ĀN: ''And He will teach him the Book and the Wisdom and the Torah and the Injīl: The definite articles, in ''the Book'' and ''the Wisdom'', denote the genes of the Book and the Wisdom. The Book, as explained earlier refers to revelation which removes the people's differences. The Wisdom is the useful knowledge related to the belief and action. Now the Torah and the Injīl themselves were books containing Wisdom. Yet, the Spirit or the angels mentioned them separately after the Book and the Wisdom. Sometimes a particular person or thing is mentioned after description of its genes, because that thing is important enough to deserve separate mention. The definite article in ''the Book'' is not for comprehensiveness. In other words, it does not say that 'Īsā (a.s.) was taught all the book, all the revelation. Allāh says: And when 'Īsā came with clear arguments, he said: ''I have come to you indeed with Wisdom, and so that I may make clear to you part of what you differ in; so fear Allāh and obey me'' (43:63) . Note the word, ''part of''; we have written about it earlier.

When the Qur'ān mentions the Torah, it refers to the revelation which Allāh had sent down to Mūsā (a.s.) inscribed on the tablets when he was on the Mount Sinai, as Allāh describes in the ch. 7, i.e., ''The Battlements''. As for the books presently in the hands of the Jews, they themselves admit a big vaccum and void, a large gap, in its chain of narrators between the reigns of Nebuchadnezzer, King of Babylon, and Cyrus, King of Persia. Nevertheless, the Qur'ān confirms that the Torah which was with the Jews in the days of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) was not altogether different from the original Torah — although it had been altered and interpolated to a great extent. The Qur'ānic verses clearly show these facts.

As for the Injīl — and it means ''good news'' — the Qur'ān says that it was a single book that was revealed to 'Īsā (a.s.), it was therefore a revelation sent especially to him. Allāh says: and He revealed the Torah and the Injīl aforetime, a guidance for the people (3:3 — 4). But the present Gospels attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, were admittedly written and composed long after ʻĪsā (a.s.).

The Qur'ān also shows that the Law was only in the Torah; the Injīl did not bring any new sharīʻah, except that it abrogated some rules of the Torah. Allāh says in the verses under discussion: ''And a verifier of that which is before me of the Torah, and that I may allow you part of that which has been forbidden to you.'' Again He says: and We gave him the Injīl in which was guidance and light, and verifying what was before it of Torah, and a guidance and an admonition for those who guard (against evil). And the people of the Injīl should have judged by what Allāh revealed in it ... (5:46 — 47). It may be inferred from this verse that there were some affirmative rules too in the Injīl.

The Qur'ān also shows that the Injīl, like the Torah, contained the good news of the advent of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), Allāh says: Those who follow the Messenger Prophet, the ummī, whom they find written down with them in the Torah and the Injīl (7:157).

QUR'ĀN :''And (make him) a messenger to the Children of Israel: Evidently ʻĪsā (a.s.) was sent particularly to the Children of Israel; and the verses concerning Mūsā (a.s.) imply the same thing about him. But while writing on the subject of prophethood, under the verse: Mankind was but one people; so Allāh sent the prophets ... (2:213); we have explained that ʻĪsā (a.s.), like Mūsā (a.s.), was one of the ulu 'l-ʻazm prophets, who were sent to the whole world.[1]

This problem may be solved if you look at the difference between a messenger and a prophet written there. It was mentioned that a prophet conveys to his people what is good for them in this world and the hereafter; and an apostle brings to them a special message which decides between the people with truth and finality — either providing them with eternal blissful life or bring to them destruction and perdition, as has been described in the words of Allāh: And every nation had a messenger; so when their messenger came, the matter was decided between them with justice and they shall not be dealt with unjustly (10:47).

[1] See al-Mīzān, vol.3, p.212. (tr.)

In other words, a prophet is a man who is sent to explain the religion to the men, while a messenger is sent to convey a special message whose rejection brings destruction and perdition in its wake, and whose acceptance bestows eternity and bliss.[1] This idea gets strengthened if we ponder on the messages given by the messengers (like: Nūḥ, Hūd, Ṣāliḥ, Shu'ayb and others, peace of Allāh be on them) to their nations, and which are quoted in the Qur'ān.

This being the case, being a messenger to a particular nation does not necessarily mean that he was sent as prophet to them only. Possibly a messenger sent to a particular nation could have been appointed as prophet to that nation together with other people — as was the case with Mūsā and 'Īsā (a.s.).

We find in the Qur'ān evidence in support of the above views. For Example, Mūsā (a.s.) was sent to Pharaoh, as Allāh said to him: Go to Pharaoh, surely he has exceeded all limits (20:24); and the magicians of the Pharaoh's nation believed in Mūsā (a.s.); evidently their belief was accepted by Allāh although they too were not from the Children of Israel, as Allāh says: they said: ''We believe in the Lord of Hārūn and Mūsā'' (20:70). Likewise, the call to the Divine Religion was addressed to the whole nation of Pharaoh: And certainly We tried before them the people of Pharaoh, and there came to them a noble messenger (44:17).

A similar phenomenon is seen about 'Īsā (a.s.). Before the appearance of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.), there had entered into the religion of 'Īsā a multitude of non-Israelites, like the Romans, the Franks, the Austrians, the Prussians and the Anglo-Saxons in the West, and the tribe of Najrān in the East. And when the Qur'ān speaks about the Christians, it does not single out the Israelite Christians. When it says something for or against them, it covers all Christians — Israelites and non-Israelites alike.[2]

[1] Ibid., p.205. (tr.)

[2] This argument seems inconclusive. 'Īsā (a.s.) himself said: ''I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.'' (Matthew, 15:23); and when he sent his Apostles to spread the Divine Message, he expressly forbade them to go to non-Israelites: ''Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and unto the city of the Samaritans enter you not: But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.'' (Matthew, 10:5 — 6). But St. Paul, who had never seen 'Īsā (a.s.) in his life, over-ruled the Apostles who had spent their time with 'Īsā (a.s.) and were privy to his ideas and ideals. Thus, St. Paul took Christianity to non-Israelites; and this transplantation bore out such fruits which could never be palatable to 'Īsā

QUR'ĀN: '' 'That I have come to you with a sign from your Lord, that I create for you out of dust like the form of a bird, then I breathe into it and it becomes a bird with Allāh's permission, and I heal the blind and the leper, and bring the dead ones to life with Allāh's permission,: ''al-Khalq'' (اَلْخَلْقُ = to create; to assemble the parts of a thing). This verse ascribes creation to someone other than Allāh; the same idea is implied by the verse: so blessed be Allāh, the best of the creators (23:14).

al-Akmah (اَلْاَكْمَهُ = one who is born blind). ar-Rāghib says that it is sometimes used for one who has lost his eyesight, i.e., as synonymous to blind. It is said: His eyes kamahat (كَمَهَتْ = lost their sight until they became white).

al-Abraṣ (اَلْاَبْرَصُ) means one having al-barṣ (اَلْبَرْصُ = leprosy, a well-known skin disease).

He said, ''and bring the dead ones to life'', using the plural. It proves, or at least hints, that he brought to life many dead persons. And he said, ''with Allāh's permission'', to make it clear that these miraculous signs appearing on his hands were actually attributed to Allāh, not that 'Īsā (a. s.) had any independent power to do so. He went on repeating this phrase to put utmost emphasis on this aspect.

There was a real danger of people believing him to be a god — because of these miracles. That is why he repeatedly added the proviso, ''with Allāh's permission'', after every miracle which could confuse and mislead the people, like creation of bird, and bringing the dead to life. And it was because of this very reason that he ended his talk saying: Surely Allāh is my Lord and your Lord, therefore worship Him; this is the straight path.

The verse, ''that I create for you ...'', apparently means that these miracles had actually happened on his hands; it was not just a talk, nor just a challenge. Had he wanted only to tell them that he had got that power — just to complete his argument against them — he would have added some proviso like, ''if you ask for it'', or ''if you so desire''.

Moreover, the talk that Allāh will have on the Day of Resurrection

(a.s.) himself.

Clearly, we cannot bring in evidence an action of St. Paul (or more precisely, the fruit of that action) which was diametrically opposed to a clear instruction of 'Īsā (a.s.). (tr.) with ʻĪsā clearly shows that these miracles had actually happened: When Allāh will say: ''O ʻĪsā son of Maryam! remember My favour on you and on your mother ... and when you created out of clay a thing like the form of a bird by My permission, then you breathed into it and it became a bird by My permission, and you healed the blind and the leper by My permission; and when you brought forth the dead ones by My permission ... '' (5:110).

Some people have said: Utmost that can be proved from these verses is that Allāh had given him this power, and that he mentioned that power when he argued with the people. Thus, he completed his proof against them, because he would have shown those miracles, if they had asked for them. But it does not prove that all or some of these miracles did actually happen.

COMMENT: The explanation given by us and the Divine Speech on the Day of Resurrection make it abundantly clear that all these miracles did actually take place, and that it is absolutely wrong to cast any doubt on them.

QUR'ĀN: ''and I inform you of what you eat and what you store in your houses ...: This is news of the unseen which is reserved for Allāh and his messengers who knew it by Divine Revelation. It is another miracle, an information of the unseen which was beyond any doubt or confusion — man, after all, cannot have any doubt about what he has eaten or has stored in his house.

This miracle does not have the proviso, ''by permission of Allāh'', although no miracle can take place without Allāh's permission. Allāh Himself says: and it was not meet for a messenger that he should bring a sign except with Allāh's permission (40:78). The reason of this omission lies in the verb ''inform''. ʻĪsā (a.s.) was to give them those informations; it would be a speech emanating from ʻĪsā (a.s.). In other words, it was ʻĪsā's action, and as such was not worthy of being attributed to Allāh, in contrast to the preceding two signs, i.e., creation and bringing the dead to life, which are really the actions of Allāh and cannot be attributed to anyone else except by His permission.

Moreover, these two signs were not like giving those informations. They had more potentiality of leading people astray, when compared to his informing them of what they ate and what they kept in store. Simple minded people can very easily accept the Godhead of a creator of birds and resurrector of dead, rather than the divinity of one who gives them the news of the unseen. Common people do not think that the knowledge of the unseen is exclusively reserved for Allāh; they think that it is not so difficult an art and may be attained to by any magician through training and practice. That is why ʻĪsā (a.s.) found it necessary, when talking to them, to put the condition of Allāh's permission, on the two signs, and not on this last one. The same is the case of healing; it was sufficient just to mention, as he did in the beginning, that it was ''a sign from your Lord''; and especially when he was talking with the people who claimed to be believers. That is why he ended his talk with the words, most surely there is a sign in this for you, if you are believers, i.e., if you are truthful in your claim that you are a believer.

QUR'ĀN: '' 'And a verifier of that which is before me of the Torah, and that I may allow you part of that which has been forbidden to you: It is in conjunction with ''and a messenger to the Children of Israel''. Of course, this phrase is in the first person (i.e., spoken by ʻĪsā, a.s.) while the former is in the third person (i.e., spoken by the Spirit); but it makes no difference because the former, i.e., ''and a messenger ...'', has been immediately explained by ʻĪsā (a.s.) in the following words: ''That I have come to you with a sign from your Lord ...''; and this has changed the mode from the third to the first person — and this makes the conjunction perfect.

He came as a verifier of the Torah; he verified the Torah which was revealed before him and which he was taught by Allāh, as the preceding verse says. In other words, he verified the original Torah which was given to Mūsā (a.s.). This phrase, therefore, does not show that he verified the Torah which was with the Jews in his time, nor does it imply that the Torah of his days was unaltered. The same applies to the verification of the Torah by our Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

QUR'ĀN: '' 'and that I may allow you part of that which has been forbidden to you: Allāh had forbidden them some of the good things, as He says: Wherefore for the iniquity of those who are Jews did We disallow to them the good things which had been made lawful for them ...

(4:160).

This talk shows that ‘Īsā (a.s.) had endorsed the laws of the Torah with exception of some tough rules prescribed for them in the Torah, which he abrogated. That is why it is said that the Injīl does not contain a new sharī‘ah.

The phrase, ‘‘and that I may allow you ...’’, is in conjunction with, the phrase, ‘‘with a sign from your Lord’’; the preposition, li (ل = that), describes the purpose; the sentence therefore means: I have come to you for the purpose of abrogating some of the hard rules imposed on you in the Torah.

QUR’ĀN: ‘‘ ‘and I have come to you with a sign from your Lord ...: Apparently, this is to make it clear that the following phrases, ‘‘therefore fear Allāh and obey me’’, are based on his bringing a sign from Allāh, and not on his allowing some of the forbidden things. It is to remove this possible misunderstanding that the phrase, ‘‘and I have come to you with a sign from your Lord’’, has been repeated.

QUR’ĀN: ‘‘ ‘Surely Allāh is my Lord and your Lord, therefore worship Him ...’ ’’: ‘Īsā (a.s.) said it in order to cut off the excuse of those who were to believe in his divinity — either because he (a.s.) had detected such tendency in them or because he was informed through revelation of these future happenings. It was a sincere attempt to remove all chances of misunderstandings, as he had done when he added the proviso, ‘‘with Allāh’s permission’’, while talking about creating a bird and bringing the dead ones to life. But it appears from his talk on the Day of Judgment as quoted by the Qur’ān in the verse 5:117 (I did not say to them aught save what Thou didst enjoin me with: That worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord ...), that he had said it in pursuance of the order of Allāh and His revelation.

QUR’ĀN: But when ‘Īsā perceived unbelief on their part, he said: ‘‘Who are my helpers to Allāh?’’: The narration leaves unsaid his life story from his conception to the early days of his mission, because its important milestones had already been mentioned in the good news given to Maryam. That is why this verse picks up the thread of narration from the point when ‘Īsā (a.s.), after announcing his mission and showing the aforesaid miracles, faced resistance from his people. It describes how he selected his disciples, how his people planned against him, and how Allāh defeated their conspiracy by purifying him, taking him away to Himself and making him to ascend to Him. And thus the story ends.

The narrative throws light on those aspects only which were immediately needed for clarifying the subject matter to the Christians of Najrān, whose delegation was then at Medina for discussion and argument. That is why many other points of the story, mentioned in the Chapters of: 'The Women,' 'The Table,' 'The Prophets,' 'The Embellishment' and 'The Ranks,' have been omitted in this one. The use of the word, perception or sense, in connection with unbelief — although disbelief is a matter pertaining to heart — implies that their disbelief was so transparent that it could be perceived by external senses. It could alternatively mean that when they, because of their disbelief, planned to harm and kill him, he sensed it and in this way perceived their disbelief. The verse therefore means: When 'Īsā perceived, i.e., felt, sensed and noticed the unbelief of the Children of Israel — whose name was mentioned in the good news given to Maryam — he said: ''Who are my helpers to Allāh?'' He asked this question as he wanted to distinguish and set apart a selected group of his people who would be solely dedicated to truth; they would strengthen the power of religion and form the nucleus around which the structure of religion would be built — they would be the centre from which the Divine Religion would spread. We find this phenomenon in every physical, social and other powers: When a party begins its activities, it finds it necessary to take for itself a core of dedicated cadre, on which it gets its strength. Otherwise, it could not pursue its activity and would become useless. In Islamic history, the same phenomenon is seen in the pledges of allegiance of the mountain pass and the tree. The Messenger of Allāh's aim in the two pledges was to concentrate the full strength of Islam, reinforcing its power, in order that the Divine Mission could spread and succeed.

Thus 'Īsā (a.s.) became sure that his mission was not succeeding in the Children of Israel — in a major part of them — and that they were not ready to believe in him no matter what he did. He was afraid that if they succeeded in destroying his life, the mission would fail and the difficulties would increase. Therefore, he wanted to make arrangements as a safeguard against that eventuality. He sought help of a selected group in proceeding towards Allāh. The disciples answered his call and thus were distinguished from among the whole nation by their belief. It paved the way to distinguish belief from disbelief, by making the faith victorious over faithlessness, spreading his mission and establishing proofs. Allāh says: O you who believe! be helpers of Allāh, as 'Īsā son of Maryam said to (his) disciples: ''Who are my helpers to Allāh?'' The disciples said: ''We are helpers of Allāh.'' So a party of the Children of Israel believed and another disbelieved; then we aided those who believed against their enemy, and they became uppermost (61:14).

'Īsā (a.s.) qualified his question, ''Who are my helpers'', with the phrase, ''to Allāh''. He did so to awaken their longing and arouse their eagerness to proceed towards Allāh, to be near Him. And this was the real reason for asking this question. The same was the idea behind the question, Who is it that will lend to Allāh, a goodly loan ... (2:245). It is the preposition ''to'', in ''my helpers to Allāh'', which implies the meaning of going or proceeding, etc. A similar connotation is found in the declaration of Ibrāhīm (a.s.) as quoted in the Qur'ān: Surely I go to my Lord: He will guide me (37:99).

Some commentators have said that ''to'' in the above sentence means ''with''; the question according to them means: Who are my helpers with Allāh? But there is no evidence to support this explanation. Moreover, it is against the manners of the Qur'ān to count Allāh in line with others. The Qur'ān cannot count others as the helpers when it counts Allāh as the Helper. Nor is it in conformity with the manners of 'Īsā (a.s.) which shines so brightly everywhere in his narrative in the Qur'ān. Furthermore, the reply of the disciples too does not support this interpretation. In case this meaning were correct, the disciples should have said: 'We are your helpers with Allāh.' (Think over it).

QUR'ĀN: The disciples said: ''We are helpers of Allāh: We believe in Allāh and be (our) witness that we are submitting ones: A man's ''al-ḥawāriyy'' (اَلْحَوَارِيُّ) is the one exclusively attached to him. It is reportedly derived from al-ḥawr (اَلْحَوْرُ = intense whiteness; marked contrast between the white of the corona and the black of the iris). The Qur'ān has not used this word except for the close companions of 'Īsā (a.s.).

The sentence: ''We believe in Allāh'', is a sort of explanation of their former declaration, ‘‘We are helpers of Allāh’’. This too supports the above exegesis that ‘Īsā’s phrase, ‘‘my helpers to Allāh’’, implies proceeding on the way leading to Allāh, because true belief is the prescribed way.

Was it their first entry into the circle of faith? Obviously not. The wordings used in verse 61:14 (...‘Īsā son of Maryam said to [his] disciples: ‘‘Who are my helpers to Allāh?’’ The disciples said: ‘‘We are helpers of Allāh.’’ So a party of the Children of Israel believed ...), show that it was a belief after belief. And there is nothing strange in it, as we have already explained that the īmān and islām are of various ranks, one upon the other.

Going a step further, look at the verse: And when I revealed to the disciples, saying, ‘‘Believe in Me and My messenger,’’ they said: ‘‘We believe and be our witness that we are the submitting ones’’ (5:111). It clearly shows that this reply of theirs was based on a revelation from Allāh; in other words, they were prophets. Therefore, the belief referred to in their reply was a belief after belief.

Proceeding further, we find them saying: ... and be our witness that we are submitting ones. Our Lord! we believe in what Thou hast revealed and we follow the messenger; so write us down with those who bear witness. The islām or submission to which they have referred, is unconditional surrender and submission to all that Allāh demands from them and desires for them. This too implies that it was not the initial belief, but a belief after belief, because such submission is not found except in the sincere believers; it is not within the reach of those who merely bear witness to the Oneness of God and the prophethood of the Prophet. We have earlier explained in detail that every stage of īmān is preceded by a relevant stage of islām. Their words: ‘‘We believe in Allāh and be (our) witness that we are submitting ones,’’ also point to this very fact: They used the verb for belief (implying a new occurrence) and adjective for submission (implying a sort of permanence). The first stage of islām is submission and generally bearing witness to the basic of religion. This is followed by a heartfelt belief in the above testimony in principle. Then comes the second stage of islām and that is the sincere submission to the meaning of the said belief. When this stage comes, all possibilities are removed of anger or annoyance with what Allāh and His messenger has ordered. In other words, the believer puts in practice the tenets of religion. It is followed by the second stage of īmān. This is the stage when deeds become sincere and the attributes of servitude are deeply ingrained in all actions and activities. This is followed by the third stage of islām which means surrender to the love of Allāh and to His will; such a Muslim does not love anything except because of Allāh and does not want anything except for Allāh; then nothing happens on his hands except that which Allāh loves and desires, and the man's own love and desire are completely forgotten. It is followed by the third stage of īmān, when this servile submission permeates all his actions and deeds.

Keep in view this short description of the stages of islām and īmān. Then ponder on the call of 'Īsā (a.s.) as he said: ''therefore fear Allāh and obey me. Surely Allāh is my Lord and your Lord, therefore worship Him; this is the straight path''. Note that he (a.s.) first told them to fear Allāh and obey himself. And he gave the reason of that order, in these words, ''Surely Allāh is my Lord and your Lord''. That is, Allāh is your Lord, O people of my nation, and He is also the Lord of His messenger whom He has sent to you. Therefore, it is obligatory for you to fear Him by believing in Him, and to obey me by following me. In short, you are obliged to worship and serve Him with piety and His fear, obeying His messenger, i.e., with belief and following. This much is clearly understood from his words. That is why the fear of Allāh and obedience of the prophet have been changed to the phrase, ''therefore worship Him''; He effected this change to make it clear that this order and this affair is attributed to Allāh, and that attribution becomes crystal clear in the worship. Then he said that this worship is a straight path — it is a way that leads the walker to Allāh.

After issuing that call, he perceived their disbelief, and he felt that there was no ground for hoping that their general public would accept true faith. Therefore, he said: ''Who are my helpers to Allāh?'' He was seeking helpers for proceeding on this straight path to which he had invited the people. That is the path of servitude — the piety and obedience. The disciples answered his call accepting the same thing he had asked for. They said: ''We are helpers of Allāh.'' Then they proceeded to explain it in these words: ''We believe in Allāh and be (our) witness that we are submitting ones.'' The submission here refers to their obedience and following. It was for this reason that when they humbly and beseechingly spoke to their Lord, telling Him what they had promised ʻĪsā (a.s.), they changed the word, submission, to the following; and expanded the circle of belief to cover all that was revealed by Allāh. They said: ''Our Lord! we believe in what Thou hast revealed and we follow the messenger.''

It means that they believed in all that Allāh had revealed, and in what He had taught ʻĪsā son of Maryam of the Book and the Wisdom and the Torah and the Injīl, and they followed the messenger in this matter. You will appreciate that it is among the highest ranks of belief, not its lower ones.

The disciples did not say: We believe in Allāh and we are submitting ones. Instead they asked ʻĪsā (a.s.) to be their witness regarding their submission and following. They did so in order that they should have a proof when they spoke to their Lord and said: ''Our Lord! we believe in what Thou hast revealed and we follow the messenger.'' It was as though they said: Our Lord! This is our condition and Thy messenger is our witness for it.

QUR'ĀN: ''Our Lord! we believe in what Thou hast revealed and we follow the messenger; so write us down with those who bear witness'': It is direct quotation of what the disciples said — without using an introductory phrase, like, 'They said.' This dramatic style of the Qur'ān (as we have mentioned somewhere) puts the audience in a position where they seem to hear the words directly from the speakers — not through a narrator. They asked their Lord to write them down with those who bear witness. And they based this prayer on their islām and īmān both. A messenger conveys his message when he explains what Allāh has revealed to him — both in words and in practice. He teaches the tenets of religion and himself acts upon them. Those who shall bear witness that the messenger conveyed the Divine Message to his people shall do so by learning the message from the messenger and following him in the sharīʻah. In this way, it will be seen that the messenger himself practises what he tells others to do — he does not ignore it nor does he transgress it.

Apparently, this witnessing refers to their testimony that the messenger had truly conveyed the message, as Allāh says in the verse: Most certainly then We will question those to whom (the messengers) were sent, and most certainly We will question the messengers (7:6). As for the witnessing mentioned in the verse 5:83 (And when they hear what has been revealed to the Messenger, you will see their eyes overflowing with tears on account of the truth that they recognize; they say: ''Our Lord! we believe, so write us down with the witnesses.''), it refers to bearing witness for the truth of the messengership not for conveying the message. And Allāh knows better.

Another possible explanation: They had asked the messenger to be witness for their islām; thereafter they prayed to Allāh to write them down with those who bear witness. Probably they wanted Allāh to write them among those who shall bear witness for deeds, as appears from the prayer of Ibrāhīm and Ismā'īl (a.s.) quoted in the Qur'ān: ''Our Lord! and make us both submissive to Thee and (raise) from our offspring a group submitting to Thee, and show us our ways of devotion ... (2:128). Refer for details to what we have written under that verse.

QUR'ĀN: And they planned and Allāh (also) planned, and Allāh is the best of planners: The planners were the Children of Israel, as appears from the preceding verse, ''But when 'Īsā perceived unbelief on their part ...'' We have explained under the verse 2:26 (... but He does not cause to err by it [any] except the transgressors) what planning means when it is attributed to Allāh.

QUR'ĀN: And when Allāh said: ''O 'Īsā! I am going to take you away completely: ''at-Tawaffī'' (اَلتَّوَفِّي) is to take something completely. It is for this reason that it is also used for death, because at the time of death Allāh takes man's soul away from his body. See, for example, the following verses:

> ... Our messengers take him completely (6:61), i.e., cause him to die.
>
> And they say: ''What! when we have become lost in the earth, shall we then indeed be in a new creation?'' ... Say: ''The angel of death who is given charge of you shall take you completely (i.e., cause you to die), then to your Lord you shall be brought back'' (32:10 — 11).
>
> Allāh takes completely the souls at the time of their death, and those that die not during their sleep, then He withholds those on whom He has passed the decree of death and sends the others back till an appointed term ... (39:42).
> Pondering on the last two verses you will see that the Qur'ān has not used at-tawaffī in the meaning of death, rather the word gives the idea of taking and preserving. In other words, when at-tawaffī is used for death, it is not because it means death; rather it is used to emphasize the connotation of taking and preserving, to show and establish that man's soul does not perish, is not destroyed by death — contrary to what ignorant people think; Allāh keeps and preserves it until comes the time to return it to its body for resurrection. At other places where this sense is not involved, Allāh uses the word al-mawt(اَلْمَوْتُ = death), and not at-tawaffī. For example:

> And Muḥammad is no more than a messenger, the messengers have already passed away before him; if then he dies or is killed, will you turn back upon your heels? (3:144).
> ... it shall not be finished with them entirely so that they should die ... (35:36).

There are a lot of other verses of this type, not excepting some verses in 'Īsā's story itself: For example, there are, 'Īsā's words about himself: And peace be on me on the day I was born, and on the day I die, and on the day I am raised to life (19:33); and Allāh's words about him: And there is not one of the people of the Book but most certainly shall believe in him before his death, and on the Day of Resurrection he ('Īsā) shall be a witness against them (4:159).

It all shows that at-tawaffī does not necessarily mean death.

This interpretation is also supported by the words of Allāh refuting the claim of the Jews: And their saying: ''Surely we killed the Messiah, 'Īsā son of Maryam, the messenger of Allāh;'' and they did not kill him nor did they crucify him, but it appeared to them so (like 'Īsā); and most surely those who differ therein are only in a doubt about it; they have no knowledge respecting it, but only follow a conjecture; and they killed him not for sure. Rather, Allāh took him up to Himself; and Allāh is Mighty, Wise. And there is not one of the people of the Book but most certainly shall believe in him before his death and on the Day of Resurrection he ('Īsā) shall be a witness against them (4:157 — 159). The Jews claimed that they had killed the Messiah, 'Īsā son of Maryam, and likewise the Christians think that the Jews had killed 'Īsā son of Maryam by crucifixion, and that after he was crucified Allāh raised him up from his grave to the heaven, as the Gospels say. But the Qur'ānic verses, as you see, unequivocally refute the story of killing and crucifixion both.

It is apparent from the Divine Words, And there is not one of the people of the Book ..., that ʻĪsā (a.s.) is alive near Allāh and that he will not die until all the people of the Book shall believe in him. Keeping all these factors in view, the word at-tawaffī, used in the verse under discussion, would only mean that Allāh was to take him away completely from among the Jews. Yet the verse does not say so clearly; it is only its apparent connotation. (We shall write in detail on this subject at the end of the fourth Chapter, 'The Women'.)

QUR'ĀN: 'and cause you to ascend unto Me and purify you of those who disbelieve: ''ar-Rafʻ '' (اَلرَّفْعُ = to raise, to cause to ascend) is opposite of al-waḍʻ (اَلْوَضْعُ = to put down); aṭ-ṭahārah (اَلطَّهَارَةُ = cleanliness, purity) is opposite of al-qadhārah (اَلْقَذَارَةُ = dirtiness, impurity). We have already explained the meaning of cleanliness. The phrase, ''cause you to ascend'', is qualified by the word, ''unto Me''; and it implies that the ascension was spiritual, rather than physical; because Allāh has no place like the physical spaces in which a body or things related to body arrive, stay or settle down, and from which they depart or to which they come nearer. Accordingly, this phrase will have the same connotation as the words at the end of this very verse have: then to Me shall be your return. This interpretation will be strengthened if at-tawaffī is taken to mean ''to cause to die''; because in that case, ''to cause to ascend to Me'' would imply raising his rank and taking him nearer to Allāh. Its meaning will, then, be similar to the verse 3:169, wherein Allāh says about those who are martyred in His way: they are alive near their Lord; and the verse 19:57, where He says about Idrīs (a.s.): And We raised him to a high station.

Another interpretation: The ascension refers to his being raised alive with his body and soul together to the heaven; because the apparent meaning of the Qur'ānic verses suggest that the heaven — i.e. the physical one — is the place of nearness to Allāh, the venue from which the Divine favours and blessings are sent down, and where the honoured angels live. Probably, we shall discuss the meaning of as-samā' (اَلسَّمَآءُ = sky, heaven) somewhere else, Allāh willing.

Purification from the unbelievers, as it is preceded by ascension to Allāh, implies spiritual, rather than physical purification. Accordingly, it means that Allāh would keep him away from the unbelievers, protect him from mingling with them, and remove him from their society — the society that is polluted by their unbelief and rejection of truth.

QUR'ĀN: ''and make those who follow you above those who disbelieve to the Day of Resurrection: In this verse Allāh gives a promise that He will surely make the followers of 'Īsā (a.s.) prevail over his adversaries who disbelieved in his prophethood, and that this predominance will continue upto the Day of Resurrection. This verse distinguishes the superior group from the inferior one, saying that the superior ones are those who follow 'Īsā (a.s.) and the opposite group is that of the unbelievers — without mentioning that they were from the Children of Israel, or that they were the Jews who professed to follow the sharī'ah of Mūsā (a.s.) or pointing to them in. any other way.

Of course, looking at the fact that his adversaries have been defined as unbelievers, it appears that ''those who follow you'' refers to the following in the way of truth, a following that is approved by Allāh and which He is pleased with. Accordingly, his followers would be those Christians who did not deviate from his straight path before Islam came to abrogate 'Īsā's religion; and after the advent of Islam it is the Muslims who are his followers — because only these two groups are his followers in the path of truth. If so, then the promised superiority would mean their superiority in their arguments and proofs, not their material domination or their rule over his adversaries. The meaning thus will be as follows: The proof of your followers, i.e., the above mentioned Christians and the Muslims, shall be victorious over the proof of those who disbelieve in you, i.e., the Jews, upto the Day of Resurrection.

The above was the explanation given and chosen by the exegetes. But I think that the verse does not support this interpretation either explicitly or implicitly. Evidently the whole sentence, ''I am going to take you away completely and cause you to ascend unto Me and purify you of those who disbelieve, and make those who follow you above those who disbelieve to the Day of Resurrection,'' is news of what was to happen in the future: His being taken away, his ascension to Allāh, his purification from disbelievers and the domination of his followers over unbelievers — all was to happen sometimes after Allāh had given him this news. Moreover, the words, ''and make those who follow you above those who disbelieve,'' contain a promise and a good tiding, and good tiding always refer to some future event. And it is known that the proof of the ‘Īsā’s followers is nothing but the proof of ‘Īsā himself. These are the very proofs which were mentioned in the good news given to Maryam. And those proofs had certainly gained ascendancy over those of the unbelievers, both when ‘Īsā (a.s.) was present before his ascension, as well as after his ascension. It may rather be said that before his ascension those proofs were more decisive and more convincing in face of his adversaries’ claims than they were after his ascension. This being the case, what is the meaning of a promise that his followers’ proofs would overcome those of his adversaries — in future? Again, why should this dominance be limited ‘‘to the Day of Resurrection’’ only? If a proof is victorious and convincing it should remain so for all times, without any limitation of time or day. Moreover, victory of a true proof over false ones will be even more manifest on the Day of Resurrection, as the Qur’ān informs us in connection of that Day’s happenings.

A suggestion: Perhaps predominance of proof means that it would be more popular, more widely accepted — people would heed more to it, would accept it more readily; in this way their number would increase, and their power be more formidable.

COMMENT: Does it mean that his true followers would prevail over the disbelievers, would rule over them and overwhelm them with their power? But the fact is otherwise. It is no use saying that it may be a good news which would come true in distant future in the last days of the world, because the wordings of the verse do not allow such delay.

Or does it mean predominance in number? That is, his followers — the followers of truth after ‘Īsā (a.s.) — would be more numerous than the followers of falsehood? But reality belies it. The followers of falsity have always been in majority, and the people of truth always in minority, right from the time of ‘Īsā (a.s.) upto these days of ours — a long period of two millennia. Moreover, the wordings of the verse do not support this interpretation either. Look at the context; the verse gives ‘Īsā (a.s.) the good news that Allāh’s displeasure was to descend on the Jews, that they were to be overwhelmed by Divine Anger. In this background, the predominance of his followers conforms more with his followers’ hold and dominance over his adversaries — either through convincing proofs or through rule and domination. But in no way does it point to the majority in number.

Let us have a fresh look at this verse: It distinguishes the two groups with two verbs: ‘‘those who follow you’’, and ‘‘those who disbelieve’’. The verb shows that an action has taken or will take place within the framework of a time — past, present or future. The implication would differ if these phrases were changed to adjectives: ‘‘followers’’ and ‘‘disbelievers’’; because adjectives show a more or less permanent attribute which transcends time limits, the said attribute is found in its related thing or person at all times. Suppose there is a group of people who do something good or bad, and the rest of the nation is pleased with it, even the coming generations agree with what their ancestors did, then this much ideological identity and psychological identification are enough to ascribe that action or thing to the whole nation. For example, the Qur’ān admonishes the Jews and condemns them because of their ancestors’ actions like hurting and slaying the prophets, their arrogance in face of the commands of Allāh and His messengers, their alterations and interpolations in the Book of Allāh and many other things like that.

In view of the above-mentioned two principles, ‘‘those who disbelieve’’ may be interpreted as the whole Jewish nation; and ‘‘those who follow you’’ may mean all the Christians because their early fathers had believed in and followed ‘Īsā (a.s.) — and it was a correct belief and true following — although Allāh was not pleased with those among them who believed in the trinity before Islam, nor was He pleased with the whole nation when they continued to follow ‘Īsa (a.s.) even after the advent of Islam.

The sentence therefore means that Allāh was to make the Christians — whose ancestors had truly followed ‘Īsā (a.s.) — dominant over the Jews because they had disbelieved in ‘Īsā (a.s.) and had planned and conspired against him.

The aim is to show that Allāh’s wrath has descended on the Jews, and His severe chastisement has engulfed their nation. (We have explained above that the early Christians had truly followed ‘Īsā [a.s.]; and therefore the whole Christian nation may be included in the phrase, ‘‘those who follow you’’.)

Going further, we find the phraseology changed. Instead of saying ‘‘those who follow you’’, Allāh says: ‘‘And as to those who believe and do good deeds ...'' This too supports our interpretions that ''those who follow you'' covers all the Christians, irrespective of their present belief and behaviour. It does not mean only the Muslims and those Christians who had correct belief and had truly followed 'Īsā (a.s.) — in short it is not confined to those who will be saved in the hereafter. Otherwise, Allāh would have continued the earlier mode of expression and said: And as to those who follow you, He will pay them fully their rewards.

Another interpretation: ''those who follow you'' covers all the Christians and all the Muslims; and the verse foretells that upto the Day of Resurrection the Jews would always remain under the domination of those who believe that it is obligatory to follow 'Īsā (a.s.) — and the basis of the explanation is the same as above. And it is the best of the interpretations written for this verse.

QUR'ĀN: ''then to Me shall be your return, so I will decide between you concerning that in which you differed: This talk is addressed jointly to 'Īsā (a.s.) and those who followed him and those who disbelieved in him. It gives their ultimate result on the Day of Resurrection. And with this verse the story of 'Īsā (a.s.) comes to its end — from the time Maryam got the good news to the end of his earthly life.

QUR'ĀN: ''Then as to those who disbelieve, I will chastise them with severe chastisement in this world and the hereafter, ...'': Apparently, it branches out from the phrase, ''so I will decide between you''; it gives detail of that preceding general statement, describing the Divine Judgment on the Day of Resurrection — severe chastisement for the Jews who disbelieve, and full reward for the believers.

But the phrase ''in this world'' shows that the verse branches out from two preceding sentences: ''and make those who follow you above those who disbelieve ...''; ''Then to Me shall be your return ...'' Thus, the verse says that as a result of that ''making'' and that ''returning'', the disbelievers shall be severely punished in this world on the hands of those whom Allāh has made dominant above them, and in the hereafter with the Fire, and they shall have no helpers.

It is another proof to show that in the preceding verse, making dominant means domination through power and rule, not through proofs.

The sentence ''and they shall have no helpers'' proves that they will not be able to avail of any intercession which could protect them from the chastisement. It is a firm decree which cannot change.

QUR'ĀN: And as to those who believe and do good deeds, He will pay them fully their rewards ...: It is an attractive promise of good reward for those who followed 'Īsā (a.s.). But, as mentioned above, the phrase ''those who follow you'' could be applied to the whole nation even when only a few of them actually followed him. Application of a name is one thing and actually having that attribute personally is something else. Good result and lovely reward is given only to him who actually has that attribute — not to him who is merely included in nomenclature. Allāh says: Surely those who believe, and those who are Jews, and the Christians, and the Sabaeans, whoever believes in Allāh and the Last Day and does good, they shall have their reward from their Lord, and there is no fear for them, nor shall they grieve (2:62).

This then is the reward of those who believed and did good deeds from among those who followed 'Īsā (a.s.); Allāh will pay them fully their reward. The other group from those followers shall get no reward. Allāh has pointed to this fact at the end of the verse: and Allāh does not love the unjust.

It is now clear why this verse — a verse of mercy and paradise — has ended with the phrase ''and Allāh does not love the unjust''. Otherwise, such verses usually end with Divine Names of mercy and forgiveness, or on praise of those for whom the verse is revealed. For example :

And Allāh has promised good to all; and Allāh is aware of what you do (57:10).

If you lend to Allāh a goodly loan, He will double it for you and forgive you; and Allāh is grateful, forbearing (64:17).

... and whoever believes in Allāh and does good, He will remove from him his evil and cause him to enter gardens beneath which rivers flow, to abide therein for ever; that is the great achievement (64:9).

Then as to those who believed and did good, their Lord will make them enter into His mercy; that is the manifest achievement (45:30).

We may go on quoting such examples from the Qur'ān. However, it is now clear that the phrase ''and Allāh does not love the unjust'' describes the other group from among those who claim to follow 'Īsā (a.s.) but are not true believers, nor do they do good deeds.

QUR'ĀN: This we recite to you of the signs and the wise reminder. It indicates the end of the story. The ''wise reminder'' is the Qur'ān; it reminds one of Allāh and is firm and wise in its verses and descriptions; falsehood cannot enter it, nor can non-serious talk pollute it.

QUR'ĀN: Surely the likeness of 'Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam; He created him from dust, then said to him: ''Be,'' and he was: It is the summary of the necessary points described in detail in preceding verses. Such summing up after detailed description — especially in arguments and discussions — is a beauty of style. The verses were revealed for arguments with the delegation of the Christians of Najrān. It was proper to sum up the basic point of 'Īsā's creation — after giving the story in detail — to show that the particular circumstances of his birth do not prove anything except that he was a created man like Adam (peace be on them both). Therefore, it is not permissible to say about him more than that which is said about Adam (a.s.) — that is, he was a man whom Allāh created without the agency of a father.

The verse therefore means: The condition of 'Īsā (a.s.) in the eyes of Allāh — as Allāh knows how He had created 'Īsā — is only that the manner of his creation resembles that of Adam's creation. How was Adam created? Allāh gathered various portions of earth and said to him, ''Be'', and he became a human being without any father.

This verse actually contains two independent proofs, either is sufficient to refute the idea of 'Īsā's divinity.

First: 'Īsā is a creature created by Allāh — as Allāh knows, and He is never confused in His knowledge. He created him a man, albeit without a father. And such a person is a servant of Allāh, not a god.

Second: 'Īsā's creation is not greater than that of Adam. If 'Īsā's unusual creation may in any way justify the belief in his godhead, then Adam's creation will justify the same belief. But no Christian says that Adam was god. Therefore, they should not have such belief about 'Īsā (a.s.). After all, both cases are the same.

The verse shows that 'Īsā's creation, like that of Adam, was physical and of this world, although it happened against the usual manner of conception, because usually a child is conceived through the agency of a father.

Apparently, fa-yakūn (فَيَكُونُ = lit: and he is) is used here to describe a past event — that is why we have translated it as ‘‘and he was’’.

The phrase, ‘‘then said to him, ‘Be’, and he was’’, shows instant, not gradual creation, but we know that both Adam and ‘Īsā had undergone a gradual process of creation. The fact is that there is no contradiction in these two aspects — because condition changes with the change of context. All things, whether they come into being gradually or instantly, are created by Allāh, brought into being by His command, i.e., by the word, ‘‘Be’’, as He says: His command, when He intends anything, is only that He says to it, ‘‘Be’’, and it is (36:82). Many of these things, come into existence gradually — when they are seen in the framework of their gradual causes. But when they are seen in relation to Allāh, then there is no graduality in their existence, no gap between the command, ‘‘Be’’, and their ‘‘being’’; Allāh says: And Our command is but one, as the twinkling of an eye (54:50). We shall explain it in detail in a more appropriate place, Allāh willing.

The main idea behind the statement, ‘‘then said to him, ‘Be’, and he was’’, is as follows: Allāh is not dependent on causes when He creates a thing. Things which He intends to create have equal relation with Him. If they were related to Him through causes, their conditions could have differed one with another, some would have looked possible, others impossible; one would have been easy, the other difficult; one nearer, another far away — all depending on the conditions of the relevant causes. But Allāh does not need any cause to bring about an effect; whatever He intends, He says to it, ‘‘Be’’, and it comes into being.

QUR’ĀN: The truth is from your Lord, so be not of the doubters: It emphasizes the meaning of the preceding verse which was itself emphasized by the use of the particle ‘‘surely’’. It serves the same purpose as the verse, ‘‘This We recite to you of the signs and the wise reminder’’, revealed at the end of the detailed story. It was to set the Prophet’s mind at rest that he was on truth, and to strengthen him in the argument.

The sentence, ‘‘The truth is from your Lord’’, is one of the finest expressions of the Qur’ān. It uses the preposition, ‘‘from’’, which shows beginning point. The truth starts from your Lord. If you were to change it to some other particle, e.g., ‘‘with’’, saying, the truth is with your Lord, it would give a hint of polytheism; and would actually show God as helpless, in need of that truth.

The true maxims and the propositions showing real and unalterable facts are self-evident and impossible to change; for example, four is an even number; one is half of two; and so on. Man finds out these self-evident truths from the really existing things; and existence — all of it — is from Allāh. Therefore, the truth — all of it — is from Him. That is why Allāh is not questioned concerning what He does and men are questioned. An action of a creature, if it is correct and right, accompanies the truth, but the action of Allāh is existence itself, and therefore, truth itself.

TRADITIONS

The Imām (a.s.) said[1] about the words of Allāh, O Maryam! surely Allāh has chosen you and purified you and chosen you above the women of the worlds: ‘‘(Allāh) chose her twice: As for the first, He chose her, i.e., selected her; and as for the second, she conceived without a husband; in this way, He made her excel over the women of the worlds.’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) said about this verse: ‘‘It means that He selected you for the progeny of the prophets, and purified you from unchastity, and chose you for the birth of ‘Īsā (a.s.) without a husband.’’ (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

The author says: The saying of the Imām, ‘‘He selected you for the progeny of the prophets’’, means that He selected you to be a good offspring worthy of being related to the prophets The phrase, ‘‘and purified you from unchastity’’, means that He gave you protection from unchastity; this is the best explanation of the Qur’ānic words, because she had given birth to ‘Īsā (a.s.) without a husband. Thus, the tradition describes some concomitants of her selection and purification.

[1] This is the Commentary of ‘Alī ibn Ibrāhīm al-Qummī himself and not the saying of the Imām, (See al-Qummī, at-Tafsīr, an-Najaf al-Ashraf, ed., vol. 1, p. 102). (ed.)

The two traditions are not in conflict with each other, as may be seen manifestly. And we have explained that the verse implies this meaning.

It has been narrated by Aḥmad, at-Tirmidhī (and he said that it is correct), Ibnu 'l-Mundhir, Ibn Ḥabbān, and al-Ḥākim from Anas, that he said: ''Verily the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''Sufficient are in excellence from among the women of the worlds, Maryam bint 'Īmrān, and Khadījah bint Khuwaylid, and Fāṭimah bint Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and Āsiyah wife of Pharaoh!'' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr) as-Suyūṭī has said that Ibn Abī Shaybah has narrated it from al-Ḥasan without connecting the chain of narrators with the Holy Prophet (s.a.w.a.).

al-Ḥākim has narrated from Ibn 'Abbās (and has said that it is correct), that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'The most excellent of the women of the worlds are Khadījah, and Fāṭimah, and Maryam, and Āsiyah wife of Pharaoh.' '' (ibid.)

Ibn Marduwayh narrates from al-Ḥasan that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Verily, Allāh chose four (women) over the women of the worlds: Āsiyah bint Muzāḥim, and Maryam bint 'Īmrān, and Khadījah bint Khuwaylid, and Fāṭimah bint Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.).' ''(ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from Fāṭimah (may Allāh be pleased with her!) that she said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said to me: ''You are the chief of the women of the people of the Garden, (and) not Maryam, The Virgin.'' (ibid.)

Ibn 'Asākir has narrated from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'The chief of the women of the people of the Garden are Maryam bint 'Īmrān, then Fāṭimah, then Khadījah, then Āsiyah wife of Pharaoh.' '' (ibid.)

Ibn 'Asākir has narrated through the chain of Muqātil from aḍ-Ḍaḥḥāk from Ibn 'Abbās from the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) that he said: ''Four women are the chiefs of the worlds: Maryam bint 'Īmrān, and Āsiyah bint Muzāḥim, and Khadījah bint Khuwaylid, and Fāṭimah bint Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.); and the most excellent of them in the world is Fāṭimah.'' (ibid.)

Ibn Abī Shaybah narrates from 'Abdu 'r-Raḥmān ibn Abī Laylā that he said: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'Fāṭimah is the chief of the women of the worlds after Maryam bint ‘Īmrān, and Āsiyah wife of the Pharaoh, and Khadījah bint Khuwaylid.’ ’’ (ibid.)

aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chains from ‘Ikrimah from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) drew four lines, then said: ‘The best of the women of the Garden are Maryam bint ‘Īmrān, and Khadījah bint Khuwaylid, and Fāṭimāh bint Muḥammad, and Āsiyah bint Muzāḥim, wife of the Pharaoh.’ ’’ (al-Khiṣāl)

Also, he narrates through his chains from Abu ’1-Ḥasan al-Awwal (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Verily Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, has selected four from among the women: Maryam, and Āsiyah, and Khadījah, and Fāṭimah ...’ ’’ (ibid.)

The author says: There are numerous traditions of nearly the same meaning, narrated by both sects. The fact that these four are the chiefs of the women does not preclude the difference in excellence as amongst themselves, as may be seen in the sixth tradition quoted from ad-Durru’l-manthūr, as well as other traditions. And a similar discourse was written under the verse: Surely Allāh chose Adam and Nūḥ ... (3:33).

A point to ponder: The verse talks about selection and choosing, while the above traditions describe their supremacy.

There is a difference between selection and supremacy; the latter being a degree of the former’s perfection.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said explaining the words of Allāh: ... when they cast their pens (to decide) which of them should have Maryam in his charge: ‘‘They were drawing the lot about her, when she was orphaned of her father.’’ (al-‘Ayyāshī)

The Imām (a.s.) said about the verse: And when the angels said. ‘O Maryam! surely Allāh has chosen you and purified you and chosen you above the women of the worlds’: ‘‘(Allāh) chose her twice: As for the first, He chose her, i.e., selected her, and as for the second, she conceived without a husband; in this way He made her excel over the women of the worlds.

‘‘... Then Allāh said to His Prophet: ‘This is of the tidings of the unseen which We reveal to you, (O Muḥammad!) and you were not with them when they cast their pens (to decide) which of them should have Maryam in his charge, and you were not with them when they contended one with another.' When she was born the family of 'Īmrān contended one with another about her; everyone said: 'We shall have her in our charge.' So they went out and cast lot among themselves with the arrows, and the arrow of Zakariyyā came out (in the draw) ...'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: The Commentary written above supports this and the preceding tradition. There are numerous traditions giving the details regarding the good news given to Maryam, birth of 'Īsā (a.s.), his mission and his miracles. But the general outline of his story, given in these verses is enough for the purpose of exegesis. That is why we have not written them here except the important ones.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, and I inform you of what you eat ...: '' 'Īsā (a.s.) used to say to the Children of Israel: 'I am the messenger of Allāh to you, and I create for you out of dust like the form of a bird, then I breathe into it and it becomes a bird with Allāh's permission, and I heal the blind and the leper; ' (al-Akmah means blind). They said: 'We do not think that what you do is anything but sorcery. Show us therefore a sign by which we may know that you are truthful.' He said: 'Do you think that you would know I was truthful if I informed you of what you eat and what you store in your houses, i.e., what you had eaten before you came out of your houses and what you had stored at night?' They said: 'Yes.' So he used to tell them: 'You ate this and this.' Some of them confirmed his words and became believers, and other rejected it. And there was for them a sign in it, if they were believers.'' (ibid.)

The author says: The style of the verse when describing the latter two signs differs from that used for the former ones, as we had pointed out in the Commentary. And this difference supports the theme of this tradition.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said explaining the verse, And a verifier of that which is before me of the Torah, and that I may allow you ...: ''There was (a distance of) four hundred years between Dāwūd and 'Īsā; and it was the sharī'ah of 'Īsā that he was sent with monotheism and sincerity, and with what (Allāh) had enjoined on Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm and Mūsā; and He revealed to him Injīl; and took from him the covenant that was taken from (all other) prophets; and He ordained for him in the Book establishing the prayer with religion, and enjoining good, and forbidding evil, and prohibiting unlawful, and allowing lawful; and revealed to him in Injīl the sermons and the parables, and the panel code which did not have retaliation; it contained neither (detailed) rules of panel code nor the shares of inheritance; and He revealed to him alleviation of what was (ordained) for Mūsā in the Torah. And this is (the meaning of) the words Allāh quoting what ʻĪsā said to the Children of Israel: and that I may allow you part of that which has been forbidden to you. And ʻĪsā ordered those who were with him, from among those who followed him of the believers, to believe in the sharīʻah of the Torah and the Injīl.'' (al-ʻAyyāshī)

The author says: This tradition is narrated in Qiṣaṣu 'l-anbiyā', in detail, from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.), and there it says that there was a distance of four hundred and eighty years between Dāwūd and ʻĪsā (a.s.). But neither of these dates conforms with the history of the People of the Book.

ar-Riḍā' (a.s.) was asked: ''Why the disciples were called al-ḥawāriyyūn?'' (اَلْحَوَارِيُّونَ = companions, disciples; the root word denotes ''intense whiteness''). He said: ''According to (other) people, they were named al-ḥawāriyyūn, because they were washer-men, they cleansed the dirt from clothes by washing; and it is a name derived from al-ḥawr (اَلْحَوْرُ = to bleach, to whiten). But according to us, they were given this name because they were pure in their ownselves and cleansed others from filth of sins by sermon and reminder.'' (ʻUyūnu 'l-akhbār)

The same Imām said that they were twelve men, and the most excellent and most learned of them was Luke.[1] (at-Tawḥīd) aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said, inter alia, in a tradition: ''Allāh sent ʻĪsā son of Maryam; and entrusted to him light, knowledge and wisdom; and (gave him) all knowledge of the previous prophets, and added Injīl to it. And He sent him to Baytu'l-Maqdis, to the Children of Israel, (he came) calling them to his Book and his wisdom, and to the belief in Allāh and His messenger. But most of them insisted on exceeding (the limits) and disbelieving. When they did not believe (in him), he prayed to his Lord, and adjured on Him (to punish them). So (Allāh) transformed (some) satans from among them, in order to show them a sign, so that they might take lesson from it.

[1] Apparently, this phrase is an interpolation by one of the narrators, because Luke was not among the twelve disciples. (tr.)

‘‘But it did not increase in them except (their) transgression and disbelief. Then (‘Īsā) came to Baytu’l-Maqdis, and continued calling them to, and awakening their interest in, that which is with Allāh, for thiry-three years, until the Jews got up in his pursuit. And they claimed that they tortured him and buried him in the earth alive. And some of them claimed that they killed and crucified him. But Allāh was not to give them power over him; but it only appeared to them so; and they were not able to torture and kill him or to kill and crucify him, because if they could do so it would have been a refutation of the words of Allāh; but Allāh caused him to ascend after taking him away completely.’’ (Kamālu ’d-dīn)

The author says: The words of the Imām: ‘‘Allāh transformed (some) satans from among them,’’ means that He transformed a group of evil persons from among them. ‘‘And continued calling them ... for thirty-three years’’; perhaps it refers to his span of life, as it is well-known that he lived on this earth for thirty-three years. ‘Īsā (a.s.) talked to them from his cradle upto his mature age, and he was prophet from his early childhood, as the Qur’ān quotes him saying in the verses: But she pointed to him. They said: ‘‘How should we speak to one who is a child in the cradle?’’ He said: ‘‘Surely I am a servant of Allāh; He has given me the Book and made me a prophet (19:29 — 30).

‘‘... it would have been a refutation of the words of Allāh; but Allāh caused him to ascend after taking him away completely’’. It is a paraphrase of the Qur’ānic words: Rather Allāh took him up to Himself (4:158); and, ‘‘I am going to take you away completely and cause you to ascend unto Me. ’’ As this verse mentions taking him away before causing him to ascend, the tradition infers that the events happened in the same sequence.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ‘‘ ‘Īsā (a.s.) made a promise to his companions, the night when Allāh took him up to Himself. So they gathered near him in the evening, and they were twelve men; and he made them enter into a house. Then he came to them from a fountain that was in the corner of the house, shaking off water from his hair. Then he said: 'Verily Allāh has revealed to me that He is going to take me up just now to Himself and purify me from the Jews. Now who among you (agrees) that my features be put on him, in order that he is killed and crucified (in my place) and he shall be with me in my rank?' A young man among them said: 'I, O Spirit of Allāh!' He said: 'So you are that.' Then 'Īsā said to them: 'Why! surely there is one of you who will reject me twelve times before it is morning.' One of them asked: 'Am I that? O prophet of Allāh!' 'Īsā said to him: 'Do you feel it in your heart? Then be you that.' Thereafter 'Īsā told them: 'Why! surely you will divide after me in three groups: two groups, forging lie against Allāh, (shall be) in the Fire; and one group following Sham'ūn [1], being true to Allāh, (shall be) in the Garden.' Then Allāh caused 'Īsā to ascend to Him from the corner of the house while they were looking at him.''

Then the Imām (a.s.) said: ''The Jews came searching for 'Īsā the same night. And they caught the man about whom 'Īsā had said: 'Surely there is one of you who will reject me twelve times before it is morning'; and they took the young man who had been given the features of 'Īsā and he was killed and crucified. And he for whom 'Īsā had said that he would reject him twelve times before it was morning, did (indeed) reject him.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: The traditions of nearly the same meaning have been narrated from Ibn 'Abbās, Qatādah and others. Some people have said that the man who was made to look like 'Īsā was the same person who had guided the Jews so that they could arrest and kill him. There are some other views regarding those details. But the Qur'ān is silent on this subject; and we shall write on it in detail under the verse: ... and they did not kill him nor did they crucify him, but it appeared to them so ... (4:157).

ar-Riḍā (a.s.) said: ''There never was, in the eyes of the people, any uncertainty concerning the affairs of any prophet or Proof of Allāh except the affair of ‘Īsā alone; because he was taken up from the earth alive, and he was given death between the heaven and the earth, then he was taken up to the heaven. And this is (the meaning of) the words of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: And when Allāh said: ‘O ‘Īsā! I am going to take you away completely and cause you to ascend unto Me and purify you’; and (also) Allāh says quoting the words of ‘Īsā (which he will say) on the Day of Resurrection: ‘and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them, but when Thou didst take me (away) completely, Thou wert the watcher over them, and Thou art witness of all things (5:117).’ ’’ (‘Uyūnu ’l-akhbār) aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘ ‘Īsā son of Maryam was taken up with a woollen outer garment, spun by Maryam, and woven by Maryam, and sewn by Maryam. But when he reached the heaven, he was addressed: ‘O ‘Īsā! Lay down your worldly embellishment.’ ’’ (al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: We shall explain the meaning of the above quoted two traditions, Allāh willing, at the end of the Chapter 4, ‘‘The Women.’’

It is written in ad-Durru’l-manthūr about the verse: Surely the likeness of ‘Īsā is with Allāh ...: ‘Abd ibn Ḥamīd and Ibn Jarīr have narrated from Qatādah that he said: ‘‘We have been told that as-Sayyid and al-‘Āqib, the two chiefs and bishops of the people of Najrān, met the Prophet of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and asked him about ‘Īsā, and said to him: ‘Every human being has a father. Then why is it that ‘Īsā (a.s.) had no father?’ Then Allāh revealed this verse about him: Surely the likeness of ‘Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam ...’’

The author says: The traditions of nearly the same meaning have been narrated from as-Suddī, ‘Ikrimah and others; al-Qummī also has narrated in his at-Tafsīr, that the verse was revealed on the same occasion.

SOME OTHER TRADITIONS ABOUT AL-MUḤADDATH

Zurārah said: ‘‘I asked Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) about the messenger, the prophet and al-muḥaddath (اَلْمُحَدَّثُ = the one spoken to). He said: ‘The messenger is the one who sees the angel (who) brings the message of his Lord to him, and tells him: ‘‘(Allāh) orders you so-and-so.’’ And the messenger is a prophet with (the added rank of) messengership. And the prophet does not see the angel, something comes down to him — the news (comes) to his heart; and he becomes as though he be in a trance, and he sees (the vision) in his dream.’ I said: ‘Then how does he know that what he saw in his dream was truth?’ He said: ‘Allāh makes it clear to him, so that he knows that it is truth; and he does not see the angel. And al-Muḥaddath is the one who hears the voice and does not see (the speaker) in person.’ ’’ (Baṣā’iru ‘d-darajāt)

The Author says: It has been narrated from the same Imām in al-Kāfī also.

The original word of the Imām at the end of the tradition is shāhidan (شَاهِداً = translated here as ‘‘in person’’); it literally means ‘‘at present’’; also it may be a conditional phrase related to the subject; in other words, it may mean, ‘‘he does not see manifestly’’.

Burayd enquired from al-Bāqir and aṣ-Ṣādiq (peace be on both of them), inter alia, in a tradition: ‘‘Then what is a messenger, a prophet and ‘the one spoken to’?’’ He (the Imām) said: ‘‘A messenger is one to whom the angel appears and speaks; and a prophet is one who sees in his dream; and possibly the messengership and the prophethood is combined in a single person. The muḥaddath is the one who hears the voice of the angel but does not see his person.’’ Burayd said: ‘‘I said: ‘May Allāh make things right for you! How can he know that what has he seen in his dream is the truth and that it is from the angel?’ He (the Imām) said: ‘He is directed in the right way until he knows it (with certainty). Allāh has surely set a seal on the (divine) books with your Book, and on the prophets with your prophet.’ ’’ (ibid.)

Muḥammad ibn Muslim said: ‘‘I mentioned al-Muḥaddath in the presence of Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.). He said: ‘Verily he hears the voice but does not see his person.’ I said: ‘May Allāh make things right for you!

How does he know that it is the speech of the angel?' He said: 'He is given tranquillity and dignity so that he knows that it is the angel (speaking).' '' (ibid.)

Abū Baṣīr narrates from the same Imām that he said: '' 'Alī was the muḥaddath, and Salmān was the muḥaddath.'' Abū Baṣīr says: ''I said: 'Then what is the sign of the muḥaddath?' He said: 'The angel comes to him and scratches his heart (i.e., communicates to him) so-and-so.' '' (ibid.)

Ḥumrān ibn A'yan said: ''Abū Ja'far (a.s.) said to me that 'Alī was the muḥaddath. (When I told this to) our Companions, (they) said: 'You did nothing when you did not ask him who used to speak to him?' Then it happened that I (again) met Abū Ja'far; and I said to him: 'Did not you inform me that 'Alī was spoken to?' He said: 'Surely.' I said: 'Who used to speak to him?' He said: 'An angel.' I said: 'Then I may say that he was a prophet or a messenger?' He said: 'No. But you should say that his likeness was the likeness of the Companion of Sulaymān and the Companion of Mūsā; and his likeness was the likeness of Dhū 'l-Qarnayn. Why! Have not you heard that 'Alī was asked about Dhu 'l-Qarnayn whether he was a prophet?' He said: 'No. But he was a servant who loved Allāh, so (Allāh) loved him; and he was sincere towards Allāh, so (Allāh) gave him good advice (i.e., guided him). So this also is like that.' '' (ibid.)

The author says: There are numerous traditions narrated from the Imāms of the Ahlu 'l-bayt about the meaning of 'the one spoken to' found in Baṣā'iru 'd-darajāt, al-Kāfī, Kanzu 'l-fawā'id, al-Ikhtiṣāṣ and other books. This topic is found in the Sunnī traditions too.

As for the distinction given by these traditions, between a prophet, a messenger and 'the one spoken to', we have described the difference between a messenger and a prophet. Also it has been explained that through revelation Allāh speaks to His servant, and it creates by itself firm and certain knowledge, and this knowledge does not require any other proof. Among all Divine messeges, revelation has the same position as the self-evident truths have in human knowledge — man does not need any proof or logical deduction to know that it is truth.

As for the dream, you must have noted that the traditions explain it in another way; it is not the vision which one sees normally in sleep; rather it denotes something like a trance, in which the external senses of the prophet are suspended, and then he observes what Allāh wants him to see — in the same way as we observe the things in our wakening. Then Allāh strengthens his conviction by bestowing on him the certainty that what he has seen is from Allāh and not a Satanic manipulation.

As for being spoken to, it denotes hearing the voice of an angel. But he hears it by his heart, not by the ears, nor is it something like ideas or imaginations occurring in the mind, because idea or imagination is not called 'hearing the voice' — except as a far-fetched allegory. That is why the traditions describe it as hearing the voice and also as communicating to the heart; and yet name it as speech and talk. In short, the muḥaddath hears the voice of the angel and listen to it with his 'hearing, power' just as we hear and listen to normal talks and voices heard in this material world; but no other person can share in that talk or hear that voice, and therefore it is called a matter of heart.

As for his firm knowledge that what he heard was an angel's talk and not a Satanic whispering, it happens by the help of Allāh, as is explained in the above-quoted tradition of Muḥammad ibn Muslim: ''He is given tranquillity and dignity so that he knows that it is the angel (speaking).'' The Satanic whispering — surely a falsehood — may come in either of the two ways: It may appear in a form which the believer knows to be false, and then he naturally will know that it cannot be the talk of an angel because angels do not disobey Allāh and do not go against His command. Or, it may appear wearing a mask of truth and fact — hoping to bring in its wake falsehood and lie. In such case, the Divine Light, which always leads the believer, exposes its reality. Allāh says: Is he who was dead then We raised him to life and made for him a light by which he walks among the people ... (6:122).

Apart from that, whispering and evil suggestions always create restlessness in soul and turmoil in heart, contrary to the remembrance of Allāh and His speech which create gravity, and tranquillity. Allāh says: It is only the Satan that frightens his friends (3:175); now surely by Allāh's remembrance are the hearts set at rest (13:28); Surely those who are pious, when a visitation from the Satan afflicts them they become mindful, then to ! they see (7:201).

When therefore the heart of the muḥaddath is blessed with tranquillity and dignity at the time when he hears the message, it conclusively proves that the message is from Allāh. Conversely, restlessness and anxiety would show that it was a Satanic whispering, which brings precipitation, anxiety, anguish, etc., in its wake.

The traditions say that the muḥaddath hears the voice of the angel and does not see him. It looks at the reality of being spoken to, and gives its academic definition. But it does not mean that the muḥaddath cannot see the angel. A man becomes al-muḥaddath (اَلْمُحَدَّثُ = the one spoken to), as soon as he hears an angel's voice, it is not necessary for him to see the angel. And if the muḥaddath sees the angel, it is not because he is spoken to; it is an added excellence. Many verses clearly show that some of those spoken to had seen the angels when they spoke to them.
For example:

Maryam: then We sent to her Our Spirit, and there appeared to her a well-made man. She said: ''Surely I fly for refuge from you to the Beneficient Allāh, if you are pious.'' He said: ''I am only a messenger of your Lord: That I should give you a pure boy'' (19:17 — 19).

Wife of Ibrāhīm: And certainly Our messengers came to Ibrāhīm with good news. They said: ''Peace,'' ''Peace,'' said he ... And his wife was standing (by), so she laughed; then We gave her the good news of Isḥāq and after Isḥāq of (a son's son) Ya'qūb. She said: ''O woe to me! shall I bear a son (now) when I am an (extremely) old (woman) and this my husband an (extremely) old (man)? Most surely this is an amazing thing.'' They said: ''Do you wonder at the decree of Allāh? The mercy of Allāh and His blessings be on you, O people of the house surely He is Praised, Glorious'' (11:69 — 73).

However, the above traditions may have got another explanation: The statement that the muḥaddath does not see the angel, may mean that he does not see the reality of the angels, although he might see them in the form which they assume when appearing before him. After all, the above-quoted verses only show that Maryam and the wife of Ibrāhīm had seen the angels in human form — the assumed form.

Someone has suggested a third interpretation: The statement means that the angel does not bring to him any revelation of the Sharī'ah; he does not appear before him with a legislative order; and this distinction is meant to protect the dignity of the messengers and the prophets.

But it is a far-fetched interpretation.

COMMENTARY

QUR'ĀN: But whoever disputes with you in this after what has come to you of knowledge: ''Fa'' (فَ = translated here as ''But'') shows that the offer of al-mubāhalah (اَلْمُبَاهَلَةُ = earnest imprecation) branches out from the Divine teaching explained above so clearly and convincingly about ʻĪsā son of Maryam (a.s.), and ended so emphatically with the words, The truth is from your Lord, so be not of the doubters (60). ''in this'': The pronoun ''this'' refers either to ʻĪsā or to the ''truth'' mentioned in the preceding verse.

The preceding verses were Divine Revelation in which there could be no doubt at all. Apart from that, they contained a clear logical proof, that is, the verse: Surely the likeness of ʻĪsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam ... (59). Thus, the knowledge emanating from these verses is two-fold: one, because it is a Divine Speech: two, because of its rational proof. That is why this knowledge was not reserved for the Prophet only; others too could understand it. Even if someone did not believe it to be a Divine Revelation, he could not entertain any doubt about the truth of the subject discussed, because it contained rational argument which unbiased mind was bound to accept. Perhaps that is why Allāh said: ‘‘after what has come to you of knowledge’’; and did not say, after what We have explained to them.

Another point: By reminding the Prophet of the Divine Knowledge, Allāh wanted to assure him that he would overwhelm his adversaries by Allāh’s permission and that Allāh would surely be on his side supporting him in that dispute.

QUR’ĀN: then say: ‘‘Come let us call our sons and your sons and our women and your women and our selves and your selves: The first person plural pronoun in ‘‘let us call’’ has a different import from the plural pronouns in ‘‘our sons’’ ‘‘our women’’ and ‘‘our selves’’. The former refers to the both parties of the argument, that is, the advocates of Islam and those of Christianity; while the latter refer to the side of Islam only. Accordingly, the meaning would be as follows: Let us both call the sons, the women and the ‘selves’; we should call our sons, our women and our ‘selves’, and you should call your sons, your women and your ‘selves’. The verse thus has shortened a long sentence in a meaningful and pleasant way.

al-Mubāhalah (اَلْمُبَاهَلَةْ) and al-mulāʻanah (اَلْمُلَاعِنَةْ) both have the same meaning: to curse each other. The actual parties of the argument were the Messenger of Allāh on one side, and the Christians men on the other. But in the challenge for the imprecation, the call was extended to the sons and women, as it would show more convincingly that the claimant is perfectly sure of the truth of his claim, that he is absolutely right. Allāh has put in man the love of his children and family, to such an extent that he puts himself in jeopardy to save them, plunges into perilous situations to keep them safe. And precisely for this reason, sons have been mentioned before women, because man loves his sons more than his women.

An exegete has said: ‘‘The verse means, let us call your sons, your women and your selves; and let you call our sons, our women and our selves.’’ But the explanation given by us above shows how absurd this meaning is. This meaning does not leave any justification for including the sons and the women in the earnest imprecation.

The detailed description of the invitees is a further proof that the caller (i.e., the Prophet) has absolute confidence in the truth of his claim. The import of the call is as follows: Let my whole group and your whole group enter into earnest imprecation, so that both groups pray earnestly to Allāh and bring about the curse of Allāh on the liars. In this way, the Divine curse and chastisement shall cover the sons, women and selves of the liars, and the enemies of truth shall be annihilated completely, they shall be rooted out without leaving any trace.

Consequently, the truth of this speech does not depend on numerousness of the sons, the women or the ‘selves’. The main brunt of the challenge is that one party — that which is on wrong — should perish together with all its near and dear ones — male and female, old and young. The exegetes unanimously say — and traditions and history support them — that when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) came out for the imprecation, the only persons whom he brought with him were: ‘Alī, Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (peace be on them all!). Therefore, the only participants, on the side of Islam, were two ‘selves’, two sons and one woman — and yet the Prophet did fully comply with the Divine Command.

Moreover, the meaning of a word in a verse is one thing, and it is quite another matter as for whom, or on how many people, could that word be applied in practice. We find numerous examples in the Qur’ān where an order, a promise or a threat has been mentioned using plural words, but the circumstances of its revelation show that it was revealed for one person only. For example: (As for) those of you who put away their wives by likening their backs to the backs of their mothers, they are not their mothers (58:2); And (as for) those who put away their wives by likening their backs to the backs of their mothers then would recall what they said ... (58:3); Allāh has certainly heard the saying of those who said: ''Surely Allāh is poor and we are rich'' (3:181); And they ask you as to what they should spend. Say: ''Whatever can be spared'' (2:219). There are a lot of verses which were revealed with plural words, although the events for which they were revealed concerned one person only.

QUR'ĀN: ''then let us pray earnestly and bring about the curse of Allāh on the liars'': ''al-Ibtihāl'' (اَلْاِبْتِهَالُ) is derived from al bahlah (اَلْبَهْلَةُ) also pronounced al-buhlah (اَلْبُهْلَةُ = curse). This is its basic meaning; then it was commonly used for earnest prayer.

The words, ''and bring about the curse of Allāh'', are a sort of explanation for the preceding verb, ''then let us pray earnestly.'' The verse said, ''and bring about the curse of Allāh''; it did not say, and ask from Allāh to curse. It was an indication that that prayer would surely be granted because at that juncture it was the only way to distinguish the truth from the falsehood.

The word, ''the liars'', does not refer to all the liars found anywhere in the world, nor does it mean the genes of the liars. It refers to a particular group — that party of the argument (between the Prophet and the Christians) which was wrong in its claim. The Prophet was saying that Allāh is One, there is no god besides Him, and that 'Īsā was His servant and messenger; while the Christians said that 'Īsā was God, and son of God, and that God had three persons.

This observation leads us to another reality. All those who came out for the proposed imprecation were equal partners in their respective claim. Had the claim and the resulting imprecation been between the Prophet only and the Christians, one party (i.e., the Prophet) would demand singular words, and the other, plural. In such cases, it is necessary to use an expression which would cover singular and plural both. For example, the sentence under discussion could have been written like this: and bring about the curse of Allāh on whosoever is lying. But it says: ''... on the liars.'' It proves that indeed there were liars (in plural) in one party of the argument, either on the side of the Prophet or on the Christians' side. Consequently, all those who came out for the imprecation would be partners in the claim — because lie presupposes a claim. Therefore, those who were present on the side of the Prophet for the imprecation — i.e., 'Alī, Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn — were partners in the claim of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and his Mission. It is one of the most excellent virtues which were given exclusively to these family-members of the Prophet (peace be on them all!). Another exclusive excellence: Allāh gave them the names of 'selves', women and sons of the Prophet to the exclusion of all the men, women and children of the ummah.

Question: You have mentioned above that the Qur'ān uses, more often than not, plural words for singular; and even this verse says ''our women'' while it was only one lady, i.e., Fāṭimah (a.s.), who participated in the imprecation. Then why should the plural, ''the liars'', be not explained in the same way?

Reply: There is a vast difference between the two. There is a situation which may happen again and again, and there is another which is not expected to repeat itself. In the former situation, it is perfectly all right to use a plural in place of a singular, so that the rule or comment would cover even those who would be doing the same thing in future. But in the latter situation it is not allowed to use plural in place of singular, because the event is not to repeat itself and no one else is expected to be included in that order or comment, etc. Look for example at the following verses:

> And when you said to him to whom Allāh had shown favour and to whom you had shown favour: Keep your wife to yourself and fear Allāh ... (33:37).
>
> The tongue of him whom they are inclined to blame (for it) is barbarous and this is clear Arabic tongue (16:103).
> O Prophet! surely We have made lawful to you your wives whom you have given their dowries, ... and a believing woman if she gave hereself to the Prophet, if the Prophet desired to marry her — specially for you, not for the (rest of) believers; ... (33:50).

And the order for calling to the imprecation could not be extended beyond that particular situation, that is, the imprecation between the Prophet and the Christians. Therefore, when Allāh uses a plural, there should be more than two in both parties which were called; otherwise, the use of the plural ''the liars'' would be out of place.

Question: All the Christians who had come in the delegation of the Najrān were a party to a claim — the claim that 'Īsā was God, and the son of God, and one of the three persons of God. There was no discord among them in this matter, nor was there any difference in this claim between their men and women. Likewise, the claim on the side of the Prophet — that Allāh is One, there is no god but He; and ʻĪsā son of Maryam was His servant and His messenger — was upheld by all the believers; it was not confined to any one of them — not even the Prophet. Therefore, it is out of place to say that those who were brought by the Prophet for the imprecation had any superiority or excellence over the rest of the believers. In fact, the Prophet had brought them just as examples of the sons, women and selves mentioned in the verse.

Moreover, claim and mission are two different things. Those who participated in the imprecation were party to the claim. How is it that you have made them partners in the Mission too?

Reply: Had the Prophet brought them just as samples, it was necessary for him to bring at least two other men, three women and three sons — to comply with the demand of the plurals. Yet, he did not do so. It proves that only those who came with him were worthy of being called his sons, his women and his selves — to the exclusion of all the others. Only on accepting this fact, we can say that he obeyed the Divine Order given in this verse. In other words, he could not find any one worthy of being included in these categories, except the one man, one woman and two sons whom he brought with him. There was no one else whom he could include in compliance with the plural words of the verse. In these circumstance, he fully complied with the order, although he could not bring three persons in any category.

Moreover, if you ponder on the events, you will see that the only aim of the Christians of Najrān in coming to Medina was to confront the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and to argue with him about ʻĪsā son of Maryam. It was the Messenger of Allāh who was claiming that ʻĪsā was a servant of Allāh and His messenger. It was he who called others to believe in this claim, saying that it was based on Divine Revelation — the revelation which, he said, was sent to him. As for the rest of the believers, the Christians had nothing to do with them; nor did they argue with them. That is why Allāh has used singular verbs and pronouns in the beginning of this verse, when referring to the Prophet: ‘‘But whoever disputes with you (literally:thee) in this after what has come to you (lit.:thee) of knowledge, then say (lit.:say thou)...’’ The same is the case of the verse: But if they dispute with you (lit.:thee), say (lit.:say thou): ''I have submitted myself (entirely) to Allāh and (so has) every one who follows me'' (3:20).

The above explanation shows that the Messenger of Allāh (blessings of Allāh be on him and his progeny!) had not brought those personalities as samples or examples of other believers — because the believers, per se, had no part in that disputation or imprecation; and there was no reason why they should be offered as targets for the curse and punishment which were to come to one of the two parties (the Christians and their adversary, i.e., the Prophet). The Prophet himself was a party of that argument and it was his obligation to offer himself as the target of the calamity which could come to him in case his claim was (God forbid!) wrong. Now, there was no reason why he should bring ʻAlī, Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (a.s.) with him, if his claim were not dependent on them also, as it was on his own self. He had come with them for imprecation because they were the only sons, woman and self on whom his claim depended. Surely he had not brought them as samples or examples. It is now crystal clear that these personalities were his partners in his claim; the claim depended on them as it did on him.

Furthermore, the Christians had come to argue with the Prophet not just because he believed that ʻĪsā son of Maryam was the servant and messenger of Allāh. They had taken upon themselves to come upto Medina because, in addition to claiming those things about ʻĪsā, he had called and invited them to believe likewise. This call, this mission, was the main reason why they had come in delegation for argument. Consequently, when the Prophet came to the appointed place of imprecation, bringing with him the four personalities, it was because of that claim and that call together. Thus these personalities were his partners in his mission, as they had been his partners in his claim.

Question: We accept that the Prophet came with them because they were a part of him; and this attribute was not found in others, it was their exclusive excellence. But it appears — and normal practice confirms it — that when a man brings his near and dear ones, his women and children, in dangerous and frightening places, it shows that he is fully confident of his and their safety and comfort. His bringing them for imprecation proves only that he was absolutely sure of his truth — it does not show anything else. It is quite irrelevant to say that his action proves that they were his partners in the mission.

Reply: It is true that the beginning of the verse does not show more than that which has been mentioned above. But the end of the verse, that is, ''on the liars'', shows that there were surely liars (in plural) in one of the two sides of the argument and imprecation. Such expression could only be used if there were several people in each group, all making some claim — be it true or false. Therefore, those who were brought there by the Prophet were indeed his partners, both in the claim and in the mission, as was explained above. It is thus proved that those who were present there with the Prophet — all of them — were parties to the claim and the mission, together with the Prophet, and were his partners in it.

Question: It follows, from what you have said, that they were his partners in the prophethood.

Reply: Not at all. We have explained earlier where we have discussed ''Prophethood'' [1] that the Call and Propagation are not one and the same with the prophethood, although they are among its conditions and concomitants, and are parts of the divinely-bestowed responsibilities which a prophet takes upon himself. Likewise, we have made it clear in the discourse about the Imāmah [2] that they are not identical with Imāmah either, although they are in a way among its concomitants.

QUR'ĀN: Most surely this is the true story, and there is no god but Allāh: The demonstrative pronoun ''this'' refers to the earlier mentioned stories of 'Īsā (a.s.). There is a fine literary transposition in the sentence. What it says is as follows: Most surely the stories We have told you concerning 'Īsā are the truth — not that which is told by the Christians.

There is multiple emphasis in this sentence: Innā (اِنَّ = surely), and la (لَ = surely) followed by an additional pronoun huwa (هُوَ = this) are all combined together to put utmost emphasis on this statement. It was done to cheer the Prophet and to encourage him and strengthen his heart for the coming imprecation, by augmenting his certainty and insight, and fortifying his confidence in the revelation which Allāh had sent to him. It is further strengthened by additional emphasis contained in the next sentence which describes an accompanying reality: ‘‘and there is no god but Allāh’’. This fact once again shows that the preceding stories are truth.

QUR’ĀN: and most surely Allāh is the Mighty, the Wise: The conjunctive ‘‘and’’ joins it to the first sentence of the verse. The same modes of emphasis have again been used here. It aims at further comforting the Prophet and strengthening his heart. It says that Allāh is Mighty: He has power to help the side of the truth. And He is Wise: He cannot neglect or forget this aid, because ignorance or oblivion cannot reach Him. He is not like those false deities whom the enemies of the truth have taken for themselves besides Him.

This explanation shows why these two Divine Names were chosen for concluding this verse. The sentence contains an exclusiveness: Only Allāh is the Mighty and the Wise.

QUR’ĀN: But if they turn back then surely Allāh knows the mischief makers: What should be the actual aim of any argument or imprecation? The manifestation of the truth. If so, then it is unthinkable for a seeker of truth to turn back from it. If the Christians really wanted the truth to be manifested — and they knew that Allāh was the Guardian of truth and that He would never allow it to be, destroyed or invalidated — they would not turn back from the proposed imprecation. And if they did, it would show that their aim by all this argumentation and disputation was not the manifestation of truth; they only wanted apparent victory, preservation of the status they had and beliefs they followed, and continuation of the customs and traditions with which they were familiar. Their only goal was that which their desire, lust and greed had made to seem fair to them — and it was not the good life which conforms with truth and happiness; it was but a semblance of life. In other words, they did not want reform and improvement; they wanted to make mischief in the world by corrupting the good life. Their turning back would mean that they were mischief-makers.

The sentence uses a metaphorical device of putting the cause in place of the effect; it mentions their mischief-making instead of saying that they do not want the truth to be manifested.

The second part of the sentence refers to the Divine Attribute of knowledge, andi it has been emphasized with addition of inna (surely), as it says: ‘‘then surely Allāh knows’’. It was to show that mischief-making and thwarting the manifestation of truth was ingrained in their psyche, and Allāh knows that as a result of that deep rooted trait they will surely turn back from the imprecation. And so they did and by doing so proved the truth of the Divine Words.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘When the Christians of Najrān came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) as a delegation — and their leaders were al-Ahtam, al-‘Āqib, and as-Sayyid — and (the time of) their prayer came, they began to ring hand-bells and prayed. The Companions of the Messenger of Allāh said: ‘O Messenger of Allāh! This in your Mosque?’ He said: ‘Let them be!’ When they finished (their prayer) they came near the Messenger of Allāh and said: ‘To what do you call (us)?’ He said: ‘To bearing the witness that there is no god except Allāh, and that I am the Messenger of Allāh, and that ‘Īsā was a servant created (by Allāh), he used to eat, drink and relieve himself.’ They said: ‘Then who was his father?’ Thereupon came the revelation to the Messenger of Allāh saying: ‘Say to them, ‘‘What do you say about Adam? Was he a servant created (by Allāh) who used to eat, drink, relieve himself and cohabit?’’ ’ The Prophet put this question to them and they replied: ‘Yes.’ He said: ‘Then who was his father?’ and they became speechless. Then Allāh sent down (the verse): Surely the likeness of ‘Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam; He created him from dust ...; and the verse: But whoever disputes with you in this after what has come to you of knowledge ... and bring about the curse of Allāh on the liars.

‘‘Then the Messenger of Allāh said: ‘(If you do not agree with what I say) then enter into earnest imprecation with me; thus if I am truthful the curse will be sent down on you and if I am a liar it will be sent down on me.’ The said: ‘You have done justice.’

‘‘So they made an appointment for the imprecation. When they returned to the place they were staying, their leaders as-Sayyid, al-‘Āqib and al-Ahtam, said: ‘If he comes for the imprecation against us with his nation (i.e., people unrelated to him), we shall enter into imprecation against him, because then he is not a prophet. But if he enters into imprecation against us with only the people of his House, we shall not enter into imprecation against him, because he will not put the People of his House forward unless he is truthful.'

‘‘When the morning came, they came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) — and there were with him the Leader of the Faithful (‘Alī), Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (a.s.). The Christians said: ‘Who are these?’ They were told: ‘This is his cousin, al-waṣiy (اَلْوَصِيُّ = executor of will) and son-in-law, and this is his daughter Fāṭimah, and these are his sons al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn.’ So they were frightened and said to the Messenger of Allāh: ‘We shall pay you whatever you are pleased with, but excuse us from the imprecation.’ Thereupon the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) made agreement with them on (the condition of) al-jizyah (اَلْجِزْيَةُ = tax); and they went away.’’ (at-Tafsīr, alQummī) ar-Rayyān ibn aṣ-Ṣalt narrates a talk of ar-Riḍā (a.s.) with al-Ma’mūn and the scholars about the difference between the Prophet’s progeny and the rest of the ummah and the former’s superiority over the latter, in which he, inter alia, says: ‘‘The scholars said: ‘Has Allāh explained (this) selection in His Book?’ ar-Riḍā (a.s.) said: ‘He has explained the selection manifestly in twelve places — apart from the hidden (references).’ Then he described those places of the Qur’ān, during which he said: ‘As for the third (verse, it was) when Allāh distinguished His purified creatures and ordered His Prophet to earnestly pray with them for His curse on the liars, in the verse of imprecation. So Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, said: But whoever disputes with you in this after what has come to you of knowledge, then say: ‘‘Come let us call our sons and your sons and our women and your women and our selves and your selves.’’ ’ The scholars said: ‘our selves means the Prophet himself.’ Abu ’l-Ḥasan (ar-Riḍā) said: ‘You are mistaken. He only meant ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib. And one of the proofs to show it is the saying of the Prophet (himself): ‘‘Banū Walī‘ah should give up (their mischief); otherwise, I will surely send to them a man like my own self’’ — referring to ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib. And He meant al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn with ‘‘sons’’, and meant Fāṭimah with ‘‘women’’. So this is an exclusive virtue in which no one can precede them, and an excellence in which no man can reach them, and an honour in which no creature can overtake them, because He made ‘Alī’s person like his (Prophet’s) own self (person)...’ ’’ aṣ-Ṣadūq narrates through his chain from al-Imām Mūsā ibn Ja‘far (peace be on both of them!), that he had a talk with (Hārūn) ar-Rashīd, during which ar-Rashīd said to him: ‘‘How is it that you say, ‘We are the offspring of the Prophet’, while the Prophet did not leave any offspring? And progeny is through male, not through female; and you are the children of the daughter and her child is not (her father’s) progeny.’’ The Imām said: ‘‘I said to him: ‘I ask you by the right of kinship and that of the grave (i.e., of the Prophet) and of him who is therein, that you should excuse me from (replying to) this question.’ He said: ‘You shall tell me of your proof for it, O son of ‘Alī, and you, O Mūsā! are their leader and their present Imām — thus I have been informed — and I am not going to excuse you from any question I put to you until you bring me a proof from the Book of Allāh; because you claim, O children of ‘Alī! that nothing of it (the Book) comes out from you — not even an alīf or a wāw — but you know its interpretation; and you advance the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great, as your proof; We have not neglected anything in the Book [6:38], and you are not in need of the opinion of scholars and their analogy.’

‘‘Then I said: ‘Do you permit me to reply?’ He said: ‘Let me have.’ I said (reciting the Qur’ānic verse): ‘I seek refuge of Allāh from the cursed Satan. In the name of Allāh, the Beneficent, the Merciful. ... and of his (Ibrāhīm’s) offspring, Dāwūd and Sulaymān and Ayyūb and Yūsuf and Mūsā and Hārūn; and thus do We reward those who do good; and Zakariyyā and Yaḥyā and ‘Īsā and Ilyās; every one was of the good ones (6:84 — 5). Who was the father of ‘Īsā? O Leader of the Faithful!’ He said: ‘He had no father.’ Then I said: ‘Yet He (Allāh) has joined him with the progenies of the Prophets through Maryam; and in the same way Allāh, the High, has joined us with the progenies of the Prophet through our mother, Fāṭimah.’ (Then I said): ‘Should I tell you more? O Leader of the Faithful!’ he said: ‘Let me have.’ I said: ‘(It is) the word of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great: But whoever disputes with you in this after what has come to you of know-ledge, then say: ‘‘Come let us call our sons and your sons and our women and your women and our selves and your selves, then let us pray earnestly and bring about the curse of Allāh on the liars.’’ And nobody has ever claimed that the Prophet — on the occasion of the imprecation with the Christians — made anyone enter under the drape except ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn. So (this) was the interpretation of His Word: ‘‘our sons’’ meant al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn; and ‘‘our women’’, Fāṭimah; and ‘‘our selves’’, ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib.’ ’’ (ibid.)

al-Ma’mūn had asked ar-Riḍā (a.s.) several questions, one of which was as follows:

al-Ma’mūn said: ‘‘What is the proof for the caliphate of your grandfather, ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib?’’

(The Imām) said: ‘‘The verse of our selves.’’

He (al-Ma’mūn) said: ‘‘If there were not our women.’’

He (the Imām) said: ‘‘If there were not our sons.’’

The author says: The Imām argued on the strength of the word, our selves. He meant that Allāh had made ‘Alī (a.s.) like the person of the Prophet. (And who could have more right to succeed the Prophet than his own person?). al-Ma’mūn said: ‘‘If there were not our women.’’ He wanted to say that the reference to ‘‘women’’ indicates that the word ‘‘our selves’’ means ‘‘our men’’, and as such it would not show any excellence. The Imām replied: ‘‘If there were not our sons.’’ That is, if ‘‘our selves’’ referred to the men, then why should the sons be mentioned separately? They would have been included in ‘‘our men’’.

Ḥarīz narrates from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said: ‘‘The Leader of the Faithful (‘Alī, a.s.) was asked about his excellent virtues. He mentioned some of them. Then they said to him: ‘Tell us (some) more.’ So he said: ‘Verily two Bishops of the Christians of Najrān came to the Messenger of Allāh, and talked (with him) on the subject of ‘Īsā (a.s.). Thereupon Allāh revealed the verse: Surely the likeness of ‘Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam... Then the Messenger of Allāh entered (the house), .and held the hands of ‘Alī, al-Ḥasan, al-Ḥusayn and Fāṭimah; then he came out, and raised his palms to the heaven and separated his fingers one from another; and called them (the Christians) to the imprecation.’ ’’ (Abū ‘Abdillāh, a.s.) then said: ‘‘And Abū Ja‘far (a.s.) has said: ‘And that is the way of imprecation; one intertwines his hand in one’s (adversay’s) hand raising them to the heaven.’ ’’ Thereupon when the two Bishops saw him, one of them said to his companion: ‘‘By God! If he is a prophet, we shall surely perish; and if he is not a prophet his (own) people would save us (from the trouble of confronting him).'' So they gave up (the imprecation) and went back.' '' (al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: This or nearly the same meaning has been narrated in other traditions through the Shī'ī chains. All of them unanimously say that those who were brought by the Prophet for the imprecation were 'Alī, Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn only.

ash-Shaykh aṭ-Ṭūsī has narrated it in his al-Amālī, through his chains from 'Āmir ibn Sa'd from his father; and also through his chains from 'Abdu'r-Raḥmān ibn Kathīr from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.); and also through his chains from Sālim ibn Abi 'l Ja'd, raising it to Abū Dharr; and also through his chains from Rabī'ah ibn Nājid from 'Alī (a.s.).

al-Mufīd has narrated it in his al-Ikhtiṣāṣ, through his chains from Muḥammad ibn az-Zibriqān from Mūsā ibn Ja'far (a.s.); and also from Muḥammad ibn al-Munkadir from his father from his grandfather.

al-'Ayyāshī has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr from Muḥammad ibn Sa'īd al-Urdunnī from Mūsā ibn Muḥammad ibn ar-Riḍā (a.s.) from his brother; and also from Abū Ja'far al-Aḥwal from aṣ-Sādiq (a.s.); and also from al-Mundhir from 'Alī (a.s.); and also through his chains from 'Āmir ibn Sa'd.

al-Furāt has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr several traditions to this effect, which separately reach to Abū Ja'far (a.s.), Abū Rāfi', ash-Sha'bī, 'Alī (a.s.), and Shahr ibn Ḥawshab and several other traditions to the same effect have been narrated in Rawḍatu 'l-wā'iẓīn, I'lāmu 'l-warā, al-Kharā'ij and other books.

It has been narrated in at-Tafsīr of ath-Tha'labī [1] from Mujāhid and al-Kalbī: ''When the Prophet called the Christians for the imprecation, they said: 'Let us return and think over it.' When they were alone, they asked al-'Āqib — and he was a man of good judgment among them: 'O 'Abdu '1-Masīḥ! What is your opnion?' He said: 'By Allāh! You are well-aware, O ye Christians! that Muḥammad is a prophet, sent by Allāh, and that he has brought to you the decisive word about your Companion ('Īsā, a.s.). By Allāh! whenever a nation has entered into imprecation with a prophet, their elders have perished and their youngsters have died.

[1] The author now gives references from the Sunnī books. (tr.)

And if you do it, we shall surely perish; but, if you turn down, for the love of your religion and (want) to remain on what you have at present, then make peace with the man and go back to your towns.'

''So they came to the Messenger of Allāh; and he had come out in the morning carrying al-Ḥusayn in his lap, holding the hand of al-Ḥasan, with Fāṭimah walking behind him and 'Alī was behind her; and he was saying: 'When I pray, you say ''Amen'' '. Then the Bishop of Najrān said: 'O ye Christians! Surely I see the faces that if they ask Allāh to remove a mountain from its place, He would surely remove it. Therefore, do not do imprecation, otherwise you will perish, and there will not remain any Christian on the face of the earth, upto the Day of Resurrection.'

''Then they said: 'O Abu '1-Qāsim! We have decided that we should not enter into imprecation against you; and that we leave you on your religion and we remain on our religion.' He said: 'Well, if you refuse imprecation, then accept Islam — you will have (the rights) which (other) Muslims have, and on you shall be (the duties) which are on them.' But they refused. So (the Prophet) said: 'Then I shall fight you.' They said: 'We do not have strength to figh against the Arabs. But we shall make peace with you that you will not fight against us or frighten us; nor will you turn us away from our religion, on the condition that we shall pay to you every year two thousand robes — one thousand in Ṣafar and one thousand in Rajab — and thirty coats of mail, (of) common (quality), made of iron.' So the Prophet made agreement with them on these conditions. And he said, 'By Him in Whose hand is my soul ! Surely destruction had almost descended on the people of Najrān.' And if they had entered into imprecation they would have been transformed into monkeys and pigs, and there would have erupted in the valley a conflagration of fire engulfing them all; and surely Allāh would have annihilated Najrān and its inhabitants — even the birds on tree tops; and the year would not have ended for all the Christians but they would have perished.''

The author says: The event, nearly in similar words, has also been narrated in Kitābu 'l-Maghāzī from Ibn Isḥāq. Also al-Mālikī has narrated it in his al-Fuṣūlu 'l-muhimmah from many exegetes; and al-Ḥammūyī has narrated nearly similar tradition from Ibn Jurayḥ.

The agreement contains the phrase, ‘‘one thousand in Ṣafar;’’ it means al-Muḥarram of Islamic calender, which was the first month of the year in Arabia. In pre-Islamic days it was called ‘‘Ṣafar’’ — the first two months were called Ṣafar al-Awwal and Ṣafar ath-Thānī. Arabs in the days of ignorance used to postpone Ṣafar al-Awwal. Then Islam confirmed the sacredness of the Ṣafar al-Awwal; so it was called, ‘‘the sacred (اَلْمُحَرَّمُ = al-Muḥarram), month of Allāh;’’ then it became known as al-Muḥarram.

‘Āmir son of Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqās narrates from his father that he said: ‘‘Mu‘āwiyah ibn Abī Sufyān ordered Sa‘d telling him, ‘What prevents you from abusing Abū Turāb (‘Alī, a.s.)?’ He said, ‘As for this matter, as long as I remember three things which the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) has said (about ‘Alī) I will never abuse him; if even one of them were for me, it would have been dearer to me than red livestocks.’ I heard the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) saying, when he left him (‘Alī) as his Deputy (when going) for one of his battles. ‘Alī said to him, ‘O Messenger of Allāh! Are you leaving me behind with women and children?’ Thereupon, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said to him: ‘Are you not pleased that you should have the same position with me that Hārūn had with Mūsā — except that there is no prophet after me?’ And I heard him saying on the day of Khaybar: ‘Most surely tomorrow I will give the standard (of army) to a man who loves Allāh and His Messenger, and whom Allāh and His Messenger do love.’ (Sa‘d) said: ‘So we held our heads high (hoping to catch the eye of the Prophet). But he said: ‘Call ‘Alī to me.’ So he was brought (before him), sore-eyed; and (the Prophet) put (his) saliva in his eyes (and he was cured); and gave the standard to him. And Allāh conquered (Khaybar) on his hand. And when this verse was revealed: ... then say: ‘‘Come let us call our sons and your sons and our women and your women and our selves and your selves, then let us pray earnestly ... ’’, the Messenger of Allāh called ‘Alī, Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, and said: ‘O Allāh! These are the People of my House.’ ’’(aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, Muslim)

The author says: This tradition has been narrated by at-Tirmidhī in his aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, Abu ’l-Mu’ayyad al-Muwaffaq ibn Aḥmad in his Kitāb Faḍā’il ‘Alī, Abū Nu‘aym in his Ḥilyatu ’l-awliyā’ (from the same narrator as above), and al-Ḥammūyī in his Farā'idu 's-simṭayn.

Abū Nu'aym narrates through his chains from 'Āmir ibn Sa'd ibn Abī Waqqāṣ from his father that he said: ''When this verse was revealed, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) called 'Alī, Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn and said: 'O Allāh! These are the People of my House.'' (Ḥilyatu 'l-awliyā')

Also he narrates in the same book through his chains from ash-Sha'bī from Jābir that he said: ''al-'āqib and aṭ-Ṭayyib came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and he invited them to Islam. They said: 'We are (already) Muslims, O Muḥammad! He said: 'You tell a lie. If you wish, I would tell you what prevents you from (accepting) Islam.' They said: 'Then let us have.' He said: 'The love of the cross, drinking liquor, and eating the flesh of pig.' Jābir further said: ''Then the Prophet invited them to imprecation, and they promised him to come to him in the morning. When the morning came, the Messenger of Allāh held the hands of 'Alī, al-Ḥasan, al-Ḥusayn and Fāṭimah. Then he sent (someone) to them. But they refused to accept his call (for imprecation) ; instead they acknowledged to him (his sovereignty). Then the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: 'By Him Who has sent me with truth! Had they done (the imprecation) the valley would have rained fire on them.' '' Jābir said: ''About them was revealed the verse: ... let us call our sons and your sons ... Jābir further said ''our selves refers to the Messenger of Allāh and 'Alī; and our sons to al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn; and our women to Fāṭimah.''

The author says: This tradition has been narrated by Ibn al-Maghāzilī in his al-Manāqib through his chains from the same ash-Sha'bī from Jābir; by al-Ḥammūyī in his Farā'idu 's-simṭayn, through his chains from the same narrator; by al-Māliki in his al-Fuṣūlu 'l-muhimmah from the same; by Abū Dāwūd aṭ-Ṭāyalisī from the same; and by as-Suyūṭī in his ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from al-Ḥākim (who has said that this tradition is correct), and from Ibn Marduwayh as well as Abū Nu'aym (in his Dalā'ilu 'l-khayrāt) — all from Jābir.

Abū Nu'aym has narrated in his Dalā'ilu 'l-khayrāt through the chain of al-Kalbī from Abū Ṣāliḥ from Ibn 'Abbās that he said: ''Verily a delegation of the Christians of Najrān came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), and there were fourteen persons of their nobles. Among them were as-Sayyid (and he was the leader) and al-‘Āqib, the second in rank and a man of good judgment among them.’’ (Then he has described the event as given above.) (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr) al-Bayhaqī has narrated in his Dalā’ilu ’n-Nubuwwah through the chain of Salmah ibn ‘Abd Yashū‘ from his father from his grandfather that he said : ‘‘The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) wrote to the people of Najrān, before the (chapter of) Ṭā Sīn Sulaymān [1] was revealed: ‘In the name of Allāh, the God of Ibrāhīm and Isḥāq and Ya‘qūb. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of Allāh to the Bishop of Najrān and the people of Najrān. If you accept Islam, then I extol before you Allāh, the God of Ibrāhīm and Isḥāq and Ya‘qūb. Now after (the praise of Allāh), I call you to the worship of Allāh leaving aside the worship of the servants (of Allāh), and I invite you to (come under) the guardianship of Allāh instead of the guardianship of the servants. But if you refuse (it), then (you should pay) the head-tax; and if you refuse (even this), then I declare war against you. And peace (be on you).’

When the Bishop read the letter, he was shocked and extremely terrified. So he sent (someone) to call a man of Najrān Shuraḥbīl ibn Wadā‘ah by name; and gave him the letter of the Prophet and he read it. Then the Bishop said to him: ‘What is your opinion?’ Shuraḥbīl said: ‘You surely know the promise which Allāh made to Ibrāhīm about the prophethood in the progeny of Ismā‘īl. Therefore, how can one be sure that it is not this very man? I would not give any opnion regarding the prophethood. If it were an opinion about a worldly matter, I would have advised you about it and made efforts on your behalf.’ Then the Bishop called the people of Najrān one after another, but all said as Shuraḥbīl had said. Thereupon, they decided to send Shuraḥbīl ibn Wadā‘ah, ‘Abdullāh ibn Shuraḥbīl and Jabbār ibn Fayḍ, so that they might bring them the (correct) news of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.)

‘‘So the delegation proceeded until they came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). And he asked them (questions) and they asked him, and this questioning between him and them continued, until they said to him:

[1] i.e., the 27th Chapter, the Ant. The author has proved, while writing the traditions under the next verse, that this particular tradition is false. (tr.)

‘What do you say about ‘Īsā son of Maryam?’ The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘Today, I do not have anything about him; therefore you stay (here), in order that I may tell you tomorrow morning what is to be said about ‘Īsā.’ Then Allāh sent down this verse: Surely the likeness of ‘Īsā is with Allāh as the likeness of Adam; He created him from dust ... and bring about the curse of Allāh on the liars.

‘‘But they refused to agree to that (truth). Thus, when the next morning came after the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had given them that information, he proceeded for the imprecation to a place thick with trees that belonged to him, carrying al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, and Fāṭimah was walking behind him; and he had many wives those days (but did not take any of them with him). And Shuraḥbīl said to his two companions: ‘Surely, I see a (serious) matter coming (to us). If this man is a prophet sent (by Allāh) and we ventured to imprecate against him, there would not remain on the face of the earth any hair or claw of us (i.e., any cattle or bird belonging to us), but it will perish.’ They said to him: ‘What is your view?’ He said: ‘My opinion is that we should leave the judgment to him, because I see (in him) a man who will never exceed the proper limits in his decision.’ They said: ‘You may do as you like in this matter.’ Thereupon, Shuraḥbīl met the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and said: ‘I have thought (of one thing) better than the imprecation against you.’ He said: ‘And what is it?’ He said: ‘(We give you the authority) to decide (between us) this day upto the night and from the night to the (next) morning. Whatever you will decide will be binding on us.’

‘‘So the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) returned without doing imprecation, and made agreement with them on the head-tax.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from ‘Ilbā’ ibn Aḥmar al-Yashkurī that he said: ‘‘When the verse was revealed: ... then say: ‘Let us call our sons and your sons ...’, the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) sent (someone) to (call) ‘Alī, Fāṭimah and their sons, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn; and invited the Jews to enter into imprecation against them. Then a young Jew said: ‘Woe unto you! Are you not familiar with (the story) of your brothers who were yesterday transformed into monkeys and pigs? Do not enter into (this) imprecation.’ So they desisted (from it).’’ (ibid.)

The author says: This tradition supports the view that the pronoun

‘‘this’’ in the opening sentence, disputes with you in this, refers to ‘‘truth’’ in the preceding verse, The truth is from your Lord. In this way, the order of imprecation would cover other matters too, besides the controversy about ‘Īsā son of Maryam. In that case, it would be another story [1] after the events which took place with the delegation of Najrān as narrated in numerous traditions which supports each other, and a large portion of which has been quoted above.

Ibn Ṭāwūs has written in Sa‘du ’s-su‘ud: ‘‘I saw in the book Mā nazala mina ’l-Qur’āni fi ’n-Nabiyyi wa Ahli baytih (by Muḥammad ibn al-‘Abbās ibn Marwān) that he has narrated the tradition of the imprecation through fifty-one chains from the Companions and others; and some of them are: al-Ḥasan ibn ‘Alī (peace be on them both), ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān, Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqās, Bakr ibn Sammāl, Ṭalḥah, az-Zubayr, ‘Abdu ’r-Raḥmān ibn ‘Awf, ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Abbās, Abū Rāfi‘ (slave of the Prophet), Jābir ibn ‘Abdillāh, al-Barā’ ibn ‘Āzib and Anas ibn Mālik.’’

Likewise (Ibn Shahrāshūb) has narrated this tradition in al-Manāqib, from a number of narrators and exegetes. as-Suyūṭī has done the same in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr.

A very strange thing has been written by an exegete who said:

‘‘The traditions unanimously say that the Prophet selected ‘Alī, Fāṭimah and their two sons for the imprecation; and they apply the word our women to Fāṭimah, and our selves to ‘Alī only. The source of these traditions are the Shī‘ahs, and their motive in this respect is well-known. They have tried as much as they could to propagate such traditions until it has spread among a vast number of the Sunnīs too.

‘‘But those who forged these traditions did not succeed in properly fitting their interpretation on the verse. When an Arab says, ‘our women’ he never means his daughter — especially when he has wives too. Such thing is not known in their language. Even more far-fetched is the claim that ‘our selves’ means ‘Alī. Moreover, the delegation of Najrān — concerning whom the verse is said to be revealed — had not come to Medina with their women and children.

‘‘The only thing which the verse shows is that the Prophet was ordered to call the People of the Book (who were disputing with him about ‘Īsā) to gather all — men, women and children — together; and he was to gather the believers — men, women and children — together, in order that they might earnestly pray to Allāh to curse the party which was in the wrong regarding its claim about ‘Īsā (a.s.).

[1] This tradition is not supported by other traditions or history. (tr.)

‘‘Such thing would prove that the Prophet had strong conviction of the truth of his claim and had utmost confidence in it. And likewise, the desistence of those who were challenged to imprecation — the Christians or other People of the Book — would show that they had no confidence in their own claim and were disputing not for the purpose of ascertaining the truth; their belief was shakey and they had no clear proofs. How can a believer in Allāh agree to gather such a group — consisting of the truthful ones and the liars — in one place to fix their attention to Allāh asking for His curse, to pray to remove the liars from His mercy? Can anyone be more daring than such a person? Can anything be more mocking to the Divine Power and Majesty than this?

‘‘The Prophet and the believers had full confidence in the truth of what they believed about ‘Īsā (a.s.). It may be understood from the words of Allāh, after what has come to you of knowledge; because knowledge in matters of belief means certainty only.

‘‘The words of Allāh, let us call our sons and your sons ..., may be interpreted in either of the two ways:

‘‘First: Each group should call the other; you should call our sons and we should call your sons and likewise about the other two categories of women and selves.

‘‘Second: Each group should call his family. We, the Muslims, should call our sons, women and ourselves, and you should do likewise with your family.

‘‘There is no difficulty in either case in calling the ‘selves’. The difficulty arises when this phrase is restricted to one person, as the Shī‘ahs and their followers do.’’

COMMENT: This is such a non-sense that no knowledgeable person would ever like to write it in academic books; and perhaps someone might venture to say that we have wrongly attributed it to such a renowned man! Yet, we have quoted it in full to show how low a man can sink in misapprehension and jaundiced views because of his bias and prejudice. He goes on demolishing what he had earlier built, and reconfirms what he had rejected before, without caring or even knowing what he was doing. Also, we wanted evil to be known to all, so that they could protect themselves from it.

We may comment on this talk in two ways:

1. To show that the verse proves utmost excellence and superiority of ʻAlī (a.s.). But it is a subject more appropriate for the books of theology, and is not so much related to our subject, that is, explanation of the meanings of the Qur'ānic verses.

2. To review what the above exegete has written about the meaning of the verse of imprecation and concerning the traditions showing what had happened between the Prophet and the Christians of Najrān. This comes within the purview of exegesis, and we shall deal with it here.

You have already seen what the verse means. And the numerous traditions (which support each other), quoted by us, perfectly fit the meaning of the verse. If you ponder on what we have written earlier, you will see where and how his innovated ''proof'' has gone wrong, and at what points his blinkered vision has made him stumble. Here are some details:

He says: ''The source of these traditions are the Shīʻahs, and their motive in this respect is well-known. They have tried as much as they could to propagate such traditions until it has spread among a vast number of the Sunnīs too.'' This he says after admitting that the traditions are unanimous! Would that I knew which traditions he speaks about. Does he mean the abovementioned traditions which support and strengthen each other, which the scholars of traditions have unanimously accepted and narrated? They are not one, two or three; they are countless in number. The traditionalists have quoted them with one voice; the compilers of traditions have written them in their books, including Muslim and at-Tirmidhī in their collections of 'correct' traditions; and the historians have confirmed them by describing the events in a similar way. The exegetes of the Qur'ān have unanimously quoted and copied them, without expressing any doubt or levelling any objection against them — and there are among them stalwarts of traditions and history, like aṭ-Ṭabarī, Abu 'l-Fidā', Ibn Kathīr and as-Suyūṭī etc.

And who were those Shīʻahs who were the source of this story? Does he mean those companions who narrated it in the first place? Like Sa‘d ibn Abī Waqqās, Jābir ibn ‘Abdillāh, ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Abbās and others? Or the disciples of the companions who took this tradition from them and conveyed it to others? Like Abū Ṣāliḥ, al-Kalbī, as-Suddī, ash-Sha‘bī and others? Does he want to say that those companions and their disciples became Shī‘ahs — just because they narrated a tradition which he does not like? It is these companions and disciples — together with other like them — who are the final links in the chains of the narrators of the Prophet’s traditions. Discard them, and you will be left neither with any tradition nor any biography of the Prophet. How can a Muslim — nay, even a non-Muslim researcher — aspire to know the details of the Prophet’s message, if he rejects the traditions? How can he know the teachings and laws brought by the Messenger of Allāh? The Qur’ān clearly upholds the authority of the sayings and actions of the Prophet; and declares that the religion is based on his life. Reject the authority of the traditions and you have lost the Qur’ān as well; there will remain no trace of the Divine Book, nor will there be any fruit of this revelation.

Or perhaps he thinks that the Shī‘ahs have interpolated and surreptitiously inserted these traditions in the books of traditions and history? But then the problem, instead of going away, would rather increase and be more overwhelming: the tradition will lose its authority and the sharī‘ah will be nullified.

He says: ‘‘They apply the word our women to Fāṭimah and our selves to ‘Alī.’’ Probably he wants to say that according to the Shī‘ahs, the words our women and our selves literally mean only Fāṭimah and ‘Alī respectively. Perhaps he got the idea from an earlier quoted tradition in which Jābir said: ‘‘Our selves refers to the Messenger of Allāh and ‘Alī; ... and our women to Fāṭimah.’’ But obviously he has not understood its meaning. he traditions do not say so. They only mean that because the Prophet when acting on the verse, did not bring (any other person for imprecation) except ‘Alī and Fāṭimah, it made it clear that she was the only one worthy of being included in the category our women, as he was the only one qualified for the category our selves; and likewise al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn were the only two for the category our sons. The words: sons, women and selves taken together meant the family. Therefore, these four were the family of the Messenger of Allāh and his closest relatives, as we have seen in some traditions that he (s.a.w.a.) said after coming with them at the appointed place: ‘‘O Allāh! These are the people of my house.’’ The sentence implies: I did not find anyone whom I could call, except these four.

That this is the correct explanation may be seen in the wording of some traditions which say: ‘‘our selves refers to the Messenger of Allāh and ‘Alī.’’ It clearly shows that the tradition aims at describing who had come under which category — not at explaining the literal meaning of the words.

He says: ‘‘But those who forged these traditions did not succeed in properly fitting their interpretation on the verse. When an Arab says our women he never means his daughter — especially when he has got wives too. Such thing is not known in their language. Even more far-fetched is the claim that our selves means ‘Alī.’’

First he has given an imaginary meaning to the traditions, then he uses it as an excuse to discard all those narrations — in spite of their numerousness, in spite of their great number. Then he discredits its narrators and all those who have accepted them by accusing them of the crime of Shī‘ism! Had he been a true seeker of knowledge, he should have studied the books of exegesis, and remembered the vast multitude of the masters of eloquence and authorities of rhetorics, since they have quoted and written these traditions in their books of exegesis and other subjects without any hesitation, without any objection.

Look at the author of Tafsīru 'l-Kashshāf. He is a recognized authority on Arabic language, grammer and literature. He has often pronounced judgment on various recitations of the Qur’ān, showing why a certain recitation was not in keeping with the norms of language or usage. And see what he has to say about this verse: ‘‘And this verse contains a proof — unsurpassed in strength — of the excellence of the people of the mantle, peace be on them. And there is in it a clear proof of the truth of the prophethood of the Prophet, because nobody — either a supporter or an antagonist — has ever narrated that they (the Christians) answered that call (for imprecation).’’

How come that those giants of rhetorics and champions of literature could not realize that these traditions — in spite of their vast multitude and their repeated narrations in the books of traditions — accuse the Qur’ān of using incorrect expression by employing a plural (women) for one woman only?

Not, by my life! This exegete is in fact confused; he does not know the difference between the literal meaning of a word and its application. Obviously, his thinking goes like this: ‘‘Allāh said to His Prophet, But whoever disputes with you in this after what has come to you of knowledge, then say: ‘Come let us call our sons and your sons and our women and your women and our selves and your selves ...’ Now if we admit that the disputers at that time were the delegates of Najrān numbering according to some traditions, fourteen men; and that there were no women or children with them; and if after that we admit that when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) went for the imprecation, he had with him only: ‘Alī, Fāṭimah, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, then the phrase, whoever disputes with you, would literally mean the delegation of Najrān; our women would mean one woman; our selves would mean one ‘self’; and your sons and your women would become words without meaning because there were neither women nor sons in that delegation!’’

I wonder why he forgot to add that it would also mean use of our sons (a plural, meaning at least three sons) for only two sons, because it is more repugnant than the use of plural for singular. Since post-classical period, people have been using plural in place of singular — although such use is not found in the classical Arabic, except when done as a mark of respect. But the use of plural for dual is an unheard of thing — it has no justification at all.

However, it was this trend of thought which led him to discard all these traditions, saying that they were forged. But he has completely misunderstood the talk.

The fact is that an eloquent talk conforms with the situation which it is related to, and throws light on what in a given context is important to explain. Sometimes the talk is between two strangers, neither knowing the other’s life condition. Then they use normal expressions which are applied in general talk. Suppose two groups are facing each other; one of them wants the other to know that their conflict is deep-rooted, and that the whole tribe — men and women, elders and youngsters — shall continue the fight till the last. In such a situation, he will say: We shall fight you with our men, women and children. Now this sentence is based on the assumption that normally and naturally a tribe does have women and children. The statement aims at making it clear to the enemy that the speaker’s tribe is one in its determination to fight against their adversary.

On the other hand, if he were to say, 'We shall fight against you with our men, a woman and two sons', it would be a superflous detail, uncalled for in this context — unless there be some good reason for it in a particular situation.

But when the talk is between friends who know each other's family, then it may be couched in general terms. For example, one may say while inviting the other to his home: We are at your service — we ourselves as well as our women and children. Or, he may wish to be more specific and say: All of us will be at your service — the men, the daughter and the two children.

In short, normal way of expression is one thing and its application on real facts is another matter. Sometimes they may coincide, at other times they may be different. If a man speaks in normal and general terms and then it appears that the real situation is different, he is not accused of telling a lie.

This verse is based on the same principal. Accordingly the words, ... then say: ''Come let us call our sons and your sons and our women and your women and our selves and your selves ... '', means as follows: Tell them that you are coming with your closest relatives who are your partners in your claim and knowledge, and invite them to come with their closest relatives. Thus, the verse proceeds in the normal way assuming that the Messenger of Allāh had in his family men, women and sons, and the Christian delegates had likewise men, women and sons in their families; it was a challenge couched in general and usual terms. But when the time came to act on that challenge, it was found that the Prophet did not have any men, women and sons except one man, one woman and two sons, while his adversaries had no woman or son with them — there were only men in their group. But this difference in implementation did not falsify the challenge. That is why when the Prophet came out with one man, one woman and two sons, the Christians did not accuse him of lying or of not fulfilling the conditions; nor did they cover their refusal by saying that the Prophet had told them to bring their women and sons which they did not have with them at that time and therefore they were unable to enter into imprecation. Also, it was because of this that those who heard this story never imagined that it was a forgery.

The above explanation also shows the absurdity of his assertion where he says: ‘‘Moreover, the delegation of Najrān — concerning whom the verse is said to be revealed — had not come to Medina with their women and children.’’

He says: ‘‘The only thing which the verse shows is that the Prophet was ordered to call the People of the Book (who were disputing with him about ‘Īsā) to gather all — men, women and children — together; and he was to gather the believers — men, women and children — together; in order that they might earnestly pray to Allāh to curse the party which was in the wrong in its claim about ‘Īsā ... How can a beliver in Allāh agree to gather such a group — consisting of the truthful ones and the liars — in one place to fix their attention to Allāh asking for His curse, to pray to remove the liars from His mercy? Can anyone be more daring than such a person? Can anything be more mocking to the Divine Power and Majesty than this?’’

In short, the verse invites both parties to gather together with their ‘‘selves’’, their women and their sons in one place and then to earnestly pray for Allāh’s curse on the liars. Now let us find out what is the meaning of this gathering which he talks about.

Was it a call to gather together all the believers and all the Christians? But the believers at that time [1] included all, or almost all, Arabs of the tribes of Rabī‘ah and Muḍar residing from Yemen and Hijāz to Iraq and beyond. And the Christians included those in Najrān (then forming a part of Yemen), Syria and the regions around the Mediterranean sea; the Romans and the Franks, as well as the people of the Britain, Austria and other places.

Such a vast multitude of people, scattered from the East to the West, must have exceeded millions upon millions, counting men, women and children all together. There can be no doubt whatsoever in the mind of a sane person that it was almost impossible for all of them to gather in one place. Normal ways and means reject such a proposition altogether. If the Qur’ān had offered this proposal then it had asked for an impossible. It would mean that the Prophet was offering a conditional proof for the authencity of his claim — and the condition, on which it depended, was

[1] It was the 9th year after Hijrah according to some historians, and the 10th according to others. But both timings are open to question, as we shall describe when writing the ‘‘Traditions’’ related to the next verses. (Author’s Note) an impossible one! It would have given an excuse — a valid excuse — to the Christians not to accept his call of imprecation; in fact it would have been more damaging to his claim, rather than weakening their case.

Or, does he mean that it was a call to gather from both groups only those who were present thereby — the believers of Medina and nearby places, and the Christians of Najrān and the places in its vicinity? This alternative — although less absurd than the preceding one — was no less impossible. Who was capable that day of gathering all the residents of Medina and Najrān and their neighbouring places, not leaving a single woman and child out, in one place for the intended imprecation? Such proposal would have been an admission that the truth was impossible to prove, because the proof depended on an impossible condition.

Or, was it a call covering only those who were actively engaged in the disputation and arguments? That is, the Prophet and the believers around him, and the delegation of the Christians of Najrān. But then his own objection would boomerang: ‘‘Moreover, the delegation of Najrān — concerning whom the verse is said to be revealed — had not come to Medina with their women and children.’’ So the problem would not go away.

Further he says: ‘‘The Prophet and the believers had full confidence in the truth of what they believed about ‘Īsā (a.s.). It may be understood from the words of Allāh, after what has come to you of knowledge; because knowledge in matters of belief means certainty only.’’

It is true that the knowledge, as used in this verse, means certainty. But would that I knew where does it say that the believers were sure of the truth of their belief concerning ‘Īsā? The verse does not speak about anyone except the Prophet in singular pronouns: But whoever disputes with you (lit. thee) in this after what has come to you (lit. thee) of knowledge, then say (lit. say thou). And there was no reason why the verse should have addressed anyone except the Prophet alone; the Christians’ delegation had only one aim before their eyes — to dispute and argue with the Prophet. It was not their intention to meet the believers; they had not argued at all with the believers, nor had the believers spoken to them.

If the verse shows at all that anyone other than the Prophet had attained knowledge and certainty, it does so about those whom the Prophet had brought with himself for imprecation, as we have inferred from the words, and bring about the curse of Allāh on the liars.

On the other hand, the Qur'ān shows that not all the believers had attained knowledge and certainty. For example:

And most of them do not believe in Allāh without associating others (with Him) (12:106). Here Allāh announces their polytheism. How can polytheism co-exist with certainty?

And when the hypocrites and those in whose heart was a disease began to say: ''Allāh and His Messenger did not promise us (victory) but only to deceive'' (33:12).

And those who believe say: ''Why has not a chapter been revealed?'' But when a decisive chapter is revealed, and fighting is mentioned therein you see those in whose hearts is a disease look to you with the look of one fainting because of death. Woe to them then! ... Those it is whom Allāh has cursed so He has made them deaf and blinded their eyes (47:20 — 23).

The fact is that certainty was attained by only a few of the followers of the Prophet who had got clear sight. Allāh says:

But if they dispute with you, say: ''I have submitted myself (entirely) to Allāh and (so has) every one who follows me'' (3:20).

Say: ''This is my way, I invite (you) unto Allāh; with clear sight (which) land he who follows me (possess) (12:108).

He says: ''The words of Allāh, let us call our sons and your sons ..., may be interpreted in either of the two ways: First: Each group should call the others; you should call our sons and we should call your sons; and likewise about the other two categories of women and selves.''

You have already seen in the Commentary that this interpretation (which he gives as his first choice) is totally absurd and not in conformity with the wordings of the verse. So far as the call for imprecation was concerned, it would have sufficed to say: Come, let us earnestly pray and bring about the curse of Allāh on the liars. Why then were the remaining phrases added: Let us call our sons and your sons and our women and your women and our 'selves' and your 'selves'? These phrases were meant to bind each party to bring for the imprecation its dearest and precious-most things, that is, the sons, the women and the selves. This challenge could be meaningful only if each party was to bring its own sons, women and selves. It would lose its meaning completely if it was interpreted as he says: You should call our sons, women and selves and we should call your sons, women and selves.

Moreover, common sense rejects this interpretation. Why should the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) give the Christians power and authority over their sons and women? Because only after getting that power and authority could each party call the other's sons and women and bring them at the place of imprecation. Surely the aim could be achieved in a better way if each party called its own sons and women.

Further, as we have shown above, this interpretation makes it necessary to add in the verse the idea of giving someone the power and authority over others. But how and on what ground can we do so? The truth is that this interpretation is absolutely wrong. Only the other interpretation is correct — that each party was to call its own family members.

He says: ''There is no difficulty in either case in calling the 'selves'. The difficulty arises when this phrase is restricted to one person, as the Shī'ahs and their followers do.''

The difficulty, to which he refers, arises from the following objection: How can a man call himself? But this objection has nothing to do with either interpretation. It has been levelled against the explanation that our selves means the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) himself. Reportedly during one religious discussion, one group said that our selves referred to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), not to 'Alī. The opposite party said that it would imply that he called himself, which is manifestly wrong. (See the second tradition, quoted from 'Uyūnu 'l-akhbār.)

It will be seen from the above that his claim that ''the difficulty arises from the Shī'ahs' interpretation'', is absolutely wrong. The Shī'ahs say that the word, our selves, means the men from the family of the Prophet; and when the order was implemented, it was applied to the Messenger of Allāh and 'Alī (blessings and peace be on them!). And there could be no difficulty in their calling one another.

Accordingly, no objection can be directed at the Shī'ahs, even according to the interpretation which he ascribes to them, that our selves means 'All. What difficulty could there be if the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) was to call 'Alī (a.s.)?

His disciple [1] has written in al-Manār, after mentioning some traditions: ‘‘Ibn ‘Asākir has narrated from Ja‘far ibn Muḥammad from his father in explanation of the verse, then say: ‘Come let us call our sons and your sons ... ’ ‘Then (the Prophet) brought Abū Bakr and his son, ‘Umar and his son, and ‘Uthmān and his son.’ ’’ Then he comments: ‘‘Apparently the verse speaks about a group of the believers.’’ Thereafter he has copied the abovequoted writing of his teacher, and then has opined as follows: ‘‘As you see the verse orders women to participate with men in national struggles and religious wars. It is based on the principle of equality between men and women even in public affairs — except where an exception has been made. (Then he goes on elaborating the same points.)

COMMENT: As for the tradition which he has quoted, it is an isolated and peculiar one and goes against all the other traditions on this subject; and needless to say that the other traditions are so numerous and so well known. That is why the exegetes have not mentioned it. Moreover, it contains statements which do not tally with the facts: It supposes that all the people mentioned therein had sons, but surely not all of them had sons at that time.

He says: ‘‘Apparently the verse speaks about a group of the believers.’’ Probably, he wants to infer from the tradition (quoted by him) that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had brought there all the believers and their children; thus the words that the Prophet, ‘‘brought Abū Bakr and his son ...’’ would indirectly imply that he brought all the believers. In this way he wants to support the interpretation of his teacher, discussed above. But you see how isolated, shunned and discarded this tradition is; and how defective is its text. Apart from that it does not give the meaning he infers from it.

Now look at the principle adduced by him that women should participate in the public affairs just as men do. If his reasoning is accepted then it would also prove that small children too should participate in those affairs with their elders. This one point alone is enough to show the falsity of his observation.

COMMENTARY

Now begins the second phase of the exposition of the People of the Book, particularly the Christians, and some related matters.

The preceding verses described the condition of the People of the Book generally, beginning with the verse 3:19 (Surely the religion with Allāh is Islam ...), taking a turn at the verse 3:23 (Have you not considered those who are given a portion of the Book?). Then it focused its attention on the Christians beginning with the verse 3:33 (Surely Allāh chose Adam and Nūḥ ...), guiding the believers earlier, in the verse 3:28, not to take the unbelievers for friends rather than the believers (Let not the believers take the unbelievers for friends rather than the believers ...). This was the first phase.

Now, the same subjects are explained in other words in a different style. First, it comments on the People of the Book in general. Apart from the verses under discussion, it throws light on various other relevant matters in other places; for example: Say: ''O People of the Book! why do you disbelieve in the signs of Allāh? ...'' (3:98); Say: ''O People of the Book! why do you hinder him who believes from the way of Allāh? ...'' (3:99). Secondly, it exposes the condition of the Christians and their belief concerning ʻIsā (a.s.): It is not meet for a man that Allāh should give him the Book, and the wisdom and prophethood, then he should say to men: ''Be my servants ...'' (3:79). Then the talk turns to the matters related to the believers calling them to submission and unity and warning them of befriending the unbelievers and being intimate with them in preference to the believers. All these things are explained in numerous verses in various places.

QUR'ĀN: Say: ''O People of the Book! come to a word, common between us and you: This call is addressed to all the People of the Book in general. The invitation to ''come to a word'' really means to unite on the meaning of the word by acting upon it. The call to the word is based on the idiom found in Arabic and other languages, as for example, they say: The nation is united on this word. It implies the meanings of belief, acknowledgment, recognition and propagation. The verse therefore means: Come let us adhere to this word, co-operating with one another in its propagation and acting on its demands.

as-Sawā' (اَلسَّوَآءُ) is a maṣdar, although it is commonly used as an adjective to denote a thing both sides of which are equal. ''common between us and you'' means that you and we both are equally bound to acknowledge it and to act on it. Obviously, the use of this adjective for ''word'' is metaphorical. What is actually equal is its acknowledgment and the resulting action. Again action is related to the import of the word, not the word itself. Moreover, the call for unity about the word in itself has metaphorical connotation. In this way, this sentence has many fine points of rhetorics: Calling to unite on a meaning, then using the ''word'' for the meaning and then ascribing the adjective ''common'' to the ''word''.

Also, it has been said that the ''common word'' refers to that which the Qur'ān, the Torah and the Injīl commonly invite to with one voice — and that is the belief of monotheism. If this suggestion is correct then the next words, ''that we shall not worship any but Allāh ...'', would serve as the correct explanation of the word common between the Muslims and the People of the Book; it would invite the latter to leave aside their own interpretation of the Oneness of God — the interpretation used to fit this pristine ''word'' on their own desire; for example, their belief that God was incarnated, took a son, was one but had three persons; their worship of their rabbis, priests and bishops. The meaning in that case would be as follows: Come to a word common between us and you, and that is the belief in One God; and if we unite on it then we would have to discard and reject all that is associated with Allāh, and would not take others for lords besides Him.

But the ending of the verse, ''but if they turn back, then say: 'Bear witness that we are Muslims (Submitting ones)' '', supports the first meaning given by us. In short, the verse calls to this word that "we shall not worship any but Allāh ...'', as it is the demand of Islam, the total submission, which is the religion with Allāh. Although submission is also a concomitant of the belief in the Oneness of God, the verse calls the People of the Book not to the theoretical, but practical, monotheism; that is, to discard worshipping anyone but Allāh. (Think over it).

QUR'ĀN: ''that we shall not worship any but Allāh and (that) we shall not associate anything with Him, and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh'': It is the explanation of ''the common word'', and it is what submission to Allāh demands. The words, ''we shall not worship any but Allāh'', reject the worship of any other than Allāh; it is not their aim to prove or affirm the worship of Allāh. We have already mentioned in the explanation of the ''creed'' — There is no god except Allāh — that the phrase, ''except Allāh'', is not an exception but al-badal (اَلْبَدَلُ = appositional substantive standing for another substantive) of ''god''; consequently, the sentence aims at rejecting partners for Allāh, not at affirming the existence of Allāh [1]. According to the Qur'ān, existence of Allāh and His being the Truth needs no proof, it is a self-evident reality.

This sentence calls them not to associate anyone to Allāh in worship. But it does not nullify the other types of polytheism emanating from the belief that Allāh had a son or the idea of trinity and things like that. That is why the call continues: ''and (that) we shall not associate anything with Him, and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh.'' The fact is that merely saying that a worship is meant for Allāh does not make it the worship of Allāh, unless it is done with pure and sincere faith, unless the heart is purged of all beliefs and superstitions springing from polytheism. Otherwise, the worship would be for a god who had a partner. And a worship devoted to one of the alleged partners in godhead — even if it is done for him exclusively — would still be a product of polytheism. Why? because such a worship, by its very definition is a share devoted to one of the two or more partners; as such it acknowledges the right of the other partner or partners, and is therefore the worship of those partners too.

On the other hand, the Prophet calls them, by order of Allāh, to the pure monotheism, ''that we shall not worship any but Allāh and (that) we shall not associate anything with Him, and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh.'' It is this call which combines in itself all the aims and objectives of prophethood; it is this which the prophets taught their men, and which they propagated in the human society.

We have described (while explaining the verse 2:213, Mankind was but one people) that prophethood is a God-inspired awakening, a true advancement, the purpose of which is to spread the word of religion. The religion, in its reality, is equilibrium in the society's march of life; and a well-balanced society creates well-balanced individual in life. In this way, each and everyone is accorded his due position which the nature has meant him to have. Thus, the society gets the freedom and the felicity of natural perfectness based on justice and equity; and likewise the individual gets complete freedom to enjoy the life in all its aspects, as he thinks fit and as he likes — except when it is likely to harm the society's life. And all these freedoms and enjoyments are conditional to servitude and submission to Allāh, subservient to the unseen authority and power.

We may summarize the prophets' message in these words: They want human species — individually and collectively — to march forward according to the dictate of their nature which adheres to the belief of monotheism. That belief in its turn demands that man should base all his individual and social actions and activities on submission to Allāh, and that he should spread justice and equity. In other words, all should be given equal rights in life, and all should have equal freedom of good intention and good deed.

This goal cannot be achieved until and unless the roots of conflict and unlawful transgression are completely destroyed; so that no strong person exploits or enslaves a weak man, no one dominates another, and no powerless person serves the interests of someone powerful. There is no god but Allāh; there is no Lord except Allāh; and there is no rule for anyone except Allāh.

This is what this verse says: ''that we shall not worship any but Allāh and (that) we shall not associate anything with Him, and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh. There are many verses of the same connotation. For example, Allāh quotes Yūsuf (a.s.) as saying: O my two mates of the prison! are sundry lords better or Allāh, the One, the Supreme? You do not worship besides Him but names which you have named, you and your fathers; Allāh has not sent down any authority for them; judgment is only Allāh's; He has commanded that you shall not worship aught but Him; this is the right religion (12:39 — 40). Also, Allāh says: They have taken their doctors of law and their monks for lords besides Allāh, and (also) the Messiah son of Maryam, and they were not enjoined but that they should worship one God only, there is no god but He (9:31).

And the same is the importance of many admonitions addressed to their peoples by the prophets like: Nūḥ, Hūd, Ṣāliḥ, Ibrāhīm, Shu‘ayb, Mūsā and ‘Īsā (peace be on them all). For example:

Nūḥ: My Lord! surely they have disobeyed me and followed him whose wealth and children have added to him nothing but loss (71:21).

Hūd: Do you build on every height a monument? Vain is it that you do. And you make strong fortresses that perhaps you may abide. And when you lay hands (on men) you lay hands (like) tyrants (26:128 — 130).

Ṣāliḥ: And do not obey the bidding of the extravagant ones (26:151).

Ibrāhīm: When he said to his father and his people: ‘‘What are these images to whose worship you cleave?’’ They said: ‘‘We found our fathers worshipping them.’’ He said: ‘‘Certainly you have been, (both) you and your fathers, in manifest error’’ (21:52 — 54).

And Allāh said to Mūsā and Hārūn: Go both to Pharaoh, surely he has become inordinate: ... So go you both to him and say: ‘‘Surely we are two messengers of your Lord; therefore send the Children of Israel with us and do not torment them ...’’ (20:43 — 47).

And lastly ‘Īsā said to his people: ‘‘... and so that I may make clear to you part of what you differ in; so fear Allāh and obey me’’ (43:63).

The natural religion is that which negates transgression and mischief, and eradicates injustice and unlawful dominations — the unjust dominations which destroy the foundation of happiness and uproot the basis of truth and reality. It was this fact which the Prophet alluded to when he said in the last pilgrimage (and al-Mas‘ūdī has mentioned it in his Murūju ’dh-dhahab, in the events of the year 10 of Hijrah): ‘‘Indeed the time has come full circle to its (original) form (as it was) the day when Allāh created the heavens and the earth.’’ Perhaps he (s.a.w.a.) meant that the men have come back to the rule of nature because the Islamic character had become firmly rooted among them.

The sentence, ‘‘that we shall not worship any but Allāh ...’’, not only covers all the aims and objectives of prophethood, but also explains the reason of this commandment.

‘‘that we shall not worsdhip any but Allāh’’: Godhead is that which everything worships, is bewildered about and loved — in every way. God is the origin and fountainhead of every perfection in all the things; in spite of their magnitude in number, they are related to one another and all are one in that each component looks to God for its needs; He is the source of every perfection desired by these things. This reality leads us to the Oneness of God. As the created things are interrelated, the Creator can be no more than one. He is the Owner in Whose Hand is the management of everything. Therefore, it is obligatory to worship Allāh, because He is the One and Only God, there is no partner or colleague to Him. And it is obligatory not to ascribe any partner to Him in worship. In other words, this universe with all that it contains cannot submit except to One Creator. These creatures are joined in a uniform system, they are united in their existence: naturally there cannot be more than one Lord for them, because there is not more than one Creator for them.

‘‘and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh’’: Human beings, in spite of their great number, are parts of one reality, that is, human species and humanity. All those merits and abilities which the hand of creation has put in them in equal measure demand that they must have equal rights in life, and must be accorded equal treatment in all those matters. On the other hand, there are differences in the conditions of the individuals and in their ability to procure and acquire some advantages and prerogatives of life; they are the gifts of general humanity which are bestowed to some particular individuals or groups here and there; such prerogatives also should be allowed to the mankind — but only in the way it demands. For example, sexual intercourse, pregnancy and medical treatment, all are the affairs of the humanity in general; yet sexual intercourse is the prerogative of an adult human being, male or female, while pregnancy is exclusively reserved for the female; and medical treatment is accorded only to a sick person.

In short, the members of the human society are components of a single reality — the components being similar to each other. No one has a right to impose his will on another, until and unless he takes on himself a similar burden on behalf of the other. And this is what co-operation in acquisition of life’s advantages means. But if the society or individual surrenders to an individual, if the whole or a part of the humanity submits to another part; raising him from the level of equality to that of superiority, giving him domination and arbitrary powers, making him an autocratic despot — he rules as he likes, is obeyed in whatever he says, and is taken as a lord whose will has to be complied with — then it negates the nature and destroys the foundation of humanity.

Moreover, Lordship exclusively belongs to Allāh, there is no lord but He. Thus, if a man puts himself under the authority of another man like himself, allowing that master to do with his follower whatever he wants, then it means that the said master has been taken as a lord besides Allāh. It is such a proposition which can never be accepted by him who has surrendered himself to Allāh.

It is now clear that the words of Allāh, ‘‘and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh’’, throw light on two realities: One, the human beings are parts of a single reality, the parts being similar to each other. Two, Lordship is the exclusive prerogative of Godhead.

QUR’ĀN: but if they turn back, then say: ‘‘Bear witness that we are Muslims (Submitting ones)’’: It is a call to them to witness that the Prophet and his followers are on a religion which Allāh is pleased with, and it is Islam. Allāh says: Surely the religion with Allāh is Islam (3:19). This declaration will cut their argument and dispute, because no proof prevails against the truth and the people of the truth.

This sentence points to the fact that monotheism in worship is a concomitant to Islam.

QUR’ĀN: O People of the Book! why do you dispute about Ibrāhīm, when the Torah and the Injīl were not revealed till after him? Do you not then understand?: Apparently it is governed by the imparative verb, ‘‘say’’, placed in the preceding verse; and so are the verses 70 — 71, coming after four verses. Thus, it will be an order to the Prophet to say these things to the People of the Book. On the other hand, the verse coming after two verses (Most surely the nearest of people to Ibrāhīm are those who followed him and this Prophet and those who believe ...), gives an association which shows that the verse under discussion too may be a direct talk of Allāh, and not of the Prophet (by Allāh’s Command).

The People of the Book disputed among themselves about Ibrāhīm (a.s.). Probably it was, in the beginning, an argument by which each group wanted to show its veracity. The Jews might be saying: Ibrāhīm, whom Allah has praised so much, was from us; a claim which the Christians might have countered by saying: Ibrāhīm was on truth, and the truth has been manifested by the advent of ‘Īsā. Then the arguments might have degenerated into bigotry and obstinacy. Then the Jews claimed that Ibrāhīm was a Jew; and the Christians, that he was a Christian. However, it is a known fact that Judaism and Christianity came on the scene after the revelation of the Torah and the Injīl respectively; and these Books were revealed long after Ibrāhīm (a.s.). How could it be possible for him to be a Jew (a follower of the religion brought by Mūsā, a.s.)? Or a Christian (a follower of the sharī'ah of 'Īsā, a.s.)? All that can be said about Ibrāhīm (a.s.) is this: He was on truth, sincerely adhering to right, away from wrong, submitting himself to Allāh. These verses, therefore, have a connotation similar to the verse: Or do you say that Ibrāhīm and Ismā'īl and Isḥāq and Ya'qūb and the tribes were Jews or Christians? Are you better knowing or Allāh? And who is more unjust than he who conceals a testimony that he has from Allāh? (2:140).

QUR'ĀN: Behold! you are they who disputed about that of which you had knowledge; why then do you dispute about that of which you have no knowledge? And Allāh knows while you do not know: The verse affirms that they possessed a knowledge in respect of the disputation which they indulged in; and negates another knowledge and ascribes it to Allāh. The exegetes have variously explained the knowledge which they had, and that which they did not. According to them it may mean as follows: 'You had disputed about Ibrāhīm and you had some knowledge about him, for example, that he existed at a certain time and was a prophet. Why then do you dispute about a matter of which you have no knowledge at all — claiming that he was a Jew or a Christian? The fact is that Allāh knows while you do not know.' Alternatively, the knowledge that has been affirmed may refer to the little knowledge they had about 'Īsā. The verse thus says: 'You have disputed about 'Īsā while you had some knowledge about him and his affairs. Why do you then dispute about a subject of which you have no knowledge, claiming that Ibrāhīm was a Jew or a Christian?'

The above two explanations, given by the exegetes, do not conform with the apparent context of the verse. The first is wrong because the People of the Book had never contended with each other about the existence or prophethood of Ibrāhīm (a.s.). The second, because neither party was on right concerning their disputation about 'Īsā (a.s.). Both were mistaken in their respective beliefs, making erroneous claims about him. How then can their disputation about 'Īsā be called a disputation of which they had knowledge? In any case, the verse says that they disputed about something of which they had knowledge and also about that of which they had no knowledge. The question arises as to what was the disputation about which they had had knowledge? Moreover, it apparently shows that both disputes were among the People of the Book themselves. It does not refer to any argument between them and the Muslims; otherwise, the Muslims would obviously have been in wrong in that matter of which the People of the Book had knowledge.

The appropriate explanation would be as follows — and Allāh knows better:

It is well known that there was a never ending dispute between the Jews and the Christians which covered all the subjects in which they differed. The main point of contention was the 'Īsā's prophethood and the claims made by the Christians concerning his status — that he was God and son of God, and the belief of trinity. The Christians disputed with the Jews about his being a prophet sent by God — and the Christians had its knowledge. The Jews disputed with the Christians and refuted his godhead, his sonship and the trinity — and they talked with knowledge about it. These were the disputations about which they had got knowledge. As for the disputation about that of which they had no knowledge, it was their contention that Ibrāhīm was a Jew or a Christian.

When the Qur'ān says that they had no knowledge of this matter, it does not mean that they were unaware of the fact that the Torah and the Injīl were revealed after Ibrāhīm — as it was an obvious thing. Nor that they were oblivious of the fact that a preceding man cannot be a follower of one coming after him, because the admonition at the end of the preceding verse (Do you not then understand?) does not leave room for this suggestion; it shows that it is such an obvious thing that a mere hint is enough to focus attention on it. They knew that Ibrāhīm preceded the Torah and the Injīl, but they were oblivious of its logical corollary that he therefore could not be a Jew or a Christian, that he would be on the Divine Religion, that is, submission to Allāh.

The Jews also said: There cannot be more than one true religion and that is the Judaism. Thus, Ibrahim would inevitably be a Jew. The same argument was used by the Christians to Christianize Ibrāhīm. The error they committed in this argument sprang from ignorance, not obliviousness. The fact is that the religion of Allāh is one — and that is Islam, the submission to Allāh. It is one, progressing towards perfection, with passage of time and in keeping with mankind's progress — as humanity advances to perfection. The Judaism and the Christianity are two branches of the perfection of Islam — the root religion. The prophets (peace be on them all !) were the builders of that building, each of them had a hand in it, laying down the foundation and raising such a lofty edifice. No doubt, Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was the founder of Islam — i.e., submission to Allāh — and it was the basic and true religion; then the true religion appeared with the name of Judaism and then Christianity; these were two of the branches of its perfection, two of the stages of its completion. What the Jews and the Christians did not know was that these propositions do not make Ibrāhīm a Jew or a Christian. He would remain, as before, an upright Muslim; his name would be always linked with that of Islam, the religion which he himself had founded. That Islam is the root of Judaism and Christianity; but it is neither Judaism nor Christianity. The root is not attributed to its branches; it is the branch that should be related to the root.

To say that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was a Muslim and not a Jew or a Christian does not imply a claim that he was the follower of the Prophet of Islam, acting according to the Qur'ānic sharī'ah. Nobody should rush to say that as Ibrāhīm (a.s.) had preceded the revelation of the Torah and the Injīl and therefore could not be counted as a Jew or a Christian, so had he preceded the revelation of the Qur'ān and the advent of Islam, therefore, in a completely identical manner, he should not be called a Muslim.

As a matter of fact, the use of 'Islam' for the Qur'ānic sharī'ah is a terminology which came up after the revelation of the Qur'ān, when the fame of the religion brought by Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), had spread far and wide. The Islam which is attributed to Ibrāhīm means submission to Allāh, humbling oneself before His Lordship. The two uses are different, and consequently there is no room for any objection whatsoever.

The People of the Book were unaware of the true meaning of the basic religion; they did not know that it was a reality which had various levels, and which had evolved, passing through stages, to the summit of its perfection. It was this ignorance of theirs to which Allāh refers when He says: ''And Allāh knows while you do not know. Ibrāhīm was not a Jew nor a Christian ...'' This meaning is also supported by the next verse: ''Most surely the nearest of people to Ibrāhīm are those who followed him and this Prophet and those who believe;'' as well as the verses 84 — 85 coming later: Say: ''We believe in Allāh and what has been revealed to us, and what was revealed to Ibrāhīm and Ismā'īl and Isḥāq and Ya'qūb and the tribes, and what was given to Mūsā and 'Īsā and to the prophets from their Lord; we do not make any distinction between any of them, and to Him do we submit.'' And whoever seeks a religion other than Islam, it shall not be accepted from him, and in the hereafter he shall be one of the losers. (We shall explain it in its place.)

QUR'ĀN: Ibrāhīm was not a Jew nor a Christian, but he was (an) upright (man), a Muslim, and he was not one of the polytheists: This verse has been explained above. Some exegetes have explained it as follows: The Jews and the Christians claimed that Ibrāhīm (a.s.) was one of them, on their religion. Likewise, the idol-worshipping Arabs claimed that they were the followers of ad-dīn al-ḥanīf (اَلدِّيْنُ اَلْحَنِيفُ = the upright religion) the religion of Ibrāhīm (a.s.); even the People of the Book came to call them al-ḥunafā' (اَلْحُنَفَآءُ) and thus al-ḥanīfiyyah (اَلْحَنِيْفِيَّةُ = uprightness; religion of Ibrāhīm) was misconstrued to mean idol-worship. When Allāh praised Ibrāhīm (a.s.) by saying that ''he was (حَنِيْفاً = ḥanīfan) upright'', it was necessary to explain the word, so that people should not take it in the sense of idol-worship. That is why Allāh added the words, ''a Muslim, and he was not one of the polytheists;'' he followed the religion which Allāh is pleased with, and that is Islam, submission to Allāh, and he was not a polytheist like the Arabs of the days of Ignorance.

QUR'ĀN: Most surely the nearest of people to Ibrāhīm are those who followed him and this Prophet and those who believe; and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers: This verse gives the reason behind the foregoing talk, and explains the reality of the subject matter. The meaning is as follows (and Allāh knows better).

If we look at relationship between this great Prophet, Ibrāhīm, and those who came after him, obviously he cannot be counted as a follower of later generations; rather, we have to decide who is nearest of all to him. Only he can be nearest of all to a prophet — coming with a sharī'ah and a Book — who follows the truth like him and accepts the religion which he brought. According to this criterion, the nearest to Ibrāhīm

(a.s.) is this Prophet (s.a.w.a.) and those who believe. They are on the Islam for which Allāh had chosen Ibrāhīm. Likewise, those who were his followers were nearest to him — not those who disbelieve in the communications of Allāh and confound the truth with falsehood.

The words, ‘‘those who followed him,’’ are an allusion against the People of the Book, indirectly telling the Jews and the Christians that they were not the nearest to Ibrāhīm because they did not follow him in submitting to Allāh.

The phrase, ‘‘and this Prophet and those who believe,’’ distinguishing the Prophet and his followers from the followers of Ibrāhīm (a.s.); this was done to show the exalted position of the Prophet; he was too great to be called someone’s follower. The same consideration is reflected in other verses; for example, These are they whom Allāh guided, therefore follow their guidance (6:90). Note that Allāh did not say, ‘therefore follow them’.

The sentence, ‘‘and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers’’, complete this reasoning and explanation. Ibrāhīm was a waliyy (اَلوَلِيُّ = friend) of Allāh, and his al-wilāyah (اَلوِلَايَةُ = friendship, guardianship) was a part of Allāh’s guardianship; and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers, not of the others who disbelieve in His Signs and confuse the right with wrong, the truth with falsehood.

QUR’ĀN: A party of the People of the Book desire that they should lead you astray, and they lead not astray but themselves, and they do not perceive: ‘‘aṭ-Ṭā’ifah’’ (اَلطَّآئِفَةُ = party; lit.: rover, walker about). The people, and especially Arabs, used to live — in the beginning — a nomadic life; their tribes and clans used to wander around with their cattles looking for water and pasture, from season to season; they travelled in groups as a safety measure against attack and assassination. They were then called ‘‘a wandering party’’; gradually the noun, ‘party’ was dropped, and the adjective aṭ-ṭā’ifah (wanderer, rover, walker about) took its place.

How is it that the People of the Book lead not astray but themselves? The first and foremost human virtue is inclination towards truth and its acceptance. A desire to divert the people away from the truth, to turn them towards falsity (being a psychological trait) is a depravity of soul — and how evil this depravity is! It is a sin, a crime, a transgression against truth; and what is there after the truth but lie and error? Thus, when they desire to lead the believers astray (when those believers are on truth), they in fact lead themselves astray although they do not perceive it.

And even if they got hold of a believer and led him astray by planting some doubts in his heart, they would be leading themselves astray before him. Man does not do anything — good or bad — but for himself. Allāh says: Whoever does good, it is for his own self, and whoever does evil, it is against it (45:46). As for those who go astray because of someone's misguidance, it is not so much a result of that deceiver's influence, as the misdeed and wrong choice of the straying person himself — by permission of Allāh. The Qur'ān says: Whoever disbelieves, he shall be responsible for his disbelief, and whoever does good, they prepare (good) for their own souls (30:44); And whatever affliction befalls you, it is on account of what your hands have wrought, and (yet) He pardons most (of your faults). And you cannot escape in the earth, and you shall not have a guardian or a helper besides Allāh (42:30 — 31). Some details about the effects and characteristics of human actions have been given in the second volume (Arabic text), under the verse: ... these it is whose deeds are forfeited in this world and the hereafter (2:217).[1]

This explanation is among those Qur'ānic realities which spring from at-tawḥīd (اَلتَّوْحِيْدُ = monotheism) of action, and that active belief in its turn is based on the realities of Lordship and Kingdom. Only in this way, we can explain the exclusiveness found in the words of Allāh: ''and they lead not astray but themselves, and they do not perceive.'' As for the explanation given by others, they do not help in understanding this exclusiveness; that is why we have not mentioned them here at all.

QUR'ĀN: O People of the Book! Why do you disbelieve in the communications of Allāh while you witness (them)?: It has already been explained that disbelieving in communications of Allāh is not the same as disbelieving in Allāh Himself. Disbelief in Allāh entails open rejection of montheism, as the idol-worshippers and atheists do; while disbelief in communications means rejection of the Divine Knowledge after it is clarified and explained. The People of the Book do believe that the universe has One God. What they disbelieve in are described in the books revealed to them and to others, like the prophethood of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) , the fact that ‘Īsā was the servant and the messenger of Allāh, that Ibrāhīm was neither a Jew nor a Christian, that the hand of Allāh is open, that Allāh is Self-sufficient and other such things. The People of the Book, in Qur’ānic language, are disbelievers in communications of Allāh, not in Allāh Himself. Of course, there is the verse which goes against it: Fight those who do not believe in Allāh, nor in the latter day, nor do they prohibit what Allāh and His Messenger have prohibited, nor follow the religion of truth, from among those who were given the Book, until they pay the jizyah (tributory tax) with their hands while they are in a state of subjection (9:29). It clearly says that those People of the Book did not believe in Allāh, i.e., they disbelieved in Allāh. But it goes on mentioning their non-prohibition of prohibited things and their deviation from the religion of truth; and it shows that when the verse attributes disbelief to them it really uses a concomitant to allude to the related characteristic. In other words, when they disbelieve in communications of Allāh, it follows that they do not believe even in Allāh and the latter day although they may not realize it. But it does not speak about open and direct disbelief in Allāh.

‘‘while you witness (them)’’: ‘ash-Shahādah’’ (اَلشَّهَادَةُ = presence; knowledge through external senses; witness). It shows that their disbelief in communications refers to their rejection of the Prophet; they did not accept that the Prophet was the promised Prophet whose advent was foretold in the Torah and Injīl although they clearly saw that the signs and descriptions mentioned therein perfectly fitted on the Prophet.

Somebody has said that the word, ‘‘communications’’, is general and comprehensive; it covers all the communications and there is no reason why it should be restricted to the signs of the Prophet; the word therefore refers to their rejection of all the true signs and communications.

COMMENT: The explanation given by us clearly shows the invalidity of this interpretation.

QUR’ĀN: O People of the Book! Why do you confound the truth with the falsehood and hide the truth while you know?:‘‘al-Labs’’ (اَللَّبْسُ = to create doubt; to confuse; to confound). Why do you manifest the truth in the form of falsehood? The words, ‘‘while you know’’, show or at least allude, that the confusion and the hiding refers to their confounding and hiding the religious knowledge and realities; and not to the verses of scriptures; that is, it does not speak about the verses which they had altered, hidden or misinterpreted.

These two verses, beginning with, ‘‘O People of the Book! Why do you disbelieve ...’’ and ending with, ‘‘while you know?’’, complete the talk which began with the words, ‘‘A party of the People of the Book desire ...’’ The whole community has been admonished for the wrong-doings of some of its members, because they were all united in race, tribe and character, and all accepted what some of them were doing. Such usage is commonly found in the Qur’ān.

QUR’ĀN: And a party of the People of the Book say: ‘‘Avow belief in that which has been revealed to those who believe (in) the first part of the day, and disbelieve (at) the end of it, perhaps they go back (on their religion) : ‘‘Wajha ’n-nahār’’ (وَجْهُ النَّهَار = lit. face of the day) means the first part of the day, because it has been used in contrast with ‘‘the end of it’’; also the face of a thing is what it appears to others with, and as far as the day is concerned, it is its early part. The context of this saying shows that something was revealed to the Prophet in the early hours of the day which conformed with tenets of the People of the Book, and another revelation came at the end of the day which was against their belief. And this prompted them to say these words.

Therefore, the clause, ‘‘that which has been revealed to those who believe’’, refers to a particular Qur’ānic revelation which agreed with the belief and practice of the People of the Book. The words, ‘‘the first part of the day ’’, are an adverbial phrase of time, and it is related not to ‘‘Avow belief’’, but to ‘‘has been revealed’’ because it is nearer. The words, ‘‘and disbelieve (at) the end of it,’’ mean: disbelieve in that which has been revealed (to those who believe) at the end of the day; it is an allegorical expression putting the adverbial phrase of time in place of the thing which happened at that time; a similar device has been used in the verse where it says: Nay, (it was) planning of night and day (34:33).

Accordingly, it supports what has been narrated from the Imāms of the Ahlu ’l-bayt (a.s.), relating the circumstances in which this verse was revealed. This idea was propagated by the Jews at the time when the qiblah was changed. The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) had prayed the morning prayer towards Baytu ’l-Maqdis which was the qiblah of the Jews. Then the qiblah was changed towards the Ka‘bah in the noon prayer. Then a group of the Jews said: Believe in that which was revealed to those who believe in the early hours of the day, that is, praying towards Baytu ’l-Maqdis, and disbelieve in that which has been revealed at the end of it, that is, facing towards the Ka‘bah. This explanation is further supported by their assertion which has been quoted in the next verse: ‘‘And do not believe but in him who follows your religion;’’ that is, do not trust anyone who does not follow your religion and does not believe in it, lest you disclose to him some of your secrets and the good tidings which were revealed to you about the promised Prophet — one of the signs foretold of the Prophet was that he would change the qiblah towards the Ka‘bah.

Another interpretation: Some exegetes have said that the phrase, ‘‘the first part of the day’’ is related to the verb ‘‘Avow belief’’; and, ‘‘the end of it,’’ is an adverbial phrase, (in which ‘‘in’’ is deleted and understood) and it is related to the verb ‘‘disbelieve’’. Accordingly, the meaning would be as follows: Some of them should pretend to believe in the Qur’ān and attach themselves with the Muslims; then they should renounce Islam at the end of the day saying that they had believed in the morning because they were deceived by apparent signs of truth of Islam but they had to renounce it by the end of the day because they had seen many things which proved its falsity; and because the good tidings of the prophethood and signs of veracity which they were told by the previous prophets did not fit on this Prophet. This was a devious plan to deceive the believers, so that the believers would be overwhelmed by doubts about their religion, and weakened in their conviction; in this way their power would break down and their mission fail.

This meaning in itself is not far-fatched, and especially from the Jews who had left no stone unturned to defeat Islam, to extinguish its light by any possible means. But the wording of the verse does not fit this interpretation. We shall write some related things under the traditions, Allāh willing.

Someone has explained it as follows: Avow belief in their praying towards the Ka‘bah in the first part of the day and disbelieve in it at the end of the day; perhaps they would go back on their religion.

A fourth explanation: Pretend to believe in the first part of the day by agreeing that the signs of the promised prophet were present in the Prophet; and disbelieve at the end of it saying that those attributes did not fit on him; this would put doubts in the believers' minds and perhaps they would renounce their religion. There is no proof for these two interpretations; and whatever the meaning, there is no ambiguity in the verse.

QUR'ĀN: And do not believe but in him who follows your religion: The contex shows that this too is the saying of the People of the Book, completing their talk which started with the words, ''Avow belief in that which has been revealed to those who believe.'' And likewise the words, ''that one may be given (by Him) the like of what you were given; or they would contend with you by an argument before your Lord,'' are continuation of their speech. And therefore the sentence, ''Say: 'Surely the guidance is the guidance of Allāh,' '' is a parenthetical sentence in reply of their talk beginning with, ''Avow belief,'' and ending with, ''who follows your religion.'' The change of style supports this view. Similarly the words, ''Say: 'Surely grace is in the the hand of Allāh ...,' '' are in reply of their talk, ''that one may be given (by Him) the like of what you were given.'' In this way, all the segments of this talk are inter-woven and the meanings of the two preceding verses inter-related with one another. Also, the two verses stand face to face with the verses describing the Jews' obstinacy, disputation and deception.

The meaning therefore is as follows, and Allāh knows better:

A party of the People of the Book, that is, the Jews, said one to another: Attest the truth of the Prophet and the believers regarding their prayer towards Baytu '1-Maqdis in the first part of the day and do not accept their truth when they prayed towards Ka'bah in the afternoon. Do not trust others when you talk with them, lest they inform the believers that the changing of qiblah to the Ka'bah was foretold as a sign of the truth of the Promised Prophet. For, if you accepted the affair of the Ka'bah and disclosed what you knew about it (that it was a sign of the Prophet's truth), then you would have to face two dangers: (1) The believers would get a qiblah of their own, like that of yours; it would destroy your supremacy and neutralize your precedence in the matter of qiblah; (2) the believers would contend with you before your Lord establishing a proof against you that although you knew about the new qiblah and were witnesses of its truth, you did not accept the Islam.

Allāh replied to their talk — that they should believe what was revealed in the early part of the day and disbelieve what happened at the end of it, and their admonition to one another to hide the matter of qiblah so that the believers would not know the truth — that the guidance which the believers needed was the true guidance and it was the guidance of Allāh, and not yours. The believers do not need your guidance; you may follow the believers' guidance if you like and reject it if you so desire; you may proclaim the truth if you wish, and hide it if you want.

Then Allāh replies to their fear that one might be given by Allāh the like of what they were given.

He says that the grace is in the hand of Allāh, He gives it to whom He pleases. It is not in the Jews' hands so that they could reserve it for their own selves, blocking the way to the others. Allāh has made no comment on their conspiracy to hide the truth so that the believers would be unable to argue with them before their Lord; it was such a conspicuously fallacious presumption that needed no reply. The same disdainful silence is maintained in another verse exposing the same fallacy: And when they meet those who believe they say: ''We believe,'' and when they are alone one with another, they say: ''Do you talk to them of what Allāh has disclosed to you that they may argue with you by this before your Lord? Do you not then understand?'' What! Do they not know that Allāh knows what they conceal and what they proclaim? (2:76 — 77). The exclamatory ''What!'' in the sentence, ''What! Do they not know'', shows that it is not a reply to the Jews; it is just an indication that their talk goes against correct understanding, for they know that their hiding or proclaiming makes no difference in Allāh's knowledge.

It will be seen from the above explanation that the words, ''And do not believe'', mean 'do not trust anyone', 'do not expect anyone to keep your secret'. It has the same connotation as the verse: and believes the believers (9:61). The words, ''him who follows your religion,'' mean 'the Jews'. Their aim was to prevent the disclosure of what they knew regarding the truth of the change of qiblah to the Ka'bah. Their knowledge of this truth was also referred to in the verses: turn then thy face towards the Sacred Mosque ... and those who have been given the Book most surely know that it is the truth from their Lord; ... Those whom we have given the Book recognize him as they recognize their sons; and a party of them most surely conceal the truth while they know (it) (2:144 — 146).

The exegetes have written various explanations for these verses. One of them says that the whole verse, ‘‘And do not believe ... Ample-giving, Knowing’’, is a direct speech of Allāh, not a quotation of the Jews’ talk; and the second person plural pronouns — ‘‘And do not believe’’, ‘‘What you were given’’, ‘‘they would contend with you’’, ‘‘before your Lord’’ — are all addressed to the believers; while the second person singular pronoun in ‘‘Say’’ refers to the Prophet. Some others agree with this explanation with one difference: They say that the second person plural pronouns in the above mentioned words are addressed to the Jews, and the speech admonishes and rebukes them. Still others have said that the words, ‘‘And do not believe but in him who follows your religion’’, are the quotation of the Jews’ talk; while the words, ‘‘Say: ‘Surely the guidance is the guidance of Allāh — that one may be given (by Him) ...’ ’’, are spoken by Allāh in reply to what the Jews had said. Likewise, there is a difference about the meaning of ‘‘grace’’ whether it means religion, worldly blessings, dominance or something else.

These interpretations, in spite of their bewildering number, are far removed from the connotation given by the context, as we have already shown. That is why we have not spent much time on them.

QUR’ĀN: Say: ‘‘Surely grace is in the hand of Allāh, He gives it to whom He pleases; and Allāh is Ample-giving, Knowing’’:‘‘al-Faḍl’’ (اَلْفَضْلُ = surplus; that which is in excess). This word is used in commendatory sense, while al-fuḍūl (اَلْفُضُولُ) is used as a derogatory term. ar-Rāghib says: Every voluntary gratis benefaction is called al-faḍl; as Allāh says: and ask Allāh of His grace (4:32); this is Allāh’s grace (5:54); and Allāh is the Lord of mighty grace (2:105); Say: ‘‘In the grace of Allāh’’ (10:58); and were it not for the grace of Allāh (4:83).

Accordingly the sentence, ‘‘Say: ‘Surely grace is in the hand of Allāh’ ’’, is a sort of abbreviated syllogism from which the first premise has been omitted. The full deductive syllogism shall be as follows: Say: This revelation and Divine bestowal (which you are trying to reserve for yourself by pretending to believe and disbelieve and admonishing each other to hide the truth) is not a thing which we mortals can impose on Allāh, it is really a grace. Grace is in the hand of Allāh (to Whom belong the Kingdom and the Command). Therefore, He has the power to give it to whom He pleases. And Allāh is Ample-giving, Knowing.

This verse does not leave any room for the Jews to reserve the Divine Grace for themselves (despite their mistaken belief reflected in their words and deeds). Why should some people enjoy the grace of Allāh to the deprivation of others (as the Jews wanted to do with religion and qiblah)? One may imagine only three ways for it.

1. Either the grace of Allāh would fall under the influence of someone else, who then would manipulate the Divine Will, diverting it to one side, preventing it from going in another direction. But the fact is otherwise. Because ‘‘Surely grace is in the hand of Allāh, He gives it to whom He pleases.’’

2. Or, the bounty is in short supply, is insufficient to reach all the aspirants. In that case it would need some outside factor to choose a few and reject the others. But the fact is otherwise. Because Allāh is Ample-giving; All-powerful, Whose grace knows no limit.

3. Or, it could be that the grace — even if it was unlimited and in the hand of Allāh — could not reach a certain group because that group was hidden from Allāh, was unknown to Him. Thus the privileged group plans devious ways to hide the other groups and keep them concealed from Allāh, in order to deprive them of the Divine Grace. But the fact is otherwise. Because Allāh is All-knowing; ignorance cannot reach Him; nothing can be hidden from Him.

QUR’ĀN: He specially chooses for His mercy whom He pleases; and Allāh is the Lord of mighty grace: As the grace is in the hand of Allāh, He gives it to whom He pleases; and as He is Ample-giving, Knowing, it is in His power to choose some of the servants for some of His favours. It is for Him to manage His property as He likes. The fact, that His grace and His bestowal of bounties are unrestricted, or that nobody can put any restraint on Him, does not make it necessary for Him to bestow His grace on each and every person indiscriminately. Otherwise, it would again be a restraint on His absolute power. It is His prerogative to specially choose for His grace whomever He pleases.

The verse ends on the sentence, ‘‘and Allāh is the Lord of mighty grace’’. In a way it explains the reason of all that has been mentioned above. The grace is mighty. Consequently it must be in His hand to give it to whom He pleases. Also, Allāh should be Ample-giving in His grace, knowing the condition of His servants, well aware of which type of grace would be more suitable to a given person. And therefore it should be His prerogative to specially choose for His grace whomever He pleases.

In the sentence, ''He specially chooses for His mercy whom He pleases,'' the word, ''grace'' has been replaced by ''mercy''. It shows that the grace, being a free gift, a discretional bounty, is a branch of mercy. Allāh says: And My mercy encompasses all things (7:156); and were it not for Allāh's grace upon you and His mercy, not one of you would have ever been pure (24:21); Say: ''If you control the treasures of the mercy of Lord, then you would withhold (them) from fear of spending'' (17:100).

QUR'ĀN: And among the People of the Book there are some such that if you entrust one (of them) with a heap of wealth, he shall pay it back to you; and among them are some such that if you entrust one (of them) with a dīnār he shall not pay it back to you except that you remain standing over him, this is because they say: ''There is not upon us in the matter of the unlearned people any way (to reproach)'': The verse points to the glaring differences seen in the characters of various People of the Book, for example, in keeping the trust and fulfilling the agreements. Their dishonesty and breach of trust is in itself a national disgrace; this characteristic has permeated their society as a well accepted feature. Unfortunately, it is based on their ideology which is reflected in the statement: ''There is not upon us in the matter of the unlearned people any way (to reproach).'' They called themselves the People of the Book, and called others gentiles, unlearned people. The above quoted statement means that no gentile (non-Israelite) can have any way against an Israelite. Even more disturbing was their claim that that behaviour was approved by religion. It is to this aspect that the next sentence refers: ''and they tell a lie against Allāh while they know ...''

They believed — as they do even today that they were the chosen people; Divine Grace was their exclusive property; others had no share in Allāh's favour; Allāh had given them Prophethood, the Book and the Kingdom; therefore they had precedence and excellence over all races, and had a right to subjugate the others. This misconception gave rise to various misunderstandings. For example, they came to believe that the sociological and financial rights and obligations (like prohibition of interest, of devouring others' property and usurping people's rights) were applicable within their own circle only. A Jew should not devour another Jew's property unjustly; an Israelite should not usurp the rights of his own people. In short, only the People of the Book had got a way to reproach against the People of the Book. As for the gentiles, the non-Israelites, they had no way of reproach against the People of the Book. The Jews thought they could deal with non-Israelites anyway they liked; they could do with others whatever they wanted. In their eyes the gentiles were no better than animals and .they dealt with them as they did with animals.

Of course, the conception was not found in the books that are said to be revealed, like the Torah, etc. They had taken this idea from their rabbis and blindly followed them. Moreover, the religion of Mūsā was meant for the Children of Israel only; others were neither invited nor allowed to enter it. Thus it became a racial religion. This gave rise to a belief that this excellence and Divine Grace was something based on race for which the Children of Israel were exclusively chosen. Being born of Israel parents was the essence of dignity, the root of excellence, the basis of supremacy. The one who was related to Israel had absolute precedence over all others. When such arrogant spirit governs the structure of a nation, it incites them to create mischief on the earth, and to annihilate the essence of humanity found in a society.

Of course, sometimes it becomes necessary in a human society to deprive some individuals or groups of some common rights. But what should be the criterion for such deprivation? A healthy society believes that whoever tries to negate others' rights or to damage or destroy the society itself, should be deprived of his own rights. From Islamic point of view the only criterion of rights is acceptance of Islam or coming under the protection of Islamic State. One who is neither a Muslim nor a dhimmī (اَلذِّمِّي = one under the protection of Islamic State), has no right in the life. This criterion conforms with the dictate of nature; and you have seen that the human society also recognizes such test in a general way.

Now, we come back to the verse under discussion, ''among the People of the Book.'' Apparently, it should have been 'among them'.

Why was the noun used in place of the pronoun? It was done to remove a possible misunderstanding: the preceding two verses had spoken about: ‘‘A party of the People of the Book’’; if these verses had said, ‘among them’, it could give an impression that it was speaking about a group of the previously mentioned, ‘‘A party of the People of the Book’’. You will see that after removing this possible cause of misunderstanding, the next verse uses pronoun when it says: ‘‘Most surely there is a party amongst those who distort the Book with their tongues.’’

Also, mentioning of the attribute — i.e., their being the People of the Book — points to a sort of reason. That is, such words and deeds — their saying that there is not upon us in the matter of the unlearned people any way to reproach, and their swallowing the people’s wealth in this way — would not have looked so strange if they had been uttered by unlearned people, who did not know anything about prophethood and revelation. But these were the People of the Book; they had the Book which contained the God’s Commandments; and they knew very well that the Book did not give them any such latitude, nor did it allow them to take other people’s wealth and property just because they were gentiles, non-Israelites. Such statements and deeds were more strange and more disgraceful because they were uttered and done by the People of the Book. Therefore, they deserved more severe condemnation and rebuke.

‘‘al-Qinṭār’’ (اَلْقِنْطَارُ = 100 raṭl; figuratively used for huge amounts); ‘‘ad-dīnār’’ (اَلدِّيْنَارُ = a coin). Apart from their rhetorical beauties [1], their parallel setting in the context of trustworthiness shows that these words have been used for great and small amounts respectively. The verse means that there are some among them who faithfully keep the amount entrusted to them, no matter how great and valuable it may be; while there are others among them who would embezzle it even if it is a trivial and worthless thing.

The second person singular pronoun in the phrase, ‘‘if you entrust one (of them) with a heap of wealth, he shall pay it back to you’’, does not refer to any particular person; it is a sort of indefinite pronoun showing general applicability of the statement. In other words, the sentence means: If someone — anyone — gives him something in trust he shall pay it back to him, no matter how great the amount may be.

[1] Like rhyme and similarity of paradigm. (tr.)

''illā mā dumta 'alayhi qā'iman'' (إِلَّا مَا دُمْتَ عَلَيْهِ قَآئِماً): It is said that ''mā'' (مَا) has changed the verb into al-maṣdar (اَلْمَصْدَرُ = infinitive verb) ; and the sentence means, ''except that you remain standing over him''. The word, ''standing'', points to urgency and insistence; when the claimant remains standing on his feet without sitting, it shows his impatience and inability to wait. Someone has said that ''mā'' is an adverb of time; but it makes no sense.

''this is because they say: 'There is not upon us in the matter of the unlearned people any way (to reproach)' '': Apparently, the context shows that the pronoun, ''this'', refers to the whole description written before, that is, the fact that some of them keep their trust even if it is a huge amount, and others do not pay it back even if it is a small thing; this difference has arisen from their belief that there is on them no way to reproach in the matter of the unlearned people. This idea has created among them a great disparity in ethical and spiritual standard although they know that Allāh has not ordained any such thing in His Book, nor is He pleased with such practices of theirs.

Alternatively, it may be referring to the second group only, which is mentioned by the sentence: ''and among them there are some such that if you entrust one (of them) with a dīnār he shall not pay it back to you.'' In this case, the first (i.e., trustworthy) group may have been mentioned here just to give the complete picture, to fulfil the demand of justice. Consequently, the plural pronouns in, ''they say'', and, ''they know'', may refer to, ''the People of of the Book'', or to, ''some such that if you entrust one (of them) with a dīnār''. In the latter case, the first person pronoun in, ''upon us'', may refer to all, ''the People of the Book'', or to a certain group of them. The translation will differ in each case, but all the possibilites are correct and credible. (Think it over.)

QUR'ĀN: and they tell a lie against Allāh while they know: It refutes their claim that there was not upon them any way to reproach in the matter of the unlearned people. Also, it proves that they used to justify their behaviour on religious grounds, claiming that it was a Divine Revelation, as we have mentioned earlier.

QUR'ĀN: Yea, whoever fulfils his promise and guards (against evil) — then surely Allāh loves those who guard (against evil): It answers their argument and affirms what they wanted to negate with their statement that there was no way to reproach upon them regarding the non-Israelites. Fulfilment of promise means acting on it and guarding against its breach. ''at-Tawfiyah'' (اَلتَّوْفِيَةُ = to give completely); ''al-istīfā' '' (اَلْاِسْتِيْفَاءُ = to take completely).

The promise refers to the covenant which Allāh had taken from His servants that they would believe in Him and worship Him. This meaning is supported by the next verse which says: ''(as for) those who take a small price for the covenant of Allāh and their (own) oaths.'' Or, it may mean all promises in general, including the covenant of Allāh.

The sentence, ''then surely Allāh loves those who guard (against evil),'' is a syllogism from which a premise has been omitted for brevity. Its completed form would be as follows: then surely Allāh loves him, because he guards against evil, and Allāh loves those who guard against evil. The idea is that Allāh bestows honour and dignity on His pious servants by loving them, and not by giving them licence to deceive, exploit and oppress His other servants.

The verse indicates that the divinely bestowed dignity is not so easily obtainable; it is not a common — place thing which could be attained by just verbal expression of belonging, or which may be used for racial or national supremacy by crafty and wily persons. The important condition for attainment of Divine Dignity is piety and fulfilment of the covenant made with Allāh. When these conditions are fulfilled the said dignity is achieved. That dignity means Allāh's love, friendship and guardianship, which are not given except to His pious servants. It results in Divine help and happy life, which in its turn brings them prosperity and betters their condition in this world, and raises their rank in the hereafter.

This is the meaning of dignity which Allāh bestows. It does not give rise to imposition of a certain race or nation on the shoulders of His servants, good and bad alike, giving the supposed ''master race'' freedom to do whatever they want and to say whatever they like. Thus, one day they would claim, ''there is not upon us in the matter of the unlearned people any way (to reproach)''; saying next day that they were the friends of Allāh to the exclusion of the other people [1] ; and yet

[1] Say: ''O you who are Jews, if you think that you are the friends of Allāh to the exclusion of other people ... '' (Qur'ān, 62:6). (Author's note) another day, that they were the sons of Allāh and His beloved ones [1] . Thus, it leads them to create mischief in the earth and to destroy the tilth and the stock.

QUR'ĀN: (As for) those who take a small price for covenant of Allāh and their (own) oaths: It explains the reason of the preceding statement. The Divine Dignity is exclusively reserved for those who fulfil the covenant of Allāh and guard against evil — are pious; because the others — those who take a small price for the covenant of Allāh and their own oaths — have no honour, no dignity at all.

The fact is that whoever breaks the covenant of Allāh and forsakes piety — not guarding himself against evil — does so just for the enjoyment of the vanities of this world, giving preference to immediate desires over everlasting happiness. He exchanges the covenant of Allāh and the piety with a few worldly trinkets. That is why it has been likened to a trade deal: Covenant of Allāh is the item sold; and insignificant worldly provision, its small price. ''al-Ishtirā' '' (اَلِاشْتِرَآءُ = to sell); ''they take a small price for the covenant of Allāh and their (own) oaths'', that is, they exchange the covenant and oaths for provisions of this world.

QUR'ĀN: Surely they shall have no portion in the hereafter, and Allāh will not speak to them ... they shall have a painful chastisement: ''al-Khalāq'' (اَلْخَلَاقُ = portion, share); ''at-tazkiyah'' (اَلتَّزْكِيَةُ = to make grow, good growing; to purify). The descriptions of this group stand face to face with the attributes of the first group (Yea, whoever fulfils his promise and guards [against evil] ...); and the consequences of their behaviour are all negative. Keeping it in view, we find that:

First: The verse points to them with the demonstrative pronoun, ulā'ika (أُولٰئِكَ = those, they), which is used for a distant object. It shows that they are far removed from nearness to Allāh. Conversely, the pious ones who fulfil their covenant are brought nearer to Allāh because He loves them.

Second: When Allāh loves someone, he is given a portion in the hereafter; Allāh will speak to him and look upon him on the Day of

---

[1] And the Jews and the Christians say: ''We are the sons of Allāh and His beloved ones'' (Qur'ān, 5:18). (Author's note)

Resurrection, will purify him and forgive him, that is, will remove chastisement from him. Allāh has mentioned three traits for those who break the covenant of Allāh and their own oaths.

First: They shall have no portion in the hereafter. ''al-Ākhirah'' (اَلْاٰخِرَةُ = the hereafter); it stands for ad-dāru 'l-ākhirah (اَلدَّارُالْاٰخِرَةُ = the abode in the hereafter; the everlasting abode); it is used for life after death. In the same way, ad-dunyā (اَلدُّنْيَا = the world) stands for ad-dāru'd-dunyā (اَلدَّارُالدُّنْيَا = worldly abode), which is used for the life before death.

They shall have no portion in the hereafter, because they themselves had preferred this world's share. It shows that ''a small price'' refers to this world. Of course, we have explained it above as the worldly provision; it was done because Allāh has used adjective ''small'' for it and the same adjective has been used for the worldly provision in the verse: Say. ''The provision of this world is small'' (4:77). In other word, the provision of the world is the world (itself).

Second: Allāh will not speak to them, nor will he look upon them on the Day of Resurrection. It stands vis-a-vis the love which Allāh has for His pious servants; in love, the lover wants to enjoy nearness with the beloved, by looking at him and talking to him when they are together. As Allāh does not love this group, He will not speak to them nor look upon them on the Day of Resurrection, the day when they will be brought in His presence. The verse first mentions not speaking and then not looking upon; the description is in descending order; speaking shows more intimacy than looking upon; it is as though the verse wants to say: Allāh shall not confer upon them any honour, neither great nor small.

Third: Allāh will not purify them and they shall have a painful chastisement: The statements are unrestricted and unconditional. It implies that they shall remain unpurified and in chastisement both in this world and in the hereafter.

QUR'ĀN: Most surely there is a party amongst them who distort the Book with their tongues that you may consider it to be (a part) of the Book; ''al-Layy'' (اَللَّيُّ = to spin, to entwine); when used with the head or tongue as its object, it means inclining, bending or tilting it. Allāh says: they turn back their heads (63:5); distorting (the word) with their tongues (4:46). Apparently, it means that they recite the lies which they have invented against Allāh in the same tone and style which they use for the Book, in order to confuse the people, making them believe that it was a part of the Book while it is not so.

The word ‘‘Book’’ has been repeated thrice in this sentence, in order to remove all possible ambiguity. The first ‘‘Book’’ refers to that which they wrote with their own hands and attributed to Allāh; the second refers to the ‘‘Book’’ which was revealed by Allāh; the third refers to the same Divine Revelation but the word was repeated to remove ambiguity and to indicate that the ‘‘Book’’, being the Book of Allāh, was too high and sublime to contain such forgeries — it is because the word ‘‘Book’’ has a connotation that points to sublimity.

The same was the cause of repeating the Divine Name, Allāh, in the sentence, ‘‘and they say, it is from Allāh, while it is not from Allāh’’. It means it is not from Allāh Who is the true God and Who does not say except truth, as He Himself says: and the truth do I speak (38:84).

The verse ends with the words, ‘‘and they tell a lie against Allāh whilst they know’’: It is refutation after refutation of their ascribing their forgeries to Divine Revelation. They were confusing the people by their distorted recitation; Allāh refuted it and said, ‘‘while it is not (a part) of the Book’’. Then they used to say, ‘‘it is from Allāh’’; Allāh refuted them first by saying, ‘‘while it is not from Allāh’’; and then by declaring that ‘‘they tell a lie against Allāh’’. This repeated denial points to two new factors: (1) Telling lies is their ingrained habit and persistent trait. (2) It is not because of any confusion or ignorance that they have told such lies; they know that it is a lie and yet they say it.

TRADITIONS

as-Suyūṭī writes in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr under the verse: Say: ‘‘O People of the Book! come to a word, common between us and you ... ’’: ‘‘Ibn Jarīr has narrated through his chains from as-Suddī that he said: ‘Then the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) called them — that is, the delegation of the Christians of Najrān — and said: ‘‘O People of the Book! come to a word, common between us and you ...’’ ’ ’’

The author says: The same book quotes another tradition of the same meaning through Ibn Jarīr from Muḥammad ibn Ja‘far ibn az-

Zubayr. The tradition apparently means that this verse was revealed about the Christians of Najrān. We have written a tradition in the beginning of the chapter [1], that its early part (upto eighty odd verses), was revealed about the Christians of Najrān; and this verse is included in that number.

Some traditions say that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) invited the Jews of Medina to a common word, until they accepted to pay jizyah. However, it is not in conflict with its revelation about the delegation of Najrān.

al-Bukhārī narrates through his chains from Ibn ‘Abbās from Abū Sufyān a long ḥadīth in which he, inter alia, mentions the letter sent by the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) to Heraclius, the Roman emperor. Abū Sufyān says: ‘‘Then he (i.e., Heraclius) asked for the letter of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and read it; and it was written therein: ‘In the name of Allāh, the Beneficent, the Merciful. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of Allāh to Heraclius, the emperor of Rome. Peace be on him who follows guidance. After this, I invite you to Islam. Accept Islam, and you will be saved (in the hereafter). Accept Islam and Allāh will give you double reward. But if you turn back, then the sin of your people also will be on your shoulders. ‘O People of the Book! come to a word, common between us and you, that we shall not worship any but Allāh and (that) we shall not associate anything with Him, and (that) some of us shall not take others for lords besides Allāh’; but if they turn back, then say: ‘Bear witness that we are Muslims (Submitting ones) ...’ ’’ (aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ, al-Bukhārī)

The author says: It has also been narrated by Muslim in his aṣ-Ṣaḥīḥ; and by as-Suyūṭī in ad-Durru ’l-manthūr from an-Nasā’ī, ‘Abdu’r-Razzāq and Ibn Abī Ḥātim, all from Ibn ‘Abbās.

And it has been said that also the letter sent by the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) to Muqawqis, the Chief of the Copts, contained these very words of Allāh, ‘‘O People of the Book! come to a word, common between us and you ...’’ There is a Cufic writing reputedly the original letter of the Prophet, its text conforming with his letter to Heraclius; and its photos are easily available throughout the Muslims world [1].

However, the historians say that the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) wrote the letters which he sent through various envoys to many kings and rulers (like: Heraclius, Kisrā and an-Najāshī) in the sixth year of hijrah. It proves that this verse was revealed in the sixth year or even earlier. On the other hand, the historians (like: aṭ-Ṭabarī, Ibnu 'l-Athīr and al-Maqrīzī) have written that the delegation of the Christians of Najrān had come to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) in the tenth year of hijrah, while others (like: Abu 'l-Fidā' in al-Bidāyah wa 'n-nihāyah and al-Ḥalabī in as-Sīrah al-Ḥalabiyyah) say that it was in the ninth year. If so, then the verse would have been revealed in the ninth of tenth year of hijrah. Sometimes, it is said that it was revealed in the early years of hijrah as the traditions written hereafter will show. Others say that it was revealed twice, as al-Ḥāfiẓ Ibn Ḥajar has reported.

Nevertheless, the verses of the chapter are connected with each other in a single context, as we had pointed out in the beginning of the chapter; and it supports the view that the verse was revealed long before the ninth year. Consequently, the delegation must have come in the sixth year of hijrah or even earlier.

It is difficult to believe that the Prophet would write letters to rulers of Rome, Egypt and Fārs and ignore the people of Najrān who were nearer.

There is a point to note in the above quoted tradition. The letter begins with the formula, ''In the name of Allāh, the Beneficent, the Merciful ''. Keeping it in view, we may know the worth of the tradition copied earlier (in the story of Najrān's delegation), from al-Bayhaqī's Dalā'ilu 'n-nubuwwah. He narrates: ''The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) wrote to the people of Najrān, before the (chapter of) 'Ṭāsīn Sulaymān' (i.e., the Ant) was revealed: 'In the name of Allāh, the God of Ibrāhīm and Isḥāq and Ya'qūb. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of Allāh to the Bishop of Najrān and the people of Najrān. If you accept Islam, then I

[1] The first such letter discovered was that sent to Muqawqis. Its photo was published in the al-Hilāl of November, 1904. It is now in Istanbul (Turkey). A third letter sent to the co-rulers of Oman, 'Abd and Jayfar, sons of Julandā, was discovered not very long ago. (tr.)

extol before you Allāh, the God of Ibrāhīm and Isḥāq and Ya‘qūb. After that I call you to the worship of Allāh leaving aside the worship of the servants (of Allāh), and I invite you to (come under) the guardianship of Allāh instead of the guardianship of the servants. But if you refuse (it), then (you should pay) the head-tax; and if you refuse (even this), then I declare war against you. And peace (be on you).’ ’’

Now, the chapter of the Ant is a Meccan one; and its textual evidence almost clearly proves that it was revealed before hijrah; how can that period be juxtaposed with the event of Najrān? Apart from that, the purported letter contains some other things which cannot be explained, like the demand of jizyah and ultimatum of war and other such things. And Allāh knows better.

aṭ-Ṭabarānī narrates from Ibn ‘Abbās: ‘‘Verily the letter of the Messenger of Allāh to the unbelievers was: ‘come to a word common between us and you ...’ ’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

It is written in the same book about the words of Allāh, O People of the Book! why do you dispute about Ibrāhīm ...: ‘‘Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr and al-Bayhaqī (in his Dalā’ilu ’n-nubuwwah) have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘The Christians of Najrān and rabbis of the Jews came to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and disputed with one another near him. The rabbis said: ‘‘Ibrāhīm was but a Jew’’; and the Christains said: ‘‘Ibrāhīm was but a Christian’’. Thereupon, Allāh revealed about them: O People of the Book! why do you dispute about Ibrāhīm, when the Torah and the Injīl were not revealed till after him?... and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers. Then Abū Rāfi‘ al-Quraẓī (a Jew from Banū Qurayẓah) said: ‘‘Do you demand from us, O Muḥammad! that we should worship you as the Christians worship ‘Īsā son of Maryam?’’ And one of the Najrānites said: ‘‘Is it what you wish, O Muḥammad?’’ And the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘‘I seek protection of Allāh that I should worship other than Allāh or enjoin worship of other than Him. Not for this He has sent me or enjoined me.’’ Then Allāh revealed concerning their talk: It is not meet for a man that Allāh should give him the Book and Judgment and Prophethood, then he should say to men: ‘‘Be my servants rather than Allāh’s’’; but rather (he would say): ‘‘Be worshippers of the Lord because of your teaching the Book and your reading (it yourselves).’’ Or that he should enjoin you that you should take the angels and the prophets for lords; What! would He enjoin you with unbelief after you are Muslims? (3:79 — 80). Thereafter Allāh mentioned the covenant He had made with them and their forefathers that they should believe in the Prophet when he came to them, and to their acceptance of this fact; so He said: And when Allāh made a covenant through the prophets: ''Certainly what I have given you of the Book and Wisdom — then an Apostle comes to you verifying that which is with you, you must believe in him, and you must aid him.'' He said: ''Do you affirm and accept My compact in this (matter)?'' They said: ''We do affirm.'' He said: ''Then bear witness, and I (too) am of the bearers of witness with you''(3:81). (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: According to the text and context of the verses (It is not meet for a man that Allāh should give him the Book and Judgment and Prophethood ...) are applicable on 'Īsā son of Maryam (a.s.) more meaningfully and in an easier way than on the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), as we shall explain when writing on these verses. Perhaps what the tradition says concerning the revelation of these verses about the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) is just an inference of Ibn 'Abbās. Moreover, when the Qur'ān deals with such talks, it invariably always brings it in the form of question and answer or as a quotation with its refutation.

al-Kalbī has narrated the story of the hijrah to Abyssinia through Abū Ṣāliḥ from Ibn 'Abbās; and it has also been narrated by Muḥammad ibn Isḥāq from Ibn Shahāb through his chains, that he said: ''When Ja'far ibn Abī Ṭālib with a group of the Companions of the Prophet migrated to Abyssinia and settled there; and the Prophet migrated to Medina and there happened in Badr what happened, the Quraysh assembled in Dāru'n-Nadwah (the Town Hall) and said to each other: 'You may avenge those who have been killed at Badr with those Companions of Muḥammad who are with an-Najāshī (Negus). Collect some money and send it as a present to an-Najāshī; perhaps he would hand over your tribesmen to you; and there should go two of your wise men as your envoys to him.'

''They sent 'Amr ibn al-'Āṣ and 'Umārah ibn Abī Mu'ayt [1] with

[1] The right name of this person is 'Umārah ibn 'Uqbah ibn Abī Mu'ayṭ. But the real person who accompanied 'Amr ibn al-'Āṣ to Abyssinia, in the first presents (of) skins, etc. They sailed the sea and arrived at Abyssinia. When they came to an-Najāshī, they prostrated before him and greeted him; and said: 'Our people are sincere and thankful to you, and they love your courtiers. They have sent us to you to warn you against these people who have come to you for, they follow an imposter who has stood up, claiming to be a Messenger of Allāh; and none of us has followed him except a few simpletons. And we made life difficult for them and compelled them to take shelter in a narrow mountain valley of our land, with nobody visiting them, until hunger and thirst (nearly) destroyed them. When the situation became too tough for him, he sent his cousin to you, in order to create mischief here — in your religion, kingdom and subjects. Therefore, beware of them and hand them over to us; it will save you the trouble of dealing with them.' Also, they said: 'And it is a sign (of their mischief) that when they come here they will not prostrate before you, nor will they greet you in the way the people greet you; (it is because of their) disliking your religion and customs.'

''Then an-Najāshī called them (i.e., the Muslims). When they came, Ja'far called at the door: 'The party of Allāh ask permission to come before you.' an-Najāshī said: 'Tell this caller to repeat his words.' Ja'far did, and an-Najāshī said: 'Yes; let them enter with safety of Allāh and His protection.' 'Amr looked at his colleague and said: 'Do you not hear how they jabbered about the party of Allāh and how the King responded to them?' And they were displeased with it.

''Then (the Muslims) entered and did not prostrate before him. 'Amr ibn al-'Āṣ said: 'Do you not see that they deem themselves too great to prostrate before you?' an-Najāshī said to them: 'What prevents you from prostrating before me and greeting me in the way all those do who come to me from furthest regions?' They replied: 'We do sajdah (prostration) to Allāh Who created you and gave (this) kingdom to you. Of course, we were using the customary greeting when we were idolaters; then Allāh raised among us a truthful Prophet, and he taught us the greeting which Allāh is pleased with, and that is, ''Peace'', the greeting of the people of the Garden.' an-Najāshī knew that it was true and that it was in the Torah journey, was 'Umārah ibn al-Walīd ibn al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī, the brother of Khālid ibn al-Walīd; and in the next journey 'Amr was accompanied by 'Abdullāh ibn Abī Rabī'ah ibn al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī. (ed.) and Injīl. Then he said: ‘Who among you had called, ‘‘The party of Allāh asks permission to come before you?’’ ’ Ja‘far said: ‘I’ Then he (Ja‘far) said: ‘You are a king from the People of the Book, and it is not proper to talk much before you, nor to do any injustice. I would like to answer on behalf of my Companions; therefore, order these two people that one of them should speak and the other should just listen; and you should listen to our talk.’ ‘Amr said to Ja‘far: ‘Speak.’ Ja‘far said to an-Najāshī: ‘Ask these two people whether we are slaves or free people. If we are slaves (and) have fled from our masters, then you should return us to them.’ an-Najāshī said: ‘Are they slaves or free people?’ He (‘Amr) said: ‘Nay; (they are) free and noble people.’ an-Najāshī said: ‘They are saved from slavery.’ Ja‘far said: ‘Ask them if we have shed any blood unjustly, so that they want its requital from us?’ ‘Amr said: ‘No; not a single drop.’ Ja‘far said: Ask them, if we have taken other people’s property without right, so that we have to repay it?’ an-Najāshī said: ‘Even if it is a heap of money I shall repay it.’ ‘Amr said: ‘No; not even a small amount.’ an-Najāshī said: ‘Then what do you want from them?’ (‘Amr) said: ‘We and they were together on one religion, the religion of our forefathers; and they have left it and followed another religion. Therefore, our people have sent us so that you may hand them over to us.’ an-Najāshī said: ‘What was the religion you followed and what is that which they have now accepted?’ Ja‘far said: ‘As for the religion we followed before, it was the religion of the Satan; we disbelieved in Allāh and worshipped the stone. And as for the religion to which we have turned, it is the religion of Allāh, the Islam; it has been brought to us from Allāh by a Messenger, coming with a Book like the Book of the son of Maryam and conforming to it.’ an-Najāshī said: ‘O Ja‘far! you have spoken a very great thing.’

‘‘Then an-Najāshī ordered the gong to be rung. It was done and every priest and monk gathered near him. When all were assembled, an-Najāshī said: ‘I adjure you by Allāh Who revealed the Injīl to ‘Īsā, do you find (any news of) a prophet messenger between ‘Īsā and the Day of Resurrection?’ They said: ‘By God! Yes. He has given us the good news of him and said: ‘‘Whoever shall believe in him shall believe in me, and whoever shall disbelieve in him shall disbelieve in me.’’ ’ an-Najāshī said to Ja‘far: ‘What does this man say to you? What does he enjoin you to do? And what does he forbid you from?’ (Ja‘far) said: ‘He recites to us the Book of Allāh and enjoins us to do good and forbids us the evil; he enjoins us to be good to our neighbours and relatives and to the orphans, (and) tells us that we should worship Allāh, the One, (Who) has no partner.' (an-Najāshī) said to him: 'Recite to me from what he recites to you.' Then (Ja'far) recited to him the Chapters of 'The Spider' and 'The Greeks'. The eyes of an-Najāshī and his Companions overflowed with tears, and they said: 'Recite to us some more from this good talk.' Then Ja'far recited to them the Chapter of 'The Cave'. (At this stage) 'Amr, intending to incite (the anger of) an-Najāshī against them, said: 'These people abuse 'Īsā and his mother.' an-Najāshī said (to Ja'far): 'Well, what do you say about 'Īsā and his mother?' Then he (Ja'far) recited the Chapter of 'Maryam'. When he came to the story of Maryam and 'Īsā, an-Najāshī raised his tooth-stick just a small bit (enough to disturb one's eyes) and said: 'By God! The Messiah did not say more then what you have said.' Then he said turning towards Ja'far and his Companions: 'Go, you are free in my land; you are safe from ill-treatment, and it will be a crime to give you any trouble.' Again, he said: 'Be of good cheer; do not be afraid; there is no downfall today for the party of Ibrāhīm.' 'Amr said: 'O an-Najāshī! and who are the party of Ibrāhīm?' (an-Najāshī) said: 'This group and their companion (i.e., the Prophet) whence they have come here, and those who follow them.' The polytheists denied it and claimed (themselves to be on) the religion of Ibrāhīm. Then an-Najāshī gave back to 'Amr and his companion the presents they had brought (to him), and said: 'Surely your present is just a bribe; you take it back because God gave this kingdom to me and He did not take any bribe from me.' Ja'far said: 'Then we returned (from the court), and we were under the best protection.' And Allāh revealed to the Messenger (s.a.w.a.) (who was in Medina) the verse about their dispute about Ibrāhīm: Most surely the nearest of people to Ibrāhīm are those who followed him and this prophet and those who believe; and Allāh is the Guardian of the believers.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Khāzin)

The author says: This story has been narrated with other chains, and also from the Ahlu 'l-bayt (a.s.). We have copied it here in spite of its length, and although it has nothing to do with the circumstances in which the verses under discussion were revealed, because it contains important information about the trials of the first migrants among the Muslims.

It has been narrated from aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) about the words of Allāh, Ibrāhīm was not a Jew nor a Christian, that he said: ‘‘The Leader of the Faithful, said: ‘Neither a Jew praying to the West nor a Christian praying to the East; but he was an upright Muslim on the religion of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.).’ ’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: We have explained in the Commentary the meaning of his being on the religion of Muḥammad, blessing of Allāh be on them and their progenies! This tradition looks at the direction of prayer when the qiblah was changed to the Ka‘bah (and the Ka‘bah is almost to the south of Medina). The Jews and the Christians denied its validity; and felt themselves obliged to turn towards the west (where Baytu ’l-Maqdis is situated), or the east (to which the Christian face). This has been counted as a deviation of these two groups from the middle course. This aspect is supported by wordings of the verse: And thus We have made you a medium nation (2:143). However, it is just an interesting and fine literary inference, and nothing more.

Explaining this verse, aṣ-Sādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘Pure, sincere, totally free from idol-worship.’’ (al-Kāfī)

The Leader of the Faithful said explaining the verse: Most surely the nearest of people to Ibrāhīm are those who followed ...: ‘‘Surely the nearest of the people to the prophets is he who practises most faithfully what they have brought.’’ Then he recited this verse and said: ‘‘Surely the friend of Muḥammad is he who obeys Allāh, even if his relationship is far from him; and surely the enemy of Muḥammad is he who disobeys Allāh, even if he has a near relationship with him.’’ (Majma‘u ’l-bayān)

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘They are the Imāms and their followers.’’ (al-Kāfī; at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

‘Umar ibn Udhaynah narrates from the same Imām that he said: ‘‘You, by Allāh, are from the progeny of Muḥammad.’’ I said: ‘‘From themselves? May I be your ransom!’’ He said: ‘‘Yes, by Allāh, from their own selves.’’ He said it three times; then he looked at me and I looked at him and he said: ‘‘O ‘Umar! surely Allāh says in His Book: Most surely the nearest of people to Ibrāhīm ... ’’ (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī; at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

There is a tradition narrated from al-Bāqir (a.s.) that he said about this verse: And a party of the People of the Book say: ''Avow belief ...'': ''Verily, when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) came to Medina he was praying towards Baytu 'l-Maqdis, (and) the people (i.e., the Jews) were pleased with it. When Allāh turned him from Baytu 'l-Maqdis towards His Sacred House, the Jews were annoyed. And the change of qiblah had happened in the noon prayer. So they said: 'Muḥammad prayed the morning prayer facing towards our qiblah; therefore, believe in that which was revealed to Muḥammad in the first part of the day; and disbelieve the latter part'; they meant (disbelieve in) the qiblah when the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) faced towards the Sacred Mosque.'' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: As you see, the tradition takes the adverbial phrase, (in) the first part of the day, as related to the verb, was revealed; and not to the verb, Avow belief. And we have explained it in the Commentary.

Ibn Jarīr and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated through al-'Awfī from Ibn 'Abbās, that he said about the verse: And a party of the People of the Book say: ''Avow belief ...'': ''A party of the Jews said: 'Avow belief when you meet the Companions of Muḥammad in the first part of the day; and when it is the end of it then pray (according to) your own prayer; perhaps they, that is, the believers, would say: ''These are the People of the Book and they are more knowledgeable than us.'' Perhaps they would then turn away from their religion.' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This meaning has been narrated in the same book from as-Suddī and Mujāhid also.

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said about the verse 2:27: ''It has been revealed about the covenant: (As for) those who take a small price for the covenant of Allāh and their own oaths — surely they shall have no portion in the hereafter, and Allāh will not speak to them, nor will He look upon them on the Day of Resurrection nor will He purify them, and they shall have a painful chastisement. And 'portion' means share. So he who shall have no share in the hereafter, with what will he enter the Garden?'' (al-Kāfī) ash-Shaykh aṭ-Ṭūsī narrates through his chains from 'Adiyy ibn 'Adiyy from his father that he said: ''Imra'u 'l-Qays and a man from Ḥaḍramawt brought their dispute concerning a land to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). (The Prophet) said: 'Do you have a proof?' He said: 'No.' (The Prophet) said: 'Then (it will be decided) by his (i.e., the opposite party's) oath.' He said: 'Then, by Allāh, he will take away my land.' (The Prophet) said: 'If he takes your land by his (false) oath, he shall be among those that Allāh will not look upon him on the Day of Resurrection nor will He purify him and he shall have a painful chastisement.' (Hearing this) the man was frightened and gave the land back to him.'' (al-Amālī, ash-Shaykh)

The author says: As you see, the tradition does not show that the verse was revealed about this event. Several traditions have been narrated through the Sunnī chains that it was revealed about this event. But those traditions give conflicting reports. Some like the above, say, that the dispute was between Imra'u 'l-Qays and a man from Ḥaḍramawt; others say that the conflict was between al-Ash'ath ibn al-Qays and a Jew concerning a land; yet, another tradition says that it was revealed about an unbeliever, who had offered in the market a merchandise for sale, and in order to deceive a Muslim customer, swore by Allāh that he was offered for it a price which in reality he was not offered. Then the verse was revealed.

You have seen in the Commentary that obviously the verse explains the reason of the preceding verse. In this background utmost that is possible is to take these traditions as an application of the verse on that happening ; but they cannot be accepted as an account of the circumstances in which the verse was revealed.

COMMENTARY

The verses come after those related to the affairs of ʻĪsā (a.s.); it implies that it is the second stage of the argument exonerating ʻĪsā from the responsibility of what the Christians believe about him. We may summarize the whole argument as follows:

ʻĪsā (a.s.) was not as you think about him. Neither was he Lord nor had he claimed Lordship for himself. (1) He was not Lord, because he was a mortal creature; was conceived in his mother's womb who gave birth to him and brought him up in a cradle. Of course, just like Adam (a.s.), he had no father, thus his likeness was with Allāh as the likeness of Adam. (2) Nor had he claimed to be Lord, because he was a prophet, and was given the Book, the Judgment and Prophethood; and a prophet, having that status, cannot transgress the limit of servitude, nor can he divest himself of submission to Allāh.

How can a prophet tell people: Take me as your Lord, be my servants rather than Allāh's? Or, how can he allow it for any other creature of Allāh? A prophet would never enjoin men to take the angels or the prophets for lords. He would not give to any servant of Allāh more than his due, nor would he deny prophethood of any prophet of Allāh divesting him of his status and dignity.

QUR'ĀN: It is not meet for a man that Allāh should give him the Book and the Judgment and Prophethood, then he should say to men: ''Be my servants rather than Allāh's'': ''al-Bashar'' (اَلْبَشَرُ = man) is synonymous with ''al-insān'' (اَلْاِنْسَانُ); it is used for singular as well as plural; one man is al-bashar and also a group of men is al-bashar.and also a group of men is al-bashar.

Mā kāna li basharin (مَا كَانَ لِبَشَرٍ = it is not meet for a man); li (ل) in li-basharin (لِبَشَرٍ) denotes ownership; that is, it does not belong to him; it is not meet for him; he has no right to it. The same expression has been used in some other places; for example, It does not beseem us that we should talk of it (24:16); And it is not attributable to a prophet that he should act unfaithfully (3:161).

The clause, ''that Allāh should give him the Book and the Judgment and Prophethood'', is the subject of kāna (كَانَ = was; is). It prepares the ground for the next statement; ''then he should say to men; 'Be my servants rather than Allāh's.' '' Apparently, the sentence could be shortened by omitting the introductory clause, ''that Allāh should give him the Book ...''; yet, it was inserted to give a new connotation to the phrase, ''It is not meet for a man''. Let us see what happens if the sentence is rewritten, omitting the introductory clause; then the verse would run as follows: It is not meet for a man that he should say to men. The meaning then would be as follows: He was not given that right, although possibly he could say so if he transgressed the limit and became insolent. But there is no room for such inference in the sentence as it now stands. The verse in the present form means as follows: When Allāh gives a man knowledge and gnosis of reality, and brings him up with Divine Care, that man can never transgress the boundary of servitude; nor does he feel free to interfere in what does not belong to him, or to dispose what he has no right to; as Allāh describes the declaration of ʻĪsā (a.s.), in the verse: And when Allāh will say: ''O ʻĪsā son of Maryam! did you say to men, 'take me and my mother for two gods besides Allāh' '', he will say: ''Glory be to Thee, it did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say) '' (5:116).

The verse says, ''that Allāh should give him ...'', instead of saying: a man whom Allāh gave the Book and the Judgment and Prophethood. The reason for it is clear from the above explanation. The latter wording points only to the basic legislative prohibition of such transgression. On the other hand, the present construction, ''that Allāh should give him ....'', shows that such behaviour is definitely impossible. The Divine Guidance and upbringing cannot fail to attain its goal, as Allāh says: These are they whom We gave the Book and the Judgment and the Prophethood, therefore if these (i.e., the tribesmen of the Messenger of Allāh, s.a.w.a.) disbelieve in it, We have (already) entrusted with it a people who are not disbelievers in it (6:89).

In short, the verse says that it is not possible for a man to join these Divine Favours with calling the men to his own worship. It is not possible when he is given a Book, the Judgment and Prophethood that he should say to men: Be my servants rather than Allāh's. In this context the verse resembles to a certain extent the verses: The Messiah does by no means disdain that he should be a servant of Allāh, nor do the angels who are near to Him ... and as for those who disdain and are proud, He will chastise them with a painful chastisement. And they shall not find for themselves besides Allāh a guardian or a helper (4:172 — 173). The implication is that the Messiah and the angels who are near to Allāh are too high in prestige and too great in status to disdain the worship of Allāh; because disdaining His worship brings painful chastisement on the culprit; and far be it from Allāh to chastise His honoured prophets or the near angels.

Objection: The verse uses the word, thumma (ثُمَّ = then) in the phrase, ''then he should say to men''; this conjunctive denotes some delay; and the delay does not conform with the joining you have mentioned.

Reply: What we have said about joining the Divine Favours with calling men to disbelief gives the gist of the matter. Togatherness and combination can happen with simultaneous things as well as with two things appearing consecutively — that too is a sort of combination.

''Be my servants rather than Allāh's'': al-'Ibād (اَلْعِبَادُ) like al-'abīd (اَلْعَبِيْدُ) is plural of al-'abd (اَلْعَبْدُ = slave; servant); the difference between the two plurals is in usage; al-'ibād is mostly used in relation to Allāh, for example, 'ibādu'llāh (عِبَادُ اللّٰهِ = slaves/servants of Allāh); while al 'abīd is generally used when related to man; they say, 'abīdu 'n-nās (عَبِيْدُ النَّاس = slaves/servants of men), and not 'ibādu 'n-nās (عِبَادُ النَّاس)

The proviso, ''rather than Allāh's'', has been added after the words, ''my servants'', as a matter of necessity. Allāh does not accept any worship unless it is purely for His own person. Allāh says: Now, surely, sincere religion (obedience) is for Allāh (alone); and (as for) those who take guardians besides Him, (saying), ''We do not worship them save that they may make us nearer to Allāh'', surely Allāh will judge between them in that in which they differ; surely Allāh does not guide him aright who is a liar, ungrateful (39:3). Thus, Allāh has rejected outright the worship of those who join worship of others with His worship, even if the others are worshipped merely as interceders and intermediaries, and only with intention of reaching near Allāh through them.

Moreover, the reality of worship does not come into existence until some independence is admitted for the worshipped even in polytheism. The partner, per se, has some independence; while in reality it is only to Allāh that absolute Lordship and Godhead belongs. Therefore, His Lordship cannot be complete, nor can His worship be correct except with negation of independence from every other thing in every possible way. The worship of someone else is worship of other than Allāh, even if Allāh is worshipped with him.

QUR'ĀN: but rather (he would say): ''Be worshippers of the Lord because of your teaching the Book and your reading (it yourselves)'': ''ar-Rabbānī'' (اَلرَّبَّانِيُّ = translated here as worshippers of the Lord) is derived from ar-Rabb (اَلرَّبُّ = the Lord), to which ''a'' and ''n'' (اَنْ) have been added for augmentation of meaning; as for example, they use:

al-liḥyānī (اَللِّحْيانِيُّ) for one having a luxuriant beard. Thus ar-rabbānī means the one having special relationship with the Lord, and spending his life in His servitude and worship. Bi (بِ) in bi-mā (بِمَا) is causative, and means ‘‘because’’; while mā (مَا) is for al-maṣdar (اَلْمَصْدَرُ) and has changed the past tenses into infinitive verbs; that is why we have translated it in the following way: ‘‘but rather (he would say): ‘Be worshippers of the Lord because of your teaching the Book and your reading (it yourselves) ’ ’’

ad-Dirāsah (اَلدِّرَاسَةُ = to study) is more specific than at-ta‘allum (اَلتَّعَلُّمُ = to learn; to study), as the former is generally used for studying from book by reading and reciting. ar-Rāghib says: ‘‘Darasa ’d-dār (دَرَسَ الدَّارُ = vestiges of the house remained); it implies that the house itself was obliterated; and for this reason ad-durūs (اَلدُّرُوْسُ) is translated as obliteration. Likewise, darasa ’l-kitāb (دَرَسَ الْكِتَابُ) (or, darasa ’l-‘ilm = دَرَسَ الْعِلْمُ) means, he got trace of book (or, knowledge) memorizing it; he grasped its meaning. As it is attained by regular recitation, such recitation is called memorization. Allāh says: and they have read what is in it (7:169); because of your teaching the Book and reading; And We have not given them any books which they read (44:44).’’

The theme is that a man having such a high status will call you only to attainment of faith and to believe in the teachings of the Book which you learn and teach — the Book that contains the fundamental Divine Knowledge; he will enjoin you to acquire noble character and good traits found in the Book; and to practise and do good deeds to which you call the people. He will do so, in order that you attach yourselves exclusively to your Lord, and thus become divine scholars.

Bi-mā kuntum (بِمَا كُنْتُمْ = lit., because you were), being a past tense, shows that the action had already taken place; that the audience was already teaching and reading the Book. It gives a hint that, possibly, it is an allusion to the Christians, who said that ‘Īsā had told them that he was the son of God and His Word (with all the differences in the meaning of sonship). The fact is that the Children of Israel had been given a revealed Book which they taught and read; then they differed in it — a difference that was accompanied by textual changes and alterations. ‘Īsā (a.s.) was sent only to explain to them a part of what they differed in and to allow them part of that which was forbidden them; in short, to call them to fulfil their obligations concerning the learning and teaching — that they should attach themselves exclusively to their Lord in reading and teaching His Book.

Although the verse may somehow be applied to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) — because his mission covered the People of the Book too, who used to teach and read the Book of Allāh — but ʻĪsā (a.s.) was before the Prophet and the verse applies to him in a more befitting manner; also because he was sent exclusively to the Children of Israel, unlike the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.).

So far as other ulu 'l-ʻazm prophets (who came with a Book), i.e., Nūḥ, Ibrāhīm and Mūsā are concerned, the verse obviously cannot be applied to them.

QUR'ĀN: Or that he should enjoin you that you should take the angels and the prophets for lord: The verb ''aw ya'murakum'' (اَوْيَأْمُرَكُمْ = or that he should enjoin you), because of the vowel ''a'' after ya'mur (according to the well-known and common recital), is in conjunction with ''he should say''.

A group of the People of the Book had taken the angels for lords. For instance, the Sabaeans worshipped the angels and attributed that custom to the authority of religion. Likewise the Arabs, while claiming to follow the religion of Ibrāhīm (a.s.), said that the angels were Allāh's daughters.

As for taking the prophets for lords, the Jews, for instance, said that ʻUzayr was the son of Allāh — as the Qur'ān quotes them — although Mūsā (a.s.) had not allowed it to them, nor was there in the Torah anything other than monotheism. Had Mūsā (a.s.) allowed it to them he would be enjoining it — far be it from him!

The style of the verse, ''then he should say to men: 'Be my servants rather than Allāh's' '', differs in two ways from that of the next verse, ''Or that he should enjoin you that you should take the angels and the prophets for lords'': (1) The subject matter in the former is worship of other than Allāh, and in the latter it is taking them for lords. (2) The enjoined people in the former are described in third person, ''men'', while the latter addresses them directly in second person. Let us look at both changes:

First: The former verse adversely alludes to the Christians concerning their worship of ʻĪsā. As is known, they believe in his godhead openly, saying that he had invited them to his own worship. Thus they have clearly ascribed this call to ʻĪsā that he said to them: ʻBe my servants'. On the other hand, taking the angels and the prophets for lords (in the meaning used in the case of others than ʻĪsā) is opposed to the belief of monotheism only by implication, not clearly. That is why the latter verse uses the word, ''lords'', instead of gods.

Second: Both expressions ('Be my servants'; that he should enjoin you) deal with a subject which was relevant to the audience of these verses, that is, the People of the Book and the Arabs. The first verse has used the word, ''should say''; and ''saying'' implies a face to face talk. But the people present at the time of the Prophet were not present at the material time, that is, when ʻĪsā was supposed to say it. It is for this reason that the verse says, ''he should say to men'', instead of saying, he should say to you. On the other hand, the second verse uses the word ''enjoin''; enjoining does not necessarily require face to face talk; it may be done even when the enjoined one is absent. An order given to, or a matter connected with, the ancestors is applied to the later generations if the latter identify themselves with the former. As for ''saying'' — because it employs transmission of voice — it denotes oral conversation and presence of the audience (except when it is used simply in the meaning of instruction).

It is therefore evident that basically these verses require second person plurals (as in, or that he should enjoin you ...); but exception was made in the first verse owing to special reasons.

QUR'ĀN: What! would he enjoin you with unbelief after you are Muslims (Submitting Ones)?: Apparently, the question is directed to all who followed a prophet like the People of the Book, or claimed to do so like the Arabs of the days of Ignorance who believed that they were on the religion of Ibrāhīm. The talk is based on a hypothetical proposition and the meaning is as follows: If it is true that you do follow this man who was given the Book, the Judgment and Prophethood, then you have already submitted to Allāh, acquiring the characteristics of Islam; then how will it be possible for that prophet to enjoin you with disbelief, diverting you from the very path to which he had guided you by the order of Allāh?

It is clear from the above explanation that in this verse, Islam refers to the religion of monotheism; the religion which Allāh sent all the prophets with. This view is supported by other verses preceding and following this verse, in which the word, ‘‘Islam’’, has been used in this very meaning: Surely the religion with Allāh is Islam (3:19); Is it then other than Allāh's religion that they seek (to follow) ... And whoever seeks a religion other than Islam, it shall not be accepted from him, and in the hereafter he shall be one of the losers (3:83 — 85).

An exegete has said that the two verses under discussion refer to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.). His view is based on a tradition (quoted earlier) describing the circumstances of its revelation which says that Abū Rāfi‘ al-Quraẓī and a Najrānite Christian said to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.): ‘‘Do you want us to worship you? O Muḥammad!’’ Then Allāh revealed: ‘It is not meet for a man that Allāh should give him ... after you are Muslims?’ Then the said exegete has argued by the last phrase, ‘after you are Muslims’; ‘‘because Islam is the religion brought by Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.).’’

COMMENT: He has confused the Islam of Qur’ānic terminology (the religion of monotheism which was preached by all the prophets) with the Islam of the Muslims’ terminology — a term which came into use after the time of revelation. (We have explained it earlier).

CONCLUSION

(Having Seven Chapters)

1. The Story of ‘Īsā and his Mother in the Qur’ān

Maryam, daughter of ‘Imrān, was the mother of the Messiah. When her mother was pregnant with her, she made a vow that she would release what was in her womb to be devoted to the service of the Temple. She believed that she was pregnant with a male child; but when she brought it forth and came to know that it was a female, she was disappointed and dejected. Then she named her Maryam, that is, servant. Her father, ‘Imrān, had died before she was born; so the mother brought her to the Temple for handing her over to the priests — Zakariyyā was one of them.

They contended one with another to get the privilege of her custody; then they agreed to decide it by lot, in which Zakariyyā's name was drawn; and he became her guardian. When she reached the age of puberty, Zakariyyā made for her a partition to protect her from men's eyes. She used to worship Allāh therein and nobody entered that sanctuary except Zakariyyā. Whenever Zakariyyā entered the sanctuary to see her, he found with her food. He said: ''O Maryam! whence comes this to you?'' She said: ''It is from Allāh, and surely Allāh gives sustenance to whom He pleases, without measure.''

Maryam was a truthful woman, and was sinless by Allāh's protection; purified, chosen and spoken to; the angels spoke to her and purified her. She was obedient to the Lord and a sign of Allāh for the worlds. Vide 3:35 — 44; 19:16; 21:91; 66:12.

Then Allāh sent to her His Spirit when she had hidden herself behind a curtain, and he appeared to her as a well-made man. He said to her that he was a messenger of her Lord so that he should give her, by permission of Allāh, a pure boy without a father. He also gave her good news of the manifest miracles which were to happen on the hand of her son; and informed her that Allāh would surely strengthen him by the Holy Spirit, and would teach him the Book, the Wisdom, the Torah and the Injīl. He also told her that her son would be a messenger to the Children of Israel and would have clear signs. After informing her of the boy's status and story, he breathed into her the Spirit and she became pregnant with 'Īsā (a.s.), as a woman conceives her child. Vide 3:33 — 50.

Then she withdrew herself with him to a remote place. And the throes of childbirth compelled her to betake herself to the trunk of a palm-tree. She said: ''Oh, would that I had died before this, and had been a thing quite forgotten!'' Then (the child) called out to her from beneath her: ''Grieve not; surely your Lord has made a stream to flow beneath you: And shake towards you the trunk of the palm-tree, it will drop on you fresh ripe dates: So eat and drink and refresh the eye. Then if you see any man, say: 'Surely I have vowed a fast to the Beneficient God, so I shall not speak to any man today.' '' And she came to her people with him, carrying him (with her). Vide 19:20 — 27. His conception, birth, talk and all related affairs were similar to those of other men.

When her people saw her in such a condition, they were enraged, and blamed and taunted her — as was natural in case of an unmarried woman conceiving and bringing forth a child. They said: ‘‘O Maryam, surely you have done a strange thing. O sister of Hārūn! your father was not a bad man, nor was your mother an unchaste woman.’’ But she pointed to him. They said: ‘‘How should we speak to one who is a child in the cradle?’’ He said: ‘‘Surely I am a servant of Allāh; He has given me the Book and made me a prophet: And he has made me blessed wherever I may be, and He has enjoined on me prayer and zakāt so long as I live: And dutiful to my mother, and He has not made me insolent, unblessed: And peace on me on the day I was born, and on the day I die, and on the day I am raised to life.’’ Vide 19:27 — 33.

This talk of ‘Īsā (a.s.) was a sort of prologue which pointed to his future mission — that he would rise against oppression and injustice, revive and reform the sharī‘ah of Mūsā (a.s.), renovate what was obliterated from the revealed knowledge and make clear to them what they had differed in.

‘Īsā (a.s.) grew up and became a young man. He and his mother used to eat and drink in normal way with all the necessary concomitants and accidents of human life upto the end.

Then ‘Īsā (a.s.) was made a messenger to the Children of Israel. He stood up calling them to the religion of monotheism and told them: ‘‘I have come to you with a sign from your Lord, that I create for you out of dust like the form of a bird, then I breathe into it and it becomes a bird, with Allāh’s permission, and I heal the blind and the leper, and bring the dead to life, with Allāh’s permission, and I inform you of what you eat and what you store in your houses. Most surely there is a sign in this for you. Surely Allāh is my Lord and your Lord, therefore, worship Him only.’’

He called them to his new sharī‘ah, which verified the Law of Mūsā (a.s.); but he abrogated some parts of it, allowing them somethings which were forbidden in the Torah as a punishment to the Jews. ‘Īsā (a.s.) used to say: ‘‘Surely I have come to you with wisdom, so that I may make clear to you a part of what you differ in. O Children of Israel! surely I am the messenger of Allāh to you, verifying that which is before me of the Torah and giving the good news of a Messenger who will come after me, his name being Aḥmad.’’

He showed the miracles which he had mentioned, e.g., creation of bird, raising the dead to life, healing the blind and leper, and giving the news of the unseen — all by Allāh's permission.

He continued like that calling them to monotheism and his new sharī'ah until he was convinced that they would not believe in him. Seeing their insolence, enmity and hatred, and the arrogance of their priests and rabbis, he turned away from them and selected his apostles (from the small band that had believed in him) to be his helpers to Allāh.

Then the Jews rose against him with the intention to kill him. But Allāh took him away completely and raised him. The Jews were put in confusion: some thought that they had killed him, others that they had crucified him; but in fact it was made to appear to them like that. Vide 3:45 — 58; 4:157 — 158; 5:110 — 111; 43:63 — 65; 61:6 — 14.

This is in short the story of 'Īsā (son of Maryam) and his mother as given in the Qur'ān.

2. Position of 'Īsā Before Allāh and in His Own Eyes

'Īsā (a.s.) was a servant of Allāh and a prophet (vide 19:30); a messenger to the Children of Israel (vide 3:49); was one of the five ulu 'l-'azm prophets, bringing a new sharī'ah and a Book, i.e., Injīl (vide 5:46; 33:7; 42:13); Allāh named him the Messiah, 'Īsā (vide 3:45); he was the Word of Allāh and a Spirit from Him (vide 4:171); an Imām (vide 33:7); one of the witnesses of deeds (vide 4:159; 5:117); he brought the good news of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) (vide 61:6); was worthy of regard in this world and the hereafter, and one of those who are made near to Allāh (vide 3:45); was one of the chosen progenies (vide 3:33); one of the selected and righteous ones (vide 6:85 — 87); was made blessed wherever he might be, and purified; was a sign to the people, a mercy from Allāh, and dutiful to his mother; greeted himself with peace (vide 19:19 — 33); and was among those whom Allāh taught the Book and the Wisdom (vide 3:48).

These twenty-two characteristics, from the stations of al-wilāyah (اَلوِلايَةْ = friendship and guardianship of Allāh), give the gist of the attributes which Allāh has used to praise this honoured prophet and to raise his rank. These may be divided in two categories: (1) The acquired ones, like servitude, righteousness and nearness to Allāh; (2) Those bestowed by Allāh as His special grace. We have explained each characteristic in relevant places of this book according to our understanding. Anyone, wanting more details should look it up in those volumes.

3. What ‘Īsā Said, and What was Said About Him?

The Qur’ān says that ‘Īsā (a.s.) was Allāh’s servant and messenger; and that he did not claim for himself what the Christians ascribe to him, nor did he tell them anything other than conveying the Divine Message. Allāh says: And when Allāh will say: ‘‘O ‘Īsā son of Maryam! did you say to men, ‘Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allāh’ ’’, he will say: ‘‘Glory be to Thee, it did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say); if I had said it, Thou wouldst indeed have known it; Thou knowest what is in my mind, and I do not know what is in Thy mind; surely Thou art the great Knower of the unseen things. I did not say to them aught save what Thou didst enjoin me with: That worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord, and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them, but when Thou didst take me (away) completely, Thou wert the watcher over them, and Thou art witness of all things. If Thou shouldst chastise them, then surely they are Thy servants; and if Thou shouldst forgive them, then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise.’’ Allāh will say: ‘‘This is the day when their truth shall benefit the truthful ones’’ (5:116 — 119).

This wonderful reply contains the essence of servitude and shows outstanding manner; it is a mirror of ‘Īsā’s attitude and behaviour towards his Lord; it shows how he looked at himself in relation to his Creator and what he thought of the people and their deeds. He says that he looked at himself just as a servant of his Lord, who had nothing to do other than obeying the Lord; he does not proceed except when directed to, and does not stop unless told to. And he was not ordered except to call people to the worship of Allāh and he did not tell them except what he was enjoined with: That worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord.

And so far as his relationship with his people is concerned he shall be the witness for their deeds, and that is that; it is none of his business what Allāh does with them and about them — whether He forgives them or chastises them.

Question: If so, then how would you justify what you had written in the topic of intercession that ʻĪsā shall be among the intercessors on the Day of Resurrection, he shall intercede and his intercession will be honoured and accepted?

Answer: The Qur'ān says expressly — or almost expressly — that he is an intercessor. Allāh says: And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (43:86); and on the Day of Resurrection he (ʻĪsā) shall be a witness against them (4:159); and when I taught you the Book and the Wisdom and the Torah and the Injīl (5:110). And we have already written extensively on the subject of intercession.

This intercession is something quite different from the atonement which the Christians believe in. The theory of atonement invalidates the system of reward and punishment, and consequently negates the absolute sovereignty of Allāh — as we shall explain later on. It is the idea of atonement which the above-mentioned talk of ʻĪsā (a.s.) refutes. But this verse has nothing to do with intercession — it neither confirms it nor rejects it. Had it wanted to confirm it — in spite of its inconsistency [1] with context — it should have said: If Thou shouldst forgive them, then surely Thou art the Forgiving, the Merciful. And if it wanted to refute it, it should not have mentioned his being a witness for the people. We shall describe in detail this topic later on, Allāh willing.

Looking at what the people said about ʻĪsā (a.s.), we find that they were divided after him into various sects, and disintegrated to perhaps more than seventy denominations. This number looks at fundamental and major divisions only, because minor differences are too numerous to count.

Nevertheless, the Qur'ān concerns itself only with what they say about ʻĪsā (a.s.) and his mother, because it affects the foundation of monotheism which is the only goal to which the Qur'ān calls and the natural straight religion leads. The Book of Allāh is not concerned with other relatively minor points, e.g., the problem of alteration of the Book and that of atonement.

The beliefs which the Qur'ān ascribes to them (or quotes them) are as follows:

[1] Because the situation demands self-abasement, not relaxedness. (Author's note)

1. and the Christians say: ''The Messiah is the son of Allāh'' (9:30); And they say: ''The Beneficent God has taken to Himself a son'' (21:26);
2. Certainly they disbelieve who say: ''Surely Allāh, is the Messiah, son of Maryam'' (5:72);
3. Certainly they disbelieve who say: ''Surely Allāh is the third of the three'' (5:73);
4. and say not, Three (4:171).

Apparently these verses contain different phrases, describe different beliefs. (That is why some people [1] apply various verses to various sects, for example, the Melkites [2] who believe in real sonship; the Nestorians [1]

[1] Like ash-Shahristāni in his al-Milal wa 'n-niḥal. (Author's Note)

The author has taken these descriptions from ash-Shahristāni (vide al-Milal wa 'n-niḥal [Egypt, 1381 A.H. = 1961 C.E.] vol. 1, pp. 220 — 228). But ash-Shahristāni's information is superfluous and apparently based on hear-say; and his comments on Christianity remind one of his flight of fancy regarding Shī'ite faith and its various imaginary branches.

The fact is that almost all the splits in the early Christian Church were centred around the nature and substance of the Christ. It is not the place to go into historical details. Suffice it to say that gradually four groups had come into being about the nature of Jesus Christ:

a. Homoousians who believe that the Son was of one substance with the Father; they are called the Orthodox;

b. Homoeans who believed that the Son was like the Father; they are called the Arians;

c. Homoiousians who believed that the Son was of like substance with the Father; they are called the Semi-Arians;

d. Anomoeans who believed that the Son was unlike the Father; they are called Ultra-Arians.

Ulimately the Orthodox (Homoousians) prevailed. They say that the Son was of one substance with the Father, and that the Incarnate Christ was a single Person of a doubt nature — Divine and human — at one God and man.

All the sects are united on the ''sonship'', although they differ in its interpretation. That is why the Qur'ān rejects sonship — and the resulting trinity — to refute the Christians' belief in general. (tr.)

[2] Melkites (or Melchites) were those Christians of Syria and Egypt who, refusing the doctrine of Monophysitism (for its meaning see note no.2 p.152), and accepting the definition of faith of the Council of Chalcedon (451 C.E.), remained in communion with the Imperial See of Constantinople; hence their who explain descendence and sonship as radiance of light on a transparent body like crystal; and the Jacobites [2] who explain it in the terms of change and transformation, that is, the God was transformed into flesh and blood.)

But evidently the Qur'ān does not look at the peculiarities of their diverse sects. It is concerned only with one belief which is common between all of them — that 'Īsā is the son of God and of one substance with God, with the resulting belief of trinity — although they differ very much in its explanation (which has led to extreme conflicts and discords). That this explanation is correct is supported by the fact that the Qur'ān brings one and the same argument to refute the views of all of them.

It may be explained as follows:

name that means ''Emperor's men''. (ash-Shahristāni thinks that Malka was some individual who started this sect!) They like other Orthodox Christains, believe that the Logo (Word) of God being conjoined with the man Jesus — together called the Christ — was begotten in a non-literal sense by God. They do not believe in physical human-like sonship. Today there are about a million Melkites, most of them belonging to the Patriarchate of Antioch, whose head-quarters are at Damascus. (tr.)

[1] Nestorians: Followers of Nestorius (cir. 380 — 451 C.E.), who was the Patriarch of Constantinople (428 — 431 C.E.). He believed that there were two separate Persons in the Incarnate Christ — that the physical nature of Jesus was separate from his divine one, as opposed to the orthodox doctrine. According to him, it was Jesus the man, who was born of the Virgin Mary. Consequently, he rejected the term, Theotokos, (lit., God-bearer; usually translated as ''Mother of God''), that was used to refer to Maryam. For this heresy he was anathematized by the Council of Ephesus (431 C.F.). (ash-Shahristāni says that Nestorius lived during the reign of al-Ma'mūn — 813 — 833 C. E. !) (tr.)

[2] Jacobites: The body of the Syrian Monophysites who rejected the teaching of the Council of Chalcedon (451 C.E.) on the Person of the Christ. Monophysitism was the doctrine that in the Person of the Incarnate Christ there was but a single, that is, Divine, nature, as opposed to the orthodox belief of a single person of double nature. They were named after Jacob Baradaeus through whom they became the national Church of Syria. They flourished in spite of recurring Imperial persecutions, which led them to welcome the Muslim army when it attacked Syria. Although there were many converts to Islam (cir. 640 C.F.), the Jacobite Church continued. The Mongol invasions in 13th and 14th centuries caused their real decline. (tr.)

The present Torah and Gospels all together clearly mention the Oneness of Allāh; on the other hand the Gospel clearly mentions the sonship declaring that the Son is the Father and none else.

They do not interpret the postulated sonship in the terms of distinction, honour and excellence, although many verses of the Gospels clearly give this meaning. For example:

‘‘But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you. That you may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.’’ (Matt., 5:44 — 48) [1]

‘‘Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.’’ (Matt., 5:16)

‘‘Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them: otherwise ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven.’’ (Matt., 6:1)

‘‘After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name.’’ (Matt., 6:9)

‘‘For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you.’’ (Matt., 6:14)

‘‘Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful.’’ (Luke, 6:36)

Also he said to Mary Magdalene: ‘‘go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father, and your Father; and to my God and your God.’’ (John, 20:17)

These and other similar sentences of the Gospels refer to Allāh as the Father of ‘Īsā as well as of others, all in the sense of distinction and honour.

There are some sayings in the Gospels which allude to the union of the Son with the Father. For example:

---

‘‘These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee.’’ (John, 17:1)

Then he went on praying for his disciples and finally said: ‘‘Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And the glory which thou gayest me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one; I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.’’ (John, 17:20 — 23)

However, there are other verses which apparently cannot be explained in the terms of distinction and excellence. For example:

‘‘Thomas saith unto him (i.e., Jesus), Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way? Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me. If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him. Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself: but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me.’’ (John, 5:11)

‘‘For I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me.’’ (John, 8:42)

‘‘I and my Father are one.’’ (John, 10:30)

‘‘Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing [1] them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.’’ (Matt., 28:19)

‘‘In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Him; and without Him was not any thing made that was made. In Him was life; and the life was light of men.'' (John, 1:1 — 4)

These and similar other statements of the Gospels have led the Christians to the belief of trinity in unity. The belief of trinity is an attempt to reconcile the belief that the Christ is the Son of God with the belief in one God which the Christ himself had taught. For example, Mark, 12:29 quotes him as saying: ''The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord.''

The believers in the trinity say (although it does not impart any intelligible meaning): God is one substance with three Persons. The word Person denotes an attribute with which a thing appears to others; and the attribute is none other than the thing itself. The three Persons are: The Person of existence, the Person of knowledge, i.e. the Word, and the Person of life, i.e. the Spirit.

These three Persons are the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost. The first is the Person of existence; the second, the Person of knowledge (the Word); and the third, the Person of life. The Son who is the Word and the Person of knowledge descended from his Father (i.e. the Person of existence) accompanied by the Holy Ghost (i.e. the Person of Life) that gives light to all things.

Then they differ among themselves in explanation of this vague statement; and ever-occurring conflicts have divided them to more than seventy sects and denominations. We shall mention some of them to the extent that is necessary in the framework of this book.

Think over the above description; then look at what the Qur'ān ascribes to the Christians, or quotes them as saying: and the Christians say, ''The Messiah is the son of Allāh'' (9:30); Certainly they disbelieve who say: ''Surely Allāh, He is the Messiah, son of Maryam'' (5:72); Certainly they disbelieve who say: ''Surely Allāh is the third (Person) of the three'' (5:73); and say not, ''three''; Desist (4:171). Then you will realize that all these statements point to a single idea, i.e. the trinity in unity which is the common factor of all the sects which sprang up in the Christianity (as we have said above).

Why did the Qur'ān concentrate on this common factor? It was because the same objections apply to all their beliefs regarding 'Īsā (a.s.) — in spite of their diversity and numerousness. The arguments put by the Qur'ān are applicable to all their interpretations with equal force, as will be explained later.

4. Argument of the Qur'ān against the Belief of the Trinity

Coming to the belief of trinity, the Qur'ān refutes it in two ways:

First: The general method, i.e. showing that it is impossible for Allāh to take a son for Himself, no matter whether the presumed son be 'Īsā or someone else.

Second: The particular method, i.e. describing that 'Īsā son of Maryam was neither a son of God nor God; that he was but a servant created by Allāh.

First Method: What is the quiddity of sonship and birth? What do these words really mean? A living material thing (like man, animal or vegetable) separates from itself a portion of its own matter, then gradually develops it until it becomes another individual of the same species similar to its parent; the offspring has the same characteristics and traits as the parent body had. An animal separates semen from its body, or a plant removes a seed from itself, then it preserves and grows the semen or seed gradually until it becomes another animal or plant similar to its parent. This is what sonship and birth mean. It is no secret that such a thing is impossible for Allāh:

First: Because it needs a physical material body; and Allāh is far above matter and its concomitants without which matter cannot exist like motion, time, space and other such things.

Second: To Allāh belongs absolute Divinity and Lordship; consequently, He has absolute authority over, and total management of, all things in His hand. Every thing is in need of Him to bring it into existence, and depends on Him for its continuity. It is just impossible to imagine a thing similar to Allāh in ''species'' — a thing having the identity, attributes and characteristics similar to those of Allāh and independent of Him.

Third: If Allāh could beget or give birth to a son, it would entail graduality of action for Allāh. In other words,He would be governed by the laws of matter and movement; and it is contradiction in term, because whatever takes place by His Will comes into being at once without delay, without graduality.

The above explanations are inferred from the words of Allāh: And they say: ''Allāh has taken to Himself a son.'' Glory be to Him; rather, whatever is in the heavens and the earth is His, all are obedient to Him. The Originator of the heavens and the earth; and when He decrees an affair, He only says to it, ''Be'', and it is (2:116 — 117).

As we have explained above, the words, Glory be to Him, are a complete proof; the clause, whatever is in the heavens and the earth is His; all are obedient to Him, is another proof; and the verse, The Originator of the heavens and the earth; and when He decrees an affair, He only says to it, ''Be'', and it is, is a third proof. [1]

It is also possible to take the clause, The Originator of the heavens and the earth, as an allegorical expression in which the attribute of the object has been transferred to the subject. In other words, the clause may denote that the heavens and the earth are original in their creation and design; Allāh has created them without any previous model. Therefore, He cannot beget anyone, otherwise it would be a creation on His own model. (After all, the Christians believe that the Son is one with the Father.) In that case this clause would be an independent proof by itself.

The Christians generally use the sentence, 'the Messiah is the Son of God', in a somewhat allegorical sense, and not in its literal meaning. They expand the meaning of sonship. Probably, it means separation of a thing from another of similar quiddity without physical and material division and without graduality. This interpretation may remove the problems of body, materiality and graduality. Yet, the problem of similarity will remain unsolved.

The problem of similarity may be described thus: Evidently, to believe in God the Father and God the Son is to believe in number, in real plurality, even if we suppose that the Father and the Son are one in ''species'' or quiddity. A human father and his son are one because both have the same quiddity, both belong to the homosapien species; but they are in fact more than one because they are two individual human beings. Now, if we suppose that God is one, then all other things (including the Son) would be ''no-God''; they would be owned by God and dependent on Him; consequently the putative son would not be a God like Him. On the other hand, if we suppose a son similar to God, free of, not dependent on, Him, then it would invalidate and negate the Oneness of God.

This exposition is found in the following words of Allāh: and say not, ''Three''. Desist, it is better for you; Allāh is only one God; far be it from His glory that He should have a son; whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth is His; and Allāh is sufficient for a Protector (4:171).

Second Method: ʻĪsā son of Maryam could not be a son of God sharing Godhead with Him, because he was a human being having all the concomitants of humanity.

The Messiah (a.s.) was conceived by Maryam and grew up in her womb; then she brought him forth as women give birth to their children, and brought him up, as a child is brought up by his mother. He grew up proceeding through normal stages: from infancy to childhood, from youth to the middle age. All this time, his condition was like any other normal human being in march of life. He was governed by all normal accidents and conditions undergone by other men. He was hungry and satiated; felt joy and sorrow; was pleased and displeased; affected by delight and pain, comfort and discomfort; he ate and drank, slept and woke up, was tired and rested etc.

This was the condition of ʻĪsā (a.s.) when he was among the people. Doubtlessly a person having such characteristics is just a mortal man like any other member of his species. As such he, like all other human beings, was a creature made by Allāh. Now, let us look at the miracles and supernatural things that happened on his hand, like giving life to dead bodies, creating the birds and healing the blind and leper. Also, there are extraordinary signs related to his birth, that is, his conception without father. All these things are supernatural, against the normal custom which people are familiar with; yet they are unfamiliar because of their rarity, not because they are impossible. There was Adam who by evidence of the heavenly Books was created from dust and had no father. And here are the prophets, for example: Ṣāliḥ, Ibrāhīm and Mūsā (peace be upon them) on whose hand so many miraculous signs had appeared (which are mentioned in revealed scriptures). But nobody thinks that those miracles negated their humanity or proved their divinity.

This method has been used in the verses: Certainly they disbelieve who say: ''Surely Allāh is the third (Person) of the three''; and there is no god but the One God, ... The Messiah, son of Maryam is but an apostle; apostles before him have indeed passed away; and his mother was a truthful woman, they both used to eat food. See how We make the signs clear to them, then behold how they are turned away (5:73 — 75).

Eating food has been specially selected for mention in preference to other activities, beause it rather more forcefully proves his materiality and shows his neediness and wants, which cannot be combined with Godhead. Obviously, a person who by his nature feels hunger and thirst and satisfies it with a morsel of food and a cup of water, is nothing but an embodiment of poverty and need — a need that cannot be removed without help of some extraneous agent. How can such a man be God? What is the meaning of such divinity? A man surrounded by needs, depending for their fulfilment on something outside his own being, is deficient in himself, and managed by some other than himself. He cannot be self-sufficient god; rather he shall be a creature who is looked after by the Lord the Lord Who has His creatures' affairs in His Own Hand. The verse 5:17 may possibly be explained in this light: Certainly they disbelieve who say: ''Surely Allāh He is the Messiah, son of Maryam''. Say: ''Who then could control any thing as against Allāh when He wished to destroy the Messiah son of Maryam and his mother and all those on the earth?''And Allāh's is the kingdom of the heavens and the earth and what is between them; He creates what He pleases; and Allāh has power over all things.

The same is the case with the verse (coming after 5:75 quoted above) addressing the Christians: Say: ''Do you worship besides Allāh that which does not control for you any harm, or any profit?'' And Allāh — He is the Hearing, the Knowing (5:76).

The basis and theme of such arguments is this: 'Īsā (a.s.), as is seen from his condition and affairs, lived according to, and was governed by, the natural law which permeates a man's life. He had all the attributes, did all the deeds, and underwent all the conditions which a human being does; like eating, drinking, fulfilling all other human needs, showing all characteristics of the human race. Also this material involvement, these physical attributes were real; not an illusion or imagination. 'Īsā (a.s.), was a real man who had those natural attributes, conditions and actions. The Gospels contain many verses in which he calls himself man and son of man; are full of the stories of his eating, drinking, sleeping, walking, travelling, tiring, speaking and many such things which cannot be explained away, nor can they be interpreted otherwise. This being the case, the position of the Messiah would be the same as that of other human beings; he did not own or control any affair of the others, and he could be destroyed like others.

The same is the implication of his prayers and invocations; no doubt that he worshipped Allāh, his intention being to reach nearer to Allāh, with humbleness and humility to the sublimity and majesty of Allāh; certainly it was not for the purpose of teaching others how to pray or for any other such aim.

The verse 4:172 arguing against ʻĪsā's supposed divinity points to his prayer. Allāh says: The Messiah does by no means disdain that he should be a servant of Allāh, nor do the angels who are near to Him, and whoever disdains His worship and is proud, He will gather them all together to Himself. ʻĪsā's service and worship is the first and foremost proof that he was not God and that he had no share in Godhead which is reserved for the One other than him. How can a man put himself in the position of servitude to himself? How can he be the slave of himself? How can a thing be self-sufficient in the same framework in which it is dependent on someone else? The answer is clear: In no way.

Likewise, the worship of the angels clearly shows that they are not Allāh's daughters. Nor is the Holy Ghost a God, because they all are worshippers of Allāh and obedient to Him. Allāh says: And they say: ''The Beneficient God has taken to Himself a son.'' Glory be to Him. Nay! they are honoured servants; they do not precede Him in speech and (only) according to His commandment do they act. He knows what is before them and what is behind them, and they do not intercede except for him whom He approves, and for fear of Him they tremble (21:26 — 28).

Moreover, the Gospels contain verses showing that the Spirit or Ghost is obedient to Allāh and His messengers, following their commands, acting on their orders. There is no sense in saying that a thing orders itself or obeys itself, or that it accepts and acts on the orders of its own creatures (i.e., messengers).

In the same way as ʻĪsā's worship of Allāh proves that ʻĪsā was not Allāh, his call to the people to worship Allāh proves it; as the verse points to it: Certainly they disbelieve who say: ''Surely Allāh, He is the Messiah, son of Maryam ''; and the Messiah said: ''O Children of Israel! worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord, surely whoever associates (others) with Allāh, then Allāh has forbidden to him the garden, and his abode is the fire; and there shall be no helpers for the unjust'' (5:72). The method of argument used in this verse is self-evident.

Although the Gospels do not contain such comprehensive sentence as, ''worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord'', they are full of his sayings calling people to Allāh and to His worship; he repeatedly declares that Allāh is his Lord in Whose Hand is the management of his affairs; he openly says that Allāh is the Lord of the people; and never invites them to his own worship — in spite of his reported saying: ''I and my Father are one'' (John, 10:30). If we accept that it is a correct reporting, then, all things taken together, it must mean: my obedience is Allāh's obedience; thus, it shall have the same connotation as the verse of the Qur'ān: Whoever obeys the Messenger, he indeed obeys Allāh (4:80).

5. 'Īsā is An Intercessor, not A Redeemer

The Christians believe that Jesus Christ atoned for their sins with his blood; and that is why they call him the Redeemer, the Saviour. They explain this belief as follows:

''Adam disobeyed Allāh by partaking of the forbidden tree; it was a sin which remained with Adam, and it is inherited by his progeny who come into this world burdened with that original sin; and the recompense of sin is punishment in the next world, the eternal perdition, the everlasting ruin — which cannot be warded off. And Allāh is Merciful and Just — both at the same time.

''This situation created a knotty problem which defied all solutions: If Allāh were to punish Adam and his progeny for their sin, it would have been against the mercy for which He had created them; and if He were to forgive them, it would have been against His Justice. Justice demands that a sinner should be punished for his sins and errors, just as a good-doer and obedient person should be rewarded for his good deeds. [1]

[1] That is what most of the Christians believe. But some of them, like Bishop Mār Isḥāq, say that there is no difficulty if one refrains from inflicting a threatened punishment. In other words, it is all right not to fulfil a threat, although one is not allowed to break a promise of reward. (Author's Note)

Bishop Mār Isḥāq's view has been taken from ash-Shahristāni's al-Milal wa 'n-niḥal, pp. 223 — 224. (tr.)

‘‘This problem remained unsolved until Allāh solved it through Christ. Christ — the Son of God who was Himself God — entered the womb of a descendant of Adam, that is, the Virgin Maryam, and was born from her as a human being is born. In this way, he was a complete man, because he was a son of man; and at the same time, was a complete God, because he was the Son of God.

‘‘And the Son of God, being God Himself, was sinless and protected from every sin and error.

‘‘He lived among his people for sometime, mixing and dealing with them; he joined them in eating and drinking, talked and walked with them and befriended them. Thereafter he surrendered to his enemies enabling them to kill him the worst killing — killing by crucifixion, because one who is crucified is, according to the Divine Scriptures, cursed by God.

‘‘He took upon Himself the Divine curse and crucifixion, with all the condemnations, sufferings and chastisement which it entails. In this way he redeemed the people through his sacrifice, in order that they might be saved from the chastisement of the hereafter and the eternal perdition. Thus, he is the atonement for the sins of the believers, nay, for the sins of the whole world.’’ [1] This is what the Christians believe.

The Christians have made this theory (i.e., the crucifixion and atonement) the foundation of their religion. It is the Alpha and Omega of their call and mission — in the same manner as the Qur’ān has founded the Islam and its mission on monotheism; as Allāh says addressing His Messenger (s.a.w.a.): Say: ‘‘This is my way: I invite (you) unto Allāh: with clear sight (are) I and he who follows me; and glory be to Allāh; and I am not of the polytheists’’ (12:108).

It is the Christians’ belief in spite of the fact that Christ (as the Gospels clearly say, and we have mentioned earlier) used to admonish them first of all to believe in one God and to love Him.

The Muslims as well as many non-Muslims have shown the Christians the defects and invalidities of the above-mentioned belief of [1] ‘‘My litle children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ — the righteous: And he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.’’ (I John, 2:1 — 2) (Author’s Note)

Christianity. Countless books and booklets have been written and numerous pamphlets and articles published, showing that this theory is not only contrary to logic and reason, but is also contradictory to the Books of the Old and the New Testaments. What we are concerned with here — and what comes within the purview of this book of ours — is to show how this idea is opposed to the basic Qur'ānic teachings, and to explain the difference between intercession (as confirmed by the Qur'ān) and atonement (as claimed by the Christians).

Moreover, the Qur'ān clearly says that it talks with the people explaining the things in such a way as to bring it to the level of their understanding, to make it easier for them to grasp its realities. It explains what helps them to distinguish the truth from the falsehood, so that they may accept that and reject this. It enables him to differentiate between virtue and evil, between beneficial and harmful, so that he may take the one and leave the other. The fact that the Qur'ān keeps in view the level of the healthy reason and understanding is abundantly clear to all who study the Divine Book.

Now let us have a critical look at the above mentioned Christian theory of atonement:

First: They say that Adam committed a sin by eating from the forbidden tree. But the Qur'ān refutes this idea in two ways:

1. The said prohibition was not like a binding order given by a master to his slave; it was only an advisory counsel aiming at the good of the person so advised — in order that he may live more comfortably. Such an advice does not bring any judicial reward or punishment whether one acts upon it or ignores it. It is not different from the order or prohibition of an advisor to the one who seeks his advice, or the directions given by a physician to his patient. What happens in such situations is this. If the person concerned acts upon the advice, he achieves what is good and beneficial to him in this life; and if he neglects such advice, he may come to harm in this world. When Adam ate from the forbidden tree, the only harm he suffered was his removal from the Garden, and thus he lost the comfort and happiness he had been enjoying there. But there was no question at all of any punishment of hereafter, because he had not disobeyed any compulsory legislative order which could have resulted in ''punishment''. (For detail, see the Commentary of the verses 2:35 —

39).[1]

2. Adam (a.s.) was a prophet: The Qur'ān clearly says that the prophets were sinless; they were protected by Allāh from committing sins and transgressing the ''orders'' of Allāh. Logical reasons support this belief and the Qur'ān proves it. (See our discourse on the sinlessness of the prophets given in the Commentary of the verse 2:2l3).[2]

Second: They say that the said sin remained with Adam. But the Qur'ān rejects this idea when it says: Then his (Adam's) Lord chose him, so He turned to him (with mercy) and guided (him) (20:122); Then Adam received (some) words from his Lord, so He turned to -hiim mercifully; surely He is Oft-returning (to mercy), the Merciful (2:37). The reason also supports, nay, proves it. Retribution of sin is a frightening and formidable thing which the reason — or the master — thinks necessary for him who disobeys the command or shows obstinancy; it is from fear of punishment that legislations and laws are obeyed. Had there been no reward and punishment, the mastership could not be enforced and no order or prohibition would be obeyed. The master has the right and power to punish the sinners for their sins as well as to give rewards to the obedient ones for their obedience. Likewise, it lies within his power to excercise his discretion in a way he thinks fit, within the jurisdiction of his mastership. He has every right to pass over and overlook the disobedience and mistakes of wrong-doers by forgiving and pardoning them their sins and wrongs. This power of forgiveness is a part of management and rule as much as is the authority to mete out punishment. There is no doubt in any mind that forgiveness and pardon, in certain cases, is good and commendable when the forgiver has full power to punish; even today reasonable persons practise it and put it into effect. In this background, there is no reason why a wrong done by a man should remain attached to him forever. Otherwise, forgiveness and pardon would have no meaning at all. One forgives and pardons for erasing a mistake, for nullifying the effect of a sin; and if we say that the mistake and sin remains attached and cannot be removed, then forgiveness and pardon are meaningless. Moreover, the Divine Revelation is full of descriptions of forgiveness and pardon; also the Old and New Testaments speak of it.

[2] ibid., vol.3, pp.195 — 204. (pub.)

Not only that, even the afore-mentioned ‘‘Christian dogma’’ speaks about it. In short, the claim that a certain sin or mistake had been attached to a man, which could not be erased or forgiven even after repentance and expression of sorrow, even after returning to the Lord with sincerity, is a thing which no reason would accept, nor would any straight thinking person agree with.

Third: They say that the sin of Adam has remained attached not only to him but even to his progeny upto the Day of Resurrection. It means that the punishment of a crime of one person was extended to the others too who had no hand in that sin. In other words, a slave commits a sin and the master widens the circle of punishment to include even those who were in no way connected with that sin! (We are not speaking about a situation where someone had committed a sin and his descendants were pleased with his action; because in that case all would be counted as sinners.) What the Christians say puts the burden of sin on those who had nothing to do with that supposed sin. And the Qur’ān rejects it when it says: That no bearer of burden shall bear the burden of another: and that there is not for man (aught) except what he strives for (53:38 — 39). Sound reason supports this dictum, because it is an evil to penalize someone for a sin he has not committed. (Vide the discourse on the ‘‘Deeds’’, under the verses 2:216 — 218.) [1]

Fourth: Their argument is based on a misconception that every mistake and sin — without any exception — throws the man into eternal perdition. In other words, sins do not differ in size and magnitude — all are great and capital. But the Qur’ān teaches us that the sins and errors are of various categories: some are great, others small; some may be forgiven, others like polytheism shall not be forgiven except after repentance. Allāh says: If you avoid the great sins which you are forbidden, We will expiate from you your (small) sins and cause you to enter an honourable (place of) entering (4:31); Surely Allāh does not forgive that anything should be associated with Him, and forgives what is besides that to whomsoever He pleases (4:48). Thus Allāh has taught us that some of the forbidden things, that is, sins and mistakes, are great, and others are, by implication, small; some are not forgivable while others are forgiven. In any case, sins vary in their seriousness, and not every sin puts the sinner in eternal perdition or everburning fire.

Reason also refuses to lump all sins together, to put all mistakes in one category. A slap on face is different from murder; a lustful eye and fornication are not one; and so on. Never in the long human history have people treated all sins and errors alike. Sane persons in every age have prescribed different punishments for different crimes. How can it be possible to bracket all sins together without any discrimination, when there is so clear difference among them? In view of this accepted difference, only a few of them may cause eternal perdition, never-ending chastisement (for example) associating others whit Allāh, as the Qur'ān has said: Obviously going against the prohibition of partaking of a tree cannot be put in the category of disbelief in Allāh or polytheism or things like that. Thus there is no reason why it should cause an eternal punishment. (Vide the above-mentioned discourse on Deeds).

Fifth: Let us look at what they have said about the problem of the conflict between the Divine attributes of mercy and justice; how a plan was devised to overcome that difficulty; and how Christ came down and then ascended to heaven to effect that scheme — with all the ramifications they have mentioned.

Ponder on this statement and its concomitants, and see what type of god they believe in. Here you will find a Creator God Who is the beginning and the end of this created universe and all its components. But all His actions emanate from a will and a knowledge which are found in Him; and His will depends on an academic preference — in the same way as a man opts for a course of action after weighing its pros and cons according to his knowledge. Likewise, God ponders on the positive and negative sides of a thing and then decides whether to do it or not. Sometimes He makes a wrong choice and repents for it [1] ; at other times He meditates upon a problem without finding its correct solution; often He remains unaware of many affairs. In short, in their eyes, God in His attributes and actions is not different from a man. Whatever He does, He does it after thinking and meditating over it, directing His endeavours to the advantages of that action. His decision is thus governed and controlled by some extraneous factors, that is, the said advantages. He

[1] ''And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart.'' (Gen., 6:6). (Author's Note) may find His way to the correct decision; also He may take a wrong decision; there may be error, misunderstanding or forgetfulness in the course He has taken. Sometimes He knows, at other times He does not; often He overpowers, and frequently is Himself overpowered. His power, like His knowledge, is limited. When all this is believed about Him, then it should be equally possible for Him to be subjected to all the conditions which prevail in a human being who decides to do a work after pondering on its pros and cons: God will thus experience joy and grief, vainglory and shame, happiness and sorrow — and things like that. Needless to say that such a being would be a physical and material one, governed by the laws of movement, change and gradual completion. A thing having these attributes must be a transient being, a created thing; it cannot be the Self-existing God Who is the Creator of all things.

If you study the Old and New Testaments, you will know that all that we have said above is true; and that they believe in a god who has a body and has all the attributes found in a body, and especially in a man.

As for the Qur'ān, it declares the Lord's glory in all these matters, showing that He is far above such myths and superstitions, as it says: Glory be to Allāh (for freedom) from what they describe (37:159). We have many incontestable rational proofs to show that Allāh is One in Whom all the attributes of perfection are united. His are the existence without any hint of inexistence, absolute power without any shade of weakness, all-encompassing knowledge without any taint of ignorance, absolute life without any possibility of death or destruction. This being the case, there can never come any change in His existence, power, knowledge or life.

Consequently, He cannot be a body or a thing related to body, because body and the things connected to it are surrounded by change and alteration, subdued by incorporeality, neediness and shortcomings. As He is not a body, nor related to body, He is not subjected to varying circumstances or changing conditions; He is far above forgetfulness or obliviousness, mistake or repentance, undecidedness or uncertainty, reaction or despondency, weakness or defeat — and things like that. We have fully explained the rational arguments (related) to these topics in this book in relevant places; those who want a thorough study should look for them under relevant verses.

A discerning reader may easily judge between the two beliefs: Here is the Qur'ān, declaring the glory of the Lord of the universe; it affirms for Him every attribute of perfection, and asserts His freedom from every imperfection; and declares that He is too great to be comprehended by our understanding — beset as it is by limitations and imperfections. And there are the Old and New Testaments describing God in terms which can only be found in the Greek, Indian and Chinese mythologies of the ancient times; and ascribing to Him such things which primitive man imagined and which his superstition led him to believe.

Sixth: They say that Allāh sent His Son, Christ, and told him to enter into the womb of a woman — in order that he could be born a man while he was a god. It is the same unintelligible theory which has been strongly refuted by the Qur'ān; there is no need to repeat here the earlier-explained Qur'ānic arguments against it.

Also the reason does not support this theory. First look at the attributes which are essential for the Self-existing Being. His existence is eternal, without beginning or end; there can be no change in Him; His existence knows no limit; He encompasses everything, but Himself is above the limits of time, space and their concomitants. Then think over the creation of man from the time he was a sperm to the stage when it is a foetus in a womb — no matter which interpretation you accept for this human birth of god: that of the Melchites, or the Nestorians, or the Jacobites or some other groups. In the end you will have to admit that there is no relationship between a thing that has a physical body with all its accidents and concomitants and a Being that has neither a body nor any of its concomitants or accidents (like time, space, movement etc.). How can one even think of unity between the two in any way?

The fact is that this theory does not agree with self-evident rational propositions. That is why St. Paul and other leaders of Christianity hold philosophy in contempt and spurn and disdain rational arguments. St. Paul writes: ''For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? ... For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom. But we preach Christ crucified.'' (Epistle of Paul, ch. 1) [1]

[1] I Corinthians, 1:19 — 23. (tr.)

We find a lot of pronouncements — in similar vein — in his as well as in others' writings. This line was adopted only for propagation of their ideas and missionary activities. Anyone pondering on these epistles and books and studying the way they address the people may easily understand the motive behind it.

The above discourse also exposes the flaw in their statement that: ''God is sinless and protected from sins and errors.'' The God they have imagined is not safe from errors at all; He errs in His perceptions and He errs in His actions. Of course, He does not disobey anyone because none is superior to Him. That is why the question of sin and disobedience does not arise at all, so far as God is concerned. Consequently, it is irrelevant, nay, unimaginable, to say that He is ''protected from sins''.

Seventh: They say that God became man and then lived with his people as a man lives in society until he surrendered to his enemies.

It means that the Self-existent God may acquire for Himself some properties especially reserved for transient and incorporeal creatures — only then He can be God and man all at the same time. If so, then He can also become any of His other creatures; He may acquire for Himself the reality of any of the species created by Him. One day He may appear as a man, the next day as a horse; sometimes as a bird, at other times as an insect, and so on. He may even acquire more than one reality at a time, that is, He may come to this world as a combination of several species, for example, He may appear as perfect man and perfect horse and perfect insect, all at the same time.

Likewise, He may do any action done by His creatures — because He may appear as a certain species and then would do the actions reserved for that species. Going a step further, it would be possible for Him to do two opposite things together like justice and injustice, or to acquire opposite attributes for Himself, for example, knowledge and ignorance, power and lack of power, life and death, want and freedom from want. Glory be to Allāh Who is far above such absurdities! (This snag is different from the one explained in the Sixth Objection.)

Eighth: They say that he suffered until he was crucified and took upon himself the curse, because a crucified person is cursed. What do they really mean when they say that he took the curse upon himself? What is the meaning of curse? In common usage and language curse means removal from Divine Mercy and Honour. Does that supposed curse imply the same meaning? Or is it something else? If it has the same meaning which is known to the language and common usage, then how can God remove Himself from His own mercy? Or, how can anyone else remove Him away from His own mercy? What is mercy? It is a positive bestowal, a grant of favours and bounties, a bequeathal of especialities of existence. When one is cursed — taken away from Divine Mercy — it results in poverty, disgrace or effects like that — in this world or the next or in both. This being the case, what is the sense of saying that God was effected by curse? Choose any meaning for curse, it cannot apply to God — the God Who is Self-sufficient and fulfils the needs of everything.

The Qur'ānic teaching is diametrically opposed to this truly amazing theory of the New Testament. Allāh says: O men! you are the ones who stand in need of Allāh, and Allāh is He Who is Self-sufficient, the Praised One (35:15). Also the names and attributes of Allāh mentioned in the Qur'ān make it clear that it is impossible for any type of need or want, shortcoming or defect, loss or extinction, evil or abomination, disgrace or stigma to reach the sublime majesty of Allāh.

Poser: God suffered disgrace and took the curse upon Himself only because He became one with man. Otherwise, He in His own Self is too high to be affected by such things.

Reply: Did God, by becoming one with man, take upon Himself that curse and those sufferings in real sense of the word? Or, was it all just a metaphor, only an allegory? If it was in real sense, our objection stands. And if it was only in a metaphorical sense, then the original ''problem'' would remain unsolved; the birth of Christ would not solve the conflict between Divine Mercy and Divine Justice. If it was not God — but somone else — who suffered all those indignities and curse — the so-called scheme of atonement would remain unfulfilled. Obviously, the said plan was based on the idea that God Himself should be the ransom for human beings.

Ninth: They say that 'Īsā atoned for the sins of the believers, nay, for the sins of the whole world. This talk shows that they do not understand the real meaning of sin and error, nor do they comprehend how the sins bring the next world's punishment, or how that punishment is affected. Also, they have not grasped the relationship between sins and errors on one side and Divine Legislation on the other, nor do they know the stand of the sharī'ah about it. But the Qur'ān clearly describes all these things and teaches us these realities — as we have explained in the Commentaries of verses 2:26 (Surely Allāh is not ashamed to set forth any parable ...) and 2:213 (Mankind was but one nation...). We have described there that the orders and laws (which might be the subject of disobedience) and the sins and errors all are mentally posited things based on subjective consideration. They have been made for the protection of society's welfare; and the punishment of its disobedience is the unpleasant result which has been prescribed with a single aim in view — to discourage and prevent a responsible man from indulging into sin, from disobeying the law. This is the view of the sages who have laid the foundation of human society.

But the Qur'ānic teaching leads us to a still higher level in this respect (and the rational reasoning supports it, as we have explained). It says that when a man obeys the sharī'ah prescribed for him by Allāh, his psyche acquires some noble and praiseworthy inner traits; and if he disobeys the said sharī'ah, he acquires unworthy, hideous and evil traits. It is these deeply ingrained traits and characteristics which prepare for him the rewards or punishments of the next life, respectively. That reward and punishment is represented by the Paradise and the Hell, respectively — and their respective reality is nearness to Allāh or distance from Him. Thus the merit and demerit of deeds are based on things which actually exist and have a system. Unlike our social laws they are not based on any imaginary thing emanating from subjective consideration.

Also it is not a secret that the Divine Legislation perfects and completes the Divine Creation. It brings the creative guidance to its final destination. In other words, Allāh brings every thing to the perfections of its existence, to the final goal of its being. And among the perfections of human existence are a good social system in this world, and a happy, bounteous life in the hereafter. The way to that perfection is religion which enacts and promulgates laws for society's reform and development, and contains directions for reaching nearer to Allāh (and these directives are called acts of worship). When a man follows the laws of religion, his life and livelihood are improved, and his soul becomes ready to receive Allāh's bounties; and he is qualified — in his self and in his actions — for the Divine Honour in the hereafter. All of this emanates from the light put in his heart, and the purity that is found in his self. This in short is the reality.

Man gets nearer to Allāh or goes far away from Him. This nearness and distance are the foundations of his eternal happiness and unhappiness, respectively — and also for his social development (or otherwise) in this life. And religion is the only factor that brings about his nearness and distance. All these are real things, not based on imaginary assumptions or subjective considerations.

Now suppose that one putative sin of Adam — his partaking of the forbidden tree — brought eternal perdition on him, and not only on him, but on all his descendants also; and that there was no remedy for it, no relief from that ruination — except atonement through Christ. Then what was the use of sending religion — any religion — before Christ? And what was the use of ordaining it with Christ? And what is the use of promulgating it after Christ?

Let us put it this way: Eternal perdition and punishment in hereafter was a firmly-decreed fate of man — because of the said sin; it could not be removed or averted from him either through good deeds or through repentance; the only effective remedy was the atonement through Christ's suffering and crucifixion. Then why did Allāh promulgate the laws, revealed the books, and sent the prophets and messengers? What was the sense behind all this exercise? Were not all those promises and threats, all those good tidings and warnings devoid of truth? What could all those endeavours avail mankind when the whole species was doomed to perdition, and when eternal punishment was their firmly-decreed fate?

Also, suppose there were people who perfected themselves by sincerely following the previous sharī'ah (and there were countless prophets and also men of God in previous ummah who were like that, for example, the honoured prophets Ibrāhīm, Mūsā and others); they lived perfectly and died before the time of atonement. Now what would you say about them? Did they end their life in infelicity and perdition? Or in felicity and happiness? What did they face when they met death and went to the next world? Did death bring them to chastisement and ruination? Or to Divine bounties and happy life?

Moreover, Christ clearly says that he was sent only to save the sinners and wrong-doers, and that good-doers and righteous have no need of such help.[1]

Frankly speaking, no valid reason can be given for promulgating the Divine Laws, for ordaining the religious values — before the supposed atonement was affected through Christ; it was but a vain, senseless and aimless exercise. Nor can any good and correct reason be advanced for this ''strange'' action of God. The only thing that can be said is this:

God knew very well that, unless the problem of Adam's sin was solved, no law promulgated by Him would do any good. Yet He went on promulgating those laws just to be on safe side, hoping that one of these days He would get a chance to solve this problem and then He would be able to harvest the fruits of those legislation! Thus He legislated the laws and promulgated them through the prophets — hiding the truth from the prophets and their people alike. He did not tell them that there was a big problem which — if it remained unsolved — would nullify all the efforts of the whole group of the prophets and the believers, and which would render all the laws ineffective and useless. On the contrary, He pretended that the legislations and the prophetic missions were very serious, very important and very real things.

Thus God deceived the people, and deceived Himself too. He deceived the people by promising that their safety and happiness was guaranteed if they faithfully followed the sharī'ah. And He deceived Himself because, once the atonement was affected, legislation of the sharī'ah would become irrelevant, without having any effect on the people's felicity — in the same way as it was without any effect as long as the problem of Adam's sin was not solved. This was the case before affectation of the said atonement.

Coming to the time when atonement was affected, and to the later days, ineffectiveness and futility of the sharī'ah, of prophetic mission and of Divine Guidance is much more self-evident. What is the use or benefit of believing in divinely-sent realities and doing good deeds now that the problem of the original sin has been solved, and the atonement has brought forgiveness and mercy to all men, believers and unbelievers,

[1] ''But their scribes and Pharisees murmured against his disciples, saying, Why do ye eat and drink with publicans and sinners? And Jesus answering said unto them, They that are whole need not a physician; but they that are sick. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.'' (Luke, 5:30 — 32) (Author's Note) righteous and unrighteous, all alike, without any difference between the most impeccable righteous one and the most incorrigible impious one: Both were to suffer eternal perdition when the original sin was not redeemed and both are to share in the Divine Mercy now that it has been redeemed through the said atonement. (Remember that no good deed could remove that stigma, if there were no atonement.)

Objection: The atonement would benefit only those who believe in Christ. Therefore, the prophetic mission did have its use and benefit, as Christ has said in the Gospel.[1]

Reply: First of all, it contradicts the saying of St. John referred to earlier. Secondly, it destroys all the edifice built so far, because nobody — right from Adam to the Last Day — would enter the sanctuary of safety and deliverance except a very small group, that is, those who believe in Christ and the Holy Ghost; and not even all the Christians but only a certain group among all those widely differing denominations — all other denominations would be thrown into eternal perdition. I wish I knew what would happen to the honoured prophets (who came) before Christ, and to the believers of their ummah ! What would be the status of their mission, of the books they brought and of the wisdom they taught? Was it true? Or just a lie? The Gospels verify the Torah and its mission, and there is no mention at all of the Ghost and the atonement in the Torah. Does the Gospel verify a true book? Or does it verify a pack of lies?

Poser: As we know, the previously revealed books give the good tidings of Christ. This was a sort of a general call by them towards Christ, although they did not give any detail about his coming and atoning the sin. God was always telling His prophets about the advent of Christ in order that they might believe in him and be happy with what he would do.

Reply: First: To make such claims for the prophets before Mūsā is to shoot in the dark, to venture into terra incognita. Moreover, if there was

[1] ‘‘Also I say unto you, whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God: But he that denieth me before men shall be denied before the angels of God.’’ (Luke, 12:8 — 9) (Author’s Note) any good news, it was not an invitation to believe in, and follow, him. Secondly, that good tiding does not solve the problem of futility of the sharī'ah; if Christ delivered all those who believed in him, then was it not useless and futile to invite people to follow the laws of the sharī'ah and to practise good ethics and morality? Even Christ exhorted people to follow the rules of religion and be of good conduct; and the Gospels are full of his sermons to this effect. Thirdly, the basic problem still remains. They had talked about the original sin and the unfulfilment of the Divine Purpose, and that purpose is still unfulfilled. God had created mankind to bestow His mercy on all of them, to cover all of them with His favour and bounties, felicity and happiness. But what is the result? Almost all of them — with the exception of a small group — are going to be punished, suffering under the wrath of God, thrown into eternal perdition.

These are just a few of the rational reasons showing the absurdity and invalidity of this theory. The Qur'ān too supports these reasons. Allāh says: Our Lord is He Who gave to everything its creation, then guided it (to its goal) (20:50). He has made it clear that everything is guided to its goal and to what its existence demands. The guidance is of two kinds: creative and legislative. It is the established way of Allāh to bestow every relevant guidance on everything, and it includes the religious guidance bestowed on man.

Then Allāh says — and it is the first religious guidance given to Adam and those who were sent down with him from the Garden: We said: ''Get down you therefrom all together; if there comes to you a guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance, no fear shall come upon them, nor shall they grieve, And (as to) those who disbelieve in and belie our signs, they are the inmates of the fire, in it they shall abide'' (2:38 — 39). It gives in a nut-shell what various laws were to promulgate in detail upto the Day of Resurrection; it contains legislation as well as promise and threat — all in clear terms without ambiguity. Again He says: ... and the truth do I speak (38:84); The word is not changed with Me, nor am I in the least unjust to the servants (50:29). Allāh declares that He has no hesitation or misgiving about what He decides, He does not break what He has joined; whatever He decides, He enforces; and what He says, He enacts; His action does not deviate from the line He has prescribed for it. He does not waver or hesitate when He wills; nor is it befitting to His knowledge that He should intend a thing and then some demerit should appear in that course of action which He did not know before and thus He should decide not to do it. Nor can anyone else hinder His plan: It is not that He should will a thing, deciding to do it and then some rational defect should prevent Him from doing it, or some snag should appear in its execution and He should abandon the plan — because all such things, if they ever happened, would show helplessness of God. Allāh says: and Allāh is predominant over His affairs (12:21); surely Allāh attains His purpose (65:3); and Mūsā is reported as saying: The knowledge thereof is with my Lord in a book: errs not my Lord, nor does He forget (20:52); and Allāh says about the Day of Judgment: This day every soul shall be rewarded for what it has earned; no injustice (shall be done) this day; surely Allāh is quick in reckoning (40:17).

These and similar other verses clearly show that Allāh, after creating His creatures, has not neglected to look after their affairs, nor is He ignorant of what they would do, nor is He sorry for what He has done. As He is constantly looking after their welfare, He has ordained for them His laws — a serious and important legislation which He has ordained not because He is afraid of something or expects to gain something through it. He shall reward every doer for his action — if good, then good; and if evil, then evil. In all these affairs nobody can overpower Him, nor can anyone impose his will on Him — because He has no partner or colleague. There will be neither any ransom nor any redemption to save anyone; nor can anyone intercede for someone without Allāh's permission. Because all such propositions are against His absolute ownership which He has over His creatures.

Tenth: Let us look at the story of atonement. What is atonement or ransom? A man — or a thing related to him — is involved in some crimes or sin, as a result of which he faces the possibilities of harm or destruction of life or valuable property; and therefore he offers something less important in order to save his life or the more valuable property. A man taken prisoner redeems himself with offer of some money; crimes are redeemed with money paid as fine. The thing given for this purpose is called ransom, fine or redemption. Atonement, in short, is a deal which transfers the right of the claimant from the person so redeemed to the thing given in ransom or redemption — and thus the redeemed one is saved from captivity or from the evil consequences of the crime he had committed.

This description shows that atonement and redemption is simply unimaginable in the matters related to Allāh. The Divine Authority — unlike human authority which is merely an abstracted idea, a subjective consideration — is the real authority which cannot be changed or transferred. Things, in their species and with their effects, actions and reactions, have been created by Allāh and continue to exist because of Him. It is a reality, a fact; and reality and fact cannot change into non-reality, non-fact. Such a proposition cannot be imagined — let alone its ever coming into being. Allāh's ownership, authority and rights are not like those of us human beings. We are bound with social norms and laws. Our social rights, authority and ownership are merely subjective considerations, abstracted ideas based on our imaginations; their status and worth is in our own hands; we may establish a right today and abolish it tomorrow — as our interest and outlook change concerning our life and livelihood. For details see Commentaries of the verses 1:4 (the Master of the Day of Judgment) [1], and 3:26 (Say: 'O Allāh, Master of the Kingdom ... ') [2].

Allāh has specifically refuted the idea of atonement in the following verse: So today ransom shall not be accepted from you nor from those who disbelieved; your abode is the fire (57:15). And as explained earlier, the same is the import of the words of the Messiah quoted by Allāh in the Qur'ān: And when Allāh will say: ''O 'Īsā son of Maryam! did you say to men, 'Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allāh' '', he will say: ''Glory be to Thee, it did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say); ... I did not say to them save that what Thou didst enjoin me with: 'That worship Allāh, my Lord and your Lord', and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them, but when Thou didst take me (away) completely, Thou wert the watcher over them, and Thou art witness of all things. If Thou shouldst chastise them, then surely they are The servants; and if Thou shouldst forgive them, then surely Thou art the Mighty, the Wise'' (5:116 — 118). His words: ''and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them ... '', have the following import: 'I had nothing to do with them except what Thou hadst entrusted me to do, that is, conveying Thy message to them and being a witness over them — as long as I was among them; whether Thou shouldst chastise them or shouldst forgive them, entirely depends on Thy discretion; I have nothing to do with it. I do not have any authority on Thy will, with which I could save them from Thy chastisement or sentence them to punishment.'

It clearly refutes the idea of ransom and atonement. Had there been any ransoming or redeeming, it would have been wrong for him to wash his hands of the fate of his ummah, telling Allāh that it was His (Allāh's) discretion whether to punish them or forgive them, and that he ('Īsā — a.s.) had nothing to do with it.

Of similar connotation are the following verses:

And be on your guard against the Day when one soul shall not avail another in the least, neither shall intercession on its behalf be accepted, nor shall any compensation be taken from it, nor shall they be helped (2:48).

... before the day comes in which there is no bargaining, neither any friendship nor intercession ... (2:254).

The day on which you will turn back retreating; there shall be no saviour for you from Allāh ... (40:33).

Obviously, the ''compensation'' (in the first verse), the ''bargaining'' (of the second) and the ''saviour'' (of the third) all apply to the idea of atonement and redemption; the verses in refuting these things refute the belief of atonement.

Of course, the Qur'ān accepts the Messiah as one of the intercessors — but not as an atonement. We have explained about ''Intercession'' under the verse 2:48 (And be on your guard against the day when one soul shall not avail another...)[1]. We have explained there that intercession shows the nearness of the intercessor and his good standing with the master, without there being any transfer of authority from the master to the intercessors; without affecting in any way the ownership or power of the master; without nullifying or abrogating the master's commandment which the sinner had disobeyed; and without negating the system of recompense, reward and punishment. Intercession is but a sort of prayer and request by the intercessor that the master — in this case, the Lord — should manage the affairs of His creature with mercy. The intercessor accepts the Master's right to punish the sinner (because he had sinned and the law of recompense makes him liable to punishment), but asks the Master to exercise His power of forgiveness — because He has the right to forgive as He has the right to punish.

The intercessor thus requests the Master to exercise His right of pardon and forgiveness, when the sinner has become liable for punishment, without in any way affecting the Master's ownership or authority. But atonement is something else; it is a deal, a bargain, which transfers the Master's authority from the sinner to the ransom given in his place, and removes the sinner from the Master's power as soon as the Master accepts the ransom in his place.

That the Messiah is ari- intercessor is proved by the following verse: And those whom they call upon besides Him have no authority for intercession, but he who bears witness of the truth and they know (43:86). It clearly says that the people excepted would have the authority to intercede. 'Īsā (a.s.) is among those whom they call besides Allāh. But he has the authority of intercession because he is included in the exception: Allāh confirms in the Qur'ān that He had taught him ('Īsā) the Book and the Wisdom, and that he ('Īsā) shall be among the witnesses on the Day of Judgment. Allāh says: And He will teach him the Book and the Wisdom (3:48), and quotes him as saying: and I was a witness of them so long as I was among them (5:117). He also says: and on the Day of Resurrection he shall be a witness against them (4:159).

All these verses read together prove that 'Īsā (a.s.) is one of the intercessors. We have described it in detail under the following verse: And be on your guard against the day when one soul shall not avail another in the least ... (2:48).

6. The Origin of These Beliefs

The Qur'ān rejects the idea that these theories and beliefs were started or propagated by 'Īsā (a.s.). The fact is that the Christians blindly followed their leaders, leaving all affairs in their hands; and the leaders transplanted the myths of ancient idolators into Christianity. Allāh says: And the Jews say: '' 'Uzayr is the son of Allāh''; and the Christians say: ''The Messiah is the son of Allāh''; these are the words of their mouths; they imitate the saying of those who disbelieved before; may Allāh destroy them; how they are turned away! They have taken their doctors of law and their monks for lords besides Allāh, and (also) the Messiah son of Maryam, and they were not en-joined but that they should worship one God only, there is no god but He; far from His Glory be what they set up (with Him) (9:30 — 31).

Who are the unbelievers whom Allāh refers to when He says: they imitate the saying of those who disbelieved before? Surely it does not refer to the idolaters of pre-Islamic Arabia, who said that the angels were the daughters of God. Because the People of the Book believed God to have a son long before they came into contact with the Arabs — and especially so the Jews; while the words, who disblieved before, apparently refer to the unbelievers who were before the Jews and the Christians. Moreover, the Arabs themselves were not the originators of idol-worship — it was brought to them from abroad.[1]

Moreover, the idolaters of Rome, Greece, Egypt, Syria and India were nearer to the People of the Book (who lived in Palestine and its neighbourhood), and it was easier for the Jews and the Christians to adopt those people's beliefs and rituals, and the influencing factors were more conducive to it.

Therefore the unbelievers of earlier times (whose ideas concerning sonship of God, the People of the Book imitated) referred to by the

[1] It is said that the first man to place idols in the Ka'bah and to call the people to their worship was 'Amr ibn Luḥayy, a contemporary of Shāpūr Dhu'l-Aktāf. He became the chief of his people in Mecca and took over the management of the House. Then he journeyed to the Syrian city, al-Balqā', and found the people there worshipping idols. He enquired about it. They said: ''These are the Lords, we have made them in the images of the celestial deities and human sages; we seek help from them and we get help; we pray to them for rain and we get rain.'' 'Amr requested them to give him one of the idols; they gave him the Hubal. He brought it to Mecca and putting it on the Ka'bah, he invited the Meccans to worship it. He also had with him Asāf and Nā'ilah in the image of a couple; he called people to them too in order to come nearer to Allāh through them. This has been written by ash-Shahristānī in his al-Milal wa 'n-niḥal, as well as by others. It is very interesting to see that the Qur'ān uses names of some idols of Arabia in the story of Nūḥ (a.s.), where it quotes his complaint against his people: And they say: ''By no means leave your gods, nor leave Wadd, nor Suwā'; nor Yaghūth, and Ya'ūq and Nasr'' (71:23). (Author's Note)

Qur'ān were the ancient idolaters of India and China, as well as those of Rome, Greece and North Africa. The history shows close resemblance of such Jewish and Christians beliefs with the myths of those nations — like sonship, fathership, trinity, as well as the stories of crucifixion and atonement etc. These are the historical facts to which the Qur'ān has drawn our attention.

Similarly, the following verse points to this historical fact: Say: ''O People of the Book! be not unduly immoderate in your religion, and do not follow the low desires of the people who went astray before and led many astray and went astray from the right path'' (5:77). This verse shows that their immoderation in religion, their excessive love of some creatures which led them to raise them to godhead, had come to them from some previous nations who had gone astray before them, and in whose footsteps the Jews and the Christians were following.

The phrase: the people who went astray before, does not refer to their scholars or monks. The phrase is unrestricted and unconditional; it does not say, 'the people among you'. or 'led many among you astray'. Nor does it point to the Arabs of the days of ignorance — as we have explained earlier.

Moreover, it describes those people as having led many people astray; in other words, they were leaders of falsehood, whose words were listened to and whose directions were followed. Arabs did not have such a position in those days; they were just a small group of unlettered people, and did not have any knowledge, civilization and development in which — or because of which — other people could follow them. But the case of Iran, Rome and India etc., was different; they were highly civilized and developed nations.

Clearly the verse points to the idol-worshippers of China, India and the western countries, as we have explained.

7. Which Book the People of the Book Belong to? What is Its Condition?

Although traditions count the Zoroastrians among the People of the Book (and it means they must have had a special Book of their own, or should have belonged to one of the Books mentioned by the Qur'ān, for example, the Book of Nūḥ, the Scriptures of Ibrāhīm, Torah of Mūsā, Injīl of ‘Īsā and Zabūr of Dāwūd), but the Qur’ān does not make any reference to them, nor does it mention any book of theirs; the Avastha which they have is not mentioned in the Qur’ān at all, and they do not acknowledge any of the other Books.

When the Qur’ān uses the term, the People of the Book, it means the Jews and the Christians, because of the Books which Allāh had revealed to them.

The Jewish Scripture contains 35[1] Books: five are together called the Torah of Mūsā[2] ; twelve are called the Kings[3] ; then there are the Books of Job and Psalms of Dāwūd; then come three Books of Sulaymān[4] ; and lastly seventeen Books called the Prophets[5] .

The Qur’ān has not mentioned any of them except the Torah of Mūsā and the Zabūr of Dāwūd.

The Christians’ Scriptures are as follows: The four Gospels (of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John); the Acts of the Apostles, and several Epistles[6], and lastly the Revelation of John.

The Qur’ān does not mention any of these Christians’ Books. But it says that there was a Divine Book revealed to ‘Īsā son of Maryam, which was named Injīl; it was a single Book, not many. Although the Christians do not know it, nor do they acknowledge its existence, there are sentences in the writings of their leaders which contain admission that ‘Īsā did have a Book, Injīl by name[7] .

Nevertheless, the Qur'ān gives a hint that a portion of genuine Torah is still preserved in the Scriptures of the Jews, as is a part of genuine Injīl still extant in the Scriptures of the Christians. Allāh says: And how do they make you a judge and they have the Torah wherein is Allāh's judgment? (5:43); And of those who say: ''We are Christians'', We did take their covenant, but they forgot a portion of what they were admonished with ... (5:14). Both verses clearly imply what we have said.

an-Najjār has given in his Quṣaṣu 'l-anbiyā', this and similar other quotations from the Epistles of Paul to prove that there was there a book — other than the four Gospels — which was called the Injil of the Messiah. (Author's Note)

[1] The author in this section has given a lot of references from the Christian and western writers. He had to rely on Arabic translations of the English or other languages, given in Tafsīr al-Manār (ed., Rashīd Riḍā, Egypt, 4th ed., 1380/1961, vol. 6, pp.31 — 36 and 88 — 92), and some other books and Encyclopaedias. I tried to get hold of original sources, so that in my translation I could include those quotations in their original wordings — it would have been odd to retranslate into English an English passage through its Arabic rendering. Unfortunately oriental authors generally do not give the original spellings of the names of western writers or their work, nor do they put vowels on them to help in pronunciation. To compound the difficulty, there were some printing mistakes in al-Manār which were faithfully copied in al-Mīzān. For example, Anacaly psis of Higgins appears as الانگلوساکسن (al-Anglo-Saxon) in Arabic, and Monier Williams has become Morifore Lims!

After spending more than a month in various sections of the British Library, London, I was able to get many sources — and then it transpired that a large portion of quotations given in al-Manār was not taken directly from the original books, but from Bible Myths and their Parallels in other Religions (by Doane, Thomas William).

There are still some names which I could not ascertain. While writing such a name in English I have given first the Arabic rendering, then its English transliteration followed by question mark within brackets [?]. I shall be obliged if any reader could help me in finding their correct spellings. (tr.) beginning they lived a nomadic tribal life; then the Pharaohs brought them to Egypt, where they treated them as captive slaves. This continued until Allāh delivered them through Mūsā from the Pharaoh and his deeds.

During Mūsā's time they followed the line of their Leader, that is, Mūsā (a.s.), and thereafter Yūsha' (a.s.) (Joshua). For sometime thereafter their affairs were in the hands of the judges like Ehud and Gideon etc. Then began the era of the Kings; the first of the Kings was Saul (Plat of the Qur'ān); and then came Dāwūd and Sulaymān (a.s.).

After Sulaymān the Kingdom was divided[1], and their power weakened. Still there came on throne more than thirty Kings like Rehoboam, Abijam, Jeroboam, Jehoshaphat, Jehoram and others.

The division continued to sap the nation's strength until they were vanquished by the Babylonian King, Nebuchadnezzar, who subdued Jerusalem, that is, Baytu'l-Maqdis around 600 B.C. Later the Jews revolted; so he sent his army which besieged them, and on reconquering the city, ransacked it, plundering the King's treasures as well as those of the Temple. The Babylonians gathered the Jews and took about ten thousand souls — wealthy people, strong youths and artisans — in captivity to Babylonia, leaving only weak persons and beggars in Jerusalem. Nebuchadnezzar appointed Zedekiah (the last Israelite King) to govern them as his vassal.

Ten years passed, Zedekiah gathered some strength and established some contact with the Pharaoh of the time. Then he revolted against Nebuchadnezzar. This enraged the latter who himself led his army against the Jews and besieged their towns. They fortified themselves and the siege continued for about one and a half year; the besieged population faced famine and epidemic. Still the siege continued until Nebuchadnezzer conquered all the forts in the year 586 B.C.; he massacred the Jews, turned their towns into ruins, demolished the Temple and destroyed every religious symbol. When he left, the Temple was only a mound of dust and rubble; and the Torah and the Ark in which it was kept were irretrievably lost.

The things continued like that for about fifty years. The Jews were captives in Babylonia; their Book (Torah) was lost and there was nowhere any trace of it; their Temple was a ruin, their towns middens of rubble.

Then Cyrus, the Persian King, appeared on the scene. He vanquished Babylonians, conquered Babylonia and stayed there for a short time. He released the Israelite captives, and appointed Ezra as their leader; Ezra was authorized by him to rewrite the Torah for them, rebuild their Temple and re-establish their original rites and rituals. Ezra led the Israelites back to Jerusalem in 457 B.C.[1] . Thereafter he compiled and edited the books attributed to Mūsā — and it is what is known today as the Torah.[2]

Translator's Note: The first five books of Old Testament, commonly known as the Torah, are also called Pentateuch. In the 18th Century, some Christian scholars started what is now known as the ''Higher Criticism''. Their views are now accepted by a great part of Christiandom. They have proved that it contains writings of unknown number of people right upto 1000 years after the death of Mūsā. I append below the time table and sequence of its editing (in short) as given by Rev. W.K.L. Clarke, in his Concise Bible Cemmentary (S.P.C.K., London, 1952): He says that by the end of the 19th Century, it was generally recognized ''that there are four main sources in the Pentateuch, to be assigned to the 9th, 8th, 7th and 5th or 4th Centuries (B.C.) respectively.''

''The first look at the Pentateuch shows three characteristics styles illustrated by Genesis:1, Genesis:2 and Deuteronomy, and the documents marked by these styles were first to be noticed.''

''The obviously early source begins in Gen. 2:4. This source is called 'J', after the J of Jehovah (pronounced Jahweh). 'J' is generally thought to have been put into written form about 850 B.C.

''Another source is 'D', so-called from the book of Deuteronomy, which was the book of law discovered in Josiah's reign. The third source is called Priestly document, P for short. A large part of P is believed to have been composed in Babylonia and brought to Jerusalem by Ezra in 397 B.C. How much of P was omitted in final compilation of Pentateuch we have no means of knowing. There was a subordinate source, known as the Code of Holiness, H for short. Opinions differ whether it was written before 586 B.C. or after the fall of Jerusalem. It is found in Lev. 17:28.

''Now comes the fourth source. After taking P, D and J from the Pentateuch a considerable amount of material remains, parallel to J, but in Genesis using

If you think over these events you will see that the chain of the narrators of today's Torah is broken, and not connected upto Mūsā (a.s.) — except through a single person, that is, Ezra. But first of all, we do not know who Ezra was; secondly, we do not know how much he knew of the Torah or how deep his knowledge was; thirdly, we do not know how honest and trustworthy he was; fourthly, we do not know from where he collected what he compiled as the books of the Torah; and lastly, we do not know with which authentic source he compared his collection to correct the mistakes which might have crept into the text.

This unfortunate episode has given rise to another disturbing theory. Some western scholars now deny the existence of Mūsā (a.s.) and the events related to him. They say that he is a mythical being who never existed. (The same theories have been advanced about 'Īsā son of Maryam. But we the Muslims cannot entertain such ideas, because the Qur'ān in very clear terms confirms his existence (peace be on him).

2. The Story of 'Īsa and the Gospel:

Elohim for God and not Yahweh. This non-P Elohim matter begins in Gen. 20:1 — 17 ... Altogether E is more mature religiously and is thought to have reached written from about 750 (B.C.).''

How were these four main sources compiled to form the Pentateuch?

''The first step was to combine J and E. This must have been done after the fall of Samaria in 721 B.C. The two were combined in a document which is called JE.

''Then in 621 Deuteronomy was discovered, or at least a large part of it. The next stage was to put JE, and D together. This will have taken place during the exile ... A perceptible amount of editing of JE took place.

''P was written in Babylonia and brought to Jerusalem by Ezra in 397 B.C. Later, editors used it as a framework and incorporated JED, thus producing the Pentateuch ... in about 300 B.C.''

Rev. Clarke sums it up in these words: ''Probably a multitude of persons have combined to give us Genesis (etc.), covering in their lives a span of 1000 years.''

Even that minority of the Christian scholars which still holds fast to the theory of ''Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch has to admit that it must have been rewritten by the subsequent generations to modernize the language. This concession has to be given because ''it is hardly probable that the Hebrew of Moses' day was like that of Biblical Hebrew.'' See the Westminister Dictionary of Bible, under ''Pentateuch''.

The Jews pay particular attention to their history. They have recorded main events through which they have passed. Nevertheless, if you hunt through their books and literature you will not come across any mention of ʻĪsā son of Maryam. Jewish literature throws no light on his birth or mission, nor does it say anything about his character of life story. It is silent about the miracles appearing on his hand; and does not say how his life on the earth was ended — did he die a natural death? Was he killed or crucified? Or, was there something else? Why this silence? Why had his affairs remained hidden from them? Or, why did they keep it hidden?

The Qur'ān mentions that the Jews had falsely accused Maryam and calumniated her regarding the birth of ʻĪsā, and that they claimed to have killed ʻĪsā. Allāh says: And for their unbelief and for their having uttered against Maryam a grievous calumny. And their saying: ''Surely we killed the Messiah, 'Īsā son of Maryam, the messenger of Allāh''; and they did not kill him nor did they crucify him, but it appeared to them so (like ʻĪsā); and most surely those who differ therein are only in a doubt about it; they killed him not for sure (4:156 — 157).

Was this claim of theirs based on some oral tradition which was never put to writing? Every nation does have such folklores — some facts, some myths — which should not be taken seriously unless they are based on correct, reliable sources.

Or, was it that they heard the Christians talking about the Messiah and his birth and mission; and taking the story from them they accused Maryam of indecency and claimed to having killed the Messiah? No definite answers can be found to these questions. As far as the Qur'ān is concerned, it clearly ascribes to them only the claim of killing, not of crucifying; then it says that they are in confusion and there is a difference of opinion among them about the whole matter.

As for the Christians, the story of the Messiah is based on their Scriptures, that is, the four Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John; as well as the Acts of the Apostles (by Luke) and several Epistles of Paul, Peter, Jacob, John and Jude. Authenticity of all depends on genuineness of the four Gospels; therefore let us have a look at them.

The Gospel of Matthew: It is the first and earliest of the Gospels so far as compilation and publication is concerned. Some say that it was written in 38 C.E.; others that it was compiled between 50 and 60 C. E.[1] In any case, it was written after the Messiah.

The ancient and modern Christian scholars are of the opinion that it was originally written in Hebrew; and then translated into Greek and other languages. But the original Hebrew version is lost; and as for the translation, its condition (correctness, etc.) cannot be verified, nor is it known who had translated it [2].

The Gospel of Marks: Marks was a disciple of St. Peter; he was not one of the twelve disciples of the Christ. It is often said that he wrote his Gospel on Peter's orders, and that he did not believe in divinity of the Christ [3]. Accordingly some people say that he had written his Gospel for the tribes and villagers, and that was why he introduced Christ as a messenger of Allāh who brought and conveyed the sharī'ah of Allāh[4]. He wrote this Book in 61 C.E.

The Gospel of Luke: Luke was neither one of the disciples nor had he seen Christ. He learnt Christianity from Paul. Paul was a Jew who hated the Christians and Christianity; he oppressed those who believed in Christ and used to hinder their activities and disturb their affairs. Then all of a sudden he came to them and claimed that he had been seized by an epileptic fit in course of which Christ appeared to him, and admonished him for his bad treatment of the Christians; according to his claim, he believed in Christ in the same trance and Christ in the same vision

[4] As described in the Dic. of Bib. It says: ''Although the early fathers unanimously say that St. Mark had written his Gospel in Rome and that it was published after the deaths of Sts. Peter and Paul, but this is not very credible, because it appears from his Gospel that he had written it for the tribes and villagers, not for the (civilized) people leaving in cities — and especially Rome.'' Ponder on this statement. (Author's Note) appointed him as his apostle to propagate the Christ's Gospel.

It was St. Paul who laid the foundation of Christianity, as it is today[1]. He taught that mere believing in the Christ was enough for salvation; there was no need of acting on it. Accordingly, he allowed them to eat pork and dead animals; and forbade circumcision and a lot of the sharī'ah of the Torah[2] . This was in spite of the fact that Injīl was revealed just as a verifier of the Torah, and had made lawful only a few things which were forbidden in Torah. 'Īsā (a.s.) had come to re-establish the sharī'ah of Torah, and to bring the deviators and transgressors back to it; he had not come to abrogate the sharī'ah or to base the eternal felicity on a belief devoid of action.

Luke wrote his Gospel after that of Marks, and it was after the deaths of Sts. Peter and Paul. Some people have firmly opined that the Gospel of Luke is not a revelation like other Gospels, as may be understood from his Prologue[3] .

[3] Luke begins his Gospel with these words:

''Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, Even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word. It seemed good to me also, having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first, to write unto thee in order, most excellent Theophilus.'' (Luke, 1:1 — 3)

It clearly shows that it is a book based on human understanding, not on revelation. This view has also been attributed to كدل Mr. Cadell [?] in the booklet, Revelation. St. Jerome has said that some early Fathers had doubts about the first two chapters of the Gospel of Luke, and that they were missing from the version of the Marcionites*. Eichhorn declares in his book (p.95) that verses 43 to 47 of the 2nd chapter of the Luke's Gospel are an interpolation. Also he says on p. 61 of his book: ''Fictitious narratives have been mixed up in description of miracles mentioned by Luke; and the writer has included them as poetic exaggeration. But it is difficult at this point of time to separate truth from falsehood.'' And an-Najjār quotes in Qaṣaṣu 'l-anbiyā' (p. 401) the saying of كلي مي شيس Mr. Clemesious [?] that: Matthew and Mark differ in their narration; and when they identify, their report would be given preference over that of Luke.(Author's Note)

The Gospel of John: Many Christians say that the John who wrote it was John son of Zebedee, the fisher, one of the twelve disciples, and the one whom the Christ loved[1].

They say that as Cerinthus[2] and Ebionites[3] and their followers thought that the Christ was nothing more than a created human being whose existence did not precede his mother's existence, the bishops of Asia and others visited John in 96 C.E. and urged him to write what others had not written in their Gospels so that he could particularly describe the divinity of the Christ. John had to comply with their request and wrote this Gospel[4].

There is a difference of opinion when it was written: Some say, in 65 C.E., some say, in 96 C.E., and others say, in 98 C.E.

Another group says that it was not written by John the disciple: Some say that it is the work of a student of Alexanderia[5]; others say that this

 Eichhorn, Johann Gottfried (1752 — 1827) was Biblical scholars and orientalist. He was among the first to make comparison between the Biblical Books and other Semitic languages; and one of the earliest critics who laid foundation of the High Criticism of the Bible. (tr.)

[2] Cerinthus, who flourished around 100 C.E., was a Gnostic ''heretic''. Among other things, he taught that Jesus began his earthly life as a mere man; at his baptism 'the Christ', a ''higher divine power'', descended on him, only to depart from him again before the crucifixion. He seems to have had connections both with the Ebionites and Alexandrine Gnosticism. (tr.)

[3] Ebionites, literally 'poor men', were a sect of Jewish Christians which flourished in the early centuries of the Christian era. Apparently, two of their principle tenets were: (i) belief in humanity of the Person of Christ, to the effect, for example, that Jesus was the human son of Joseph and Mary, and that the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove lighted on him at his baptism; and (ii) emphasis on the binding character of the Mosaic Law. Gospel as well as the Epistles of John were authored in the beginning of the 2nd Century by an unknown person who attributed them to John so that the writings might gain credence in people's eyes[1] ; yet others think that the Gospel of John originally contained twenty chapters and after his death the Church of Ephesus added the twenty-first[2] .

This is then the condition of the four Gospels. What is certain is that all these narrations depend on seven persons: Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Peter, Paul and Jude; and they rely on the four Gospels, which in their turn rely on the earliest one, that is, the Gospel of Matthew. And we have already seen that it is a translation whose original is lost; nobody knows who had translated it. What was the theme and teaching of the original? Did it teach messengership of Christ? Or, his divinity?[3]

(Author's Note)

[1] It is the view of Bretschneider, as an-Najjār has written in his Qaṣaṣu 'l-anbiyā', quoting from al-Fārūq.,vol. 1. (Author's Note)

[2] ibid. (Author's Note)

[3] Traditionally, the Gospel of Matthew is held to be the oldest of the four. But modern scholars commonly hold that it is Mark which is the oldest. There occurs a large amount of common subject matter in the three Synoptic Gospels (i.e., Matthew, Mark and Luke) and often similar phrasing in more than one Gospel. That this parrallelism, of varying degree of closeness, must be accounted for by their literary interdependence is nowadays almost universally held by scholars. There is also wide, but less complete, agreement (1) that Mark is the earliest of the three Gospels and was used as a framework by both Matthew and Luke; (2) that the non-Marcan material common to Matthew and Luke is derived from a single lost source known to critics as 'Q' (from German 'Quelle' = source); and (3) that the authors of Matthew and Luke used further sources for the matter peculiar to them. In view of the fact that Matthew drew extensively on Mark, which he expanded with the aid of 'Q', the early tradition that the Gospel was written in Hebrew is untenable. The chief objection to its ascription to St. Matthew is the unlikelihood that an Apostle, who was an eye-witness of the events, would have taken as his principal source of the work of St. Mark, whose material is in any case secondhand. It is not only the Gospel of Matthew whose author is unknown; the Gospel

The present Gospels show that there had appeared among the Children of Israel a man named ‘Īsā son of Yūsuf, the carpenter; he began calling towards Allāh; he claimed that he was a son of God, born without agency of a human father, and that his Father had sent him to atone for the sin of the people through being killed by crucifixion; that he gave life to the dead, healed the blind and the lepers, and restored the possessed to health by removing devil from them; that there were twelve disciples with him, one of them being Matthew the Evangelist; he blessed them and sent them to propagate his religion ...

This is the gist of the Christianity and its mission — in spite of its having been spread to every corner of the world. It all boils down to a report by one person whose name and particulars are unknown, whose identity and character is shrouded in abscurity.

This curious weakness just in the initial stage has compelled some independent minds of Europe to claim that Christ, ‘Īsā son of Maryam, is a mythical being, invented by some religious movements for or against the government of the time. This view has been strengthened by another mythical character which it resembles in every detail, and that is the character of Krishna: The idol-worshippers of India believe that Krishna was the son of God, who descended to earth from his divine abode, and atoned for the people by being crucified in order to deliver them from their sins and mistakes. It is the same belief which the Christians have about Christ ‘Īsā. (Details are given below.)

Other scholars have found it necessary to say that there were in fact two Christs, one uncrucified, the other crucified, who came more than five centuries after the former.

The Christians Era (which at the time of writing is 1956 C.E.) does not correspond with any of the above-mentioned two dates. The former (uncrucified) Christ had preceded it by more than two hundred and fifty years (and lived for sixty years), while the latter (crucified) Christ came more than two hundred and ninety years after the beginning of the said Era (and lived for about thirty-three years)[1].

of John suffers the same fate. Many scholars believe that its author was some disciple and follower of the Apostle John the son of Zebedee. ‘‘His name is either unknown to us, or more likely, was John the Presbyter, or Elder.’’ (tr.)

[1] This subject has been described in detail by the scholar Behrūz, in a book he recently wrote on the Prophetic foretellings. I hope to quote some parts of it

However, difference of the Christians Era with the actual birth-date of Christ is a fact which is not denied even by the Christians — and it is a historical disjunction[1] .

Moreover, there are some other matters which give rise to doubts and mistrust. They have written that during the first two centuries many more Gospels, including the four now used, were written — their number exceeded a hundred. Then the Church banned all of them except the four which were canonized because they corresponded with the views of the Church[2].

Among the discarded ones was the Gospel of Barnabas, a copy of which was found years ago, and which has been translated into Arabic and Persian. The story of Christ, ʻĪsā son of Maryam, as given in this at the end of the Commentary of Chapter Four ‘‘The Women’’. What is certain (and with which we are concerned here) is the incorrectness of the Christians Era. (Author's Note)

[2] Celsus, the 2nd Century's philosopher, admonished the Christians, in his book, Logos Alethes (True Word) for their manipulations of the Gospels — that they erase by tomorrow what they had written yesterday. [He wrote this book about 176 — 180 C.E. It was the first notable polemic against Christianity. The book itself has perished, but fragments of high interest occur as quotations in Origen's Contra Celsum.]* In 384, Pope Damasus ordered a new Latin translation of the Old and New Testaments to be prepared for the Church — the Emperor Theodosius had tired of the polemics and controversies raging among the bishops. That translation, called Vulgate, was completed; it covered only the four Gospels — Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. The editors wrote: ‘‘After comparing various old Greek copies, we edited them, that is, we discarded what was contradictory, and left the remaining parts as they were.’’ That version was confirmed by the Trent Council held in 1546, that is, some eleven centuries later. In 1590, Pope Sixtus V declared it to contain errors and mistakes, and ordered a new version to be published. Pope Clement VIII found fault with the second version too, and ordered in 1592 publication of a new revised version — which is used by the Catholic Church today. Gospel, generally corresponds with that given in the Qur'ān[1].

Strangely enough, even the non-Jewish historical records are silent about what the Gospels present as the Christ's mission — sonship, atonement and other related matters. The famous American historian, Hendrick Willem Van Loon has given in his book, Story of Mankind, a letter of a Roman physician, Aesculapius Cultellus, which he wrote in 62 A. D. to his nephew, Gladius Ensa, who was a soldier in Syria[2].

In that letter, he says:

A few days ago I was called in to prescribe for a sick man named Paul. He appeared to be a Roman citizen of Jewish parentage, well educated and of agreeable manners ...

A friend of mine ... tells me that he heard something about him in Ephesus where he was preaching sermons about a strange new god. I asked my patient if this were true ... Paul answered me that the kingdom of which he had spoken was not of this world and he added many strange utterances which I did not understand ...

His personality made a great impression upon me and I was sorry to hear that he was killed on the Ostian Road a few days ago. Therefore I am writing this letter to you. When next you visit Jerusalem, I want you to find out something about my friend Paul and the strange Jewish

[1] This Gospel in Italian had been discovered sometime ago. Dr. Khalīl Sa'ādah of Egypt translated it into Arabic, and the well-known scholar Sardār Kābūli, into Persian in Iran. (Author's Note)

The said manuscript was found in the Imperial Library, Vienna. Lonsdale and Laura Ragg edited the Italian text and translated it into English which was published by the Clarendon Press, Oxford, in 1907. It was from that version that the above-mentioned Arabic version was prepared. Strange as it may seem, now only two copies of the 1907 edition are known to exist, one in the British Library, London, and the other in the Library of Congress, Washington. Within the last two decades Begum Aisha Bawany Waqf, Karachi, has printed it several times and distributed it widely throughout the Muslim World.

Understandably, the Christians, including the translators (Lonsdale and Laura Ragg) themselves claim that the Vienna manuscript is spurious, not genuine. Their arguments deserve careful consideration. (tr.) prophet, who seems to have been his teacher.... I would like to know the truth about all these romours ...

Six weeks later, Gladius Ensa, the nephew, [a captain of the VII Gallic Infantry], answered as follows:

[I received your letter and I have obeyed your order. Two weeks ago our brigade was sent to Jarusalem ...]

I have talked with most of the older men in this city but few have been able to give me any definite information.[1]

A few days ago a peddler came to the camp. I bought some of his olive and I asked him whether he had ever heard of the famous Messiah who was killed when he was young. He said that he remembered it very clearly.... He gave me the address of one Joseph, who had been a personal friend of the Messiah and told me that I had better go and see him if I wanted to know more.

This morning I went to call on Joseph. He was quite an old man. He had been a fisherman on one of the freshwater lakes. His memory was clear, and from him at last I got a fairly difinite account of what had happened during the troublesome days before I was born.

Tiberius, our great and glorious emperor, was on the throne, and an officer of the name of Pontius Pilatus was governor of Judaea and Samaria ... In the year 783 or 784 (Joseph had forgotten when) Pilatus was called to Jerusalem on account of a riot. A certain young man (the son of a carpenter of Nazareth) was said to be planning a revolution against the Roman government. Strangely enough our own intelligence officers, who are usually well informed, appear to have heard nothing about it, and when they investigated the matter they reported that the carpenter was an excellent citizen and that there was no reason to proceed against him. But the old-fashioned leaders of the Jewish faith, according to Joseph, were much upset. They greatly disliked his popularity with the masses of the poorer Hebrews. The ‘‘Nazarene’’ (so they told Pilatus) had publicly claimed that a Greek or a Roman or even a Palestinian, who tried to live a decent and honourable life, was quite as good as a Jew who spent his days in studying the ancient laws of Moses. Pilatus does not seem to have been impressed by this argument, but when the crowds around the temple threatened to lynch Jesus, and kill all his followers, he decided to take the carpenter into custody to save his life.

[1] This, when it was 62 C.E., and they were older men! Strange, isn’t it? (Author’s Comment)

He does not appear to have understood the real nature of the quarrel. Whenever he asked the Jewish priests to explain their grievances, they shouted ‘‘heresy’’ and ‘‘treason’’ and got terribly excited. Finally, so Joseph told me, Pilatus sent for Joshua (that was the name of the Nazarene, but the Greeks who live in this part of the world always refer to him as Jesus) to examine him personally. He talked to him for several hours. He asked him about the ‘‘dangerous doctrines’’ which he was said to have preached on the shores of the sea of Galilee. But Jesus answered that he never referred to politics. He was not so much interested in the bodies of men as in Man’s soul. He wanted all people to regard their neighbours as their brothers and to love one single God, who was the father of all living beings.

Pilatus, who seems to have been well versed in the doctrines of the Stoics and the other Greek philosophers, does not appear to have discovered anything seditious in the talk of Jesus. According to my informant he made another attempt to save the life of the kindly prophet. He kept putting the execution off. Meanwhile the Jewish people, lashed into fury by their priests, got frantic with rage. There had been many riots in Jerusalem before this and there were only a few Roman soldiers within calling distance. Reports were being sent to the Roman authorities in Caesarea that Pilatus had ‘‘fallen a victim to the teachings of the Nazarene’’. Petitions were being circulated all through the city to have Pilatus recalled, because he was an enemy of the Emperor. You know that our governors have strict instructions to avoid an open break with their foreign subjects. To save the country from civil war, Pilatus finally sacrificed his prisoner, Joshua, who behaved with great dignity and who forgave all those who hated him. He was crucified amidst the howls and the laughter of the Jerusalem mob.

That is what Joseph told me, with tears running down his old cheeks. I gave him a gold piece when I left him, but he refused it and asked me to hand it to one poorer than himself. I also asked him about your friend Paul. He had known him slightly. He seems to have been a tent maker, who gave up his profession that he might preach the words of a loving and forgiving God, Who was so very different from that Jehovah of whom the Jewish priests are telling us all the time. Afterwards, Paul appears to have travelled much in Asia Minor and in Greece, telling the slaves that they were children of one loving Father and that happiness awaits all, both rich and poor, who have tried to live honest lives and have done good to those who were suffering and miserable ... [1]

This is the main theme of this letter as far as the subject of our present discussion is concerned.

On pondering on this letter one may easily understand which direction Christianity had taken — among the Israelites — soon after ʻĪsā (a.s.). Clearly it was a prophetic mission of a messenger sent by Allāh — not a claim of divinity calling people to believe that God had taken a human form and descended to the earth to deliver mankind by offering an atonement for their sins.

Then some disciples of ʻĪsā and/or those claiming connection with him, like Paul, and the disciples of disciples journeyed — after the said crucifixion — to various regions of the world, like India, Africa, Rome, etc., and spread the message of Christianity. But soon after that, in the wake of those missionary activities, they differed among themselves about the basic teachings of the new religion. Was Christ a God? Was belief in Christ enough for salvation without any need of following the Mosaic Law? Was the religion of the Gospel an independent one which had abrogated the Mosaic Law? Or, was it a part of the Mosaic religion sent merely to perfect it? In this way they divided into various sects and groups.[2]

We should keep in mind the fact that all the nations where Christianity was propagated in the beginning — like Rome and India, etc. — were at that time idol-worshippers, the Sabaeans, the Hindus or the Buddhists, etc. Also there was some mystic influence on one side and the hold of Brahmanic philosophy on the other. All these systems and religions believed to a great extent in incarnation and appearance of gods and deities in human form. Also the beliefs of trinity in unity, coming down of a deity in human body, and its suffering and being crucified [3] to atone sins of mankind was very much prevalent among ancient idol-worshippers of India, China, Egypt, Chaledonia, Assyria and Iran. The same was the situation among ancient western idolators like Romans, Scandinavians and others — as may be seen in the books written about ancient religions and beliefs.

[3] Killing by crucifixion is one of the oldest methods. They used to crucify the hardest criminals who had committed very heinous crimes, because crucifixion

Doane writes in his Bible Myths and their Parallels in other Religions:

‘‘If we return to India we shall find that one of the most prominent features in the Indian theology is the doctrine of a divine triad, governing all things. This triad is called Tri-murti — from the Sanscrit (sic.) word tri (three) and murti (form) — and consists of Brahma, Vishnu and Siva. It is an inseparable unity, though three in form.’’ [1]

Then he goes on to explain that Brahma is the Father; Vishnu, the Son; and Siva, the Holy Spirit.[2]

Then he writes [in the footnote] about Vishnu, the Son that he is ‘‘the Lord and Saviour Chrishna[3]. The Supreme Spirit, in order to preserve the world, produced Vishnu. Vishnu came upon earth, for this purpose, in the

was the most torturous way of killing and left the blackest stigma on the name of the one so executed. The cross was made by joining two wooden logs which formed angles with each other [like T, t or X] as we see the crosses nowadays; it was done in a way that a man could be placed on it. The criminal was attached to it with outstretched hands and arms; his palms were fixed on the horizontal piece with nails, and the legs nailed to the upright post — sometimes they were tied to it and not nailed. Then the cross was erected vertically in the earth, leaving a space of about a yard between the earth and the victim’s feet. He was left on the cross for a day or more; then his legs were broken and he was killed on the cross, or was brought down from the cross and then killed. The victim, before being put on cross, was tortured, whipped or mutilated. It was an indeliable disgrace for a family or clan if one of them was crucified. (Author’s Note)

He writes that like the Christians, the Hindus too use the dove for the emblem of the third person of their trinity.[2]

[Doane further writes:]

''Mr. Faber, in his Origin of Heathen Idolatry, says: 'Among the Hindoos, we have the Triad of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; so, among the votaries of Buddha, we find the self-triplicated Buddha declared to be the same as the Hindoo Trimurti. Among the Buddhist sect of the Jainists (sic.), we have the triple jiva, in whom the Trimurti is similarly declared to be incarnated.' '' [3]

[Doane further quotes from the same book of Mr. Faber:]

''Among the Chinese, who worship Buddha under the name of Fo, we find this God mysteriously multiplied into three persons ... '' [4]

Doane now turns to Egypt:

''The priests of Memphis, in Egypt, explained this mystery to the novice, by intimating that the premier (first) monad created the dyad, who engendered the triad, and that it is this triad which shines through nature.

''Thulis, a great monarch, who at one time reigned over all Egypt, and who was in the habit of consulting the oracle of Serapis, is said to have addressed the oracle in these words:

'' 'Tell me if ever there was before one greater than I, or will ever be one greater than me?'

''The oracle answered thus:

'' 'First God, afterward the Word, and with them the Holy Spirit, all these are of the same nature, and make but one whole, of which the power is eternal. Go away quickly, mortal, thou who hast but an uncertain life.' '' [5]

‘‘Some persons are prepared to admit that the most astonishing development of the old religion of Egypt was in relation to the Logos or Divine Word, by whom all things were made, and who, though from God, was God.’’[1]

It should be noted that these are the very words with which the Gospel of St. John begins.[2]

Doane quotes from Higgins Anacalypsis that: ‘‘Mithras, the Mediator, and Saviour of the Persians, was called the Logos.’’ [3]

Doane has proved that the ancient pagans used to believe in one god with three persons. He has extensively shown that the pagan belief of trinity in unity was prevalent among the Greeks, Romans, Finns, Scandinavians, Chaldeans, Assyrians and Phoenicians.[4]

[On the question of atonement], he writes:

‘‘The idea of expiation by the sacrifice of a god was to be found among the Hindoos even in Vedic times.’’[5]

Then giving the references, he, inter alia, writes.

‘‘Crishna, the virgin-born, ‘‘the Divine Vishnu himself’[6], ‘he who is without beginning, middle or end’[7], being moved ‘to relieve the earth of her load’[8], came upon earth and redeemed man by his suffering — to save

What the Buddhists narrate about Buddha fits even more perfectly on what the Christians believe about Jesus Christ. The Buddhists call Buddha, the Messiah, the Only Begotten, the Saviour of the World, the God who sacrificed his life to wash away the offences of mankind, and thereby to make them partakers of the Kingdom of Heaven[3].

This subject has been explained by many orientalists, like Bell[4] , Huc, Muller[5] , and others[6] .

This was a sample of the belief of deities taking human form, and of crucifixion and atonement as it was found in ancient religions prevalent in the nations among which Christianity was propagated in the very beginning. The new religion very much attracted the people in all these places where the Christian missionaries went. And the reason was clear: The Christian Fathers took the fundamentals of Christianity and remoulded them in the moulds of idolatry, and in this way got the people attracted to their call and made it easier to them to accept their teachings.

This view is strengthened when we see how Paul and others disparage the wisdom and philosophy of the philosophers, and how they look down with disdain at rational argument, declaring that the Lord God prefers the foolishness of the fools to the wisdom of the wise.

The fact is that they presented their teaching to the schools of logic and philosophy, and the intellectuals rejected it saying that there was no way of even understanding it — let alone accepting it. To overcome this difficulty, they started talking of revelation, apocalypse and vision; and claimed that they were filled of the Holy Ghost. In this, they followed the life of the ignorant mystics who claim that their way is beyond the reach of reason and intellect. Thereafter, their missionaries went to various cities and regions (as described in the Acts of Apostles and the history books) and propagated the Christianity. Wherever they went, the masses welcomed them. The main reason of their success — and especially within the Roman Empire — was the simmering discontent and disgruntling despair which had spread everywhere because of the never-ending oppression and injustice; the ruling class treated the masses as their slaves and serfs; there was a yawning gap between the lives of the rulers and the ruled, an unbridgeable chasm between the high and the low classes; the extravagant life-style of the rich was sustained by the sweat and blood of the poor and slaves. In this social structure, the Christian missionaries called the people to brotherhood, love, equality and good neighbourliness; they exhorted them to discard this world and its transient painful life and to concentrate on the pure and happy life that was in heaven. It was this theme which the ruling classes — the kings and emperors — found advantageous to themselves, and they thought that it was in their interest to turn a blind eye to the missionaries' activities; as a general rule, this tacit understanding saved the new group from punishment, torture and banishment.

Their number kept increasing, and so did their power. A great multitude embraced Christianity within and outside the Roman Empire; it reached upto Africa and even India. Invariably opening of a church heralded the closure or destruction of a temple. With number and power, their attitude changed. Not only that they disregarded the resistance of the pagan leaders (as they went on undermining idol-worship), they even refused obeisance to the rulers and emperors. Their refusal to obey imperial decrees in this respect resulted in their punishment, imprisonment and even murder. Many were tortured and killed; others imprisoned or banished.

This continued until the Emperor Constantine came on throne. He accepted Christianity and recognized it as the State religion. Churches were built in Rome and throughout the empire. It was in the second half of the fourth century of Christian Era. [1]

From then on the Church of Rome became the centre of Christianity. Bishops and missionaries were sent to all regions and countries within the Roman Empire. Countless churches, monastries and seminaries (to teach Christianity) were built.

There is an important point which the reader should ponder on: All their talks and discussions begin on some evangelical postulates, like the theme of Father, Son and Holy Ghost, the scheme of crucifixion and atonement, and similar other principles. They base their talks on these ideas as though they were self-evident truths — and then go on building their edifice on them. They do not realize that it is their first and basic weakness. No matter how strong and lofty a structure may be, it cannot make up for the weakness of the foundation. And the foundation on which they have built their edifice — the three-in-one theology and the crucifixion and atonement — is simply incomprehensible.

Many Christian scholars agree that it is an idea that cannot be understood. Still they say that it is a religious tenet, therefore, it must be believed without asking for reason — after all, there are many things in religion which the reason says are impossible.

But it is one of the invalid ideas which spring from that invalid base. How can there be an impossible principle in the religion of truth? As far as we are concerned, it is through reason and understanding that we accept a religion and discern its truth and validity. How can a true belief contain something which reason invalidates? Is it not a contradiction in term?

Of course, religion accepts validity of miracles — the things which are possible in reason but impracticable; but an idea impossible in reason

[1] It happened in the first (not the second) half of the fourth century. Constantine I (the Great) established Christianity as State religion in 324; Nicaean Council was held in 325; his new capital at Byzantium was inaugurated in 330 (hence Byzantine Empire) which was renamed Constantinople (City of Constantine); he died in 337. (tr.) can never happen.

However, the above-mentioned way of ''argument'' led their thinkers and scholars into conflicts, discords and disagreements in the very early days when the students gathered to learn Christianity at Alexanderia, Rome and other places.

The church increased its watchdog role to preserve the unity of creed. Whenever a differing view was expressed or new idea raised its head, the church called a council of the bishops and presbyters to convince the party concerned to leave their ideas and beliefs; and if they persisted they were anathematized, banished or even killed.

The first such council was held in Nicea, to counter the views of Arius[1], who said that the Son was not like the Father, that only God was eternal while Christ was a created being.

The bishops, and presbyters assembled at Constantinople, in presence of the Emperor Constantine; they were three hundred and thirteen in number. They adopted the following creed:

We believe in one God, the Father, almighty, maker of heaven and earth, of all things visible and invisible;

And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, begotten from the Father before all ages, light from light, true God from true God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father, through whom all things came into existence, who because of us men and because of our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnated from the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary and became man, and was crucified for us under Pontius Pilate, and suffered and was buried and rose again on the third day according to the Scriptures and ascended to heaven, and sits on the right hand of the Father and will come again with glory to judge

[1] Arius was Presbyter of Bancalis. A follower of Origen, he believed that Christ was a created being, not of the substance of God but created from ''nothing''; he had a beginning and was thus not eternal. Although he was defeated at the Nicene Council (held in 325), subsequent Councils held at Arles, Milan and Sirmium (held in 353, 355 and 357, respectively) upheld his views. But it was again defeated in the Contantinople Council held in 381. Christian scholars say that Arians' 'temporary triumph' ''had been made possible by imperial interference.'' But so was the case with the ''original Nicene success'' and its later victories. (See Williston Walker, A History of Christian Church, Edinburgh, 1970, pp. 107 — 117.) (tr.)

living and dead, of whose Kingdom there will be no end;

And in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Life-giver, Who proceeds from the Father, Who with the Father and the Son is together worshipped and together glorified, Who spoke through the prophets; in one holy Catholic and apostolic church. We confess one baptism to the remission of sins; we look forward to the resurrection of the dead[1], and the life of the world to come [2]. Amen !

That was the first Council; after that numerous Councils were held to anathematize newly appearing schisms, like the Nestorians, Jacobites, الاليانية Ilyanites [?], اليليارسية Yalyarsites[3] [?], Macedonians [1], Noetus [2] , [1] people have commented on the last sentence that it affirms physical resurrection, while the Christians believe in spiritual resurrection only as the Gospel shows.

But I think that the Gospel only indicates the absence of physical worldly enjoyments in the next world; it does not say that man will be resurrected in spirit only without his body. It rather says that man in the resurrection will become like angels, and there will be no sexual enjoyment among them. On the other hand, the Bible shows that even God and angels have bodies, let alone the man after resurrection. (Author's Note)

[2] The author has taken these details from ash-Shahristānī's al-Milal wa 'n-niḥal. ash-Shahristānī is confused when he says that the ''first Council held at Nicea'' assembled ''at Constantinople''. The Nicene Council had assembled in 325 at Nicea, and another Council was held at Constantinople in 381 C. E. The actual Nicene Creed is now only a matter of surmise. Probably it ended with the sentence, 'And in the Holy Spirit'. However, the Constantinople Council reconfirmed and enlarged it. That is why scholars refer to it as, ''the so-called Nicene Creed'', and sometimes with its technically correct name, the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed. But in spite of all that, its first appearance was at the Council of Chalcedon (451 C.E.); it was signed on 25/10/451, in presence of the Emperor Marcian. (See J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, Longman, London, 3rd ed., 1972, pp. 296 — 297; and The Oxford Dictionary of Christian Church, 2nd ed., O.U.P., 1977).

In ash-Shahristānī's book, the number of participants of the first Council is given as 318 and not 313. (tr.)

[3] The author has taken these names from ash-Shahristani. I could not find the names, الاليانية and اليليارسية in the books 1 referred to ash-Shahristānī, however, it gives the following details:

a). Ilyanites: A sub-sect of the Jacobites, found in Syria, Yemen, and Armenia. They believed that 'Īsā was not a body in reality; all the sufferings, killing and crucifixion happened only on an illusion (or illusory being).

b). Yalyarsites: They believed that people, on arriving at the heaven, would enjoy eating, drinking and sexual relations for a thousand years; thereafter, they would proceed to the bounties promised by Arius. (tr.)

[1] Macedonians: Named after Macedonius (died c. 362), Bishop of Constantinople. He strongly supported the semi-Arian cause in Council of Seleucia (359). From end of the fourth century, he is regarded as the founder of Pneumatomachi who are called Macedonians after him. They denied the full God-head of the Holy Ghost. See The Oxford Dictionary of Christian Church; also W. Walker, A History of the Christian Church, p. 118. (tr.)

[2] Noetus: In Arabic text this name is mentioned in the last. I have put it before the Sabellians, etc., as it would facilitate understanding. Noetus, probably of Smyrna, taught in his native region in 180 to 200 ‘‘that Christ was the Father Himself, and the Father Himself was born and suffered and died’’. His views were called Modalistic Monarchianism. (W. Walker, A History of the Christian Church, p.69). Another name for that belief was Patripassion doctrine; Noetus also rejected Logo doctrine. (The Oxford Dictionary of Christian Church). (tr.)

[3] Sabellians: Sabellianism is an alternative title for the Modalistic Monarchianism. Named after Sabbellus, who was teaching in Rome cir. 215. His theology was essentially that of Noetus, but much more carefully wrought out, especially in that it gave a definite place to the Holy Spirit, as well as to the Son. Father, Son and Holy Spirit are all one and the same. They are three names of one God, Who manifests Himself in different ways according to circumstances. (W. Walker, A History of the Christian Church, p. 69). (tr.)

[4] Paulianists: Followers of Paul of Samosata; he became Bishop of Antioch cir. 260. He taught a form of Dynamic Monarchianism in which God-head was a closely knit trinity of Father, Wisdom and Word, and until creation formed a single hypostasis. He was a precursor of Nestorius, holding that from Incarnation the Word rested upon the human Jesus as one person upon another, and that the Incarnated Christ differed only in degree from the prophets. (The Oxford Dictionary of Christian Church). (tr.)

[5] Paulicians: A sect of the Byzantine Empire. Their name may have been derived from St. Paul, or more probably from Paul of Samosata. Endlessly persecuted, many of them assisted the Muslims in their wars against the empire and adopted Islam. Apparently they ceased to exist as an independent sect in the

The church was ever vigilant in guarding what in its eyes was the true faith. The missionary work continued in full force, until by the end of fifth century all European governments (except Russia) were parts of Christendom: France, England, Austria, Prussia, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, etc., were all converted to Christianity by 496 C.E.

The Church continued to progress becoming stronger day by day. On the other hand, the Barbarians of the North were attacking the Roman Empire every now and then. The wars and internal strifes and unrest weakened the Empire — until a time came when the people of Rome together with the victorious tribes decided to hand over the affairs of the State to the Church. Now the Pope of the time, Gregory the Great [1], had in his hand the reins of the temporal as well as the spiritual powers. It was in 590 C.E.

Consequently, the Church of Rome acquired absolute power over the Christians world. But by that time the Roman Empire had divided in two parts: the Western Roman Empire with its capital at Rome and the Eastern Roman (i.e. Byzantine) Empire with its capital at Constantinople. The Byzantine Emperors claimed for themselves the headship of Church within their domain, without accepting the authority of the Church of Rome. This led to the division of Christianity between the Catholics — the followers of the Church of Rome and the Orthodox, i.e., others.

The things continued in this manner, until the Ottoman Turks conquered Constantinople, and Palaeologus, the last Byzantine Emperor and Head of the Eastern (i.e. Orthoxod) Church, was killed in the Cathedral, Hagia Sophia[2] .

The Tzars of Russia now claimed the headship of the Church — as a legacy of the Byzantine Emperors to whom they were related by marriage. (Russia had been Christian since the tenth century.) The Russian Emperors thus became he Heads of the (Orthodox) Church in their land, independent of the (Catholic) Church of Rome. It was in 1454 twelfth century. (ibid.) (tr.)

[1] Gregory I (590 — 604) established the temporal power of the Papacy in that period of unrest in Itlay. However, it was Pope Innocent III who during his Papacy (1198 — 1216) made several European Kings and Emperors to pay homage to him, accepting him as their overlord. (tr.)

[2] Constantine XIII palaeologus (1394 — 1453) was killed on 29th May, 1453. (tr.)

C. E.

The things continued in this way for about five centuries, until the last Tzar, Nicholas, was killed, with all his family, in 1918, by the Communists. Thus the Church of Rome almost returned to the condition that prevailed before the division.

Meanwhile, during the Middle Ages when the Vatican had reached the highest point of its glory and the Popes controlled every aspect of the people's lives, a lot of good Christians revolted against the Vatican in order to free themselves from the shackles which the Church had put on them.

One group refused to follow the Church of Rome or to obey the Popes, but they continued to accept the religion as interpreted by the Councils and agreed upon by their scholars. They are called the [Greek] Orthodox. Another group discarded the Roman Church altogether; they neither accept the said Church's interpretation of religion nor do they recognized the Pope's authority in any religious matter. They are the Protestants.

In this way, the Christians world is mainly divided into three sects: the Catholics who follow the Vatican and its teachings; the Orthodox, who accept the Catholic teachings but do not recognize the authority of the Vatican. As described above, this group resulted from the division of the Church [on the line of the Western and Eastern empires] and especially after the transfer of the Patriarchate from Constantinople to Moscow; and the Protestants, who recognize neither the authority of Vatican nor its teachings — they became independent in the fifteenth century of the Christian Era.

This is, in a nut-shell, the history of the Christian Church of the last two millenniums. Those who know the main theme of our book, will understand why we have written here this short account of their history. Our aim was three-fold:

First: To provide to a research scholar an insight into various changes taking place in the religion of the Christians; and to make them aware as to how alien ideas have been implanted in their beliefs and rituals; how pagan superstitions and idolatrous thoughts have crept into Christianity — by hereditary influences, or social give and take, or wilful adoption, or just because old habits die-hard.

Second: The power of the Church — and especially the Church of Rome — gradually increased until it reached its zenith in the Middle Ages; the Popes had taken both temporal and spiritual powers in their hands, and the kings and emperors in Europe had to submit to the Papal decrees, and pay homage to the Popes. The Popes put on throne whomsoever they wished and removed whoever they wished [1].

It is narrated that the Pope once ordered the German emperor to stand barefoot on the door of the Papal Palace for three days (in the winter) — for expiation of some mistakes which he beseeched the Pope to forgive[2].

On another occasion, the Pope kicked with his foot the crown of a king who had approached him kneeling down to seek Papal pardon[3].

Those church leaders had described the Muslims to their followers in a way that the Christians were bound to regard Islam as a religion of idol-worshippers. You will see it in the slogans and poems which were written to incite and arouse the Christians against the Muslims during the Crusades which raged between the two powers for long years.

The Christians were led to believe[4] that the Muslims worshipped idols; that they believed in three gods: (1) Māhom (who is also called افوميد Afomed [?] and Mahounde), he is the first among gods and he is Muḥammad; (2) Apoline who is the second; and (3) Tervagān who is the third. Others added two more to this list: مارتوان to Māratwān [?] and Jupiter; but their rank was below the first three. They said that Muḥammad's religion was based on his claim of divinity — that he claimed to be god. Sometimes the ''information'' was added that Muḥammad had taken for himself an idol made of gold.

Richard composed poems to incite the Franks against the Muslims, in which he, inter alia, says: ''Arise and dislodge Mahound and Tervagan and throw them into fire, so that you may get near your God.''

Roland described Mahom, the ''god of Muslims'', in a poem, in which he says: ''It is made of gold and silver; if you see it, you will know that no artisan can even imagine a more beautiful face, let alone make it; big in size, admirable in workmanship, majesty radiating from its features, Māhom is made of gold and silver, its brilliant splendour dazzles the eyes to blindness; it has been placed on an elephant which is the finest work of art; its stomach is hollow, and an onlooker may find lustrous light glowing from it (because) it is set with precious brilliant gems, (it is transparent, and) its inside may be seen from outside; its fine workmanship is matchless.

‘‘The gods of Muslims used to inspire them at times of trouble and turmoil. The Muslims were once defeated in a battle; so their commander sent someone to call their god who was in Mecca (i.e., Muḥammad, s.a.w.a.). An ‘eye-witness’ says that the god (i.e., Muḥammad, s.a.w.a.) came to them; a huge mob of his followers surrounded him; they were beating drums, playing lutes and blowing pipes and bagpipes made of silver; singing and dancing around him they brought him to the battleground, they were full of joy and happiness, making merry. His deputy was waiting for him; when he arrived (the deputy) stood up and began worshipping him with humbleness and humility.’’

Richard explains the revelation sent by the god, Māhom, in this manner: ‘‘The sorcerers captured a genie and put it in the stomach of that idol. That genie used to thunder and hammer inside and then speak to the Muslims, who listened to him with rapt attention.’’

Such droll flippancies are found in a lot of their books written during, or about, the Crusades. Our readers will, no doubt, be astounded and scandalized to read such accounts of their pure religion — may be some would even doubt the authenticity of these quotations. After all, they have ascribed such things to Islam that no one has ever seen in his life, nor has any Muslim imagined them or even dreamt of them[1].

Third: A deep thinker may easily recognize the changes that have occurred in the Christianity during the past twenty centuries. The idolatrous beliefs crept imperceptibly into Christianity: first it was excessive reverence for Christ; then his message was cast into the mould of trinity (Father, Son and Holy Spirit), which was further developed in the theory of crucifixion and atonement, which in its turn gave rise to the belief that law and its obedience was not needed at all, the faith was sufficient for salvation.

At first it appeared in religious garb; the Church insisted on some religious rites like prayer, fast and baptism. But opposite trends continued to grow and various ideas raised their heads, until the Protestantism appeared on the scene; the political turmoil and unrest gave way to formal secular laws based on the principle of freedom in the matters which were not covered by those laws. In this way, the teachings of religion became weaker and weaker, and continued to give ground to anti-religion forces, until moral values and virtuous conduct could not stand the onslaught of materialism which ‘‘the unrestricted freedom’’ had let loose on humanity.

Then appeared socialism and communism, based on Dialectic Materialism; belief in God and adherence to moral virtues and religious rites and deeds were discarded. Spiritual humanism was succeeded by materialistic animality composed of only two instincts: greed to gain for oneself whatever one desires and impulse to crush down whoever comes in one’s way. Today the world is speeding to that animalistic goal, to its doom.

Various new religious revival movements that have lately appeared everywhere are but political games invented and played by political groups, who want to attain their goals through them. We know that politics, as a profession, now knocks at every door and uses every conceiveable device to realize its aims.

According to Dr. Joseph Sittler, of Chicago Lutheran Theological Seminary, the underlying weakness of the current U. S. religious revival is that it seeks to give divine sanction to the cultural values modern man lives by. ‘We make God say amen to what we believe, instead of saying amen to God.’ The greatest danger, he feels, is that this pious self-flattery may immunize Americans against any desire to join in a genuine relgious revival if one should arise[1].

According to Dr. Georges Florovsky, the ‘foremost U. S. spokesman for Russian Orthodoxy’, Christian teaching, which reaches most Americans through sentimental literature, consoles them instead of awakening them through deeply felt or 'witnessed' experience[1].

Whence the caravan of religion started from, and where has it arrived? The message began in the name of revival of religion (i.e., belief), morality (i.e., virtuous character) and the sharī'ah (good deeds); and ended up by repudiating and abolishing all of it, replacing it with animalistic enjoyment.

This has happened because of the first deviation affected by St. Paul the Apostle and his disciples. We are living in a civilization that admittedly threatens mankind with extinction. Some people say that Christ is the leader and standard-bearer of the modern civilization. But it would be nearer to truth to call it the Paulian civilization.

TRADITIONS

al-Qummī narrates about the verse: It is not meet for a man that Allāh should give him the Book and the Wisdom and Prophethood, then he should say to men, ''Be my servants rather than Allāh's''. ''Surely 'Īsā did not say to men: 'I have created you, therefore you should be my servants rather than Allāh's', rather he said to them: 'Be worshippers of the Lord', that is, having true knowledge.'' (at-Tafsīr)

The author says: The context and associations given in the Commentary support this explanation. ''Surely 'Īsā did not say to men: 'I have created you.' '' It is a sort of a proof to show that he had not said it. Had he told them to worship him, it would have been necessary to tell them that he was their creator; but he had not said it, nor had he created them.

The same exegete narrates about the verse: Or that he should enjoin you that you should take the angels and the prophets for lords. ''There were people who worshipped the angels; the Christians thought 'Īsā was the Lord; and the Jews said that 'Uzayr was the Son of God. Allāh therefore said that no prophet would enjoin you that you should take the angels and the prophets for Lords.'' (ibid.)

[1] ibid. (tr.)

The author says: It has been explained in the Commentary.

It is narrated in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr from Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Jarīr, Ibn Abī Ḥātim and al-Bayhaqī (in his Dalā'ilu 'n-Nubuwwah) from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘When the Jewish scholars and Christians of Najrān gathered near the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and he invited them to Islam, Abū Rāfi‘ al-Quraẓī said: ‘Do you wish, O Muḥammad, that we should worship you as the Christians worship ‘Īsā son of Maryam?’ Thereupon a Christian of Najrān said: ‘Well, do you want this from us, O Muḥammad?’ The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ‘I seek refuge in Allāh that we should worship other than Allāh, or that we should enjoin worship of someone else; He has neither sent me with it nor has He enjoined me this.’
Therefore, Allāh, revealed the verses (because of their question): It is not meet for a man ... after you are Muslims (submitting ones)?’’ (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

It is reported in the same book: ‘‘ ‘Abd ibn Hamid has narrated from al-Ḥasan that he said: ‘I have been told that a man said: ‘‘O Messenger of Allāh! We greet you (exatly) as we greet each other. Should not we prostrate before you?’’ He said: ‘‘No. But you should honour your Prophet, and recognize the right of the ones having that right; because prostration should not be done for anyone other than Allāh.’’ Then Allāh revealed the verses: It is not meet for a man ... after you are Muslims (submitting ones)?’ ’’ (ibid.)

The author says: Also other events have been narrated concerning revelation of these verses. Obviously, all of them are based on academic inferences: and we have discussed in detail about them. Also, it is possible for various reasons to combine in relation to one verse. And Allāh knows better.

COMMENTARY

The verses are not disjointed from the preceding ones; they have been revealed in the same context. Earlier, Allāh had described that the People of the Book transgressed the limits by indulging in alteration of the Books they were given, creating doubts and confusion among the people, making differences between the prophets, and rejecting the signs of the truth of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); then He showed how impossible it was for a prophet like Mūsā or 'Īsā (peace be on them both) to tell the people to take him or some other prophets or the angels as their lords — as the Christians openly claimed and the Jews implied.

Now He puts more emphasis on the impossibility of such an idea. How can any prophet give such an order to his people, when Allāh has made covenant with the prophets that they must believe in and help every prophet no matter whether he preceded them or came after them? They were to fulfil that promise by confirming the truth of the preceding prophets and giving good news of those who were to come after them — as 'Īsā (a.s.) verified the prophethood of Mūsā (a.s.) and his laws, and foretold the advent of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.). Likewise, Allāh made a covenant with them that they should make a similar covenant with their people, and made them witnesses over them; and then declared that it was the Islam — submission — which dominates all those who are in the heavens and in the earth.

Then Allāh enjoins His Prophet (s.a.w.a.) to adhere to that covenant:

he is to believe in Allāh and all that was sent to His prophets — without making any distinction between them, and to surrender to Allāh. He was to enter into the covenant on his own behalf, and also on behalf of his ummah. That is why it is said that the covenant was made with him directly, and with his ummah through him, as we shall explain later.

QUR'ĀN: And when Allāh made a covenant with the prophets: ''Certainly what I have given you of Book and Wisdom — then a Messenger comes to you verifying that which is with you, you must believe in him, and you must aid him'': The verse speaks of a covenant that was made. ''Mīthāqa'n-nabīyyīn'' (مِيْثَاقَ النَّبِيِّنَ = translated here as ''covenant with the prophets''), literally means 'covenant of the prophets'. This covenant was taken for the prophets (as the clause, ''then a Messenger comes to you ... you must aid him'', points to), as well as ''with the prophets'' (as the clauses, He said: ''Do you affirm ... '', and, Say: ''We believe in Allāh ... '', show). The covenant was therefore made for the prophets and with the prophets — although it was made with the prophets' people too, through the prophets.

The phrase, ''covenant of the prophets'', may therefore refer to the covenant made ''with'' them and to that ''for'' them, while in fact it is the same covenant looked at from different angles. In other words, ''the prophets'', may refer to those prophets ''for'' whom the covenant was made, and`also to those ''with'' whom it was made. However, the import of the preceding two verses (It is not meet for a man ... after you are Muslims) which were revealed in the same context, gives rather more weight to the idea that, ''the prophets'', refers to those ''with'' whom the covenant was made. Looking in this context the verses have the following connotation: 'It was not possible for the prophets, after Allāh gives them the Book, the Wisdom and Prophethood, to call the people to take someone other than Allāh as their lord or to worship him. How can it be possible while Allāh has made covenant with them to believe in, and help, other prophets of Allāh — who enjoin their peoples to believe in one God.' It is for this reason that this verse begins with mention of the covenant — focusing our attention to it.

''lamā ātaytukum min kitābin wa ḥikmah'' (لَمَا اٰتَيْتُكُمْ مِنْ كِتَابٍ وَ حِكْمَةٍ = Certainly what I have given you of Book and Wisdom): 'lamā' (with the vowel 'a' after 'l', and without putting emphasis on 'm') is in accordance with the well-known recital (of all the reciters except Ḥamzah). Accordingly 'mā' (مَا) is relative pronoun meaning, ''what'' or ''whatsoever''; ''ataytukum'' (اٰتَيْتُكُمْ = I have given you) is its ''aṣ-ṣilah'' (اَلصِّلَةُ = antecedent). Its another recital is ''ātaynākum'' (اٰتَيْنَكُمْ = We have given you). The objective pronoun that should come here is omitted because the phrase ''of Book and Wisdom'', points to it. The whole phrase is the subject, and, ''you must believe in him, and you must aid him'', the predicate. 'la', in 'lamā', denotes beginning of the sentence, while in ''latu'minunna bihi'' (لَتُؤمِنَنَّ بِهٖ = you must believe in him) it is for emphasis and oath. The whole sentence describes the covenant that was made, which would be as follows: 'That which I have given you of Book and Wisdom, then a Messenger comes to you verifying that which is with you, you should believe in that Messenger and aid him without fail.'

There is another syntactical possibility: 'ma' in 'lamā' may be a conditional pronoun, meaning ''when''; and ''you must believe in him'', its answer. The meaning, in this case, would be like this: 'When I have given you of Book and Wisdom and then a Messenger comes to you ... you must believe in him, and you must aid him.' This explanation is rather more appropriate (because it is more common to add 'la' of oath on the ''answer'' of a conditional sentence), and the meaning in this case is cleareer; also it is more usual to put conditional clauses in covenants.

A reciter has recited 'limā' using the vowel 'i' (instead of 'a') for 'l'. In that case 'li' would denote reason, and 'limā ātaytukum' would mean 'because of that which I have given you'. But the first recital has more weight.

The second person plural pronoun ''you'' in ''have given you'' and ''comes to you'', apparently refers to ''the prophets''. But the speech, Do you affirm and accept my compact in this?, indicates that it includes the people of the prophets too; that is, the talk is directed to the prophets only but the order (i.e., covenant) covers their people too. The people are as much obliged to believe in and help the coming Messenger as are the prophets themselves.

The conjuctive ''then'' in the clause ''then a Messenger comes to you'', obviously shows a delay in time; in other words, it was incumbent on a preceding prophet to believe in and help a prophet who would come after him. On the other hand, the verse 3:84 (Say: ''We believe in Allāh and what has been revealed to us and what was revealed to Ibrāhīm ...'') , implies that the covenant was made with each of the preceding and the following prophets for the other — the following prophets too were required to believe in and help the preceding ones. But it is only an inference; the words are silent about this matter — as we shall explain later, Allāh willing.

There are two third person singular pronouns in the clauses, ''you must believe in him, and you must aid him''. Both may refer to the ''Messenger'' who was to come later; there is no difficulty in the idea of one prophet believing in another; as Allāh says: The Messenger believes in what has been revealed to him from his Lord, and (so do) the believers; everyone of them believes in Allāh and His angels and His books and His messengers (2:285). Nevertheless, it appears from the verse: Say: ''We believe in Allāh and what has been revealed to us, and what was revealed to Ibrāhīm ... '', that the first pronoun refers to the Book and the Wisdom that was revealed, and the second one to the Messenger.

The meaning therefore would be as follows: 'You must believe in what I have given you of the Book and the Wisdom, and you must aid the Messenger who comes to you verifying that which is with you.'

QUR'ĀN: He said: ''Do you affirm and accept my compact in this (matter)?'' They said: ''We do affirm'': The question was put for confirmation. ''al-Iqrār'' (اَلْاِقْرَارُ = affirmation; acknowledgement); ''al-iṣr'' (اَلْاِصْرُ = compact, covenant), it is the object of the verb, ''accept''. Literally, the clause means, 'and take my compact in this'. The prophets were to take or make God's covenant; obviously there should be a second party there to enter into covenant with them, and it could be none except their own ummah. The verse therefore means: 'Do you affirm this covenant and have you made this compact of mine with your people? They said: ''We do affirm.''

An exegete has said: Taking God's compact means that the prophets accepted that covenant for themselves. If so, then, ''(Do you) take my compact in this (matter)'', would be an explicative apposition of the preceding clause, ''Do you affirm?'' This explanation is stengthened by their response, as they only said, ''We do affirm'', without saying anything about taking the compact. Accordingly, the covenant would be restricted to the prophets; their ummah would not be included in it. On the other hand, the next directive, Then bear witness, goes against this explanation; obviously one bears witness for or against other than oneself. Also, the next directive (Say: ''We believe in Allāh ... '') uses plural pronoun, We, and not, I, apparently, it is a declaration of faith by the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) for himself and on behalf of his ummah. Therefore, ''taking of compat'' would mean making the compact with the ummah. Although, it may be said that it is these two sentences, Then bear witness, and, We believe in Allāh, which prove the participation of the ummah with the prophets in this compact, while, ''take my compact in this'', is not related to this matter.

QUR'ĀN: He said: ''Then bear witness, and I (too) am of the bearers of witness with you''; Obviously, the witness, as explained above, is borne for or against someone else; therefore, it is concerned both with the prophets and their people. As mentioned above, also the next directive, (Say: ''We believe in Allāh''), proves it. And the context too supports this meaning: The verses were revealed to reprove the People of the Book for their rejecting the message of the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and for ascribing falsehoods to 'Īsā, Mūsā and some other prophets (peace be on them all); and it is in this background that they have been rebuked: Is it then other than Allāh's religion that they seek (to follow)?

Some exegetes have said that the order, ''Then bear witness'', refers to the prophets bearing witness for one another; others have written that this order was given to the angels who were to bear witness, and that it is not concerned with the prophets.

COMMENT: These two meanings, although possibly correct in themselves, cannot be inferred from the verse without an association; and you have seen that the association goes against it.

One of the fine points in this verse deserves special attention. Read the words, Allāh made a covenant with the prophets, in conjunction with the clause, then a Messenger comes to you. You will see that the covenant was made with the prophets for the Messenger. And we have described in the Commentary of the verse 2:213 (Mankind was but one people ...) that messengership is more particular than prophethood, that every messenger is a prophet but not every prophet is a messenger. The verse therefore obviously means that the covenant was made with the rank of prophethood for the rank of messengership — but not vice versa.

Keeping this connotation in view, we may question the comprehensiveness of the explanation given by an exegete that the covenant was made with the prophets that they would believe in each other and would tell one another to believe in each other — the religion is one which all the prophets invite to.

The meaning in fact should be as follows: Allāh made a covenant with the prophets and their people that if Allāh gave them Book and Wisdom and then a messenger came to them, verifying that which was with them, they would surely believe in what he would bring to them and help him; a later coming prophet would help a preceding (or contemporary) messenger by affirming his truth, and a preceding prophet would foretell the coming of a later messenger and enjoin his ummah to believe in him (the coming messenger), affirm his truth and help him in his cause. This covenant thus implies and affirms the Oneness of Divine Religion.

Another exegete has explained the verse as follows: ‘‘Allāh made a covenant with the prophets that they would affirm the truth of Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.) and give their people the good tidings of his advent.’’ This meaning is correct in itself; but it cannot be discerned from the wording of the verse. Of course, we may infer it from the context, as we have explained earlier: The verse is among the ones that argue against the People of the Book, admonishing and rebuking them for their tendency of altering the Books, hiding the signs foretold of the Holy Prophet of Islam, transgressing the limit and turning away from the clear truth.

QUR’ĀN: Whoever therefore turns back after this, these it is that are the transgressors: It puts emphasis on the above-mentioned covenant. The meaning is clear.

QUR’ĀN: Is it then other than Allāh’s religion that they seek (to follow), and to Him submits ... ?: The question arises from the preceding verses. Well, Allāh’s religion is one; it was about that religion that the covenant was made with the prophets and their people; it was incumbent upon the preceding prophets and their people to foretell the advent of the Messenger who was to follow and they had to believe in his message and help him. Well, is it not strange — in this background — the way the People of the Book are behaving? What do they want when they deny your truth? They show the desire to follow the religion. If so, then do they seek a religion other than Islam which is the only Divine Religion? There can be no other explanation why they do not accept your truth, why they do not hold fast to the religion of Islam. Undoubtedly, it was incumbent upon them to accept and follow Islam, because it is.the religion which is based on nature — a religion should not go against nature. Do they need a proof? Then see how all those inhabitants of the heavens and the earth (who have been endowed with sense and intelligence) submit to Allāh — on the level of creation — then let them also submit to him on the level of legislation.

QUR'ĀN: and to Him submits whoever is in the heavens and the earth, willingly or unwillingly: This is the Islam — submission — that encompasses all who are in the heavens and the earth, including the People of the Book, who it says, are not Muslims. The word used here is ''aslama'' (اَسْلَمَ = he submitted), in past tense, which shows that the action has already taken place; in other words, they have already submitted to Allāh.

Obviously, it can only refer to their submission in creative affairs — they cannot go against His decree in matters of creation. It does not refer to Islam in the sense of religion, or in the meaning of belief and worship. The words, ''willingly or unwillingly'', support, nay, prove this explanation.

Keeping the above explanation in view, it appears that the words, ''to Him submits'', gives a proof, a reason, without mentioning, for the sake of brevity, its result and conclusion. The complete talk would be as follows: 'Do they seek to follow a religion other than Islam? But it is the religion of Allāh; whoever is in the heavens and the earth submits to Him and obeys His order. If these People of the Book would accept it, their submission would be done willingly; if they disliked what Allāh has decreed for them and tried to seek something else, the Divine Decree would nevertheless be enforced, however they might dislike it.'

It appears from it that the conjunctive 'wa' (وَ = or) in, ''willingly or unwillingly'', denotes division. The alternatives point to their willing acceptance of what Allāh has decreed for them of the things they like; and their resentment of Divine Decrees in matters they dislike, for example, death, poverty and sickness, etc.

QUR'ĀN: and to Him shall they be returned: It is another reason why they must seek Islam as religion. They are bound to return to Allāh, their true Lord; they would not be able to hide from Allāh or to go to what their disbelief and polytheism leads them to rely on.

QUR'ĀN: Say: ''We believe in Allāh and what has been revealed to us: Allāh enjoins the Prophet to adhere to the covenant which was made with him and the others. He should declare as follows, for himself and on behalf of the believers from his ummah: ''We believe in Allāh and what has been revealed ...''

It is a proof, as we have said above, that the covenant was made with the prophets and their people together.

QUR'ĀN: and what was revealed to Ibrāhīm and Ismā'īl ... and to Him do we submit'': All those mentioned here were prophets from the progeny of Ibrāhīm. The verse implies that the word, ''the tribes'', refers to the prophets from the progeny of Ya'qūb — from the Children of Israel — like Dāwūd, Sulaymān, Yūnus, Ayyūb and others. Then comes the phrase, ''the prophets from their Lord''; it makes the declaration comprehensive, as it covers Adam, Nūḥ and all the others. Then a reference is made to the whole group, saying, ''we do not make any distinction between any of them and to Him do we submit.''

QUR'ĀN: And whoever seeks a religion other than Islam ... shall be one of the losers: It negates and nullifies all that is outside the purview of the said covenant. It further emphasises the obligation of following the terms of the covenant.

TRADITION

The Leader of the faithful ('Alī, a.s.) said: ''Verily, Allāh made covenant with the prophets (who came) before our Prophet that they should inform their people of his advent and his characteristics, give them his good news and enjoin them to affirm his truth.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

Ibn Jarīr has narrated from 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib (may Allāh be pleased with him) that he said: ''Allāh did not send any prophet — Adam and those who came after him — without making a covenant with him about Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.): If he (Muḥammad, s.a.w.a.) was sent when that prophet was alive, he must believe in him and help him; and He enjoined him to make a (similar) covenant with his people.'' Then the Imām recited the verse, And when Allāh made a covenant with the prophets: Certainly what I have given you of Book and Wisdom ... '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: These two traditions explain the verse keeping both the words and the context in view, as we have written above.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) explained this verse as follows: ''When Allāh made a covenant with the people of the prophets — (with) every ummah — for affirming the truth of its prophet and following what they (the prophets) would bring to them; but (the people) did not fulfil it (i.e., the covenant) and neglected much of their laws and altered (it) to a great extent.'' (Majma'u 'l-bayān; al-Jawāmi')

The author says: The above tradition applies the verse to a particular situation; it therefore does not conflict with the explanation given in the Commentary that the verse refers to a covenant made with the prophets together with their people.

The Leader of the faithful (a.s.) said explaining the words: He said: ''Do you affirm ... '': ''He (Allāh) said: 'Do you affirm? And have you made this compact with your people?' They (i.e., the prophets and their people) said: 'We do affirm what Thou hast enjoined us to affirm.' Allāh said: 'Then bear witness over your people in this respect, and I too am one of the bearers of witness with you, over you and your people.' '' (Majma'u 'l-bayān)

Ibn Jarīr narrates from 'Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib that he said about the words, Then bear witness ...: ''Allāh said: 'Then bear witness over your people in this respect; and I too am one of the bearers of witness with you, over you and them. Then whoever turns away from you, O Muḥammad, after this covenant taken from all the people, these it is that are the transgressors, they are the disobedient ones, (steeped) in disbelief.' '' (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: Its explanation has been given earlier.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ''(Allāh) said to them (when they were) in (the state of) particle: 'Do you affirm and accept my compact in this matter?' They said: 'We do affirm.' Then Allāh said to the angels: 'Then bear witness.' '' (at-Tafsīr, al-Qummī)

The author says: The wording of the verse is not in conflict with this explanation, although, as we have said earlier, it is not inferred from its apparent meanings.

It is written in ad-Durru 'l-manthūr concerning the verse, And whoever seeks a religion other than Islam ...: ''Aḥmad and aṭ-Ṭabarānī (in his al-Mu'jamu 'l-awṣaṭ) have narrated from Abū Hurayrah that he said: 'The Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) said: ''The deeds shall come on the Day of Resurrection. So the prayer will come and say, 'O Lord, I am prayer,' and He will say, 'Surely you are on good.' And the alms will come and say, 'O Lord I am alms,' and He will say, 'Surely you are on good.' Then the fast will come and say, 'I am fast,' and He will say, 'Surely you are on good.' Then the deeds will come (one after another) and Allāh will go on saying, 'Surely you are on good.; (until Islam will come and Allāh will say:) 'With thee shall I take today and with thee shall I give.' Allāh says in His Book: And whoever seeks a religion other than Islam, it shall not be accepted from him, and in the hereafter he shall be one of the losers'' '.''

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about this verse: ''It (i.e., Islam) means their believing in the Oneness of Allāh, the Mighty, the Great.'' (at-Tawḥīd; at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: The belief in monotheism requires that the servant should accept, and submit to, whatever Allāh wants him to do. It therefore implies the same thing which has been written in the Commentary. If on the other hand it is explained just as ‘‘not ascribing anyone or anything to Allāh’’, then the willingness and unwillingness (mentioned in a preceding verse) would imply voluntary and compulsory guidances.

There are several other traditions narrated by al-‘Ayyāshī and al-Qummī (in their books) and others, in explanation of the verse, And when Allāh made a covenant with the prophets ... In those traditions the words, you must believe in him, and you must aid him, have been explained as follows: You must believe in the Messenger of Allāh and you must aid the Leader of the faithful — blessings and peace be on them. Obviously, these tradtions refer the former pronoun, him, to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) and the later, him, to the Leader of the faithful (‘Alī, a.s.), without there being any proof or association for it in the wording of the verse.

Nevertheless, a tradition given by al-‘Ayyāshī may solve this problem. He narrates from Salām ibn al-Mustanīr, from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) that he said:

‘‘They have taken for themselves a name, that Allāh named no one with it except ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib — and there has not come its interpretation yet.’’ I said: ‘‘May I be your ransom ! When will its interpretation come?’’ He said: ‘‘When it comes, Allāh shall gather before Him the prophets and the believers, so that they should help him. And it is the words of Allāh, And when Allāh made a covenant with the prophets ... and I (too) am of the bearers of witness with you.’’

This tradition solves the problem. The problem arises if we take those traditions as an exegesis or explantion of the verse [but this tradition shows that they do not purport to give the exegesis; they aim at pointing at its interpretation]. And we have described earlier that interpretation is not meaning of the word, nor a thing related to word. Vide for detail the discourse under the following verse: He it is Who sent down to thee the Book ...[1] (3:7).

How shall Allāh guide a people who disbelieved after their believing, and they have borne witness that the Messenger was true and clear arguments had come to them? And Allāh does not guide the unjust people (86). (As for) these, their reward is that upon them is the curse of Allāh and the angels and of men, all together (87). Abiding in it; their chastisement shall not be lightened nor shall they be respited (88); Except those who repent after that and amend, then surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful (89). Surely those who disbelieve after their believing, then increase in unblief, their repentance shall never be accepted, and these are they that have gone astray (90). Surely, those who disbelieve and die while they are unbelievers, the earth full of gold shall not be accepted from one of them, though he should offer to ransom himself with it; these it is who shall have a painful chastisement, and they shall have no helpers (91).

COMMENTARY

The verses may possibly be connected to the preceding ones dealing with the People of the Book; but apparently they are separate and revealed in another context.

QUR'ĀN: How shall Allāh guide a people ... Allāh does not guide the unjust people: The question shows improbability of the situation; that it is impossible for them to get guidance. The verse ends with the sentence, ''and Allāh does not guide the unjust people''. We have explained somewhere earlier that in such sentences the adjective explains the reason, that is, Allāh does not guide them because they are unjust, and as long as they persist in injustice they will not get Divine Guidance. Of course, they could not be debarred from that guidance if they repented and returned to Allāh.

The clause, ''and they have borne witness that the Messenger was true'': If the verse refers to the People of the Book, then the bearing of witness would refer to their realization that the signs foretold of the awaited prophet perfectly fitted on the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.); and the next clause, ''and clear argument had come to them'', would refer to that reality. If, on the other hand, it refers to those who apostatized after professing Islam, then the ''witness'' refers to their affirmation of the truth of the Prophet — not only a ritual affirmation resulting from ignorance or tribal influence, but the one based on clear understanding, as the clause, ''and clear arguments had come to them'', indicates.

In any case, as the verse contains the clause, ''and they have borne witness that the Messenger was true'', it shows that the disbelief refers to their rejection of Faith after the truth was made clear to them, after the proof was completed against them. They had disbelieved only because they hated the truth, because they haughtily wrangled with the believers and transgressed the limit unjustly. It is this injustice which does not let its people find their way to safety and deliverance.

There is another syntactic explanation given for the clause, ‘‘and they have borne witness’’. It has been said that it is in conjunction with the word ‘īmānihim’ (اِيْمَانِهِمْ = their belief) and it means, ‘who disbelieved after they had believed and after they had borne witness.’ Yet another explanation: The conjunctive, ‘‘and’’, in the clause, ‘‘and they have borne witness’’, has a circumstantial connotation, and the sentence means, ‘while they have borne witness’. In this case it would be a circumstantial clause.

QUR’ĀN: (As for) these, their reward ... nor shall they be respited: We have earlier explained how all the curse returns to such people. For detail see the Commentary of the following verse: ... these it is whom Allāh does curse, and those who curse do curse them (too) (2:159) [1]

QUR’ĀN: Except those who repent after that and amend, then surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful: ‘‘Aṣlaḥū’’ (اَصْلَحُوا = amended, changed to better); it points to sincerity of repentance; that they repent with true heart, by which the impurity of disbelief is removed and their soul is purified by true belief. This word does not refer to doing good deeds; of course, good deeds follow the sincere repentance and are inseparable from it, yet they are not a part of repentance. The clause, ‘‘then surely Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful’’, puts the reason to point to its unspoken result. Its connotation is as follows: then Allāh forgives them and has mercy on them, because Allāh is Forgiving, Merciful.

QUR’ĀN: Surely those who disbelieve after their believing ... are they that have gone astray. Surely those who disbelieve and die ... they shall have no helpers: The two verses together explain the reason of the verse in the beginning, ‘‘How shall Allāh guide a people who disbelieved after their believing.’’ It applies a general rule to a particular case. A man, who disbelieves after truth has been made manifest to him and proof completed against him, and who then does not sincerely return to Allāh, can belong to one of the two categories: Either he is an apostate who disbelieves after believing, then increases in unbelief and goes on transgressing without ever thinking of amending his ways; Allāh shall not guide such a person nor will He accept his insincere repentance, because he does not turn to God with sincerity; he is totally lost, and there is no hope at all of his returning to the right path. Or, he is an unbeliever who dies in his disbelief, in his aversion to truth, without ever repenting; Allāh shall not guide him in the hereafter to the Garden, because he himself never tried to return to his Lord; and there is no substitude for this returning to Lord, for repentance. He therefore will have nothing to offer as ransom, nor will any intercessor or helper intercede on his behalf or help him.

In this context, look at the sentence, ‘‘and these are they that have gone astray ’’. In Arabic it is a ‘‘nominal sentence’’, because its predicate is a nomen agentis, ‘aḍ-ḍāllūn’ (اَلضَّآلُّوْنَ = lit: strayers); such a sentence indicates permanence. Then there is the demonstrative pronoun ‘ulā’ika’ (أُولئِكَ = lit: those) which is used for distant objects; and it shows that they are removed far from mercy of Allāh. Thus there are three modes of emphasis which have been combined here: addition of a separate personal pronoun, ‘‘they’’, use of a noun (nomen agentis) for predicate; and the definite article ‘al’ (اَلْ = the) before the said predicate — all these together prove that they are hardened wrong-doers and transgressors for whom there is no hope of guidance.

Likewise, the last sentence, ‘‘and they shall have no helpers’’, proves that they will not get benefit of intercession — it is the intercessors who shall be the helpers on the Day of Resurrection. We have earlier explained that the use of plural, e.g., intercessors, in the verse 26:101 (So we have no intercessors) proves that there shall be intercessors on the Day of Judgment but the unbelievers shall not be able to avail themselves of their intercession. (See the details in the discourse of ‘‘Intercession’’ under the verse 2:48 [1] .) The same is the import of the plural, ‘‘helpers’’, in this place.

The second verse says that no ransom shall be accepted from them, nor will they get any helper. It is because these things are substitutes, which are used when the original thing is not available. They lost their chance of repentance in this life and there is nothing that can be a substitute of repentance in the hereafter.

It also shows that the clause, ‘‘and die while they are unbelievers’’, implies that they died without repentance. As such, there is no conflict between this apparently exclusive statement and the following verse which says: And repentance is not for those who go on doing evil deeds, until when death comes to one of them, he says. ‘‘Surely now I repent ’’; nor (for) those who die while they are unbelievers. These are they for whom We have prepared a painful chastisement (4:18). In this verse, when death comes, means, when the death approaches and man sees the signs of the next world and his ties with this world are cut off. Obviously at this point of time the door of repentance is closed on him.

‘al-Mil’ ’ (اَلمِلْءُ = a quantity that fills a pot); ‘mil’u ’l-arḍi dhahaban’ (مِلْءُ الاَرْضِ ذَهَباً = a quantity of gold that would fill the earth); in this phrase, the earth is taken for a pot that is filled by gold. It is an imaginative ‘al-isti‘ārah bi ’l-kināyah, (اَلاِسْتِعَارَةُ بِالْكِنَايَةِ = extended metaphor).

TRADITIONS

It is reported in Majma‘u ’l-bayān about the verses, How shall Allāh guide a people ...: ‘‘It is said that the verses were revealed about a man from the Anṣār, al-Ḥārith ibn Suwayd ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit by name; he had treacherously killed al-Mujadhdhar ibn Dhiyād al-Balawī, fled (from Medina), renounced Islam and reached Mecca. Thereafter he felt remorse and sent a message to his people to ask the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) whether he would be allowed to repent. They asked (the Messenger of Allāh); so the verses were revealed: How shall Allāh guide a people who disbelieved after their believing ... Except those who repent after that and amend ... A man from his clan took these verses to him. (Hearing them) he said: ‘I surely know that you are truthful, and the Messenger of Allāh is truer than you, and Allāh is the most truthful of the three.’ So he returned to Medina, repented and his Islam was good. It is reported from Mujāhid and as-Suddī; and the same is narrated from Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.).’’

Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn al-Mundhir have narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās that he said: ‘‘Verily al-Ḥārith ibn Suwayd killed al-Mujadhdhar ibn Dhiyād and Qays ibn Zayd (from Banū Ḍubay'ah) during the Battle of Uḥud, and then went over to Quraysh, and remained at Mecca. Thereafter he sent message to his brother, al-Julās, expressing his desire of repentance, so that he could return to his people. Thereupon, Allāh sent these verses about him: How shall Allāh guide a people ...'' (Then the story continues as above.) (ad-Durru 'l-manthūr)

The author says: This story has been narrated through other chains, and there are many differences among them: For example, 'Ikrimah says that it was revealed about Abū 'Āmir ar-Rāhib, al-Ḥārith ibn Suwayd ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit and Waḥwaḥ ibn al-Aslat (among twelve persons) who had renounced Islam and went over to Quraysh. Later they wrote to their families whether their repentance would be accepted. Then these verses were revealed.

Another example is found in Majma'u 'l-bayān, that the verse, Surely those who disbelieve after their believing, then increase in unbelief ..., was revealed about the eleven companions of al-Ḥārith ibn Suwayd. When al-Ḥārith returned (to Medina), they said: 'We shall remain in Mecca in our disbelief as long as we wished; later on if and when we wanted to return (to Medina) we would return, and there would come for us too what had been revealed about al-Ḥārith.' When the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.) conquered Mecca, some of them re-entered into Islam and their repentance was accepted. And it was revealed about those of them who had died in disbelief, Surely those who disbelieve and die while they are unbelievers ... (This report has been attributed to some exegetes.)

There is a third view that it was revealed about the People of the Book. Others say that the verse, Surely those who disbelieve after their believing, then increase in unbelief ..., was revealed particularly for the Jews, because at first they believed (in Mūsā), then disbelieved in 'Īsā, then increased in unbelief by rejecting Muḥammad (blessings of Allāh be on him and his progeny and the two prophets).

There are other explanations given by other people.

If you ponder on these views, explanations and traditions, you will realize that all are based on personal opinions of the ancient exegetes — as some later ones have remarked. As for the tradition attributed to aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.), it is al-mursalah and weak. Moreover, it is possible for a verse to have more than one cause for its revelation; and Allāh knows better.

COMMENTARY

The connection of the first verse with the preceding ones is not clear; possibly it was not revealed with the remaining verses (which are clearly connected to each other). We had encountered a similar difficulty in deciding the revelation date of the verse: Say:''O People of the Book! come to a word common between us and you ...'' (3:64).

Someone has tried to show its relation with the other verses. He says: The verse like the rest of the talk is addressed to the Children of Israel. Previously they were admonished and rebuked because they loved this world, and preferred wealth and riches to the Divine Religion. Now it says to them: You tell a lie when you claim a special relationship with Allāh and His prophets, and when you say that you are pious and righteous ones. See what the truth is; you love your good property and sit on it refusing to spend from it in Allāh's way. You only spend from undesirable things which you do not care about. But man can never attain to righteousness unless he spends out of what he loves, that is, from good properties; and if you spend out of it Allāh shall preserve it for you and give you its reward in the hereafter.

That is the gist of what he has written; but, as you see, it is stretching the point too far.

As for the rest of the verses, their connection with the preceding one is quite clear.

QUR'ĀN: Never shall you attain to righteousness until you spend (benevolently) out of what you love:''an-Nayl'' (اَلنَّيْلُ = to reach, to attain); 'al-birr' (اَلبِرُّ) means comprehensive good-doing. ar-Rāghib says: '' 'al-bar-r' (اَلبَرُّ = land) is opposite of 'al-baḥr' (اَلبَحْرُ = sea); it led to the idea of spaciousness, and from that is derived 'al-barr' = spaciousness (or comprehensiveness) in good-doing.''

''Good-doing'' is used in an unrestricted sense. It covers the action of heart (like true belief and pure intention) as well as the action of body (like worship of Allāh and spending in His way). (We have used the word ''righteousness'' in translation to convey this comprehensive goodness.) And it is this very sense in which this word has been used in the following verse: It is not righteousness that you turn your faces towards the East and the West, but righteousness is the one who believes in Allāh and the Last Day, the angels and the Book and the prophets, and gives away wealth out of love for Him to the near of kin and the orphans and the needy and the wayfarer and the beggars and for (the emancipation of) the captives, and keeps up prayer and pays the zakāt;

and the performers of their promise when they make a promise, and the patient in distress and affliction and in time of conflicts (2:177).

Reading this verse in conjunction with the one under discussion, one may clearly understand that spending wealth out of love for Allāh is an essential part of righteousness; and making righteousness dependent on this spending shows the utmost importance attached to it particularly. It is because man by nature has too much attachment with the wealth he has gathered; he thinks that it is a part of his being, if it goes then a portion of his life is gone. There is no such difficulty in other acts of worship and good deeds where nothing seems to be lost.

It is not difficult, in view of the above discourse, to see the weakness of an exegete's explanation that 'righteousness is spending from what you love.' Perhaps he thought that the verse is framed in the style of the sentence, 'You cannot get rid of hunger until you eat!' The verse 2:177 is enough to show inaptness of this explanation.

The same verse (2:177) also makes it clear that 'al-birr' has been used in its literal sense, that is, comprehensiveness in good-doing, because it explains it by enumerating all-encompassing good of faith and deed. And it shows the inappropriateness of an explanation that 'al-birr' means bounty and favour of Allāh; or of someone else's interpretation that it means the Garden.

QUR'ĀN: and whatever thing you spend, Allāh surely knows it: It strengthens and gladdens the spenders' hearts. They should know that what they have spent from their cherished wealth and property is not wasted, has not gone unnoticed, because Allāh Who has enjoined them to do so, knows their spending and what they spend.

QUR'ĀN: All food was lawful to the Children of Israel — except that which Israel had forbidden to himself — before the Torah was revealed:''aṭ-Ṭa'ām'' (اَلطَّعَامُ = whatever is eaten); the people of Ḥijāz [in whose language the Qur'ān was revealed] use this word particularly for wheat, and it is this meaning they understand when the word is used without any association. 'al-Ḥill' (اَلْحِلُّ = lawfulness) is opposite of 'al-ḥurmah (اَلْحُرْمَةُ = unlawfulness, prohibition); probably it is derived from 'al-ḥall' (اَلْحَلُّ = to open) which is opposite of 'al-'aqd' or 'al-'aql' (اَلْعَقْدُ , اَلْعَقْلُ = to tie, to bind) — thus lawfulness has a connotation of openness, unrestrictedness. Israel was (the acquired name of) the Prophet Ya'qūb; he got this name because he endeavoured hard in the way of Allāh; the People of the Book say that it means 'one who vanquished God and prevailed against Him'. The Torah says that he wrestled with God in a place called Peniel and vanquished Him [130]. But the Qur'ān rejects it and the reason says that such thing is impossible.

The clause, ''except that which Israel had forbidden to himself,'' is exception from the above-mentioned ''food''. The next clause, ''before the Torah was revealed'', is related to the verb ''was lawful''; it means: Allāh had not forbidden any food to the Children of Israel before the Torah was revealed, except that which Israel had forbidden for himself.

The following sentence, ''Say: 'Bring them the Torah and read it, if you are truthful,' '' indicates that the Jews were not admitting that every food was lawful to them before the Torah was revealed. They had to say so because they did not accept that Divine Laws could be abrogated. (We have described it under the verse 2:106 [131], Whatever signs We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, We bring one better than it or like it.) No wonder, they disputed the words of Allāh where He says: Wherefore for the iniquity of those who are Jews did We disallow to them the good things which had been made lawful to them (4:160).

Likewise, the last verse, Say: 'Allāh has spoken the truth; therefore follow the religion of Ibrāhīm ... '', indicates that they were trying to create doubts in the minds of the Muslims through these denials. They did not admit that every food was lawful to them before the revelation of the Torah; nor that many lawful things were forbidden to them because of their iniquity; and through these denials they disputed the claim of the Messenger of Allāh (which was based on Divine Revelation) that his religion was that of Ibrāhīm, and that it was the natural religion free from excess and shortcoming. The Jews said: ''How can it be true, when Ibrāhīm was a Jew in religion, on the sharī'ah of Torah? How could religion of Ibrāhīm allow what was forbidden in the Torah, when abrogation is not allowed?''

It is clear now that the verse intends to answer the questions which the Jews had put about, and by which they had tried to confuse the

131 See al-Mīzān (Engl. transl.), vol. 2, pp. 42 — 52. (pub.)

Muslims. Obviously, they had not put these questions directly to the Messenger of Allāh (s.a.w.a.), but to the believers during their social contacts. This inference is supported by the fact that the Qur'ān has not mentioned here their objection or question at all, unlike many occasions where it has quoted their sayings before replying. For example, And the Jews say: ''The hand of Allāh is tied up'' (5:64); And they say: ''Fire shall not touch us but for a few days'' (2:80); And they say: ''Our hearts are covered'' (2:88); there are several such verses.

Moreover, the verses 3:99 — 100, coming soon after this talk clearly show that the Jews were trying to mislead the believers through such insidious propaganda: Say: ''O People of the Book! why do you hinder him who believes from the way of Allāh? ... '' O you who believe! if you obey a party from among those who have been given the Book, they will turn you back as unbelievers after you have believed.

In short, the Jews objected as follows: How can your Prophet be true as he accepts validity of abrogation? He says that God had disallowed many lawful things to the Jews because of their iniquity. But it entails abrogation of a previously ordained law, which is not acceptable in case of Allāh. What is unlawful will remain unlawful forever; it is not possible for a Divine Law to change.

Allāh directed His Prophet to answer them as follows: The Torah says that every food was lawful to the Children of Israel before the revelation of the Torah. Therefore bring the Torah and read it if you are truthful in your claim. (All food was lawful ... if you are truthful.) But if you refuse to do so, then you must admit that you have fabricated a lie against Allāh and that you are unjust. (Then whoever fabricates a lie against Allāh after this, these it is that are the unjust.) It will prove to you that I am truthful in my mission. You should therefore follow my religion which is the religion of Ibrāhīm, the upright one; (Say: 'Allāh has spoken the truth; therefore follow the religion of Ibrāhīm, the upright one; and he was not one of the polytheists.'')

The exegetes have variously explained these verses — each in his own way. But all have said that the verses aim to refute the objection of the Jews concerning abrogation — as we have said above.

The strangest explanation (given by one of them) is as follows:

''The verse replies to a Jewish objection regarding abrogation. It appears that the Jews had said: 'O Muḥammad! If you are, as you claim, on the religion of Ibrāhīm and the succeeding prophets, then how is it that you have allowed, for example, camel meat that was forbidden to him and them? And now that you have made lawful what was unlawful to them, you should not claim that you affirm their truth and are on their religion; nor should you especially mention Ibrāhīm.'

''The reply runs as follows: 'Every food was lawful to all people including the Children of Israel. But the Children of Israel had forbidden some things to themselves by indulging into sins and evils, as Allāh says: Wherefore for the iniquity of those who are Jews did We disallow to them the good things which had been made lawful for them ...' (4:160). Therefore, the word, 'Israel' , refers to the whole nation, to all the Children of Israel, not to Israel (Ya'qūb) alone. And such usage in tribes' names is common. The clause, 'Israel had forbidden to himself' , actually means that the Children of Israel indulged in injustice and committed sins, as a result of which Allāh forbade it to them. The clause, 'before the Torah was revealed', qualifies the preceding verb, 'Israel had forbidden to himself'; that is, what the Israelites had forbidden to themselves before the revelation of the Torah. If we take, 'Israel', to mean Ya'qūb alone, then this clause (before the Torah was revealed) would be superfluous, because everybody knows that Ya'qūb had preceded the revelation of the Torah.''

This is the gist of what he has written. Someone else has given the same explanation with one difference. He writes: ''The clause, 'that which Israel had forbidden to himself', means that the Children of Israel had themselves forbidden those things to themselves, making laws of their own, without any revelation from God; in the same way as the Arabs of pre-Islamic days were doing and which Allāh has mentioned in the Qur'ān.''

Both exegetes have strained the words to an intolerable limit, which no knowledgeable person would agree with. They have diverted the whole talk from its proper line. Actually, they were misled in this way because they thought that the clause, ''before the Torah was revealed'', was related to the clause, ''Israel had forbidden'' — while in fact it qualifies the words in the beginning, ''All food was lawful''; and the exception clause, ''except that which Israel had forbidden to himself'', is just a parenthetical clause.

Consequently, there is no reason why ''Israel'' should be interpreted as ‘‘the Children of Israel’’, as they have done, thinking that without it the verse could not be explained!

Now we come to the usage of tribes’ names. It is true that the Arabs say, Bakr, Taghlib, Nizār and ‘Adnān, when they actually mean, the children of Bakr, the children of Taghlib, the children of Nizār and the children of ‘Adnān, respectively. But we have never seen them — at the time when the Qur’ān was revealed — using ‘‘Israel’’ for ‘‘the Children of Israel’’. Nor has the Qur’ān used this word in that sense anywehere else; although it has mentioned ‘‘the Children of Israel’’ in about forty places, including this very verse: ‘‘All food was lawful to the Children of Israel — except that which Israel had forbidden to himself.’’

Let us ask them one thing: What is the difference (according to their explanation) between the two clauses? The Qur’ān refers to them first as ‘‘the Children of Israel’’ and then immediately after that as ‘‘Israel’’. Why this change if both words mean the same? If their explanation is correct, then was it not necessary to use the same word in both places, lest there be any confusion? And confusion was bound to occur; because, from the point of view of these two writers, the whole lot of the exegetes was miled into thinking that Israel refers to Ya‘qūb, not to his children!

The best proof to show that the name ‘‘Israel’’ refers to Ya‘qūb alone, is the singular masculine pronoun, ‘‘to himself’’, used for ‘‘Israel’’. Had ‘‘Israel’’ stood for ‘‘the tribe of Israel’’ or ‘‘the Children of Israel’’, it was essential to say ‘‘to itself’’ or ‘‘to themselves’’.

QUR’ĀN: Say: ‘‘Bring then the Torah and read it, if you are truthful’’: So that it may be seen who is right, I or you. Allāh guides His Prophet to reply them in this way.

QUR’ĀN: Then whoever fabricates a lie against Allāh after this, these it is that are the unjust: Apparently it is Allāh’s talk addressed to His Prophet; accordingly, the aim is to strengthen and gladden the Prophet’s heart, by declaring that it is his enemies, the Jews, who are the unjust, because they fabricate lies against Allāh. It is an indirect adverse allusion to the Jews.

There is another syntactical possibility: It may be a continuation of the reply given to the Jews by the Prophet, although the second person singular pronoun used in the demonstrative pronoun ‘dhālika’ (ذٰلِكَ = this) does not fit this explanation. However, according to this explanation too, the sentence would be just veiled aside, giving the vanquished adversary a chance to save his face — because it does not clearly say that the Jews are the unjust ones. Putting the matter in general terms gives the enemy an opportunity to surrender gracefully.

It is the same style that has been used in the following verse which says: And most surely we or you are on a right way or in manifest error (34:24).

The demonstrative pronoun, ‘‘this’’, in ‘‘after this’’ points to the explanation and proof offered to the Jews.

Why has this proviso, ‘‘after this’’, been added here? Is not he, who fabricates a lie against Allāh, unjust in all circumstances? The fact is that he cannot be called unjust until proof has been clearly explained to him — as some scholars have said. However, the sentence, ‘‘these it is that are the unjust’’, is an exclusive one, and it implies that such fabricators cannot be but unjust.

QUR’ĀN: Say: ‘‘Allāh has spoken the truth; therefore follow the religion of Ibrāhīm ... ’’: As the truth is on my side (in what 1 have told you and called you to), you should follow my religion; also you should admit that camel meat, for example, is a good thing made lawful by Allāh, and that Allāh had forbidden it to you as a punishment for your injustice and transgression — as He has said.

The clause, ‘‘therefore follow the religion of Ibrāhīm’’, is a sort of indirect invitation to follow the Prophet’s religion. It was not mentioned directly because: first, the Jews affirmed the truth of Ibrāhīm’s religion; secondly, the present wording shows that the religion to which they are invited is the upright and natural one — after all, nature does not prevent man from eating good sustenance given by Allāh, including meat.

TRADITIONS

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘Whenever Israel ate camel meat, he felt throbbings of pain in his sides. Therefore, he forbade camel meat to himself. And it was (long) before the revelation of the Torah. When the Torah was revealed, (Mūsā) neither forbade it, nor ate it.’’ (al-Kāfī; at-

Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: An almost similar tradition is narrated through the Sunnī chains. The verbs in the clause, neither for bade it nor ate it, refer to Mūsā (a.s.) whose name, although not mentioned, is clearly understood. The verb, ‘lam ya’kulhu’ (لَمْ يَأْكُلْهُ = did not eat it) may alternatively be read from the paradigm ‘at-taf‘īl’ as ‘lam yu’akkilhu’ (لَمْ يُؤَكِّلْهُ = did not feed it, i.e., did not tell them to eat it). The dictionary, Tāju ’l-‘arūs, says that the verb ‘al-akl’ (اَلْاَكْلُ = to eat) when conjugated on the paradigms of ‘at-taf‘īl (اَلتَّفْعِيْلُ) and ‘al-mufā‘alah’ (اَلْمُفَاعَلَةُ), has the same meaning. It means that ‘at-ta’kīl’ (اَلتَّأْكِيْلُ = to feed) and ‘al-mu’ākalah’ (اَلْمُؤَاكَلَةُ = to eat together) have the same connotation.

COMMENTARY

The two verses are in reply to another objection which the Jews were putting to the believers, because of the ‘‘abrogation’’. Their target, this time, was the change of qiblah from Baytu ’1-Maqdis to the Ka‘bah. We have explained under the verse 2:144 (... turn then thy face towards the Sacred Mosque ...) that the change of qiblah was a very important matter which had profound effect, materially as well as spiritually, on the People of the Book, especially the Jews; apart from the fact that it offended their views about abrogation. That is why they vehemently objected to it and contentions and conflicts between them and the Muslims continued for a long time after the change of qiblah.

It may be inferred from the verses that they had combined two elements in their objection: their aversion to abrogation, and a denial that the new direction of qiblah had anything to do with Ibrāhīm. How could the Ka'bah be considered the qiblah of Ibrāhīm, when Allāh had appointed Baytu 'l-Maqdis as qiblah? This new rule entails abrogation of Ibrāhīm's law — admittedly the true religion — when we know that abrogation is impossible and void.

The verse deals with it as follows: The Ka'bah was appointed as the House of worship long before other houses like Baytu 'l-Maqdis were built. Undoubtedly it was Ibrāhīm who built it and dedicated it for Divine Worship; there are many clear signs, like the standing place of Ibrāhīm, which prove this fact. Baytu 'l-Maqdis, on the other hand, was built by Sulaymān [1] who came centuries after Ibrāhīm.

QUR'ĀN: Most surely the first house ... for the worlds: Meaning of house is well-known; that the Ka'bah was appointed for men, means that it was dedicated in order that people should worship Allāh in that place. It was a means of Divine Worship, helping men and making it easier for them to pray to Allāh, by journey to, or facing towards it; and in various ways turning their attention to Him. All this may be inferred from the phrase ''blessed and a guidance for the worlds''. Also the expression ''one at Bakkah'' hints at it. The word ''bakkah'' (بَكَّةَ) means gathering of people, and its use here points to the fact that there is always a large gathering of people therein who are engaged in circumambulation, prayer and other rites of worship.

The wording however does not show that the Ka'bah was the first House built on the earth or appointed for the benefit of men.

Bakkah — refers to the land on which the Ka'bah stands; it has been given this name because there is always a huge gathering of people there. There are also other explanations: (1) Bakkah is Mecca, the letter 'm' (م) has been changed to 'b' (ب), as it has been done in 'lāzim' (لَازِمْ) and 'lāzib' (لَازِبْ) or 'rātim' (رَاتِمْ) and 'rātib' (رَاتِبْ) etc.; (2) It is a name of the Meccan Sanctuary; or (3) of the Sacred Mosque; or (4) of the area of circumambulation.

[1] It was founded by Dāwūd and completed by Sulaymān. (tr.)

''al-Mubārakah'' (اَلْمُبَارَكَةُ) is on the paradigm of al-mufā'alah (اَلْمُفَاعَلَةُ) from the root word al-barakah (اَلْبَرَكَةُ = abundant good); it has been translated here as 'blessed'; it means bestowal of abundant good on the House, making it blessed. Abundant good covers good of both worlds; but in this verse it has been put face to face with the phrase ''a guidance for the worlds'' and it indicates that the blessing refers to worldly good. The best of such blessings are abundance of sustenance in Mecca, and deep yearning of people to go there for pilgrimage, to present themselves there and to keep it in highest regard. In other words, it would show the fulfilment of Ibrāhīm's prayer:

> O our Lord! surely I have settled a part of my offspring in a valley, uncultivable, near Thy Sacred House, our Lord! that they may establish prayers; therefore make the hearts of some people yearn towards them and provide them with fruits; haply they may be grateful (14:37).

The Ka'bah is a guidance, as it shows the people the way to their happiness in the hereafter, leads them to nobility and Divine Nearness; because, Allāh has designated it for worship, and has prescribed various prayers, acts of worship and rituals to be performed there; also, it has remained the longed for destination of believers and a place of worship for worshippers.

The Qur'ān shows that it was in Ibrāhīm's time — after he had completed the construction of the Ka'bah — that pilgrimage was prescribed for the first time: Allāh says: And We enjoined Ibrāhīm and Ismā'īl (saying): Purify (you two) My House for those who make circuit and those who abide (in it for devotion) and those who bow down (and) those who prostrate themselves (2:125). And He had enjoined Ibrāhīm as follows: And proclaim among men the Ḥajj; they will come to you on foot and on every lean camel, coming from every remote path (22:27). This verse clearly says that this call, this cry, would surely be answered with general acceptance by the people from near and afar, from various clans and tribes.

Also the Qur'ān proves that this divinely-initiated ''symbol'' was firmly established and quite well-known in the days of Shu'ayb (a.s.). Allāh quotes him as saying to Mūsā (a.s.): I desire to marry one of these two daughters of mine to you on condition that you should serve me for eight years (lit.: pilgrimages); but if you complete ten, it will be of your own free will (28:27). He used the word ‘‘pilgrimages’’ for ‘‘years’’. There can be only one explanation for it: the years were counted in terms of pilgrimage, as it happened every year.

Also there are many points in Ibrāhīm’s invocation which show that the House all the time served as a worship centre, was a symbol of guidance. (For detail see ch. 14 — Ibrāhīm).

The Arabs even in the days of ignorance, held the House in reverence and performed its pilgrimage, rightly believing it to be a part of Ibrāhīm’s sharī‘ah. History says that other nations too accorded respect to it. This in itself is a sort of guidance because it fixes man’s mind on remembrance of Allāh. So far as the period after the advent of Islam is concerned, Ka‘bah’s guidance needs no elaboration. Its fame encompasses the East and the West. The Ka‘bah is always present in people’s minds and hearts. The Muslims turn to it every where and at all times: during worship and prayer, while standing or sitting, for slaughtering animals and in a number of other religious affairs.

In this way, the House is a guidance (with all stages of guiding), be it just attention of mind or complete surrender to Allāh — the stage which may be attained only by the purified servants of Allāh — from among those who are free of sin and error.

Moreover, it guides the Muslim’s world to their worldly blessings, because it unifies their goal, unites the ummah and opens for them avenues of benefit and profit. Also it is a guidance for the others, because it makes them appreciate the fruits of this unity and they realize how beneficial it is to unite all separate forces together.

It appears from the above that:

First: The Ka‘bah is a guidance to the happiness of this world and the next; and it encompasses all the stages of guidance. In short, the guidance is general and unconditional.

Second: It is a guidance for the whole world, not for a particular world or special group like the progeny of Ibrāhīm, or the Arabs, or the Muslims. It is because of unrestrictedness of the guidance.

QUR’ĀN: In it are clear signs, the standing place of Ibrāhīm: The ‘‘signs’’ are qualified by the adjective ‘‘clear’’, it particularizes the signs to a certain extent. Yet the ambiguity, the vagueness remains. But the context demands that the distinctions and special qualities of the House be clearly shown, in order that the audience may know why it has got precedence over all other houses of worship. It requires definitive description of its distinctions, free from ambiguous expression or vague depiction. Looking from this angle, it becomes clear that the next phrases and clauses have been put there as classifications of the ''clear signs''. What are the clear signs? They are the standing place of Ibrāhīm, its being a sanctuary and place of safety, and obligatoriness of its pilgrimage for those who can afford.

But it does not mean that the three clauses are in '' 'aṭfu 'l-bayān'' (عَطْفُ الْبَيَانْ = explicative apposition) to the phrase ''clear signs'' or serve as its ''al-badal'' (اَلْبَدَلُ = substitute). Otherwise it would require reconstruction of all the sentences. For example, it will have to be rewritten as follows: ''These signs are the standing place of Ibrāhīm, and safety for those who enter it, and its pilgrimage for him who may afford the journey.'' Thus we will have to reduce a whole sentence (whoever enters it shall be secure) to a single word ''security'' (it makes no difference whether we take that sentence as an imperative or a declarative one), and to change the imperative sentence (and for the sake of Allāh, pilgrimage to the House is incumbent ...) into a declarative one and then setting it in conjunction with the preceding sentence; and this too will have to be reduced to a single word. Alternatively we will have to add 'an' (اَنْ) of maṣdar before both sentences. But the context does not agree with all these alterations.

The fact is that the three sentences are independent; each has a certain connotation — either declarative or imperative — and all three together describe the clear signs. It is as we say: Zayd is a noble man; he is the son of a great father; his house is always open to guests; and we should follow in his footsteps. [Thus the three independent sentences explain the nobility of Zayd.]

QUR'ĀN: the standing place of Ibrāhīm: It is a subject with its predicate omitted; the complete sentence would be, ''There is in it the standing place of Ibrāhīm.'' It is the stone that has the imprint of the feet of Ibrāhīm. It is reported that the stone is fixed in the place now called ''Maqāmu Ibrāhīm'' (مَقَامُ اِبْرَاهِيْمُ = standing place of Ibrāhīm) on the periphery of the circumambulation area [1], facing ''al-Multazam'' (اَلْمُلْتَزَمُ = the Ka'bah's wall between its door and the Black Stone). It is this stone that Abū Ṭālib, the uncle of the Prophet, refers to in his well-known poem:

And the footprints of Ibrāhīm in the stone identify,
With his (i.e., Muḥammad's) feet — when they are bare.

Sometimes this phrase gives the idea that there is in the House — or the House itself — the place where Ibrāhīm stood or stayed for Divine Worship.

Another syntactical possibility: We may say that the implied sentence is as follows, 'In it are clear signs, and they are the standing place of Ibrāhīm, and security and pilgrimage'; but the last words (i.e. 'and security and pilgrimage') have been omitted for brevity because the next sentences allude to them. The next sentences, (and whoever enters it ..., and for the sake of Allāh pilgrimage ...) give imperative connotation, but are constructed as declarative ones.

This verse, therefore, shows one of the wonderful Qur'ānic styles: It uses a talk (which has its own theme) — to serve another purpose — it is placed in such a way as to point to the other meaning too. Thus one sentence serves two purposes without sacrificing either connotation. For example, sometimes it puts direct quotation in an indirect narration: ... everyone of them believes in Allāh and His angels and His books and His messengers: We make no difference between any of His messengers (2:285). Two examples are found in the verse 2:258 (Did you not see him who disputed with Ibrāhīm about his Lord ...) and also 2:259 (Or like him who passed by a town, and it had fallen down upon its roofs ...); and we have pointed to this in the Commentary of the second verse. Other examples are seen in 26:88 — 89 (The day on which neither property will avail, nor sons, except him who comes to Allāh with a heart submissive); and also 2:177 (It is not righteousness that you turn your faces ... , but righteousness is the one who ...) wherein righteousness has been used for ''righteous''; the same modality is seen in 2:171 (And the parable of those who disbelieve is as the parable of one who calls out to that which hears not more than a call and a cry). This modality is used in most of the Qur'anic parables.

[1] Now it is enclosed in a hemispherical glass through which the imprints may be seen. (tr.)

The modality used in this verse, In it are clear signs ... independent of the worlds, which frequently switches from declarative to imperative mood and back, is the same as that employed in the verses: And remember Our servants Ayyūb, when he called upon his Lord: The Satan has afflicted me with weariness and torment. Stamp your foot, here is a cool washing place and a drink. And We gave him his family and the like of them with them, as a mercy from Us, and as a reminder to those possessed of understanding. And take in your hand a bundle of rushes and beat her with it and do not break your oath; surely We found him patient; most excellent the servant! Surely he was frequent in returning (to Allāh) (38:41 — 44).

However, the explanation given above is totally different from that given by some people who speak in term of explicative apposition, and which we have rejected earlier. If one thinks it necessary to treat it as an explicative apposition, then it is far better to treat only one phrase ''the Standing Place of Ibrāhīm'', in this way; and treat the next two sentences as independent ones, which by their meanings point to other two explicative appositions which are deleted for brevity — as we have done. The completed sentence then would be as follows: In it are clear signs, the Standing Place of Ibrāhīm, and the security of the visitor, and the pilgrimage of one who can afford it.

There is no doubt whatsoever that each of the above-mentioned things is a clear sign that leads to Allāh and reminds one of His majesty. What is a sign? It is a thing that points to something else. And there is no sign that may lead to Allāh, may remind His servants of His majesty, greater and clearer in people's eyes than the Standing Place of Ibrāhīm, the sanctuary that provides security to the one who enters it, and the worship and rites which are performed by millions of people year after year and which the alternations of days and nights cannot set aside.

It should be made clear that it is not necessary for a ''sign'' to be a super-natural thing that should contradict the normal system of nature; neither miraculousness is a part of this word's meaning, nor its use in the Qur'ān is confined to this sense. Allāh says: Whatever signs We abrogate or cause to be forgotten, We bring one better than it or like it (2:106). No doubt, abrogated laws of the sharī'ah are included in the meaning of the word, ''signs'', here. Also He says: Do you build on every height a monument (lit. sign)? Vain is it that you do (26:128). There are many such verses in the Qur'ān.

Now you may see how untenable is the position of those who say that only the Standing Place of Ibrāhīm is a ''clear sign'', and that the security and the pilgrimage are not related in any way to the ''clear signs''.

The same is the position of those who insist that the phrase ''clear signs'' refers to various special characteristics of the Ka'bah. (We do not think it necessary to quote them here; whoever so desires, should refer to some detailed books of exegesis.) Such an explanation takes it for granted that ''signs'' means miraculous and super-natural things; but as we have explained just now, there is no evidence to prove it.

The fact is that the sentence ''Whoever enters it shall be secure'', points to a legislative law, not to any creative characteristic. Apparently it is a declarative sentence which refers to a law that was in force since long and had made the House a place of security. This may be inferred from the invocation of Ibrāhīm quoted in the ch.14 (Ibrāhīm) and ch. 2 (The COW). This right of sanctuary was recognized even by the Arabs of pre-Islamic time, and its origin may be traced to Ibrāhīm's days.

Some exegetes have said: The sentence declares that violence and upheaval, turmoil and turbulence cannot happen in, or reach, the sanctuary. But experience refutes this explanation; we know how many battles and wars were fought in that area; how much distance and violence had occurred there — and especially before this verse was revealed. Also the verse 29:67 (Do they not see that We have made a sacred territory secure, while men are carried off by force from around them?) does not show any creative security inherent in the nature of Ka'bah. It only points to the fact that safety and security surrounded the sacred area, because people respected the sanctity of the House and accorded it full honour as it was established by the sharī'ah of Ibrāhīm; thus ultimately it depends on Divine Legislation, on the law ordained by Allāh.

This view is further supported by the invocations of Ibrāhīm as he implored Allāh: My Lord! make this city secure (14:35); My Lord! make it a secure town (2:126). He prayed to Allāh to make Mecca a secure town, and Allāh answered his prayer by promulgating a law to that effect and implanting acceptance of this law in people's hearts so that they could continue respecting this sanctuary generation after generation.

QUR'ĀN: and for the sake of Allāh, pilgrimage to the House is incumbent upon men, (upon) every one who can afford the journey to it: ''al-Ḥijj'' (اَلْحِجُّ), which has also been recited 'al-ḥajj' (اَلْحَجُّ), literally means, to intend, to aim; then it was reserved for intention of, or repairing to, the House in a particular manner laid down by the sharī'ah; 'sabīlan' (سَبِيْلاً = lit.: way; translated here as, the journey) is 'at-tamyīz' (اَلتَّمْيِيْزُ = accusative of specification) related to the verb ''can afford''.

The verse approvingly describes the institution of 'ḥajj' as a law that was ordained for the sharī'ah of Ibrāhīm; as Allāh describes in the verse 22:27, where He mentions His order to Ibrāhīm: And proclaim among men the hall; they will come to you ... It appears from the above, that the modality of the sentence ''and for the sake of Allāh ...'' is the same as that of the preceding one ''and whoever enters it shall be secure''. Each is a declarative sentence which approvingly describes a previously ordained law. Alternatively it is possible to treat both as imperative sentences meant to reconfirm the two Ibrāhīmic laws. But the context obviously supports the first explanation.

QUR'ĀN: and whoever disbelieves, then surely Allāh is Self-sufficient (independent) of the worlds. Disbelief, in this verse, means disbelieving in a law, in a branch of religion; like the disbelief resulting from neglect of prayer or zakāt. The word in this context means neglecting the important law of ḥajj. In this clause, the effect has been used to describe the reason; in other words it says, 'Whoever neglects ḥajj becomes a disbeliever.' On the other hand, the clause ''Allāh is Self-sufficient'' puts the reason in place of effect; that is, he will not cause any harm to Allāh because Allāh is Self-sufficient. The full sentence, therefore, means as follows: Whoever neglects ḥajj becomes a disbeliever, but he, by his disbelief, cannot harm Allāh in any way because Allāh is Self-sufficient and independent of the worlds.

Ibn Shahrāshūb narrates from the Leader of the Faithful ('Alī, a.s.)

about the words of Allāh, Most surely the first house appointed for men ..., as follows: ‘‘A man asked him whether it was the first house (built). He said: ‘No. Surely there were houses (built) before it, but it is the first House appointed for men, blessed, in which there is guidance, mercy and blessing. And it was Ibrāhīm who first built it; then an Arabian group from the (tribe of) Jurhum built it, then it was demolished, so the al-‘Amāliqah rebuilt it; again it fell down and then the Quraysh rebuilt it.’ ’’

Ibnu ’l-Mundhir and Ibn Abī Ḥātim have narrated through the chain of ash-Sha‘bī, from ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, that he said, explaining this verse: ‘‘There were houses before that; but it was the first House made for the worship of Allāh.’’ (ad-Durru ’l-manthūr)

The author says: as-Suyūṭī has also narrated a similar tradition through Ibn Jarīr from Maṭar (ibn Ṭuhmān). And there are numerous traditions of the same theme.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said: ‘‘The land on which the House stands is Bakkah; and the town is Mecca.’’ (‘Ilalu ’sh-sharāyi‘)

The same book quotes the same Imām as saying: ‘‘Bakkah was named Bakkah because people are crowded therein.’’

The author says: ‘‘Yabakkūn’’ (يَبَكُّونَ = they are crowded).

al-Bāqir (a.s.) said: ‘‘Mecca is called Bakkah because men and women are crowded therein; a woman prays in front of you, and on your right, and on your left, and with you, and there is no harm in it (at that place); but surely it is disliked in all other towns.’’ (ibid.)

The same Imām said: ‘‘When Allāh intended to create the earth, He ordered the winds and they agitated the face of water until it produced waves (and) then brought up foam (and froth); so (all of) it became one foam. Then Allāh gathered it in the place of the House (i.e., where the House now stands) and made it a mountain of foam; thereafter He spread out the earth from beneath it. And this is the (meaning of the) words of Allāh: Most surely the first house appointed for men is the one at Bakkah, blessed. Thus the first plot created of the earth is the Ka‘bah; then the earth was expanded from it.’’ (ibid.)

The author says: There are numerous traditions saying that the earth was expanded and extended from beneath the Ka‘bah. There is nothing against the Qur’ān in these traditions. Nor is there any rational reason to refute it — except the ancient philosophers’ theory that the earth was an eternal indivisible element; but that theory has so manifestly been proved wrong that it needs no further exposition.

This narrative explains how and why the Ka‘bah was the first House (i.e., piece of land) of the earth — from traditions’ point of view. But so far as the obvious meaning of the verse is concerned, it supports the first two traditions.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) was asked what were the clear signs mentioned in the verse: In it are clear signs. He said: ‘‘The Standing Place of Ibrāhīm — where he stood upon the stone and his feet left their prints in it, and the Black Stone, and the House of Ismā‘īl.’’ (al-Kāfī; at-Tafsīr, al-‘Ayyāshī)

The author says: There are other traditions of the same meaning. Perhaps the Imām (a.s.) mentioned them as examples, although some of them are not mentioned in the verse.

‘Abdu ’ṣ-Ṣamad said: ‘‘Abū Ja‘far [al-Manṣūr] wanted to buy from (some) Meccans their houses in order to extend the (Sacred) Mosque; but they refused. Then he induced them; they still resisted. So he was frustrated. Then he came to Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) and said to him: ‘I requested these people (to sell to us) some of their houses and compounds, so that we could extend the Mosque; but they have refused; and it has put me into utmost grief.’ Abū ‘Abdillāh (a.s.) said: ‘Why does it grieve you and your proof against them is (very) clear?’ He said: ‘And what should I argue against them with?’ (The Imām) said: ‘With the Book of Allāh.’ He said: ‘In which place (is it explained)?’ (The Imām) said: ‘The words of Allāh: Most surely the first house appointed for men is the one at Bakkah. And Allāh has informed you (in this verse) that the first House appointed for the men is the one that is at Bakkah. Now if they had taken the possession (of the land) before the House (was built) then their plots would belong to them; but if the House was there before them, then it (the Ka‘bah) owns its plot.’ Abū Ja‘far then called them and argued with them accordingly. Thereupon they said: ‘Do whatever you want.' '' (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

al-Ḥasan ibn 'Alī ibn an-Nu'mān says: ''When al-Mahdī built (i.e., extended) the Sacred Mosque, there remained there one house (because of which) the Mosque could not be made square. He asked for it from its owners; but they refused. He asked jurists about it, and all of them told him that he should not include in the Sacred Mosque anything taken by force. Then 'Alī ibn Yaqṭīn said: 'O leader of the faithful! I am writing (a letter) to Mūsā ibn Ja'far (peace be on them both), so that I may tell you what the proper ruling is in this matter.' So he wrote to the Governor of Medina to ask Mūsā ibn Ja'far (peace be on them both) about the house which we wanted to include in the Sacred Mosque but its owners refused (to sell it) — how this problem could be solved? (The Governor) told Abu 'l-Ḥasan (Mūsā ibn Ja'far — peace be on them both) about it. Abu 'l-Ḥasan (a.s.) said: 'Is it necessary to give its reply?' He said: '(Yes), it is a matter that is necessary.' Then (the Imām) said to him: 'Write down: ''In the Name of Allāh, the Beneficent, the Merciful, if the Ka'bah had settled down with the people, then the people have more rights on its courtyard; but if the people have settled down around the Ka'bah, then the Ka'bah has more right over its courtyard.'' ' When the letter reached al-Mahdī, he took it and kissed it, then he ordered to demolish the (said) house. The house owners then came to Abu '1-Ḥasan (a.s.) and requested him to write a letter to al-Mahdī regarding the price of the house. He wrote to him to give them something, so he made them happy.'' (ibid.)

The author says: The two traditions contain a very fine point of argument. It was Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr who began the extension of the Sacred Mosque which was completed during al-Mahdī's reign.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) said about the words of Allāh, and for the sake of Allāh, pilgrimage to the House is incumbent ...: ''(Allāh) means by it the ḥajj and the 'umrah both, because both are obligatory.'' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: al-'Ayyāshī too has narrated it in his at-Tafsīr. This tradition takes the word 'ḥijj' in its literal sense, i.e., to proceed to.

aṣ-Ṣādiq (a.s.) has explained the word, and whoever disbelieves, as ''whoever neglects''. (at-Tafsīr, al-'Ayyāshī)

The author says: ash-Shaykh has narrated this tradition in at-Tahdhīb. We have explained it earlier that disbelief, like belief, has many grades; and that the word, as used in this verse, means disbelieving in — i.e., not complying with — a commandment of the sharī'ah.

'Alī ibn Ja'far narrates from his brother Mūsā (a.s.), a tradition in which he, inter alia, says: ''I said: 'Then whoever among us does not go for ḥajj, is an unbeliever?' (The Imām) said: 'No. But whoever says that it is not so (i.e., it is not obligatory) becomes an unbeliever.' '' (al-Kāfī)

The author says: There are many traditions of the same theme. Disbelief, as explained in this tradition, means rejection and refutation, and the verse could mean it. Thus disbelief has been used here in its literal meaning, i.e., hiding the truth; and it may refer to various grades of disbelief according to various situations.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE KA'BAH

It is mutawātir and definitely known that it was Ibrāhīm al-Khalīl (a.s.) who built the Ka'bah. The residents around it at that time were his son, Ismā'īl, and the tribe of Jurhum (originally from Yemen). It is an almost square building whose sides face the cardinal points of the compass; the winds, no matter how strong, lose their force when they strike it — without doing it any harm.

The construction of Ibrāhīm stood intact, until it was rebuilt by al-'Amāliqah, and later by the tribe of Jurhum (or vice versa), as has been described in the earlier narrated tradition of the Leader of the Faithful ('Alī, a.s.).

When the management of the Ka'bah came into the hands of Quṣayy ibn Kilāb — an ancestor of the Prophet — in the second century before hijrah, he demolished and rebuilt it on firm foundation, putting a roof of doom palm timber and date-palm trunk on it. He also built 'Dāru 'n-Nadwah' (دَارُالنَّدْوَةُ = Council House) on one side. It was the place from where he ruled and where he held counsel with his colleagues. Then he divided various sides of the Ka‘bah among different clans of the Quraysh and each clan built their houses at the side allotted to them; and they opened their doors towards the Ka‘bah.

Five years before the. start of the Prophet’s mission, there came a flood which destroyed the Ka‘bah’s building. The Quraysh divided among themselves the various responsibilities connected with its reconstruction. They hired a Roman mason to build it and an Egyptian carpenter to help him with the woodwork. When the time came to fix the Black Stone, a dispute erupted as to which clan should be accorded the honour of putting the Black Stone in its place. Then they agreed to leave the decision to Muḥammad (s.a.w.a.), who at that time was thirty-five years old — because they had full faith in his deep wisdom and sound judgment. He got his robe, and putting the Stone on it, told all the clans to hold the sides of the robe and raise it together. When the Stone reached the required height (on the eastern corner), he took it in his hands and fixed it in its proper place.

But the Quraysh found their funds exhausted. So they reduced the size on one side — as it is today; thus a part of the original foundation was left out, and that is the portion known as ‘Ḥijr Ismā‘īl’ (حِجْرُ اِسْمَاعِيْلُ = the Enclosure of Ismā‘īl).

The building remained in that condition until ‘Abdullāh ibn az-Zubayr established his rule over Ḥijāz during the reign of Yazīd ibn Mu‘āwiyah. Ḥusayn ibn Numayr, the commander of Yazīd’s army, besieged him at Mecca and struck the Ka‘bah with catapult. The Ka‘bah was demolished, the ‘al-Kiswah’ (اَلْكِسْوَةُ = covering of the Ka‘bah) and some roof timbers were burnt down. The siege was lifted when news came of Yazīd’s death. Ibn az-Zubayr decided to demolish the Ka‘bah completely and rebuild it on its original foundation. He got good mortar from Yemen and constructed the new building. Ḥijr Ismā‘īl was re-included in the Ka‘bah; the door was fixed at the level of the ground; another door was fixed on the opposite side, so that people might enter from one door and go out from the other. He fixed the height of the House at twenty-seven arms. When the building was ready, he covered the whole building with musk and perfume inside out, and put silken Kiswah on it. The construction was completed on 17th Rajab, 64 A.H.

When ‘Abdu ’1-Malik ibn Marwān came to power in Damascus, he sent his commander, Ḥajjāj ibn Yūsuf, who defeated Ibn az-Zubayr and killed him. Entering the Sacred Mosque, he saw what Ibn az-Zubayr had done regarding the Ka‘bah. He wrote to ‘Abdu ’1-Malik about it who ordered him to return it to its previous shape. Ḥajjāj, therefore, demolished six and a half arms from the northern side and rebuilt it according to the plan of the Quraysh; he raised the eastern door and closed the western one; he also filled the inside with the stones that could not be re-used (thus raising the inside floor to the new level of the door).

When the Ottoman Sultan Sulaymān ascended the throne in 960 A.H., he changed the roof of the Ka‘bah. Sultan Aḥmad (who came to power in 1021 A.H.) made some other repairs and alterations. Then came the great flood of 1039 A.H. which demolished parts of its northern, eastern and western walls. Therefore, the Ottoman Sultan Murād IV got it repaired. And the same building continues till this day and it is the year 1375 by lunar hijri calendar, and 1338 according to the solar one.

The Shape of the Ka‘bah: The Ka‘bah is nearly square in shape, built with hard dark bluish-grey stones. It now rises to sixteen metres; but was much lower at the time of the Prophet (s.a.w.a.) as may be inferred from the fact that, on the day of conquest of Mecca, the Prophet raised ‘Alī (a.s.) on his shoulders so that ‘Alī could remove and break the idols that were placed on the roof of the Ka‘bah.

The wall [the northern one that faces the Enclosure of Ismā‘īl and] over which is placed the water trough and the one on its opposite side [the southern one] are ten metres and ten centimetres long; while the [eastern] wall which has the door and the one opposite to it are twelve metres long. The door is placed at a height of two metres from the ground level. The Black Stone is fixed in the [east-south] corner, so that if one wants to enter the door, the Stone would be on his left. This Stone is one and a half metres above the ground level, that is, above the level of the circumambulation area. The Black Stone is a hard rock of irregular oval shape, black with some reddish tint; it has red dots and yellow wavy lines which appeared when some broken pieces were soldered and joined. It has a diameter of about thirty centimetres.

The Ka‘bah’s corners, since ancient days, are called ‘‘al-arkān’’ (اَلْاَرْكَانُ ; pl. of ‘‘ar-rukn’’ اَلرُّكْنُ = pillar); the northern one is called, the Iraqī rukn; the western, the Syrian; the southern, the Yemenite; and the eastern (wherein the Black Stone is fixed), is named the Black. The area between the door and the Black Stone is called ''al-Multazam'' (اَلْمُلْتَزَمُ = lit.: the place where one clings to) because when one circumambulates one adheres to it for invocation and prayer.

The trough fixed over the northern wall, which is called the Trough of Mercy, was an innovation of al-Ḥajjāj ibn Yūsuf; in 954 A.H. Sultan Sulaymān changed that with a silver one; that too was replaced by Sultan Aḥmad in 1021 A.H. with another one of enamelled silver with golden designs. In 1273 A.H. Sultan ‘Abdu ’1-Majīd replaced it with another one made of gold, and it is the present one.

Facing the northern wall is a wall — half circle in shape. It is called, al-Ḥaṭīm. It is like a bow whose two ends face the northern [Iraqī] and the western [Syrian] rukns; there is a gap of two metres and three centimetres between the ends of the bow and the said rukns. The wall, al-Ḥaṭīm, is one metre high and one and a half metres wide. It is panelled with carved marble. The distance between the centre of al-Ḥaṭīm and the centre of the northern wall of the Ka‘bah is eight metres and forty-four centimetres. The area covered by al-Ḥaṭīm and the northern wall is known as Ḥijr Ismā‘īl [Enclosure of Ismā‘īl]. About three metres of this space was included in the Ka‘bah built by Ibrāhīm (a.s.); and the remaining area was the pen for sheep of Hājirah and her son. It is said that Hājirah and Ismā‘īl are buried in the same Enclosure.

The changes and alterations that were done inside the Ka‘bah, and the rituals and sunnah rites connected with the House are not so necessary to be described here.

The Covering of the Ka‘bah: We have described, in the chapter of ‘The Cow’, in the traditions relating the story of Hājirah and Ismā‘īl and their settlement at Mecca, that Hājirah hang her mantle as a curtain on the door of the Ka‘bah when its construction was completed.

As for the covering of the House itself, it is said that the first to cover it was the Tubba‘ [1] Abū Bakr As‘ad, who hang on it the sheets embroidered with silver threads. His successors followed this custom. Then people started covering it with sheets of various kinds — putting one upon the other. Whenever a covering looked old, a new one was put over it. This continued until Quṣayy came on the scene. He imposed a tax on the Arabs for putting a new covering every year. This system continued in his descendants. Abū Rabī‘ah ibn al-Mughīrah used to put a covering one year and all the clans of Quraysh did so the next year.

[1] Tubba‘ — was the title of the Kings of Yemen. (tr.)

The Prophet covered the House with Yemenite sheets. This custom continued. When the ‘Abbāside caliph al-Mahdī went for pilgrimage, the attendants of the House complained to him about the coverings that had accumulated on the roof of the Ka‘bah. They said there was a danger of the roof collapsing down because of that load. The King ordered that all the old covernings should be removed and that every year a new covering should replace the old one — and that custom is followed uptil now.

The Ka‘bah is draped from inside too. The first to do so was the mother of ‘Abbās, son of ‘Abdu ’l-Muṭṭalib — she had done so because of a vow she had taken regarding her son — ‘Abbās.

Prestige of the Ka‘bah: The Ka‘bah was held in high esteem by various nations. The Hindus respected it, believing that the spirit of Siva, the third person of their Trimurty, entered into the Black Stone, when he was accompanied by his wife visited Ḥijāz.

The Sabaeans of Persia and Chaledonia counted it as one of their seven holy sanctuaries [1]. Many of them said that it was the House of the Saturn — because it was the most ancient, and the longest in existence.

The Persians too respected the Ka‘bah, believing that the spirit of Hormoz was present therein; they sometimes went for its pilgrimage.

The Jews honoured it and worshipped God there according to the religion of Ibrāhīm. There were many pictures and images in the Ka‘bah, including those of Ibrāhīm and Ismā‘īl which had divining arrows in their hands. Also there were pictures of the virgin Mary and Christ — which indicates that the Christians too respected the Ka‘bah like the Jews.

The Arabs held it in the highest esteem; they believed that it was the House of Allāh, and came to its pilgrimage from every place. They believed the Ka‘bah to be built by Ibrāhīm and the ḥajj to be a part of his religion which had come to them as his legacy.

[1] The seven sanctuaries were: (1) The Ka‘bah; (2) Mars — on the summit of a mountain in Iṣfahān; (3) ‘‘Mandūsān’’? (مندوسان) in India; (4) Naw Bahār in Balkh; (5) House of Ghamdān in San‘ā; (6) Kawsān in Farghānā, Khurāsān; and (7) a House in Upper China. (Author’s Note)

Trusteeship of the Ka‘bah: The trusteeship was in the hands of Ismā‘īl; and after him it remained in his descendants. Then the Jurhumites became more powerful and took over the trusteeship. They in their turn were vanquished after several wars by the ‘Amāliqah, who were a part of Banū Karkar. The ‘Amāliqah resided at the lower section of Mecca while the Jurhumites had settled in its upper section. They had their own Kings.

Later on, the Jurhumites defeated the ‘Amāliqah and regained the trusteeship, which remained with them for about three hundred years. They extended the area of the House and increased its height.

Gradually the Ismā‘īlites grew in number and gained power; and they found the place too congested and over-populated. Then they fought the Jurhumites, defeated and expelled them from Mecca. The leader of the Ismā‘īlites at that time was ‘Amr ibn Laḥiyy, the chief of the clan of Khuzā‘ah. He became over-lord of Mecca and took over the trusteeship of the Ka‘bah. It was he who put idols in the Ka‘bah and called people to worship them. The first idol he put there was Hubal which he had brought from Syria; then he brought others. Gradually there were a lot of idols, and idol-worship spread among the Arabs; the upright religion of Ibrāhīm was discarded.

Shaḥnah ibn Khalaf al-Jurhumī refers to this episode, when he addresses ‘Amr ibn Laḥiyy in the following ode:

O ‘Amr! you have invented various gods;
At Mecca — idols around the House.
And there was for the House One Lord from ever;
But you have made for it several lords (which are now worshipped) by the people.
Surely you should know that Allāh is in no hurry;
Soon He will choose for (His) House stewards other than you.

The trusteeship remained in the clan of Khuzā‘ah upto the time of Ḥalīl al-Khuzā‘ī. He nominated his daughter (who was married to Quṣayy ibn Kilāb) to succeed him, and gave the right of opening and closing the door to a man from his clan, Abū Ghabshān al-Khuzā‘ī by name. Abū Ghabshān sold his right to Quṣayy ibn Kilāb for a camel and a skinful of liquor. The proverb, ‘‘More loss incurring than the deal of Abū Ghabshān’’, alludes to this sale.

The trusteeship was thus transferred to the Quraysh. Quṣayy rebuilt the House, as we have mentioned above. The things continued as they were, until the Prophet conquered Mecca, and entering the Ka‘bah ordered the pictures to be effaced, and the idols to be thrown down and broken.

The Standing Place of Ibrāhīm — the stone with the imprints of Ibrāhīm’s feet — was at first put in a kneading trough near the Ka‘bah; then it was buried in the place where it is at present. It has a dome on four pillars where the people offer their prayers after the circumambulation.

There are a lot of details of various aspects of the Ka‘bah and other religious buildings attached to it. We have described here only the things which are necessary for understanding the verses of ḥajj and the Ka‘bah.

One of the especialities of this House — which Allāh has blessed and made a guidance — is that no Muslim group has ever disagreed about it or its prestige, honour and respect.

COMMENTARY

The verses as is evident from themetic continuity, indicate that the People of the Book (a group of them — i. e., the Jews — or a group of the Jews) disbelieved in the Divine Revelation, and hindered the believers from the way of Allāh by trying to show that it was a crooked and unright way, and presenting to them the actually crooked misleading way as the way of Allāh. They did so by creating doubts in the believers' minds, in order that the believers would see the truth as falsehood and the falsehood (to which they invited them) as truth. The preceding verses had pointed to the Jews' deviations, for example, their denial of the fact that all food was lawful to them before the revelation of the Torah, and their rejection of the abrogation of the previous qiblah, that is, Baytu 'l-Maqdis.

These verses therefore put the finishing touches to the preceding ones which had described the lawfulness of all food before the Torah and declared that the Ka'bah was the first House appointed for the men. Now these verses admonish the Jews because they were constantly trying to create doubts and mislead the believers; also the verses warn the believers against following the advice of those unbelievers, because if they listened to their call, they would themselves become unbelievers; then they exhort and encourage them to hold fast to Allāh so that they would be guided to the path of true faith and their guidance would continue for ever.

It has been narrated by Zayd ibn Aslam (as as-Suyūṭī has reportedly [1] written in Lubābu 'n-nuqūl) as follows:

''Shāsh ibn Qays, a Jew, saw some people of the tribes of Aws and Khazraj engaged in (friendly) talk, and he was incensed by what he saw of their friendship and unity after their (hereditary) enmity. Therefore, he ordered a young Jew (who was with him) to sit with them and remind them of the Battle of Bu'āth. He did and they started boasting and quarelling with each other. The argument continued until two men — Aws ibn Quraẓī from the Aws and Jabbār ibn Sakhr from the Khazraj — jumped up and abused each other; the two groups were enraged and stood against each other for fighting. The news reached the Messenger of
